Glorine "Minnie" Guerrero

May 23, 1935 – November 2, 2017

Thank you to all those who supported the family in our time of need. We appreciate the encouraging words, and acts of kindness in the loss of our mother. We are comforted to know that she was an inspiration to many people on the reservation. She will be greatly missed.

Billie Jean, Ronald, John, and Bobby Guerrero and families.

May hope forever wipe away your tears,

And, above all,

*May silence make you

Dennis Banks

American Indian Movement co-founder, activist, author and teacher Dennis Banks died at 80 years of age from pneumonia he had contacted following open-heart surgery on October 29, 2017.

Dennis, an Ojibwa/Anishinabe from Leech Lake Reservation in Minnesota, was known as one of the co-founders of the American Indian Movement (AIM) with George Mitchell and Clyde Bellecourt.

Joined by fellow AIM activist Russell Means, they participated in the Wounded Knee occupation during which federal agents fought against Native occupiers for 71 days that resulted in the deaths of two tribal members and seriously wounding a federal agent.

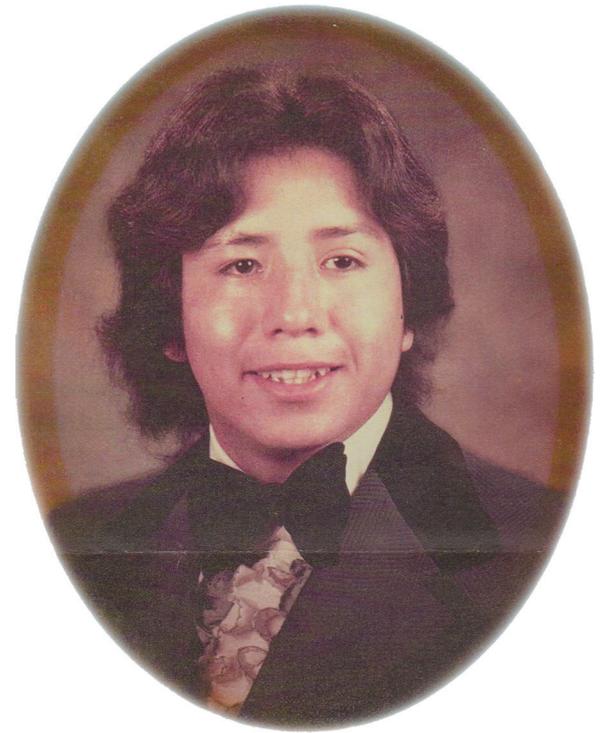

They were charged in 1974 for their participation in the occupation but the presiding federal court judge dismissed the charges on the grounds of federal misconduct.

On April 12, 2012, Dennis received a Living Legends Award in Washington D.C. for his "contributions as a co-founder of the American Indian Movement and his commitment to the well being of the American Indian community."

As a teacher, Dennis Banks taught at D-Q University in Davis, Calif. in the 80's but was later incarcerated on charges stemming from the infamous "Custer riot" in 1973. After serving an 18-month term, he worked as a drug and alcohol counselor at Pine Ridge Reservation and continued his activism fighting for Native gravesite protections and repatriation, and legislation to protect these sites.

Dennis also participated in The Longest Walk, a traditional and spiritual journey from San Francisco to Washington DC. Aspects of the longest walk are still celebrated annually.

In addition to his activism, Dennis appeared in movies such as War Party (1988), The Last of the Mohicans (1992), Thunderheart (1992), and Older Than America (2008). As a musician he released Still Strong (1993) and teamed up with Peter Gabriel on Les Musiques du Monde and with Golden Globe and Grammy Award-winning artist Kitaro on the CD Let Mother Earth Speak.

Armellio Milton Barlese

"Julio", 56, passed away on December 17, 2017 following a long illness. He was born on March 3, 1961 and he was a lifelong resident of Pyramid Lake.

Julio was one of five students who were the first to graduate in 1981 from Nixon High School that was housed in the building now used by the Water Resources Dept.

When Julio married Donna, she bought a formal wedding gown but they decided for a simple ceremony so Donna wore a red dress. Later he wanted her to wear the wedding gown so they married again in a more formal ceremony.

He loved the lake and would take Chris and Misty with him to the lake. When he became ill, he continued to travel with Donna and Jacob.

Julio is survived by wife, Donna, children Claudia Pete, Misty, Christopher, Dustin, Derrick; stepchildren Donetta and Mark; grandchildren Jacob and Jayden; mother Janice and brothers David and Dion, and several nieces and nephews. He is preceded in death by his father Milton, sister Ann, brother Billy and niece Lauren.

Services were held on December 22 at the Nixon Gym, officiated by his uncle Marty Barlese, and eulogy offered by Kimber Brown. Burial was at the Nixon Cemetery.

The family wishes to thank the Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe and everyone who offered their support and kind words of comfort and prayer.

In August 2016, he was the vice presidential nominee on the Peace and Freedom Party, a socialist political party in California.

In a 2013 interview with Indian Country Today, Dennis said, "There's always going to be a need for change whether it's the American Indian Movement or Idle No More. Whether it's now or 10 years from now, we're always going to need those people to go out and confront the issues and take a stand even if we all become doctors and lawyers and senators and congressmen, even if we all become millionaires. There will still be a need to tell America that there are some very important contracts that were made in the 1700s and 1800s that deal with our land."

Dennis was buried in his home reservation at Leech Lake with traditional services.

Native American Testimony: Premonitions and Phophecies

HE WILL USE ANY MEANS TO GET WHAT HE WANTS

Dan Katchongva—his Hopi surname means White Cloud Above Horizon—was a revered spiritual leader from Hotevilla, Arizona. When he repeated this prophecy in 1955, during testimony at a Washington congressional hearing, he was in his eighties. Hopi often mention the Bahana, the Hopi's lost white brother, who vowed to return to the Hopi to establish peace and spread wisdom. Some Hopi say they wait for him still.

IN ANCIENT TIMES it was prophesied by our forefathers that this land would be occupied by the Indian people and then from somewhere a White Man would come. He will come either with a strong faith and righteous religion which the Great Spirit has also given to him, or he will come after he has abandoned that great Life Plan and fallen to a faith of his own personal ideas which he invented before coming here. It was known that the White Man is an intelligent person, an inventor of many words, a man who knows how to influence people because of his sweet way of talking and that he will use many of these things upon us when he comes. We knew that this land beneath us was composed of many things that we might want to use later such as mineral resources. We knew that this is the wealthiest part of this continent, because it is here the Great Spirit lives. We knew that the White Man will search for the things that look good to him, that he will use many good ideas in order to obtain his heart's desire, and we knew that if he had strayed from the Great Spirit he would use any means to get what he wants. These things we were warned to watch, and we today know that those prophecies were true because we can see how many new and selfish ideas and plans are being put before us. We know that if we accept these things we will lose our land and give up our very lives.

WHITE RABBIT GOT LOTSA EVERYTHING

In 1939, Lucy Young, a member of the Wintu tribe of northern California, was nearly blind from cataracts and over ninety years old at the time of her story that she recalls probably took place in the 1840s.

MY GRANDPA, before white people came, had a dream. He was so old he was all doubled up. Knees to chin, and eyes like indigo. Grown son carry him in great basket on his back, every place.

My grandpa say: "White Rabbit"—he mean white people—"gonta devour our grass, our seed, our living. We won't have nothing more, this world. Big elk with straight horn come when white man bring it." I think he means cattle. "Nother animal, bigger than deer, but round feet, got hair on his neck." This one, horse, I guess.

My aunt say: "Oh, Father, you out your head, don't say that way."

He say: "Now, Daughter, I not crazy. You young people gonna see this."

People come long way, listen to him dream. He dream, then say this way, every morning.

They leave li'l children play by him. He watch good. Have big stick, wave round, scare snake away. He had good teeth. All old people had good teeth.

One time they travel, they come to big pile of brush. My grandpa stop, and look at it. He say: "This, good wood. When I die, burn my body to ashes on top of ground. Here gonta be big canoe, run around, carry white people's things. Those White Rabbit got lotsa everything."

"How canoe gonta run round on dry ground all round here?" we askum. "Don't know," he say. "Just run that way." He mean wagon, I guess.

I never grow much. They call me li'l Shorty," but I know pretty near everything that time. My grandpa put his head on my head, smooove my hair, and hold his hand there.

"Long time you gonta live, my child," he say. "You live long time in this world."

Well, I live long enough. I guess 'bout ninety-five next summer, if I living till then.

My grandpa never live to see white people, just dreaming every night 'bout them. People come long way, listen [to] him dream.

My grandpa move down by big spring. One day he couldn't get up. He say: "I gonta leave you today. I used to be good hunter, kill bear, elk, deer, feed my children. Can't feed my children no more. Like old root, just ready for growing now. Pretty soon dead. Speak no more."

All seem like dream to me. Long, long ago. Night-time he die, and in morning, all tied up in deerskin with grass rope. Sit up knees to chin, They tie him up too soon. He roll over, and come back. Scare everybody. He ask for water, and ask for packstrap to basket always carry him in. He ask for li'l basket he always use for cup. He drink lots.

"I starve for water, and want my strap," he say. "That's why I come back."

Then he die. Our people dig big hole, put stick across. Put brush. Put body in. Put more brush. Burn all to ashes. They put basket and strap, too, with him, when he go where people go at last.

EASY LIFE OF THE GRAY-EYED

The old Acoma Pueblo in New Mexico stands atop a steep rocky mesa 357 feet high where James Paytiamo spent his childhood there and the existence of the white man was an established fact. What the old Acoma caciques, or headmen, seem to foretell here are the destructive influences white culture will have on the traditional Acoma way of life.

I CAN JUST REMEMBER the old men of my village. Old age was simply a delightful time, when the old men sat on the sunny doorsteps, playing in the sun with the children, until they fell asleep. At last they failed to wake up.

These old, old men used to prophesy about the coming of the white man. They would go about tapping with their canes on the adobe floor of the house, and call to us children:

"Listen! Listen! The gray-eyed people are coming nearer and nearer. They are building an iron road. They are coming nearer every day. There will be a time when you will mix with these people. That is when the Gray Eyes are going to get you to drink black, hot water, which you will drink whenever you eat. Then your teeth will become soft. They will get you to smoke at a young age, so that your eyes will run tears on windy days, and your eyesight will be poor. Your joints will crack when you want to move slowly and softly.

You will sleep on soft beds and will not like to rise early. When you begin to wear heavy clothes and sleep under heavy covers, then you will grow lazy. Then there will be no more singing heard in the valleys as you walk.

When you begin to eat with iron sticks, your tones will grow louder. You will speak louder and overtalk your parents. You will grow disobedient. Then when you mix with these gray-eyed people, you will learn their ways, you will break up homes, and murder and steal."

Such things have come true, and I compare my generation with the old generation. We are not good as they were; neither are we healthy as they were.

How did these old men know what was coming? That is what I would like to know.

THE SPIDER'S WEB

Black Elk, an Oglala Sioux holy man, had seen his tribe transformed from buffalo-hunting lords of the Great Plains to hungry, impoverished prisoners, pent up on thirteen government reservations. At the age of nine, Black Elk had gone into a trance and experienced a wondrous vision in which the Six Grandfathers—West, East, North, South, Earth, and Sky—granted him unusual spiritual powers. Thereafter he was dedicated "to bringing to life the flowering tree of his people" by revitalizing the seven sacred rights of the Oglala. Black Elk remembers the ominous dream of an earlier Sioux medicine man.

A LONG TIME AGO my father told me what his father told him, that there was once a Lakota [Sioux] holy man, called Drinks Water, who dreamed what was to be; and this was long before the coming of the Wasichus [white men]. He dreamed that the four-leggeds were going back into the earth and that a strange race had woven a spider's web all around the Lakotas. And he said: "When this happens, you shall live in square gray houses, in a barren land, and beside those square gray houses you shall starve."

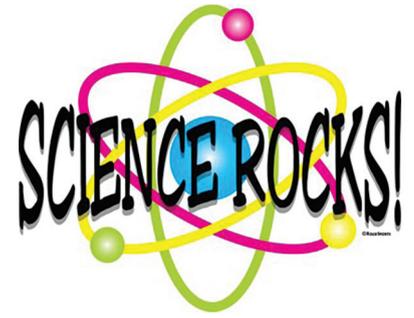

They say he went back to Mother Earth soon after he saw this vision, and it was sorrow that killed him. You can look around you now and see that he meant these dirt-roofed houses we are living in, and that all the rest was true. Sometimes dreams are wiser than waking.

Happy Holidays

Mr. Bridge-water's Environmental Science class and Ms. Neil senior History class attended a one day youth summit at UNRs Desert Research Institute.

The summit was part of the "Native Waters on Arid Lands" regional confer-ence held at the Nugget in Sparks. The students listened to climate change issues affecting Native Lands and it peoples from people as far away as Navajo Tech. University.

In addition, four students were invited to attend two days the actual scientific conference. They listened to current research being done on climate change issues that affect native lands and were able to interact with adults that are on the cutting edge of this issue.

We all came away with a better understanding of the impact of climate change and were able to observe how members of different tribes face the same problems and what they have done that has been successful.

Interior's Top Ten Priorities

In the last issue of Numuwaetu Nawahana, the new Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke was introduced. There was some doubt as to whether he would truly be the guardian of the country's public lands or would he endorse Trump's idiocy.

On December 4th Secretary Zinke was on hand to witness Donald Trump as he thoughtlessly reduced two national monuments: Bears Ears by 85 percent and the Grand Staircase-Escalante by over 50 percent (see page 15). Two of the most beautiful places in Southwest Utah will now be open so that the Republican's corporate masters can drill, mine, frack, bulldoze, pollute, and basically destroy the land.

Trump knows nothing but concrete and asphalt, whereas Zinke might have had his equilibrium shifted by the corporate-minded gnomes lurking in the high echelon offices of the Interior Department.

Ecowatch published Interior's "Top 10 Priorities", their 2018-2022 Strategic Plan with some native-oriented editing.

1. Create a conservation stewardship legacy second only to Teddy Roosevelt. Not. Interior wants to strip protections from more than 11 million acres of public lands; 218 acres of marine environment; dismantle wildlife refuges, and undermine laws protecting endangered animals.

2. Sustainably develop our energy and natural resources. Not. Interior cancels the 2016 moratorium on new coal leases; the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) announced a new round of coal leasing in Wyoming's Powder River Basin; announced offshore oil and gas leases in a 77 million-acre region of the Gulf of Mexico still recovering from the 2010 Deepwater Horizon disaster; and recommended the opening of the Pacific Natural Monument to commercial fishing.

3. Restore trust and be a good neighbor. Not. Closed-door dealings; refused to release the national monuments report; suspicious relationships with Political Action Committees; and the special attention to corporate energy interests.

4. Ensure [that] tribal sovereignty means something. Not. Actions speak louder than words and starting with the BIA budget cuts (see last issue) not exactly ensuring meaningful tribal sovereignty; making changes in the Cobell settlement agreement then pretending to consult the tribes; ignoring the tribes living on both sides of the proposed U.S.-Mexican border wall, and eliminating discretionary grants deemed unnecessary for reclaiming abandoned mining sites many located on Indian lands, especially the dangerous uranium mining sites—to start.

5. Increase revenues to support the department and national interests. Highly questionable. Zinke is seeking to cut Interior's budget: 11 percent from the National Park Service; 13 percent from BLM, U.S. Fish & Wildlife; Bureau of Reclamation; U.S. Geological Survey, and nearly half from the Office of Surface Mining and Reclamation. To make up for the budget cuts, he's pushing for drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge while cancelling a rule that would require energy companies to pay the fair market value for oil, gas, and coal they extract from public lands and that would create a shortfall of about $75 million in revenue. However, to make up for that loss he wants to triple the entrance fees to the national parks. Better yet, the Zinke announced the government's plan to "have more public-private partnerships" running the National Park Service (NPS) after Trump cut $360 million from NPS's budget. Privatizing the national parks seems agreeable to Zinke who once said, "I don't want to be in the business of running campgrounds."

6. Protect our people and the border. Not. Although Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection has jurisdiction over the infamous border wall, Zinke's Interior should be concerned about the devastating effect it would have on the wildlife and habitat, including endangered species, several national wildlife refuges and tribes living on both sides of the border.

7. Strike a regulatory balance. Not. As directed by Trump's "Promoting Energy Independence and Economic Growth" the Interior Department has issued a report identifying policies that are potentially "burdensome" on the domestic energy production of natural resources. Targeted are protections for wildlife and habitat; scientific consultation to protect endangered species; protected designation for public land and waters; public planning and appeals processes; and legislative and administrative requirements for permitting, exploring, siting, developing and transporting fossil fuels.

8. Modernize our infrastructure. Not. Despite the requested $1.6 billion cut in Interior's budget, the National Park Service has a $12 million maintenance backlog and the National Wildlife Refuge System has a $2.7 million backlog. If federal projects like roads and bridges ever get built they may not withstand the impacts of climate change. Trump cancelled that order so such projects might be built faster but may not withstand the next big storm.

9. Reorganize the department for the next 100 years. Doubtful. More than 50 senior staff members have been "involuntarily reassigned" to positions for which they have no expertise or experience. One scientist was move to an accounting position after he mentioned the dangers that climate change poses to Native communities in Alaska. Zinke wants "an estimated reduction of roughly 4,000" full-time employees and is planning on transferring hundreds more by moving the headquarters of three agencies from Washington, DC to Denver.

10. Achieve our goals and lead our team forward. Not. After comparing his staff to pirates and says that "30 percent of the crew that's not loyal to the flag", it's questionable if Zinke's goal for moving the department forward can be achieved. A recently resigned employee said that morale at Interior is "in the toilet" and employees are constantly "looking over their shoulder". It appears that in keeping with Trump's agenda, employees are going to have to adapt a totally different attitude towards their jobs as stewards of America's natural resources.

Indian Givers Strike

National Monuments Under Attack

Nevada's Gold Butte National Monument was 1-year-old on December 28 and the Indian Givers are proposing to reduce it—just like Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante in Utah. Why? Could it be Gold Butte has some secret minerals under all those acres of sandstone? Maybe it's because they don't like the Southern Paiutes wanting to preserve their ancient homeland that was made possible by President Obama.

Even Nevada's Attorney General Adam Laxalt didn't want the monument. He and several Republican congressmen opposed its designation and want it revoked by Congress.

Laxalt has decided to run for Governor of Nevada in 2018.

The only reasonable explanation is the Republican's unreasonable hatred for President Obama. Their unstable leader spent the entire year undoing whatever Obama did—beginning with the Dakota pipeline where multiple tribal groups peacefully demonstrated their opposition only to get beaten up—literally.

Just four months in office, Trump signed an executive order directing Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to examine any national monument created as of January 1, 1996 and has at least 100,000 acres. Zinke selected 27, including Katahdin that is 87,500 acres and was donated by the St. Clair family foundation and is currently managed by the Forest Service.

Located in southeastern Nevada, the Gold Butte monument contains nearly 300,000 acres of desert that has ancient Indian petroglyphs and dwellings dating back 12,000 years and are culturally sacred to the local Paiutes. Over the years many of their cultural sites have been vandalized as well as other historic sites including the ghost town of Gold Butte.

The Paiutes, local conservation groups, Nevada and Clark County lawmakers, Congresswoman Dina Titus and former Senator Harry Reid campaigned for the area's protection under the Antiquities Act.

With the monument designation, the area is now closed to industrial development. In 1998, Clark County bought out the area's grazing permits, retired them and no new permits will be issued. The monument will permit development and maintenance of existing water rights and transportation infrastructure, but prohibits future claims.

There are multiple federal jurisdictions within the monument boundary: the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) which manages it, the National Park Service (NPS), and the Bureau of Reclamation (BuRec) so there is the possibility that Gold Butte will be used for land and mineral exchange—a method where one agency will exchange sections of land with another agency to consolidate jurisdiction over a specific area.

and wildlife corridor essentially connecting the national recreation area of Lake Mead and Grand Canyon's Parashant Monument

The monument status will provide protection to numerous wildlife species, including desert tortoise, desert bighorn sheep, the banded Gila monster, great horned owls and a great variety of reptiles, birds and mammals. It will eliminate uncontrolled off-road vehicle use that tears up easily damaged soils and the desert tortoise habitat. It will also prevent irresponsible vehicle use; vandalism, theft of Indian artifacts and littering that have been destroying the landscape, rock art and other archaeological sites.

Bears Ears National Monument

Uranium. That is the real reason those Indian Givers took back 85 percent of Bears Ears on December 4, 2017.

It wasn't about correcting the "massive federal land grab" as claimed the Great White Fibber. Or that (uranium) mining and drilling played no role in the largest elimination of protected land in U.S. history as repeatedly denied by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Utah Republicans. Curiously the Interior Secretary was twice quoted as saying, "Public lands are for public use and not for special interests."

Ecowatch calls that "doublespeak", Ten Bears called it "speaking with two tongues" and all Indians call it "speaking with forked tongue."

Eight days later on December 12, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit upheld a 20-year ban on new uranium mining around the Grand Canyon. However, Energy Fuels Nuclear will be allowed to operate the Canyon Mine because it predates the ban. Tribal Peoples Survival (Summer 1988) reported that Energy Fuels Nuclear owns 45,000 mining claims on state and federal lands on both the North and South Rims of the Grand Canyon and "sees a maximum of 50 mines in the area in the next 30 or 40 years."

The Havasupai who live at the bottom of Grand Canyon supports the ban and a tribal representative was on hand to testify at a Dec. 12 hearing of the House Natural Resources subcommittee during which the Republicans warned against putting federal lands off-limits to new (uranium) mining.

Carletta Tilousi spoke of the air and water contamination plus the health risks associated with the uranium mining; some mines located 15 miles from their land. The subcommittee chairman Paul Gosar (R-AZ) accused Tilousi of using "scare tactics" about the dangers of uranium mining and said, "You're not entitled to your own facts." Say what??

The Tribal Peoples Survival (April 1979) reported that the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission wrote that "Uranium mining and milling are the most significant sources of radiation exposure to the public from the entire nuclear fuel cycle, far surpassing nuclear reactors or high-level waste disposal."

The Southwest Indian Environmental Monitor (1983) reported, "Removing uranium from its place in nature is like opening up a Pandora's Box of latent cancer cells. In fact, the dangers from exposure are so great that Dr. David Dreesen of the Los Alamos National Scientific Laboratory suggested, 'Perhaps the solution to the radon problem is to zone the land in uranium mining and milling districts so as to forbid human habitation'."

For 75 years uranium mining has affected nearly every tribe and pueblo in the Southwest ever since the Bureau of Indian Affairs reported carnotite (a mineral containing both uranium and vanadium) in Monument Valley and the Carrizo Mountains on the Navajo Reservation in Arizona. In a short span of 26 years (1942 to 1968) millions of tons of uranium were mined and tribes were victims of radioactive contamination to their air, lands, water, and food sources.

The Southwest Indigenous Uranium Forum (1993) reported that Navajo had over 1,000 abandoned open-pit and underground uranium mines, over 600 contaminated homes, a pandemic of cancer and leukemia clusters and birth defects, mine wastes and mill tailings were openly stored there, several hundred former miners had died or were dying of radiation-caused diseases, and a disposal pond at Church Rock breached its dam and released 1,100 tons of radioactive waste and 93 million gallons of mine effluent into the Rio Puerco.

From White Mesa Ute in the north to Mescalero Apache in the south and all Southwest tribes east and west, none were left untouched. Clean up of most of the uranium mining mess has been practically non-existent because the 1872 General Mining Act allows mining companies to avoid cleaning up after themselves. Legislative bills were introduced to amend the Act to include reclamation but they were defeated by the mining lobby. Currently there are more than 500 uranium mines designated as SuperFund sites.

"You know what uranium is, right? It's this thing called nuclear weapons, and other things, like lots of things are done with uranium, including bad things."

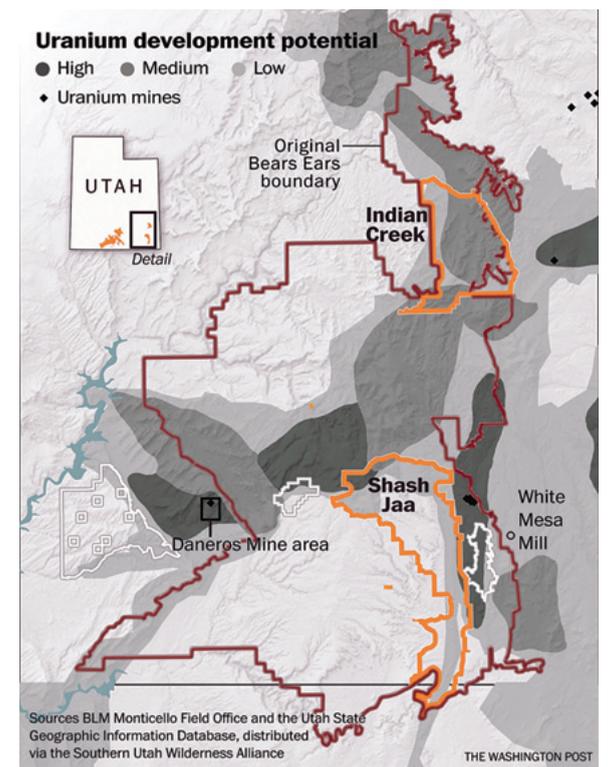

—Donald Trump, 2017

Utah refers to the Bears Ears area as the San Juan Energy Zone and they want to open it to mining regardless if Bears Ears is sacred to the Navajo, Hopi, Ute Mountain Utes, Unitah and Ouray, and Pueblo of Zuni. They have fought for Bears Ears for over 80 years. They use the land for their spiritual and cultural needs and it contains thousands of ancient sites and artifacts of their ancestors. It was a refuge for the Navajos who escaped the deadly 400-mile Long Walk to Bosque Redondo in eastern New Mexico.

But Energy Fuels Resources (USA) Inc. hired lobbyists from the Faegre Baker Daniels firm, led by lobbyist Andrew Wheeler to work on the Bears Ears issue and other federal policies affecting the company. The company and the Department of the Interior (DOI) were instrumental in reducing Bears Ears for easier access to the uranium deposits, the nearby processing mill and revitalizing a now-dormant uranium mine, all located within and next to the monument's current boundary.

The lobbying firm's vice president of operations William Goranson, Wheeler, two other lobbyists, and DOI advisers Downey Magallanes, deputy chief of staff who also supervised the monument review, and Vincent De Vito an energy policy counselor met at a July 17 meeting to discuss Bears Ears.

Earlier DOI's Chief Operating Officer Mark

Chalmers wrote on May 25 that President Obama's creation of Bears Ears "could affect existing and future mill operations." He also noted "There are also many other known uranium and vanadium deposits located within the (boundaries) that could provide valuable energy and mineral resources in the future."

The Natural Resources Defense Council said Trump's action is illegal because there is no federal law that gives Trump the power to undo monument designations of previous presidents. But there are other ways to cripple the federal laws designed to protect the environment.

For instance, Secretary Zinke is advocating for energy development but is proposing to eliminate discretionary grants to reclaim abandoned mine sites. Hopi tribal chairman Herman Honanie said the government should clean up and reclaim existing contaminated sites of polluted soil, washes, aquifers, and drinking water before it promotes renewed uranium mining especially in the Grand Canyon area.

"This is not about energy. There is no mine within Bears Ears." said Interior Secretary Zinke. It is about energy exploitation and uranium mines in Bear Ears. It's about the White Mesa processing mill and the dormant Daneros uranium mine. And it is also about radioactive pollution mining companies don't have to clean up.

"Without question, our public lands are America's treasures." A quote attributed to Secretary Zinke on DOI's official website. However, one should not listen to what they say but watch what they do.

The Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument has "an estimated several billion tons of coal and large oil deposits" contained within its boundaries, according to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke. Grand Staircase was reduced by over 50 percent on December 4 by Donald Trump following the recommendation of the Interior Secretary.

Former President Clinton established the monument in 1966 that later included a land exchange between Utah and the federal government, ratified by Congress, and incorporated a $14 million buyout of 17 leases held by the controversial coal mining company, Andalex Resources Inc.*

“clean energy sources” like solar and wind, the Trump administration is trying to revitalize the fossil fuel industry. Grand Staircase has been described as a “Dinosaur Shangri-la” because it is full of dinosaur fossils many that can be located on a plateau that contains one of the country’s largest known coal reserves.

Changing the way the two national monuments in Utah are managed, as well as their size, has already produced a number of lawsuits. “No other administration has gone this far,” said Kristen Brengel, vice president of government affairs for the National Parks Conservation Association. “This law (Antiquities Act) was intended to protect places from development, not promote damage to natural and cultural resources.”

A memorandum labeled, “Final Report Summarizing Findings of the Review of Designations Under the Antiquities Act” claims that both Republican and Democratic presidents went too far in limiting commercial activities in protected areas. The Act gives a president wide latitude to protect public lands and waters but the memo claims that certain monuments were designed to prevent economic development rather than protect specific objects(?).

“Throughout the review, the Secretary has seen examples of objects not clearly defined in the proclamation,” according to the report. “Examples of such objects are geographic areas, ‘viewsheds’ and ‘ecosystems’.”

*Andalax Resources Inc. was bought by Utah American Energy Inc., a subsidiary of Murray Energy Corporation that is one of the nation’s largest coal mining companies.

Andrew Wheeler, a coal lobbyist, has been nominated by Trump to be deputy administrator in the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), the number two position in the agency. Wheeler works at the Faegre Baker Daniels law firm and his clients include Murray Energy.

Wheeler, reviled by environmentalist but praised by the coal industry, is known to have the know-how to dismantle Obama-era fossil fuel regulations and “resetting our energy and environmental policies” at the EPA said Thomas Pyle, president of the Institute for Energy Research which promotes fossil fuels and opposes climate change.

Wheeler opposed the Obama administration’s efforts to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from power plants; criticized Obama’s agreement with China to jointly cut carbon pollution; and heralded Murray Energy’s opposition to the Paris Accord on Climate Change. Trump agreed and withdrew the U.S. from the Paris Accord making the U.S. the only country in the entire world that isn’t a member.

Making America Great Again

Dear Readers,

What a year 2017 has been. Have you turned on the news, only to hear– “Today, President Trump has...” and think, “Ahh, Geez, what’s he done now?”

There has never been a president who 1) doesn’t know what he doesn’t know, 2) doesn’t care to know what he doesn’t know, 3) refuses to admit he doesn’t know what he doesn’t know, and 4) refuses to listen to anyone telling him what he should know. And that makes him dangerous.

This past year, Trump has revoked nearly every positive measure President Obama had established on health care, worker safety, environmental protections, food programs for children and the elderly, education opportunities, even the program that offers dogs to the Wounded Warriors Program.

Trump has boasted he will create millions of jobs with his agenda and he has –for the legal profession. Almost everything he’s done and undone has resulted in a lawsuit.

Recently the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) revoked Obama’s Net Neutrality Rule that allowed equal access to the Internet by small companies offering internet services (en-Touch, Hughes Net, etc.) or movie services like Netflix. Verizon, Comcast and AT&T lobbied for the change and the Commissioner, Ajit Pai, was happy to oblige his former employer Verizon where he was an attorney for the company. The small companies could be shut out and the large companies will be able to dominate the Internet. It's been speculated that the large internet providers will be able to block certain cable channels or slowdown service then charge to speed it up. Over 20 states have filed lawsuits but Nevada is not listed as one of them. A relatively small amount of fraud was cited as the reason for cancelling the Net Neutrality rule. Those who will be most affected will be the rural communities and isolated Indian reservations. With the exception of Reno and Las Vegas, Nevada can be described as mostly rural.

The above cartoon accurately depicts what the country understands will happen if the Net Neutrality cancellation is approved.

Censorship has become another Trump goal. It has started by banning certain words and phrases used by federal agencies in their reports. The words are: vulnerable, entitlement, diversity, transgender, fetus (?), evidence-based, and science-based. Also, the Affordable Care Act must be called Obamacare in an apparent effort to create a negative view of the health care act. Trump says the Constitution's First Amendment (protecting free speech and freedom of the press) "is disgusting" and he wants to open up "the libel laws" to restrict what journalists can write about him plus curtail the "fake news" published in leading newspapers and reported on news broadcasts. It seems that the National Enquirer and Fox News are his standard.

At least five lawsuits were filed before the ink dried on Trump's order to reduce Bears Ears and the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monuments. He doesn't know that there are no laws that allows him to do that and the Interior Department couldn't tell him because they don't have a solicitor yet. Recently 118 law professors and a number of conservation organizations concluded that the president does not have authority to downsize or revoke national monuments. Trump's effort to scale back these monuments oversteps his authority and is unlikely to stand.

But not knowing the law will not stop him. Just recently he said "I have the absolute right to do what I want to do with the Justice Department." He may not know there is a reason for three separate branches of government: Executive, Legislative, and Justice. The key word being separate and one branch should not interfere with the other.

Two days into his administration Trump gleefully approved the Dakota Pipeline despite the numerous tribal groups opposing it. The treatment The People encountered violated basic human decency and those militarized storm troopers clearly enjoyed abusing them. Trump protecting a Canadian oil company's interest over the native people's sacred land and water can be considered a traitorous act. Even though Trump said the pipeline is "good for the environment", it sprung a leak on November 16 and spilled over 200,000 gallons of oil onto the South Dakota landscape.

The Republican's shameless tax reform plan that is designed to enrich the already rich will hurt many people who are not in a $150,000-plus income bracket. People earning $8,000 to $75,000 will pay the most taxes.

This tax bill was written by lobbyists so very few congressmen knew what was in the bill, didn't have time to read the 500-plus-page document, and voted for it anyway. The bill was crafted in November, voted on in December and will take effect in January—even the IRS will be hard-pressed to write the regulations for it to inform the millions of payroll accountants.

Now teachers can't deduct what they pay for school supplies. It eliminates deductions for personal losses from wildfires (think California and all the western states), earthquakes, and other natural disasters. And no more deductions for medical costs or long-term medical care.

Also Medicare took a major $25 billion a year hit that will continue until it no longer exists.

When the economy tanks and the national debt becomes too much Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security and other social programs will be reduced or eliminated so that money can be paid into the national debt.

Twice the Republicans have looted the Social Security fund (FICA taxes paid but not used) to put into the national debt. For some unexplained reason Republican leaders Paul Ryan and Mitch McConnell think Social Security and Medicare are entitlements. It is not and people who have paid into Social Security expect that money when they retire and Medicare to help supplement their health care insurance.

For health care Indian people have the Indian Health Service but that only has enough money to pay for operating their hospitals and clinics and not enough for medical care. Medicare and Medicaid supplement the Indian Health Service to a large extent. If those two supplemental programs are taken away, the Indian Health Service would be hard-pressed to provide medical care and Indian people will die, needlessly.

Trump began his administration by firing all the U.S. federal attorneys throughout the country which basically crippled the federal legal system. Tribal governments rely on the federal judicial system for protection. Trump has been extremely slow filling the federal attorney positions and those who have been appointed are conservative and would likely put God before the law.

He has appointed people to Cabinet positions who oppose the ideals of the very departments they are charged with running.

For the Environmental Protection Agency Trump selected Scott Pruitt who, as Oklahoma's attorney general, has sued EPA a number of times over EPA's environmental laws. Trump promised to do away with EPA and Pruitt has managed to follow through because so far over 700 employees have left the EPA, 200 were scientists. In addition, Trump has recommended for the number two job in EPA a former coal lobbyist (see Bears Ears story on pages 16-17). Secretary Pruitt has contemplated cutting off EPA reimbursement funds to the Justice Department's Environmental and Natural Resources Division that handles litigation for EPA's SuperFund program. And for EPA's SuperFund Clean Up Task Force, Pruitt hired his former banker, Albert Kelly, for that job. Kelly is no longer a banker because he's been banned from ever holding a job in the banking industry again.

Department of the Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke thinks energy exploiters can co-exist alongside Indian people wishing to preserve their sacred grounds. It's quite understandable to think that would work but history has shown the exact opposite will happen again. He criticized the Obama-era ban on uranium mining around the Grand Canyon area that was implemented after area tribes and environmentalists raised concerns that uranium mining would pollute the Colorado River. He said the ban inhibited "much needed growth and jobs." He has filled the top positions at Interior with former employees of energy companies who may be hard-pressed to be protectors of this country's natural resources.

Department of Energy Secretary Rick Perry suggested fossil fuels could somehow prevent sexual assaults at an energy event in D.C. "But also from the standpoint of sexual assault, when the lights are on, when you have light that shines, the righteousness, if you will, on those types of acts. So from the standpoint of how you really affect people's lives, fossil fuels is going to play in role in that. I happen to think it's going to play a positive role." Sierra Club's director called on Perry to resign for trying to "exploit this struggle (sexual assaults) to justify further dangerous fossil fuel development. Perry also wants to increase the use of coal, oil, and gas even though many states are moving towards implementing solar and wind energy systems.

Department of Education Secretary Betsy DeVos, who reportedly has no experience in this country's educational system except for the private schools she attended, got her position due in large part because her family was a large contributor to Trump's campaign. She advocates for the school voucher system and wants to privatize the public school system. She rescinded the regulations for disabled students and took them off the Education's official website. She will no longer cancel debts of students defrauded by fake universities that gave them fake degrees—like the now-defunct Trump University. She owns a large debt collection company that collects on student loans. During her confirmation, she testified that she was in favor of guns in schools, “like in Wyoming where they might run into grizzly bears.”

U.S. Attorney General Jeff Sessions doesn't believe in the Constitution's provision separating church and state. He has come under fire from Trump, who selected him for the position, for recusing himself from Mueller's investigation on Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election. He was a senator from Alabama and actively campaigned for Trump.

Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, formerly a CEO of Exxon, has been constantly undermined by Trump when trying to make diplomatic nice with North Korea. Tillerson, not quite the diplomatic type, has been so frustrated by Trump that at one point he called him a moron. Many career professionals have left his State Department and hundreds of positions have not been filled.

Tribal leaders met with Trump in June to discuss the development of their energy resources and the cumbersome regulations they encounter. Trump said, “But now it's me. The government's different now. Obama's gone; and we're doing things differently now.” He continued, “Chief, chief, what are they going to do? Once you get it out of the ground are they going to make you put it back in there? I mean, once it's out of the ground it can't go back in there.

You've just got to do it. I'm telling you, chief, you've just got to do it.”

Clearly “it” refers to breaking the law and “they” refers to officials responsible for upholding the law. That wasn't covered in the story from Indian Country Today reprinted in the 2nd quarter issue. Incidentally, politicians always call Indian men “chief” regardless of who they are or when they don't care to remember their names.

Who can forget Trump's Pochontas remark? Using an Indian woman's name to insult a woman Senator who is a thorn in his massive backside. He just couldn't resist using that insult when he was suppose to be honoring the Navajo Code Talkers and then using that Indian killer Andrew Jackson's portrait as a backdrop.

Earlier Trump asked General Kelly, “How good were these code talkers?” Kelly replied, “You have no idea.” The gentleman in the wheelchair was a survivor of the Bataan Death March and chances are Trump probably doesn't know about that either.

More than 400 Navajo Marines participated in using their language to transmit coded messages that the Japanese were unable to break during World War II. The Code Talkers are recipients of Congressional gold medals.

Now comes stage two: 2018. Having delivered our government to their privileged friends and benefactors, Trump, House Speaker Ryan and Senate Leader McConnell will make sure that Washington does even less for the vast majority of Americans. Ryan speaks eagerly of wanting to “reform” Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid and programs for those with low incomes. Rarely has the idea of “reform” been so degraded.

Indian people will suffer along with other folks when lose their current level of health care, educational opportunities, and have their basic lifestyle turned upside down. The problem is that it will take longer for Indian people to recover.

This country is being torn apart from within because Trump is being used by Russia's Putin and big money. And a gutless Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, who have remained eerily silent. Republicans vote Republican whether it's good for the country or not.

And so did Nevada's Dean Heller. Isn't he up for re-election?

TRUMPISMS

Sometimes you see a little feature called, You can't make this stuff up that has totally off-the-wall comments. Well, Donald Trump could fill a whole page with stuff. When he's not golfing on his “working vacations” he's trying to erase Obama's accomplishments because he'll never be as smart, as educated, or as cool as Obama. He has a gold toilet but he doesn't have cool.

He brags about himself all the time, trying to convince others or himself. “I have so many words. I have the best words.” Okay then. “I have the best memory... I went to an Ivy League college. I'm very intelligent. I was a nice student... One of the great memories of all time... Ask anyone about Donald Trump.”

During a recent interview with the New York Times Trump revealed a few of his thoughts.

The Mueller investigation: “It makes the country look very bad and it puts the country in a very bad position. So the sooner it's worked out, the better it is for the country.” He adds, “I have absolute right to do what I want with the Justice Department”. He does but he'll be impeached almost immediately if he tries to interfere with the Justice Department and the investigation.

He disputes reports that he doesn't have a detailed understanding of legislation, especially the recently passed tax reform bill. “I know the details of taxes better than anybody. Better than the greatest C.P.A. I know the details of health care better than most, better than most.” Later he added that he knows more about “the big bills” debated in the Congress “more than any president that's ever been in office.”

“I don't want to get into loyalty, but I will tell you that, I will say this: (former U.S. Attorney General) Holder protected President Obama. Totally protected him.” Then he added, “When you look at the things that they did, and Holder protected the president. And I have great respect for that, I'll be honest.”

About the media, Trump said, “Another reason that I'm going to win another four years is because newspapers, television, all forms of media will tank if I'm not there because without me, their ratings are going down the tubes.” Then invoked one of his preferred insults, “Without me, The New York Times will indeed be not the failing New York Times, but the failed New York Times. So they basically have to let me win. And eventually, probably six months before the election, they'll be loving me because they're saying, ‘Please, please, don't lose Donald Trump’. O.K.”

“While the Fake News loves to talk about my so-called low approval rating, at Fox and Friends

[they] just showed that my rating on Dec. 28, 2017, was approximately the same as President Obama on Dec. 28, 2009, which was 47%... and this despite massive negative Trump coverage and Russia hoax!”

“Why is the United States Post Office, which is losing many billions of dollars a year, while charging Amazon and others so little to deliver their packages, making Amazon richer and the Post Office dumber and poorer? Should be charging much more!”

“The Democrats have been told, and fully understand, that there can be no DACA without the desperately needed wall at the Southern Border and an end to the horrible Chain Migration and ridiculous Lottery System of Immigration etc. We must protect our Country at all cost!”

A Good Catholic Joke

The Pope and Trump are on the same stage in Yankee Stadium in front of a huge crowd. The Pope leans towards Trump and said, “Do you know that with one little wave of my hand I can make every person in this crowd go wild with joy? This joy will not be a momentary display, but will go deep into their hearts and they'll forever speak of this day and rejoice!” Trump replied, “I seriously doubt that! With one little wave of your hand... Show me!” So the Pope backhanded him and knocked him off the stage! AND THE CROWD ROARED AND CHEERED WILDLY and there was happiness throughout the land!

Tedra Begay, a Navajo artist, uses her photographs and weaving skills to create her art of textured images. Born and raised in Albuquerque, Tedra (pronounced “Teedra”) spent her summers at Seba Dalkai, Arizona where she learned traditional weaving from her grandmother.

She took photography courses at the Institute of American Indian Arts (IAIA) in Santa Fe and one day, she sliced up a photograph, then pieced it back together using her weaving skills. The result is a combination of a puzzle with the raised surfaces of Navajo textiles.

Her “Apache Crown Dancer” is a double exposure photograph transferred onto aluminum. She slices her photos into quarter-inch strips and then weaves them back together.

After graduating from IAIA in 2005, she took time off and to decide what she wanted to do. She began doing designs with her weaving, then began experimenting with her photographs and “it came about.” She is planning photography trips to Canyon de Chelly and Monument Valley and hopes to do her art full time. Currently she is working in the library at the Southwestern Indian Polytechnic Institute.

Her parents now live in Gilbert, Arizona and she will be taking her father to visit the Grand Artist with “Harmony”

Canyon for a long holiday weekend. She still visits her grandmother and “She’s just awed at what I can do. She loves it.”

Tedra took second place in the digital photography category at the Santa Fe Indian Market in 2013. In 2015 she placed second in photography at the Heard Museum Guild Indian Art Fair. This year she participated again in the Indian Market, selling her photo weavings and also displayed her artwork at the New Mexico State Fair.

“Apache Crown Dancer”

You can’t make this stuff up...

“If we sold a few non-income generating properties, like Yosemite, the Grand Canyon, and Yellowstone, we could wipe out the federal debt and overturn Obamacare. That’s what experts call Economics 101.”

Hi Heather,

The meeting they are referencing was a gathering of the President's Hispanic Advisory Board. She was a member of it. They were an entity prior to inauguration. The meeting was in conjunction with the 5 de Mayo reception since many of them were in town for it.

I was planning to just confirm that for Juliet.

Let me know if any issues.

Thanks

Dear Jarrod,

I understand that Secretary Zinke's wife Lola met with staffers from the VP's office this spring, I believe it was the first week of May. (A discussion of the meeting cropped up in an email exchange between DOI's White House liaison and Mark Calabria on May 7. I was hoping you could just let me know what the topic of the meeting was, and who attended it.

Subject: Flagging - Zinke a bit out over his skis in a GQ interview

A Zinke interview just popped in GQ and he has a couple of eyebrow-raising quotes in there about Trump.

KEY SECTIONS:

Zinke Calls His Job Interview With Trump Disorganized:

Rumors buzzed that he'd been shortlisted for the job atop the Interior Department, but when Zinke and his wife, Lola, passed through the gilded doors of Trump Tower, he actually had no clue what position he was interviewing for—Priebus had never said definitively. And by the end of a rambling conversation with the president-elect, Zinke still wasn't entirely sure.

"The conversation went a hundred seconds. It went from women in combat to Syria policy to the Chinese to energy independence, a little about public lands, a little about hunting access," Zinke tells me. "Most of the conversation was not really Interior, per se." At one point, Trump proposed the Veterans Affairs post, to which Zinke quipped, "I don't think you hate me that much."

He was flying back to Montana when Mike Pence called him. "The vice president says, 'Well, congratulations!'" Zinke recalls, sharing the moment he was asked to join the Trump Cabinet, "and I asked him, 'What job?'"

Zinke Says The Trump Administration Has Had "A Lot Of Distractions And Chatter":

Thirty minutes into our ride, after snaking through another throng of tourists, we approach the Washington Monument—that stone memorial to the original military man turned president—and Zinke takes stock of these still-early days of the Trump administration. "The president is the best boss I've ever had," Zinke tells me, "but there's a lot of distractions and chatter." He tugs on his reins to pause for a moment and consider the structure, the city's tallest by edict. "You're just always looking for ways to stay above that."

Zinke Complains About How Hard It Is To Bring People Onboard And Notes Government Is Different Than Business:

For all that camera-ready affection for the boss, members of the Trump cabinet, Zinke included, admit to being frustrated with the White House, which they say has left them chronically short-staffed. According to the Partnership for Public Service, the White House has yet to nominate staffers for 357 out of 570 key agency positions. So far, only 50 nominees have been confirmed. (By this time in their first terms, President Obama had gotten 203 confirmed; George W. Bush, 203.)

Zinke, four months into the job, has been able to fill only two key positions that require White House approval, out of 15 vacancies. He notes that he's submitted the names of "awfully good, just super people," but that the past few months have been a waiting game. "Operating a business sometimes is a little different from operating in the Oval Office," Zinke says. "[In business], it's just 'All right, you're hired.' But I think the White House is running into the swamp...there's a bureaucracy there that's very difficult to determine." (Zinke may have himself to thank for recent inaction, though. The day after his unseemly call to Murkowski, the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which the Alaska senator chairs, announced that hearings for a slate of Zinke's nominees would be delayed.)

Zinke Said The WH Is "Getting Its Legs Under It" And Says They Were "Getting In Other People's Business A Bit Too Much":

Zinke insists that he and his team have gotten along just fine with their designated White House minder, but John Kelly, who served until last week as the secretary of homeland security, was a bit more candid when we spoke. "I don't need a lot of supervision," he told me. "Obviously the White House is getting its legs under it, but early on it was a bit of a pain. They were getting in other people's business a little bit too much." (Kelly's tune will presumably change: On Friday he was named White House chief of staff.)

American Oversight Sues for Records on Lolita Zinke Travel, Role at Department of the Interior

Watchdog Group Expands Investigation into Ryan Zinke's Management of Department of the Interior and Lolita Zinke's Taxpayer-Funded Travel

Washington, DC – Non-partisan watchdog group American Oversight today sued the Department of the Interior (DOI) to force the release of records related to Lolita Zinke, wife of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, and her role at the department, use of taxpayer-funded travel, and participation in official meetings or other events.

The lawsuit was filed on behalf of the Montana-based Western Values Project which submitted the initial Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) requests seeking the records.

"Time and again we've seen how personal relationships and political loyalty trump competency in the current administration, and it appears the Department of the Interior is no different," said American Oversight Executive Director Austin Evers. "We're suing the Department of the Interior to uncover the truth about what role Secretary Zinke's wife is playing in running the department, how much it's costing taxpayers, and why she was jetting off to Europe with her husband on a military plane."

"Under Secretary Zinke's leadership the Department of Interior has turned into a front group for special interests," said Chris Saeger, Executive Director of the Western Values Project. "We filed this FOIA because there should be transparency and accountability for everyone who influences Interior's decisions. If Lola Zinke is playing a role at Interior, taxpayers deserve to know if she is playing by the same rules as everyone else who works there."

Lolita Zinke has reportedly joined her husband extensively on his official travel – including on a military plane to Norway, Greenland, and Alaska – and has played an unusually prominent role at the Department of the Interior for the spouse of a cabinet secretary. On October 2nd, DOI’s Inspector General announced it was opening an investigation into travel by Secretary Zinke.

The lawsuit is part of American Oversight's broader investigation into Secretary Zinke's management of DOI – including his government-funded travel, his involvement in relaxing standards for toxic chemicals, and meetings related to the construction of President Trump's border wall. On Wednesday, American Oversight submitted an additional FOIA request seeking further details about Lolita Zinke's presence and activities at DOI.

In early June, the Western Values Project submitted a FOIA requests to DOI asking for records, communications and documents related to Lolita Zinke’s role in the department, including her participation in internal meetings, presence on official trips, and emails sent to her in relation to government business. DOI failed to adequately respond to the FOIA requests as required by law, and American Oversight filed suit today on behalf of the Western Values Project in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to force the release of relevant documents.

Heather:

It was a pleasure meeting you with Secretary Zinke and seeing Marshall. He and I worked Presidents Trumps campaign in northeast Florida where I had the pleasure of serving as Northeast Regional director.

More to the point Yesterday's event with Congressman Mast was extremely humbling for me considering I've had the pleasure of working with NPS on both the Underground Railroad and the Gullah Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor in my home county of St. John's as in St. Augustine, FL over the last 12 years.

Attached please find a proof of the NPS Sea Community Gullah Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor digital magazine 2nd edition which will roll out on Monday and please consider sharing with Secretary Zinke.

You too will find a film my family and I co produced during the 6th annual NPS Underground Railroad Conference, which we hosted and sponsored in 2012!

Should you'll ever need assistance with the Department of Interior and NPS Gullah Geechee Corridor or the southern route to the Underground Railroad please let me know I'd love to work with you'll.

Also, I'd like to formally ask if I can include Secretary Zinke in the next edition of the magazine?

Thank you and have a great day.

Pool Report #2
East Room
July 27, 2017

Potus and VPotus held a ceremony in the East Room to honor the police officers who responded to the shooting of Republican congressmen at a baseball diamond in Alexandria, Va., last month and awarded them the Medal of Valor. As always, please check quotes against transcript.

VP Pence opened the ceremony and said Rep. Steve Scalise, who was among those injured during the shooting, was watching. "We're inspired and relieved by your recovery," VP Pence said, addressing the congressman. "It's an answer to a prayer."

VP Pence then invited up to the stage five police officers who responded that day: Officers Kevin Jobe, Alexander Jensen and Nicole Battaglia of the Alexandria Police Department and Special Agents David Bailey and Crystal Griner of the Capitol Police. The three Alexandria officers all wore dark uniforms while the Capitol Police officers were in civilian clothes. Special Agents Griner and Bailey were shot during the incident and Special Agent Griner, with a cast on her lower leg, sat in a chair for much of the ceremony while the other four stood next to her.

Potus then entered and recounted the events of that day, noting that Congressman Scalise, Matt Mika, a lobbyist and former congressional aide, and Zachary Barth, a congressional aide, were each shot. "Fortunately from the moment that gunman began to shoot, he was met by return fire," Potus said. With the officers behind him on stage, he said, "They are American heroes and we salute them."

Potus also saluted other congressmen who shielded each other and helped the injured and he also honored members of the Alexandria Fire Department and U.S. Park Police Aviation Unit who responded. "Thank you for what you did that day and for what you do every day," he said.

He singled out two doctors who have treated Congressman Scalise at MedStar Washington Hospital Center: Dr. Jack Sava, the director of trauma, and Dr. Robert Golden, the director of orthopaedic trauma, who were both in the audience. "You have the gratitude of the entire nation," Potus said.

"Steve is a fighter," he added. "We've known that for a long time. This week he was discharged from the hospital and is now beginning weeks of intensive rehabilitation at an inpatient facility. He will recover. We are praying for him, we are pulling for him and we are sending his family our support and our love."

He recognized the congressman's wife, Jennifer, who was in the audience. "We applaud the strength and courage that she has shown throughout this incredible ordeal."

He noted that a bill in Congress would provide more support for Capitol Police officers and credited Congressman Scalise. "Jennifer, you can tell Steve he pulled it off," he said. "That's better than being a whip. I hope it gets to my desk soon. I will sign it immediately."

Potus said: "The assault on June 14 reminds us that evil exists in this world but it also reminds us that heroes walk in our midst." He thanked law enforcement officers in general "for doing the tough jobs, the dangerous jobs and sometimes the thankless jobs."

He then presented the Medal of Valor to all five officers. Special Agent Griner stood on crutches when Potus draped the medal around her neck.

Reince Priebus walked in shortly before the ceremony began and took a seat in the third row. As guests waited for it to begin, they could hear a musical group in Cross Hall playing Beatles songs, including "Eleanor Rigby" and "When I'm Sixty-Four."

Hello Heather, wanted to follow up on a couple things: could you locate the pictures we took with Congressman Lagomarsino and the Secretary (they're on his phone, I believe). I'd like to get one to Bob, and for myself. Also, if it's possible to get Ryan's autobiography signed (I have one, so no need on my end) and sent to Bob it'd be very appreciated. I believe Lola was going to discuss with you. Bob's address is: (b) (6).

I appreciate how busy you all are and thank you in advance.

US Secretary of Interior Zinke Speaks on Boating Access, Infrastructure on Federal Lands

WASHINGTON, July 19, 2017 -- Just as outdoor enthusiasts enjoy federal lands, recreational boaters need access to federal waters. Access, however, can be threatened due to aging marina infrastructure, lack of funds for ramp and dock maintenance, or government will. The Department of Interior oversees about one-fifth of the nation's land, including the national parks. Boat Owners Association of The United States (BoatUS) was eager to sit down with U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke yesterday at an event in Washington to discuss his agency's support for maintaining boating infrastructure and growing access to federal waters.

The Secretary's interview with BoatUS was part of a coalition of outdoor recreation industry associations that met with him to highlight the economic importance of outdoor products and the enjoyment they bring American families. These include boats, recreational vehicles, off-road vehicles, and camping, fishing and hunting gear that generate $887 billion per year in economic activity and provide an estimated 7.6 million direct jobs.

As the nation's largest advocacy, services and safety group, BoatUS supports the recreational boating industry and believes improvements to federal boating-access sites and addressing the Department of Interior's deferred maintenance backlog will improve recreational boating opportunities for the nation's 11.8 million boat owners.

In speaking to BoatUS, Secretary Zinke made clear his advocacy for expanded access to federal public lands and waters and improving infrastructure at many of the aging facilities. “Pressure to use our public lands will continue to grow, and many of our facilities consist of Eisenhower-era infrastructure,” Zinke said. “We have a $11.5 billion maintenance and repair backlog at our public parks. We need to look at reinvesting in our public lands.”

Speaking on the boating-access issue, Secretary Zinke said he’s “looking to not only maintain it, but enhance it. ... Public access via water provides an opportunity for improving infrastructure, from maintaining moorings to repairing docks. It’s a field where there can be an enormous amount of improvement.”

He promised, “Fixing the backlog of maintenance items will be a priority in upcoming budgets. ... We are going to catch up on infrastructure, restore trust and show Americans we can be good stewards of our public lands. Revenue from user fees, including contracts with private concessionaires should offset the cost of maintaining facilities. If we work together, everybody wins.”

The Department of Interior will also look at ways to improve the experience at parks, noting Wi-Fi access and air-conditioned buildings are amenities that today’s park visitors ask for. “We’re going to adapt to what Americans want. Our citizens deserve the best uses of our public lands,” he said. “In the past, the answer has been ‘no.’ Our answer should be, ‘How do we get to yes?’”

The Secretary also used the day’s events to announce the formation of an advisory committee consisting of outdoor-industry members assigned to nurture public-private partnerships that he believes can provide the resources to make federal parks “a five-star experience” to enjoy. He stressed, “This is not privatizing our national parks. No one is more passionate about our public lands, and I am adamant against selling our public lands.”

In a related boating topic, Secretary Zinke, whose wife owns a 38-foot powerboat, also noted that boating presents “a unique challenge” when it comes to invasive species, which he said is “a real problem” but stressed the need for the right strategies to combat the threat.

Said BoatUS Manager of Government Affairs David Kennedy, “Boaters need well-maintained, safe and modern boating amenities in good condition. We look forward to the Secretary’s help to address these needs with public-private partnerships. This is not the first time our parks have needed private investment — some of the first such partnerships in national parks were the early and now historic lodges built by the railroads. Well-managed access can be good for boaters, the federal government and for local economies. If you build it, they do come.”

Where's Zinke? The Interior secretary's special flag offers clues

At the Interior Department's headquarters in downtown Washington, Secretary Ryan Zinke has revived an arcane military ritual that no one can remember ever happening in the federal government.

A security staffer takes the elevator to the seventh floor, climbs the stairs to the roof and hoists a special secretarial flag whenever Zinke enters the building. When the secretary goes home for the day or travels, the flag — a blue banner emblazoned with the agency's bison seal flanked by seven white stars representing the Interior bureaus — comes down.

In Zinke's absence, the ritual is repeated to raise an equally obscure flag for Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt.

Responding this week to questions from The Washington Post, a spokeswoman for Zinke, a former Navy SEAL commander, defended the Navy flag-flying tradition as "a major sign of transparency."

"Ryan Zinke is proud and honored to lead the Department of the Interior, and is restoring honor and tradition to the department, whether it's flying the flag when he is in garrison or restoring traditional access to public lands," press secretary Heather Swift said in an email.

Zinke, a Stetson-wearing former Montana congressman who has cultivated an image as a rugged outdoorsman, has come under a harsh spotlight in recent weeks for behavior criticized as extravagant for a public official. The agency's inspector general opened an investigation after he ran up bills for travel on chartered jets and mixed business with political appearances, sometimes accompanied by his wife, Lola. It's one of five probes underway of Cabinet secretaries' travel.

Zinke upset some of the 70,000 employees at the agency that manages public lands by stating that 30 percent of the workers are "not loyal to the flag" in a speech to oil and gas executives. It is unclear whether the reference was literal or figurative.

Zinke rode to work on horseback on his first day in office and displays animal heads on his woodpaneled office walls. For a while, he kept a glass-case display of hunting knives but was asked to remove them because of security risks, according to people familiar with the decision.

He has commissioned commemorative coins with his name on them to give to staff and visitors, but the cost to taxpayers is unclear. Zinke's predecessors and some other Cabinet secretaries have coins bearing agency seals, but not personalized ones.

The flag ritual is unique in President Trump's administration. The White House does not raise the presidential flag when Trump alights at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. There is no Defense secretary's flag atop the Pentagon.

Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, like his predecessors, has a personal flag that flies beside the U.S. flag in front of the department's Foggy Bottom headquarters. But it's there whether Tillerson is in the building or not.

"We're talking about Cabinet members and federal buildings, not the Queen of England and Buckingham Place," said Chris Lu, deputy Labor secretary in the Barack Obama administration, referring to the British tradition of announcing the queen's presence by raising her personal heraldic flag.

"If we had a secretarial flag at the Obama Labor Department, we never bothered to locate it or use it," Lu said.

Retired Army Col. Steven Warren, who ran the Pentagon's press operation before retiring this year, could not recall the place in Washington hierarchy represented by the raising of a federal official's personal flag.

"Is he trying to send a message?" Warren wondered. "Is he big on pomp and circumstance, or is this a case of 'Look at me?'"

Personal flags for federal government officials have a proud, if arcane, history that originated with the secretary of the Navy in 1866, to help sailing ships in the fleet recognize which one carried the naval commander. The Coast Guard and secretary of war wanted one, too.

By the early 20th century, the civilian heads of the Treasury, Commerce and Labor departments had flags. The first one for Interior was adopted in 1917.

"If you were the secretary of agriculture, you asked yourself, 'Hey, the secretary of war has a flag, how come I don't have one?'" said Joseph McMillan, a retired Defense Department official and student of flag history from Alexandria who is president of the American Heraldry Society.

The flags proliferated by World War Two, with banners for subordinate officials from undersecretaries to assistant attorneys general.

Back when security was not a concern, official government vehicles would display a high-ranking official's personal flag on its left front fender, with the American flag flanking the right. They were considered pretentious, McMillan said, and eventually went out of fashion.

At Lady Liberty Flag and Flagpole in Austin, one of the largest flag vendors for federal offices, Sandra Dee Merritt said she sells 300 to 500 department flags a year to various Interior offices.

Secretarial flags are no longer in demand. "I haven't sold any of those individual secretarial flags to any agency in forever," Merritt said.

Raising a personal flag to mark an official's presence remains a custom in the military. Field commanders often display their unit's flag when they are at headquarters to signify that the boss is in.

But the personal flag, whether belonging to a general or a Cabinet secretary, stays behind the desk, if it's there at all.

By flying his flag, Zinke is doing exactly what the flag was designed for, McMillan said. Yet he's skeptical. The Interior Department is not the Navy.

"I'm all about tradition," McMillan said. "But I kind of have an aversion to militarizing everything in our government. The world doesn't need to know the secretary of the Interior is in the building."

Newly released records shed light on the outsize profile Lola Zinke has established compared with the typical Cabinet secretary's spouse.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife has frustrated department staffers by saddling them with extra work when she traveled with him on official business, according to new records that a liberal watchdog group says uncover the potential misuse of government resources.

The records document Lola Zinke's last-minute requests to join high-level dinners and additions to the guest list for a conservative group's event near their home in Southern California earlier this year. The Western Values Project filed a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit last month to force Interior to release more than 100 pages of documents related to Lola Zinke's trips with her husband and interactions with Interior staff.

Shared first with POLITICO, the documents shed new light on the outsize profile Lola Zinke has established compared with the typical Cabinet secretary's spouse, including her dictating people to invite to a town hall hosted by the conservative Young America's Foundation for her husband.

New emails also reveal a celebratory dinner the Zinkes attended that was organized in part by a major GOP donor who gave heavily to Ryan Zinke's congressional campaigns. And they show Interior staffers had to accommodate a last-minute request for her to join the secretary at an official dinner with Alaska's governor. The records cover two trips Lola Zinke joined in the first three months of her husband's tenure as well as some other interactions with Interior staff, such as coordinating her attendance at a White House briefing for Cabinet members' spouses.

While the department says Lola Zinke paid her own way, the records show Interior used staff time to coordinate some of her activities while traveling with her husband. And the trips gave her access to high-level politicians and GOP activists and donors who could benefit her as a political operator in her own right.

"These emails show that the leadership at the Department of Interior treats basic ethical standards like an inconvenience," Western Values Project Executive Director Chris Saeger said. "If Secretary Zinke is willing to be so sloppy with something as elementary as this, then God only knows how they're handling big decisions about energy and public lands behind closed doors."

Interior says Lola Zinke pays her own way when she accompanies her husband and that travel is cleared by ethics officials in advance.

"DOI incurred no expenses due to Mrs. Zinke's presence" with the secretary, Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Friday.

Interior's inspector general and the independent Office of Special Counsel are investigating the former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL's travel expenses and appearance at political events while on official trips, including those where he was accompanied by his wife. Last week, the IG's office said it could not conduct a thorough investigation because Interior had kept inadequate records. Among other problems, the watchdog said it had "not been able to determine the full extent to which Lolita Zinke, the Secretary's wife, accompanied the Secretary on official travel." Interior officials blamed the shortcomings on inadequate procedures left in place by the Obama administration.

The new records show the secretary's wife helped decide the guest list for a Young America's Foundation town hall forum with Ryan Zinke on April 17 at its Reagan Ranch in Santa Barbara, Calif., part of a weeklong official trip in the state. Lola Zinke joined her husband for national parks tours and meetings with government officials throughout the week, as well as for a private tour of the Reagan Ranch galleries led by Andrew Coffin, YAF's vice president.

Lola Zinke sent a "list of people I have invited to the event" to two Interior staffers, according to a series of April 7 emails. Caroline Boulton, a special assistant to the secretary, forwarded the list on to an official at YAF, with a warning that more could be added. Interior redacted the names of Zinke's guests before releasing the email.

"She's expecting some of them to bring plus ones and also her list is not yet final," Boulton wrote. "She's said that she doesn't have emails for them all since many of them have been personally told about the event, but I wanted you to have the list!"

YAF is a key pillar of the conservative movement with alumni ranging from White House officials to prominent journalists. The group's donors have reportedly included the Koch brothers, among others.

Lola Zinke is active in conservative politics. The Santa Barbara native was a member of President Donald Trump's Hispanic outreach team during the 2016 campaign, and in September she became chairwoman for the Senate campaign of Troy Downing, a Montana businessman hoping to unseat Sen. Jon Tester next year.

Lola had previously faced criticism for accompanying her husband on the California trip. She posted a photograph on Twitter from Gov. Jerry Brown's office and accompanied her husband to meetings with DOI regional staff in Sacramento and trips to Fresno and the national parks at Yosemite, Sequoia and Kings Canyon, the trip manifests show.

The trip also included five days in Santa Barbara and then four days in Zinke's hometown in Whitefish, Mont., an upscale part of the state where the couple owns a home and other real estate.

The secretary bringing his wife along on official trips isn't illegal as long as the government doesn't pay for her expenses. But it can be an ethically gray area, depending on the circumstances, said Craig Holman, government affairs lobbyist with good-governance watchdog Public Citizen.

"Spousal travel, especially when paid for by the spouse, suggests that the trip may have less to do with official duties and more resembles a family vacation partially paid for by taxpayers," Holman said.

When Lola Zinke joined an official trip to Norway, Greenland and Alaska, she appears to have caused some headaches by deciding to stay longer than expected. Ryan Zinke sent his staff scrambling to make last-minute arrangements so she could accompany him to dinner with the governor of Alaska and other dignitaries in Anchorage, according to new emails.

Interior staffers apparently found out about the change in plans second-hand from an aide to Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who also was on the trip, along with other senators and their spouses, according to a May 27 email from Director of Scheduling and Advance Russell Roddy to other colleagues at Interior — one day before Lola Zinke had been scheduled to return to Washington.

"I have heard that Mrs. Zinke was now maybe not going to fly out from Fairbanks Sunday morning ... so, I asked Annie if she happened to talk to Mrs. Zinke about her plans. She said Mrs. Zinke said she was now going to head to Byers Lake and Anchorage with RKZ and fly out of Anchorage on Tuesday," Roddy wrote. "UGH! We have all kinds of planes, trains and automobiles manifests to now scramble with."

It is unclear what led to the change in plans. Before the trip, Lola Zinke had apparently been trying to secure a seat on a military plane back to Washington, but the Senate staffer coordinating the trip told Interior that it would be a "safer bet" for her to fly commercial because Ryan Zinke would not be with her. The military typically does not like when members of Congress try to get their spouses on military planes without the member being present, according to an email from Boulton relaying guidance she had received. "There's a lot of ifs in that, so let me know if you want me to keep pushing on the" military return flight, Boulton wrote to Lola Zinke on May 18.

Lola Zinke joined her husband at a May 29 dinner in Anchorage with Alaska Gov. Bill Walker and other state officials.

"The Secretary personally paid the State of Alaska for Mrs. Zinke's meal," Swift said. Lola Zinke flew home on a commercial flight from Anchorage the following day.

Lola Zinke also accompanied her husband to an April 10 dinner in Washington that was organized with the help of one of his past campaign donors, Burt Sugarman, who has donated heavily to Republicans.

"We are very excited that Sec Zinke accepted the event," wrote Phil Anderson, president of lobbying firm Navigators Global who helped organize the April 10 dinner sponsored by the National Geographic Society, in a March 24 email to Boulton. "As you know, Burt Sugarman first discussed the dinner with Sec Zinke."

Sugarman and his wife, the former Entertainment Tonight anchor Mary Hart, are members of the National Geographic Society's board of directors.

The Sugarmans gave a combined $10,800 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign, out of more than $180,000 they gave to GOP candidates and committees in the last election cycle, according to FEC documents.

On April 27, Lola Zinke was invited to an ethics briefing at the White House for Cabinet spouses. "They stressed the importance of attending since important ethics rules will [be] discussed and questions can be answered by White House counsel," Boulton wrote in an email to Lola Zinke.

"Thank you!" she replied. "It's a good thing I'll be in town then."

Deputy Interior Secretary David Bernhardt today defended a plan to charge $70 for a peak-season entry fee at 17 of the busiest national parks next year, saying it's roughly the same cost as taking his family to a 3-D movie.

"It costs me about $68 and 90 cents for the two kids and my wife and I to go see a movie," Bernhardt said on NPR's 1A, a daily program and podcast produced by NPR member station WAMU.

Bernhardt said park fees have not kept pace with inflation. And he said that higher fees would not keep most low-income Americans from visiting the parks, adding that a bigger problem for them is the cost of transportation and lodging associated with traveling to the parks.

Bernhardt also noted that many parks would not be affected by the new plan, including his favorite, Mesa Verde National Park in southwest Colorado, a park that he often visited as a youngster.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, who oversees the 417 national park sites, announced the new fee proposal last week, saying it would raise $70 million a year for infrastructure projects.

The higher fees would take effect next year at Acadia, Arches, Bryce Canyon, Canyonlands, Denali, Glacier, Grand Canyon, Grand Teton, Joshua Tree, Mount Rainier, Olympic, Rocky Mountain, Sequoia and Kings Canyon, Shenandoah, Yellowstone, Yosemite and Zion national parks. Most of the increases would take effect in May or June of 2018.

Under the new plan, peak-season entry fees at the 17 parks would be $70 for a private vehicle, $50 for a motorcycle, and $30 for a person on bike or foot. An annual pass for a park would cost $75.

Currently, vehicle fees at the 17 parks range from $25 to $30, while motorcycle fees range from $12 to $25. A person on bike or foot pays from $10 to $15, while a park-specific annual fee ranges from $40 to $60.

Bernhardt said on the radio program that 80 percent of the money raised by the higher fees would stay in individual parks, helping them pay for maintenance of restrooms, trails and visitor centers, among other things.

And he urged those who want to respond to the plan to make themselves heard by Nov. 23, the deadline for public comment.

"We'll see how those comments line up, and once we have that information, the park service will have an opportunity to rethink its proposal and decide the best course of action," he said.

The plan has set off a backlash on Capitol Hill, with at least 14 senators urging Zinke to scrap the idea.

Hey guys,

I need to see if I can get a comment from Interior/BLM on Steed taking over as acting BLM director. Who is taking over Steed's role as Deputy Director for Programs and Policy? Also, where is the agency in terms of nominating a full-time director for BLM?

My deadline is no later than noon EST today.

BLM employees:

This week, Secretary Ryan Zinke appointed Brian Steed as Acting Director of the BLM, and I want to welcome him as he begins his journey leading this great agency. John Ruhs and I have worked alongside Brian since his appointment as Deputy Director for Programs and Policy in October, and we have come to know his ethic, his intellect, and his passion for our multiple-use and sustained yield mission. His experience includes working as Chief of Staff to U.S. Representative Chris Stewart of Utah, teaching and researching economics at the University of Utah, and serving as a Deputy County Attorney in Iron County, Utah. He is a native of Logan, Utah, and now resides in Northern Virginia with his wife and three children. Brian's western heritage and values make him a perfect fit for the BLM team.

Since March 15, I have had the honor of leading the BLM. Your tireless dedication to our mission inspires me every day. DOI leaders continually express their confidence in the BLM's leadership in the field and here in Washington, which is a testament to all of you. Thank you for supporting me as the Acting Director over these months, and remaining as ever BLM strong.

During the coming weeks, John and I will transition to different roles. John will return to his position as BLM Nevada State Director, and I will assume the duties of Acting Deputy Director for Operations. I appreciate John's sacrifice over the past seven months while he has lived away from his family and the wide open spaces that he loves.

Please join me in welcoming Brian to his new position. As we move forward, let's continue to stay focused on our shared mission and values that guide us in our stewardship of America's public lands.

Take care and have a wonderful day! :)

Zinke's veteran daughter excoriates Trump in response to transgender military ban

The daughter of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, like her father a Navy veteran, appears, in the rawest of terms, to have excoriated President Donald Trump in a social media post after the announcement that transgender soldiers would be banned from the military.

"This man is a disgrace. I've tried to keep politics out of my social media feed as much as possible, but this is inexcusable," read a July 26 public Instagram post from what appears to be the account of Jennifer Detlefsen, the Navy diver daughter Zinke frequently mentioned in his successful 2016 re-election campaign for the U.S. House. Shortly after the election, Trump chose Zinke to lead the U.S. Department of the Interior.

"This veteran says sit down and shut the (expletive) up, you know-nothing, never-served piece of (expletive)." She also used a hashtag, #itmfa, that is an acronym for "impeach the (expletive) already."

The comments began circulating among national advocates for LGBTQ rights and one of them shared a screenshot of the Instagram post with the Missoulian on Friday, the day Trump signed the order making the transgender ban official.

Interior Press Secretary Heather Swift declined to make Zinke available for an interview or to provide an immediate statement Friday night.

"This is not a matter related to the Department of the Interior so I cannot offer you a statement," Swift wrote in response to a reporter's request.

She later added, "Family members are not elected officials and deserve privacy and respect."

The Instagram account links to a professional page with a resume that matches the name and biographical details of Zinke's daughter. It also includes a Jan. 6, 2015, photo taken from the floor of the U.S. House of Representatives, the day her father was sworn in for his first term as a congressman from Montana.

The post on that account includes a screenshot of an NPR story describing tweets by the president that "the United States Government will not accept or allow ... Transgender individuals to serve in any capacity in the U.S. Military." Trump first announced plans for the ban on July 26, the same day of the Instagram post.

Trump's Friday order formalized that Twitter announcement and provided the first details of his plan.

In it, he directs the military not to recruit transgender people, to stop paying for medical treatment regimens of transgender people already serving in the military, and to evaluate existing transgender soldiers and their impact on the military for "effectiveness and lethality, unitary cohesion, budgetary constraints, applicable law, and all factors that may be relevant."

Although some details remain unclear and Trump has indicated he is giving top defense officials some leeway to implement his plan, the move could effectively reverse a 2016 order by former president Barack Obama to allow transgender individuals to serve openly.

Zinke, a retired Navy SEAL, has not spoken publicly about his opinion of the ban. Nor has his wife, Lolita Zinke. She was a member of Trump campaign outreach efforts for Hispanics and women, and later joined the president's Veterans Administration transition team.

Detlefsen served in the Navy as a Deep Sea Diving Medical Technician and later as a High Risk Instructor of an explosive ordnance disposal training unit. She had worked at Special Operations for America, a military-focused super political action committee founded by Zinke, doing digital consulting and social media work, according to filings with the Federal Elections Commission.

Detlefsen now is a Virginia-based glass artist "bound by themes of masculine/feminine dichotomy, double standards, motherhood, and literature's impact on gender roles."

She could not immediately be reached for comment Friday night. A phone rang without answer and had a voicemail box that was full. Messages sent to two private email accounts also were not immediately returned.

Secretary Ryan Zinke Appoints Veteran Interior Official Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior

Tribal Leaders, Congressional Officials, Others Praise Selection

WASHINGTON – U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced the appointment of former Interior Department official and former Chief of Staff to Rep. Steve Pearce (NM) Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior. In this role, Willens will work closely with yet-to-be-confirmed Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt. Willens brings with him more than 20 years of public policy and governmental affairs experience, with proven successes on behalf of prior Administrations, Members of Congress, national associations, and the private sector. He possesses a deep knowledge and understanding of the Department's many complex policies, ranging from land to energy, wildlife, and water management.

"In addition to being a westerner, Todd brings a strong combination of public and private sector experience to the Interior Department," Secretary Ryan Zinke said. "Most of Interior's holdings and responsibilities are in the West, and Todd's intimate understanding of the West, from growing up in rural California to his previous time at Interior to his tenure with Congressman Pearce, will be a major asset to the people we serve. I look forward to Todd helping us advance Interior's mission and the work of the Administration on behalf of local communities."

"It is an honor and privilege to be appointed as Interior's Assistant Deputy Secretary," Willens said. "I thank Secretary Zinke for his confidence in my abilities to serve the Department and the Administration. I look forward to getting to work contributing to the implementation of the President's priorities for the Department and our Agencies, making America great again."

Willens served as Chief of Staff to Congressman Steve Pearce (R-NM) from 2010 to 2017. During his tenure as Chief of Staff, Willens provided strategic advice and operational oversight to meet the needs of the constituents of the 2nd Congressional District of New Mexico. He worked closely with various stakeholders in this capacity, including local government officials, Congress, and the previous Administration to ramp up operations at defense bases, prevent job-killing regulatory action, and increase federal accountability significantly for the people of New Mexico.

"Todd's dedication to New Mexico and the West made him a most effective manager of people and policies," Congressman Pearce said. "More than anything though, my wife Cynthia and I consider him a close friend. He has run my congressional operations for nearly seven years and been my top adviser on numerous items, delivering countless successes on my behalf. I congratulate Todd and the Administration on his appointment to this important position."

"The selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary deepens the bench at Interior," Jackie Johnson Pata, Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians, said. "In his prior work as Chief of Staff for Congressman Stevan Pearce, Todd handled a wide range of Native issues. In that role, he earned the great respect of many in Indian Country. As the Administration and Tribal Nations partner to advance economic development and self-sufficiency for Native communities, Todd's expertise and experience will be a valuable asset."

"I have worked with Todd for several years. He has an exceptional understanding of western issues in general, and Native issues in particular," Chairman Paul Torres of the All Pueblo Council of Governors said. "Todd is exactly the kind of leadership that can advance Interior's trust responsibility to tribes, while supporting tribal sovereignty and self-determination. This is an exceptional selection by the Administration."

"The Tehama Colusa Canal Authority couldn't be more pleased with the selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary at the Department of the Interior," Jeff Sutton, General Manager of the Tehama Colusa Canal Authority, said. "A native of Northern California, Todd has a great deal of experience in Western water issues and, as a sportsman-conservationist, he has a long track record of delivering mutually beneficial policy outcomes for the benefit of fish, wildlife and water users throughout the Western United States. We look forward to working with Todd in his new capacity."

"The Civil War Trust strongly supports the appointment of Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior," James Lighthizer, President of the Civil War Trust, said. "In his previous service on Capitol Hill and in the Department of the Interior, Todd has been a champion of our national parks and historic battlefield sites. We are excited about the opportunity to partner with him to preserve America's battlefield parks as places of remembrance as well as heritage tourism destinations."

"The Boone and Crockett Club proudly supports Todd Willens' appointment," said Paul Phillips, co-chair of the Boone and Crockett Club's Policy Committee. "Mr. Willens is a conservationist who hunts. He has this personal passion and understands the ecological and economic benefits that follow for the public. His experience in the complexities of policy at the Department of the Interior will serve the country and conservation community all very well.”

Prior to working on Capitol Hill, Willens served as Deputy Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks at the Department of the Interior from 2006 to 2008. While at the Department, he worked on the National Parks Centennial, and the historic recovery of the Bald Eagle. In addition, Willens also served as Senior Policy Advisor for United States House of Representatives Committee on Natural Resources from 2003 to 2006. In this capacity, he worked closely with the Chairman to develop key legislation, including the 2005 Endangered Species Act Reauthorization and the 2005 Energy Bill. A California native, Willens is a 1994 graduate of the University of California, Los Angeles. He currently lives in Washington, D.C. with his wife and four children.

All-

Below is a release for your awareness regarding the naming of the new superintendent at Redwood. The position has been fully vetted and approved. Let me know if there's any issues. The Region would like to put it out as soon as it's approved.

Steven Mietz named Redwood National & State Parks Superintendent

SAN FRANCISCO - The National Park Service has named Steven Mietz superintendent of Redwood National & State Parks. He is currently the superintendent of Great Basin National Park in Nevada. Mietz replaces Steven Prokop who retired earlier in the year.

“Steve is an exceptional leader who is passionate about building positive relationships to preserve our parks,” said Laura E. Joss, regional director for the National Park Service's Pacific West Region. "He has a proven track record of collaborating with partners. Along with his strong science background, this makes him an excellent fit for Redwood."

Mietz has more than 18 years with the federal government, including time with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and U.S. Geological Survey. He joined the National Park Service in 2003.

"I am humbled by the opportunity to be a partner in the stewardship of the ecosystem that supports the tallest trees in the world," Mietz said. "I am very excited about working with the staff and our partners to preserve this awe-inspiring place for the enjoyment and appreciation of all."

Under Mietz's watch, Great Basin National Park was designated an International Dark Sky Park. The park and its nonprofit partners raised $800,000 to construct the Great Basin Observatory. It will take advantage of some of the best night sky viewing in the nation. He has overseen the completion of several large-scale campsite rehabilitations and ecological restoration projects.

Throughout his National Park Service career, Mietz has served in a variety of positions, including as the Midwest Region's acting associate regional director for natural resources, the superintendent of Missouri National Recreational River, and the deputy chief of science and resource management at Grand Canyon National Park. Prior to working at Grand Canyon, he worked with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's Grizzly Bear Recovery Program, the University of Montana's Flathead Lake Biological Station, and the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes of the Flathead Nation.

Mietz is currently on temporary assignment as the superintendent of Point Reyes National Seashore in the San Francisco Bay Area. He will return to Great Basin National Park before taking the reins at Redwood, which is expected to be sometime in late fall.

Mietz earned his Bachelor of Science degree from Cornell University and his masters from the University of Montana. His personal interests include hiking, camping, and cross-country skiing with his wife, Stephanie, and sons, Jack and Ben.

Most people know Redwood as home to the tallest trees on Earth. The parks also protect vast prairies, oak woodlands, wild riverways, and nearly 40 miles of rugged coastline. For thousands of years people have lived in this verdant landscape. Together, the National Park Service and California State Parks manage the lands for the inspiration, enjoyment, and education of all.

The National Park Service has more than 20,000 National Park Service employees care for America's 417 national parks and work with communities across the nation to help preserve local history and create close-to-home recreational opportunities.

Secretary Ryan Zinke Appoints Veteran Interior Official Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior

Tribal Leaders, Congressional Officials, Others Praise Selection

(WASHINGTON) U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced the appointment of former Interior Department official and former Chief of Staff to Rep. Steve Pearce (NM) Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior. In this role, Willens will work closely with yet-to-be-confirmed Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt. Willens brings with him more than 20 years of public policy and governmental affairs experience, with proven successes on behalf of prior Administrations, Members of Congress, national associations, and the private sector. He possesses a deep knowledge and understanding of the Department's many complex policies, ranging from land to energy, wildlife, and water management.

In addition to being a westerner, Todd brings a strong combination of public and private sector experience to the Interior Department," Secretary Ryan Zinke said. "Most of Interior's holdings and responsibilities are in the West, and Todd's intimate understanding of the West, from growing up in rural California to his previous time at Interior to his tenure with Congressman Pearce, will be a major asset to the people we serve. I look forward to Todd helping us advance Interior's mission and the work of the Administration on behalf of local communities."

"It is an honor and privilege to be appointed as Interior's Assistant Deputy Secretary," Willens said. "I thank Secretary Zinke for his confidence in my abilities to serve the Department and the Administration. I look forward to getting to work contributing to the implementation of the President's priorities for the Department and our Agencies, making America great again."

Willens served as Chief of Staff to Congressman Steve Pearce (R-NM) from 2010 to 2017. During his tenure as Chief of Staff, Willens provided strategic advice and operational oversight to meet the needs of the constituents of the 2nd Congressional District of New Mexico. He worked closely with various stakeholders in this capacity, including local government officials, Congress, and the previous Administration to ramp up operations at defense bases, prevent job-killing regulatory action, and increase federal accountability significantly for the people of New Mexico.

"Todd's dedication to New Mexico and the West made him a most effective manager of people and policies," Congressman Pearce said. "More than anything though, my wife Cynthia and I consider him a close friend. He has run my congressional operations for nearly seven years and been my top adviser on numerous items, delivering countless successes on my behalf. I congratulate Todd and the Administration on his appointment to this important position."

"The selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary deepens the bench at Interior," Jackie Johnson Pata, Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians, said. "In his prior work as Chief of Staff for Congressman Stevan Pearce, Todd handled a wide range of Native issues. In that role, he earned the great respect of many in Indian Country. As the Administration and Tribal Nations partner to advance economic development and self-sufficiency for Native communities, Todd's expertise and experience will be a valuable asset."

"I have worked with Todd for several years. He has an exceptional understanding of western issues in general, and Native issues in particular," Chairman Paul Torres of the All Pueblo Council of Governors said. "Todd is exactly the kind of leadership that can advance Interior's trust responsibility to tribes, while supporting tribal sovereignty and self-determination. This is an exceptional selection by the Administration."

"The Tehama Colusa Canal Authority couldn't be more pleased with the selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary at the Department of the Interior," Jeff Sutton, General Manager of the Tehama Colusa Canal Authority, said. "A native of Northern California, Todd has a great deal of experience in Western water issues and, as a sportsman-conservationist, he has a long track record of delivering mutually beneficial policy outcomes for the benefit of fish, wildlife and water users throughout the Western United States. We look forward to working with Todd in his new capacity."

"The Civil War Trust strongly supports the appointment of Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior," James Lighthizer, President of the Civil War Trust, said. "In his previous service on Capitol Hill and in the Department of the Interior, Todd has been a champion of our national parks and historic battlefield sites. We are excited about the opportunity to partner with him to preserve America's battlefield parks as places of remembrance as well as heritage tourism destinations."

"The Boone and Crockett Club proudly supports Todd Willens' appointment," said Paul Phillips, co-chair of the Boone and Crockett Club's Policy Committee. "Mr. Willens is a conservationist who hunts. He has this personal passion and understands the ecological and economic benefits that follow for the public. His experience in the complexities of policy at the Department of the Interior will serve the country and conservation community all very well."

Prior to working on Capitol Hill, Willens served as Deputy Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks at the Department of the Interior from 2006 to 2008. While at the Department, he worked on the National Parks Centennial, and the historic recovery of the Bald Eagle. In addition, Willens also served as Senior Policy Advisor for United States House of Representatives Committee on Natural Resources from 2003 to 2006. In this capacity, he worked closely with the Chairman to develop key legislation, including the 2005 Endangered Species Act Reauthorization and the 2005 Energy Bill. A California native, Willens is a 1994 graduate of the University of California, Los Angeles. He currently lives in Washington, D.C. with his wife and four children.

*Citizen Photographers Compete for Photo
National Public Lands and Waters Pass*

WASHINGTON – The U.S. Department of the Interior today, along with the National Park Foundation and other participating federal recreation land agencies, announced the winners of the 2016 “Share the Experience” photography contest on CBS This Morning and Interior's popular Instagram account and launched the 2017 contest.

This annual contest invites amateur photographers to submit their favorite views, moments, and adventures from America’s national parks and public lands. The winning picture, captured by Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas, will be featured on the annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass.

More than 16,500 photos were submitted with more than 710,000 photo views over the course of the contest, which ran from April 28, 2016, through Dec. 31, 2016. The contest saw a 50 percent increase in new users and almost a 10 percent increase in overall photo submissions from the previous contest year.

“Photos have the power to inspire curiosity about our national parks and public lands,” said Will Shafroth, president of the National Park Foundation. “This contest motivates people to get out, find their park, and enjoy these treasured places.”

Dabbling in wildlife photography since the early 1970s, grand prize winner Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas and his wife make weekly visits to Aransas National Wildlife Refuge during the summer months.

“I like photographing the frogs because they’re artistic – little reptiles and amphibians are gorgeous to me. I’ve been studying them for 60 years now – patterns, designs, and their behavior all fascinate me,” said McIntyre. “Public lands are very important to me, especially places like Big Bend National Park, Aransas National Wildlife Refuge, and South Padre Island National Seashore. These places and the habitat need to be protected.”

Second place went to Gary Hamer of Robins, Iowa, for the serene shot of his friends paddling off on a morning adventure surrounded by calm water and rising fog in Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, part of Superior National Forest, in northeastern Minnesota.

Third place went to Christopher Regala of Mililani, Hawaii, for the photo he snapped of his son experiencing The Narrows at Zion National Park in Utah.

The grand prize for the winning image is $10,000, followed by $5,000 and $3,000 for second and third place. Winners also receive outdoor gear provided by Celestron and Osprey Packs, hotel packages courtesy of Historic Hotels of America® and an annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass. Prizes are awarded for fan favorites and the following six category winners:

- Adventure and Outdoor Recreation
- Historical and Cultural
- Scenic, Seasons, and Landscapes
- Family, Friends, and Fun
- Wildlife
- Night Skies

This week, Secretary Ryan Zinke appointed Brian Steed as Acting Director of the BLM, and I want to welcome him as he begins his journey leading this great agency. John Ruhs and I have worked alongside Brian since his appointment as Deputy Director for Programs and Policy in October, and we have come to know his ethic, his intellect, and his passion for our multiple-use and sustained yield mission. His experience includes working as Chief of Staff to U.S.

Representative Chris Stewart of Utah, teaching and researching economics at the University of Utah, and serving as a Deputy County Attorney in Iron County, Utah. He is a native of Logan, Utah, and now resides in Northern Virginia with his wife and three children. Brian's western heritage and values make him a perfect fit for the BLM team.

Since March 15, I have had the honor of leading the BLM. Your tireless dedication to our mission inspires me every day. DOI leaders continually express their confidence in the BLM's leadership in the field and here in Washington, which is a testament to all of you. Thank you for supporting me as the Acting Director over these months, and remaining as ever BLM strong.

During the coming weeks, John and I will transition to different roles. John will return to his position as BLM Nevada State Director, and I will assume the duties of Acting Deputy Director for Operations. I appreciate John's sacrifice over the past seven months while he has lived away from his family and the wide open spaces that he loves.

Please join me in welcoming Brian to his new position. As we move forward, let's continue to stay focused on our shared mission and values that guide us in our stewardship of America's public lands.

Take care and have a wonderful day! :)

Hi there. With Sec. Price in the news, we're looking into travel by other secretaries,, so apologies in advance for the detailed email. I'm working with a colleague, Drew Harwell. We've looked at Sec. Zinke's travel schedule since his confirmation in March, through July. Hoping you and your colleagues will be able to tackle these questions. Obviously an Interior secretary is going to be traveling a lot... We would just like to flesh out some questions. Many thanks, and really appreciate. Lisa

- OVERALL questions
- How many flights has Sec. Zinke taken on government or charter jets? Can you please provide the aircraft manifest, type of plane, destinations, dates of use, purpose, cost of the trip and source of payment for the trips?
- On what trips did Sec. Zinke's wife Lola and/or other members of Sec. Zinke's family join?
- The calendar says that spouses attended a cultural briefing with local reindeer herders on May 26 in Norway. Was Lola Zinke one of the spouses?
- Did Sec. Zinke take steps to limit the costs of his travel? If so, what were they?
- Virgin Islands
 - What was the official purpose of the U.S. Virgin Islands trip during Zinke's first month as Interior secretary?
 - What was the cost of the trip?
 - Did Sec. Zinke's wife Lola attend?
 - While some flights appear to be commercial, others are not shown, including multiple flights on March 31. Can you please provide the manifest, type of plane, cost of the trip and source of payment for the trips?
- Big Sky event
 - Sec. Zinke was in Big Sky in March 17-19, the same time Sen. Daines hosted a "weekend in the Montana mountains" benefiting the Daines Big Sky Committee. He attended multiple Daines receptions and stayed the night at Daines' home. A fundraiser flyer says requested contributions were $3,000 for PACs, $1,500 for personal.

- What was the policy purpose of this trip?
 - Was this a political trip?
 - Who paid for Zinke's travel to the political events?
- Atlanta
 - What was the purpose of Sec. Zinke's trip to the NRA Institute for Legislative Action event in Atlanta on April 28? Was this a political event? What was the cost of flying on Air Force One, and did the DOI reimburse any other agencies for the seats of Sec. Zinke, Lola Zinke or his staff?
- April 12-20
 - During the trip, Sec. Zinke spoke at the Reagan Center in Santa Barbara and campaigned for Greg Gianforte. Was this a political trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
 - On April 15 and 16, Sec. Zinke was in Santa Barabra, including a meeting with former Congressman Bob Lagomarsino. What was the meeting about? Did these home trips entail personal or official use? The items don't say that it was "personal travel" or "paid for personally" - was it?
 - On April 17, Sec. Zinke went to the Reagan Ranch Center and met the vice president of the Young America's Foundation. What was the official policy purpose of this trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
- May 5-13: Montana, Utah, California, Montana
 - What was the official policy purpose of Sec. Zinke's trip on May 5-13?
 - During the trip, Sec. Zinke gave keynote remarks to the RNC Spring Meeting Dinner and attended a rally for Greg Gianforte. Was this a political trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
 - On May 8 and May 9, Sec. Zinke traveled in a B200 Turboprop 8-passenger plane, the calendar states. Can you please provide the manifest, cost of the trip, owner of the jet and source of payment for the trips?
 - Sec. Zinke spent that weekend at home in Kalispell, Montana. He then flew to Dulles and home on Monday. Federal regulations say employees' official travel should by no means include personal use. Did these home trips entail personal use?
- May 25-June 2: Norway, Greenland, Alaska, Idaho
 - What was the official purpose of this trip?
 - Sec. Zinke attended a reception for Rep. Don Young at Sullivan's Steakhouse. Was this a political trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
 - Sec. Zinke flew from Boise to L.A. on June 2. The June 3 and 4 dates say "Personal travel // Paid for personally" in Santa Barbara. What did Sec. Zinke pay for? How much did he pay At what rate did he pay for the travel personally? What aircraft did he fly on? What was the total cost to government?
- June 25-28: Nevada, Montana
 - On June 25, Sec. Zinke attended the Rule of Law Defense Fund Reception & Dinner, where he sat at a dinner table with leaders of the casino industry, the NRA, the Chamber of Commerce and Koch Industries. What was the policy purpose of Sec. Zinke's attendance? Was this a political event?
 - On June 26, Sec. Zinke flew from Las Vegas to Kalispell on a private plane tied to a Republican donor. Can you please provide the aircraft manifest, purpose, cost of the trip and source of payment for the trips? It appears Sec. Zinke spent the night afterward at his home in Whitefish; is that correct, and wouldn't that convey personal use?
- July 20-22: Colorado
 - On July 20, Sec. Zinke gave remarks in Denver at the American Legislative Exchange Council. He also attended a Colorado Republican Committee roundtable and gave remarks at the Western Conservative Summit.

- What was the official policy purpose of these trips? Were these trips political or personal? What were Sec. Zinke's remarks at these trips. What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?

Interior secretary draws flak for mixing politics, official travel

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon

10/04/2017 07:31 PM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little B.S."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Justice Department's Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips he takes outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then-Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity. Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations, that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

The courtesy of a call would be nice. If you actually read the email I sent to Michael, which was fairly explicit, I clearly know who appoints board members. Similarly, if I thought it would be remotely useful to contact a flak at the Interior Department, I obviously would have done that. I don't mean to be rude, but it often feels like people in your position are deliberately trying to be unhelpful.

re: Susan LaPierre

Dear Mr. Reynolds,

I'm a senior reporter at The Trace (thetrace.org), which is an investigative reporting site that covers the gun issue and co-publishes stories with a number of national news outlets, including The New Yorker, Politico, Rolling Stone, and Newsweek. Last month, I broke the story about the appointment of Susan LaPierre (wife of Wayne, the NRA CEO), to the board of the Parks Foundation: <https://www.thetrace.org/2017/08/nra-parks-department-interior-zinke-alaska/>.

I'm still seeking more information on her appointment. I find it odd, for example, that her bio makes no mention of the NRA: <https://www.nationalparks.org/sites/default/files/susan-lapierre.pdf>. It does mention the Women's Leadership Forum, as if it were a standalone entity, which it is not. It's actually called the NRA Women's Leadership Forum, and its chief function is to raise money for the NRA from wealthy women: <http://www.nrawlf.com/>.

Over the spring, when I learned about Susan's appointment, I filed a FOIA request seeking more information about it. That request was fulfilled the other week. If you didn't know, Susan is absolutely not a noted conservationist, and, like her husband, she absolutely does not hunt, and probably does not fish or hike either. The records show that Susan was officially appointed the day before the NRA's April Annual Meeting, where Zinke was slated to speak at the Leadership forum. The records also show that there were backchannel conversations between Chris Cox, the NRA's top lobbyist, and new appointees in the Interior Department about Susan's appointment.

To be frank: much of this doesn't add up or make sense to me, and it feels like there's something bigger going on. If you have any time today, please call me on my cell. I think we should talk. Here's the number: (b) (6) . Would be happy to meet you in person.

Best,
Mike Spies

Hi Heather,

Wanted to direct you to the responses in this tweet: <https://twitter.com/LolaZinke/status/917711705374937089>

A Twitter user poses this question to Lola: So are you claiming that no taxpayer funds have ever been used to pay for your travel? DOI confirmed that you went along to Norway & AK

Lola then responds: please refer to Senate Select committee travel ethics rules

It appears this is an admission that Lola was on those flights but that she believes she followed all appropriate ethics rules (and, again, there may well have been clearance by ethics). Was Lola on those flights? Can you provide that clearance that ethics provided for her to be on those flights?

Since these responses are public, I'm operating with some considerable time pressure but I also want to get this right. So please let me know.

Hi Heather, hope your weekend went well. A few questions for you. We're looking to run something this week, so hope to get your input in the next few days:

Chief of Staff Scott Hommel indicated on his OGE form 278 that his wife makes no income over $1,000 a year, correct?

How much money does Lucretia Hommel make, if any, from doing interior design work for Kimberly Bellissimo's homes in New Jersey and downtown Washington D.C.? Is it a non-profit, or does she make more than $1,000 a year from this business?

How much money does Lucretia Hommel make a year overall doing interior design for her business, Snobz? How much does she make selling furniture from her Web site, snobz.co? Is there a way to break that down to see how much money she makes, if any, selling Bellissimo's furniture on the Web site?

Did anyone in Interior's ethics office discuss with Hommel how to fill out OGE form 278?

Can you say who arranged this meeting?

One of those "gentlemen," Chuck

Johnson, is a fairly controversial figure.

- His website is fundraising for Andrew Anglin, publisher neo-Nazi website Daily Stormer.

- Prior to the meeting, Johnson incorrectly identified a student at University of Virginia and accused her of making false rape accusations (he attacked her online and posted a photo of her). Link: <http://jezebel.com/woman-falsely-idd-as-uvas-jackie-by-conservative-blogge-1671234663>

- He was booted from Twitter after saying he planned to "take out" a black activist. Link: <http://www.politico.com/blogs/media/2015/05/troll-charles-johnson-banned-from-twitter-207688>
- He's argued that homosexuality was responsible for an Amtrak derailment. Link: <http://www.advocate.com/commentary/2015/05/15/op-ed-amtrak-accident-isnt-part-gay-agenda>
- He falsely claimed a "left-wing Democrat" nurse in New Jersey had Ebola and offered $1,000 for pictures of a Republican candidate's wife, who was in a nursing home. Link: <http://bit.ly/139nGar>

Was the secretary aware of Mr. Johnson's... how do I put it.... extremely inappropriate and abusive behavior prior to taking that meeting?

Please excuse the language in this email below, I'm quoting one of the attendees of the meeting in which Mr. Zinke, Downey Magallanes, Scott Hommel, Nancy Guiden, as well as acting Communications Director Megan Bloomgren, were all present.

We asked Mr. Luckey if he could elaborate on what was discussed w/ the Secretary at this meeting.

Mr. Luckey told our reporter: "I could give you an answer. Or I could tell you to go fuck yourself."

In response, we're filing a FOIA request for additional information about the meeting & printing a story about the meeting within the hour.

Former Louisiana State Official Scott A. Angelle Named as Director of the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Former Louisiana state official Scott A. Angelle will head-up the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement. As part of the Department of the Interior, BSEE fosters safe and responsible energy production on the U.S. Outer Continental Shelf through regulatory oversight of oil and gas operations. Angelle, who most recently served as Vice Chairman of the Louisiana Public Service Commission, will assume his new position May 23.

“Scott Angelle brings a wealth of experience to BSEE, having spent many years working for the safe and efficient energy production of both Louisiana’s and our country’s offshore resources,” Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke said. “As we set our path towards energy dominance, I am confident that Scott has the expertise, vision, and the leadership necessary to effectively enhance our program, and to promote the safe and environmentally responsible exploration, development, and production of our country's offshore oil and gas resources.”

Angelle, who will serve as the fourth director in BSEE's history, has held numerous positions in Louisiana State and Parish governments, including Interim Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Natural Resources, and St. Martin Parish President. In the aftermath of the BP oil spill, Angelle served at the request of then Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal as liaison to the federal government, and negotiated an early end of the previous administration's drilling moratorium.

“I welcome the opportunity to serve President Trump and Secretary Zinke, and work with BSEE staff to meet the critical goal of energy dominance for our country,” said Angelle. “It is an exciting and challenging time for BSEE; I look forward to leading our efforts to empower the offshore oil and gas industry while ensuring safe and environmentally responsible operations.”

Angelle served for eight years as Louisiana's Secretary of the Department of Natural Resources. Under his leadership, the state's coastal permitting system was reformed, providing for efficient permitting while increasing drilling rig counts in Louisiana by more than 150 percent during his tenure. Angelle has also served as Chairman of the Louisiana State Mineral Board, and as a member of the Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors, Southern States Energy Board, and the Louisiana Coastal Port Advisory Authority.

Angelle is a native of Breaux Bridge, Louisiana, and a cum laude graduate of the University of Louisiana at Lafayette with a Bachelor of Science degree in Petroleum Land Management. He and his wife Dianne are the proud parents of five children and four grandchildren.

Established in 2011, BSEE fosters secure and reliable energy production through a program of efficient permitting, appropriate regulations, compliance monitoring and enforcement, inspections, technical assessments, and incident investigations. The position of BSEE Director is not Senate-confirmed.

Washington, DC — Exorbitant travel by the Interior Secretary is not limited to charter planes but includes seagoing vessels, according to documents released today by Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility (PEER). In mid-April, Ryan Zinke diverted a National Park Service (NPS) boat to pick him and family members up for a three-hour island tour featuring a Junior Ranger swearing-in ceremony.

On April 18th, the NPS boat Ocean Ranger left its Ventura, California port to travel to Santa Barbara Harbor to pick up Zinke, his wife, and aunt to take them and other members of his party to Santa Rosa Island, part of the Channel Islands National Park, and back that same day.

The party spent more time at sea than on the island, with a three-hour itinerary that consisted largely of photo ops, a tour, lunch, and Zinke swearing in middle school students as Junior Rangers. Notably –

- Use of the government ship cost taxpayers around $4,000 dollars, including fuel and crew overtime, an estimate that does not include significant time by several NPS staff people;
- Zinke also brought along two local fishermen whom he classified as “technical experts” though on what issue is unclear. As such, they traveled free; and
- To pay for his wife and aunt, NPS presented Zinke with a bill for $142, which by mid-June increased to $152 in late fees. The bill appears to have been paid by late June.

“This ‘grip-and-grin’ tour is galling when the Secretary is telling everyone else to tighten their belts,” stated PEER Executive Director Jeff Ruch who obtained the documents under the Freedom of Information Act after employees complained of the time and expense lost for no discernible purpose. “Taxpayers should not foot the bill for public officials acting as tourists.”

The records also describe Zinke expressing a desire to open a “working demonstration ranch” on Santa Rosa Island to “highlight the island’s ranching heritage,” quoting a note from the park superintendent. The Zinke tour group also included members of the Vail family which ran a cattle ranch on the island until 1998 and a commercial hunting operation there until 2011.

The Channel Islands are often called “the Galapagos Islands of North America” due to the unique and wide diversity of plants and animals found nowhere else on earth. In recent years, NPS has undertaken a major and costly effort to preserve and protect these native resources, including removal of nonnative plants and animals, recovery of island foxes, and reestablishment of bald eagles.

“Cattle and imported game animals are not the ‘heritage’ of Santa Rosa but an aberrant moment in its history,” added Ruch, noting a recent Zinke directive to maximize hunting opportunities even on national park lands. “Our major concern is that Ryan Zinke wants to turn this ecological jewel back into a game preserve.”

Good evening Heather,

Attached is the last issue for this year for the Pyramid Lake Tribe.

And you are right, it is opinionated rather than straight news copy. I started working with the Nevada State Journal probably before you were born and my teachers were the reporters and editors on staff. It was their encouragement to “slant” my articles in favor of my Indian people because we had very few chances of letting our views be known. And basically that is what Indian press attempts to do—let our Indian voices talk to our Indian people. Non-Indians have their own media.

Thanks for your critique. I always appreciate knowing what other folks think.

For Review, from POLITICO -

1. Did Secretary Zinke reimburse DOI for Lola's meal at the governors meeting in Denal I

DOI did not pay for the meal. The Secretary personally paid the State of Alaska for the meal. Further, DOI incurred no expenses due to Mrs. Zinke's presence.

1. Was there any reason for Lola to attend that dinner? I know that Interior staff had originally advised against it.

It's not accurate to say staff advised against it. Staff simply stated it would need to get it approved by ethics under short notice.

I am writing an article on a statement by Susan LaPierre, the head of the NRA Woman's Forum and wife of NRA chief Wayne LaPierre, that Sec. Zinke named her to the board of the National Park Foundation, which raises private funds to support national parks. When does that appointment take effect? Any statement available on this selection. Who else, if anyone, has the secretary named to the board?

Deadline is 10am Thursday.

Thanks.

I'm looking over some of the Zinke for Congress PAC expenditures. Please answer the following questions.

1) Please address the sale of the RV to Buttrey and whether the PAC sold it to him for less than it's actual value. And please address whether Lola Zinke may have conversely sold the RV to the PAC for more than it was worth.

2) The Zinke for Congress PAC reported a $22K-ish payment to First BankCard and listed the underlying transactions as all happening on December 31.

2a) Please provide the dates that the three expenses listed underneath were actually incurred?

recipient_name	recipient_state	disbursement_description	disbursement_amount	disbursement_date
VONS	CA	CAMPAIGN DINNER	314.36	12/31/2016 0:00
WESTHOUSE	NY	LODGING	696.18	12/31/2016 0:00
LIME INN	Virgin Islands	LODGING	522.74	12/31/2016 0:00

3) The Zinke for Congress PAC reported the receipt of this $13,997.653 transfer on its April Quarterly report, but does not list the individual contributions contained in the transfer-in from Zinke Victory Fund. Why is that?

4) Lastly, please provide a general comment on the extent to which Zinke ensured his campaign PAC followed campaign finance and disclosure laws.

Please respond by 10 am Monday as we plan to run a story at 11 a.m. Apologies for the short notice.

Thanks, Esther

Do you want me to respond?

Hi Heather –

I'm hoping you can help confirm some details about a meeting that was listed on Secretary Zinke's August calendar –

<image001.png>

Is that the same Steve Ryan who represented the Zinkes in D.C. Superior Court earlier this year in a lawsuit involving Saint Sophia Greek Orthodox Church? (background here: <https://www.eenews.net/stories/1060058652>)

If so, is he representing the secretary or Lola Zinke in other legal matters?

Is the Jim McCray listed in the description the CEO of Highwood Capital? <http://www.highwoodcap.com/team.html>

Are Brian Ballard, Susie Wiles and Syl Lukis all from the lobbying firm Ballard Partners?

Did all of the listed participants actually attend the meeting?

What did they discuss?

Please let me know if you could get answers to these by the end of the day today.

Good afternoon:

I am writing a story about Mrs. Zinke, dealing with her role in politics (the Downing campaign), in public commentary (Twitter) and her support for the secretary.

(Parenthetical note: I understand there was a previous E&E story proposed, that never ran. This is not that story; I am a different reporter.)

A couple of questions:

Is Mrs. Zinke available for interview?

How would you characterize her role at the department?

On what occasions will she travel with the secretary?

Does she have work space at the department?

Has she received ethics briefing?

I appreciate the help. My deadline is Friday at 11 a.m.

Thanks.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
July 13, 2017

Senate Western Caucus Urges Confirmation of Bernhardt for Deputy Secretary of the Interior

U.S. SENATE — Today, the Senate Western Caucus, led by Chairman Steve Daines (R-MT), urged the confirmation of Department of the Interior veteran David Bernhardt for Deputy Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior (DOI).

Bernhardt, a Westerner from Rifle, Colorado, brings years of personal experience as an avid hunter and fisherman as well as professional experience having served under former DOI Secretaries Gale Norton and Dirk Kempthorne in multiple positions.

Bernhardt was announced as President Donald J. Trump's choice for Deputy Secretary on April 28 and was subsequently approved by the U.S. Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on June 6. Less than a month away from the August recess, the Senate has confirmed only 23 percent of President Trump's 216 nominations. By the first August recess during President Obama's first term, the Senate had confirmed 69 percent of his 454 nominations.

U.S. Senator Steve Daines (R-MT): "David Bernhardt will be a partner to Montanans and to Secretary Ryan Zinke – which makes for the best kind of Deputy Secretary of the Interior. David will work to improve access to public lands, restore American energy dominance and empower Montanans ability to best serve their families and communities. We need to confirm David Bernhardt so he can get to work on behalf of Montanans and the West."

U.S. Senator Cory Gardner (R-CO): "As a native Coloradan from Rifle, David Bernhardt has a deep understanding of Western land issues, and his expertise and experience will serve the Department well. Unfortunately, a partisan minority in the Senate continues to block Mr. Bernhardt's nomination, and I hope that the confirmation process has not become a broken process that disincentives qualified people, like Mr. Bernhardt, who are held in high professional regard, from becoming public servants."

U.S. Senator Jeff Flake (R-AZ): "David Bernhardt has the deep water background we need to continue efforts to protect our Colorado River supplies" said Senator Jeff Flake, the Chairman of the Water and Power Subcommittee of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. "We need this experienced nominee confirmed without delay."

U.S. Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT): "I applaud the nomination of Dave Bernhardt for Deputy Secretary of the Department of Interior. President Trump and Secretary Zinke have already made great progress in restoring trust between Westerners and the federal government, but significant work remains, especially in Utah where reduced access to our public land has hurt our rural economies. As a former Interior Solicitor, Dave has the legal and political background necessary to confront some of the most difficult challenges ahead, such as expanding responsible development of our natural resources, protecting and promoting multiple-use, and expanding opportunities for recreational access. I am confident that Dave's breadth of experience makes him uniquely qualified for this position, and I look forward to working with him."

U.S. Senator Mike Lee (R-UT): "I can think of no one who is more qualified to be deputy secretary of the Interior than David Bernhardt. He has a long track record of distinguished service in the department and he understands the importance of efficient and collaborative federal land and resource management. David's extensive knowledge, experience, and leadership will go a long way in advancing Secretary Zinke's goal of restoring the American people's trust in the Interior Department. I urge my colleagues to support David's nomination and confirm him as soon as possible."

U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski (R-AK): "Dave Bernhardt is an excellent choice to help set strategic direction and run the Department of the Interior on a day-to-day basis. He grew up in the West, has extensive knowledge of issues that are important to Alaskans, and will be a great asset to Secretary Zinke and his team. We reported his nomination from the Energy and Natural Resources Committee with bipartisan support more than a month ago, so I urge my colleagues to support the swift confirmation of this well-qualified nominee."

U.S. Senator John McCain (R-AZ): "David Bernhardt's experience working on water policy and Native American issues makes him uniquely suited to serve as the Deputy Secretary of the Interior Department Administration. I am confident David will serve the state of Arizona and the nation with distinction, and I encourage my colleagues to vote in favor of his nomination."

Former United States Senator Jon Kyl (R-AZ): “Having worked with David Bernhardt for many years on a variety of Department of the Interior matters, in particular on Indian water settlements, I know he’ll be a great addition to the team.”

David Allen President/CEO Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation: “The Senate has not yet acted on several important positions that remain unfilled at the Interior Department. Among them is the nomination of David Bernhardt to be Deputy Secretary. This is a critical position that not only ensures the Department’s programs are run effectively, but also succeeds the Secretary in certain situations. Bernhardt is a Coloradan, a hunter and angler, and former high-ranking officer at Interior who understands the issues important to sportsmen and women. We encourage the Senate to act on his nomination without delay.”

Dale Hall, Chief Executive Officer, Ducks Unlimited: “I have known and worked with David for more than 10 years and could not be more pleased with his nomination for Deputy Secretary of the Interior. For David Bernhardt, integrity is doing the right thing even when the easiest decision would be to continue with the status quo. I believe David is a man with personal and professional integrity that is beyond reproach and has always advocated for the proper application of science and implementation of the law, especially when it comes to species conservation. I believe David will continue to advocate for sound and balanced resource management and advocate for the use of best available science.”

Whit Fosburgh, Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership President and CEO: “The Department of Interior, the chief steward of our national public lands, requires a Deputy Secretary who understands how the department functions and understands the complexities associated with balancing the resource needs of our country, both now, and most importantly, for future generations of Americans. David Bernhardt will provide much needed departmental experience to the Interior leadership team at a time when important natural resource decisions with wide impact are being considered.”

Jeffrey Vorberger, Vice President, Policy & Government Affairs of NOIA: “NOIA strongly encourages the Senate to confirm David Bernhardt as the Deputy Secretary of the Interior sooner rather than later. Strong, experienced leadership at all levels of the Department are necessary as America strives to become energy dominant. David has a proven record, is beyond qualified and his extensive experience serving the Department of Interior under the George W. Bush administration will make him a vital asset to Secretary Zinke. Further delay on his confirmation is a lost opportunity.”

Peter Hayes, Associate General Manager & Chief Public Affairs Executive, Salt River Project: “David Bernhardt has for many years exhibited strong leadership on federal land, water, and natural resources policies, having previously served the public as a senior official at the Department of the Interior. SRP urges quick confirmation in the Senate for Mr. Bernhardt and looks forward to continuing its long-standing collaborative partnership with the Department under Secretary Zinke and Mr. Bernhardt’s leadership.”

Russell Begaye, President of the Navajo Nation: “Mr. Bernhardt brings years of experience working on Indian country's most pressing issues. I look forward to working with him and the rest of the Department of the Interior leadership team to bring the Bureau of Indian Affairs into the 21st century.”

Stephen Roe Lewis, Governor, Gila River Indian Community, AZ: “Based on our experience in negotiating and working on complex issues with Mr. Bernhardt, we support his position as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. We believe he has an understanding of tribal sovereignty and the United States' trust responsibility to tribal nations, including the Gila River Indian Community.”

White Mountain Apache Tribal Council, AZ: “David Bernhardt is respected by the White Mountain Apache Tribe and enjoys widespread respect in Indian County as being fair and well versed in Native American issues and the historic time-honored government to government and trust relationship between Indian Nations and the United States.”

The position of Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior is the Chief Operating Officer of the Department and Bernhardt's nomination is subject to confirmation by the United States Senate.

Bernhardt also previously served as the United States Commissioner to the International Boundary Commission, U.S. and Canada. He earned his bachelor's degree from the University of Northern Colorado and graduated with honors from George Washington University National Law Center. He recently served on the Board of Game and Inland Fisheries for the Commonwealth of Virginia, where he resides in Arlington with his wife Gena and their two children. As Deputy Secretary, Bernhardt will make Interior a better neighbor, ensure American energy dominance to create jobs and return Endangered Species Act to its original intent.

July 13, 2017

Senate Western Caucus Urges Confirmation of Bernhardt for Deputy Secretary of the Interior

U.S. SENATE — Today, the Senate Western Caucus, led by Chairman Steve Daines (R-MT), urged the confirmation of Department of the Interior veteran David Bernhardt for Deputy Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior (DOI).

Bernhardt, a Westerner from Rifle, Colorado, brings years of personal experience as an avid hunter and fisherman as well as professional experience having served under former DOI Secretaries Gale Norton and Dirk Kempthorne in multiple positions.

Bernhardt was announced as President Donald J. Trump's choice for Deputy Secretary on April 28 and was subsequently approved by the U.S. Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on June 6. Less than a month away from the August recess, the Senate has confirmed only 23 percent of President Trump's 216 nominations. By the first August recess during President Obama's first term, the Senate had confirmed 69 percent of his 454 nominations.

U.S. Senator Steve Daines (R-MT): "David Bernhardt will be a partner to Montanans and to Secretary Ryan Zinke – which makes for the best kind of Deputy Secretary of the Interior. David will work to improve access to public lands, restore American energy dominance and empower Montanans ability to best serve their families and communities. We need to confirm David Bernhardt so he can get to work on behalf of Montanans and the West."

U.S. Senator Cory Gardner (R-CO): "As a native Coloradan from Rifle, David Bernhardt has a deep understanding of Western land issues, and his expertise and experience will serve the Department well. Unfortunately, a partisan minority in the Senate continues to block Mr. Bernhardt's nomination, and I hope that the confirmation process has not become a broken process that disincentives qualified people, like Mr. Bernhardt, who are held in high professional regard, from becoming public servants."

U.S. Senator Jeff Flake (R-AZ): "David Bernhardt has the deep water background we need to continue efforts to protect our Colorado River supplies" said Senator Jeff Flake, the Chairman of the Water and Power Subcommittee of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. "We need this experienced nominee confirmed without delay."

U.S. Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT): "I applaud the nomination of Dave Bernhardt for Deputy Secretary of the Department of Interior. President Trump and Secretary Zinke have already made great progress in restoring trust between Westerners and the federal government, but significant work remains, especially in Utah where reduced access to our public land has hurt our rural economies. As a former Interior Solicitor, Dave has the legal and political background necessary to confront some of the most difficult challenges ahead, such as expanding responsible development of our natural resources, protecting and promoting multiple-use, and expanding opportunities for recreational access. I am confident that Dave's breadth of experience makes him uniquely qualified for this position, and I look forward to working with him."

U.S. Senator Mike Lee (R-UT): "I can think of no one who is more qualified to be deputy secretary of the Interior than David Bernhardt. He has a long track record of distinguished service in the department and he understands the importance of efficient and collaborative federal land and resource management. David's extensive knowledge, experience, and leadership will go a long way in advancing Secretary Zinke's goal of restoring the American people's trust in the Interior Department. I urge my colleagues to support David's nomination and confirm him as soon as possible."

U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski (R-AK): "Dave Bernhardt is an excellent choice to help set strategic direction and run the Department of the Interior on a day-to-day basis. He grew up in the West, has extensive knowledge of issues that are important to Alaskans, and will be a great asset to Secretary Zinke and his team. We reported his nomination from the Energy and Natural Resources Committee with bipartisan support more than a month ago, so I urge my colleagues to support the swift confirmation of this well-qualified nominee."

U.S. Senator John McCain (R-AZ): "David Bernhardt's experience working on water policy and Native American issues makes him uniquely suited to serve as the Deputy Secretary of the Interior Department Administration. Hi Interior folks,

I'm working on a story and emailing to request a brief interview with/written comment from Sec. Ryan Zinke regarding the settlement of a civil dispute over a property in D.C. that he and his wife rented from Saint Sophia Greek Orthodox Cathedral.

I've also reached out to Mr. Zinke's attorney in this matter. I can be reached on the cell phone number listed below.

Thank you very much,

The Center for American Progress claims that FOIA'd records show that Interior has passed along less than 500 copies of comments to the Commerce Department referencing the marine monuments but the group says that more than a half a million comments submitted to Interior actually mentioned the marine monuments. Interior said in the Federal Register notice that people shouldn't duplicate comments between the agencies because DOI would share what it received.

Please comment on this, including the extent to which the Interior passed along information to the Commerce Department in this review. Are you planning on sending more over?

Thanks, Esther

Laura,

I apologize for not writing this email sooner. Here's what I sent Heather a while back re: request to interview Secretary Zinke. Here's how our "Outsiders on the Inside" series is formatted.

Let me know if Secretary Zinke would have an interest in discussing true conservation, expanding hunting/fishing rights, the monuments review, and energy independence when his schedule cools down!

My dad says you have a work-related trip tomorrow. Have fun!!

Best,

Gabriella

Hi Heather,

I hope this email finds you well! Your DOI colleague Natalie Davis recommended I reach out to you directly for an interview request. Sent an email a few weeks ago about interviewing Secretary Zinke for my publication. Below is my original email with details about the publication and a recent post at The Hill I penned praising Secretary Zinke's efforts to promote true conservation. (See attached.)

I look forward to hearing from you!

Hi Heather,

Your DOI coworker Natalie Davis suggested I contact you about media inquiries regarding requests to interview Secretary Zinke.

I'm writing today to see if Secretary Zinke would be interested to talk about his work to promote true conservation at DOI for The Resurgent for our video series "Outsiders on the Inside". We garner an average of 100k-110k daily views at our site. I serve as their D.C. correspondent and have followed the secretary's work very closely at our publication to better highlight his efforts. (I'm a fellow sportsman/outdoor enthusiast.) My original video series "Outsiders on the Inside" currently features lawmakers, but I'm hoping to extend it to department heads - like Secretary Zinke - who boast an outsider mentality here in Washington, D.C. Here's a recent video I did with Senator Mike Lee, where we discussed Bears Ears National Monument and Secretary Zinke's efforts to reform the Antiquities Act.

If this is something Secretary Zinke would be interested in, please let me know. There is no timeliness for a video interview--especially given the secretary's busy schedule with his efforts to reform the Antiquities Act and to make DOI the "Happy Department."

I look forward to hearing from you. Thank you for the timely DOI updates via email!

Best,

You guys good with this? I can't fix the font differences.

“The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources.” - Heather Swift, DOI spokesman

"The Scheduling Office meets regularly with the Departmental Ethics Office and the Division of General Law to ensure that all travel is thoroughly reviewed and approved in advance and that it is fully compliant with all applicable laws, rules, and regulations. Consistent with this process, the trip was reviewed and approved in advance by both the Departmental Ethics Office and the Division of General Law. In short, the trip - including the Secretary's address to the hockey developmental squad - was completely compliant with all applicable laws, rules, and regulations." --Joint Statement from Melinda Loftin (Department of the Interior Designated Agency Ethics Official and Director of the Departmental Ethics Office) and Edward Keable (Deputy Solicitor - General Law). Both are career members of the Senior Executive Service.

ON BACKGROUND

unaware of ownership of any vendor services including government selected vendors for air transport. Some media report the plane is owned by a Mr. Neilson. The Secretary has never met or spoken to Mr Neilson. The charter plane company is a vendor of the federal government. It was selected by career officials a thousand miles away in Boise or Atlanta after cost analysis. Furthermore, that company had years of federal contracts before the Secretary was even sworn into office. The vendor has been used for years by previous administrations.

It is false to say commercial flights are available between LAS and FCA that the Secretary could have taken. There were exactly 0 commercial flights leaving after 8PM that would have gotten the Secretary to FCA in time. The Secretary's itinerary began with meetings at 8:30 AM then included a keynote speech to the Western Governors Association, a (bi-partisan event that was led by Montana's Democratic governor), a press conference, a working lunch with governors, and other engagements.

Mrs. Zinke was not on the Nevada trip.

Mrs. Zinke was one of many spouses invited on the bipartisan CODEL organized by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which is standard for those trips. Mrs. Zinke's fare was covered personally.

Justification for Mrs. Zinke to have a desk there at Interior? -- No such desk exists.

Heather,

Circling back again. It's been a few days now.
Reupping the questions CNN has.

What was the purpose of his speech to the Vegas Golden Knights Hockey team in June?

Who invited Zinke to give the speech to the team?

Who owned the plane that Zinke flew on from Vegas to Montana?

Who else was on board the plane from Vegas to Montana?

Zinke's schedule shows on 4/28 he traveled from DC to Atlanta. How did he travel? Commercial? Government plane? Private?

On June 22 how did Zinke travel to his meeting in West Virginia? Did he use a Park Police Chopper? What is the cost estimate for use of the chopper?

On July 7 why did the Secretary travel using a USPP helicopter? What was the cost associated with the use of the helicopter?

Can you tell us about the flight on July 20th. Was that a commercial flight? If so please share the flight details?

CNN is looking for justification for why Zinke's wife accompanied him on the following trips : Las Vegas, Greenland and Alaska?

When on these trips does Mrs. Zinke participate in official meetings with the Secretary?

Justification for Mrs. Zinke to have a desk there at Interior?

Did Mrs. Zinke reimburse the government for these flights? When? How much was reimbursed?

Thank you

Re:

The
below information was supplied to your colleague
earlier.

On
record

As
is consistent with
travel
previous Interior
secretaries,
the Secretary traveled on charter
when

were no commercial options
available.

All travel
is pre-approved by the ethics office
and
lawyers
in
the Division
of General
Law (statement from them
before booking,

the charter flights went through
additional level
due diligence.

Taxpayers absolutely have
right to know how much official government travel
costs.
It's common
At

Department
we make those documents
public.
Using tax dollars wisely
ethically
big responsibility
at the heart
good government.
Unfortunately
there are some

when Interior
has
utilize charter services
often
areas that don't
lot
flight
options.

Standard operating procedure
the Secretary

and staff fly
commercial,
government,
coach fare whenever possible.

"The Scheduling Office
meets regularly
the Departmental Ethics
Office
the Division
of General
Law
to ensure that

travel
thoroughly reviewed
and approved
advance
it
is fully compliant with
applicable laws, rules,
and regulations.

Consistent
this process,
the trip was
and
in advance

by both
Departmental Ethics
Office
the Division
of General
Law.

In short,
the

including
Secretary's address

the hockey developmental squad

was completely compliant with all applicable

laws, rules,
and regulations." -

Joint Statement from Melinda
Loftin (Department
the Interior Designated

Ethics
Official
and Director
the Departmental Ethics
Office)
and Edward Keable
(Deputy Solicitor
General
Law). Both

career members
Senior Executive Service.

On background

Regarding
ownership
the plane:
the Secretary
never met or spoken
Mr Neilson
that the charter
company

a vendor
federal government.

It was selected by
officials

thousand miles away
in

Boise or Atlanta
after
analysis.

Furthermore,
company had years
federal contracts
the Secretary

even sworn into office.

The WP piece was false through omission where
said commercial flights are available between LAS
and
FCA.
fact there are
0 commercial flights

after 8PM
that would
got the Secretary
to
time for an 8:30AMmeeting.

The WP was wrong
said
there were multiple political events,
there were not.
He attended single

event for Senator Daines
in Big Sky
when he was already scheduled
be
the area
it was no cost
Department.

The
piece
is false through omission

the Yellowstone aspect by making
sound like
itinerary
light.
In fact,
itinerary
in Yellowstone was robust.
Yellowstone
serious sexual harassment situation?
The Secretary traveled
there
to meet

the superintendent
the staff about it.

park
is also
hot negotiations
tribes
number of fronts that needed
the secretary's time.

All
these things were also part

the secretary's trip
addition to meeting
employees
he oversees.

point
the
STATES Virgin Islands.
Again another lie through omission
leading readers
believe he

at
foreign "Caribbean" islands rather than an American territory
overseen by
Department.
That
itinerary included several hours
official government
and ceremonies
as well as meeting with American military veterans from the territory

a visit
a National Park
that is under
jurisdiction
Department.

Lastly-
politico piece did not accurately describe
the Montana portion

the trip.
The Secretary's itinerary began with meetings at 8:30
AM
then
keynote speech
the Western Governor's Association (which is led by Montana's Democratic governor),
a press conference,
a working lunch

with governors,
and other engagements.

Good Morning Heather,

I hope you are having a great weekend. I received word that we will be in studio 3 for our pre tape which is good news. Is it possible to give me the names of the security detail coming in. I don't know if the building security is just going to let them up. They get a little stern even if a name maybe misspelled.

Anyways I have the topics/questions that David would like to talk about with Sec. Zinke:

- Responsibilities of the Dept. of the Interior when it comes to Harvey recovery and post Hurricane Harvey.

- What is the department of the interior doing to update and reform its operations to be a more effective agency?

- What are some of the more key points of interaction with individual states?

- Are there regional strategies based on geographical area not just state borders?

These are the main questions David has. He will be thinking of others but for now these are the most important. Thank you Heather!

Sec Zinke did not "enlist" in the Navy in 1985 as the bio below states. He was an officer for his entire career. Enlistees are "enlisted Sailors" not officers.

Rather, it should read: he was "commissioned as an officer in the Navy in 1985..."

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Secretary Ryan Zinke

Ryan Zinke was sworn in as the 52nd Secretary of the Interior on March 1, 2017.

A fifth-generation Montanan and former U.S. Navy SEAL Commander, Ryan Zinke built one of the strongest track records in the 114th Congress on championing sportsmen's access, conservation, regulatory relief, forest management, responsible energy development, and smart management of federal lands.

"As a former Navy SEAL, Ryan has incredible leadership skills and an attitude of doing whatever it takes to win," President Donald Trump said in nominating the former congressman, who built an impressive portfolio on Interior issues ranging from federal mineral leases to tribal affairs to public lands conservation.

Growing up in a logging and rail town near Glacier National Park, Ryan has had a lifelong appreciation for conserving America's natural beauty while honoring Teddy Roosevelt's vision of multiple-use on our public lands. He has consistently led the efforts to renew the Land and Water Conservation Fund in Congress, and has also been a firm advocate for our nation's sportsmen to gain access to our public lands with the SCORE Act and SHARE Act. Zinke also coauthored the Resilient Federal Forest Act, which initiated new reforms for revitalizing America's timber towns and preventing wildfires by emphasizing the collaborative process.

Zinke is widely praised for his voting record supporting the Teddy Roosevelt philosophy of managing public lands, which calls for multiple-use to include economic, recreation and conservation. He has pledged to explore every possibility for safely and responsibly repealing bad regulations and using public natural resources to create jobs and wealth for the American people.

"I am honored and humbled to serve Montana and America as Secretary of the Interior," Zinke said. "I shall faithfully uphold Teddy Roosevelt's belief that our treasured public lands are 'for the benefit and enjoyment of the people'. I will work tirelessly to ensure our public lands are managed and preserved in a way that benefits everyone for generations to come. Most importantly, our sovereign Indian Nations and territories must have the respect and freedom they deserve. I look forward to making the Department of the Interior and America great again."

As Secretary of the Interior, Zinke leads an agency with more than 70,000 employees who are stewards for 20 percent of the nation's lands, including national parks, monuments, wildlife refuges and other public lands. The department oversees the responsible development of conventional and renewable energy supplies on public lands and waters; is the largest supplier and manager of water in the 17 Western states; and upholds trust responsibilities to the 567 federally recognized American Indian tribes and Alaska Natives.

Ryan Zinke represented the state of Montana in the U.S. House of Representatives since 2014. Before that he served in the Montana State Senate from 2009 to 2011, but the bulk of his public service was 23 years as a U.S. Navy SEAL officer.

Zinke enlisted in the Navy in 1985 and was soon selected to join the elite force where he would build an honorable career until his retirement in 2008. He retired with the rank of Commander after leading SEAL operations across the globe, including as the Deputy and Acting Commander of Joint Special Forces in Iraq and two tours at SEAL Team Six. Zinke was the first Navy SEAL elected to the U.S. House and is the first SEAL to serve as a cabinet secretary.

Zinke holds a Geology degree from the University of Oregon, where he was an All-PAC 10 football player; a Master's degree in Business Finance from National University; and a Master's degree in Global Leadership from the University of San Diego. Ryan and his wife Lolita (Lola) have three children and two granddaughters. Zinke is proud to be an adopted member of the Assiniboine Sioux Tribe at the Fort Peck Reservation in Northeast Montana.

Secretary Zinke goes on Mediterranean vacation with only one week left to decide the fate of more than a dozen monuments he's never visited

DENVER—One week from today, Interior Secretary Zinke is due to decide the fate of dozens of national monuments protected over the last two decades. Secretary Zinke, who President Trump placed in charge of the review, promised that he would listen to and engage with local communities and national monument stakeholders before permanently closing any national monument lands.

Rather than spending his final week hearing from local communities who have worked tirelessly to protect their natural and cultural heritage as national monuments, Secretary Zinke is on vacation in the Mediterranean. His wife, Lola Zinke, tweeted a picture early this morning of herself and Secretary Zinke enjoying a sunrise on the Bosphorus Strait.

With only seven days remaining in the review, the secretary has failed to visit most of the national monuments on the chopping block. Of the 27 monuments under consideration for elimination, Secretary Zinke has visited and met with stakeholders at only 8 of them. The visits Secretary Zinke has made were marked by controversy, failing to meet key stakeholders and even admitting to a group of veterans in New Mexico that his mind was made up to eliminate national monuments.

The secretary is not expected to make other site visits prior to the August 24th deadline. In advance of next week's decision, the Center for Western Priorities issued the following statement from Deputy Director Greg Zimmerman:

“Our national monuments are full of beautiful places to take a summer trip. Secretary Zinke promised a rigorous analysis of national monuments, but what the American public got was a sham review and a foreign vacation. If he bothered to listen, Secretary Zinke would have found that national monuments are cornerstones of Western economies, that they protect exceptional and unique lands, and, most of all, that virtually no Americans support eliminating national monuments. I worry, instead, he’s moving to permanently shut down national monuments.”

All,

A reporter from Politico wants to confirm the contents of Mike Nedd's message about Brian Steed as current Acting Director of the BLM. She also wants to know when the appointment was made and why. Finally, she wants to know what the new Acting Director's authority will be, now that the Vacancies Act is in play.

I think we can confirm that Mike sent the email that said Mr. Steed is now acting director and refer the rest of the questions (when the appointment was made and why/Vacancies Act) to DOI. DOI weighed in on the Vacancies Act last Thursday in an E&E article (link here), as follows: "When asked about Vacancies Act issues, Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said "we are aware of the deadline and we have taken sufficient administrative actions to ensure that the functions, duties, and responsibilities of the positions are performed.""

What do you all think if this?

Thanks,

Derrick.

This week, Secretary Ryan Zinke appointed Brian Steed as Acting Director of the BLM, and I want to welcome him as he begins his journey leading this great agency. John Ruhs and I have worked alongside Brian since his appointment as Deputy Director for Programs and Policy in October, and we have come to know his ethic, his intellect, and his passion for our multiple-use and sustained yield mission. His experience includes working as Chief of Staff to U.S. Representative Chris Stewart of Utah, teaching and researching economics at the University of Utah, and serving as a Deputy County Attorney in Iron County, Utah. He is a native of Logan, Utah, and now resides in Northern Virginia with his wife and three children. Brian's western heritage and values make him a perfect fit for the BLM team.

Since March 15, I have had the honor of leading the BLM. Your tireless dedication to our mission inspires me every day. DOI leaders continually express their confidence in the BLM's leadership in the field and here in Washington, which is a testament to all of you. Thank you for supporting me as the Acting Director over these months, and remaining as ever BLM strong.

During the coming weeks, John and I will transition to different roles. John will return to his position as BLM Nevada State Director, and I will assume the duties of Acting Deputy Director for Operations. I appreciate John's sacrifice over the past seven months while he has lived away from his family and the wide open spaces that he loves.

Please join me in welcoming Brian to his new position. As we move forward, let's continue to stay focused on our shared mission and values that guide us in our stewardship of America's public lands.

Take care and have a wonderful day! :)

Secretary Zinke Touts "America First" Energy Policy.

In an op-ed for the Washington Times (5/1, Zinke), Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke writes that like "America's conservationist" president Theodore Roosevelt, President Trump "believes that responsible development of natural resources, conservation stewardship, and outdoor recreation on public lands benefit all Americans." According to Zinke, "developing American energy and achieving American energy independence have three major benefits to the environment, economy and national security." He recognizes that "while not all public lands are appropriate for energy development, many provide the perfect opportunity to balance energy, conservation and outdoor recreation priorities." Zinke asserts that the Interior Department "leads the way in showing that responsible energy development and conservation stewardship are possible."

Secretary Zinke Says US In Position To Be Energy Dominant. Bloomberg News (5/1, Blewitt) reports that while speaking at the Offshore Technology Conference in Houston, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said the US is primed to be energy dominant, not just independent, because of hydraulic fracturing and plans to loosen drilling regulations. He said that "fracking is a game-changer – certainly a global game-changer." In regards to the executive order to reconsider regulations about offshore drilling, Zinke said, "My task is to look at it look at where we're going to make changes, recommendations across the board. ... The stars have lined up so we can create energy jobs."

Reuters (5/1, Hampton) reports Zinke signed two orders on Monday to facilitate offshore oil exploration. The first order directed the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management to issue a new five-year plan for development on the US Outer Continental Shelf. He said that the order implements President Trump's directive to ban drilling in parts of the Atlantic, Arctic and Pacific Oceans. Zinke's second order created a new position in his office, counselor to the secretary, to coordinate the department's energy portfolio, which encompasses 10 bureaus.

The Houston Chronicle (5/1, Blum) reports Zinke wants the Interior Department to generate more federal revenue from oil and gas production. He also said he wants to reorganize the department to allow for more state and local control. For example, he indicated that Houston and Seattle have different views and priorities on energy development, and those differences should be recognized in policies.

The Hill (5/1, Cama) reports Zinke said that producing more offshore oil and gas is good for the economy, national security and the environment, because the US has strong safeguards for drilling. He said, "The United States has the most stringent, toughest, best regulatory framework for safety and environmental extraction of our resources in the world, undisputed."

Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1) reports that Zinke "stressed a balance of careful regulation and energy development, and said he wanted to protect the nation's water and air quality." He was "also careful to credit his inspiration for balancing public and private use of the lands, or a "multi-use" policy, to President Theodore Roosevelt, the founding father of the nation's public forests, prairies and waters."

Additional coverage was provided by Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1, Blum), World Oil (5/1), Oil and Gas Online (5/1), the Maritime Executive (5/1), and E&P Magazine (5/1, Vermillion).

BP Says Imaging Technology Identified 1 Billion Potential Barrel In Gulf Of Mexico. Reuters (5/1) reports Richard Morrison, the head of BP's Gulf of Mexico region, said that the use of a new seismic imaging technology has identified a potential 1 billion additional barrels at four of its US offshore fields. Speaking at the OTC conference, Morrison said the imaging technology was used at its Atlantis, Mad Dog, Thunder Horse and Na Kika fields. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1, Handy) reports Morrison said that BP's offshore drilling operations have adapted to a lower oil price environment. He said the company can profit at

$50 a barrel, but will not drill if prices dip lower. He said, "The grit and determination required to weather the last 24 months will be equally important over the next 24 months." The Houston Chronicle (5/1, Handy) reports that Morrison said he did not expect conditions in the market to improve in the months ahead. However, he did show that projects can be profitable at $40 a barrel. He pointed to the Mad Dog project, in which the company decided to use standard industry technology rather than custom designed equipment to cut costs. It also reduced its fleet of vessels and helicopters, along with its workforce. Rigzone (5/1, Jones) reports the Morrison said the low price environment has not compromised operation safety, adding that accidents did not increase in the Gulf of Mexico or anywhere else within the company. He also said the costs of projects still justify attention in the deepwater industry. He said, "The economics for deepwater investments make as much sense today as they did in 2001. ... BP has rebalanced the cost and revenue equation, so that our Gulf of Mexico free cash, breakeven point is less than $40 per barrel."

Upstream Online (5/1) also provided coverage.

Brazil Tries To Draw Investments At OTC. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1, Eaton) reports that amid recent corruption scandals, Brazil is working to bring oil companies to new exploration contracts by offering the most offshore acreage in its history, and by promising to lower local content rules, taxes and royalties for risky investments. The country plans to auction off 287 exploration blocks in 10 separate rounds over the next three years in an effort to increase daily oil production by 2 million barrels over the next ten decades, according to Brazilian officials at the Offshore Technology Conference. Jorge Camargo, president of the Instituto Brasileiro do Petroleo, said, "Brazil is emerging from the worst economic and political crisis in its modern history. ... We're beginning now a new era where we have a more diverse, competitive, transparent and friendly environment for private investment."

Mexico Inviting Nominations For Deepwater Block Auction. Platts (5/1, Spencer) reports Mexico is inviting domestic and international oil companies to submit nominations on 119 deepwater blocks available on its side of the Gulf of Mexico. Aldo Flores Quiroga, the country's deputy energy secretary for hydrocarbons said that some of the nominations may be included in a bid round this December. The nomination process, which started in March and will be open for three months, will help decide which and how many blocks to offer in the auction. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1) reports that Flores Quiroga, speaking at the OTC, said that Mexico's energy reforms were not hindered by the oil price bust. He said, "What that means is we're doing this because it makes sense regardless of the price of oil. ... It is indeed a challenge but our commitment — from what you can tell from how we're marching forward — is very strong."

OTC Focusing On Reducing Offshore Costs. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1, Handy) reports Houston's Offshore Technology Conference started Monday morning as companies seek to highlight new technologies and strategies to rebuild the offshore drilling industry after the oil bust. Industry professionals gather to examine technology that tries to reduce expenses to help deepwater drillers compete with lower cost shale companies. The conference is expected to be more upbeat this year following the market collapse in 2016, when attendance was the lowest since the Great Recession. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1) reports Red Wing Shoes was one of several vendors at OTC who said that fewer unemployed oil and gas workers have been dropping off resumes at display booths in a sign that the oil and gas job market has improved since last year. Red Wing Shoes has seen sales increase for boots, hard hats and safety goggles for workers heading back into the oil patch. Robert Warren, VP of global sales and distribution for Red Wing, said oil companies are back to conducting manpower studies to see how many workers will be needed for new oil and gas projects. Warren said, "There weren't any manpower studies last year. It was about how many people they needed to get rid of. ... Now they need to hire."

Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1, Eaton) reports people at the conference said that even though oil prices are currently sitting around $50 a barrel, it will still take at least a year before the offshore oil industry recovers after last year's collapse. Peter Moran, a general manager at RSCC, said, "Last year was like a funeral. ... This year is like being in the ICU. Everyone's ready for it to come back." Courtney Smith, a marketing specialist at Varel International Energy Services, said, "With the shale out in Odessa, things have been picking up a lot. ... But it's going to be another year and a half before offshore gets back to where it was before." The Houston Chronicle (5/1, Hunn) reports deepwater drillers are looking to standardize technology in order to cut costs, save time and boost production. BP is using its supercomputer to detail the subsea geography to better pinpoint optimum drilling locations. Baker Hughes has a new, more universal tool for deepsea hydraulic fracturing that can save about 25 days of rig time. Dril-Quip has adopted aerospace techniques to build a new subsea wellhead that takes two to three days less to install on the ocean floor. Marcus Smedley, VP of sales and marketing at Dril-Quip, said, "There's a lot of effort in the industry to standardize designs, standardize materials, to make things less expensive." Neal Anderson, chief executive of energy research at Wood Mackenzie, said, "With the deep water, all our clients are asking, 'Where are costs going?'"

Tomlinson: OTC Brings Speakers Who Have An Interest In Industry's Survival.

Chris Tomlinson writes in his column for the Houston Chronicle (5/1, Tomlinson) that while the attendance at the OTC is more subdued than in years past, the industry insists that it is not dead. Speakers used to focus on how new technology would allow them to drill in ultradeepwater or find the most difficult oil reservoirs. As the conference started, the main focus was on reducing costs and choosing contractors wisely to weather the oil price downturn. Tomlinson says that at least two-thirds of the panels this year are about reducing costs, but that the "problem with conferences like OTC is that only those who believe in the industry's future get to speak." Tomlinson said, "Everyone taking the stage has an interest in the industry's survival, and in the case of corporations, no executive will dare say anything that might impact the stock price."

Baker Hughes Bringing Shale Technology To Deepwater. The Houston Chronicle (5/1, Blum, Hunn) reports that Baker Hughes is bringing the technological advancement that facilitated the shale revolution to the deepwater industry with its new "DeepFrac" technology. The product, unveiled at the OTC, is intended to produce more oil in concentrated areas while using less time and money. Jim Sessions, Baker Hughes VP for completions, said the technology would not suddenly make the offshore industry profitable again, but it could increase the efficiency of production and lower costs.

OES Unveils New Offshore Life Cycle Inspection Service. Offshore

Magazine (5/1) reports OES Oilfield Service Group renamed itself OES Asset Integrity Management and unveiled a new lifecycle inspection technology for the offshore industry at the OTC. The ARCUS platform is supposed to provide a number of services that encompass the life cycle of a range of offshore assets and facilities. It helps to deal with the planning and construction stage and reactivation through all phases of operation until decommissioning.

Houston Chronicle Highlights Realtime Fatigue Monitoring System. The Houston Chronicle (5/1) highlights Stress Engineering Services' Realtime Fatigue Monitoring System as a method of providing field measurements of stress and fatigue on drilling risers, vertical pipes, wellheads, and other subsea equipment. The OTC recognized the product as an advanced technical solution to the challenges of offshore drilling. Stress Engineering says the system allows engineers to receive data on the integrity of well systems and alter the equipment's safety, increase the efficiency, and reduce downtime to reduce the costs of deepwater production.

Companies Bring Trucks To Turn Heads At OTC. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1, Eaton) reports J.H. Larsen, a Norwegian water recycling equipment company, displayed its giant pumps on a truck at the OTC. The company was one of several to bring a large truck into the exposition hall of the conference in an effort to attract some buyers from the US oil patch. The Texas oil field service company Dragon also brought in a giant truck with equipment that blends 120 barrels of proppant, chemicals and water per minute.

Schlumberger: Two New Technologies Improve Decision Making. Schlumberger writes a piece for E&P Magazine (5/1) highlighting two new technologies that enable better decision making. The AvantGuard system optimizes well performance from poststimulation operations through production. It provides real-time monitoring to ensure that a well is being operated within a secure operating envelope to protect the well. Second, the saturates, aromatics, resins and asphaltenes (SARA) analysis is used for field development planning. The Maze microfluidic SARA analysis can bring highly accurate measurements from any oil sample and across all labs with a smaller environmental footprint.

Airlines Expect Flights To Oil, Gas Areas To Pick Up Along With Oil Prices. Fuel Fix \(TX\) (5/1) reports Chad Brossman, head of district sales for Delta Airlines in Houston, said that the company has suspended flights to some energy rich regions around the world, but that travel is starting to pick up again as oil prices increase. International airlines had seen a drop in international travel to oil and gas areas as companies but back on international travel to their drilling sites. Delta, Air France, and KLM have a joint booth at the OTC trade show flow to advertise chairs and services to 45 oil and gas destinations around the world.

Continuing Coverage Of Trump's National Monuments Order.

The Morning Consult (5/1, Fitzpatrick) reports that the Interior Department "says it does not know how many national monuments it will review as a result of last week's executive order on the Antiquities Act, an agency spokeswoman said." Department spokeswoman Heather Swift on Monday "said the agency does not have a 'final' list of monuments that it plans to review." However, "before Trump signed the order, the department circulated a list of 24 monuments that it called the 'full list' of reviewable monuments."

Additional coverage was provided by the Rio Grande Valley \(TX\) Morning Star (4/26), the Kaweah \(CA\) Commonwealth (4/28, Elliott), Yahoo! News (5/1, Wealey), and WBUR-FM Boston \(MA\) Boston (5/1, Fahys).

Tribes Near Bears Ears National Monument Press Secretary Zinke For Meeting. Reuters (5/1, Volcovici) reports that “the Native American tribes that help manage the Bears Ears national monument in Utah raised concerns on Monday” that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has “not responded to requests for a meeting ahead of his visit to Utah next week to review its monument designation.” An Interior Department spokesperson “said she did not know whether Zinke planned to meet with the inter-tribal coalition.” Davis Filfred, a Navajo Nation council delegate, said, “If Secretary Zinke truly believes that ‘sovereignty should mean something,’ as he had said, we hope he will finally respond to the Tribes’ multiple requests to meet with him.”

San Juan County Leaders To Meet With Secretary Zinke About Bears Ears. KUTV-TV Salt Lake City (5/1, Harris) reports that “the three commissioners of San Juan County are in Washington D.C. ahead of a meeting with the Department of the Interior where they plan to support the repeal of the national monument designation of the Bears Ears.” According to the article, “the commission has a scheduled meeting with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke Tuesday morning, in addition to meetings with all of the congressional delegates from Utah.”

Maine Gov. LePage To Voice Opposition To National Monuments. The AP (5/1) reports that Maine Gov. Paul LePage will “be in Washington this week to voice his opposition to national monuments like the one former President Barack Obama created in the state.” LePage will “testify at a House subcommittee on federal lands hearing on Tuesday on the use of the Antiquities Act of 1906 to create monuments.”

Additional coverage was provided by the Bangor \(ME\) Daily News (5/2, Sambides).

Commentary. For the “Pundits” blog of The Hill (5/1, Schultz, Contributor), David Schultz, editor of the Journal of Public Affairs Education, writes that President Trump’s national monuments order illustrates his “indifference or misunderstanding of the concepts of constitutionalism and rule of law.” Schultz argues that if Trump is looking to undo national monument designations, he is “wrong” and “lacks the authority to undo what previous presidents did, absent congressional authorization.” According to Schultz, “there is no legal basis for Trump to be able to argue that any use of the Antiquities Act since 1996 was an abuse of presidential power or that he has the legal ability along with an executive order to reverse those uses.”

In a piece for the Huffington Post (5/1, Brune, Contributor), Michael Brune, the executive director of the Sierra Club, also criticizes the national monuments order as “a brazen attack on the 111-year-old Antiquities Act under which those monuments were designated” and “a barefaced betrayal of the American people.” Brune asserts that “none of these national monuments were designated casually or without extensive deliberation and input from surrounding communities.” In fact, he argues that “our national problem isn’t too many monuments — it’s too few.” He urges the public to tell Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke “that any attempt to revoke or shrink our national monuments is an assault on our historical, cultural, and natural heritage.”

Interior Budget Would Get $12.3B Under Omnibus Deal.

E&E Publishing (5/1) reports that "Congressional leaders reached a bipartisan deal" Sunday night "to fund the government through the rest of the year that avoids steep cuts for U.S. EPA and renewable energy programs sought by the Trump administration." For the Interior Department, the National Park Service, Bureau of Land Management, and Fish and Wildlife Service "would see slight funding increases." Overall, the Interior Department "would get $12.3 billion, $42 million more than enacted levels."

Interior Appoints Top Energy Adviser.

The Washington Examiner (5/1) reports that the Interior Department announced Monday that "it is appointing an Energy Department veteran to coordinate its energy goals across the agency's nine bureaus." Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke appointed Vincent DeVito to serve as the department's counselor for energy policy "to strengthen and better coordinate the department's vast energy portfolio," the Interior Department announced. Zinke said, "Like President Trump and myself, Mr. DeVito recognizes that American energy resources create jobs and revenue and that we can both promote responsible energy development and protect traditional multiple use through responsible stewardship of our treasured public lands for future generations to come."

Migratory Bird Conservation Commission Approves $17.8M In Grants For Wetland, Waterfowl Conservation.

The Knoxville \(TN\) Daily Sun (5/1) reports that the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission, chaired by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, has "approved $17.8 million in grants for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and its partners to conserve or restore more than 108,000 acres of wetland and associated upland habitats for waterfowl, shorebirds and other birds in 14 states throughout the United States." The grants, made through the North American Wetlands Conservation Act, will be "matched by nearly $40 million in partner funds." Zinke said, "Hunting and fishing are the cornerstones of Americans' sportsmen heritage, and today, sportsmen and women are leading efforts in wildlife conservation. The projects approved today by the commission will benefit hundreds of wetland and coastal bird species, other wildlife and their habitats, ensuring we have the ability to pass our shared heritage down to our kids and grandkids."

Cantwell Raises Concerns About Bernhardt.

Politico Morning Energy (5/1) reports that President Trump's pick to be Interior Deputy Secretary, David Bernhardt is going to face scrutiny in the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. Sen. Maria Cantwell said, "I am gravely concerned about Mr. Bernhardt's record of working on behalf of corporations at the expense of the environment, and his history at the Department of Interior during years plagued by ethical scandals. The committee must do its job in closely scrutinizing his record and any conflicts of interest.”

WTimes Energy Series: “Unleashing America’s Full Energy Potential.”

The Washington Times published a series of opinion pieces from leading energy officials and experts as part of a Special Report titled, “Energy 2017: Unleashing America’s full energy potential – in all of its forms.” The Washington Times’ (5/1, Department) Advocacy Department, which prepared the series, provides a broad outline of the major energy and environmental policies pursued by the Trump administration in its first 100 days. Specifically, they cite executive orders intended to resurrect the Keystone XL and Dakota Access oil pipelines; rollback key Obama-era environmental regulations; open up federal lands to coal mining; direct the Interior Department to review national monument designations; and end the ban on new offshore drilling leases.

Secretary Perry: US Energy Security Requires “Unleashing America’s Full Energy” Potential. In his op-ed in the Washington Times, (5/1, Perry) Energy Secretary Rick Perry writes that the Trump administration’s energy policy is focused on “unleashing America’s full energy in all of its forms,” developing “cutting-edge energy technologies,” and overhauling “harmful regulations that prioritized a political agenda over the realistic needs of baseload generation.” At the recent G-7 Energy Ministers’ Meeting, Perry says he discussed energy-security challenges, which the Trump administration believes can be address by utilizing our “abundance of energy resources to advance the national security and economic interests of our friends and our allies.” According to Perry, President Trump “doesn’t just want America to be energy-independent; he wants America to be energy-dominant.”

Assuming a similar tone, Reps. Greg Walden, Fred Upton, and John Shimkus write in the Washington Times (5/1, Walden, Upton, Shimkus) that under the Trump administration, the U.S. has “started to to usher in a new era — one that capitalizes on our energy abundance.” They advocate for policies that “build on our nation’s energy abundance, modernize our energy infrastructure, and promote domestic manufacturing and job growth,” and argue that they don’t need to be mutually exclusive with environmental protection.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski: US Must Upgrade Infrastructure, Strengthen Cybersecurity. Sen. Lisa Murkowski writes in the Washington Times (5/1, Murkowski) to highlight the “twin energy imperatives” of upgrading energy infrastructure and strengthening cybersecurity. Noting that upgrading and building infrastructure is a “expensive and time-consuming process,” she praises the Trump administration for making infrastructure a “national priority,” and says she “look[s] forward to working with him” and members of the Senate to develop a broad infrastructure package.

Also in the Washington Times (5/1, Chapman), Adrian P. Chapman, President and Chief Operating Officer of WGL Holdings, Inc., writes that our nation’s “aging infrastructure is in significant need of investment and care if we want to ensure a secure future for coming generations.”

“Regulatory Assault” On American Workers Is Over, Says EPA Chief. In an op-ed in the Washington Times, (5/1, Pruitt) EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt says that “relief — and prosperity — is on the way” thanks to the Trump administration’s promise to end the “regulatory assault on American workers.” Going forward, Pruitt says that EPA will no longer be allowed to “pick winners and losers through regulation,” and that regulatory certainty will prevail for the states and businesses they affect.

Also in the Washington Times, (5/1, Grande) Bette Grande, a research fellow at The Heartland Institute, praises the Trump administration for quickly moving to eliminate the “onerous Waters of the United States rule, Stream Protection Rule and the Clean Power Plan.” She believes “each state must deal with its own unique issues and impose policies that weigh the true costs and benefits of energy and environmental regulatory schemes.”

Sen. Manchin: Clean Coal Offers Opportunities For US On Global Market. In an op-ed in the Washington Times, (5/1, Manchin) West Virginia Sen. Joe Manchin praises coal as “one of our most reliable sources of electricity.” He says that the future of coal should be secured “through pursuing and supporting advanced coal technologies and efficiencies.” Moreover, he views the increase in coal-fired capacity in India and China as an opportunity for the U.S. to bring “clean coal technology to commercialization” and export it to the rest of the world.

Similarly, Republican Rep. David B. McKinley, P.E. who represents the 1st Congressional District of West Virginia, argues in the Washington Times (5/1, McKinley) that the Obama administration’s “war on coal devastated small towns and communities.” He says that over those eight years, 400 mines were closed, 246 coal-fired plants were shut down, and 83,000 jobs were lost. Looking ahead, Rep. McKinley advocates an “all-of-the-above” energy policy that includes research for clean coal technology and fossil fuels.

Meanwhile, Republican Rep. Paul A. Gosar asserts in the Washington Times (5/1, Gosar) that most people don’t actually know what an “all-of-the-above” energy strategy entails. He says that such a strategy includes responsible oil and gas production, natural gas exports, expanded use of hydropower, and expedited permitting for major energy projects.

Conservationist Urges EPA To Reconsider Ethanol Mandates. The Washington Times (5/1, Jung) includes an op-ed from Jerry Jung, “a retired businessman and conservationist who became concerned when Monarch Butterflies stopped arriving at his hobby farm in central Michigan after migrating from Mexico.” Jung opposes the EPA’s ethanol mandates, which he claims have resulted in increased emissions; harmful impacts to wildlife and biodiversity; and no proven role in reducing dependence on fossil fuels.

Jacobson: Clean Energy Benefits US Consumers, Manufacturers. Lisa Jacobson, President of the Business Council for Sustainable Energy (BCSE), advocates for clean energy in her op-ed in the Washington Times, (5/1, Jacobson) asserting that energy efficiency, natural gas and renewable energy have clearly been shown to benefit “American consumers, American businesses and American manufacturers.”

Rep. Dan Newhouse writes in the Washington Times (5/1, Newhouse) that he is “committed to advocating for hydropower as one of the most affordable — and underutilized — sources of energy that our country is capable of expanding in order to provide more clean, renewable power.” As a new member of the House Appropriations Committee’s Energy and Water Subcommittee, Rep. Newhouse said he will push for legislation to simplify the permitting process for non-federal hydropower projects.

Also in the Washington Times (5/1, Kiernan) Tom Kiernan, CEO of the American Wind Energy Association, praises wind energy for its role in “making the grid and America’s electricity mix more diverse, secure, and — now that turbines have scaled up across 41 states — more reliable too.”

Mark McManus, General President of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry, writes in the Washington Times (5/1, McManus) that his union “wholeheartedly believe[s] that an overall approach — inclusive of economic impact, grid reliability and climate change — is the best formula when it comes to developing a balanced energy mix.” He touches broadly on the positive aspects of all energy sources, including solar and wind power, along with nuclear energy and fossil fuels including natural gas and coal.

Writing in the Washington Times, (5/1, McCallister) Terry D. McCallister, Chairman and CEO of Washington Gas, says “as the cleanest of fossil fuels, natural gas is, and will continue to be, a mainstay of our nation’s energy portfolio going forward.”

Federally-Funded Research Is Critical To Energy Innovation. Jay Faison, founder and CEO of ClearPath Foundation, and Rich Powell, executive director of ClearPath Foundation, enthusiastically support federally-funded energy research in their op-ed in the Washington Times. (5/1, Faison, Powell) According to the authors, the “human genome project, shale gas revolution, nuclear energy, touchscreens and the discovery of dinosaur extinction...all owe their success to the Department of Energy and its predecessors.” They argue that the federal government is better suited to provide long-term investments in major energy research. Moreover, the benefits of such new energy technologies “benefit everybody,” so it’s a natural fit for the government.

The AP (5/1) reports that “environmentalists are criticizing the decision to repeat a backcountry trail race after a long-distance runner was attacked by a bear last year at a National Park Service preserve in northern New Mexico.” Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility on Monday said the NPS is “downplaying the threat of interactions between wildlife and participants in a 50-mile race on May 20 at the Valles Caldera National Preserve.” The article notes that “a mother bear with three cubs was euthanized last year by state wildlife officials after attacking and injuring a marathon runner as she raced through the Valles Caldera.” A park service “evaluation of this year’s race describes a continued threat of human interaction with bears and bear cubs, while noting a positive influence on recreation and public relations at the preserve.”

The AP (5/1) reports that “Alaska officials, the American Petroleum

We are proud to recognize the efforts of many diverse partners in the Seattle area whose work has led to this milestone signing, and eager to see what the continued power of collaboration will produce for birds in the Puget Sound area.”

Fire In Okefenokee Wildlife Refuge Could Take Months To Fight.

Reuters (5/1, Woodall) reports that “a wildfire that has burned more than 100,000 acres (40,469 hectares) at the Okefenokee National Wildlife Refuge in southern Georgia could take until November before it is put out, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service said on Monday.” According to Mark Davis, spokesman for the service, “the fire has burned about one-fourth of the wildlife refuge, and the blaze is considered only eight-percent contained.” Davis said, “November is the worst-case scenario. The firefighters’ plan is to contain the fire as best they can, hoping that nature will cooperate with some rainfall.”

Senators Call On Trump Administration To Protect Coastlines From Offshore Drilling.

The Dover \(DE\) Post (5/1) reports that 27 Democratic senators called on the Trump Administration “to protect the coastlines of the U.S. from offshore oil drilling.” Led by Sens. Edward J. and Robert Menendez, “the group of lawmakers sent a letter to Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke urging him not to revise the 2017-22 Outer Continental Shelf Oil and Gas Leasing Program — Five-Year Plan — to eliminate protections for the east and west coasts, the eastern Gulf of Mexico and for the sensitive marine ecosystems in the Arctic Ocean.” In the letter, the senators say “that oil companies are currently holding and warehousing leases in the Gulf of Mexico that comprise an area nearly the size of Kentucky, so there is no need to open up any new areas to oil drilling and the threat of a spill.”

Additional coverage of the order was provided by the Press of Atlantic City \(NJ\) (5/1, Skeldon), the Los Angeles \(CA\) Weekly (5/1, Romero), and KPBS-TV San Diego \(CA\) San Diego (5/1).

Trump Oil Drilling Review Sets Up Clash Over Florida’s Gulf Waters. Politico (5/1, Ritchie) reports that Sen. Bill Nelson on Monday “emphasized Pentagon opposition to Gulf oil drilling as an industry representative sought to downplay such concerns.” Nelson said “he received on Monday an April 26 letter from a Pentagon official to U. S. Rep. Matt Gaetz raising concerns about the effect on training missions in the eastern Gulf of Mexico off Florida, where there is a moratorium on drilling and related activities." The letter was sent in response to a March 27 letter from Gaetz "and other members of the congressional delegation raising concerns about the threat of drilling to military missions."

The Tampa Bay \(FL\) Times (5/1, Pittman) reports in its Buzz Florida Politics blog that the Pentagon says keeping the current moratorium on oil and gas activities in the Gulf of Mexico beyond 2022 is "essential for developing and sustaining our nation's future combat capabilities," according to a letter sent to US Rep. Matt Gaetz. Anthony M. Kurta, the acting Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, wrote the letter in which he indicated that the Department of Defense "cannot overstate the vital importance of maintaining this moratorium."

The South Florida Sun Sentinel (4/28) reports Florida's lawmakers said the President Trump's actions on offshore drilling pose a threat to Florida's Atlantic coast. Sen. Bill Nelson, along with US Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz and Ted Deutch, called for a return to the bipartisan consensus among Florida's elected officials against offshore drilling. Deutch said, "There is not a person who lives in Florida on the coastline, a family in Florida who visits our beaches, a small business who thrives on the business generated on our pristine coastline who thinks it's a good idea of have drilling off our pristine coastline."

The Tampa Bay \(FL\) Times (5/1) reports in its Buzz Florida Politics blog that Florida Reps. Vern Buchanan and Debbie Wasserman Schultz proposed legislation that would extend the five year moratorium on drilling off Florida's Gulf coast until 2027. The release said, "The legislation also makes the oil company responsible for a spill pay for cleanup efforts and provides grant funding to states. ... Currently oil companies are only held accountable for oil spill cleanup if the oil is transported in a single-hull vessel."

API Urges Regulators To Allow Drilling In Eastern Gulf Of Mexico. The Hill (5/1, Henry) reports the API wants regulators to consider allowing drilling in the eastern Gulf of Mexico. Erik Milito, API's upstream and industry operations group director, said, "The eastern Gulf is in close proximity to existing production and infrastructure, and opening it would spur investment and economic activity that could create thousands of jobs and provide billions of dollars in government revenue." He went on to say, "We're optimistic — we think that it would be essential, from an energy security standpoint, both for national security reasons and for the continuing demand for oil and gas that we're going to see for a long time, for Interior to take a serious look at the eastern Gulf of Mexico."

Executive Order Likely To Be Hindered By Legal Challenges, Oil Market. E&E Publishing (5/1) reports that while offshore drillers have praised President Trump's executive order to expand drilling around the US, oil and gas from offshore leasing are not likely to flow for years because of legal challenges from environmental groups, continued poor energy prices, and the industry's hesitance to lease in expensive regions. Ken Silverstein writes a contributing piece for Forbes (5/1, Silverstein) saying that President Trump's executive order will not have much of an effect because the development of traditional oil has been declining for years and it is not economically advantageous for explorers. He says that with a protracted legal fight over the executive order, investments will move towards alternative energies and unconventional shale oil and gas operations.

Companies Appeal For Seismic Permits For Atlantic Surveys. The Hampton Roads \(VA\) Virginian-Pilot (5/1, Mayfield) reports that “a half-dozen companies that in early January were denied federal permits for seismic airgun blasting in the Atlantic have appealed the decisions, betting that the Trump administration will look more favorably on the controversial testing for oil and gas deposits.” According to the article, “the companies – TGS, WesternGeco, CGG Services, Spectrum Geo, Multi Klient Invest and ION Geophysical – have proposed the surveys off the coast of Virginia and other East Coast states, from Delaware to Florida.” The article says that “it’s been more than 30 years since the last seismic tests along the coastline, and industry officials have said improved technology likely would mean much more accurate estimates of oil and gas reserves out in the Atlantic.”

Helvarg: Trump Should Let Post-Carbon Market Develop In California. David Helvarg, the executive director of Blue Frontier, writes an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (5/1, Helvarg) urging for a renewable energy future, rather than drilling for oil off the coast of California. He writes that in order to get to a future that is not under dire threat from global warming, “the president would have to remove his undersized thumb from the scales and let the U.S. post-carbon market, particularly in California, catch up with the green energy industrial expansion of China and Germany.” While Helvarg says, “Trump’s executive order can’t change things immediately, not least because the current price of oil makes offshore drilling much less attractive than it used to be,” he urges concerted action to protect against climate change.

Florida Agrees To Plan To Distribute BP Oil Spill Money.

The AP (5/1) reports Florida lawmakers “have agreed on a plan to hand out millions of dollars given to the state for damages related to the 2010 Deepwater Horizon oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico.” On Monday, the Florida Senate “voted unanimously for a bill that would guarantee that $300 million be distributed to eight Panhandle counties that were hardest hit by the spill.” The legislation goes “back to the Florida House, which is expected to approve it.”

Environmental, Tribal Groups Urge Court To Block New Mexico Drilling Permits.

Law360 (5/1, Sieniuc) reports that “environmentalists and a Navajo tribal group urged a New Mexico federal court Friday to block the Bureau of Land Management from carrying out any further drilling in New Mexico’s Mancos Shale in their challenge to more than 350 previously issued drilling permits, saying the agency hasn’t completed the proper environmental reviews or public consultations under the National Environmental Policy Act.”

Spending Bill Includes Provision For Coal Miners’ Healthcare Benefits.

Reuters (5/1, Volcovici) reports the federal “government and coal companies will be required to pay out healthcare to retired coal miners, guaranteeing benefits to workers even as coal companies face bankruptcy, after Congress on Sunday reached a fiscal spending agreement for 2017." This provision to provide the United Mine Workers' healthcare benefits was part of the spending bill which lawmakers negotiated on Sunday. The article adds that some "22,600 coal miners and their families were on the brink of losing on April 30 their healthcare benefits, which were at risk of default as the industry struggled, with companies trying to recover from bankruptcies."

North Dakota Governor Ask For Federal Aid For Pipeline Protest Costs.

The AP (5/1) reports Gov. Doug Burgum of North Dakota is asking President Trump "for federal reimbursement of $38 million in state law enforcement costs related to months of protests over construction of the Dakota Access oil pipeline." On Saturday, Burgum emailed the president "seeking a presidential disaster declaration to pave the way for federal aid." Officials in the White House did not "immediately comment on the likelihood of Trump declaring a disaster."

The Washington Times (5/1, Richardson) reports Burgum "also encouraged the administration to conduct a review of disaster declaration criteria 'to include intentional human-made disasters,' saying that the months-long Dakota Access demonstration 'underscored the changing nature of protests in America.'" Sen. John Hoeven of North Dakota announced yesterday "that the Senate Appropriations Committee has approved up to $15 million in federal funding to help with the state's Dakota Access costs."

Lummis: Wyoming Integrated Test Center Offers Real World Opportunity To Test Carbon Capture.

Former Rep. Cynthia Lummis writes in The Hill (5/1) "Pundits Blog" blog that Wyoming is aware that "Coal, once again, has an ally in the White House." He has "signed executive orders to roll back the Clean Power Plan, reopen coal leasing on federal lands and rescind the royalty valuation rule." Yet even with such changes, "low natural gas prices have eroded coal's market share." Wyoming has invested $15 million in its Wyoming Integrated Test Center in cooperation with Tri-State Generation and Transmission Association, the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, and Basin Electric Power Cooperative. The center is at the Dry Fork Station coal plant.

Senate Urged To Nullify Methane Rule.

In an op-ed for the Morning Consult (5/2, Pyle), Thomas Pyle is president of the American Energy Alliance, urges the Senate to nullify a "Bureau of Land Management regulation dealing with methane venting and flaring on federal lands." Doing so, Pyle argues, "would save American jobs and protect households from higher energy costs." He also argues that the BLM regulation "would only reduce global greenhouse gas emissions by an estimated 0.0092 percent."

Trump Orders Benefit Coal Country.

In a piece for TIME (5/1, Phillips), Tim Phillips, the president of Americans for Prosperity, writes that President Trump's "team has delivered on a key campaign promise that will help people to improve their lives: removing regulatory barriers that are denying opportunities to working families." Phillips points to the executive order “halting the implementation of all pending regulations” and an order “requiring that for every new federal regulation, at least two others be repealed.” In addition, the Trump Administration has “enlisted the help of Congress to repeal regulations through the Congressional Review Act,” including eliminating the “stream protection rule.”

The AP (5/1) reports that Deepwater Wind’s five turbines, the nation’s first offshore wind farm, is now powering more of Rhode Island after the Block Island Power County shut down its diesel generators. As a result, the power company “says Block Island’s 2,000 electric customers now have access to cheaper and cleaner energy at stable prices.”

High Court To Examine Power Of Congress To Affect Outcome Of Court Cases.

Roll Call (5/1, Ruger) reports that the Supreme Court “agreed Monday to decide a case that could reshape Congress’ power to use legislation to affect the outcome of specific ongoing court cases – in this instance, a 2014 law about a Michigan land tract and its use as a Native American casino.” The action “puts the justices back into a long chain of litigation and legislation about whether the Interior Department could take that tract into trust for the Gun Lake Tribe of Pottawatomi Indians to pave the way for gaming operations – and whether a nearby resident can sue to stop it.” According to Roll Call, “the case likely will be set for arguments in the next term that starts in October, and it will be the second time the Supreme Court rules in the case.”

Media Analyses: Bipartisan Budget Agreement A Loss For Trump.

Analyses of the agreement on a 1,665-page omnibus budget bill to fund the government through September 30 are in agreement that the deal is a loss for the Trump Administration, with very few of the goals of the President’s budget outline included. Some analyses call the agreement a total loss for the White House, while others say the President at least manages to avoid a government shutdown. But reports highlight that border wall funding and sought-after cuts are not included, and that in addition to showing the continued clout of minority Democrats, the agreement could set an ominous precedent for the Administration in that congressional GOP leaders worked out the agreement without the White House.

The New York Times (5/1, Kaplan) runs a piece headlined “Winners And Losers Of The Spending Deal (Spoiler Alert: Trump Lost).” The Times says that the “more than $1 trillion spending deal that congressional leaders reached on Sunday was an act of compromise, a rarity in a highly polarized Congress.” But the White House “has little to brag about in this deal. The agreement provides an additional $15 billion in military spending, but that is only half of what Mr. Trump had sought.” And many cuts that President Trump sought were not part of the deal. The AP (5/1, Taylor) says the agreement shows “that Democrats retain considerable clout in Donald Trump’s turbulent presidency.”

to abandon drastic spending cuts favored by the Trump administration, but also stripped out scores of conservative policy amendments the Republicans had hoped to enact under a unified government." The GOP leaders, recognizing that "they'd likely be blamed for a shutdown while holding unified control of Congress and the White House," managed to avoid that. The Hill says that while the President "had to make significant concessions" he avoids "a messy spending fight three months into his presidency." But OMB Director Mulvaney failed to "slash domestic spending" and to "deny certain funds to 'sanctuary cities'" – his two main objectives.

The Los Angeles Times (5/1, Bierman, Bennett) writes that while the promise to build a wall along the US-Mexico border was "the most indelible aspect of Trump's political branding...over the past week, Trump gave up on pushing Congress to include the billions needed for the wall" in the spending plan. While it "remains a White House priority...the physical wall itself remains very much in doubt." Politico (5/1, Kim, Wright) writes, "Congressional members didn't just snub Donald Trump on his border wall: They also used the $1 trillion spending deal hatched over the weekend to rein in the president's powers." The omnibus agreement would "withhold $2.5 billion in defense funds until the proposal to battle ISIS is produced," and would also bar Attorney General Sessions from interfering in state medical marijuana laws. It "also contains three separate reminders for Trump, who did not seek congressional approval before launching missile strikes against the Syrian government last month, that he must obey the War Powers Act."

The New York Times (5/1, Hulse) says the outcome "should worry the new president," since "by cutting a bipartisan spending compromise among themselves, Republicans and Democrats in Congress not only prevented the White House from delivering on President Trump's priorities in his very first budget, they also drafted a handy blueprint for circumventing the Trump administration in the future." Reuters (5/1, Cowan, Gibson) similarly says that Congress "may be mapping a bipartisan path forward that skirts around [Trump] when he refuses to engage constructively with lawmakers." And congressional leaders of both parties took to Twitter. Senate Minority Leader Schumer posted 15 tweets in a 45-minute period Monday afternoon, calling the agreement "a big win for Democrats" and highlighting funding that was protected for a wide range of programs. House Speaker Ryan also lauded the agreement in 12 tweets posted throughout the day Monday, most of them highlighting the defense and border security funding in the omnibus.

Sen. Jack Reed tweeted, "Trump Admin wanted to gut #cleanair & #cleanwater programs. The bipartisan #omnibus spending bill Congress is set to pass won't allow it." Sen. Tom Udall tweeted, "I worked hard to ensure #omnibus included no $ for border wall/ deportation force, no @PPact cuts, more $ for @NIH & fighting #opioid crisis."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (5/1) says that "to judge from" the omnibus, congressional leaders' "priorities are not President Trump's priorities." The agreement is "a tribute to the Democrats' skillful leveraging of their power, even as a minority in both houses; to the Republicans' pragmatic fear of a politically costly partial government shutdown – and to the stubborn persistence of good old-fashioned political horse-trading, even under this supposedly disruptive president." The Post calls it "a temporary victory for basic common sense."

Conservatives Angry Over Agreement. McClatchy (5/1, Douglas, Daugherty) reports under the headline "Trump Budget Plans Fade, Conservatives Protest" that "the fiery, never-give-in ultra-conservative wing of the GOP is highly displeased with the budget agreement reached this week." Ken Cuccinelli of the Senate Conservatives Fund said, "Instead of fighting for President Trump's conservative budget priorities, they have surrendered to the Democrats once again." Art Halvorson, a Pennsylvania Tea Party activist, said, "It's no different than if Hillary [Clinton] was elected; it's a huge loss, and I'm livid. Paul Ryan's House is a not conservative House." The Washington Times (5/1, Richardson) reports that anti-abortion groups are also criticizing the agreement. Students for Life of America President Kristan Hawkins "called the proposed legislation 'beyond frustrating.'"

Rep. Ron DeSantis (R-FL) said on Fox News' Fox & Friends (5/1) that it is "troubling" that the budget deal doesn't have money for a border wall or a deportation force, doesn't contain cuts for sanctuary cities, and contains funds for Planned Parenthood. He added this "suggests that a lot of it is same old same old." DeSantis also said, "I think Congress needs to deliver on the wall."

Rep. Brian Babin (R-TX) tweeted, "I oppose & will be voting against $1 trillion #omnibus spending bill. This is yet another example why Senate needs to end filibuster abuse." Daniel Horowitz of Conservative Review, who has 31,800 followers, tweeted, "The #omnibus downright BANS the fence. Under current law its totally on the books just needed funding. This makes it WORSE."

A Townhall (5/1) piece by Guy Benson is headlined "After GOP Strikes Weak Government Funding Deal With Democrats, They'd Better Not Blow It On Obamacare." Benson writes, "Republicans at both ends of Capitol Hill ought to ponder how their base will react if they drop the ball on healthcare. Between that choke job and the new government funding compromise with Democrats – under which Planned Parenthood and sanctuary cities are fully funded, but Trump's wall is not – Republican voters might wonder what the point of winning elections is."

The Monday evening headline on the Drudge Report read, "DEMS CELEBRATE 'REPUBLICAN' BUDGET! MORE PAGES THAN OBAMA STIMULUS". The Washington Post (5/1) "Daily 202" blog said that "Trump got rolled in his first budget negotiation."

Science Funding Remains Intact. The Washington Post (5/1, Achenbach, Guarino, Kaplan, Fears) reports that the omnibus does not include the cuts to science and medical research spending that Trump had sought. However, it is not clear if the deal "represents a full-throated repudiation of Trump's goals, or is just an act of political expediency – a rare bipartisan compromise designed to avoid an imminent government shutdown."

Bill More Than Doubles Number Of H-2B Visas. The Washington Times (5/1, Dinan) says the omnibus includes "a sweetheart deal for America's vacation resorts and other seasonal employers": an increase in the number of

H-2B temporary visas from 66,000 to more than 135,000. Bob Dane of the Federation for American Immigration Reform said, "It is a sellout [of] the American worker."

Omnibus Protects Healthcare For Retired Miners. Reuters (5/1, Volcovici) reports that the federal government and coal companies will be required to pay out healthcare to retired United Mine Workers miners, "guaranteeing benefits to workers even as coal companies face bankruptcy." Approximately 22,600 coal miners and their families "were on the brink of losing on April 30 their healthcare benefits."

Sen. Heidi Heitkamp tweeted, "Great news a permanent fix to provide health care to coal miners is in #omnibus – critical to stand up 4 workers throughout their lives."

Bill Includes More Than $120 Million For Trump Family Security. The New York Times (5/1, Fandos) reports, "Congress would allocate more than $120 million to help cover the escalating costs of protecting the first family and Trump Tower" under the agreement. About half of it is earmarked for the Secret Service, while "another roughly $60 million would be set aside in a rare provision to reimburse localities, like New York City and Palm Beach County in Florida, that have incurred 'extraordinary law enforcement personnel costs'" associated with protecting the First Family.

LATimes Analysis: GOP Unlikely To Advance Goals In Near-Term. The Los Angeles Times (5/1, Mascaro) writes, "Don't expect other major legislative accomplishments any time soon. Even though Republicans control the House, Senate and White House, the party in power is now at risk of squandering the unique opportunity offered in an administration's early months to muscle through big-ticket priorities in Congress." The Times writes that "the toxic combination of Republican infighting, the White House's failure to provide clear direction and an over-ambitious agenda have hobbled the majority's ability to accomplish its goals."

Trump Says He'd Be "Honored" To Meet Kim Jong-Un If Conditions "Appropriate."

President Trump said in an interview with Bloomberg on Monday that he'd be "honored" to meet with North Korean leader Kim Jong-un under the right circumstances. The remarks, which the networks paired with reporting on Trump's White House invitation to Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte, prompted critical reports of what was characterized as Trump's openness to the authoritarian leaders. In the interview with Bloomberg Politics (5/1, Talev, Jacobs), Trump said, "If it would be appropriate for me to meet with him, I would absolutely, I would be honored to do it. If it's under the, again, under the right circumstances. But I would do that." The President added, "Most political people would never say that, but I'm telling you under the right circumstances I would meet with him."

In its lead story, NBC Nightly News (5/1, lead story, 2:45, Holt) reported that as North Korea on Monday announced it is pushing its nuclear program at "maximum pace," the President was "opening a door to a meeting with dictator Kim Jong-un." The AP (5/1, Lederman) likewise says "opened the door...to a future meeting" with Kim, "offering unusual praise for the globally ostracized leader at a time of surging nuclear tensions." ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 5, 3:05, Muir) reported Trump "told Bloomberg that under the right circumstances, quote, 'I would be honored to' meet with Kim, who ABC's Jonathan Karl said is "somebody who has starved his own people and threatened to destroyed the United States." Asked about the President's comments, White House press secretary Sean Spicer: "The President understands the threat that North Korea poses, and he'll do whatever is necessarily, under the right circumstances, to protect the country from the threat that its poses." CNN's Situation Room (5/1) reported the White House is "frantic" as it tries to "explain President Trump's stunning comment," and the Washington Times (5/1, Boyer) says Spicer "was peppered with questions about what conditions Mr. Trump would require for a meeting." The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 3, 2:55, Pelley) reported, "White House officials later stipulated that North Korea would first need to abandon its nuclear weapons." Townhall (5/1, Barkoukis) quotes Spicer as saying, "We've got to see their provocative behavior ratcheted down."

The New York Post (5/1, Fredericks) reports Spicer on Monday also "defended" Trump's "praise" of Kim in an interview Sunday with CBS as "a smart cookie," saying, "He assumed power at a young age when his father passed. There was a lot of potential threats that could have come his way. He's managed to lead a country forward, despite the concerns that we and so many people have, he is a young person to be leading a country with nuclear weapons."

The AP (5/1, Lederman) says that while the White House later "played down near-term prospects for such a meeting, Trump's conciliatory comments marked a departure from his more unforgiving tone toward the North in recent days." It also marked the "latest fluctuation as Trump's administration struggles to articulate its policy for addressing the growing threat from North Korea's nuclear program."

Several lawmakers reacted negatively Monday to the idea of a meeting with Kim. Rep. Kathleen Rice said on CNN's Situation Room (5/1) that the "international community all agrees" that "the facts are not there to support" a direct meeting with Kim right now. She added, "It's baffling to me how the President of the out can use the word 'honored' when talking about meeting with a dictator who kills members of his own family to assure his power." On CNN's Situation Room (5/1), Sen. Chris Coons blasted Trump for "commend[ing] Kim Jong-un of North Korea for his leadership. Kim Jong-un is a brutal dictator who has directly threatened the United States with an attack by an ICBM. I can't imagine what the right conditions would be for a direct meeting between" the two leaders. Coons added that he is "puzzle[d]" that Trump has "abruptly" changed his stance on North Korea.

Rep. Mo Brooks, however, appeared to support the idea of a meeting, saying on CNN's The Lead (5/1), "It's always a good things to improve relationships with your allies and to create relationships with your foes. And in this case I don't see any harm trying to improve America's relationship with the dictator in North Korea. We may strongly disagree with a lot of things that he does to his people, but nonetheless, if it's going to help preserve peace over the long haul, both in South Korea and the Korean Peninsula generally and with respect to the United States it's worth a shot."

In a separate interview with Fox News' The Fox News Specialists on Monday, USA Today (5/1, Estepa) reports Trump said of North Korea: "Nobody's safe. I mean, who's safe? The guy's got nuclear weapons. ... We have 28,000 troops on the line and they're right there. And so nobody's safe. We're probably not safe over here. If he gets the long-range missiles, we're not safe either." Reporting on Trump's comments to Fox, Politico (5/1, Conway) says that "instead of seeking to reassure people alarmed by North Korea's attempts to grow its nuclear capabilities, Trump has warned about the potential for conflict with the reclusive country multiple times."

As Trump made his remarks, Reuters (5/1, Park) reports North Korea accused the US "of pushing the Korean peninsula to the brink of nuclear war" after a pair of strategic US bombers flew over the area in a training drill with the South Korean air force. "The reckless military provocation is pushing the situation on the Korean peninsula closer to the brink of nuclear war," the North's official KCNA news agency said Tuesday.

White House "Defending" Duterte Invitation. During their reports on Trump's remarks about Kim Jong-un, all three networks also continued coverage of President Trump's decision to invite Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte to the White House. NBC Nightly News (5/1, lead story, 2:45, Holt) that while Duterte is "widely condemned for executing thousands of drug suspects in his own country," the White House is "defending" the invitation. Press secretary Sean Spicer: "Obviously, there is human rights component that goes into all of this. And so, it's a balance." ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 5, 3:05, Muir) reported that after being offered "kind words" from Trump, Duterte – "a man human rights groups say has committed crimes against humanity for an anti-drug campaign" – is "not ready to commit, saying, 'I am sorry, I am not sure if I can make it to the White House.'" The New York Times (5/1, Villamor) also reports Duterte indicated Monday that he "cannot make any definite promise" to accept Trump's invitation.

The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 3, 2:55, Pelley) reported, "It is unusual for an American president to publicly empathize with authoritarian leaders. From Mr. Trump has made a point of praising leaders with an iron grip on power while avoiding condemnation of their abuses." A USA Today (5/1, Korte) analysis says Trump is "demonstrating a willingness to meet with some of the most notorious leaders on the world stage — a wheeling-and-dealing approach to diplomacy that is both an embrace and a rejection of President Obama's policy of engaging with adversaries." Trump's "businesslike willingness to make deals on the world stage is becoming a central pillar of what could be seen as an emerging Trump Doctrine."

A front-page Washington Post (5/1, A1, Rucker) analysis similarly says that "as he settles into office, President Trump's affection for totalitarian leaders has grown beyond Russia's president to include strongmen around the globe," including Egyptian President Abdel Fatah al-Sissi, Thai Prime Minister Prayuth Chan-ocha, and Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan. Calling it "an undeniable shift in American foreign policy," the Post says Trump is "cultivating authoritarian leaders, one after another, in an effort to reset relations following an era of ostracism and public shaming by Obama and his predecessors."

The President, says the New York Times (5/1, Landler), "continued his outreach to rogue leaders on Monday," declaring he would meet Kim "provided the circumstances were right." The Times says Trump's "unorthodox overtures...illustrated the president's confidence in his ability to make deals and his willingness to talk to virtually anyone." A Washington Post (5/1) editorial says Duterte "poses a difficult challenge," but while a "subtle US policy would recognize the need for US-Philippine cooperation without endorsing the contemptible offenses of the current president," President Trump has instead offered Duterte "an unqualified embrace that effectively blesses his murderous campaign." In so doing, the Post argues that Trump "sends Asians the message that there is no difference between China's amoral foreign policy and that of this US administration." In an editorial, the New York Times (5/1) says there is "no evidence" that Trump "consulted the State Department, or that the White House has done anything to prepare the groundwork for a Duterte visit. The normal way to mend diplomatic ties is to negotiate privately over months and have the process culminate in, not begin with, a White House meeting."

Rep. Kathleen Rice said on CNN's Situation Room (5/1) that Trump's remarks on Kim and his invitation to Duterte are part of a "disturbing pension for authoritarian figures, for dictators, for any world leader who will compliment him." Sen. Chris Coons said on CNN's Situation Room (5/1) that while Duterte "could help" the US in addressing the North Korea threat, "human rights are an absolutely fundamental part of America's values and America's interests, and to turn a blind eye to the sort of gross human rights violations that President Duterte has been carrying out against his own people in the Philippines doesn't in the bigger picture make us safer."

Dana Milbank writes in his Washington Post (5/1) column that he is "stunned that anybody would be stunned" by Trump's invitation to Duterte, arguing that "in style, if not in scope, the two men are brothers from another mother." Both men, he says, "have employed foul language in public, boasted publicly about their sexual performance and made vulgar references to assaulting women." They have also both "threatened the free press, challenged the legitimacy of the judiciary, attacked opponents as corrupt — and insulted the pope."

US Pushing For More Sanctions On North Korea, Urging Regional Actors To Take Part. Fox News' Special Report (5/1) reported the House this week is set to consider measures that would expand sanctions targeting North Korean shipping "and those who employ North Korean slave labor." The bill also "requires the Administration to determine whether North Korea is a state sponsor of terrorism." The Administration is pushing other countries, like China, to also implement the sanctions. Secretary of state Tillerson "called out China specifically." Under the headline "Asian Leaders Are Drawn Into US Push On North Korea," the Wall Street Journal (5/1, Watts) reports President Trump also widened his efforts to build cooperation in isolating North Korea, extending White House invitations to the leaders of Thailand and Singapore on Sunday. Thai Prime Minister Prayuth Chan-ocha and Singapore Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong both said they had accepted the President's invitations.

Ross: Trump Won't Trade US Jobs For China's Help On North Korea. Reuters (5/1, Lawder) reports Commerce Secretary Ross indicated Monday that President Trump "does not intend to trade away US jobs for China's help on North Korea." In an interview with CNBC's Squawk On The Street, Ross "rowed back from Trump's comments in a CBS interview" that China's help on North Korea "trumps trade." Asked if the need for China's help to contain threats from North Korea had made it more difficult to be tough with Beijing on trade issues, Ross said, "We've been having some very constructive discussions on trade with the Chinese in parallel" to discussions on North Korea.

Pompeo Visits South Korea Amid Tensions With North. The AP (5/1, Lee) reports CIA Director Pompeo made an unannounced visit to South Korea, the US Embassy in Seoul confirmed Monday. An embassy official said Pompeo and his wife were in Seoul on Monday, "but wouldn't say for how long." South Korean media reports, however, said the CIA chief arrived in South Korea "over the weekend for meetings with the head of South Korea's National Intelligence Service and high-level officials in the presidential office." The Washington Times (5/1, Muñoz) reports that according to Yonhap News, Pompeo met with Lee Byung-ho, head of South Korea's National Intelligence Service and "other top government officials, as well as US Forces-Korea chief Gen. Vincent Brooks."

THAAD Missile Defense System Now Operational. Barbara Starr reported on CNN's Situation Room (5/1) that CIA Director Pompeo is in South Korea for meetings with US military and diplomatic personnel. Elsewhere in South Korea, the THAAD defense missile system supplied by the US "has now begun operating with limited capability to shoot down incoming North Korean missiles." Bloomberg Politics (5/2, Kong) reports the THAAD system set up in Seongju county "is in place and ready to operate, South Korea's defense ministry spokesman Moon Sang-gyun told reporters on Tuesday in Seoul."

Turnbull: Australia Won't Tolerate North Korea's "Reckless" Threats. Fox News' Special Report (5/1) reported that during a recent event commemorating US and Australian cooperation in WWII, Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull responded to North Korea's recent threat of a nuclear attack saying, "We are taking a strong message to North Korea that we will not tolerate reckless, dangerous threats to the peace and stability of the region." The New York Times (5/1, A1, Cave) reports that while South Korea, Japan and the US "have grown accustomed to North Korea's diatribes," Pyongyang "recently threatened a new target with a nuclear strike: Australia." During a recent visit by Vice President Pence to Sydney, the North warned Australia to think twice about "blindly and zealously toeing the US line" and acting as "a shock brigade of the US master." The Times says North Korea's threat against the country, "far-fetched as it might seem, is an example of how Australia's most important military alliance faces a new challenge: the risk that President Trump will draw the nation into a conflict or other unexpected crisis that destabilizes the region, angers its trading partners or forces it to side with either the United States or China."

White House, Republicans Hoping To Have Healthcare Vote This Week.

News coverage reported that the Trump Administration is hoping for a vote on the Republican healthcare bill this week, but that it may be delayed because of apparent differences among Republicans on requiring insurers to cover those with pre-existing conditions. President Trump was shown on both ABC and CBS saying that the bill would continue such requirements, but both networks said that is not true of the bill as currently crafted.

ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 7, 2:15, Muir) reported that though "the President said preexisting conditions will be covered," ABC suggests states may be allowed "to opt out of preexisting coverage." Trump was shown saying, "Preexisting conditions are in the bill. And I mandated it. I said it has to be." ABC (Bruce) added, "The bill his party is pushing tonight actually allows states to opt out" of that protection, and the American Medical Association has said the bill "could effectively make coverage completely unaffordable to people with preexisting conditions."

The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 1:55, Cordes) reported Trump "insisted his party's bill does not change protections for the sick." Yet "the GOP's latest bill does give states the options to let insurers charge sick people more." Meanwhile, National Economic Council Director Cohn "delivered another mixed message" saying, "We'll get healthcare down to the floor of the House. We're convinced we have the votes." However, added CBS, "that came as a surprise to Republican leaders here on Capitol Hill who have not scheduled a vote," because "at least 20 House Republicans at this point would vote no, and the GOP can only afford to lose 22."

Trump was shown saying on Fox News (5/1), "I don't want to set deadlines. I think it's going to be approved, it could be soon, but it could be not so soon. It's going to happen. Remember this: I've been really focused on this for like, seven weeks."

Reuters (5/1, Abutaleb, Heavey) reports that both Cohn and Chief of Staff Priebus "expressed optimism" about a vote coming soon. Priebus said there would be a vote "this week." Roll Call (5/1, Bennett) says the Administration offered "conflicting messages." Press secretary Sean Spicer said supporters are "closer and closer" to having enough votes, while adding, "I think the President has made it clear he is not instituting a timeline."

The Washington Times (5/1, Howell) says "many conservatives" support allowing states to "allow insurers to charge healthy people less than sicker ones," while "centrists...say allowing states to charge sicker patients more than healthy ones is inconsistent with pledges Republicans made on a campaign trail." The Washington Examiner (5/1, Ferrechio) reports the bill has the support of "all but one or two" members of the House Freedom Caucus, but that the "new provisions allowing states to waive Obamacare mandates have driven away some centrist GOP lawmakers." Politico (5/1, Cheney) reports that Rep. Billy Long (R-MO) has now said that he will not support the bill, explaining that the bill "strips away any guarantee that pre-existing conditions would be covered and affordable." USA Today (5/1, Shesgreen) calls Long's unexpected opposition "a sign of trouble" for the bill. Long had said about the earlier version of the bill, "If you vote no, you're voting yes for Obamacare."

The Wall Street Journal (5/1, A1, Armour, Peterson, Andrews) cites Rep. Mike Coffman (R-CO), characterized as a centrist, saying, "Many moderates...overreacted to the amendment [on preexisting conditions], thinking that it does more than it actually does." He added, "I think people are taking a second look at it." Rep. Charlie Dent (R-PA) said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (5/1), "That amendment in my view would remove protections with people with preexisting conditions or it could possibly remove them because the state would have the option to wave out of providing those potential health benefits."

Rep. Mo Brooks (R-AL) said on CNN's The Lead (5/1), "My understanding is that it will allow insurance companies to require people who have higher health care costs to contribute more to the insurance pool that helps offset all these costs." Rep. Ron DeSantis (R-FL) said on Fox News' Fox & Friends (5/1), "This is a compromise repeal and replace bill. ... I think it's probably the best we can do now. I think we have got to move forward.”

Politico (5/1, Diamond) says the bill “undermines other key promises” Trump has made, listing five. They are: “every bit as good on pre-existing conditions as Obamacare”; “Insurance for everybody”; “No cuts” to Medicaid; “No lines” for health insurers; and “No one will lose coverage.” Politico says that each of these will be violated by the current bill.

The Wall Street Journal (5/1) says in an editorial that the current bill retains both guaranteed issue and community rating, but allows states to seek a waiver if they have an alternative plan for addressing the problem. Under the current system, argues the Journal, insurers may seek other ways to discourage expensive patients from enrolling, such as narrow networks and high deductibles and copays.

Ryan, Freedom Caucus Allied For Now On New Healthcare Bill. Politico (5/2, Bade) reports that despite past bad blood, the House Freedom Caucus “is locking arms” with House Speaker Ryan, “at least momentarily. The fragile alliance has been sparked by their shared interest in finally tanking Obamacare, an eagerness to build momentum for the president’s agenda and a belief among hard-liners and leadership that each side has moved cautiously toward the other on health care.” Politico says seeing “the conservatives in Ryan’s corner for once” is “one of the more unlikely turns in recent House Republican history.” Rep. Mark Sanford (R-SC), a Freedom Caucus member, said, “Politics makes for the strangest of bedfellows. Someone you may not have been working with on the last bill, you better stay friends with them because you may need them on the next bill.”

Restriction On Using Tax Credits To Buy Plans Covering Abortion Poses Problems For California And New York. The Hill (5/1, Sullivan) reports the bill offers tax credits to help buy health insurance, but prohibits them from being used for “plans that cover abortion.” That may make them “largely unusable in some blue states” – California and New York – because those states require policies to cover abortion. California insurance commissioner Dave Jones said, “I would sue the federal government” if the provision becomes law.

Editorial Wrap-Up

New York Times.

“Donald Trump Embraces Another Despot.” In an editorial, the New York Times (5/1) says there is “no evidence” that Trump “consulted the State Department, or that the White House has done anything to prepare the groundwork for a Duterte visit. The normal way to mend diplomatic ties is to negotiate privately over months and have the process culminate in, not begin with, a White House meeting.”

“Populism, Politics And Measles.” A New York Times (5/2) editorial says that “one of the tragedies of these post-truth times is that the lies, conspiracy theories and illusions spread by social media and populist politicians can be downright dangerous.” The Times points to opposition to vaccination as one example, noting that “a serious outbreak of measles in Italy and in some other European countries could well be the result of a drop-off in vaccinations caused by utterly misguided and discredited claims about their dangers.” It argues that the outbreak, “unfortunate as it is, does give health authorities an opportunity to strengthen their case by pointing to concrete evidence of what inevitably follows when vaccinations drop off."

"President Trump Is Asked To Show His Cards." In an editorial, the New York Times (5/2, Board) says that late Friday, the Office of Government Ethics sent "a little-noticed memo" to the White House, with the subject, "Data Call for Certain Waivers and Authorizations." It could have been titled: "You Said You'd Clean Up Government. Now Prove It." The Times says it is now the job of White House ethics officer Stefan Passantino "to release to the ethics office, and to the public, the names of public servants whom Mr. Trump has allowed to bypass the rules. If he stonewalls, we look again to Republicans," like Sen. Chuck Grassley, "to remind this administration that the American people deserve an accountable government, and to make sure they get it."

Washington Post.

"A Good-Enough Budget." In an editorial, the Washington Post (5/1) says that "to judge from" the omnibus, congressional leaders' "priorities are not President Trump's priorities." The agreement is "a tribute to the Democrats' skillful leveraging of their power, even as a minority in both houses; to the Republicans' pragmatic fear of a politically costly partial government shutdown – and to the stubborn persistence of good old-fashioned political horse-trading, even under this supposedly disruptive president." The Post calls it "a temporary victory for basic common sense."

"An Unwelcome Invitation." A Washington Post (5/1) editorial says Duterte "poses a difficult challenge," but while a "subtle US policy would recognize the need for US-Philippine cooperation without endorsing the contemptible offenses of the current president," President Trump has instead offered Duterte "an unqualified embrace that effectively blesses his murderous campaign." In so doing, the Post argues that Trump "sends Asians the message that there is no difference between China's amoral foreign policy and that of this US administration."

"In Brookland, The Good Vs. The Perfect." In an editorial, the Washington Post (5/1) writes that that answers to questions regarding the extent to which private companies should be pushed to solve public problems in "a contentious, and increasingly ugly, controversy" over a redevelopment proposal for a deteriorating housing complex in Northeast Washington could have broad implications. MidCity Financial Corp. has promised to reserve 373 units for very low-income families of the 1,760 residential units it will build, a proposal the Post says is "unusual" as it is more than the 10 percent moderately affordable units DC law requires. While "promises are easier made than kept," the Post says opponents "seeking to demonize" MidCity are acting in a counterproductive manner. The Post writes that the District "has a responsibility to hold developers to their promises" all the while finding "the right balance between encouraging public-mindedness and keeping business opportunities viable."

Wall Street Journal.

"Pre-existing Confusion." The Wall Street Journal (5/1) offers its opinion in an editorial on the situation regarding pre-existing conditions, arguing that the current bill retains both guaranteed issue and community rating, but allows states to seek a waiver if they have an alternative plan for addressing the problem. Under the current system, argues the Journal, insurers may seek other ways to discourage expensive patients from enrolling, such as narrow networks and high deductibles and copays. The Journal argues that it is a small portion of the population that is high risk and that policies other than guaranteed issue and community rating may be more effective at ensuring they get the care they need.

“China’s Case For Trump’s Tax Cuts.” In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (5/1) writes that China provided an argument for President Trump’s proposal to reduce the US corporate tax rate to 15 percent: its leaders fear it will draw manufacturing away from China. The Journal adds that China’s warning shows it understands how important corporate tax rates are growth, concluding that cuts to the US rates are needed to compete globally.

“Barack Obama, Capitalist.” In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (5/1) condemns liberal criticism of former President Obama for accepting a $400,000 speaking fee from the Wall Street firm Cantor Fitzgerald, arguing that he should be allowed to make a living. The Journal approves that Obama will deal with the high tax rates adopted under his Administration and suggests he might placate his critics by donating to the US Treasury his savings from upcoming tax breaks.

Last Laughs

Late Night Political Humor.

Stephen Colbert: "Now Trump has repeatedly said that this hundred-day thing is totally arbitrary, okay. Totally unimportant. And to prove how unimportant it is, he took out a TV ad, he cut a cake on Air Force One, and he held a rally in Pennsylvania. ... He also proved just how unimportant this was with a bunch of interviews over the weekend."

Stephen Colbert: "Trump thinks Kim Jong-Un is a smart cookie, to which all of North Korea replied, 'Cookie? He's a monster.'"

James Corden: "It's the first day of May, and Donald Trump has officially passed his 100th day in office. So to celebrate, we're not going to talk about him at all tonight."

Trevor Noah: "Saturday was the hundred-day mark of Trump's presidency, which means he no longer has that new President smell. If I had to guess, I would say he now smells like nepotism and steak sauce."

Trevor Noah: "Even Donald Trump is shocked that there is a black person in his audience. You see how excited he got. Oh wow, that's really cool. Like he points out black people in his crowd like he is on a whale-watching tour. 'Look over there, look, a black one, it's so majestic. All right, Jeff Sessions, ready the harpoon.'"

Jimmy Fallon: "I'm told that President Trump just did an interview where he wondered why the Civil War ever happened. Then Education Secretary Betsy DeVos said, 'That's easy, Captain America and Iron Man got in a big fight.'"

Jimmy Fallon: "I saw that Trump defended all his trips that he's made to his golf courses, saying that he only goes there to hold meetings. Even guys who go to Hooters for the wings were like, 'Yeah, right.'"

Seth Meyers: "In a recent Reuters interview, President Trump reflected on his first 100 days in office saying, quote, 'I thought it would be easier.' What made you think it was going to be easy? This is what it did to a smart person [President Obama's picture]. By the time you're out of office, you're going to look like the Toxic Avenger."

Seth Meyers: "President Trump said yesterday that being President has been a big burden on his family. 'Yes, but somehow we manage,' said Melania from her penthouse in New York."

Seth Meyers: "In an interview today, President Trump questioned why America fought the Civil War. Even worse, then he questioned whom America fought in the Civil War. 'Wait, I know this one. Was it China?'"

Seth Meyers: "You know, at this rate, the only way Trump is going to get a second term is if he's held back."

Seth Meyers: "President Trump has a button on his desk that he uses to order a coke. Of course, he thinks it orders a nuclear strike, but once he gets the coke in his hand, he forgets what he was so worked up about."

Conan O'Brien: "Over the weekend President Trump invited brutal Filipino dictator Rodrigo Duterte to visit the White House. Yeah. The first time Trump has ever said the words 'Rodrigo, please come to America.'"

Conan O'Brien: "President Trump also said he would be honored to meet North Korean dictator Kim Jung-Un. Trump said, 'He's my kind of guy. He's crazy, overweight, and has a ridiculous haircut. We should get together. It's time we talk.'"

Conan O'Brien: "In another interview, President Trump said he thinks the Civil War could have been prevented. After hearing this, John McCain said, 'Trust me. I did everything I could. I talked to Lee. I talked to Grant.'"

Subject: Re: Urgent inquiry inre: story on Secretary Zinke and Lola's travels

Hi Heather and Team,

Hope you're having a good afternoon. We're publishing a story today on the irregularities in Interior's travel manifest. Lola Zinke appears to be at the center of all of the irregularities we could glean. Your fast response here is greatly appreciated.

We have a few new questions on the matter, and we wanted to give the department a last chance to answer the ones we've asked repeatedly:

- Multiple sources with direct knowledge of the matter told Mic that Interior's photographer was instructed to crop Lola out in official photos from departmental meetings on trips she attended with her husband. Does Interior have a comment on that?

MONTANA

- How did Lola Zinke get to Montana in March 2017 so she could be present for the tribal blessing from the Blackfeet Nation.
- Who paid for Lola Zinke's share of the March 2017 Montana trip?
- How much was it?

CALIFORNIA

- How did Lola Zinke get to California for the secretary's meeting with Gov. Brown?

- Who paid for her share of the trip?
- How much was her share of the trip?
- Why isn't she on the manifest for any part of the trip, including the meeting with Gov. Brown?
- Why isn't she in any of the photos from the meeting currently available on the department's Flickr account?
- Were any photos of Lola at that meeting deleted from the Flickr account?

NORWAY + ALASKA

- We know from Politico and U.S. News that Ms Zinke was on the trip with the secretary to Norway and Alaska. Why isn't she listed on the manifests for any of the air travel related to those trips.
- Why isn't she listed on the manifest at all, except for the cookout at Denali National Park on 5/28?
- Was the cookout the only event she attended?

Thanks,

Anthony

Hi Heather and DOI press team,

Hope you're having a good Monday afternoon. My name is Tony Smith, and I'm senior reporter for Mic. I'm writing a story on Secretary Zinke's travel, and I had a few questions.

1. I know from Interior's travel manifest that the secretary's wife, Lola, and their son, Wolfgang, showed up to the tribal blessing with the Blackstone Nation on Friday, Mar. 10 2017. However, neither Lola nor Wolfgang are listed on the flight manifest to Montana.

- How did Lola and Wolfgang travel there — on the March 9th flight (United 1532) with Secretary Zinke, or on another flight? When did they fly back to D.C.? Who paid for it?

2. I know from DOI's social media that Lola attended a trip to California with the secretary on April 13, 2017. However, she isn't listed on any part of Interior's manifest for that trip: neither for the meeting itself, nor the travel manifest.

- How did Lola travel to California — on the April 12th flight (United 291) with Secretary Zinke, or on another flight? When did she fly back to D.C.? Who paid for it?

Thank you so much for taking these questions. I'm on a tight deadline, and do need to publish this story in an hour. I appreciate your timely response.

All –

Speak for 3-5 minutes. I will introduce him. Attached PDF of the program for Reading of the Names and Veterans Day, shows the run of show for the Veterans Day program.

Program should conclude by 2:00 p.m., but the Secretary could leave 5-10 minutes before that when some people leave the dias for wreath-laying portion of the program. Not sure who NPS expects to lay their wreath, but he might want to be a part of that.

If the Secretary is on-site at 12:30, that will be perfect. Gives him a few minutes to mingle or do media interviews, but not enough time to get bored. I will be able to meet him at whatever point he leaves his car, unless you expect NPS officials to meet him and escort him to the stage.

For Advance, I will be at The Wall off and on for the next four days. Luke can contact me or Heidi Zimmerman, hzimmerman@vvmf.org, 202-765-3773,

The program agenda is attached. I'll introduce the Secretary, and we usually keep introductions very short. If there is an intro he wants me to use, please send it and we'll incorporate it into the script.

If I know when and where he plans to arrive, I'll meet him and escort him to his seat on the stage.

The event is open to the media, and there almost always are a few in attendance. If your Public Affairs folks want to arrange something special we can work directly with them. My PR person is Heidi Zimmerman, hzimmerman@vvmf.org, 202-765-3773. Otherwise, the media will be taping the ceremony from a press riser at the back of the seating area.

We will issue a press release and a media advisory. C-Span has confirmed they plan to air the ceremony.

Secretary Zinke Names Steve Wackowski as Senior Advisor for Alaska Affairs

ANCHORAGE--Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced that Steve Wackowski will serve as his Senior Advisor for Alaska affairs. Zinke made the announcement in Anchorage as part of his current tour of Alaska.

“A lifelong Alaskan, Steve is Wackowski is especially suited to advise me on matters in the state because of his exemplary military service; extensive experience with public policy for U.S. senators from Alaska; and work in the private sector with fish, wildlife, and oil and gas operations,” said Secretary Zinke. “His background is invaluable as we focus on future energy opportunities in Alaska, the welfare of Alaska Natives, and the vast expanses of lands and waters under Interior’s management including Denali and other crown jewels of the national park and wildlife refuge systems.” Zinke just returned from a tour of Denali[MJF1] .

Wachowski grew up in Anchorage and spent his summers working in Ninilchik for his family’s halibut and salmon sport-fishing business. After graduating from Bartlett High School in Anchorage, he played division I-AA football at Saint Mary’s College, where he earned a degree in Computer Science and a commission in the Air Force Reserve from UC Berkeley’s Air Force ROTC program[MJF2] .

He is currently a Major in the Reserve and drills at Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson at the 611th Air Operations Center. He has served on several active duty tours throughout his reserve career including contingency deployments to Afghanistan, Haiti, and Iraq.

After his last active duty tour Steve moved home to Alaska to work as the remote sensing operations manager for Fairweather Science, LLC in Anchorage. Steve’s work detecting and mapping maternal polar bear dens for oil and gas companies on Alaska’s North Slope was nationally recognized and helped earn him the Alaska Journal of Commerce’s “Top 40 under 40” Award in 2015.

His public policy background includes serving as a Professional Staff member on the US Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and as the late Senator Ted Stevens’ last serving Press Secretary. He most recently managed U.S. Senate Energy Committee Chairman Lisa Murkowski’s reelection campaign.

Steve is avid hunter and fisherman who says he continually gets out-fished by his wife Lindsay. They enjoy spending time in the Alaska outdoors with their two-year-old son, Lucas, and their red fox lab, Cali.

[MJF2]Did he also go to UC Berkeley or just to the ROTC there while at St. Mary's College?

Hi Lola,

I'm headed up to the ranch, but wanted to quickly let you know but just before leaving the office I received a voicemail from a Washington Post reporter who said she was writing a story about Sec Zinke's travel, and wanted more information about his event here in April. I have not called her back and spoken to her, and probably will not do so... Unless someone on your end thinks that would be helpful.

Please let me know if you would like to discuss this further.

Hope you and the secretary are well.

Ryan Zinke

U.S. Secretary of the Interior

@SecretaryZinke

Full Bio:

Ryan Zinke was sworn in as the 52nd Secretary of the Interior on March 1, 2017.

A fifth-generation Montanan and former U.S. Navy SEAL Commander, Ryan Zinke built one of the strongest track records in the 114th Congress on championing sportsmen's access, conservation, regulatory relief, forest management, responsible energy development, and smart management of federal lands.

Growing up in a logging and rail town near Glacier National Park, Secretary Zinke has had a lifelong appreciation for conserving America's natural beauty while honoring Teddy Roosevelt's vision of multiple-use on our public lands. He consistently led the efforts to renew the Land and Water Conservation Fund in Congress, and was a firm advocate for our nation's sportsmen to gain access to our public lands with the SCORE Act and SHARE Act. Secretary Zinke also coauthored the Resilient Federal Forest Act, which initiated new reforms for revitalizing America's timber towns and preventing wildfires by emphasizing the collaborative process.

Secretary Zinke was widely praised for his voting record in Congress, supporting the Teddy Roosevelt philosophy of managing public lands, which calls for multiple-use to include economic activity, recreation and conservation. He has pledged to explore every possibility for safely and responsibly repealing bad regulations and using public natural resources to create jobs and wealth for the American people.

As Secretary of the Interior, Ryan Zinke leads an agency with more than 70,000 employees who are stewards for 20-percent of the nation's lands, including national parks, monuments, wildlife refuges and other public lands. The Department oversees the responsible development of conventional and renewable energy supplies on public lands and waters, is the largest supplier and manager of water in the 17 Western states, and upholds trust responsibilities to the 567 federally recognized American Indian tribes and Alaska Natives.

The Secretary represented the state of Montana in the U.S. House of Representatives since 2014. Before that he served in the Montana State Senate from 2009 to 2011, but the bulk of his public service was his 23 years as a U.S. Navy SEAL officer.

Secretary Zinke was commissioned as an officer in the Navy in 1985 and was soon selected to join the elite force where he would build an honorable career until his retirement in 2008: the Navy SEALs. He retired with the rank of Commander after leading SEAL operations around the globe, including as the Deputy and Acting Commander of Joint Special Forces in Iraq and during two tours at SEAL Team Six. He was the first Navy SEAL elected to the U.S. House and is the first SEAL to serve as a cabinet secretary.

Secretary Zinke holds a Geology degree from the University of Oregon, where he was an All-PAC-10 football player; a Master's degree in Business Finance from National University; and a Master's degree in Global Leadership from the University of San Diego. Ryan Zinke and his wife Lolita (Lola) have three children and two granddaughters. The Secretary is proud to be an adopted member of the Fort Peck Assiniboine & Sioux Tribes in Northeast Montana.

Short Bio:

Zinke Faces Legal Complaint for Failing to Report Contributions and Misusing Campaign Funds

WASHINGTON – Today, Campaign Legal Center (CLC) filed a complaint with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) alleging Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke violated campaign finance law by failing to report tens of thousands of dollars of contributions received and for using campaign funds for the personal benefit of himself and his family.

Zinke failed to report the identity of multiple individuals who contributed thousands of dollars to his campaign through a joint fundraising committee, potentially concealing contributions in excess of federal limits.

Additionally, several transactions indicate Zinke converted campaign funds to personal use. For example, in April 2016 the Zinke campaign bought a motorhome from Zinke's wife for $59,100, spent thousands of dollars maintaining the vehicle, then sold it in July 2017 to a friend for just $25,000. If the campaign paid Zinke's wife above market rate for the vehicle, or sold it to Zinke's friend below market rate, then it illegally converted funds to personal use. Other transactions, such as a hotel stay in the U.S. Virgin Islands and a five-star hotel in New York City, were misreported on Zinke's FEC reports and may raise additional questions about personal use.

"A campaign's most basic legal obligation is to publicly disclose its major donors, so the Zinke campaign's failure to provide that information is very concerning," said Adav Noti, senior director, trial litigation and strategy at CLC, who previously served as the FEC's Associate General Counsel for Policy. "And selling a major campaign asset to the candidate's friend at half price is inherently suspect. The FEC must enforce the longstanding ban on using campaign money for personal benefits."

"The Zinke campaign failed to disclose thousands in contributions, misreported thousands of dollars in spending, and may have misused campaign funds," said Brendan Fischer, director, federal and FEC reform at CLC. "The public has a right to know who is funding a candidate and how a candidate is spending that money, but Zinke has disregarded even these basic accountability requirements."

Campaign Legal Center (CLC) marks 15 years of advancing democracy through law (2002-2017). We will continue to fight for democracy reform until the United States' political process is accessible to all citizens, resulting in a representative, responsive and accountable government.

Watchdog urges probe of whether Zinke campaign benefited friend, family

By ESTHER WHIELDON

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's congressional campaign committee bought an RV from his wife then sold it to a friend a year later at a steep discount, a watchdog group says in a Federal Election Commission complaint that alleges an illegal scheme to convert political donations into personal cash.

The June RV sale is one of several transactions the Campaign Legal Center says may have provided illegal benefits to Zinke's family or friends. The group also cites hotel stays in the Virgin Islands and New York that Zinke's campaign paid for after the Montana Republican was tapped to join then-President-elect Donald Trump's Cabinet, as well as catering expenses the campaign incurred after Zinke was confirmed. CLC also says in the complaint that Zinke may have relied on a joint fundraising committee to allow donors to give money to his campaign above federal contribution limits.

The call for an FEC investigation adds to the scrutiny Zinke is facing over his political activity. He is already under investigation by Interior's inspector general and the independent Office of Special Counsel over travel costs he incurred as secretary to attend political events while on official business, including a fundraiser in the Virgin Islands in his first month in office.

"When you combine the disregard for campaign finance laws when Zinke was a candidate with the disregard that Zinke as Interior secretary has shown for the ethics laws, you certainly get a picture of an individual who may not be taking his responsibilities as an officeholder seriously," Brendan Fischer, who submitted the complaint for CLC, told POLITICO.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift declined to comment.

In the complaint, CLC says the Zinke campaign's RV sale could have violated federal law prohibiting using political donations for personal benefit in one of two ways: Either the campaign overpaid for the vehicle when it purchased it from Lolita Zinke for $59,100 in April 2016, or it allowed Zinke's friend Ed Buttrey to pay below market value when he bought it for $25,000 in June of this year. Records also show Zinke for Congress fund spent more than $6,000 on tires and maintenance work on the RV in 2016.

The RV would have been worth between $40,000 and $49,000 when it was sold to Buttrey, according to The Associated Press, which first reported the transaction in August. Federal law requires transactions to be for fair market value when a campaign purchases goods from a candidate's family or sells assets to someone else. CLC's complaint notes it "is extremely unlikely that the value of the RV declined by 42 percent over the course of a single year."

Buttrey, a Montana state senator who is rumored to be in the running to be nominated as an Interior assistant secretary, did not respond to a request for comment.

CLC's complaint also raises concerns that Zinke has not disclosed the dates of key expenses from the end of last year. Zinke for Congress reported a $22,744 payment to a credit card on Dec. 31, but the committee itemizes those costs, including for lodging, travel and meals, as happening on the same day, according to CLC.

Masking the dates of the actual expenses makes it impossible to know whether Zinke was actually using the funds for legitimate purposes or to subsidize his personal lifestyle. For example, knowing those details would show whether Zinke used campaign funds to pay for lodging in New York City on the same day he interviewed for the Interior secretary job in Trump Tower, Fischer said. Trump Tower is a mere 10 minute walk from the WestHouse Hotel where Zinke stayed.

The campaign also listed a $522.74 charge for lodging the Lime Inn in the U.S. Virgin Islands among the Dec. 31 payments, according to CLC's complaint. POLITICO reported last week that Zinke was in the territory in November for an event with the Virgin Islands GOP, a political action committee that critics say uses questionable fundraising practices.

Also in question are a number of payments for events reported as occurring after Zinke was sworn in on March 1. His campaign paid $2,315.52 to the Capitol Hill Club on March 12 for "event catering" and $1,750 for "Senate catering" was sent to the same address over the next two months, according to campaign finance records cited in CLC's complaint.

Swift said in an email earlier this month that the "Senate catering" payments were to help the Montana delegation continue its weekly coffees for visiting constituents until Zinke's open seat was filled by Rep. Greg Gianforte. But she could not explain the Capitol Hill Club charge and did not respond to follow-up inquiries.

CLC also says Zinke's campaign failed to disclose the underlying donors for tens of thousands of dollars it received from the Zinke Victory Fund — a joint fundraising committee that disbursed funds among his campaign; his leadership political action committee, SEAL PAC; House Republicans' campaign arm; and the Montana Republican State Central Committee. The group says this lack of transparency prevents the public from knowing whether people may have exceeded the legal $2,700 contribution cap.

Partial EE article below <https://www.eenews.net/climatewire/2017/06/28/stories/1060056682>

For years, Zinke has touted the melting of Grinnell Glacier, one of the park's famous features, as evidence that he understands the impacts of climate change. He often tells a story of visiting the park with his wife, Lolita, and observing the glacier shrinking over lunch.

But it's unclear if Zinke will tackle climate change. President Trump has called it a "hoax" and is attempting to repeal rules aimed at reducing greenhouse gas emissions. After being confirmed, Zinke signed a secretarial order launching a review of climate policies (Climatewire, March 30).

Zinke has also disputed the level of influence human actions have on warming. He called that aspect "still unsettled."

Michael Reynolds, acting director of the National Park Service, told E&E News earlier this month the science is settled and the agency is continuing to plan for the impacts of climate change, even if the politics are not.

"The climate, as far as our science tells us, is changing, and so we're dealing with the resiliency factors in it, and we're dealing with the science and the facts as best we can," he said. "There may be some adjustments as we're getting used to a new set of leaders that want us to talk about it in different ways, but we're continuing to work on it."

'UGH!': Zinke's wife's travel caused some headaches for Interior staff

By BEN LEFEBVRE

11/20/2017 05:03 AM EST

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife caused some frustration for Interior staffers when traveling with him on official business, according to new records that a liberal watchdog group says uncover the potential misuse of government resources.

The records document Lola Zinke's last-minute requests to join high-level dinners and additions to the guest list for a conservative group's event near their home in Southern California earlier this year. The Western Values Project filed a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit last month to force Interior to release more than 100 pages of documents related to Lola Zinke's trips with her husband and interactions with Interior staff. Shared first with POLITICO, the documents shed new light on the outsize profile Lola Zinke has established compared with the typical Cabinet secretary's spouse, including her dictating people to invite to a town hall hosted by the conservative Young America's Foundation for her husband.

New emails also reveal a celebratory dinner the Zinkes attended that was organized in part by a major GOP donor who gave heavily to Ryan Zinke's congressional campaigns. And they show Interior staffers had to accommodate a last-minute request for her to join the secretary at an official dinner with Alaska's governor. The records cover two trips Lola Zinke joined in the first three months of her husband's tenure as well as some other interactions with Interior staff, such as coordinating her attendance at a White House briefing for Cabinet members' spouses.

While the department says Lola Zinke paid her own way, the records show Interior used staff time to coordinate some of her activities while traveling with her husband. And the trips gave her access to high-level politicians and GOP activists and donors who could benefit her as a political operator in her own right.

"These emails show that the leadership at the Department of Interior treats basic ethical standards like an inconvenience," Western Values Project Executive Director Chris Saeger said. "If Secretary Zinke is willing to be so sloppy with something as elementary as this, then god only knows how they're handling big decisions about energy and public lands behind closed doors."

Interior says Lola Zinke pays her own way when she accompanies her husband and that travel is cleared by ethics officials in advance.

"DOI incurred no expenses due to Mrs. Zinke's presence" with the secretary, Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Friday.

Interior's inspector general and the independent Office of Special Counsel are investigating the former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL's travel expenses and appearance at political events while on official trips, including those where he was accompanied by his wife. Last week, the IG's office said it could not conduct a thorough investigation because Interior had kept inadequate records. Among other problems, the watchdog said it had "not been able to determine the full extent to which Lolita Zinke, the Secretary's wife, accompanied the Secretary on official travel." Interior officials blamed the shortcomings on inadequate procedures left in place by the Obama administration.

The new records show the secretary's wife helped decide the guest list for a Young America's Foundation town hall forum with Ryan Zinke on April 17 at its Reagan Ranch in Santa Barbara, Calif., part of a weeklong official trip in the state. Lola Zinke joined her husband for national parks tours and meetings with government officials throughout the week, as well as for a private tour of the Reagan Ranch galleries led by Andrew Coffin, YAF's vice president.

Lola Zinke sent a "list of people I have invited to the event" to two Interior staffers, according to a series of April 7 emails. Caroline Boulton, a special assistant to the secretary, forwarded the list on to an official at YAF, with a warning that more could be added. Interior redacted the names of Zinke's guests before releasing the email.

"She's expecting some of them to bring plus ones and also her list is not yet final," Boulton wrote. "She's said that she doesn't have emails for them all since many of them have been personally told about the event, but I wanted you to have the list!"

YAF is a key pillar of the conservative movement with alumni ranging from White House officials to prominent journalists. The group's donors have reportedly included the Koch brothers, among others.

Lola Zinke is active in conservative politics. The Santa Barbara native was a member of President Donald Trump's Hispanic outreach team during the 2016 campaign, and in September she became chairwoman for the Senate campaign of Troy Downing, a Montana businessman hoping to unseat Sen. Jon Tester next year.

Lola had previously faced criticism for accompanying her husband on the California trip. She posted a photograph on Twitter from Gov. Jerry Brown's office and accompanied her husband to meetings with DOI regional staff in Sacramento and trips to Fresno and the national parks at Yosemite, Sequoia and Kings Canyon, the trip manifests show.

The trip also included five days in Santa Barbara and then four days in Zinke's hometown in Whitefish, Mont., an upscale part of the state where the couple owns a home and other real estate.

The secretary bringing his wife along on official trips isn't illegal as long as the government doesn't pay for her expenses. But it can be an ethically gray area, depending on the circumstances, said Craig Holman, government affairs lobbyist with good-governance watchdog Public Citizen.

"Spousal travel, especially when paid for by the spouse, suggests that the trip may have less to do with official duties and more resembles a family vacation partially paid for by taxpayers," Holman said.

When Lola Zinke joined an official trip to Norway, Greenland and Alaska, she appears to have caused some headaches by deciding to stay longer than expected. Ryan Zinke sent his staff scrambling to make last-minute arrangements so she could accompany him to dinner with the governor of Alaska and other dignitaries in Anchorage, according to new emails.

Interior staffers apparently found out about the change in plans second-hand from an aide to Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who also was on the trip, along with other senators and their spouses, according to a May 27 email from Director of Scheduling and Advance Russell Roddy to other colleagues at Interior — one day before Lola Zinke had been scheduled to return to Washington.

"I have heard that Mrs. Zinke was now maybe not going to fly out from Fairbanks Sunday morning ... so, I asked Annie if she happened to talk to Mrs. Zinke about her plans. She said Mrs. Zinke said she was now going to head to Byers Lake and Anchorage with RKZ and fly out of Anchorage on Tuesday," Roddy wrote. "UGH! We have all kinds of planes, trains and automobiles manifests to now scramble with."

It is unclear what led to the change in plans. Before the trip, Lola Zinke had apparently been trying to secure a seat on a military plane back to Washington, but the Senate staffer coordinating the trip told Interior that it would be a "safer bet" for her to fly commercial because Ryan Zinke would not be with her. The military typically does not like when members of Congress try to get their spouses on military planes without the member being present, according to an email from Boulton relaying guidance she had received. "There's a lot of ifs in that, so let me know if you want me to keep pushing on the" military return flight, Boulton wrote to Lola Zinke on May 18.

Lola Zinke joined her husband at a May 29 dinner in Anchorage with Alaska Gov. Bill Walker and other state officials.

"The Secretary personally paid the State of Alaska for Mrs. Zinke's meal," Swift said. Lola Zinke flew home on a commercial flight from Anchorage the following day.

Lola Zinke also accompanied her husband to an April 10 dinner in Washington that was organized with the help of one of his past campaign donors, Burt Sugarman, who has donated heavily to Republicans.

"We are very excited that Sec Zinke accepted the event," wrote Phil Anderson, president of lobbying firm Navigators Global who helped organize the April 10 dinner sponsored by the National Geographic Society, in a March 24 email to Boulton. "As you know, Burt Sugarman first discussed the dinner with Sec Zinke."

Sugarman and his wife, the former Entertainment Tonight anchor Mary Hart, are members of the National Geographic Society's board of directors.

The Sugarmans gave a combined $10,800 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign, out of more than $180,000 they gave to GOP candidates and committees in the last election cycle, according to FEC documents.

On April 27, Lola Zinke was invited to an ethics briefing at the White House for Cabinet spouses. "They stressed the importance of attending since important ethics rules will [be] discussed and questions can be answered by White House counsel," Boulton wrote in an email to Lola Zinke.

"Thank you!" she replied. "It's a good thing I'll be in town then."

The Girl Scout Ranger Program

The Girl Scout Ranger Program is a cooperative effort between the National Park Service (NPS) and the Girl Scouts of the United States of America (GSUSA). Through this joint initiative, NPS and GSUSA plan to cooperatively promote opportunities and activities that align with both organizations' missions and to develop a sustainable collaboration to advance our shared goals. This program will help girls get outdoors and to access our nation's natural and cultural resources.

As part of the program, Girl Scouts are encouraged to participate in a wide range of activities at NPS sites: to enjoy existing NPS educational and service programs, and to utilize NPS sites as venues for their Girl Scout activities (i.e. working on badges, Journeys, or Take Action/Highest Awards projects). NPS awards girls a certificate for 5 hours of participation, and the Girl Scout Ranger patch for 10 hours of participation.

This new program is designed to:

- Spark girls' awareness of national parks and historic sites and encourage exploration of these sites as places of discovery and adventure.
- Educate girls, Girl Scout volunteers, and NPS staff about how national parks can enrich the Girl Scout Leadership Experience by providing experiences that align with the Girl Scout program.
- Encourage the immediate and future preservation of public lands through education and stewardship activities.
- Provide Girl Scouts with opportunities to experience public land management through field-based learning and exposure to environmental issues and Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) careers.
- Support girls in developing the leadership skills needed to serve as the next generation of leaders in resource stewardship and conservation.

NPS and GSUSA announced this partnership on May 2, 2015 at the Golden Gate Bridging event, held at Golden Gate National Recreation Area in San Francisco where 6,000 Girl Scouts walked across the Golden Gate Bridge to celebrate "bridging" from a Junior Girl Scout to a Cadette.

Subject: Gizmodo Media request for comment - Zinke vacation before monument deadline
Date: Thursday, August 17, 2017 2:13:18 PM

Hi Heather,

I'm a reporter at Jezebel, a Gizmodo Media Group website, and I'm hoping to request comment and/or clarification on a vacation Secretary Zinke appears to be enjoying right now, a week before the deadline for his national monuments review.

According to an internal tally from conservation group Center for Western Priorities, Sec. Zinke has only visited 8 of the 27 monuments under review, and appears to have no further plans to visit the remaining monuments. Although Sec. Zinke has announced no changes to Grand Canyon-Parashant, Sand to Snow National Monument, Upper Missouri River Breaks, Canyons of the Ancients, Craters of the Moon, and Hanford Reach, that still leaves a number of monuments up for review that Sec. Zinke seems to not have visited in his official capacity.

Is it accurate that Sec. Zinke has visited just 8 of the monuments under review and does not intend to see more before his review deadline? Can you confirm that Sec. Zinke is currently on vacation with his wife outside the U.S., and explain his decision to do so instead of attempting to visit more of these locations?

My deadline is 3 PM EST.

Thanks,
Ellie

SCOTTISH/IRISH ANCESTRY

O.B. Johnson at Family Farm, TN

This edition is dedicated to our Murray and Johnson Clan roots based upon West African and Scottish/Irish ancestry. Both names are of Scottish origin. As a child the ancestry always made logical sense since most people associate, have relationships, fall in love, and marry people with whom they have a commonality. The Scottish/Irish and West Africans roots of many Americans are derived from the shared experiences related to agriculture and animal husbandry. People of African descent established families with Europeans during the colonial era, and those same families are presently known as “crackers” in Florida. “Cracker” is a term used to define the cracking of the whips which assisted in driving cattle and horses a major occupation of Florida settlers. The Kinsley’s of Northeast Florida was one of the first documented “Cracker” families with livestock, land, and crops.

KINGSLEY PLANTATION

Zephaniah Kingsley, of European descent, married an adolescent girl whom he purchased as a slave in the 1800’s. Transported from Senegal, West Africa, Anna Madgigine Jai whom Kingsley purchased in Havana, Cuba, was of royal blood and eventually became his wife and the mother of three of his children.

On the March 1, 1811, in the Spanish East Florida, plantation owner Zephaniah Kingsley signed a document that forever changed the life of his African wife Anna and of Florida. The document was a manumission paper ensuring her legal freedom. It marked the beginning of the young woman’s freedom in the New World and the beginning of a written record of a remarkable life. Anna petitioned the Spanish government for land, and land grant records show that in 1813 she received title to five acres on the St. Johns River. This property was located across the river from her husband’s plantation, Laurel Grove, south of present day Jacksonville. Anna purchased goods, livestock, and enslaved Africans to begin her business operation. Over time she became one of a significant number of free people of African descent in East Florida.

These free Blacks, among whom were the Haitian liberator Bissau, included farmers, craftsmen, and members of the militia. A majority of the documented eighteen black homesteads and plantations in Northeast Florida owned slaves. Availability of captured imported Africans was through four major Florida ports: St. Augustine, Amelia Island on the Atlantic Coast, Pensacola, and Mosquito Coast.

Although slavery was legally supported, Spanish policies also allowed manumission and self-purchase. Slavery was not exclusively racial or a permanent life-long condition. Under Spanish authority, both the enslaved and free Black population held certain rights and privileges with opportunities to actively participate in the territory’s economic development. Anna Kingsley, like other free people, were determined to be independent and as a business woman sold goods and poultry to neighboring settlers.

Her blossoming business lasted only a few months, because during an effort to wrestle East Florida from the Spanish, armed US American forces entered the province. Joining with a number of rebellious Floridians, they looted and occupied the homesteads of planters and settlers to obtain supplies and set up bases.

This was known as the Patriots Rebellion and during skirmishes in 1814 after the War of 1812 when many Georgians were making advances into Florida. These insurgents succeeded, and a US system of enslavement replaced the comparatively liberal Spanish policies. A principal concern of many on both sides was what would be the future status of free Black people. When US invaders and their supporters approached her property, Anna ordered her people to set a fire to consume her home and produce, escaping with her children and enslaved people on a Spanish gunboat. The insurrection ended in failure and Anna's loss was not total. A Spanish commandant reported that "the flames devoured grain and other things to the value (of) $1,500." The governor rewarded her loyalty with a land grant of 350 acres as compensation for her loss.

Laurel Grove was also destroyed as a result of the conflict. In 1814, Zephaniah and Anna Kingsley, with their children and enslaved workers moved to Fort George Island near the mouth of the St. Johns River. While at Fort George, Zephaniah Kingsley's Florida landholdings increased to include extensive timberland and orange groves, four major plantations producing rice, indigo, provisions, and Sea Island cotton. He also owned ships that he captained on trading voyages. Kingsley had African overseers at his various properties to which he entrusted his business operations when he was away.

At the Fort George plantation, Anna eventually assumed total responsibility resulting in Kingsley later declaring that she "could carry on all the affairs of the plantation in my absence as well as I could myself." These "affairs" included overseeing the lives of about sixty enslaved men, women, and children who lived on the Fort George Island plantation.

In 1821, conditions for all of Florida's people of color, free and enslaved, changed drastically when Florida became a territory of the United States. An influential planter, Zephaniah Kingsley was appointed to the 1823 territorial legislative council. He tried to persuade the new lawmakers to adopt policies similar to those of the Spanish, providing for liberal manumission and rights for the free Black population. Kingsley published his opinions in, "A Treatise on the Patriarchal, or Co-operative System of Society as It Exists in Some Governments, and Colonies in America, and in the United States, Under the Name of Slavery, with Its Necessity and Advantages" in 1828.

His arguments did not convince Floridians new legislators, and the territorial Councils employing fear of slave rebellion established policies that became increasingly oppressive. Florida legislation of the 1820s and 1830s reflects racial discrimination that blurred the distinction between freeman and slave until there was virtually no difference. (Reference: National Park Service).

Spanish Florida's society prior to 1821, in particular, was heavily influenced by Moorish (Islamic) laws and customs that had been transported to the New World by the Iberians. Muslims from North Africa and Arabia invaded major portions of Spain, influencing the culture, education, agriculture, and government policies for more than 700 years. At one time the gap between the Iberian Peninsula and North Africa was less than twenty miles. The Muslim (Moors) influence was greatest in the region known as Grenada in southeast Spain.

Many of the methods of livestock practice brought from Spain to the New World originated in North and West Africa. This includes what has become identified as Cracker Cattle and Horse husbandry. Within the year that a majority of the Moors were defeated and Jewish people were expelled, and the Catholic monarchs King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella consolidated Spain, Christopher Columbus received financing by them to search for gold and to spread the Roman Catholic faith.

In fact, many of the laws that were brought to the New Spanish Empire were based upon a culture and legal system grounded in Islamic statutes. This explains how and why freedom was available in Florida for Africans. The Spanish for centuries had incorporated Islamic slave laws based on status, not wealth or race; therefore, all enslaved or indentured people could buy, and/or earn their freedom. One major benefit under the Spanish system was that family units were not broken up in the manner of the British chattel slave system in the English colonies. Marriage and children were protected by church and state no matter the social status of the people.

AFRICAN CONNECTION TO THE NEW WORLD

Over the course of the last 15 years the city of St. Augustine, St. Johns County, and our community have worked tirelessly to connect the region's history to the National Park Service (NPS) Underground Railroad Network to Freedom Project, the NPS Gullah Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor, and to Fort Mose to promote world history! Florida has been a center of international New World events since 1513 and has existed under distinctly different and contrasting sovereign systems: Spanish, British and US.

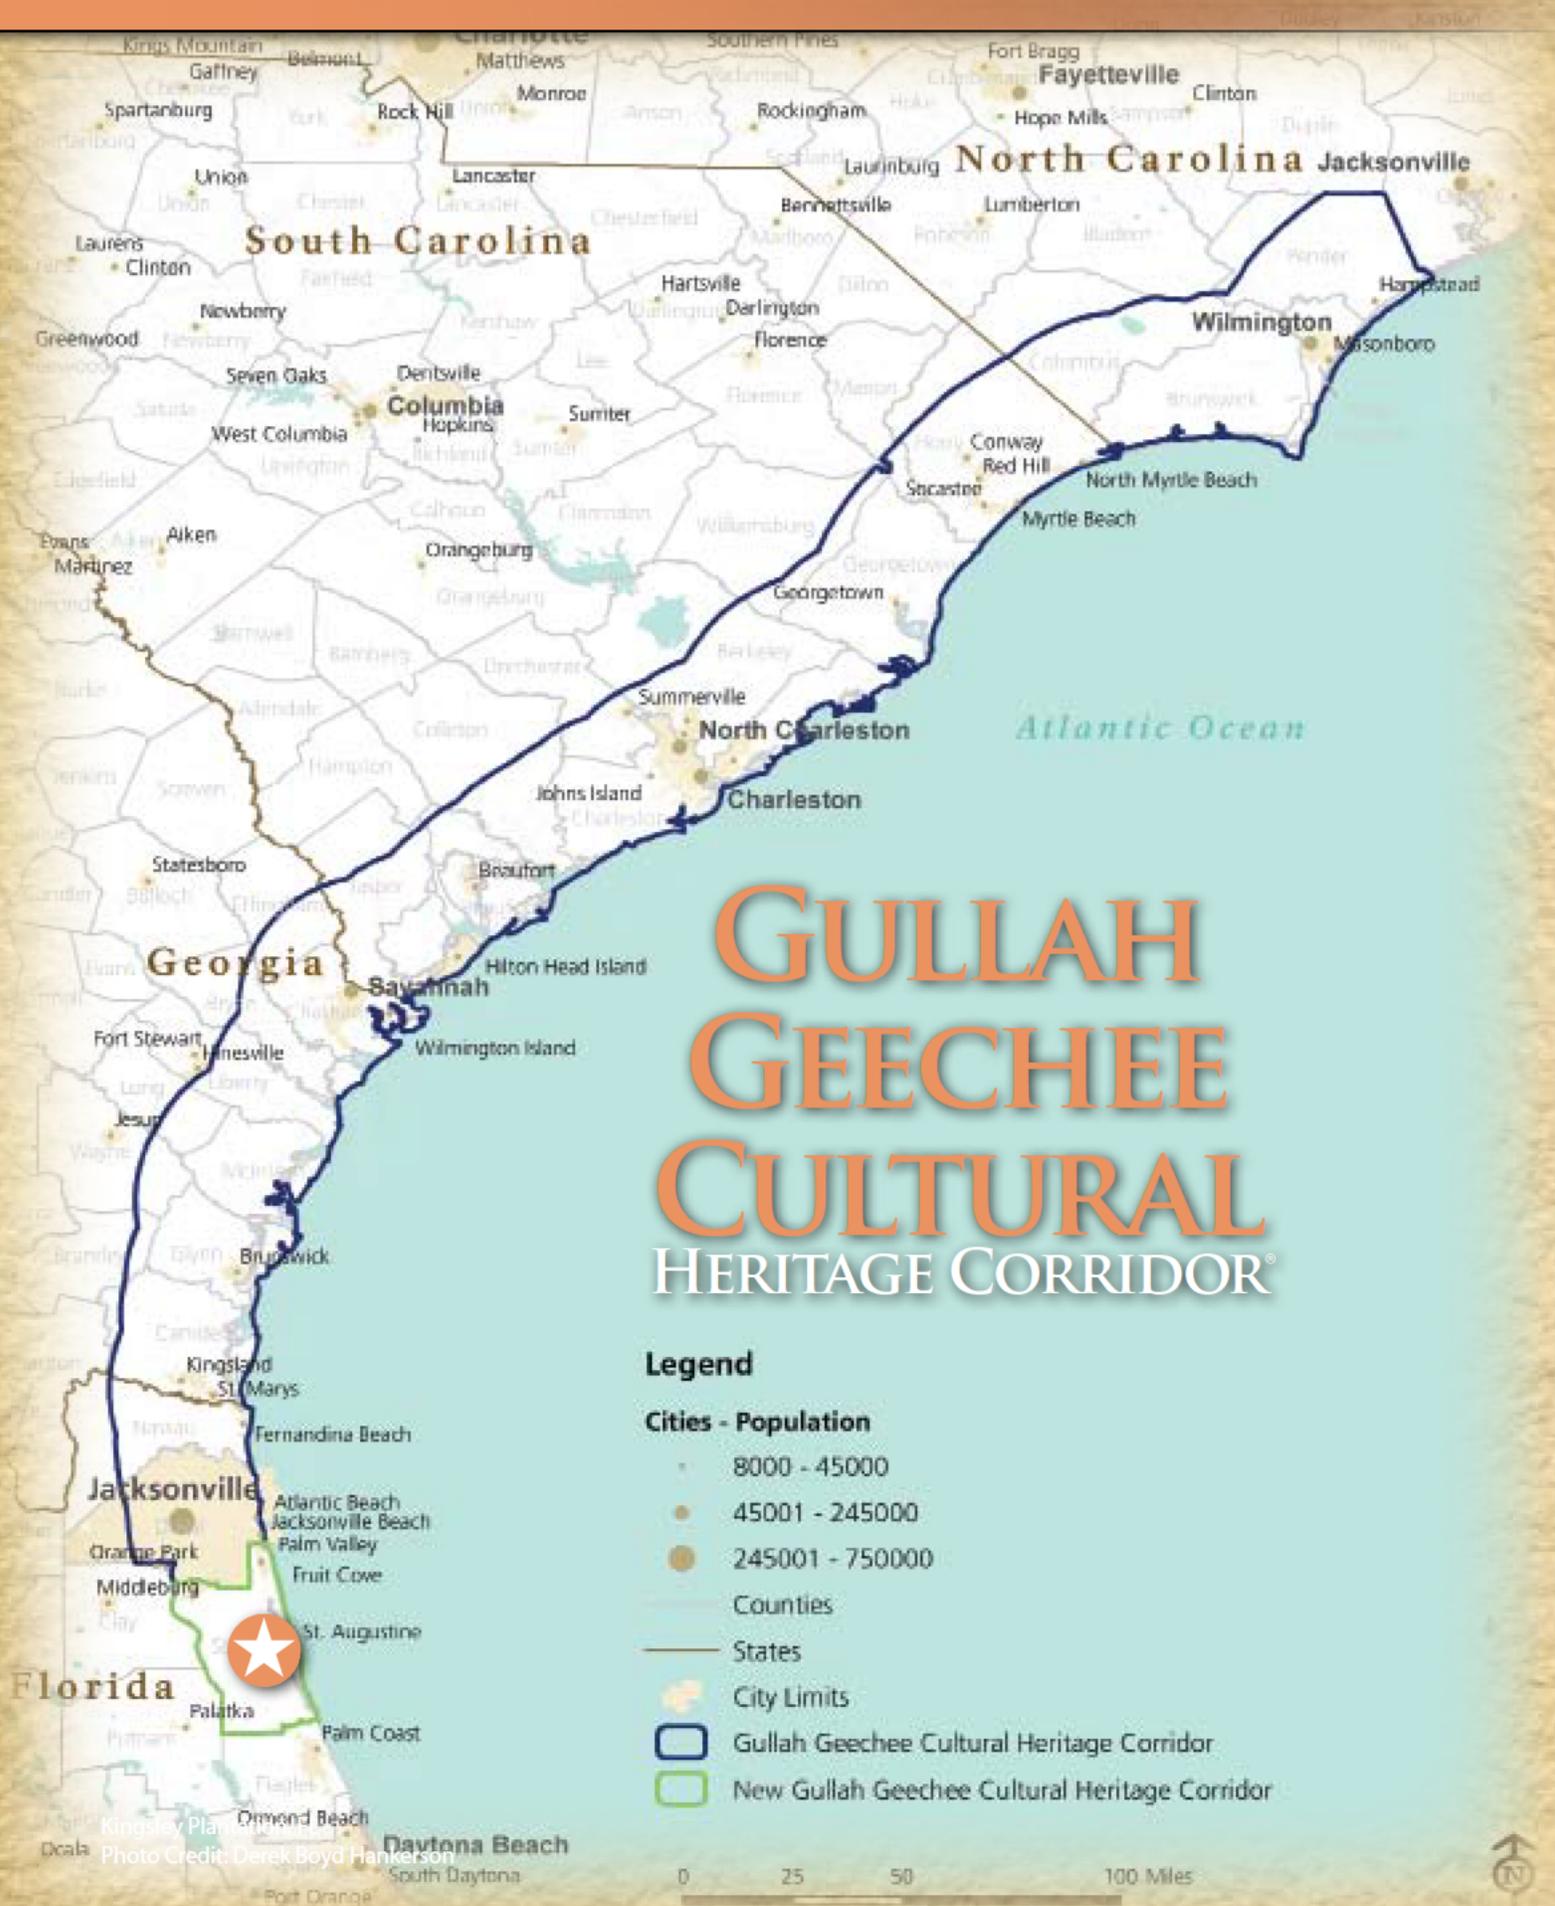

After the British and US acquisitions, Florida's Spanish foundation was sublimated or ignored. That is changing and creates a huge opportunity to reflect a more accurate history through celebrations, observances, and NPS connections. The purpose of these joint efforts is to highlight the rich African and Native people's contributions to Florida. These documented events date back 500 plus years when free African explorers sailed with Christopher Columbus in 1492, when Juan Garrido sailed with Ponce de Leon in 1513 and was the first to grow wheat in the New World, and many others. Sailors, translators, and explorers such as Estevanico the Moor in 1527 arrived on the Gulf Coast and travelled with the Spanish through Mexico, now part of the US southwest. In fact, 40-60 free and enslaved Africans sailed with Pedro Menendez de Aviles to St. Augustine in 1565, 450 years ago, to settle the New World. Also, in 1565 the first militias were established to protect the Spanish settlement of St. Augustine. These military men included Africans who had earned their freedom through service. Although the first St. Augustine militia was organized as early as 1606, the first official Black unit was commissioned in 1620 to protect the town from invaders.

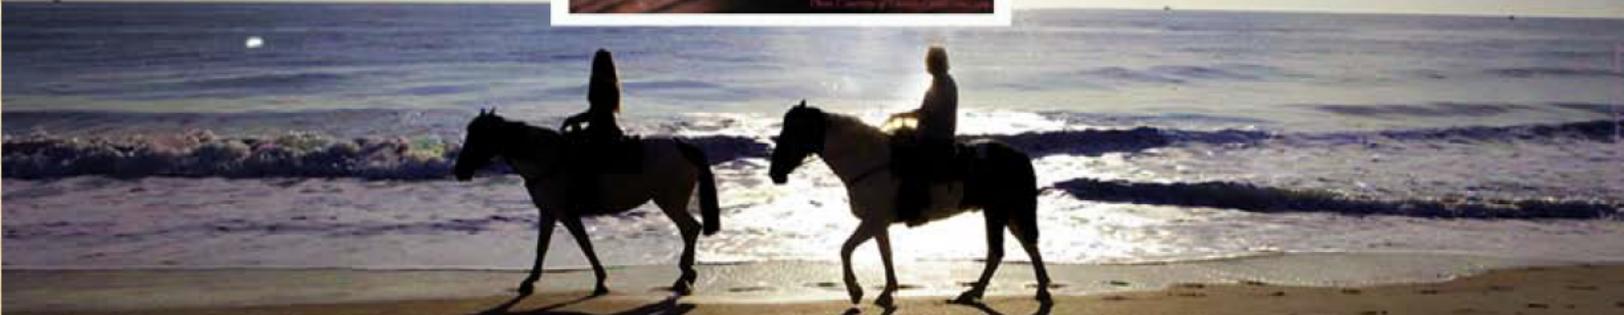

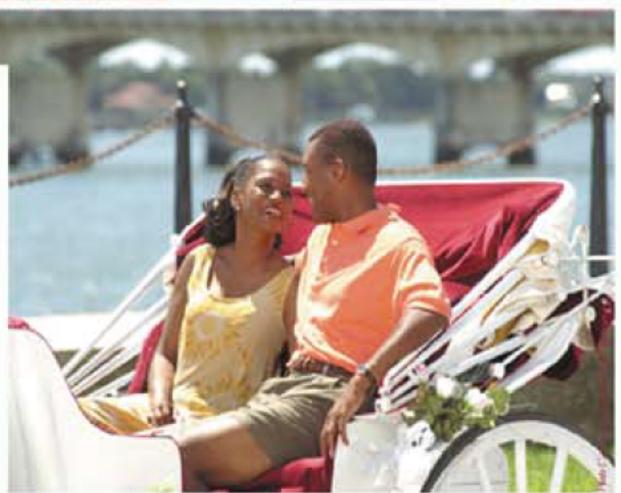

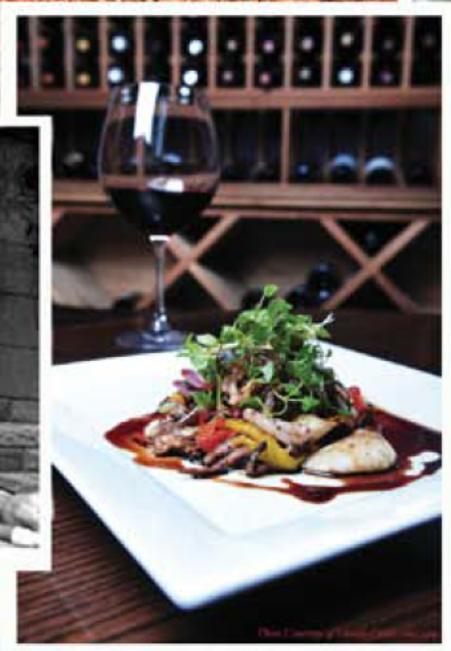

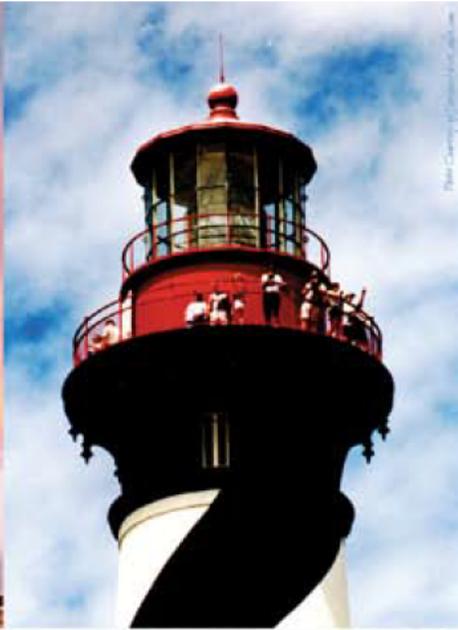

The Spanish Capitol of St. Augustine has always been a place of Black people's freedom. Various edicts and proclamations to that effect were issued in the early part of the 16th and 17th centuries as part of Spain's political and international strategy to weaken the British colonies to the north. They granted enslaved Africans from any northern British colony freedom and citizenship if they made their way to Spanish Florida, swore allegiance to the Spanish crown, and converted to Catholicism. By 1738, over 100 African families had made their way to Florida, settling at Fort Mose – the first legally sanctioned free Black community in North America. This became the destination of the original Underground Railroad, heading south to Florida not north to Canada. This process of achieving civil rights was far different from the 1960s non-violent movement that followed approximately 200 years later in 1964 in St. Augustine. Incidentally, one of the major leaders of the 1960s movement was Asa Philip Randolph, a Crescent City, Florida native. Although each era involved struggle and resistance, during the colonial era circumstances reflected international conflicts on a local scale. By providing protection of Spanish Florida from British invasion, Africans had little choice but to fight to maintain their freedom. When they did succeed, they received land grants for their heroism and many established homesteads and plantations in Florida, or moved to Cuba, Spain, Guam, the Caribbean and Canada securing freedom for themselves and their families. By the 1960s the alternatives were limited: continued local and national denial of civil rights or realization of full citizenship promised but seldom realized after the Civil War. There was no place else to go.

AFRICAN CONNECTIONS TO SPANISH FLORIDA

The Gullah Geechee Heritage Corridor connection to Africans may be older and richer than previously realized. This corridor includes northeast Florida, extending from Wilmington, NC to St. Augustine, FL. Recently, the Middle Passage Ceremonies and Port Markers Project, a Florida-based organization that facilitates ancestral remembrance ceremonies and promotes installation of historic markers at sites where Africans first touched land after journeying across the Atlantic Ocean, learned of research that identifies the Heritage Corridor, specifically Sapelo Bay region of Georgia, as possibly the first Middle Passage arrival site on the continental United States. In 1526, near Sapelo Bay Georgia, Spanish explorer Lucas Vazquez de Ayllon arrived after embarking from Santo Domingo with six ships. He had personally received from King Charles of Spain a license to establish a colony and bring enslaved Africans to build it. With 500 people from Hispaniola, of whom a significant number were Africans, on ships fully stocked with olive oil, grain, horses, tools, and armaments they went as far north as Cape Fear, North Carolina, where they were caught in a storm during which a major portion of their cargo and at least one vessel were destroyed. They sailed south and founded the colony of San Miguel de Gaudape on what would later be the Sapelo Bay region of Georgia. The colony lasted barely one year and was doomed by hunger, disease, the death of Lucas Vazquez, indigenous people's attacks, and enslaved Africans' rebellion. After revolting, all the Africans escaped into the interior, integrating into the Native communities.

ARMSTRONG COMMUNITY

On Saturday, December 7, 2013, the Sea Community Gullah Geechee Culture Heritage Corridor Organization, honored military veterans - past and present, who gathered at the Armstrong Cemetery during the 2nd Annual Rails to Trails Festival. Rails to Trails is one of three cycling trails running through the rural agrarian area of Armstrong or Sea Community and along the old Railroad Ties diagonal to Rt. 207. This annual event was attended by relatives and family member of the soldiers who served. Former County Commissioner Ken Brayn was the Master of Ceremonies, and in attendance were State Rep Cindy Stevenson, Commissioner Rachel Bennett, State Senator Travis Hutson, and Congressman Ron DeSantis.

Also, the Armstrong community celebrated its 100th Anniversary and the opening of a nine mile stretch of cycling, horseback, and walking trail. As part of an 80 mile planned bike path through northeast Florida, this stretch, known as Rails to Trails, now extends in St. Johns County near Interstate 95 through Vermont Heights, Elkton, and Armstrong to Spuds. Elected official and community residents recently celebrated the addition of another section of the bike trail in Putnam County that extends across the St. Johns River via a scenic bridge into and along Dunns Creek and the Ravine Gardens Florida State Park.

Development of the Armstrong Community – 40 Acres and a Mule Armstrong was developed with land near the railroad station donated by Clay Bottoms Farms Company. Developers Keith Canfield and J.L. Cray sub-divided the area into 40 acre lots that were sold to “colored” people. The community, known earlier as Cokesbury, was established October 5, 1900. It is one of the oldest African American settlements in St. Johns County with origins dating to about 1886 as a saw mill operation. The community was settled on two occasions, but because of its small number of residents the town was not formed nor a Post Office established! The name Armstrong coincided with the extension of the railroad tracks through southwest St. Johns County. Development centered around the saw mill and the town was formally laid out in 1911.

First Baptist Church of Armstrong
The First Baptist Church of Armstrong, organized in 1910 by African Americans, was originally located half a block east of the Florida East Coast (FEC) Railroad track. It was a small frame building erected by The Turpentine Company for Workers. In 1915, the structure burned down and was rebuilt; the building blew down in 1928 and 1939, and each time was re-erected. It was a rectangular frame, unpainted, plain structure with a bell tower. The first recorded pastor, Rev. Will Gaynor, served from 1910-1913. Rev. R. B. McHelm became the pastor in 1936.

Saint Mary's Methodist Episcopal Church

Saint Mary's Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1914 and faced the FEC track. It was a small frame building also erected by the turpentine company. After burning down in 1915, services were held in church member's homes until a brown rectangular frame building with a bell tower was completed and dedicated in 1925. The earliest known pastor was Rev. A. Anderson of Orange Mills, Florida.

Name Change – Cokesbury

The name Armstrong was temporarily replaced by the name Cokesbury around 1915, but it reverted back to Armstrong in the 1920's. And, while the community of Armstrong was not large, it was growing and in need of a post office.

Armstrong Post Office

The first Armstrong post office was established on July 24, 1886; Jun D. Webb was the first postmaster. The second post office was originally established as Cokesbury February 9, 1915, with Rev. Joseph H. Hankerson as the first postmaster. Rev.

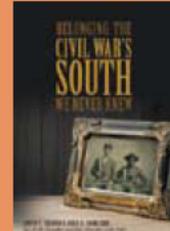

Hankerson served until approximately June 19, 1918, when a successor was appointed. The name was changed to Armstrong on September 16, 1920, and the post office was discontinued on February 15, 1932.

Pentecostal Assemblies of the World

A new African American congregation, Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, was organized in Armstrong near the railroad tracks in 1936 and was housed in a two story dwelling with services held in the rear. The pastor lived in the house.

MAROONS, BLACK SEMINOLES, NATIVE PEOPLE, AND BLACKS

From the 1680s, enslaved Africans fled from the chattel British colonies of the Carolina's and Georgia into Spanish Florida seeking freedom and refuge. Maroon settlements, such as Fort Mose, Angola, Fort. St. Nicholas, and other posts, grew in the jungles and swamps. Although they lived in separate villages, Black Cimarron's (Spanish word for wild, free, and untamed) and Yamassee lived and frequently fought side by side with Native people in a struggle for freedom and sovereignty against the U.S. government.

Cow keeper, or old King Boleck, is identified by many as the originator of the Seminole tribe when the Native people came from Alabama near Eufaula to live in Florida. He was a great friend to the English. As early as 1764 he began providing cattle and protecting the frontiers for Gov. Tonym. When General Andrew Jackson invaded Spanish Florida it was on the pretext of destroying Black settlements and returning escaped Blacks to their US owners. He charged that the Indians were harboring fugitives. In 1814 another force attempted to take control of Florida during the Patriot War staged in northeast Florida.

They were defeated by a combined force of the Fort Mose Militia and Seminole Indians. Fort Negro was abandoned by the British after the war of 1812, and with Jackson's approval, was destroyed by U.S. forces. A series of American generals were in turn repeatedly frustrated in their attempts to end the war and capture runaways. Gen Thomas Jessup wrote "This, you may be assured is a Negro, not an Indian war." Several free Blacks rose to Seminole tribal leadership, often acting as interpreters. Men like Abraham and John Horse spoke for the Native people (including a delegation to Washington D.C. in 1825). Notable figures include Osceola, Wildcat, King Phillip, and Billy Bowlegs. Many Blacks would be transported west and some as slaves of the Creeks or as free people to what is now Oklahoma.

St. Johns County in an effort to combine culture, history, travel, tourism and wellness tourism the Sea Community has taken an interest in forming cycling trails that run over the old railroad ties from Florida East Coast Railroads. The community of Armstrong in St. Johns County is the only community in the Gullah Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor that is home to 3 bicycle trails. Cyclists, naturalists, and those who enjoy the great outdoors can enjoy these nature and cycling trails while learning the history of Black families who provided their labor for Henry Flagler's entrepreneurial ventures. The background stories of families who built and worked in hotels, on timber and turpentine farm camps, and with the railroads are all part of the experience as you and our family enjoy the great outdoors in this rural agricultural setting. In an effort to highlight this rich American history, the National Park Service, St. Johns County, Department of Environmental Protection, Rails to Trails Conservancy, Sea Island Loop, and the East Coast Greenways all have trail heads in Armstrong off Route 207 in St. Johns County, and home to the only recognized Geechee community in St. Johns County, was Founded and settled by West Africans. These Africans families worked in the silver culture industry for several St. Johns County families, such as Beech, Maguire, and Burrell.

These bike and nature trails afford visitors and cyclists an opportunity to learn much of this history in a traditional setting with the beautiful natural backdrop of towns, registered historic sites, waterways, and verdant woods.

St. Johns County is the only place on the Gullah Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor which boasts historical sites, cycling, nature, and horse trails combined with parks and recreation for a true Wellness, Culture and Heritage Tourism experience. This nature and touring experience begins at Fort Mose where you and/ or your family can ride in a canoe, kayak on the tributaries and waterways, and/ or ride by bike along a road way. After riding through the city of St. Augustine along San Marco Blvd., cross over the tracks to Route 214, and ride to the beginning of the Rails to Trails on Route 207 to Armstrong and further into Putnam County.

RAILS TO TRAILS

Rails to trails are converted rail tracks that combine nature, cycling, and horse trails. As in Armstrong, Florida, thousands of miles of abandoned rail tracks and railway corridors have been transposed into public trails for walking, bicycling, horseback riding, enjoying wildlife habitat and nature appreciation. A rail trail is the conversion of a disused railway into a multi-use path, typically for cycling, walking, and sometimes horse riding. The Palatka to St. Augustine Trail, when completed, will stretch 18 miles. Currently 8.5 miles are complete, and 9.5 more miles are planned with numerous access points, historical markers, interactive and interpretive signs, a rail head (the place where supplies were unloaded), and a station along Route 207.

The trail is co-managed by the cities and counties along the route. The St. Augustine - Palatka Trail is part of the 260 mile St. Johns River to Sea Loop that travels through St. Johns, Putnam, Flagler, Volusia and Brevard counties. This, combined with the Sea Community Gullah Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor, provides a huge economic development potential that will benefit St. Johns and surrounding counties for generations to come if managed and maintained properly, efficiently, and effectively. Rails-to-Trails Conservancy (RTC) creates nationwide networks of trails using former rail lines and connecting corridors to build healthier places for people. RTC advocates at the local, state, and national level numerous efforts to enact policies in support of trails and greenways for transportation, recreation, conservation, and coordination of areas into a facet of livable communities. The RTC is headquartered in Washington, D.C., with regional offices in California, Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

Rails to Trails Event

During its 100th Anniversary the community was joined by officials from the Florida Department of Transportation, St. Johns and Putnam County officials, East Coast Greenways Alliance and Rails to Trails Conservancy members. At this event, Florida Department of Environmental Protection Director Donald Forgiore stated, "Trails change the landscape of tourism as they create connections between [the] state's natural beauty and the places people chose to live, work and play."

EAST COAST GREENWAYS (ECG)

The East Coast Greenway is a developing trail system, spanning nearly 3,000 miles from Calais, Maine to Key West, Florida, linking all the major cities of the eastern seaboard. Over 25 percent of the route is completed with safe, traffic-free paths. The East Coast Greenway includes US cities, suburbs, and rural areas along the Atlantic Coast. The goal is for the entire Greenway to be on paths completely separated from the road. Nearly a quarter of the route is currently on local, traffic-free, firm-surfaced trails that are safe for all abilities. The remainder is comprised of interim on-road sections that link completed trails together, using occasional ferries and trains where there is currently no safe on or off-road option. Florida boasts the longest portion of Greenway with the most miles of completed trail. North to south, the Greenway enters the state at Fernandina Beach on Amelia Island and continues 584 miles to Key West, the United States' southernmost mainland point. The Greenway travels largely along the coast, through seaside villages, America's earliest historic sites, vast nature preserves, and major cities including Jacksonville and Miami. The route includes 198 miles of completed traffic-free paths and the most bridges of any ECG state. Much of the Greenway through Florida is on wide auxiliary path that parallels Highway A1A and concludes with the Florida Keys Overseas Heritage Trail which hops from island to island for 106 miles (about half of which is completed trail). The Alliance of Cyclist plans an alternate route that will provide access to Florida's Gulf Coast, the Pinellas Trail, and Lake Okeechobee. Thirty-four percent of the Florida route is completed trail, 19% is in development, 36% is in public control and awaiting development, and only 26 miles (4%) is considered "gap" where the route location has not yet been determined.

The ECGA works with regional and county planning agencies, trail developers, researchers of regional impact, and trail advocates to advance the Greenway.

Historic Preservation/Community Identity

Many local, community, and elected leaders have been surprised at how trails have become sources of community identity, pride, and successful economic development. These effects are magnified when communities use trails and greenways to highlight and provide access to historic and cultural resources. In fact, many trails and greenways help preserve historically significant transportation corridors.

Economy/Revitalization

The economic effects of trails and greenways are sometimes readily apparent and are sometimes subtle. For example, a company may factor in local amenities as these trails into its decision to locate in a particular community. There is no question, however, that countless communities across America have experienced economic revitalization due in part to trails and greenways. They encourage healthier mobile lifestyles by making possible places to walk, bike, and more. They develop stronger economies by promoting tourism and local businesses, and increasing property values. They support a healthier climate and environment by making alternate transportation a viable option to the automobile. Overall, they contribute to a more vibrant community interaction, connecting people to places where they live, work and play.

Made in America: Promoting the All-American Outdoor Experience

This week, President Trump kicked off “Made in America Week.” At the Department of the Interior, we are taking this opportunity to promote and strengthen America’s tradition of outdoor recreation on public lands, which is made possible, in large part, thanks to private foundations, American businesses, and the thousands of public-private-partnerships across our public lands.

We already have thousands of partners across the country who fund and assist with visitor services, infrastructure, and even land acquisition.

Boston Harbor National Recreation Area is a unique example of a public-private-public partnership where federal, state, and private organizations work together to manage the land, provide boats between islands, restore historic lighthouses and forts, provide educational tours, and carry out janitorial and maintenance tasks. All of this could not be possible without the joint effort.

Private partners also help maintain our buildings and aging infrastructure.

For example, earlier this year, President Trump donated his first quarter salary of about $78,000 to the National Park Service to restore historic battlefields. Private foundations like the Civil War Trust, National Park Foundation, and Save Historic Antietam all chipped in, and with matching donations we were able to fund a $263,000 project to restore a historic structure and nearly mile-long fence at the historic Antietam National Battlefield in Maryland.

Some of our most-iconic, all-American outdoor experiences like riding the historic

Ford “Red Jammer” busses in Glacier National Park, staying overnight in the El Tovar lodge at the Grand Canyon, or whale watching in Alaska’s Glacier Bay National Park would not be possible without public-private partnerships.

To highlight and expand on Made in America partnerships, this week Interior is hosting a roundtable with outdoor recreation industry leaders and land managers to brainstorm innovative ideas for how we can partner together to build upon the All-American Outdoor Experience on public lands. Some ideas I’ve already heard is for a food truck in a park’s parking lot, energy-efficient cabins in a national monument, and bringing mobile youth fishing centers to urban areas across the country.

The Department is focused on identifying and expanding the best existing services and bringing in new services to parks and recreation areas.

For example, Wi-Fi, internal transportation, campgrounds, boat ramps, concessions, and even restrooms are not available on many public lands. Also, once somebody gets to a recreation area, services like boat, ATV and fishing pole rentals are often unavailable. This would be like going on a ski vacation and not being able to rent skis or have access to a lift up the mountain.

This leaves many families without practical and affordable options for camping, hiking, and recreating. Having three kids and two granddaughters myself, I can’t imagine going on a family vacation without some of these basic services.

Now, expanding public-private-partnerships does not mean privatizing our parks as some have wrongly suggested. I am opposed to the sale or transfer of our public lands, and under my watch our public lands will remain public.

Having partners in parks also does not mean the shuttle bus will look like a race car covered in corporate stickers. In fact, some of our most iconic features are only possible thanks to partnerships.

Expanding partnerships will allow parks and public lands to deliver greater services to more visitors, while allowing our rangers to focus on things like the health of the ecosystem, guided tours, educational services, and land management. Partners are also able to deliver many services to the American people at a lower cost than the government can.

With the right amount of ingenuity and originality, we can foster the All-American Outdoor Experience through our work at Interior. The Roosevelt Arch at Yellowstone National Park reads, “For the enjoyment of the people.” Enjoying recreation on public lands is at the core of our shared American heritage.

The All-American Outdoor Experience is part of who we are as Americans, but it’s also a big economic driver for communities across the country. As a whole, the outdoor recreation industry supports $887 billion in consumer spending and supports 7.6 million American jobs, according to industry analysts. In addition, the revenue the industry produces is a major boost to our economy.

Made in America is about products as much as it is about our shared heritage and values. It is about making memories by taking a kid fishing for the first time, or in my case, taking my wife hiking early in our relationship.

There’s a reason 330 million people from across the country and the world visit our parks every year, and millions more flock to public lands coast to coast: It’s because these spaces are uniquely American and are the result of a century of public-private partnerships.

This “Made in America” Week, let’s unite under a common pride in our country, standing behind American businesses and engaging in American outdoor traditions that have stood the test of time.

Hey there

I know it's not even Halloween yet, but the end of the year is fast approaching, and assuming we want to do a holiday video, it's important to decide what we want it to be asap...if for instance we want to have submissions from around Interior, wildlife refuges, national parks, etc, we'll have to start asking for those submissions soon...if we decide it will be nothing more complicated than the Secretary, his wife and the dog in front of the Christmas tree in his office, holiday music playing underneath, we can literally shoot that one in the morning and send it out in the afternoon...there's also the possibility of having the Secretary -- and his family if you want -- in front of the National Christmas tree

Just want to get it on the radar so it doesn't sneak up on anyone...to me this whole season is Hallowhistmas, it starts on October 1st and ends on January 1st

Fox News Opinion-Made in America: Promoting the All-American outdoor experience

This week, President Trump kicked off “Made in America Week.” At the Department of the Interior, we are taking this opportunity to promote and strengthen America’s tradition of outdoor recreation on public lands. The all-American outdoor experience was the idea of visionaries like President Theodore Roosevelt, and has been carried on by the federal government and Congress for years. It could not have been possible without help from philanthropic foundations, American businesses, and thousands of public-private partnerships across our public lands.

We already have thousands of partners across the country who fund and assist with visitor services, infrastructure, and even land acquisition for increased public access.

In my recent visit to Boston Harbor National Recreation Area, I learned how it is a unique example of a public-private-public partnership where federal, state, and private organizations work together to manage the land, provide boat transportation between islands, restore historic lighthouses and forts, lead educational tours, and complete janitorial and maintenance tasks. All of this could not be possible without the joint effort.

Private individuals and philanthropic organizations also help maintain our public lands.

For example, earlier this year, President Trump donated his first quarter salary of about $78,000 to the National Park Service to restore historic battlefields. Private foundations like the Civil War Trust, National Park Foundation, and Save Historic Antietam all chipped in, and with matching donations we were able to fund a $263,000 project to restore a historic structure and nearly mile-long fence at Antietam National Battlefield in Maryland.

Some of our most-iconic, all-American outdoor experiences, like riding a historic Ford “Red Jammer” bus in Glacier National Park, staying overnight in the El Tovar lodge at the Grand Canyon, or whale watching in Alaska’s Glacier Bay National Park, would not be possible without the valued work of American businesses and workers.

To highlight and expand on Made in America partnerships and products, this week Interior is hosting a roundtable with outdoor recreation industry leaders to brainstorm innovative ideas for how we can work together to build upon the outdoor experience on public lands. Some ideas I’ve already heard are for outdoor recreation outfitters to make investments in our public lands for things like energy-efficient cabins and fishing access points.

The Department is focused on identifying and expanding the best existing services, and bringing in new services to parks and recreation areas to preserve and enhance the American outdoor experience.

For example, Wi-Fi access, internal transportation, campgrounds, boat ramps, concessions, and even restrooms are not available on many public lands. Also, once somebody gets to a recreation area, common services like boat, ATV, and fishing pole rentals are often unavailable. Our goal is to expand services so public access to our public land is expanded for all Americans.

More partnerships does not mean privatizing our parks as some have wrongly suggested. I am opposed to the sale or transfer of our public lands, and under my watch our public lands will remain public, “For the benefit and enjoyment of the people,” as the famous Yellowstone Roosevelt Arch states.

Having partners on public lands also does not mean the tour bus will look like a race car covered in corporate stickers. Some of our most iconic features are only possible thanks to partnerships.

Expanding partnerships will allow parks and public lands to deliver better services to more visitors, while allowing our rangers to focus on things like the health of the ecosystem, guided tours, educational services, and land management.

The All-American Outdoor Experience is part of who we are as Americans, but it’s also a big economic driver for communities across the country. As a whole, the outdoor recreation industry generates $887 billion in consumer spending and supports 7.6 million American jobs, according to industry analysts. In addition, the revenue the industry produces is a major boost to our economy.

Made in America is as much about products as much as it is about the shared American experience created here. It is about making memories by taking a kid fishing for the first time, or in my case, taking my wife hiking early in our relationship.

There’s a reason why 330 million people from across the country and around the world visit our parks every year, and why millions more flock to public lands from coast to coast: It’s because these spaces are uniquely American.

This Made in America Week, let's unite with a common pride in our country, standing behind American businesses and engaging in American outdoor traditions that have stood the test of time.

Ryan Zinke is the 52nd Secretary of the Interior. He is a fifth-generation Montanan, former Congressman, an Eagle Scout, and retired Navy SEAL Commander.

This is the same process used by the previous administration. 2. the letter Dep Secretary Bernhardt sent to the IG in response to the management advisory letter they sent to us.

I'm leaving at 2:00 today. WP just asked for comment so I sent the Bernhardt letter. If more inquiries come in and I don't respond to inquiries within 30 minutes, can you please go ahead and forward the Bernhardt letter to reporters for me?

Thanks!

PS here is the statement for Brian Steed - "Brian has been an incredible asset to the Bureau since his first day. We are excited to have him temporarily step into this leadership role. We couldn't be more thankful to Mike Nedd for leading the Bureau during the initial transition. Interior Announces Share the Experience 2016 Photo Contest Winners

Citizen Photographers Compete for Photo Placement on National Public Lands and Waters Pass

WASHINGTON – The U.S. Department of the Interior today, along with the National Park Foundation and other participating federal recreation land agencies, announced the winners of the 2016 Share the Experience photography contest on the agency’s popular Instagram account and launched the 2017 contest.

This annual contest invites amateur photographers to submit their favorite views, moments, and adventures from America’s national parks and public lands. The winning picture, captured by Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas, will be featured on the annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass.

“These incredible photos represent some of America’s best recreation, wilderness and wildlife, and I’m happy to have the opportunity to share them with the nation,” said U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke.

More than 16,500 photos were submitted with more than 710,000 photo views over the course of the contest, which ran from April 28, 2016, through Dec. 31, 2016. The contest saw a 50 percent increase in new users and almost a 10 percent increase in overall photo submissions from the previous contest year.

“Photos have the power to inspire curiosity about our national parks and public lands,” said Will Shafroth, president of the National Park Foundation. “This contest motivates people to get out, find their park, and enjoy these treasured places.”

A small green tree frog clings to the stem of a green plant.

“I like photographing the frogs because they’re artistic – little reptiles and amphibians are gorgeous to me. I’ve been studying them for 60 years now – patterns, designs, and their behavior all fascinate me,” said McIntyre. “Public lands are very important to me, especially places like Big Bend National Park, Aransas National Wildlife Refuge, and South Padre Island National Seashore. These places and the habitat need to be protected.”

Second place went to Gary Hamer of Robins, Iowa, for the serene shot of his friends paddling off on a morning adventure surrounded by calm water and rising fog in Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, part of Superior National Forest, in northeastern Minnesota.

Third place went to Christopher Regala of Mililani, Hawaii, for the photo he snapped of his son experiencing The Narrows at Zion National Park in Utah.

The grand prize for the winning image is $10,000, followed by $5,000 and $3,000 for second and third place. Winners also receive outdoor gear provided by Celestron and Osprey Packs, hotel packages courtesy of Historic Hotels of America® and an annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass. Prizes are awarded for fan favorites and the following six category winners:

- Adventure and Outdoor Recreation
- Historical and Cultural
- Scenic, Seasons, and Landscapes
- Family, Friends, and Fun
- Wildlife
- Night Skies

The 2017 Share the Experience photo contest, sponsored by the National Park Foundation in partnership with the National Park Service, the Bureau of Land Management, the Bureau of Reclamation, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the U.S. Forest Service, and Recreation.gov, is now accepting entries through December 31. All entries have the chance to be featured on the Interior Department’s popular Twitter, Instagram and Facebook accounts.

Share the Experience is the official photo contest of America’s national parks and federal recreational lands, showcasing the more than 500 million acres of federal lands and drawing entries from all across the United States. For a full listing of prizes and rules, or to submit a photo, please visit www.sharetheexperience.org.

Share the Experience is a great example of the countless ways there are to #FindYourPark/#EncuentraTuParque — a public awareness and education movement to inspire people from all backgrounds to connect with, celebrate, and support America’s national parks and community-based programs. #FindYourPark invites people to discover and share their own unique connections to our nation's natural landscapes, vibrant culture, and rich history.

Lolita Zinke makes her mark outside the Cabinet

INTERIOR

Lolita Zinke (center) plays a uniquely public role as the spouse of a Cabinet secretary. Pamela King/E&E News

Meet Lolita Zinke, the woman dubbed a "real trooper" by her husband.

While Ryan Zinke runs the Interior Department, Lolita Zinke serves as the opinionated campaign chairwoman for one of several Republicans running for a high-profile U.S. Senate seat in Montana.

She sometimes hits the press, hard.

On Wednesday, deploying a #FakenewsCNN hashtag, the California native said on Twitter she would "completely agree" with President Trump's tweeted assessment that most Americans "think the Media is inventing stories about Trump & his Administration."

The wife of a former Navy SEAL and the mother of three, including a Navy veteran, Lolita Zinke wades into other controversies as well. In a Sept. 24 tweet, she denounced as "#disgraceful and #clueless" the football players who knelt during the national anthem.

And, at times, she's right by the Interior secretary's side, although officials characterize this support as familial and nothing out of the ordinary.

"Mrs. Zinke has zero role at the department," Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said today.

An Interior official added that "much like previous secretaries and spouses, she occasionally meets her husband while he is traveling at her own personal expense" and that "she and all Cabinet spouses received a federal ethics briefing."

Still, Lolita Zinke's diverse activities spotlight the sometimes blurry boundaries between public and private spheres that confront family members in every administration. These are perennial issues, now amplified by the social media megaphones that can turn quiet musings into broadcast opinions and by the heightened scrutiny of Cabinet-level ethics (Greenwire, Oct. 12).

On Oct. 5, a frequent Zinke critic called the Western Values Project filed a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit seeking documents concerning Lolita Zinke's participation in Interior meetings, presence on official trips and emails dealing with government business, among other matters.

So far, the lawsuit stated, the department "has failed" to produce any documents or make any determination concerning the FOIA request first filed in June (E&E News PM, Oct. 5).

The Justice Department, representing Interior, has not yet responded to the lawsuit.

Some spousal activity comes with the territory.

The husband of former Interior Secretary Sally Jewell would attend various D.C. events alongside his wife, such as the annual lighting of the White House Christmas tree. Once, he went hiking with her in Maine. The wife of Ken Salazar, Jewell's predecessor, also took part in some events.

"Both spouses were known to Interior staff, but I think it was rare for them to accompany [the secretaries] on official travel," said one former Interior official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

In April, for instance, Lolita Zinke was alongside her husband in Atlanta at an NRA event. She was also with him on a tour the secretary and a group of senators took to Norway, Greenland and Alaska.

Political activity

Outside Interior, Lolita Zinke explicitly entered the political arena in early September, when she was named chairwoman of Republican businessman Troy Downing's Senate campaign. Downing is running for the chance to take on Democratic Sen. Jon Tester, a red-state politician who some thought might someday be challenged by Zinke himself.

Tester voted for Zinke's confirmation, while 31 Senate Democrats opposed him.

"This isn't title only," Lolita Zinke said in a statement last month. "I'm going to be hands-on in this campaign because it's vital for Montana and America that we elect Troy."

Lolita Zinke tweeted this photo in April, writing, "CA's First dog, Calusa Brown. Dogs make people happy, treats make dogs happy." @LolaZinke/Twitter Downing's campaign filings, covering the period through Sept. 30, do not show any payments to Lolita Zinke. One public way in which she's contributed, though, is through her Twitter account, on which she has tweeted or retweeted more than two dozen pro-Downing messages.

Lolita Zinke has 241 Twitter followers, a small fraction of the 57,376 followers who track the official Interior secretary's Twitter account. A number of her Twitter followers are reporters.

She stands out, in some respects. The wife of EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt does not appear to have a Twitter account, while the wife of Energy Secretary Rick Perry last tweeted in 2015.

She's tweeted strictly fun pictures, like one from an August vacation with her husband that she titled "Love on the Bosphorus." She's also tweeted photos that shed some light on how she's by her husband's side at other times, like an April 13 photo of the two in a meeting in Sacramento with California Gov. Jerry Brown (D).

The picture, though, was not the classic political grip-and-grin photo. Instead of Brown, the photo showed the Zinkes and the governor's dog.

"Dogs make people happy," Lolita Zinke wrote. "Treats make dogs happy."

'This knucklehead shows up'

She was born Lolita Hand in Santa Barbara, Calif., and graduated from the University of California, Santa Barbara, before attending California Western School of Law. She met Ryan Zinke in 1990 at McP's Irish Pub and Grill, a bar near Coronado, on a night, he recalled decades later, when she was wearing a colorful skirt and black cowboy boots.

At the time, she was a single mom, raising her daughter Jennifer following the death in a car accident of her first husband. Zinke was serving as an instructor at the Navy's famously grueling Basic Underwater Demolition/SEAL, or BUD/S, training and going through a divorce from his first wife.

They married in August 1992, when Ryan Zinke was still in the upward trajectory of a high-speed Navy career that often sent him far away.

"I spent years missing birthdays, family dinners, tucking my kids in at night, and anniversaries. Lolita was left raising a family alone with the uncertainty of my return," Ryan Zinke wrote in his 2016 memoir, titled "American Commander."

"It takes someone special to be a SEAL; it takes someone even more special to be a SEAL's wife," the book added.

Consider, Zinke recounted, what happens when someone returns home from a special warfare deployment. Instead of secret missions and the silent brotherhood, he finds kids running around, teenagers awkwardly growing up and chores that don't include kicking down doors.

"All of a sudden this knucklehead shows up saying that he's the man of the house, and the wives who have been dealing with the usual family drama say, 'Wait a second! The crown is not yet yours!'" Zinke wrote.

While the couple was living in London, Lolita Zinke worked as a civilian quality control specialist, where she was invited to various functions involving the Navy brass.

"That gave me an edge on the flag deck!" Ryan Zinke later recounted.

According to a Republican National Committee summary, "Lolita later continued her public service" as an undercover "operative with the California Department of Motor Vehicles in San Diego." No further details are provided.

She was a member of Trump's Hispanic and women's outreach efforts during the 2016 presidential campaign, writing a pro-Trump article for the arch-conservative Breitbart News Network. In August, she tweeted a photo of herself with Steve Bannon, the former White House strategist who runs Breitbart, writing "[heart] this man!"

"I'm a republican because I believe in fiscal responsibility, economic growth through cutting regulation, and a strong military," she stated on a Republican National Committee webpage, adding that "my Hispanic values of family first, strong work ethic and a personal, spiritual relationship with God are embodied by the republican values."

She subsequently was a member of the Trump transition team for the Department of Veterans Affairs after the election, and she accompanied her husband to a job interview in Trump Tower that left him uncertain about what position he might be offered.

"I walked out in the hallway and I said, 'Well, Lola, what do you think?'" Zinke subsequently recounted to the Public Lands Council. "She says, 'That meeting went great, but I think he was looking at you for Interior.'"

"I had no idea," Zinke confessed (E&E News PM, March 28).

Marine One touched down on the South Lawn at 8:29 pm under a cloudless sky.

Travel/photo lid called at 8:40.

Shortly after landing, the president emerged from the helicopter with Mrs. Trump and their son Barron, and with Marine One pilot, Maj. Randall White. POTUS waved a few times and shot a thumbs up toward the press pen.

White's family was on hand, excitedly watching the landing amid the press pool. This was his last flight after four years flying Marine One, according to his wife, Lisa. She brought their kids, Clay and Keira. Her husband's parents also were on hand, William and Lynn White. The president called all of them through the ropes. He kissed the pilot's wife, chatted with all of them. The three Trumps posed for photos with the entire White family and then the president called out "Randall, thanks very much."

The Trumps then entered the White House. Moments later, the trio walked the Colonnade into the West Wing and the pool was ushered through the Palm Room doors, so we didn't see if the president went to the Oval Office.

The Pods are gone. Lights were on in the redecorated Oval.

Mrs. Trump was wearing sunglasses throughout. Barron's T-shirt reads: "On your mark tiger shark"

Subject: in-town pool report #3 -- attendees and longer quotes

Here are some additional quotes from Trump's address before signing the space declaration. Below, as provided by the White House, is a list of attendees. Of note: also in attendance, but neither listed nor mentioned, was Buzz Aldrin, the second man to walk on the moon.

Additional Trump quotes: "We are honored to be joined by Apollo astronaut Jack Schmitt. Exactly 45 years ago, almost to the minute, Jack became one of the last Americans to land on the moon. Today we pledge that he will not be the last, and I suspect we'll be finding other places to land in addition to the moon, what do you think Jack? ... The directive I'm signing today will refocus America's space program on human exploration and discovery. It marks an important step in returning American astronauts to the moon for the first time since 1972 for longterm exploration and use. This time we will not only plant our flag and leave our footprint, we will establish a foundation for an eventual mission to Mars and perhaps, someday, to many worlds beyond. This directive will ensure America's space program once again leads and inspires all of humanity."

The following individuals are expected to attend:

Trump Administration:

Secretary of Transportation, Elaine Chao
Secretary of Commerce, Wilbur Ross
Secretary of Homeland Security, Kirstjen Nielsen
Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. H.R. McMaster
Director of National Intelligence, Dan Coats
Acting Administrator of NASA, Robert Lightfoot
Deputy Assistant to the President for Science and Technology, Michael Kratsios
The Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Paul J. Selva
Deputy Secretary Pat Shanahan, Department of the Army

Members of Congress:

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-FL)
Rep. Brian Babin (R-TX)
Rep. Mo Brooks (R-AL)
Rep. John Culberson (R-TX)
Rep. Bill Posey (R-FL)
Rep. Lamar Smith (R-TX)

External Participants:

Former U.S. Sen. Jack Schmitt (R-NM), Apollo 17 Astronaut
Theresa Fitzgibbon, Wife of Jack Schmitt
Peggy Whitson, NASA Astronaut
Christina Koch, NASA Astronaut
Sandy Magnus, Executive Director of the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics
Mary Lynn Ditmar, President and CEO of Coalition for Deep Space Exploration

More detail from meeting with Senate Finance Committee in the Cabinet Room.

Trump was seated at the middle of the table with Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), the chairman of the committee, to his left and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) to his right. Senators and administration officials filled the remaining seats of the large table. Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), the ranking member of the committee, was seated at the end of the table to the president's right.

Trump read from a paper in front of him, saying they were there to discuss their plan to deliver historic tax cuts for American families, businesses, and workers. "It will be the largest tax cut in the history of our country," he said.

Some of the highlights from their framework include doubling the amount of income taxed at the zero bracket; increasing the child tax credit; ending the estate tax; cut the business tax rate from the highest in the developed world of 35% to no more than 20%, Trump said. According to the Council of Economic Advisers, reducing the rate from 35% to 20% will increase average household income by $4,000 a year, he said.

The plan would cut taxes on small businesses to the lowest rate in more than 80 years, Trump said. For the next five years, businesses and manufacturers would be able to expense the full value of new equipment, which would have one of the biggest impacts on the economy, he said.

The plan would encourage companies to bring profits back to the U.S., and most Americans would be able to file their taxes on a single sheet of paper, Trump said. This will be a big simplification, or tax cuts and reform, he said. The U.S. will go from being one of the highest-taxed nations in the world to one of the lowest. This will result in more jobs, higher wages, and more products stamped Made in the USA, he said.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, in my opinion," Trump said. He joked with Sen. Wyden that this is something that should get unanimous support, right? Wyden did not respond but smiled broadly.

A little more on the questions:

On the reports of his conversation with the widow of Army Sgt. La David Johnson:

"I didn't say what that congresswoman said, didn't say it at all, she knows it. And she now is not saying it. I did not say what she said. And I'd like her to make the statement again, because I did not say what she said. I had a very nice conversation with the woman, with the wife, who sounded like a lovely woman. I did not say what the congresswoman said and most people aren't too surprised to hear it [inaudible]"

Q. what is the proof, Mr. President?

"Let her make her statement again, and..."

Q. She is saying that you said this

"Let her make her statement again and then you'll find out."

On the question of the Alexander-Murray health care bill:

“We’ll see the bipartisan, and Lamar Alexander is working on it very hard [inaudible]. And if something can happen that’s fine, but I won’t do anything to enrich the insurance companies, because right now the insurance companies are being enriched--they’ve been enriched by Obamacare like nothing anybody’s ever seen before. I’m not going to do anything to enrich the insurance companies. Thank you.”

Subject: In-town print pool No. 3 POTUS remarks

After returning to the White House from Camp David, POTUS answered several shouted questions from reporters.

Do you believe transition emails were “improperly taken?”

POTUS: “Not looking good. It’s not looking good. It’s quite sad to see that. My people are very upset about it. I can’t imagine there’s anything on ‘em, frankly, because as we said, there’s no collusion. There’s no collusion whatsoever. A lot of lawyers thought that was pretty sad.”

He was asked about U.S.-Cuba relations (question not entirely audible on video)

POTUS: “Hopefully everything will normalize with Cuba, but right now, they are not doing the right thing. And when they don’t do the right thing, we’re not going to do the right thing. That’s all there is to it. We have to be strong with Cuba. The Cuban people are incredible people. They support me very strongly. But we’ll get Cuba straightened out.”

Do you intend to fire special counsel Robert Mueller?

POTUS: “No, I’m not.”

POTUS said he spoke with Cindy McCain, wife of Sen. John McCain.

“I wished her well. I wish John well. They’ve headed back (to Arizona). But I understand he’ll come if we ever needed his vote, which hopefully we won’t. But the word is John will come back if we need his vote. It’s too bad. He’s going through very tough time, there’s no question about it. But he will come back if we need his vote.”

A special note of thanks to the TV poolers as the updated guidance of POTUS arrival went to my junk folder.

Subject: In-town print pool report #3 - photo-op w/ military leaders

Good evening from your substitute pooler. Around 7:10 PM, after a travel/photo lid was called, White House staff hastily assembled the pool to cover a photo spray with military leaders and their spouses before a dinner with POTUS and FLOTUS.

POTUS made no news, but he did offer some cryptic remarks to the press corps.

Pool was led into the State Dining Room at 7:18 PM. A five-piece Marine Corps band positioned in the entrance hall played classical music. It was a piece of music your uncultured pooler did not recognize.

POTUS and FLOTUS stood side-by-side in the middle of more than a dozen couples who were lined up for an official photo. CJCS Dunford and his wife stood to their left. An unidentified military leader and his wife stood to POTUS' right.

"Tell us when you're ready," POTUS told the photographer. "Be careful, don't push."

"Our faces are tired," one of the spouses joked.

A couple of seconds later, POTUS pointed around the room and asked members of the pool, "you guys know what this represents?"

"Tell us," one reporter responded.

"Maybe it's the calm before the storm," POTUS replied.

"What's the storm?" another reporter asked. "On Iran? On ISIS? On what?"

"We have the world's great military people," POTUS replied. "Thank you all for coming."

Kristen Welker of NBC News asked, "what storm Mr. President?"

"You'll find out," POTUS replied.

"Give us a hint on your Iran decision," another reporter asked.

POTUS said "thank you, everybody" and pool was ushered out of the room.

The entire spray lasted about a minute.

We now have a travel/photo lid, again.

Secretary Zinke Names Steve Wackowski as Senior Advisor for Alaska Affairs

(ANCHORAGE) Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced that Steve Wackowski will serve as his Senior Advisor for Alaska Affairs based out of Anchorage. Zinke made the announcement in Anchorage as part of his current tour of Alaska.

“A lifelong Alaskan and Air Force Major, Steve is perfectly qualified to advise me on Alaskan issues,” said Secretary Zinke. “Like 10 percent of Alaskans, Steve served in the military, and he then continued his service as a civilian working for elected officials. His broad range of experience will prove to be invaluable as the Department focuses on future energy opportunities in Alaska, the welfare of Alaska Natives, and the vast expanses of lands and waters under Interior’s management.”

"It's an incredible honor to be asked to serve on Secretary Zinke's staff. I look forward to working with our state, local, and First Alaskan partners to help unlock Alaska's potential," said Wackowski.

Wachowski grew up in Anchorage and spent his summers working in Ninilchik for his family’s halibut and salmon sport-fishing business. After graduating from Bartlett High School in Anchorage, he played division I-AA football at Saint Mary’s College, where he earned a degree in Computer Science and a commission in the Air Force Reserve from UC-Berkeley’s Air Force ROTC program .

He is currently a Major in the Reserve and drills at Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson at the 611th Air Operations Center. He has served on several active duty tours throughout his reserve career including contingency deployments to Afghanistan, Haiti, and Iraq.

After his last active duty tour Steve moved home to Alaska to work as the remote sensing operations manager for Fairweather Science, LLC in Anchorage. Steve’s work detecting and mapping maternal polar bear dens for oil and gas companies on Alaska’s North Slope was nationally recognized and helped earn him the Alaska Journal of Commerce’s “Top 40 under 40” Award in 2015.

His public policy background includes serving as a Professional Staff member on the US Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and as the late Senator Ted Stevens’ last serving Press Secretary. He most recently managed U.S. Senate Energy Committee Chairman Lisa Murkowski’s reelection campaign.

Steve is avid hunter and fisherman who says he continually gets out-fished by his wife Lindsay. They enjoy spending time in the Alaska outdoors with their two-year-old son, Lucas, and their red fox lab, Cali.

In a building for private aircraft of the president at Dallas Love, several dozen supporters of the president filed through security and waited for about 20 minutes before being escorted to the landing area.

The supporters were huddled behind a short metal fence. Media were staged at a flatbed trailer nearby to await the arrival of Air Force One.

A secret service agent went over the protocol for greeting the president. One rule audible to the press pool: "Keep your hands out of your pocket" once the presidential party begins exiting the aircraft.

The president descended Air Force One at 3:24 p.m. to the chants of "Trump, Trump, Trump" and "We love you Trump."

Texas Gov. Greg Abbott greeted the president at the base of the stairs to the jet.

He chatted with the supporters. Many of them took smart phone photos and the president appeared to pose for selfies with some of them.

He also waved a hand-painted sign given to him by children that carried the message, "We played hooky to high five our president."

Inside before the president arrived, Elisa Smith, who called herself "a proud Marine wife," said she kept her kids, 8-year-old Akhyla and Brielle, 6, just for the experience.

"It's great for the girls to have an opportunity to meet the president," she said.

Alaska Dispatch News | Trump's interior secretary vows to reinvigorate Alaska oil industry

Author: Nathaniel Herz

<https://www.adn.com/politics/2017/05/31/new-interior-secretary-pledges-fewer-roadblocks-for-alaska-oil-development/>

President Donald Trump's interior secretary, Ryan Zinke, drew cheers from some industrial-minded Alaskans on Wednesday when he pledged to pave the way for new development on the North Slope and reinvigorate the state's oil industry.

"The only path for energy dominance is a path through the great state of Alaska," Zinke told the audience at an Anchorage conference hosted by the state's major oil industry group, the Alaska Oil and Gas Association.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke takes questions Tuesday in Anchorage. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, Sen. Dan Sullivan and Rep. Don Young listen at right. (Marc Lester / Alaska Dispatch News)

"The president has declared — and thank you Donald J. Trump — that the war on North American energy is now over," Zinke added, equating "energy" and oil.

Flanked by politicians and hard-hat-wearing union members, Zinke signed a secretarial order at the end of his speech aimed at boosting production in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska and at updating estimates of the amount of oil beneath the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Alaska politicians welcomed the move, calling it a reversal of Obama-era policies of the past eight years that Republican U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski described as an effort to "close it all off."

"Now, finally, we have an administration that will listen to us — that will work with us to ensure that we can safely produce our resources," Murkowski said.

But some industry players interviewed at the conference were more tempered in their reaction, saying the federal government is limited in the amount of power it can exert over global market forces that have crashed the price of oil, caused thousands of job losses in Alaska and blown a massive hole in the state's budget.

"The market determines what we can pull the trigger on," said Dave Norton, an engineer and co-owner of Anchorage-based Hawk Consultants, which manages oil and gas projects. "Fracking in Texas is so cheap to do, why would anybody want to come up here?"

Zinke is a retired U.S. Navy SEAL who said Wednesday that he had spent time on the Aleutian islands of Adak and Shemya. His wife also has Alaska credentials, having once worked at the Lucky Wishbone restaurant, though Zinke did slip up once Wednesday, referring to the North Slope as the "North Shore."

His pledge to make the oil industry great again, at the Dena'ina Civic and Convention Center downtown at the tail end of a nearly weeklong trip through the state, was his first major public address in Alaska. It came before an enthusiastic audience of state and federal lawmakers, staffers and oil industry executives who had often clashed with the Obama administration and its efforts to fight global warming by limiting the production of Earth-warming greenhouse gases — the byproducts of fossil fuels.

"Our economy's an oil economy," said Anchorage Republican state Rep. Chris Birch, who said the conference was like "going to church on Sunday."

"You get up, you get out kind of refreshed," he said.

Zinke's pledge to revitalize the state's oil industry came as Trump prepared to announce Thursday whether he would abandon the landmark Paris climate deal reached in 2015 under Obama — with initial reports claiming he would.

The Paris agreement calls for the United States to make about one-fifth of the globe's emissions reductions through 2030.

Obama used Alaska as a backdrop for his push for the climate deal, describing global warming as a looming crisis for the state and the world in his own speech in Anchorage in 2015 and declaring that "any so-called leader who does not take this issue seriously or treats it like a joke is not fit to lead."

Zinke didn't mention global warming in his speech. He told reporters at a news conference afterward that he thinks the climate is changing. But he said he hadn't read the Paris agreement and argued that there's a lot about climate change that's not understood.

"What can we do about it? What is the influence? That is unsettled," he said, contradicting the latest U.N. scientific report that said it's "extremely likely" that human influence has been the dominant cause of warming in the past half-century.

About 20 people protested Zinke's appearance both inside and outside the convention center, with one, Rachel Cella, 40, saying that she wanted to hear more plans to help move the state's economy away from oil.

"Obviously we're not going to just shutter the oil fields," she said while holding a handmade sign that said "there are no jobs on a dead planet." She added: "We need to acknowledge what's happening and acknowledge that we can't bury our heads in the sand anymore and think that the oil industry is coming back in Alaska. They're not accepting change and the reality that this is a shifting planet."

Zinke argued that boosting Alaska energy production would create economic opportunities, and he pointed out that he didn't hear any objections to development at a Tuesday round-table meeting with Alaska Native leaders.

Zinke's new order gives his agency three weeks to create a new schedule for review and revision of an Obama-era plan for the Indiana-sized petroleum reserve, on the North Slope. It also directs his agency to create a plan within three weeks for "updating current assessments of the undiscovered, technically recoverable oil and natural gas resources" on the North Slope, with a focus on the petroleum reserve and the coastal plain of the wildlife refuge.

The Obama administration plan for the petroleum reserve, finished in 2013, made about half of the area unavailable for leasing, in a move that could preclude development of as many as 350 million barrels of oil, according to the order.

While Zinke and Alaska politicians described the Obama administration as hostile to oil development on the North Slope, one former top Interior Department official, David Hayes, said that the existing plan for the petroleum reserve was in part shaped by oil industry interest — or lack of it.

"They turned back many of their leases. So the notion that the Obama administration stood in the way of developing responsible oil and gas on the east side of the NPR-A is belied by the facts," said Hayes, a former deputy interior secretary under Obama who's now a lecturer at Stanford Law School. "The economics are challenging up there for companies. It's much cheaper to get shale oil in North Dakota than it is on the North Slope. It's that simple."

But since the 2013 adoption of the plan, oil industry interest in the petroleum reserve and nearby state land has surged following recent announcements of major discoveries by companies like Repsol, Armstrong and ConocoPhillips. And officials with Gov. Bill Walker's administration now describe the area as red-hot.

"Suddenly, now, we have a body of information that suggests geologically, and based on well results and seismic (testing), that wait a minute, we've been missing something," said Andy Mack, the natural resources commissioner. "Now there are these huge, economic discoveries and it's pretty prolific. It's exciting for Alaska."

Trump touches down in SLC

Air Force One arrived at 10:52 am Mountain Time at the Utah Air National Guard base adjacent to the SLC International Airport.

POTUS alighted a few moments later, followed by Sens. Orrin Hatch and Mike Lee and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, sporting a cowboy hat.

They were greeted at the bottom of the steps by Gov. Gary Herbert and First Lady Jeanette Hebert as well as House Speaker Greg Hughes and his wife, Krista.

The president worked the rope line where he found one kid dressed as a mini-Trump and another as mini-Mike Pence.

POTUS didn't answer shouted questions by the pool about his backing of Roy Moore in Alabama and Hatch didn't respond to a question of whether he's going to run again.

Motorcade is on the move now to Welfare Square.

'You're Fired' may be harder than Trump thinks when it comes to federal workers

Anxious to remake the federal government, the Trump administration is cracking down on employees who break the rules, taking action in some instances in disciplinary cases that had languished under former president Barack Obama.

The White House in April instructed agencies to “remove poor performers” as they construct plans to shrink the workforce as part of a federal downsizing. Trump vowed during the campaign to shake up a government awash in “waste, fraud and abuse” — and the new administration has been vocal about its strategy.

Budget director Mick Mulvaney laid out detailed mandates to ensure that poor conduct be handled swiftly and poor performers monitored closely or given “appropriate discipline.”

After years criticizing the Obama administration for going easy on cases involving problem employees, Republicans are taking a hard line against misconduct at several troubled agencies.

[\[Trump's hard-line plan for government workers\]](#)

President Trump promised to shake up the federal workforce if elected. Six months into his presidency, workers see a changing landscape – but while some like it, others don't. (Video: Peter Stevenson/Photo: Calla Kessler/The Washington Post)

Veterans Affairs, still recovering from criticism in 2014 that employee misconduct led to manipulated patient waiting lists at its medical centers, in July began publishing disciplinary actions online, including 525 firings since Trump took office. With 350,000 employees, VA in June became the model for a broader job protections shake-up sought by conservatives when Trump signed a bill creating a quick path for VA Secretary David Shulkin to fire employees who fail to meet conduct or performance standards.

At Homeland Security, the inspector general is conducting an agencywide review of misconduct actions. Employees were asked in a July survey whether the sprawling department created after the 9/11 attacks has “sufficient processes and procedures to address conduct issues.”

Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross is asking career officials at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to explain how they have handled improper time and attendance reporting, an agency official familiar with the inquiry said. Investigators and congressional Republicans say the problems related to time and attendance tracking have gone unaddressed for years.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has vowed zero tolerance for sexual harassers. This month the Yellowstone National Park superintendent went public with disciplinary actions he is taking against a dozen employees involved in a harassment case.

But in its efforts to fulfill the president’s campaign promise to “drain the swamp” of entrenched federal workers, the new political leadership in Washington is meeting resistance from powerful federal employee unions and finding that maneuvering around long-guaranteed civil service protections is not easy.

This month an administrative board ordered a stay of the firing of the former director of the VA Medical Center in Washington, who had been removed from his post to an administrative job in April. An inspector general's probe found that patient health was endangered by managerial dysfunction.

 Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) makes his way to a meeting with other members of the House Freedom Caucus on Capitol Hill. (Ricky Carioti/The Washington Post)

Brian Hawkins was fired for a "failure to provide effective leadership," VA officials said. He claimed wrongful termination and is back at work while his case is independently reviewed. In a test of the new law, which offers fewer protections for employees, Shulkin plans to remove Hawkins again based on another inspector general's investigation, VA officials said. That inquiry found that he violated agency rules by sharing sensitive information about employees with his wife on their personal email accounts. Hawkins did not respond to a request for comment.

Even cases that Trump officials inherited from the Obama administration have been challenging. The Census Bureau took over litigation that sprang from an inspector general's findings two years ago that employees in its hiring office gamed the system to improperly collect $1.1 million in salaries. It is still unresolved, an agency spokesman said.

After a three-year investigation, the office has moved recently to fire or suspend 18 of about two dozen employees in a clerical support unit that docket trademark applications, according to current and former agency staff and other government officials familiar with the case. One worker has been fired.

[\[Patent office filters out worst telework abuses in report to watchdog\]](#)

Agency officials conducted an internal inquiry whose findings were shared with The Washington Post, showing that the employees improperly charged the government hundreds of thousands of dollars over several years. In the most egregious cases, officials found that some employees worked two hours a day but billed taxpayers for eight, plus two more overtime hours.

A union official denied any impropriety, saying his members "were available to work" but often finished their tasks quickly and awaited more assignments, a practice that went on for as long as a decade.

"My employees are not in the wrong," said Harold Ross, president of Local 243 of the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents the unit. “They produce fast. They’re available for the whole time. All of a sudden, management wants to come against them.”

Patent office spokesman Paul Rosenthal said in an email the agency does not comment on specific personnel cases.

“More broadly, the USPTO has always taken its time and attendance policies seriously,” he wrote. “Employees must accurately record their time worked. And the overwhelming majority of our employees do just that. But employees who falsify their work records or work hours . . . will continue to be held accountable.”

In another sign of the Trump administration’s efforts to more forcefully address employee misconduct, Rosenthal cited an agreement — signed by the union representing patent examiners — to allow supervisors to monitor staff work habits with tracking software that indicates whether employees are at their computers. Labor had resisted these changes, which the union signed the day before Trump took office.

Timecard abuse has been documented over several years in reports by the inspector general at the Commerce Department, the patent office’s parent agency. The office has been praised for its flexible work hours and telework policies.

The Post reported in 2014 that an internal investigation found patent examiners repeatedly misrepresented their hours and received unsubstantiated overtime pay and bonuses. Top agency officials removed the most damaging revelations from material turned over to the inspector general, documents provided to The Post showed. Commerce officials said the material was in draft form.

At the time, Obama officials pledged to hold employees accountable. But critics said few patent examiners were punished or paid restitution.

Commerce’s then-acting inspector general, Dave Smith, opened an investigation into the trademark employees, according to government sources. But top patent officials prevailed after asking that they be allowed to conduct their own inquiry.

Last fall, Smith released a computer analysis showing discrepancies between the time claimed by patent examiners and hours worked. But privacy laws prevented the agency from acting against 415 employees identified as the worst offenders. Under a new law, management is allowed to pursue administrative or criminal enforcement in such cases. It is unclear if the patent office plans to act.

Republicans’ frustration with patent officials and the unions boiled over at a House hearing in December after Trump’s election. Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee's panel on government operations, dressed down the agency's No. 2 Obama appointee, Russell Slifer, and the head of the patent examiners' union for tolerating abuses.

The agency had long suspected timecard abuses in the trademark division, where jobs have been outpaced by automation. But managers could not document it until 2013, when they installed tracking software.

"We had never seen anything like it," recalled Bill House, who retired in 2015 from the employee relations office, which investigates misconduct. The number of cases, the money allegedly bilked and the hours the employees spent not working "was so bad they pulled other [employee relations] specialists to work on it," House recalled.

The treasury employees union is fighting the proposed discipline, said union and management officials who requested anonymity to discuss the subject. An arbitrator is scheduled in October to hear the first case, of the sole employee who has been fired.

Tim Hannapel, the NTEU's national counsel, said the tracking software detects only part of the work employees are asked to do — tasks that include emails, phone calls, and monitoring rules and regulations.

"It's substantive stuff, but there isn't a code that tracks this work," he said.

The union has turned down management's offers to allow employees to resign with clean records if they reimburse taxpayers for unearned compensation, according to union officials and others familiar with the discussions. The employees, who are paid $59,693 annually on average, remain on the payroll.

The NTEU also is alleging disparate racial treatment because almost all of the employees are black. The union says relatively few higher-paid white patent examiners have been disciplined for similar misconduct claims.

The story must be told.

Your subscription supports journalism that matters

Try 1 month for 99¢

The agency did not comment on the settlement negotiations or the discrimination claim.

"They turned a blind eye to the other employees," Ross, the local union president, said of patent examiners.

Slifer, now an intellectual-property attorney in Boise, Idaho, said that when he and the unions worked together to respond to Congress's accountability requests, it was clear that the relationship with the Trump administration would be different.

"The recognition that having a GOP majority in Congress and in the White House certainly put the unions on notice that they don't necessarily enjoy the same support from Republicans as they have from Democrats," he said.

He said employee accountability is more complicated than saying "if someone isn't putting in their 80 hours [every two weeks] they need to be canned. It is important that you provide all employees due process and make sure they understand their responsibilities."

Senate advances Bernhardt for deputy

Kellie Lunney, E&E News reporter
Published: Thursday, July 20, 2017

The Senate this afternoon advanced the nomination of David Bernhardt for Interior Department deputy secretary, teeing up the final confirmation vote expected Monday.

Senators voted 56-39 to invoke cloture on the nomination. All Republicans present, six Democrats and one independent voted in favor.

Democrats Martin Heinrich of New Mexico, Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota, Joe Manchin of West Virginia, Joe Donnelly of Indiana, Brian Schatz of Hawaii and Michael Bennet of Colorado voted with Republicans, as did independent Angus King of Maine.

Senators not voting were: Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), Ben Sasse (R-Neb.) and Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.). Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), recovering from surgery and recently diagnosed with brain cancer, was absent.

David Bernhardt. Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee

Bernhardt's nomination has attracted strong support because of his extensive public policy experience in the executive and legislative branches, but also robust opposition from Democrats and green groups alarmed by his ties to oil and gas lobbyists.

The Campaign for Accountability today filed a complaint with the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia to investigate whether Bernhardt violated the Lobbying Disclosure Act by continuing to lobby despite formally withdrawing his registration in 2016.

Emails obtained through the California Public Records Act show Bernhardt continued to advise the Westlands Water District, a California agricultural organization, after terminating his lobbying registration (Greenwire, July 18).

Bernhardt was registered as a Westlands lobbyist between June 2011 and Nov. 18, 2016, when he was a member of the Trump administration's Interior Department transition team and potential nominee. The president formally picked him in April.

Bernhardt, who had served as chairman of the natural resources department at the law firm Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck LLP, previously promised lawmakers that if confirmed, he would "not participate personally or substantially in any particular matter involving" his former clients or "specific parties in which I know the firm is a party or represents a party" for two years, unless he receives authorization to do so.

Administration aides have said they thoroughly vetted Bernhardt on ethics. They and other defenders, including Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.), call him an experienced nominee.

In addition to his lobbying career, the Coloradan has worked as a Capitol Hill aide and served as an Interior official during the George W. Bush administration.

Bernhardt has taken heat over allegations of mismanagement at Interior during his tenure there, including a drug and sex scandal at the former Minerals Management Service and political interference in endangered species decisions.

'Disqualifying'

Energy and Natural Resources Committee ranking member Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) has led the opposition to Bernhardt and spoke on the floor before today's vote.

Cantwell said that while it's true Bernhardt has "considerable" experience to do the job, the revolving-door nature of his career continues to concern her and raises a serious appearance of conflict-of-interest issues.

By putting forward Bernhardt as Interior's No. 2, President Trump is not helping to drain the swamp, "he's helping to fill it," Cantwell said.

The League of Conservation Voters also reiterated its opposition to Bernhardt today after sending a letter last month to the full Senate urging it to reject the nomination.

"Bernhardt's long list of conflicts of interest alone should be disqualifying — but given the Trump administration's incredible disregard for integrity, science and facts, it's no surprise that a top nominee would have a record of altering government science for political gain and overseeing an office plagued by scandal," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, LCV's senior vice president for government affairs.

Sittenfeld added: "We strongly urge senators to oppose Bernhardt's nomination and will continue to hold Congress and the administration accountable for putting polluter profits ahead of our clean air, clean water, public lands and families' health."

Gardner on the floor today praised Bernhardt's experience and commitment to public service, noting that other nominees considered by the Energy and Natural Resources panel have toggled between government and the private sector.

"What we see is another nominee, dedicated public servant, who gained experience in the private sector and is willing to come back to public service to give back to our great country," said Gardner, who noted that Bernhardt worked with his wife, Jaime, at Interior during the Bush administration. "Mr. Bernhardt's integrity and ability are two of his strongest qualities for his nomination."

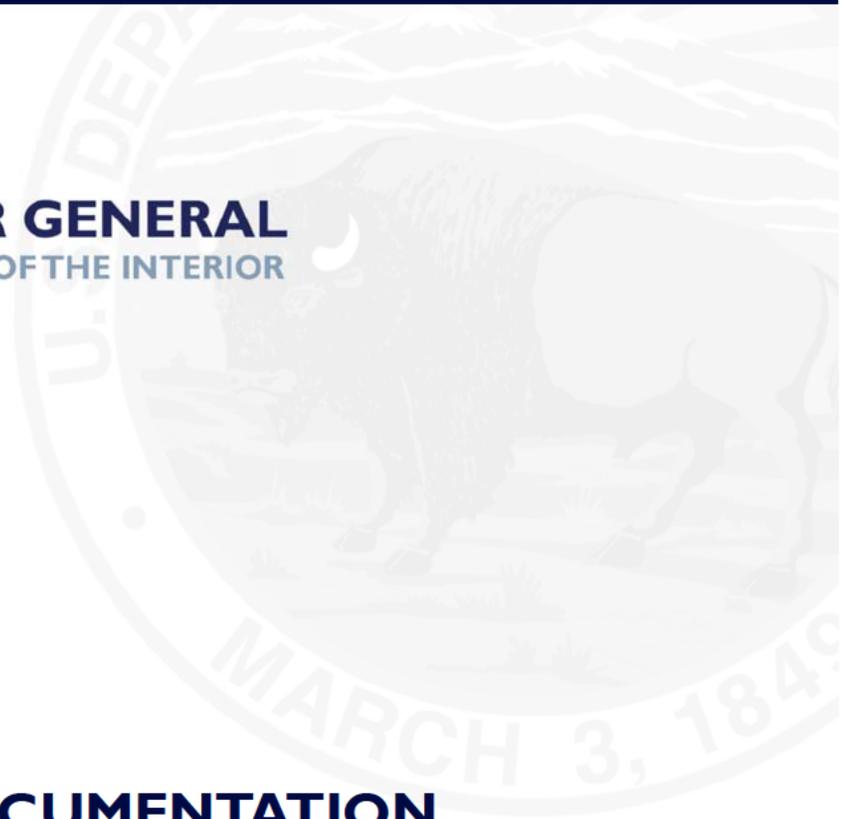

Several stakeholders have voiced their support for Bernhardt as well, including the Colorado River District, Colorado Water Congress, Southern Ute Indian Tribe, Outdoor Recreation Industry Roundtable and Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership.

Yesterday, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) talked with reporters about the lack of confirmed appointees in place at Interior — and how it's making Secretary Ryan Zinke's life "miserable."

"There are a whole lot of problems that could be solved if Bernhardt was here now," the chairman said. "The Senate waiting as long as it has is wrong, it's simply wrong."

Memorandum

NOV 15 2017

To: David W. Bernhardt
Deputy Secretary

From: Mary L. Kendall
Deputy Inspector General

Subject: Management Advisory – Incomplete Documentation Identified During Case No. OI-PI-17-1040-I

The Office of Inspector General (OIG) is currently investigating multiple allegations regarding Secretary Ryan Zinke's travel. During our work, we discovered several issues that need prompt attention and changes to current IOS procedures.

Our investigation has been delayed by absent, or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips and a review process that failed to include proper documentation and accountability. Although we have received full cooperation from all employees contacted, we have found the documentation and adherence to Departmental travel policies deficient and without proper management oversight and accountability. Many authorizations and vouchers required for Secretary Zinke's fiscal year (FY) 2017 travel have yet to be completed and processed. In addition, we learned that the Office of the Solicitor (SOL) and Department Ethics officials have established a process to review and approve Secretarial travel, but the process does not include sufficient documentation of the legal and ethical analysis conducted to distinguish between personal, political, and official travel, or consistent cost analysis to justify use of non-commercial travel. Finally, based on the documents we have received to date, we have not been able to determine the full extent to which Lolita Zinke, the Secretary's wife, accompanied the Secretary on official travel.

While we have received some requested documentation, we seek your assistance in obtaining additional information necessary for us to complete a thorough and timely investigation of Secretary Zinke's travel. We request that the following be provided to our office no later than December 11, 2017:

- Complete documentation for all FY17 Secretarial travel (authorizations, vouchers, reimbursements).
- Complete documentation for all FY17 travel for the Secretary's wife when she accompanied him on official travel. This documentation should describe all instances when Mrs. Zinke traveled in a government-owned vehicle, watercraft, or aircraft, and whether payment on her behalf was paid in advance, determined to be reimbursable, or no reimbursement required.

In addition, we make the following recommendations for IOS to address:

1. Develop and implement procedures (with appropriate performance management measures) to complete the timely processing of future Secretarial travel documents in accordance with government travel regulations and Department policy.
2. Develop and implement procedures to ensure consistent documentation of the SOL's legal and ethical analysis of the Secretary's future travel, to include the review, analysis, and approval of:
 - Use of non-commercial transportation;
 - Personal and political travel, and need for reimbursement;
 - Accompanied spousal or family travel.

Please provide a written response detailing the actions you will be taking to address our recommendations. You may either email your response to Matthew_Elliott@doioig.gov, or send to:

Subject: MEDIA REQUEST – Sec. Zinke's trip to Channel Islands National Park
Date: Friday, December 29, 2017 4:30:02 PM

Happy holidays Interior folks,

Hoping to speak with someone about Sec. Ryan Zinke's trip in April to Channel Islands National Park. Emails show that Zinke's guest list included, among others, his wife; his wife's aunt; Nita Vail, a political supporter; commercial fishermen Jason Robinson and Jeff Maassen; and Jon Jorgeson, an area yacht broker.

It is my understanding that one of the fishermen, Mr. Robinson, was fined in 2009 for illegally fishing in the reserve and that a judge tossed out the charges years later. The emails also show that several guests, including Robinson, Jorgeson and Maasen, were identified by Zinke as technical experts.

A few questions...

Exactly what technical expertise did these guests provide?

Which of Zinke's guests paid their own way and were issued a bill of collections? And who had their travel costs covered by government funds?

How much did Interior spend to bring along these technical experts?

Thanks and Happy New Year!

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by Chevron: Concerns mount over mysterious Whitefish Energy contract — Nominees get votes today in EPW — Murkowski's winning streak rolls on Date: Wednesday, October 25, 2017 5:43:16 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 10/25/2017 05:41 AM EDT

With help from Emily Holden, Esther Whieldon and Alex Guillén

QUESTIONS MOUNT OVER WHITEFISH CONTRACT: Lawmakers from both parties expressed concern Tuesday over the $300 million contract offered to the little-known company Whitefish Energy from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's hometown for electric grid recovery work in Puerto Rico and vowed to pursue additional information about it. "I obviously want to find out more about it because this is quite a substantial contract and one that is really important for the people of Puerto Rico right now," Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski told reporters. She wasn't sure if her committee would tackle the matter, but she plans to hold a hearing on the broader Puerto Rican recovery "within the next week or so."

Bishop has concerns: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop told reporters he wants more information on how many bids there were, the criteria for selection and who made the final call on Whitefish. "We have questions about it, but we need more information," he said. "I'm not reading anything into it because I'd probably be wrong, but there are questions."

Democrats, too: Top Natural Resources Democrat Raul Grijalva and Senate Energy ranking member Maria Cantwell both called for further probes into the contract. "Today I am calling on the Government Accountability Office to investigate the circumstances surrounding the multi-million dollar contract awarded to Whitefish Energy— a brand new company with two employees," Cantwell said in a statement. The Puerto Rican government tweeted Tuesday it would audit the contract. Wasting no time, American Oversight filed a FOIA seeking any information from Interior about Zinke's connection to the deal (the agency has denied he had any role in it).

Vote of full confidence: Even amid the controversy over the Whitefish contract, POLITICO's report of Zinke's close connections to so-called scam PACs and the secretary's travel habits, Bishop said he isn't worried about Zinke's performance. "I see nothing right now that would say he is not doing a credible performance at his job," he said. "I think he's justified in how he's traveled. We asked the questions in comparison to what happened in the past. I think he'll weather that fairly well."

Headed to Puerto Rico: Bishop said he'll visit Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands later this week to view recovery efforts first hand. "I want to make sure that we are structurally there to make sure that what assistance is given can get to the people directly on the immediate humanitarian needs," he said. "That's what I'd like to see." The Utah Republican said he'll hold hearings when he returns, hopefully in coordination with the Senate so officials can make just one trip to Washington.

Oh and in case anyone was wondering: Bishop wholeheartedly endorsed using the emerging tax reform process to explore opening up ANWR to potential drilling. "Hell yes. Give me a rational person that doesn't want to drill in ANWR," he said.

And ICYMI, your ME host and Pro's Nick Juliano looked at Zinke's separate briefings to House Natural Resources Democrats and Republicans, which Democrats described as "weird."

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NEI's Robert Powers was first to pick Delaware as the state with the fewest counties (it has three). ME acknowledges the question could have been worded more precisely as neither Alaska nor Louisiana has counties. That said, for today: With Delaware Rep. Lisa Blunt Rochester assuming office this year, just two states have never elected a woman to Congress. Which ones? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

BIG DAY FOR TRUMP NOMINEES: One week and a mega-RFS fight later, Senate EPW gavels in today at 10 a.m. to consider a big group of Trump nominees. Most controversial are two EPA selections: Michael Dourson's bid to run the chemicals office and William Wehrum's selection to run the air office. Also on tap are David Ross's selection to run the water office, Matthew Leopold's selection to be general counsel and Paul Trombino's bid to run the Federal Highway Administration. Lawmakers will also consider Jeffery Baran's renomination to the NRC, which Chairman John Barrasso seemed decidedly cool toward during a confirmation hearing last month. After the votes, the committee will consider a discussion draft of wildfire management legislation.

Word of caution: These selections may have to wait a while for floor votes after clearing committee. There's a significant backlog and Democrats have already hinted they'll make some of the most controversial selections — think Dourson and Wehrum — jump through procedural hurdles before confirmation. Remember the committee Democrats demanded information on Dourson's advisory role at EPA on Tuesday.

MURKOWSKI'S MAJOR WINNING STREAK: Less than three months after they reportedly threatened her policy priorities over her refusal to back Obamacare repeal, the Trump administration is seemingly giving Murkowski everything she could want, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. Interior is moving ahead with efforts to help reverse the long decline in Alaska's energy production, mulling new drilling permits off the Alaskan coast, taking the first steps toward opening ANWR to oil exploration and edging toward building a road through the federally protected Izembek wilderness, among other longtime Murkowski priorities now within reach. "She holds the purse strings and occupies key positions on committees for the Interior department, so it's a smart move to keep her happy," said Kate Kelly, a former senior adviser to former Interior secretary Sally Jewell.

Murkowski said the administration isn't trying to sway her: "I think in fairness the administration is working on issues that are important and they care about. And these are matters that we've been talking about with them since they came into office, so this is about priorities that they have laid down, and we agree."

NO MORE CARROT, TIME FOR STICK: House Oversight ranking member Elijah Cummings asked Chairman Trey Gowdy in a Tuesday letter to subpoena Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder for documents related to the Flint water crisis, in particular when he learned about cases involving Legionnaire's disease. "Governor Snyder has been obstructing our investigation for months, and it is now clear that the only way he will turn over the documents we asked for is if he is compelled to do so," Cummings wrote. If Gowdy doesn't want to issue the subpoena himself, Cummings asked the committee to vote on one at its next meeting.

WHAT'S HAPPENING ON THE HOUSE FLOOR? Lawmakers today take up legislation H.R. 469 \(115\) that would limit the ability of the government to enter into so-called "sue and settle" agreements by requiring settlements to be posted online and opened to additional intervenors. The U.S. Chamber issued a "key vote" letter ahead of the vote. It comes after the chamber cleared legislation H.R. 732 \(115\) on Tuesday that would restrict the government's ability to enter into settlement agreements that fund third-party activities by a vote of 238 to 183.

DISASTER AID CLEARED: The Senate sent a second installment of disaster relief funding to Trump's desk Tuesday, signing off on $36.5 billion to respond to wildfires and hurricanes, including $16 billion to pay off some of the national flood insurance program's debt so that it can make good on claims. It follows $15.3 billion that Congress approved in September. The money comes with no changes to the troubled flood insurance program and with no new restrictions on how communities rebuild as they face rising risks from extreme weather exacerbated by climate change. Trump administration disaster response officials have said they don't want to finance risky projects and will consider new flood standards, according to the Washington Post, although they've yet to unveil them.

CAN WE TALK? Members of the Sustainable Energy and Environment Coalition sent a letter to House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady requesting a meeting to discuss potential sustainable energy and environmental policies for inclusion in the emerging tax reform package.

BERNHARDT TO SPEAK AT HEARTLAND-SPONSORED CONFERENCE: The number two official at Interior, David Bernhardt, plans to deliver the keynote closing address at the Heartland Institute's American First Energy Conference in Houston next month, the organization announced Tuesday.

CUOMO'S ENERGY CZAR BASHES PERRY'S PITCH: Richard Kauffman, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo's top energy adviser, warned that Energy Secretary Rick Perry's push to bolster coal and nuclear power plants might force the state to keep its two remaining coal plants open and hamper its ability to hit its ambitious climate goals, POLITICO New York's Marie J. French reports.

FUNNY COINCIDENCE! Boy, Iowa Gov. Kim Reynolds sure has gleaned a ton of face time with the Trump administration lately. She met with Pruitt on Tuesday, one week after the administrator sent a letter outlining a number of victories for the Midwest on the Renewable Fuel standard. Pruitt then tweeted a picture from a roundtable session with the National Association of Home Builders clearly showing his still-unconfirmed enforcement chief Susan Bodine pictured right to his left.

CARBON TAX MEETS BUDGET: Connecticut Democrat Rep. John Larson plans to introduce a carbon tax amendment when the Ways and Means Committee begins debating tax reform, he told E&E News. Larson acknowledged the measure will likely go nowhere in the Republican-controlled Congress, but argued it could help pay for an expensive infrastructure package President Donald Trump wants to pass. Larson's office expects a markup on the Republican tax plan the week after lawmakers finalize a federal budget.

COMMERCE MARINE MONUMENT REPORT DUE TODAY: Today is Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross's deadline to send the White House his recommendations on 11 national marine monuments and sanctuaries created or expanded by presidents George W. Bush and Barack Obama. But don't expect to see the report anytime soon as Commerce is expected to take a page from Zinke's playbook and send the document over without releasing it. Trump directed Ross to analyze the costs of maintaining the massive monuments and sanctuaries located in the Great Lakes and far offshore of California, New England states, Hawaii and Pacific remote islands — and to estimate any lost energy development opportunities. Zinke's leaked report to the White House earlier this year recommended opening up three of the monuments to commercial fishing.

GREENS ASK COURT TO RESTORE HIGHER CAFE PENALTIES: Five states and several environmental groups separately asked a federal court in New York on Tuesday to restore higher civil penalties for CAFE violators, with the green groups calling the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's delay of the higher penalties "without statutory authority and in blatant disregard of the Administrative Procedure Act." Both coalitions asked the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals for fast action so as not to "reward" NHTSA for an illegal action. "Automakers are deciding, now, whether to comply with fuel-economy standards based on the applicable penalty: delaying the long-overdue penalty increase will thus lead to less efficient vehicles and greater emissions of harmful air pollutants," they wrote. "Meanwhile, the only countervailing purpose for the delay is to make it easier for automakers to evade the standards." The rule boosted the fines, which had not been indexed to inflation, from $5.50 per tenth of a mile per gallon to $14 starting with model year 2019 vehicles.

MORE SAGE GROUSE MEETINGS ANNOUNCED: BLM announced more regional public meetings on the changes it could make to its plans for protecting greater sage grouse habitat in Western states. The BLM Montana/Dakotas office will hold a meeting on Nov. 8 and BLM's Wyoming office will host sessions on Nov. 6 and 8. The agency has already announced meetings in Colorado, California and Oregon. The agency created the plans in 2015 under an agreement with states in lieu of listing the bird as either endangered or threatened under the Endangered Species Act but re-opened them at Zinke's bidding.

REPORT: GETTING HOTTER IN HERE: Nearly 210 million Americans live in counties where they face health threats from extreme summer heat events, according to an NRDC analysis. Huge cities, including New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Boston, may experience six times as many dangerously hot summer days by 2100 as they did between 1975 and 2000 on average.

Zinke funneled millions to questionable PACs Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Nick Juliano | 10/24/2017 05:04 AM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has directed millions of dollars in political contributions since 2014 to a network of Washington operatives that prominent conservatives have accused of profiting by misleading donors.

Beneficiaries of Zinke's largesse include groups linked to Washington-area political operative Scott B. Mackenzie, organizer of a Virgin Islands GOP political action committee that hosted the secretary at a St. Croix fundraiser in March. Before that, when Zinke was a Republican congressman from Montana, his political operation steered significant portions of its spending to a handful of Washington, D.C.-area consulting firms that also have had ties to Mackenzie and his associates.

Zinke has continued this relationship even as other Republicans have recoiled from dealing with Mackenzie, whose critics say he operates "scam PACs" that raise small-dollar donations from conservative voters but then spend the bulk of the money on consultants and overhead. The critics include former Virginia Attorney General Ken Cuccinelli, who filed a suit accusing Mackenzie and other defendants of running a "national fundraising scam" after they gave his 2013 campaign for governor less than a half percent of the money they had raised in his name.

Similarly, Zinke's own leadership PAC also relied heavily on small donors while spending heavily on consultants, in a departure from how most members of Congress operate those kinds of groups.

The details about Zinke's fundraising and spending practices have not been previously reported, nor has his years-long relationship with Mackenzie's Virgin Islands Republican Party, a group that some Republicans in the Caribbean island chain have accused of misrepresenting itself to donors. POLITICO's analysis of Federal Election Commission filings, plus interviews with campaign finance lawyers and people familiar with the Virgin Islands group's fundraising, offer a deeper picture of the political activism of the retired Navy SEAL who serves in President Donald Trump's Cabinet.

None of the records indicate that Zinke violated the law or received any direct compensation from his association with Mackenzie, the Virgin Islands PAC or its consultants. But one campaign finance expert said the information shows that Zinke was not behaving like a typical politician.

"To say the least, this is highly unusual," said Karl Sandstrom, a former Democratic FEC commissioner who now works at the law firm Perkins Coie.

An Interior Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the assistance Zinke has offered to the Virgin Islands group or his use of political consultants. Mackenzie declined to be interviewed, and officials from the Virgin Islands organization — also known as VIGOP — did not respond to requests for comment.

Zinke is separately facing investigations by Interior's internal watchdog and the independent Office of Special Counsel over his habit of mixing politics and official business.

Legal limits on Zinke's partisan activities have tightened now that he's Interior secretary, and he has cut ties with his PACs since being sworn in. Still, he has kept up appearances at fundraisers and other political events — averaging more than one per month — a pace that is unusual for a Cabinet member. Those include his appearance at the March fundraiser in the Virgin Islands, which occurred during a taxpayer-funded trip less than a month after he became secretary.

Complaints among Republicans about "scam PACS" have been on the rise for years, focusing on groups that target conservative voters as a source for donations. Those complaints have repeatedly focused on Mackenzie, the founder of a number of GOP-leaning PACs that have used slogans such as "Stop Hillary Clinton" to raise money from conservatives — then appeared to do little actual politicking.

Such groups make use of what past FEC leaders have described as a loophole in campaign finance law. The commission declined to take action against one of Mackenzie's Virginia-based PACs, the Conservative StrikeForce, after former Rep. Allen West (R-Fla.) complained in 2012 that it had been "fraudulent" in raising money from his supporters while falsely implying it would aid his reelection campaign. While the PAC's actions were "troubling," the commission's attorneys wrote, they didn't violate any laws or rules that the FEC has the power to enforce.

Cuccinelli made similar criticisms in his 2014 lawsuit, which accused Mackenzie, Conservative StrikeForce and other defendants of using the bulk of the money they had raised in his name to "enrich themselves." The case was eventually settled, with Conservative StrikeForce agreeing to pay Cuccinelli's campaign $85,000 and turn over its donor lists.

Conservative commentator Erick Erickson warned campaigns as far back as 2010 that he might not endorse any Republican candidate who used one Mackenzie-linked consulting firm, then known as Base Connect and now called ForthRight Strategy. Montana Democrats accused Zinke of facilitating a "political Ponzi scheme" with his connections to Mackenzie-linked firms during his 2014 congressional campaign, though the charges apparently gained little traction.

More recently, Rep. Will Hurd (R-Texas) — who was angered last year when the Virgin Islands GOP used his photo without his permission on fundraising solicitations — said in a statement to POLITICO that the Virgin Islands group and ForthRight "are preying on seniors in a disgusting attempt to enrich themselves."

Adav Noti, a former FEC associate general counsel who now works for the nonprofit watchdog Campaign Legal Center, said in an interview that he had dealt with the Virgin Islands group and Mackenzie as an FEC official, and that in his opinion, "They are a scam PAC."

"Scott Mackenzie has a number of scam PACs," Noti said. "He was probably the first, or one of the first, with the idea of bilking people out of money through PACs. People are being defrauded, and that needs to stop."

The FEC is scheduled to decide Thursday whether to fine Mackenzie for less-serious discrepancies in campaign filings by two other PACs of which he's the treasurer, Freedom's Defense Fund and the Conservative Majority Fund.

None of the criticism has seemed to deter Zinke, who used part of a government-paid trip to the Virgin Islands in March to attend a VIGOP fundraiser, where — as POLITICO reported in early October — an invitation listed tickets costing as much as $5,000 a couple, and Zinke's schedule indicated that high-dollar donors had a chance to take photos with him. It was at least the third VIGOP event Zinke had attended there since 2015.

VIGOP, which the FEC classifies as a "non-party" PAC, directed more than a third of its spending during the 2016 election cycle to a handful of Washington-area consulting firms, including ForthRight and at least three other companies that share its address on 15th Street Northwest, according to campaign filings and other documents. Those firms also received more than $3.2 million during the same period from Zinke's congressional campaign, leadership PAC and a super PAC he founded before running for Congress, federal campaign records show.

Between the 2014 and 2016 elections, Base Connect had renamed itself ForthRight Strategy after a former executive pleaded guilty to child pornography charges. A number of the firm's clients left, but Zinke's campaign and his newly formed leadership PAC not only stayed with the firm but also spent substantially more on it in the next election.

Zinke also publicly endorsed ForthRight's performance in his 2014 congressional race, offering a testimonial that was displayed on the firm's website until this month, when the watchdog group Campaign for Accountability filed an ethics complaint.

"Your results and personal commitment to Team Zinke were bar none!" the company quoted Zinke as saying on its website. "I greatly value the professional as well as the personal relationship we have developed over many years."

This praise came even though Zinke's campaign appears to have received less than it spent from its relationship with the firm.

ForthRight says it raised $1.9 million for Zinke's 2014 race by sending out 1.6 million pieces of mail, attracting nearly 44,000 new donors whose average contribution was $44. About $550,000 of that haul went to Zinke's campaign for "voter mail, radio ads, TV ads, get-out-the-vote activities and lawn signs," according to the firm's website. But that was less than the $608,000 that Zinke's campaign spent on postage and direct mail from Century Data Mailing Service, a firm located at the same 15th Street address as ForthRight, according to FEC records.

In the run-up to last year's election, Zinke's campaign and his leadership PAC, known as SEAL PAC, spent about $3 million combined on ForthRight Strategy, Direct Support Services and Legacy Lists — all of which operate out of the same office and list ForthRight CEO Kimberly Bellissimo among their executives. (Bellissimo did not respond to POLITICO's requests for comment.)

Special Operations for America, a super PAC that Zinke founded in 2012 before running for office, also paid firms at that address a total of about $1.8 million during the 2014 and 2016 campaign cycles.

Mackenzie is not listed on ForthRight's website or business filings but was long associated with the firm under its previous names, Base Connect and BMW Direct, both of which listed him as a staff member as far back as 2007.

Besides sharing an affinity for the same consultants as Mackenzie's VIGOP, Zinke's SEAL PAC has also followed a similar fundraising model: It raised two-thirds of its money from small donors in 2016, then steered only 4 percent of its spending to other campaigns, with almost all the rest going to operating expenses and overhead.

Typically, members of Congress use their leadership PACs to cover expenses that cannot be funded from their campaign accounts and to contribute to fellow politicians, using donations of up to $5,000 from lobbyists and other PACs. But SEAL PAC relied on donations of less than $200 for about two-thirds of the $3 million it collected during the 2016 cycle, according to a review of the donations. The group then spent more than $2.6 million on overhead and gave just $118,000 to other congressional campaign committees.

Relying heavily on small-dollar donations is one hallmark of the "scam PAC" play, said Brett Kappel, a partner at the law firm Akerman LLP who specializes in campaign finance, lobbying and government ethics.

"Unfortunately, they generally target the most vulnerable segment of the population with the least disposable income — retired people living on fixed incomes," said Kappel, who declined to discuss specific cases. "Frequently, these are elderly conservative voters who are upset with the direction of the country."

Lorraine Hutchinson, of Butler, Pennsylvania, told POLITICO that these elderly voters included her mother, who she noticed was repeatedly contributing to SEAL PAC and other organizations, though she didn't have the disposable income to spare. Hutchinson said Zinke's PAC was one of the slowest to cease soliciting money when she asked them to stop. At one point, Hutchinson resorted to posting a plea on SEAL PAC's Facebook page.

"It took a great deal of time and effort but I managed to get most of them to stop. The Seal PAC was one of the most persistent," Hutchinson told POLITICO in a Facebook message last week. "I am convinced that these groups knowingly take advantage of the vulnerable elderly and this is a widespread problem without any easy solutions."

Erickson told POLITICO in 2015 that groups that raise political donations without doing much actual politicking are "completely a drain" on the conservative movement, saying they threatened to sap the donors' enthusiasm while achieving no concrete results.

But Bellissimo, the ForthRight CEO, defended direct-mail fundraising in a 2014 post for The Daily Caller.

Donors who send checks in response to mail solicitations "are some of the most patriotic, conservative, generous, and sophisticated people on the planet. ... They are also 'movement' people," Bellissimo wrote. "They are willing to sacrifice their dollars on a principled conservative even when they know that candidate is an underdog."

Mackenzie has similarly defended his high operating costs, telling the FEC in response to West's complaint that "fundraising is expensive and getting more so every year."

Bellissimo's firm has played a crucial role in partnering with Mackenzie's Virgin Islands PAC: Several months before Mackenzie filed the VIGOP's initial paperwork with the FEC in December 2013, Virgin Islands Republican Party Chairman John Canegata signed a contract with Base Connect Vice President Timothy Webster making the firm the exclusive fundraiser for the PAC, according to a copy of the confidential document reviewed by POLITICO.

Some Republicans in the Virgin Islands objected to the use of their name in fundraising mailers urging voters to "Stop Hillary Clinton," and Canegata's involvement with Mackenzie has exacerbated divisions within the local party's governing body.

The anti-Clinton pieces, "at best, solicit donations under false pretenses," four members of the Virgin Islands Republican Territorial Committee wrote in a February 2015 internal report, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO. The members reported that "not a single penny of the funds received through these solicitations have been used for any purpose identifiable to any effort to oppose the election of Hillary Clinton as president."

Bellissimo introduced Zinke to VIGOP in 2015, his first year in Congress, a source familiar with VIGOP's operations told POLITICO. Zinke, his wife, Lola, and Bellissimo flew to St. Thomas to attend a VIGOP event in November of that year. Photos of the VIGOP members posted on Facebook show Zinke and Bellissimo mingling at the Caribbean venue alongside Canegata and Saul Anuzis, a Michigan-based GOP operative who helped raise money for VIGOP. Neither Anuzis nor Canegata responded to requests for comment.

In February 2016, Bellissimo posted a photo of Zinke speaking at the Hay-Adams hotel across from the White House and bragged that she had "the privilege of playing staffer for Congressman Zinke this afternoon." When a friend commented on the Facebook post, saying the then-House freshman should run for president, she replied: "Maybe someday.... Will you help me campaign for him?"

Zinke returned for another VIGOP event at the Ritz-Carlton in St. Thomas less than two weeks after the 2016 election, according to social media posts. Then came his appearance at the VIGOP fundraiser this past March — this time as a member of Trump's Cabinet.

Zinke separately briefs Democrats, Republicans on national security matter Back

By Anthony Adragna and Nick Juliano | 10/24/2017 03:25 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke delivered a pair of secret briefings Tuesday to members of the House Natural Resources Committee, a session Democrats said was confusing and unusual.

Zinke met separately with Republicans and Democrats from the committee in a secure room in the basement of the Capitol typically reserved to discuss classified information. The topic of discussion was a "national security matter," and lawmakers declined to say much more than that.

"Suffice to say that they related to international resource issues," Rep. Jim Costa (D-Calif.) told POLITICO after the briefing.

"This was a confusing meeting — certainly interesting and important issues — but I can't tell you a damn thing [about it] because it was all wrapped around the veneer of confidentiality," Rep. Jared Huffman (D-Calif.) said. "It's a check-the-box exercise to say, 'I met with the Democrats.'"

Lawmakers offered few details as they emerged from Zinke's separate sessions with Democrats and Republicans on the House Natural Resources Committee. Ranking Member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said it was the first Natural Resources meeting in a SCIF, or sensitive compartmented information facility, during his 14-year tenure in Congress.

Democrats who attended the session said Zinke's presentation and subsequent questions left little time for a host of other issues they hoped to raise with him, such as his review of national monument designations and ethical questions surrounding Zinke's associations with alleged "scam PACs," non-commercial travel and reorganization plans for the agency.

"He gave a brief statement about his travel and that was it," Costa said, declining to offer additional details.

Rep. Niki Tsongas (D-Mass.) said Zinke "tried to explain where the costs are coming from," but did not go into any detailed explanation about his participation in political fundraisers while on official trips or say whether Interior had been reimbursed for any of those costs. Tsongas would not elaborate further.

Zinke declined to answer questions from POLITICO as he entered the meeting about his political activity or travel. "It must be a slow news day," he quipped.

Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) said the use of the SCIF was necessary for "parts of" what Zinke had to say, but he did not anticipate that lawmakers would have to receive additional classified briefings from the secretary. Bishop declined to describe the subject of the meeting.

Grijalva said Zinke's presentation concerned "something that could have been done in another setting" and said "it did keep us from talking about some very substantive stuff."

He add that whether Zinke intended to or not, "the substance of what we came here to talk about — and the majority of members that were there came to talk about — never got talked about."

The briefing comes as new ethics questions swirl about Zinke's activities.

POLITICO reported Tuesday the former Montana congressman has directed millions of dollars to questionable groups that raise small-dollar donations from conservative voters but then spend the bulk of the money on consultants and overhead. And a little-known energy company, Whitefish Energy, that is based in Zinke's hometown recently won a \$300 million contract to help restore Puerto Rico's power grid despite being just two years old.

Those latest controversies come on the heels of the agency's inspector general looking into Zinke's use of taxpayer-funded charter planes and concerns about his participation in fundraising or other political events while on official travel. But Democrats said there wasn't enough time to dive into those topics.

"We didn't talk about much that was not directly related" to the national security topic, Rep. Donald McEachin (D-Va.) said.

Some Democrats said the secure setting was unnecessary.

"We were playing national security games in a [secure room] with the secretary of Interior at a time when we should be asking hard questions about why climate scientists are being reassigned to desk jobs, about why our public lands are being given away," Huffman said afterward. "The swamp is getting worse and worse in this administration. We should have been talking about it, and we were playing war games."

Democrats want details on Dourson's advisory post at EPA Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/24/2017 02:58 PM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Democrats want EPA nominee Michael Dourson to explain his role as an adviser to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt while he awaits confirmation to become head of the Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention.

The agency confirmed last week that Dourson is serving as a special adviser on chemicals ahead of his official confirmation.

"Your appointment creates the appearance, and perhaps the effect, of circumventing the Senate's constitutional advice and consent responsibility for the position to which you have been nominated," the 10 lawmakers, led by Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.), wrote in a letter to Dourson. "Your improper involvement in EPA decisions could provide grounds for subjects of EPA regulations and oversight to challenge the legal validity of those decisions in court."

They asked Dourson to describe his duties, his relationship with the career official serving as acting head of the OCSPP and whether any of that official's duties have been delegated to Dourson.

The letter also asked several questions on certain chemical and legal issues Dourson declined to answer ahead of his confirmation. "We expect that you have familiarized yourself with these issues and can be more forthright in answering the questions we previously asked," it said.

Whitehouse last month sent a similar letter to Susan Bodine, who started as a special adviser to Pruitt on enforcement ahead of her confirmation to run the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance. A spokesman did not say whether his office had received a response.

WHAT'S NEXT: Dourson's nomination will receive a committee vote alongside other nominees on Wednesday. It is unclear when he will receive a floor vote.

Murkowski draws energy policy wins despite health care stance Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/24/2017 05:00 PM EDT

It's been three months since the Trump administration first threatened reprisals against Alaska if Sen. Lisa Murkowski didn't get in line on repealing Obamacare.

Instead, it's giving her seemingly everything she could want.

The Interior Department is considering issuing new permits to drill off the Alaskan coast, taking the first steps toward opening the long off-limits Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil exploration, and edging toward building a road through the federally protected Izembek wilderness, a project long championed by Murkowski.

That's all despite the late July phone call from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to the chairwoman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to warn her that her opposition to the measure killing Obamacare could endanger federal projects in the state — a threat that quickly leaked to the media. And though she never backed the repeal, the administration has remained solidly behind her priorities.

"The Trump team appears to be learning that the tasty carrot is a better way of moving a senator than a poorly wielded stick," said Paul Bledsoe, who worked as a Clinton White House energy aide and is now a lecturer at American University.

Zinke's Interior Department is moving ahead with efforts to help reverse the long decline in Alaska's energy production, a priority for Murkowski, since the oil industry still provides about one-third of the state's jobs.

And President Donald Trump and Zinke have continued to put Alaskans into prominent administration posts, including nominating Tara Sweeney as assistant secretary of Indian Affairs. Sweeney, who was an executive for a corporation of indigenous groups that own millions of acres of oil-rich land, is the wife of Murkowski's former state director, Kevin Sweeney.

Zinke's late July calls to Murkowski and Sen. Dan Sullivan (R-Alaska) allegedly threatening to pull support from their energy and land priorities prompted lawmakers to seek a GAO probe, although a separate inquiry by Interior's inspector general ended in August after the two Alaska senators declined to discuss the incident with investigators.

For her part, Murkowski responded to Zinke by delaying her panel's consideration of several Interior and DOE nominees — though she advanced those nominations a few days later after sitting down with Zinke for a beer.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift in an emailed statement did not deny that the administration is trying to win Murkowski's support, and she noted Zinke "works with a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle to advance shared priorities" on such things as restoration of the Everglades in Florida and expanding access to the Sabinoso Wilderness in New Mexico.

The support for many of Murkowski's priorities after the dustup doesn't appear to be a coincidence, according to Kate Kelly, a former senior adviser to former Interior secretary Sally Jewell.

"These decisions don't happen in a vacuum," said Kelly, who is now at the Center for American Progress. In addition to heading the committee that oversees much of the Interior's activities, Murkowski also chairs the subcommittee that controls its appropriations.

"She holds the purse strings and occupies key positions on committees for the Interior department, so it's a smart move to keep her happy," Kelly said.

Murkowski maintained that the administration is not trying to sway her.

"Absolutely not," she told POLITICO in a brief interview. "I think in fairness the administration is working on issues that are important and they care about. And these are matters that we've been talking about with them since they came into office, so this is about priorities that they have laid down, and we agree."

Bledsoe agreed that Murkowski and the Trump administrations share many of the same priorities in boosting energy development on public lands and removing Obama administration restrictions. But he said he saw Interior's actions as an acknowledgment that "they need her every bit as much as she needs them. As the near-misses on their big legislative items have accumulated, the White House is recognizing that they're not immune from old-fashioned politics."

After years of stonewalling by the Obama administration, Murkowski appears to be close to winning Interior's permission for a 12-mile road through the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge to link the isolated city of King Cove to an all-weather airport. Documents obtained through a public records request by Defenders of Wildlife show the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is pursuing a land exchange for the road. The records, first reported by The Washington Post, include emails among staff that say the push for the exchange is coming from Zinke's office.

On the oil front, the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management is expecting to release a draft five-year offshore oil and gas leasing plan by the end of the year to allow drilling in parts of Alaska's Chukchi and Beaufort seas, which former President Barack Obama had closed off last year.

And Zinke is quietly working on an environmental review that would allow oil companies to perform seismic testing in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, according to an Aug. 11 memorandum from the FWS Alaska region acting Director James Kurth. The House is slated to vote Thursday to formally back the Senate's budget resolution passed last week that included language that would give Murkowski a path forward for opening ANWR up to drilling.

In August, BLM issued a call for nominations for new oil and gas leases in Alaska's National Petroleum Reserve, an area near ANWR that has long been home to oil production. BLM also published an order in the Federal Register on Tuesday lifting a ban on mining on 700 acres near Fairbanks that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration had set aside as a buffer around an array of weather satellite receivers. The land sits next to an open-pit gold mine owned by Kinross, which has conducted exploratory drilling in the area.

The Interior actions may not be designed to win Murkowski support for any specific Trump policies, said Pat Pourchot, who served as Interior's special assistant for Alaskan affairs under former secretary Jewell, but fostering a good relationship may pay dividends down the road.

"It doesn't matter if it's an exact quid pro quo or not, but it can't hurt to try to have good relationship with people in other branches of government or other branches of congress that might help you on your priorities," Pourchot said.

POLITICO New York: Energy czar says federal proposal to subsidize coal, nukes threatens state's climate goals Back

By Marie J. French | 10/24/2017 05:29 PM EDT

ALBANY — Gov. Andrew Cuomo's top energy official said Tuesday that the federal government's proposed rule to subsidize coal and nuclear power plants could force New York to keep its last two coal plants open and threatens the state's climate goals.

Richard Kauffman called the proposed federal rule that would guarantee returns for generators that keep a 90-day fuel supply on hand a "shot across the bow" for New York's ambitious renewable energy and climate goals. The proposed rule being considered by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission would upend competitive electricity markets and has drawn criticism from a range of industry actors. It's backed by the Trump administration and has drawn support from coal states and the nuclear industry.

"I find it ironic that this administration talks about states' rights until it's something they don't want, in which case there's federal pre-emption," Kauffman said during a talk at the Rockefeller Institute in Albany. "This is an example where states should be permitted to do what we want to do. ... We will absolutely not cede a single bit of our prerogative but ... I'm concerned there are a number of potential routes the federal government could take to get in the way of our policy."

The stated rationale of the federal government's proposal is concern about grid reliability and resilience in the face of declining fuel diversity. Kauffman said after his discussion that he's sympathetic to the spirit behind the proposal because of the lack of value placed on fuel diversity.

"We can be heading to a single source [with natural gas]. ... Natural gas prices in the past have been historically volatile, we don't have a price on carbon in wholesale markets, there's not a wholesale market value for resiliency services," Kauffman said. "We certainly understand the need for a whole variety of market reforms at FERC."

New York has addressed the effect of historically low natural gas prices on nuclear plants, crafting a subsidy based on the environmental benefits of the state's upstate nuclear power plants after they threatened to close. State policymakers and the New York Independent System Operator are also evaluating the possibility of placing a price on carbon in the electric sector in a way that supports the state's policy goals.

Kauffman said it would ultimately be preferable to have a federal price on carbon rather than for states to go it alone.

DOURSON'S IN DEEP TROUBLE: It's not looking good for President Donald Trump's nominee to run EPA chemicals office with at least five more Republicans not ready to back Michael Dourson on Thursday, Pro's Nick Juliano and your ME host report. Republican Sens. Jeff Flake, Bob Corker, John McCain and Pat Toomey were all publicly noncommittal about Dourson's nomination with Sen. Susan Collins going further to say she was "leaning against" supporting the former industry-funded toxicologist. Remember just one more defection sinks Dourson after Republican North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr said they wouldn't vote to confirm him.

Toomey's concerns: "Sen. Toomey remains concerned about the PFOA issue in Bucks County and Montgomery County and remains dedicated to addressing it," a spokesman for the Pennsylvania Republican said, naming two Philadelphia-area counties where toxic firefighting chemicals leached into the ground from two closed naval bases.

Leadership doesn't seem too optimistic about Dourson at this point. "We'll have to see whether it's a viable nomination, and with two against him obviously that doesn't leave us a lot of room," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn told us. "We haven't made a decisions on that yet, but we'll be revisiting it."

But it may not matter: Dourson is currently at the agency as a senior adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt and none of the Republicans we spoke to seemed anxious to kick him out, even if he lacked support to be confirmed. "I'll leave that up to the EPA to decide," Tillis said. Even Sen. Joe Manchin, who opposes confirmation despite supporting several other Trump nominees, said he was not asking Dourson to leave his current post. But other Democrats, who have criticized the arrangement from the start, want Dourson out of the agency ASAP: "He is a lightning rod that we don't need and I would hope that we don't have to deal with him at EPA," Sen. Ben Cardin told ME.

Why his selection matters: Dourson, whose prior clients include Dow Chemical, Koch Industries and Chevron, has frequently recommended standards many factors less protective than public health and EPA research suggested. And in the early 2000s, Dourson helped West Virginia set drinking water guidance limits for PFOA at 150 parts per billion. That was 150 times less protective than manufacturer DuPont's own internal standard of 1 part per billion and more than 2,000 times less protective than EPA's recommendation of 70 parts per trillion.

KEYSTONE SPRINGS A LEAK: Days before Nebraska regulators decide whether to approve its expansion through their state, the original Keystone pipeline spilled 210,000 gallons of heavy Canadian oil in South Dakota Thursday, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Pipeline operator TransCanada said it shut down the line around 7 a.m. after discovery of the leak in Marshall County and alerted the Pipeline and Hazardous Material Safety Administration. The leak was on original section of the Keystone pipeline system, opened in 2010, that runs from Alberta east through Canada and then down through South Dakota until Steele City, Neb. The Nebraska Public Service Commission will decide Monday whether to approve the route of Keystone XL — an expansion of the original system that takes a shorter path from Alberta to Steele City.

Environmentalists seized on the incident: "These pipelines are bound to spill, and they put communities, precious drinking water, and our climate at risk," Greenpeace's Rachel Rye Butler said in a statement. "The Nebraska Public Service Commission needs to take a close look at this spill." And 350.org Executive Director May Boeve said: "This is exactly the kind of disaster we can expect more of if Keystone XL is approved."

WE MADE IT TO FRIDAY EVERYBODY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Andeavor's Stephen Brown first to identify former Rep. Joe Kolter as the other congressman caught up in the post office scandal. ICYMI: Interior's inspector general said Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke hasn't properly documented his travel as secretary, leaving it unable to determine whether he violated government rules or improperly mixed partisan political activity with official business, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt said the Obama administration's "organizational and operational mess" was to blame for the lack on documentation.

BONN TRAVAIL: Today's the last day of the climate summit in Bonn, Germany, and most of the high-level activities seem to have already wrapped. Look for final high-level speeches this morning and the closing session in the afternoon. Fingers crossed, everything will be wrapped and settled around midday U.S. time.

One awkward thing: Germany's continued dependence on coal has been a sore spot for this year's summit host. And with difficult coalition talks underway to form a government, Barbara Hendricks, the German environment minister, was caught in a difficult spot when asked about the new anti-coal alliance. "We were asked, whether we want to participate. I have asked for understanding, that we cannot decide this ahead of the next government. The initiative, however, will keep us up to speed about what's happening," she said in an emailed statement.

WHERE IN THE WORLD IS SCOTT PRUITT? Today the EPA administrator delivers remarks at the Federalist Society's 2017 National Lawyers Convention at 11:15 a.m. Link to the schedule here.

Attractions yet to come: Nearly a year after his confirmation, Pruitt makes his first return visit to Senate EPW on Jan. 31, 2018, your ME hosts reports. Ranking member Tom Carper said the visit is "long overdue" but adds he's "glad that a date has finally been set." He'll also testify before the House Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee on Dec. 7.

On Thursday, he met with Washington state Rep. Cathy McMorris Rodgers at agency headquarters. Picture here.

WHAT THEY'RE SAYING: Here's what various energy groups are saying about House passage of its tax package H.R. 1 \(115\) Thursday afternoon.

— Edison Electric Institute President Tom Kuhn is decidedly on board: "The single most important action we can do to grow our economy and to create jobs is to pass comprehensive tax reform this year, and this is a giant step forward in getting comprehensive tax reform across the finish line."

— Malcolm Woolf, Senior Vice President of Policy for Advanced Energy Economy, has mixed feelings about the bill: "While we are encouraged that the House is reducing the corporate tax rate and finally providing equal treatment for technologies like fuel cells, combined heat and power, geothermal, and advanced nuclear, today's vote also completely undermines market certainty for the wind, solar and electric vehicle businesses."

— API's Jack Gerard likes what he sees: "By including pro-growth proposals like lowering the corporate tax rate and strong cost-recovery provisions, this legislation will help unleash economic growth and allow our industry to continue providing safe, reliable energy for Americans."

— The National Enhanced Oil Recovery Initiative, a coalition of coal, oil, labor and environmental groups, hopes a tax extenders package expected to be considered in the Senate Finance Committee has space for extending a CCS credit: "Carbon capture legislation has unprecedented bipartisan, bicameral support and deserves congressional action."

The Senate Finance Committee cleared its own version of the tax overhaul late Thursday 14 to 12, Pro Tax's Brian Faler reports.

CONFIRMED: Before the Thanksgiving jet fumes got them, the Senate confirmed Brenda Burman to run the Bureau of Reclamation by voice vote, your ME host reports. "FINALLY! Excited to finally have Brenda Burman confirmed to lead @usbr," Zinke tweeted in response.

NUDGING PEOPLE ON APPROPRIATIONS: The Senate Appropriations Committee plans to unveil its chairman's mark for the Interior and Environment fiscal 2018 spending bill next week, along with three other outstanding packages, Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief's Sarah Ferris reports. They won't be marked up but will allow staff level work on funding to trudge along, as Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran ruled out any short-term spending bill that extends past New Year's Eve.

Speaking of which, three sources tell POLITICO's John Bresnahan, Seung Min Kim and Sarah Ferris the White House will ask today for $44 billion to help storm-ravaged communities in Texas, Puerto Rico and Florida.

NEW WRINKLE TO TEST! The North American Electric Reliability Corp.'s recent two-day test of energy companies and government agencies' response to simulated cyber and physical attacks featured for the first time "fake news" on social media to gauge how participants react, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. "I think that term has become part of our lexicon now and so there's an awareness as to is what we're seeing completely accurate or is it designed to fool us?" Marcus Sachs, senior vice president and chief security officer at NERC, said. "Is it potentially a threat actor making something up and trying to psychologically push people in a wrong direction?" More than 6,000 people from the power, oil and gas sectors as well various federal agencies participated in this year's event.

ABOUT THAT PUERTO RICAN OUTAGE: Whitefish Energy said a Wednesday power outage in Puerto Rico had nothing to do with the company's efforts on the island. A since-updated Mashable article linked to in Thursday's ME suggested the outage might have been related to its repair work. "The outage in PREPA Rico on Wednesday, just like the one last week, has absolutely nothing to do with the work performed by Whitefish Energy on the 50100 transmission line," a spokesman said in a statement. "That line was turned over to PREPA several weeks ago and our crews are no longer in the area as they are working elsewhere on the island." The island's utility blamed the outage on a "technical failure."

MOVING FORWARD: Virginia took the next step toward joining Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative on Thursday as the commonwealth's Air Pollution Control Board released a plan for public comment that proposes to cap carbon dioxide emissions from power generation in Virginia at 33 million tons or 34 million tons in 2020, with 3 percent annual reduction through 2030, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. Public comments are expected to last at least 60 days once the plan formally appears in the Virginia Register.

HAMMING IT UP: Billionaire Continental Resources chief and Trump supporter Harold Hamm told an Energy Information Administration webinar Thursday its forecasts had overstated oil production this year by 200,000 barrels a day, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Hamm said the estimates were hurting his business. "We believe the EIA must be responsive to changing dynamics and do it on a timely basis," Hamm said. "Shareholders are demanding return on investment. Hopefully we will give the EIA data a more realistic stamp."

SIERRA CLUB HITS BACK ON GRID PUSH: Responding to FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee's comments about an "interim" grid proposal, the Sierra Club launched targeted ads on Facebook, YouTube, Twitter, and Google Display in 11 states opposing Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resiliency push. Watch here.

MAIL CALL! ROUND OF APPLAUSE TO YOU: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, as well as the committee's subcommittee chiefs, sent a letter to Trump voicing support for reorganizing Interior. "Any thoughtful DOI reorganization should give serious consideration to relocating select agencies away from Washington," they wrote. "Simply put, federal employees should know and live around the people, lands, and economies they regulate."

CHANGE COURSE ON RFS CUTS: Eighteen House Democrats, led by Donald Milford Payne and Ruben Gallego, sent a letter to Pruitt urging him to preserve existing biofuels volume requirement mandates. They fear the proposed 2018 volumes "will curtail investment in innovation and have an adverse impact on our country. It will particularly affect communities of color and urban areas that already face air pollution issues and higher costs of living, especially in regard to gasoline prices."

DON'T DO IT: Colorado Sen. Michael Bennet sent a letter to Zinke opposing a proposal to raise National Park Service fees. Read it here.

MORE TIME PLEASE: More than two dozen House Democrats asked Zinke for a 45 day extension of the public comment period on Interior's plan to modify or rewrite sage grouse conservation plans. Link here.

GROUPS WANT GRID PUSH RECORDS: The Environmental Working Group and American Oversight filed a public records request Thursday seeking communications, emails and calendar entries for meetings between senior DOE officials and corporations including Peabody Energy and Murray Energy. It also requests any records related to lobbying groups such as the Edison Electric Institute, the Nuclear Energy Institute, and the American and National Coal Councils. Link here.

Dourson at risk of rejection as more Republicans lean no Back

By Nick Juliano and Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee to a key chemical safety job at the EPA is at risk of rejection after Republican senators balked amid accusations that he is too eager to cover for companies peddling dangerous products.

North Carolina's two GOP senators have said they will vote against confirming Michael Dourson as an EPA assistant administrator, citing a record that included work on a chemical linked to cancer deaths near a Marine Corps base in their home state. And Maine Republican Susan Collins said Thursday that she is leaning no as well — a vote that would be enough to sink his nomination.

Democrats are optimistic about turning four additional Republicans who they believe should be in play based on contamination issues back home.

Republican leaders have not decided what to do about Dourson's nomination, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said Thursday.

"We'll have to see whether it's a viable nomination, and with two against him obviously that doesn't leave us a lot of room," Cornyn told POLITICO. "We haven't made a decisions on that yet, but we'll be revisiting it."

Critics say Dourson, a former industry-funded toxicologist, regularly downplayed the risks of chemicals such as PFOA and trichloroethylene that are contaminating soil and water in communities across the country. Dourson has already begun working at EPA as a senior adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt, an arrangement Democrats have condemned as improper.

"There are all these local contamination issues across the country that have been bubbling up recently or have been out there for years, and because Dourson is this hired gun ... he's almost by nature of his job been working on these really controversial chemicals," said Jack Pratt, chemicals campaign director for the Environmental Defense Fund, which opposes Dourson's nomination.

Republican North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr said Wednesday that they could not support Dourson because of his past work as a toxicologist who was frequently hired by industry to rebut public health concerns about chemicals. Collins said Thursday that she is "leaning against" confirming him.

A legislative aide said Democrats are eyeing Republican Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Bob Corker of Tennessee and Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, although Flake, Toomey and Corker told POLITICO they're still undecided.

"Sen. Toomey remains concerned about the PFOA issue in Bucks County and Montgomery County and remains dedicated to addressing it," a spokesman for the Pennsylvania Republican said, naming two Philadelphia-area counties where toxic firefighting chemicals leached into the ground from two closed naval bases. Toomey is reviewing the nomination "with these concerns in mind," but the spokesman did not say how he plans to vote.

However, even if the nomination is pulled or rejected, Dourson will still be able to influence

EPA's implementation of a major chemical safety law because he has already started working at the agency. Democrats have criticized that arrangement, though EPA says previous administrations allowed people to begin working there before being confirmed.

EPA's chemical safety office, which Dourson has been nominated to lead, has a heavy workload after Congress in 2016 passed a bipartisan law updating the Toxic Substances Control Act for the first time in nearly 40 years. The office has been charged with evaluating the safety of chemicals already in use and determining how to test new chemicals before they are allowed into the marketplace.

The near-universal support TSCA reform won in Congress last year may help explain the wariness among lawmakers about giving chemical industry allies too much of a foothold in EPA.

"They wanted to give the public some assurance that the products on their shelf are safe, and when you put the chemical industry in charge that's not going to happen," said Madeleine Foote, a legislative representative with the League of Conservation Voters.

Tillis and Burr stopped short of calling for Dourson to step down from his existing position at the agency. "I'll leave that up to the EPA to decide," Tillis told POLITICO.

Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), who has supported several Trump nominees, said he would vote against Dourson but not object to him continuing to work at EPA.

Before joining EPA last month, Dourson was a professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine's Risk Science Center, and he founded the nonprofit Toxicology Excellence for Risk Assessment, which was often conducted industry-funded research. He also previously worked at EPA from 1980 to 1995. Past clients of Dourson and his research group have included Dow Chemical, Koch Industries and Chevron, according to the Associated Press.

Critics say Dourson's research routinely concluded that chemicals were safer in far higher concentrations than those recommended by agencies like EPA, putting communities at greater risk of finding toxic substances like perchlorate, TCE or PFOA in their air or drinking water.

Pratt said Dourson's work followed a pattern.

"Over and over again these chemical companies would hire him, he'd look at the research, and say the standard that EPA or whatever regulatory body has is too strict — it should be looser," Pratt said.

Dourson told the Environment and Public Works Committee at his confirmation hearing last month that he did not have a thumb on the scale.

"I can give you as many or more examples of situations where the science that we brought forward as a team actually lowered the safe dose or risk position for various sponsors," Dourson told Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) at the hearing. "If confirmed, I will rely on the guidance of EPA ethics officials."

Tillis and Burr said they could not support Dourson based on his record and North Carolina's history of chemical pollution problems, such drinking water at Camp Lejeune that was contaminated for decades by chemicals including trichloroethylene. TCE is one of the first 10 chemicals EPA must evaluate under the new safety law, but Dourson has previously endorsed health standards that are 1.5 to 15 times less protective than those backed by other researchers, according to EDF.

Retired Marine Corps Master Sgt. Jerry Ensminger, whose daughter died of leukemia linked to the contaminated water at Camp Lejeune, met with Tills and aides to Burr to urge their opposition, according to the Wilmington Star News.

Among his other industry-funded work, Dourson appeared before an EPA scientific advisory panel session concerning the pesticide chlorpyrifos on behalf of CropLife America. He led a 2008 paper on acrylamide, which can form during high-temperature cooking of some starchy foods, that received funding from major food companies like Burger King, Frito-Lay and McDonald's. And he studied 1-bromopropane, a solvent linked to some neurological and reproductive disorders, in 2004 with funding from Albemarle Corp. and Ameribrom Inc.

In all cases, he recommended standards many factors less protective than public health and EPA research suggested.

He also has done work for industry-friendly state governments. In the early 2000s, Dourson helped West Virginia set drinking water guidance limits for PFOA, also known as perfluorooctanoic acid or C8, at 150 parts per billion. That was 150 times less protective than manufacturer DuPont's own internal standard of 1 part per billion and more than 2,000 times less protective than EPA's recommendation of 70 parts per trillion.

During his confirmation hearing, Dourson argued that the research had evolved significantly since his recommendation to West Virginia, saying that "the science has progressed, significantly advanced since the time of 2004 and the new science indicates a lower level." And he defended the integrity of his work overall.

"Throughout my career — with EPA, TERA and now with the University of Cincinnati — I have been objective in my work and applied sound science to come to my conclusions," Dourson said.

Collins 'leaning against' Dourson for EPA chemicals role Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 12:35 PM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins told reporters today she's "leaning against" backing Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemicals office, which would leave him without adequate support for confirmation in the closely divided chamber.

"I have a lot of concerns about Mr. Dourson, but I've not yet made a final decision," she said.

North Carolina Republican Sens. Richard Burr and Thom Tillis both came out in opposition on Wednesday to Dourson, who is currently working as an adviser at the agency. Both declined to say if he should leave that role today.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) also said today he had not decided whether to support the nomination.

Keystone pipeline spills 210,000 gallons of oil in South Dakota Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/16/2017 05:02 PM EDT

The Keystone pipeline spilled 210,000 gallons of heavy Canadian oil in South Dakota, pipeline operator TransCanada said in a statement today.

TransCanada shut down the pipeline around 7 a.m. ET after discovering the leak in Marshall County, the company said. Crews isolated the spill and called in emergency responders, the company said. TransCanada also alerted the Pipeline and Hazardous Material Safety Administration of the spill.

The spill comes less than a week before a local regulatory commission in Nebraska is scheduled to rule whether to approve the route through the state where TransCanada wants to build Keystone XL, an expansion of the original Keystone line.

TransCanada said it has received enough interest from shippers to green-light Keystone XL project if it gets the go-ahead from the Nebraska Public Service Commission.

Watchdog slams Zinke for failing to document travel Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/16/2017 04:16 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke failed to properly document his travel, the agency's watchdog said Thursday, preventing it from determining whether he had violated government rules.

Zinke has come under scrutiny for mixing taxpayer-funded travel with political activities, as well as taking military or private planes rather than flying commercial, and the investigation by Interior's Office of Inspector General seeks to clarify whether all procedures were correctly followed.

"Our investigation is delayed by absent or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips and a review process that failed to include proper documentation and accountability," Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall said in a letter obtained by POLITICO and first reported by The Washington Post.

Zinke's travels have drawn scrutiny after Interior revealed he had taken non-commercial flights at taxpayer expense, POLITICO and other news outlets have reported. POLITICO has also reported that the former congressman from Montana has mixed taxpayer-paid trips with political work, such as when he participated in a fundraiser on behalf of the Virgin Islands GOP.

The IG criticized Zinke for failing to complete documentation for his travel in the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, and said that the process established by Interior's Ethics Office and Office of the Solicitor "does not include sufficient documentation of the legal and ethical analysis conducted to distinguish between personal, political, and official travel, or consistent cost analysis to justify use of non-commercial travel."

The IG asked for documentation of all of Zinke's travel, as well as for the documentation of travel by his wife, Lola Zinke, with documentation for how and when the travel was paid.

Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt, the agency's second-ranking official, blamed the lack on documentation on the Obama administration for leaving behind "an organizational and operational mess."

In his response letter, Bernhardt emphasized that Interior employees would continue to cooperate with the IG, and said he would provide documentation as requested.

But he also went on to note that former Interior Secretary Sally Jewell hadn't completed her documentation for 12 trips taken last year and in January of this year, and he said some trips may have never been entered in the system.

"When I arrived at the Department in August 2017 it was clear to me that the Secretary and I had inherited an organizational and operational mess," he wrote. "From my perspective, regarding IOS travel procedures, it appears that the exact same procedures and processes utilized by the previous Administration remain in place and continue to be dysfunctional."

Zinke joins a cast of Trump administration officials, including Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and now-departed Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price, who are accused of misuse of taxpayer funds for travel.

New anti-coal push in Bonn pits nations against U.S. Back

By Emily Holden | 11/16/2017 03:08 PM EDT

BONN, Germany — Canada and the U.K. on Thursday launched an anti-coal alliance at the global climate summit here, a direct challenge to the Trump administration's bid to promote new high-efficiency coal-fired power plants.

Canadian Environment Minister Catherine McKenna and Claire Perry, the U.K. minister for climate change, formally launched the 27-member group whose declaration said it will seek to close down existing coal plants and "impose a moratorium on any new traditional coal power stations without operational carbon capture and storage."

"Coal is literally choking our cities, with close to a million people dying every year from coal pollution," McKenna said.

Almost 40 percent of global electricity comes from coal, and while McKenna acknowledged that phasing it out would not be easy, she said it was crucial to achieve climate goals and protect public health.

Other members include France and Italy, which both aim to phase out coal in the next decade, and Finland, Mexico and New Zealand. Two U.S. states — Washington and Oregon — will also join. Both have already announced plans to shutter their coal plants. While the group's members consume only a small fraction of the global coal supply, they aim to form a powerful political partnership.

McKenna said despite the U.S. effort to support coal, the economic case for the fuel was fading.

"There are cheaper, more sustainable sources of power, in particular clean power, renewables," she said. "The economics dictate it, but we need to be supporting countries that want to make the move. We've said that there are developing countries [where] there might be a price differential. We want to be helping to support them. This is the huge opportunity."

Officials from the White House have used the annual climate change conference to tout "cleaner" fossil fuels, including at a controversial event on Monday that drew protesters. But the head of the American negotiating team delivered a speech to the assembled nations that carefully steered clear of coal.

Judy Garber, an acting assistant secretary at the State Department, at the COP23 high-level session said the U.S. still intends to withdraw from the 2015 Paris deal and is open to rejoining later under "more favorable" terms. The U.S. team has said it was not planning to discuss those terms at the Bonn meeting.

Garber noted "dramatic decreases in the cost of low-emissions technologies and fuels, including natural gas, solar, wind, energy storage and energy efficiency," but also referenced work with China and India capturing carbon emissions from coal.

"We know that each country will need to determine the appropriate energy mix based on its particular circumstances, taking into account the need for energy security, promotion of economic growth and environmental protection," she said. "In that context, we want to support the cleanest, most efficient power generation, regardless of source."

Not all developed countries are on board with the new anti-coal pitch, including Germany, where Chancellor Angela Merkel is still struggling to form a new government.

"We were asked whether we want to participate. I have asked for understanding, that we cannot decide this ahead of the next government," said Barbara Hendricks, the German environment minister. "The initiative, however, will keep us up to speed about what's happening."

Pruitt to testify before EPW in late January 2018 Back

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt will appear before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee on Jan. 31, 2018, making his first return to the panel nearly a year after his confirmation, the panel announced today.

"It is important that EPA Administrator Pruitt testifies before the committee," Chairman John Barrasso said in a statement. "It will give senators the chance to hear about the important work being done at the agency."

Committee Democrats have already expressed outrage Pruitt hasn't returned since his confirmation in February so waiting more than two additional months likely won't mollify that the anger.

"Mr. Pruitt's appearance before our committee, which oversees the agency he leads, is long overdue," Ranking member Tom Carper said in a statement. "While I think it is unacceptable that members of this committee will have to wait over a year to hear directly from Administrator Pruitt, I am glad that a date has finally been set, and I look forward to his testimony on January 31st."

WHAT'S NEXT: Pruitt will testify on Jan. 31.

Pruitt to testify before House panel Dec. 7 Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/16/2017 12:00 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt will testify before the House Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee on Dec. 7.

"We're looking forward to receiving a much-needed update from Mr. Pruitt on his priorities for the agency, including his stated policy of getting EPA 'back to the basics' and its impact on the agency's activity going forward," E&C Chairman Greg Walden and Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus said in a joint statement. "Following EPA's controversial and expansive interpretation of its authorities during the past administration, it is past time for EPA to refocus on pursuing its important public health and environmental missions as Congress originally intended."

The appearance will be Pruitt's first before the Energy and Commerce Committee. Democrats on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee are also seeking to have Pruitt testify soon, noting he has not appeared before that committee since his confirmation hearing on Jan. 18.

Senate Finance Committee approves GOP tax reform plan Back

By Brian Faler | 11/16/2017 10:37 PM EDT

The Senate's tax-writing committee this evening approved Republicans' sweeping plan to overhaul the tax code.

The Finance Committee voted along party lines, 14-12, to forward the proposal on to the full Senate. Approval came after four days of sometimes testy consideration, during which Republicans substantially revised the measure while voting down dozens of Democratic amendments.

Senate leaders aim to take up the bill — which would cut both business and individual taxes while killing Obamacare's individual mandate requiring health insurance — after Thanksgiving.

The Finance panel's vote came hours after the House approved its own competing tax plan. Lawmakers aim to get compromise legislation to President Donald Trump's desk by the end of the year.

Senate confirms Burman to lead Bureau of Reclamation Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 06:11 PM EDT

The Senate cleared Brenda Burman's nomination to run the Bureau of Reclamation by voice vote on Thursday.

"FINALLY! Excited to finally have Brenda Burman confirmed to lead @usbr," Secretary Ryan Zinke tweeted in response.

Burman's nomination to lead the nation's wholesale water and hydroelectric power provider got caught up in the battle over Zinke's national monument designation review.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin placed a hold on her nomination until he landed a meeting with Zinke to discuss the review and lifted it after that meeting took place earlier this week.

WHAT'S NEXT: Burman will assume her position running the Bureau of Reclamation.

Senate appropriators to release details on four spending bills Back

By Sarah Ferris | 11/16/2017 03:46 PM EDT

The Senate Appropriations Committee plans to unveil its remaining four spending bills next week as it ratchets up pressure on congressional leaders to strike a budget deal.

The committee will release a so-called chairman's mark for each of the fiscal 2018 bills — Defense, Financial Services, Homeland Security and Interior and Environment — early next week. The bills will not be marked up in full committee, according to a GOP aide.

The Senate will not be in session, but the bills will be released to allow staff-level work during the holidays, the aide said. After the Thanksgiving break, Congress will have just days left until government funding expires.

Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran announced the plans in a rare statement directed at congressional leadership this afternoon, warning about the fast-approaching Dec. 8 deadline.

"We need a new budget deal to finish our work. Congress and the administration must reach agreement on acceptable top-line funding levels," Cochran wrote. "I urge all parties to those negotiations to redouble their efforts to reach agreement."

In a break with some House conservatives, Cochran (R-Miss.), ruled out any short-term spending bill that extends past New Year's Eve.

Cochran, who also chairs the Defense subcommittee, urged House and Senate leaders to reach an accord that would lift the budget cap for the Pentagon. Without a deal, Cochran said he would be "hard-pressed" to write a bill that "fully meets our national security needs or reflects the priorities of the Senate."

White House seeks at least $44B in third disaster request Back

By John Bresnahan, Seung Min Kim and Sarah Ferris | 11/16/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The White House will ask Congress on Friday to approve at least $44 billion to help storm-ravaged communities in Texas, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Florida, according to three sources privy to the request.

It would mark the third aid installment in three months. Congress has already approved $52 billion in response to the spate of hurricanes that killed 260 people and caused hundreds of billions of dollars in damage.

The latest request falls short of what local officials had sought for their recovery, though the White House is expected to send additional aid proposals in the coming months. Texas had asked for $61 billion for reconstruction, and Puerto Rico has sought $96 billion.

Both the House and Senate are expected to take up the request next month, possibly as part of a year-end spending deal. The request comes as lawmakers leave town for a weeklong Thanksgiving break.

Grid attack simulation exercise includes 'fake news' scenario Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/16/2017 05:10 PM EDT

A two-day exercise to test energy companies and government agencies' response to simulated cyber and physical attacks on the electric grid has added a new wrinkle: using "fake news" on social media to gauge how participants react.

The North American Electric Reliability Corp. holds its so-called GridEx simulations every two years, and this year's event drew about 6,000 people from the power, oil and gas sectors as well as from FERC, NERC, DOD, DHS, DOE and other national agencies.

This year's exercise included simulations similar to the malware attacks made on Ukrainian energy and transport companies earlier this year. And it also included a social media component in which GridEx administrators put out news stories, and allowed utilities to post their own accounts on social media.

"We had some reaction from members questioning whether what they're seeing is accurate, and using the words 'Is this fake news?'," said Marcus Sachs, senior vice president and chief security officer at NERC. "I think that term has become part of our lexicon now and so there's an awareness as to is what we're seeing completely accurate or is it designed to fool us? Is it potentially a threat actor making something up and trying to psychologically push people in a wrong direction?"

The 2015 exercise led companies and agencies to improve their response to natural disasters and create a cyber mutual assistance program, said Kevin Wailes, co-chairman of the electricity subsector coordinating council and CEO of the Lincoln Electric System.

WHAT'S NEXT: NERC expects to publish a report on lessons learned from GridEx IV in March.

Virginia advances proposal to join RGGI Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/16/2017 04:57 PM EDT

Virginia's Air Pollution Control Board today decided to officially move ahead with a proposal for the state to join the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative.

The plan, which will now go out for public comment before it's finalized, proposes to cap carbon dioxide emissions from power generation in Virginia at 33 million tons or 34 million tons in 2020, with 3 percent annual reduction through 2030.

Outgoing Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe announced the decision to join the multi-state program earlier this week at the climate summit in Bonn, Germany. In a statement today backing the board's decision, McAuliffe made a dig at President Donald Trump.

"Virginia is uniquely vulnerable to the threat of climate change and many of our residents are already experiencing its impacts. ... I am proud that Virginia is joining states around the nation that are filling the void of leadership that President Trump has left on transforming the energy sector and protecting our environment," he said.

New Jersey, which exited the pact under Republican Gov. Chris Christie, is also set to rejoin RGGI.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Air Pollution Control Board is expected to take public comments for at least 60 days once it's announced in the Virginia Register.

Hamm tells EIA its high oil forecasts are hurting his business Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/16/2017 04:57 PM EDT

Continental Resources chief and Trump supporter Harold Hamm told an Energy Information Administration webinar on Thursday that the agency was overestimating U.S. crude output and hurting his business.

The presentation by Hamm, who is largely credited with sparking the oil rush in North Dakota, is the latest sign of the policy influence that energy executives have in the Trump administration. Like coal magnate Bob Murray and refinery owner Carl Icahn, billionaire Hamm has regularly had Trump's ear.

"When it comes to public policy and politics and being at that table, it appears they now have a seat they didn't necessarily have before," said Jon Haubert, an energy consultant and founder and managing partner of HB Legacy Media.

During his approximately 15-minute presentation, Hamm said he had given input to the EIA since 2012 in his role as head of the Domestic Energy Producers Alliance, a trade group he co-founded and represents 29 companies. He said that the EIA forecasts had overstated oil production this year by 200,000 barrels a day, a discrepancy he complained was hurting this business with investors. Continental's share price is down about 10 percent from a year ago, but had fallen as much as 40 percent during the summer.

"We believe the EIA must be responsive to changing dynamics and do it on a timely basis," Hamm said. "Shareholders are demanding return on investment. Hopefully we will give the EIA data a more realistic stamp."

EIA has estimated the U.S. oil production will average 9.2 million barrels a day in 2017. Hamm's Continental Resources and other oil companies have suffered from low oil prices, which have been under pressure from high crude inventories and the growth in U.S. production in recent years. A lower estimate from EIA could help lift oil prices and boost oil company profits.

Hamm met with Energy Secretary Rick Perry in September to argue that the EIA was overestimating U.S. oil output for the next few years. The former wildcatter also appeared onstage with Trump at an event in Mandan, N.D. earlier that month.

Matt Lee-Ashley, senior fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress, said he believed backing from Trump helped Hamm get a spot in the EIA meeting.

"Harold Hamm has been very clear that he has a financial interest in the EIA's forecasts and he has put political pressure on the EIA to change their forecasts," he said. "This not only hurts the EIA's all-important reputation of being independent, but it raises questions about whether the Trump administration is letting Hamm influence the government's crude oil forecasts for his personal financial benefit."

An EIA spokesman did not reply to questions as to how Hamm came to join the panel. A spokeswoman for Continental Energy and the DEPA declined to answer specific questions, only saying "DEPA has been providing insight to the EIA for years."

Market analysts were less worried that Hamm's participation in the webinar would mar the EIA's reputation for independence.

"Dialogue with industry players should not, in and of itself, create concerns about the reliability of the EIA's data and forecasts," said Pavel Molchanov, a Raymond James energy analyst.

FERC chief urges critics to 'move past' DOE's proposal Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/16/2017 01:30 PM EDT

FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee said Thursday that the agency was developing its own approach to support grid resilience rather than working from the proposal submitted by Energy Secretary Rick Perry.

Chatterjee told reporters after FERC's monthly meeting that the issue of supporting baseload coal-fired and nuclear power plants had caused a "hyperbolic reaction" because many people did not understand the agency's process.

"I think part of the problem is that people are still debating the [notice of proposed rulemaking] as it was submitted to us [by the Energy Department]," he said. "What I'm trying to say is we've moved past that and we're moving toward a constructive solution that still answers the questions that Secretary Perry asked in the NOPR in a way that does not distort markets and is legally defensible."

Chatterjee said his effort to implement an "interim" proposal to prop up economically struggling generators in power markets is still being ironed out, but it may direct grid operators to identify what plants are needed for "resilience."

"Once it's fully fleshed out and I feel that it's a defensible product, I want to be able to present that to my colleagues so they can review it," he said, noting that he would ensure that his fellow commissioners would have sufficient time to review it.

In an interview with Utility Dive on Wednesday, Chatterjee said he was considering an order to require regional grid operators to provide "interim compensation" for power plants that contribute to grid resilience and are at risk of closing before FERC can finish a formal rulemaking, or that those grid operators "show cause that [they] not be required to do so."

Chatterjee said Thursday that "on-site, secure, firm fuel that does not depend on just-in-time delivery," as among the characteristics of power plants that contribute to grid resilience.

The interim FERC chief said that he didn't see any threat to the renewable industry or to natural gas from his plan.

"I genuinely believe that this will not have a negative impact on gas. I believe deeply in natural gas and its value. ... I don't want to do anything to hurt the gas industry," he said.

Chatterjee said that he's pushing an interim proposal to preserve certain power plants because "in the short term, I just want to make sure that the patient doesn't die while we do the longer-term analysis."

However, he didn't envision that his plan — which doesn't appear to have broad support among the FERC leadership yet — would have a mechanism to compensate consumers for paying plants that ultimately turn out not to have been necessary in any long term review.

"As we look through this, we will try and make this as minimally disruptive — we'll try to keep the costs down — to consumers as possible," Chatterjee said, adding that "consumers have paid for things that have a lot less value to the grid than long term resilience and security."

He added: "Thinking about the consequences if we got this wrong, it's a pretty reasonable ask."

Kevin McIntyre, President Donald Trump's pick to lead FERC, is expected to be sworn in in the next few days.

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by Chevron: Energy amendments ready for House debate — Little new energy talk from Trump in North Dakota — EPA preps as Hurricane Irma hits Caribbean
Date: Thursday, September 07, 2017 5:47:20 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 09/07/2017 05:45 AM EDT

With help from Eric Wolff, Ben Lefebvre and Darius Dixon

TEED UP, READY TO GO: House Rules Committee lawmakers readied 80 EPA and Interior amendments for floor consideration as the chamber moves through its mammoth, 1,300-page spending package H.R. 3354 \(115\) starting today. Here are six worth watching as debate moves along:

1. An amendment from senior Natural Resources Committee Democrats restoring funding to EPA's environmental justice program by taking funds from the Interior secretary's office,
2. An effort by New York Republican Rep. John Katko to restore $250 million in Clean Water State Revolving Funds, an infrastructure program that usually enjoys broad bipartisan support,
3. A push by Rep. Gary Palmer to eliminate funding for the Diesel Emissions Reduction Act, which helps convert diesel engines to more efficient ones. Several dozen groups sent a letter to House members opposing the move.
4. A bipartisan amendment from Republican Frank LoBiondo and Democrat Don Beyer to block offshore drilling in a host of Atlantic sites,
5. An amendment from Rep. Scott Perry blocking EPA from issuing any regulations under Section 115 of the Clean Air Act, feared by some conservatives as a hidden weapon to mandate carbon regulations,
6. A Republican amendment that would bar federal agencies from using funds to cover legal fees associated with Clean Air Act, Clean Water Act and Endangered Species Act settlements.

Other Democratic amendments expected to fail would block President Donald Trump's administration from delaying ozone standards, being able to unilaterally withdraw the Waters of the U.S. rule and preparing a new five-year offshore oil and gas leasing plan.

A full list of amendments is available here.

NOT MUCH ENERGY CHATTER IN MANDAN: Trump's tax talk at Andeavor's refinery in Mandan, N.D., yielded little fresh energy news on Wednesday. Addressing a crowd at the plant that had expanded in 2012 to take in more Bakken crude, Trump warned of a tax code that caused businesses to be "regulated out of existence." Continental Resources CEO and Trump pal Harold Hamm made a brief cameo in sunglasses to say: "You find oil in North Dakota! And the Bakken!"

Trump freestyled on energy regulations and pipelines: "The Dakota Access Pipeline is finally open for business. Now, what other politician, if elected President, would have done that one? They would have stayed so far away. And I did it immediately, and I didn't even do it in that case for jobs. It was the right thing to do. And that is flowing now beautifully." ME would note that any of the other 2016 GOP presidential candidates would have approved the pipeline if elected.

Memorable: Trump, who tried a softer touch to get centrist Sen. Heidi Heitkamp on board with tax reform that he used on Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill, may have inadvertently written the Democrat's first reelection ad by calling her on stage and proclaiming her a "good woman." Heitkamp tweeted an (awkward) selfie with refinery workers, while potential challenger Rep. Kevin Cramer posted a selfie with Trump.

U.S. TERRITORY BRACES FOR IRMA: There are already reports of massive damage from the massive Category 5 Hurricane Irma across the Caribbean, but Puerto Rico's electric company warned Wednesday the storm with 185 miles an hour winds could leave the island without power for four to six months, the Miami Herald reports. Meanwhile, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt approved an emergency fuel waiver for Florida and the agency said it was securing 22 current or former Superfund sites in the 100 southernmost miles of the state.

In an all-staff email, Pruitt thanked employees for their response efforts to Hurricane Harvey in Texas and said the agency had already begun preparations for Irma's landfall. "While Harvey caused extreme flooding, our biggest health and environmental concerns in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands are potential oil spills and the potential impacts of power disruptions on drinking and waste water systems," he wrote. The agency is working with regions 2 and 4 to secure Superfund sites and drinking and waste water systems to prevent spills. And the Miami Herald looks at what two Florida nuclear plants are doing to get ready.

NEW ENERGY BUYERS GROUP FORMS: A collection of corporate giants — Microsoft, Walmart, Amazon, Salesforce, Lockheed Martin and Aligned Energy, among them — is today launching the Advanced Energy Buyers Group. The new entity, coordinated by Advanced Energy Economy, will push to expand the market for purchasing renewable and other advanced energy sources as large companies seek to hit their sustainability targets. "We've made good progress, but more work needs to be done to advance policies that make it easier and cheaper for more companies, schools, hospitals and families to buy clean energy," Rob Bernard, chief environmental strategist at Microsoft, said in a statement.

ENERGY INDUSTRY HITS BACK AT EXXON STUDY: Energy in Depth argues in a Wednesday post that a Harvard study asserting that Exxon Mobil misled the public on climate change left out many of the company's public advertorials on the subject, an oversight that would have "severely weakened" the study's conclusions. They say some of the pieces included in the research came mainly from Mobil before it merged with Exxon, meaning the study "largely compared the climate research of one company with the advertorials of a different company." Neither author responded to requests for comment.

WILDFIRE FUNDING MAY HITCH A RIDE: Lawmakers are poised pass an initial injection of relief funding for Hurricane Harvey, but senior Republicans want a second bill to also address the dozens of wildfires throughout the West. "There will be more disaster relief coming up obviously and I would suspect that wildfire will be part of that," Rep. Mike Simpson, a senior appropriator, told reporters. "There are other things than just hurricanes and right now they're burning in the west." House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop said he could go along with that approach, but still hoped to pursue broader reforms to how the federal government responds to wildfires.

RUMOR QUASHED: Any idea that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke might mount a 2018 challenge to Democratic Sen. Jon Tester seemed to die Wednesday when his wife, Lola, signed on as campaign chair for Tester challenger Troy Downing. "I first met Troy on a fishing trip and his kindness, intelligence, youthful enthusiasm, business experience and amazing military history made me think that one day he must serve his state and country again," she said. "And right now is the perfect time."

NOMINEE TRAIN KEEPS ON ROLLING: The Senate will take a big step for FERC today when the Energy and Natural Resources Committee runs Trump's latest picks for the agency through the ringer — but don't expect all too much pulse-pounding excitement. Kevin McIntyre, Trump's FERC chairman-in-waiting, is likely to get peppered by Democrats about his long list of energy industry clients during his long stretch with Jones Day, and commitments to maintain FERC's independence. On the other hand, Rich Glick, general counsel for ENR Democrats, is generally well-liked on both sides of the aisle. But the reason FERC nominees, and members of other federal commissions, from different parties tend to move together is so everyone has something to gain and good reason to hold their fire. By all accounts, McIntyre and his record are boring — which will work in his favor. But much like earlier FERC nomination hearings, expect questions about the growth of renewables, the survival of coal and the threats of climate change.

Two Interior noms up too: Joseph Balash, Sen. Dan Sullivan's chief-of-staff and a deputy commissioner of the Alaska Department of Natural Resources, gets his hearing on his bid to become Interior's assistant secretary for land and mineral management. And Ryan Nelson, general counsel for Idaho-based Melaleuca, an online "wellness shopping club" since 2009, gets his day in the hot seat as he vies to become Interior's solicitor. Take a look at his newly-obtained ethics and financial documents.

If you go: The hearing is slated to begin at 10:30 a.m. in Dirksen 366.

SVINICKI SAYS SUMMER SHUTDOWN HIT 35 AT NRC: Plans to scuttle the Summer nuclear project may cause about 35 NRC employees to find other jobs at the agency, NRC Chairwoman Kristine Svinicki said Wednesday. "Summer was in the neighborhood of 35 agency-wide positions impacted," she said at an agency all-hands meeting, amid a years' long effort to resize the NRC's staffing and mission as the nuclear industry declines. But, Svinicki said, in spite of the heartache for those employees, it doesn't represent a major shift for an agency with more than 3,200 employees. "The project has been canceled so efforts are ongoing to look at positions where those same skill sets of those individuals might align," she said.

Svinicki: DOE didn't ask us to help on grid study: An NRC staff meeting is its own kind of jargonfest, and one staffer took issue with nuclear-related language in DOE's recent grid study that seemed to confuse regulators. Among its recommendations, the study urged the NRC to revisit "nuclear safety rules under a risk-based approach," without giving the term much context. "I'm not certain if they recognized the distinction between risk-informed and risk-based," Svinicki said. The NRC leans more heavily on "risk-informed" regulation, which factors in safety elements that aren't purely calculations of issues that could lead to accidents. The NRC reached out to DOE to help with the report, Svinicki said, but "to my knowledge, they appreciated that but did not take us up on it. I think it's fair to say that the language DOE used was developed by them without really any kind of reaction from NRC or any of our experts."

DOE ELECTRICITY GROUP SHRUNK: Energy Secretary Rick Perry has decided to reduce the size of the Energy Department's Electricity Advisory Committee from 32 to 24 people, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. But he's decided to install six new members even as he reduces the board's overall size. The electricity advisory committee will meet next Wednesday and Thursday in Arlington, Va.

MURKOWSKI LOOKING AT GRANTS ISSUE: Sen. Lisa Murkowski, who oversees the Appropriations subcommittee in charge of EPA funding, told reporters she's looking into reports the agency halted all grants to Alaska for several weeks in the aftermath of her vote against the GOP healthcare bill. "I want to know, is this really so? Cause, if so, that's kind of upsetting," she said. An agency spokeswoman pushed back on the reports, telling TPM "a state was never was singled out in the grant review process; grants were never withheld."

STEEL GROUP BACKS SUNIVA SOLAR TRADE PETITION: The Steel Manufacturers Association, representing 30 North American producers, is backing a bid from Suniva and SolarWorld Americas to have the ITC impose steep tariffs on imported solar cells and modules. "The steel industry fought back in 2001 and was awarded temporary relief that gave the industry the chance to recover," Philip Bell, president of the group, wrote in a letter. "The American solar industry deserves a similar chance."

NEW MEXICANS PUSH ZINKE ON LAND LEASING: Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, as well as Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, asked Zinke to uphold a previous commitment to defer all leases on land near Chaco Culture National Historical Park as the federal government mulls how to manage the area. "We further appreciate your recent public support for the BLM and BIA's cooperative approach, and respectfully request that you maintain the status quo and defer leasing" until the process is completed, they wrote in a letter.

SCALING ON UP: The World Resources Institute, in a report out today, urges cities to accelerate the shift to cleaner cooking, work to scale up distributed renewable energy sources and prioritize expanding energy efficiency of buildings and appliances as they push to expand energy access amid rapid growth.

AN ELECTRON STORED IS AN ELECTRON EARNED: Utility customers installed a record number of behind-the-meter batteries and other power storage systems in the second quarter of 2017, GTM Research and the U.S. Energy Storage Association say in a report out this morning. Behind-the-meter systems are typically smaller than big utility-scale systems, and are usually installed by residential or commercial customers. The numbers are still tiny, as only 32 megawatt hours of capacity were installed, led by California, Hawaii and New York, all of which have incentive programs.

CONTOURING THE EVER-ELUSIVE CARBON TAX: The R St. Institute is out with a new paper this morning looking at how to structure a border-adjusted carbon tax "to deal with imports from and exports to other nations that do not have an equivalent carbon price."

MOVER, SHAKER: Elbert Lin has left his post as solicitor general for West Virginia to go to Hunton & Williams. Lin made his name when he helped persuade the U.S. Supreme Court to put a stay on the Clean Power Plan. Lin will be joined at Hunton by Virginia Solicitor General Stuart Raphael.

Dave Hoppe, Speaker Paul Ryan's chief of staff until January, has joined 38 North Solutions as a senior principal. The group advises groups primarily in the energy and tech sectors. "His vast experience in public policy and political strategy complements our team's expertise in clean energy and technology innovation," Katherine Hamilton, the firm's chair, said in a statement.

Trump tries softer touch to woo Heitkamp on tax reform Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Elana Schor | 09/06/2017 05:21 PM EDT

President Donald Trump has already tried negotiation-by-threat in his push for tax reform - but on Wednesday he took a softer touch to woo North Dakota Democratic Sen. Heidi Heitkamp to his side.

Trump invited Heitkamp to join him on Air Force One before a joint appearance in her home base of Mandan to tout his signature legislative goal.

The president is leaning on Democratic senators from states he won in 2016 to support his effort for tax reform in hopes of avoiding the narrow defeat suffered by his health care reform proposal in August.

He used a trip last week to Missouri to take a direct shot at its politically vulnerable Democratic Sen. Claire McCaskill, telling his audience at a factory that "you have to vote her out of office" if she doesn't support tax reform.

He did make remarks Wednesday targeting Democrats broadly. "If Democrats don't want to bring back your jobs, cut your taxes, raise your pay and help America win, voters should deliver a clear message," Trump said. "Do your job to deliver for America or find a new job. Do something else. Just do something else."

But he welcomed Heitkamp warmly, declaring her a "good woman."

"Everyone's saying what is she doing up here?" Trump said, gesturing to Heitkamp as she walked on stage. "I'll tell you what. We'll have your support. I hope we have your support."

Later, he added: "You listening, Heidi? She's listening. She heard that. We're not going to put her on the spot. I'm not doing it."

Trump carried North Dakota by 36 points in November. But while Heitkamp has voiced a willingness to support tax reform in the past, it's unclear just how much incentive there will be to cross party lines and hand a win to a president whose approval ratings are mired below 40 percent.

Congressional Republicans plan to pass a tax bill using the filibuster-proof maneuver known as budget reconciliation, signaling to senior Democrats that the GOP will likely pursue cuts for corporate and wealthy taxpayers that are deeply unpopular with their liberal base. Given that initially partisan tone of the tax debate, Democrats are preparing for few if any defections on a bill that may not come to a vote until next year.

Heitkamp, however, is one of the three Democratic senators who declined to sign onto a letter last month committing most of the caucus to opposing any tax bill that cuts bills for wealthy earners. That makes her a ripe target for Trump, who briefly considered appointing the former state tax commissioner to his Cabinet earlier this year.

Heitkamp's looming reelection battle is another potent motivator as Trump courts her vote. One of her potential challengers next year, Rep. Kevin Cramer (R-N.D.), also joined Trump on Air Force One for the Wednesday flight, as did North Dakota Republican Sen. John Hoeven.

The business community in North Dakota shares some of Trump's optimism that Heitkamp can be wooed on taxes.

"The one thing I know about Sen. Heitkamp is on that on many business issues she is fairly business friendly," said Andy Peterson, president and CEO of the Greater North Dakota Chamber of Commerce, who will be attending Wednesday's event. "On things like energy and taxes and things like that, she generally gets it and understands what it takes to make a business operate. ... She has been very friendly with our office on a lot of issues."

"She's not afraid to vote her conscience on something and then stand up and be accountable for why she voted that way," he added.

But Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden, the top Democrat on the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, said he is "not concerned about" the caucus sticking together to support the stipulations that most of them committed to last month.

Wyden predicted "exceptional unity" around those conditions, including no tax cuts for the top 1 percent of earners and no bill that adds to the deficit, adding that he has talked taxes with Heitkamp "a number of times in recent weeks - she is arguably one of most knowledgeable people about taxes I've met in public life."

The handful of Democratic senators who didn't sign onto the taxes letter, including Heitkamp, "said they agreed with the overwhelming part of this," Wyden added.

A coalition of liberal groups known as Not One Penny, after their opposition to tax breaks for the wealthy, on Wednesday rolled out a five-figure ad buy targeting Heitkamp and Hoeven on the issue.

Sens. Joe Donnelly (D-Ind.) and Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), who appeared with Vice President Mike Pence in his home state last week, joined Heitkamp in declining to sign the Senate Democratic statement on taxes.

Other red-state Democratic senators facing voters in 2018 appear less inclined to entertain a potential tax-cut plan that adds to the deficit as relief from Hurricane Harvey and other natural disasters takes a separate toll on the Treasury.

"I've got my own guidelines around tax reform: Simplify it, make sure it doesn't add to the debt. Give a break to working families and small businesses," Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.) said in an interview.

"But the truth is that we're dealing with a situation right now, with Houston and fires in Montana -- we've got 40 active fires now - $3 million a day, maybe more than that's going out the window. So we've just got to make sure we're fiscally responsible here moving forward."

House passes $7.9 billion aid bill for Hurricane Harvey Back

By Sarah Ferris | 09/06/2017 12:35 PM EDT

The House overwhelmingly approved a $7.85 billion measure this afternoon for response to Hurricane Harvey, with the goal of landing the legislation on President Donald Trump's desk by week's end.

The aid bill now heads to the Senate, where GOP leaders plan to link it to a separate effort to raise the debt ceiling. But an offer this morning from Democratic leaders has complicated that calculus.

Trump is aiming to quash growing GOP opposition to the strategy to raise the debt ceiling as part of a Hurricane Harvey relief package, according to multiple House and White House officials. And the House is expected to ultimately approve the deal.

"It's 100 percent the Senate is going to put the debt ceiling on Harvey. It'll come back here, and I think it'll get bipartisan support," Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.) said this morning.

Congress aims to deliver the first installment of aid by Friday, when FEMA is expected to run out of emergency dollars.

House Speaker Paul Ryan told GOP lawmakers in a closed-door meeting this morning that they must agree to a funding deal this week, even if it means staying in town through Saturday.

In contrast to the lump sums allocated for past disasters like Hurricane Sandy in 2012, Congress is expected to send multiple aid packages in the coming months to help with Hurricane Harvey recovery — an effort Texas Gov. Greg Abbott has estimated at between $150 and $180 billion.

The disaster relief package was passed on a 419-3 vote, with Reps. Andy Biggs (R-Ariz.), Justin Amash (R-Mich.) and Tom Massie (R-Ky.) voting against it.

DOE shrinks electricity advisory board Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/06/2017 05:34 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry is installing new members to the Energy Department's Electricity Advisory Committee even as he whittles down the size of the board.

The 2016-17 roster for the board, which reports to the assistant secretary for electricity deliverability and energy reliability, had numbered 32 people, but including the new members, it will now total 24, since 14 members didn't have their terms renewed.

DOE says that three members had asked the agency not to renew their terms because of other commitments or because they had left the country.

Perry installed six new members: Mike Heyeck, a former AEP executive and founder of Grid Group; Paul Hudson, ex-chairman of the Texas Public Utilities Commission; Mladen Kezunovic, an engineering professor at Texas A&M; Bryan Olnick, an executive with Florida Power & Light; David Wade, CEO of the Electric Power Board of Chattanooga; and Tom Weaver, an official with AEP.

EAC members serve two-year terms, but about half of the positions are staggered so that some measure of continuity is maintained.

The board, which typically meets three times a year, is purely advisory and works on a range of power-related issues. The panel's charter states that there be "approximately 30" members.

Those not returning are: Ake Almgren, Merwin Brown, Paula Carmody, Paul Centolella, Carlos Coe, Phyllis Currie, Mark Lauby, Janice Lin, Anne Pramaggiore, Paul Roberti, Sue Tierney, Rebecca Wagner, Audrey Zibelman, and Carl Zichella.

WHAT'S NEXT: The electricity advisory committee will meet next Wednesday and Thursday in Arlington, Va.

States, foreign governments press ITC to reject solar petition Back

By Luis Sanchez | 08/15/2017 05:48 PM EDT

Several industry leaders, state government officials and representatives of foreign governments pressed the U.S. International Trade Commission at a hearing Tuesday to reject a petition from two domestic solar manufacturers asking for steep tariffs on imported solar cells and modules.

U.S. solar manufacturer Suniva and SolarWorld Americas have asked the commission to declare that solar cell and module imports from predominantly Asian nations have caused "significant injury" to their domestic business.

"U.S. module manufacturers suffered net losses exceeding a billion dollars over a five-year period," Matthew J. McConkey, a spokesperson for Suniva, said at Tuesday's hearing. "As U.S. demand for solar products increased from 2005 to 2016, foreign suppliers, including those from China, Korea, Canada and Malaysia, began capturing an even larger share of the U.S. market."

If the ITC agrees with the two companies that a "deluge" of solar imports had distorted the U.S. market, it could have huge impact on the renewable energy source that has grown rapidly over the past decade as costs for the panels that turn sunlight into electricity have plunged.

Chinese companies dominate the global production of solar cells and modules, and they have built extensive supply chains and manufacturing operations across Asia. President Donald Trump had often criticized China for its trade practices, and on Monday he issued an executive memorandum calling for U.S. trade officials to "consider all available options" to get China to stop coercing U.S. companies to hand over valuable technology.

Suniva, which is based in Georgia and is majority-owned by China's Shunfeng International, filed its section 201 petition with the ITC in April, just eight days after it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. SolarWorld later joined the petition.

The commission has until Sept. 22 to make an injury determination and would submit its report on a proposed remedy to the president by Nov. 13. Trump then has until Jan. 12, 2018, to make a decision on a remedy and present his plan to Congress.

Suniva and SolarWorld are seeking an initial tariff of 40 cents per watt of capacity on all imported solar cells and a 78 cents per watt minimum price for modules, roughly twice the current domestic price for solar modules. Suniva alleges that wages for industry workers dropped by 27 percent and 1,200 U.S. manufacturing jobs were lost between 2012 and 2016 because of imports.

The two companies, the two largest surviving domestic manufacturers of solar cells and modules, are seeking the protections to keep cheaper solar modules from being sold on the U.S. market and further hurting the U.S. industry.

However, opponents of the petition said that manufacturing the equipment is only a small part of the U.S. solar industry. Out of the 260,000 people working in the U.S. solar industry, only about 38,000 people work in manufacturing.

The Solar Energy Industries Association argues that tariffs and price floors would damage the whole solar industry, eliminating 88,000 jobs.

"One out of every 50 new jobs created last year in the U.S. was a solar job. Solar is an American success story whose future remains bright," said Matthew Nicely, a spokesperson for SEIA. "Its continued success could be destroyed by the misguided actions of the two petitioners and their small group of supporters whose workers represent less than one percent of all those that work for this dynamic American industry."

Government officials from several U.S. states also expressed their opposition to the petition at Tuesday's hearing, citing potential job and investment losses.

"If this petition is granted, it may save a few hundred cell or module manufacturing jobs, but there are many thousands of good manufacturing installation jobs that will be lost," Jason Saine, a North Carolina state representative said. "A remedy will do more harm than good here with the only benefit going to a small number of companies that frankly don't deserve it."

Al Christopher, director of the Virginia Department of Mines, Minerals and Energy, said that solar projects were not just helping the economy in his state; they also act as "a vital marketing tool in attracting the growing number of companies seeking renewable energy options when deciding where to make investments."

Several representatives of foreign governments also argued the tariffs weren't justified and they urged the commission to exclude their nations from possible tariffs.

"The value of imports from Korea was quite low for most of the period investigated," Korean Minister Counsellor for Trade, Industry and Energy Chang K. Kim said. When the shipments from his country increased in 2016, the imports went to the "utility segment of the market and were part of the share the domestic industry could not supply."

Sibylle Zitko, a representative for the European Commission, went a step further, contending "inefficiencies" and "bad investments" were more to blame for Suniva and SolarWorld's woes rather than imports.

"The criteria for the inquisition for safeguard measures are clearly not met in this case and thus the investigation should be terminated," Zitko said.

McConkey said the argument that Suniva and SolarWorld brought their financial problems on themselves was both false and offensive, and the petitioners only needed to show at Tuesday's hearing that they had suffered because of the imports. "We'll get to remedy later this fall," he said,

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by Chevron: Energy companies get something in Russian sanctions deal — Energy and Water hits the floor this week — Zinke gets a lieutenant today
Date: Monday, July 24, 2017 5:42:26 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 07/24/2017 05:40 AM EDT

AGAINST RUSSIA WITHOUT LOVE: House lawmakers are ready to vote this week on a sweeping sanctions deal against Russia, Iran and North Korea that gave the energy sector at least some of the changes it sought from the Senate-passed version. The compromise package unveiled Saturday would bar U.S. companies from participating in projects in which sanctioned Russian entities have at least a 33 percent interest or a controlling stake. That's lower than the 50 percent threshold the industry lobbied for but a major shift from the Senate-passed bill, which would have barred U.S. participation in any energy project with a Russian stake.

The bill heads to the floor Tuesday under suspension of the rules, meaning House leadership expects it will clear the two-thirds level of support for expedited passage. In a Saturday statement, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and Foreign Affairs Chairman Ed Royce said the legislation would "bolster the energy security of our European allies by maintaining their access to key energy resources outside of Russia." White House Press Secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders indicated on ABC's "This Week" the White House would sign the package if it reaches President Donald Trump's desk. "We support where the legislation is now, and will continue to work with the House and Senate to put those tough sanctions in place on Russia," she said. But new White House Communications Director Anthony Scaramucci sent a different signal on CNN's "State of the Union": "[Trump] hasn't made the decision yet to sign that bill one way or the other."

Europe prepares to fight back: The European Commission intends to respond "within days" if the sanctions become law with Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker especially worried about the energy-related provisions in the package, POLITICO Europe's Ryan Heath reports. In a note, Juncker said the Commission would seek a public declaration that discretionary powers in the sanctions wouldn't be used against E.U. countries, utilize a regulation to state the U.S. law could not be enforced in Europe and consider possible WTO retaliatory measures. The biggest affected interest would be the mooted Nord Stream 2 gas pipeline from Russia to Germany.

RUSSIAN ALLEGATIONS REPUBLICANS LIKE: Amid the ongoing probe about the Trump administration's ties to Russia, conservatives are pushing with renewed vigor a theory that Russia has funneled money to U.S. environmental groups to oppose fracking, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. GOP House members and Energy Secretary Rick Perry are among those in recent weeks who have breathed new life into charges that Moscow has sought to discourage European countries from developing their own natural gas supplies as an alternative to Russian fuel and suggested that support for anti-fracking activism may have extended to U.S. green groups. There's little but innuendo to base those allegations on, but Republicans hope the Treasury Department will look into the claims just the same.

Green groups blast allegations: Advocates like the Sierra Club and League of Conservation Voters, named in a letter from House Science Chairman Lamar Smith letter on the matter, slammed the charges as a move to distract from Trump's own Russian troubles. "If congressional Republicans are so concerned about Russian influence, they should start seriously investigating that country's interference in our election, not attacking long-standing environmental organizations," said Melinda Pierce, the Sierra Club's legislative director, said. For what it's worth, Brenda Shaffer, an adjunct professor at Georgetown University's Center for Eurasian, Russian and Eastern European Studies, said there's no evidence that Russian money has gone to U.S. green groups nationally and even less evidence that any money would have been well spent given how hard it is to get fracking bans enacted. "It would be almost impossible to prevent fracking in the United States," she said.

MUST BE THE MONEY: DOE's decision Friday to seek early retirements or buyouts from 35 employees in its Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy is due to a downward trend in congressional funding, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. The part of the department's budget used for salaries and benefits has declined from $170 million in 2011 to $153.5 million now. "In EERE's case, the program direction account decreased for the third year in a row and this adjustment through voluntary separations is necessary to match staffing levels with current appropriations," DOE said in an email.

HOUSE TAKES UP ENERGY APPROPRIATIONS: Lawmakers today kick off consideration of a mini-bus appropriations package that includes the Energy and Water title. Amendments to the bill H.R. 3219 \(115\) are due today at 10 a.m. and the Rules Committee then gathers at 5 p.m. to figure out how to structure debate on the measure. House Appropriators cleared the a $37.56 billion fiscal 2018 package back on July 12 that would close out DOE's Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program and cut Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy funding in half. Look for potentially hundreds of amendments on the floor and a vote on final passage late in the week. And there's still plenty of work ahead to iron out big differences with the Senate, where energy and water appropriators want to protect ARPA-E and keep EERE's budget about level with this year.

THIS IS HOW WE'LL DO IT: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's energy policy counselor, Vincent DeVito, sat down with Pro's Esther Whieldon and said he's "absolutely" committed to reducing the permitting process for oil and gas projects on public lands to as little as 30 days. "We do want to shrink it down to 30 days and to make all the processes as short as possible, but at the same time, making sure our environmental stewardship is not breached, all of which is completely doable," he said. "We intend to be a better business partner ... by harmonizing the environmental review process across the board, the one-stop-shopping type of model." DeVito also said he thinks Interior could shrink the timeline for developing the agency's five-year offshore drilling plan as well.

Another theme for DeVito is returning Interior to being good partner "on the business side" without sacrificing environmental protection. He also reasserted the agency could collect billions more in revenues than it is now despite the current slump of the energy sector. "Punitive policies have caused a decline in energy production on federal lands," he told Esther. "Folks can't say that revenues are down because the markets declined. No, they were investing elsewhere because nobody wanted to do business with the federal government anymore, so federal government revenues went down."

Speaking of Zinke, in between remarks at the Western Conservative Summit and ALEC, he and Sen. Cory Gardner announced the release of $20 million in federal funds, along with $33 million in private funds, to fund high priority maintenance and infrastructure projects at 42 parks in 29 states. "Using public-private partnerships to help address the deferred maintenance backlog remains a priority for the Department and the Trump Administration," Zinke said in a statement Saturday. He also posted some cute pictures of a visit to Rocky Mountain National Park with Gardner's family.

Send in the reinforcements: Zinke will get a lieutenant later today after the Senate holds a final vote on the nomination of Dave Bernhardt at 5:30 p.m. The deputy secretary nominee cleared a key procedural hurdle last Thursday with seven members of the Democratic caucus backing his selection.

EPA CHIEFS TALK AGENCY WORK: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt gave an interview with the Daily Caller News Foundation that went up Saturday. He scoffed at his critics, reasserted the Obama administration was very ineffective at environmental protection and said he was "optimistic" about his ability to work with career staff. Pruitt also touted his commitment to working with states and refocusing EPA's activities in the face of tighter budgets. "We've got to reevaluate how those regions are working. Are they working effectively?... It's good to go through these kinds of processes to reorganize and restructure," Pruitt tells interviewer Ginni Thomas (Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas' wife).

A NEW, BETTER DEAL? Senate Majority Leader Chuck Schumer cited the merger of Exxon and Mobil as an example of a merger Democrats will work to prevent as part of their new agenda to be unveiled today. "We have these huge companies buying up other big companies. It hurts workers and it hurts prices," he said on ABC's "This Week." "How the heck did we let Exxon and Mobil merge? And that was Democrats."

MEET THE NEWEST DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES: Scientists aren't normally known for their political chops but frustrated with Trump's hostility to climate science and other areas of research, many are launching bids for office for the first time, POLITICO California's David Siders reports. Former New Jersey Congressman Rush Holt, a physicist and now chief executive of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, said he began fielding more calls from scientists considering running for public office. "It's still not in the dozens [of prospective candidates]. But instead of two or three, it might be 12 or 15," Holt said. "There seems to be a general sense that policy is being made without sufficient attention to scientific evidence." There's now a group called 314 Action, a political action committee, that helps people with scientific backgrounds run for office.

WHAT'S THE DEAL WITH EPA'S CLIMATE 'DEBATE'? Three senior Democrats on the House Science Committee — Eddie Bernice Johnson, Don Beyer and Suzanne Bonamici — sent a letter to Pruitt Friday seeking details on his proposed "red team-blue team" debate of climate change science. "Your efforts seem to be divorced from reality and reason," they wrote, while asking for information on the format of the review, a timetable for its execution and how participants in the exercise would be selected.

Speaking of the House Science panel, its Chairman Lamar Smith on Friday endorsed Rep. Mo Brooks in the heated Alabama Republican primary for Senate. "This is unusual," Smith said in Huntsville, Ala., according to AL.com, given he rarely gives endorsements in primaries. "But then again, Mo Brooks is an unusually good, strong candidate. I have no hesitation at all." Brooks is seen as locked in a close battle with incumbent Sen. Luther Strange and former Alabama Chief Justice Roy Moore for the two slots in a likely runoff.

MOVER, SHAKER: Kevin Bush, a long-time policy strategist for HUD, has been named Washington's first Chief Resilience Officer by Mayor Muriel Bowser. He'll oversee an office dedicated to increasing the city's resilience to shocks and stresses as part of the 100 Resilient Cities initiative.

Russia sanctions deal reached without changes Trump sought Back

By Elana Schor and Heather Caygle | 07/21/2017 04:10 PM EDT

Negotiators in both parties on Saturday released a sweeping sanctions deal that does not include changes President Donald Trump's administration sought to make it easier for him to ease penalties against Russia.

The accord on a package of sanctions against Russia, Iran and North Korea is set for a House vote on Tuesday, according to the announcement from Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy's office. To resolve a partisan clash over giving House Democrats the power to force a vote blocking Trump from easing sanctions on Moscow, the deal expedites House consideration of any anti-Trump vote that the Senate has already passed.

The sanctions legislation is expected to pass with overwhelming majorities in both the House and Senate before lawmakers leave for their annual August recess, giving the Republican-led Congress a major bipartisan achievement to tout amid struggles on health care and taxes — albeit an achievement that delivers a thumb in the eye to Trump.

The White House had pressed to dilute the bill's provisions empowering Congress to block Trump from easing or ending sanctions against Russia, but its request fell on deaf ears among Republican leaders.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee's top Democrat, Ben Cardin of Maryland, hailed the agreement Saturday.

"I believe the proposed changes to the bill have helped to clarify the intent of members of Congress as well as express solidarity with our closest allies in countering Russian aggression and holding the Kremlin accountable for their destabilizing activities," Cardin said in a statement.

Cardin added an encouragement for Trump to sign the bill once it reaches the White House, despite his administration's failure to secure more "flexibility" to deal with Vladimir Putin's government.

"A nearly united Congress is poised to send President Putin a clear message on behalf of the American people and our allies, and we need President Trump to help us deliver that message," Cardin said.

The sanctions deal makes a technical change to the portion of the bill by ensuring that Congress would not review minor and routine licenses for businesses seeking to operate in partnership with Russian entities.

The deal also gives oil and gas companies some of what they sought in order to avoid what they feared would be undue hindrance of their ability to partner with Russian entities. While the industry had asked for a 50-percent interest threshold for sanctioned Russian entities before penalties kicked in on joint projects, the final agreement set a 33-percent threshold.

Republicans brewing Russian scandal to target greens Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 07/23/2017 12:12 PM EDT

Republicans are trying to conjure up a Russian scandal they can get behind.

GOP House members and at least one Trump Cabinet member are pushing years-old allegations from conservative activists that Russia has funneled money to U.S. environmental groups to oppose fracking. The story has reappeared in conservative circles in recent weeks — a respite, perhaps, from the steady drip-drip of news reports about dealings between Russians and President Donald Trump's inner circle.

Allegations have circulated for years that Moscow has sought to discourage European countries from developing their own natural gas supplies as an alternative to Russian fuel. And conservatives have sought to extend those concerns to the U.S. — though there's little but innuendo to base them on.

But the rumors gained new life in late June, when House Science Committee Chairman Lamar Smith and fellow Texas Republican Rep. Randy Weber asked Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin to investigate whether the Kremlin is bankrolling green campaigns against the fracking technology that helped the U.S. overtake Russia in gas production.

Among other material, Smith and Weber cited articles in conservative news publications and an alleged Hillary Clinton speech published by WikiLeaks — part of a trove of stolen Clinton campaign documents that U.S. intelligence agencies have linked to Russia's election-meddling efforts.

The reports, the Republican lawmakers wrote in the letter to Mnuchin, suggest "that Russia is also behind the radical statements and vitriol directed at the U.S. fossil fuel sector."

Green groups dismissed Smith's allegations as an attempt to divert attention from all the news surrounding Trump and Russia.

"If congressional Republicans are so concerned about Russian influence, they should start seriously investigating that country's interference in our election, not attacking long-standing environmental organizations," said Melinda Pierce, legislative director for the Sierra Club, one of the groups Smith and conservatives have accused of potentially taking Russian money.

The League of Conservation Voters, another group named in Smith's letter, also blasted the Science Committee's allegations.

"This is false," LCV spokesman David Willett said. "We have no connections to Russia and have been an effective advocate for environmental protection for over 45 years. This seems like nothing more than an attempt at distraction away from the Trump campaign's well-publicized interactions with Russian interests to influence the election."

Still, Fox News and The Wall Street Journal op-ed page have both run items about the committee's letter, and Energy Secretary Rick Perry lent his voice to the effort when a Fox Business anchor asked whether he supported an investigation.

"Absolutely," Perry said in the July 11 broadcast. "Steve is a very capable and very focused business individual who knows that this type of activity has to be investigated, has to be halted."

Spokespeople for the Energy Department and Treasury Department did not respond to questions. A White House spokesperson did not reply to questions about whether the allegations had made their way to Trump.

Anti-fracking sentiment in the U.S. started bubbling up among U.S. environmental groups as soon as the oil and gas production method started surging in the late 2000s, with the documentary "Gasland" appearing in theaters in 2010 after a year and a half in production. Much of that opposition was driven by local activists in new gas hot spots like Pennsylvania who complained about threats to their drinking water, while major national environmental groups like the Sierra Club were slower to take up the cry.

Russian President Vladimir Putin, who oversees an economy almost totally dependent on oil and gas exports, has also slagged fracking technology. He once said that fracking makes "black stuff" come out of people's water faucets, according to a New Yorker report.

Still, there is no evidence that Russian money has gone to U.S. green groups, at least on the national level, said Brenda Shaffer, an adjunct professor at Georgetown University's Center for Eurasian, Russian and Eastern European Studies. And there is even less evidence that any money would have been well spent, given how hard it would be to push widespread fracking bans through the myriad of local, state and federal governments involved in permitting, she added.

"It would be almost impossible to prevent fracking in the United States," Shaffer told POLITICO.

The evidence the committee cites includes comments that former NATO Secretary General Anders Fogh Rasmussen made at a London-based think tank in 2014, when he said he believed Russia was working with environmental groups in Europe to oppose shale gas development.

"Other officials have indicated the same scheme is unfolding in the U.S.," Smith's letter goes on to say — though from there the trail becomes murkier.

The letter also cites a speech that Clinton allegedly delivered in Canada in 2014, according to Clinton campaign emails published by WikiLeaks, in which the former secretary of state supposedly said she had encountered "phony environmental groups" that opposed pipelines and fracking. The emails were part of a cache of Democratic documents that U.S. intelligence officials believe were originally pilfered by Kremlin-linked hackers.

"I'm a big environmentalist, but these were funded by Russians," Clinton says in the alleged transcript.

But the text does not indicate whether Clinton — who promoted shale gas drilling in Europe — was referring to environmental groups in Europe or the United States. A Clinton campaign aide did not answer questions about the veracity and the context of the speech. The campaign has refused to confirm or deny the content of any of the leaked materials.

Still, the alleged Clinton quotes have taken off in conservative news outlets, with The Daily Caller and Washington Times including them in articles published in the past year. Smith, in turn, cited those articles in the footnotes of his letter to Treasury.

"It's a theory, but the reasoning behind it makes sense," said a committee aide, who requested anonymity. "The chairman is saying there's data points pointing to this theory, and he's saying the Treasury secretary can shine some light on this. This isn't out of left field and crazy."

Science Committee aides also argued that last year's national intelligence report on Russian meddling in the 2016 election supports the concerns raised in Smith's letter. However, the intelligence report doesn't allege any Kremlin outreach to U.S. environmental groups.

The intelligence report's non-classified, 14-page version makes reference to anti-fracking programming broadcast by Kremlin-controlled news channel RT. "This is likely reflective of the Russian Government's concern about the impact of fracking and U.S. natural gas production on the global energy market and the potential challenges to Gazprom's profitability," the report says. Gazprom is a Russian natural gas giant.

Much of the rest of the case that Russia funneled money to U.S. green groups comes from a 2014 report created by the Environmental Policy Alliance, which describes itself as "devoted to uncovering the funding and hidden agendas behind environmental activist groups."

The group shares a Washington, D.C., address and a phone number with a public relations firm run by Richard Berman, a lawyer and former lobbyist who has also created issue groups such as the Center for Union Facts and Center for Consumer Freedom — prompting liberal critics to nickname him "the astroturf kingpin." CBS News once called him "Dr. Evil" in a 2011 piece focusing on his lobbying efforts on unpopular issues, including a campaign against Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

A representative of the Environmental Policy Alliance confirmed that Berman's firm manages the group.

The group's report and Smith's letter focus on $23 million that a Bermuda-based philanthropic firm, Klein Ltd., donated in 2010 and 2011 to the San Francisco-based Sea Change Foundation, according to information disclosed in Sea Change's IRS tax forms. Sea Change then awarded around $55 million in each of those years to the Sierra Club Foundation, U.S. Climate Action Network, Natural Resources Defense Council and other environmental groups to promote energy efficiency and climate change-related operations, according to its IRS tax filings.

"Although the source of Klein's capital has not been documented," the Science Committee's letter says, the panel alleged that various corporate and personal connections "strongly suggest" that the money originated with "the Russian government and energy sector."

But a lawyer representing Klein told POLITICO that none of the money came from sources connected to Russia. And a Sea Change spokesperson said none of its donations to environmental groups were earmarked for opposition to fracking.

"The Klein Foundation grants were given as general support and no requirement was made that the funds be used for specific projects, programs, or activities of the Sea Change Foundation," the spokesperson said.

Berman's report draws on a court case filed in the British Virgin Islands in the mid-2000s that resulted in a money-laundering conviction against IPOC Group, an entity owned by Leonid Reiman, Russia's former telecommunications minister and adviser to Putin, according to an outline of the case maintained by the World Bank. Roderick Forrest, a lawyer for Wakefield Quin, a law firm representing Klein Ltd., was one of IPOC's directors, according to case documents.

The House committee did not contact Klein as part of its fact-finding, a committee aide said. But Forrest railed against the accusations and said the company was considering legal action following the committee's letter.

"The allegations are completely false and irresponsible," Forrest told POLITICO. "We can state categorically that at no point did this philanthropic organization receive or expend funds from Russian sources or Russian-connected sources, and Klein has no Russian connection whatsoever."

The Sierra Club's Pierce also denied that any of the money it received from Sea Change ultimately came from Moscow.

"We have confirmed that the origin of these funds is a private U.S. donor who cares about climate change and has invested in the work the Sierra Club does to tackle the climate crisis and advance the clean energy economy — not from Russia," she said.

DOE seeks to buyout 35 EERE employees Back

By Darius Dixon | 07/21/2017 03:32 PM EDT

The Energy Department is looking for 35 employees in its Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy to take early retirement or buyout offers, according to a memo obtained by POLITICO and sent to agency staff this afternoon.

The memo, signed by Steven Chalk, EERE's deputy assistant secretary for operations, identifies 16 specific positions that qualify for early retirement and 97 that could seek buyouts at DOE's Golden, Colo., site and headquarters.

"This first window of opportunity will help align EERE staffing levels with recent program direction budget trends so that we are well-positioned entering FY 2018," Chalk states. "[R]equests will be approved based on EERE organizational needs and program requirements that help reshape EERE to be more efficient.

The applications are to be submitted by Aug. 15 with a resignation date before Sept. 30.

DOE spokesperson Shaylyn Hynes said the request was designed "to align staffing levels with FY 17 program direction appropriations. No additional actions will be taken until we know the outcome of the FY 18 appropriations process."

However, Congress approved a slight spending increase for EERE when lawmakers funded the remainder of fiscal 2017 this spring.

E&E News first reported on the memo earlier this afternoon.

WHAT'S NEXT: Applications for the buyout and early retirement programs are due Aug. 15.

DOE blames budget for EERE buyouts Back

By Darius Dixon | 07/21/2017 05:40 PM EDT

DOE says a downward trend in congressional funding for managing the agency's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy triggered its decision to seek buyouts and early retirements from its staff today.

The "Program Direction" component of EERE's budget, which covers salaries and benefits, declined by 1 percent to $153.5 million from $155 million a year earlier. That program direction line has been shrinking since reaching $170 million in 2011.

Fiscal 2018 energy spending bills in Congress either keep program direction funds flat or call for cuts.

"In EERE's case, the program direction account decreased for the third year in a row and this adjustment through voluntary separations is necessary to match staffing levels with current appropriations," DOE said in an email.

Earlier today, EERE management told its staff that it's seeking 35 employees to either take buyouts or early retirements.

WHAT'S NEXT: Applications for the buyout and early retirement programs are due Aug. 15.

House appropriators advance energy and water spending bill Back

By Darius Dixon and Annie Snider | 07/12/2017 02:38 PM EDT

The House Appropriations Committee today approved a $37.56 billion fiscal 2018 energy and water spending bill that would end a popular Energy Department research program and includes a suite of policy riders decried by Democrats.

Appropriators advanced the bill on a voice vote.

The spending bill for the Department of Energy, Army Corps of Engineers and other agencies cuts $209 million from this year's spending levels, which is still $3.65 billion more than President Donald Trump proposed.

The measure would make deep cuts in DOE renewable energy programs, close out its Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program and stop DOE from issuing new loan guarantees.

The measure would provide $6.16 billion for the Army Corps, a 23 percent increase above Trump's request. It would make use of revenue collected through a barge industry fuel tax for new lock and dam projects and major upgrades, whereas Trump's budget would have left those funds untouched.

Democrats unsuccessfully tried to remove all of the riders from the measure, including one aimed at shielding the Trump administration's withdrawal of the Waters of the U.S. rule from legal challenges, one allowing firearms at Army Corps recreational sites, and one blocking implementation of a National Oceans Policy.

"The majority knows full well that the bulk of these policy riders are so contentious that Democrats cannot vote for bills that include them," said New York Rep. Nita Lowey, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee.

WHAT'S NEXT: The energy and water spending bill moves to the House Rules Committee and the House floor.

POLITICO Pro Q&A: Vincent DeVito, Zinke's energy policy counselor Back

By Esther Whieldon | 07/24/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Vincent DeVito, a former Boston-based energy lawyer and DOE staffer, returned to Washington in May as Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's energy policy counselor, a newly created position designed to help carry out President Donald Trump's promise to expand energy production and shrink regulations.

DeVito, who was on Zinke's congressional leadership PAC, sat down with POLITICO at his Washington office to outline his plans for getting Interior's agencies to break down their silos and streamline their energy permitting processes and regulations.

This transcript has been edited for length and clarity.

What is your strategy to put all the Interior Department's agencies and bureaus on the same page on energy issues?

What I'm doing here is making sure not only that we're branding the Department of Interior as the Department of Interior "energy" and making sure that folks know that we're not ashamed to wear our energy economy, or our energy resources, on our sleeve ... but also to make sure that within Interior, we're harmonizing across the agencies, bureaus, offices on not only the energy front, [but also] the environmental front, the permitting front.

I learned at the Department of Energy, [where] everybody is in a programmatic office ... they tend to be stovepipes. So they're all operating within their own and they're not interconnecting with each other in any way, shape or form. To have an inability to move the government because people didn't want to necessarily get out of their lane, for a lack of a better phrase, I found discomfoting. Here, we're not like that at all, which is interesting because we have been in the past.

What we've done is created a liaison type of system. So every agency office and bureau has designated one or two people throughout the department to dotted-line report to me, which allows communications from all aspects of energy issues to come to me. That ends up creating a fairly significant stream of information into the secretary's office on the energy portfolio that's never existed before.

Another purpose of the energy liaisons group is to give me some additional bandwidth. So I can process items with a little more information and do my own due diligence as well [regarding] where the numbers come from, what went into the modeling, so I make sure it's not garbage going in. [It ensures] the secretary can make rock-solid decisions when they get to him.

In speeches, Zinke often suggests he can take the Interior back to the days in 2008 when it was pulling in billions more in revenues than it is now. Yet the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management earlier this month lowered the royalties for leases in shallow waters off the Gulf of Mexico in the name of encouraging competition. How can the agency achieve its goal of significantly increasing revenues given that the energy market is in such a slump?

This is how I prioritize things: enhanced production, enhanced revenue, create jobs, environmental stewardship, none of which are mutually exclusive, none of which are contradictory. The fact that we're trying to enhance production and increase revenue by enhanced production is not deterred by market forces. Those are decisions to be made by investors.

We're also the department of common sense. So if something is practical and it makes sense to help us achieve our objectives, we're probably going to do it. If there's no investment, there are no revenues. If it encourages investment, then it will then create revenues and, as the second-largest generator of revenue for the federal government, it's something that we view as an important function for us.

Punitive policies have caused a decline in energy production on federal lands. Folks can't say that revenues are down because the markets declined. No, they were investing elsewhere because nobody wanted to do business with the federal government anymore, so federal government revenues went down.

I've got an anecdote [in which an investor said], "I can get something online in four months on private land, but if I do it through the federal government it's going to take me 18 months, if I'm lucky." Well, we're addressing that. Why would the timeline be so long? What we're trying to do is make the federal government a good partner, not only on the environmental stewardship side ... but also on the business side. I mean that's the key because folks do want to invest in federal land.

A recent order from Zinke aims to speed up permitting timelines to as little as 30 days. How will you meet that target, particularly for decisions that require environmental reviews, without risking having them thrown out by a court down the road?

There's a real opportunity to make that specific change, and it's one of the items that I'm absolutely focused on. Yes, we do want to shrink it down to 30 days and to make all the processes as short as possible, but at the same time, making sure our environmental stewardship is not breached, all of which is completely doable.

We're not a department of stovepipe agencies anymore. We're a department of collaborating agencies. When you have different offices and bureaus conducting their own environmental review and investors and other stakeholders have to deal with separate processes across the board to meet the same objective for the same project, that is sloppy government.

We intend to be a better business partner ... by harmonizing the environmental review process across the board, the one-stop-shopping type of model. This also applies to ... the five-year [offshore drilling] plan as well, so that we can shorten that process too.

The question is, can we supplement prior environmental reviews? Do we have to have such long gaps between stakeholder meetings, which are important? Can we speed up the process by shrinking the process, but at the same time making sure that what we do, our decisions, determinations, reports and planning have durability in terms of beyond the two terms of this administration but also durability for court review?

Zinke has said he is considering merging BOEM and the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement, which along with the Office of Natural Resources Revenue were spun out of the Minerals Management Service following the 2010 Deepwater Horizon oil spill disaster. What benefits might come from recombining BOEM and BSEE?

You can't set up these separate organizations and have them operate independently and expect optimal safety results or optimal operation results, so the thought behind all that is to at least make sure that folks are talking again.

Is Zinke considering getting the full MMS band back together — merging ONRR, BOEM and BSEE?

No, not that I'm aware of, but I am focused on that group, too. ONRR is an entity in itself that we're going to look at and see how it does business. The financial assurances [requirements for energy development], the program formula for that, is something we're looking at examining pretty aggressively.

The secretary has reinstated and expanded the scope of the agency's royalty policy committee to review rents and royalties for all types of energy. As chair of the committee that is close to launch, what issues do you want it to address first?

I think the first on the list may be the financial assurances. There's a few things we're kicking around, and we haven't finalized the initial agenda yet.

This is going to be a meaningful group. We're going to address substantive items. We're going to have a solid agenda. We're going to meet more than once a year — at least quarterly, I would say. The first meeting is going to be here [in Washington, D.C.], and I would hope the secretary participates in the first meeting at least.

Bernhardt nomination to Interior clears Senate hurdle Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 07/20/2017 03:37 PM EDT

The Senate voted 56-39 to invoke cloture on the nomination of Dave Bernhardt to the Interior Department's No. 2 position.

Six Democrats and independent Sen. Angus King of Maine voted along with Republicans to limit further debate on Bernhardt's nomination as Interior's deputy secretary. A confirmation vote is likely to come the evening of July 24.

Bernhardt has drawn fire from environmental and good-governance groups criticizing his past work as an oil and gas lobbyist and his time as Interior's solicitor under the George W. Bush administration.

He has more recently come under allegations of possibly violating lobbying disclosure laws. Bernhardt told senators he stopped lobbying on behalf of Westlands Water District after Nov. 18, 2016, but activists obtained emails under public records law showing Bernhardt continued to advise the district on legislation.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate likely will vote July 24 to confirm Bernhardt.

Meet the lab-coat liberals Back

By David Siders | 07/23/2017 06:55 AM EDT

LOS ANGELES — The lab-coat liberals are marching on Washington.

Dismayed by President Donald Trump's perceived hostility to climate science and other areas of research, a surge of scientists is entering the public arena and running for political office for the first time.

They represent an evolving brand of Democrat that has been gaining steam for months. What began with rogue Twitter accounts and protest marches has graduated into candidacies in House races in places as varied as California, Texas, Pennsylvania and New York.

The handful of scientists who have formally announced their candidacies so far — and the others who are preparing to join them — have cast themselves as a counterforce to the Trump administration's dismissal of climate science and de-prioritization of innovation funding.

But they are also stretching the boundaries of the scientific field into unfamiliar terrain. Researchers traditionally avoided wading into politics. Now, amid winds of anti-intellectualism, they are testing whether a significant number in their ranks can break through.

"It is past time for scientists to step up and get involved ... because that is the only way that we are going to change the course," said Shaughnessy Naughton, a cancer researcher-turned-business owner who twice ran unsuccessfully for Congress in Pennsylvania. She is the founder of 314 Action, a political action committee that helps people with scientific backgrounds run for office. "Traditionally, the attitude has been that science is above politics, and by getting involved in politics, it could possibly pollute science. My response to that is, 'How's that working for you?'"

Researchers have long bemoaned stagnating federal investment in innovation, and advocacy groups have existed for more than a decade to encourage scientists to become more active in civic affairs. But few current members of Congress come from backgrounds in math and science. Among the 435 members of the House, there are seven engineers, one physicist, one microbiologist and one chemist, according to the Congressional Research Service.

For many scientists, Trump's election marked a turning point. Researchers marched in protest throughout the world in April, and former New Jersey Congressman Rush Holt, a physicist and now chief executive of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, said he began fielding more calls from scientists considering running for public office.

"It's still not in the dozens [of prospective candidates]. But instead of two or three, it might be 12 or 15," Holt said. "There seems to be a general sense that policy is being made without sufficient attention to scientific evidence."

Trump, whose dismissal of mainstream climate science had already alarmed researchers, infuriated the scientific community when, soon after taking office, he proposed reducing non-defense research and development spending by about 19 percent, sharply curbing spending on climate and clean energy innovation and basic science and medical research.

Hans Keirstead, a pioneering stem-cell researcher who is running to unseat GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher in California's Orange County, said that when he "saw the budget and health care bills starting to come up, that's what tipped me over the edge."

Looking to Washington from a lab where his latest clinical trial on an ovarian cancer treatment is underway, Keirstead said of Congress, "I see it as a grander platform to do good."

While many researchers believe they hold a firmer grasp on science-related policy than politicians from other fields, the mechanics of an election remain largely unfamiliar — and there have been uneven starts to their campaigns.

Despite a torrent of media coverage surrounding her bid to unseat GOP Rep. Steve Knight in Southern California, geologist Jess Phoenix raised just more than $77,000 in the second quarter of this year. She told a small group of supporters soon after the fundraising period closed that she had finished strong and that the next quarter would be "even better." But other scientists have found the effort too taxing.

Patrick Madden, a computer scientist and university professor who recently abandoned his campaign to unseat Republican Rep. Claudia Tenney of New York, described a jolt when his department chair came to him "a little freaked out" that the university had received a public records request from a conservative opposition group for Madden's emails and other documents.

"In politics, it seems you get ahead by lying, by misleading, by misstating things," Madden said.

He said scientists have a "good skill set" for Congress and that the records request would not have dissuaded him. But he succumbed when it became apparent he could not raise enough money to run a competitive campaign.

"I was hassling all my friends, all my contacts, and it just didn't feel ... I don't want my life to revolve around money," Madden said. "To get up in the morning and worry about money, worry about money all day long — it was no fun."

By one measure, scientists would appear exceptionally well-positioned to run for public office. Seventy-six percent of Americans say they have at least a fair amount of confidence in scientists generally to act in the best interests of the public, according to a Pew Research Center poll last year. That level of confidence outpaces religious and business leaders, educators, the news media and elected officials.

But Pew has also documented wide differences in opinion between scientists and the public on issues ranging from evolution to vaccines and the safety of genetically modified foods. And other research suggests that if scientists wade too deeply into politics, public confidence in them might fall.

Jon Krosnick, a Stanford University professor who has studied public opinion on climate change, has found in surveys that when natural scientists stray from pure science and offer policy prescriptions related to their work, trust in those scientists erodes. And scientists who engage in politics face the additional problem of communicating with lay people unaccustomed to the dialogue of a university or a lab.

"You know, the premise of having more scientists in Congress is an interesting one," said Jennilee Brown, a Republican strategist in Los Angeles who studied chemistry as an undergraduate student. "Initially, I would say that's a fantastic idea because scientists are very used to looking at complex situations and ... finding solutions to things."

However, Brown said, "Where I question scientists running for Congress is more in their ... power of public persuasion."

Joe Trippi, a Democratic strategist who sits on 314's board and has been working with a handful of scientist candidates, said Friday that the challenge for scientists is no different than for lawyers or elected politicians, all of whom must learn to leave their profession's jargon behind when talking with voters. But in contrast to Trump, he said, scientists may cut an especially appealing profile.

"In this environment Trump is setting, where everything is a rhetorical Twitter stream," Trippi said, "I actually think people talking common sense based on the facts ... may be where a sweet spot is" in 2018.

Naughton's political action committee said it is working with 10 congressional candidates and has heard from thousands of people who are interested in running for office at some level. They have hosted candidate trainings to address messaging, fundraising and other tactical concerns, and they have helped candidates find strategists and other advisers to work on their campaigns.

Phoenix, the geologist, said scientists have to work harder to "humanize" their issues, reflecting a view among some academics that without concerted outreach, science can seem out of touch. In a campaign, Phoenix said, "Even if you can't get people excited about, you know, 'Save the whales,'" she said, "you can say, 'Do you want your kids going outside at recess? Yes? OK, then we need to have protections for air quality in place.'"

Andrew Hoffman, a University of Michigan professor who has written about the role of scholars in public life, said many scientists are unprepared to step into the bruising field of politics, with debates that are "much messier" than in evidence-based research. But, like Holt, he said he senses that is changing.

The scientific community is "facing a crisis of relevance, and scientists are starting to feel compelled to stand up for it," Hoffman said.

In Congress, Rep. Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.), a wind energy consultant, said last week that "it would be helpful to have more STEM people in both parties, really," saying that "would help us with some of these technical issues."

His own doctorate in mathematics, McNerney said, has given him "a perspective and an appreciation for science and research and what's possible in a technical field," informing his opinion about matters ranging from telecommunications to nuclear energy and data security.

But he acknowledged that when he was first seeking election — as the current crop of scientist candidates is now — his background did not afford him a ready-made network for a political campaign.

"For one thing, people in STEM ... generally shy away from political involvement. So generating support ... developing a support network and getting the sort of grass-roots support that I needed was a real challenge."

Elaine DiMasi, an experimental physicist who has taken a leave from Brookhaven National Laboratory to weigh a run against Republican Rep. Lee Zeldin of New York, said that after watching her friend Madden withdraw from his race, "I think I understand how difficult it's going to be."

DiMasi, who is planning to burn through savings to support herself while campaigning for the rest of the year, said her father was "horrified" at her decision.

"He said, 'You're going to give up your job and be a politician?'" DiMasi said. "And I said, 'I'm going to be a scientist with a job as a legislator working on policy.'"

DiMasi said her parents eventually came around. Perhaps more important for her congressional campaign, she added, "They're donors."

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by Chevron: FERC sets quick timeframe to consider Perry's request — Trump heads to Puerto Rico today — Heavyweights weigh in on solar tariffs today
Date: Tuesday, October 03, 2017 5:44:42 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 10/03/2017 05:41 AM EDT

With help from Eric Wolff, Lauren Gardner and Alex Guillén

FERC AIMS FOR QUICK WORK: FERC is asking for initial comments on DOE's proposed rule that would benefit nuclear and coal-fired power plants to be submitted in just three weeks — a timeline that suggests the independent commission is eager to move quickly on the Trump administration's proposal that is already generating push-back from a diverse group of major industry players. In a notice out late Monday, FERC set an Oct. 23 comment deadline and said reply comments would be due by Nov. 7.

Energy super-group says slow down: Representatives of oil, natural gas, wind, solar and other sectors urged FERC in a Monday letter to pump the brakes on Energy Secretary Rick Perry's request for a quick turnaround on the new rules, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "This is one of the most significant proposed rules in decades related to the energy industry and, if finalized, would unquestionably have significant ramifications for wholesale markets under the Commission's jurisdiction," wrote the 11 groups, including the American Petroleum Institute, Solar Energy Industries Association and Electric Power Supply Association. They called Secretary Rick Perry's proposed timeline "unreasonable on its face."

Murkowski seems lukewarm: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski also seemed lukewarm to Perry's push, saying in a statement she respects "Secretary Perry for taking an action that he believes is necessary" and "will be following the proceedings closely" at FERC.

DOE's proposal should be a hot topic on the Hill today. The House Science Committee takes a look at grid resilience at a hearing at 10 a.m. in Rayburn 2318. Then this afternoon a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee will hear a wide variety perspectives on reliability in a changing electric sector, including representatives of the coal and nuclear industries as well as several of the groups who signed that letter, at 2 p.m. in Rayburn 2123.

TRUMP HEADS TO PUERTO RICO TODAY: President Donald Trump heads to the devastated island of Puerto Rico today even as information released Monday by the federal government hints at the lengthy recovery road ahead. Puerto Rican Gov. Ricardo Rosselló said at a news conference that just one in 10 of the island's nearly 3.5 million people are likely to have power within two weeks, and only a quarter of the island should have the lights on by next month. It's a similarly dire situation for drinking water: 47 percent of residents have potable drinking water right now, though Rosselló said that number should climb to around 60 percent by the end of the week.

The president summed up his view of the situation Monday. "It's been amazing what's been done in a very short period of time on Puerto Rico. There's never been a piece of land that we've known that was so devastated," Trump said in Oval Office remarks. "The bridges are down, the telecommunications was nonexistent, and it's in very, very bad shape. The electrical grid, as you know, was totally destroyed. But we've gotten tremendous amounts of food and water, and lots of other things — supplies — generally speaking, on the island." The White House said San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz, who drew Trump's wrath over the weekend, has been invited to events with him today.

Disaster relief request coming: Meanwhile, the Trump administration is expected to by the end of this week request between $10 billion to $15 billion to respond to the disaster, Playbook reports.

The Center for American Progress today is out with a policy roadmap for lawmakers as they consider the next round of assistance for Puerto Rico and other areas impacted by hurricanes. They urge Congress to enact policies to improve resiliency, update flood risk information and prioritize underserved communities, among other ideas, rather than just throwing money at the problem.

PERMANENT JONES ACT REPRIVE? Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on Monday fast-tracked potential consideration of legislation S. 1894 \(115\) that would permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act, which bans foreign-flagged ships from traveling between U.S. ports. After sustained pressure, Trump granted a 10-day Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico last week.

ITC TO GET AN EARFUL ON REMEDY FOR THAT SOLAR BURN: The U.S. International Trade Commission will hear arguments this morning about how to best level the playing field for U.S. solar manufacturers, and it looks like it's going to be quite a show, with hours' worth of speakers lined up. The commission found last week that U.S. solar manufacturing had been harmed by cheap solar imports, over the objections of the rest of the solar industry.

In this corner, for the installers: The Solar Energy Industries Association, along with solar producer SunPower, told the ITC in its brief that a tariff will result in the loss of 62,800 jobs in 2018 and 80,000 jobs in later years. Sen. Martin Heinrich will bat for the no-tariffs team, along with a laundry list of SEIA witnesses. They will also be backed by representatives from the embassies of China, Korea, Brazil, and Mexico.

And in this corner, for the petitioners: In their public briefs, Suniva and SolarWorld Americas offered the commission two choices: A tariff plus a price floor for solar cells, or a tariff plus a quota. Sen. Ron Wyden and Rep. Suzanne Bonamici, both of Oregon, will speak in support of their home-state SolarWorld, which wants tariffs and a price floor. "I urge the Commission to recommend a remedy robust enough to repair the serious injury already experienced by the U.S. solar manufacturing sector and to ensure its long-term growth and competitiveness," Wyden will say according to an excerpt of his statement obtained by ME. "In practical terms, that means identifying a remedy that helps to revive a domestic manufacturing sector central to our leadership in energy innovation yet long under siege."

And First Solar shall be first: SEIA also locates a winner if tariffs are imposed, Arizona-based thin film manufacturer First Solar, which does much of its manufacturing in Malaysia. "Thin-film solar directly competes with CSPV solar in the marketplace. Consequently, global trade restrictions on [crystalline silicon photovoltaic] would raise rivals' costs and drive customers toward First Solar's products, strengthening First Solar's already strong hand."

MORE CONCERNS RAISED OVER RFS POTENTIAL CHANGES: Nearly all major biofuel trades and the corn growers are out with a letter this morning to Trump urging him to abandon "drastic, unprecedented changes" to change the Renewable Fuel Standard that they said would benefit a select few petroleum refiners. "The proposed changes are inconsistent with the law and threaten the growth and prosperity of the U.S. biofuels industry," wrote signatories of the letter, including National Corn Growers Association, Renewable Fuels Association and Growth Energy. "EPA's changes are also inconsistent with Administrator Pruitt's assurances to uphold the law and your long-standing support of ethanol and the RFS." EPA released a notice last week suggesting it might reduce the already set 2018 biomass-based biodiesel requirement and shrink the mandate in 2019.

Grassley confirms Trump conversation: Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley told reporters he discussed his concern over potential changes to the RFS during a Friday phone conversation with Trump. "They're trying to respond to big oil and not take into consideration the needs of alternative energy, biofuels," he said. "Cutting back on the mandate isn't a way you're going to encourage capital and capital is what we need now to get pumps to pump E15 instead of E10."

Seems relevant: The White House previously granted EPA deputy general counsel Erik Baptist, a senior counsel to the American Petroleum Institute for more than six years, an ethics waiver to work on RFS issues given his "expertise in this program and its policy and implementation." Copy of that waiver here.

NO OZONE DESIGNATIONS AS DEADLINE PASSES: EPA appears to have missed the Oct. 1 deadline to say which parts of the U.S. meet the 2015 ozone standard and which don't, a key step toward implementing the regulation. The agency is remaining mum; a spokesperson told ME Monday that there is "no further information" on when the designations will be released. The matter has been controversial for months, ever since Administrator Scott Pruitt said he would delay the designations by a year — a delay he later reversed following lawsuits from Democratic attorneys general and environmental groups. (The 2015 standard itself is also under review, with no specific timeline attached.) It may be a while before green groups can take Pruitt to court. The Clean Air Act requires them to provide EPA with 60 days' notice before filing a lawsuit over a missed deadline, meaning any suit couldn't be filed until December at the earliest.

Also adding uncertainty to the process is a pending proposed rule at OMB that appears to set new thresholds for how EPA classifies ozone areas. That rule arrived at OMB on Sept. 21. EPA had previously proposed classification details last November that the agency characterized as only minor changes to the implementation rules for the 2008 ozone standard. An EPA spokesperson declined to comment on a rule under review at OMB.

DOE's Perry pushes FERC to support coal power plants Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/29/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The Trump administration on Friday called on FERC to create new rules to protect coal-fired and nuclear power plants that are being squeezed by cheaper natural gas and renewable sources, saying they were "indispensable for economic and national security."

Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who told miners in Pennsylvania on Thursday that "it's time for coal in this country to be revived," pressed electricity regulators to alter power markets and protect the resilience of the power grid with payments to generators that keep fuel supplies on site, a clear reference to the coal-fired and nuclear power plants.

The proposal, which DOE said gave FERC 60 days to create a final or interim rule, comes just a month after Perry's agency issued a report saying FERC should "expedite" its work with grid operators to ensure the stability of the nation's power network.

"In terms of process, this is a pretty bold move," said Tony Clark, a Republican former FERC commissioner. DOE often conducts studies on issues it believes need attention, he said, but "actually forwarding to the commission something specific for action is a pretty bold way of moving the issue right up the batting order at FERC."

The new proposal, directed at FERC under a rarely used Section 403 authority of the Department of Energy Organization Act, stops short of specifically seeking market incentives for coal. But it calls for full-cost recovery for power generating units that provide essential power and "ancillary" services — and have a 90-day fuel supply on site in case of natural or man-made disruptions. That would exclude most natural gas power plants, which do not typically keep large fuel inventories on hand and instead receive supplies via pipeline.

Perry's request represents a departure from the two decades of U.S. policy that has trended toward more market-based tools, which has helped natural gas to nearly double its power market share. Renewable energy sources like wind and solar, though still modest when compared to fossil fuels or nuclear power, have also grown quickly as federal incentives helped drive down their costs.

But the growth of renewables and natural gas — combined with tighter pollution controls and weak new demand for electricity — has forced hundreds of old coal-fired power plants into retirement. Nuclear power plants in some parts of the country are also under financial pressure, hurt by negative wholesale power market prices that sometimes require the plant owners to pay to deliver their power supplies.

"If this gets the debate started, then my hat's off," said former FERC Chairman Pat Wood, a friend of Perry and a strong advocate for market-based power systems. "But it's a pretty arresting [thing] to wake up and read. That would never have played in Texas. ... If there is a service to be valued, then a market can value that."

In the grid study ordered by Perry and released in August, DOE experts pointed to low power prices and cheap natural gas as the single biggest reason for coal ceding its position as the nation's biggest source of electricity. And that report also called for "reforms" to power markets that would help bolster the electricity network's resilience by easing the financial pressures on many power providers.

In its Friday proposal, DOE cited a spike in demand during the 2014 "polar vortex" that hit much of the U.S., which prompted utilities to run many coal plants that were slated for retirement. Without those plants, as many as 65 million people in the PJM market would have seen their power resources threatened, DOE said.

But the new regulatory pitch from the agency also fueled the growing feud between the gas and coal industries.

Paul Bailey, president and CEO American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, commended Perry for "initiating a rulemaking by FERC that will finally value the on-site fuel security provided by the coal fleet."

But the American Petroleum Institute, which also represents natural gas producers, said DOE drew the wrong conclusions from the 2014 event, and that forcing new mandates on the power market wasn't the solution.

"[A]s we review the proposal we are concerned the agency has mischaracterized the lessons learned from past weather-related events and appears to suggest that additional regulation is the answer where markets have already proven the ability to greatly benefit consumers and give our electric system the flexibility needed to meet constantly, and often rapidly, changing electricity demands," said API Executive Vice President and Chief Strategy Officer Marty Durbin in a statement.

FERC, which has struggled to integrate states' energy policies that aim to boost renewables or support aging nuclear power plants, has long maintained a fuel-neutral stance in the regional markets that it oversees. If it were to follow Perry's directive to create incentives for grid resilience to plants that maintain their own fuel inventories on site, it would be an implicit move at the national level to alter the electricity markets to support the fuels that both Perry and Trump have touted.

Montana regulator Travis Kavulla suggested on Twitter that rather than deal with the pressing issues facing the grid, "Instead, this reform is sort of the @ENERGY equivalent of the Oprah "you get a car, and you get a car. And you? A car!" approach."

However, FERC, whose members are appointed by the president and operate as an independent body, isn't obligated to implement the specific policy pushed by Perry. The commission will so be back to operating with a full five members in the coming weeks, with a Republican majority.

"FERC's going to follow its own procedures," said Marc Spitzer, a Republican former FERC commissioner. "It would be a mistake for people to assume that this is going to be some partisan Republican rubber stamp given the way FERC works."

FERC can spend months or years digging into complex issues that underpin the power markets, and its commissioners tend to seek common ground with each other to ensure that its rules are clear and ensure long-lasting regulations that give utilities stability to plan their operations.

"Is someone really going to invest [billions of dollars] when it's a 3-2 vote that partisans and the parties can flip next year? Is that a good forum for investment as opposed to a 5-0 order?" Spitzer said.

FERC declined to say when the agency last received a rulemaking from DOE using Section 403.

Gas, oil, renewables, utility groups ask FERC to lengthen debate on DOE pricing rule

By Darius Dixon | 10/02/2017 05:43 PM EDT

Nearly a dozen energy-related trade associations are pleading with FERC today to pump the breaks on an Energy Department request for rules that would benefit nuclear and coal-fired power plants, calling the Trump administration's proposed timeline "unreasonable on its face."

DOE last week asked FERC to quickly implement a proposal mandating payments to power plants for their on-site fuel stocks. Today, representatives of oil, natural gas, wind, solar and other sectors were unified in their opposition to that time frame.

"This is one of the most significant proposed rules in decades related to the energy industry and, if finalized, would unquestionably have significant ramifications for wholesale markets under the Commission's jurisdiction," wrote the 11 groups, including the American Petroleum Institute, Solar Energy Industries Association and Electric Power Supply Association. DOE's time frame is "wholly unreasonable and insufficient to allow for an informed consideration of the significant issues proposed therein."

DOE directed FERC to take "final action" on the proposal within 60 days of its publication in the Federal Register, and make it take effect within 30 days after that. Alternately, DOE said regulators should institute it as an interim final rule with the potential for later changes.

The groups, which have asked for FERC to convene a technical conference and offer a 90-day comment period, said the commission "is justified in setting its own schedule for seeking comments on the NOPR, should it choose to notice it or a similar proposed rule for comment at all."

WHAT'S NEXT: The timeline on DOE's proposed rule will start once it's published in the Federal Register, but it is unclear when that might be.

White House: Trump to allow foreign ships to supply Puerto Rico Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/28/2017 08:59 AM EDT

President Donald Trump will grant a 10-day waiver to the Jones Act to allow non-U.S.-flagged ships to transport supplies to Puerto Rico in a bid to speed the commonwealth's recovery from Hurricane Maria's devastation.

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders announced the waiver Thursday morning via Twitter and said "it will go into effect immediately."

Puerto Rico had petitioned the Department of Homeland Security for a waiver as it struggles with shortages of water and fuel. The administration denied that request two days ago, and the president told reporters Wednesday that, "we have a lot of shippers and a lot of people and a lot of people who work in the shipping industry that don't want the Jones Act lifted."

Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló had continued to press the U.S. government for a waiver, including on morning cable news television on Thursday. Senate Republicans John McCain of Arizona and Marco Rubio of Florida also called for the relief, as did most congressional Democrats.

Later Thursday morning House Democrats pushed Trump for more.

"The waiving of the Jones Act was a good idea, but we want to stretch it out to be longer than ... 10 days," Rep. Jose Serrano (D-N.Y.) said. "Much longer than that."

McCain and Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) introduced legislation today to permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act.

Lawmakers argued that more help was needed from the military as well, needling Trump over reports from Puerto Rico that there's not enough support from the federal government to distribute supplies sitting in the capital of San Juan.

The military response continues to gradually ramp up after the repeated calls from Congress and the commonwealth government.

The deputy commander for the regional Department of Defense command coordinating relief efforts, Brig. Gen. Rich Kim, is scheduled to arrive in Puerto Rico on Thursday. The USS Comfort, a naval hospital ship, will depart Norfolk, Va., on Friday for Puerto Rico.

But that didn't satisfy lawmakers calling for more.

In a letter sent Thursday afternoon, Rubio pushed for Trump to use his constitutional authority as commander in chief to increase the military's involvement in coordinating disaster relief efforts.

"There is no clear command, control, and communication between local officials on the ground and federal agencies, and many roads and bridges remained unpassable, making it even more difficult for repair crews to restore power and communications to areas of the island outside of San Juan," Rubio wrote. That has resulted in "lifesaving supplies sitting in containers rather than being distributed upon arrival," he wrote.

"This unique situation requires a well-coordinated response led by the Department of Defense (DOD), which is the only entity capable of executing a recovery effort of this scale and complexity," he said. "I urge you, as commander-in-chief, to make DOD the lead agency in the ground phase of recovery efforts."

"We have the resources," said Congressional Hispanic Caucus Chair Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-N.M.), referring to the U.S.

The number of Americans affected by Hurricane Maria in the Caribbean is equivalent to "the combined populations of the states of Wyoming, Vermont and Alaska," she added. "I have no doubt that the responses to those states in this situation would be far different than the situation we're having today."

Several states have offered to help deploy their own personnel to help Puerto Rico, and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus chair said House Democrats were looking for ways to expedite that.

In an interview with CBS, Rene Plasencia, a Republican in the Florida state house who accompanied emergency responders to Puerto Rico, said those responders could not get transportation from officials on the ground to provide help.

"We've been trying to get [rescue] planes in [from Florida] since last Friday," Plasencia said.

Democrats also criticized Trump's remarks earlier this week that delivering emergency supplies to Puerto Rico is difficult because it's an island.

"Well, you built a golf course there so you certainly knew where it was," Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) said. He was referring to a Trump brand golf course that went bankrupt a few years after the president began his involvement with the project, leaving the commonwealth government on the hook for millions in debt.

"Mr. President, talk to your national security team," Serrano said. "They certainly had plans for 50 years to invade an island in the Caribbean," he said, referring to Cuba. "So they know how to get troops and the military into an island."

Talk has already begun in Congress around an aid package. Some on the left want a suspension of the law that Congress passed last year to allow the commonwealth to restructure its $70 billion in bond debt that also instituted an unpopular federal oversight board. But Republicans, who have promised ample disaster relief funding when a request comes from the Trump administration, would likely reject that.

Rep. Nydia Velazquez (D-N.Y.) estimated that $50-$70 billion would be needed to rebuild Puerto Rico, and Gutierrez pushed for the federal government to pick up the total bill for the cash-strapped island, likening it to a sick patient in the hospital.

"It's bankrupt," Gutierrez said. "There is no money in Puerto Rico to make copayments."

"This is Katrina 2017," he said.

White House praises solar manufacturers in statement on trade decision Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/22/2017 01:15 PM EDT

The White House praised the role of U.S. solar manufacturing in providing "energy security and economic prosperity" in its response to a federal trade panel's finding today that will give President Donald Trump the final word on setting tariffs and quotas on solar imports.

In a unanimous vote, the U.S. International Trade Commission said domestic panel and cell makers had been harmed by cheap imports, agreeing with the petition filed by Suniva and SolarWorld USA.

"The President will examine the facts and make a determination that reflects the best interests of the United States," said Natalie Strom, a White House spokeswoman. "The U.S. solar manufacturing sector contributes to our energy security and economic prosperity."

Solar manufacturing made up 13 percent of the 260,000 jobs in the solar industry was the slowest growing segment between 2010 and 2016, according to the 2016 National Solar Job Census from the nonprofit Solar Foundation.

WHAT'S NEXT: The commission will send recommendations for tariffs to the president by Nov. 13.

Suniva, SolarWorld modify remedy proposal in trade case Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/28/2017 07:20 PM EDT

Suniva and SolarWorld USA are pressing a U.S. trade panel to recommend that President Donald Trump institute either a floor price for imported solar equipment or tariffs plus a quota that caps the amount of solar panels and cells that can enter the country.

The two solar panel manufacturers filed a joint brief to the U.S. International Trade Commission, and each recommended different remedies, though they said that either option could be selected.

Suniva recommends a price floor for all solar modules that starts at 74 cents per watt and declines over the four years of the tariff, as well as tariffs for both modules and the solar cells. SolarWorld said it was seeking a a quota of 220 MW on imported cells and 5,700 MW on imported modules.

"Both co-petitioners agree that an effective remedy must include either the co-petitioners' requested tariff plus Suniva's requested module floor price or the co-petitioners' requested tariff plus SolarWorld's requested quota," the companies said in a joint statement.

Briefs were due on Wednesday to the ITC, and the companies publicly released their proposals to today, excluding proprietary company information.

The ITC voted unanimously last week that low-cost imports had harmed the domestic solar manufacturing industry. Under the "safeguard" provisions of the Trade Act, Trump will have the final say in what tariffs to impose.

WHAT'S NEXT: The commission will have a hearing on remedies on Oct. 3.

Biofuel producers unite against potential EPA biodiesel cuts Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/27/2017 06:57 PM EDT

Biofuels producers and their farm-state backers in Congress are keeping the pressure on EPA, accusing the agency of betraying President Donald Trump's promises to back the Renewable Fuel Standard after the agency signaled it would cut its biodiesel volume mandates.

EPA's Tuesday notice seeking input on whether to reduce the already set 2018 biomass-based biodiesel requirement and shrink the mandate in 2019 is drawing opposition from both biodiesel and ethanol producers, who say EPA's move marks its second attempt to undermine the program this year.

The new EPA notice has already driven down prices for biofuel credits, which are used by refiners to meet the obligations under the RFS. That's a boon to refiners like CVR Energy, the company owned by former Trump adviser Carl Icahn who had joined with other fuel processors like Valero Energy earlier this year in an unsuccessful effort to shift the compliance burden of the RFS away from their companies.

Trump has repeatedly offered public support for ethanol producers and the RFS, and just last month, he told Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) to assure Iowans he had their backs on the RFS — a position Trump staked out early in his presidential campaign and which helped him carry Iowa and other Midwestern states.

On Wednesday, Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) blasted the new EPA move, saying in a letter to Trump that the biodiesel cut would be "bad for American farmers, American manufacturing and American rural communities," adding that she hoped "that your EPA has not forgotten about the pledges that were made to my constituents and to farmers across the country."

That letter came a day after Grassley said the proposal "seems like a bait-and-switch from the EPA's prior proposal and from assurances from President Trump himself and Cabinet secretaries in my office. ... This all gives me a strong suspicion that Big Oil and oil refineries are prevailing, despite assurances to the contrary."

And biodiesel makers are drawing strong support from the ethanol industry, who see the EPA's move as a step toward undercutting the RFS.

"This would undermine renewable fuel production in the U.S. and cause severe harm to our friends in the biodiesel industry," Robert Walther, vice president of federal advocacy for ethanol producer POET, told POLITICO. "That harm would radiate throughout the entire biofuel value chain from starch biofuel plants, to cellulosic facilities now scaling up, to the corn and soybean farmers who voted overwhelmingly for Trump."

In its Tuesday notice, EPA relied on letters from Valero, the American Petroleum Institute, and the American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers to argue the agency expects biodiesel prices to climb because of the expiration of a tax credit last year — as well as the new tariffs the administration is putting on biodiesel imports from Argentina and Indonesia.

As a result, the agency asked for comment on revising down the amount of biodiesel to be used in 2018 by 15 percent, and on setting 2019 biodiesel requirements possibly as low as the 1 billion gallon floor laid out in the law, less than half the original 2018 level of 2.1 billion gallons.

Biodiesel credits are linked to the ethanol credits — called Renewable Identification Numbers — since U.S. ethanol producers typically fall short of supplying the volumes required under the RFS program. Oil refiners then must buy biodiesel RINs to meet requirements, according to research by University of Illinois economist Scott Irwin.

While corn ethanol credit prices are cheaper than biodiesel RINs, the two tend to move in tandem, so the effect of EPA's notice on RIN prices for ethanol, advanced biofuel and biodiesel was immediate: a 20 percent decline in prices for credits of biodiesel and ethanol after EPA's notice, according to the fuel price tracking service OPIS.

The proposal to cut the biomass-based fuel shocked the biodiesel makers such as Gene Gebolys, CEO of World Energy, who said the industry "froze" as soon as the notice came out.

"The more baffling part is Trump has been consistently supportive of the RFS, over and over and over and over again, he has been supportive of the RFS," he said. "This has been a frontal assault on the RFS. You have to ask yourself, is EPA taking direction from the White House or the oil industry?"

EPA also did not respond to a request for comment. Nor did API or Valero, both of whom EPA cited in its notice, although the AFPM trade association was pleased by the action.

"EPA is on the right track in adjusting renewable fuel requirements," AFPM CEO Chet Thompson said in a statement. "This proposal more appropriately advances Congress's stated purpose of bolstering America's energy independence. American drivers shouldn't have to shoulder more costs to help foreign biofuel producers."

But ethanol producers think EPA may be putting key states in play if it follows through and makes cuts to biodiesel.

"If I am a Democrat thinking of taking Trump on in Iowa and Wisconsin in 2020, I am licking my chops," Walther from POET said.

Grijalva asks Interior IG to include Zinke's wife in travel probe Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/02/2017 04:10 PM EDT

Two House Democrats are calling on the Interior Department's inspector general to investigate how often Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife joined him on taxpayer-funded charter or military flights in light of her involvement in a Republican Senate campaign.

Lolita Zinke is chairing the campaign of Troy Downing, a businessman who is vying to unseat Sen. Jon Tester next year.

"Because the secretary's spouse is leading a senate campaign in Montana, tax-payer funded travel for Mrs. Zinke, especially to or from Montana, deserves heightened scrutiny," wrote Raúl M. Grijalva and Donald McEachin in a letter today to Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall, the top watchdog within Interior. Grijalva is the top Democrat on the House Natural Resources Committee, and McEachin is ranking member of its oversight subcommittee.

POLITICO reported earlier today that the IG's office has opened an investigation into Zinke's travels.

The inspector general's office has not decided on the scope of its investigation but it is "focused on the secretary's travel at this point," said Nancy DiPaolo, IG spokeswoman. The investigation, which was launched Friday, "is at its earliest phases," she said. "We'll likely be looking into travel, modes of travel, costs and schedules, etc."

STB clears way for California city to block oil train facility Back

By Lauren Gardner | 09/21/2016 06:41 PM EDT

The Surface Transportation Board declined this week to block a California city from rejecting a plan to build a facility that would enable more oil trains to pass through the area, but only because the project's owner was an energy company, not a railroad.

Oil refiner Valero Energy had petitioned the STB to step in and prevent Benicia, Calif., from denying the company permits to build the facility in the city, which is also home to one of the company's refineries.

Environmentalists cheered the Tuesday rejection as a victory in their effort to encourage local governments — which fear catastrophes like the oil train explosion in Lac Megantic, Quebec, that killed 47 people in 2013 — to reject projects that could bring vast quantities of crude oil through their communities.

The regulator is likely to find itself at the center of future high-profile cases like this since trains remain one of the most viable methods of transporting oil, much like the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has become a hotbed of controversy as green groups have sought to block permits for pipelines that ship fossil fuels.

But STB made it clear that its members rebuffed Valero in this instance only because it was not a rail carrier, nor was it handling transportation services for one, and therefore does not fall under the board's jurisdiction.

STB's decision that interstate commerce law doesn't allow it to preempt the Benicia government from denying the permits to Valero came hours ahead of a unanimous city council vote scuttling the project.

It's not yet clear whether Valero will take its fight to court. A company spokeswoman said executives are "considering our options moving forward."

"After nearly four years of review and analysis by independent experts and the city, we are disappointed that the city council members have chosen to reject the crude by rail project," Valero spokeswoman Lillian Riojas said.

STB's decision included guidance that even if Benicia had approved the permits, the bayside city near San Francisco wouldn't have carte blanche to impose conditions on Valero, since they could "unreasonably" bleed into operations by Union Pacific, the freight railroad the refiner planned to have service the offloading facility.

"As an initial matter, any attempt to regulate UP's rail operations on its lines would be categorically preempted," STB wrote. "Otherwise, state and local regulation is permissible where it does not unreasonably interfere with rail transportation."

If circumstances changed and the railroad were to build or own the offloading facility project, "then it would clearly be preempted by the federal law," Karen Torrent, federal legislative director at the Environmental Law and Policy Center, said of Benicia's permit denial.

The Association of American Railroads declined to comment on Tuesday's decision, but it had voiced its support for Valero's petition in July, expressing concern that a "patchwork" of rules among states and localities could stymie freight operations.

"This case now presents the Board with the situation where state and local permitting requirements are being applied to rail-served customer facilities with the purpose of controlling — and often preventing — rail transportation," AAR attorney Timothy J. Strafford wrote.

Jackie Prange, a Natural Resources Defense Council staff attorney, said the ruling has broader implications because local governments in California and the Pacific Northwest grappling with similar projects have monitored the Benicia case.

The San Luis Obispo County Planning Commission is scheduled to hold its final hearing Thursday on a proposal by refiner Phillips 66 to bring millions of gallons of crude per week into its Santa Maria refinery by train. The company asked the county last month to delay the hearing, anticipating that STB would not have issued its decision in the Benicia case by now, according to a local report.

Staff at the county commission have recommended that officials reject the project.

SCRUTINY MOUNTS OF PRUITT'S HABITS: Critics of EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt increasingly see a chief who avoids contact with the broader public and distrusts even his own agency's career staff, opting instead for meetings with like-minded industry and political leaders that could prove useful in a future political run, Pro's Emily Holden and Alex Guillén report. The Trump administration doesn't consider Pruitt's $58,000 in charter and military flight expenses to be as troubling as former HHS Secretary Tom Price's and now consider the controversy resolved after Price's resignation last week, one administration official said.

Environmentalists and other critics say Pruitt's spending is at best tone-deaf given agency budget reductions and at worst speaks to paranoia. Christine Todd Whitman, a Republican who ran EPA during President George W. Bush's first term, said she recalls taking chartered planes only while visiting remote areas of Alaska that were otherwise inaccessible. "Most people have to wait in line for a long time for planes," Whitman said. "The fact that you just turn around and order a private plane ... that starts to look really problematic. It's a lot of money." The agency said the flights were all cleared by ethics officials and say Pruitt's unprecedented around-the-clock security protection is necessary given increased threats.

Others point to who he met with as especially revealing. An analysis of Pruitt's broader schedule shows he's met most often with oil and gas executives, followed by agriculture and farming interests. And the former Oklahoma attorney general has paid especially close attention to his home state. Of at least 30 meetings or speaking engagements Pruitt had with oil and gas executives or trade groups, seven appear to have connections to Oklahoma. He's also spoken at events or held calls with right-wing policy groups that spend little of their time on environmental issues, such as the Family Research Council, Council for National Policy, State Policy Network and Federalist Society.

PRUITT LIEUTENANTS HOP ONTO HOTSEAT: Sparks are guaranteed to fly as Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hears from four EPA nominees and an NRC candidate today. Expect Democrats to pay close attention to William Wehrum, the EPA air nominee, and his long history as an industry attorney, the same issue that kept him from this post in the pre-nuclear option George W. Bush era. Since leaving EPA a decade ago, Wehrum's client list is a who's who of industry groups, including the American Petroleum Institute, American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers and the Utility Air Regulatory Group. Wehrum just last week helped industry groups challenge OSHA's silica rule in court — though the judges indicated they weren't buying his arguments that the agency had failed to prove new health benefits.

Heavy focus expected on Dourson: The other nominee likely to face heat is Michael Dourson, nominee for EPA chemicals and pesticides chief. The job will be vital as EPA works to implement the reformed Toxic Substances Control Act. Critics were also incensed when Pruitt earlier this year rejected agency scientists' suggestion to ban the pesticide chlorpyrifos.

Dourson's work as an independent toxicologist often concluded that safe levels of various chemicals and pesticides were significantly higher than the findings of government and university scientists. Dourson is also the author of a series of self-described "science-Bible stories."

Also slated to attend: Matt Leopold, the nominee for EPA general counsel, and David Ross, the pick to run EPA's water office. Leopold is a Florida lawyer who was previously the Florida Department of Environmental Protection's general counsel. Ross heads the Wisconsin Department of Justice's Environmental Protection Unit and previously helped challenge the Obama administration's WOTUS rule, which EPA is working to repeal and replace. Joining the EPA nominees is Democrat Jeff Baran, who is up for renomination to the NRC through 2023.

If you go: Chairman John Barrasso will gavel in the hearing at 10 a.m. in Dirksen 406.

WHAT ABOUT THE BOSS?: Pruitt himself hasn't been to an EPW hearing since he was confirmed in February, and the committee's top Democrat Tom Carper is out of patience. "It's almost nine months into the administration and we're still waiting for the head of EPA to come in and defend the administration's budget for EPA, which is appalling," Carper told ME.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee has never heard from Pruitt in a public hearing, though it is traditional for the EPA boss to testify there at least once a year. Illinois Republican John Shimkus, who chairs the E&C environment subcommittee, says a visit is overdue, especially in light of the heightened scrutiny of his spending. Shimkus said he thinks Cabinet officials should fly commercial, just like members of Congress do. "We're also stewards of taxpayers' dollars and these agencies, we're asking them to do more with less," Shimkus told ME Tuesday. "It probably would have been better had he come earlier than later."

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and the Joyce Foundation's Ed Miller first identified Rep. Fred Grandy, aka Gopher from The Love Boat, as the Iowa congressman. ADMINISTRATION PICKS ARMY CORPS CHIEF: Trump announced late Tuesday his choice of R.D. James to lead the Army Corps of Engineers. He's previously served on the Mississippi River Commission where he's provided water resources advice to several administrations and Congress. James has also served as president of the Southern Cotton Ginners Association. Among other responsibilities, James would have a major role as the Trump administration revamps the Waters of the U.S. regulation. An April report made it sound like James was lukewarm on taking the post: "I'm a country boy, and I can't imagine living up there, but, if chosen, I will, and I will do my very best."

TRUMP STRIKES HARSH TONE IN PUERTO RICO: Visiting the devastated island of Puerto Rico Tuesday, President Donald Trump warned the island's millions of residents — many of whom have been told not to expect electricity or potable drinking water for months — they had "thrown our budget a little out of whack because we've spent a lot of money on Puerto Rico" and avoided a "real catastrophe" like Hurricane Katrina. As POLITICO's Matthew Nussbaum and Nolan D. McCaskill note, Trump maintained his boasts about a wildly successful response effort that hasn't matched the reality of the hurricane-ravaged island.

At a stop later in the day Trump insisted residents didn't need flashlights (it's unclear what he meant) even though 95 percent of the island lacks electricity. "The power grid, honestly, was devastated before the hurricanes even hit. And then the hurricanes hit and they wiped them out," Trump said, as he repeatedly seemed to blame the island for its poor infrastructure and financial situation. Joining him on the trip were Pruitt and Energy Secretary Rick Perry.

POLITICO's Burgess Everett and Seung Min Kim report the administration will today ask for $13 billion in hurricane recovery funding, $16 billion in flood insurance relief and more than $500 million for wildfires with congressional consideration likely in mid- to late-October.

BISHOP PROBES YEARS OF NON-COMMERCIAL TRAVEL: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop and Rep. Bruce Westerman sent a letter to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke Tuesday asking for all records of non-commercial travel by the Interior secretary since the start of the Obama administration, as well as copies of department policies on the matter. "When partisan opportunists conflate diligent conformance to scandal, no one wins," they wrote. "Let's get all facts on the table, ensure taxpayers are protected and proceed with the peoples' business."

More questions raised for Zinke: A group of 26 House Democrats, led by Nanette Barragan and Don Beyer, asked Zinke in a Tuesday letter to immediately disclose all details of his use of charter aircraft.

Zinke doesn't plan to repay the government for his charter flights, the Associated Press reports.

NUCLEAR WASTE BILL ON ICE — FOR NOW: Shimkus said plans to bring a committee-passed nuclear waste package, H.R. 3053 \(115\), to the House floor are on hold for now as Nevada lawmakers, some of the most vocal opponents of the measure, deal with Sunday's massacre. "In light of the tragedy, there's no desire to move quickly," he said.

BISHOP: SILENCER CONTROVERSY 'SILLY': Delaying a broad sportsmen's package over language loosening gun silencer restrictions amid the response to the Las Vegas tragedy would be silly, Bishop told reporters. As your ME host reports, Bishop added: "If that's a hang-up, that's sad that that's a hang-up." GOP sources have previously indicated the SHARE Act, H.R. 3668 \(115\), likely won't come to the floor anytime soon after the shooting that killed 59 people and injured hundreds others.

COAL, NUCLEAR CAUTIOUSLY BACK PERRY'S PLAN: Representatives of the coal and nuclear industries offered qualified support before a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee for Perry's plan to extend their plants a lifeline through FERC, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. Nuclear Energy Institute CEO Maria Korsnick voiced support for an extended public comment period while Paul Bailey, who heads the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, said he'd back the proposal if forced to answer yes or no with "a huge caveat [that] we're still looking at it."

Lotsa wiggle room: FERC General Counsel James Danly told Senate lawmakers Tuesday the commission intends to act on DOE's resiliency pricing rulemaking proposal within the 60 days outlined by Perry, but he left plenty of room to tease out what that might look like, Pro's Darius Dixon reports.

Not giving up: Three new groups — the Energy Storage Association, the American Biogas Council, and the Business Council for Sustainable Energy — have linked arms with the other 11 energy groups asking DOE and FERC to slow down. The groups were spooked by FERC's decision on Monday to take comments on DOE's proposal even before the rulemaking was published but it's unclear how the processes will mesh. They have asked FERC to respond by Friday to their request for an extended comment period and technical conference.

GREENS PLAN SUIT OVER MISSED OZONE DEADLINE: A group of 10 environmental groups said Tuesday they plan to sue Pruitt after he missed a deadline to decide which parts of the U.S. do or do not meet the 2015 ozone standard, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. In response, an agency spokesman told ME: "The agency is continuing to work closely with the states to work through the designations process for the 2015 ozone standard."

SEIA GOES TO THE WHITE HOUSE: The Solar Energy Industries Association has a meeting today at the White House with presidential aides and staff from DOE, USTR and other cabinet agencies, Abigail Ross Hopper from the Solar Energy Industries Association said Tuesday. SEIA is trying to ward off tariffs on imported solar panels that will ultimately be decided by the president. The group would not specify who they'd be meeting with. "We are speaking with all of those folks who have a seat at the table and will help advise the president what the right decision is," Hopper said. "This is a conversation about American jobs, American blue collar jobs from many of the states that voted for our president."

LET'S GET TOGETHER, ROYALLY: Interior convenes the initial meeting of its new Royalty Policy Commission today. Counselor to the Secretary for Energy Policy Vincent DeVito will chair the commission, which he said will help with "looking at financial elements [at Interior] that have not been looked at in quite some time." The department caught flak earlier this year for stacking the commission with industry representatives but failing to fill slots reserved for public interest groups. NGOs said they will provide public comments, however, with The Wilderness Society set to ask Interior to increase royalty rates for oil and gas developed on public land from the current 12.5 percent. "Remarkably, for oil and gas, this rate has not changed since the 1920s," TWS said in prepared remarks seen by ME.

MORE JABS AT MANCHIN FROM BLANKENSHIP: Former West Virginia coal executive Don Blankenship released an ad Tuesday attempting to link Sen. Joe Manchin to both the Benghazi consulate attack and the deaths at Upper Big Branch Mine, Campaign Pro's Kevin Robillard reports. The spot, airing on state television, provocatively asks: "Does Manchin have blood on his hands?" Blankenship, who served a year in prison for conspiring to violate mine safety standards, has previously mused about challenging Manchin for his Senate seat as a Republican.

MURRAY JOBS SUIT REACHES SUPREME COURT: Coal producer Murray Energy asked the Supreme Court Tuesday to conclude Section 321(a) of the Clean Air Act requires EPA to produce a detailed study of its effects on coal jobs, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. A federal appeals court said that study represents a discretionary duty after a district court judge originally called it a mandatory one. But keep your expectations in check: It'll likely take the administration months to respond and there's no guarantee SCOTUS will ultimately hear the appeal.

AHEAD OF THE CLASS: Solar energy capacity in 2016 was 4,500 percent higher than the government thought it would be 10 years earlier, and wind supply is 350 percent above projections, the Natural Resources Defense Council finds in a report out Tuesday. "When you look at how clean energy development has exploded beyond official government projections from just 10 years ago, it offers hope that its potential will continue to far surpass expectations and we'll meet our U.S. climate goals," Amanda Levin, co-author of the report, said.

CEI SUES FOR PARIS DOCUMENTS: The Competitive Enterprise Institute filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking emails and text messages concerning the communications of three former Obama-era State Department officials in the lead up to the Paris climate agreement being reached. In particular, the lawsuit seeks records related to Todd Stern and Sue Biniaz's communications with officials at NRDC and the World Wildlife Fund.

LAWSUIT FILED OVER ADVISORY BOARD RECORDS: The Center for Biological Diversity filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking NOAA records concerning its decision to end a federal climate change advisory panel — Advisory Committee for the Sustained National Climate Assessment — over the summer. Copy of the filing here.

MOVERS, SHAKERS: State Energy & Environmental Impact Center at NYU School of Law, which aims to help state attorneys general fight Trump environmental rollbacks, today announced the additions of Elizabeth Klein as deputy director and Chris Moyer as communications director. Klein was most recently Interior's associate deputy secretary under the Obama administration and Moyer was most recently deputy communications director for California Attorney General Xavier Becerra.

Former FERC Commissioner Colette Honorable has joined the Bipartisan Policy Center as a senior fellow.

Pruitt critics see political motives in flights and meetings Back

By Emily Holden and Alex Guillén | 10/03/2017 07:02 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt is facing growing political blowback about his taxpayer-funded spending and meetings with industry allies, with critics seizing on his expensive flights, $25,000 soundproof phone booth and 18-person security detail just days after lavish travel costs brought down former HHS Secretary Tom Price.

The travel expenses drawing the most scrutiny for Pruitt — $58,000 at last count — don't come close to the more than $1 million that taxpayers had spent to fly Price on private and government planes since May. But to his detractors, the EPA chief's spending on charter and government flights, eavesdropper protection and round-the-clock security point to an administrator who avoids contact with the broader public and distrusts even his own agency's career staff.

Instead, according to multiple interviews and POLITICO's review of agency travel records, Pruitt spends much of his time meeting with like-minded industry and political leaders — the kind of people who could back him in a future political campaign — but meets relatively seldom with environment and public health groups that oppose President Donald Trump's policies.

Pruitt, who spent six years as Oklahoma's elected attorney general, is already facing an EPA inspector general investigation for taking at least 10 commercial flights in March, April and May to his home state, where he is widely seen as a potential candidate for U.S. senator in 2020. Since then, he's been back to Oklahoma several times, including to meet with oil and gas companies and state political leaders and participate in media interviews, according to his published schedule.

Agency records released in the past week show that he has also spent tens-of-thousands of dollars on four private or government flights, including more than $36,000 to travel on an Air Force plane from Cincinnati to New York in June. House Democrats have asked the inspector general to review those as well. Senate Judiciary Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) also cited some of Pruitt's travels last week in a letter urging Trump to rein in Cabinet spending.

The White House has taken note of the negative news coverage surrounding Pruitt's travels but doesn't consider his expenses to be as troubling as Price's, one administration official told POLITICO on Tuesday. Administration officials have said they consider the travel-expense controversy to have been resolved by Price's departure, which was quickly followed by an order requiring Cabinet officials to get chief of staff John Kelly's approval for almost any trips on chartered or government planes.

But environmentalists and other critics say the records raise questions about Pruitt's priorities.

Pruitt "has traveled extensively and spent an inordinate amount of time in Oklahoma, which begs the question of whether or not he's laying the groundwork for a campaign," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, senior vice president of government affairs at the League of Conservation Voters.

Pruitt's staff has defended all his trips, and has said the four non-commercial flights were approved by ethics officials and were necessary for him to make it to key meetings.

But Christine Todd Whitman, a Republican who ran EPA during President George W. Bush's first term, said she recalls taking chartered planes only while visiting remote areas of Alaska that were otherwise inaccessible.

"Most people have to wait in line for a long time for planes," Whitman said. "The fact that you just turn around and order a private plane ... that starts to look really problematic. It's a lot of money."

Whitman said Pruitt's other expenses are troubling, too. The agency already had a secure enclosure where people can talk and use the phone protected from eavesdropping — but, as The Washington Post reported last week, EPA is spending nearly $25,000 to install a customized private phone booth that is outfitted against eavesdropping inside his office at DC's Federal Triangle.

Whitman said she "can't imagine what the reasoning is behind this, except the paranoia."

One current EPA employee, who requested anonymity to discuss internal agency affairs without authorization, told POLITICO that it's difficult for anyone outside Pruitt's office to hear someone speaking inside. A few hand-picked administrative staffers work outside the office's thick wooden doors, and beyond that are several unoccupied rooms, which are also guarded by security.

And Whitman said EPA administrators typically haven't needed the around-the-clock protection that Pruitt is demanding. "The problem that I have with it is not that he's getting the security details but that it's at the same time they're cutting the budget of the agency," she said.

Pruitt's aides say he needs his security detail, which is far bigger than what any previous administrator had, to guard him against increased threats. On one of his trips, the agency decided that his security needs warranted chartering a private flight so that Pruitt wouldn't have to fly commercial without a bodyguard or wait for a delayed plane.

His guards were initially drawn away from other duties in EPA's enforcement office until the agency made an exception to a hiring freeze to bring on more officers.

Eric Schaeffer, executive director of the Environmental Integrity Project and a former director of civil enforcement at EPA, called Pruitt's travel habits "arrogant" and "tone-deaf."

"What would Republicans have done if Gina McCarthy had done this?" Schaeffer said, referring to former President Barack Obama's second-term EPA chief. "They would have gone ape. And now they're not concerned."

Penn State climate researcher Michael Mann, a frequent critic of Trump's and Pruitt's environmental policies, said via email Monday that "ethical violations demand that Pruitt step down."

"And by ethical violations, I don't just mean his abuse of the public trust through frivolous personal use of government-funded private plane trips," Mann added. "I also mean the manner in which he has betrayed the citizens he is supposed to represent by endangering them through the dismantling of environmental protections built up over decades, under Democratic and Republican administrations."

Critics say they are most upset because Pruitt's spending comes amid potential budget cuts. He has indicated, for example, that he wants to end payments to Justice Department lawyers who force polluters to pay to clean up Superfund sites, The New York Times reported last week.

They say his travel records are just as telling in showing whom he chooses to meet with as EPA administrator.

His four non-commercial flights included a trip to visit with Oklahoma farmers, meetings with Republican officials in North Dakota and a tour to criticize a Colorado environmental project mishandled by the Obama administration.

In July, he flew in an Interior Department plane from Tulsa to Guymon, Okla., where he met with farmers as part of a tour highlighting his effort to withdraw an Obama administration water rule. Pruitt and his aides then continued in the plane to visit state officials in Oklahoma City. The total cost for both legs was $14,434.50.

EPA declined to provide a more detailed schedule or a list of business leaders who were present. Spokesman Jahan Wilcox provided local news clips that report 90 farmers and ranchers from Oklahoma, Texas and Kansas attended.

In August, Pruitt toured the site of the Gold King Mine spill, a 2015 mining-waste disaster caused by EPA and its contractors, for a visit in which he said the Obama administration had "failed those who counted on them." He got there via a plane that EPA had chartered from Denver to Durango, Colo., at a cost of more than $5,000.

The agency says Pruitt had initially traveled on a commercial flight to Denver, only to learn that his planned connection to Durango would be delayed by several hours. Individual seats were available on other commercial planes but didn't have enough space for Pruitt's bodyguard or other staff, the agency said.

In a third trip, Pruitt had lunch with North Dakota Republicans — Gov. Doug Burgum, Sen. John Hoeven and Rep. Kevin Cramer — in Fargo. He and two staffers then flew with the governor on his state plane to meet farmers and tour an energy research center that studies ways to keep the state's struggling coal industry alive. The ride cost EPA $2,144.40, according to The Washington Post. A spokesman said Pruitt needed to fly with Burgum to keep up with the governor's schedule. Driving between the two cities would have taken about an hour and a half.

The flight with the biggest price tag, $36,068.50, was on an Air Force plane from Cincinnati to New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport on June 7. Pruitt then flew on to Rome, on what Wilcox described as a scheduled commercial flight, where he arrived several days early for a meeting with foreign environment ministers. Wilcox said Pruitt had to find a way to New York after the president invited him at the last minute to Cincinnati to promote infrastructure development.

EPA spokespeople have said they explored all other options for the Rome trip, although they did not comment on why Pruitt couldn't have flown commercially from Cincinnati to another U.S. international hub and then to Italy.

Trump's event with Pruitt was set to conclude by 2:10 p.m., according to the president's schedule. Pruitt's public schedule for the following day, June 8, didn't show any public meetings until 1 p.m., at the U.S. Embassy, and 2 p.m., with a business roundtable — which could have left time for even a lengthy international flight. Travel sites show that on a typical Wednesday, multiple options from Cincinnati to Rome would fit the time window and cost around $3,000 per person when purchased last-minute.

On June 9, Pruitt met with officials from the Catholic Church and attended a judicial roundtable. Not until June 10 and 11 did he meet with foreign ministers, before leaving the high-profile event early to make it back for a Cabinet meeting at the White House on the morning of June 12, according to his schedule. During the trip, EPA tweeted pictures of Pruitt rolling pasta and eating prosciutto with Italian environment minister Gian Luca Galletti, which critics were quick to highlight when he left ahead of schedule.

A POLITICO analysis of Pruitt's broader schedule, as shown in EPA records, demonstrate he's spent much of his time meeting with key industries, including ones back home. He's met most often with oil and gas executives, followed by agriculture and farming.

Of at least 30 meetings or speaking engagements Pruitt had with oil and gas executives or trade groups, seven appear to have connections to Oklahoma. He's spent time with executives of companies whose employees donated at least $37,000 for his 2014 campaign to be Oklahoma attorney general, according to state campaign finance records.

For example, Pruitt met in March with representatives from Oklahoma Gas & Electric, whose executives were a major source of cash for his 2014 reelection campaign. Pruitt has also had face-to-face sit-downs with John Minge, the head of BP America, Duke Energy's Lynn Good and the boards of the National Mining Association, the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, the American Petroleum Institute and American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers.

Pruitt spends far more time with industry and political leaders than with environmental advocates, according to two months of calendars released under public records requests and another six months of far less detailed schedules that the agency has published.

EPA maintains a list of environmental or public health groups the agency has met with, but they do not appear officially on Pruitt's schedule.

The EPA chief has also spoken at events or held calls with right-wing policy groups that spend little of their time on environmental issues. For example, he had a call in May with the Family Research Council, a conservative group that lobbies against abortion rights and believes homosexuality is "unnatural" but has never filed comments on EPA proceedings.

In the same month, he had a speaking engagement with the Council for National Policy, which advocates for limited government and "Judeo-Christian values," and was on a call with the State Policy Network, an umbrella group for state-level conservative think tanks.

He continues to appear at events for the Federalist Society, a group that advocates for an originalist interpretation of the Constitution and has become an established gatekeeper for conservatives seeking judicial posts.

Price resigns from HHS after facing fire for travel Back

By Dan Diamond, Rachana Pradhan and Adriel Bettelheim | 09/29/2017 04:40 PM EDT

HHS Secretary Tom Price resigned Friday in the face of multiple federal inquiries and growing criticism of his use of private and government planes for travel, at a cost to taxpayers of more than $1 million since May.

The White House said the former seven-term Georgia congressman, 63, offered his resignation earlier in the day and that President Donald Trump had accepted it.

Price becomes the first Trump administration Cabinet secretary to step down. The White House said Trump asked Deputy Assistant Health Secretary Don Wright to serve as acting secretary of the agency, which has an annual budget $1.15 trillion and includes the Medicare and Medicaid programs, as well as the FDA, NIH and CDC.

As late as Thursday, Price said he believed he had the president's support. But the tumult surrounding his travel became another distraction for an administration already reeling from the defeat of repeated Senate efforts to repeal Obamacare and criticism for its hurricane relief efforts in Puerto Rico.

Price ran afoul of Trump in part because his actions seemed to symbolize everything the president had inveighed against on the campaign trail by vowing to "drain the swamp." The fallout extended to the entire Cabinet Friday night when the White House announced that chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Price, in his resignation letter, expressed regret that "recent events" distracted from efforts to overhaul the health care system. "In order for you to move forward without further disruption, I am officially tendering my resignation as the Secretary of Health and Human Services effective 11:59 PM on Friday," he wrote.

Senate Democrats quickly served notice they were preparing for a potential confirmation fight over Price's successor, saying the next HHS secretary must not undermine Obamacare. Under Price, the department cut the law's enrollment period in half and slashed advertising and outreach for the enrollment period starting in November.

"The next HHS secretary must follow the law when it comes to the Affordable Care Act instead of trying to sabotage it," said Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

"Tom Price's replacement needs to be focused on implementing the law as written by Congress and keeping the president's promise to bring down the high cost of prescription drugs," Senate Finance ranking Democrat Ron Wyden of Oregon said in a statement.

House Speaker Paul Ryan, a close ally, praised Price as a dedicated public servant. "His vision and hard work were vital to the House's success passing our health care legislation," Ryan said in a statement.

POLITICO revealed that Price flew at least 26 times on private aircraft at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, a sharp break with his predecessors' practice. Many of Price's flights were between major cities that offered inexpensive alternatives on commercial airlines, including Nashville, Philadelphia and San Diego.

On some of those trips, Price, an orthopedic surgeon, mixed official business with leisure. He took a government-funded private jet in August to get to St. Simons Island, an exclusive Georgia resort where he and his wife own land, a day and a half before he addressed a medical conference he and his wife have long attended. In June, HHS chartered a private jet to fly Price to Nashville, where he owns a condominium and where his son resides. Price toured a medicine dispensary, spoke to a local health summit organized by a friend and had lunch with his son, an HHS official confirmed.

Price also used military aircraft for multi-national trips to Africa, Europe and Asia, at a cost of more than $500,000 to taxpayers. The White House said it had approved those trips but not the private jets within the United States.

Price tried to defuse the controversy by promising on Thursday to reimburse the government for the approximately $52,000 cost of his own seat on his domestic trips. But that wasn't enough to tamp down the scandal, which had infuriated the president and prompted a bipartisan inquiry from the House Oversight Committee and separate calls for accountability from lawmakers including Republican Sen. Chuck Grassley. The inspector general of Price's own agency is reviewing if Price complied with federal travel regulations.

The White House put Cabinet officials on notice Friday that it would crack down on use of private planes, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Mick Mulvaney, director of the Office of Management and Budget, sent out the memo soon after Price's resignation was made public, reminding department and agency heads that, by regulation, "Government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft should not be used for travel by Government employees except with specific justification."

The issue of Cabinet members' travel has already extended beyond Price: POLITICO reported Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides took several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights in the Caribbean. Zinke dismissed the furor as a "little B.S." during a Friday appearance at the Heritage Foundation.

Price's wife, Betty, accompanied him on the military flights, while other members of the secretary's delegation flew commercially to Europe.

HHS spokeswoman Charmaine Yoest said Price reimbursed the agency for his wife's travel, but declined to elaborate.

White House officials have grouched about Price's frequent travels, with one senior White House official saying the HHS secretary was "nowhere to be found" as they mounted a last-ditch unsuccessful push to repeal Obamacare.

Congressional Democrats attacked Price for advocating spending cuts to the health agencies he oversaw and health care programs while spending taxpayer dollars on private jets. "There could not be a clearer statement of the Trump administration's priorities," Sen. Maggie Hassan (D-N.H.) said. Key Democrats overseeing health issues in Congress had formally requested that HHS's inspector general review Price's travel practices.

In June, Price defended a proposed fiscal 2018 budget for HHS that included a $663,000 cut to the agency's $4.9 million annual spending on travel, or roughly 15 percent. "The budgeting process is an exercise in reforming our federal programs to make sure they actually work — so they do their job and use tax dollars wisely," Price told the Senate Finance Committee on June 8.

Ethical questions dogged Price even before questions about his travel arose. During his Senate confirmation hearing to helm HHS, Price faced pointed questions about his personal investments in health care companies during his time in Congress. Democrats called on government ethics officials to investigate Price's health care stock trades, following reports that he got a sweetheart deal from a biotech company and invested in Zimmer Biomet, a medical device-maker, just days before writing legislation that would have eased regulations on the sector.

The Senate confirmed Price by a 52-47 margin in February after he maintained full Republican support.

Price carved out a reputation as a staunch fiscal conservative during his decade-plus tenure in the House of Representatives. He generally supported reducing government spending on health care while shifting more of the financial burden onto individuals. Like most conservatives, he's supported privatizing Medicare so that seniors would receive fixed dollar amounts to buy coverage and limiting federal Medicaid spending to give states a lump sum, or block grant, and more control over how they could use it.

Trump expected to pick Bush EPA official turned industry lawyer for agency's air office

By Alex Guillén | 07/24/2017 10:03 AM EDT

President Donald Trump is expected to nominate Bill Wehrum, a former George W. Bush-era EPA official, to run the agency's powerful air office, according to two sources outside the administration familiar with the plans.

While Wehrum would bring critical knowledge of EPA's workings and environmental law, he also represents several high-profile industry groups in lawsuits challenging numerous Obama-era EPA regulations, meaning he may face recusal and conflict issues similar to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt.

Wehrum served as acting assistant administrator for the Office of Air and Radiation from 2005 to 2007. Bush pulled Wehrum's formal nomination to that post after Democrats blocked him as too industry-friendly, though the new simple majority threshold on nominees likely will prevent that from happening again. Wehrum spent 2001-2005 as counsel to Jeff Holmstead, Bush's first air administrator. Holmstead emerged last month as a possible Trump pick to be EPA deputy administrator, though coal lobbyist Andrew Wheeler remains the frontrunner for that job.

In a 2013 interview with Law360, Wehrum said that despite the Supreme Court's 2007 ruling that said EPA has the authority to regulate greenhouse gases, he believes "Congress never intended the EPA to address an issue such as climate change under the Clean Air Act."

He also called for lengthening the review cycle for National Ambient Air Quality Standards beyond five years — House Republicans recently passed a bill that would stretch that to ten years — and said the Obama administration tried to shift power away from the states and toward EPA, comments since echoed by Pruitt.

And in a 2015 Wall Street Journal editorial, Wehrum said the EPA-caused Gold King mine spill highlighted how the agency "often criminalizes actions that are nothing more than accidents, many far less damaging to the environment than the Animas River disaster." That spill fouled Colorado's Animas River and downstream areas for several weeks before water quality returned to normal and the river was reopened to recreational activities.

Wehrum pointed to the 2014 chemical spill that fouled drinking water for hundreds of thousands of West Virginia residents, which led to an EPA investigation and the company's bankruptcy, as an example of "unjust" treatment.

For the last decade Wehrum has been a partner at the high-powered D.C. law firm Hunton & Williams, where he currently represents high-profile clients, including two leading oil and gas industry lobbying groups, in a number of ongoing lawsuits against EPA.

Wehrum represents the American Petroleum Institute in a challenge to EPA's methane rule for new oil and gas wells, as well as the separate legal battle over EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's decision to stay that rule while under review, where API has defended Pruitt's stay.

He also represents either API or American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers, a refinery sector group, in lawsuits over a 2015 rule limiting pollution from oil refineries; a "regional consistency" rule that governs how court rulings apply to nationwide EPA regulations; and permitting rules for Indian lands.

He represents the Utility Air Regulatory Group, a coalition that challenges EPA air regulations, in a legal challenge over an Obama-era rule meant to decrease explosions at chemical plants and other facilities. Pruitt has put that rule on hold while it is under review.

Wehrum helped the Gas Processors Association challenge two greenhouse gas reporting rules. He took an EPA boiler regulation to court on behalf of a coalition of industry groups, including the American Chemistry Council, the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Forest & Paper Association. He is challenging an EPA emissions rule for brick manufacturers on behalf of an industry group. And he represented construction interests in various lawsuits against the Labor Department, including an ongoing challenge to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's 2016 silica exposure rule.

Wehrum did not immediately reply to a request for comment on Monday. EPA and White House spokespeople did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

EPA nominee's case against OSHA rule draws skepticism from judges Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/26/2017 12:24 PM EDT

Federal judges seemed skeptical today of arguments made by William Wehrum, President Donald Trump's pick to head EPA's air office, against the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's silica rule.

Wehrum, an attorney at Hunton & Williams, argued on behalf of various industry groups that OSHA had not proven that lowering the silica standard would provide any significant health benefits.

"OSHA had a thumb on the scale" because it had already decided to lower the standard and had "lost objectivity," Wehrum told a three-judge panel at the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Judge David S. Tatel called Wehrum's comment "curious" and pointed to reams of data and studies OSHA used to justify the new standard.

Chief Judge Merrick Garland noted that there are some legitimate disagreements among scientists about silica's health effects — but he said the law says the regulation in such situations should lean in favor of caution. "There's supposed to be a thumb on the scale in terms of safety," Garland said.

"We believe that skepticism is well warranted," Wehrum replied.

A Justice Department attorney defending the rule faced light questioning from the judges about OSHA's methodologies and called Wehrum's arguments about uncertainty in epidemiology "flimsy."

As air administrator, Wehrum would be charged with implementing or writing new versions of a number of health-based standards, including the 2015 ozone rule. EPA officials last week noted that Wehrum can argue against the OSHA rule since it is not an EPA regulation and is unrelated to his nomination.

WHAT'S NEXT: The D.C. Circuit will weigh Wehrum's argument along with arguments made by other attorneys on technological, economic and union issues with the silica rule. Wehrum's nomination hearing was postponed last week and has not yet been rescheduled.

Trump brings harsh edge to Puerto Rico trip Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill and Matthew Nussbaum | 10/03/2017 05:03 AM EDT

President Donald Trump brought a jarring tone to Puerto Rico as he toured the hurricane devastation Tuesday, appearing to blame the U.S. territory for having "thrown our budget a little out of whack" and complimenting officials for sustaining only 16 deaths, compared with the much higher human toll of Hurricane Katrina.

"I hate to tell you, Puerto Rico, but you've thrown our budget a little out of whack because we've spent a lot of money on Puerto Rico," Trump said as he met with local officials from the island, which declared a form of bankruptcy in May. "And that's fine."

The president also appeared to boast that the death toll in Puerto Rico pales in comparison to the more than 1,800 fatalities that followed Katrina in 2005.

"We saved a lot of lives," said Trump, who added that "every death is a horror" and broached what he called "a real catastrophe" in Katrina.

"Sixteen people versus in the thousands," the president said, overstating Katrina's death toll.

"You can be very proud of all of your people, all of our people working together," he told Gov. Ricardo Rosselló. "Sixteen versus literally thousands of people. You can be very proud. Everybody around this table and everybody watching can really be very proud of what's taken place in Puerto Rico."

A Rosselló spokesman said Tuesday night that the death toll had more than doubled, to 34, news agencies reported.

Trump landed in Puerto Rico on Tuesday after spending much of the past week boasting about a wildly successful response effort that hasn't matched the reality of the hurricane-ravaged island — and after picking a fight over the weekend with San Juan's mayor and other "political motivated ingrates" who have questioned the robustness of the federal response.

The visit came as he's attempting to be soother-in-chief for the nation after a shooting in Las Vegas left at least 59 dead on Sunday night — the first time he's had to navigate two disasters of national scope that are politically perilous for any president, but especially one prone to off-the-cuff riffs.

The Puerto Rico stop marks only the start of emotionally charged travels for Trump this week. On Wednesday, he is scheduled to travel to Las Vegas to meet with the families of victims of Sunday's massacre.

Trump struck a somber and unifying tone Monday when discussing the attack in Las Vegas. But on Tuesday, he traded the scripted and controlled setting of the Diplomatic Room for a storm-ravaged island where more than half of the residents remain without access to drinking water and only 5 percent of the island has electricity.

Throughout the day, he boasted about his administration's response and appeared to repeatedly blame Puerto Rico for its poor infrastructure and financial situation before Hurricane Maria ripped through and left a humanitarian crisis in its wake.

Early on Tuesday, Trump extended praise to his officials and to Rosselló, Puerto Rico's Democratic governor. And he asked the island territory's Republican non-voting congresswoman, Jenniffer González-Colón, to repeat past accolades of the administration's response for the television cameras.

"He's not even from my party, and he started right at the beginning appreciating what we did," Trump said of Rosselló. "Right from the beginning this governor did not play politics. He didn't play it at all. He was saying it like it was, and he was giving us the highest grades. And on behalf of our country, I wanna thank you."

Trump, however, sought to have the plaudits reciprocated, noting that he watched González-Colón say "such nice things about all of the people that have worked so hard" the other day and asking her to repeat her compliments.

"Jenniffer, do you think you can say a little bit [of] what you said about us today?" Trump asked. "And it's not about me. It's about these incredible people, from the military to FEMA to first responders. I mean, I've never seen people working so hard in my life. Perhaps you could say, congresswoman?"

Cameras captured the president engaging in a conversation with a hurricane victim, asking multiple questions and commending public officials in closing, but also telling another group of victims impacted by the storm to "have a good time."

The pool of reporters accompanying the president described a pair of basketball-related exchanges. Trump asked a teenager whether he played basketball and was going to the NBA. After handing out bags of rice at a church, Trump began tossing paper towels into the crowd — mimicking the motions of a jump shot.

In later remarks Tuesday — as the president handed out flashlights — Trump insisted Puerto Ricans don't need flashlights, though much of the territory is still without power, as he acknowledged to reporters just minutes prior.

"The power grid, honestly, was devastated before the hurricanes even hit. And then the hurricanes hit and they wiped them out," Trump said. "A lot of generators have been already brought to the island. Most of the hospitals are open — or at least partially open. But most of them now are open. And, again, the job that's been done here is really nothing short of a miracle. It's been incredible."

Trump has courted controversy by blasting on Twitter the "poor leadership ability" of Puerto Rican officials, who he said "want everything to be done for them." Trump had also said the island's leaders "are not able to get their workers to help," and he accused Carmen Yulín Cruz, the Democratic mayor of San Juan — who repeatedly slammed the Trump administration's response to Hurricane Maria — of trying to score partisan political points by criticizing him.

"We have done a great job with the almost impossible situation in Puerto Rico. Outside of the Fake News or politically motivated ingrates," Trump tweeted on Sunday.

All the while, he's kept up an upbeat tone about the response. He told reporters in the Oval Office on Monday that it's "amazing what's been done in a very short period of time." He added: "There's never been a piece of land that we've known that was so devastated."

Other officials have echoed his attitude. "The federal government is doing everything within our powers and capabilities to first focus on the life-sustaining and life-saving measures as well as on the rebuilding process," press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders told reporters on Monday.

But Trump's comments on Tuesday at times distracted from his administration's response efforts, with Cruz, the San Juan mayor, freshly criticizing the president for his comments about Puerto Rico's impact on the U.S. budget.

"It goes to prove the lack of sensibility," she told CNN in an interview.

Colin Wilhelm contributed to this report.

White House seeking $29 billion more in disaster assistance Back

By Burgess Everett and Seung Min Kim | 10/03/2017 08:54 PM EDT

The Trump administration is expected to request about $29 billion in disaster assistance on Wednesday, according to three sources familiar with the matter.

The administration is expected to ask Congress to deliver nearly $13 billion in funding for recovery from hurricanes that struck Puerto Rico and other parts of the United States, $16 billion in flood insurance relief, and more than $500 million for wildfires, the source said. Congress is expected to consider the package in mid- to late-October.

The figures were first reported by the Associated Press. The nearly $13 billion in FEMA funding is estimated to last through Dec. 31, one source said, although the government has been spending disaster money more quickly than expected because of the recent spate of hurricanes.

Congress previously approved more than $15 billion in disaster assistance for hurricanes in Texas and Florida in September.

Nuclear waste bill clears House committee with bipartisan backing Back

By Darius Dixon | 06/28/2017 12:05 PM EDT

The House Energy and Commerce Committee approved nuclear waste reform legislation this morning on a bipartisan 49-4 vote, facing only a handful of Democratic holdouts.

The bill, H.R. 3053, sponsored by E&C Environment Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus, would make the first changes in 30 years to the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, which names Yucca Mountain as the nation's sole waste repository.

The committee agreed to a compromise manager's amendment that would let DOE open one interim storage facility while regulators continue to work on a permanent repository. That eliminated most of the Democratic objections to a draft version of the bill that would have barred such work until the Nuclear Regulatory Commission issued a decision on Yucca Mountain.

Yucca Mountain supporters have been concerned that a storage site would take the pressure off of approving a repository. Meanwhile, lawmakers have been anxious to move the waste building up at defunct nuclear power plants in their states.

Another bipartisan amendment, also approved on a voice vote, removed the bill's original language impacting Nevada's water rights and air permitting. The amendment would also increase Yucca's capacity from 70,000 metric tons to 110,000 metric tons.

The bill also authorizes payments to host states and limits work on any defense waste-only repository.

New Jersey Rep. Frank Pallone, the top Democrat on E&C, said that the bill was "a delicate and difficult negotiation, but I believe we have arrived at a very good compromise."

WHAT'S NEXT: Shimkus has said he expects the bill to get a vote by the full House before the August recess, but GOP leaders have not yet scheduled floor time for the bill.

Bishop: 'Silly' to delay sportsmen's package over silencer provision Back

By Anthony Adragna | 10/03/2017 02:26 PM EDT

House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop told reporters today it would be "silly" to remove provisions in a broad sportsmen's package, H.R. 3668 \(115\), loosening restrictions on purchasing gun silencers even after the nation's worst shooting massacre in modern history.

"The suppressor part actually helps people," he said. "To remove it, you're not helping anybody out. That would be silly to do that."

He added: "If that's a hang up, that's sad that that's a hang up."

GOP sources previously told POLITICO the Las Vegas shooting would derail consideration of the Sportsmen's Heritage and Recreational Enhancement Act at least in the short term.

Bishop said he'd been told by leadership the legislation would get a floor vote "soon," but said he'd never been given a specific date. But the Utah Republican said he hadn't spoken to them about the matter this week.

"To get a floor vote for things, I would strip naked if I had to," he said.

WHAT'S NEXT: Republican sources have previously indicated the SHARE Act is unlikely to get a floor vote in the near future.

Coal, nuclear industry leaders cautiously supportive of DOE proposal Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/03/2017 05:38 PM EDT

Coal and nuclear power industry representatives offered qualified endorsements today of the Energy Department's proposed regulation that offer their plants an economic lifeline.

Many experts are already confused about DOE's proposal to FERC, and a strange-bedfellows coalition of energy groups, including oil and renewables trade associations, has asked regulators to slow down.

Testifying before a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee, Nuclear Energy Institute CEO Maria Korsnick said she'd support having another 30 days to comment on the Energy Secretary Rick Perry's plan to FERC, which gave regulators just 60 days to finalize the rule or issue an interim final rule. She said the proposal is "a good baseline but additional conversations need to be had through the rulemaking process."

Paul Bailey, who heads the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, demurred when asked how long FERC should collect comments, stressing that the work "needs to be done very, very quickly." Bailey said he'd back the proposal if he was only given a yes-or-no option, but he added there was "a huge caveat [that] we're still looking at it."

Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.) noted that FERC often allows 180 days to comment on complex proposals.

Meanwhile, Marty Durbin, an executive with the American Petroleum Institute, which has criticized the proposal, said it was "totally inconsistent" with the grid study DOE issued in August.

John Moore, of the Natural Resources Defense Council, said he would toss the proposal "in the trash can because I don't think it meets the minimum standards of due process and the Administrative Procedures Act."

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC has asked for comments on the proposal to be submitted by Oct. 23 and for reply comments by Nov. 7. DOE has not yet published its proposal in the Federal Register, which will kick off the 60-day countdown clock.

Official: FERC will take 'appropriate action' on DOE pricing rule within 60 days Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/03/2017 04:22 PM EDT

FERC intends to act on the Energy Department's resiliency pricing rulemaking proposal within the 60 days Energy Secretary Rick Perry directed last week, FERC General Counsel James Danly told lawmakers this afternoon. But his comments left plenty of room for interpretation.

"Right now, the commission is internally reviewing the notice of proposed rulemaking that was put forward by the secretary," Danly told members of a Senate Energy and Natural Resources subcommittee, while noting that FERC has already requested comments on the proposal.

"We're reviewing the options that are available and we are in the process of building the record by soliciting these comments and reply comments," he said. "Once they're assembled, we're going to review them and take the appropriate action within the 60-day timeframe established by the NOPR."

The law that Perry is using to initiate the rulemaking at FERC directs regulators to take "final action" within a reasonable timeframe, but it's unclear what FERC might consider a final action. Similarly, Danly's phrase "appropriate action" could represent a number of decisions by FERC.

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC has asked for comments on the proposal to be submitted by Oct. 23 and for reply comments by Nov. 7. DOE has also not yet published its proposal in the Federal Register, which will kick off the 60-day countdown clock.

Greens will sue Pruitt over missed ozone deadline Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/03/2017 05:13 PM EDT

Ten environmental groups say they plan to sue EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt for missing the Oct. 1 deadline to decide which parts of the U.S. do or do not meet the 2015 ozone standard, a critical step toward implementing the rule and curbing pollution.

"It's an outrage that Scott Pruitt just willfully ignored his legal and moral obligation to keep American communities safe from dangerous air pollution that sends children to the hospital," Matthew Gravatt of the Sierra Club said in a statement.

Pruitt earlier this year announced plans to delay the designations by one year, citing trouble with data collection from states. Following lawsuits from green groups and Democratic attorneys general, EPA reversed course and said Pruitt would work to meet the deadline. But the deadline passed this week without any word from EPA on any designations.

The underlying 2015 standard is itself under review at EPA, along with a host of other Obama-era regulations. EPA in recent weeks also sent for White House review what appears to be a proposal setting new thresholds for which areas would have to take action to improve their air quality.

EPA on Monday had no comment on when the agency plans to issue the designations.

Groups suing include the Sierra Club, Natural Resources Defense Council, American Lung Association and National Parks Conservation Association.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Clean Air Act requires anyone suing EPA over a missed deadline to give the agency at least 60 days' notice. The lawsuit could be filed as soon as early December.

Taxpayer advocate, Democrats see industry tilt on Zinke's royalties panel Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/14/2017 03:33 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has pledged to increase energy revenue from federal lands, but congressional Democrats and public watchdogs are worried the agency is putting key policy decisions about royalties in the hands of the industry.

Interior officials have said increasing drilling on federal lands would help fulfill President Donald Trump's promise to "usher in a golden age of energy dominance" — and help restore the agency's coffers back to levels seen a decade ago, when they were bolstered by oil prices that flirted with $150 a barrel.

Now, with oil prices under $50 a barrel, the portion of Interior's budget from those revenues has dropped to $6.2 billion, one-quarter of where it was in during the heady market of 2008.

"I will be looking at revenue," Zinke told senators during a June budget hearing, pointing to the federal income from natural gas, oil and wind. "If you're going to operate on public land, then the public should have a say, because we are all stewards of our public lands. We want to make sure we have a fair return. That return should be transparent."

But public interest groups and Democrats say the 20-member advisory committee Zinke named to review royalty rates that oil, natural gas and coal companies pay for access to federal land and water is stocked with industry-linked members.

The committee includes five energy company representatives and six others members who hail from energy-friendly, GOP-led local governments. Critics say it lacks representatives from public interest groups or Democrats who might question whether the public is getting a fair deal from new drilling.

"We should be exploring better royalty structures," Sen. Tom Udall (D-N.M), whose state is the fifth largest oil producer in the country, said in an email. "But I'm skeptical that the royalty policy committee established by Secretary Zinke is structured to ask the most probing and balanced questions to benefit citizens." Udall plans to reintroduce his legislation, S. 2254 \(108\), next week that would institute royalties on gold, silver and other precious minerals currently excluded from generating royalties.

Ryan Alexander, president of public watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense, lauded Zinke's move to restart that commission as an opportunity to make sure taxpayers get a fair return for energy developed on public lands, but its make-up didn't give her confidence that would happen.

"There's a lot of people who know a lot of stuff on that committee," said Alexander, whose nomination to the committee was rejected by Interior. "But there isn't anyone who focuses on taxpayer interest. It is a definitely a concern that this is weighted toward the industry. We're going to be watching carefully."

Republicans have backed Zinke's exclusion of environmental and public interest groups.

"Many of these public interest groups have been driving this debate in court and so forth at the demise of our natural resource industry, and our economies and jobs in places like Montana," Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) told POLITICO. "So it's time to change it up."

Interior's royalty rates dictate the percentage of the proceeds from oil, gas or other energy produced from federal lands or waters that companies must share with the government. The new committee will "provide advice to the Secretary ... on the fair market value of and on the collection of revenues derived from, the development of energy and mineral resources on Federal and Indian lands," according to the charter Zinke approved in March.

Oil production on federal lands reached an all-time high of 580 million barrels in 2016 from the surge in offshore production, according to data from the Office of Natural Resources Revenue, an overall increase of 33 percent from 2008.

Even as oil production surged, oil revenues flowing to Interior dropped to $2.8 billion, however, the lowest point since 2005, largely because of weak market prices. U.S. oil averaged $43.29 per barrel last year, less than half the price in 2014.

Natural gas volumes have fallen by a third since 2008, with most of the drop because of offshore drillers' shift to more profitable oil production. And coal production on federal land fell by a third between 2008 and 2016, following electric utilities' switching to cheaper natural gas.

Interior's decisions on royalties have a major impact on state budgets. In 2016, Wyoming received $684 million from federal leases, nearly one-quarter of the state's $3 billion budget that year, while New Mexico got $386 million, about 6 percent of the state's total budget.

Interior lowered the minimum royalty payments for oil and gas produced from shallow-water areas of the Gulf of Mexico that it offered in a lease in August. But that cut failed to attract companies to the area, which is largely tapped out of oil and gas from years of development, and only 10 percent of the tracts up for auction were leased.

Interior has also rolled back an Obama-era rule on assessing the value of coal from federal lands that required mining companies to use the price they sold the coal at on the open market — not to affiliate companies they may have sold it to at a steep discount. Zinke's move did away with a rule that the department estimated would increase Interior's coal royalty revenues by up to $85 million a year, but that coal companies complained was too burdensome.

Zinke's appointments to the committee include employees of ConocoPhillips, Anadarko Petroleum and the National Ocean Industries Association, a trade group representing offshore drilling companies.

He also included Matthew Adams, vice president of taxation at Cloud Peak Energy, a Wyoming-based coal company that donated $10,000 to Zinke's PAC in 2016. Cloud Peak paid the department $80 million in royalties last year, according to government data.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift called the commission members "eminently qualified individuals," and added that Cloud Point Energy's donation to Zinke's PAC was "absolutely not" a factor in appointing a company representative to the commission.

Another member of the committee is John Sweeney, an investor relations executive at VWR Corp., a Pennsylvania-based company that provides laboratory services to the pharmaceutical, biotech, industrial and healthcare industries.

Sweeney nominated himself to the commission and was appointed because of "his education and experience in business connecting investors with developers," Swift said. Sweeney did not reply to messages seeking comment.

Swift also pointed to the native American tribes on the commission as operating some renewable energy projects. Those tribes on the board are also heavily invested in oil, gas and coal projects. The Navajo Nation, whose president Russell Begaye is on the royalty commission, runs the largest coal-fired power plant in the western United States, and Begaye wrote an op-ed in March asking for government assistance to keep plant from shutting.

Zinke promised to appoint up to four members representing "academia and public interest" groups when he announced plans for the commission, and he has stressed the importance of public oversight on royalties.

But the sole slot that was allotted in the end for a representative for the public interest went to Daniel Ruzs, a coal expert from energy industry consulting group Wood MacKenzie.

Interior's Swift initially said the choice came about because "no groups identifying themselves as public interest were nominated or self-nominated." She didn't address the rejection of the Taxpayers for Common Sense nomination, but said the group was "still permitted to attend the public meetings and the public comments are taken into consideration in decision making processes."

The commission also doesn't include any local government representatives identified as Democrats or nominated by Democratic governors. No one from Colorado or California was appointed, despite those two states producing more energy resources from federal lands than Alaska or Texas.

Gov. Steve Bullock, the Democratic head of Zinke's home state of Montana, nominated a Montana Department of Natural Resources employee who helps manage 6.2 million acres in the state that received $23 million in royalties from Interior in 2016, though that nominee was rejected. Interior did name a Montana representative as an alternate board member in case a sitting member drops out.

Instead, Interior appointed a Clinton Carter, Alabama's Republican state finance director. Alabama received $1.9 million in royalties from the department in 2016.

The lack of public accountability advocates on the board threatens to undermine its purpose of helping Interior increase public revenue, House Natural Resources committee ranking member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said in a letter to Zinke.

Appointing a committee dominated by the fossil fuel industry with no public interest voices does not build "greater trust and transparency," Grijalva said in his letter, adding that the committee "should not be allowed to act as a fig leaf for actions designed solely to favor the interests of drilling and mining companies."

Convicted coal exec attacks Manchin in new ad Back

By Kevin Robillard | 10/03/2017 04:15 PM EDT

Don Blankenship, a former energy executive convicted of a misdemeanor related to the deaths of 29 coal miners in West Virginia, is paying for an inflammatory new television ad attacking Democratic Sen. Joe Manchin.

The 30-second ad, which is airing on broadcast television in the state, starts by talking about the deaths of four Americans at the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya and then links it to the deaths at Upper Big Branch Mine, which Blankenship blames on the federal government. The ad repeatedly shows Manchin side-by-side with former President Barack Obama and Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton, along with captions asking: "Does Manchin have blood on his hands?"

"In 2012, four Americans were killed by terrorists in Benghazi, Libya. Many say the Obama administration hid the Benghazi truth," a male narrator says. "The truth about more killed Americans has also been hidden. In 2010, 29 Americans were killed. None of them were an ambassador, none were CIA agents, none were killed by terrorists. They were coal miners who were killed when the U.S. government reduced their mines' airflow. President Trump must be told the truth about Obama's deadliest cover-up."

The ad is the latest in a series of amateurish spots Blankenship has paid for attacking Manchin and asserting federal officials are to blame for the deaths at Upper Big Branch. The United Mine Workers of America have blasted the ads as "desperate, low-life attempt to once again shift the blame for a decade of death, destruction and despair at Massey Energy while Blankenship was CEO."

Manchin is considered a slight favorite to win reelection in a state President Donald Trump won handily. Rep. Evan Jenkins and Attorney General Patrick Morissey are competing in the Republican primary to challenge Manchin in 2018. Blankenship has previously mused about running for the seat himself as a Republican.

Murray asks Supreme Court to force EPA study of coal job losses Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/03/2017 03:21 PM EDT

Coal producer Murray Energy has asked the Supreme Court to force EPA to study how its regulations and other actions affect coal jobs.

A federal judge in West Virginia initially sided with Murray in ruling that Section 321(a) of the Clean Air Act required EPA to produce a separate, detailed study of its effects on coal jobs, despite EPA arguments that it did so on a rolling basis as it worked on each rule.

But just days before the July 1 deadline for EPA to cough up a study going back through 2009, the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the study is a discretionary duty, not a mandatory one open to enforcement in the courts, thus freeing EPA from having to produce the study.

Last week, Murray appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the 4th Circuit's ruling "creates a substantial blind spot where EPA will be left to its own devices.

"An evaluation of the job losses that have occurred and those jobs that remain under threat because of EPA's decisions will be a powerful tool in helping EPA, Congress, the States, and Plaintiffs address and correct a policy that, up until now, has been far 'too narrow a policy and a cruel one at that for workers' in the coal industry," Murray wrote.

The case is Murray Energy v. Pruitt, 17-478.

WHAT'S NEXT: It will likely take months for the Trump administration to reply. If the Supreme Court agrees to hear the appeal — a major question — it likely will do so next spring or fall.

DIRE SITUATION IN PUERTO RICO AMID TRUMP ATTACKS: President Donald Trump spent the weekend tweeting defenses of his administration's response to Hurricane Maria in Puerto Rico from his New Jersey golf resort but his words bear little resemblance to the dire situation on the ground. Just 5 percent of the island has electricity and more than half of people lack access to clean drinking water more than a week and a half after the hurricane.

View from the ground: Trump in a series of weekend tweets bashed the "poor leadership ability" of Puerto Rican officials, who he said "want everything to be done for them," POLITICO's Matthew Nussbaum and Marc Caputo report. But Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Buchanan, who the Defense Department tapped to lead its response efforts, told the PBS NewsHour "this is the worst I've ever seen" in terms of damage from the storm. And Carmen Yulín Cruz, San Juan's mayor and the target of a number of Trump's Twitter missives, told ABC's "This Week" of the federal officials responding: "Their heart is in the right place, but we have to cut the red tape. That's the one message."

Several relief officials told Matthew and Marc over the weekend that the administration's patting itself on the back over the response was not helping, especially as the conditions on the ground in no way matched the rhetoric. "We have to think of this as societal collapse: no power, no water, no food, no nothing," one relief official told them from Puerto Rico. "We came in thinking this would be a traditional model of disaster response ... It is up to us to keep everything moving. Civil society is pretty much gone, and we didn't realize that until like 36 or 48 hours ago. And who knows when it's going to end." Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer summed up his view of the response during an interview with CBS' "Face the Nation": "The bottom line is at least for the first week and a half the effort has been slow footed, disorganized, and not adequate," he said.

Administration mounts defense: FEMA Director Brock Long told "Fox News Sunday" the administration continued to make daily progress on improving the situation but added "absolutely" there was a long road ahead. "This is the most logistically challenging event the United States has ever seen and we have been moving and pushing as fast as the situation allows," Long said. "It's going to be multiple — multiple months before power is restored to many of these areas and that's just a reality." In an update obtained by Axios, Tom Bossert, Trump's homeland security adviser, wrote: "Lack of power and the persistent commodity distribution problems on the island are major focuses right now. This is still an urgent situation."

WELCOME TO MONDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NOIA's Nicolette Nye was first up to name Rep. Dana Rohrabacher as the former Reagan speechwriter. WHITE HOUSE TIGHTENS REINS ON CABINET TRAVEL: After Tom Price's resignation Friday over hundreds of thousands in private flights, White House Chief of Staff John Kelly must now approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft," POLITICO's Matthew Nussbaum reports. "Every penny we spend comes from the taxpayer," OMB Director Mick Mulvaney wrote in a memo shortly after Price's resignation. "We thus owe it to the taxpayer to work as hard managing that money wisely as the taxpayer must do to earn it in the first place." Officials should stick to commercial travel "with few exceptions," he wrote. Remember both EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke have faced scrutiny in recent days for non-commercial travel.

Key line from memo: "Put another way, just because something is legal doesn't make it right."

Questions for Zinke continue: The Campaign for Accountability on Friday asked Office of Special Counsel and Interior's inspector general to probe whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act by speaking to the NHL's Vegas Golden Knights. He spoke at the dinner organized by team owner Bill Foley, one of Zinke's biggest campaign donors. Then, as POLITICO first reported, he hopped a $12,000 charter flight to an airport 20 minutes away from his Montana residence.

Some argue Pruitt, Zinke deserve Price's fate: A number of green and progressive groups urged Trump to also fire Pruitt and Zinke due to their non-commercial travel. "Forcing Tom Price from office does not come close to answering questions in the Trump Administration about the abuse of taxpayer funds when Ryan Zinke and Scott Pruitt are unrepentantly wasting hundreds of thousands on their own luxurious travel and sticking hardworking Americans with the bill," Sierra Club executive director Michael Brune said in one statement. "They deserve Price's fate and should be removed from office immediately."

MORE PUSHBACK TO PERRY'S FERC ASK: Count the solar and wind industries among those concerned by Energy Secretary Rick Perry's push to throw a lifeline to the struggling coal and nuclear industries (ICYMI Pro's Darius Dixon dived deep into the proposal Perry launched Friday). "The best way to guarantee a resilient and reliable electric grid is through market-based compensation for performance, not guaranteed payments for some, based on a government-prescribed definition," Amy Farrell, senior vice president for the American Wind Energy Association, said in a statement.

Same worries for solar: Christopher Mansour, vice president of federal affairs for the Solar Energy Industries Association: "While we agree that wholesale markets should fully compensate generators for all the energy, capacity and ancillary services they provide, healthy competition should always promote the best, most innovative solutions," he said. The conservative R St. Institute called Perry's plan "an arbitrary backdoor subsidy to coal and nuclear plants."

DEREGULATORY PUSH GETS SPOTLIGHT TODAY: Trump is expected to deliver remarks today at 11 a.m. highlighting his administration's efforts to remove regulatory burdens across the federal government to drive economic growth. Don't expect any major new initiatives to be announced, but ME would be shocked if the efforts of EPA to halt or delay a host of Obama-era regulations don't make a major appearance. That'll be followed by a series of breakout sessions with 10 agencies, including the Energy and Interior departments.

Not on the list? EPA, though the agency is doing its own event Tuesday to launch what it's calling Smart Sectors. EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said it's "a program that aims to facilitate meaningful collaboration with regulated sectors, sensible policies to improve environmental outcomes, and better EPA practices and streamlined operations." As Pro's learned last week, the event will designate staff liaisons for specific industries including oil and gas and utilities and power generation.

Pre-buttal: Public Citizen and Coalition for Sensible Safeguards put out their pre-buttal to the speech and say Trump's agenda is "premised on a series of demonstrably false claims about the costs of regulation, defies public opinion and major campaign promises, and represents a craven attempt at self-enrichment and payback to corporate donors." They'll host a press call at 1:30 p.m., along with Rep. David Cicilline, responding to his remarks.

A taste of today's remarks: Here's how Trump summed up his deregulatory efforts to the National Association of Manufacturers on Friday: "We are cutting regulations at a pace that has never even been thought of before — not even thought of. This is a groundbreaking campaign and involves every department and agency across our government."

A preview (via Playbook): A photo inside the White House from a tipster with the pages on the right showing "the number of pages in the [Code of Federal Regulations] today, which is a measure of all regs on the books (Fed Register are just new ones), versus the # about a half-century ago" on the left side. ARKEMA UNDER INVESTIGATION: The Harris County District Attorney's Office announced Friday it was investigating the Houston-area Arkema plant whose volatile chemicals exploded in the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey, The Houston Chronicle reports. "Companies should be on notice that we care when they pollute our air, our water, our environment," District Attorney Kim Ogg said. "We are looking into exactly what happened at the plant. We are gathering facts and we will apply the law. Arkema is under criminal investigation."

MAIL CALL! LET'S DO IT, PRUITT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Democrats, led by ranking member Tom Carper, sent Chairman John Barrasso a letter Friday urging him to schedule a hearing on EPA's budget request where Pruitt would testify. "We are concerned that this necessary hearing is long overdue," they wrote. Barrasso would only tell reporters last week he planned to have Pruitt appear before the committee "this year."

BORING BUT IMPORTANT: POLITICO's Danny Vinik looks at an important issue likely floating under your radar: the federal government's workforce continues to get older and younger people aren't stepping in to fill in the gaps. "It's that smart agencies develop a plan for a pipeline. The federal government's biggest problem is it's not very good at pipeline planning," Don Kettl, a professor at the University of Maryland who has written extensively on government management, said.

TAKE A GLANCE! Interior released a report Friday finding it contributed 1.7 million jobs and $254 billion in economic output during fiscal 2016. Among the conclusions: Interior-managed lands and waters produced 768 million barrels of crude oil, 4.7 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, and 310 million tons of coal. Its lands and facilities also generated enough hydropower to power 3.4 million homes.

SOMETHING'S PHISHY HERE: EPA employees were targeted by a phishing scheme seeking to steal large amounts of office supplies from the U.S., according to a podcast released Friday by the agency's inspector general. Photos of some of the phishing messages posted here.

Trump picks risky Puerto Rico fight Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Marc Caputo | 09/30/2017 07:50 AM EDT

The natural disaster in Puerto Rico has escalated into a firestorm for President Donald Trump, whose Saturday Twitter attack on the mayor of San Juan drew harsh condemnations, new charges of insensitivity, and warnings about political fallout.

In a series of Saturday morning tweets, Trump blasted the "poor leadership ability" of Puerto Rican officials, who he said "want everything to be done for them." Trump also said the island's leaders "are not able to get their workers to help," and accused the Democratic mayor of San Juan — who has publicly criticized his administration's response to Hurricane Maria — of scoring partisan political points.

Even Republicans were uncomfortable seeing television images of suffering Puerto Ricans juxtaposed with Trump's fighting words, tweeted from his luxury golf course in Bedminster, New Jersey.

"He is definitely not helping," said Republican state Rep. Bob Cortes, a Puerto Rico native who lives in Central Florida, which has seen a huge influx of Puerto Rican families in recent years. Cortes added that the controversy "gives [Democrats] a platform to register new voters."

Other Republicans also worry that Trump's comments could be a godsend to Democrats in Florida—a swing state whose Puerto Rican population of more than 1 million is expected to swell as people flee the storm's aftermath.

Ten days after Maria ravaged the island, most of Puerto Rico is still without power and many of its 3.4 million residents, most of them U.S. citizens, lack basic supplies like food and water. Critics say the Trump administration has been slow to help, with some invoking the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans a decade ago.

The perception that George W. Bush oversaw an incompetent and insensitive response to Katrina dealt a crippling blow to his presidency from which he never recovered, helping to drive his approval ratings to the low 20s. Trump officials scoff at the comparison with Katrina, saying their response to Maria has been appropriate.

In Washington, Democrats were swift to condemn Trump's tweets Saturday.

Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, released a statement calling Trump's tweets "abhorrent, baseless, and ... beneath the dignity of the office of the Presidency."

"Lives are on the line and people are dying," he added.

Trump's early morning broadsides, which began at 7:19 a.m., came after San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz slammed the administration's response repeatedly on Friday amid growing media coverage of the devastation on her island.

"We are dying here," Cruz said in an emotional plea. "If anybody out there is listening to us, we are dying, and you are killing us with the inefficiency and the bureaucracy." Puerto Rican officials say Maria killed at least 16 people there — a number experts believe will grow significantly.

From Bedminster, Trump defended his response while dismissing Cruz as a partisan.

"The Mayor of San Juan, who was very complimentary only a few days ago, has now been told by the Democrats that you must be nasty to Trump," Trump wrote on Twitter. "Such poor leadership ability by the Mayor of San Juan, and others in Puerto Rico, who are not able to get their workers to help."

Trump added that the Puerto Ricans "want everything to be done for them when it should be a community effort. 10,000 Federal workers now on Island doing a fantastic job."

But Republicans are anxious about the political effect the Puerto Rico crisis might have on Trump's national standing as well as their fortunes in Florida, where Gov. Rick Scott is mulling a bid against Democratic incumbent Sen. Bill Nelson next year. The past four top-of-the-ticket races in Florida were decided by 1.2 percentage points or less. Puerto Rican voters already tend to favor Democrats.

"It is a political nightmare for both Trump and Scott," a consultant associated with the Republican National Committee said in a text message. He said the disaster and Trump's "asinine response to criticism" have given Democrats "a way to 1) energize Puerto Rican voters in Florida and 2) motivate Puerto Rican residents who will be Florida residents after this disaster."

While echoing those concerns, Cortes also said Puerto Rico deserves its share of the blame, thanks to the commonwealth's endemic corruption and mismanagement. "It took a storm of this magnitude to show how underprepared they were," Cortes said.

Meanwhile, the White House is fighting against the narrative that it has been slow to act. Trump's Saturday schedule lists five phone calls to discuss the storm response, including one with Federal Emergency Management Agency administrator Brock Long.

Trump also reiterated his plan to visit the island on Tuesday, saying he would "hopefully" stop off in the U.S. Virgin Islands.

Trump's White House social media director, Dan Scavino, joined the fray on Twitter, calling Cruz a "hater" and "an opportunistic politician." Cruz denied that her criticism of Trump was fueled by personal animus.

"Actually, I was asking for help," she told MSNBC on Saturday morning. "I wasn't saying anything nasty about the president." Cruz noted that even Trump's point man for the disaster recovery effort, Army Lt. Gen. Jeff Buchanan, said on Friday that the number of U.S. troops assisting is "not enough." (Buchanan said more manpower and equipment like helicopters were headed to the island.)

Trump's tweets also targeted media outlets that have dedicated increasing amounts of air time to the suffering and chaos on the pummeled island.

"Fake News CNN and NBC are going out of their way to disparage our great First Responders as a way to 'get Trump.' Not fair to FR or effort!" he wrote.

Under mounting pressure, in recent days Trump officials have defended their relief effort as a success. On Thursday, acting Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke called the response "a good news story."

The comment only inflamed frustrations on an island where a sense of helplessness prevails, however.

"Damn it, this is not a good news story," Cruz told CNN on Friday. "This is a people are dying story. This is a life or death story. This is a there's a truckload of stuff that cannot be taken to people story. This is a story of a devastation that continues to worsen because people are not getting food and water."

Cruz, a liberal Trump critic, initially avoided tussling with the president for fear that it would become a distraction to relief efforts and "not productive."

But as the week unfolded, Puerto Rico officials felt their pleas for faster action and less red tape went unheeded. Then, on Thursday, Trump touted the recovery effort on Twitter, writing, "Governor said 'great job!'" That was an apparent reference to Cruz, who finally let loose with harsh criticism.

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) also pointed to problems on the island in a Friday tweet, writing that criticism of the Trump administration response is "missing [the] main problem." FEMA "has sent lots of aid problem is distribution once it gets to #PuertoRico," Rubio wrote.

Rubio, though, warned the Trump administration privately and publicly that Puerto Rico could become a "Katrina-like" situation.

Behind the sharp debate over disaster response are internal political tensions on the island. Cruz is eyeing the job of Puerto Rico's Republican governor, Ricardo Rossello, who has taken pains to avoid publicly criticizing Trump. She is developing strong ties to Florida Democrats and met Wednesday with Miami Beach Mayor Philip Levine, a likely candidate for Florida governor, when he delivered 7,000 pounds of relief supplies to the island.

About 24 hours later, Florida's Republican governor met with Rossello in Puerto Rico, then debriefed Trump on the disaster response over lunch the following day.

"This is not a time for politics," Scott said on the White House lawn Friday, saying that Rossello is "going through an unbelievable crisis."

Trump's breaking point with Price Back

By Andrew Restuccia, Josh Dawsey and Dan Diamond | 09/29/2017 08:24 PM EDT

Tom Price's downfall was his penchant for pricey jets.

But his demise was months in the making, as the president continued to lose trust in the Health and Human Services secretary who rarely attended Oval Office strategy meetings, had little sway or influence on Capitol Hill, and was associated in the president's mind with one of the administration's biggest defeats — the failure to repeal Obamacare.

Of particular notoriety: A picture of Price in March drinking at Bullfeathers, a famed Capitol Hill bar, as his colleagues tried to wrangle votes for the president's signature initiative.

Price's lack of goodwill with Trump and other senior administration officials ultimately doomed his chances of survival, even though many administration officials believed the furor would blow over when news first broke that Price spent hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars on private jets.

By early this week, however, it became clear that the growing firestorm over Price's travel was only getting worse. A number of officials in the White House said HHS had badly handled the response to the controversy — and was caught off guard by the facts. And it was hard to find a power player in the White House who would defend Price to the president.

POLITICO published five stories over the last 10 days that revealed Price had spent more than \$1 million in taxpayer money on travel since May, including overseas flights on military aircrafts and more than two dozen domestic trips on private planes.

Other media outlets amplified the revelations, with cable news frequently running damaging chyrons and reporters peppering Trump and press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders about the growing scandal throughout the week.

The president grew more angry, fuming to West Wing aides about the optics of a member of the administration spending so lavishly. The almost daily drip of revelations — including that Price took a government-funded private jet in August to get to a Georgia resort where he and his wife own land — further incensed the president.

Meanwhile, Trump was intensely frustrated by his unsuccessful health care push and associated Price with the failure, several aides said. He joked at a rally in July he would fire Price if he didn't get the votes for the Obamacare repeal.

While the White House has weathered a steady stream of mini-scandals since Trump took office, this one was different, according to administration officials, because it made Price look like the kind of creature of Washington that the president had railed against on the campaign trail.

Trump himself blasted Price on Friday for what he suggested was frivolous spending in light of the administration's efforts to impose fiscal conservatism on the federal government.

"I've saved hundreds of millions of dollars," the president told reporters on Friday when he was asked if he had lost confidence in Price. "So I don't like the optics of what you just saw."

Administration officials grew increasingly certain on Friday that Price would be ousted, but the final decision happened quickly, according to aides, who had cautioned as late as Friday afternoon that Trump might change his mind.

Though he nurtured a reputation as a ruthless boss on The Apprentice, Trump often hesitates to fire people — and sometimes takes weeks to make a final decision. In this case though, the president was counseled that the travel stories had become a distraction from his policy agenda, especially his tax reform push, according to an administration official.

There was also little personal chemistry between the two men.

The president was initially attracted to Price because he was a doctor, a supporter and "looked the part," one adviser with direct knowledge said, plus he was given positive reviews from House Speaker Paul Ryan and others on Capitol Hill.

He soon became a bit player in the administration.

Price was often left out of senior level meetings in the Oval Office on Obamacare repeal, even as other top deputies attended, according to several people with knowledge of the matter.

The president and a number of top aides had little faith in his political instincts.

Leading the effort to negotiate with senators on the Hill was Seema Verma from the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and Marc Short, head of legislative affairs. Two senior White House officials said Price's relationships at the Capitol were not as good as he promised — and that some members preferred not to deal with him. Many members saw him as prickly and not particularly likable, one senior GOP aide said, damaging his ability to negotiate.

Andrew Bremberg, the head of the White House's Domestic Policy Council, was more involved in policy decisions than Price, these people said.

Price was often out of town during key stretches of the presidency, and while several senior officials said they weren't aware of his private jet use, there was a general consensus that he was often nowhere to be found.

"I didn't know he was on private jets," one senior administration official said. "I knew he was never there."

Price's press office initially reassured the White House that the story would quickly pass and argued that Price needed charter jets to respond to public health emergencies like the recent hurricanes.

After POLITICO identified at least 17 charter flights that took place before the first storm — Hurricane Harvey — hit in late August, and included flights that did not appear to be for urgent public health priorities, HHS then changed its argument: Price needed charter aircraft "to accommodate his demanding schedule," a spokesperson allowed last week.

As he often does when making a big decision, the president began making calls on Thursday night and Friday morning to ask whether he should fire Price.

Trump also told aides that if Price had a defense, he would give it. "I don't think he has any defense for it," one person said, summarizing Trump's comments. "He is just taking it."

Price did make a last-ditch effort to save his job, announcing on Thursday that he would reimburse the federal government for the cost of his seat on the domestic flights, a figure that reportedly totals nearly $52,000 — just a fraction of the total cost of the trips. The president didn't like that Price was only offering to pay back some of the flights, and was struck by TV coverage that showed the total cost as more than $1 million, officials said.

The secretary also tried to go on Fox News and assuage the president. It didn't work.

Rumors began swirling in HHS early Friday that Price might be fired. But, in an apparent sign of how quickly the final decision was made, Price was conducting business as usual late Friday.

Just minutes before Price's resignation became official, the secretary sent an email to HHS officials outlining next steps on the "Reimagine HHS initiative," a broad reorganizational effort of the department that was expected to result in staff reductions. The email outlined senior HHS officials who will be spearheading the process.

"Thank you for all your dedication and support, and we look forward to being in touch soon," Price wrote, according to the email, which was obtained by POLITICO.

Across town at the White House, Trump's chief of staff John Kelly was calling Hill leadership to tell them Price was out.

One senior official said the tipping point was when the White House couldn't contain the scandal and it became an administration-wide story.

Other members of Trump's Cabinet were coming under increased criticism for their use of military and private aircraft, including Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin.

"Got to the point he was causing problems for everybody," this person said. "He could have lasted maybe if it didn't just get worse every day."

White House to Cabinet: No private air travel without Kelly's approval Back

By Matthew Nussbaum | 09/29/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The White House cracked down on Cabinet officials' use of private planes Friday, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft," after Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price resigned over his own taxpayer-funded flights.

Mick Mulvaney, the director of the Office of Management and Budget, sent out the memo soon after Price's resignation was made public. His exit came after a series of POLITICO reports about his frequent use of private planes to conduct government — and sometimes personal — business.

"In light of recent events, the President has asked me to remind the heads of all executive departments and agencies of Administration policies on travel," Mulvaney wrote.

He reminded the department and agency heads that, by regulation, "Government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft should not be used for travel by Government employees except with specific justification."

"However, beyond the law and formal policy, departments and agencies should recognize that we are public servants," Mulvaney wrote. "Every penny we spend comes from the taxpayer. We thus owe it to the taxpayer to work as hard managing that money wisely as the taxpayer must do to earn it in the first place."

Mulvaney added: "Put another way, just because something is legal doesn't make it right."

Officials should stick to commercial travel "with few exceptions," he wrote.

In the wake of the controversy, other administration officials' travels have come under scrutiny. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has used military planes for some trips, POLITICO reported, while EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin have also raised eyebrows with their travel itineraries.

President Donald Trump was livid over the Price scandal and accepted his resignation on Friday.

"We have great secretaries, and we have some that actually own their own planes, so that solves that," Trump told reporters earlier on Friday.

Interior Secretary Zinke traveled on charter, military planes Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/28/2017 07:54 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides have taken several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, according to documents and a department spokeswoman.

Zinke is at least the fourth senior member of the Trump administration to have used non-commercial planes at taxpayer expense, along with Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price. President Donald Trump has fumed at Price's pricey travel, and Democrats say the revelations demonstrate a cavalier attitude by Cabinet members toward excessive spending.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said Zinke's charter or military plane trips were booked only after officials were unable to find commercial flights that would accommodate Zinke's schedule and that all were "pre-cleared by career officials in the ethics office." Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as Price plans to do for some of the $400,000 tab he racked up on charter flights.

On June 26, a Beechcraft King Air 200 carried Zinke and several staffers from Las Vegas to Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Montana, about a 20-minute drive from Zinke's home in Whitefish, according to his official schedule. The flight cost $12,375, Swift said.

Zinke left after speaking at an event for the city's new professional hockey team, the Vegas Golden Knights Development Camp Dinner, according to his schedule. Earlier in the day, he had been in Pahrump, Nevada, for an announcement related to public lands.

Zinke's flight left Las Vegas at 8:30 p.m. PST and landed in Kalispell around 1:30 a.m. MST. The secretary stayed overnight at his residence, Interior documents show.

Las Vegas is one of the main connecting airports for commercial flights to Glacier International. Commercial flights between the two cities are available for several hundred dollars a ticket, according to travel planning websites.

In Whitefish, Zinke attended the Western Governors' Association's annual meeting, where he spoke for about 20 minutes without taking questions. He then had a private lunch with association members. In the afternoon Zinke was the subject of a photo shoot with GQ magazine at Lake McDonald and fished while being interviewed by Outside Magazine, the records show.

Zinke and staffers flew commercial back to Washington, D.C., the next day, according to the records.

The trip was not the first in which Interior booked a private jet for Zinke. On March 31, Interior chartered two flights to take Zinke and staff from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. Another two flights were chartered to return to St. Croix later that night.

Swift said she did not know how much the flights cost but that no other arrangements were available.

Commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars, according to travel booking websites.

In May, Zinke and his wife, Lolita, used a military aircraft to travel to Norway. From there, they flew on a military plane to Alaska for events organized by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The trip included charter planes to travel within Alaska, a common occurrence in the large, remote state. The Zinkes paid for Lolita's share of the trip, the full cost of which was not immediately available, Swift said.

Zinke also took a military helicopter from Fort Bliss to review the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument in New Mexico in June, and he used a Bureau of Land Management helicopter to review the Basin and Range National Monument on July 30. "It is difficult to survey a half-million-acre piece of land with few roads by foot or car in an hour-and-a-half," Swift said.

Along with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke took a military plane to Ravalli County, Montana, to check on wildfires in the area in August. "The military plane was used because of a very tight travel window, with no viable commercial airline options to transport two secretaries, security details, and associated USDA, Forest Service and Interior staff to Missoula in the time required," said USDA spokesman Tim Murtaugh. The cost of the flight was not immediately available, but the two agencies plan to reimburse the Air Force, Murtaugh said.

DOE's Perry pushes FERC to support coal power plants Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/29/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The Trump administration on Friday called on FERC to create new rules to protect coal-fired and nuclear power plants that are being squeezed by cheaper natural gas and renewable sources, saying they were "indispensable for economic and national security."

Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who told miners in Pennsylvania on Thursday that "it's time for coal in this country to be revived," pressed electricity regulators to alter power markets and protect the resilience of the power grid with payments to generators that keep fuel supplies on site, a clear reference to the coal-fired and nuclear power plants.

The proposal, which DOE said gave FERC 60 days to create a final or interim rule, comes just a month after Perry's agency issued a report saying FERC should "expedite" its work with grid operators to ensure the stability of the nation's power network.

"In terms of process, this is a pretty bold move," said Tony Clark, a Republican former FERC commissioner. DOE often conducts studies on issues it believes need attention, he said, but "actually forwarding to the commission something specific for action is a pretty bold way of moving the issue right up the batting order at FERC."

The new proposal, directed at FERC under a rarely used Section 403 authority of the Department of Energy Organization Act, stops short of specifically seeking market incentives for coal. But it calls for full-cost recovery for power generating units that provide essential power and "ancillary" services — and have a 90-day fuel supply on site in case of natural or man-made disruptions. That would exclude most natural gas power plants, which do not typically keep large fuel inventories on hand and instead receive supplies via pipeline.

Perry's request represents a departure from the two decades of U.S. policy that has trended toward more market-based tools, which has helped natural gas to nearly double its power market share. Renewable energy sources like wind and solar, though still modest when compared to fossil fuels or nuclear power, have also grown quickly as federal incentives helped drive down their costs.

But the growth of renewables and natural gas — combined with tighter pollution controls and weak new demand for electricity — has forced hundreds of old coal-fired power plants into retirement. Nuclear power plants in some parts of the country are also under financial pressure, hurt by negative wholesale power market prices that sometimes require the plant owners to pay to deliver their power supplies.

"If this gets the debate started, then my hat's off," said former FERC Chairman Pat Wood, a friend of Perry and a strong advocate for market-based power systems. "But it's a pretty arresting [thing] to wake up and read. That would never have played in Texas. ... If there is a service to be valued, then a market can value that."

In the grid study ordered by Perry and released in August, DOE experts pointed to low power prices and cheap natural gas as the single biggest reason for coal ceding its position as the nation's biggest source of electricity. And that report also called for "reforms" to power markets that would help bolster the electricity network's resilience by easing the financial pressures on many power providers.

In its Friday proposal, DOE cited a spike in demand during the 2014 "polar vortex" that hit much of the U.S., which prompted utilities to run many coal plants that were slated for retirement. Without those plants, as many as 65 million people in the PJM market would have seen their power resources threatened, DOE said.

But the new regulatory pitch from the agency also fueled the growing feud between the gas and coal industries.

Paul Bailey, president and CEO American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, commended Perry for "initiating a rulemaking by FERC that will finally value the on-site fuel security provided by the coal fleet."

But the American Petroleum Institute, which also represents natural gas producers, said DOE drew the wrong conclusions from the 2014 event, and that forcing new mandates on the power market wasn't the solution.

"[A]s we review the proposal we are concerned the agency has mischaracterized the lessons learned from past weather-related events and appears to suggest that additional regulation is the answer where markets have already proven the ability to greatly benefit consumers and give our electric system the flexibility needed to meet constantly, and often rapidly, changing electricity demands," said API Executive Vice President and Chief Strategy Officer Marty Durbin in a statement.

FERC, which has struggled to integrate states' energy policies that aim to boost renewables or support aging nuclear power plants, has long maintained a fuel-neutral stance in the regional markets that it oversees. If it were to follow Perry's directive to create incentives for grid resilience to plants that maintain their own fuel inventories on site, it would be an implicit move at the national level to alter the electricity markets to support the fuels that both Perry and Trump have touted.

Montana regulator Travis Kavulla suggested on Twitter that rather than deal with the pressing issues facing the grid, "Instead, this reform is sort of the @ENERGY equivalent of the Oprah "you get a car, and you get a car. And you? A car!" approach."

However, FERC, whose members are appointed by the president and operate as an independent body, isn't obligated to implement the specific policy pushed by Perry. The commission will so be back to operating with a full five members in the coming weeks, with a Republican majority.

"FERC's going to follow its own procedures," said Marc Spitzer, a Republican former FERC commissioner. "It would be a mistake for people to assume that this is going to be some partisan Republican rubber stamp given the way FERC works."

FERC can spend months or years digging into complex issues that underpin the power markets, and its commissioners tend to seek common ground with each other to ensure that its rules are clear and ensure long-lasting regulations that give utilities stability to plan their operations.

"Is someone really going to invest [billions of dollars] when it's a 3-2 vote that partisans and the parties can flip next year? Is that a good forum for investment as opposed to a 5-0 order?" Spitzer said.

FERC declined to say when the agency last received a rulemaking from DOE using Section 403.

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by Chevron: Trump team not pitching Paris renegotiation in Bonn — NERC head on leave after arrest — Perry raises eyebrows with roundtable for big donors

With help from Emily Holden

LAISSEZ LES BONN TEMPS ROULER? Government officials and industry executives will urge developing countries to pursue "cleaner" fossil fuel and nuclear power in a presentation today in Bonn, Germany, Pro's Emily Holden reports. At tonight's event George David Banks, special assistant to President Donald Trump on energy and environment, will make introductory remarks, while Francis Brooke, an aide to Vice President Mike Pence, moderates a discussion with executives from the liquefied natural gas company Tellurian, the coal company Peabody Energy and the nuclear power company NuScale. Barry Worthington, director of the U.S. Energy Association who will participate in the discussion alongside industry executives, told Climate Home News that striking fossil fuel trade deals was a major goal of the presentation.

Not on the agenda? Paris. Diplomats entering the second week of the COP23 climate negotiations won't be getting any hints from the U.S. delegation about how to convince Trump to stay in an international deal to slash greenhouse gas emissions. A White House official briefing reporters last week said climate mitigation is a "lesser priority" than energy security and economic development, "but it's still a priority" for the White House. "The president has left the door open, the president has said multiple times that he's willing to reconsider our engagement in the Paris agreement if we can find a fairer deal that works for American businesses, taxpayers, consumers, so yeah it's up to the president," the official told reporters.

Out of the shadows: A host of prominent Democratic officials, including five senators, stressed over the weekend that the U.S. remained committed to action on climate change despite Trump's stance on issue, POLITICO California's David Siders and Emily report. "I want to make it clear: The federal government is not just the president of the United States," Sen. Ben Cardin, ranking member on the Foreign Relations Committee, told activists on Saturday. The senators met with delegations from India, Japan, the European Union, Mexico, Indonesia and Canada to assuage concerns about U.S. inaction. They also participated in side events including one decrying efforts to weaken automobile CAFE standards.

Governors tout actions too: Four Democratic governors — Virginia's Terry McAuliffe, California's Jerry Brown, Washington's Jay Inslee and Oregon's Kate Brown — plan to highlight their climate ambitions in a panel this morning with Christiana Figueres, former executive secretary of the UNFCCC. And that comes after Jerry Brown and former New York mayor Michael Bloomberg, released a report touting the role of U.S. states and cities in addressing climate change that nonetheless acknowledged non-federal efforts won't be sufficient to meet the 26 to 28 percent emissions reductions below 2005 levels that the U.S. promised by 2030.

Steyer stays focused (on impeachment): Tom Steyer, the billionaire Democratic donor, on Sunday morning made his case for impeaching Trump to Democrats in Bonn, asking them to "confront the liars and deniers," David also reports. The governors seemed unimpressed, and Steyer acknowledged himself that congressional Republicans, not voters, would have to back his impeachment campaign for it to work.

IT'S ANOTHER MONDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NRDC's Ed Chen was first up to identify the L.A. County board of supervisors as the body with two former congresswomen (Janice Hahn and Hilda Solis). NERC CHIEF ON LEAVE AFTER ARREST: Gerry Cauley is on a leave of absence from the North American Electric Reliability Corporation "until further notice" following his arrest on a domestic violence charge. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reports Cauley has been charged with a misdemeanor, battery/family violence. Charles Berardesco has been named interim CEO.

EYEBROWS RAISED BY PERRY ROUNDTABLE: Energy Secretary Rick Perry headlines an intimate gathering today on behalf of the pro-Trump outside group America First Policies in a growing trend of giving donors access to Cabinet officials that many worry is an ethical gray area, POLITICO's Maggie Severns reports. Perry won't solicit donations but America First officials plan to ask for contributions after he departs. He's allowed to take part in events for the group's nonprofit policy arm, which is legally separate from the super PAC even though the same officers run both groups.

But campaign finance reform advocates say the arrangement takes advantage of a loophole. "This is all part of the very close coordination we're seeing between the campaign itself and what's supposedly an outside group," said Craig Holman, the government affairs lobbyist at the good-government group Public Citizen.

INSIDE LOOK AT PRESSURE ON PERRY'S GRID STUDY: Alison Silverstein, the veteran energy consultant who authored Perry's electric grid study, resisted pressure from the agency to blame regulations for the struggles of coal and nuclear plants, Forbes reports. After being hit for not faulting regulations in the first draft, Silverstein said she asked officials to provide data to back up their assertion: "I said, 'Bring me the data. I've been in the building three or four weeks now, you guys are the ones who own the issue. Prove to me, bring me all of your research on how regulation has killed these.' 'Well, we don't have any.' 'Then how am I supposed to do this?'"

ACTIVISTS WILL BE PROSECUTED: The Justice Department said Friday it would aggressively prosecute activists who damage pipelines or "critical energy infrastructure in violation of federal law," Reuters reports. That comes after more than 80 House members sought information on what DOJ planned to do about an increase in protest activities around pipelines in a late October letter.

ON TAP IN CONGRESS — DISASTER AID REQUEST EXPECTED: The latest disaster relief request is expected to arrive on Capitol Hill sometime this week and is likely to top $50 billion, Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief reports. Like the two previous requests, it won't be broken down state-by-state. But the governors of Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands will be town to push for recovery funds and the Texas congressional delegation hopes to meet with OMB Director Mick Mulvaney to make their case for their full $61 billion request.

Speaking of which, Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló and Del. Jenniffer González hold a press conference at 11 a.m. today at the Hall of States to make their case.

And you're out: Abner Gómez resigned his post as head of Puerto Rico's emergency management department on Friday and Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Buchanan, who led the Trump administration's military response to the hurricanes, will be reassigned off the island this week, CNN reports.

And remember Whitefish? While senior linemen from Florida working on grid restoration work on behalf of Whitefish Energy earned $63 an hour working in Puerto Rico, the tiny Montana-based company billed the island's utility $319 an hour for linemen, the New York Times reports. Experts said those charges were well above normal, even for emergency work, though a spokesman for the company defended the charges, saying "simply looking at the rate differential does not take into account Whitefish's overhead costs," included in the rate.

Status check: More than 7 weeks after Hurricane Maria hit, more than 52 percent of the island remains in the dark and more than 10 percent of residents still lack drinking water, according to government figures.

MINE SAFETY PICK COULD GET VOTE: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell filed cloture last week on David Zatezalo's selection to be the administration's mine safety chief, teeing up a final confirmation vote as soon as this week. He chaired the coal company Rhino Resources when it received pattern of violation notices in 2010 and 2011, but said during his confirmation hearing he wouldn't have a problem working with career staff at MSHA that issued those notices.

FLOOD INSURANCE READY TO ROLL! House Republicans are ready to try again with a revised version H.R. 2874 \(115\) of their flood insurance reauthorization and the Rules Committee meets today at 5 p.m. That comes even as coastal lawmakers continued to raise concerns with the proposal. Pro Financial Services' Zachary Warmbrodt with more here.

FORMER EPA ATTORNEYS BASH PRUITT ORDER: Fifty-seven former EPA career attorneys today sent a letter to Administrator Scott Pruitt "to correct the many mistakes of law and fact" concerning his October directive boosting the role of industry in settlement negotiations. "It is EPA's failure to comply with legal requirements that is the problem, not the people who sue EPA, the courts that hear the suits, or the EPA and DOJ staff who faithfully negotiate settlements that provide EPA longer and more flexible schedules than it would receive if there were no settlement," they wrote. The former agency attorneys urge Pruitt to revise the directive to promote "fair, transparent, and efficient settlement of well-founded suits against the agency."

NORTH CAROLINA OFFICIAL ALSO ON LEAVE: Donald van der Vaart, a recent appointee to EPA's Scientific Advisory Board and top North Carolina environmental regulator during the prior Republican governor's term, has been placed on "investigatory leave," The News & Observer reports. Van der Vaart's selection to the advisory board generated significant controversy and prompted the new head of the state's Department of Environmental Quality to say he didn't represent North Carolina on the EPA board. His deputy John Evans was also placed on "investigatory leave" for unspecified reasons. Both men demoted themselves to be shielded from termination under the new incoming Democratic administration.

WHY BROWN'S A CLIMATE WARRIOR: David Siders' entire profile of Brown is worth your time but of particular interest to ME readers is why termed-out governor has devoted so much energy to climate change. "I find a lot of what is included in politics doesn't count that much, at least for my salvation or my peace of mind or my interest in life," Brown said. The climate, he went on, "is fundamental. It's not like dietary requirements. It's not like a tax measure, or a school curriculum, or many of the issues, even a crime bill. It goes to the essence of being alive, living things. Whether it's humans or fauna, flora, the basis of life is embedded in this chemical structure, biological structure. And it's threatened."

But not good enough for some: Environmental activists interrupted Brown's speech in Bonn Saturday, shouting his refusal to ban fracking in California was a major blemish on his record. But the long-time governor shot back, according to The Sacramento Bee, "I agree with you, 'in the ground. Let's put you in the ground so we can get on with the show here."

U.S. climate delegation won't outline conditions to stick with Paris deal Back

By Emily Holden and David Siders | 11/12/2017 03:33 PM EDT

BONN, Germany—The Trump administration does not plan to give international diplomats any clues about how they could convince the U.S. to stay in a global agreement to fight climate change but will use meetings this week as an opportunity to promote U.S. coal, gas and nuclear companies, according to a White House official.

The centerpiece of the White House presence at the climate talks in Bonn, Germany, will be a Monday evening presentation where government officials and industry executives will urge developing countries to pursue "cleaner" fossil fuel and nuclear power — a pitch that could be meant to widen the market for American energy exports.

The White House source said State Department diplomats and Trump aides would not engage on remaining in the 2015 Paris agreement, which Trump has said he would exit unless he got terms more favorable to U.S. businesses.

"We're not going to address that issue," the official said on an embargoed call with reporters on Thursday. "The president has left the door open, the president has said multiple times that he's willing to reconsider our engagement in the Paris agreement if we can find a fairer deal that works for American businesses, taxpayers, consumers, so yeah it's up to the president."

Trump has never repudiated his view that man-made climate change is a hoax, although the White House has since said he "believes the climate is changing" without elaborating on the cause. But the lack of engagement from his negotiating team suggests he has little interest in reaching a better deal to limit global greenhouse gas emissions.

The U.S. panel is not expected to discuss ways to reach the Paris agreement goals of reducing greenhouse gas emissions enough to avoid a 2 degrees Celsius rise above pre-industrial levels, which scientists say would be a dangerous tipping point.

"The president believes that we can reduce our emissions while growing our economy," the White House official said.

Climate activists were mulling protest actions ahead of the Monday night forum, while fearing the event would only further cast a shadow over the United States' role in the conference.

"It's what you expect when we have fossil fuel billionaires running our government," said Garrett Blad, executive director of the SustainUS, a youth advocacy group. "I think it's irresponsible and dangerous, and I think the American people know that and are on our side."

Former Vice President Al Gore said he expected the forum would do little to alter dynamics of the conference.

"I think that people will see it for what it is," he said in an interview. "The president has surrounded himself with some of the most notorious climate deniers, and people who come to these meeting know who these characters are, and I think they see it for what it is."

The White House official said he didn't expect other countries to ask what kind of deal the president is looking for, adding that the United Nations conference "is really not the place for that to happen," and that the conversation would be more likely to occur between world leaders. Trump returns Tuesday from a 12-day trip to Asia, which included meetings with Chinese President Xi Jinping and other heads of state. He did not mention climate change once while abroad.

The Trump administration is rolling back President Barack Obama's climate efforts and also trying to boost coal-fired power--a major driver of rising temperatures that are making seas swell and extreme weather intensify.

Despite Trump's stance, a delegation of career officials from the State Department is on site at the United Nations conference to represent U.S. interests as countries negotiate how they will achieve and verify their commitments to curb emissions.

In the discussion Monday, George David Banks, special assistant to President Trump on energy and environment, will make introductory remarks. Francis Brooke, an aide to Vice President Mike Pence, will moderate the talk among executives from the liquefied natural gas company Tellurian, the coal company Peabody Energy and the nuclear power company NuScale, as well as Barry Worthington, director of the U.S. Energy Association.

The panel will outline ways U.S. could encourage developing countries to build "cleaner, more efficient," fossil fuel plants to mitigate climate change, the White House source told reporters last week.

Worthington told Climate Home News that striking fossil fuel trade deals was a major objective of the discussion.

"The flavor du jour is LNG but we're also exporting crude oil and derivative products and continue to export a sizeable volume of coal," he told the outlet.

The White House source said climate mitigation is a "lesser priority" than energy security and economic development, "but it's still a priority."

Without U.S. involvement, "the Chinese will build the coal plants and use inefficient technology," the official said.

"Quite frankly, if we don't bring it up and want to engage people on it, it's just not going to happen," he said. "It's burying your head in the sand if you don't have a conversation, just simply because of the facts, again because of the role coal is going to play in the energy mix...because of the role that natural gas is going to play."

The official cited International Energy Agency projections that natural gas demand will grow 50 percent and coal demand will increase by 2040, especially in South and Southeast Asia. And he pointed to reports that at least 1,600 coal plants are planned or under construction in 62 countries, according to the environmental group Urgewald. Chinese companies are reportedly planning many of them, but the Chinese government in January canceled plans for 103 plants.

As part of the Paris agreement, China pledged to begin shrinking total emissions by 2030. Trump has said it's unfair that China would be able to keep increasing its carbon output in the meantime, although the U.S. over time has contributed more greenhouse gases to the atmosphere than any other nation and China's economy was slower to begin growing.

The White House official did not explain how the U.S. would seek to push of more efficient coal plants abroad, but he said the conversation in Bonn Monday would cover "high efficiency, low emissions coal, but then also the more advanced technologies that either improve efficiency, or the carbon capture and utilization pieces."

Trump on his trip to Asia last week unveiled a slate of deals with China, but none were to promote more efficient coal-fired power plants. One is for sales and rentals of Caterpillar mining equipment to China's largest coal mining company and another is a joint venture between a U.S. industrial gases company and state-owned Chinese firm to build a coal-to-syngas facility, according to Bloomberg. Trump's travels focused far more on promoting the export of U.S. liquefied natural gas.

Top Democrats stage anti-Trump revolt at Bonn climate summit Back

By David Siders and Emily Holden | 11/12/2017 10:56 AM EDT

BONN, Germany — A handful of Democratic governors and scores of other lawmakers and mayors are mounting an insurgency at the United Nations climate conference here, orchestrating a highly choreographed campaign to persuade world leaders that President Donald Trump doesn't speak for the United States on climate change.

Several Democratic U.S. senators began meeting last week with officials from other countries, seeking to minimize Trump's withdrawal from the Paris climate agreement. Meanwhile, the governors of California, Virginia, Oregon and Washington — along with mayors from throughout the nation — were expected to touch off a blitz of public appearances at the conference as the meeting enters its final week.

"We are still in!" Sen. Ben Cardin of Maryland told cheering activists Saturday at a pavilion set up just outside the official meeting zone, a de facto headquarters for the opposition. "I want to make it clear: The federal government is not just the president of the United States."

The Democrats' diplomacy — part lobbying, part public relations — comes amid widespread international concern about Trump's decision to pull the United States out of the Paris accord. War-torn Syria announced last week that it would join the agreement, leaving the United States — if it goes through with its withdrawal — as the only country in the world outside of the pact.

On Saturday, Democratic politicians, climate activists and like-minded business interests sought to present the United States as a country divorced from its president. Speakers repeated the slogan, "We are still in," a message splayed across an electronic ticker and on buttons at the unofficial U.S. pavilion. The pavilion's estimated $235,000 cost was being covered by a coalition including former New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg and the billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer.

Steyer, who is spending millions of dollars on a national television ad campaign calling for Trump's impeachment, was expected to outline his case for Trump's ouster in a speech here Sunday.

While pavilion organizers plied guests with big-name speakers and free beer and wine, a subtler campaign was unfolding inside the conference halls. Starting late last week, a small delegation of U.S. senators, including Cardin, Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii), Ed Markey (D-Mass.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) — began meeting with officials from other countries in an effort to assuage nerves about Trump. Schatz said he and other lawmakers met with delegations from India and Japan and were planning to meet with representatives of the European Union, Mexico, Indonesia and Canada.

The senators argued Trump could not quickly undo eight years of Obama-era climate policies or significantly affect state-level efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

"I think that there's an understanding of the American system of government, which is sometimes cumbersome and slow, and frustratingly so, but in this instance it works in favor of climate action," said Schatz. "Whatever the president's rhetoric, he can't prevent us from moving forward on clean energy."

Following a meeting with Mexican officials, Markey said Saturday, "Obviously, I think it's important for them to understand that there are 30 states that have renewable electricity standards, that the fuel economy standards are still the federal law, that the appliance efficiency standards are still federal law."

Democrats trying to thwart attacks on climate action have on their side bureaucracy, the courts and a narrowly divided Congress that often gets stuck in legislative stalemates. Although Republicans control Congress and the White House, they need 60 votes to proceed to most legislation.

The Trump administration is moving to undo President Barack Obama's climate standards — including carbon limits for the roughly one-third of emissions that come from the power sector. Those regulatory rollbacks could take years and will have to stand up to legal review, but in the meantime, the federal government will not move forward to curb greenhouse gases.

Markey promised that Democrats will fight to maintain fuel economy standards and will block any effort to cut back wind and solar tax credits. He told a crowd on Saturday that Trump has "assembled a Cabinet of Big Oil all-stars" but that, "On our side, we have 100 years of science and nearly 100 percent of the scientists in the planet. And inside the United States, we have city after city, state after state, standing up to take action."

Diplomats are paying close attention to American representatives pledging to keep fighting climate change, said Jens Mattias Clausen, a Copenhagen-based climate change adviser for Greenpeace who is attending the talks.

The most important thing those representatives can do is "show the rest of the world that even if the Trump administration refuses to face reality here and continues with this very isolationist style that the rest of the U.S. is actually ready to step up and help with the commitments that they have," Clausen said. In terms of specific numbers they can offer, "the more concrete it gets ... the better," he added.

California Democratic Gov. Jerry Brown and Bloomberg are leading a group called America's Pledge, which aims to release more specific reduction commitments from states and localities next year. On Saturday, they released a report asserting the combined economic power of every state and city that has committed to the Paris agreement would outmatch every country except for China and the U.S.

Yet even their own report acknowledged, as previous studies have, that non-federal efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions are not sufficient to meet the United States' commitments under the Paris agreement given Trump's stated policies. And local and state climate efforts are fraught with their own, internal disagreements about how aggressively subnational governments should pursue climate policies on their own. On Saturday, Brown had a speech interrupted for an extended period by activists protesting California's cap-and-trade program and its permissiveness on hydraulic fracturing.

"You have a positive message insofar as what individual states and individuals are doing" about climate change, Mairead McGuinness, a member of the European Parliament, told Brown at a forum last week.

However, she said, "Sometimes when we make a step forward, there are forces that ask us to step back by half."

McGuinness added, "One of the comments we hear from EU citizens is that, why should we act when others are not?"

For all of the Democrats' efforts, Trump looms large over the conference, and the power of the White House is not lost on the international community. Trump, who has called climate change a hoax, is publicly promoting coal production. He has said he is withdrawing from the Paris agreement because it puts the United States at a "big economic disadvantage."

Last week's elections in the United States provided a rare, positive talking point for Democrats trying to combat Trump's message in Bonn. The Democrats' sweep in the off-year contests, they said, presaged a return to Democratic power in Washington and re-engagement in climate talks abroad.

"Tuesday's election marked that Trump is alone and isolated," said Garrett Blad, executive director of SustainUS, a youth advocacy group. "It's going to be our job back home — 2018 is going to be a huge year with the elections — to make sure that states ... are moving forward with the most aggressive action that we can."

When Bloomberg mentioned Saturday that the official U.S. delegation to the conference under Trump was preparing to host a controversial panel on Monday on the use of fossil fuels, the crowd booed.

"The Trump administration did send a delegation here to Bonn, and it might be the first climate conference where — this is not a joke, folks — coal is being promoted as an example of sustainability," Bloomberg said.

He added, "It will also likely be the last. The world is moving on, and so is the United States."

Former Vice President Al Gore, a major draw for climate activists at the conference, told POLITICO in an interview Saturday that commitments made by states, cities and businesses all "adds up to a very impressive reduction in U.S. emissions."

He added, "I mean, [Trump] can prohibit EPA employees from talking to the public, and he can remove the word 'climate' from all the government websites. But he can't stop the technological and business revolution that's gaining speed around the world and especially in the U.S."

McAuliffe, top Democrats dismiss impeachment talk Back

By David Siders | 11/12/2017 11:19 AM EDT

BONN, Germany — Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe said Sunday he does not support impeaching President Donald Trump, after Democratic billionaire Tom Steyer pressed the case for impeachment at the United Nations climate conference here.

"Let [special counsel Robert] Mueller, and let the people who are doing the process, go through and do what they're doing," McAuliffe said after a breakfast speech by Steyer, a supporter of the Virginia Democrat. "You don't prejudge investigations."

Steyer, who is spending millions of dollars running television ads in the United States calling for Trump's impeachment, told a small crowd Sunday that "lack of action is a choice."

But Steyer's message did not appear to resonate with top Democratic politicians in Germany for the climate talks. Oregon Gov. Kate Brown, who also attended the breakfast, said she has no position on impeachment, which she said is "something that Congress is going to deal with." California Gov. Jerry Brown was also dismissive.

"Do you want me to start an impeachment movement by saying, 'Yes, I agree with Steyer. Let's go.' What will that do?" Jerry Brown told reporters on Saturday night. "That would be counterproductive. It would undermine all that we're trying to do."

Former California GOP Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a vocal critic of Trump, declined to answer questions about impeachment Sunday.

Steyer, who is considering running for U.S. Senate in California, spoke in a pavilion set up by United States climate advocates and financed by a coalition including Steyer and former New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

McAuliffe, a potential presidential contender who described Steyer as a friend, said, "He paid for the breakfast. He's entitled to clearly say what he wants."

Pro-Trump group courts donors with Cabinet access Back

By Maggie Severns | 11/10/2017 03:22 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry will headline an intimate gathering of high-powered business executives in Texas next week for the pro-Trump outside group America First Policies, the first in a series of "roundtable discussions" giving donors face time with top Trump officials.

The Houston event featuring Perry, detailed in an invitation sent to a Republican donor and obtained by POLITICO, will include roughly 30 people and cover topics from energy policy to the Trump administration's broader agenda, America First spokeswoman Erin Montgomery said. Perry will not solicit donations from the attendees at the Monday event, which would be a violation of federal law — but America First officials plan to ask for contributions after Perry leaves the room.

The event highlights the cozy and growing ties between officials in President Donald Trump's administration and outside allies spending millions of dollars pushing administration policies this year. America First is brandishing its relationships with government officials to establish itself as the White House's preferred outside ally, among a mass of pro-Trump groups that have popped up this year.

In addition to holding more roundtable events, America First Policies recently held conference calls featuring White House Legislative Affairs Director Marc Short, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and Rep. Erik Paulsen, all key players on tax reform. America First leaders also huddled with White House officials recently.

America First Policies and its affiliated super PAC, America First Action, plan to raise and spend $100 million supporting Trump's agenda in the next year. Super PACs are not permitted to coordinate with candidates and there are strict rules governing Cabinet officials' political activities. But there is a loophole: Perry and others can participate in events put on by America First's nonprofit policy arm, which is legally separate from the super PAC even though the same officers run both groups.

"As long as the super PAC and the 501(c)(4) each stays in its own lane they can both operate under the same umbrella," said Brett Kappel, a campaign finance lawyer and partner at Akerman LLP.

But campaign finance reform advocates said the arrangement crosses an ethical line.

"This is all part of the very close coordination we're seeing between the campaign itself and what's supposedly an outside group," said Craig Holman, the government affairs lobbyist at the good-government group Public Citizen. The activities constitute "coordination in anyone's definition except for the Federal Election Commission's," he said.

Perry is an ideal ambassador for America First Policies in Texas, where the former governor has deep ties to the energy industry and donors who fueled his state campaigns as well as two presidential bids.

An Energy Department spokesperson did not return a request for comment. Perry was in France this week meeting with energy leaders from other countries. He is slated to attend a similar meeting in Texas on Monday, prior to the America First event, with leaders from Canada and Mexico.

America First was silent for much of this year and went through multiple staff shakeups, but has recently been working to restore its original position as the central group backing Trump's agenda.

But it has competition. Future45, which supported Trump during the 2016 elections with funding from casino billionaire Sheldon Adelson and the Ricketts family, announced a project that will spend in the tens of millions of dollars promoting tax reform earlier this month. Great America PAC, which is affiliated with former White House strategist Steve Bannon, began endorsing 2018 candidates in recent days.

Great America PAC's support for Roy Moore broke from Trump's support for Sen. Luther Strange in Alabama. America First plans to stay closely aligned with Trump and Trump's agenda, which Texas businessman Roy Bailey said could be a differentiator.

"We're not second-guessing anything; we're totally confident in [Trump's] ability to lead this nation and we're supporting him and the vice president," said Bailey, who is involved with America First.

That message has intrigued Texas-based energy executive Dan Eberhart, who said he hasn't yet made a donation to America First but is "interested in what they have to say."

"A lot of people who supported Republicans in 2016 are frustrated with the way things have turned out," Eberhart said. "If the Republican establishment won't support the president's agenda, we need alternatives who will."

Perry's grid study: 4 things that may have legs Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/24/2017 06:56 PM EDT

The Energy Department's study of the electric grid arrived late Wednesday, but it's not yet clear whether Secretary Rick Perry's efforts to help support nuclear and coal-fired power plants will have legs.

The 187-page report called for DOE to focus mostly on R&D and coordinating efforts to prepare for disasters, and left the heavy lifting for other agencies, such as FERC, EPA, the National Science Foundation and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Among the recommendations are for FERC to "expedite" its work to reformulate how electricity markets pay power generators, and for EPA to revisit its New Source Review permitting program that requires plants to tighten emissions controls when they upgrade their plants — both issues that have proven difficult for the two agencies.

"If these recommendations, as a suite, are something that the administration really wants to do, someone in the White House is going to have to quarterback that," said Greg Gershuny, who served as chief of staff in DOE's Energy Policy and Systems Analysis office during the Obama administration and worked on the Quadrennial Energy Review.

"In the next four or five weeks, as Congress gets back, we'll see if these things are going to move," he said. "How engaged Perry is and how many times a week he's going to the Hill and talking to other agency heads is going to tell us a lot about how serious they are about this."

DOE, which did not submit the report for OMB review before its release, is now taking public comments on the study. Here's a breakdown of the issues.

Wholesale electricity markets: The new report calls on FERC to speed its work with states, grid operators and market players to "improve" how power producers are paid in the wholesale markets under the agency's jurisdiction. FERC had been grappling with the issue under its "price formation" initiative over the past three years, rolling out proposals and new rules to try to adapt to the increasing complexity of the electric grid — and to make sure power generators are fairly compensated.

However, grid operator PJM has argued regulators were thinking too small, and it released a trio of working papers earlier this year highlighting FERC's initiative while quickly noting that "fundamental" price formation issues hadn't been addressed. DOE suggested that FERC consider "fuel-neutral" markets to pay for essential grid reliability services.

So far, FERC seems sympathetic.

Soon after President Donald Trump gave him the gavel this month, FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee stressed that generators, including coal and nuclear plants, "need to be properly compensated to recognize the value they provide." FERC has broad authority to alter market pricing rules, but that can be a slow process, and can have vastly different impacts in different states and regions — and draw sharp political pushback.

ClearView Energy Partners analysts warned against dismissing opposition to market rules that raise electricity prices on consumers.

"FERC-led initiatives can often create strange bedfellows, strong alliances and more opposition than state-led proposals," a ClearView report issued Thursday said. "We are reluctant to assume this all goes as quickly as the change advocates hope."

DOE's study also argued that "negative offers should be mitigated to the broadest extent possible," a reference to the fact that renewables like wind power can still make money even if power prices go negative because they can rely on a federal production tax credit.

Grid reliability R&D: The new report says that DOE should "focus R&D efforts to enhance utility, grid operator, and consumer efforts to enhance system reliability and resilience." That view stands in contrast to the Trump administration's first budget proposal, which suggested cutting DOE's electricity office by 42 percent from current levels, to $120 million.

Nevertheless, Perry has said he wants his agency to focus on "early-stage" research, with the intention of transitioning that work to the private sector as quickly as possible.

DOE's study says more research should be done on technology that will make it easier for grid operators to integrate increasing amounts of renewable power, facilitate technical coordination with Canada and Mexico, and increase "targeted" R&D to boost the efficiency of coal-fired power plants.

Infrastructure development: The new push calls on the federal government to "accelerate and reduce costs for the licensing, relicensing, and permitting of grid infrastructure" — including power plants and transmission — which could easily involve a half-dozen federal agencies.

DOE, the study says, "should review regulatory burdens for siting and permitting for generation and gas and electricity transmission infrastructure and should take actions to accelerate the process and reduce costs."

The Obama administration sought to quicken the electric transmission permitting process in 2013 with a memo to the chiefs at the departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Energy and Interior, which resulted in a final rule last year. Several members of Congress have also pressed the issue in legislation, including in the 2015 highway bill that included directives to more than a dozen agencies to join a new permitting council tasked with speeding up the federal process for large infrastructure projects.

DOE also recommends that the NRC "ensure the safety of existing and new nuclear facilities without unnecessarily adding to the operating costs and economic uncertainty of nuclear energy" and, without much explanation, "[r]evisit nuclear safety rules under a risk-based approach."

The report doesn't target specific NRC regulations, but does discuss the agency's license renewal process and the expenses associated with equipment upgrades, which may make it a prime target for cost reductions.

Breaking down barriers for coal power: The study recommends that policymakers "encourage EPA to allow coal-fired power plants to improve efficiency and reliability without triggering new regulatory approvals and associated costs." That's a reference to the New Source Review permitting program, which was created under the 1977 Clean Air Act amendments to prevent coal plants and other major emitters from making equipment changes or upgrades that would increase their emissions.

Reforming the program has been an industry priority for decades, with companies arguing that power plants have held back on making upgrades that would increase their efficiency because of concerns that they would have to go through the NSR permitting process. A collection of unions earlier this summer, for example, called for NSR reform as part of any replacement rule for the Clean Power Plan.

But multiple Bush administration attempts to weaken permitting requirements show that NSR reform is much easier said than done. A 2002 rule was partly struck down by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said several new exemptions were not allowed under the Clean Air Act. Another 2003 rule introducing another major exemption was completely tossed out by the D.C. Circuit. A third NSR rulemaking, issued in the final days of Bush's presidency, dealt with how sources report emissions changes. Environmentalists sued, and the rule remains under reconsideration at EPA to this day.

MSHA nominee: 'I was not proud' of violations notice Back

By Ian Kullgren | 10/04/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee for assistant secretary of Labor for Mine Safety & Health told a Senate committee today that his coal company ignored safety conditions at one of its mines.

David Zatezalo was chairman of Rhino Resources when it received pattern of violation notices in 2010 and 2011, the Charleston Gazette-Mail previously reported. The company was later fined when a wall collapsed, killing a worker.

When questioned by Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) about the notice, Zatezalo blamed the mine manager.

"The management of that particular group and that particular site was not doing what they should have been doing," Zatezalo said. "I was not proud of the fact that we got designated as a [potential pattern of violations] mine. I did not try to lawyer up and stop anything from happening."

"I replaced that management," he added, "because I wasn't too happy with their performance and hadn't been for sometime."

Zatezalo appeared before the Senate HELP Committee for a confirmation hearing with Cheryl Stanton and Peter Robb, Trump's nominees for Wage and Hour Division administrator and NLRB general counsel, respectively. Few senators showed up to the hearing, though, and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) complained that the Senate's busy schedule didn't leave enough time to probe as deeply as she would have liked.

Zatezalo assured Kaine that he wouldn't have a problem working with career staff at MSHA who issued the notice to his company.

"They did what they were supposed to do," he said.

Coastal lawmakers push back on House flood insurance proposals Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 11/08/2017 03:59 PM EDT

A bipartisan group of coastal lawmakers is pushing for major changes to the National Flood Insurance Program reauthorization bill that's awaiting a floor vote.

Republicans and Democrats representing the Atlantic and Gulf coasts have filed several amendments, which have been released by the House Rules Committee.

Some of the amendments would attempt to further shield policyholders from flood insurance premium increases, following concessions won by House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) that reduced proposed penalties for properties that repeatedly flood.

One amendment by Reps. Frank LoBiondo (R-N.J.) and Peter King (R-N.Y.) would strike three sections of the bill, H.R. 2874, including a prohibition on coverage for buildings valued above $1 million. Their amendment would also lower the bill's proposed cap on annual premium increases to $5,000 from $10,000.

"While discussions continue with the committee, Congressman LoBiondo feels the flood insurance bill is not at a point it needs to be to earn his vote and those of other coastal legislators," LoBiondo chief of staff Jason Galanes said. "He drafted the amendment to address those outstanding concerns."

LoBiondo and King were two of 26 House Republicans who wrote to House leadership this summer warning that they would not support an earlier iteration of the House Financial Services Committee package in part because they said it would make flood insurance unaffordable for their constituents.

Another lawmaker who signed on to that letter, Rep. Garret Graves (R-La.), has offered four amendments, including one that would restrict FEMA from raising insurance rates if a property was at a higher risk of flooding because of actions undertaken by the federal government.

Rep. Dan Donovan (R-N.Y.), who was part of the group fighting the bill this summer, has offered an amendment that would freeze insurance premiums in areas where flood maps are being redrawn.

Other coastal Republicans who signed the July letter were trying to put their stamp on the final bill.

Rep. Leonard Lance (R-N.J.) raised concerns about the bill this week, a spokesman said. Rep. Clay Higgins (R-La.) is part of the negotiations, his spokesman said.

Rep. Steven Palazzo (R-Miss.) is pushing for changes addressing several concerns with the bill, including increasing surcharges, how premium rates will be determined for coastal versus inland locations and the lack of provisions that address the NFIP's debt, a spokeswoman said.

"He will continue to push for a program that protects South Mississippians, provides flood insurance that is affordable and available, and ensures the long term success of the program," she said.

House aides said the Financial Services Committee was preparing to rewrite a section of the bill laying out annual assessments that FEMA charges policyholders to fill a reserve fund.

The new provision would require FEMA to impose a 16 percent assessment on insurance premiums, up from the flood program's current rate of 15 percent.

Aides said the change was being made to address member confusion and issues raised by the CBO.

House Rules reschedules hearing on flood insurance bill Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 11/10/2017 04:51 PM EDT

The House Rules Committee will hold a hearing Monday on the National Flood Insurance Program reauthorization bill, as Republicans try to move ahead with a floor vote.

The Rules Committee will resume consideration of the bill, H.R. 2874 \(115\), after postponing a Tuesday hearing on the legislation. At the time, the committee said it delayed the meeting after the CBO flagged a scoring issue.

In the interim, House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) decided to revise a section of the bill that would impose assessments on premiums to fill a reserve fund, drop a prohibition of coverage for homes worth more than $1 million and delay the implementation of an exemption for commercial properties subject to mandatory coverage requirements.

This week, a group of coastal lawmakers continued to raise concerns with the bill and offered several amendments.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Rules Committee hearing on the bill will be at 5 p.m. on Monday.

SAB appointee doesn't represent North Carolina, state says Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 10:16 AM EDT

Donald van der Vaart, the former head of North Carolina's Department of Environmental Quality, will not represent the agency or the state in his recent appointment to EPA's Science Advisory Board, the DEQ told a local television station.

Van der Vaart, a Republican who was considered for a top EPA appointment, demoted himself at DEQ to a non-political position that cannot be removed at will following last fall's gubernatorial win by Democrat Roy Cooper.

But his position on SAB will not come with Cooper's blessing, according to DEQ.

"DEQ does not support his participation on the EPA's SAB," the agency told local TV station WRAL. DEQ will not participate as a representative of the DEQ or North Carolina, the agency added.

Neither van der Vaart nor EPA immediately returned requests for comment this morning.

Jerry Brown, President of the Independent Republic of California Back

By David Siders | 11/11/2017 07:06 AM EDT

VATICAN CITY—On his way to the United Nations climate talks in Bonn, Germany, this week, Jerry Brown stopped over at the Vatican, where a doleful group of climate scientists, politicians and public health officials had convened to discuss calamities that might befall a warming world. The prospects were so dire—floods and fires, but also forced migration, famine and war—that some of the participants acknowledged difficulty staving off despair.

California's doomsayer governor did not express much optimism either. Seated between an economist and an Argentine bishop at the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, Brown leaned into his microphone and said, "It is despairing. Ending the world, ending all mammalian life. This is bad stuff."

"There's nothing that I see out there that gives me any ground for optimism," he went on. Still, he promised action: "I'm extremely excited about doing something about it."

Even though President Donald Trump has abandoned the Paris climate agreement and called climate change a "hoax," and even though he is proceeding to scrap the Obama-era Clean Power Plan and promoting the production of coal, Brown insisted to his audience at the Vatican that these policies do not reflect the true sensibilities of the United States.

"This is not just a top-down structure that we have in the United States," the governor said. The small crowd burst into applause when he added, "Over time, given the commitments that we're seeing in this room today, and what we're seeing around the world, the Trump factor is very small, very small indeed."

In the raw balance of power between a governor and a president, Brown has almost no standing abroad. What he does have is a platform, and a proposition: Crusading across Europe in his Fitbit and his dark, boxy suit, Brown advances California and its policies almost as an alternative to the United States—and his waning governorship, after a lifetime in politics, as a quixotic rejection of the provincial limits of the American governor. In the growing chasm between Trump's Washington and California—principally on climate change, but also taxes, health care, gun control and immigration—Brown is functioning as the head of something closer to a country than a state.

In his final term, Brown has lobbied other states and regions to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions, while augmenting California's already expansive suite of climate change programs. But Trump's election—and the specter of Brown's own retirement—have lately set the governor on a tear. In a rush of climate diplomacy this year, Brown traveled to China to meet with President Xi Jinping, then to Russia to participate in an international economic forum. This past week saw him address lawmakers in Brussels and Stuttgart, Germany, and he was preparing for roundtable meetings with scientists in Oslo before arriving in Bonn for a climate conference, where Brown will serve as special adviser for states and regions. And he is preparing for California to host an international climate summit of its own next year in San Francisco.

In one sense, Brown's fixation on climate change would seem unremarkable, the predictable conclusion of a career steeped in the ecological and environmental movements of the 1960s and 1970s. The 1969 Santa Barbara oil spill, early Earth Day rallies and the Stockholm conference on the environment weighed heavily on the public consciousness when Brown was starting out in politics, and observers of a certain age will still recall him mystifying audiences with pronouncements about "planetary realism" and the "spaceship Earth." He was still talking about the need for a fundamental shift in lifestyle when he said at the Vatican that confronting climate change will require "a transformation of the relationship of human beings to all the mysterious network of things."

"It's not just a light rinse," Brown said. "We need a total, I might say, brainwashing. We need to wash our brains out and see a very different kind of world."

But in his climate diplomacy today, Brown is performing a more urgent, final act. For nearly all his public life—from secretary of state to governor, to mayor of Oakland and state attorney general before becoming governor once again, at age 72—Brown's near-constant state was to run for public office. Now, for the first time, he is not. Term limits will chase Brown from the state Capitol in January 2019, and today he calls climate change his "campaign," dismissing the idea that after running unsuccessfully for president three times, he might try again in 2020. "I've thought because people like you ask me," he said in an interview before leaving for Europe. "But no, I'm not running."

Now, Brown's future rests on a family ranch in Northern California, where he is nearly finished building a remote, off-the-grid home. These days, he talks more about rattlesnakes and wild boar than the presidential election, and he has turned his focus from electoral politics to more existential concerns.

"I find a lot of what is included in politics doesn't count that much, at least for my salvation or my peace of mind or my interest in life," Brown said. The climate, he went on, "is fundamental. It's not like dietary requirements. It's not like a tax measure, or a school curriculum, or many of the issues, even a crime bill. It goes to the essence of being alive, living things. Whether it's humans or fauna, flora, the basis of life is embedded in this chemical structure, biological structure. And it's threatened."

Sitting in the back of a Ford Crown Victoria on a tarmac at Los Angeles International Airport, Brown added, "This, to me, seems worthwhile."

Brown often borrows from the writer Carey McWilliams' description of California as "the great exception," a colossus that McWilliams said, "always occupied, in relation to other regions, much the same relation that America has occupied toward Europe: it is the great catch-all, the vortex at the continent's end into which elements of America's diverse population have been drawn, whirled around."

Trump's election nearly spun that vortex off its axis. In a state where Democrats had already battered Republicans to near-irrelevance, voters last year installed Democratic super-majorities in both houses of the state Legislature. They approved higher taxes and stricter gun controls, legalized marijuana and made certain felons eligible for early parole. They handed Trump the most lopsided loss a Republican presidential nominee has suffered in California in 80 years. Then they slumped in front of their TV sets as the rest of America went the other way.

The morning after the election, the leaders of the state Senate and assembly issued a joint statement in which they said they "woke up feeling like strangers in a foreign land." Brown had joked before the election that if Trump were to become president, "We'd have to build a wall around California to defend ourselves from the rest of this country."

Now, the state Legislature and a large share of Brown's constituents expected him to hoist it up—to assert California's sovereignty in the Trump state. As Trump started dismantling his predecessor's climate policies, Brown helped organize an alliance of 14 states and the island of Puerto Rico, pledging to meet their share of the U.S. commitment to the Paris climate accord. He redoubled his efforts outside of the United States, expanding on a joint project with the German state of Baden-Württemberg: recruiting nearly 200 mostly subnational governments to sign a nonbinding pact to limit global temperature rise to below 2 degrees Celsius, the threshold beyond which many scientists predict environmental catastrophe. On top of that, Brown negotiated legislation extending California's signature cap-and-trade program for an additional 10 years, then signed an agreement with leaders of Ontario and Quebec to integrate their cap-and-trade systems with California's.

Trump's election shook Brown and his home state in other ways, too: California relied on billions of dollars in federal health care funding that Trump threatened to undo, and the president's hard line on immigration sowed fear among California's large population of undocumented immigrants. When the Trump administration started conducting immigration sweeps in Los Angeles, protesters strung "No I.C.E" signs from freeway overpasses, and Brown—who had signed legislation granting undocumented immigrants driver's licenses and access to college financial aid—negotiated state legislation curbing local law enforcement officials' ability to cooperate with federal immigration agents.

By this fall, California's feuding with Washington had grown so routine that it barely registered as news when, during the span of seven hours one day last month, state Attorney General Xavier Becerra announced four separate lawsuits against the Trump administration on issues ranging from health care and education to immigration and oil extraction on public and tribal lands.

Before Trump's election, Brown existed largely at the margins outside California. When he returned to office in 2011, a fellow Democrat held the White House, and no one had to look West for an expression of leftist causes. In that context, Brown presented as a moderate, taking criticism from environmentalists for his permissiveness of hydraulic fracturing, while others dismissed as insignificant the nonbinding climate agreements he pursued.

But then Trump, less than a month in office, told a national TV audience, "California is in many ways out of control." Former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon, addressing California Republicans shortly after Brown signed legislation expanding protections for undocumented immigrants, said that if California kept this up, it would eventually "try to secede from the union." The governor factored so heavily in the specter of a civil war that House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, himself a Californian, slipped in a speech last month in which he rebuked one "President Brown."

The nation's most populous state was cleaving from Washington, and Brown was its marshaling force.

"Trump is leaving many vacuums, and I think Jerry Brown has long imagined himself as a kind of global player," says Orville Schell, who wrote a biography of Brown in 1978 and remains in contact with him. "He does see California, as the sixth-largest economy of the world, as capable of playing more of a nation-state-like role."

Brown "sort of accidentally has had the world thrust in his lap through the climate issue, which he passionately believes in," Schell adds. "The opportunity has presented itself, the inclination is there, and he's sort of ratcheting the state up to rush into that breach that Washington is leaving."

In the role of a statesman, Brown so far has been met with dotting audiences in Europe. When he arrived in Stuttgart for meetings this week, local officials sent a seven-car motorcade to the airport to deliver him to his hotel with lights flashing, an unheard-of accommodation back home. And when Brown spoke in Brussels on Tuesday, before the hemicycle of the European Parliament, the body's president, Antonio Tajani, said the governor's presence gave Europeans "some comfort" in the era of Trump. Muhterem Aras, president of the parliament of Baden-Württemberg, told Brown through an interpreter, "You and your work are needed more than ever." She cast Brown as a warrior "facing a mighty lobby as an adversary."

Yet in the polished, grip-and-grin world of diplomacy, Brown can also seem out of place. He has sprinted through his trip on a borrowed charter plane with his tiny entourage—a handful of aides, a small protective detail and his wife and adviser, Anne Gust Brown, straightening his collar. He maintains an exasperatingly loose schedule, suffers posing for photographs and sometimes wanders on stage.

Before he strode into the Vatican headquarters of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, a 16th century summer residence for Pope Pius IV, Brown darted for a table of coffee and cookies that waiters were starting to clear away.

"You had to eat, didn't you, love?" his wife asked her husband, who has a sixth sense for free food.

Throughout his trip, Brown has also carried copies of two articles he wrote about the threat of nuclear proliferation, his principal concern other than climate change. The first, "Nuclear Addiction: A Response," was written in 1984 for a now-defunct Jesuit publication. The second is Brown's review in the New York Review of Books last year of former defense secretary William Perry's My Journey at the Nuclear Brink. Leaving a meeting one night in Rome with Arturo Sosa, the superior general of the Jesuits, Brown squinted over his hawk-like nose and said that while "going around enlisting allies ... I bring my two little articles and I pass them around."

Depending on his audience and mood, Brown vacillates between optimism and dread for the future. Signing a government guestbook in Brussels this week, he quoted Virgil: "Ad astra per aspera"—to the stars through difficulties. Later, when the elevator taking Brown from a meeting went up instead of down, he first complained, half-joking—"Mistake!"—and then said, "That can happen with missile launches, too."

As frequently as Brown is asked about Trump, Brown has mentioned the president only sparingly on his European tour. Although he has called Trump the "null hypothesis" for climate change, a politician who by "making his case of denial so preposterous, helps the other side," he insists the problem of climate change is bigger than one leader, and has acknowledged he is trying to make "lemonade out of a lemon."

A year ago, it appeared that Brown might not be able even to do that. Two nights before the election, he was eating chips and salsa at an airport bar in Durango, Colorado, where he had spent the day campaigning for Hillary Clinton. If Trump took the White House, he said in an interview, it would be "game over" for climate change. "Game over," he said again.

Asked about it recently, on the tarmac in Los Angeles, Brown said, "I say a lot of things while waiting for a drink in bars across America."

"We're fighting," he added. "The game is over in Washington for the moment ... But not in the world."

Later, at the Vatican, he put it this way: "You should despair, but that won't help. So be optimistic, and do whatever you can."

Brown said he has met Trump once, when he was mayor of Oakland in the 2000s and considered bringing a casino to the city. The two flew together in Trump's plane to Oakland from Palm Springs. The governor recalled being impressed with a Renoir that Trump had hung on a wall in the plane. "I don't know whether it was real or not," Brown said last year. "But I thought it was. I thought it was a hell of a statement."

Brown, more than many politicians, could appreciate the populist appeal that swept Trump into the White House—and that Brown sought to capture in his own three presidential campaigns. In 1976, he called for an "era of limits," then campaigned against the North American Free Trade Agreement and the influence of corporate money in politics in his 1992 campaign. He refused campaign contributions greater than $100 and, in rhetoric reminiscent of Trump's "drain the swamp," criticized "the basic fact of unchecked power and privilege."

Pat Caddell, the veteran pollster and political analyst who gave advice to Brown in 1992 and Trump in 2016, says, "Brown was way ahead of his time, really ... I think if Jerry had run in '16, he could have won the Democratic nomination."

Today, Brown's mind is elsewhere. He deflects questions about his legacy, arguing, "Everything we're doing can be framed as either a model for everybody else or building my legacy that I'm going to be reviewing in my dotage." Yet the issues that consume him—climate change and nuclear proliferation—are legacy concerns of humankind.

"Human civilization is on the chopping block," Brown told an auditorium full of lawmakers and students this week in Stuttgart, his voice rising almost to a yell. "We have to wake up the world. We have to wake up Europe, wake up America, wake up the whole world to realize that we have a common destiny."

While climate change has afforded Brown a degree of notoriety outside California, he believes that history is not kind to governors and a politician's relevance quickly fades. "It's just a matter of time before your irrelevance engulfs your total being," he said in Los Angeles, chuckling. "I'm pretty focused on today."

He is at least thinking a little about the near future. Dna Hoover, who is building the Browns' ranch house, said Anne Gust Brown called recently to ask about stucco samples and a generator, and the couple ran a herd of goats through the property, where the Browns have planted olive trees, to chew down grass to prevent fire. "He's ready," Hoover says. "He's really so connected with that place and is ready to get up there full-time."

Brown has even discussed the possibility of creating some kind of meeting space on the ranch.

Before he was to arrive in Bonn on Saturday, he left his aides behind and swung south to Bremen, Germany, to visit with Silja Samerski, who had once helped him organize a salon he called the "Oakland Table," attracting intellectuals such as the late social critic Ivan Illich. "We're going to talk about unfinished issues from the Oakland Table," Brown said of his visit with Samerski. "The good life, and how are we supposed to lead it. What are we doing? So, that's getting ready for the Colusa Institute," he explained, laughing a bit. Colusa is the name of the county where he is building his ranch.

Brown is also contemplating writing when he leaves office, something he tried, but largely gave up, after his first two terms as governor. His work at the time, he says, "didn't rise to the quality that met my standards."

Decades later, Brown says, "I have much more to say."

At an event held alongside the Democratic National Convention last year, Brown had compared his retirement to that of a Roman statesman, "a fellow named Cincinnatus who saved the Republic, and then he went back to the plow."

Reminded of that comparison recently, Brown smiled and said, "I like to be on my plow." But he added, "Maybe I'll be sending out pronouncements from the plow."

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by Chevron: White House coy ahead of House Russia sanctions vote — House GOP mulls another try at full omnibus — Bernhardt confirmed by Senate

RUSSIAN SANCTIONS GETS HOUSE VOTE TODAY: House lawmakers vote today on a package of sanctions against Russia, Iran and North Korea, but it remains an open question what President Donald Trump would do once the measure reaches his desk. White House Press Secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders on Monday appeared to walk back earlier indications of support. "He's looking over where it stands exactly at this point and we'll keep you posted on the decision," she told reporters on traveling with the president on Air Force One. The bill, H.R. 3364, includes language sought by the U.S. energy sector that would allow companies to participate in projects as long as sanctioned Russian firms do not have a controlling interest or more than a 33 percent stake in them. It is expected to easily clear the House.

Speaking of sanctions, any new penalties currently being considered against Venezuela won't start with the country's oil exports, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports, citing a senior administration official. "Everything is definitely on the table" as far as sanctions targets, the official told Ben. But "round one will definitely not" target the country's oil sector, the official added. Analysts have said that targeting Venezuela's oil sector would crash its economy and make the human rights situation there worse. U.S. refiners have also scoffed at the idea.

SUMMER BREAK DELAYED? Frustrated with their leadership's decision to pursue a slimmed-down, mini-spending package this week, House GOP Appropriators are urging the cancellation of the first week of August recess so they can pursue a full, 12-bill omnibus, POLITICO's Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report. "The whole purpose of whipping is to be able to make your case so the fact that we did all this work and it's not going anywhere is really frustrating," steamed appropriator Tom Rooney said last Thursday. Sources close to GOP leaders said Monday they were considering reversing course and pursuing the broader spending package. But by Monday night it appeared they still sorely lacked the votes.

In the meantime, the House Rules Committee is expected to finalize the structure of the debate for the mini-bus later today. Lawmakers filed 79 amendments to the Energy and Water title of the package H.R. 3219 \(115\) on everything from funding for Yucca mountain to increasing funds for DOE's Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy to barring a rider related to the Waters of the U.S. regulation. Many of those are unlikely to actually see floor time, but we'll have to wait until the committee finishes up its work to see the full list of what made the cut.

In a statement of administration policy Monday, the White House backed the underlying spending bill but strongly condemned "continued construction" for the MOX project in South Carolina, which the administration called "unaffordable and risky." In addition, the White House voiced concern with a prohibition on using other funds from the Nuclear Waste Fund on interim nuclear waste storage activities and called for lawmakers to "further reduce funding for costly later-stage development, commercialization, and deployment activities" on energy research.

BERNHARDT WINS SENATE CONFIRMATION: Senators voted 53-43 Monday evening to confirm David Bernhardt's nomination as deputy secretary at Interior, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Five members of the Democratic caucus — Michael Bennet, Joe Donnelly, Heidi Heitkamp, Angus King and Joe Manchin — joined all Republicans in supporting his bid to serve as Secretary Ryan Zinke's No. 2. "David's extensive experience serving under previous Interior secretaries, his esteemed legal career, and down-right love of our land and resources is exactly what is needed to help streamline government," Zinke said in a statement after the vote.

Green and good governance groups, which criticized Bernhardt as having too many conflicts of interest to fill the position, vowed after the vote they would closely watch his actions at the agency. "Bernhardt is ethically compromised on issues ranging from national monuments to offshore drilling; we expect timely recusals from these decision-making processes," Kelly Mitchell, Greenpeace's climate and energy director, said in a statement.

SPOTTED: Energy Secretary Rick Perry and fellow Eagle Scout Zinke (in a Scout uniform) traveled with Trump to the 2017 National Scout Jamboree in Beaver, W.Va., and stood behind the president on stage as he delivered remarks. DEEP DIVE INTO USDA SCIENCE PICK: All major farm groups are lining up behind Sam Clovis, Trump's pick to be USDA's chief scientist who lacks scientific experience and has criticized mainstream climate change science, Pro Agriculture's Helena Bottemiller Evich reports. "Some have suggested that Dr. Clovis is not qualified for this position due to his lack of hands-on science and research experience," a coalition of nearly two dozen industry groups wrote. "We do not share this point of view." But environmental and scientific groups say he's not qualified for a position that, by law, must be drawn from "among distinguished scientists with specialized training or significant experience in agricultural research, education and economics." Despite criticism of his credentials, Clovis has been quietly winning over rank-and-file at USDA, which was not seized by the chaos that engulfed other agencies, like EPA, during the first few months of the Trump administration.

DEMS READY TO ROLL ON ENERGY BILL? Whatever shot the Senate's energy package S. 1460 \(115\) has for movement in the near term likely hinges on today's healthcare vote, but Energy and Natural Resources ranking member Maria Cantwell says her side is good to go. "We hotlined it on our side and everybody's ready to go," she told reporters. Should the healthcare vote fail, the measure's backers hope it could be slotted in for floor time as the chamber plans to stick around into August. But a Democratic committee aide was less equivocal about where things stand later Monday: "We're still working through the amendment process right now," the aide said.

CARPER BASHES PRUITT: Amid disclosures showing EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt spent nearly half his first three months atop the agency on trips to Oklahoma, Senate EPW ranking member Tom Carper called for "increased transparency" from the administrator but delivered quite the burn. "Mr. Pruitt has spent more days in Oklahoma at this point than President Trump has spent at his golf courses, which is no minor feat," he said in a statement.

PROBE SOUGHT OVER INTERIOR REASSIGNMENTS: Eight Senate ENR Democrats, led by ranking member Maria Cantwell, asked Interior's inspector general to look into recent moves to reassign senior career staff, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. The move follows the highly publicized transfer of Joel Clement, who was moved from a managerial position involving climate change issues to a job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies. In a letter to Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall, the senators said moving career staff to jobs "where their talents are wasted would constitute a serious act of mismanagement, a gross waste of public funds, and an abuse of authority."

FIRST STEP TOWARD CLIMATE 'RED TEAM'? The Competitive Enterprise Institute's Myron Ebell says EPA might tap Steven Koonin, DOE undersecretary for science from 2009 to 2011, to run its "red team" review of climate science, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Koonin, who wrote in 2014 the science behind climate change "is not settled," floated the formation of a red team in an April Wall Street Journal piece, where he said such a review "would shine much-needed light on the scientific debates" surrounding the issue. Critics say such an exercise would give the minority disputing the scientific consensus on climate change an outsized public voice.

LBNL REPORT SAYS STATE RPS PLAYING DIMINISHED ROLE: A new report by DOE's Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory finds that overall state renewable portfolio standards are playing less of a role in renewables growth, particularly where wind generation is concerned. Across the U.S. last year, RPS drove 44 percent of all renewable capacity additions whereas from 2008 through 2014 it accounted for up to 70 percent of new projects. In 2016, only 21 percent of all wind additions were because of state requirements, although 59 percent of new solar was thanks to state RPS. The report attributes the changes partly to corporate contracts for renewable power and growth of utility-scale projects in states that do not have renewable standards.

REPORT: NEW REACTORS COULD MAKE INDUSTRY COMPETITIVE: Advanced reactor tech could make nuclear-generated electricity competitive in the power markets where the industry has states bending over backward to rescue the existing fleet, according to a report coming out today. The study, being released by the Energy Innovation Reform Project, estimates that the technology under development at eight companies could generate electricity at an average of $60 per megawatt-hour, nearly 40 percent below what the Vogtle and Summer nuclear expansions will be producing at. "At these costs, nuclear would be effectively competitive with any other option for power generation," the report says. EIRP's executive director will discuss the report at the Nuclear Energy Institute headquarters at 10 a.m.

Senior U.S. official: Venezuelan oil won't be first target of potential sanctions Back

The U.S. would not include Venezuela's oil exports in any first round of new sanctions currently being considered, a senior administration official said today.

The White House is still weighing its options of how exactly to react to the situation in Venezuela, where President Nicolás Maduro's government has been clashing with protesters for weeks, the senior official told POLITICO. Sanctions could come before a July 30 vote whether to start the process of rewriting the country's constitution, the official added.

"Everything is definitely on the table" as far as sanctions targets, the official told POLITICO. But "round one will definitely not" target the country's oil sector, the official added.

Oil is Venezuela's main source of foreign currency, which it desperately needs to repay loans from China and Russia. Analysts have said that targeting Venezuela's oil sector would crash its economy and make the human rights situation there worse.

U.S. refiners have also criticized the idea. The U.S. is one of the main destinations for that oil, importing 796,000 barrels of crude oil a day in 2016, according to the EIA. Most of it goes to refineries along the Gulf Coast.

WHAT'S NEXT: A decision on sanctions could come later this week.

Unhappy GOP appropriators press leadership to delay recess Back

By Rachael Bade, John Bresnahan and Sarah Ferris | 07/24/2017 05:07 PM EDT

House Republican appropriators are pressing Speaker Paul Ryan to cancel the first week of recess and tackle a massive spending package full of goodies for the base — a strategy leadership rejected last week.

Under the lead of financial services subcommittee chairman Tom Graves (R-Ga.), a handful of appropriators are urging leadership to reconsider and bring up a $1 trillion appropriations bill before leaving for summer break. They argue they worked at record pace to finish all their spending bills. And they were furious when leadership decided last week to only pursue a smaller, scaled-back version for national security priorities.

Some appropriators even threatened to vote against the so-called "minibus" of Pentagon spending plus-ups and border wall funding unless the other bills were included. Others took leaders to task for failing to sell the idea to the conference, resulting in an inconclusive whip check that showed a lack of support.

"We worked really hard on these bills," steamed appropriator Tom Rooney (R-Fla.) last Thursday. "Then it's put out for a whip check on a Friday — and nobody knows what's in these bills — but they don't give us a chance to make our case? Then they do a whip check and people are all undecided and then they pull it."

He added: "The whole purpose of whipping is to be able to make your case so the fact that we did all this work and it's not going anywhere is really frustrating."

Even Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), an ally of GOP leadership also on the appropriations panel, was not happy the bills wouldn't hit the floor.

"Look, it's a Republican bill full of Republican policies... But we didn't get a chance to make that argument and I regret that," he said.

To be sure, leaders decided against pursuing the full package of spending bills because they did not have the votes. Should the legislation fail on the floor, it would create an embarrassing episode highlighting Republicans' inability to govern — and leaving a sour taste in their mouths as they depart for the five-week recess.

That's the main reason why Ryan (R-Wis.) and Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) decided not to pursue the bigger spending package in the first place. Chief deputy whip Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) told them and lawmakers in a closed-door meeting last week that they whip came back overwhelmingly "undecided."

Sources close to GOP leaders say they're were once again re-considering a full, 12-bill omnibus instead of the minibus on Monday. By Monday evening, however, it appeared they still sorely lacked the votes.

If leadership decides to reverse course and pursue a full GOP spending package, it's likely the House will stay in session for another week, delaying the first week of recess.

The decision entirely hinges on the number of supporters Graves can muster. He, McHenry and several other whips worked the phones throughout the weekend, trying to move members from "undecided" to "yes," insiders said.

Supporters of the idea are starting to get involved as well to up the pressure game. Republican Study Chairman Mark Walker is attempting to force a vote on a GOP omnibus with a last-minute amendment to this week's slimmer package.

His amendment, which dropped late Monday night, would wrap all 12 bills into a single bundle that would hit the full floor of the House. The RSC chairman has already spoken to House GOP leaders and members of the House Rules Committee about the amendment, according to a senior GOP aide.

"In conversations with members, they're more favorable to this process," a senior GOP congressional aide said.

Senate confirms Bernhardt as Interior deputy Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 07/24/2017 06:31 PM EDT

The Senate today confirmed former lobbyist Dave Bernhardt to the Interior Department's No. 2 spot.

The 53-43 vote to make Bernhardt deputy secretary fills a key position in a department that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has complained of being severely understaffed. President Donald Trump has tasked Interior with major regulatory reviews and policy changes in a bid to increase oil and gas production.

Bernhardt had worked at Interior in several roles, including solicitor, during the George W. Bush administration.

Bernhardt's confirmation came despite environmental and good governance groups criticizing him as having too many conflicts of interest to fill the position. They also took issue with Bernhardt continuing to work for his old firm Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck LLP even after he withdrew his lobbying registration to pursue the nomination.

WHAT'S NEXT: Bernhardt will take up his position.

The Sam Clovis factor: Scientist? No. Skilled in the science of influencing Trump? Yes.

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 07/25/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Sam Clovis, President Donald Trump's pick to be USDA's chief scientist, has been many things in life: He's an F-16 fighter pilot turned defense contractor turned academic; he was a conservative radio host in Sioux City, Iowa, and a failed U.S. Senate candidate in the Hawkeye State who managed to become co-chair of the presidential campaign of a New Yorker who won — against all odds.

These days in Washington, Clovis' critics are obsessing over what he is not: He's not an agricultural scientist, nor is he an agricultural economist, nor does he appear to be qualified for a position that, by law, must be drawn from "among distinguished scientists with specialized training or significant experience in agricultural research, education and economics."

Senate Democrats, activists deeply concerned about climate change and left-leaning science groups predictably seized on Clovis' weak credentials to attack his selection as yet another sign the Trump administration rejects science-based policymaking and endangers the integrity of federal research.

But none of that has deterred the heavyweights in the agriculture industry, who believe, in effect, that Clovis' political savvy is more important than his resume.

The White House announced last week that Trump intends to nominate Clovis, but it has not yet sent the formal paperwork to the Hill. In the coming nomination fight, Clovis, whose early and loyal backing of Trump helped the president win in Iowa, has politics on his side.

Not only does Trump owe him a job, but most major farm groups are now rallying behind his pending nomination despite his lack of hard-science experience. On Monday, a coalition of nearly two dozen industry groups, including the American Farm Bureau Federation and the National Corn Growers Association, sent a letter to Senate Agriculture Committee leaders, urging support for Clovis — a political calculation that has many policy experts in Washington rolling their eyes, considering farm groups constantly fuss about the importance of sound science.

"Some have suggested that Dr. Clovis is not qualified for this position due to his lack of hands-on science and research experience," the groups wrote. "We do not share this point of view. The U.S. Department of Agriculture already employs some of the finest and most dedicated scientists in the world. They do not need a peer. They need someone to champion their work before the administration, the Congress, and all consumers around the world."

What Clovis lacks in science chops, he makes up for in knowing — really understanding — Trump. Back in April, when Trump was on the verge of withdrawing the U.S. from NAFTA, it was widely reported that Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue helped walk the president away from the ledge by showing up at an Oval Office meeting with a map of the U.S. that pointed out areas that would be most harmed by an abrupt withdrawal — many of them counties and states that voted for Trump, and many of them rural.

It was actually Clovis who prepped Perdue for the meeting and Clovis who suggested the secretary take along the map to drive home his point in a visual, high-impact way, multiple sources with knowledge of the exchange said. Clovis did not respond to multiple inquiries from POLITICO.

"It shows that I do have a very big farmer base, which is good," Trump later recalled about the meeting and the map, after deciding to drop a planned executive order that would have pulled the U.S. from the free trade deal with Mexico and Canada, which has been a boon for agriculture. "They like Trump, but I like them, and I'm going to help them."

If Clovis has special insight into what makes Trump tick, it's because he joined Trump's campaign early on and earned standing in a political universe where family has first-order status and positions of true influence are grounded in loyalty, above all else.

Clovis first bet on Rick Perry in Iowa, but bailed when the former Texas governor sputtered. The Iowan joined the Trump campaign as co-chair and policy adviser in August 2015, two short months after Trump announced his run — back when many in Washington dismissed his candidacy as a joke.

Clovis grew to be an influential part of Trump's lean campaign team, serving as a constant surrogate on cable news and corralling an unwieldy group of unconventional policy advisers.

"He's been with Donald Trump from the very beginning," said Gary Baise, a leading agriculture lawyer in Washington, who Clovis enlisted to help organize farm leaders during the campaign. "He has a masterful understanding of how to appeal to Donald Trump for the benefit of agriculture."

From Sioux City to Trumpland

Clovis, if he had his druthers, really wanted something at DoD — perhaps a more logical choice given his long career in the U.S. Air Force. But USDA undersecretary for research, education and economics — a little-known but crucial post that oversees a budget that approaches $3 billion — is not a shabby consolation prize.

The Iowa Republican, who led the Trump transition's beachhead team for USDA and currently serves as the department's liaison to the White House, portrays himself as an economist — but his Ph.D. is in public administration. At Morningside College, a small liberal arts school in Sioux City, Clovis taught classes on business, management and public policy, according to internet archives, and didn't appear to publish any major peer-reviewed work.

He's on the record questioning the scientific consensus on climate change, a stance that helped fuel the criticism from Democrats and science advocates that emerged after ProPublica reported in May that Clovis was likely to be Trump's choice for USDA's chief scientist.

"If President Trump wants to keep Americans safe and healthy, ensure prosperity for farmers and rural communities, and follow the law, this nomination is the wrong choice," said Ricardo Salvador, director of the food and environment program at the Union of Concerned Scientists, which has led opposition to Clovis' pending nomination. He disputed the idea that a politically wired advocate for agricultural science would have greater impact than someone with deep research experience.

"These are not mutually exclusive possibilities," he said, "and the nation's food system and ag research investments should not be held hostage to such a false choice."

Senate Agriculture ranking member Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) said last week, after the White House announced Clovis' selection, that she has "strong concerns that Sam Clovis is not qualified" for the position.

Yet science groups and the land-grant universities that work with the division Clovis would lead have been noticeably quiet, choosing instead to avoid a political fight with a nominee who's close to the president, likely to be confirmed and expected to ultimately have much power over the level of federal funding their institutions are to be given.

Other groups, like the Thurgood Marshall College Fund, which represents historically black colleges and universities, jumped on the chance to back Clovis after the White House's announcement. "Shortly after the election results were announced, Dr. Clovis began meeting with TMCF to develop an action plan to deepen the USDA's relationship with our ag schools in order to help them build capacity, infrastructure and career paths for their graduates," said Johnny Taylor Jr., CEO of TMCF. "We are hopeful our positive working relationship with the USDA will continue with Secretary Purdue and, if confirmed, Dr. Sam Clovis."

As Clovis' credentials have publicly drawn fire, he's been quietly winning over rank-and-file at USDA, which was not seized by the chaos that engulfed other agencies, like EPA, during the first few months of the Trump administration. Clovis has proven himself to be a steady hand, impressed career staff and become well-liked, even by some of his critics, who privately acknowledge that tanking his nomination could yield a pick they would view as much worse.

Clovis is also known to have a direct line to the president, a level of access far above that which is usually enjoyed by USDA's head of research — something that is not lost on agricultural groups.

USDA officials, multiple sources said, have simply gotten over the fact that Clovis isn't a scientist. "Their first instinct, given his background, was to not like this guy," said Chuck Conner, president and CEO of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, who organized the industry coalition's letter. "But he's won them over in a big way."

Baise, a close ally of Clovis, emphasized the idea that the former professor possesses a rare blend of experience in academia and politics. "We don't have a lot of folks with Ph.Ds who have run for public office," Baise said.

In 2014, Clovis took a leave of absence from his Morningside College post to run for Senate, entering the GOP primary to fill the Iowa seat vacated by the retirement of former Sen. Tom Harkin. Clovis had a conservative talk radio show based out of Sioux City, but he was virtually unknown in Iowa politics. He surprised everyone by coming in second to Joni Ernst, who went on to win the seat. Clovis even bested energy businessman Mark Jacobs, who had sunk more than $3 million of his own money into his primary campaign. Clovis then ran unsuccessfully for state treasurer, one of his last iterations before he joined Trump's orbit.

Though Clovis' rise in politics has been meteoric, Morningside College wasn't interested in talking up its connection to the Trump administration official when POLITICO inquired about Clovis' academic record for this story. A spokesman for the college refused to answer questions about which classes Clovis taught there and what his research interests were. The spokesman also would not grant faculty members permission to talk about Clovis' time at the school. He left the college in 2015.

Climate science and a 'cool hand'

Clovis' pending nomination has sparked a barrage of snarky headlines and tweets — perhaps more than any other subcabinet pick. "Trump Nominates Sam Clovis, a Dude Who is Not a Scientist, to Be Department of Agriculture's Top Scientist," blared Gizmodo. "Incompetence Looms: Trump To Appoint Non-Scientist As USDA's Chief Scientist," said the headline of an op-ed in Forbes.

And fake news, that newly elevated element of American politics that will forever be linked to the 2016 campaign, has also attached itself to Clovis at times. A few days after the ProPublica report, a site called USPOLN.com ran a story claiming that Clovis had mocked scientists as "dumb regular people that think dinosaurs existed." The post got so much traction on social media that Snopes and PolitiFact both flagged it as a hoax.

Clovis' name has also repeatedly surfaced in relation to his involvement in another enduring aspect of the 2016 campaign — the Russia question. It was reportedly Clovis who vetted Carter Page, an international businessman, to be a national security adviser to the Trump campaign. As of the summer of 2016, well after Page had joined the campaign, the FBI was said to be surveilling him, suspecting Page may have been acting as an agent of the Kremlin, The Washington Post reported; he was later dropped from the campaign.

But other than the fact Clovis is not a scientist, nothing about his background and work on the campaign and transition has gotten as much attention as his skepticism about climate change, in part because the division he would oversee conducts all manner of climate science research — from studying how to reduce the carbon footprint of food production to coming up with ways for farmers to adapt to more severe weather patterns.

When he was running for Senate in 2014, Clovis did an interview with Iowa Public Radio, during which the hosts pointed out that 97 percent of climate scientists agree that rising temperatures are "very likely due to human activities."

"Do you believe the science?" the hosts asked.

"I am extremely skeptical," he said without skipping a beat. "I have looked at the science and I have enough of a science background to know when I'm being boofed. And a lot of the science is junk science.

"It's not proven," he continued. "I don't think there's any substantive information available to me that doesn't raise as many questions as it does answers. So I'm a skeptic."

But those who have worked with Clovis are unnerved by the breathless criticism in the left-leaning media. They describe him as whip-smart, open-minded, jolly and self-deprecating. He also works long hours and avoids events in Washington that require schmoozing.

"People think he's going to be an a--hole, and then he's not," said one lobbyist who's worked with him.

Another Clovis supporter said the Iowan is "a guy with real balls," noting that one has to be "half-nuts" to fly an F-16 fighter jet, as Clovis did throughout his decadeslong career in the Air Force. He retired in 1996 as a colonel.

In Trumpland, Clovis has developed a reputation for being even-keeled amid an administration known for infighting and volatility. "He was always cool-headed," recalled Sid Miller, the controversial Texas agriculture commissioner who worked with Clovis on the campaign's agricultural advisory committee. "A lot of us would get rattled when Donald Trump would have a bad day. Not Sam. He's a cool hand."

He saw victory outside city limits

Clovis wasn't the kind of campaign operative who assumed victory and ignored political realities. He just happened to understand the political moment in the heartland, which ended up being key to Trump's victory. At an event in Washington just short of three weeks before Election Day, Clovis wasn't banking on his candidate winning.

"I have no idea how this is going to turn out," Clovis told POLITICO at the time.

Clovis had just spent the better part of two hours being peppered with questions about farm policy at the National Press Club in Washington. It was his first appearance before the D.C. hive, and the audience was skeptical, to say the least.

No one in the room, which was packed with food, ag and environmental lobbyists, had any idea who Clovis was. Some had seen him on CNN as a surrogate for Trump. Some had heard he'd run unsuccessfully for Senate in Iowa. But they all couldn't figure out how a little-known professor and conservative talk radio host had become the Trump campaign's lead on agricultural policy.

Clovis, however, had clearly done his homework. He sat back in his chair, eyeglasses perched above his eyebrows, and jumped with ease from farm subsidies and food stamps to the complexities of the peanut program and conservation. He outlined policy stances that were surprisingly moderate. He hammered away on the need for better water quality, said he'd like to wean farmers off price supports, and expressed support for a legal immigrant workforce to meet agriculture's needs.

During the meeting, Clovis also offered brief thoughts on agricultural research, an issue on which he has almost no record. "I also think the research needs to be transparent," he said after endorsing voluntary GMO labeling, because "consumers have a right to know." He added: "If we have these demands, and we have to fund research in these areas, we should have some accountability on that funding; and the other aspect is it is transparent, to know what we're looking at and what we're investigating."

Clovis offered that one of his personal "pet rocks" is water policy. "I honestly believe if we ever have another civil war in this country, it'll be over water," he said.

After the meeting, even Democrats admitted that Clovis' breadth of knowledge had surprised them.

Trump, for his part, knew he needed to gin up support among rural voters to offset the bludgeoning he'd take in the cities, and he'd tasked Clovis with using farm policy to galvanize the heartland.

"With city limits in the rear-view mirror, it's Trump," Clovis told POLITICO after the Washington meeting, when asked about the widening gap in rural support between Hillary Clinton and Trump. It was something many in the mainstream media and political establishment had missed or disregarded, but Clovis repeatedly pointed to the fact that Trump signs seemed to appear just outside of city limits by a staggering margin compared with Clinton signs.

"Not just yard signs; barn signs. Barns!" he laughed. "People have painted their barns. The sides of their houses. It's nuts," he continued. "There's a lot of angst out there. There really is."

Clovis then explained that the campaign's strategy was to try to make up for getting "trounced" in cities by cultivating hefty returns in rural counties.

And in that, Clovis and Trump certainly had politics on their side.

Pruitt spent significant time in Oklahoma in spring, records show Back

By Alex Guillén | 07/24/2017 10:49 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt spent 43 days in March, April and May on trips to his home state of Oklahoma, according to travel records obtained by the watchdog group Environmental Integrity Project.

The records, released under the Freedom of Information Act, include weekend trips home as well as official business in the state, such as a tour of a chemical plant or an awards event hosted by the Oklahoma Well Strippers Association. The records indicate Pruitt sometimes paid his own airfare but often went at the government's expense.

"These travel records show that Administrator Pruitt is more focused on cultivating his relationships with industry and conservative political organizations in his home state of Oklahoma than he is on protecting the environment and the public health for the rest of America," EIP Executive Director Eric Schaeffer said in a statement.

The group will ask EPA's inspector general to investigate Pruitt's travel Monday, an EIP spokesman said. As precedent, he pointed to a 2015 IG report on a regional administrator who scheduled more than half of his official trips to areas near his home in California's Orange County, some of which the IG questioned.

EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said in a statement that Pruitt was focused on running EPA, "not running for elected office. The administrator's travel, whether to Utah, Michigan or Oklahoma, all serves the purpose of hearing from hard-working Americans about how EPA can better serve the American people."

Pruitt said at an industry conference in May that his wife would join him in living in Washington this summer since both their children are both now in college, which could decrease his weekend trips home to Oklahoma.

Pruitt's predecessor, Gina McCarthy, paid her own way for trips home to Boston approximately every other week, according to an EIP spokesman.

Senate Democrats ask Interior IG to probe career staff reshuffle Back

By Esther Whieldon | 07/24/2017 03:49 PM EDT

Senate Energy and Natural Resources ranking Democrat Maria Cantwell and seven of her colleagues today asked the Interior Department's inspector general to investigate the agency's recent reassignment of a number of senior executive staff.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in June reassigned about 50 senior executive employees, including Joel Clement, who was moved from a managerial position involving climate change issues to a job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies.

Moving senior executives from the positions in which they may best use their expertise to jobs "where their talents are wasted would constitute a serious act of mismanagement, a gross waste of public funds, and an abuse of authority," the senators said in the letter to Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall.

The senators acknowledged that Zinke is allowed to shuffle senior executives around. But they argued the law requires for reassignments to be made to best accomplish the agency's mission, promote program continuity and to provide for an executive system that is free from improper political interference.

"Any suggestion that the department is reassigning SES employees to force them to resign, to silence their voices or to punish them for the conscientious performance of their public duties is extremely troubling and calls for the closest examination," the letter said.

The letter was also signed by Senate Finance ranking member Ron Wyden and Sens. Mazie Hirono (D-Hawaii), Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.), Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.), Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) and Al Franken (D-Minn.)

WHAT'S NEXT: It remains to be seen whether the IG will launch an investigation.

Ebell: EPA eyeing Koonin for 'red team' climate science review Back

By Alex Guillén | 07/24/2017 03:22 PM EDT

EPA is considering picking Steven Koonin, a top DOE official during former President Barack Obama's first term, to run its "red team" review of climate science, according to Myron Ebell of the Competitive Enterprise Institute.

Koonin suggested the formation of a red team in an April Wall Street Journal piece, where he said such a review "would shine much-needed light on the scientific debates" surrounding climate change. Koonin has long been a critic of climate change science, writing in the Journal in 2014 that the science "is not settled."

Some climate scientists and environmentalists have criticized such a review as giving a minority scientific opinion an outsized voice and laying the groundwork for revoking the 2009 endangerment finding that underlies all of EPA's greenhouse gas regulations.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, who called Koonin's idea "very exciting," has raised the idea of a televised debate.

Ebell, who briefly led President Donald Trump's transition effort at EPA, said today that he is not directly involved in the search but has been told by an "impeccable" source that Koonin is the top choice to lead the climate red team.

A theoretical physicist by training, Koonin was undersecretary for science at the DOE from 2009 to 2011, and since 2012 has been director of the New York University Center for Urban Science and Progress. He previously was chief scientist for BP and provost of the California Institute of Technology.

Koonin did not respond to requests for comment. EPA did not immediately respond to a request for comment today.

ZINKE'S 'SCAM PAC' PALS: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has worked for years with a group of Washington political operatives who have been accused by fellow conservatives of raising money on false pretenses, Pro's Ben Lefebvre and Nick Juliano report. Their investigation sheds new light on Zinke's fundraising practices as a member of Congress and since joining Interior. In his first month on the job, Zinke flew to the Virgin Islands at taxpayers' expense for a series of official events tied to the 100th anniversary of the territory's handover to the U.S. — and while there he squeezed in a personal detour to attend a fundraiser for the Virgin Islands Republican Party. That group, known as VIGOP, is one of several "scam PACs" run by Washington-area political consultant Scott Mackenzie, according to numerous critics that include some Republicans in the Virgin Islands.

Prominent GOP politicians have recoiled from working with Mackenzie and firms that have been linked to him, such as ForthRight Strategy, formerly known as Base Connect and BMW Direct before that. Texas Rep. Will Hurd says they "are preying on seniors," and former Virginia Attorney General Ken Cuccinelli filed a lawsuit accusing Mackenzie and others of running a "national fundraising scam." ForthRight CEO Kimberly Bellissimo introduced Zinke to the VIGOP in 2015, when she accompanied him on a trip to the island chain.

But not Zinke. He substantially increased his spending on firms linked to ForthRight between his first race for Montana's sole House seat in 2014 and his re-election two years later, when he spent nearly $3 million on direct mail fundraising firms operating out of the same address as ForthRight between his congressional campaign and leadership political action committee, SEAL PAC. And he provided a testimonial for the firm's website praising the "professional as well as personal relationship we have developed over many years."

SEAL PAC seemed to operate on the same model as VIGOP and other groups Mackenzie has run, raising huge sums from small donors and spending the vast majority of its money on fundraising consultants. The group raised $2 million of its $3 million haul last cycle in increments of $200 or less, and it spent $2.6 million on overhead, far more than the $118,000 it sent to other congressional committees. That made it an outlier among other leadership PACs, which typically court high-dollar donors and allow lawmakers to spread contributions among their colleagues.

There is no evidence Zinke did anything illegal, but his relationship with the consultants and PACs is raising eyebrows. "To say the least, this is highly unusual," said Karl Sandstrom, a former Democratic FEC commissioner now at the law firm Perkins Coie.

WELCOME TO TUESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and ME baffled the crowd on Monday's trivia. There are seven states (North Dakota, South Dakota, Vermont, Delaware, Montana, Wyoming and Alaska) with just one congressperson. For today: What state has the fewest counties? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

IT'S HERE AND IT'S EXPENSIVE: The impacts stemming from climate change are already costing the federal government lots of money to address and will likely continue to grow rapidly over the next several decades, according to a GAO report out today. Noting that precise economic estimates are difficult to calculate, the report nevertheless urges policymakers to collect better data to prioritize adaptation actions that could blunt the financial risks to the government as the owner of vulnerable infrastructure, insurer of property and crops and provider of disaster assistance.

Requested by the bipartisan duo of Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and Republicans Sen. Susan Collins back in 2015, GAO's release comes as Congress continues to respond to various natural disasters with hundreds of billions in estimated damages. It calls for the executive branch to "identify significant climate risks facing the federal government and craft appropriate federal responses."

"Our government cannot afford to spend more than $300 billion each year in response to severe weather events that are connected to warming waters," Collins said in a statement. "I hope the release of this analysis will cause all of us to think more broadly about this issue, take a harder look at the economic consequences of inaction, and use what is known about climate risks to inform federal policy."

Sound familiar? It should, because former President Barack Obama issued a similar directive back in 2013 calling for all federal agencies to take steps to prepare for the impacts of climate change. President Donald Trump rescinded that order as part of a sweeping directive in March that began the process of dismantling his predecessor's climate legacy. Both the White House and EPA declined to provide official comments on the report.

Speaking of adaptation, six state attorneys general released a letter to congressional leaders Monday calling for the reinstatement of a federal flood standard that requires federally funded construction projects be built to withstand the stronger storms and additional flooding projected to occur as the climate changes. Trump suspended the measure in August.

READ 'EM AND WEEP: FERC's comment deadline for DOE's controversial resiliency proposal hit Monday, and a lot people had a lot to say despite the short timeline. ME plucked the highlights of those that rolled under the closing gate like Indiana Jones. Energy Secretary Rick Perry's plan got praise from state coal associations, FirstEnergy, Exelon, and coal producer Murray Energy, which said it was threatened with bankruptcy if too much coal power tanked. But some of the state regulators and grid operators expected to be most affected by the proposal were unafraid to brandish their boom sticks.

The heart of PJM: The Public Utilities Commission of Ohio urged FERC to rejected the plan, found it "deeply concerning" that DOE "makes no attempt to quantify the costs" of the rule (which Perry said was equal to the "the cost of freedom") and suggested it could cost $8.1 billion a year. Pennsylvania regulators said DOE's "hastily drafted" plan threatens markets "without adequate justification" and using the 2014 "polar vortex" to justify the proposal is "inadequate and inappropriate." PJM CEO Andy Ott said DOE's rule didn't meet legal muster and ISO-New England said it wouldn't address the region's fuel concerns. The attorneys general of Massachusetts, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maryland, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington also submitted a six-point attack.

The Counterintuitive Awards: A few entities tried to praise DOE's goals around resiliency while making it clear that they weren't willing to stomach the proposal at face value. "DOE is heading in the right direction, but the industry needs more time," American Electric Power argued. "[T]he proposal put forward by DOE should not be adopted by FERC without comprehensive discussions and inputs from stakeholders in all sectors of the industry" — a vast departure from DOE's argument that there's already been too much talk. Entergy, which has nuclear plants that could benefit from the proposal, says DOE's rule is "not well-defined" and could "produce conflicts with current market rules and otherwise create unintended consequences." Even the West Virginia regulators, who aren't thrilled with PJM markets, said having 90 days of fuel on site was "excessive" and urged FERC to do something like 45 days.

The magic minute: People were filing into the docket at such a clip on Monday that five different notices came from the docket at 4:29 p.m. Things got bad enough that we couldn't access FERC's system for a few hours on Monday, and eventually the agency said that it would accept filings for another day.

ZINKE'S SUPER SECRET HILL MEETING: Zinke is scheduled to meet this afternoon with House Natural Resources Committee members in a room typically reserved for issues involving a high-security clearance. Zinke will meet separately with committee Democrats and Republicans and copies of invitations obtained by ME say he will be "raising a confidential matter" and only members and staff with top-secret level clearance may attend.

Topic not specified: The invitations do not say what topics Zinke plans to discuss and the Interior declined to comment. But the agency does oversee park and wilderness areas that abut the US-Mexico border and Zinke raised concerns in a leaked report to the White House earlier this year that Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument in New Mexico can be used as a drug smuggling route and needs to be monitored. Also, the U.S. territory of Guam faces possible missile threats from North Korea. Or it could simply be that Zinke, who reportedly flies his official flag over the Interior building when he occupies it, is looking to limit the number of people who know what the agency has in store on a number of topics, such his plans for national monuments.

'Everything about this is weird': A former Interior staffer could not recall a time when prior secretaries Sally Jewell or Ken Salazar ever called a meeting with lawmakers in a secure room on the hill or in the agency's Washington headquarters. "Everything about this is weird," the former staffer said. And Democratic Rep. Ruben Gallego said there's "nothing normal" about having a meeting with Zinke in such secure meetings and also found it odd the secretary would split up Democrats and Republicans.

MURKOWSKI: 'CLIMATE CHANGE IS REAL': Senate Energy committee Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski broke sharply with the party line over the weekend during a speech at the Alaska Federation of Natives convention with the message that climate change is real, and she urged action to install alternative energy systems across her state, KTOO reports. "Climate change is real," she said. "Confronting climate change and adapting to it will take leadership, it will take partnership and attention to social justice if we are to find the strength to tackle the issue together."

HOUSE TO VOTE ON SETTLEMENT BILL: Lawmakers today take up a bill H.R. 732 \(115\) that would restrict the government's ability to enter into settlement agreements that fund third-party activities. Though the House report on the package says it "explicitly" permits "payments to remediate environmental damage," it also condemns a settlement with Volkswagen that funded a $2 billion electric vehicle initiative and says it is "critical that Congress act to prevent these activities in the future."

MAIL CALL! MENENDEZ SEEKS PROBE OF EPA CHEMICAL CHANGES: New Jersey Sen. Bob Menendez asked EPA's inspector general in a Monday letter to investigate the influence of a former chemical industry insider in revising regulations in light of a New York Times report. In particular, Menendez wants the inspector general to look into potential suppression of scientific evidence, whether the agency's hiring practices run afoul of ethics and conflict of interest requirements and whether EPA has caved to industry requests in rulemakings.

INFORMATION SOUGHT ON PIPELINE ATTACKS: More than 80 House members sent Attorney General Jeff Sessions a letter Monday wanting to know what's being done to address recent attacks on pipeline infrastructure around the country. "While we are strong advocates for the First Amendment, violence toward individuals and destruction of property are both illegal and potentially fatal," the letter, led by Ken Buck, said.

GET YOUR GREAT LAKES PITCH IN: A bipartisan group of senators, led by Rob Portman and Debbie Stabenow, sent a letter to OMB Director Mick Mulvaney on Monday asking for $300 million for the Great Lakes Restoration Initiative in the fiscal 2019 budget resolution. "Now is not the time to scale back our nation's commitment to restore the Great Lakes environment and economy," they wrote. Link here.

DURBIN FIGHTS FOR... UTAH MONUMENTS: Sixteen Senate Democrats, led by Minority Whip Dick Durbin, asked Trump in a letter not to alter the existing boundaries of the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase Escalante national monuments in Utah. "It is clear that any changes to these monuments threaten their important natural, archeological, and cultural resources," they write. The push comes as Zinke is expected to meet later this week with Trump.

SUPPORT URGED FOR CCS TECHNOLOGY: A group of unions, environmental advocates, coal companies and others sent a letter to congressional Appropriations leaders Monday urging full support for the DOE Office of Fossil Energy for fiscal 2018. Link here.

RENEWED PUSH ON ARPA-E LEGISLATION: A bipartisan quartet — Reps. Mia Love, Eddie Bernice Johnson, Ryan Costello and Marcy Kaptur — sent a dear colleague letter urging support for legislation H.R. 3681 \(115\) that would reauthorize and allow "reasonable growth" in the ARPA-E program through 2022.

WORTH NOTING: A group of deep-pocketed donors gather today at oilman T. Boone Pickens' Mesa Vista ranch to lay out plans to raise money for the Trump-aligned America First Action super PAC ahead of the 2018 and 2020 elections, POLITICO's Alex Isenstadt reports.

WHO'S IN? Leaders of the We Are Still In coalition, which is still aiming to hit the U.S. reduction goals of the Paris agreement, are holding a press call today at 11 a.m. to discuss the upcoming Bonn, Germany, climate meetings. Participants include Washington Gov. Jay Inslee.

REPORT: MARKETS NOT REGULATIONS FOULED COAL PLANTS: Resources for the Future released a report Monday finding declining energy consumption and low natural gas prices accounted for much of the decline in coal plant profitability. The stringency of regulations affected emissions levels but had little impact on the balance sheets of plants.

TAKE A GLANCE! The Union of Concerned Scientists is out with a new playbook describing how some companies manipulate the findings of scientists to distort the impacts of their products on public health and the environment. There's also a PSA from former NFL player Chris Borland.

NEW TOOL! The U.S. Chamber's Global Energy Institute and Beveridge & Diamond released a new tool to track regulatory, judicial and legislative developments across the government.

LCV ALL-IN FOR NORTHAM: The Virginia League of Conservation Voters Political Action Committee announced today it's now spent $3.1 million on the commonwealth's upcoming elections, including Ralph Northam's bid to become governor. That investment includes $1.1 million of direct contributions to candidates, a $1.4 million field program and a $500,000 digital program that includes a website on Republican Ed Gillespie's environmental record.

DUNCAN JOINS E&C: The House Steering Committee picked Rep. Jeff Duncan for the spot on the Energy and Commerce Committee that opened up with the resignation of former Rep. Tim Murphy. Chairman Greg Walden said he was confident Duncan would "make an immediate impact on the committee with some of the broadest jurisdiction in Congress."

TWO MORE JOIN ENERGY COUNCIL: ClearPath CEO Jay Faison and former Aerospace Corp. CEO Wanda Austin are joining American Energy Innovation Council, whose members also include Bill Gates, Tom Fanning and others.

Zinke boosted fortunes of 'scam PAC' operators Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Nick Juliano | 10/23/2017 09:48 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has directed millions of dollars in political contributions since 2014 to a network of Washington operatives that prominent conservatives have accused of profiting by misleading donors.

Beneficiaries of Zinke's largesse include groups linked to Washington-area political operative Scott Mackenzie, organizer of a Virgin Islands GOP political action committee that hosted the secretary at a St. Croix fundraiser in March. Before that, when Zinke was a Republican congressman from Montana, his political operation steered significant portions of its spending to a handful of Washington, D.C.-area consulting firms that also have had ties to Mackenzie and his associates.

Zinke has continued this relationship even as other Republicans have recoiled from dealing with Mackenzie, whose critics say he operates "scam PACs" that raise small-dollar donations from conservative voters but then spend the bulk of the money on consultants and overhead.

The critics include former Virginia Attorney General Ken Cuccinelli, who filed a suit accusing Mackenzie and other defendants of running a "national fundraising scam" after they gave his 2013 campaign for governor less than a half percent of the money they had raised in his name.

Similarly, Zinke's own leadership PAC also relied heavily on small donors while spending heavily on consultants, in a departure from how most members of Congress operate those kinds of groups.

The details about Zinke's fundraising and spending practices have not been previously reported, nor has his yearslong relationship with Mackenzie's Virgin Islands Republican Party, a group that some Republicans in the Caribbean island chain have accused of misrepresenting itself to donors. POLITICO's analysis of Federal Election Commission filings, plus interviews with campaign finance lawyers and people familiar with the Virgin Islands group's fundraising, offer a deeper picture of the political activism of the retired Navy SEAL who serves in President Donald Trump's Cabinet.

None of the records indicate that Zinke violated the law or received any direct compensation from his association with Mackenzie, the Virgin Islands PAC or its consultants. But one campaign finance expert said the information shows that Zinke was not behaving like a typical politician.

"To say the least, this is highly unusual," said Karl Sandstrom, a former Democratic FEC commissioner who now works at the law firm Perkins Coie.

An Interior Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the assistance Zinke has offered to the Virgin Islands group or his use of political consultants. Mackenzie declined to be interviewed, and officials from the Virgin Islands organization — also known as VIGOP — did not respond to requests for comment.

Zinke is separately facing investigations by Interior's internal watchdog and the independent Office of Special Counsel over his habit of mixing politics and official business.

Legal limits on Zinke's partisan activities have tightened now that he's Interior secretary, and he has cut ties with his PACs since being sworn in. Still, he has kept up appearances at fundraisers and other political events — averaging more than one per month — a pace that is unusual for a Cabinet member. Those include his appearance at the March fundraiser in the Virgin Islands, which occurred during a taxpayer-funded trip less than a month after he became secretary.

Complaints among Republicans about "scam PACS" have been on the rise for years, focusing on groups that target conservative voters as a source for donations. Those complaints have repeatedly focused on Mackenzie, the founder of a number of GOP-leaning PACs that have used slogans such as "Stop Hillary Clinton" to raise money from conservatives — then appeared to do little actual politicking.

Such groups make use of what past FEC leaders have described as a loophole in campaign finance law. The commission declined to take action against one of Mackenzie's Virginia-based PACs, the Conservative StrikeForce, after former Rep. Allen West (R-Fla.) complained in 2012 that it had been "fraudulent" in raising money from his supporters while falsely implying it would aid his reelection campaign. While the PAC's actions were "troubling," the commission's attorneys wrote, they didn't violate any laws or rules that the FEC has the power to enforce.

Cuccinelli made similar criticisms in his 2014 lawsuit, which accused Mackenzie, Conservative StrikeForce and other defendants of using the bulk of the money they had raised in his name to "enrich themselves." The case was eventually settled, with Conservative StrikeForce agreeing to pay Cuccinelli's campaign $85,000 and turn over its donor lists.

Conservative commentator Erick Erickson warned campaigns back as far back as 2010 that he might not endorse any Republican candidate who used one Mackenzie-linked consulting firm, then known as Base Connect and now called ForthRight Strategy. Montana Democrats accused Zinke of facilitating a "political Ponzi scheme" with his connections to Mackenzie-linked firms during his 2014 congressional campaign, though the charges apparently gained little traction.

More recently, Rep. Will Hurd (R-Texas) — who was angered last year when the Virgin Islands GOP used his photo without his permission on fundraising solicitations — said in a statement to POLITICO that the Virgin Islands group and ForthRight "are preying on seniors in a disgusting attempt to enrich themselves."

Adav Noti, a former FEC associate general counsel who now works for the nonprofit watchdog Campaign Legal Center, said in an interview that he had dealt with the Virgin Islands group and Mackenzie as an FEC official, and in his opinion, "They are a scam-PAC."

"Scott Mackenzie has a number of scam-PACs," Noti said. "He was probably the first, or one of the first, with the idea of bilking people out of money through PACs. People are being defrauded, and that needs to stop."

The FEC is scheduled to decide Thursday whether to fine Mackenzie for less-serious discrepancies in campaign filings by two other PACs of which he's the treasurer, Freedom's Defense Fund and the Conservative Majority Fund.

None of the criticism has seemed to deter Zinke, who used part of a government-paid trip to the Virgin Islands in March to attend a VIGOP fundraiser, where — as POLITICO reported in early October — an invitation listed tickets costing as much as $5,000 a couple, and Zinke's schedule indicated that high-dollar donors had a chance to take photos with him. It was at least the third VIGOP event Zinke had attended there since 2015.

VIGOP, which the FEC classifies as a "non-party" PAC, directed more than a third of its spending during the 2016 election cycle to a handful of Washington-area consulting firms, including ForthRight and at least three other companies that share its address on 15th Street Northwest, according to campaign filings and other documents. Those firms also received more than $3.2 million during the same period from Zinke's congressional campaign, leadership PAC and a super PAC he founded before running for Congress, federal campaign records show.

Between the 2014 and 2016 elections, Base Connect had renamed itself ForthRight Strategy after a former executive pleaded guilty to child pornography charges. A number of the firm's clients left, but Zinke's campaign and his newly formed leadership PAC not only stayed with the firm but spent substantially more on it in the next election.

Zinke also publicly endorsed ForthRight's performance in his 2014 congressional race, offering a testimonial that was displayed on the firm's website until this month, when the watchdog group Campaign for Accountability filed an ethics complaint.

"Your results and personal commitment to Team Zinke were bar none!" the company quoted Zinke as saying on its website. "I greatly value the professional as well as the personal relationship we have developed over many years."

This praise came even though Zinke's campaign appears to have received less than it spent from its relationship with the firm.

ForthRight says it raised $1.9 million for Zinke's 2014 race by sending out 1.6 million pieces of mail, attracting nearly 44,000 new donors whose average contribution was $44. About $550,000 of that haul went to Zinke's campaign for "voter mail, radio ads, TV ads, get-out-the-vote activities and lawn signs," according to the firm's website. But that was less than the $608,000 that Zinke's campaign spent on postage and direct mail from Century Data Mailing Service, a firm located at the same 15th Street address as ForthRight, according to FEC records.

In the run-up to last year's election, Zinke's campaign and his leadership PAC, known as SEAL PAC, spent about $3 million combined on ForthRight Strategy, Direct Support Services and Legacy Lists — all of which operate out of the same office and list ForthRight CEO Kimberly Bellissimo among their executives. (Bellissimo did not respond to POLITICO's requests for comment.)

Special Operations for America, a super PAC that Zinke founded in 2012 before running for office, also paid firms at that address a total of about $1.8 million during the 2014 and 2016 campaign cycles.

Mackenzie is not listed on ForthRight's website or business filings but was long associated with the firm under its previous names, Base Connect and BMW Direct, both of which listed him as a staff member as far back as 2007.

Besides sharing an affinity for the same consultants as Mackenzie's VIGOP, Zinke's SEAL PAC has also followed a similar fundraising model: It raised two-thirds of its money from small donors in 2016, then steered only 4 percent of its spending to other campaigns, with almost all the rest going to operating expenses and overhead.

Typically, members of Congress use their leadership PACs to cover expenses that cannot be funded from their campaign accounts and to contribute to fellow politicians, using donations of up to $5,000 from lobbyists and other PACs. But SEAL PAC relied on donations of less than $200 for about two-thirds of the $3 million it collected during the 2016 cycle, according to a review of the donations. The group then spent more than $2.6 million on overhead and gave just $118,000 to other congressional campaign committees.

Relying heavily on small-dollar donations is one hallmark of the "scam PAC" play, said Brett Kappel, a partner at the law firm Akerman LLP who specializes in campaign finance, lobbying and government ethics.

"Unfortunately, they generally target the most vulnerable segment of the population with the least disposable income — retired people living on fixed incomes," said Kappel, who declined to discuss specific cases. "Frequently, these are elderly conservative voters who are upset with the direction of the country."

Lorraine Hutchinson, of Butler, Pa., told POLITICO that these elderly voters included her mother, who she noticed was repeatedly contributing to SEAL PAC and other organizations, though she didn't have the disposable income to spare. Hutchinson said Zinke's PAC was one of the slowest to cease soliciting money when she asked them to stop. At one point, Hutchinson resorted to posting a plea on SEAL PAC's Facebook page.

"It took a great deal of time and effort but I managed to get most of them to stop. The Seal PAC was one of the most persistent," Hutchinson told POLITICO in a Facebook message last week. "I am convinced that these groups knowingly take advantage of the vulnerable elderly and this is a widespread problem without any easy solutions."

Erickson told POLITICO in 2015 that groups that raise political donations without doing much actual politicking are "completely a drain" on the conservative movement, saying they threatened to sap the donors' enthusiasm while achieving no concrete results.

But Bellissimo, the ForthRight CEO, defended direct-mail fundraising in a 2014 post for The Daily Caller.

Donors who send checks in response to mail solicitations "are some of the most patriotic, conservative, generous, and sophisticated people on the planet. ... They are also 'movement' people," Bellissimo wrote. "They are willing to sacrifice their dollars on a principled conservative even when they know that candidate is an underdog."

Mackenzie has similarly defended his high operating costs, telling the FEC in response to West's complaint that "fundraising is expensive and getting more so every year."

Bellissimo's firm has played a crucial role in partnering with Mackenzie's Virgin Islands PAC: Several months before Mackenzie filed the VIGOP's initial paperwork with the FEC in December 2013, Virgin Islands Republican Party Chairman John Canegata signed a contract with Base Connect Vice President Timothy Webster making the firm the exclusive fundraiser for the PAC, according to a copy of the confidential document reviewed by POLITICO.

Some Republicans in the Virgin Islands objected to the use of their name in fundraising mailers urging voters to "Stop Hillary Clinton," and Canegata's involvement with Mackenzie has exacerbated divisions within the local party's governing body.

The anti-Clinton pieces, "at best, solicit donations under false pretenses," four members of the Virgin Islands Republican Territorial Committee wrote in a February 2015 internal report, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO. The members reported that "not a single penny of the funds received through these solicitations have been used for any purpose identifiable to any effort to oppose the election of Hillary Clinton as president."

Bellissimo introduced Zinke to VIGOP in 2015, his first year in Congress, a source familiar with VIGOP's operations told POLITICO. Zinke, his wife Lola and Bellissimo flew to St. Thomas to attend a VIGOP event in November of that year. Photos the VIGOP members posted on Facebook show Zinke and Bellissimo mingling at the Caribbean venue alongside Canegata and Saul Anuzis, a Michigan-based GOP operative who helped raise money for VIGOP. Neither Anuzis nor Canegata responded to requests for comment.

In February 2016, Bellissimo posted a photo of Zinke speaking at the Hay-Adams hotel across from the White House and bragged that she had "the privilege of playing staffer for Congressman Zinke this afternoon." When a friend commented on the Facebook post, saying the then-House freshman should run for president, she replied: "Maybe someday.... Will you help me campaign for him?"

Zinke returned for another VIGOP event at the Ritz-Carlton in St. Thomas less than two weeks after the 2016 election, according to social media posts. Then came his appearance at the VIGOP fundraiser this past March — this time as a member of Trump's Cabinet.

Trump signs order to end 'crushing attack' of Obama climate legacy Back

By Alex Guillén | 03/28/2017 05:08 AM EDT

President Donald Trump ordered his administration to begin dismantling his predecessor's climate change policies on Tuesday with a sweeping directive to end what he called a "crushing attack" on the U.S. economy — by halting efforts to reduce the carbon pollution of electric utilities, oil and gas drillers and coal miners.

The executive order Trump signed represents his biggest blow yet to former President Barack Obama's climate legacy. But it does not go as far as some conservatives would like to dismantle the EPA's authority to regulate greenhouse gases, nor will it begin to separate the U.S. from a landmark international climate accord — two areas of intense disagreement within the administration.

"My administration is putting an end to the war on coal," Trump told an audience at the EPA headquarters signing, where he was joined by a group of coal miners whom he promised would be put back to work quickly.

"We're going to have clean coal. Really clean coal," Trump added. "Together we will create millions of good American jobs, also so many energy jobs, and really lead to unbelievable prosperity."

Democrats argue that Trump is ignoring the risks of climate change for the sake of rewarding supporters in the fossil fuel industry.

"Thanks to this executive order, our future is looking darker, it's looking dirtier and it's looking less prosperous," Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del) told a press conference. "Today Donald Trump is shirking our nation's responsibilities, disregarding clear science and undoing the significant progress that we've made to ensure we leave a better, more sustainable planet for generations to come."

After last week's embarrassing failure of Trump's attempt to repeal and replace Obama's health care law, the energy executive order offers the president a chance to refocus on another key campaign-trail promise: unleashing the American energy industry. The order comes on the heels of Trump's move to ease Obama's ambitious vehicle fuel efficiency requirements and his order to reverse EPA's controversial Waters of the U.S. rule. The president has also recently signed legislation undoing Obama-era rules on Appalachian coal mining and energy companies' payments to foreign governments.

Trump order calls for the EPA to rewrite tough rules that critics said make it virtually impossible to build a new coal-fired power plant, and he instructed the Interior Department to end Obama's moratorium on new coal mines on federal lands, among other steps.

Additionally, the president's "energy independence" executive order also repeals several Obama-era environmental directives aimed at reducing the federal government's own carbon footprint, and it directs agencies to ferret out any additional policies that "result in impediments" to U.S. energy production, a likely reference to restrictions on fracking and offshore drilling. The president also told federal regulators to stop using the "social cost of carbon," which attempts to quantify the effects of climate change, in economic analyses of future rules.

"There is every reason to believe that the federal government will no longer seek to punish American consumers and businesses for using the energy resources that fuel our economy," U.S. Chamber of Commerce President and CEO Thomas J. Donohue said in a statement welcoming the order.

But Trump has not ordered EPA to reconsider the underlying policy that lets it regulate carbon emissions — the 2009 "endangerment finding" in which it declared that greenhouse gas pollution threatens human health and welfare. Nor will he address whether the U.S. will stay in the 2015 Paris climate accord.

"We're happy with it so far and we look forward to the right decisions on Paris and endangerment, but I think those are still to be made and they're a ways down the road," said Myron Ebell, director of the Center for Energy and Environment at the Competitive Enterprise Institute and the former leader of Trump's EPA transition team.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt went on national TV earlier this month to declare that carbon dioxide is not "a primary contributor to the global warming that we see," a statement that is at odds with the conclusions of the vast majority of climate scientists, including those at his own agency. But Pruitt has not followed up on that statement with any effort to reverse the Obama-era endangerment finding — a factor that sources say contributed to last week's abrupt departure of a Trump appointee from the agency.

On Monday, a writer for Breitbart.com, the site previously run by White House strategist Steve Bannon, suggested that a failure to revoke the endangerment finding would be grounds for Pruitt to resign.

"If Scott Pruitt is not up to that task, then maybe it's about time he did the decent thing and handed over the reins to someone who is," wrote James Delingpole, a prominent climate skeptic.

The White House has not ruled out later revisiting the endangerment finding, which Trump promised on the campaign trail to review. But environmentalists hope the administration decides that would be too much trouble, given that the policy already survived judicial scrutiny, and that courts are unlikely to support revoking it given the overwhelming scientific data on climate change.

Trump has not nominated anyone to fill key leadership positions below Pruitt and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, leaving open the question of how quickly his order will yield any concrete results.

"It's going to be harder if you don't have those positions filled," said David Doniger, director of the climate and clean air program at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "Unless, actually, their intention is never to fill them and work through political operatives who are not accountable."

Trump's advisers are split over whether to withdraw from the Paris climate deal, which Obama joined with a pledge to reduce U.S. emissions at least 26 percent from 2005 levels by 2025. The U.S. would face no penalty for missing that target, but many conservatives nonetheless say Trump should abandon the agreement altogether, as he pledged to do during the campaign.

But more moderate advisers, including Trump's daughter Ivanka and his son-in-law Jared Kushner, fear that pulling out would damage relations with key U.S. allies. Administration officials are now considering a middle-ground approach: Stay in the deal in exchange for more international support for technologies to reduce emissions from fossil fuels.

The order was also silent on a carbon tax, another issue that has become a flashpoint in disputes between moderates and hardliners in the White House.

Despite the lofty rhetoric coming out of the White House, Tuesday's order will have relatively little immediate effect.

It will take EPA years to rewrite its Clean Power Plan and accompanying rules on future power plants — both of which courts already had frozen while lawsuits play out.

The Trump administration plans to ask federal courts to suspend lawsuits over the EPA climate regulations and send the rules back to the agency to be rewritten or withdrawn. But the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, which heard arguments on the Clean Power Plan six months ago, does not have to go along. The appeals court judges could rule any day on the Clean Power Plan, and a separate D.C. Circuit panel has scheduled oral arguments on the future plant rule for April 17.

If EPA will not defend the regulation, environmentalists and states like California and New York have indicated they will step up and do so. And the ultimate fate of EPA's climate authority likely will eventually be decided by the Supreme Court, which ruled in 2007 that the agency had to regulate greenhouse gases if they endanger public health — but did not say how.

Trump's plans for the social cost of carbon are less clear.

The Obama administration estimated that each ton of carbon dioxide imposes $36 in costs to society to evaluate its climate rules. But Republicans and fossil energy supporters argued it arrived at that figure by counting global benefits while specifying only domestic costs — and they complain the metric was not subjected to a traditional notice-and-comment period before it was employed.

Critics also said the Obama administration used the social cost of carbon to impose stricter rules at EPA, the Energy Department and elsewhere that would be too costly to justify otherwise. Many environmentalists, meanwhile, complained that the amount was too low.

Whether Trump significantly lowers the cost of carbon or abolishes it altogether, the change could have a serious impact on energy regulations that will play out over a period of years. And it remains unclear how the courts might react. Federal judges have upheld agencies' use of the metric before, but some may be inclined to give deference to the Trump administration over what amounts to a highly technical calculation.

Meanwhile, Trump's order will also lead to the resumption of federal coal leasing. But major coal companies are hardly champing at the bit to sign new leases on federal land, although the Bureau of Land Management could make new tracts available relatively quickly. For example, a spokesman for Peabody Energy, which mines more U.S. coal than anyone else, told Bloomberg that the company will not need a new lease in Wyoming's Powder River Basin for "approximately a decade."

The Obama administration imposed a moratorium in February 2016 as part of a three-year review of the federal coal program. That followed reports from the Government Accountability Office, Interior's inspector general and a coalition of environmentalists and government spending watchdogs that concluded Interior was undervaluing coal on public lands.

Zinke hinted earlier this month that he will continue the underlying review, despite lifting the moratorium, to ensure taxpayers get the full value of coal being sold off of federal lands.

It's not clear that the moratorium cost any jobs, particularly since most coal mining is happening on private rather than public lands. The National Mining Association has not calculated the costs of the moratorium so far, but the group noted that coal mines on federal lands employ 14,000 miners.

Trump to roll back climate-focused flood standard Back

By Annie Snider | 08/15/2017 12:41 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will roll back a flood standard designed to protect federal investments from stronger storms as part of an executive order set to be signed this afternoon, according to a White House source.

The Federal Flood Risk Management Standard was established under an executive order issued by President Barack Obama in 2015. It requires that new federally funded projects — from government buildings like Veterans Administrations hospitals to bridges and schools funded by federal grants — be built to withstand the stronger storms and additional flooding projected to occur as the climate changes. It does not apply to the National Flood Insurance Program.

The Obama administration's standard offers multiple options for achieving greater flood protection, but generally requires construction to withstand a 500-year storm. The previous standard, on the books for more than four decades, required construction to take place outside of the 100-year floodplain. The new standard has not actually taken effect yet; each federal agency is tasked with developing its own regulation for implementing the standard, and none have yet been finalized.

Industry groups objected to the standard, arguing it was developed behind closed doors and could greatly increase costs.

Environmental groups have objected to efforts to repeal the standard.

"Ninety percent of all natural disasters in the United States involve flooding. These events claim lives and strain the capacity of government agencies and local communities to adequately respond and provide relief," Laura Lightbody with the Pew Charitable Trusts said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump is slated to sign an executive order on infrastructure containing the roll back of the Federal Flood Risk Management standard at 3 p.m. today.

PJM CEO: Perry grid plan 'contrary to law' Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/23/2017 02:38 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposal to support coal and nuclear power generation is unworkable and may be contrary to law if enacted, according to Andy Ott, CEO of PJM Interconnection.

"Some of the concerns raised by DOE we certainly understand [and] agree with a need for action. However, the DOE's proposed remedy is simply unworkable," Ott told reporters on a conference call this afternoon.

He argued that Perry's plan flew in the face of FERC's core statute and the agency's practice of treating energy sources fairly.

"It's not a uniform proposal across the nation. It seems to be a proposal that's targeted at specific resources, which we think is discriminatory and inconsistent with the Federal Power Act," Ott said. "We believe that it's contrary to law and ... [won't] really solve any problems."

The proposal was discriminatory, he said, because in boosting coal and nuclear power, the rule would create a special group of power sources that are "providing very similar or the same services" to the grid. In addition, Perry's plan was tweaked after its release but before its official publication to stipulate that the rule would apply to power markets that also had capacity markets.

"Certainly, there are generators in non-RTO areas and certainly generators in areas without capacity markets," Ott said. "The point is, why would they be compensated any differently?"

He added: "I don't know how you incorporate such a proposal without having a significant detrimental impact on markets. "

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC is accepting initial comments on the DOE proposal through the end of today.

MIXING PUBLIC LANDS AND POLITICS: Over the course of his first months in office, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has met with big donors or political groups more than a half-dozen times while on official travel, raising questions about the appropriateness of those habits even if they don't cross any legal red lines, Pro's Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon report. GOP donors shelled out up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with him during a nearly two-hour Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser during a stop on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. Tickets for the fundraiser, which was attended by local party members and elected officials, ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple.

Though ethics watchdogs said Zinke's appearance was legal, they said attending a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct. "It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen. An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor would say if he planned to continue raising funds.

Zinke's not alone: Obama administration officials had their own struggles mixing official business with politics. A watchdog group requested a probe of whether then-Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama re-election campaign RV tour of Colorado. The Office of Special Counsel found HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius violated the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" in North Carolina. Former Interior chief Sally Jewell said she thought Zinke was within his rights, noting she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell that she paid her own way to. "If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said.

But some see Zinke's activity as trying to maintain political contacts so can keep his options available for what to do after he leaves the Trump administration. "I think he's definitely got political aspirations, that that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition." He's widely seen an attractive candidate for Montana's open-seat governor's race in 2020.

Quotes that keep coming back to ME: "Put another way, just because something is legal doesn't make it right," OMB director Mick Mulvaney wrote last week. "So much of what happens around here is based on appearances. If it just appears wrong, don't do it," Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski told reporters last week.

REPORT: PERRY TOOK CHARTER TOO — LAST WEEK: Energy Secretary Rick Perry took a chartered flight last week from Hazleton Regional Airport in Pennsylvania to the Greater Portsmouth Regional Airport in Ohio one day before HHS Secretary Tom Price resigned last week, Reuters reports, citing "PMH Aviation, the company that runs the Portsmouth airport." Information about the cost of the flight were not available and the agency did not respond to requests for comment. PMH declined to confirm the flight when contacted by ME Wednesday night. But FlightAware has details of a Sept. 28 trip that appears to match Perry's itinerary that day; his tour of a uranium facility started at 8:30 the following morning. After the tour, Perry tweeted that he was headed to the Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky International Airport.

SPEAKING OF TRAVEL: The Western Values Project told ME it plans to file a complaint in federal court today complaining Interior has not responded to FOIA requests it filed in June asking the extent that Zinke's wife has accompanied him on official work business. Lola Zinke has accompanied her husband on some official trips, either ceremonial events to which she had been officially invited or on trips on which she has paid her way, Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift told ME. And CNN reports Interior's inspector general expanded its existing probe on Zinke's non-commercial travel to also include a summer visit to the Vegas Golden Knights hockey team.

"I DID NOT SIGN UP TO GO BLOW UP THE MARKETS": Recently minted FERC Commissioner Robert Powelson didn't hold back Wednesday making it clear that he's not going to be a rubber stamp on the Energy Department's grid pricing proposal, and warned against politicizing FERC. According to SNL, the audience gathered for a meeting of the Organization of PJM States broke into a standing ovation when the former longtime Pennsylvania regulator declared, "We will not destroy the marketplace." Powelson, a Republican, reportedly said he wouldn't support a rule that undoes the power markets FERC oversees. "When that happens, we're done. I'm done; I don't need this job," he said, according to SNL. "FERC does not do politics. We don't do energy politics," he also said. "I did not sign up to go blow up the markets."

Something to keep in mind: Organization of PJM States includes state regulators spanning Illinois to New Jersey and down to North Carolina, and its meetings include not only officials from PJM, the nation's largest power market, but consumer counsels from those states and plenty of power companies. PJM is also the market that would be the most affected by DOE's proposed rule. This is Powelson's crowd.

We need lots of information: Late Wednesday, FERC posted 53 questions and other requests for information as it dives into DOE controversial resiliency pricing proposal, Pro's Darius

Dixon reports. The six-page document splits those questions into categories looking for feedback on rates, the 90-day on-site fuel requirement envisioned by DOE, and how pricing changes would be implemented, among other issues.

METHANE RULE LIVES — FOR NOW: A federal court in California ruled Wednesday that BLM unlawfully postponed key compliance dates for a methane waste rule in June, effectively putting the rule back on the books for now. Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Magistrate Judge Elizabeth Laporte said the agency was too late to delay components of the regulation because its effective date had already passed and therefore should have gone through a round of notice-and-comment rulemaking before suspending any part of the rule. Her decision came the same day Interior proposed an 18-month delay of the methane waste rule as it works to rewrite it. BLM will accept comments on that proposal for 30 days.

EPA STRATEGIC PLAN DROPS CLIMATE FOCUS: EPA's priorities for the next four years would no longer make reference to climate change or rules to reduce carbon emissions under a draft strategic plan, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. The document, which went out to EPA employees Wednesday, instead defines the agency's "core mission" as ensuring clean air, water and land, calls for more "cooperative federalism" and touts the "rule of law and process." Accompanying graphic that went to employees here.

DEMOCRATS OFFERING CLIMATE METRIC BILL: Led by Sen. Michael Bennet, eight Senate Democrats today are introducing a bill — the Transparent Pollution Accounting Act — that would standardize the metric used across the federal government to quantify the cost of climate pollution. The Trump administration suspended use of the existing social cost of carbon earlier this year, prompting the need for a codified value, the Democrats argue.

WATCH THAT WRAP UP TODAY: Murkowski wants to have Kevin McIntyre, Trump's pick to chair FERC, and Rich Glick, who serves as general counsel to energy committee Democrats, onto the commission before the chamber adjourns for the Columbus Day recess, Pro's Darius Dixon reports.

Barrasso: Baran's renom needs a big offset: If Democrats want to secure a full five-year term for Nuclear Regulatory Commission member Jeff Baran, they're going to have to agree to "a fairly significant, robust [nomination] package for me to agree to allow him through," Sen. John Barrasso told ME. Democrats have insisted that Baran, a former aide to ex-Rep. Henry Waxman who has been on the commission since 2014, get a new term alongside the confirmations of GOP commission nominees Annie Caputo and David Wright, who were approved by EPW in July.

Barrasso's comments suggest that Democratic support for Caputo and Wright likely isn't enough to get him to go along with Baran, especially considering his frustration with objections to EPA enforcement nominee Susan Bodine. Still, there's not much to hang over the Democrats in the near term: It's a Republican administration with plenty of EPA nominees they don't like, and Baran's seat doesn't expire until June.

ADMINISTRATION SENDS OVER DISASTER FUNDING REQUEST: Officials formally sent over a request for nearly $30 billion in disaster relief Wednesday that included

$12.8 billion for FEMA's disaster relief fund, $16 billion for the National Flood Insurance Program and $576.5 million for the forest service's firefighting fund, Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief's Sarah Ferris reports. That came as San Juan's mayor blasted Trump on Wednesday as the "miscommunicator in chief" and called his visit to the island "insulting."

Murkowski's focused on immediate relief: Murkowski expressed concern about the "slow" federal response to Hurricane Maria and said building a more resilient Puerto Rican grid was secondary to getting the lights back on. "When you think about the extent of a disaster like this, we all want to say, 'Okay, let's improve, let's improve the grid here, let's build the Puerto Rican grid of the future,' but first and foremost—we've just gotta try and clean up," she told reporters. An aide said Murkowski planned to visit the island with other lawmakers next week but that those details are still being finalized.

PHMSA, NOAA PICKS ADVANCE: The Senate Commerce Committee advanced the nominations of Howard Elliott to run PHMSA and Timothy Gallaudet to be No. 2 at NOAA by voice vote Wednesday. Add them to the ever-increasing backlog of nominees waiting for a Senate floor vote.

DEMOCRATS SEEK PROBE OF PRUITT'S SPENDING: Two senior House Transportation Democrats — Peter DeFazio and Grace Napolitano — asked EPA's inspector general in a letter to probe "wasteful" spending by Pruitt on round-the-clock security and a $25,000 soundproof phone booth. "This culture, which is reflected in travel and lifestyle choices from the president on down, seems to embolden senior, politically appointed officials of the Trump administration to undertake lavish spending of taxpayer dollars for their sole and personal benefit, and not for the benefit of the Americans paying the tab," they write.

Udall considering private plane rider: Sen. Tom Udall, top Democrat on Appropriations subcommittee responsible for EPA spending, told ME he was "exploring" some sort of rider barring officials from private plane travel. "What I end up seeing is there's some very wasteful things going on," he said.

SENIOR E&C MEMBER MURPHY TO RETIRE: Rep. Tim Murphy, who chairs the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight, announced late Wednesday he'll retire at the end of his current term, POLITICO's Rachael Bade, Elena Schneider and John Bresnahan report. The staunchly pro-life Murphy allegedly suggested a mistress get an abortion.

MINE SAFETY PICK ACKNOWLEDGES FAULTS: David Zatezalo, Trump's mine safety pick, told a Senate panel Wednesday he was "not proud of the fact" the coal company Rhino Resources he used to run got notices of safety violations, Pro Labor's Ian Kullgren reports. He also said he'd have no trouble working with career staff that issued the notices in 2010 and 2011.

ZINKE HEADS TO FLORIDA: Today, the Interior secretary will get a briefing on "infrastructure upgrades and Everglades restoration at Lake Okeechobee." He'll also visit National Park Service sites Friday impacted by recent hurricanes.

CONSERVATIVES FOR CLEAN ENERGY: Hundreds are expected to gather today at the Hyatt Regency for the Conservative Clean Energy Summit. Multiple lawmakers are expected to address the gathering, including Sens. Mike Rounds, Rob Portman and Lindsey Graham, as well as Rep. Scott W. Taylor. More information here.

Milestone for House climate caucus: There are now 60 members of the House Climate Solutions Caucus with the additions of Reps. Pete Aguilar and Mimi Walters.

PERRY AIDE ADDS MORE CLIENTS: Jeff Miller, a former adviser to Energy Secretary Rick Perry during his second presidential run, has signed three new clients — including Pacific Gas and Electric, the massive California utility. Miller reported lobbying DOE in the second quarter on behalf of six clients, including AECOM, Lucid Motors (as a subcontractor to Hobart Hallaway & Quayle), the Nuclear Energy Institute, Occidental Petroleum, Southern Company and Valero Energy. He's signed 15 clients since he started lobbying in Washington this year and Perry became DOE chief (h/t POLITICO Influence).

END OF A (SHORT) ERA: The Rogue EPA Twitter account is going on hiatus, it announced Wednesday. "We started this account to be sure the public knew what was happening at EPA. Now, the world sees...It may be time to take a step back and let others carry the torch for a while. Those of us at the helm, here, are tired," a couple of tweets said.

Interior secretary draws flak for mixing politics, official travel Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/04/2017 07:31 PM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little B.S."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Justice Department's Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips he takes outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then-Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity. Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations, that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Report: Sebelius violated Hatch Act Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 09/12/2012 03:13 PM EDT

HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius violated the Hatch Act, which prohibits certain political activity, when she made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" during a speech in her official capacity earlier this year, the U.S. Office of Special Counsel said Wednesday.

The office sent an official report outlining the rare Hatch Act violation and Sebelius's response to President Barack Obama.

The special counsel's office said it "found no evidence that Secretary Sebelius made any other political statements in her official capacity."

During a speech to the Human Rights Campaign Gala in North Carolina in February, Sebelius said North Carolina Lt. Gov. Walter Dalton "needs to be the next governor of North Carolina." She also outlined the Obama administration's accomplishments so far and said, "One of the imperatives is to make sure that we not only come together here in Charlotte to present the nomination to the president, but we make sure that in November he continues to be president for another four years."

The Office of Special Counsel said she made the political remarks in her capacity as a federal employee and thus violated the Hatch Act. If Sebelius had made those remarks in her personal capacity, they would have been acceptable.

After that appearance, Sebelius had the event reclassified from official to political, and done in her personal capacity, in an attempt to avoid a Hatch Act violation. She and HHS also reimbursed the Treasury Department for all the costs associated with the trip. At least some of the cost was picked by the Democratic National Committee, according to the OSC.

But the OSC said the reclassification doesn't mean the violation didn't occur, particularly because the gala was advertised using Sebelius's HHS title.

"OSC concluded that Secretary Sebelius violated the Hatch Act by making extemporaneous political remarks," OSC Special Counsel Carolyn N. Lerner wrote in a letter to President Barack Obama. "As the upcoming elections approach, this report offers an opportunity to remind federal employees of the complex Hatch Act restrictions."

Hatch Act violations against sitting Cabinet secretaries are relatively rare.

"This particular type of violation, where you have a Cabinet secretary speaking at an event, is pretty uncommon," said Scott Coffina, a former associate counsel in President George W. Bush's White House and a partner at Drinker Biddle & Reath. He said there are "a lot of very garden-variety violations," citing federal employees who forward political emails or put up campaign photos.

Republicans immediately criticized Sebelius, and conservative groups called for her dismissal.

But Sebelius told the OSC that the endorsements of Obama and the government were unscripted and a "mistake." OSC quoted her as saying that she "got a little caught up in the notion that the gains which had been made would clearly not continue without the president's reelection."

Sebelius, in her response, said the ruling was "somewhat unfair" and the use of her title amounted to a "technical and minor" violation. She said that OSC should have concluded that the violation was "corrected" when the event was reclassified as political.

OSC said that by reimbursing the Treasury, she didn't violate rules prohibiting government-funded political events, but it didn't correct the prohibition on making political statements in an official role.

"It is my understanding that the Hatch Act permits Cabinet members to engage in political activities, without regard to location and duty hours, due to the 24-hour nature of our jobs," Sebelius wrote. "I believe that you should have concluded that the consequence of my going 'off script' at an official event was to change the nature of my appearance for cost reimbursement purposes only.

"Keeping the roles straight can be a difficult task, particularly on mixed trips that involve both campaign and official stops on the same day," Sebelius wrote.

Republicans were quick to pounce on Sebelius's violation.

"That the secretary violated federal law in this manner is disturbing, but hardly a surprise," said Antonia Ferrier, spokeswoman for Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). (The law was named after a different Sen. Hatch: Sen. Carl Hatch of New Mexico.)

"Since almost day one, this administration has had a singular focus on politicking — not governing — that's borne out by the secretary ignoring a strict prohibition on electioneering while working for federal taxpayers," Ferrier said.

House Oversight Committee Chairman Darrell Issa said Obama should carefully consider how to respond to the report.

"As he decides the appropriate consequences for Secretary Sebelius, the president should consider the important leadership role of Cabinet secretaries and the example they must set for the entire executive branch," he said in a statement.

Conservative advocacy groups said the violation warranted her departure.

"This is the most high-profile example of a Hatch Act violation since the act was passed in 1939," said Dan Epstein, executive director of Cause of Action. "Never before has a member of the president's Cabinet been found to have committed a Hatch Act violation. President Obama should immediately fire HHS Secretary Sebelius for her violation of federal law."

Maureen Ferguson and Ashley McGuire of The Catholic Association said most of Sebelius's actions "have advanced the president's political interests" throughout her tenure. "We already know she is willing to violate the First Amendment rights of Americans for political purposes, so why should we be surprised when she bends other laws to score political points?"

White House to Cabinet: No private air travel without Kelly's approval Back

By Matthew Nussbaum | 09/29/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The White House cracked down on Cabinet officials' use of private planes Friday, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft," after Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price resigned over his own taxpayer-funded flights.

Mick Mulvaney, the director of the Office of Management and Budget, sent out the memo soon after Price's resignation was made public. His exit came after a series of POLITICO reports about his frequent use of private planes to conduct government — and sometimes personal — business.

"In light of recent events, the President has asked me to remind the heads of all executive departments and agencies of Administration policies on travel," Mulvaney wrote.

He reminded the department and agency heads that, by regulation, "Government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft should not be used for travel by Government employees except with specific justification."

"However, beyond the law and formal policy, departments and agencies should recognize that we are public servants," Mulvaney wrote. "Every penny we spend comes from the taxpayer. We thus owe it to the taxpayer to work as hard managing that money wisely as the taxpayer must do to earn it in the first place."

Mulvaney added: "Put another way, just because something is legal doesn't make it right."

Officials should stick to commercial travel "with few exceptions," he wrote.

In the wake of the controversy, other administration officials' travels have come under scrutiny. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has used military planes for some trips, POLITICO reported, while EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin have also raised eyebrows with their travel itineraries.

President Donald Trump was livid over the Price scandal and accepted his resignation on Friday.

"We have great secretaries, and we have some that actually own their own planes, so that solves that," Trump told reporters earlier on Friday.

FERC floats dozens of questions on DOE pricing proposal Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 06:52 PM EDT

FERC opened the floodgates tonight for comments on the Energy Department's controversial resiliency pricing proposal, posting 53 questions and other requests for information about the rulemaking.

The six-page document signed by FERC's director for energy policy and innovation, groups the questions into broader categories looking for feedback on rates, the 90-day on-site fuel requirement envisioned by DOE, and how pricing changes would be implemented, among other issues.

But many of the questions, which are open to anyone seeking to comment before FERC's initial comment deadline of Oct. 23, are directed at the foundation of DOE's proposal.

For example, DOE's 19-page proposal leans heavily on the grid stresses that occurred during the "polar vortex" to press for new regulatory action. But, FERC doesn't treat the premise as a given. "The proposed rule references the events of the 2014 Polar Vortex, citing the event as an example of the need for the proposed reform. Do commenters agree?"

There are also questions directed at how on-site fuel would address power outages triggered by damage to the electric transmission and distribution system, and several questions seeking to define ostensibly basic information about how the 90-day fuel supply concept should be applied.

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC's initial comment deadline is Oct. 23, with reply comments due Nov. 7.

Judge says Interior delay of methane waste rule was illegal Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/04/2017 07:32 PM EDT

A federal judge ruled today that the Bureau of Land Management's June postponement of key compliance dates for the methane waste rule was unlawful.

BLM relied on Section 705 of the Administrative Procedure Act to justify the delay. But Magistrate Judge Elizabeth Laporte of the U.S. District Court for Northern California said it was too late because the rule's effective date had already passed. That means BLM should have gone through a round of notice-and-comment rulemaking before suspending any part of the rule, she said.

Coincidentally, the ruling came on the same day that Interior proposed an 18-month delay of the methane waste rule as it works to rewrite it.

Laporte's ruling acknowledges the pending rulemaking but said it could be months before it is finalized and takes effect, and may not survive its own legal challenge, giving her no reason to pause now.

She vacated the delay and ordered the requirements reinstated. She rejected BLM's arguments that the delay should be kept in place, saying that doing so would create "a free pass for agencies to exceed their statutory authority and ignore their legal obligations under the APA, making a mockery of the statute." And Laporte said any company that misses upcoming

January deadlines because of Interior's delay is in "a problem to some extent of their own making."

Laporte previously used similar legal reasoning to strike down Interior's delay of a resource valuation rule.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will take public comment for 30 days on its new proposal to delay the methane waste rule.

BLM proposes 18-month delay to methane rule Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/04/2017 09:59 AM EDT

The Interior Department proposed to suspend enforcement of an Obama-era rule on methane emissions for 18 months as it plans to rewrite it, according to a document to be filed tomorrow in the Federal Register.

"The BLM is currently reviewing the 2016 final rule and wants to avoid imposing temporary or permanent compliance costs on operators for requirements that may be rescinded or significantly revised in the near future," the agency said in the document.

The agency said it is concerned that the final rule analysis "may have underestimated costs and overestimated benefits, and [BLM] is therefore presently reviewing that analysis for potential inaccuracies."

The 2016 rule was intended to require oil and gas developers on federal lands to capture more of the methane that leaked during their operations. The rule went into effect in January 2017 and survived an effort by Congressional Republicans to repeal it.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will accept public comments on the proposal for 30 days.

Draft EPA strategic plan drops all reference to climate change Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/04/2017 04:26 PM EDT

The Trump administration has dropped all mention of climate change or rules to reduce carbon emissions from a strategic plan outlining EPA's priorities for the next four years, according to a draft obtained by POLITICO.

The draft was circulated around EPA for comment earlier today along with an accompanying one-page graphic.

The document creates a new framework for EPA's mission that reflects the management style of Administrator Scott Pruitt. It defines EPA's "core mission" as ensuring clean air, water and land. It calls for more "cooperative federalism" to empower state governments. And it touts the "rule of law and process," which is meant to "refocus the Agency on its statutory obligations under the law."

The draft was released to EPA employees just days after Pruitt missed a key statutory deadline to implement the 2015 ozone standard. EPA has offered no update on that issue.

"I believe this draft Plan provides the foundation for a more efficient and effective agency, enabling us to accelerate progress and deliver real, tangible results for the American people," Pruitt wrote in an email to EPA staff today.

The previous strategic plan released by the Obama administration in 2014 listed climate change as "goal one," along with broader air quality issues. The new draft plan makes no mention of climate change, though it does address non-climate air issues, as well as a litany of other regulatory, permitting and administrative goals for EPA.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will publish the draft plan in Thursday's Federal Register and take comments through Oct. 31.

Murkowski pressing to have FERC nominees approved this week Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 04:17 PM EDT

Sen. Lisa Murkowski is aiming to have President Donald Trump's two pending FERC nominees confirmed before the Senate flies off for its recess at the end of the week.

"I was talking with our leadership today about it. I want to try to get it shook loose before we take a break," the Alaska Republican, who chairs the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said of the nominees. The Senate is not scheduled to be in session next week.

Kevin McIntyre, Trump's pick to chair the agency, and Rich Glick, who serves as general counsel to energy committee Democrats, were approved by Murkowski's committee on a voice vote last month to become FERC members.

Sen. Maria Cantwell, the top Democrat on the energy committee, has said she was "favorably impressed" by McIntyre who, when confirmed by the full Senate with Glick, will bring FERC's leadership board back to full strength for the first time since late 2015.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate is scheduled to be on recess for the week of Columbus Day and is rarely in session on Friday, suggesting that the FERC nominees could be confirmed in the next day or so.

White House seeks nearly $30B in disaster aid package Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/04/2017 06:13 PM EDT

The White House this afternoon formally requested nearly $30 billion in emergency funding for its ongoing recovery efforts in hurricane-battered regions like Puerto Rico, Florida and Texas.

In a letter to congressional leaders, the Trump administration asked for $12.8 billion for FEMA's disaster relief fund, $16 billion for the National Flood Insurance Program and $576.5 million for the forest service's firefighting fund.

"We need the help of Congress to stabilize the affected communities and replenish dwindling and depleted funds," Office of Management and Budget chief Mick Mulvaney wrote. He said the money should be classified as "emergency spending," meaning it would not require spending offsets.

House and Senate appropriators immediately released statements in support of the White House's request and pledged to act quickly. House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) said he would "put legislation forward as soon as possible."

Rep. Nita Lowey, his Democratic counterpart on the panel, said she supported Trump's request for FEMA, but added it needed to go further.

"Congress should add to this request by appropriating funding for flexible Community Development Block Grants; rebuilding coastlines, roads, transit systems, airports, ports, and other infrastructure; small business loans; and repairs to military installations and other federal facilities damaged in the storms," said Lowey, of New York.

The White House's request had previously been reported by POLITICO.

Embattled GOP Rep. Tim Murphy to retire Back

By Rachael Bade, Elena Schneider and John Bresnahan | 10/04/2017 02:44 PM EDT

Rep. Tim Murphy of Pennsylvania announced Wednesday that he will retire at the end of his term, after allegations that the married Republican lawmaker, who opposes abortion rights, asked his mistress to terminate a pregnancy.

Murphy admitted several weeks ago to an affair with forensic psychologist Shannon Edwards — news that came to light during the woman's divorce proceedings with her husband.

"After discussions with my family and staff, I have come to the decision that I will not seek reelection to Congress at the end of my current term," Murphy said in his statement. "I plan to spend my remaining months in office continuing my work as the national leader on mental health care reform, as well as issues affecting working families in southwestern Pennsylvania."

Murphy added: "In the coming weeks I will take personal time to seek help as my family and I continue to work through our personal difficulties and seek healing. I ask you to respect our privacy during this time."

Murphy met privately with Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) before his retirement announcement, as well as with Pennsylvania GOP Reps. Bill Shuster and Charlie Dent.

A number of top Republicans have said privately that Murphy should retire or resign in light of the scandal.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette reported Tuesday that Murphy suggested Edwards get an abortion during a pregnancy scare, citing leaked text messages between the two.

"And you have zero issue posting your pro-life stance all over the place when you had no issue asking me to abort our unborn child just last week when we thought that was one of the options," Edwards texted to Murphy in late January, according to the Post-Gazette.

Edwards was responding to a Facebook post by Murphy touting his anti-abortion position in Congress. Murphy is a member of the House Pro-Life Caucus and voted Tuesday for legislation to ban abortions after 20 weeks.

The story also highlighted a toxic work environment in Murphy's office, citing a June 8 memo in which his chief of staff, Susan Mosychuk, warned Murphy about mistreating staff. The document, titled "Office Conduct and Behavior: Harassment/Legal Compliance," suggests there was a "pattern of sustained inappropriate behavior."

Mosychuk wrote that the office has experienced 100 percent staff turnover over the past several years and attributed it to the congressman's behavior. She said he often worked staff through the weekends, only to berate them for failing to meet expectations.

Murphy's district leans heavily Republican, backing Donald Trump by almost 20 points in 2016 and Mitt Romney by nearly 17 points in 2012. It is likely to remain in Republican hands.

Indeed, national Democrats scoffed at the idea that Democrats might be able to retake the seat — even if Murphy, crippled from scandal, were to run again. One Democratic consultant called it "completely unwinnable" as an open seat.

"[Murphy] is certainly weaker today than he was yesterday, but it'd be a stretch to say this is a Democratic pickup opportunity," another national Democratic strategist said.

The chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, Rep. Steve Stivers of Ohio, likewise said in a statement late Wednesday evening that he was "confident" the district would stay in GOP hands next year.

"While I am extremely disappointed in the circumstances surrounding Congressman Murphy's retirement, I remain confident that PA-18 will remain under Republican control next year," Stivers said. "I look forward to working with the eventual Republican nominee to ensure the district's conservative values are represented in Congress."

Still, Democrats on the ground are more hopeful, pointing to competitive down-ballot results in the district.

"It's a tough district, no doubt about it, but Democrats have been able to keep it close in other races," said Mike Mikus, a longtime Democratic operative in the state. "I think you'll see more Democrats taking a look at this and considering jumping in now."

A handful of Democrats are already in the race, including Pam Iovino, a Navy veteran and former Veterans Affairs official; Mike Crossey, a former member of the Allegheny County Council; and Bob Solomon, a physician.

But former Rep. Jason Altmire — a centrist Democrat who represented Western Pennsylvania and lost his seat, partially due to redistricting, in 2012 — said "it would have to be the right kind of Democrat" to put the seat in play.

"If you had a social conservative Democrat, it's been proven that a Democrat like that and who fits that mold can win," Altmire said.

MSHA nominee: 'I was not proud' of violations notice Back

By Ian Kullgren | 10/04/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee for assistant secretary of Labor for Mine Safety & Health told a Senate committee today that his coal company ignored safety conditions at one of its mines.

David Zatezalo was chairman of Rhino Resources when it received pattern of violation notices in 2010 and 2011, the Charleston Gazette-Mail previously reported. The company was later fined when a wall collapsed, killing a worker.

When questioned by Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) about the notice, Zatezalo blamed the mine manager.

"The management of that particular group and that particular site was not doing what they should have been doing," Zatezalo said. "I was not proud of the fact that we got designated as a [potential pattern of violations] mine. I did not try to lawyer up and stop anything from happening."

"I replaced that management," he added, "because I wasn't too happy with their performance and hadn't been for sometime."

Zatezalo appeared before the Senate HELP Committee for a confirmation hearing with Cheryl Stanton and Peter Robb, Trump's nominees for Wage and Hour Division administrator and NLRB general counsel, respectively. Few senators showed up to the hearing, though, and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) complained that the Senate's busy schedule didn't leave enough time to probe as deeply as she would have liked.

Zatezalo assured Kaine that he wouldn't have a problem working with career staff at MSHA who issued the notice to his company.

"They did what they were supposed to do," he said.

CLEAN POWER PLAN WALKBACK ARRIVES: From the heart of coal country in Hazard, Ky. and alongside Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt announced Monday he'd sign a proposed rule today formally kicking off what's expected to be a protracted, years-long regulatory and legal process of withdrawing the Obama-era Clean Power Plan. "The past administration was unapologetic, they were using every bit of power, authority to use the EPA to pick winners and losers on how we pick electricity in this country. That is wrong," Pruitt told the crowd.

POLITICO's Emily Holden and Andrew Restuccia got the talking points ahead of the announcement, which show President Donald Trump's administration will frame the regulation's repeal as "another step advancing the president's America First strategy." It's worth noting the country is more than halfway toward meeting the rule's goals even though it never formally took effect. New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman vowed to sue over that action Monday.

Long haul ahead: It'll take a ton of time to actually formally remove the Clean Power Plan from the books and to defend those actions in court, Emily reports. So environmentalists and Obama-era EPA leaders say Pruitt seems to be setting himself up to never actually issue a replacement rule limiting carbon emissions from power plants. "Scott Pruitt's politics really does militate against him signing a regulation on greenhouse gas emissions," said Joe Goffman, the lead attorney at EPA when it filed the rule in 2015. But even without the rule, many companies and states are moving away from coal, opting for cheaper natural gas or renewable power.

Farmers count more: Pruitt didn't seem too concerned Monday that his schedule includes few meetings with environmental groups. Speaking at a Kentucky Farm Bureau Monday afternoon, Pruitt said he was asked by reporters earlier about the lack of meetings. "Well, what about those farmers and ranchers in Iowa? What about those farmers and ranchers in North Dakota and Kentucky?" he asked. "Then I sat down and I listened to them about issues that impact them. Do they not count? And the answer is, you count more. Because every single day, what we do impacts you and we have to work together to achieve better outcomes for water and air quality in this country."

Gina McCarthy's thoughts? The former EPA administrator who authored the regulation: "They're using stall tactics to defer action, ignoring the courts and the demands of the American people ... They're adding more pollution into our air and threatening public health at a time when the threats of climate change are growing and the costs are growing immeasurably higher on our children and their future."

Somebody tell Rick Perry: Pruitt blasted the Obama administration, saying "regulatory power should not be used by any regulatory body to pick winners and losers." Not sure where he might come down on the latest move by Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who has asked FERC to write rules to prop up the struggling coal and nuclear sectors.

PERRY RELEASES DEETS ON NON-COMMERCIAL TRAVEL: Joining the ranks of Trump officials utilizing non-commercial travel arrangements while in office, Perry announced Friday he'd spent as much as $56,246 during four trips on government-owned or chartered aircraft, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. In a letter to House Oversight and Government Reform Committee leaders, the former Texas governor detailed the trips:

— A mid-May one-day round trip from Reagan to Olathe, Kan. for DOE's Small Business Forum & Expo that cost an estimated $35,000,

— A private charter flight on Sept. 28 (one day before HHS Secretary Tom Price resigned after a series of POLITICO reports on his lavish private plane usage) from Dulles to Hazleton Regional Airport in Pennsylvania that later continued to the Greater Portsmouth Regional Airport in Ohio at a cost of an estimated $11,000, — Use of a DOD plane in May to travel from Idaho Falls, Idaho to Santa Fe, N.M. at an estimated cost of $7,000, and,

— Use of a Bonneville Power Administration plane in August to fly from Seattle to Richland, Wash., to visit the Hanford nuclear site, which cost an estimated $3,246

DOE spokesperson Shaylyn Hynes said in a statement. "The Secretary travels almost exclusively on commercial aircraft. In the rare instances where government-owned or chartered aircraft have been used, trips were pre-approved by an Ethics officer within the Office of General Counsel."

Speaking of questionable travel, EPA's inspector general confirmed Friday it had expanded a prior investigation to include all of Pruitt's travel, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. The watchdog has faced pressure to look into whether Pruitt's non-commercial flights were necessary and appropriate expenses as it's already looking into whether the former Oklahoma attorney general's frequent trips back to his home state were appropriate.

New probe sought: Meanwhile, the Campaign Legal Center has asked DOJ's Office of Special Council to investigate whether Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's appearance at a political fundraiser in the U.S. Virgin Islands while on an official trip ran afoul of the federal law prohibiting federal officials from using government resources to engage in partisan political activity, Pro's Nick Juliano, Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon report. "This activity constitutes impermissible solicitation of political contributions if event organizers conditioned the opportunity to take a photograph with Secretary Zinke on paying a higher fee," Walter Shaub, the Campaign Legal Center's senior director for ethics, wrote, citing POLITICO's reporting.

Meanwhile, CNN is reporting that Obama's Interior secretaries had spent $971,000 on non-commercial air travel over seven years. Read it here.

DISASTER FUNDING FIGHT ON TAP: The House is expected this week to consider a massive $29 billion disaster funding relief package to provide aid to Florida, Texas and Puerto Rico in the aftermath of four consecutive blows from hurricanes. That comes as Puerto Rican Gov. Ricardo Rosselló asked Congress to provide an additional $4 billion from various federal programs and agencies to meet the island's "immediate emergency needs."

Congressional delegation vows support: A bipartisan, bicameral group of lawmakers toured the devastated territory over the weekend and vowed long-term support to rebuild the island. Multiple lawmakers, including Sens. Cory Gardner and Ron Johnson, said reconnecting the island's electric grid was their top priority. "If you're a utility CEO and you're listening to this right now, I hope you will contact the Puerto Rico power authority," Gardner said, according to McClatchy. "Come into Puerto Rico. Contact them. Let's make sure we get this grid built."

Vice President Mike Pence visited the island on Friday and said the Trump administration would be there for the long haul ahead. "The people of Puerto Rico can be assured that we will be with you every step of the way," he said. "We will see this challenge through." The most recent government figures show 59.5 percent of residents now have potable drinking water and 15 percent of people have electricity.

Feud with mayor goes on: FEMA Administrator Brock Long dismissed the criticism of the federal government's response by San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz as "political noise" during a Sunday interview on ABC's "This Week." That comes after Cruz tweeted Sunday "Increasingly painful to understand [sic] the american people want to help and US Gov does not want to help. WE NEED WATER!" She had previously called Trump's remarks during a visit to the island "insulting."

Florida seeks more hurricane relief funding: All of Florida's congressional delegation (except for Rep. Daniel Webster) signed a letter Friday seeking nearly an additional $27 billion in disaster relief as the state recovers from Hurricane Irma.

BARRASSO GETTING A CHALLENGER? Erik Prince, the founder of the security contractor Blackwater, is taking a hard look at challenging Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso for the Republican Senate nomination in deep red Wyoming, the New York Times and Associated Press report. The brother of Education Secretary Betsy DeVos, Prince, wouldn't challenge Barrasso's conservative bona fides, but would instead go after his close ties to McConnell. Steve Bannon is leading the charge for Prince to run despite his scant ties to Wyoming (he had a residence in Wapiti, Wyo. in the late 1990s and early 2000s).

* Presented by ExxonMobil: We're collaborating with FuelCell Energy on a novel idea to use fuel cells to capture carbon at natural gas power plants, and in the process reduce emissions and increase electrical output. This technology could be a game changer in addressing the world's growing need for energy, while also reducing the impact on the environment. Learn more. **

JONES ACT WAIVER LAPSES: The Trump administration declined to renew a Jones Act waiver allowing foreign vessels to load ships at domestic ports for delivery to Puerto Rico, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. "We believe that extending the waiver is unnecessary to support the humanitarian relief efforts on the island," DHS spokesman David Lapan said. "There is an ample supply of Jones Act-qualified vessels to ensure that cargo is able to reach Puerto Rico." Ships previously loaded at U.S. ports now have until Oct. 18 to deliver their cargos.

BONN MOVE: Quashing rumors that Pruitt might lead the U.S. delegation to the major international climate change summit in Bonn, Germany next month, the Trump administration has picked the State Department's Thomas Shannon to head up the U.S. delegation, POLITICO's Andrew Restuccia reports. The appointment of Shannon, undersecretary for political affairs at State, comes as the administration has declined to appoint a climate envoy, who would normally lead the trip.

MOVING ON ANTIQUITIES ACT REFORM: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop released legislation H.R. 3990 \(115\) Monday revamping the Antiquities Act ahead of a Wednesday markup of the bill. "This legislation provides for accountability in the Act's uses," he said in a statement. "It modernizes the law to restore its intent, allowing for the protection of actual antiquities without disenfranchisement of local voices and perspectives. It standardizes and limits the president's power to reshape monuments. "

MAIL CALL! CONSERVATIVES URGE TRUMP TO IMPLEMENT RFS REFORMS: A group of conservative organizations are out with a letter today urging Trump to revamp the Renewable Fuel Standard by moving its point of obligation, which they describe as a "mandate [that] hinders economic growth and stifles innovation" particularly among smaller companies. "Moving the 'point of obligation' would level the playing field between large oil companies and independent refiners as well as reduce the unfair advantage that the mandate gives large gas station chains over small mom-and-pop gas stations," wrote the groups, including Tea Party Nation and Institute for Liberty. Of course, shifting that obligation to comply with the program had been a major goal of Carl Icahn, the Trump adviser and refinery owner who resigned his unpaid White House position in August amid concerns he was using his influence to help one of his companies.

Lawmakers write letter of their own: Pennsylvania Sens. Bob Casey and Pat Toomey, as well as 12 House members, sent a letter Trump urging him to revamp the RIN credit program which they said is "undermining the continued viability" of Northeast oil refiners. "We are concerned that current compliance costs and the volatile RIN market may lead to the closure of one or more these merchant refineries, which would have a devastating impact on the regional economy," they wrote.

WOTUS WATCH AT SCOTUS: Supreme Court justices hear arguments Wednesday on the relatively simple but ultimately important, question of which court should hear arguments over the waters of the U.S. regulation (and a forthcoming replacement), Pro's Alex Guillén reports in Energy Regulation Watch. At issue is whether Clean Water Act cases like this should start at the district courts or, like many Clean Air Act challenges, skip that step and go to the federal appeals court level.

WALK, DON'T RUN: 134 of the the nation's mayors are launching a push today to ensure their citizens live within a 10-minute walk from a park or public green space. "I am proud we're supporting the goal of a 10-minute walk to a quality park for all," New Orleans Mayor Mitch Landrieu said in a statement.

FERC ASKS COURT FOR LIMITED REHEARING ON STUDY: FERC appealed a federal court decision that directed the agency to amend an environmental study for the Southeast Market Pipelines Project to include an assessment of greenhouse gas emissions from the power plants that may use the fuel. On Friday afternoon, regulators said they plan to comply with the Aug. 22 ruling but asked that the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals provide the agency with more time to address the order as well as reconsider their decision to vacate FERC's certificate approving the project.

"Vacatur would revoke the certificates of public convenience and necessity for these pipelines - pipelines that are currently providing natural gas to power plants in Florida," FERC attorneys wrote in their rehearing request. "Without such certificates, the pipelines would have to cease operating, at least temporarily. That outcome risks significant disruption to natural gas and electricity service to Florida consumers." FERC issued a 5-page draft supplemental environmental impact statement on Sept. 27 to start compliance with the court order, and has asked for comments through Nov. 20. The court could respond in the next few weeks.

ARNOLD'S LIFE AFTER POLITICS: POLITICO's Edward-Isaac Dove takes a look at what Arnold Schwarzenegger's been up to in the six years since the Republican terminator left the California governor's mansion and gets this quote on climate change efforts that seems like it could have come from Gov. Jerry Brown. "If the federal government, Republicans and Democrats, and Donald Trump and his whole White House would be smart, they would just copy exactly what we are doing in California," he said.

ANOTHER ONE BITES THE DUST: One of Texas' largest coal-fired power plants will permanently close Jan. 4, 2018, the Houston Chronicle reports. Vistra Energy's 1,800 megawatt Monticello power plant will lay off approximately 200 employees with the closure. "This was a difficult decision made after a year of careful analysis," CEO Curt Morgan said.

STAFFING UP: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke formally announced six hires on Friday: Jason Larrabee as principal deputy assistant secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks; Austin Ewell as deputy assistant secretary for Water and Science; Brian Steed as deputy director of BLM; Cally Younger as counselor to BLM; Kathleen Benedetto as senior adviser to BLM and Benjamin Cassidy as senior deputy director for Intergovernmental and External Affairs.

SAD STATE OF AFFAIRS: EPA's inspector general has launched 70 investigations into a surge of threats against agency employees this year, NBC Washington reports. Patrick Sullivan assistant inspector general for investigations, told the local news station: "I do feel we've prevented acts of violence through our investigations. I feel very confident we have." There's been a rise in threats against Pruitt, the report says.

But the one that caught ME's eyes was one that targeted McCarthy. In that case, former EPA employee Barbara Jordan wrote an email that she was outside a hotel and that "i am going to murder those (expletive)... and i hope they drop dead like flies." Jordan has pleaded not guilty.

MOVERS, SHAKERS: Two former George W. Bush administration Interior veterans have been named to lead Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck's energy practice. Jon Hrobsky worked in the Office of the Secretary and was also deputy director for policy and planning of the U.S. Minerals Management Service. Luke Johnson was former chief of staff for BLM.

Trump's climate rule rollback will focus on 'America First' talking points Back

By Emily Holden and Andrew Restuccia | 10/07/2017 05:32 PM EDT

The Trump administration plans to highlight its "America First" strategy when unveiling a proposal to roll back the biggest part of former President Barack Obama's climate legacy next week, according to talking points obtained by POLITICO.

An administration official said the final announcement to withdraw the Clean Power Plan — a rule to limit greenhouse gas emissions from coal plants — would probably be made by EPA, not the White House, making the prospect of a Rose Garden speech from the President Donald Trump unlikely.

The official said it's unclear whether EPA will hold an event to make a formal announcement, though multiple sources tracking the issue expect the agency to release its plans on Tuesday.

EPA did not immediately respond to request for comment.

"Repealing the Clean Power Plan is another step advancing the president's America First strategy," guidance from the administration said. The rule was the focal point of the Obama administration's plans to meet its international pledges to curb the carbon emissions that cause climate change.

The lack of a Rose Garden ceremony would give the rule's withdrawal less drama than Trump's June speech outside the White House in which he announced he was exiting the Paris climate agreement — an action he said he took for the "citizens of Pittsburgh, not Paris." Both Trump and EPA administrator Scott Pruitt have discounted man-made climate change, with Trump dismissing it as a "hoax" and Pruitt questioning carbon dioxide's role.

EPA and the White House will say the regulation was "premised on a novel and expansive view of agency authority." It will also emphasize that the Supreme Court stayed implementation of the rule while a lower court reviewed challenges to the regulation — a stay the administration will describe as "unprecedented and historic," according to a brief summary.

The talking points say the rule "ignored states' concerns and eroded longstanding and important partnerships that are a necessary part of achieving positive environmental outcomes."

Obama's EPA officials have said they talked frequently with states before, during and after finishing the rule.

The Clean Power Plan called on states to write their own plans to reduce carbon levels, by using less coal power, ramping up natural gas and renewable energy use, and limiting power demand by making electricity systems and consumer use more efficient. States also could have grouped together to form trading systems, and coal-heavy states could have purchased allowances from greener states to keep some of their plants online. The U.S. is already more than halfway to meeting the Clean Power Plan's goals, although the rule never took effect.

Pruitt will take first step to repeal Clean Power Plan but could slow-walk replacement

By Emily Holden | 10/06/2017 06:20 PM EDT

EPA chief Scott Pruitt is finally making his first move to rescind Barack Obama's marquee climate change rule — but he may not be done by the time President Donald Trump leaves office.

The agency is preparing to publish a proposal to eliminate the Clean Power Plan and may consider replacing it but will not outline options immediately, according to a draft obtained by POLITICO on Friday. Given the amount of time and effort it will take just to get the current rule off the books — and then to defend that move in court — environmentalists and Obama-era EPA leaders say Pruitt appears to be setting himself up to never have to issue a replacement rule limiting carbon emissions from power plants.

"They're not committing to doing anything at all," said Sean Donahue, an attorney representing environmental groups that support the Clean Power Plan. "This is not a kind of, 'We have a better way to do it.' This is a, 'We really don't want to do it.'"

Pruitt's moves leave federal climate action facing years in limbo as the world experiences warming that is already threatening the environment and public health, with heat waves, drought, sea-level rise and flooding. The Clean Power Plan was the linchpin of U.S. efforts to reduce emissions that cause those problems under an international deal to slow climate change, which Trump has said the country will exit. Even if Pruitt does eventually issue a new rule, he is expected to tailor it so narrowly that it would not lead to any significant carbon reductions.

Joe Goffman, the lead attorney at EPA when it filed the rule in 2015, said it is clear Pruitt's strategy is to slow-walk any action to replace the rule, delaying any of the regulations to curb carbon emissions that the Supreme Court called for a decade ago.

"Scott Pruitt's politics really does militate against him signing a regulation on greenhouse gas emissions," he said.

Pruitt, the former Oklahoma attorney general who sued the federal government more than a dozen times, including over the Clean Power Plan, has said he wants to lead public debates on the merits of science linking human activity to the Earth's rapid warming. Critics speculate he is prepping for a future campaign for Congress or a state-wide office.

EPA has a legal obligation to regulate carbon from power plants, following a 2007 Supreme Court decision and the agency's own declaration that heat-trapping gases endanger public health by causing climate change. But environmental groups can't sue until Pruitt officially withdraws the rule and again if he publishes a replacement. It will be years before the courts settle the issue.

Fossil-fuel trade groups on Friday lauded the proposal. Paul Bailey, president of the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, said the regulation would have increased energy prices while reducing global temperatures a fraction of a degree.

"We are pleased to see EPA repeal this very bad rule," he said.

National Mining Association CEO Hal Quinn said the Clean Power Plan was "an unlawful attempt to transform the nation's power grid." Nixing it would save coal jobs, he argued.

Green groups still must weigh their options, but Donahue indicated they may try one final push to get the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to issue its ruling on the Clean Power Plan, which would cement an answer to the legal issues EPA is raising in its repeal effort.

The new draft discounts most of the value that the Obama administration had estimated would come from reducing carbon emissions and air pollutants that cause health problems. It uses the term "climate change" only once.

"That's the problem with this and other things that these guys are doing, is that they do not acknowledge the fundamental health and environmental threats they're charged with protecting people from," Donahue said. "Their whole thing is about rewarding a subset of industry who are their bankrollers."

The Clean Power Plan would have shifted the U.S. away from coal power and toward lower-carbon natural gas and emissions-free renewable power. It still would have secured only a fraction of the emissions cuts the U.S. would need to achieve to comply with its pledge under the Paris climate agreement.

Power-sector emissions are about a third of the country's carbon pollution, and the Clean Power plan aimed to cut them about 15 percent below 2015 levels. Even without the rule, many companies and states are moving away from coal, opting for cheaper natural gas or renewable power.

Goffman said he's optimistic that Trump's moves won't torpedo a global movement away from fossil fuels because countries have already invested political capital in choosing their commitments.

Jeff Holmstead, an EPA deputy under the George W. Bush administration who now represents groups suing against the Clean Power Plan, believes Pruitt will write a replacement rule focused only on coal plants. Holmstead thinks that move will make it hard for a future administration to write different power-sector climate rules.

"The big picture is that if EPA actually does what it's supposed to do under the Clean Air Act, it will push the issue back to Congress," Holmstead said.

EPA's proposal sets the tone for how Pruitt will express his opinions about climate change in regulatory actions.

Joanne Spalding, a climate attorney at the Sierra Club, said the draft shows that "it's completely irrelevant to this administration the harm that these power plants are doing by spewing out all this carbon pollution, and they don't even talk about it."

A replacement rule would be more of a defensive legal maneuver, meant to protect against judges who might require EPA to move forward after federal climate action has languished for more than a decade. A new regulation would probably call on coal plants to run slightly more efficiently, according to arguments EPA laid out in its draft.

"It's basically saying that these dinosaur coal plants that were built in the '60s and '70s decades ago get to operate forever — even though there are all sorts of clean power sources out there that we could be using that are not destroying our health and the planet," Spalding said.

Alex Guillén contributed to this report.

DOE's Perry pushes FERC to support coal power plants Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/29/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The Trump administration on Friday called on FERC to create new rules to protect coal-fired and nuclear power plants that are being squeezed by cheaper natural gas and renewable sources, saying they were "indispensable for economic and national security."

Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who told miners in Pennsylvania on Thursday that "it's time for coal in this country to be revived," pressed electricity regulators to alter power markets and protect the resilience of the power grid with payments to generators that keep fuel supplies on site, a clear reference to the coal-fired and nuclear power plants.

The proposal, which DOE said gave FERC 60 days to create a final or interim rule, comes just a month after Perry's agency issued a report saying FERC should "expedite" its work with grid operators to ensure the stability of the nation's power network.

"In terms of process, this is a pretty bold move," said Tony Clark, a Republican former FERC commissioner. DOE often conducts studies on issues it believes need attention, he said, but "actually forwarding to the commission something specific for action is a pretty bold way of moving the issue right up the batting order at FERC."

The new proposal, directed at FERC under a rarely used Section 403 authority of the Department of Energy Organization Act, stops short of specifically seeking market incentives for coal. But it calls for full-cost recovery for power generating units that provide essential power and "ancillary" services — and have a 90-day fuel supply on site in case of natural or man-made disruptions. That would exclude most natural gas power plants, which do not typically keep large fuel inventories on hand and instead receive supplies via pipeline.

Perry's request represents a departure from the two decades of U.S. policy that has trended toward more market-based tools, which has helped natural gas to nearly double its power market share. Renewable energy sources like wind and solar, though still modest when compared to fossil fuels or nuclear power, have also grown quickly as federal incentives helped drive down their costs.

But the growth of renewables and natural gas — combined with tighter pollution controls and weak new demand for electricity — has forced hundreds of old coal-fired power plants into retirement. Nuclear power plants in some parts of the country are also under financial pressure, hurt by negative wholesale power market prices that sometimes require the plant owners to pay to deliver their power supplies.

"If this gets the debate started, then my hat's off," said former FERC Chairman Pat Wood, a friend of Perry and a strong advocate for market-based power systems. "But it's a pretty arresting [thing] to wake up and read. That would never have played in Texas. ... If there is a service to be valued, then a market can value that."

In the grid study ordered by Perry and released in August, DOE experts pointed to low power prices and cheap natural gas as the single biggest reason for coal ceding its position as the nation's biggest source of electricity. And that report also called for "reforms" to power markets that would help bolster the electricity network's resilience by easing the financial pressures on many power providers.

In its Friday proposal, DOE cited a spike in demand during the 2014 "polar vortex" that hit much of the U.S., which prompted utilities to run many coal plants that were slated for retirement. Without those plants, as many as 65 million people in the PJM market would have seen their power resources threatened, DOE said.

But the new regulatory pitch from the agency also fueled the growing feud between the gas and coal industries.

Paul Bailey, president and CEO American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, commended Perry for "initiating a rulemaking by FERC that will finally value the on-site fuel security provided by the coal fleet."

But the American Petroleum Institute, which also represents natural gas producers, said DOE drew the wrong conclusions from the 2014 event, and that forcing new mandates on the power market wasn't the solution.

"[A]s we review the proposal we are concerned the agency has mischaracterized the lessons learned from past weather-related events and appears to suggest that additional regulation is the answer where markets have already proven the ability to greatly benefit consumers and give our electric system the flexibility needed to meet constantly, and often rapidly, changing electricity demands," said API Executive Vice President and Chief Strategy Officer Marty Durbin in a statement.

FERC, which has struggled to integrate states' energy policies that aim to boost renewables or support aging nuclear power plants, has long maintained a fuel-neutral stance in the regional markets that it oversees. If it were to follow Perry's directive to create incentives for grid resilience to plants that maintain their own fuel inventories on site, it would be an implicit move at the national level to alter the electricity markets to support the fuels that both Perry and Trump have touted.

Montana regulator Travis Kavulla suggested on Twitter that rather than deal with the pressing issues facing the grid, "Instead, this reform is sort of the @ENERGY equivalent of the Oprah "you get a car, and you get a car. And you? A car!" approach."

However, FERC, whose members are appointed by the president and operate as an independent body, isn't obligated to implement the specific policy pushed by Perry. The commission will so be back to operating with a full five members in the coming weeks, with a Republican majority.

"FERC's going to follow its own procedures," said Marc Spitzer, a Republican former FERC commissioner. "It would be a mistake for people to assume that this is going to be some partisan Republican rubber stamp given the way FERC works."

FERC can spend months or years digging into complex issues that underpin the power markets, and its commissioners tend to seek common ground with each other to ensure that its rules are clear and ensure long-lasting regulations that give utilities stability to plan their operations.

"Is someone really going to invest [billions of dollars] when it's a 3-2 vote that partisans and the parties can flip next year? Is that a good forum for investment as opposed to a 5-0 order?" Spitzer said.

FERC declined to say when the agency last received a rulemaking from DOE using Section 403.

Energy Department discloses $56K in Perry travel Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/06/2017 07:06 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry has racked up as much as $56,246 in non-commercial air travel since taking office in early March, the Energy Department disclosed Friday in response to congressional questions about Cabinet-level trips.

Political appointees at DOE did not use private non-commercial aircraft, but on four occasions

Perry did fly on government-owned aircraft or chartered aircraft, DOE Deputy General Counsel Eric Fygi wrote in a letter to the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. That committee is seeking information about Trump administration officials' travel following the revelations that led to Tom Price's resignation from the job as HHS secretary.

Perry's single biggest expense, according to agency documents submitted to the committee, was a one-day round trip in mid-May from Reagan National Airport near Washington D.C. to Olathe, Kan. for DOE's Small Business Forum & Expo, and included a tour of the DOE Kansas City National Security Campus, which is responsible for manufacturing and procuring non-nuclear components for nuclear weapons.

Joining Perry on that trip were a handful of other agency officials, including National Nuclear Security Administrator Frank Klotz and deputy chief of staff Dan Wilmot. The total cost to taxpayers for using the Federal Aviation Administration's Gulfstream IV plane was an estimated $35,000.

Perry's second most expensive trip was a private charter flight on Sept. 28 from the Washington Dulles Airport to the Hazleton Regional Airport in Pennsylvania, which later continued to the Greater Portsmouth Regional Airport in Ohio, and was disclosed by a Reuters report earlier this week. The trip, costing an estimated $11,000, occurred just a day before Price resigned after a series of POLITICO reports of him running up a government travel tab exceeding $1 million — a figure that dwarfs Perry's apparent billing.

After visiting the coal mine in Pennsylvania and a defunct uranium enrichment facility in Ohio, the DOE documents say Perry planned to "secure commercial transportation for the continuation of his travel out of Ohio."

Perry and his staff also made use of a Defense Department plane in May for travel from Idaho Falls, Idaho, to tour the national lab there, to Santa Fe, N.M., to visit the Los Alamos National Laboratory. The trip continued from Santa Fe to Carlsbad, N.M., to visit the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant, a low-level nuclear waste storage facility. The estimated cost of the trip was $7,000.

The last trip documented by DOE was for the round-trip use of plane owned by the Bonneville Power Administration, a quasi-independent utility within DOE, to fly from Seattle to Richland, Wash., to visit the Hanford nuclear site in August. The cost of the trip: $3,246.

The information sent to Capitol Hill did not include trips senior DOE non-career officials took with President Donald Trump and Vice President Mike Pence on government-owned aircraft or trips with officials at other agencies with their own aircraft, such as DoD and DHS.

"This response does not address this travel as such travel arrangements were not made by DOE," Fygi wrote.

"The Department of Energy strictly follows both government-wide and internal DOE travel regulations and policy," DOE spokesperson Shaylyn Hynes said in a statement. "The Secretary travels almost exclusively on commercial aircraft. In the rare instances where government-owned or chartered aircraft have been used, trips were pre-approved by an Ethics officer within the Office of General Counsel."

The White House has backed steep spending cuts across the executive branch, including a roughly 9 percent to DOE for fiscal 2018, a decline of roughly $2.7 billion compared to current levels.

In the wake of Price's resignation, several other Cabinet-level Trump officials have found their taxpayer spending scrutinized.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has flown on military planes for some trips that also coincided with appearances at fundraising events, raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism, POLITICO has reported. The EPA Inspector General has also recently expanded a probe into EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's travels.

An investigation into seven military flights taken by Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin that cost about $811,798 ultimately found that the former Goldman Sachs alum had not violated any ethics requirements or other regulations.

The White House began cracking down on Cabinet officials' use of private planes amid Price's resignation, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Price resigns from HHS after facing fire for travel Back

By Dan Diamond, Rachana Pradhan and Adriel Bettelheim | 09/29/2017 04:40 PM EDT

HHS Secretary Tom Price resigned Friday in the face of multiple federal inquiries and growing criticism of his use of private and government planes for travel, at a cost to taxpayers of more than $1 million since May.

The White House said the former seven-term Georgia congressman, 63, offered his resignation earlier in the day and that President Donald Trump had accepted it.

Price becomes the first Trump administration Cabinet secretary to step down. The White House said Trump asked Deputy Assistant Health Secretary Don Wright to serve as acting secretary of the agency, which has an annual budget $1.15 trillion and includes the Medicare and Medicaid programs, as well as the FDA, NIH and CDC.

As late as Thursday, Price said he believed he had the president's support. But the tumult surrounding his travel became another distraction for an administration already reeling from the defeat of repeated Senate efforts to repeal Obamacare and criticism for its hurricane relief efforts in Puerto Rico.

Price ran afoul of Trump in part because his actions seemed to symbolize everything the president had inveighed against on the campaign trail by vowing to "drain the swamp." The fallout extended to the entire Cabinet Friday night when the White House announced that chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Price, in his resignation letter, expressed regret that "recent events" distracted from efforts to overhaul the health care system. "In order for you to move forward without further disruption, I am officially tendering my resignation as the Secretary of Health and Human Services effective 11:59 PM on Friday," he wrote.

Senate Democrats quickly served notice they were preparing for a potential confirmation fight over Price's successor, saying the next HHS secretary must not undermine Obamacare. Under Price, the department cut the law's enrollment period in half and slashed advertising and outreach for the enrollment period starting in November.

"The next HHS secretary must follow the law when it comes to the Affordable Care Act instead of trying to sabotage it," said Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

"Tom Price's replacement needs to be focused on implementing the law as written by Congress and keeping the president's promise to bring down the high cost of prescription drugs," Senate Finance ranking Democrat Ron Wyden of Oregon said in a statement.

House Speaker Paul Ryan, a close ally, praised Price as a dedicated public servant. "His vision and hard work were vital to the House's success passing our health care legislation," Ryan said in a statement.

POLITICO revealed that Price flew at least 26 times on private aircraft at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, a sharp break with his predecessors' practice. Many of Price's flights were between major cities that offered inexpensive alternatives on commercial airlines, including Nashville, Philadelphia and San Diego.

On some of those trips, Price, an orthopedic surgeon, mixed official business with leisure. He took a government-funded private jet in August to get to St. Simons Island, an exclusive Georgia resort where he and his wife own land, a day and a half before he addressed a medical conference he and his wife have long attended. In June, HHS chartered a private jet to fly Price to Nashville, where he owns a condominium and where his son resides. Price toured a medicine dispensary, spoke to a local health summit organized by a friend and had lunch with his son, an HHS official confirmed.

Price also used military aircraft for multi-national trips to Africa, Europe and Asia, at a cost of more than $500,000 to taxpayers. The White House said it had approved those trips but not the private jets within the United States.

Price tried to defuse the controversy by promising on Thursday to reimburse the government for the approximately $52,000 cost of his own seat on his domestic trips. But that wasn't enough to tamp down the scandal, which had infuriated the president and prompted a bipartisan inquiry from the House Oversight Committee and separate calls for accountability from lawmakers including Republican Sen. Chuck Grassley. The inspector general of Price's own agency is reviewing if Price complied with federal travel regulations.

The White House put Cabinet officials on notice Friday that it would crack down on use of private planes, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Mick Mulvaney, director of the Office of Management and Budget, sent out the memo soon after Price's resignation was made public, reminding department and agency heads that, by regulation, "Government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft should not be used for travel by Government employees except with specific justification."

The issue of Cabinet members' travel has already extended beyond Price: POLITICO reported Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides took several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights in the Caribbean. Zinke dismissed the furor as a "little B.S." during a Friday appearance at the Heritage Foundation.

Price's wife, Betty, accompanied him on the military flights, while other members of the secretary's delegation flew commercially to Europe.

HHS spokeswoman Charmaine Yoest said Price reimbursed the agency for his wife's travel, but declined to elaborate.

White House officials have groused about Price's frequent travels, with one senior White House official saying the HHS secretary was "nowhere to be found" as they mounted a last-ditch unsuccessful push to repeal Obamacare.

Congressional Democrats attacked Price for advocating spending cuts to the health agencies he oversaw and health care programs while spending taxpayer dollars on private jets. "There could not be a clearer statement of the Trump administration's priorities," Sen. Maggie Hassan (D-N.H.) said. Key Democrats overseeing health issues in Congress had formally requested that HHS's inspector general review Price's travel practices.

In June, Price defended a proposed fiscal 2018 budget for HHS that included a $663,000 cut to the agency's $4.9 million annual spending on travel, or roughly 15 percent. "The budgeting process is an exercise in reforming our federal programs to make sure they actually work — so they do their job and use tax dollars wisely," Price told the Senate Finance Committee on June 8.

Ethical questions dogged Price even before questions about his travel arose. During his Senate confirmation hearing to helm HHS, Price faced pointed questions about his personal investments in health care companies during his time in Congress. Democrats called on government ethics officials to investigate Price's health care stock trades, following reports that he got a sweetheart deal from a biotech company and invested in Zimmer Biomet, a medical device-maker, just days before writing legislation that would have eased regulations on the sector.

The Senate confirmed Price by a 52-47 margin in February after he maintained full Republican support.

Price carved out a reputation as a staunch fiscal conservative during his decade-plus tenure in the House of Representatives. He generally supported reducing government spending on health care while shifting more of the financial burden onto individuals. Like most conservatives, he's supported privatizing Medicare so that seniors would receive fixed dollar amounts to buy coverage and limiting federal Medicaid spending to give states a lump sum, or block grant, and more control over how they could use it.

Price traveled by private plane at least 24 times Back

By Rachana Pradhan and Dan Diamond | 09/21/2017 05:58 PM EDT

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price has taken at least 24 flights on private charter planes at taxpayers' expense since early May, according to people with knowledge of his travel plans and a review of HHS documents.

The frequency of the trips underscores how private travel has become the norm — rather than the exception — for the Georgia Republican during his tenure atop the federal health agency, which began in February. The cost of the trips identified by POLITICO exceeds $300,000, according to a review of federal contracts and similar trip itineraries.

Price's use of private jets represents a sharp departure from his two immediate predecessors, Sylvia Mathews Burwell and Kathleen Sebelius, who flew commercially in the continental United States. HHS officials have said Price uses private jets only when commercial travel is not feasible.

But many of the flights are between large cities with frequent, low-cost airline traffic, such as a trip from Washington to Nashville that the secretary took on June 6 to make a morning event at a medication distributor and an afternoon speech. There are four regular nonstop flights that leave Washington-area airports between 6:59 a.m. and 8:50 a.m. and arrive in Nashville by 9:46 a.m. CT. Sample round-trip fares for those flights were as low as $202, when booked in advance on Orbitz.com. Price's charter, according to HHS' contract with Classic Air Charter, cost $17,760.

HHS spokespeople did not respond to questions about specific aspects of Price's travels, including how many charter trips he has taken. Charmaine Yoest, the agency's top spokesperson, said Price's travel for official business "comes from the HHS budget."

In a statement, Yoest said, "The Secretary has taken commercial flights for official business after his confirmation. He has used charter aircraft for official business in order to accommodate his demanding schedule. The week of September 13 was one of those times, as the Secretary was directing the recovery effort for Irma, which had just devastated Florida, while simultaneously directing the ongoing recovery for Hurricane Harvey . . . Some believe the HHS Secretary should be Washington-focused. Dr. Price is focused on hearing from Americans across the country."

Nonetheless, POLITICO identified at least 17 charter flights that took place before the first storm — Hurricane Harvey — hit in late August, and included flights that did not appear to be for urgent HHS public health priorities.

For example, Price took a Learjet-60 from San Diego to the Aspen Ideas Festival — a glamorous conference at the Colorado resort town — that arrived at 3:33 p.m. on Saturday afternoon, June 24, nearly 19 hours before his scheduled panel. That flight likely cost more than $7,100, according to one charter jet agency estimate.

"If you're going to a conference, you have some [advance] flexibility to book travel" and shouldn't need last-minute charters, said Walter Shaub, who was the Barack Obama-appointed director of the United States Office of Government Ethics until July. "This shows a complete disregard for the expense to the taxpayer."

Since being confirmed in early February, Price has developed a reputation inside the agency for flying on private charters rather than taking other means of transportation, people inside and outside the Trump administration said.

After a POLITICO investigation identified five private flights that Price took up and down the East Coast last week, Price took a charter jet to Oklahoma on Tuesday of this week, Sept. 19, where he met with Native American tribes and toured health care facilities by car — although HHS initially explored flying him by charter around the state, two people with knowledge of Price's travels said. "There was a push from political [staff] at HHS to fly him and not drive him to these small communities," said one of the people.

Price's staff cut short his news conference in Oklahoma on Wednesday when reporters raised questions about his use of taxpayer funds, an attendee said.

Price's frequent trips around the country have rankled staff inside the White House, with a senior official saying many trips aren't related to priorities like Obamacare repeal and other items on the president's agenda. While Price has flown to Maine, New Hampshire, Oklahoma and Pennsylvania since last Wednesday, President Donald Trump and Senate Republicans have been frantically rallying support to pass an Obamacare repeal bill by Sept. 30. After that date, the GOP will need 60 Senate votes, not 50, to overturn the 2010 health law.

"No one is quite sure what [Price] is doing," a senior White House official said. "You look at this week, we're doing a last final push trying to get this over the finish line, and he's nowhere to be found."

Many of Price's trips have centered on making announcements related to the use of opioids and holding listening sessions about the epidemic, which Trump labeled a national emergency and continues to contribute to rising death rates from drug abuse. Price has labeled fighting the opioid epidemic one of his top priorities.

But rather than fly commercially to these events, which are scheduled well in advance, Price tends to rent corporate-style jets. Sometimes, he ferries big-name guests along with him. In May, Price and Kellyanne Conway — the White House counselor and former Trump campaign manager who traveled with Price to Philadelphia last week to tour an addiction treatment center — made stops in four different states in the span of two days.

The pair traveled to Lansing, Michigan, and Charleston, West Virginia, for opioid-related meetings in the morning and early afternoon on May 9. That happened to be the same day Trump abruptly fired FBI Director James Comey. On May 10, Conway and Price were in Augusta, Maine, and Concord, New Hampshire, for more opioid-related events.

On July 6, Price again made an opioid-related visit to Chattanooga, Tennessee, where he took a private plane, according to two sources with knowledge of the situation. According to records, HHS signed a $14,570 charter plane contract for Washington to Tennessee travel with a July 6 effective date.

In June, Price spoke at a physicians association conference in San Diego, where he vowed to wring out wasteful spending in the government's health care programs. Getting "value" for spending "is incredibly important," he said.

Price took a private plane to get to the meeting, which was one stop on a five-state sprint of charter travel that cost $50,420.

EPA watchdog expands investigation into Pruitt's travel Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/06/2017 03:26 PM EDT

EPA's inspector general says it is expanding the scope of its previously announced probe into Administrator Scott Pruitt's travel to include all of his travel.

The IG's office already opened an audit of Pruitt's travel to and from Oklahoma following complaints that he spent too much time back in his home state. In recent weeks, Democratic lawmakers and outside groups have called for the IG to look at whether Pruitt's non-commercial flights were necessary and appropriate expenses.

According to a memo dated Thursday and released today, the significantly expanded scope will consider the "frequency, cost and extent" of Pruitt's travel through Sept. 30, as well as whether agency procedures were followed by Pruitt, his security and his staff, and whether those procedures are properly designed to prevent fraud, waste or abuse.

"To accomplish these objectives, we will review supporting documentation and conduct interviews with management and staff to determine whether the EPA followed applicable policies and practices, and complied with federal requirements," the memo says.

WHAT'S NEXT: The investigation is likely to take several months to complete.

Watchdog group requests Hatch Act probe of Zinke's appearance at Virgin Islands Back

By Nick Juliano, Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/06/2017 06:14 PM EDT

A watchdog group is asking the Justice Department's Office of Special Council to open a Hatch Act investigation into Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke after POLITICO reported he had appeared at a political fundraiser in the U.S. Virgin Islands while on an official trip less than a month after being confirmed.

Donors who gave the Virgin Islands Republican Party between $1,500 and $5,000 per couple were invited to get their photos taken with Zinke at the March 30 event, according to a copy of the invitation seen by POLITICO and Zinke's official schedule.

The nonprofit Campaign Legal Center says that activity may have run afoul of the federal law prohibiting federal officials from using government resources to engage in partisan political activity.

"This activity constitutes impermissible solicitation of political contributions if event organizers conditioned the opportunity to take a photograph with Secretary Zinke on paying a higher fee," writes Walter Shaub, the Campaign Legal Center's senior director for ethics, in a request to the OSC, citing POLITICO's story.

The invitation to the event said donors could get into the event at a St. Croix hotel with a contribution of as little as $75. Zinke's official schedule from that day said he participated in a photo line with "host committee" members and "patrons" at the event. Those designations were given to donors who gave $1,500 or $5,000 per couple, according to the invitation.

Shaub, a former director of the U.S. Office of Government Ethics, asked the OSC to investigate whether lower-paying guests also were allowed into the photo line. "Should OSC determine that this privilege was reserved for host committee members and Patrons, OSC should take action against Secretary Zinke," he writes.

The OSC typically opens an investigation in response to complaints it receives.

Interior officials have said all of Zinke's travel was legal and cleared in advance with ethics officials. A spokeswoman did not immediately respond to a request for comment on the Campaign Legal Center's request.

Trump's Interior chief 'hopping around from campaign event to campaign event' Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/05/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little BS."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Justice Department's Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips has taken outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then- Interior Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity.

Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations; that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana, where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to a joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Trump administration does not plan to extend Puerto Rico Jones Act waiver past Sunday Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/06/2017 03:58 PM EDT

Foreign vessels may soon be barred again from delivering goods from other U.S. ports to disaster-struck Puerto Rico, DHS said today.

The administration does not plan on renewing the Jones Act waiver, DHS spokesman David Lapan said. The 10-day waiver issued last month ends on Sunday, after which foreign vessels will no longer be able to load ships at domestic ports for delivery to the U.S. territory; those ships will have until Oct. 18 to deliver their cargoes.

"We believe that extending the waiver is unnecessary to support the humanitarian relief efforts on the island," Lapan said in an email to POLITICO. "There is an ample supply of Jones Act-qualified vessels to ensure that cargo is able to reach Puerto Rico."

President Trump authorized a lifting of the Jones Act on Sept. 28 to help deliver fuel and other goods after Hurricane Maria devastated Puerto Rico a week earlier. The island is still recovering from the storm, with electricity only reaching a small fraction of the population.

Rep. Nydia Velazquez (D-N.Y.) sent a letter to Trump today asking that the waiver be extended for at least a year, her spokesman said, arguing that reinstating it will drive up the cost of shipping supplies to the island.

WHAT'S NEXT: The waiver will end Sunday unless another request is received.

State Dept's Shannon to lead U.S. delegation to climate talks Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 10/06/2017 07:18 PM EDT

Thomas Shannon, the State Department's undersecretary for political affairs, will lead the U.S. delegation to a major international climate change summit next month in Bonn, Germany, according to an administration official.

The news comes amid swirling rumors that Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt was angling to lead the delegation, a move that would have made a skeptic of established climate science the face of the United States at the talks.

In previous years, the State Department's climate envoy led the U.S. delegation to the annual gathering. But the Trump administration has declined to fill that position.

The Bonn negotiations are aimed at implementing the 2015 Paris climate change agreement, from which President Donald Trump has said he intends to withdraw.

Neither the White House nor the State Department responded to requests for comment.

D.C. Circuit: FERC must consider GHG emissions tied to gas pipelines Back

By Esther Whieldon | 08/22/2017 11:38 AM EDT

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ruled today that FERC must consider the potential greenhouse gas emissions that could result from its 2016 approval of three natural gas pipeline segments in the Southeast, marking a major victory for environmental groups.

The court vacated FERC's approval of the Southeast Market Pipelines Project's three natural gas pipelines now under construction in Alabama, Georgia and Florida, and said the agency must redo the environmental impact statement it used in its decision.

Two of the three judges on court's panel rejected FERC's assertions that it could not know the level of GHG emissions that would result from its projects, specifically from power plants burning the natural gas the pipelines would provide.

"We conclude that at a minimum, FERC should have estimated the amount of power-plant carbon emissions that the pipelines will make possible," the opinion said, agreeing with the Sierra Club's arguments.

The court in 2016 made a much different ruling when it held FERC did not evaluate the climate change effects of exporting natural gas from LNG terminals since the agency had no legal authority to consider the environmental harm those exports may cause.

But Judge Janice Rogers Brown, a President George W. Bush appointee, dissented and said FERC lacks authority in this case as well, and is not required to consider the downstream emissions. "The truth is that FERC has no control over whether the power plants that will emit these greenhouse gases will come into existence or remain in operation," Brown said.

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC will have to rerun its EIS for the pipeline projects.

FERC amends pipeline study to add climate impact Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/27/2017 04:31 PM EDT

FERC announced today that it is amending an environmental study for a natural gas pipeline to meet a federal court's requirement that it include an assessment of greenhouse gas emissions from the power plants that may use the fuel.

The new 5-page analysis of the Southeast Market Pipelines Project, which consists of three natural gas pipelines under construction in Alabama, Georgia and Florida, conducted by FERC staff says they "would not result in a significant impact on the environment" so long as the developer followed the mitigation measures mentioned in the final 2015 environmental impact statement.

The original EIS didn't include an assessment of carbon dioxide, methane and nitrous oxide emissions associated with use and combustion of the natural gas that would be transported by the project when it was done. Last month, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals sided with the Sierra Club and vacated FERC's approval of the project, saying the agency must redo the EIS it used in its decision.

FERC's move to issue a supplemental EIS on greenhouse gas emissions suggests that it may not appeal the court's decision.

The analysis also states that using the social cost of carbon in its greenhouse gas analysis "is not appropriate for use in any project-level NEPA review."

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC has until Oct. 6 to decide whether it will appeal the D.C. Circuit's Aug. 22 ruling, which could require the agency to revisit the EISs it conducted for several pipelines.

The Strange Political Afterlife of Arnold Schwarzenegger Back

By Edward-Isaac Dovey | 10/06/2017 05:04 AM EDT

MUNICH, Germany—The Governor is off to conduct the band at his favorite beer tent at Oktoberfest. Why? Well, he finished his salty half-chicken, gave the photographers the pose he knew they wanted—the one in which he's holding the giant beer stein and mime-biting the oversize pretzel—and he's not quite ready for dessert.

Oh, but why? Because he wants to. The crowd chants his name. He crouches forward, making a show of drawing out the tubas with his fingers. He does a muscleman pose. He pretends to blow a trumpet. In the beer tent, he makes his pecs dance.

Welcome to the strange and wondrous political afterlife of Arnold Schwarzenegger, a rural Austrian kid who parlayed his success as perhaps the greatest bodybuilder of all time into a lucrative career as Hollywood's top action hero, then parlayed that into becoming the improbable Republican governor of California for two terms.

Now, six years after leaving Sacramento, he's still reinventing himself—as a kind of globetrotting do-gooder, promoting a handful of causes like fighting climate change and gerrymandering. But mostly, he's having a hell of a good time. Wherever he goes, everybody knows him. Everybody loves him. With a net worth estimated at $300 million, he zips around the world in private jets and has restaurant owners pick up his tab because they're just so honored he chose to eat there. Constant selfies. He sounds off on whatever he wants, but has no actual responsibility. His perfect day is waking up and not knowing what country he'll eat dinner in.

On this particular Tuesday afternoon, Schwarzenegger is stopping at the Munich Oktoberfest just for fun, part of a whirlwind 10-day European tour that began with inspirational speeches in England, then a jaunt to a factory in Austria to test out the new electric Hummer converted just for him, then to Barcelona for his Arnold Classic bodybuilding tournament, then popping up to San Sebastián, Spain, to premiere the 3-D "Wonders of the Sea" movie from Jean-Michel Cousteau that he narrated and produced. Then here to Munich, for a stop he's been making regularly since he was a young bodybuilder and won a stone-lifting contest (508 German pounds, or about 560 American pounds). The next day, he'll have his assistant scramble a plane for a drop-in at Arnie's Life Museum, the Schwarzenegger shrine in the house where he grew up in the hills outside Graz, Austria. Then, it's back to the U.S. to hear oral arguments in Gill v. Whitford, the nonpartisan redistricting case that's become his latest passion, and to L.A. again to host an appreciation dinner for Republicans in the California Legislature who backed his push for a stiffer crackdown on greenhouse gases.

All of a sudden, a guy who just turned 70—in Barcelona, he celebrated the 50th anniversary of winning Mr. Universe, which began his breakthrough—and had seen politics pass him by is ... back. But why? Schwarzenegger is barred from another run for governor and has no interest in the Senate; a certain clause in the Constitution is keeping him out of the White House. He's making movies again, though nothing huge. In a Hillary Clinton presidency, he had been planning to be one of the Republican moderate voices urging his party to find ways to work together. The Schwarzenegger Institute at USC would be hosting after-school program summits and earnest environmental speeches. It would have been his own peculiar form of keeping busy, but with nothing like the urgency he feels now.

Instead, Schwarzenegger is back in the public eye because of what he calls "a disastrous situation"—the Trump presidency. It's the topic he can't escape, even at his news conference in San Sebastián about the oceans documentary. What do you think of Trump? What do you think people should do about Trump? In Spain, he deflects. He's there to promote the movie, and he wants the headline to be about Cousteau's film, which he backed because the French oceanographer convinced him that people will be more likely to save the ocean if they fall in love with it.

In the air two days later, flying back from checking in on his museum, he answers: He avoids talking about Trump in these situations because after all those years of having cameras chase him wherever he goes, he knows how the media work—whatever he says about Trump becomes the quote, and he wants to talk about his other causes.

But Schwarzenegger is perfectly happy to blow his way into Trump's spotlight when it suits him—he even keeps a bobblehead of Trump in his kitchen that he used for a viral video in which he lectured the president about racism. Cameras swarmed his after-school summit at USC this year after he made another video slamming Trump for a budget proposing major cuts, and Trump took time out of the National Prayer Breakfast to swipe at him. Every word he says about environmentalism gets more attention since Trump announced the withdrawal from the Paris global climate accord, and he gets to brag about relative GDP growth on his watch: "If the federal government, Republicans and Democrats, and Donald Trump and his whole White House would be smart, they would just copy exactly what we are doing in California," he said in Spain.

He also gets Trump on a visceral level—like they're twins, say, separated at birth. They are the same age. Both have been global celebrities for decades—Schwarzenegger ever since he first won the Mr. Universe competition at age 20, which he later said was "my ticket to America, the land of opportunity, where I could become a star and get rich." Each has a history of boasting about his sexual conquests and an instinct for the viral quote—like Schwarzenegger's famous riff comparing pumping iron to orgasms. One man claims never to have had a headache, stomachache or allergy; the other's doctor declared him the fittest man ever to seek the presidency. One was underestimated by political elites because of his Austrian accent and bulging physique; the other due to his outer-borough mannerisms and outrageous statements. And whereas Arnold's fame skyrocketed, thanks to showdowns with Lou Ferrigno and the evil T-1000, Donald has turned his penchant for tabloid-fueled feuds into a governing philosophy.

So doesn't it complicate things to have people ask him about Trump all the time, to have the leader of the free world tweet about his Celebrity Apprentice ratings?

Not at all, Schwarzenegger says. "Trump helps me." And maybe, in a way, he's even doing more good than harm. "A lot of times, we crucify Trump for doing certain things, and then in the end, deep down inside, [it's like] 'Well actually, that was helpful,'" he says. "People get more educated because he starts talking about things that no one ever thought about."

Schwarzenegger's father was literally a Nazi, though an investigation by the Simon Wiesenthal Center found no evidence his dad had ever committed any atrocities. The general subject of Nazis is one he usually avoids, but he says he can't understand Trump's reluctance to condemn the white supremacists after violent protests in Charlottesville, Virginia.

"We have seen the history of that kind of behavior. It's not like this is new," he tells me. "This has always gone in the wrong fucking direction in history. I'm not a history buff or anything, but there's one thing I know: that that is not good."

"Last Action Hero!" an American woman in the crowd shouts as he walks off the bandstand.

"Save America, Arnold!" shouts another next to her.

Last Action Hero*, Schwarzenegger tells me later, was a movie he knew was bad as they were making it. The director said he wanted to make E.T. That's not going to work, he remembers saying in his trailer. People come to see an Arnold Schwarzenegger movie, they hear the words "last action hero" and they figure no one else survives and he's shooting his way through.

This is what it's like to hang out with the Governor, who had invited me to tag along with him in Europe because ... well, I'm not exactly sure why. He is bursting with theories and opinions about everything, and enjoys talking about movies, and politics, and culture, and sports, and public policy—and whatever else crosses his mind.

Now we're in the backyard of his childhood home that's been turned into a museum, a two-story yellow house stuffed with memorabilia from his weightlifting and movie careers. For reasons no one can quite explain, the yard is now filled with a collection of giant Transformers sculptures. He wasn't in any of the movies, and he's only seen the first one (it didn't hold him, he says, because it was all explosions and no plot). Nowadays, his tastes run to artier fare, like Black Swan or Dunkirk—lots of shooting and stuff blowing up, but with a point.

There are three mannequins of him inside, plus the giant flexing bronze outside by the front door. He makes fun of the haircut on the one from his bodybuilding days, now standing in what used to be his parents' bedroom.

"What's it like to have a museum to yourself?" I ask him as he takes a seat at a table set up for us downstairs with glasses of schnapps and a spread of pastries. "I don't think about it," he says. He has a jelly-filled doughnut, and launches into a 10-minute speech about what he learned from the local politicians he admired in Austria as a teenager.

Schwarzenegger speaks in sports metaphors. He says that every policy debate, even health care, has a sweet spot that would make it fly if everyone could just work together to hit it. He also talks in terms of machines and guns, when he's not throwing in the odd reference to Milton Friedman. Certain people have a chip wrong in them, he'll say, or he'll explain the philosophy of how he pursues his causes by imagining how a robot from the future might do it. "It's the shotgun approach versus the rifle approach. This is the rifle approach. Specific target. This is where I go. Let's not spread out and try five different things," he says.

Schwarzenegger throws his money around for what he believes in—"I couldn't tell you a system. It's really a gut reaction kind of thing," he says. He talks about it in $100,000 chunks. After Charlottesville, the Simon Wiesenthal Center got a chunk, plus all the proceeds from a "Terminate Hate" T-shirt he had made up with red, white and blue flowers sticking out of the barrel in one of his most iconic images, the one of him in the leather jacket and sunglasses. The center's founder, Rabbi Marvin Hier—also famous for delivering the Jewish blessing at Trump's inauguration—questioned whether they should have a gun on an anti-hate T-shirt. Come on, Schwarzenegger told him. It's the Terminator.

He got involved in after-school programs after visiting schools while working on the president's council on fitness in the 1980s. The Special Olympics taught him the value of government funding. He recycled before he was elected, but only when he was governor did he get interested in actual environmental policy. Infrastructure and immigration stuck with him, and above all, to his surprise, he became attached to the issues of gerrymandering and election reform.

"There were certain things that stuck because I got exposed to it, and then all of a sudden, something in me found great joy in it," he says.

Schwarzenegger has always been ambitious—he's a firm believer in having a vision of success, and willing it to happen, like the first time he bench-pressed 500 pounds—but he got into politics on a whim. He tells the story like this: When he started in movies, Sylvester Stallone was the enemy. Schwarzenegger didn't like him, and didn't like that he was the top box-office draw. He set out to take him down. Twenty years later, he felt like California's then-governor Gray Davis was a jerk to him in a meeting about after-school programs, and suddenly the Terminator became obsessed with knocking him out.

In San Sebastián, over red wine and cheese and bread—after years of fanatic abstemious dieting, he's happy to indulge in some carbs—he whips out his iPad and records a video that he turns into an endorsement on the fly for Rep. Rod Blum, the Iowa Republican who was one of the three dozen members of Congress whom Schwarzenegger called last month, urging them to sign on to an amicus brief in the gerrymandering case. Somewhere over France on the way to Munich the next morning, he tinkers with a statement on an arcane dispute between two warring bodybuilding federations. In Graz the next day, he bats around taking up Prince Albert's offer to have a private jet pick him up for a gala in Monaco celebrating Leonardo DiCaprio and protecting the oceans. Ultimately, he decides not to go. But he was never going to get in a tuxedo for it—"I don't like rules," he explains.

At the Supreme Court on Tuesday for the gerrymandering arguments, he couldn't get around the no cellphone rule. Schwarzenegger loves FaceTime and Snapchat; once, he even pulled out his iPad to record a video in the middle of a papal mass at the Vatican. But he loved seeing the justices in action for the first time, remarking on how they jumped all over the lawyers arguing the case, and each other.

Outside, on the court steps, he rebuts the conservative justices' main argument against killing gerrymandering: that it's a political problem, and not one the courts should adjudicate. "As Einstein said, those who created the problem will not be able to solve it," Schwarzenegger says.

Afterward, at a rally for Common Cause, the good-government group, he explains why of all things, he's made this his cause. In California, he saw gerrymandering lead to the parties running to their respective corners and not getting anything done, and he says the same thing has happened in Washington. "It's time to say, 'Hasta la vista' to gerrymandering. Terminate it!"

The way Schwarzenegger sees it, nothing major has gotten done in America since 2000. Congress has a lower approval rating than herpes, he likes to joke. So that's where he comes in.

"I came to America. I made my money in America. Now, let's fix America," he told me. His adopted country is starting to come apart, he worries, and it's because no one has shown the leadership to bring it together.

"I see down the line a decline, and we get a little bit of a taste of that now. There is a lack of working together. No one sees themselves as a team. It's all about 'Me, me, me.' That's not America," he says. "My biggest fear is: If this plane takes off and the pilot doesn't know where we're going, we'll be flying around and we may crash. Because no one was telling where we're going. Same thing with this."

A friend of Schwarzenegger's, the German bodybuilder-turned-actor Ralf Möller, a towering hulk of a man who played a bruiser in Gladiator, tells me at Oktoberfest that he wants me to write that his friend should be secretary of state.

How about that?, I ask Schwarzenegger later.

He responds by rattling off other jobs that might interest him—EPA, Energy. But the State idea clearly intrigues him.

"It's just that if a president asks me, and says, 'Go and step in, you could really move the agenda,' of course, I would do it. We would figure out the rules, figure out what I can do, am I just a puppet in there—'Do I have to ask some schmuck from the White House to go and make a move?'" he says, the misadventures of Rex Tillerson and Jeff Sessions on his mind. "No, I would never do that, because my ego would never allow it. And the country doesn't deserve it."

He says he'd even consider it if the call came in from Trump. His ex-wife's mother, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, he says, taught him, "You never ever turn down a president." (Later, he jokes: "Maybe I can't be in the Cabinet because I fly commercial too much.")

The job he really wants, he knows, is out of reach. "I'd be running in two seconds if I was born in America," he says.

Flying back from his old house to his fancy hotel in Munich in the private jet, having happily obliged the latest airport police officer who slyly slid out his phone for a picture with him, he says he's made his peace with that.

"I can't make myself be angry about it because everything else that I've accomplished is because of America. So how can I complain about the one thing that I can't do? Hello? Look where I'm sitting," he says. "I didn't even dream half of it."

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by ExxonMobil: Lawmakers to grill Perry on grid resiliency plan — EPA questions GHG authority in replacement draft — Disaster relief package gets House vote today
Date: Thursday, October 12, 2017 5:43:29 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 10/12/2017 05:41 AM EDT

With help from Eric Wolff and Esther Whieldon

PERRY STEPS INTO E&C HOTSEAT: Energy Secretary Rick Perry makes his much-anticipated debut before the House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee today at 10 a.m. and several members are planning to press him on his grid resiliency proposal, which would benefit coal-fired and nuclear power plants. "I have many concerns with this proposal, starting with the fact that this is chiefly a policy matter that should be left to Congress and the states," ranking member Frank Pallone will say in his opening remarks. "You are distorting the market, damaging the environment, and delivering preferential treatment to favored industries."

Pallone plans to send a letter seeking more information on Perry's process in developing the proposal — but don't expect criticism of Perry's plan to be a purely one-party affair: Texas Republican Rep. Pete Olson last week said he was concerned because DOE's proposal "appears to be picking winners and losers" and a normally friendly face, Rep. Joe Barton, declined to discuss his planned line of questioning.

But some panel members are expected to be big fans: West Virginia Rep. David McKinley told ME he'll be "very supportive" of Perry's request of FERC, and he scoffed at criticism that the plan was unfairly playing favorites by propping up the struggling nuclear and coal sectors. "It's an insurance policy that we never have a blackout in this country. Isn't there some value in that?" he asked. "I don't think it's picking winners and losers at all." ME would look for Reps. Morgan Griffith and Bill Johnson to also be big backers of the proposal.

Perry response: According to a copy of his opening statement, Perry will stress that his request of FERC is just a "first step" in a conversation while at the same time emphasizing he'll take whatever action necessary to protect the U.S. grid's resiliency. "I will not sit idly by when I see a threat to that reliability, or a reasonable course of action that is within my authority to mitigate it," he plans to say.

What else what else? At least three other issues seem likely to crop up throughout the hearing:

—Democrats will ask Perry for guarantees and additional information concerning more than \$56,000 in non-commercial travel he took since coming into office. Pallone will ask DOE's inspector general in a letter today to probe his non-commercial travel habits.

—Questions from both parties about DOE's next move in restarting the Yucca Mountain program. Remember Sen. Dean Heller lifted his hold on DOE Deputy Dan Brouillette's confirmation after unspecified progress on the matter, but we haven't heard much since then.

—Why the agency conditionally approved a $3.7 billion increase in federal loan guarantees for the troubled, over-budget Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia and whether it intends to further wade into similar nuclear matters.

If you go: Perry settles into the witness chair at 10 a.m. in Rayburn 2123. More here.

WELCOME TO THURSDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and EPA's Aaron Ringel was first up to identify Strom Thurmond as the only senator ever reelected in their 90s. FUNDAMENTAL GHG REGULATORY AUTHORITY PONDERED: EPA plans to question whether it even has the authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from power plants and how states might craft their own plans to upgrade coal plants as it ponders a replacement to the Clean Power Plan, Pro's Emily Holden reports, citing excerpts of a draft notice. The agency continues to mull "whether it is appropriate to propose a rule," and must "ascertain the scope of legal authority that Congress conferred to EPA" before proceeding. In the document — an advanced notice of proposed rulemaking in Washington speak — EPA calls itself as "a creature of statute," and notes that the Clean Air Act delegates air pollution control to states and local governments. Pros learned the document went over to OMB for review earlier Wednesday.

CAN ALREADY SMELL THOSE JET FUMES: Two days after posting the measure, the House is expected today to clear a $36.5 billion emergency funding package H.R. 2266 \(115\) for hurricane and wildfire relief and recovery. Senate consideration will have to wait until next week, at least. "We think it's critical that we pass this legislation this week to give the people in California the support they need to fight these fires, to help the victims, and also to help the communities still recovering and dealing with the humanitarian problems with the hurricanes," Speaker Paul Ryan said on Wednesday.

Energy bill clears House: Lawmakers cleared by voice vote legislation S. 190 \(115\) that exempts certain equipment that needs to remain on at all times from energy use restrictions for an additional six years. "Devices like home security alarms or fire detection need to be on 24/7," Olson said on the floor. "But, the 2007 energy law on energy efficiency standards for external power supplies did not allow for this." It now moves to the White House, after having already passed the Senate.

ACCUWEATHER CEO TAPPED FOR NOAA CHIEF: Trump announced late Wednesday his selection of Barry Myers, CEO of weather-forecasting firm AccuWeather, to lead NOAA, POLITICO's Henry C. Jackson reports. CEO since 2007, Myers would take over one of the key agencies in conducting climate research and assessing climate change if confirmed by the Senate. An attorney by training, Myers significant business background fits the mold of many other picks for officials in Trump's administration.

HOUSE PANEL PASSES ANTIQUITIES ACT BILL: The House Natural Resources Committee on Wednesday passed, on a vote of 23-17, Chairman Rob Bishop's bill H.R. 3990 \(115\) that would require a federal environmental review process and approval from local officials to designate any monument bigger than 640 acres in size and block the creation of new marine national monuments "with no archeological or historic sites in need of protection." The committee rejected a resolution by Rep. Raul Grijalva that aimed to have Zinke disclose more information about his review of existing national monument designations.

Bishop defended his bill to ME: "If I was going back to the old mantra of just doing away with the Antiquities Act, [the criticisms] still wouldn't hurt my feelings. We're not doing that. What we're doing is coming up what I think is a moderate, rationale way of establishing process so it's not about any president, it's not about any monument."

But greens and public lands advocates bashed it: "This bill upends a century of the Antiquities Act being successfully used by Republican and Democratic presidents to protect some of the most iconic and loved parks and public lands in our country," The Coalition to Protect America's National Parks said in a statement. "And this is being done to allow development of these lands that belong to all Americans for the benefit of private companies and individuals."

SENATORS: 'FULLY IMPLEMENT' RUSSIA ENERGY SANCTIONS: Sens. John McCain and Ben Cardin urged Trump in a Wednesday letter to "fully implement" sanctions on companies that engage in Russian energy projects, POLITICO's Elana Schor reports. "The administration must also clearly communicate to energy companies in the U.S. and around the world that it will aggressively enforce all mandatory energy sanctions laid out in the law," the bipartisan duo wrote.

TAKING A FIRM STANCE: Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and environmental advocates are holding an event today at 2:30 p.m. at a Lower East Side community garden "denouncing the polluter takeover of the EPA and the Republican assault on the agency's budget," according to an advisory.

ZINKE'S FUNDRAISING ACTIVITIES DRAW MIXED REACTION: Bishop told ME Wednesday the types of fundraising Zinke's done on official Interior trips has "always been done" and that he wasn't too worried about the revelations. "It's a game that's being played," the Utah congressman said. "I don't take it too seriously." But that's not the unanimous feeling: New Hampshire Democratic Sen. Maggie Hassan tweeted Wednesday Zinke's mixing of fundraising with official business, revealed by POLITICO, "needs to be investigated."

Richard Painter, chief ethics adviser to George W. Bush, tweeted Zinke's attendance of a Montana fundraiser while on official travel was a "Hatch Act violation."

EPA AIR ADVISER PICKED: David Harlow, a lawyer with expertise in the Clean Air Act most recently with Hunton & Williams, has joined EPA in an advisory role to the Office of Air and Radiation, Pro's Eric Wolff reports, citing multiple sources familiar with the move. His role will most closely resemble that of Joe Goffman, who was senior counsel to the Air Office during the Obama administration. The agency did not respond to requests for comment.

AND THE FIRST SOLAR SHALL BE LAST: After months of remaining mum on a solar trade tariff case, thin film solar producer First Solar waded into the fray Wednesday with a filing to the U.S. International Trade Commission arguing that tariffs would be a good idea. The position is a boost for Suniva and Solar World, who won a unanimous injury determination from the ITC last month. "My overarching point is that the Commission should reject the notion that [crystalline silicon photovoltaic] industry must be left to die so that the downstream solar industry may live," writes Mark Widmar, CEO of First Solar. "I firmly believe the commission can design an effective remedy that allows solar demand to continue to flourish."

Tariffs wouldn't affect First Solar's supplies: The Solar Energy Industries Association, of which First Solar is a member, has repeatedly pointed out to reporters and the commission that thin film products are not covered by the case. So if the commission recommends a strict remedy to the president, First Solar could see its competition from much the rest of the sector wane.

EPA MOVES ON HARVEY-IMPACTED SUPERFUND SITE: EPA announced Wednesday it approved a plan that would see the removal of tons of dioxins from the Houston-area San Jacinto Waste Pits Superfund site that sustained damage and leaked material in the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey. "EPA is prioritizing Superfund clean-up by making decisions in a decisive, timely manner," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement. Cleaning up the site, which was first added to the National Priorities List in 2008, will cost an estimated $115 million.

Houston-area Democratic Rep. Gene Green thanked EPA for the decision but said: "We will be monitoring the remediation process closely and call on the EPA to move as quickly as possible before more damage is done."

YIKES: There are reports of Puerto Ricans drinking from wells located on Superfund sites on the island, EPA said Wednesday. In a statement, the agency said it "advises against tampering with sealed and locked wells or drinking from these wells." According to government data, just 64 percent of residents have access to potable drinking water and less than 11 percent of the island has electricity.

McKINLEY UPBEAT ON COAL EFFORTS: McKinley says the Trump administration has already made significant progress on 11 of the 14 priority areas to boost coal he presented to Vice President Mike Pence last year. "[Trump] has done a lot of things, but we're not trying to play favorites," he told ME. "Just give us a level playing field." Developed in consultation with the Congressional Coal Caucus, McKinley's memo calls for rolling back Obama administration climate change efforts and several EPA regulations. He now hopes the administration can work on boosting U.S. coal exports globally, where he says there's "voracious appetite."

DOE grid proposal sparks more questions than answers Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/03/2017 01:36 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry has prodded federal regulators to rescue economically ailing coal and nuclear plants in the name of "economic and national security."

But several industry players and experts argue that the Energy Department's proposal resembles a back-of-the-envelope sketch more than a regulation, and Capitol Hill is starting to get dragged into the scuffle.

Members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee are expected to get an earful about the rule Tuesday during a hearing scheduled before the release of the new rulemaking, as well as later in the week. And Marc Veasey (D-Texas), on the Science Committee, suggested that DOE may be "redefining grid resiliency to accomplish a political agenda."

The 19-page proposal DOE sent to FERC last week, which directs competitive electricity markets to dole out cash to power plants with 90 days of fuel on-site, raised eyebrows from the moment people looked at the sparse page count. Washington lawyers and policy wonks have been tossing and turning over big gaps in the plan, not to mention a list of unanswered questions about how the regulatory procedure might unfold, where the payments DOE is demanding actually get implemented in the real world, and why Perry put his chips into on-site fuel.

"I'm sympathetic with the 'hurry up and fix something'" attitude, said former FERC Chairman Pat Wood, a Republican who is a strong advocate for markets. "But this is such a draconian way of fixing it that I'm assuming it's put out there to be a lightning rod to get people off their ass and get to focusing on proper solutions to this."

He added: "Everything in our society has a shelf-life and then it goes into retirement."

Even basic issues about how DOE's 60-day timeframe for FERC to take "final action" lines up with routine federal administrative law are unclear, and have already sparked outrage from a range of energy trade associations that don't usually work together.

Still, late Monday FERC announced that it would take comments on DOE's pitch for just three weeks, even before DOE officially published its proposal in the Federal Register.

Nevertheless, the proposal was hailed as a bold, decisive and proactive measure by the nuclear and coal-fired power industries and their allies.

After speaking with more than a half-dozen experts and reviewing documents, here are the biggest questions DOE plopped in FERC's lap:

How does this process even work?

DOE used Section 403 of the Department of Energy Organization Act to initiate a rulemaking at FERC and directed regulators to take "final action" on the new proposal within 60 days of its publication. No one disputes Perry's right to utilize the process, but few fully understand how it works because the section so rarely tapped — DOE hasn't invoked it in 30 years and has used it fewer than a half-dozen times. Although FERC has already requested comments, Section 403 doesn't define "final action" and while it states that Energy secretaries can set "reasonable time limits," another phrase up for debate.

Analysts at ClearView Energy Partners argued that FERC would put Perry's proposal on the fast-track but takes DOE's timeline with a grain of salt. "We view the aggressive timeline mostly as an indication of where DOE wants this on FERC's near term priority list than as a true drop-dead date," ClearView analysts wrote in a note to clients.

In a separate letter Perry sent to the commissioners to push his proposal, he said the short countdown clock was necessary because FERC was not doing enough to deal with the "crisis" facing the sector.

"He uses the word 'crisis.' No one believes that," one former FERC official said. "It also asserts ... that every single inflexible coal and nuclear plant is needed for reliability. Those are two huge leaps. But everything is built on that foundation. If either of those, or both of those, are proven incorrect there's no basis for FERC to act."

How does DOE's plan mesh with the markets?

The most vexing issue looming over DOE's proposal is who pays the power plants for having 90 days of fuel and how does the pricing mechanism get factored into existing wholesale energy markets. DOE offers one page of regulatory text for FERC to adopt but doesn't suggest a way for issuing the payments, which "shall" include "operating and fuel expenses, costs of capital and debt, and a fair return on equity and investment."

The pricing mechanism "is, to me, the biggest question mark," said former FERC Commissioner Tony Clark, who echoed just about everyone interviewed for this story. "It dumps it all on FERC. They can try to come up with something out of thin air but the mechanism is not defined in the rule, which is really the whole name of the game."

DOE's proposal, as written, would make all nuclear plants and many coal plants eligible for payments. But should those payments come out of electricity markets, or capacity markets — which generators bid into in exchange for being available when grid operators call on them — or something else? DOE doesn't say.

"If they did decide to define 90 days of fuel supply, for whatever reason, as a valuable attribute to the market, then they would need to figure out what the mechanism is and think about whether there's a semi-market-friendly way to do that," Clark said.

Miles Farmer, a staff attorney for the Natural Resources Defense Council, went so far as to say that the plan has too many plot holes to be considered a proposed rule.

"FERC could not simply enact this," Farmer said. "There are no rules for how the plants would be bidding into the market, or not. There are no rules for how one would evaluate whether these payments ever sunset. Are we talking about infinite subsidies forever?"

There's already a process for power plants to delay a retirement on the electric grid if they're needed for reliability. How should those processes overlap? Regions that have capacity markets have also instituted stiff penalties on plants that promised to deliver but don't follow through. But the plan envisioned by DOE doesn't explain whether a power plant should still get paid if it ever falls short of the 90-day rule or can't operate.

ClearView chose a diplomatic approach: "[W]e would not be surprised if the RTOs and ISOs themselves find accommodation of this proposal difficult or problematic."

Why focus on on-site fuel storage?

DOE's proposal says power plants eligible for the new payments must offer some essential energy services and "have a 90-day fuel supply on site in the event of supply disruptions caused by emergencies, extreme weather, or natural or man-made disasters." But 90 days is never explained in the 19-page document and, according to Paul Bailey, CEO of the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, the nation's coal fleet maintains enough on-site fuel supplies to power their plants 73 to 82 days, on average. Those figures line up with data at the Energy Information Administration.

Another complicating factor for Perry's "grid resiliency pricing rule" is that FERC doesn't have a set definition for what resiliency means in technical terms.

Perry emphasizes the grid stress triggered by the 2014 "polar vortex" to defend the urgency of his new plan. But even there, it's unclear why 90 days was necessary when most outages on the mainland U.S. don't last half that time. Several experts point out that having fuel on-site isn't a panacea for disruptions.

While nuclear plants don't need to swap out their fuel for 18 months or more, some reactors in Florida along the path of Hurricane Irma shut down, including because of a problem with a valve. Last week, Platts highlighted a case where NRG Energy told state regulators in Texas that Hurricane Harvey dumped so much water that stocks of coal at its W.A. Parish power plant were so "saturated with rainwater that coal was unable to be delivered into the silos" and switched to natural gas.

Even with the polar vortex, API's Marty Durbin argues to lawmakers that deliveries cut off during the 2014 cold spell weren't directly weather-related but instead a result of economic decisions made by generators who had customers with "interruptible" contracts.

"I come from an era when major policy and initiatives, including notices of proposed rulemaking, were usually done in 300- or 500-page documents. This looks pretty spare," said former FERC Chairman Jim Hoecker, who served under the Clinton administration. "I'm not sure that the threat that the secretary is alluding to here is imminent. It might be. They just need to explain themselves.

He added: "What they're going to find is that having a different philosophy doesn't relieve the responsibility to testify it."

Energy Department discloses $56K in Perry travel Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/06/2017 07:06 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry has racked up as much as $56,246 in non-commercial air travel since taking office in early March, the Energy Department disclosed Friday in response to congressional questions about Cabinet-level trips.

Political appointees at DOE did not use private non-commercial aircraft, but on four occasions Perry did fly on government-owned aircraft or chartered aircraft, DOE Deputy General Counsel Eric Fygi wrote in a letter to the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. That committee is seeking information about Trump administration officials' travel following the revelations that led to Tom Price's resignation from the job as HHS secretary.

Perry's single biggest expense, according to agency documents submitted to the committee, was a one-day round trip in mid-May from Reagan National Airport near Washington D.C. to Olathe, Kan. for DOE's Small Business Forum & Expo, and included a tour of the DOE Kansas City National Security Campus, which is responsible for manufacturing and procuring non-nuclear components for nuclear weapons.

Joining Perry on that trip were a handful of other agency officials, including National Nuclear Security Administrator Frank Klotz and deputy chief of staff Dan Wilmot. The total cost to taxpayers for using the Federal Aviation Administration's Gulfstream IV plane was an estimated $35,000.

Perry's second most expensive trip was a private charter flight on Sept. 28 from the Washington Dulles Airport to the Hazleton Regional Airport in Pennsylvania, which later continued to the Greater Portsmouth Regional Airport in Ohio, and was disclosed by a Reuters report earlier this week. The trip, costing an estimated $11,000, occurred just a day before Price resigned after a series of POLITICO reports of him running up a government travel tab exceeding $1 million — a figure that dwarfs Perry's apparent billing.

After visiting the coal mine in Pennsylvania and a defunct uranium enrichment facility in Ohio, the DOE documents say Perry planned to "secure commercial transportation for the continuation of his travel out of Ohio."

Perry and his staff also made use of a Defense Department plane in May for travel from Idaho Falls, Idaho, to tour the national lab there, to Santa Fe, N.M., to visit the Los Alamos National Laboratory. The trip continued from Santa Fe to Carlsbad, N.M., to visit the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant, a low-level nuclear waste storage facility. The estimated cost of the trip was $7,000.

The last trip documented by DOE was for the round-trip use of plane owned by the Bonneville Power Administration, a quasi-independent utility within DOE, to fly from Seattle to Richland, Wash., to visit the Hanford nuclear site in August. The cost of the trip: $3,246.

The information sent to Capitol Hill did not include trips senior DOE non-career officials took with President Donald Trump and Vice President Mike Pence on government-owned aircraft or trips with officials at other agencies with their own aircraft, such as DoD and DHS.

"This response does not address this travel as such travel arrangements were not made by DOE," Fygi wrote.

"The Department of Energy strictly follows both government-wide and internal DOE travel regulations and policy," DOE spokesperson Shaylyn Hynes said in a statement. "The Secretary travels almost exclusively on commercial aircraft. In the rare instances where government-owned or chartered aircraft have been used, trips were pre-approved by an Ethics officer within the Office of General Counsel."

The White House has backed steep spending cuts across the executive branch, including a roughly 9 percent to DOE for fiscal 2018, a decline of roughly $2.7 billion compared to current levels.

In the wake of Price's resignation, several other Cabinet-level Trump officials have found their taxpayer spending scrutinized.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has flown on military planes for some trips that also coincided with appearances at fundraising events, raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism, POLITICO has reported. The EPA Inspector General has also recently expanded a probe into EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's travels.

An investigation into seven military flights taken by Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin that cost about $811,798 ultimately found that the former Goldman Sachs alum had not violated any ethics requirements or other regulations.

The White House began cracking down on Cabinet officials' use of private planes amid Price's resignation, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

DOE approves big boost for Vogtle loan guarantees Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/29/2017 11:08 AM EDT

The Energy Department has conditionally approved a $3.7 billion increase in the federal loan guarantees for the over-budget Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia, the agency announced this morning.

DOE had already approved $8.33 billion for the two-reactor project under the Obama administration. Now, Energy Secretary Rick Perry is primed to offer an additional $1.67 billion to Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, $1.6 billion to Oglethorpe Power Corp. and $415 million to the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia.

The Energy Department had originally extended loan guarantees for $3.4 billion to Georgia Power, $3.1 billion to Oglethorpe and $1.8 billion to MEAG.

WHAT'S NEXT: The new DOE loan guarantees are conditional and the firms will not be able to access the financing until they are finalized. It's unclear how long it will take to finalize.

EPA draft questions greenhouse gas authority, ponders state rules for coal plants Back

By Emily Holden | 10/11/2017 11:13 PM EDT

EPA's proposal to consider a replacement to the Clean Power Plan will question whether the agency has authority to regulate greenhouse gases from power plants, and how it should let states write their own plans to upgrade coal plants, according to excerpts of the draft notice obtained by POLITICO.

The 34-page EPA document is currently under review by the White House and other agencies, and administration officials have said it will be released in a few weeks.

Any replacement EPA might propose is expected to achieve modest greenhouse gas reductions, especially compared to the Obama administration rule, which sought to shrink carbon dioxide levels from the power sector by 32 percent from 2005 levels by 2030.

Some conservatives are lobbying EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to forego a replacement and instead challenge the legal finding that requires the agency to regulate emissions. The draft may leave that option open.

EPA is still considering "whether it is appropriate to propose a rule," and must "ascertain the scope of legal authority that Congress conferred to EPA," before determining how best to implement a policy, according to the document.

On Tuesday, EPA proposed to withdraw the Obama-era power plant standards, arguing they exceeded the agency's authority by pushing electricity companies away from coal and toward natural gas and renewable power.

In the advanced notice of proposed rulemaking, or ANPR, EPA refers to itself as "a creature of statute," and notes that the Clean Air Act delegates air pollution control to states and local governments.

"States will have the primary role in deciding who gets regulated and the scope of that regulation," the document says. "While the CAA is a source of authority, it is also a source of carefully crafted limitations, which this agency must and will respect."

The agency interprets Section 111 of the Clean Air Act, the part used to write the Clean Power Plan, as requiring EPA to rely on a demonstrated system for curbing greenhouse gas emissions and to consider the costs of achieving those reductions and any "non-air quality" health effects. In Tuesday's draft withdrawal of the Clean Power Plan, EPA discounted many of the health benefits the Obama administration had cited in 2015 from cutting air pollutants other than carbon dioxide.

"Each state then develops a plan with its own legally enforceable emission standards to implement the emission guidelines, with flexibility to accommodate the State's particular needs and circumstances," the draft ANPR explains.

The ANPR asks for feedback on "several technologies and equipment upgrades—as well as good operating and maintenance practices," that coal plants could pursue to reduce emissions. The draft also considers in detail whether making those changes would trigger a "new source review," which would require plants to obtain air pollution permits. It covers ways that coal plant operators could avoid those reviews.

White House reviewing proposal to consider Clean Power Plan replacement Back

By Emily Holden | 10/11/2017 03:48 PM EDT

The White House is reviewing EPA's advance proposal to consider a replacement to the Obama administration's climate standards for power plants, according to a notice that the Office of Management and Budget received the document Tuesday.

EPA officially proposed to revoke the Clean Power Plan Tuesday. On a call with conservative interests, administration officials said a proposal about a replacement could be issued in the next few weeks, as POLITICO reported.

The agency argued in moving to withdraw the regulation that Obama's EPA illegally set requirements that would have required companies to shift away from coal-fired power plants and use more natural gas and renewable power for electricity. EPA argued it only has authority to regulate coal plants directly.

Officials on the call also suggested the agency is considering letting states set their own standards for coal plants.

The document OMB received is called "State Guidelines for Greenhouse Gas Emissions from Existing Electric Utility Generating Units."

Any replacement rule would likely require coal plants to run more efficiently but is not expected to significantly reduce power-sector carbon dioxide emissions that cause climate change.

EPA has said it has not yet decided whether to pursue a replacement, although a Supreme Court ruling and endangerment finding written by the agency require it to address greenhouse gas emissions from power plants. Some conservatives want Administrator Scott Pruitt to fight that endangerment finding.

Trump nominates AccuWeather CEO to lead key climate agency Back

By Henry C. Jackson | 10/11/2017 10:42 PM EDT

President Donald Trump has nominated the CEO of AccuWeather to run the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, a key agency in conducting climate research and assessing climate change.

Barry Myers has served since 2007 as CEO of AccuWeather, a media company in State College, Pennsylvania, that provides worldwide weather predictions. He graduated from Penn State with a degree in business and received a law degree from Boston University, but has no science training.

In a news release, the White House called him "one of the world's leading authorities on the use of weather information." Trump has nominated him to serve as the Commerce Department's under secretary for oceans and atmosphere, which oversees NOAA.

At AccuWeather, Myers has led a global expansion of the company. His significant private-sector experience fits with many of the other high-profile Trump administration appointees.

NOAA has a vast portfolio that includes the nation's weather forecasts and projecting climate change. The agency oversees the National Weather Service and a vast array of research. It also has responsibility for protecting coastal areas and oceans.

McCain, Cardin urge Trump to get tough with Moscow Back

By Elana Schor | 09/29/2017 04:12 PM EDT

Two senior senators are urging President Donald Trump to fully use the new authority to punish Russia that lawmakers overwhelmingly granted him last month.

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Ben Cardin (D-Md.) wrote to Trump on the eve of a key deadline in the Russia sanctions bill, which won lopsided bipartisan support in Congress and forced the president to get tougher on Moscow over its election meddling. That legislation requires the administration to identify by Friday individuals linked to Russian defense and intelligence operations who could be subject to new penalties.

McCain and Cardin urged Trump to meet the deadline in a way that "expansively defines these actors to ensure that the perpetrators of the attack on our democracy last year — the defense and intelligence sectors — are sanctioned appropriately."

"We are very concerned that Russia may attempt to work around sanctions by funneling the arms trade through companies not included in the administration's guidance," the senators added.

Beyond that deadline, McCain and Cardin pressed Trump to "fully implement" another section of the sanctions measure that adds new penalties for companies connected to Russian oil and gas projects. They also asked Trump to nudge European allies to coordinate their sanctions in line with the U.S. system, asking for a briefing from the State and Treasury Departments.

And the duo also delivered a broader warning to Trump that lawmakers would take advantage of the popular sanctions bill's authority to force a congressional review of any decision to ease or end sanctions against Russia.

"As you know, the law provides for Congress to review any administration determination to remove sanctions designations on individuals or entities," McCain and Cardin wrote. "Based on the overwhelming Congressional support for enacting this law, and that provision in particular, Congress will undoubtedly take that role seriously."

Zinke's travels: Ski resort and Alaskan steakhouse Back

By Esther Whieldon and Ben Lefebvre | 10/10/2017 07:32 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has attended at least two additional political fundraisers while traveling for official business, including a weekend ski getaway less than three weeks after he was sworn in that donors paid up to $3,000 to attend, according to sources and documents reviewed by POLITICO.

Zinke's previously undisclosed attendance at the events adds to scrutiny he is facing over his habit of mixing political activities with official business when traveling outside of Washington, D.C., and to questions over travel expenses incurred by members of President Donald Trump's Cabinet. In addition to the fundraisers, Zinke has held at least a half-dozen other events with big donors or influential conservative organizations while on official trips.

Zinke, a former Montana congressman who became secretary March 1, started his fundraising appearances even before attending a March 30 Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser in St. Croix that POLITICO reported last week, at which donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with him. The Office of Special Counsel, which is investigating Zinke's use of travel and political activities in office, has been asked by a watchdog group to look into his appearance there.

In the first of the newly disclosed appearances, Zinke attended a mid-March fundraiser at a ski resort in Big Sky, Montana, organized by committees affiliated with Republican Sen. Steve Daines, according to two attendees who saw him there. And in May, Zinke briefly stopped by a fundraiser for GOP Rep. Don Young at a steakhouse in Anchorage, Alaska, a spokesman for Young's campaign told POLITICO.

All three fundraisers occurred on trips that Zinke took for official Interior Department business. The Hatch Act and other federal laws allow Cabinet secretaries to participate in partisan political activities only if they do so on their own time and do not use any governmental resources. Federal Election Commission records for the campaign committees do not list any reimbursement payments to Interior for the events.

"Both law and common sense tell us that taxpayer resources are supposed to be used when you're doing the taxpayers' business [but] are not supposed to be used to help candidates get elected," said Brendan Fischer of the nonprofit watchdog organization Campaign Legal Center.

An Interior Department spokeswoman did not respond to specific questions about Zinke's attendance at the events nor whether the campaigns reimbursed Interior for any of his travel expenses, but she said ethics officials sign off on the secretary's trips and all of them comply with the law.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Other guests attending the Montana fundraiser included Sens. John Hoeven (R-N.D.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), according to an invitation to the March 17-19 event posted by a local political blog earlier that month. Donors were asked to contribute $3,000 if they were attending on behalf of a political action committee or $1,500 for an individual. Another invitation for events that weekend obtained by POLITICO sought donations as low as $500 to attend two dinners for Daines.

Hoeven hosted his own reception Friday night before the Daines dinner and a lunch Saturday, according to a campaign invitation obtained by POLITICO, which also informed guests that they could purchase "discounted ski lift tickets" at the resort.

Zinke was not named on the invitations, but his official schedule lists him as attending a "welcoming reception" for Daines on Friday night, spending "personal time with Senator Murkowski" at Big Sky Resort on Saturday and attending a "reception & dinner" for Daines that evening.

Two sources who attended the Daines fundraiser recalled seeing Zinke there. One of the sources, a lobbyist, said Zinke attended the Friday night social and the breakfast buffet the next day. The lobbyist said that when Daines introduced Zinke, the Montana senator mentioned that Zinke was the state's first Cabinet secretary.

The Hatch Act bars Zinke from taking part in political events while acting in his official role as Interior secretary, which includes being identified by his title in invitations. But Richard Painter, a University of Minnesota professor and former White House chief ethics lawyer under President George W. Bush, said Daines referring to Zinke's Cabinet position doesn't appear to violate the law.

Zinke "should take reasonable steps to make sure people aren't using his official title" and not use the title himself at political events, Painter said. "But I don't know that he has an obligation to jump in and tell the senator he can't do that."

The secretary spent most of the day that Friday touring Yellowstone National Park, which the Interior Department manages through the National Park Service. He did not have any other official events listed on his schedule for Saturday and flew back to Washington, D.C., on Sunday.

A report posted by Interior on Zinke's March travel expenses shows that he claimed 75 percent of his per diem that Friday and did not claim any lodging or reimbursements over that weekend, which he took as personal days off. He did fly home on official taxpayer-funded travel, however.

The Young fundraiser occurred May 31, when Zinke was in Anchorage for a speech to the Alaska Oil and Gas Association's annual conference, where he signed a secretarial order for an updated assessment of how much oil exists in part of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The invitation to the reception, a copy of which was obtained by political blog Must Read Alaska and shared with POLITICO, does not list Zinke as a special guest, nor does it say how much donors had to contribute to attend.

FEC records for the Alaskans for Don Young campaign committee show it received $9,800 in campaign contributions from individuals and political action committees on that day.

Young's campaign spokesman, Matt Shuckerow, said in an email that Zinke made "only very brief remarks" at the event, and that the campaign did not confirm his attendance in advance and did not require guests to pay to attend. "Not only did the campaign seek out the guidance of the Interior Department's ethics personnel prior to the event, it took concerted efforts to follow their strict guidance," Shuckerow said. He did not say whether the campaign reimbursed the Interior Department for any costs associated with Zinke's trip.

Zinke's calendar for that day includes a brief stop at Sullivan's Steakhouse in Anchorage, the same venue listed on the invitation, for a "Rep. Don Young Reception." Later that night, Zinke went to dinner with representatives of sportsmen's groups, according to his schedule.

The Anchorage stop came in the middle of a weeklong trip that included the use of a military plane to fly from Washington, D.C., to Norway, Greenland and then Alaska. Interior paid for Zinke and three Interior staff members to take the flight. Zinke's wife, Lola, also accompanied him on the trip but reimbursed the government for the cost of her seat, Interior has said.

In both of the newly disclosed appearances, Zinke did not pose for photos with high-dollar donors, as had been the case with the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser. POLITICO's report on Zinke's appearance in that photo line led Walter Shaub, a former director of the U.S. Office of Government Ethics who is now with the Campaign Legal Center, to ask the Office of Special Counsel to open a Hatch Act investigation. The OSC typically opens investigations in response to complaints it receives, but a spokesman declined to comment on the status of Shaub's request.

Still, some watchdogs question whether Zinke is focused enough on his day job given how much attention he has paid to politics.

"There's always the risk that a high-level government official spending more time involved in political events may not be attending to their official duties," said Nick Schwellenbach, director of investigations at Project On Government Oversight.

EPA hires industry lawyer as adviser to air office Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/11/2017 05:12 PM EDT

EPA has hired David Harlow, a lawyer with expertise in the Clean Air Act, to serve in an advisory role to the Office of Air and Radiation, EPA sources tell POLITICO.

EPA's press office did not respond to a request for comment, but agency sources say Harlow's role will most closely resemble that of Joe Goffman, who was senior counsel to the Air Office during the Obama administration. Should Bill Wehrum be confirmed to serve as the assistant administrator to the office, Harlow will report to him, sources said.

Harlow, like Wehrum, most recently worked at Hunton & Williams where he advised and representing the power and paper industries in enforcement and permitting cases. His biographical webpage for the firm has been removed, but a cached version says he helped utilities with new source permit cases and he defended wood pulp and paper mills from Clean Air Act enforcement. Court documents show that he worked with William Brownell representing the Utility Air Regulatory Group, an informal group of electric utilities who have sued the EPA over regulations many times.

EPA did not respond to a request for comment on Harlow's hiring.

LONG CARBON RULE BATTLE LIES AHEAD: President Donald Trump's administration sought to frame Tuesday's move to rescind the Obama-era Clean Power Plan as fulfilling a campaign process, but it really just kicked off what's likely to be an arduous and lengthy legal and regulatory process that may ultimately result in a replacement rule with very modest reductions in the emissions that fuel climate change. "This is the beginning of the process to carry out the president's promise to make sure that we do our job at the agency within the bounds of the law and don't declare war on certain sections of our economy," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said on "Fox News," his only public appearance Tuesday to discuss his proposed rule.

Many state officials, environmental advocates, businesses and reporters were left wondering why they hadn't received any sort of briefing or additional background before or after the proposal's release — especially since senior agency officials had a closed phone call Tuesday morning with conservative organizations where they took questions from groups like the Heartland Institute and State Policy Network, as Pro's Emily Holden reports. Clint Woods, the director of the Association of Air Pollution Control Agencies, which represents mostly conservative state air agencies, said his members got a heads up on timing but would be "looking forward to more engagement prior to major announcements in the future."

Joe Goffman, EPA general counsel when the Clean Power Plan was proposed and finalized, said the agency typically had background conversations with all of those groups when rolling out a major proposal. "We thought that it was an elementary part of our obligation to present information to state governments, to the affected industry, often very broadly defined, and to environmental advocacy groups," Goffman said. A phone call between the administrator and reporters, and a briefing on the Hill for lawmakers was also customary, he said. Pruitt has accused Obama's EPA of not conducting enough outreach or listening enough to states, which Goffman said is "demonstrably false." The agency did not respond to questions about its outreach on the rollback.

ICYMI: Here's links to EPA's fact sheet, proposal and regulatory impact analysis.

Five things: Pro's Alex Guillén and Eric Wolff take a look at five of the biggest policy changes the Trump administration has made to try to prop up the prospects of fossil fuels. 1) Killing the crown jewel of Obama's climate change legacy by axing the Clean Power Plan, 2) A push to shore up coal's place in the nation's electricity marketplace, 3) The likelihood of trade barriers on imported solar products, 4) Tapping the brakes on tightened mileage standards that Obama had imposed for cars sold from 2022 to 2025 and 5) Actions designed to make federal lands more amenable to fossil fuel development.

Push to shutter coal plants gets another jolt: Former New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg is at the Sierra Club's HQ this morning at 11:45 a.m. where he'll announce "an increased commitment" to shutter the U.S. coal fleet even amid the repeal of the Clean Power Plan. That comes as the Union of Concerned Scientists released an analysis finding 21 percent of the nation's coal fleet uneconomic and an additional 18 percent already slated for retirement or conversion to natural gas.

Quotable: California Senate leader (and potential Sen. Dianne Feinstein primary challenger) Kevin de Lèon not mincing words on the withdrawal: "Washington's utter failure to confront the existential threat of climate change will go down among the most shameful chapters in US history," he tweeted.

Here's where we are: EPA started the process to roll back the signature Obama-era effort to combat climate change even as the U.S. is reeling from back to back to back to back hits from hurricanes and ferocious wildfires slam California. Assuming a disaster aid package eventually clears Congress as expected, lawmakers will have spent more than $50 billion responding to the natural disasters already, and House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy said last week "I do not believe this will be the last of the supplementals." Three weeks after Hurricane Maria slammed into Puerto Rico, 84 percent of the island still lacks electricity and 36 percent of residents still don't have potable water, according to official figures.

TIMELY TELEVISION VIEWING: "Frontline" titles its episode tonight "War on the EPA," as the PBS show focuses on Pruitt's rise from an anti-EPA crusader as Oklahoma attorney general to running the agency. Trailer for the episode here.

WE'RE ROLLING RIGHT THROUGH THE MIDDLE OF THE WEEK! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Independent Petroleum Association of America's Neal Kirby was first to identify Sen. Bill Cassidy as our most recent physician elected to the Senate. For today: Who is the only senator to win a reelection race in their 90s? SKI RESORTS, ALASKAN STEAKHOUSE, OH MY! Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke attended at least two additional political fundraisers during trips he took for official Interior business, Pro's Esther Whieldon and Ben Lefebvre scoop. Federal law permits Cabinet officials to participate in partisan political activities on their own time and without using any federal resources, but FEC records don't list any reimbursement payments to Interior for the events. "Both law and common sense tell us that taxpayer resources are supposed to be used when you're doing the taxpayers' business [but] are not supposed to be used to help candidates get elected," said Brendan Fischer of the nonprofit watchdog organization Campaign Legal Center.

The two events were:

— A mid-March fundraiser at a ski resort in Big Sky, Mont., organized by committees affiliated with Republican Sen. Steve Daines. Donors were asked to contribute $3,000 if they were attending on behalf of a political action committee or $1,500 for an individual. Also in attendance: Sen. John Hoeven and Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski. He didn't charge for lodging or his per diem for part of the trip.

— A May 31 fundraiser for Alaskan Rep. Don Young where a Young campaign spokesman, Matt Shuckerow, said the secretary made "only very brief remarks." He said the campaign "took concerted efforts to follow" strict guidance from Interior's ethics personnel.

Interior's response: Spokeswoman Heather Swift said ethics officials signed off on all trips and they all complied with the law. "The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," she said.

NOT PLEASED: Amid weeks of reporting on non-commercial travel and other troubling behavior from Cabinet officials, the acting head of the Office of Governmental Ethics issued a memo warning he is "deeply concerned" by recent actions. Among the suggestions is "modeling a 'Should I do it?' mentality versus a 'Can I do it?' mentality" in their actions. "It is essential to the success of our republic that citizens can trust that your decisions and the decisions made by your agency are motivated by the public good and not by personal interests," David Apol wrote.

THE WOTUS WITH THE MOSTEST: The Supreme Court today will take up a wonky but important question central to federal water law: Should challenges to the Obama administration's Waters of the U.S. rule go through a district court first or straight to an appellate venue? Of course, the Trump administration is working to repeal WOTUS in the coming months and says it will issue a rewritten version early next year. But this venue question is all but guaranteed to apply again, meaning SCOTUS guidance could prove useful.

What you need to know: The Clean Water Act says that most CWA regulations and actions should be challenged first at the district level, but it lists seven exceptions that would go straight to a circuit court. Two are in play here: one regarding rules affecting effluent limitation guidelines, and one for any action approving or denying discharge permits. The Trump administration argues both exceptions apply, and the suits should go to a circuit court first. Various challengers, led by the National Association of Manufacturers, want it to go through district courts first.

History brief: After the rule was released, lawsuits were filed in both district and circuit courts throughout the country. After some district-level proceedings that led to a stay of WOTUS in 13 states only, the circuit-level cases were consolidated into one mega-case before the 6th Circuit, which then issued a nationwide injunction. The 6th Circuit then issued a complicated 1-1-1 ruling that concluded that it should indeed hear the challenge first. One judge said both exceptions apply, one said only one exception applies and the third said neither applies and the challenges should first go through district courts.

Why it matters: This isn't entirely an esoteric spat. Supporters of district-first litigation argue the Clean Water Act gives more time to challenge regulations that go to lower courts first. It also means challengers can pick the district court where they want to sue, whereas circuit-first challenges would be randomly consolidated. Meanwhile, those who want circuit-first review argue that it provides more certainty and helps avoid patchwork problems — such as the 13-state WOTUS freeze.

EPICALLY BUSY DAY AT HOUSE NATURAL RESOURCES: The panel is slated to convene two separate hearings Wednesday to examine controversial measures on offshore drilling and the Antiquities Act:

— At 2 p.m., the Energy and Mineral Resources Subcommittee considers a draft of the Accessing Strategic Resources Offshore Act, which would expand offshore revenue sharing program to additional states; prevent future presidents from withdrawing sections of the outer continental shelf from drilling or designating marine sanctuaries; and repeal certain Obama-era rules on Arctic drilling, among other things. Witnesses include former Senate Energy Chairwoman Mary Landrieu.

— The full committee then gathers at 4 p.m. to mark up Chairman Rob Bishop's long-awaited effort to overhaul the Antiquities Act. The bill, H.R. 3990 \(115\), would require a federal environmental review process to designate any monument more than 640 acres in size, require the sign off from local officials on new large monuments and prohibit marine national monuments "with no archeological or historic sites in need of protection." Committee members will also consider a resolution requiring Zinke to disclose more information about his review of existing national monument designations.

A NEW DISASTER EMERGES — CALIFORNIA WILDFIRES: Trump declared a major disaster in California Tuesday as wildfires have forced the evacuations of tens of thousands, cost at least 17 lives to date and caused billions in damage. "We are with you, our prayers are with you, and we will be with you every day until we put the fires out and stand with these families to rebuild these communities," Vice President Mike Pence said alongside McCarthy and Rep. Trump administration takes ax to climate rule Back

By Emily Holden | 10/10/2017 02:16 PM EDT

The Trump administration officially moved to kill the Obama-era climate change rule for power plants Tuesday, fulfilling a campaign pledge but setting off what is expected to be a bitter legal battle between the EPA and several states, health and environmental groups.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt signed an agency proposal to repeal the Clean Power Plan, which would have sped the nation's shift away from coal-burning power plants and toward renewable power and natural gas, which emits less planet-warming carbon dioxide. Less than a third of U.S. emissions come from the power sector, and the rule aimed to shrink them to about 15 percent below 2015 levels by 2030.

Pruitt, the former Oklahoma attorney general who sued Obama's EPA over the rule, claims that it would have cost $33 billion and is illegal because it pushed for a transition away from coal rather than directly limiting emissions from coal plants. EPA released a photo of Pruitt signing the document but did not hold a public event.

EPA is exploring writing a replacement that would let states set their own standards to require coal plants to run more efficiently, or burn less coal while producing the same amount of power. That would likely achieve few emissions reductions.

"The Obama administration pushed the bounds of their authority so far with the CPP that the Supreme Court issued a historic stay of the rule, preventing its devastating effects to be imposed on the American people while the rule is being challenged in court," Pruitt said in a press release. "We are committed to righting the wrongs of the Obama administration by cleaning the regulatory slate. Any replacement rule will be done carefully, properly, and with humility, by listening to all those affected by the rule."

The Trump administration has hailed the withdrawal as a victory for coal, but market experts say the outlook for the fuel is still dim.

"Withdrawing the Clean Power Plan won't clear the deck for new coal generation. The economics of natural gas and renewables are more favorable, now and in our future scenarios," Bloomberg New Energy Finance Policy Editor Steph Munro said.

During President Barack Obama's two terms, the fracking boom turned the U.S. into a natural gas super power, cutting the cost of the fuel by 75 percent and leading to a boom in natural gas-power generation, which tripled between 2009 and 2016, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

Wind power also surged under Obama, tripling in capacity, while solar power grew from virtually zero to become the leading source of new power generation in 2016.

Jim Matheson, CEO of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, said the withdrawal will give cooperatives, which are owned by customers rather than investors, flexibility to decide when to take coal plants offline. Those co-ops got 62 percent of their power from coal in 2016, compared to 71 percent just two years before, he said.

Still, Matheson wants EPA to write a replacement rule to provide business certainty to the utilities, although he acknowledged that process could take years.

"To the extent we can have a level of clarity over time about what the playing field looks like, that matters," he said. Many electricity companies believe that if Pruitt's EPA can write a replacement rule, it will be more difficult for a future administration to challenge than if he takes no action at all. Critics have contended that Pruitt plans to slow-walk the process.

Conservative groups praised the repeal, with lobbying group Americans for Prosperity saying it would prevent "dramatically higher" energy costs.

Health advocates say Trump's EPA is vastly overstating the costs of the rule while ignoring the impacts of climate change and other pollutants that come from coal plants, especially by declining to count the benefits of reducing those emissions in an analysis of the Clean Power Plan.

When EPA finalized the Clean Power Plan, the agency estimated that by 2030 it would annually prevent 3,600 premature deaths, 90,000 childhood asthma attacks and 1,700 heart attacks.

"These are not insignificant benefits, health effects," said Paul Billings, senior vice president of advocacy at the American Lung Association. "I don't necessarily agree with the dollar amount they place on the cost of a human life, but it does create a basis for doing comparisons across rules ... to translate those health effects into dollars costs."

More than half of states sued to stop the Clean Power Plan, and the Supreme Court in early 2016 stayed its implementation while a lower court considered the challenge.

EPA has been asking the court to withhold its decision about whether the rule was legal until the agency has had a chance to withdraw it and explore an alternative.

Tim Profeta, director of Duke University's Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy

Solutions, said EPA is nixing the rule now to keep the court from issuing a decision.

"The court should decide the case that it has before it in order to clear up any dispute over the extent of EPA's authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from power plants," Profeta said.

Since Trump's election, 14 green-leaning states have banded together as part of the Climate Alliance and said they will aim to curb emissions even without the federal government.

"We will push ahead and work with states that share our belief in science and the imperative to combat global warming," California Gov. Jerry Brown said.

Washington Gov. Jay Inslee added that "Washington state is already feeling the harmful and costly effects of climate change — in more devastating wildfire seasons, strained water resources, increasingly acidic coastal waters, and more. And we are taking action to respond."

Inslee argued that "the United States Supreme Court has ruled on three separate occasions that the EPA has a responsibility, under the Clean Air Act and other federal laws, to protect American communities from harmful carbon pollution."

The Supreme Court in 2007 ruled that EPA would have authority to regulate carbon if the agency found it to be a danger to public health. EPA subsequently decided that carbon is a pollutant. For Pruitt to avoid climate regulations outright, he would have to fight that finding, which many legal experts say is a losing battle.

EPA lays out options for replacement to Clean Power Plan Back

By Emily Holden | 10/10/2017 02:06 PM EDT

EPA is considering allowing states to set their own efficiency standards for coal-fired power plants to replace the Obama administration climate regulation that would have imposed stricter pollution limits across the electricity sector, senior agency officials said during a conference call with conservative groups Tuesday.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has long argued that the Obama-era Clean Power Plan, which he proposed to withdraw Tuesday, was agency overreach because it set state carbon goals that would have forced a shift away from coal and toward natural gas and renewable power, rather than requiring changes solely at individual coal plants.

A proposal issued Tuesday raised the possibility of a coal plant-focused replacement, but the comments on the phone call give a clearer indication of what EPA is considering as a replacement.

EPA is proposing to return to its "traditional view of scope and authority" under the law, one administration official said on the call, "which means we are going out to the facility and setting source-by-source specific standards.

"EPA has authority to set up a process. It is then the states that take that process and based on their source-by-source analysis and respective localized environmental characteristics set standards that are actually feasible and achievable," the official said on the call that POLITICO monitored.

That would "ensure that states can still make the decision to keep a diverse fuel supply," according to the official.

EPA plans to issue an advance notice of proposed rulemaking in a few weeks to take comment on crafting the replacement to the Clean Power Plan, officials said. EPA will also hold a public hearing and take comments for 60 days after the proposal signed Tuesday is published in the Federal Register, according to officials on Tuesday's call.

Another administration official described the Clean Power Plan as a "novel and expansive view of agency authority" that would have cost consumers $33 billion and forced companies to shut down coal plants.

"Repealing the Clean Power Plan is another step advancing the president's America First strategy and is an example of President [Donald] Trump keeping his promises to the American people," the official said, hewing to talking points acquired by POLITICO on Oct. 7.

The officials on the conference call with more than a dozen participants heard from climate science opponents who urged the administration to convince Americans that, contrary to mainstream research, carbon dioxide does not cause global warming. And they called on EPA to fight the legal finding that requires it to write a replacement rule and regulate emissions.

"Eventually we really need to move to get rid of the endangerment ruling of the Supreme Court," said Jay Lehr, science director for the Heartland Institute, which argues that human activity does not affect the climate. "I think in order to do this in everything EPA does and the president does, we need to begin laying the groundwork for the American public to understand that carbon dioxide is not a contaminant. It is in fact why we live on this planet, it is a breath of life, it has no endangering aspects."

One official suggested Lehr file that idea as a comment in response to the agency's upcoming notice about replacing the Clean Power Plan.

"That will be especially beneficial for us to consider as we move forward," the official said.

Another questioner from Heartland, research fellow Sterling Burnett, suggested the Obama rule might have cost even more than the $33 billion that Pruitt's EPA is contending, although that figure has been criticized as too high by former EPA officials and think tanks.

Burnett also urged EPA not to allow states like California to set higher climate standards than the federal government. The administration officials encouraged him to submit that idea to the agency in the comment-gathering period.

The official also noted that EPA's cost estimates were "interim" figures that might be adjusted.

A third administration official added that "if any stakeholders out there feel that the figures presented in this proposal do not adequately reflect costs for one reason or another, that would be a very good thing I think to submit in comment because that may shape the analysis that's attached with any final action we may take on this proposed repeal."

5 big things Trump is doing to reverse Obama's climate policies Back

By Alex Guillén and Eric Wolff | 10/10/2017 08:34 PM EDT

The Trump administration is gutting President Barack Obama's climate legacy with a series of moves designed to favor the fossil fuel industry while punishing solar and wind energy producers — and Tuesday's proposal to repeal an Environmental Protection Agency rule on power plants is just the most visible.

President Donald Trump's agencies have also taken steps toward buttressing coal's historically dominant role in the electricity markets, protecting it from rising competition from cleaner sources like natural gas and wind. The administration has opened the door to rolling back the stricter fuel-efficiency standards for cars and trucks that are due to take effect in 2022. And Trump's Interior Department is loosening Obama's limits on fossil fuel production on federal lands, while potentially clamping down on leases for wind and solar projects.

Also waiting in the wings is an upcoming trade decision that would allow Trump to sharply increase the cost of solar installations in the U.S. — eroding sun-powered electricity's ability to compete just as it weans itself off federal subsidies.

Trump's supporters say the steps are needed to protect jobs and American energy dominance. But clean-energy advocates say the actions imperil the planet's future.

"In the midst of flood and fire, our federal government is resolutely deciding to cover its eyes," said climate activist Bill McKibben, referring to the intense hurricanes and Western wildfires that have ravaged the U.S. "History will judge few things more harshly."

Here are five of the biggest U.S. energy policy shifts taking place under Trump:

1) Killing the power plant rule

The Clean Power Plan that the EPA is moving to revoke was the crown jewel of Obama's climate change legacy — representing the first time the U.S. had gone after the climate-warming pollution that's belched out of coal-fired power plants' smokestacks. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt — a former Oklahoma attorney general who had sued to block the regulation — signed the paperwork Tuesday to begin the long process of withdrawing the rule, fulfilling a Trump campaign promise.

The power plant rule sought to capitalize on the U.S. electric industry's shift away from coal and toward natural gas and renewables. The Obama EPA had estimated the rule would cut the power sector's carbon dioxide emissions 32 percent below 2005 levels by 2030. (The U.S. is already more than halfway to that goal even without the rule.)

"This is a policy that the world wants and that makes sense because of market forces and a policy the world needs because, hello, we're seeing climate change effects on people every day," said Janet McCabe, Obama's former EPA air chief.

EPA's new repeal proposal echoes the coal industry's arguments — and Pruitt's previous legal filings — in contending that the Obama administration overstepped its authority.

Pruitt's agency is considering a potential replacement rule, but one that would yield much smaller emissions cuts. If that effort succeeds, a future Democratic administration could find itself barred from imposing significant regulations on greenhouse gases from other major polluting industries.

2) Securing coal's place in the markets

Energy Secretary Rick Perry issued a surprise directive last month aimed at altering the nation's electricity markets by giving an economic advantage to power plants that keep large fuel supplies on site — a move clearly aimed at helping the coal industry ward off increasingly stiff competition. (It would also benefit nuclear power, another economically struggling sector.)

Coal is the nation's most abundant power-plant fuel, but a combination of environmental regulations, huge surges in natural gas and wind-energy production and slumping demand for electricity have prompted power companies to shutter many coal-burning plants in the past decade. As recently as 2007, coal fueled more than half the electric power sector's net electricity generation — but as of this summer, that had fallen to less than a third.

Green-energy supporters say simple economics are spelling coal's demise — but Perry has argued that the trend puts the "resiliency" of the nation's power grid at risk, endangering national and economic security. His plan, if enacted by the independent Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, would insulate coal and nuclear power plants from the low power prices that have put dozens of older plants into retirement.

DOE's proposal, according to one Montana utility regulator, would be "the largest change to electricity regulation in decades."

Critics say the rule could heap billions of dollars in additional energy costs on homes and businesses without a guarantee that they wouldn't lose power when the next hurricane rips out their power lines or a polar vortex freezes the pile of coal at a power plant.

But that decision will ultimately fall to the five commissioners of FERC, an agency made up largely of technocrats that has long sought to safeguard the energy markets. The markets aren't perfect, but Perry's rule is "a draconian way of fixing it," said Pat Wood, a former FERC chief who was appointed by President George W. Bush.

3) Launching a solar trade war?

A vote by a federal trade panel last month will allow Trump to impose tariffs or a quota on imported solar panels that make up the vast majority of the fast-growing U.S. renewables market — if he chooses to.

The decision by the U.S. International Trade Commission agreed with bankrupt solar manufacturers Suniva and SolarWorld that the low-cost imports had harmed U.S.-based producers. Now, people following the case expect that Trump will slap trade barriers on the imported solar equipment, which is largely produced by Chinese-based companies at factories across Asia.

Those barriers would help the small number of U.S.-based solar manufacturers that remain in existence but could send costs skyrocketing and hurt the much larger solar installation industry. It would also threaten to end the U.S. solar boom, which saw the technology become the country's biggest source of new power generation last year for the first time ever.

With the help of federal subsidies, which will be fully phased out by 2020, the solar industry has slashed costs far faster than predicted and grown more rapidly than expected. But the production of cells and panels has shifted to countries like Malaysia, Vietnam and South Korea.

The ITC will send its recommendations for trade remedies to Trump by Nov. 13 — though the White House can ultimately implement any barrier it chooses. That has solar installers and project developers in a panic, and many are stockpiling panels ahead of possible tariffs. The Solar Energy Industries Association is predicting up to 88,000 job losses, or nearly a third of the U.S. sector. And if domestic manufacturing ramps over the next year, 2018 is likely to see supply shortfalls and price spikes as production fails to catch even reduced demand.

4) Hitting the brakes on fuel economy

Trump announced in March that EPA would reconsider the tightened mileage standards that Obama had imposed for cars sold from 2022 to 2025, a move the former president's agencies had said would lift the average to about 50 miles per gallon. Trump's agency is expected to roll back the requirements.

In a review hastened to completion just before Obama left office, then-EPA chief Gina McCarthy affirmed that the aggressive mileage standard was feasible.

Trump's decision to review the target came amid pressure from U.S. automakers to cut back the standards, but it could backfire. The Clean Air Act includes an exception for California to set its own mileage standards, and if EPA changes the requirements, it won't affect California or the 11 other states that follow the Golden State's lead. For automakers, it opens up the nightmare scenario of producing cars for two different U.S. standards.

5) Opening federal lands to fossil fuels

Trump's Interior Department is seeking to boost oil, gas and coal production by taking a hatchet to Obama-era regulations that govern fossil fuel production on public land. One of the biggest moves so far would reverse Obama's tightened restrictions on leaks of planet-warming methane from drilling wells, pipelines and other infrastructure.

Interior also said it would postpone and rewrite a controversial Obama administration rule that requires drillers to publicly disclose the chemicals they used to frack wells on federal land, among other things.

Interior also has scuttled a review that probably would likely have increased the royalties that coal companies must pay to mine on federal land. And in August, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke recommended that Trump shrink the size of several national monuments in Utah, Oregon and Nevada, a move that would potentially open them up for drilling or mining. Zinke is aiming to lift restrictions on grazing, mining, fishing and timber harvesting at those and a handful of other monuments.

Besides fighting against previous rules, Interior is trying to take steps it says will increase oil production off the Alaskan coasts and in the long-protected Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Zinke's travels: Ski resort and Alaskan steakhouse Back

By Esther Whieldon and Ben Lefebvre | 10/10/2017 07:32 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has attended at least two additional political fundraisers while traveling for official business, including a weekend ski getaway less than three weeks after he was sworn in that donors paid up to $3,000 to attend, according to sources and documents reviewed by POLITICO.

Zinke's previously undisclosed attendance at the events adds to scrutiny he is facing over his habit of mixing political activities with official business when traveling outside of Washington, D.C., and to questions over travel expenses incurred by members of President Donald Trump's Cabinet. In addition to the fundraisers, Zinke has held at least a half-dozen other events with big donors or influential conservative organizations while on official trips.

Zinke, a former Montana congressman who became secretary March 1, started his fundraising appearances even before attending a March 30 Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser in St. Croix that POLITICO reported last week, at which donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with him. The Justice Department's Office of Special Counsel, which is investigating Zinke's use of travel and political activities in office, has been asked by a watchdog group to look into his appearance there.

In the first of the newly disclosed appearances, Zinke attended a mid-March fundraiser at a ski resort in Big Sky, Montana, organized by committees affiliated with Republican Sen. Steve Daines, according to two attendees who saw him there. And in May, Zinke briefly stopped by a fundraiser for GOP Rep. Don Young at a steakhouse in Anchorage, Alaska, a spokesman for Young's campaign told POLITICO.

All three fundraisers occurred on trips that Zinke took for official Interior Department business. The Hatch Act and other federal laws allow Cabinet secretaries to participate in partisan political activities only if they do so on their own time and do not use any governmental resources. Federal Election Commission records for the campaign committees do not list any reimbursement payments to Interior for the events.

"Both law and common sense tell us that taxpayer resources are supposed to be used when you're doing the taxpayers' business [but] are not supposed to be used to help candidates get elected," said Brendan Fischer of the nonprofit watchdog organization Campaign Legal Center.

An Interior Department spokeswoman did not respond to specific questions about Zinke's attendance at the events nor whether the campaigns reimbursed Interior for any of his travel expenses, but she said ethics officials sign off on the secretary's trips and all of them comply with the law.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Other guests attending the Montana fundraiser included Sens. John Hoeven (R-N.D.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), according to an invitation to the March 17-19 event posted by a local political blog earlier that month. Donors were asked to contribute $3,000 if they were attending on behalf of a political action committee or $1,500 for an individual. Another invitation for events that weekend obtained by POLITICO sought donations as low as $500 to attend two dinners for Daines.

Hoeven hosted his own reception Friday night before the Daines dinner and a lunch Saturday, according to a campaign invitation obtained by POLITICO, which also informed guests that they could purchase "discounted ski lift tickets" at the resort.

Zinke was not named on the invitations, but his official schedule lists him as attending a "welcoming reception" for Daines on Friday night, spending "personal time with Senator Murkowski" at Big Sky Resort on Saturday and attending a "reception & dinner" for Daines that evening.

Two sources who attended the Daines fundraiser recalled seeing Zinke there. One of the sources, a lobbyist, said Zinke attended the Friday night social and the breakfast buffet the next day. The lobbyist said that when Daines introduced Zinke, the Montana senator mentioned that Zinke was the state's first Cabinet secretary.

The Hatch Act bars Zinke from taking part in political events while acting in his official role as Interior secretary, which includes being identified by his title in invitations. But Richard Painter, a University of Minnesota professor and former White House chief ethics lawyer under President George W. Bush, said Daines referring to Zinke's Cabinet position doesn't appear to violate the law.

Zinke "should take reasonable steps to make sure people aren't using his official title" and not use the title himself at political events, Painter said. "But I don't know that he has an obligation to jump in and tell the senator he can't do that."

The secretary spent most of the day that Friday touring Yellowstone National Park, which the Interior Department manages through the National Park Service. He did not have any other official events listed on his schedule for Saturday and flew back to Washington, D.C., on Sunday.

A report posted by Interior on Zinke's March travel expenses shows that he claimed 75 percent of his per diem that Friday and did not claim any lodging or reimbursements over that weekend, which he took as personal days off. He did fly home on official taxpayer-funded travel, however.

The Young fundraiser occurred May 31, when Zinke was in Anchorage for a speech to the Alaska Oil and Gas Association's annual conference, where he signed a secretarial order for an updated assessment of how much oil exists in part of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The invitation to the reception, a copy of which was obtained by political blog Must Read Alaska and shared with POLITICO, does not list Zinke as a special guest, nor does it say how much donors had to contribute to attend.

FEC records for the Alaskans for Don Young campaign committee show it received $9,800 in campaign contributions from individuals and political action committees on that day.

Young's campaign spokesman, Matt Shuckerow, said in an email that Zinke made "only very brief remarks" at the event, and that the campaign did not confirm his attendance in advance and did not require guests to pay to attend. "Not only did the campaign seek out the guidance of the Interior Department's ethics personnel prior to the event, it took concerted efforts to follow their strict guidance," Shuckerow said. He did not say whether the campaign reimbursed the Interior Department for any costs associated with Zinke's trip.

Zinke's calendar for that day includes a brief stop at Sullivan's Steakhouse in Anchorage, the same venue listed on the invitation, for a "Rep. Don Young Reception." Later that night, Zinke went to dinner with representatives of sportsmen's groups, according to his schedule.

The Anchorage stop came in the middle of a weeklong trip that included the use of a military plane to fly from Washington, D.C., to Norway, Greenland and then Alaska. Interior paid for Zinke and three Interior staff members to take the flight. Zinke's wife, Lola, also accompanied him on the trip but reimbursed the government for the cost of her seat, Interior has said.

In both of the newly disclosed appearances, Zinke did not pose for photos with high-dollar donors, as had been the case with the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser. POLITICO's report on Zinke's appearance in that photo line led Walter Shaub, a former director of the U.S. Office of Government Ethics who is now with the Campaign Legal Center, to ask the Office of Special Counsel to open a Hatch Act investigation. The OSC typically opens investigations in response to complaints it receives, but a spokesman declined to comment on the status of Shaub's request.

Still, some watchdogs question whether Zinke is focused enough on his day job given how much attention he has paid to politics.

"There's always the risk that a high-level government official spending more time involved in political events may not be attending to their official duties," said Nick Schwellenbach, director of investigations at Project On Government Oversight.

White House seeks $4.9B to shore up Puerto Rico finances Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/10/2017 07:11 PM EDT

The Trump administration today sought an additional $4.9 billion in emergency hurricane aid to stave off what Puerto Rico's governor recently warned could become a fiscal catastrophe.

The OMB sent a formal request to House leadership this afternoon, revising its most recent recovery package request to nearly $35 billion.

The extra $4.9 billion would "address the immediate liquidity issue that Puerto Rico is having," OMB spokesman John Czwartacki told POLITICO. It would allow the island government to make its payroll and fund pensions amid its worst natural disaster in decades.

The White House's request exceeds the $4 billion request from Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló last week, though it would be delivered in the form of a loan, rather than a grant.

In his letter to the White House, Rosselló warned that Puerto Rico's government needed an immediate cash infusion.

"In addition to the immediate humanitarian crisis, Puerto Rico is on the brink of a massive liquidity crisis that will intensify in the immediate future," the governor wrote to the White House.

The loan funds would likely be added to the storm recovery package that the House is expected to approve this week.

The House Appropriations Committee has received and is reviewing the request, a GOP aide confirmed.

Drinking water utilities push for farm bill water protections Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 10/10/2017 07:17 PM EDT

The American Water Works Association — a group representing drinking water utilities — is urging lawmakers to include in the next farm bill provisions and funding to better protect drinking water sources from agricultural runoff.

Tracy Mehan, AWWA's executive director of government affairs, said the group is getting more involved in the farm bill process than in years past in light of high-profile instances of utilities' source water being contaminated by nitrate and other agriculture-related pollutants — including the Des Moines Water Works' unsuccessful challenge of upstream counties over farm runoff and the algal bloom that shut down Toledo's water supply in 2014.

AWWA is asking lawmakers to include "robust overall funding" for the conservation title — keeping it at $6 billion, if not adding to the current allotment. The group also wants farm bill conservation programs to prioritize protection of drinking water, increase benefits to farmers for practices that safeguard source water, and ensure at least 10 percent of conservation funds are devoted to water-quality efforts.

"We need to sensitize USDA and the relevant committees to the importance of public health" and the issues that arise from farm runoff and chemicals that make their way into bodies of water, Mehan said. For example, nitrogen, a key ingredient in fertilizer, can cause developmental problems and pose cancer risks if present at high levels in drinking water. A report earlier this year from the Environmental Working Group found the contaminant to be present in the drinking water of 218 million Americans.

While conservation programs already address water-quality issues, Mehan said AWWA's focus is to get more resources and reporting aimed at potable water sources. "We assume that a lot of the money that they are spending already is probably useful and could be legitimately categorized as [being spent on] source water protection; we would just like to be more specific and track it," Mehan said of his group's requests.

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by ExxonMobil: Senate expected to send Pruitt an air chief today — Senate Energy slots in Nov. 15 ANWR markup as text released — East vs. West coal battle heats up — New hurdle for nuclear waste bill
Date: Thursday, November 09, 2017 5:43:31 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 11/09/2017 05:41 AM EDT

With help from Emily Holden and Eric Wolff

HELP'S ON THE WAY: The Senate is expected to confirm William Wehrum today at 11:30 a.m. to run EPA's air office, sending Administrator Scott Pruitt a key, if controversial, lieutenant as he embarks on a sweeping agenda to roll back a host of Obama-era air regulations. Barring any huge surprises (the cloture vote was along party-lines), Wehrum is expected to receive unanimous Republican backing and universal Democratic opposition.

Al Franken made a candid hot mic comment during the cloture vote. Watch here.

Pressure to testify ramps up: With help on the way to the agency, look for Congress to further lean on Pruitt to return for oversight hearings. House Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus told reporters he's personally told Pruitt within the past two weeks that he needs to appear before the committee. "I know that I said, 'You know you're eventually going to have to come before the committee, and the sooner you do it the better,'" he said. "He was quiet." House Science Chairman Lamar Smith said in a letter his staff was working on finding "a mutually convenient time" for Pruitt to come. From ME's perspective, Hill Republicans may have to do more than nicely ask for Pruitt to appear.

Speaking of Pruitt, a tipster tells ME they spotted the administrator in first class on a flight from D.C. to Detroit on Wednesday morning. An agency spokeswoman wouldn't say where he was going or what he was doing once he arrived.

Hey, EPA: That's not how this works. Pruitt is a Cabinet official, not a private citizen. His responsibilities include testifying before Congress regularly, and the public has a right to know where he is on a given day. Unlike Pruitt, other Cabinet officials — including Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, Defense Secretary Jim Mattis, Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross (even President Donald Trump himself) — regularly provide their daily schedules in advance.

So where is he today? Pruitt's slated to meet with the American Chemistry Council's board of directors for 2-1/2 hours on Kiawah Island, S.C.

IF IT'S THURSDAY, ME'S HERE FOR YOU! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and EPA deputy nominee Andrew Wheeler was first (on the morning of his confirmation hearing!) to identify that Sen. Shelley Moore Capito's father, Arch Moore, served three terms as West Virginia governor before legal troubles ended his career. For today: Which former lawmaker left the House to become a public works commissioner? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to adragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

ANWR LEGISLATION RELEASED: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski released a four-page reconciliation package late Wednesday that would open Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska to oil and gas drilling. According to the CBO, the measure would net $1.092 billion over the 10-year budget while limiting development to 2,000 acres of federal land. The release allows the committee to move on to a markup on Nov. 15. Efforts to open ANWR to drilling are staunchly opposed by Democrats, including Ranking Member Maria Cantwell, and environmental advocates. Remember instructions in the budget resolution, H. Con. Res. 71, require Murkowski's committee to raise $1 billion in revenue over the next decade.

Hot docs: Text of the chairman's mark here. Summary of the mark here. Map of the area under consideration here.

NEW EAST V. WEST BEEF: Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resiliency push to boost the coal and nuclear sectors is casting a brighter light on the ever-expanding divide between the coal industry's Appalachian mines and Wyoming's Powder River Basin, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. And though the Trump administration has paid close attention to boosting the fortunes of Appalachia in its early months, experts say the industry's future appears brighter out West. "The industry recognizes it's just a fact of geology and Mother Nature and economics," said analyst Michael Dudas of Vertical Research Partners. "Over the past decades, the mix has certainly gone away from Appalachia towards the Powder River Basin."

Eastern and Western coal states have been on different trajectories for decades, with 56 percent of U.S. coal production in 2015 coming from the Western region and just 25 percent from Appalachia. Western coal is easier to access and reserves are so abundant that companies were able to absorb an Obama-era moratorium on new leases largely unfazed. "In the grand scheme of things, economically, we're the better bet for a utility," Travis Deti, executive director of the Wyoming Mining Association, said.

But the nostalgia factor: Appalachia is the nation's sole producer of metallurgical coal, high-grade fuel used to make steel and other metals and is better-positioned to export its coal. But beyond those factors, it continues to occupy an overwhelming cultural and political presence in parts of the country. "Our advantage is we have the best coal miners in the world and we got probably some of the best coal in the world right here. The Lord blessed us in that standpoint," Bill Raney, president of the West Virginia Coal Association, said.

NUCLEAR WASTE BILL HITS NEW HURDLE: A dispute between Shimkus and House Appropriators over how money from the Nuclear Waste Fund is spent must be resolved before a bipartisan nuclear waste bill can hit the floor, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. At issue is mandatory spending in the Shimkus bill that would go to operating costs related to Yucca Mountain and additional payments through a "benefits agreement" with the state of Nevada. Current law has Congress dole out monies from the fund during the annual appropriations process and lawmakers on that panel don't want to cede that power. "My frustration is that we are serious but the appropriators, right now, are still wedded to a year-to-year process," Shimkus told Darius.

It's a pile-on! Even if the bill gets out of the House, there's been little appetite to move on the issue in the Senate where leadership doesn't want to put vulnerable Nevada Republican Sen. Dean Heller in a tough spot. "Senate Republicans have made it clear they don't want to move forward on Yucca Mountain because it could hurt Sen. Heller," a senior Senate aide said. Heller said in an interview — with a smile — he'd been pushing Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to keep Yucca funding out of the next spending package. "I think we'll get there," he added.

HOW ABOUT A MEETING? The Senate's number two Democrat has no plans to lift his hold on multiple Interior nominees until Secretary Ryan Zinke meets with his office about his review of national monument designations, your ME host reports. "A meeting, how about that for a radical idea?" Sen. Dick Durbin told ME when asked what it would take to lift the holds. "We asked the secretary to meet with us and he won't do it." Zinke demanded the senators "lift the random and senseless holds" in a tweet late Wednesday.

ROUGH WATERS FOR CORPS NOMINEE? Rickey Dale "R.D." James, Trump's pick to run the Army Corps of Engineers, is likely to face scrutiny today before the Armed Services Committee over what critics say are his conflicts of interests, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. His thousands of acres of valuable Missouri farmland lie within the New Madrid floodway, a relief-valve channel that can be used to divert floodwaters from the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. James, a long-time member of the powerful Mississippi River Commission, has admitted to being conflicted about flooding the area because of his ties there. "I could not displace from my mind what the decision would mean to my friends and neighbors," James told the Defense Media Network in 2012.

His defenders include both of Mississippi's senators — Thad Cochran and Roger Wicker — and major waterways groups. Once he clears the Armed Services Committee, he will go through another hearing and vote before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. The session gavel in at 10 a.m. in Dirksen G-50.

OLD KING COAL: Michael Bloomberg and Bloomberg Philanthropies today will announce a $50 million cash infusion to launch the Europe Beyond Coal campaign to reduce the continent's dependence on coal energy. Done in partnership with the European Climate Foundation and a sister campaign on ongoing U.S efforts, both groups plan a Nov. 11 event on the sidelines of the UN's COP23 to discuss their new push.

Taking stock: As the climate confab in Bonn continues, a new analysis from Data-Driven Yale finds nearly 15,000 subnational and non-state actors have set close to 100,000 goals to curb climate change. The researchers synthesized information from 17 platforms and organizations, finding that more than 7,000 cities representing 17 percent of the world's population have climate targets. Most (5,831) are in Europe, and 554 are in North America. The study identified climate commitments from about 6,225 companies and investors with $36.5 trillion in revenue, and from 34 of the world's 57 largest banks, as well as 700 U.S. colleges and universities

HYDROPOWERING THROUGH: The House voted 257 to 166 on Wednesday to approve the Hydropower Policy Modernization Act H.R. 3043 \(115\) revamping the permitting process for hydropower projects. "This bill won't change outcomes or environmental standards. Instead, it will speed up the relicensing process and save time and money," bill sponsor Rep. Cathy McMorris Rodgers said in a statement. Twenty-six Democrats backed the measure, while three Republicans voted against it.

BISHOP'S 'DISAPPOINTED' BY PREPA'S ABSENCE: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop told ME he's "disappointed" but not surprised the head of Puerto Rico's utility backed out of a congressional hearing earlier this week. "They would have had to face all the questions about Whitefish, so I kind of understand why they didn't necessarily want to be there," he said. "If we're trying to solve the problem, spending a lot of time on Whitefish would be fun but not necessarily essential with moving forward."

FIGURE IT OUT: Democratic Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Michael Bennet asked FERC in a Wednesday letter to reverse course and include the social cost of carbon as part of its review of pipeline projects. They included a point-by-point rebuttal of a recent draft FERC analysis in which the commission said it would not include the figure estimating societal costs of carbon pollution in its analyses.

ATLANTIC SUNRISE CAN PROCEED: A three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit denied a request Wednesday from community and environmental groups to halt construction of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline while a broader challenge to FERC approval of the project proceeds, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "Petitioners have not satisfied the stringent requirements for a stay pending court review," the court said in its order.

MAIL CALL! THANKS, MR. PRESIDENT! A group of advanced biofuel producers, including ethanol giants Archer Daniels Midland and POET, sent a letter to Trump thanking him for past support of the ethanol industry and asking him to make sure advanced biofuel volumes are raised from proposed levels. "Mr. President, we very much appreciate your ongoing commitment to the biofuels industry and the Americans who work every day to produce biofuels and other bio-based, agricultural products," the letter says.

Hey, House, lay off our wind tax credit: Rhode Island Gov. Gina Raimondo and South Dakota Gov. Dennis Daugaard are asking House tax writers to lay off changes to the wind tax credit. In a letter to Ways & Means Chairman Kevin Brady and ranking member Richard Neal, the pair, who are also the current and past chairmen of the Governors Wind and Solar Energy Coalition, say the bill should drop its provisions that change how wind projects qualify and that eliminate an inflation adjustment. Fifteen House members, led by Rep. David Young, made a similar plea in their own letter Wednesday.

Not sold: A group of 17 environmental and public health groups sent a letter to the House on Wednesday strongly opposing the chamber's tax package, H.R. 1 \(115\). "The plan puts at risk our clean energy future by preserving tax breaks for dirty energy sources while slashing them for cleaner forms of energy," the letter, signed by groups like the Center for Biological Diversity, Sierra Club and Oil Change International, says. "And if the tax plan itself weren't harmful enough, it is also being packaged in the Senate with unrelated, controversial legislation that hands over the pristine and sacred Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to exploitation by Big Oil."

Energy research can be fun(ded)! A group of business leaders sent a letter to top House and Senate appropriators urging robust energy research funding. "Ensuring America stays at the forefront of global energy technology research is both an economic and security imperative," the letter, signed by leaders including Southern Co's Tom Fanning, ClearPath's Jay Faison and the U.S. Chamber's Thomas Donohue, says.

GOOD YEAR FOR PARKS: The Trust for Public Land ran the numbers and voters around the country approved $1.5 billion in local and state ballot measures for parks and conservation.

Twenty-six of the 30 local park and open space measures passed. "At a time when Americans seem to be increasingly divided, one thing we all agree on is that we love our parks, whatever our political party," Will Rogers, the group's president, said in a statement.

TAKE A GLANCE! Energy In Depth, a research program of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, is launching a website today pushing back on claims made by the #ExxonKnew campaign.

Wehrum clears cloture hurdle Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 05:30 PM EDT

The Senate invoked cloture on William Wehrum's nomination to run EPA's air office, leaving just one final vote until Administrator Scott Pruitt lands his first lieutenant.

The vote was 49-46 along party lines.

It's been an arduous process for Wehrum, a veteran of the George W. Bush Office of Air and Radiation in EPA. A vote in the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee was briefly delayed due to Republican concerns over the agency's plans for the Renewable Fuel Standard.

Democrats and environmental groups oppose his selection. During his confirmation hearing, Wehrum said the degree that human activity drives climate change remains an "open question," contradicting mainstream science.

WHAT'S NEXT: A final vote on the nomination is likely sometime on Thursday.

Nuclear waste bill clears House committee with bipartisan backing Back

By Darius Dixon | 06/28/2017 12:05 PM EDT

The House Energy and Commerce Committee approved nuclear waste reform legislation this morning on a bipartisan 49-4 vote, facing only a handful of Democratic holdouts.

The bill, H.R. 3053, sponsored by E&C Environment Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus, would make the first changes in 30 years to the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, which names Yucca Mountain as the nation's sole waste repository.

The committee agreed to a compromise manager's amendment that would let DOE open one interim storage facility while regulators continue to work on a permanent repository. That eliminated most of the Democratic objections to a draft version of the bill that would have barred such work until the Nuclear Regulatory Commission issued a decision on Yucca Mountain.

Yucca Mountain supporters have been concerned that a storage site would take the pressure off of approving a repository. Meanwhile, lawmakers have been anxious to move the waste building up at defunct nuclear power plants in their states.

Another bipartisan amendment, also approved on a voice vote, removed the bill's original language impacting Nevada's water rights and air permitting. The amendment would also increase Yucca's capacity from 70,000 metric tons to 110,000 metric tons.

The bill also authorizes payments to host states and limits work on any defense waste-only repository.

New Jersey Rep. Frank Pallone, the top Democrat on E&C, said that the bill was "a delicate and difficult negotiation, but I believe we have arrived at a very good compromise."

WHAT'S NEXT: Shimkus has said he expects the bill to get a vote by the full House before the August recess, but GOP leaders have not yet scheduled floor time for the bill.

Shimkus: Nuclear waste bill mired in dispute with appropriators Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 06:10 PM EDT

Rep. John Shimkus is in the midst of a face-off with members of the powerful Appropriations Committee over language in his bipartisan nuclear waste bill that would limit their say in how money from the Nuclear Waste Fund is spent.

The Illinois Republican's bill, H.R. 3053, would authorize the Energy Department to open one interim storage facility while regulators review plans to permanently house it at Yucca Mountain, which would be expanded in size. But the measure also sets aside mandatory spending from the fund, an account amassed from fees on nuclear-generated electricity that was valued at $46 billion last year.

Mandatory spending in the Shimkus bill includes operating costs related to Yucca Mountain and additional payments through a "benefits agreement" with the state of Nevada. Under existing law, Congress spends money from the fund through annual appropriations bills, a process that allowed Democrats to block required regulatory reviews of Yucca Mountain for the last several years.

"We want to be able to send a signal to not just DOE to move forward and that there's going to be some consistent funding, but we also want to send a signal to the state of Nevada that if there's going to be an agreement on benefits that that's not at the whim of a year-to-year process," Shimkus told POLITICO on Wednesday. "My frustration is that we are serious but the appropriators, right now, are still wedded to a year-to-year process."

GOP leadership "wants us to resolve this conflict" before bringing the bill to the floor, Shimkus said.

Given the fund's $46 billion value last year, Shimkus' bill would permit DOE to spend at least $500 million annually for the construction and operation of a Yucca Mountain facility as well as payments to Nevada for hosting "without further appropriation."

Shimkus said the negotiations with appropriators over his bill are separate from the omnibus spending bill lawmakers need to address next month, making it difficult to estimate when the conflict might be resolved.

The showdown is only the latest hurdle for long-suffering nuclear advocates who want the U.S. to establish a permanent waste repository.

Even if Shimkus and the appropriators resolve their differences on his bill, the Senate has shown little appetite this year for addressing a permanent nuclear waste repository, despite the retirement of former Democratic Leader Harry Reid, Yucca Mountain's No. 1 foe. Nevada Republican Dean Heller, who faces one of the toughest reelection fights next year, has become the biggest roadblock in the upper chamber. The House included $150 million to restart Yucca in its fiscal 2018 spending bill for the Energy Department and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, but the Senate did not follow suit and seems unlikely to go along with including the funds in an omnibus.

"Senate Republicans have made it clear they don't want to move forward on Yucca Mountain because it could hurt Sen. Heller," a senior Senate aide said.

Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who chairs the appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over Yucca, acknowledged in a recent interview that Heller is "a well-respected, influential U.S. senator, so his views will be paid attention to by lots of senators," but that it was too soon to tell how a final deal would shake out.

Heller himself wouldn't say whether he'd secured any assurances from Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to keep new Yucca funds out of the next spending law. "I keep urging it," he said with a smile. "I think we'll get there."

The Senate is "not passionate about this," said Tim Peckinpaugh, a partner at K&L Gates, a law firm that was involved with the lawsuits that sued to force the federal government to continue work on the Yucca Mountain application. "I don't see a John Shimkus in the Senate," he said. "He has passion and incredible persistence on this issue. But I do see broad-based support. I'm convinced that if there's an up-or-down vote in the Senate, it would pass by big numbers — more than 60 — and I think both sides know that, quite frankly."

Simply looking at the map of where the commercial and defense nuclear waste destined for a site like Yucca Mountain currently sits, logical supporters of the new funding would include members of the Senate Democratic leadership like Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York, Dick Durbin of Illinois and Patty Murray of Washington.

But Sen. Catherine Cortez Masto (D-Nev.), like Heller, opposes Yucca in line with the rest of her state's congressional delegation. And she's convinced that Schumer, the Senate minority leader, won't support new cash for the project next month.

"I don't anticipate that there's going to be any funding," she said. "I've talked to my leadership about it. ... Sen. Schumer is opposed to it."

Durbin freezes Interior nominees over monument review Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 04:17 PM EDT

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin said in a letter today that he's placed a hold on multiple Interior nominees until the agency responds to an earlier October letter concerning his review of national monument designations.

"I remain hopeful that a meeting can be scheduled in the near future to discuss these important issues," he wrote to Micah Chambers, acting director of Interior's Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs. "Please let the Secretary know that while my colleagues and I await his scheduling decision, my holds on Department of Interior nominees will continue."

In that previously unreleased October letter, Sens. Tom Udall, Martin Heinrich and Jeff Merkley and Durbin asked Zinke to meet with Durbin's office to explain his recommendations to shrink several national monuments created under the Antiquities Act by prior administrations.

They also requested maps, documentation and justifications for those recommendations and called for his report to be released publicly.

Zinke sent a letter earlier today to Senate leadership demanding "immediate action" on multiple Interior nominations that have been held up for months.

WHAT'S NEXT: Durbin said his hold on the nominees will continue until Zinke agrees to a meeting.

Army Corps nominee to face scrutiny over Mississippi River project Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 06:36 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's pick to run the Army Corps of Engineers, Rickey Dale "R.D." James, is likely to draw some scrutiny on Thursday over what critics complain is his conflict of interest over a controversial Mississippi River flood control project.

James, a civil engineer by training, was recommended to Trump by Sens. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) to head the agency with a $6 billion budget that takes the lead on major water infrastructure projects across the U.S.

The pair were impressed by James' 36 years sitting on the Mississippi River Commission, which along with the Corps oversees water projects on the nation's biggest river and its many tributaries.

"He has been a friend to Mississippi in terms of supporting projects and policies to improve navigation and flood control in our state," Cochran said in a statement.

Cochran chairs the Appropriations Committee and thus exercises great power over the Army Corps' budget, while Wicker is a senior member of the Armed Services Committee, which will host Thursday's hearing.

Major waterway groups are pleased as well.

"Given his tenure on the Mississippi River Commission, he really has an in-depth knowledge of the Corps of Engineers and the importance of investing in infrastructure," said Amy Larson of the National Waterways Conference.

But James' critics say he used his position on the powerful commission to protect his own interests, which include thousands of acres of valuable Missouri farmland sitting inside a controversial floodway.

"He has a long history of advocating for environmentally devastating and costly projects that benefit a handful of special interests," said Melissa Samet, a water attorney at the National Wildlife Federation. "And a lot of that advocacy has been carried out despite what we see as a clear conflict of interest with his position at the Mississippi River Commission."

James and his wife own New Madrid farmland worth between $2.5 million and $11 million, according to his financial disclosure. Some of that land is rented out via a family limited partnership. If confirmed to the Army Corps post, James has promised to hand over control of the farmland and a company he owns to his son, although he will still receive crop rent income.

James' farmland lies squarely within the New Madrid floodway, a relief-valve channel that can be used to divert floodwaters from the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. But using the floodway — as has happened twice in the last 90 years — means damaging James' farm and the land of other politically powerful landholders.

Following the most recent flooding in 2011, the Army Corps delayed blowing out a levee that would activate the floodway, and the state even sued in an attempt to stop it, despite rising flood levels in Cairo, Ill., up the Mississippi River. James, who consulted on the decision, said he had been conflicted about flooding the Missouri farmland because of his family's holdings.

"My family's land lies within the floodway, and I could not displace from my mind what the decision would mean to my friends and neighbors," James told the Defense Media Network in 2012.

The political battle over whether to replace that levee, which would protect the land owned by James and other farm owners but leave small Illinois towns at risk of flooding in the future, continues to this day.

James will likely also find himself at the center of budget battles between the White House, which has proposed a steep 16 percent spending cut in the Army Corps' budget to $5 billion, and lawmakers who are desperate to fund more major civil works projects in their states.

The Senate budget package calls for a small boost to $6.2 billion, slightly above the $6.16 billion sought by the House. It is unclear whether those increases will survive whatever spending deal Congress eventually strikes, but the Army Corps' funding is unlikely to decrease from fiscal 2017.

Larson said James' personal experiences with Corps projects means he is well placed to pressure the White House to maintain or increase project funding. "Given his position, he understands that we need additional funds for investments in the nation's infrastructure," she said.

And James will play a major role in helping EPA rewrite its Waters of the U.S. regulation, which will determine the waterways that fall under federal jurisdiction. EPA has indicated it will not propose a new version of the Obama rule until early next year.

Once James clears the Armed Services Committee, he will go through another hearing and vote before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

In addition to the farm, James manages a Missouri cotton gin and grain elevator company. His term on the Mississippi River Commission is the group's second-longest tenure, and he was most recently reappointed by former President Barack Obama in January.

James has given more than $21,000 to federal candidates since the 1990s, according to FEC records. Most of that money went to Missouri lawmakers, including former Sen. Jim Talent and former Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, both Republicans, and Rep. Marion Berry, a Democrat from Arkansas' 1st Congressional District. The only presidential campaign he gave to was Rudy Giuliani in 2007.

James and his wife report owning stocks in the utilities Dominion Energy and American Electric Power, natural gas company Spectra Energy and oil giant Shell.

Appeals court denies stay on Atlantic Sunrise pipeline construction Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 06:22 PM EDT

A federal court panel today denied a request from community and environmental groups to halt construction of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline while those organizations challenge FERC's approval of the project.

"Petitioners have not satisfied the stringent requirements for a stay pending court review," a three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals said in the order.

The panel instituted an administrative stay on Monday while it weighed whether to grant the full stay, which would've been in place until the lawsuit, Allegheny Defense Project, et al v. FERC, 17-1098, was resolved.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court still needs to establish the briefing schedule for the lawsuit and has not decided when or whether to hold oral arguments.

AT LAST MY TAX IS COMPLETE AGAIN! Senate tax writers waited until 9 p.m. Thursday to roll out their tax bill, and here's what jumped out to ME's bleary-eyes:

— The big stuff everyone gets: The Senate bill, like the House bill, cuts the corporate tax rate to 20 percent, something pretty much all the energy companies will like. And the bill provides a temporary ability to use 100 percent expensing of capital, a boon to capital-intensive energy industries like oil, natural gas, coal mining, and even renewables, though solar companies have an interaction between the Investment Tax Credit and expensing that may cause unpleasant side-effects.

— Oil gets a change to treatment of foreign income: ME noticed that oil comes up several times in the tax bill, but the one that jumped out was the oil industry got a $4 billion boost from a change to the treatment of refining and pipeline operations overseas in the Senate bill, the same as it got in the House bill. An industry source told ME earlier in the week that the change actually has little impact on bottom lines, since it mostly changes in what tax year foreign subsidiaries transfer money up to parent companies. The source was baffled as to why the Joint Committee on Taxation gave it a score in the House version, and will no doubt still be baffled at the score in the Senate version.

— Utilities keep their exception to the interest deduction changes. The Senate bill cuts the amount of interest businesses can deduct, but utilities, who favor the provision much more than 100 percent expensing, get a carveout.

— No home for the orphans: Senate tax writers opted not to deal with a slew of expired energy tax credits that found homes in the House bill. Nothing for fuel cells, small wind, microturbines, or even the nuclear tax credit extension. And there appeared to be nothing related to a carbon capture and sequestration credit pushed by a bipartisan group.

— Then again, windies can becalmed: The senators also did not include the changes the House made to Production Tax Credit. Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley has said the House bill didn't need to make its changes, since the PTC was already going to phase out under a 2015 agreement. "The Senate tax reform bill keeps a promise to America's more than 100,000 wind energy workers and restores the confidence of businesses pouring billions of dollars into rural America," Tom Kiernan, CEO of the American Wind Energy Association, said in a statement.

— Charged up for EVs: The Senate did not follow the House lead on electric vehicles, either. While the House wiped out a $7,500 tax credit, the Senate bill is silent.

Environmental groups are already trashing the effort. "The GOP is once again trying to redirect taxpayer money to the super-rich and super-polluting fossil fuel industry — and they expect us to pay for it by giving up our healthcare, our safety, and our children's future," Janet Redman, U.S. policy director for Oil Change International, said in one typical statement.

Bigger picture: There are massive differences between the House and Senate versions of the tax overhaul that signal hard bargaining lies ahead, POLITICO's tax gurus Aaron Lorenzo, Brian Faler and Bernie Becker report. Their take: "Reconciling the House and Senate plans and getting sign-off from Trump is likely to be daunting." Score of the Senate proposal here.

IT'S THE END OF THE WEEK AS WE KNOW IT! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and the Renewable Fuels Association's Rachel Gantz was first to pick Rep. CLIMATE HAWKS LAND IN BONN: Five Democratic senators — Ben Cardin, Ed Markey, Sheldon Whitehouse, Brian Schatz and Jeff Merkley — are on the ground at the Bonn climate talks this weekend and will hold a call today at 12:30 p.m. to discuss their goals. But their message is clear: "We're not all nuts," Whitehouse told ME.

Still in it to win it: On Saturday, California Gov. Jerry Brown and former NYC Mayor Michael Bloomberg will unveil America's Pledge with a report detailing the scope of the actions planned by non-federal entities to fight climate change. Joining them to reiterate U.S. commitment to aggressive climate action: Cardin, UNFCCC Executive Secretary Patricia Espinosa, COP23 President and Fijian Prime Minister Frank Bainimarama and Pittsburgh Mayor Bill Peduto, among others.

Big spenders: The World Resources Institute announced Thursday a private cash infusion of $2.1 billion in private funds to help restore degraded lands in Latin America and the Caribbean. "With more than $2 billion of investments earmarked for Latin America alone, restoration is a climate solution that works and is a great investment," Walter Vergara, coordinator of the new push, said in a statement. More information here.

* Presented by ExxonMobil: We're collaborating with FuelCell Energy on a novel idea to use fuel cells to capture carbon at natural gas power plants, and in the process reduce emissions and increase electrical output. This technology could be a game changer in addressing the world's growing need for energy, while also reducing the impact on the environment. Learn more. **

WHEN HE'S NOT WRITING OP-EDS: Energy Secretary Rick Perry, back from a trip to Paris this week, will headline a "roundtable discussion" in Houston on Monday afternoon on behalf of America First Policies, the pro-Trump political nonprofit, Campaign Pro's Maggie Severns reports. America First has been quiet much of the year but is now pushing to give a jolt to its fundraising and reassert its close ties to President Donald Trump. But Texas businessman Roy Bailey, who has deep ties to group, said Perry won't be there looking to raise funds. "It's a nice opportunity for people to understand what's going on at the Energy Department," Bailey said.

Remember: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has generated controversy and several investigations over his habit of mixing political activities with official government business.

CORNSTATERS NOT ALL SOLD ON WHITE: Kathleen Harnett White, Trump's pick to chair the Council on Environmental Quality, will need the support of all the Midwesterners on the Senate Environment committee if she's going to advance, and it looks like she still has some work to do on that front. Despite disavowing her previously staunch opposition to the Renewable Fuel Standard thanks to "new data" from Sen. Joni Ernst, White doesn't yet have Ernst's backing. "We're still debating that one," Ernst told ME. Veteran ME readers know the Iowa Republican extracted concessions from EPA on the RFS before backing new agency air chief Bill Wehrum.

Nebraska's Deb Fischer is also "still debating" White's nomination, and she is still looking for more information on how White would do her job. The CEQ chair doesn't have a regulatory role on RFS, but she would offer advice to Trump. "If you look at the questioning I had, I was looking at also how she would present options to the president," Fischer told ME. "That's going to be her job, not necessarily on the RFS, but where she gets her data from, how she prepares that and what kind of facts she has. We'll see how it shakes out."

Rounds a tentative yes: Mike Rounds of South Dakota said he's not totally on board, but, "I would lean yes as opposed to no." He thought she answered his questions well. "What I wanted to make sure people understood is that the RFS in its current form is the minimum we can do," he said.

PRUITT ADDRESSES ANTI-CLIMATE ACTION CONFERENCE: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt delivered a two-minute video address to a conference in Houston sponsored by the Heartland Institute, the group that opposes action to fight climate change. "I want to say to you at the Heartland Institute, thanks for what you're doing to advance energy, thanks for what you're doing to advance natural resources," Pruitt said. "There's great optimism across the country and I pray you feel that in Houston, Texas."

PAUSED FURTHER: A federal appeals court once again ordered lawsuits over the Obama administration's Clean Power Plan held in abeyance for another 60 days, until Jan. 8, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. The D.C. Circuit ordered EPA to file status updates on its CPP repeal effort every 30 days.

BLUNT MESSAGE FOR BARRASSO: Whitehouse told ME he understands why Pruitt might not want to testify before the Senate EPW committee but that Chairman John Barrasso should not let him off. "There's a point where oversight becomes a responsibility irrespective of your loyalties," he said. "I think there will be really awkward questions for him and I think the farther he stays away from a forum where he has to tell the truth, the happier he is."

DOURSON REALLY IN TROUBLE? If a vote came up today, ranking member Tom Carper told reporters, Michael Dourson, Trump's pick to run EPA's chemicals office, wouldn't have the necessary votes. "Privately, in my conversations with a number of Republicans, they have expressed deep concerns," he said. "We're going to make sure at the end of the day that he does not have the votes." And North Carolina's Thom Tillis confirmed Wednesday he's not yet ready to back Dourson: "We've heard the concerns and we're working on getting the background information."

ZINKE SAYS HE'S READY TO MEET WITH DURBIN: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a letter Thursday said he would be "happy to meet ... to discuss any issue" involving the agency with Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin who has put the confirmation of multiple Interior nominees on hold until he gets a meeting with the secretary to discuss his review of several dozen national monument designations. Zinke pointed out that he talked with a number of Democrats prior to sending the report to the White House in late August and also with Sen. Tom Udall in mid-September on the New Mexico Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks and Rio Grande Del Norte monuments. In a tweet Thursday, Zinke said he'd be "happy to talk monuments and nominees. Call anytime, Dick."

MORE INFORMATION SOUGHT ON PERRY'S PLAN: Four environmental groups — the Sierra Club, Earthjustice, the Environmental Defense Fund and the Natural Resources Defense Council — filed FOIA requests with Energy and FERC seeking information on the development of Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resiliency proposal to FERC. "It's outrageous that there is so little transparency at DOE that we have to repeatedly file these Freedom of Information Act requests instead of Rick Perry simply allowing the public and energy stakeholders to inform the policy making process," the Sierra Club's Mary Anne Hitt said in a statement.

HERE'S SOMETHING: The compromise version of the National Defense Authorization Act would require the Pentagon to rank the top 10 installations in each military branch's that are the most vulnerable to the effects of climate change over the next two decades, Pro Defense's Connor O'Brien reports. Conservatives sought to take out the provision during House floor debate earlier this year, but Democrats and moderate Republicans teamed up to leave it in.

ZINKE DENIES IMPROPRIETY IN WHITEFISH DEALINGS: During an interview with Fox News late Thursday, Zinke denied playing any role in his son landing a job with controversial Whitefish Energy — "he got a job by himself" — and said he had no role in the Montana-based company getting a now-cancelled contract to repair Puerto Rico's electric grid. "I didn't have any influence, didn't have any knowledge of the contract. Puerto Rico is not under Interior. And those elitists that would think from being a small town somehow is a crime, shame on ya," he said.

MAIL CALL! CONSERVATIVES ENDORSE 'BIGGER' MONUMENT REVIEW: Twenty-four House Republicans sent a letter to Trump Thursday urging him to "think big and act bigger" as he mulls final recommendations about what to do to a host of prior national monument designations. It recommends the outright rescission of several monuments and significant downsizing of others. "We ask that you take these recommendations to heart and that you not be deterred by a few vocal special-interests groups from finishing what you set out to accomplish with this review," they wrote.

Democrats to GAO: Expand adviser probe: Ten members of the Senate Democratic caucus, led by Whitehouse, asked GAO in a Thursday letter to expand its existing probe into EPA scientific advisory appointments to evaluate Pruitt's new order barring scientists who receive grants from serving on advisory boards. "When a policy, like this one, does not on its face address the problem it purports to solve it should get exacting scrutiny to determine what in fact its true purpose is," they wrote.

How about that coal memo? Frustrated by the lack of response from the White House and EPA, Whitehouse demanded Murray Energy head Bob Murray turn over a copy of the three-page "action plan" he gave to the administration. The document became a major focus of Andrew Wheeler's nomination hearing to be EPA deputy administrator on Wednesday.

Think of us: The Petroleum Marketers Association of America sent a letter to Barrasso on Thursday asking him to urge the Trump administration "to reduce the ethanol mandate given that the [underground storage tank] system compatibility issues present severe economic harm to small businesses" as senators discuss the RFS with administration officials. Link here.

ETHANOL, GRAINS PRODUCERS WANT BRAZIL PUNISHED: U.S. ethanol and grains producers are urging the U.S. Trade Representative to suspend Brazil's tariff benefits under the Generalized System of Preferences, which grants tariff relief on imports from developing countries, because of complaints that the South American country has put in place a restrictive quota on ethanol imports. "Brazil's decision to engage in protectionist trade measures as a result of a short-term and market-oriented deficit against the largest agriculturally related product imported from the U.S. is not in keeping with the spirit of the GSP program," the Renewable Fuels Association, Growth Energy and the U.S. Grains Council wrote in a letter to Lighthizer on Thursday.

SKEPTICISM OVER CBO'S ANWR ESTIMATE: Count Taxpayers for Common Sense among the deep skeptics that Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski's proposal to open ANWR would generate more than $1 billion in revenue over the next decade, as the Congressional Budget Office estimated it would. The non-partisan group forecasts that oil and gas companies would have to bid at levels 10 times higher than historic norms to meet the $1 billion CBO estimates would flow into federal coffers. "If Congress were to enact legislation that opened up the 1002 Area to oil and gas leasing, it is unlikely — near to the point of impossibility — that such leasing would generate the amount of revenue to the Treasury that the CBO predicts," the group's new fact sheet states. It released a second fact sheet outlining a series of other options to raise revenue through federally-owned natural resources.

California's dirty secret? The Center for Biological Diversity released a report finding three-quarters of California's oil is as harmful to the environment as Canadian tar sands. Link here.

High stakes in the desert: Failing to keep the Navajo Generating Station open could put at risk the reliability of Arizona's electric grid and the regional power supply, according to a study funded by coal giant Peabody Energy. Among the cities potentially hardest hit include Phoenix, Scottsdale, Tucson and Flagstaff, according to the study. Summary link here.

NO FUN! Amid reports the National Park Service is considering closing the National Mall to softball and frisbee games permanently, the Sierra Club's DC-based softball team, the Conservation Laborers Against Wrong, vowed a fight. "Maybe the hundreds of Congressional Republican staffers who play organized softball every summer will let Zinke and Trump know there is nothing to drill or mine for underneath the Mall," the team's coach Lauren Lantry quipped.

BLOWN AWAY? Facebook co-founder Mark Zuckerberg visited an Oklahoma wind farm where he said "it's clear that wind and renewables are the future." Full post here.

Senate GOP's tax bill points to nasty fight ahead Back

By Bernie Becker, Brian Faler and Aaron Lorenzo | 11/09/2017 11:49 AM EDT

Yawning divisions have emerged between the House, Senate and White House over tax reform, raising doubts about whether Republicans will be able to achieve their most important political and policy priority before the end of the year.

The Senate and House are split on some key issues, including the top tax rate and the timing of the corporate tax cut, and also at odds with President Donald Trump in many areas. Hard bargaining, battles between GOP factions and an onslaught of lobbying are the gauntlets Republicans will have to run to get legislation to Trump's desk by the end of the year — and into their mailers and ads for the 2018 elections.

If one thing unifies Republicans and makes the job easier than it might appear, it's the fear that they will have nothing to take into those contests after the failure of another marquee effort, repealing and replacing Obamacare. House Speaker Paul Ryan and other GOP leaders used the drubbing the party took in Tuesday's election in Virginia as a warning to the rank and file: Pass tax reform or face the wrath of Republican voters.

"We are going to conference," Ryan told reporters Thursday, after the Senate unveiled its long-awaited plan and House tax writers advanced theirs to the House floor. "Yes, the Senate bill is going to be different than the House bill because that's the legislative process."

The House Ways and Means Committee approved its bill on a party-line 24-16 vote, and House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy said the full House would vote on it next week. The Senate Finance Committee will start working on its bill next week, maybe as early as Monday.

One of the first differences to emerge was the Senate's plan to delay slashing the corporate tax rate to 20 percent from 35 percent until 2019. The House wants to cut the tax immediately, and has the White House on its side.

Cutting the corporate rate is the centerpiece of the GOP plan to lower tax rates and spur faster economic growth. But the Senate is trying to limit the revenue impact to allow a bill to pass with just 51 votes and avoid a possible Democratic filibuster.

In another break with Trump, neither the Senate bill or the House bill includes a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate requiring Americans to have health insurance. But Senate Republicans are still considering a repeal to help cover the cost of making some tax cuts permanent.

GOP leaders are talking with rank-and-file members to assess whether they have the necessary 50 votes to scrap the least popular part of Obamacare.

"I'd sure like to do that," said Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) "I think we're counting votes. It sure gives us a lot more flexibility."

Trump has pushed for repealing the mandate, along with conservative senators and House members. But many lawmakers said reopening the health care debate would just make passing the tax bill harder.

The Senate plan would set a top individual tax rate of 38.5 percent, compared to the House's 39.6 percent for annual income above $1 million, and keep deductions for people with high medical bills and for student loan interest that the House wants to discard.

It would completely eliminate a federal deduction for state and local taxes, while the House had to mollify a group of GOP lawmakers from high-tax blue states by keeping the deduction for property taxes, up to $10,000.

The Senate kept the maximum mortgage deduction at the interest on loans up to $1 million. The House would cut it to $500,000.

The House targeted the estate tax — a favorite foil of conservative Republicans — for elimination in 2025, after doubling the current exemptions to about $11 million for individuals and $22 million for married couples. The Senate is proposing only to double the exemptions.

The House proposed expanding the child tax credit to $1,600 per child from $1,000. The Senate set the increase at $1,650.

But that is still too low for some senators who want a $2,000-per-child credit because they worry some middle-income people could otherwise see their taxes go up under the plan — and they have an ally in Ivanka Trump. "While we are glad to see an increase to the child tax credit, like the House bill, it is simply not enough for working families," Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Mike Lee (R-Utah), the main champions of the issue in the Senate, said in a joint statement.

On another hot-button issue, the treatment of "pass-through" businesses that pay individual tax rates, the Senate would set a top rate of 30 percent, while owners of those businesses have been clamoring for parity with corporations. The House is offering a super-low 9 percent rate on the first $75,000 those businesses earn, which attracted praise from the powerful National Federation of Independent Business, which had panned the House bill last week.

Both bills would shift the U.S. to a "territorial" tax system that would largely shield offshore corporate income from U.S. taxation. But they parted ways on a mechanism to discourage more companies from moving abroad to take advantage of the change.

As the first details were trickling out about the Senate plan, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) unveiled a new round of changes to the House GOP's plan.

Their tax plan had ballooned beyond their budget, allowing them to cut taxes by no more than $1.5 trillion, after Republicans earlier this week gutted a plan to crack down on international tax avoidance hated by the Koch brothers and a number of multinational corporations.

The revisions include hundreds of billions of dollars in new revenue aimed at filling that budget hole. Republicans did it in part by taking back much of the money — $87 billion — they had lost when they watered down those overseas tax avoidance provisions.

Another $70 billion would come from charging companies more in a one-time tax on their overseas earnings. Under the new plan, they'd pay 14 percent on their liquid assets and 7 percent on illiquid ones like factories overseas. That's up from 12 percent and 5 percent, respectively, under the previous proposal.

House lawmakers want to raise another $20 billion by requiring people claiming the popular child tax credit to provide a Social Security number for their child, a provision long sought by Republicans aimed at preventing undocumented immigrants from taking the break.

Delaying their plans to repeal the estate tax by another year saved them $21.5 billion. They'd raise another $109 billion from companies tapping a long-standing break for research and development expenses.

Other House provisions would expand a tax on private university endowments and impose a surtax on life insurance companies.

The plan also would allow organizations such as charities and churches to engage in political speech without risking their tax-exempt status, and it restored a tax break for adopting children that had been on the chopping block.

Senate Finance Committee aides said the panel was still working to make its bill compliant with the chamber's budget rules, which don't allow the tax bill to add to deficits outside the 10-year budget window.

Given the GOP's slim majority in the Senate and the danger of a repeat of their Obamacare fiasco, some House Republicans were resigned to more or less having to defer to the Senate.

"I look at it more as a priority of process and procedure over substance," said Rep. Dennis Ross (R-Fla.). "While there are some very good things, don't get me wrong, substantively in our bill, I think the canvas will probably be painted in its final stage in the Senate once we give them the vehicle."

Perry to headline Texas event for pro-Trump outside group Back

By Maggie Severns | 11/10/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry will attend an event in Texas next week put on by America First Policies, the pro-Trump political nonprofit, according to an invitation obtained by POLITICO.

The invitation, which was sent to a Republican donor, says that Perry will headline a "roundtable discussion" in Houston on Monday afternoon. Details of the event's location will be available only to those who RSVP shortly before the event, the invitation said.

Perry's trip to Texas comes at an auspicious moment for America First Policies and its affiliated super PAC, America First Action. The organization is working to lock in support from donors and establish itself as a center of gravity for pro-Trump activity with close ties to the Trump administration.

America First was silent for much of this year, prompting some to question what role, if any, it would play for President Donald Trump, but organizers are working to reinvigorate the group's fundraising and reassert America First's close ties to the president. The group aims to spend $100 million promoting tax reform and supporting 2018 candidates in the next year. Leaders of the group have convened at the White House in recent weeks, and with donors at a Texas ranch owned by megadonor T. Boone Pickens. Donald Trump Jr. was present at the ranch to signal his support.

Perry has deep ties to both the energy industry and donors in Texas, which helped power his two presidential runs. But Perry will not be in Houston asking for funds, said Texas businessman Roy Bailey, who is deeply involved in America First Policies. "It's a nice opportunity for people to understand what's going on at the Energy Department," Bailey said.

An Energy Department employee did not return a request for comment. Perry was in France this week meeting with energy leaders from other countries.

America First is ramping up activity as other high-profile Republican operatives and donors are accelerating pro-Trump outside efforts of their own.

Future45, which supported Trump during the 2016 elections with funding from casino billionaire Sheldon Adelson and the Ricketts family, announced a project that will spend in the tens of millions of dollars promoting tax reform earlier this month. Great America PAC, which is affiliated with Steve Bannon, began endorsing 2018 candidates in recent days.

Great America PAC's support for Roy Moore broke from Trump's support for Sen. Luther Strange in Alabama. America First plans to give unwavering support to Trump's agenda, which Bailey said could be a differentiator from other groups.

"We're not second-guessing anything; we're totally confident in [Trump's] ability to lead this nation and we're supporting him and the vice president," Bailey said.

Trump's Interior chief 'hopping around from campaign event to campaign event' Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/05/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little BS."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips has taken outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then- Interior Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity. Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations; that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana, where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to a joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Court again freezes Clean Power Plan litigation for 60 days Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/09/2017 04:55 PM EDT

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today once again placed the lawsuits over the Obama administration's Clean Power Plan in abeyance for another 60 days, until Jan. 8.

The court's single-page order did not include any sort of note such as the one included in the court's previous 60-day abeyance order on Aug. 8. In that order, two of the judges attached a stern note saying EPA was skirting its statutory duty to regulate greenhouse gases.

EPA last month released its proposed repeal, and will take public comment through Jan. 16. The agency has yet to release its advance notice of proposed rulemaking seeking suggestions on whether and how to craft a narrower replacement regulation.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court ordered EPA to file status updates on its CPP repeal effort every 30 days.

Final defense policy bill would require Pentagon climate change study Back

By Connor O'Brien | 11/09/2017 04:04 PM EDT

The Pentagon would be required to detail threats posed by climate change to military installations under to the compromise version of the National Defense Authorization Act, H.R. 2810 \(115\), released today.

The legislation calls on the Pentagon to rank the 10 most vulnerable installations within each service to the effects of climate change over the next two decades — including from rising sea levels, flooding, drought and wildfires — and outline steps to mitigate any damage.

The report would be due within a year of the bill's enactment.

The climate change study was included in the House version of the defense policy bill, and the Senate accepted the provision in a joint conference committee.

Conservatives attempted to strip the provision during House floor debate in July, but Democrats and moderate Republicans joined to preserve the study requirement.

Wheeler attended Murray meetings on DOE coal aid but says he didn't write company's pitch Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 01:08 PM EDT

Andrew Wheeler, the nominee for EPA deputy administrator, says he represented Murray Energy in meetings with Energy Department and congressional officials to support Trump administration efforts to prop up ailing coal-fired power plants.

Wheeler, who counted Murray among his clients as a lobbyist at Faegre Baker Daniels, faced numerous questions at his confirmation hearing today over his work for the company, which would be one of the main beneficiaries of DOE's proposed grid rule, and its CEO Bob Murray, a top supporter of President Donald Trump. Wheeler said he attended a Murray Energy meeting at DOE where the grid proposal was discussed several months ago, as well as a meeting on Capitol Hill on the subject. He said he de-registered as a lobbyist in August.

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse pressed Wheeler over Murray's comments in a recent PBS Frontline documentary. The CEO said he gave Trump "an action plan" outlining coal policies to pursue, including eliminating the Clean Power Plan.

"I did not work on that and I do not have a copy of that memo," Wheeler told Whitehouse at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing.

Wheeler said Murray gave him a copy to read in December or January. "I looked at it and handed it back to him, I don't have it," Wheeler said, adding that he did not recall any specifics.

Whitehouse said he hopes to get a copy of the plan with the help of EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) now that Wheeler confirmed its existence.

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee will likely vote on Wheeler's nomination in the coming weeks.

BONN JOUR! Starting today, international negotiators gather in Bonn for the COP23 — the first U.N. climate summit to be chaired by a small island nation, Fiji. It's also the first meeting after President Donald Trump announced his intention to pull the U.S. out of the landmark Paris accord in June. Let's take a quick look at what to expect between now and the conference's end on Nov. 17:

—The U.S. question: An open question remains how much the U.S. decision to withdraw from the Paris accord will be a distraction to the nitty gritty work of filling out the details of the 2015 pact. The Trump administration opted to send longtime diplomat Thomas Shannon as the delegation's lead in Bonn rather than a cabinet member, suggesting a low-key role on the sidelines. But U.S. officials are expected to tout the benefits of nuclear energy and fossil fuels in combating emissions, according to the New York Times. Meanwhile, a high-profile delegation of U.S. governors, mayors, private sector leaders and others are traveling the conference as a signal that much of the country remains committed to aggressive climate action.

—Loss and damage: Fiji, backed by other vulnerable island countries, is keen to focus attention on the loss and damage already linked to climate change (think, hurricanes, floods and rising sea levels). Many island nations are raising pressure on negotiators, especially from wealthy nations, to tackle loss and damage issues such as funding, risk preparedness, weather forecasting and new insurance proposals. This, compounded by a number of high-profile weather events this year, will make it one of the more challenging discussions at the summit, according to Camilla Born from the environmental think tank E3G.

—Working out the rules: Another challenge will be to advance work on rules to make sure countries meet the Paris agreement's goals ahead of next year's COP24 — when parties said they would sign off on the rulebook underpinning the deal. A thorny discussion here will be around setting a common and transparent monitoring and reporting system that ensures emissions reductions can be compared across countries. It's a sensitive issue with emerging economies such as China, long wary of letting outsiders glance their domestic books, but a priority for the EU, which wants to make sure everyone pulls their weight. The battle could therefore be over whether it will be a bifurcated system, setting different guidelines for developed and developing countries, or universal.

—Assessing progress: Negotiators will also have to work out how the first stock-take of national progress toward achieving climate pledges will play out next year. The idea behind the 2018 meeting is to pave the way for countries to increase their emissions reduction targets in 2020, when parties are for the first time required to communicate renewed (and ideally strengthened) commitments, as set out under the Paris deal. The outgoing Moroccan COP22 presidency and the incoming Fijian presidency have published a joint document outlining their vision for the meeting.

—Who's coming? According to the UNFCCC, close to 20 world leaders, including French President Emmanuel Macron and German Chancellor Angela Merkel, are slated to attend. Also expected to participate: Arnold Schwarzenegger, UN Secretary-General António Guterres, Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo, California Governor Jerry Brown, UN Special Envoy Michael Bloomberg and several U.S. lawmakers, including Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Brian Schatz. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt won't attend, though other agency staff will.

NEXT STEP IN WOTUS UNWIND: EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers sent a proposed rule delaying the effective date of the Waters of the U.S. Rule to the White House for review, a move designed to give the administration more time to design its own version, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. An agency spokeswoman said the action would "amend the effective date associated with the 2015 Clean Water Rule to give the agencies time to consider the two-step process proposing to rescind and revise the 2015 rule." The new proposed rule is separate from any rule intended to replace WOTUS. The agency declined to say when the new effective date would be or if it would make any other tweaks to the regulation.

DEMOCRATS TALK DISASTER RELIEF PRIORITIES: Thirty members of the Senate Democratic caucus sent a letter Friday to OMB Director Mick Mulvaney outlining their priorities for a third disaster supplemental spending package expected to be requested by the administration later this month. "We can invest in technology, conservation and infrastructure that will mitigate further damage and make our communities more resilient," they wrote. Particular requests include "specific legislative language" concerning electric grid reconstruction in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, as well as "further investments" in NOAA's weather infrastructure and forecasting capabilities.

High-profile visitors: House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster and Ranking Member Peter DeFazio, Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and Senate EPW Ranking Member Tom Carper were among those lawmakers visiting Puerto Rico this weekend, according to local media. Also along: Sen. Kamala Harris, Sen. Bill Cassidy, Sen. Al Franken and Rep. Garret Graves.

Let's reschedule: House Homeland Security ranking member Bennie Thompson wrote to Chairman Michael McCaul asking for the panel to reschedule a hearing on hurricane response and recovery that was suddenly shelved last week. Link to letter here.

QUITE THE PUBLIC PITCH: Tweeting at 2:49 a.m. in Hawaii, Trump asked Saudi Arabia to list shares of its biggest oil company on the New York Stock Exchange. "Would very much appreciate Saudi Arabia doing their IPO of Aramco with the New York Stock Exchange. Important to the United States!" he wrote. That comes as Saudi Arabia moves toward an offering of shares of its state-run oil company — the world's largest energy company — on international markets. He later told reporters aboard Air Force One: "They're not looking at it, but I want them to strongly consider the New York Stock Exchange or NASDAQ, or frankly anybody else located in this country, but those are the big two... I just spoke to the king a little while ago, and they will consider it."

ANOTHER INVESTIGATION ARRIVES: GAO agreed last week to probe whether Pruitt's appearance in an August video from National Cattlemen's Beef Association violated laws "on the use of appropriated funds for lobbying and publicity or propaganda purposes and the Antideficiency Act," Pro's Alex Guillén reports. House Democrats asked GAO to begin the investigation.

TEAM ETHANOL FIRES BACK: If Trump watches the ads on Fox & Friends, then he's getting an earful on the Renewable Fuels Standard these days. Starting today and through the Nov. 20, Fuels America, an umbrella group of ethanol producers and trade associations, will be running an ad reminding Trump of his promises to farmers and accusing oil refiners of demanding a taxpayer funded bailout. The refiners had the inverse ad up during Fox & Friends last week.

Ticking clock: EPA's final RFS rule went to the White House for review last week, and Pruitt has promised to release it by the statutory Nov. 30 deadline.

* Presented by ExxonMobil: We're collaborating with FuelCell Energy on a novel idea to use fuel cells to capture carbon at natural gas power plants, and in the process reduce emissions and increase electrical output. This technology could be a game changer in addressing the world's growing need for energy, while also reducing the impact on the environment. Learn more. **

HIT THE FLOOR! House lawmakers this week are expected to vote on the Hydropower Policy Modernization Act H.R. 3043 \(115\), which aims to speed the regulatory approval process for hydropower projects. And they're also expected to consider compromise legislation H.R. 2874 \(115\) overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program to impose new penalties on homeowners with repeat flooding, though with softer consequences than originally floated.

MEGA HOUSE ENERGY PACKAGE GETS MARKUP: The House Natural Resources Committee is expected Wednesday to mark up a broad new energy package H.R. 4239 \(115\) on Wednesday after its introduction on Friday, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Among other provisions, the SECURE American Energy Act would roll back Obama-era offshore drilling rules, create an offshore oil and gas revenue program for East Coast drilling and give more oil and gas permitting power to the states.

CLIMATE REPORT AT ODDS WITH TRUMP STANCE: Even as the White House stuck with its line the climate "has changed and is always changing," scientists from the 13 agencies who worked on the National Climate Assessment that concluded human activity is driving climate change said they saw no effort from the administration to meddle in their work, Pro's Emily Holden reports.

In response, Paul Bledsoe, who helped release the first national climate assessment while at the Clinton White House in 2000, emails his take: "The White House clearly judged that the firestorm over delaying or suppressing the report release, especially ahead of the Bonn climate talks, would be greater than from the findings themselves."

NEW TACTIC IN CLIMATE FIGHT: Speaking at the Vatican over the weekend, California Gov. Jerry Brown asked the Catholic Church to throw its weight behind his efforts to undermine Trump's climate rollbacks abroad, POLITICO California's David Siders reports. Brown urged religious establishments to help "awaken the world" to efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and described the president's rejection of mainstream climate science as a "lie within a lie."

PRINCE OF WYOMING? Blackwater founder Erik Prince tells NBC News he's still "mulling" a challenge to Wyoming Sen. John Barrasso. "They have been in the wilderness for eight years, saying oh, if only we had a Republican president and now they have one," he said. "[They're] kind of out of excuses." One fact of note: Barrasso has received just 5.5 percent of his total $2.4 million haul of itemized individual contributions since the start of 2013 from Wyoming. There's no public polling on how the theoretical Barrasso v. Prince matchup would go.

MAIL CALL! TIME OUT! Two top Energy and Commerce Committee Democrats — Frank Pallone and Bobby Rush — sent a letter asking that a hearing slated for Tuesday on two bills making significant changes to the Energy Star programs and efficiency standards for ceiling fans be postponed until witnesses from EPA and DOE are available. "These bills would make substantial changes to the popular Energy Star Program and efficiency standards for ceiling fans, and should not be rushed through the Committee process without adequate input from the agencies tasked with executing these potential changes," they wrote to Chairman Greg Walden and Energy Subcommittee Chairman Fred Upton.

DEMOCRATS TO PRUITT: WITHDRAW SCIENCE ADVISER POLICY: Six senior House Democrats on the Science and Energy and Commerce committees asked Pruitt to withdraw his "biased, harmful" policy barring scientists who receive agency grants from serving on scientific advisory panels. "We advise you to follow [Federal Advisory Committee Act] regulations and policy in selecting qualified individuals to serve on EPA's science advisory committees just as previous administrations led by both parties have done. Anything less is a great disservice to the public interest," they wrote.

CALIFORNIA TALLIES WILDFIRE NEEDS: Golden State bigwigs, including Brown, Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Kamala Harris and 39 California House members, sent a letter to Trump Friday asking for $7.4 billion in federal funds to help the state recover from devastating wildfires. Letter link here.

MORE TIME NEEDED: A bicameral group of 81 Democrats, led by Sens. Maria Cantwell and Tom Udall and Reps. Jared Polis and Raúl Grijalva, asked Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in a letter released Friday to extend the public comment period on its proposed repeal of BLM's methane waste rule from 30 to 90 days and to offer public hearings in the Western U.S. "The American people deserve to get a proper return on this natural gas resource, and any attempt to roll back this rule would represent a giveaway to industry polluters," they wrote.

THIS TIME IT'S PERSONAL: In light of U.S. Forest Service recommendations to potentially allow new uranium mining near the Grand Canyon, House Natural Resources Ranking Member Raúl Grijalva wrote Chairman Rob Bishop a letter to ask for a hearing on his bill H.R. 360 \(115\) to create a national monument in the area. Grijalva separately asked Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue for his rationale behind the recommendation and whether the public would have the opportunity to comment.

NEW PHASE OF KEYSTONE FIGHT: Volunteers with Bold Nebraska went door-to-door in the five Nebraska Public Service Commissioners home districts to raise concerns about the use of eminent domain and environmental concerns surrounding the Keystone XL pipeline. The Nebraska regulators expect to make a final decision on the pipeline permit by the end of the year.

ADS URGE NO DRILLING IN ANWR: The League of Conservation voters is targeting Republican Reps. Bruce Poliquin and Darrell Issa with ads (sample here) urging them not to support opening ANWR to drilling. It's part of an ongoing $200,000 campaign.

NO REAL RUSH ON METHANE: EPA is now all-but-certain not to take any final action on the Obama-era 2016 methane regulation targeting emissions rule for new oil and gas wells until the next year, Pro's Alex Guillén reports in Energy Regulation Watch. That comes as the agency issued a notice last week floated the idea (offered by the American Petroleum Institute) to implement longer phase-in periods for key requirements of the rule rather than seeking an outright stay.

MOVER, SHAKER: Katie Waldman leaves her post as press secretary for Montana Sen. Steve Daines this Thursday for a "new opportunity."

State Dept's Shannon to lead U.S. delegation to climate talks Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 10/06/2017 07:18 PM EDT

Thomas Shannon, the State Department's undersecretary for political affairs, will lead the U.S. delegation to a major international climate change summit next month in Bonn, Germany, according to an administration official.

The news comes amid swirling rumors that Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt was angling to lead the delegation, a move that would have made a skeptic of established climate science the face of the United States at the talks.

In previous years, the State Department's climate envoy led the U.S. delegation to the annual gathering. But the Trump administration has declined to fill that position.

The Bonn negotiations are aimed at implementing the 2015 Paris climate change agreement, from which President Donald Trump has said he intends to withdraw.

Neither the White House nor the State Department responded to requests for comment.

EPA, Army Corps seek delay to WOTUS start date Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/03/2017 05:48 PM EDT

The EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers sent to the White House a proposed rule on Friday delaying the effective date of the Waters of the United States regulation to give the administration more time to craft a new version of rule, according to an agency spokeswoman.

EPA declined to specify the new effective date for the regulation, also called the Clean Water Rule. Nor would it say if the proposed rule would make other changes. The notice will appear on the OMB's website this morning.

"In order to provide regulatory certainty, EPA and the Department of the Army have sent a proposed rule to the Office of Management and Budget for interagency review that would amend the effective date associated with the 2015 Clean Water Rule to give the agencies time to consider the two-step process proposing to rescind and revise the 2015 rule," the spokeswoman said.

In June, EPA proposed a repeal of the rule, which aimed to clarify which waters fall under federal jurisdiction. The comment period closed in September with 190,000 comments filed.

The proposed rule is separate from any rule intended to replace WOTUS.

"The agency is also in the process of holding listening sessions with states, tribes and stakeholders as we work to develop a proposed step 2 rule that would revise the definition of 'waters of the United States,'" the spokeswoman said.

The current rule was stayed by the 6th Circuit in some states last year.

WHAT'S NEXT: OMB will send the proposed rule back to EPA for release and publication in the Federal Register.

Trump urges Saudi Arabia to list state oil company on N.Y. stock exchange Back

By POLITICO Staff | 11/04/2017 09:58 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Saturday urged Saudi Arabia to list shares of its biggest oil company on the New York Stock Exchange.

"Would very much appreciate Saudi Arabia doing their IPO of Aramco with the New York Stock Exchange. Important to the United States!" Trump tweeted shortly before he was due to leave Hawaii on the first leg of a 13-day trip to Asia.

Saudi Arabia is preparing to sell shares of its state-run oil company — the world's largest energy company — on international markets.

Saudi Prince Mohammed has said the initial public offering of about $100 billion could value the company at some $2 trillion, according to Reuters.

In an on-the-record meeting with reporters aboard Air Force One later Saturday, Trump clarified: "Aramco is going public. It will be perhaps the biggest going public ever. It's the Saudi Arabian oil company and it will be just about the biggest ever.

"And I want them to consider, because right now they're not looking at it, because of litigation, risk and other risk, which is very sad, they're not looking at it, but I want them to strongly consider the New York Stock Exchange or NASDAQ, or frankly anybody else located in this country, but those are the big two

"I just spoke to the King a little while ago, and they will consider it."

The Trump administration has been working hard to strengthen ties with Saudi Arabia.

Trump in August described his relationship with King Salman of Saudi Arabia as "very great," calling him "a friend of mine."

Trump's son-in-law and senior adviser Jared Kushner made an unannounced visit to Saudi Arabia at the end of October — his third trip to the country this year. He was accompanied by deputy national security adviser Dina Powell and Middle East envoy Jason Greenblatt.

Kushner is tasked with leading the administration's efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East. The White House would not say who Kushner met with on his visit.

In August, Trump offered to personally mediate a dispute between Saudi Arabia, Qatar and other Arab countries centered around alleged support of terrorism.

"I was telling the emir before that if I can help between UAE and Saudi Arabia ... if I can help mediate between Qatar and, in particular, the UAE and Saudi Arabia, I would be willing to do so," he said at the time.

Trump visited Saudi Arabia with a large White House entourage in May, committing the United States to a deeper alliance with the "sacred land."

As a presidential candidate, Trump had previously accused the Muslim-majority kingdom of complicity in the World Trade Center attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

GAO to review Pruitt appearance in beef group's anti-WOTUS video Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/03/2017 06:22 PM EDT

The Government Accountability Office will investigate EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's appearance in an industry group's video calling for public comments in favor of repealing the Waters of the U.S. rule, according to a letter released today by House Democrats.

Rep. Peter DeFazio (D-Ore.) asked GAO to investigate whether Pruitt's actions violated laws "on the use of appropriated funds for lobbying and publicity or propaganda purposes and the Antideficiency Act," according to the letter, dated Oct. 31.

The video was posted on Aug. 16 by the National Cattlemen's Beef Association, a major critic of the Obama-era WOTUS regulation. It includes an interview in which Pruitt discusses his criticisms of the rule, along with text urging viewers to submit pre-written comments via the NCBA's website.

The video quickly drew criticisms from environmental groups. EPA at the time said Pruitt sought "engagement with all stakeholders, especially those who felt their voices were ignored by the previous Administration."

GAO previously dinged the Obama-era EPA in 2015 when it concluded the agency's use of a "Thunderclap" social media campaign promoting the WOTUS rule amounted to "covert propaganda."

WHAT'S NEXT: GAO's letter does not specify how long the inquiry will take.

House Natural Resources Committee unveils new energy bill Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/03/2017 03:34 PM EDT

House lawmakers today unveiled a new energy bill that would roll back Obama-era offshore drilling rules, create an offshore oil and gas revenue program for East Coast drilling and give more oil and gas permitting power to the states.

Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) introduced the bill, with House Natural Resource Committee Chairman Rep. Rob Bishop (R-Utah) and Texas Democratic Reps. Henry Cuellar and Vicente Gonzalez. The bill is expected to move through the committee next week and hit the House floor "in the near future," committee spokesman Parish Braden said.

Among the bill's provisions is a directive to create an offshore oil and gas revenue program for states along the Atlantic coast and Alaska, where the Interior Department is exploring opening more of the waters for offshore oil drilling.

The bill would also require Congress to approve any future removals of offshore acres from lease sales or establishment of new marine sanctuaries, an apparent response to the Obama administration's last-minute removal of some Alaska and Atlantic waters from development.

Onshore, the bill would also allow states to oversee drilling plans on federal land within their borders.

The bill calls on Interior to hold a lease sale for wind power projects off the California coast within one year of the bill's passage. Interior would also conduct feasibility studies for wind lease sales off the coasts of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Guam, with results due in six months and possible sales within a year of the bill's passing.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House Natural Resources Committee expects to take up the bill next week.

New U.S. climate report at odds with Trump policy Back

By Emily Holden | 11/03/2017 05:10 PM EDT

A sweeping new U.S. government report concludes that humans have pushed global temperatures to the highest level seen by modern civilization, defying the Trump administration's pronouncements that climate change is a hoax or based on unsettled science.

The report, produced by 13 agencies as part of the congressionally required National Climate Assessment, reinforced years of research that shows human activity was the main reason temperatures have soared in the past century — and they are likely to keep climbing, boosting sea levels and threatening environmental disasters.

The report contradicts President Donald Trump's rejection of climate science, his plan to withdraw the U.S. from a global pact to fight climate change and his moves to unwind a slate of policies put in place under former President Barack Obama to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

"Foremost, we conclude based on extensive evidence, that it is extremely likely that human activities are the dominant causes of global warming," said David Fahey, one of the lead authors. "For the warming over the last century, there is no convincing alternative explanation for the warming observed."

However, the White House stuck to its stance that climate "has changed and is always changing," and it pointed to portions of the report about the uncertainty around the Earth's sensitivity to greenhouse gas emissions.

White House spokesman Raj Shah said in a statement that the Trump administration "supports rigorous scientific analysis and debate," and the U.S. will continue to promote access to "affordable and reliable energy needed to grow economically," support technology and infrastructure that reduce emissions and "enable us to address future risks, including climate related risks."

Fahey, a scientist at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, told reporters on a conference call that he saw no attempt to influence the report by the Trump administration.

"I'm quite confident to say there's been no political interference in the scientific messages of this report," Fahey said.

Virginia Burkett, an Interior Department climate scientist and chair of the subcommittee on Global Change Research, emphasized that the report steered clear of recommending any policies to deal with climate change, saying it was limited to "strictly the science."

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, who said he did not believe that man-made emissions were the main cause of climate change and has moved to eliminate Obama's rules curbing carbon dioxide pollution from power plants, did not comment on the report.

The report was reviewed by scientists at the National Academies, released for public comment and screened by federal agencies under both the Obama and Trump administrations.

Juanita Constible, a special projects director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, said in a blog post the report confirms what many other previous studies had shown.

"It's essential that our federal leaders in Congress and the Executive Branch take seriously the dire conclusions from the painstaking and authoritative work in the [the report] — and more importantly, to urgently act on the findings," Constible wrote.

Bob Kopp, a climate scientist at Rutgers University and a report contributor, said the findings "reaffirmed that climate change is real, that humans are the dominant cause of warming, and that it is having an effect in the U.S. And those effects will grow more severe as long as we continue to emit carbon dioxide into the atmosphere."

Sea levels are expected to rise one to four feet by the end of the century and could swell by up to eight feet if emissions of greenhouse gases continue to rise, the Climate Science Special Report says.

Episodes of heavy rainfall are becoming more frequent and intense, and heat waves will become more common. Kopp said the report also shows the U.S. can expect more compounded extreme weather events, like the multiple hurricanes and wildfires that occurred this summer.

Annual global average temperatures are expected to rise by 2.5 degrees Fahrenheit by 2050. And although the growth in global carbon dioxide emissions is slowing, that trend is moving too slowly to keep temperatures below a dangerous tipping point of 3.6 degrees, or 2.0 degrees Celsius, above pre-industrial levels that would see more devastating impacts, the scientists found.

The report is the most comprehensive study since the last National Climate Assessment was published three years ago and the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change published its physical science report four years ago, Kopp said.

The U.S. Global Change Research Program, which coordinates the assessment, also released a draft of a second volume, which examines impacts on public health and the environment, and a draft of a report on changes in carbon levels.

The report about how climate change impacts Americans, which will undergo public comment, notes that "Americans are responding to rapid changes affecting their everyday lives and livelihoods," because of climate change.

Reservoir managers in the Colorado River Basin are adjusting to lower water levels, cities along the Gulf and Atlantic Coasts are seeing more flooding and storm surge from rising seas and heavier rains. Farms in the Midwest are adopting new crop management strategies, and communities in the western U.S. face more wildfires, it notes.

Some risks are already unavoidable while others could be reversed if greenhouse gas emissions decline, according to the report.

"Climate change puts many things Americans care about at risk, both now and in the future, and risks will intensify without action," the report says.

Eric Wolff contributed to this report.

Jerry Brown's holy war on Donald Trump Back

By David Siders | 11/05/2017 07:12 AM EDT

VATICAN CITY — California has opened a new front in its war on Donald Trump — the Vatican, where Gov. Jerry Brown on Saturday sought to enlist the Catholic Church in his effort to undermine the president's climate policies abroad.

Brown, addressing a somber gathering of scientists, politicians and religious leaders here, rebuked Trump's rejection of mainstream climate science as a "lie within a lie," urging religious establishments to help "awaken the world" to efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The conspicuous repudiation of the president, in this center of Christendom on the eve of this week's international climate talks in Bonn, Germany, served to underscore Brown's role as one of the most prominent figures in the anti-Trump resistance. But it also highlighted California's deep antipathy toward the president on a global stage, allying the nation's most populous state with the international community against the backdrop of simmering tension between the White House and Pope Francis on climate change.

The pope, who did not appear at the conference, implicitly criticized the president in October for withdrawing from the Paris climate agreement, a decision that weighed heavily over the gathering.

Brown wasn't the only Californian emphasizing the American divide over global warming — or the state's determination to blaze its own trail on the issue. Rallying the same audience the previous day, California Democratic state Senate leader Kevin de León cast California's leaders — and not, explicitly, Washington's — as the "faithful stewards of God's creation."

Daniel Kammen, the University of California, Berkeley, professor who resigned noisily from his role as science envoy to the State Department in August, called Trump's election America's "existential crisis" and encouraged efforts to impeach him. And California Democratic Congressman Scott Peters said the relatively large proportion of U.S. Congress members who are Catholic is "one reason why Pope Francis' commitment to making environmental stewardship a priority of his papacy has such a potential to affect American climate policy."

The meeting, hosted by the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, preceded two weeks of climate talks in Bonn, where Brown and leaders of other Democratic states will seek to persuade the world's nations that wide swaths of the United States remain committed to the Paris agreement. Trump's withdrawal from the pact has cast a cloud over the upcoming gathering in Germany.

Still, California's Democratic governor minimized the significance of Trump's withdrawal from the accord, saying the decision helped focus public attention on the issue.

In comparison to worldwide efforts to address climate change, Brown said, "The Trump factor is very small, very small indeed."

Instead, Brown called for a fundamental transformation of people's way of life.

"It's not just a light rinse," Brown said. "We need a total, I might say brainwashing. We need to wash our brains out and see a very different kind of world."

Yet the Catholic Church's ability to move American public opinion on climate change remains in doubt. For one thing, relations between Trump and the spiritual leader of America's more than 50 million Catholics remain cool after Pope Francis criticized Trump on issues ranging from climate change to immigration to refugee resettlement.

"The state of relations between the pope and Trump is not good and has never been good," longtime Vatican analyst Iacopo Scaramuzzi said in an email. "They are openly at odds on almost every point, from personal style of life to issues as climate change or migrations, from attitude towards China, Iran or Cuba to the concept of 'people' and 'populism.'"

While the pope's encyclical on the environment served as an inspiration for negotiations in Paris two years ago, many climate activists hoped lobbying by a popular religious figure might also nudge public opinion on climate among conservatives in the United States. There is little evidence that has happened.

Following the encyclical's release and the pope's 2015 U.S. tour, researchers at the Yale Project on Climate Change Communication found a short-term increase in the number of Americans who said climate change was a "moral," "social justice" or "poverty" issue. Soon after, however, they found public opinion returned to pre-encyclical levels.

"It was him coming to the United States, where he got 24-7, wall-to-wall coverage we saw a significant impact on public opinion," said Anthony Leiserowitz, director of the Yale Project on Climate Change Communication. "We also found that six months later, that effect had faded away."

Bob Inglis, a former Republican congressman whose progressive views on climate change contributed to his defeat in a South Carolina primary in 2010, said of the pope's encyclical, "I do acknowledge that it hasn't exactly — it hasn't yet turned into the barn burner that I had hoped that it might have been."

For conservatives, Francis may be an imperfect messenger, controversial for his relatively progressive views not only on climate, but on marriage and immigration. The pope and Trump traded jabs during the presidential campaign last year about Trump's proposal to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, and Trump announced his withdrawal from the Paris climate agreement just days after a visit in which the pope handed him a copy of his encyclical, Laudato Si.

"I've got a Catholic friend in Congress who will go nameless, who told me that, and he was only halfway joking, that he thinks this pope is the anti-Christ," Inglis said. "There's a contingent of American Catholics who really think that the pope has left the reservation."

Inglis said he is optimistic for the long-term effect of the pope's advocacy on climate change, as the issue is taught in local parishes and other religious organizations. Climate activist Bill McKibben said the Catholic Church is "one of those bureaucracies through which things work their way kind of slowly," and he said its effects will likely percolate for years.

But Francis is also suffering in America from a problem that he shares with Trump: a declining base. Though about 1 in 5 American adults are still affiliated with the Catholic Church, their numbers are in decline. A survey last month from the Pew Research Center found a majority of U.S. adults do not think it is necessary to believe in God to be moral. And regardless of religious affiliation, climate change has failed in recent elections to register a top level of concern for most voters.

Jim Nicholson, the former secretary of Veterans Affairs and Republican National Committee chairman who served as ambassador to the Holy See under George W. Bush, said Trump's relationship with the Vatican "got off to a ragged start" but has improved steadily and is now "pretty good." He cited Trump's nomination of Callista Gingrich, the wife of former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to be ambassador to the Holy See.

"There are obvious differences on some subjects, like climate and immigration and the death penalty, always. But there's an awful lot of alignment in values — religious freedom and trafficking and life," he said.

Trump has said he is withdrawing from the Paris agreement because it puts the United States "at a very, very big economic disadvantage." But he heartened many religious leaders with his appointment of Neil Gorsuch to the U.S. Supreme Court and his opposition to funding for nongovernment organizations that perform abortions.

For many religious voters, said Mitch Hescoc, president of the Evangelical Environmental Network, matters such as abortion and Supreme Court nominations carry more weight at the ballot box than climate change.

"The problem is that [climate change] is not on the radar screen of the reasons they vote yet at this point in time," Hescoc said. "That's my job, is to help them to see why it is as important as being pro-life. Our No. 1 message is that climate change is a pro-life issue."

Climate experts stewed throughout the Vatican meeting over global climate projections they described as "horrific," "terrifying" and "depressing."

Brown, who left the Vatican for an 80-minute meeting with Arturo Sosa, the superior general of the Jesuits, said Saturday night that he is "going around enlisting allies" in the battle over climate change.

"What it all comes down to is we've got to act sooner, and we have to act more decisively, and that's not happening," Brown said. "There's real horror in store for us if we don't take action."

CIAO PRESIDENTE! LET'S TALK CLIMATE: Expect President Donald Trump to get an earful about climate change and the 2015 Paris agreement from the leaders of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United Kingdom as the G-7 kicks off in Sicily. National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn told reporters to expect a discussion of climate issues during a session on "global issues" sometime this afternoon. "He's interested to hear what the G7 leaders have to say about climate," Cohn said. "It will be a fairly robust discussion on that." He added Trump's heard "arguments that are persuasive on both sides" about climate change, and noted the president's concern the existing emissions reduction pledge is too ambitious and would be "highly crippling to the U.S. economic growth."

Eyebrow-raising comment from Cohn on U.S. energy mix: "Coal doesn't even make that much sense anymore as a feedstock. Natural gas, which we have become an abundant producer [of], which we're going to become a major exporter of, is such a cleaner fuel. If you think about how solar and how much wind power we've created in the United States, we can be a manufacturing powerhouse and still be environmentally friendly."

Climate has already popped up repeatedly on Trump's European swing: Cohn said Trump had been pushed on climate change and the Paris pact at every bilateral meeting with world leaders during his time in Europe. Newly-elected French President Emmanuel Macron told reporters he had an "extremely direct and very frank" conversation with Trump about not making a hasty decision on Paris. "I reminded him of the importance these agreements have for us," Macron said, according to Reuters. "My wish in any case is that there should be no hasty decision on this subject by the United States because it is our collective responsibility to retain the global nature of this pledge, which was a first."

European Council President Donald Tusk said there were unresolved questions about the U.S. position on climate change following his meeting with the president. And that comes on the heels of Pope Francis gifting Trump a copy of his climate change-related encyclical and Vatican officials urging the U.S. to stick with the Paris deal.

Commitment sought: As Trump touched down in Sicily Thursday night, European leaders still hadn't gotten a clear sense of where he stood on the Paris deal, and diplomats from other nations said their top priority was keeping Trump in the pact, POLITICO's Tara Palmeri reports. The U.S. indecision is a departure from standard practice at international summits where policy commitments are typically agreed to in advance.

Bottom line: Trump is expected to make a final decision about Paris once he returns from the trip.

GIANFORTE WINS IN MONTANA: One day after allegedly assaulting a reporter, Montana voters sent Republican Greg Gianforte to Congress to fill the seat once held by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke. The race went for Gianforte, a former technology executive who lost a gubernatorial bid in 2016, over Democrat Rob Quist, a folk singer and first-time candidate. The race for Montana's sole congressional seat had narrowed even before the "bodyslam" of The Guardian's Ben Jacobs, even though Trump won the Big Sky State by more than 20 points last fall. POLITICO's Scott Bland has more on the race here.

COMPLIANCE DATES PUSHED FOR EPA RULE: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt signed a proposed regulation Thursday suspending compliance dates for an Obama administration regulation limiting toxic discharges from coal-fired power plants, Pro's Annie Snider reports. The agency will accept public comment for 30 days on its plan to suspend compliance dates implementing two aspects of the rule, which limits waterborne pollutants like arsenic and lead. Those requirements would be indefinitely suspended "until EPA promulgates a final rule specifying compliance dates."

MORE PRESSURE FOR ETHICS WAIVERS: Additional voices are pushing the Trump administration to release copies of ethics waivers it has granted so that lobbyists can serve in its ranks. House Natural Resources Ranking Member Raul Grijalva sent a letter to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross and Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue requesting all copies of the waivers. "The current Administration's refusal to comply with this completely reasonable and standard request for information flies in the face of the President's repeated claims to support an open and transparent government," he wrote. That letter comes after Earthjustice filed FOIA requests with EPA, Energy and Interior for copies of all waivers already granted.

YOU DON'T GOT THE POWER! As the public comment period on what to do about Bears Ears National Monument closes, the top four congressional Democrats — Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, Minority Whip Dick Durbin, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer — sent Zinke a letter urging him not to alter existing national monument designations. "It is unconscionable to think that this administration would sell out America's outdoor heritage to benefit corporate interests in the oil, gas and mining industries," they wrote.

But wait, there's more! 86 House Democrats, led by Raul Grijalva, sent Zinke a letter arguing he lacks the power to rescind or revise national monuments designated under the Antiquities Act. "Congress has not delegated authority to significantly diminish or abolish an existing national monument," they wrote. "The Constitutional authority to revoke or shrink a national monument lies with the Congress."

Meanwhile, politicians split on Maine designation: While comments on another two dozen previously designated monuments roll on, Sen. Angus King sent a letter Thursday urging Zinke "in the strongest possible terms" to let the Katahdin Woods and Waters National Monument, designated by the Obama administration, remain in its current form. "I am absolutely convinced that the prompt conclusion of this review and reaffirmation of the Monument designation would be a positive step," King wrote. "This Monument is some of the first positive news for the Katahdin region in a long time; please don't let it be taken away." That comes as a map from Gov. Paul LePage's office shows what it says are shuttered recreational opportunities in the area since the monument's designation.

JETTING OFF: Zinke will travel to Norway, Greenland and Alaska on a congressional delegation led by Senate ENR Chairman Lisa Murkowski this weekend.

ONE MORE FROM GRIJALVA: The Arizona Democrat also asked Zinke in a letter for information about who asked the U.S. Geological Survey to remove references to the relationship between climate change and sea level rise from a press release. "The public needs reassurance that his Administration will not persecute scientists or suppress the findings of their work," he wrote.

Grijalva's office tells ME he has yet to receive any response to 11 different letters sent to Interior and related agencies dating to mid-February. ME remembers Republicans loudly decrying the slow response times to their inquiries of Obama-era officials, but they don't appear to be concerned now that roles have reversed. Interior did not respond to requests for comment.

NEARLY EVERGREEN AT THIS POINT: Senior House Republican leaders, rife with divisions in their ranks about government spending, are already plotting how to avoid a government shutdown this fall, POLITICO's Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report. Congress only has 43 legislative days left to pass appropriations bills before they hit the Sept. 30 deadline to keep the lights on, so Speaker Paul Ryan in a closed-door GOP conference meeting Thursday morning raised the possibility of clumping appropriations bills together in an omnibus to save time.

The takeaway from one GOP source: "This is gonna be a brutal battle. Defense hawks want $640 [billion], appropriators want $516 [billion] for non-defense, moderates don't want any changes to mandatory. And yet everyone says the budget still has to balance. Those numbers don't add up. And a budget that doesn't have serious deficit reduction isn't going to make it out of committee."

THEY'RE GETTING FASTER AT THIS! Just two days after the announcement, Trump's White House formally sent the nomination of David Jonas to be DOE's general counsel to the Senate. The landing team member and an expert on nuclear nonproliferation has been a partner at the Virginia law firm Fluett, Huber and Hoang since 2016.

ICYMI: Three of the four protesters that interrupted Thursday's confirmation hearings for two FERC nominees and the No. 2 DOE post were sent to jail after being charged with misdemeanors, a spokeswoman for the Capitol Police tells ME. The other paid a fine and left. Pro's Esther Whieldon has a look at the rest of the hearing here.

MAIL CALL! SENATORS PUSH FOR DRINKING WATER FUNDING: A bipartisan group of more than two dozen senators, led by Sen. Ben Cardin, sent a letter to top Appropriators urging them to continue strong funding for grant programs to reduce lead in drinking water. "We can no longer delay needed upgrades to our infrastructure, strengthening drinking water protections and removing lead and other contaminants out of public water supplies," they wrote.

GROUPS FIGHT METHANE RULE RECONSIDERATION: A coalition of more than 60 conservation, public health, labor and faith groups are urging Pruitt not to suspend requirements for oil and gas companies to find and fix leaks from their facilities as he reconsiders those standards for new and modified wells. "EPA's methane standards are national protections that will ensure all communities benefit from these common sense best practices — and not just those located in states that have adopted such regulations," the groups, which include the Environmental Defense Fund, Clean Air Task Force and Earthworks, wrote in a letter.

BLANKENSHIP ASKS SUPREMES TO STEP IN: Former Massey Energy chief Don Blankenship asked the Supreme Court on Thursday to toss out his 2015 misdemeanor conviction of conspiracy to violate mine safety standards, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. He recently left prison after serving a year for that conviction, which stemmed from the 2010 Upper Big Branch mine disaster that killed 29 of his workers.

DIRECTOR OF NEBRASKA BOARD OVERSEEING KEYSTONE RESIGNS: Jeff Pursley, executive director of the Nebraska Public Service Commission, has resigned effective June 12. A commission spokeswoman tells ME the departure will have "no impact" on the commissioners' review of Keystone XL's proposed route currently before the panel.

OVERDRAWN: An employee within Interior's Office of the Chief Information Officer knowingly used her government-issued travel card to pay for hotels, airline tickets, rental cars and gasoline, according to an inspector general report out Thursday. The official, Tracy Hamm, pleaded guilty to misdemeanor credit card fraud and received a year of probation.

Trump still hasn't given allied leaders what they want Back

By Tara Palmeri | 05/25/2017 08:49 PM EDT

SICILY — Despite a day of pitches from European leaders, President Donald Trump has yet to give them what they want — a commitment to the Paris climate accord ahead of the G7 summit.

Trump departed late Thursday from Brussels, where he met with his fellow NATO heads of state, and headed to Sicily, where he embarks Friday on his first meeting with leaders of the G7.

Trump's national economic advisor Gary Cohn set the bar low for any strong commitments from the U.S. at the global summit, where Trump will meet with his Canadian, French, German, Italian, Japanese and British counterparts.

"The G7 is set up to be more of an ad-hoc session where the leaders get together and they listen and talk to each other," Cohn told U.S. reporters on the way to Italy.

"The president has told you that he's going to ultimately make a decision on Paris and climate when he gets back," Cohn added. "He's interested to hear what the G7 leaders have to say about climate. It will be a fairly robust discussion on that."

That position is a departure from standard practice for international summits, at which policy commitments are typically agreed in advance.

Diplomats from other nations said their top priority was keeping Trump in the Paris accord, a 2015 agreement intended to limit global warming.

Trump has argued that the regulations imposed hamper domestic economic growth but has said he would consider some pollution limits.

"This time there's going to be a substantive negotiation that can last late into the night Friday into Saturday on a final communiqué," warned a French official. "We want the most ambitious agreement possible, and we don't want the United States to leave."

While the EU leaders described the meeting as "cordial" and "friendly," it was clear that the new and unpredictable American president had not offered reassurances on some core areas of concern for Brussels.

European Council President Donald Tusk said they had found common ground on fighting terrorism, and appeared to be "on the same line" about the conflict in Ukraine. But Tusk said there were unresolved questions on trade and climate change - two topics that will be addressed at the G7 summit.

"Some issues remained open like climate and trade," EU Council President Donald Tusk told reporters shortly after a meeting at EU headquarters in Brussels on Thursday morning.

He reserved his most pointed remarks for the U.S. position on Russia though. "I am not sure that we can say 100 percent today that we have a common position, common opinion about Russia," Tusk said.

Sanctions on Russia were also raised at the NATO summit, but Trump has not taken a position either way. "I think the president is looking at it. Right now, we don't have a position," Cohn said.

There is one point Trump has been clear on -- the fight against terrorism. Trump will continue his discussion from the middle east portion of his trip about raising funding to fight terrorism. His goal is to get the G7 and then G20 involved. Cyber security will also be a major topic.

"Terrorism is going to be a very big topic," Cohn said. "It's going to lead off."

He suggested that Trump may give more clues on his trade policy on Friday in Sicily.

"We are going to continue to fight for what we believe is right, which is free, open and fair trade, which the president has been very clear on what that means," he said.

"We will have a very robust discussion on trade and we will be talking about what the president means by free and open is, we will treat you the way you treat us, meaning if you don't have barriers to trade or you don't have tariffs, we won't have tariffs."

Montana House GOP candidate cited after reporter says he 'body-slammed me' Back

By Hadas Gold and Gabriel Debenedetti | 05/24/2017 08:36 PM EDT

HELENA, Mont. — Montana Republican congressional candidate Greg Gianforte was issued a citation late Wednesday after he allegedly "body-slammed" a reporter at a campaign event on the eve of a hotly contested special election.

Ben Jacobs, a reporter for The Guardian tweeted that Gianforte "body-slammed me and broke my glasses" at a campaign event in Bozeman, Montana — minutes before what was to be the last campaign rally of the campaign. Jacobs said he had asked Gianforte about a new budget analysis of House Republicans' effort to repeal and replace the Affordable Care Act.

Late Wednesday, Gallatin County Sheriff Brian Gootkin issued a statement saying the Republican congressional candidate had been cited for "misdemeanor assault" and that Gianforte would have to appear in court by June 7 to resolve the matter. "The nature of the injuries did not meet the statutory elements of felony assault," the sheriff said in his statement.

The incident rocked a closely watched contest, just hours before voters cast their ballots in Thursday's special House election in Montana to replace Ryan Zinke, who is now the Trump administration's secretary of the interior. Gianforte, a technology executive, is running against Democrat Rob Quist, a folk singer and first-time candidate. The race in the traditional Republican stronghold is turning out to be closer than many thought it would be.

The encounter on election eve immediately captured statewide and even national attention. At least one local station interrupted prime-time programming for a breaking news report and reports bannered all of Montana's biggest newspapers.

The Billings Gazette, The Helena Independent Record and The Missoulian subsequently rescinded their endorsements of the Republican candidate.

Gianforte's campaign acknowledged an incident but offered a starkly different version of events — one contradicted by witnesses and by audio posted by The Guardian. Gianforte spokesman Shane Scanlon blamed Jacobs for being "aggressive" as he asked questions and for creating a scene.

"Tonight, as Greg was giving a separate interview in a private office, The Guardian's Ben Jacobs entered the office without permission, aggressively shoved a recorder in Greg's face, and began asking badgering questions. Jacobs was asked to leave," Scanlon said.

"After asking Jacobs to lower the recorder, Jacobs declined. Greg then attempted to grab the phone that was pushed in his face. Jacobs grabbed Greg's wrist, and spun away from Greg, pushing them both to the ground. It's unfortunate that this aggressive behavior from a liberal journalist created this scene at our campaign volunteer BBQ."

Audio of the incident posted by The Guardian seemed to directly contradict the Gianforte campaign's version, as did a number of witnesses — including a Fox News crew that was in the room during Wednesday's incident.

Alicia Acuna wrote on Fox News' website that she and a crew were preparing for an interview with Gianforte when Jacobs walked into the room, produced a voice recorder and asked Gianforte a question. After Gianforte rebuffed Jacobs, and Jacobs asked a follow-up question, Gianforte grabbed him by the neck, Acuna wrote.

"Gianforte grabbed Jacobs by the neck with both hands and slammed him into the ground behind him," she wrote. "Faith, Keith and I watched in disbelief as Gianforte then began punching the man, as he moved on top the reporter and began yelling something to the effect of 'I'm sick and tired of this!'"

In audio of the incident, Gianforte can clearly be heard getting upset. In it, Jacobs asks Gianforte about the Republican health care bill. Gianforte tells him, "Let me talk to you about that later" as Jacobs continues trying to ask a question. "Speak with Shane," Gianforte says, referring to his spokesman.

"The last guy did the same damn thing," Gianforte says.

"You just body-slammed me and broke my glasses," Jacobs says.

"Get the hell out of here," Gianforte yells.

Gootkin, the sheriff, initially declined to file charges, saying that he had not yet listened to full audio of the incident. He subsequently issued a citation.

In March, Gootkin donated $250 to Gianforte's campaign, according to an FEC filing.

"After the press conference it was brought to my attention that people were commenting on a contribution that I made to the Gianforte campaign. I did contribute $250.00 on March 23, 2017. This contribution has nothing to do with our investigation which is now complete," the sheriff stated.

The sheriff said charges followed multiple interviews and an investigation by the Gallatin County Sheriff's Office. He said it was a misdemeanor based on "the nature of Jacobs' injuries."

Other reporters on the scene confirmed via Twitter that they witnessed some sort of altercation between the two.

"I'm not sure I've seen anything like this before," BuzzFeed reporter Alexis Levinson, who was on the scene, tweeted in a long thread. "This happened behind a half-closed door, so I didn't see it all, but here's what it looked like from the outside. Ben walked into a room where a local TV crew was set up for an interview with Gianforte. All of a sudden, I heard a giant crash and saw Ben's feet fly in the air as he hit the floor."

"Ben walked out holding his broken glasses in his hand and said: 'He just body-slammed me,'" Levinson continued.

Whitney Bermes, a reporter for the Bozeman Daily Chronicle, tweeted that the police were called to the scene. The Daily Chronicle also reported that Jacobs was treated by an ambulance on the scene, and Bermes later tweeted that one person was transferred to the hospital.

"Gianforte sitting in a Jeep. Sheriff's deputies were talking to him earlier. Now a medic is at the window talking with him," Bermes also tweeted.

Gianforte then left the event before he was scheduled to speak, according to reporter tweets.

In an interview, Jacobs told MSNBC he approached Gianforte and asked him about the Congressional Budget Office's score of the House bill to repeal and replace the Affordable Care Act.

"It was the strangest moment in my entire life reporting," Jacobs said.

He said after calling his editor and police, he went to the hospital to have X-rays because he fell on his elbow.

The Guardian, in a statement released late Wednesday, said it stood by its reporter.

"The Guardian is deeply appalled by how our reporter, Ben Jacobs, was treated in the course of doing his job as a journalist while reporting on the Montana special election," U.S. editor Lee Glendinning said. "We are committed to holding power to account, and we stand by Ben and our team of reporters for the questions they ask and the reporting that is produced."

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee called on Gianforte to drop out of the race "after his alleged violent assault of an innocent journalist," spokesman Tyler Law said.

Quist declined to comment on the news after his first Missoula event of the evening, then also didn't address it at his second, a quick rally to thank his supporters at a brewery.

The candidate instead walked on stage, joined his opening act for a song, and repeated much of his stump speech for roughly seven minutes. He then walked off the stage and again declined to answer questions about Gianforte.

Elena Schneider and Cristiano Lima contributed to this report.

Gianforte wins Montana special election Back

By Elena Schneider | 05/25/2017 07:07 PM EDT

Republican Greg Gianforte won Montana's special House election Thursday night, beating Democrat Rob Quist a day after Gianforte was charged with assault for allegedly attacking a reporter covering his campaign.

The incident threatened to sink a red-state campaign that was already worrying Republicans nationally, despite President Donald Trump's 20-point win in Montana just last year. But Gianforte's win preserved the GOP's 24-seat edge in the House of Representatives, frustrating Democratic activists who poured money into Quist's campaign and demanded more help from party groups that saw the uphill, red-state race as unwinnable.

Gianforte, a technology executive, had 51 percent of the vote when The Associated Press called the race at about 10:30 p.m. Mountain Time. Quist, a folk singer and first-time candidate, had 44 percent of the vote. A Libertarian candidate, Mark Wicks, had 6 percent.

The hotly contested special election to replace Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in Congress took a violent turn Wednesday night when Ben Jacobs, a reporter for The Guardian, asked about Gianforte's reaction to the Congressional Budget Office score of the House Republican health care plan. Jacobs said Gianforte "body-slammed" him and broke his glasses, an account which was corroborated by audio of the incident and eyewitness accounts from a Fox News reporting team in the room. The accounts directly contradicted Gianforte's campaign, whose spokesman, Shane Scanlon, called Jacobs' behavior "aggressive."

But over a quarter-million voters cast their ballots before the incident, limiting its impact on the results of the special election.

Republicans including House Speaker Paul Ryan and Montana Sen. Steve Daines called on Gianforte to apologize Thursday, which Gianforte did in a victory speech late Thursday night before supporters in Bozeman, Mont.

"When you make a mistake, you have to own up to it. That's the Montana way," Gianforte said. "Last night I made a mistake and I took an action that I can't take back. I'm not proud of what happened. I should not have responded in the way that I did and for that I am sorry."

"I should not have treated that reporter that way and for that I am sorry Mr. Ben Jacobs," he added. Gianforte, however, did not address his campaign's contradictory statement released last night.

Republicans acknowledged that Gianforte has work to do to reset his image.

One Republican survey showed the news of the incident reached most voters in Montana. Ninety-three percent of likely Election Day voters in the state told Remington Research Group in an automated poll that they had heard about the altercation between Gianforte and Jacobs. Nine percent of those Election Day voters said they flipped their votes to Quist after hearing about the story.

"Gianforte's brand for the rest of his political career is going to be 'the body slammer,'" said Titus Bond, the pollster. "Every single room he walks into in D.C., that'll be the chatter, that's what they'll say."

"He won't be the only hot-headed lunatic in the House, but doesn't mean it's an easy situation for Republicans to deal with," said one national Republican strategist. "The Speaker was smart to say he should apologize, and most smart people agree he needs to make this right fast."

Quist told supporters that he conceded to Gianforte but wants them to stay involved in politics.

"I know Montanans will hold Mr. Gianforte accountable," Quist said. "Do not be discouraged. Be determined."

Gianforte always led the race, but even before the incident, private polling showed Gianforte's lead slipping from double-digits to single-digits in Montana. Even then, Democratic groups did not match the millions in outside spending poured in by the GOP, much to the frustration of Democratic activists, including a number of backers of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who endorsed Quist.

DCCC chairman Ben Ray Lujan said in a statement that Democrats intend to "compete hard for this seat" in 2018. "Unfortunately, the alleged violent assault of an innocent reporter and subsequent criminal charges have tainted this election at the very end and further clarified that Greg Gianforte is unfit to represent Montana," Lujan continued. "There's no question in my mind that Gianforte should not be sworn into office."

National Republicans took the opportunity to swipe at House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, after linking Quist to her in TV ads painting him as too liberal for Montana.

"Greg Gianforte will be the next congressman from Montana and Nancy Pelosi and liberals in Washington were rejected again," NRCC chairman Steve Stivers said in a statement.

Some Republicans had privately been criticizing Gianforte for not putting away the race more easily before the explosive end of the campaign. Democrats effectively tagged Gianforte as a millionaire from New Jersey who was trying to buy the election. All through last year's gubernatorial race, Democrats also attacked Gianforte over reports that he sued to block access to a stream in front of his ranch, kicking up a public lands dispute that "probably followed him into this House race," said Jeff Essman, the chairman of the Montana Republican Party.

Gianforte's episode with the reporter followed three weeks of intense pressure and questions on health care, after Gianforte was taped praising the GOP health care bill in a conversation with lobbyists while publicly refusing to commit to the plan. As Quist's campaign attacked Gianforte over his comments and provisions in the bill, private surveys showed Gianforte's lead slipping from double-digits to a slim, single-digit gap.

Quist's campaign win was powered by Democrats' online grassroots, which helped him raise more than $6 million — including $1 million in the final week of the race. But those activists grew frustrated over the course of the race as their investment was not matched by Democratic groups. Republicans spent more than $7 million on TV ads to about $3 million from Democrats.

Meanwhile, Republicans brought big names to the state, with Vice President Mike Pence and Donald Trump Jr. holding rallies with Gianforte in the final weeks of the race to stir up GOP voter enthusiasm.

EPA moves to suspend compliance for coal plant discharges rule Back

By Annie Snider | 05/25/2017 06:15 PM EDT

EPA is proposing to suspend compliance dates for an Obama administration regulation limiting toxic discharges from coal-fired power plants while the Trump administration decides how to proceed with the underlying regulation.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt today signed a proposed regulation that would suspend the date by which some facilities would have to implement two aspects of the rule, which limits waterborne pollutants like arsenic and lead. Under the final 2015 rule, compliance requirements for those aspects would kick in Nov. 1, 2018.

Pruitt's new proposed rule would postpone those requirements "until EPA promulgates a final rule specifying compliance dates."

EPA moved in April to reconsider the rule, known as effluent limitation guidelines, following industry requests. A federal court has also put pending litigation on hold amid EPA's review. Environmental groups are suing over EPA's decision to indefinitely suspend the rule.

"This proposed rule is one of nearly two dozen significant regulatory reform actions I have taken during my short time as EPA Administrator to protect the environment, jobs and affordable, reliable energy. Today's action, if finalized, will provide relief from the deadlines under the existing ELG Rule while we carefully consider the next steps for this regulation," Pruitt said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA is setting a 30-day public comment period on the proposed rule to suspend compliance dates, which would begin once the rule is published in the Federal Register.

House GOP leaders already plotting to avoid fall shutdown Back

By Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan | 05/25/2017 02:30 PM EDT

House Republican leaders, facing a serious time crunch this fall, are already plotting ways to avoid a government shutdown at the end of September — a real possibility given partisan divisions over spending priorities.

Speaker Paul Ryan in a closed-door GOP conference meeting Thursday morning laid out the legislative calendar, showing lawmakers they're approximately four months behind schedule in the appropriations process for 2018, in part because President Donald Trump's budget landed later than usual.

The early discussion about salvaging the annual spending process underscores how much Trump, Ryan and other party leaders are struggling to govern now that they run Washington.

House Republicans can't agree on their own budget blueprint for next year, clashing internally over cuts to entitlement programs and safety net initiatives such as food stamps and housing aid, all while trying to create space for tax reform and a big defense spending increase. In addition, they still have to find money for Trump's priorities, including the hugely controversial border wall between the United States and Mexico.

Congress needs to pass a funding bill by Sept. 30 to keep the lights on at federal agencies. Yet with lawmakers out for the August recess, they only have 43 legislative days left to pass appropriations bills before they hit that deadline. Obamacare repeal efforts are likely to suck up much of that time in the Senate. Tax reform — or even a tax-cut package — would also take up more time and energy.

Aware of the looming deadline, Ryan raised the possibility of clumping appropriations bills together in an omnibus to save time. Passing a continuing resolution, that essentially maintains current spending levels and priorities in order to keep the government open, was also discussed.

The idea, GOP insiders say, was to manage expectations of what's possible and what's not. Republicans for years have vowed to bring back "regular order" if they were in charge, with Congress debating and passing 12 separate spending bills each year. But even having the White House and Congress is not enough for Republicans. Regular order, for now, will remain a memory from a bygone era.

"We talked about how we might move forward on appropriations at this juncture... Putting all the appropriations together in one package is one option," said Rep Robert Aderholt (R-Ala.), a senior member of the House Appropriations Committee. "I think certainly, when you look at the calendar, you've got to say: It's crunch time, and of course trying to do all these appropriations bills in that short period of time" would be difficult.

Under the Budget Control Act, Republicans in fiscal 2018 face $5 billion in across-the-board cuts to defense and non-defense programs unless they take action. Trump wants to increase defense spending and request new money to build a border wall with Mexico. That, however, would require Congress to raise spending caps put in place years ago.

In order to do that, Republicans would need the support of at least eight Democrats in the Senate, which is extremely unlikely at this point. Democrats typically demand dollar-for-dollar funding boosts for non-defense programs, such as transportation or housing, in order to support defense increases. They've also sworn to never support funding for Trump's wall, something the White House wants to push for in earnest this fall — even at the risk of a shutdown fight.

During Thursday's House GOP conference meeting, Republicans harped on Senate rules requiring 60 votes for passage instead of a simple majority. They discussed the possibility of convincing Senate Republicans to go nuclear on spending bills, as they did to confirm Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch — though that's unlikely at best.

"We do our appropriations in the House... then, it goes over to the Senate and they say, 'No, we have to work with Democrats,'" said Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.), who often rants about Senate rules and wants Senate Republicans to eliminate the filibuster. "What will come out of this process is going to be a significantly, in large part, a Democrat omnibus ... We don't seem to have the courage to face the real problem head on."

Republicans, however, can't point to Democrats for all their budget problems: The conference faces a critical moment right now over how far they go in their own budget. Conservatives want drastically lower spending and are pushing GOP leaders to use reconciliation to cut safety-net programs. But that idea is sure to repel moderate Republicans, putting GOP leaders in the awkward situation of trying to find a way to garner 216 votes for passage. In the past, they've had to turn to Democrats to pass spending bills.

Defense hawks want dramatically higher spending. And all Republicans talk about balancing the budget, which is only possible if they raise taxes — an anathema — or cut entitlement programs. Trump has already said we won't touch Social Security retirement funds or Medicare.

"This is gonna be a brutal battle," said one GOP source. "Defense hawks want $640 [billion], appropriators want $516 [billion] for non-defense, moderates don't want any changes to mandatory. And yet everyone says the budget still has to balance. Those numbers don't add up. And a budget that doesn't have serious deficit reduction isn't going to make it out of committee."

Much is at stake. If Republicans don't agree on a blueprint, they will never get to tax reform. That's because only after passing the budget can they unlock the fast-tracking tool known as reconciliation that allows them to pass tax reform without a single Democratic vote in the Senate.

When asked when — and if — House Republicans would unveil their own budget, Budget Committee Chairwoman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) was non-committal.

"We're working on it, and we'll let you know when we get to that point," Black said. "We're going to bring it out as soon as we get consensus and get all of our people together."

And Black faithfully repeated that line several time no matter what question she was asked about the budget. "That's all I'm gonna give you, that we're working on it," Black said. GOP insiders expect the budget to be released in June.

There isn't much time to deliberate.

While the budget process typically starts in February, after the president releases his budget, Trump waited until the end of May to release the details of his fiscal blueprint. Even though the Trump budget — with huge spending cuts to domestic problems, big tax cuts and some fuzzy math to make it balance — was dead on arrival, the delay in sending it to Capitol Hill set lawmakers back, all while the issues dividing the Republican Conference are just becoming tougher and tougher.

"People know that we have an abbreviated timeframe for the appropriations process," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who sits on both the Appropriations and Budget panels.

Cole said Appropriations Committee Republicans met privately on Wednesday night to discuss the situation, but he acknowledged GOP lawmakers will miss the Sept. 30 deadline for passing spending bills.

"We're prepared to work Saturdays, whatever we need to do," Cole said. "We can get the bills ready to get all 12 bills out of committee. The real question is do you have the time to do them on the floor? Probably not. So you're gonna have 'minibuses' or an omnibus. I think there's just probably not the time given health care, given tax reform and everything else we've gotta get done."

Kentucky Rep. John Yarmuth, top Democrat on the House Budget Committee, says the GOP infighting over spending priorities is par for the course.

"We've got a Republican majority that's having a hard time governing," Yarmuth said. "We saw it on health care. It doesn't surprise that's it happening on the budget as well."

Yarmuth said his aides tried on Thursday to find out from their GOP counterparts whether a budget would be marked up in June.

"They clearly are undecided about what they're going to do," Yarmuth added.

Yarmuth, Rep. Nita Lowey (D-N.Y.) — ranking member on Appropriations — and party leaders want to get rid of any spending limits so they can boost funding for domestic programs.

Trump to tap nonproliferation expert as DOE's top lawyer Back

By Alex Guillén | 05/23/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump plans to nominate David Jonas to be the Energy Department's general counsel, the White House announced today.

Jonas, a partner at the Virginia law firm Fluet, Huber and Hoang since 2016, was also a DOE landing team member and is an expert on nuclear nonproliferation.

He previously served as the general counsel for the National Nuclear Security Administration, DOE's nuclear security arm, from 2001 to 2010, according to his LinkedIn page. From 2012 to 2014, Jonas was general counsel for the Defense Nuclear Facilities Safety Board, an independent agency that advises DOE on nuclear defense facilities.

Jonas's resume also includes a year as DOE's director of legal strategy and analysis and a year as a vice president at the Pentagon Federal Credit Union. He holds advanced law degrees in military law and international law.

Jonas's wife, Tina Jonas, served as chief financial officer for the FBI under Robert Mueller and later as CFO and under secretary of Defense from 2004 to 2008.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee likely will schedule a hearing on his nomination for sometime after Congress returns from its Memorial Day recess in early June.

Protesters disrupt FERC, DOE nominees' hearing Back

By Darius Dixon | 05/25/2017 11:34 AM EDT

A handful of climate change and anti-natural gas protesters took turns interrupting the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee nomination hearing of President Donald Trump's two FERC appointees and an Energy Department deputy this morning.

The disruptions at the hearing for FERC nominees Neil Chatterjee and Robert Powelson and deputy Energy secretary candidate Dan Brouillette started about 45 minutes into the meeting, with one protester screaming "FERC hurts families. Shut FERC down!"

Three other protesters interrupted the hearing in the next 15 minutes.

"I am compelled to interrupt this because I have seen the destruction that climate change [causes]," one woman said, as Sen. Joe Manchin peppered the nominees with questions.

As the woman and another protester were escorted out, and Manchin was assured by Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski that he had not lost any of his time questioning the nominees, he looked at the nominees and said "God bless America," drawing laughs from the audience.

Several organizations have signed onto a pledge to oppose any of Trump's appointments to FERC, and anti-gas protesters have regularly interrupted meetings at the agency's headquarters for more than two years.

The number of seats available to the public were limited at the hearing because the nominees brought more than 30 family members and friends.

WHAT'S NEXT: Murkowski told committee members today that they should expect to vote on the three nominees, along with Deputy Interior Secretary David Bernhardt, shortly after the upcoming week-long Memorial Day recess.

FERC nominees: Grid needs all-of-the-above energy mix Back

By Esther Whieldon | 05/25/2017 03:46 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's picks to fill two of the vacancies at FERC stuck to largely conservative talking points on the role of renewables and nuclear generation on the electricity grid at their confirmation hearing today, advocating for an all-of-the-above approach.

Neil Chatterjee, an aide to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, and Rob Powelson, a Pennsylvania utility regulator, were asked by lawmakers on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee what they think the nation's energy mix should look like in the future, and how FERC should address state policies that affect regional power market prices.

Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), who has argued that coal-fired generation was crucial for grid reliability, quizzed the nominees on their definition of baseload fuels.

Powelson said that in the PJM Interconnection market in the Mid-Atlantic region, those baseload supplies were nuclear, coal and natural gas, but that "renewables are playing a part of this energy mix."

"But they're the resources right now that seem to be evolving, and on a national level as well," Powelson said. "There's a tectonic shift taking place across the U.S."

Chatterjee agreed with Powelson, saying all generation sources were important. "We need coal, we need nuclear, we need hydro and we need renewables and then I think obviously gas plays an important role. Sometimes it serves as baseload, sometimes it serves as backup," and sometimes it's used opportunistically, he said.

If confirmed, Chatterjee and Powelson, both Republicans, will join the agency that has been without a quorum and unable to make any major decisions for almost four months. Among the major issues they would help decide if confirmed is how FERC should accommodate state policies that promote nuclear and renewables but could affect grid reliability and power prices, whether the grid can provide better incentives for battery storage, and how FERC should address state efforts to prevent solar developers from using the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act to force utilities to sign power purchase contracts.

The Trump administration has pushed policies to reverse the decline in the coal industry while stimulating new oil and natural gas production, veering sharply from the Obama administration's emphasis on curbing climate change and promoting renewables. Under the leadership of former chairmen Jon Wellinghoff and Norman Bay, FERC used its authority to promote demand response, storage and other clean-energy technologies.

Sen. Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.), who noted her state aimed to keep its nuclear power plants from closing, asked if the two "agree that state legislatures [are] the appropriate place for these policies to be decided, and as FERC commissioners would you act to pre-empt these laws as some have suggested?"

Both nominees pledged to keep an "open mind" on the issues and said they respect states' rights to establish their own energy policies. But Powelson noted earlier in the hearing that FERC may have to "step in" if state actions prevent the agency from following its own market and grid reliability mandates.

Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) asked how FERC should respond to pressure from the solar industry to intervene in moves by some states to staunch the flow of new projects they are building under PURPA, which is overseen by FERC but implemented at the state level.

"While you have my assurance I would work very seriously on these issues should I be confirmed, I think any major changes need to come from this body and not from FERC," Chatterjee said.

Blankenship appeals conviction to Supreme Court Back

By Alex Guillén | 05/25/2017 05:42 PM EDT

Former Massey Energy chief Don Blankenship asked the Supreme Court today to overturn his conviction related to the 2010 Upper Big Branch mine disaster that killed 29 of his workers.

A jury in 2015 acquitted Blankenship of various felony charges related to the disaster, but convicted him on a misdemeanor, conspiracy to violate mine safety standards. He was recently released from prison after serving a one-year sentence.

His appeal to the 4th Circuit was rejected in January, and now Blankenship has asked the Supreme Court to intervene because of two alleged infirmities with his trial.

One involves how a witness was questioned, while the other argues that the jury was given bad instructions about whether Blankenship had to "willfully" violate the law. Blankenship has long maintained that federal prosecutors did not prove he was specifically aware of the issues that led to the explosion.

It is unclear whether the Supreme Court will take Blankenship's appeal.

However, the high court last year overturned another high-profile criminal conviction out of the 4th Circuit — former Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell. A unanimous court ruled that McDonnell had been wrongly convicted on bribery charges that were defined too broadly. The government decided not to re-try McDonnell.

While Blankenship's case is significantly different, he does cite McDonnell's exoneration in his Supreme Court filing to argue that "instructional error [is] not harmless where it allowed conviction for conduct that is not a crime."

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by POET: Will climate change pop up as Trump, Pope meet? — Fiat sued in latest emissions cheating scandal — Trump taps another for DOE role
Date: Wednesday, May 24, 2017 5:46:11 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 05/24/2017 05:42 AM EDT

With help from Anca Gurzu and Esther Whieldon

ON THE ROAD TO ... ST. PETER'S: All eyes turn to Vatican City this morning where Pope Francis and President Donald Trump are meeting for the first time. Of course, the two hold starkly different views is climate change — Francis wrote an entire encyclical urging action to confront the problem while Trump has dismissed it as a Chinese hoax — and many observers expect the issue to come up in their discussions as U.S. weighs whether to pull out of the Paris agreement. Archbishop Marcelo Sánchez Sorondo, chancellor of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, told an Italian news agency last week he thought the pope might be able to influence Trump on the issue. "This president has already changed about several things, so perhaps on this as well," he said. The pope, for his part, said he didn't have a strategy to sway Trump on any political issue: "We'll talk, each of us will say what he thinks. Each of us will listen to the other," Francis said on May 13, according to Bloomberg.

ME FIRST — Democrats urge Trump to stick with Paris: Forty Senate Democrats, led by Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, are sending a letter to Trump this morning urging him not to abandon the 2015 Paris agreement on climate change. "Backing out of the Paris Agreement now, after the years of painstaking negotiations and strong U.S. leadership it took to get the world to this point, would be a self-inflicted injury to America's credibility and influence on the world stage," they wrote. Schumer, as well as Democratic Sens. Tom Carper, Maria Cantwell, Ben Cardin, Sheldon Whitehouse, Brian Schatz, and Ed Markey, will hold a press conference in the Capitol at 10 a.m.

Meanwhile, the European Union, China and Canada have agreed to co-host a global ministerial gathering in September to move the Paris agreement forward, Climate Action and Energy Commissioner Miguel Arias Cañete tweeted Tuesday evening. "The three parties agree on the need for urgent climate action and are ready to lead the way," he said in a statement. "No one should be left behind but our message today is very clear: we are moving ahead."

U.S. allies are frustrated by Trump's vague stances on climate change and trade in the days preceding the G-7 summit in Taormina, Italy on Friday and Saturday this week, POLITICO's Tara Palmeri reports. The lack of clarity on those matters is holding up the crafting of the formal statement usually released at the end of the conferences. "Trade and climate are holding up the communique," a senior French official said.

BUDGET URGES EVEN CHEAPER ENERGY: Don't expect many oil, natural gas and power producers to jump aboard the Trump budget's calls for even lower energy costs as they continue to struggle with the soft prices for their products and as the U.S. energy burden for most households is at its lowest level in decades, Pro's Ben Lefebvre and Darius Dixon report. Tuesday's document explicitly makes the call "for strengthening our national security, lowering the price of electricity and transportation fuels, and driving down the cost of consumer goods so that every American individual and business has more money to save and invest."

But oil producers are just regaining their footing after prices rebounded from lows in the mid-\$20s per barrel early last year. "Closing your eyes and keeping your fingers crossed that the market will always move in one direction with fossil fuels — which, in essence, is what the Trump administration proposes with this budget — is not what any smart business person or political leader would pin their future economic hopes to," Josh Freed, Third Way's vice president for clean energy, said. Not to mention that if oil price do sink, sustained low prices could stall the deployment of new technologies, such as electric cars, potentially putting the U.S. at risk of falling behind the rest of the world.

NON VA BENE: Fiat Chrysler faces potentially billions of dollars in fines after DOJ accused the company of selling almost 104,000 diesel vehicles equipped with software designed to cheat on emissions testing, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Fiat Chrysler faces fines of $37,500 to $45,268 per vehicle sold, along with further penalties for each undisclosed software device and reporting violations.

The automaker flatly denied the accusations. "The company intends to defend itself with strength especially against the accusations that it has deliberately planned to install manipulative technology to apply to U.S. emission tests," Fiat said in a statement. As POLITICO Europe's Joshua Posaner reports, Fiat said it has cooperated with an ongoing investigation by EPA and the California Air Resources Board.

TRUMP TAPS ANOTHER FOR DOE POST: David Jonas, a partner at the Virginia law firm Fluet, Huber and Hoang since 2016, has been tapped by the Trump administration to be general counsel at DOE, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. He was previously general counsel for the National Nuclear Security Administration, DOE's nuclear security arm, from 2001 to 2010, and then general counsel for the Defense Nuclear Facilities Safety Board, an independent agency that advises DOE on nuclear defense facilities, from 2012 to 2014. Expect a confirmation hearing in the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee sometime after the Memorial Day recess.

PRUITT SPEAKS: Look for EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to deliver keynote remarks today at noon during an energy symposium hosted by Faegre Baker Daniels Consulting. Also worth flagging: Pruitt's expected No. 2 EPA pick, Andrew Wheeler, is slated to deliver closing remarks at 3 p.m., after FERC Commissioner Tony Clark speaks on a panel entitled "The Future of the Electric Grid" at 2 p.m.

This is weird: Pruitt tweeted he met with Rep. Fred Upton, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee, about "the importance of protecting the Great Lakes" during a Wednesday meeting. That came after Trump's budget zeroed out the $300 million program cleaning up the Great Lakes. In addition to Upton, Pruitt also mentioned meetings with California Democrat Rep. Jim Costa and the Congressional Western Caucus.

TOP DEMOCRAT PUSHES FOR ETHICS WAIVERS: Schumer said on Tuesday he pressed OMB Director Mick Mulvaney to release copies of waivers the Trump administration granted to former lobbyists to get around their ethics pledge. That came after the White House sent a letter to Walter Shaub Jr., the head of the Office of Government Ethics, asking him to withdraw a request for those waivers. "There is absolutely no excuse for the Administration to keep these waivers from the OGE or the American people," Schumer said in a statement. "[Mulvaney] assured me that he would take my concerns under consideration — I hope they make this change for the good of our country."

PESTICIDES BILL ON THE FLOOR: Expect House floor action today on legislation — the Reducing Regulatory Burdens Act (H.R. 953) — that would exempt pesticide applicators from needing a Clean Water Act permit for spraying over water. It's broadly opposed by most Democrats as well as the environmental and public health communities. Similar legislation cleared the House in May 2016.

ZINKE TEES UP INTERIOR REORG: Look for proposals in the next couple of months aimed at reorganizing the Interior Department, Secretary Ryan Zinke said Tuesday. As Pro's Esther Whieldon and Annie Snider report, he hopes to increase coordination on issues like wildlife corridors, watersheds and trail systems that span multiple federal agencies, as well as state and local ones. "I view this as a century reorganization to look at how best to manage, protect, use our public lands in the next 100 years given that we have a number of challenges," Zinke said during a conference call.

ANOTHER PUBLIC KEYSTONE MEETING SCHEDULED: The Nebraska Public Service Commission announced Tuesday it would hold an additional public meeting on June 7 on the Keystone pipeline's proposed route through the state. That meeting will be held in O'Neill, Neb., from 1 to 8 p.m. "We recognize the emotion and conviction surrounding this application," Jeff Pursley, executive director of the commission, said in a statement. The notice said even more meetings are possible and a public hearing on the application will be held sometime during the week of Aug. 7-11 at the Lincoln Marriott Cornhusker Hotel.

TAKING AIM AT SUE AND SETTLE: Two House Oversight subcommittees today receive testimony on "sue and settle" agreements, in which federal agencies agree to regulatory actions as part of settlement deals with outside groups. Republicans have long contended that Democrats and greens engaged in the practice, which they say imposes significant economic burdens on regulated industries without giving them an opportunity to participate in the process. The hearing gavel today at 2 p.m. in Rayburn 2154.

PANEL EXAMINES NATURAL RESOURCES LAWS: The House Natural Resources Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations holds a hearing this morning on the implementation of the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, the Wilderness Act of 1964, and the Federal Land Policy and Management Act, paying special attention to "instances where federal agencies' application of these three federal laws has strayed beyond their original purposes and intent." Chairman Raul Labrador kicks things off today at 9 a.m. in Longworth 1324.

SOLAR PANEL TRADE PROBE LAUNCHED: The U.S. International Trade Commission

announced Tuesday it would take the first step in investigating U.S.-based solar cell manufacturer Suniva's request for trade tariffs to protect the manufacturing sector, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. Suniva argues a flood of cheap solar panel modules and cells, mainly from Chinese companies, are severely harming its business. In a statement, the Solar Energy Industries Association pledged to "remain at the forefront of the opposition to Suniva's requested remedies."

INTERIOR REVIEWING PAST MOUs: The Interior Department late Monday ordered assistant secretaries to have their agencies report by June 2 on any memorandum of understanding or memorandum of agreement they signed last year and until Trump's January inauguration that "are high level and national or regional and represent a commitment of resources or memorialize policy direction," according to a copy of the email obtained by ME. Zinke has ordered a full review of the agency's actions under the last administration. Among those that could be targeted are Interior's MOU with Mexico on resource management, its MOU with California to coordinate on renewables and a multi-agency MOU creating a wildland fire leadership council.

FERC LOOKS FOR MORE INPUT ON MARKET DESIGN: FERC staff is asking for additional comments following up on an early May technical conference on how the agency should design long-term solutions to problems facing the three Eastern power markets. FERC will be accepting comments for 30 days.

LAWSUIT SEEKS CLIMATE CENSORSHIP RECORDS: The Center for Biological Diversity filed another lawsuit against the Trump administration Tuesday seeking public records showing federal employees at DOE, EPA, Interior and State have been barred from using climate change-related terms in official communications. "Just as censorship won't change climate science, foot-dragging and cover-ups won't be tolerated under the public records law," CBD's Taylor McKinnon said in a statement.

MAIL CALL! SENATORS URGE CAREFUL MONUMENT REVIEW: Twenty-three Republican senators urged Zinke to "keep all remedies on the table as you consider how to correct past abuses of the Antiquities Act" and ensure a "more measured approach" is taking moving forward with monument designations. Meanwhile, Sen. Cory Gardner and Rep. Scott Tipton urged Zinke in their own letter not to make any changes to the designation of the Canyons of the Ancients National Monument in Southwest Colorado.

RELEASE THE FUNDS: Fifty-eight Democratic congressmen, led by Don Beyer, Paul Tonko and Anna Eshoo, sent a letter to Energy Secretary Rick Perry Wednesday seeking the immediate release of funds for previously approved ARPA-E projects and more information on existing procedures for approving and funding grants. "Agencies may not thwart the intent of Congress by withholding or impounding funds directed for a specific purpose," they wrote.

REPORT: GOVERNMENT GIVING BILLIONS IN DRILLING SUBSIDIES: A collection of environmental groups led by Oil Change International today released a report finding the government provides at least $7 billion per year in subsidies to support fossil fuel production on federally held lands and offshore waters. It argues the fossil fuel leasing program on public lands should be phased out, among other recommendations.

REPORT: CLIMATE LITIGATION ON THE RISE: The number of countries with active litigation over climate change has tripled since 2014 and there are three times as many cases involving the issue in the U.S. than the rest of the world combined, according to a report out

Tuesday from the United Nations Environment Programme and Columbia Law School's Sabin Center for Climate Change Law. "Judicial decisions around the world show that many courts have the authority, and the willingness, to hold governments to account for climate change," Michael Burger, executive director of the Sabin Center, said in a statement.

Trump's budget calls for even cheaper energy Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Darius Dixon | 05/23/2017 06:47 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's budget proposal released Tuesday says lowering energy costs must be a national priority to benefit U.S. households — but that call's likely to fall flat with many oil, natural gas and power producers that have been struggling with the weak prices for their products in recent years.

And the call to lower energy prices, which follows Trump's campaign promises to boost U.S. oil and gas output, seems to overlook data that shows the energy burden for most households is at its lowest level in at least 25 years.

Since taking office, the Trump administration has moved to open up new lands and offshore areas for drilling, approved the Keystone XL and Dakota Access pipelines and removed Obama-era rules that the industry has complained stood in the way of its growth.

And Tuesday's budget calls for increasing energy production explicitly "for strengthening our national security, lowering the price of electricity and transportation fuels, and driving down the cost of consumer goods so that every American individual and business has more money to save and invest."

But U.S. oil producers have been breathing a sigh of relief since oil prices rebounded from lows in the mid-\$20s per barrel early last year. That selloff triggered a wave of bankruptcies and tens of thousands of layoffs in the industry. Now, with oil prices hovering near $50, oil producers have resumed drilling new wells, raising expectations that production could reach record levels next year — even as retail gasoline prices hover near $2.36 a gallon.

"When oil prices were high and U.S. economy was weak — at $100 a barrel and 10 percent unemployment — upstream jobs made a big difference," said Kevin Book, an analyst at ClearView Energy Partners. "Now that oil prices are low and the economy is stronger — $50 a barrel and 5 percent unemployment — policy emphasis appears to have returned to its usual focus: end-users."

The White House is also seeking to sell much of the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserves. Trump's budget would put 270 million barrels of oil on the market, a move the White House says could shave $16.6 billion off the federal deficit over the coming decade by selling half the inventory the Energy Department holds for emergencies. However, in this case, the budget takes a bullish stance for oil prices: To reach the deficit reduction goal, DOE would have to sell the oil at more than $61 a barrel, 20 percent higher than the current price.

In the power sector, retail electricity prices in the U.S. have been rising steadily over the past two decades — but they have lagged inflation, shrinking their hold on household budgets.

In fact, Americans in 2015 spent the smallest share of their income on energy since the Energy Information Administration started tracking the number in 1992. U.S. consumers are spending less than 6 percent of U.S. GDP to buy electricity, gasoline, natural gas and other fuels, according to EIA statistics, down from nearly 10 percent in 2008.

Many power producers have struggled as demand growth for electricity flattened out in recent years, and as cheap wind and solar power — as well as plentiful natural gas — cut deeply into the profits of nuclear and coal-fired power over the past decade. In the West, solar power has made electricity in California so inexpensive that it's even thrown the economics of some gas-fired power plants there into question and the state has resorted to shipping excess electricity across state lines.

Meanwhile, several states across the Midwest to the East Coast have seen power prices fall to their lower point since the decade began, fueled in large part by the rising flow of natural gas. The prices are so low that some utilities and power companies with large "baseload" facilities have pressed states and federal regulators to craft new market rules the industry hopes will provide more cash for those big plants.

The American Petroleum Institute, American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers and the Edison Electric Institute declined to comment on the Trump budget call for lower prices.

While voters and lawmakers alike lament spikes in gasoline prices, sustained low prices can also stall the deployment of new technologies, such as electric cars, potentially putting the U.S. at risk of falling behind the rest of the world and missing a big trade opportunity.

"There's an enormous emerging market in China for electric vehicles. Do we want to be exporting to China?" said Josh Freed, Third Way's vice president for clean energy. "It wouldn't appear so from this budget."

Trump's budget also leans too heavily on cost factors while ignoring the need to sustain a mix of energy sources on the electric grid that are also clean, Freed said.

"Leaving it to one or two cheapest-at-the-moment commodities is a very, very risky bet for the future of the American economy, our ability to create jobs and American security," he said. "Closing your eyes and keeping your fingers crossed that the market will always move in one direction with fossil fuels — which, in essence, is what the Trump administration proposes with this budget — is not what any smart business person or political leader would pin their future economic hopes to."

EPA sues Fiat Chrysler over emissions cheating allegations Back

By Alex Guillén | 05/23/2017 03:49 PM EDT

The Justice Department and EPA today sued Fiat Chrysler, contending the automaker sold almost 104,000 diesel vehicles equipped with software designed to cheat on emissions testing, threatening the Italian-owned company with billions of dollars in fines.

The agencies first went public with their allegations in January, when Obama-era officials demanded Fiat Chrysler explain whether its "auxiliary emission control devices" were acting as defeat devices on Ram 1500 and Jeep Grand Cherokee models.

Those defeat devices, consisting of at least eight software features that were undisclosed to EPA during the company's certification process, boost performance under real-world driving conditions by increasing nitrogen oxide emissions, according to DOJ.

Fiat Chrysler faces fines of $37,500 to $45,268 per vehicle sold, along with further penalties for each undisclosed software device and for reporting violations, which could add up to billions of dollars.

Fiat last week said it was in talks with the DOJ to settle the allegations, though today's filing does not indicate the parties have reached a deal. DOJ said in a release the talks continued but that timing was unclear.

Fiat on Friday announced it has taken a first step toward getting its 2017 model year diesel vehicles approved by EPA and the California Air Resources Board, and will install updated emissions software in 2014-2016 vehicles.

The Fiat allegations come after Volkswagen settled its own emissions cheating scandal for a record $4.3 billion.

Trump to tap nonproliferation expert as DOE's top lawyer Back

By Alex Guillén | 05/23/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump plans to nominate David Jonas to be the Energy Department's general counsel, the White House announced today.

Jonas, a partner at the Virginia law firm Fluett, Huber and Hoang since 2016, was also a DOE landing team member and is an expert on nuclear nonproliferation.

He previously served as the general counsel for the National Nuclear Security Administration, DOE's nuclear security arm, from 2001 to 2010, according to his LinkedIn page. From 2012 to 2014, Jonas was general counsel for the Defense Nuclear Facilities Safety Board, an independent agency that advises DOE on nuclear defense facilities.

Jonas's resume also includes a year as DOE's director of legal strategy and analysis and a year as a vice president at the Pentagon Federal Credit Union. He holds advanced law degrees in military law and international law.

Jonas's wife, Tina Jonas, served as chief financial officer for the FBI under Robert Mueller and later as CFO and under secretary of Defense from 2004 to 2008.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee likely will schedule a hearing on his nomination for sometime after Congress returns from its Memorial Day recess in early June.

Sources: Trump expected to tap Wheeler as EPA deputy Back

By Andrew Restuccia, Alex Guillén and Anthony Adragna | 03/16/2017 08:00 PM EDT

President Donald Trump is expected to tap Andrew Wheeler, a coal lobbyist and former aide to Sen. Jim Inhofe, to be deputy administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, sources familiar with the hiring process told POLITICO.

Sources cautioned that the decision has not yet been finalized, but they said Wheeler is expected to get the job. It's unclear when Trump will make the announcement, but one source said it could be weeks before Wheeler is officially tapped.

Wheeler worked as an EPA staffer earlier in his career. He later joined Inhofe's Senate office and then spent more than a decade as a Republican staffer on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, where he worked on several major pieces of legislation, including the 2005 and 2007 energy bills.

He has worked at the law firm Faegre Baker Daniels since 2009. He now co-leads the firm's energy and natural resources practice.

Wheeler is a registered lobbyist for Murray Energy, the nation's largest privately owned coal company, which regularly filed lawsuits against the Obama administration over its environmental regulations.

As a lobbyist, Wheeler may need to obtain a waiver to serve at the EPA.

Trump signed an executive order in January that bars registered lobbyists from participating in "any particular matter" on which they lobbied in the past two years. Those lobbying restrictions last for two years from the time the person joins the administration.

But the executive order says the administration can grant "any person a waiver of any restrictions" in its ethics and lobbyist requirements. Unlike an order signed by former President Barack Obama in 2009, Trump's executive order doesn't require public disclosure of the waivers.

Aside from Murray, Wheeler also lobbies on unspecified energy and energy efficiency issues for Underwriters Laboratories, an Illinois-based lab company, and on agricultural issues for cheese maker Sargento. His former clients include Xcel Energy and Bear Head LNG, as well as a cooking oil-recycling company, an auto auctioner and a medical isotope coalition.

Wheeler won't be the only energy lobbyist to join the Trump administration. Mike Catanzaro, a lobbyist at the firm CGCN Group whose clients included several fossil fuel companies, took a job at the White House last month as an energy and environmental adviser at the National Economic Council. Catanzaro is a former EPW staffer to Inhofe.

Meanwhile, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, a fellow Oklahoman, has also brought former Inhofe aide Ryan Jackson on as chief of staff. Byron Brown, a former Inhofe aide, is EPA's deputy chief of staff and Mandy Gunasekara, a former EPW counsel, is now a senior policy adviser to Pruitt.

More aides with ties to Inhofe are expected to join the EPA in the coming weeks. Susan Bodine and Brittany Bolen, two EPA staffers, are widely expected to be offered jobs at EPA.

Wheeler, a White House spokeswoman and an EPA spokesman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Zinke to unveil Interior 'century' reorganization plan Back

By Esther Whieldon and Annie Snider | 05/23/2017 03:00 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said today he will begin releasing proposals in the next couple of months to reorganize the agency.

"I view this as a century reorganization to look at how best to manage, protect, use our public lands in the next 100 years given that we have a number of challenges," Zinke said in a conference call about the fiscal 2018 budget proposal.

Zinke said the reorganization will be aimed at coordinating on issues like wildlife corridors, watersheds and trail systems that span multiple federal agencies, as well as state and local ones.

He said his staff has already begun exploring ways of applying military models, he said, and for natural resources, the concept could be based around different watersheds to push more authority down to the "front lines."

Zinke has met with White House officials and interest groups including from the energy industry and environmental sectors about a reorganization options. And he met with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue to discuss fighting forest fires. POLITICO in January reported Zinke was mulling proposing congress move USDA's Forest Service to the Interior.

WHAT'S NEXT: With a few exceptions, Zinke will need congressional approval for any major reorganization of the Interior's nine bureaus or for bringing over bureaus from other agencies.

U.S. trade commission launches investigation into Suniva solar trade complaint Back

By Esther Whieldon | 05/23/2017 06:10 PM EDT

The U.S. International Trade Commission has initiated an investigation into the request by U.S.-based solar cell manufacturer Suniva that the Trump administration create temporary trade tariffs to protect the manufacturing sector.

The move, announced today, clears the first first hurdle in the process.

In April, Suniva filed a petition with the USITC asking the agency to recommend Trump grant for temporary relief under Section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 and to impose trade restrictions for four years on imported solar cells and modules. Suniva is going through a bankruptcy proceeding and agreed to file the Section 201 petition in exchange for an additional line of credit.

The company contends that an influx of cheaper solar panel modules and cells largely from China are putting it out of business.

WHAT'S NEXT: The commission said it will accept pre-hearing briefs on the case through Aug. 8. It hopes to determine the extent to which the cheaper solar panels are causing injury by Sept. 22 and to send recommendations to Trump by Nov. 13.

Doug Palmer contributed this report.

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by the National Biodiesel Board: FERC green lights two controversial pipelines — The Texas think tank helping to staff the Trump administration — Probe sought on Puerto Ricans drinking from Superfund sites
Date: Monday, October 16, 2017 5:43:23 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 10/16/2017 05:40 AM EDT

With help from Eric Wolff, Alex Guillén, Sara Stefanini and Darius Dixon

FERC APPROVES CONTROVERSIAL GAS PROJECTS: FERC gave its blessing late Friday to two contentious pipelines that would carry gas out of the Marcellus shale formation in West Virginia. The 2-1 approval came over the objections of Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur, who said the Atlantic Coast and Mountain Valley pipeline projects were not in the public interest. Atlantic Coast would run through Virginia's Shenandoah Valley on its way to North Carolina, while Mountain Valley would end in southern Virginia. At the heart of LaFleur's 5-page dissent is concern about the footprints and redundant elements of the 900 miles of new gas infrastructure, which she believed could've been reined in in order to limit their collective environmental impacts. Although Atlantic Coast has documented demand for all of its capacity, MVP could only account for 13 percent of its capacity, she wrote.

LaFleur's dissent highlighted two alternative approaches requested by FERC staff that they ultimately dismissed because of how much of a design overhaul they would require, significantly upsetting proposed schedules. One option would've shaved 173 miles off the collective 900 miles, and avoided the Monongahela National Forest and the George Washington National Forest while reducing the number of crossings of the famous Appalachian Trail and Blue Ridge Parkway. The second alternative — a single, larger pipeline — would essentially remove all the environmental impacts associated with the Mountain Valley project. "[T]he decision before the Commission is simply whether to approve or reject these projects, which will be in place for decades. Given the environmental impacts and possible superior alternatives, approving these two pipeline projects on this record is not a decision I can support," she wrote. LaFleur, who doesn't seem to have voted against a natural gas project approval since a controversial compressor station decision in 2012, went to Twitter Friday night to say that her dissent "was a very difficult decision."

It's an issue in the Virginia governor's race: Republican nominee Ed Gillespie said in a Saturday statement he was "glad" for FERC's decision and called on Democratic nominee Ralph Northam to voice support for the projects. According to The Roanoke Times, Northam did not take a firm stance on the pipeline Saturday, noting the Army Corps of Engineers and Virginia's Department of Environmental Quality must still sign off on them. Elana Schor wrote about the dicey politics of the Atlantic Coast pipeline in 2015, when Virginia Republicans were fighting the project's route.

More pipeline drama in New York: FERC's approval of both projects came the same day New York lobbed a new test of the authority that states have to block natural gas pipelines, when Gov. Andrew Cuomo's administration challenged the commission's decision to overrule a state denial of a water quality permit for the 7.8-mile Millennium Valley Lateral project, POLITICO New York's Marie J. French reports.

And out of Europe: Russian gas giant Gazprom didn't think it would have much trouble expanding the Nord Stream pipeline, but those beliefs are being severely challenged, POLITICO Europe's Anca Gurzu reports. And Trump administration officials went to Brussels last week to reiterate U.S. opposition to the project.

AND WE'RE ROLLING INTO A NEW WEEK! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Duke Energy's Michael Sewell was first to pick Sen. Luther Strange as the tallest in U.S. history. Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

NEW MEMBERS OF THE INNER CIRCLE: A conservative Texas think tank that had close ties to Energy Secretary Rick Perry while he served as Texas governor has now seen three members of its staff selected for energy and environmental posts in President Donald Trump's administration, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The latest addition from the Texas Public Policy Foundation is Kathleen Hartnett White, Trump's controversial nominee to lead the White House's Council on Environmental Quality. Sometimes viewed as too far right even among Texas GOPers, the think tank has already landed staff in important roles overseeing oil and gas rules and federal enforcement of environmental standards.

Brian Roberts, a University of Texas professor specializing in political institutions and interest groups, said the group's rise appears reflective of the mutual disdain between Trump and D.C.-establishment Republicans that's forced the administration to look outside traditional GOP channels to fill political slots across the federal government. "Texas is a very large state that's been under Republican control for a generation, so it hardly seems far-fetched that there might be some conservative policy talent here," Roberts said. "Couple that with the fact that the Trump administration is going out of its way to avoid 'establishment' talent — those most likely to be resting comfortably in D.C.-area think tanks — it makes even more sense that we find them fishing for talent outside the swamp."

Other TPPF veterans in Trump slots: Susan Combs, who is awaiting Senate approval to become Interior's assistant secretary for Policy, Management, and Budget, and Doug Domenech, tapped to be Interior's assistant secretary of Insular Areas.

Sen. John Barrasso called White, an "excellent choice" in a statement to ME. "She deserves full and fair committee consideration, followed by a Senate vote," the Environment and Public Works Committee chairman said.

ON THE PRESIDENT'S MIND: Trump shot back at a New York Times story examining his struggles at implementing a host of campaign promises by largely touting his accomplishments in the energy arena. "The Failing @nytimes, in a story by Peter Baker, should have mentioned the rapid terminations by me of TPP & The Paris Accord & the fast.....approvals of The Keystone XL & Dakota Access pipelines. Also, look at the recent EPA cancelations & our great new Supreme Court Justice!" he tweeted. ME would just note Trump merely kicked off the multi-year process of withdrawing from Paris and those EPA "cancelations" must still go through the formal rulemaking process and survive vigorous legal challenges.

OIL RIG EXPLODES IN LAKE PONTCHARTRAIN: One person is missing and six others are injured after an oil rig reportedly owned by Clovelly Oil Co. exploded in Lake Pontchartrain, La. shortly after 7 p.m. Sunday, The New Orleans Advocate reports. Video footage filmed shortly afterward showed the platform still on fire. The Coast Guard and local police are reportedly responding to the scene.

KING COVE ROAD COMING? Turns out Interior's been working quietly behind-the-scenes on a land swap that would enable the construction of a long-sought one-lane gravel road from the isolated southwestern Alaska village of King Cove through the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge, The Washington Post reports. Opponents of the road fear it would harm the habitats of a variety of animals and potentially endanger other wildlife refuges throughout the country. The proposal would turn federal land over to King Cove Corporation that would enable construction of a road through the refuge that could be connected to roads on both sides. This has long been a pet project of Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and briefly delayed the confirmation of Obama-era Interior chief Sally Jewell.

FEINSTEIN GETS A CHALLENGER: California state Senate leader Kevin de León, who ushered ambitious climate legislation and an extension of the state's cap and trade program through his chamber, announced a primary bid against Sen. Dianne Feinstein, POLITICO California's David Siders reports. "California needs a senator who will stand up and fight for Medicare for All, one that prioritizes the fight against climate change, that will protect Dreamers and our economic prosperity," he said in an interview.

NEW PUSH TO FILL POLITICAL VACANCIES: Even as his boss has repeatedly voiced comfort leaving hundreds of high-level political appointments vacant, White House Chief of Staff John Kelly has granted Cabinet officials new autonomy to select top political appointees, POLITICO's Nancy Cook reports, citing 10 interviews with White House officials and advisers close to the administration. According to the Partnership for Public Service, the Senate has confirmed to date roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government.

— Four EPA nominees, including the highly controversial picks of Michael Dourson as chemicals chief and William Wehrum as lead air official, get votes Wednesday in the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Also on the to-do list are the nominations of David Ross to head the water office, Matthew Leopold to be general counsel and Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC, which Barrasso called a "big ask" even if packaged with two GOP selections.

PROBE SOUGHT INTO SUPERFUND DRINKING WATER: In light of reports some Puerto Ricans were drinking water from Superfund sites out of desperation, Homeland Security Ranking Member Bennie Thompson asked DHS to investigate whether that behavior was occurring and what could be done to stop it. Nearly one month after the storm, just 15 percent of the island has electricity and 31 percent of people still lack potable drinking water, according to government figures.

MICROBREWED LNG WITH A SIDE OF AVOCADO TOAST: Today is the last day to comment on the Energy Department's proposal to setup a special application process for the export of small batches of liquefied natural gas to countries that are not part of free trade agreements with the United States. According to its Federal Register notice, DOE wants to ease approvals for applications to export LNG in quantities up to 140 million cubic feet per day, so long as they don't require an environmental impact statement or an environmental assessment under the National Environmental Policy Act. The agency expects that the small-scale shipments will serve LNG customers in the Caribbean, as well as Central and South America. A few weeks after issuing this NOPR, DOE approved small-scale LNG exports to the Caribbean from a site in Florida.

FOR YOUR VIEWING PLEASURE: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop's full half-hour interview with C-Span's "Newsmakers" is available here. He said Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has "exceeded my expectations" so far. Other topics included wildfires, Antiquities Act and Puerto Rico, among others.

BIPARTISAN GROUP BASHES BIODIESEL CUTS: A bipartisan group of at least 25 senators — led by Heidi Heitkamp, Roy Blunt, Patty Murray and Chuck Grassley — are today sending EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt a letter urging him to reverse course on proposed cuts the advanced biofuel volume for 2018 and his intention to hold biomass-based diesel volume stagnant for 2019. "The industry is poised for growth, in accordance with the intent of the law, if EPA sends the market signals with increased volumes. Reducing volumes and especially those RVOs that were previously finalized is disruptive, unprecedented, and very troubling," the letter said.

ME FIRST — RFA REPORT SAYS RIN PRICES DON'T HURT GAS PRICES: The Renewable Fuels Association is out with a report today arguing that a jump in prices for credits under the Renewable Fuel Standard had little impact on gas prices. The report is an attempt to rebuff arguments from oil refiners that volatility in the market for Renewable Identification Numbers drive up gas prices, and thus EPA should act to reduce those costs. "This analysis demonstrates that EPA's efforts will have no impact on consumer gasoline prices," RFA CEO Bob Dinneen said in a statement. "If finalized, however, these proposals will have a decidedly negative impact on the U.S. ethanol industry by artificially cannibalizing demand."

EPA FOUND A CARBON RULE IT CAN LIKE: Sure EPA is proposing to roll back the Clean Power Plan, but that doesn't mean all carbon rules are off the table: The agency is even now working on a rule to regulate carbon from jet engines, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. The rule would implement an agreement struck by the International Civil Aviation Organization to increase jet efficiency and thereby reduce carbon emissions on international flights. The rule is crucial for Boeing, which needs federal agencies to certify its engines before it can sell aircraft overseas in 2020, when the agreement takes effect. "For Boeing, GE and Pratt and Whitney, it's critical," said Daniel Rutherford, marine and aviation program director for ICCT. "If they want to sell aircraft after 2020, they need this rule."

A good sign for HFCs agreement? The ICAO agreement had the strong backing of industry, much as does an amendment to the Montreal Protocol to reduce use of global warming hydrofluorocarbons. "Without reading too much into it, the administration's pending carbon emission rule for aircraft could be a positive sign for its eventual support of the Kigali Amendment to the Montreal Protocol," Francis Dietz, spokesman for the Air Conditioning Refrigeration, and Heating Institute, told ME. "Just as the ICAO agreement has the U.S. aircraft industry's support, so too is Kigali strongly supported by U.S. manufacturers, who would like to see a unified, global phase down of HFC refrigerants rather than the hodgepodge of national, regional, and even state policies that would likely be the case without it."

REPORT: ACTING EPA SCIENCE ADVISER STEPPING DOWN: Robert Kavlock, currently EPA's acting assistant administrator for the Office of Research and Development, plans to leave that role Nov. 3, CNN reports. Though the agency's top science adviser initially declined to comment on the reasons for his departure, he later said "the time was right to go for a variety of reasons" and that his retirement was not early.

ALASKA OFFICIAL TO RUN EPA REGION 10 — REPORT: Chris Hladick, Alaska's commissioner of the Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development, has been picked to run EPA's Region 10, according to the website Must Read Alaska, citing unnamed sources familiar with the pick. Region 10 is headquartered in Seattle and covers Alaska, Washington, Oregon and Idaho. Region 10 is home to one of the more contentious matters EPA faces: The proposed Pebble Mine, which the agency is allowing to apply for mining and discharger permits but is opposed by Gov. Bill Walker. As commissioner, Hladick oversees several divisions and corporate agencies, including the Alaska Energy Authority and the Alaska Gasline Development Corps. He previously served as city manager of Unalaska.

GREEN MESS WITH TEXAS (HAZE RULE): Environmentalists have major issues with the Trump administration's recent federal haze rule covering Texas, calling it in a Friday court filing "a sham rule that flagrantly violates notice and comment procedures mandated by the Clean Air Act." Greens say EPA put out a "drastically different" final rule compared to what the Obama administration proposed in January and that the new version could actually allow for an increase in emissions. The groups ask the court to toss the rule and force EPA to issue a new version closer to the proposal within 30 days.

Also likely to affect the proceedings are the recent announcements from Texas utility Luminant about plans to close three coal plants that were major emitters of haze-forming pollutants. Those retirements could affect this rulemaking, though the filing didn't address the closures.

Divided FERC approves Atlantic Coast, Mountain Valley pipeline projects Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/13/2017 08:00 PM EDT

FERC gave a green light to the contentious Atlantic Coast natural gas pipeline project tonight, with Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur as a dissenting vote.

FERC voted 2-1 on approvals for both Atlantic Coast as well as a the Mountain Valley Pipeline Project.

"Given the environmental impacts and possible superior alternatives, approving these two pipeline projects on this record is not a decision I can support," LaFleur wrote in a 5-page dissent attached to both orders, saying that "I cannot conclude that either of these projects as proposed is in the public interest."

Pipeline politics: Virginia's Keystone? Back

By Elana Schor | 05/03/2015 01:32 PM EDT

Call it the Keystone next door.

A core group of Virginia Republicans and other landowners is leading the charge against a proposed natural gas pipeline near their backyards and using tactics similar to the environmental crusade against the Keystone XL oil pipeline — the very project Republicans in Congress have elevated into a matter of national economic survival.

Financial services super-lobbyist Phil Anderson is joining other politically active Republicans in carrying out a well-funded campaign against Dominion's $5 billion Atlantic Coast Pipeline, which would cross Virginia's Shenandoah Valley while running 550 miles from West Virginia's fracking fields to North Carolina. They're calling the effort "All Pain, No Gain," which echoes the "All Risk, No Reward" coalition that Keystone opponents formed two years ago.

"Job One is to stop this route — it would be a tragedy for the state of Virginia," said

Anderson, whose family has owned land for more than a century along Atlantic Coast's proposed path 20 miles west of Charlottesville. His allies include other landowners in the area, as well as Tom Harvey, a national security staffer in the George H.W. Bush administration; and Taylor Keeney, a former spokeswoman for Republican ex-Gov. Bob McDonnell.

The pipeline opponents say their fight is neither Republican nor Democratic, and Anderson said his campaign against Atlantic Coast is "not mutually exclusive" with the overwhelming GOP support for Keystone. He notes that Dominion could use condemnation to acquire access to private property for the project if it can't work out agreements with the owners.

"A lot of conservatives oppose this pipeline — eminent domain for a pipeline that's not providing any true public utility," Anderson said. He added: "The XL debate obviously has raised talking points about pipelines to a higher level, but in many ways they are not germane to this issue in Virginia. It's a different type of pipeline, a different sort of need."

Still, Atlantic Coast's opponents acknowledge the parallels with the anti-Keystone push that has pitted President Barack Obama against a chorus of GOP lawmakers in Washington. The dispute is also a reminder of how Keystone has changed the politics of pipelines nationwide, offering a template that activists from New England to Minnesota and Wisconsin are using to grind projects to a halt.

"In some ways, I think we're not too far from the crowd of folks who say, 'No pipelines, nowhere,'" said campaign co-Chairwoman Charlotte Rea, an Air Force veteran and self-described independent. "We have a lot of common ground with those folks, more common ground probably than we do differences."

The activists leading the fight against the Alberta-to-Texas Keystone XL project say: Welcome aboard, Virginians.

"Any effort to slow the building of new fossil fuel infrastructure is a blow for climate sanity at this point," said Bill McKibben, co-founder of the group 350.org.

"I am happy to see Republicans got their backbone back after selling out landowners along the Keystone XL route for the very same risks and concerns about property rights and water," said Nebraska anti-Keystone activist Jane Kleeb. She added, "If the K Street lobbyists want to learn how to run a grass-roots campaign to protect property rights and water, they can come visit us in Nebraska."

Anderson, whose firm Navigators Global has represented big-name clients such as AIG and AT&T, said his main concern is blocking Atlantic Coast's current route — not necessarily "nuances of opinion about subsequent routes [or] having no pipelines at all." He complained that Dominion "consulted with no one" before choosing the path.

He also contends that Virginians have no guarantee that they would benefit from either the fuel the pipeline would carry or the jobs it would create, saying that "there is very little gain for the citizens of Virginia from this pipeline." That's pretty much Obama's slam on Keystone, which he has said would be "very good for Canadian oil companies" but not even "a nominal benefit to U.S. consumers."

Atlantic Coast's foes are aiming their political pressure at Gov. Terry McAuliffe and Sens. Tim Kaine and Mark Warner, all of them Democrats, and have been running television and radio ads in the Virginia heartland urging people to contact the senators. Anderson said the campaign aims to grab the politicians "by the shoulders and say, 'Let's have a conversation about how this thing should go.'"

Fundraising for the All Pain, No Gain campaign is halfway to organizers' $1 million goal, Anderson said. The Global Environment & Technology Foundation, an Arlington, Virginia-based nonprofit that Harvey chairs, is the vehicle for donations to the campaign.

Although McAuliffe was among Atlantic Coast's earliest backers, activists still hope to persuade him to shrug off what Anderson quipped is Dominion's "letter jacket." McAuliffe spokesman Brian McCoy seemed to offer little hope for a change of heart, underscoring McAuliffe's support in a statement that said the governor "has no role in the planning of the project" but "has urged the companies involved to proceed with as much deference to the concerns of landowners and local communities as possible."

But McAuliffe, a longtime ally of Bill and Hillary Clinton, suggested new caveats for the pipeline on Thursday in an interview with Richmond radio station WRVA. McAuliffe told a caller that the state should "pick the best route that doesn't affect the homeowners. I want a route that doesn't affect our pristine environmental areas."

Warner and Kaine have steered clear of any firm stance on the project, though both have spent weeks urging the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to extend its initial public comment period before starting an environmental review.

Kaine and his aides have met with landowners and environmentalists about Atlantic Coast, and the senator "believes their concerns are worthy of careful consideration," a spokeswoman said. Warner remains "committed to listening to the concerns of constituents, taking into consideration the environmental impacts, and carefully monitoring the final pipeline route to ensure it is in the best interest of the state," spokeswoman Rachel Cohen wrote in an email.

The campaign has stirred a battle royal with Dominion, the state's dominant electricity supplier. Dominion is a 45 percent partner in the Atlantic Coast project, along with Duke Energy, Piedmont and the Atlanta-based energy services company AGL. Dominion began its own ad campaign in support of Atlantic Coast even before All Pain, No Gain's ads started. It has also prepared a "Myth vs. Fact" sheet that seeks to counter the opponents' arguments, including their contentions that the pipeline would be used export fuel as well as criticisms of gas as bad for the climate.

Dominion wants "to find the route with the least impact to the environment, to historical and cultural resources, and that's what we believe we're doing through conversations with landowners," spokesman Jim Norvelle said. He added that the green movement "also wants to close coal-fired power stations," which makes Atlantic Coast's gas important for power companies that "still have a responsibility to keep the lights on."

Norvelle acknowledged that fewer landowners in Rea's home of Nelson County have given Dominion access to their land than in any of the other Virginia counties where surveying for the pipeline is underway — although he added that they seem willing to "bring reporters on their property."

All Pain, No Gain co-Chairwoman Nancy Sorrells countered that Dominion would be unable to find any "alternate responsible routes" for the pipeline through Augusta County, where she lives, or in Rea's county. "Our economy is too dependent on things that would be harmed," she said.

Sorrells, who like Rea is an independent, said the group wants Dominion and its partners to show a demonstrated need to ship 1.5 billion cubic feet of gas through their state every day. (Atlantic Coast's annual capacity is more gas than Virginia consumed last year, according to the Energy Department.) It also has significant questions about the safety of building a 42-inch pipeline across Nelson and Augusta counties, which depend on agriculture and tourism.

Meanwhile, Republicans in neighboring states are pressing FERC to sign off on the project. West Virginia Sen. Shelley Moore Capito recently urged the agency "to proceed without further delay" on the review, while North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr called for "a robust and transparent public process" in a letter that hails the economic benefits of Atlantic Coast.

Those benefits would include $377 million in lower annual energy bills for Virginia and North Carolina customers, according to a Dominion-commissioned study released earlier this year.

Glen Besa, director of the Sierra Club's Virginia chapter, said his group's activists and the new crew of plugged-in Atlantic Coast opponents have indeed found an agenda they can share. They're "all pushing to minimize the impact of any pipeline that's built, and from our perspective stop any pipeline from being built," he said.

"In one sense," Besa added, "there's a common enemy: Dominion Virginia Power."

POLITICO Pro New York: State challenges feds to block pipeline for natural gas power plant Back

By Marie J. French | 10/13/2017 05:19 PM EDT

ALBANY — Gov. Andrew Cuomo's administration is challenging a federal decision to overrule New York's denial of a water quality permit, in a test of the authority that states have to block natural gas pipelines.

The Department of Environmental Conservation on Friday filed a petition for a rehearing with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission over the commission's decision to overrule the DEC's rejection of the 7.8-mile Millennium Valley Lateral project.

DEC rejected the permit in August, arguing federal regulators hadn't considered the project's climate change impacts. FERC didn't account for the emissions from the CPV Valley power plant the pipeline would supply, the department said.

In September, FERC ruled that the DEC waived its authority to approve or deny a water quality permit because the agency missed its statutory one-year deadline to act on the permit under federal law. That ruling has already led the backers of the Constitution Pipeline, for which the Cuomo administration rejected a key permit, to appeal to FERC on the same grounds.

The state's petition focuses on whether the one-year deadline for action was triggered by the first application submitted by Millennium, which the state said was incomplete, or the refiled application.

"Under FERC's erroneous interpretation of Section 401, the waiver period would commence upon the Department's receipt of any request for a [water quality certificate], however perfunctory," the petition states.

If DEC simply denied incomplete applications as FERC's September decision suggested, it "would be inefficient and penalize both the Department and an applicant by foreclosing the opportunity to work cooperatively to ensure that a given application contains all the necessary information for a Department to render a decision on the merits," it says.

The state's requirement for a complete application is also consistent with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' practice, according to the state.

The power plant the pipeline would supply is part of a corruption case against Joe Percoco, a top former aide to Cuomo. Environmental activists have seized upon that link in calling for blocking the plant. The alleged corruption scheme did not involve permits or other state actions benefiting the 685 megawatt Orange County plant, but Percoco did play a role in a bi-state agreement — since ended — with New Jersey that benefited a CPV plant in that state.

The Texas think tank filling out Trump's energy, environment team Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/16/2017 05:00 AM EDT

The nomination of Kathleen Hartnett White to lead the White House's Council on Environmental Quality makes her the third member of a conservative Texas think tank to land a prominent energy or environmental job in the Trump administration.

That think tank, the Texas Public Policy Foundation, was closely tied to Energy Secretary Rick Perry during his years as governor. And though it sometimes skewed too far to the right for even some Texas GOP members, it's finding success in filling prominent positions overseeing oil and gas rules and federal enforcement of environmental standards.

"It seems to be there is expertise outside of D.C.," said Heritage Foundation research fellow Nick Loris. "In some sense, it's refreshing to get some folks from outside the bubble."

The foundation's rising profile appears to reflect the mutual disdain between Trump and D.C.-establishment Republicans, which has prompted the White House to search further afield for staff, said Brian Roberts, a University of Texas professor specializing in political institutions and interest groups.

"Texas is a very large state that's been under Republican control for a generation, so it hardly seems far fetched that there might be some conservative policy talent here," Roberts said. "Couple that with the fact that the Trump administration is going out of its way to avoid 'establishment' talent — those most likely to be resting comfortably in D.C.-area think tanks — it makes even more sense that we find them fishing for talent outside the swamp."

As head of the CEQ, White would help guide federal environmental initiatives and develop the administration's policies on issues such as implementation of the National Environmental Policy Act, the landmark 1970 law that requires environmental analyses for federal projects.

But she's drawn sharp criticism for her unconventional views, including her stance that carbon emissions are harmless.

"Appointing a climate denier and friend of the fossil fuel industry like [White] to such a vital environmental policy position is a complete joke," said Gene Karpinski, president of the League of Conservation Voters.

White, who also chaired the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, pressed "the moral case" for fossil fuels in a 2014 paper for the Foundation, arguing that coal, oil and gas should not be moved aside for "inferior energy sources" given their role in spurring the Industrial Revolution. And in a controversial 2014 blog post, she credited the rise of fossil fuels with helping to end slavery.

The TPPF first set up shop in Texas in 1989 to push the issue of school vouchers in the state. It has since gotten behind policies that, among other things, would repeal all Texas taxes except a sales tax, and has called for a convention of states to rewrite parts of the U.S. Constitution. It also seeks to end state-backing of programs curbing greenhouse gas emissions and boosting renewable energy.

"Our founder's goal almost 30 years ago was to produce Heritage-caliber research on Texas issues," said Alicia Pierce, TPP spokeswoman, referring to the Heritage Foundation. "As we've realized so many state policies are hamstrung by federal actions, we've started to explore those angles in a way that supplements the work done by our friends such as Heritage, not to encroach on their work."

Heritage, for its part, has welcomed the the Texas group's growing role, and it hosted a TPPF-sponsored event in Washington. The group has also recommended experts for panel discussions, Loris said.

The TPPF flourished during Rick Perry's record-long stint as Texas governor, and Perry's policies and budgets often followed the direction of Foundation policy papers, Texas political analysts said. TPPF Chief Executive Brooke Rollins served as Perry's deputy general counsel and later his policy director in Austin. Chip Roy, another Foundation expert, was Perry's senior adviser in Texas, as well as a staff member for Republican Sens. John Cornyn and Ted Cruz.

"A lot of Republican leaders here in Texas take their cues from a small selection of conservative think-tanks, and the TPPF is one of them," said Adrian Shelley, director for the Texas branch of government watchdog Public Citizen.

The relationship with Perry's administration helped the Foundation attract donors. By the time

Perry finished his 15-year tenure as governor, the Foundation's annual revenue had grown tenfold, to nearly $11 million in 2015, according to IRS filings.

The ties with Perry were strong enough that the foundation even named a part of the $20 million headquarters it built in Austin in 2015 the "Governor Rick Perry Liberty Balcony." Its website also offered Perry as an expert available for interviews.

An Energy Department spokesman did not reply to questions about Perry's relationship with the Foundation.

Another TPPF alumnus called to make the jump to Washington is Susan Combs, a former Texas comptroller under Perry, who is awaiting Senate approval to become Interior's assistant secretary for Policy, Management, and Budget.

Democrats are sure to probe Combs' long-running fight to against the Endangered Species Act. During her tenure as Texas comptroller, a little-noticed amendment to a state spending bill empowered her office to manage the Texas Fish and Wildlife Service's endangered species list. Combs used that power to help block the FWS from designating as an endangered species the dunes sagebrush lizard, a small reptile that lives mainly in the oil-rich Permian Basin in west Texas.

The decision was made over the protest of a career FWS scientist who was subsequently transferred out of the state, according to a whistleblower complaint the scientist filed in 2014.

Combs, whose website offers her as a public speaker on topics such as "Winning the Battle Over Regulatory Issues Under the Federal Endangered Species Act (ESA)," was unavailable for comment.

Trump has also tapped Doug Domenech to be Interior's assistant secretary of Insular Areas. He joined the TPPF in 2015 as director of the think tank's Fueling Freedom Project, billed as a way "to combat the Environmental Protection Agency's proposed Clean Power Plan" and "push back against the EPA's onerous regulatory agenda that threatens America's economy, prosperity, and well-being."

Domenech has also praised a booklet written by Dr. Roy Warren Spencer, a climate change denialist who has also questioned the theory of evolution. Separate from the Foundation, Domenech has written for the Capital Research Center, a group that has argued that carbon dioxide is harmless and regulating would destroy jobs. Domenech said in Senate testimony that he doesn't "minimize that the climate is changing," but he has also written that the change is "in very small ways."

Domenech was also Virginia's Secretary of Natural Resources for four years up to January 2014, who's emails contained an unusual footer message: "It's OK to print this email. Paper is a Biodegradable, Renewable, Sustainable product made from trees and recycled paper. Growing and harvesting trees provides jobs for millions of men and women."

Domenech and White were not available for comment.

Perry's successor, Gov. Greg Abbott, has remained close to the group, and some of TPPF board members have bankrolled challenges to lawmakers who blanch at implementing many of its conservative policy proposals. But other Texas Republicans have been wary of whether the group pushes ideological stances over sound policy, including its dubious claims about state spending in a bitter 2013 state budget battle.

And its argument in its effort to repeal Texas' corporate and property taxes have also raised eyebrows, said Jim Keffer, a Republican who served 20 years in the Texas Legislature before stepping down last year.

"They swing a lot of weight, no doubt about it," Keffer said of the foundation. "But I think the data is skewed. We would have had to raise our [sales] tax from six percent to 20 percent for the sales tax to do what they wanted to do as far as getting rid of all the other taxes. That would literally ruin the Texas economy."

Another problem is that while the foundation has had Texas lawmakers' ears, they haven't had much success in getting their policies passed into law, notes Scott Braddock, editor of the Quorum Report, which focuses on Texas politics. Despite school choice being its core policy issue since its founding, there remains no school voucher system in Texas, Braddock notes.

"For someone who prides himself on getting things done, there is some irony in Trump choosing folks who are increasingly legislatively ineffective in their home state and importing them to Washington," Braddock said.

Alaska's long road war Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 04/04/2014 05:00 PM EDT

In the fall of 1998, Frank Murkowski took to the Senate floor to make an impassioned plea for the authority to build a one-lane gravel road from the isolated southwestern Alaska village of King Cove to a neighboring community with an all-weather airport.

"This is a road to life for the residents of King Cove," he said.

More than 15 years later, his daughter, Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski — along with the rest of the Alaska congressional delegation — is still fighting for the road, insisting it's the only viable way to ensure that King Cove's 965 largely native Alaskan residents have access to emergency medical care.

(Also on POLITICO: Full transportation and infrastructure policy coverage)

What seems like a simple request is anything but. The proposed road would cut through federally protected wilderness land in the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge, a 315,000-acre sanctuary near the tip of the Alaska Peninsula. And the Interior Department says the road would threaten vulnerable plants and animals that rely on the area's unique ecology.

The oftentimes ugly fight has pitted Alaska politicians against the federal government for decades, sowing mistrust and frustration. It has also reinforced the view of many in Alaska that policymakers in the Lower 48 are out of touch with their needs.

At the same time, the battle has laid bare tensions between Alaskan leaders and conservation groups, which argue that approving the road could set a dangerous national precedent in other protected wilderness areas.

Lisa Murkowski and Alaska Democratic Sen. Mark Begich, who faces a tight reelection fight, are vowing to do everything in their power to win approval for the road, even though the Interior Department rejected the proposal late last year after a four-year analysis.

(PHOTOS: 10 tough Senate races for Democrats)

Murkowski is using her position as the top Republican on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to elevate the issue, expressing her outrage at hearings and in floor speeches and holding a series of news conferences with King Cove residents. She has also lambasted Interior Secretary Sally Jewell, who announced the most recent rejection of the road just two days before Christmas.

"I am not willing to let a day go by without raising this as an issue," Murkowski said in an interview.

The road would give King Cove residents access to the larger airport in the nearby community of Cold Bay when extreme weather grounds flights at the smaller King Cove airport. King Cove has a medical clinic, but residents often have to travel to Anchorage for major procedures and emergencies.

The road, proponents argue, is the best solution to the transportation problems that have long plagued isolated King Cove.

Besides its small airport, the town has access by boat across the Izembek Lagoon, but foul weather can make air and boat travel difficult, residents say. Supporters of the road say at least 19 deaths over the years have resulted from plane crashes or an inability to obtain adequate medical care.

(Sign up for POLITICO's Morning Transportation tip sheet)

Della Trumble, a King Cove resident and longtime advocate for the road, said its approval is a matter of life and death.

"I just feel strongly that the human factor far outweighs the wildlife," she said. "We will protect the wildlife. It's who we are."

Trumble and other residents have made dozens of trips to Washington to make their case, telling stories of family and friends who have been hurt or killed trying to get out of the community during storms. Trumble said she watched as her niece was flown out for a medical emergency amid winds of 70 to 80 mph. She said another niece was born on the galley table of a crab boat during an evacuation attempt.

Just this week, an injured fisherman was flown out of King Cove by the Coast Guard, marking the fifth medical evacuation of the year, according to King Cove officials.

But opponents say the road would wreak havoc on the refuge and its wildlife. The refuge hosts more than 200 species, including caribou, grizzly bear and, in the fall, about 98 percent of the world's Pacific black brant. It also has one of the largest eelgrass beds on the planet and was one of the first areas in the U.S. to be designated as a wetland of international importance.

"You can't punch a road through there without doing serious damage," said Don Barry, who served as Interior's assistant secretary for fish, wildlife and parks during the Clinton administration.

In addition, the proposed road faces major legal hurdles. In 1980, Congress designated most of the refuge as wilderness, the highest level of public land protection.

Barry, now a senior official at the conservation group Defenders of Wildlife, said it would be unprecedented to allow a road through a wilderness area. Though the refuge has some old military roads, they were built before the conservation laws were enacted.

Several opponents raised concerns that approving the road would lead to a push for development in other protected areas.

"Once you carve a road of this kind right through the middle of a national wildlife refuge, where does it stop?" former Clinton administration Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt asked.

Babbitt and other opponents have also suggested that the road could be used for commercial purposes, noting that Peter Pan Seafoods has a cannery in King Cove. "But despite pledges and promises to the contrary, the real purpose for building the road is the same as it ever was: moving fish and workers to and from King Cove's canneries," Babbitt wrote in the Los Angeles Times last month.

Peter Pan has rejected those accusations, and Murkowski notes that her legislation calling for approval of the road specifically bars using it for commercial purposes.

The fight over the road burst into public view in the late 1990s, when then-Sen. Frank Murkowski pushed legislation that would allow for approval of the road as part of a land exchange. The bill passed the Senate in 1998 but never passed the House. President Bill Clinton threatened a veto amid concerns about the road's effect on wildlife.

Soon after, then-Sen. Ted Stevens launched into a tense series of negotiations with the Interior Department. The resulting compromise was a $37.5 million appropriation approved by Congress to improve the King Cove medical clinic and airport and make accommodations for a hovercraft to transport residents to Cold Bay. The hovercraft was used until 2011, but it is being sold because, operators said, it was too expensive to operate.

"Finally it was settled — and now it turns out it isn't," said Babbitt, who worked with Stevens to negotiate the deal and strongly opposed the road.

Within several years, the issue was back on the table. Lisa Murkowski included a provision in a 2009 bill calling on the Interior Department to analyze the road and proposing another land exchange. In exchange for setting aside land in the refuge for the road, the federal government would receive more than 43,000 acres of Alaska state land and more than 13,000 acres of land owned by the King Cove Native Corp.

The provision set off a four-year analysis by Interior that culminated in December with the department's rejection of the road.

"While the proposed land exchange would bring many more acres of land into the Refuge System, the analysis indicates that the increased acreage could not compensate for the unique values of existing refuge lands, nor the anticipated effects that the proposed road would have on wildlife, habitat, subsistence resources and wilderness values of the Refuge," the department said in a statement at the time.

The decision infuriated the Alaska delegation and has strained Murkowski's relationship with Jewell.

After hearing about the decision, Murkowski said she told Jewell, "I cannot forgive the fact that you have delivered this, that you have dashed all hope for the people of King Cove, and the fact that you did this the week of Christmas is absolutely callous and cold-hearted."

Other Alaska lawmakers have similarly taken Jewell to task. "If someone dies out of King Cove, I want you to really think about it and be ashamed of yourself," Rep. Don Young told Jewell at a hearing Thursday.

The road's opponents say viable alternatives exist — a notion that Murkowski and others reject. Opponents also argue that the road, which would snake through isolated land often battered by extreme weather, would pose its own dangers.

At a recent Senate hearing, Jewell said she is committed to working with King Cove residents to find alternatives. During a recent meeting with Begich, she said she will again listen to the community's concerns.

"Jewell committed to reviewing the information that the community plans to provide on the issue and to provide a response to the senators, State of Alaska and the community on their request to reconsider the final decision," Interior spokeswoman Jessica Kershaw said in an email.

Alaska lawmakers face major hurdles toward changing Interior's mind but say they're not giving up.

Begich said in a recent interview that he hopes to attach his bill approving the road to upcoming Interior appropriations legislation. Murkowski vowed to continue hammering away as well.

"This secretary has made a decision, and I think she thought the people of King Cove were tucked far enough away that nobody would be making a big deal about this," Murkowski said. "But I'm not forgetting them, and it's not just an idle threat."

CORRECTION: A previous version of this story offered an incorrect name for the city where King Cove residents sometimes have to travel for major medical procedures.

Feinstein draws primary challenge from Democrat de León Back

By David Siders | 10/15/2017 01:56 PM EDT

LOS ANGELES - Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) will face a primary challenge from California state Senate leader Kevin de León, who cast himself on Sunday as a progressive champion of California's resistance to President Donald Trump.

Launching his campaign, de León said in an email to supporters that he will "take the fight to Trump from California to Washington DC," doing his part "to work even harder to reunite this nation with a progressive agenda."

The announcement, which had long been expected, comes less than a week after Feinstein announced her re-election bid.

De León did not mention Feinstein in his public campaign roll-out. In a subsequent interview with POLITICO, he avoided criticizing Feinstein by name. "California needs a senator who will stand up and fight for Medicare for All, one that prioritizes the fight against climate change, that will protect Dreamers and our economic prosperity," he said.

He said he was a "bundle of nerves" and that the announcement was "just like jumping off a cliff."

"It will be David and Goliath...I'm under no illusion," he said.

De León, a Los Angeles lawmaker, faces an uphill climb in his effort to unseat Feinstein. First elected to the Senate in a 1992 special election, Feinstein has long served as a pillar of California's Democratic Party and has connections that could make fundraising difficult for de León. The state's junior senator, Kamala Harris, endorsed Feinstein immediately after she announced her re-election campaign, as did former Sen. Barbara Boxer and Lt. Gov. Gavin Newsom, the Democratic frontrunner to succeed Jerry Brown as governor.

Still, Feinstein's more centrist politics could present an opening for de León, who will run against her from the left. Feinstein, 84, has come under criticism from progressive activists for her skeptical view of single-payer health care legislation and her support for some of Trump's earliest nominees.

De León this year championed a failed universal health care measure and a successful bill granting additional protections to undocumented immigrants. De León cheered Feinstein's critics earlier this year when, seizing on Feinstein's remark that Trump could become a "good president," he said Democrats should "not be complicit in his reckless behavior."

Yet Feinstein's public approval ratings, though slipping slightly since Trump's inauguration, remain relatively favorable in California. And de León is little known statewide. When the Berkeley-IGS Poll asked Californians in April who they would support for U.S. Senate if Feinstein opted not to run, De León polled at 3 percent.

De León, who will soon have to leave the state Senate due to term limits, had few options for advancement. The 50-year-old had considered entering California's race for governor, but the field is already crowded with Democrats.

It remains unclear if de León will be the only high-profile Democrat challenging Feinstein. Billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer is mulling a run, and Joseph Sanberg, a wealthy Orange County progressive activist, is considered another potential candidate. Some long-shot candidates are already in the race, including a progressive lawyer, Pat Harris.

Under California's primary rules, the top two finishers in next year's primary will advance to a November runoff regardless of party affiliation.

Kelly tries to get empty administration jobs filled fast Back

By Nancy Cook | 10/15/2017 05:42 PM EDT

White House chief of staff John Kelly is giving Cabinet secretaries more autonomy to pick top political appointees, reversing efforts under his predecessor Reince Priebus to run most appointments through the West Wing.

Kelly's goal, according to 10 interviews with White House officials and advisers close to the administration, is to do a better job of finding candidates for the hundreds of jobs throughout the administration that remain vacant almost nine months into President Donald Trump's first term.

"Being somebody from the Department of Defense, normally you've got key people in place and a clear chain of command," said Leon Panetta, a former White House chief of staff himself and former Secretary of Defense, who spoke to Kelly around the time he accepted the White House job. "It's very difficult to run anything if you don't have people responsible in those positions."

Kelly entered the White House with an unusually clear understanding of the flaws of the personnel process, according to two people close to him.

As a Cabinet pick and then as Department of Homeland Security secretary, Kelly was frequently exasperated during the transition and early days of the administration over his inability to choose his own staff. He got into frequent spats with the White House over filling a handful of top jobs in his department, according to one of the people close to him.

Other Cabinet secretaries, including Defense Secretary James Mattis and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, have had their own problems with the White House personnel office, with Mattis trying to circumvent it and hire his own staff.

"Look, everyone in the White House is upset. It's both a problem of getting candidates through the bureaucracy and through the Senate. Of course Kelly is upset," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, an informal adviser to Trump whose wife, Callista, has been nominated as Trump's Vatican ambassador. "The whole system is totally screwed up."

Part of the problem stems from the Trump administration's criteria for hiring staffers and top political appointees. Potential candidates must be loyal to the administration and not have spoken harshly about the president during the campaign.

That has created a particular problem when it comes to filling national security jobs, because scores of Republican experts, many of whom served in the George W. Bush administration, signed a letter criticizing the future president before the election.

Many experienced Republicans who ordinarily would have vied for middle- and top-level posts under a Republican president also decided to sit out the Trump administration in January, starving the president of choices when it came to picking appointees.

The president himself seems willing to tolerate vacancies indefinitely.

"I'm generally not going to make a lot of the appointments that would normally be - because you don't need them," Trump told Forbes in an interview which posted last week. "I mean, you look at some of these agencies, how massive they are, and it's totally unnecessary. They have hundreds of thousands of people."

The White House press office did not respond to requests for comment.

Filling vacant jobs has taken on particular urgency in recent weeks, as the White House contends with thorny policy questions such as North Korea's growing nuclear might and the fate of the Iran deal. The administration is also trying to re-negotiate the NAFTA trade agreement and roll back parts of Obamacare through regulations and executive orders.

At the State Department, more than 78 jobs do not have a nominee out of 149 key positions, and 32 countries still don't have ambassadors in place, according to data kept by the non-partisan Partnership for Public Service.

The Treasury Department has 15 key slots open out of 28 significant Senate confirmed positions as the White House dives into selling tax reform.

Just last week, Treasury announced it would not fill its No. 2 deputy secretary slot after a second candidate dropped out of the running for it.

Kelly's own former job remains open two and a half months after he moved to the White House, with Trump nominating Kelly's No. 2 Kirstjen Nielsen this week after other potential nominees were passed over.

The Department of Health and Human Services, the agency responsible for overseeing the Affordable Care Act, lacks a Cabinet secretary after former Rep. Tom Price resigned after spending hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars to charter private jets for government trips.

So far, the Senate has confirmed roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government, according to the Partnership for Public Service.

The presidential personnel office also got off to a rocky start. Its director Johnny DeStefano, who started right after the inauguration, had to find candidates for hundreds of key Senate-confirmed jobs without an existing pool of applicants after the administration discarded lists compiled by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who was fired as transition head days after the election in November.

DeStefano also entered the job with no formal experience in executive recruiting or hiring. Previously, he worked for House Speaker John Boehner and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

At the White House, both Priebus and Steve Bannon, the former White House chief strategist, were seen as his high-level protectors. Their departures this summer have left DeStefano adrift inside Kelly's new power structure, according to two people close to the administration.

Kelly recently asked DeStefano to oversee the Office of Public Liaison, whose head George Sifakis left in August following Priebus' ouster.

DeStefano, who also retains his title as head of the personnel office, did not respond to requests for comment.

Outside conservative activists and groups are no longer blaming Senate Democrats for holding up confirmations.

Last week, over 100 conservatives released a letter to remind both the administration and Capitol Hill that "personnel is policy."

The letter demands that Senate leadership schedule committee and floor action every Thursday and Friday and to work full weeks until Trump's nominees get confirmed. Among the signatories are Edwin Meese, former Attorney General under Ronald Reagan; Becky Norton Dunlop, a former Reagan adviser who worked on the Trump transition; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, and Adam Brandon, President of FreedomWorks.

Republicans say that the slow pace of appointments impedes Trump's agenda. It ends up leaving much of the agency-level, or diplomatic work to government careerists who aren't necessarily supportive of the Trump agenda.

"The career people know how to keep the government going and respond to citizens, but if there is any desire to change what the government is doing, that is most effectively done if it is being led by a political appointee," said Clay Johnson, who oversaw presidential personnel under Bush. "So without the hundreds of political appointees at each of the key agencies, the administration of government will continue, but it will be hard for the Trump administration to change or eliminate something, or create something new."

EPW to vote next week on EPA, NRC, DOT nominees Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/13/2017 04:42 PM EDT

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will vote Oct. 18 on four EPA nominees, plus appointments to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Federal Highway Administration.

The committee will vote on Michael Dourson to run the EPA's chemicals and pesticides office, William Wehrum to run the air office, David Ross to head the water office and Matthew Leopold to be general counsel.

Sen. Tom Carper, the committee's top Democrat, indicated last week that he will oppose Wehrum over his strong ties to industry and Dourson because he declined Carper's request to recuse himself from issues he worked on previously as an independent toxicologist.

The committee will also vote on Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC. Chairman John Barrasso called Baran's re-confirmation, even in exchange for Democrats moving two Republican NRC nominees, as a "big ask."

And the committee will vote on Paul Trombino as administrator of the FHWA. His nomination hearing was held last week.

Barrasso indicated last week that he is working to get a package of energy-related nominees onto the floor, including possibly several pending nominations to FERC and the Energy Department.

WHAT'S NEXT: The vote is scheduled for Oct. 18 at 10 a.m. in Dirksen 406.

Barrasso: Baran renomination to NRC is a 'big ask' Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 10:59 AM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso complained this morning that re-confirming Nuclear Regulatory Commission member Jeff Baran may be too high a price for Republicans to pay in exchange for Democrats easing their opposition to GOP nominees to the agency.

"Senate Democrats have refused to advance the nominations of Annie Caputo and David Wright to the NRC until Commissioner Baran is confirmed to a new five-year term," Barrasso said at nomination hearing with Baran and four nominees to the EPA. "To be clear, Mr. Baran's nomination is a big ask."

Caputo and Wright secured the blessing of EPW in July but Sen. Tom Carper has pressed that Baran, whose seat expires in June, get a new five-year term and move alongside Republican picks as a bipartisan package.

But Barrasso bristled at the notion of having Baran on the NRC longer than President Donald Trump's GOP nominees, as well as NRC Chairwoman Kristine Svinicki. Wright and Caputo are up for terms expiring in June 2020 and June 2021, respectively. The Wyoming Republican also said he's hardly seen reason to drop his long-held opposition to Baran since former Sen. Barbara Boxer originally pushed him through the Senate years ago.

"In December 2014, the last time the Senate confirmed Mr. Baran, only one Republican voted in favor of his confirmation," Barrasso said. "Since then, Commissioner Baran has given me little reason to reconsider my vote."

WHAT'S NEXT: EPW has not yet scheduled a vote on the nominees.

DOE gives nod to Florida small-scale LNG project Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/15/2017 01:37 PM EDT

The Energy Department approved a company's application to export small amounts of liquefied natural gas from Florida, the agency said today.

Eagle LNG Partners Jacksonville II LLC is now authorized to ship 10 million cubic feet a day of natural gas in intermodal containers, DOE said. The company plans to ship the LNG to Caribbean islands to be used mainly as ship fuel, according to its website.

DOE has now approved up to 21.35 Bcf/d of natural gas exports.

WHAT'S NEXT: The U.S. is expected to become a net exporter of natural gas this year, according to U.S. Energy Information Administration forecasts.

Trump administration restarts work on airplane carbon rule Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/13/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The EPA confirmed it is developing a rule to regulate carbon emissions from aircraft, a rare step by the Trump administration to address climate change, and one that's seen as critical for the U.S. aerospace industry.

The rule, still under development, is part of the effort agreed to by a United Nations body last year to set a global carbon standard for international flights. Aircraft manufacturer Boeing, and its engine-makers Pratt & Whitney and GE, supported the agreement, and the companies need EPA to create the emissions regulation that would allow DOT to certify its equipment for international sale.

The rulemaking runs counter to President Donald Trump and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's steadfast opposition to efforts to combat climate change, and their rollback of Obama's climate policies. EPA had paused development of the aircraft rule over the summer as part of Trump's broader deregulatory push. But official schedules show Pruitt met with Boeing and GE in July, and the agency restarted the work this fall.

In crafting the rule, the administration appears to be willing to support a climate change effort that is strongly backed by industry, and could be an indicator of how it will consider a treaty to limit global warming-causing coolants. The carbon rule for aircraft is essential for Boeing, one of the top U.S. exporters.

"If the U.S. does not write a rule, U.S. manufacturers, particularly this would be Boeing, and manufacturers of engines on planes, they would not be able to sell those on international service and U.S. airlines would not be able to buy them for international operations," said Nancy Young, vice president for environmental affairs for the lobby group Airlines for America.

A committee of the International Civil Aviation Organization, an international standards-setting body, first agreed to the carbon standard for aircraft engines early in 2016. New engine designs in 2020 would be required to be an average of 4 percent more efficient than 2015 engines, and all new aircraft will have to meet the standard by 2024. ICAO issued a final approval in the spring, and EPA had already begun work on the rule, publishing an endangerment finding in July last year.

But Trump's election put the effort in doubt, and work on the rule paused over the summer as part of the new administration's regulatory reviews. Pruitt's schedule showed he had at least one meeting with Boeing over the summer, and work has begun now in earnest to produce a rule implementing the agreement.

"EPA is working on CO2 standards for aircraft to align them with the ICAO agreement," an EPA spokesman told POLITICO, confirming news first reported by Bloomberg BNA. The agency had said in its deregulatory agenda on July 20 that work on the rule had been suspended.

ICAO sets a wide variety of technical and safety standards, and federal agencies like the FAA and DOT typically implement them with little fanfare. Agreements by the body do not typically require Senate ratification. The ICAO agreement requires action by EPA to set the emission standards, and DOT would use those standards to certify engines promoted by Boeing, but it would not require Senate ratification.

But any carbon rule seemed unlikely under the Trump administration, which has spent its first months in office erasing regulatory efforts to fight climate change, including the Clean Power Plan and the U.S. participation in the Paris climate agreement.

Without an EPA rule implementing the deal, Boeing would have been unable to export its aircraft, or would have been forced to get them certified by another country that had implemented the deal, like Canada or Mexico. Boeing is a major exporter: The U.S. exported $136 billion in aerospace equipment in 2016, and Boeing exported $25 billion in aircraft to China alone. The International Council on Clean Transportation, a transportation think tank, characterized the stakes by noting Boeing's $250 billion order backlog that could be at risk without a rule.

Boeing declined to comment for this story.

Boeing and GE met with Pruitt on July 13, a week before the public learned the rule had been paused, according to a schedule of Pruitt's meetings released by EPA last month.

"For Boeing, GE and Pratt and Whitney, it's critical," said Daniel Rutherford, marine and aviation program director for ICCT. "If they want to sell aircraft after 2020, they need this rule."

Greens are split on the ICAO standard. Bill Hemmings, who leads aviation work at Transport and Environment, an international green group, lambasted it at the time as "a nice try" that fell short of making major strides to reduce emissions. According to ICCT's analysis, Boeing will exceed the standard with the products in their pipeline by 10 percent.

But defenders of the agreement say it has value for preventing backsliding in engine efficiency, and for stopping other countries from producing less efficient products that undercut higher-quality U.S. goods.

"With this agreement, ICAO created the first-ever standards for carbon dioxide performance for a major sector of the economy, the aviation industry," said Rick Duke, a former aide to Obama who worked on the agreement. "It's good for American industry because we produce efficient aircraft and so we want to make sure that laggards are not grabbing market share with poor-performing aircraft."

The administration's action could also be good news for the U.S. coolant-making industry, which is strongly backing a separate agreement struck at the end of last year to limit global-warming hydrofluorocarbons. The industry supports the agreement reached in Kigali, Rwanda, because U.S. companies are the leaders in next-generation coolants. But unlike the ICAO agreement, the amendment to the Montreal Protocol requires Senate ratification.

Now, the willingness of Trump's EPA to write a carbon rule on behalf of industry could signal at least tacit approval to remain part of the international business arrangement, if not administration support for the Kigali agreement itself.

"I think that's what we saw happen last year with the Kigali agreement with HFCs where U.S. industry strongly pushed for successful outcome there," Duke said. "And like the aircraft sector, the industry produces high-performing products, and they very much appreciate having a level playing field and allows them to have a clear path."

Texas utility to shut down two major coal plants Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/13/2017 11:30 AM EDT

Texas utility Luminant announced plans today to shut down two major coal-fired power plants that it said are "economically challenged."

The plants, with a combined 2,300 megawatts of capacity, were undercut by "low wholesale power prices, an oversupplied renewable generation market, and low natural gas prices," Luminant, a subsidiary of Vistra Energy, said in a release.

The plants are Big Brown, a 1,150-megawatt plant about 80 miles southeast of Dallas, and Sandow, a 1,137 MW-plant that sits 45 miles northeast of Austin.

Both plants burn lignite coal. The mine associated with Big Brown, Turlington, was already scheduled to close this year, according to Luminant. The Three Oaks mine that supplies

Sandow will close down soon as well.

About 650 workers at all those sites will be affected. Luminant said it will provide severance and help finding new work.

Environmentalists have targeted those plants, and particularly Big Brown, for years. But Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, in a statement downplayed the notion that the closures are a further sign of trouble for coal "but rather as an important part of an increasing diverse array of generation sources."

Luminant last week announced it will shut down its 1,800-megawatt Monticello coal plant about 100 miles east of Dallas on Jan. 4. It was supplied by coal from the Powder River Basin.

WHAT'S NEXT: Assuming the decommissioning process is approved by ERCOT, the Texas grid regulator, Big Brown will shut down on Feb. 12 and Sandow will close on Jan. 11.

Trump's Love Affair with Coal Back

By Michael Grunwald | 10/15/2017 07:06 AM EDT

In February, surrounded by coal miners at the White House, President Donald Trump signed a bill repealing the Obama-era Stream Protection Rule, which would have restricted coal companies from burying streams. "This is a major threat to your jobs," Trump said, "and we're getting rid of this threat." He did not mention streams.

In March, this time surrounded by coal miners at the Environmental Protection Agency, Trump signed an executive order vowing to roll back Obama-era climate change policies, including the Clean Power Plan limiting carbon pollution from coal-fired power plants. "C'mon fellas, you know what this says?" Trump asked. "You're going back to work!" He did not mention climate or pollution.

So it was no surprise when, last week, Trump's EPA administrator, Scott Pruitt, announced he was launching the formal process to repeal the Clean Power Plan in a speech to coal miners in the coal town of Hazard, Kentucky. He proclaimed, as his boss has many times, that "the war on coal is over." There was once again little pretense that the move had much to do with the EP part of the EPA.

As the Trump administration has battled internally and seesawed publicly over issues like trade, health care, infrastructure and even immigration, there's no issue where it's been more consistent and emphatic than its support for coal. Miners held up "Trump Digs Coal" signs at his raucous campaign rallies, and sure enough, he's been a relentless advocate for this small and beleaguered industry.

He has stocked his administration with coal veterans, hacked away at coal regulations, and done what he can to prop up struggling coal companies. He probably won't be able to keep his promise to revive a once-dominant fossil fuel that has been declining around the world—and most rapidly in the United States—but he is already changing the policy landscape around our dirtiest source of energy. He is also sending a political message to his base that he is waging a war on the war on coal, standing with tough guys who earn their living underground against tree-huggers who whine about climate change and clean air.

So far, coal is continuing its slump despite Trump's support. Utilities have announced the retirements of 12 more coal-fired power plants since he took office, including two massive ones in Texas added to the closure list on Friday. That announcement marked a milestone: Half of America's coal fleet has been marked for mothballs since 2010, a total of 262 doomed plants. And as jobs go, coal mining is now a tiny sliver of the U.S. economy, employing about 52,000 Americans last month, down 70 percent over three decades. (The count is up about 4 percent since Trump took office, but mostly because a snafu in China's steel industry temporarily boosted U.S. exports.) By contrast, the solar and wind industries employed almost 10 times as many Americans last year, and they're both enjoying explosive growth.

Coal is America's leading source of the carbon emissions that warm the planet, as well as a host of other air and water pollutants. And the economics of coal has cratered. Still, politically, the coal industry is one of the purest distillations of Trump's base, uniting right-wing business executives who hate environmental regulations and taxes along with blue-collar miners who wish America was more like it used to be when coal was king. While polls suggest that fewer than one-third of Americans approve of Trump's indelicate approach to the environment, more than two-thirds of the Republicans he's courted approve. At the ceremony where he erased the stream rule, Trump ticked off a list of coal states—West Virginia, Kentucky, Wyoming, Ohio—that all happened to have been big Trump states in November.

"Special people, special workers, we're bringing it back and we're bringing it back fast," he crowed.

So even if Trump can't stop the decline of coal, the industry is thrilled that he's doing his part to try to slow it, especially after eight years of an eco-friendly, climate-concerned Democrat in the White House. Bob Murray, a prominent coal CEO and early Trump backer, says in a new Frontline documentary that he handed Trump a 3½-page action plan when he took office, and the president has already plowed through Page 1.

"From a government whose avowed aim for eight years was to destroy the industry, we've understandably benefited from one that for eight months has helped us," says Luke Popovich, vice president of the National Mining Association.

Trump began by hiring coal-friendly aides like Pruitt, who had repeatedly teamed up with fossil-fuel interests to sue President Barack Obama's EPA when he was Oklahoma attorney general, and Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross, the founder of a coal company that once had a deadly disaster in one of its mines. Trump's nominee to be Pruitt's deputy is a coal lobbyist; his nominee to be assistant labor secretary for mine safety and health ran a mining company with a checkered safety record.

The result has been a flurry of coal-friendly actions. Pruitt is taking aim not only at Obama's carbon plan for the power industry but a host of other rules limiting mercury, soot, smog and other discharges from coal operations. The president defied the world by withdrawing from the Paris climate agreement, specifically complaining that it was unfair to American coal. His administration has also lifted Obama's moratorium on coal leases on federal land, ended Obama's restrictions on financing coal projects overseas, and shut down a study of the health effects of coal mining that blasts away entire mountains. His energy secretary, Rick Perry, recently proposed new subsidies for coal plants that keep stockpiles of coal handy, galvanizing opposition from an odd coalition of renewable energy advocates, environmentalists, Koch Industries and other oil and gas interests, manufacturers and other electricity consumers.

At a hearing last week, a Democratic congressman asked Perry why he was pushing a plan that could prop up outdated coal plants and increase costs to ratepayers. The secretary's response summed up the administration's approach to coal: "I think you take costs into account, but what's the cost of freedom? What's the cost to keep America free? I'm not sure I want to leave that up to the free market."

Coal's long decline did get worse during the Obama years—partly because of his anti-pollution regulations, partly because of the Sierra Club's well-funded and well-executed anti-coal campaign, but mostly because of the cruel realities of the market: Natural gas and even renewables got cheaper. And the slump is only expected to accelerate, since scores of still-operating coal plants are already scheduled to shut down over the next few years, and nobody is building new coal plants. Even if the economics made sense, and even if utilities didn't have to worry about carbon emissions, coal plants belch all kinds of pollution into the air and water; the American Lung Association believes its particulates kill about 7,500 Americans every year.

Still, Trump is a fan, and he's unusually forthright in his fandom. He's often either misleading or misinformed about the impact of his other policies—claiming his tax plan wouldn't help the rich, or that his health policies would expand access and protect pre-existing conditions—but when it comes to coal, Trump is clear about his goals, and transparent about whose interests he's pushing. Murray, the coal executive, was by his side when he signed the order attacking Obama's climate policies. Vice President Mike Pence, Pruitt, Perry and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke have all toured coal operations this year.

So it was no surprise that the National Mining Association held a board meeting this month at the Trump International Hotel in Washington, putting money in its presidential benefactor's pockets. And as the Washington Post first reported, three Cabinet secretaries spoke to the group—Perry, Ross and Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta, who was once an attorney for a Murray Energy subsidiary in a dispute with its union. Zinke couldn't make it, but he sent his deputy, former fossil-fuel lobbyist David Bernhardt, in his place.

The meeting was private, but an activist at the Climate Investigation Center sent me photos the group obtained of Bernhardt speaking to the group—including photos of his notes. They appear to show that Interior is "considering appropriate adjustments" to the Obama administration's decisions to prohibit mining claims on certain environmentally sensitive public lands. Bernhardt's notes described some of those decisions as "nothing short of uninformed, arbitrary, and frankly senseless." Bernhardt had also jotted down the cellphone number of Luke Russell, vice president of external affairs for Hecla Mining. Hecla is seeking permits from Interior's Fish and Wildlife Service for two copper mines in Montana, and Russell said in an interview that the process has been dragging out for years.

"We're encouraged by the actions of this administration to try to move things along and get to a yes or no much quicker," Russell said.

The Interior Department did not respond to a request for comment. But the department's leaders have not been shy about their belief that Obama treated mining companies and other extractive industries unfairly. In August, for example, they rescinded an Obama-era rule that closed a loophole coal mining firms and other fossil-fuel companies were using to evade federal royalties on public lands. Zinke argued that the rule was causing too much "confusion and uncertainty" and holding back U.S. energy development.

Trump administration officials often frame their attacks on energy-related rules as an aversion to "picking winners and losers," accusing their predecessors of harming coal in order to help wind (which tripled its capacity under Obama) and solar (which increased about 40-fold). But environmentalists point out that Obama's EPA, for example, never targeted the coal industry; it targeted pollution, and coal happens to produce an inordinate amount of pollution. Bruce Nilles, senior director of the Sierra Club's Beyond Coal campaign, says a distraught EPA career official recently told him the agency's political bosses have given clear marching orders: Do whatever you can to promote coal. That certainly sounded like picking winners.

"The insanity is, it's not a secret," Nilles says. "They make no bones about it. They see their job as helping coal companies pollute as much as they want."

The EPA's focus has often shifted with the partisan winds, but it's still a bit jarring to see an agency founded to fight pollution used so aggressively to assist some of America's biggest polluters. Pruitt believes the EPA has strayed far beyond its original mandate, and he has been open about his desire to give the subjects of its regulations a break. He recently told a group of farmers that he's often asked why he meets so much more with industry groups than environmental groups, and he was surprisingly forthright: "The answer is, you count more."

Pruitt has tried to ditch or delay just about all of Obama's coal regulations—prominent ones limiting carbon, mercury and ozone as well as lesser-known ones dealing with coal ash, "nonattainment areas" and "regional haze." Two weeks ago, his agency gave one of the Trump administration's most consequential gifts to the industry so far, gutting an Obama-era effort to force the state of Texas to rein in coal-fired pollution around Big Bend National Park.

But neither coal-friendly Texas nor the coal-friendly EPA could stop Luminant, considered one of the coal-friendliest utilities, from announcing the retirements of four Texas coal plants in the past 10 days. Coal used to be dirty but cheap, but now it's just dirty—and utilities who have to make long-term investment decisions can't assume that Trump's willingness to ignore coal pollution will continue beyond his term in office. American Electric Power, a coal-heavy utility that is America's largest carbon emitter, recently invested $4.5 billion in the nation's largest wind farm—in Pruitt's home state of Oklahoma.

The Supreme Court had put the Clean Power Plan on hold even before Trump took office, but the U.S. electricity sector has already met the plan's 2030 target for reducing coal use, and it is on track to meet its overall emission goals next year. And while the EPA has not yet proposed a replacement for the plan, it is still bound by a Supreme Court decision requiring it to regulate carbon pollution, so it will have to defend whatever it decides in court. The same goes for Pruitt's efforts to gut Obama's other coal-related rules as well as unrelated rules. Rules are rules, and while it's pretty easy for administrations to ignore them, it's much harder to change them to guide future administrations.

Nilles talked to me from Oakland, where he could see haze from California's historic wildfires, this month's awful reminder of the dangers of climate change. I talked to him from Miami, where I could still see debris from Hurricane Irma, one of last month's awful reminders of the dangers of climate change. Trump has described global warming as a hoax manufactured in China, and his newly announced chair of his Council on Environmental Quality is a climate denier who has written florid praise of carbon emissions. But the impacts are getting harder to ignore—even China is shutting down coal plants around Beijing—and the American executives making electricity investments do not seem to think they will be ignored for long.

"Trump can't revive coal. The transition is already happening," Nilles says. "What Trump can do is allow more pollution and death during the transition."

The mining association's Popovich pushed back a bit, noting that coal exports and production are up slightly so far this year, "thanks in part to this regime change." But he says the Obama-era retirements have battered the industry badly, and even Trump's support can't magically fix a stagnant market.

"Conditions," he says, "are still challenging."

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by the Nuclear Energy Institute: Hurricane Maria strikes big blow to Puerto Rico's energy sector — EPA to release Pruitt's schedules — Justice might back Manchin reelection bid

With help from Alex Guillén and Darius Dixon

MARIA HITS PUERTO RICO ENERGY INFRASTRUCTURE HARD: Nearly 3.5 million Americans are without electricity on Puerto Rico following Hurricane Maria's direct hit, but the impacts to its bankrupt power provider could be felt for months after what its governor called an "unprecedented atmospheric system." The Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority declared bankruptcy on July 2 after being bogged down by old power plants that need of billions in repairs and the island's heavy reliance on imported oil. Ahead of Hurricane Irma earlier this month, Moody's Investors Service warned that "longterm power outages will have negative impacts on PREPA's revenues and will pose added challenges in Puerto Rico's overall recovery from this natural disaster." And consumers on the island already pay "more for their power than consumers in any state except Hawaii," according to the Energy Information Administration. San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz summed up the devastation to MSNBC: "We're looking at four to six months without electricity" in Puerto Rico.

President Donald Trump's administration said in a statement it "continues to direct all necessary Federal resources to protect the people of the United States territories affected by Hurricane Maria" and Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rossello said he'd requested a disaster declaration that could help speed the deployment of federal assistance. Dangerous winds and flood surges are possible over the coming days, according to federal officials. Another thing to watch is the status of the island's 18 Superfund sites. EPA said it had "temporarily paused all response operations" until the storm passed but pledged to "ramp up response activities quickly" once it is safe to do so. In a statement late Wednesday, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop said: "Both Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands are in dire need of our assistance and we will do everything in our power to ensure that all necessary resources are made available."

Nelson, Rubio request help: Florida Sens. Marco Rubio and Bill Nelson, still dealing with the impacts of Hurricane Irma on their own state, asked Trump in a letter to closely monitor the needs of Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands. And they separately wrote to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt urging the agency to expedite federal assistance to local entities to reduce sewage and wastewater exposure risks stemming from Irma. They also asked Pruitt for help to improve existing water systems so they're less vulnerable to damage in future hurricanes.

Looking ahead: Expect the recovery needs from Maria to factor into the next disaster relief package likely to take shape in Congress in the weeks ahead. Senior House members, including Speaker Paul Ryan and Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen, toured areas in Florida hardest hit by Hurricane Irma on Wednesday.

STATES ON TRACK FOR PARIS-STYLE REDUCTIONS: A bloc of 14 states representing 40 percent of the U.S. economy — or equal to the world's third-largest economy if they were a single nation — said Wednesday they expect to slash their greenhouse gas emissions 24-29 percent by 2025, Pro's Emily Holden reports. "While Donald Trump has told the world to count us out, our message is simple in New York City this week — you can count us in," Washington Gov. Jay Inslee said at a press conference. But while those reductions are in line with the U.S. target under the Paris deal Trump vowed to withdraw from, the members of the bipartisan Climate Alliance account for only about one-fifth of the country's net emissions, according to 2015 figures from the analysis firm Rhodium Group. The group released a report on their progress available here.

Environmentalists hailed the status update: "President Trump can keep attacking climate action, but he can't stop local innovation from continuing our progress," League of Conservation Voters State Policy Director Bill Holland said in a statement.

Getting lonely out here: Syria and the U.S. will soon be the lone holdouts from the Paris climate agreement after Nicaragua announced Wednesday it would ratify the accord in solidarity with other nations suffering from climate impacts, local media reports. The nation's previous resistance to the international deal was because it had said it doesn't go far enough and doesn't do enough to hold major emitters accountable.

May lightly hits Trump over Paris exit: British Prime Minister Theresa May lightly rebuked Trump for withdrawing from the accord during Wednesday remarks at the U.N. General Assembly, POLITICO Europe's Paul Dallison reports. "It is this rules-based system which we have developed — including the institutions, the international frameworks of free and fair trade; agreements such as the Paris climate accord; and laws and conventions like the Non-Proliferation Treaty — which enables the global co-operation through which we can protect those values," the British PM said.

BIWEEKLY PRUITT SCHEDULE COMING SOON, AGENCY SAYS: EPA will soon begin publicly releasing Administrator Scott Pruitt's schedule, an agency attorney tells ME. Requests for records are up this year, and Pruitt's schedule is of particular interest, but the agency so far has only released his schedule for February and March. Now the agency's plan is to release every other week an "abbreviated version" of Pruitt's doings, going back to when he was confirmed, according to the attorney. It's not yet clear just how thorough the releases will be, but it appears internal EPA meetings will be included. Daily schedules released under the previous administrator, Gina McCarthy, typically revealed only public appearances at conferences or other venues.

GREEN AD HITS LAWMAKERS OVER SPENDING BILL: The League of Conservation Voters is out with a digital ad today hitting six congressmen for their votes in favor of a spending package H.R. 3354 \(115\) with a host of cuts to environmental programs.

Targets of campaign are Darrell Issa, Rodney Frelinghuysen, Ken Calvert, Collin Peterson, Barbara Comstock and Mimi Walters. Sample ad here. LCV will also thank Betty McCollum and Frank LoBiondo for voting against the bill.

LAWMAKERS PRESS GRID OPERATOR FOR CARBON STUDY: Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Bernie Sanders have asked ISO-New England to assess the impact of using a carbon price in their power markets. New York's ISO brought in the Brattle Group to study the same thing for their state, and the New England lawmakers suggested that "the current system may discriminate against carbon-free resources in the absence of a carbon price." The pair also point to utility regulators in Minnesota and Colorado using carbon metrics to size up energy projects. But there's an obvious elephant in the room: ISO-New England serves six states and despite looking like tiny hardcore liberal states from the outside, they're hardly a monolith on this issue. CALIFORNIA SUES OVER TRUMP'S WALL: California Attorney General Xavier Becerra challenged the legality of Trump's push to build a border wall in a lawsuit filed in federal court in San Diego on Wednesday, POLITICO's Josh Gerstein reports. Among the allegations is that the administration failed to comply with National Environmental Policy Act and the Administrative Procedure Act by failing to prepare an environmental impact statement for projects related to the border wall in San Diego and Imperial counties.

GREEN QUILTS TRADE BOARD OVER CLIMATE: Bill Snape, a law professor at American University and attorney for the Center for Biological Diversity, has resigned from a federal trade advisory board with a letter where the first letter in each paragraph spells out N-O-T-A-H-O-A-X — a reference to Trump's comments on climate change and in the same acrostic-style flair employed by previous resignees in recent months. Snape had been a member of the U.S. Trade and Environment Policy Advisory Committee, overseen by the U.S. Trade Representative, since 2005. He wrote in his letter that TEPAC can be "enormously useful," but that "I do not believe in this president, or his severely shortsighted and harmful policies" and that "it's time to be real about global warming."

JUSTICE FOR MANCHIN? GOP West Virginia Gov. (and former coal executive) Jim Justice appeared to back Democratic Sen. Joe Manchin's reelection bid over the Republican candidates — Rep. "Joe Manchin is — and I know this — Joe Manchin is Donald Trump's liaison with the Democrats. And you want, and I want, what Donald Trump is trying to get done," Justice said, adding he liked both Morrisey and Jenkins but considered Manchin a "friend."

NEW SENSE OF PURPA? FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee told reporters Wednesday the agency might look at changing its rules on facilities that qualify for preferential treatment under the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. "Any major changes to PURPA I think are going to have to come from Congress," he said. But "what we could look to here are what potential changes we could do within our purview whether it relates to the one-mile rule or other items."

LAST VOICES WEIGH IN ON SUNIVA CASE: A group of retired military officials warned the International Trade Commission that slapping tariffs on imported solar products, as requested by Suniva and SolarWorld USA, would harm the Defense Department's energy security and resilience efforts in a letter sent Wednesday. "The proposed tariffs and minimum prices would double the cost of imported solar cells and modules used in utility-scale defense energy projects," they write. "This dramatic cost-increase could potentially jeopardize the financial viability of planned and future solar investments on or near domestic military bases."

SWING AND A MISS? Germany appears poised to miss its 2020 renewable energy target by more than previously estimated, POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff reports, citing a German Renewable Energy Federation report out Wednesday. Renewables should account for 18 percent of Germany's energy consumption by 2020 under European Union targets, but the new forecast estimates it will reach only 16 percent by that year. That's lower than a previous estimate of 16.7 percent, which the group blamed on higher fuel consumption and low use of renewables in the heating and transport sectors.

Moody's issues warning on Puerto Rico power utility over Irma Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/07/2017 04:45 PM EDT

Moody's Investors Service issued a preliminary statement on how it views Hurricane Irma's effect on the billions in bond debt owed by Puerto Rico's electric power authority.

Reports of widespread power outages "highlight longstanding liquidity pressures and an aging infrastructure that have beleaguered [the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority] for many years," Rick Donner, a Moody's senior credit officer, wrote.

"Longterm power outages will have negative impacts on PREPA's revenues and will pose added challenges in Puerto Rico's overall recovery from this natural disaster," he said. "Any damage from the storm will also add to the stress related to PREPA's recent default and could impact ultimate recovery for bondholders."

Seventy percent of PREPA's customers have reportedly lost power.

WHAT'S NEXT: Though experts anticipate the Federal Emergency Management Agency will help with the immediate costs following Irma, the cash-strapped utility could face longer term infrastructure problems and lose customers due to increased emigration from the U.S. territory to the mainland.

14 states expect to cut emissions on par with Paris pledge Back

By Emily Holden | 09/20/2017 02:51 PM EDT

The 14 states that plan to keep shrinking their carbon footprint despite President Donald Trump's plan to abandon the Paris climate agreement say they are on track to slash greenhouse gas emissions 24-29 percent by 2025.

In proportional terms, that is in line with the U.S. target under the Paris deal — a 26-28 percent reduction below 2005 levels by 2025. But the states, members of the bipartisan Climate Alliance, account for only about one-fifth of the country's net emissions, according to 2015 figures from the analysis firm Rhodium Group.

"While Donald Trump has told the world to count us out, our message is simple in New York City this week — you can count us in," Washington Gov. Jay Inslee said at a press conference in New York today.

The states represent 40 percent of the U.S. economy, equal to the third largest economy in the world if they were a single nation, Inslee added.

The states in the alliance are California, New York, Washington, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Virginia, plus Puerto Rico.

Former Secretary of State John Kerry, who joined the press conference, slammed Trump's decision to exit Paris.

"He forfeited American leadership, he put at risk the momentum that has been created and he said to the American people, 'I'm buying into the denial hoax,'" Kerry said, citing Hurricanes Harvey and Irma as signs that climate change is already exacerbating severe weather.

FERC mulls carbon pricing as salve for tensions with states Back

By Darius Dixon and Esther Whieldon | 05/03/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The Trump administration's doubts about climate change were nowhere to be found this week in discussions among state officials, power companies and federal regulators seeking a compromise that might meld power markets with state carbon-cutting plans.

The stark contrast between President Donald Trump's push to rescind his predecessor's climate rules, such as the Clean Power Plan, and the detailed technical discussions among FERC and state officials about the merits of policies such as a carbon tax drew the attention from a few speakers.

FERC is the "only federal building where there is a discussion of carbon pricing," said Susan Tierney, a senior adviser at the Analysis Group and who worked with both Clinton and Obama administration Energy Departments.

States and Congress have nibbled at the electricity markets for more than a decade through state renewable portfolio mandates and federal wind and solar tax credits. But after New York and Illinois — fearing a loss of jobs and emissions-free electricity — created large incentive programs for nuclear power plants in their states, market operators, economists and other energy power generators cried foul fearing energy companies would distort markets by increasingly pressuring states for special subsidies instead of trying to deliver the cheapest possible electricity.

"The status quo is just not sustainable," Richard Mroz, president of the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities, told FERC leaders and staff. "You've got the industry and the markets potentially now chasing the next subsidy that comes from a state. The concern is that it will continue to destabilize the market. That's not good for anyone."

One of the few areas of agreement among most speakers — few of which veered away from their long-held positions about state policies — was that FERC needed to exert itself, offer policy guidance and start setting timelines for action.

"The one message that seems to resonate right now with the commissioners and the staff is that FERC's gotta do something," Mroz later said in a brief interview. "FERC has to show some leadership in these issues and heretofore FERC has been either reluctant or really not fully appreciated the fact that it needed to help lead to a solution."

Acting FERC Chairman Cheryl LaFleur and outgoing Commissioner Colette Honorable, both Democrats, each acknowledged that putting a market price on carbon was one obvious solution to easing the jurisdictional tension between states and the federal government, an option often touted by environmental groups and economists but spurned by many Republicans.

"I want to say from the start I know that pricing carbon makes sense," LaFleur said. But both commissioners also noted that some states may not be so keen on that idea particularly since they want the option of choosing exactly what technologies are being promoted and they don't want to pay for other state policy decisions.

But with three vacancies on the five-member commission curtailing most of its policy work, FERC may be unable to act before states push new policies that markets have to work around.

"I think the tech conference moves the issue very little for the sole reason that there's not a lot of reasons for people to move off their positions," said former FERC staffer Jeff Dennis, who worked in ex-Commissioner John Norris' office and led FERC's policy development division. "You don't know who the commission's going to be."

Still, Dennis, who is now at Akin Gump, said, "FERC staff did an excellent job of laying out several potential paths forward to try to close the gap."

The White House has given no indication of when it might announce nominees, although sources close to the process say the administration has identified its picks.

Until at least one new member is confirmed, FERC will be unable to act on requests to review complaints charging that state policies unfairly interfere with the operation of the markets. New York's "zero emission credit" program started last month and Illinois' begins in June. Both are being challenged in federal lawsuits that will not be resolved for months.

The Electric Power Supply Association, which represents independent generators, filed complaints in January calling on FERC to ensure electricity prices in upcoming spring auctions in the New York and the mid-Atlantic area PJM Interconnection markets were not artificially lowered by state decisions to subsidize struggling nuclear plants.

LaFleur acknowledged in an interview Tuesday that "there seems to be a clear urgency to take action on this issue of state policies in the market." But without a quorum, "we're limited to soft power like having tech conferences and making statements."

The topic of carbon pricing, normally a radioactive subject in Washington, permeated the two-day technical conference as perhaps the most straightforward way of setting up a market-based system that could reflect state environmental goals.

But states participating in the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, a cap-and-trade program that has already effectively put a price on carbon in its nine participating states, have signaled that they're wary to do more.

"The states have expressed considerable reservations about pricing carbon beyond what they currently do," said ISO-New England's chief economist Matthew White. "They currently have a regional greenhouse gas market that exists, they govern it, many states have indicated a comfort retaining that and a discomfort with going beyond that."

For some states, their programs are more than dealing with carbon emissions, Mark Vannoy, chairman of the Maine Public Utilities Commission.

"At the end of the session we have a lot of bills that relate to out-of-market purchases of various types of resources for a whole variety of reasons other than just carbon," he said of his state legislature.

New York may be a test case for the idea. Bradley Jones, the CEO for the state's grid operator, said it's doing preliminary analyses on factoring in a carbon price but said that implementing one would take at least three years.

LaFleur said she hopes the FERC summit will lead the grid operators and their market players to come up with their own solutions faster.

"Hopefully, this will help spur the RTOs and some of the market participants to work together," she said. "The idea was to try to give a push for action."

Yet that worries some consumer advocates concerned about the transparency rules and governance structure of the market operators, who are private entities largely driven by the energy industry.

The RTOs already have a "deeply flawed stakeholder process," said Tyson Slocum, who directs Public Citizen's energy program. "What's going to come from this technical conference is an accelerated timeline of action by the RTOs."

California sues to block Trump's border wall Back

By Josh Gerstein | 09/20/2017 09:01 AM EDT

The state of California is suing to block President Donald Trump's plan to construct a wall along the U.S. border with Mexico, the top lawyer for the state told reporters Tuesday.

The lawsuit filed in federal court in San Diego on Wednesday argues that the effort violates federal law and the Constitution by intruding on state authority, California Attorney General Xavier Becerra said.

"They're violating the 10th Amendment and infringing on a lot of state laws, not just federal laws, that affect our state. At the same time, they're trying to do something that only Congress can do," Becerra told journalists in Washington in advance of an official announcement he plans to make in San Diego on Wednesday.

Becerra said the suit contends that federal officials are running afoul of the law by declaring the expansion of the border wall to be an emergency that justifies waiving environmental studies and usual contracting procedures.

During the presidential campaign, Trump repeatedly promised to create a border wall that the Mexican government would pay for. Mexican officials have flatly rejected contributing any funds to such a project. With most Democrats in Congress staunchly opposed to the idea, it's unclear how Trump will get money for construction.

Nevertheless, Trump administration officials are pressing forward with studies and prototypes. In recent weeks, the Department of Homeland Security awarded contracts to eight companies to produce prototypes of potential barriers. Half the awards were for concrete wall designs, while the others will explore use of other materials.

Becerra announced the suit during a press conference at a state park near the border.

One of the Trump administration's most outspoken supporters of tougher measures at the border — Attorney General Jeff Sessions — was nearby a bit earlier on Wednesday announcing record drug seizures.

Asked about the suit, Sessions said: "Well, in the United States, anybody can sue, but the United States of America has a border. The United States government has the control of that border and a responsibility to secure it. We would expect to be fully successful in moving forward with a border wall as Congress gives us the money to do so."

Chairman says FERC mulling tweaking PURPA one-mile rule Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/20/2017 04:48 PM EDT

FERC may change its rules that determine what facilities qualify for preferential treatment under the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act, including one that prevents developers from getting around size restrictions by breaking large projects up into smaller ones within one mile of each other.

"Any major changes to PURPA I think are going to have to come from Congress," Chairman Neil Chatterjee told reporters today following the agency's meeting. But "what we could look to here are what potential changes we could do within our purview whether it relates to the one-mile rule or other items."

PURPA requires utilities to buy power from relatively small "qualifying facilities" such as wind and solar projects of 80 megawatts or smaller that are located within the utilities' service territory. FERC also has a rule that any projects with the same owner or affiliated owners that are within one mile of each other will be counted as one project in calculating whether they exceed the megawatt cap.

FERC earlier this month dodged requests by developers of two wind projects in Montana to change how it calculates the distance between projects under the one-mile rule. The commission held it didn't have to answer that question because the owners of the Beaver Creek II and Beaver Creek III projects were not affiliated with each other. FERC hasn't acted on the PURPA applications of two other nearby and similarly named wind projects.

Chatterjee in a statement attached to the decision said FERC should continue to examine the one-mile rule policy.

Subject: Morning Energy, presented by the Renewable Fuels Association: Time running out for GOP to avoid shutdown — Hatch unveils tax extenders package — McIntyre leads first FERC confab today

GETTING CR-AZY: Less than 48 hours before the government shuts down, Republican leaders now plan to hold a separate votes today on a short-term government funding package and a massive $81 billion disaster package responding to a string of hurricanes and wildfires, POLITICO's Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report. But there are significant internal tensions within the House GOP and it remains to be seen what the Senate does with whatever the House ultimately passes. And there's concern that resistance to the disaster aid package in the Senate may push its consideration into 2018, which would infuriate Texas and Florida lawmakers who have vowed not to leave town for the holidays until they get the disaster funding approved.

Retiring Pennsylvania Rep. Charlie Dent summed it up: "It would be an act of political malpractice, after a successful tax reform vote, to shut the government down. Talk about stepping on your own message. I mean really, how dumb would that be? But anything's possible around here. This is Congress."

Twenty-four environmental groups sent a letter to lawmakers asking them to ensure adequate funding for environmental programs, no anti-environmental policy riders and equal treatment for defense and non-defense programs as Congress mulls lifting budget caps. Link here.

A HOLIDAYS CHRISTMAS PRESENT! Meanwhile, the Senate Finance Committee gave out special interest holiday gifts Wednesday in the form of a bill that will revive, extend or expand just about every energy credit anyone ever lobbied for, Pro Tax's Aaron Lorenzo reports. Tax writers didn't do a bunch of creative heavy lifting, since they mostly changed the end dates for credits that were gone.

Cold water: Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said Wednesday he "doesn't want to do extenders" right now, but said he'd turn to a strategy for how to advance them "after we get back" from the holiday break, Aaron also reports. A spokesperson for Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch wouldn't offer specifics on timing either but said the Utah Republican wants to addressing the extenders "in short order."

The heavy hitters: The bill includes all three of the credits that have attracted the most support: A nuclear tax credit extension, an expansion of the carbon capture tax credit, and the biodiesel blenders' credit. Those three credits bring the support of South Carolina's delegation, the Midwesterners, and the unusual combination of states concerned about climate change and states with heavy coal production.

And the list: Santa gathered up all the wishlists and compiled them together into this bill. This bill retroactively applies and extends tax credits through 2018 for biodiesel blenders, cellulosic biofuel producers, fuel cells, energy efficient homes, energy efficient commercial buildings, small wind, two-wheeled electric scooters, solar water heaters, geothermal heat pumps, and coal production on Indian land.

The one that got away? Sen. Chuck Grassley had made no secret that he wanted to convert the biodiesel blenders' credit, which goes to companies that mix biodiesel into petroleum diesel (think truck stops), into a producers credit, which would go to the folks who make the biofuel. He didn't get it. The Finance Committee simply extended the expired blenders' credit and made it retroactive.

WELCOME TO THURSDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Andrew Wheeler correctly identified Oklahoma (and South Carolina) as the states who had elections for both Senate seats at the time in 2014. MERRY FERCMAS: To understate things a bit, this has been a bizarre year for FERC. The quorum loss, four chairs, four new members, and curious senior staffing choices. Like court opinions, every FERC decision is important to someone but let's be honest: The agenda for today's meeting is not the centerpiece of the agency's monthly get-together.

Kevin McIntyre, who has a term running into 2023, will smack down the FERC gavel publicly for the first time and set a tone for how he plans to lead and what his priorities are. For his part, McIntyre said, in an agency podcast recorded last week and posted Wednesday, he hopes to bring greater transparency to FERC's processes. As journalists, we hope that extends to a forthrightness with the press and clarity on a range of issues that happened over the past few months that set the rumor mill spinning. And between now and the agency's first meeting of 2018, FERC will take some "final action" on Energy Secretary Rick Perry's controversial grid resilience proposal.

Oh, and about that agenda: Although today's agenda isn't particularly long, it does include a rulemaking on "fast-start" power sources, one element of FERC's so-called price formation initiative that largely stalled when FERC lost its quorum in February. A year ago, FERC issued a proposed rule aimed at boosting market payments to resources that can cycle up quickly when grid operators need additional electricity. Today, FERC leaders seem poised to issue a final rule that sends instructions to the grid operators. The agenda also includes a new docket on cybersecurity incident reporting standards, which could be a proposed rule or something more early-stage, such as a request for information. The meeting starts at 10 a.m. at FERC headquarters and is livestreamed.

ALASKANS TAKE VICTORY LAP: Recognizing a long-held Republican policy goal of opening ANWR to drilling, the Alaskan congressional delegation took was front in center at the White House on Wednesday afternoon as President Donald Trump and congressional Republicans took their victory lap on the tax bill's H.R. 1 \(115\) passage. "Perseverance overcomes intelligence any day of the year" is how Alaska Rep. Don Young summed up the achievement, which he said he's been pushing for 37 years (after Trump mistakenly called him "Dan," prompting the gruff Alaskan to shoot back "It's Don!"). Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and Sen. Dan Sullivan also spoke.

Anyone think this is Harold Hamm? Trump said during the press conference: "So a friend of mine called up about ANWR -- he's in the oil business — he said, 'You didn't get ANWR?' And I said, 'Tell me about ANWR.' He said, 'We've been trying to get that passed. The whole country — the world — they tried in Ronald Reagan. They tried with the Bushes. They tried with everybody. They never got ANWR.' But we got ANWR in this bill."

But the victory lap may be short-lived: Conservatives aren't pleased with a looming package — colorfully referred to by some as the "shit sandwich" — that will likely include billions in spending that won't be offset. POLITICO's Rachael Bade and Seung Min Kim with more here.

Quick analysis: The American Council on Renewable Energy released a quick analysis of the tax package now headed to Trump's desk that it deemed "a measured victory for renewable energy." Read it here.

LAST NUKE STANDING: The eyes of the nuclear energy community turn to Georgia this morning. Leaders of the Georgia Public Service Commission are considering an order from agency staff that would prevent Georgia Power from billing nearly $500 million the company spent on the Vogtle nuclear project to consumers. Southern Co.'s Georgia Power has asked regulators to greenlight $542 million in expenses it paid on the two-reactor project — the only units under construction in the U.S. — over the first six months of the year. But the commission's Public Interest Advocacy staff have said that the company should only be allowed to pass $44 million to ratepayers, arguing that payments to Westinghouse, the lead contractor who filed for bankruptcy this spring, were "not deemed reasonable."

Commission staff criticized Georgia Power, which has the largest single stake in Vogtle, for offering less than "active" oversight of Westinghouse and said that it deserves blame for missing the window to receive nuclear production tax credits. The utility has also asked that if the project is eventually cancelled, that regulators let it "recover its prudently incurred investment in the partially completed facility along with the cost of carrying the unamortized balance of that investment." Commission will hold a special energy committee meeting at 9 a.m., followed immediately by a special administrative session to vote. The audio will be broadcast here.

So what'll happen? Georgia Public Service Commission Chairman Stan Wise told WABE he expects the panel will allow the project to continue under certain conditions. "This commission will not say, 'Do not continue this plant,'" he said. "The commission will say, 'Here's what we think that you should have to do to continue the plant. Accept or reject.'"

ASSESSING NEW EPA REGIONAL CHIEFS: Anne Idsal, the new EPA Region 6 chief, told the Dallas Morning News she doesn't "necessarily" buy the consensus view that human activity is driving climate change. "I think it's possible that humans have some impact on climate change, the extent of which I have not made up my mind on," she said. Meanwhile, critics warn Cathy Stepp, the new EPA Region 5 Administrator, left the Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources "in tatters" following her tenure there where she infamously scrubbed its website of climate change information. According to MLive, prominent Midwest leaders including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker praised her selection.

ANOTHER CITY SUES FOSSIL FUEL INDUSTRY OVER CLIMATE CHANGE:

Santa Cruz County and the city of Santa Cruz on Wednesday filed two lawsuits against 29 oil, gas and coal companies asking them to be held accountable for the impacts associated with climate change including sea level rise and exacerbated wildfires. "It's time for oil companies to pay for the damage they've caused, rather than ask local residents to pick up all the costs associated with protecting us from sea level rise, increasing fires, and severe weather," County Supervisor Ryan Coonerty said in a statement. Similar lawsuits were filed over the summer by cities like San Francisco and Oakland.

In response to the lawsuits, Linda Kelly, senior vice president and general counsel of the National Association of Manufacturers, said: "Sadly this is just the latest in a long line of actions taken by wealthy activists and plaintiff's attorneys with an agenda to undermine manufacturing in America and rake in millions of dollars through the courts by politicizing natural disasters. The place to solve these issues is not in the courts."

SCHNEIDERMAN BACKS CARBON TAX: New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman became the first New York statewide elected official to back a carbon tax this week, POLITICO New York's Danielle Muoio reports. "That includes passing legislation to dramatically reduce greenhouse gas emissions, including a carbon tax, while expanding investment in the people and places hit hardest by climate change," he said in a statement.

MILLIONS REMAIN WITHOUT POWER IN PUERTO RICO: More than three months after Hurricane Maria hit, the Army Corps of Engineers doesn't think it will fully restore power to Puerto Rico until next May, CBS News reports. Power restoration is expected to hit 95 percent in February. More than 3,600 linemen are working to restore electricity "neighborhood by neighborhood," a senior DOE official told the news service.

ACCEPTED: Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse announced Wednesday GAO had accepted his request to examine White House calculations of the social cost of carbon and other similar figures. The agency said it would begin its review in the coming months. Whitehouse and six other Democrats expressed concern in their original request that the Trump administration's lowered estimates could undermine a host of environmental regulations.

MAIL CALL! TOO MUCH AUTONOMY? A 16-state coalition of governors and attorneys general, led by Texas AG Ken Paxton, sent a letter to Trump on Wednesday calling for the administration to "extend greater regulatory oversight to independent agencies." Though they weren't mentioned by name, independent agencies affected by such a move could include FERC, NRC and the Chemical Safety Board.

Information sought on sage grouse review: Thirteen Democratic senators sent a letter to the Forest Service seeking information on its role in the review of management plans for the greater sage grouse and an extension of the public comment period by 45 days. Link here.

REPORT ROUNDUP! DRILL, MAYBE, DRILL? Resources for the Future is out with a report looking at how various local communities have coped and responded to volatility in local demand for drilling over the last decade. It found most local communities reported "net fiscal benefits" from expanded oil and gas drilling, and that fiscal conditions had generally improved in 2016 and 2017. Read it here.

Keep getting more efficient: Energy efficiency programs in the electric utility industry saved 183 terawatt-hours of electricity in 2016 and savings have grown 45 percent over the past 5 years, according to a report from the Institute for Electric Innovation.

Industry report: Methane emissions declining: A report from Energy In Depth argues there have been continued reductions in methane emissions within the country's most productive shale basins. Emissions from the San Juan Basin, for example, have dropped 47 percent since 2011.

THERE'S A TRADE GROUP FOR EVERYTHING: The International Mountain Biking Association has split with its San Diego chapter over a proposal from Rep. Tom McClintock to allow bikes in federally designated wilderness areas, The Los Angeles Times' Evan Halper reports. "Resentment of these cyclists over the longstanding ban on 'mechanized' transportation in that fraction of the nation's public lands presents a political opportunity for Republicans eager to drill fissures in the broad coalition of conservation-minded groups united against the GOP environmental agenda. 'People who enjoy mountain biking have just as much right to use the public trails as those who enjoy hiking or horseback riding,'" McClintock said during a hearing on the bill, which has passed committee. The mountain biking association opposes the bill, while the San Diego chapter supports it (h/t POLITICO Influence).

Hatch releases tax extenders bill Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/20/2017 05:12 PM EDT

Legislation to extend lapsed tax benefits related to race horses, race tracks, railroad maintenance and a raft of energy provisions officially emerged today.

The bill, introduced by Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), would revive a range of tax extenders that expired at the end of 2016 under the PATH Act, which made a number of other extenders permanent and gave two- and five-year extensions to others.

The legislation would also extend and alter other energy credits, including the Investment Tax Credit, the nuclear production tax credit and the credit for carbon dioxide sequestration.

"Extending these provisions would help families, individuals and small businesses in Utah and across the country, and the chairman is committed to working with members to address the expiring extenders in short order," said an email from Katie Niederee, a Senate Finance spokesperson.

She offered no more specifics on timing, though pressures have been mounting from influence groups to attach extenders to any end-of-year legislation still moving through Congress.

GOP senators revive tax extender legislation, again Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/20/2017 08:40 PM EDT

Senate Republicans introduced legislation Wednesday to breathe new life into a host of lapsed tax benefits, the same day they also passed a wider-reaching tax overhaul that they previously touted as the end of temporary tax policy.

The so-called extenders bill, introduced by Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), would give another two years of life to nearly three dozen tax provisions that expired at the end of 2016.

They include benefits related to owning race horses, building auto-racing tracks and ongoing railroad maintenance. The bill also would let homeowners continue to itemize their mortgage insurance premiums and would extend and alter energy credits, including the Investment Tax Credit, the nuclear production tax credit and the credit for carbon dioxide sequestration.

No cost for Hatch's bill was provided, but supporters of the broader tax legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), already claimed a fiscal benefit.

They declared about $500 billion in savings from the cost of extending the numerous tax provisions, using what's known as a current policy baseline, which assumes the provisions would stay on the books since they have been routinely extended. By contrast, using a current law baseline would recognize the scheduled expiration of the benefits, meaning proposals to extend them would cost money.

Hatch's House counterpart, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), declined to comment on the accounting method.

"You're talking to the chairman who doesn't want to do extenders," Brady said.

The extenders included in the new package were last renewed at the end of 2015 under the Protecting Americans from Tax Hikes, or PATH, Act. It made a number of extenders permanent and gave two- and five-year extensions to others.

The strategy to advance this new bloc of extenders hasn't been determined, Brady said.

"We'll turn to that after we get back" from the holiday break, he said. "That's my anticipation."

A spokesperson for Hatch, Katie Niederee, offered no more specifics on timing, though pressure has been mounting from influence groups to attach extenders to any end-of-year legislation still moving through Congress.

"Extending these provisions would help families, individuals and small businesses in Utah and across the country, and the chairman is committed to working with members to address the expiring extenders in short order," Niederee said in an email.

A letter to Hatch, Brady and other congressional leaders from about 60 trade associations representing energy, housing, transportation, agriculture and other interests called on Congress to preserve all the benefits dear to their member companies.

"Allowing these tax provisions to remain lapsed creates confusion in the marketplace, and effectively increases taxes on entities that create jobs and economic growth," said the letter. "Accordingly, we respectfully ask that Congress add a multi???year extension, beginning January, 2017, of these important tax provisions to any end???of???year legislative vehicle."

But conservative groups have weighed in with opposition.

Extenders represent tax code carve-outs to special interests and continuing them would be wrong, said Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity. The group, funded by the conservative, billionaire Koch brothers, worked closely with Brady, Hatch and other congressional Republicans to get the broader tax overhaul legislation to President Donald Trump.

"We have not made any deals to look the other way on extenders," said Phillips, insisting that he wouldn't back down from opposing the effort to yet again revive temporary tax policy.

Tax victory may be fleeting for Ryan and McConnell Back

By Rachael Bade and Seung Min Kim | 12/20/2017 02:36 PM EDT

A beaming Speaker Paul Ryan high-fived and hugged his lieutenants after the House first passed the GOP tax bill Tuesday. As the Senate prepared to follow suit hours later, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell was elated.

"Couldn't be better," he said in an interview with POLITICO.

Capitol Hill Republicans have every reason to feel euphoric. Ryan and McConnell have ushered the biggest tax overhaul in a generation through Congress and delivered President Donald Trump his first major legislative victory since Inauguration Day.

But on the periphery is palpable angst, particularly in the House. Just hours before the Tuesday vote, some House Republicans fretted privately about the prospect of getting railroaded into propping up Obamacare by the end of the week. And conservatives have been stewing quietly over a looming legislative package coming in early January that most believe will increase spending and codify an Obama-era immigration program they believe is illegal.

"It's kinda like leaving a hospital finding out you're cancer free and getting run over by a Mack truck," said Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker. On the one hand, the North Carolina Republican cheered passage of the tax plan. But he was also aghast that a unified Republican government was even discussing the possibility of enacting Obamacare subsidy payments they campaigned against for years.

Ryan and McConnell scored an undeniable win this week when Congress passed a sweeping tax overhaul. For the speaker, it was a chance to check his No. 1 policy goal off his bucket list. For the majority leader, it was an opportunity to regroup with a once-in-a-generation success, particularly after the Senate failed to repeal Obamacare this summer.

But the victory lap for both men may be short-lived.

By Friday Republicans will have to figure out how to fund the government, and there are no good options. House Republicans hoped to increase defense spending without giving Democrats any funding boost for their own priorities — an idea GOP leaders retracted after realizing it would go nowhere in the Senate. McConnell, for his part, recently backed the idea of adding Obamacare stabilization payments to the short-term spending bill — something House Republicans have flat-out rejected.

That's to say nothing of January, when Congress is expected to raise strict spending caps without equivalent cuts and potentially offer deportation relief to Dreamers. Both could repel the conservative base even more.

Republicans throughout Washington have begun calling the January legislative agenda the "shit sandwich."

"It's going to take a lot of the win away and a lot of the momentum away if we go back on our principles, and to me that's why the [Obamacare] payments are toxic," said Rep. Warren Davidson (R-Ohio), a Freedom Caucus member who enjoys a strong relationship with Ryan and even sat with him on the floor in the moments before the House vote Tuesday. On Wednesday afternoon, Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) said they would not push for an Obamacare stabilization measure to hitch a ride on this week's stopgap spending bill and would instead seek passage early next year.

Ryan may have sensed that other policy matters were about to infringe on the tax triumph: Just three hours before the House first passed the bill Tuesday, the Wisconsin Republican told his colleagues in a closed-door conference meeting to treasure the moment they passed the tax overhaul and remember it as Republicans tackle a series of thorny year-end issues. Be proud, Ryan said — and don't get bogged down in the drama.

Some heeded his advice; others did not. As Republicans streamed out of the room, several balked at Ryan's suggestion that McConnell might tack Obamacare subsidies onto the government-funding bill at week's end. Minutes later, when the gavel fell on tax reform in the House, some conservatives declined to join the party's standing ovation on the floor, frustrated over leadership's handling of the year-end to-do list.

Republicans' mixed emotions will again be on full display Wednesday: Around 3 p.m., GOP lawmakers will head to the White House for a celebration, where most will laugh and pat each other on the backs like one big happy family. But right after, House leaders expect to call a private conference meeting to discuss how to avert a shutdown — a discussion that's likely to displease conservatives, appropriators and defense hawks alike.

The Senate, a more bipartisan body comprised of more centrist Republicans, is having less heartburn for now. McConnell is determined that his hard-fought legislative victory on taxes — in which he kept together his fractious conference — not be swiftly overshadowed by a shutdown battle that could bruise Republicans.

"I think there's a bipartisan desire to wrap up our business here in a fairly non-contentious way, and I think you'll see that develop at the end of the week," McConnell told POLITICO. "This is not a place we haven't been before."

His top deputy, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), was also adamant that the looming battles wouldn't detract from the tax win: "I don't know anybody that believes we're going to shut down."

A shutdown just two days before Christmas would tar the victory that GOP leaders on both ends of the Capitol have spent months working toward. Democrats have criticized the messy legislative process and accused the GOP of rushing through the tax bill with little public scrutiny, charges Republicans dismiss.

"I think it's a real tribute to our majority leader that he's been able to get this up and hopefully out," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said.

Winning over Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee, the lone GOP senator to reject the Senate's version of the tax bill, was also a feat for McConnell.

At a party lunch on Tuesday, Corker spoke to his fellow Republican senators about how he came around on the tax measure despite initially opposing it out of concerns it would blow through the deficit. He didn't mention, according to one senator, the controversy that exploded around him in the final days of the tax fight after a report suggested he flipped his vote only after securing provisions in the tax bill that would profit him personally.

McConnell came to Corker's defense in the interview with POLITICO, calling such suggestions about the Tennessee senator "absolutely outrageous."

The majority leader was unconcerned with the perception that some lawmakers could benefit financially from the tax overhaul. McConnell noted that his own accountant ran through how the Kentucky Republican would fare under the tax bill, and "I come out almost exactly where I am now."

"Every taxpayer in America has got a different set of facts," McConnell said. "Not a single member [was] casting a vote on this bill based upon their own personal tax situation."

In the House, there was never really a question about whether tax reform could pass. Ryan was able to muscle through an Obamacare repeal bill earlier in the year, and his conference was so sick of losing that they were willing to swallow almost any tax bill if it meant a legislative victory.

"It's a feather in his cap," said Rep. Bill Posey of Florida of Ryan. "He said this was one of his goals since the day he was on staff. And that says a lot, that it's been important to him — but also very important to the president and the country."

Even if GOP leaders iron out their government funding differences in the next three days with little drama, January is sure to be harder. While Republicans could pass tax and health care bills by themselves, negotiations on spending and immigration will require Democratic votes.

And Democrats, most lawmakers and aides on the Hill agree, have the upper-hand in those talks. That means it's only a matter of time before Republicans cut loose their right flank. But perhaps when that happens, and the intra-party bickering reaches a new crescendo, they'll look back to the day tax reform passed with fond memories.

"The nice thing about doing a big package that has been in the making and overdue for 31 years is this is going to have lasting impacts," said Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), who hopes Republicans will keep talking about tax reform well beyond the shutdown drama. "I don't think any of us are going to lose any of our enthusiasm or gonna stop talking about it."

POLITICO Pro New York: Schneiderman expresses support for a carbon tax Back

By Danielle Muoio | 12/20/2017 08:47 PM EDT

New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman this week voiced his support for a state carbon tax, joining ranks with a statewide coalition pushing for the legislation.

His comments, made in the Flatiron District, make Schneiderman the first statewide elected official to endorse the implementation of a carbon tax. They come as Schneiderman prepares to sue the Trump administration over its decision to repeal the Clean Power Plan.

"New York must invest in an equitable transition to a clean energy future — one that creates jobs, protects workers, and supports the communities most affected by climate change," Schneiderman said in a statement. "That includes passing legislation to dramatically reduce greenhouse gas emissions, including a carbon tax, while expanding investment in the people and places hit hardest by climate change."

The coalition, called New York Renews, is composed of clean energy, environmental justice and labor groups. It has said it will push legislation in 2018 calling for a carbon tax that would generate revenue for investments in renewables and energy efficiency projects.

A carbon tax has been proposed in the Legislature, but this is the first time a large coalition of environmental groups have made a concerted campaign to pass the measure. The New York Independent System Operator, which runs the state's power market, has also begun the first stages of examining what such a tax may look like.

"Sea levels are rising, major storms are occurring with increasing frequency — and it is low-income communities and communities of color who are hit the hardest," ALIGN Executive Director Maritza Silva-Farrell, a coalition member, said in a statement. "New York must dramatically increase its use of renewable energy to combat the threat of climate change. ... The fairest and most effective way to do this is to put a fee on pollution."

Schneiderman expressed support for the Climate and Community Protection Act, also a main focus for the coalition. The act would turn New York's renewable goals into law and set benchmarks for clean energy initiatives.

The Cuomo administration has been hesitant to support a carbon tax outright, noting that federal action would be needed to ensure it doesn't hurt the state's economic competitiveness.

Gov. Andrew Cuomo has committed New York to reducing emissions by 40 percent by 2030 as part of his Reforming the Energy Vision. Under the plan, the state is tasked with getting 50 percent of its electricity from renewable sources by 2030.

POISED FOR TAX PACKAGE PASSAGE: Congressional Republicans are poised this week to pass a massive tax package HR 1 \(115\), and the final text that emerged Friday evening was mostly good news for the renewables industry that had been unnerved by provisions in earlier versions. And the package will realize a decades-old GOP dream of opening the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling that Speaker Paul Ryan's office hailed as "a win for American energy" Sunday. Check out some of the highlights via Pro's Eric Wolff and Ben Lefebvre here.

—Spared: The final bill leaves wind and solar tax credits untouched, meaning they will continue to be phased down as originally envisioned in a 2015 bill. It preserves a tax break for electric vehicles and restores credits for abandoned oil wells and enhanced oil recovery that the House-passed bill removed. And it keeps a provision allowing utilities to continue to deduct interest on loans without the limitation placed on other businesses.

—What's on oil's mind? The bill keeps Senate language permitting the selloff of up to $600 million in Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil if revenues from opening ANWR drilling come up short of the $1 billion forecast, as many critics have warned is likely. It adds a provision offering deductions to investors in master limited partnerships, the corporate structure for many pipeline companies. And it temporarily lifts the cap on Gulf of Mexico oil and gas production revenue sharing to facilitate additional coastal restoration and protection projects.

—Can't stop the BEAT: Senate taxwriters made an effort to tweak the Base Erosion Anti-Abuse Tax in ways that would help renewable project developers. The tax is intended to keep U.S. profits domestic — but the final version doesn't go far enough to solve the problem in earlier iterations, renewables backers say. The fix in the conference bill allows banks to take 80 percent of the production tax credit and investment tax credit until 2025, but also expands which institutions are affected and makes other tweaks. "We are uncertain how the marketplace will react to the fact that more multi-national firms may now be covered by the BEAT, and tax credits may not all be useable in any given year," Gregory Wetstone, president and CEO of the ACORE, said in a statement. If you really want to get down and dirty with the BEAT and how other parts of the tax bill affected renewable projects, check out this blog post by Keith Martin, the co-head of U.S. projects for the law firm of Norton Rose Fulbright.

—Not there: As expected, none of the expired tax credits for small wind, fuel cells, and other "orphans" made it into the finished product. There's some chatter of moving an additional package before breaking for the holidays, but count ME as decidedly skeptical. Lawmakers will find the energy for such a push.

Timeline on this: Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn expressed confidence the bill would pass his chamber this week "probably on Tuesday" during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." Pro Tax's Bernie Becker has an excellent look at how the bill's expected passage is the culmination of half a life's work for a large number of Washington tax insiders.

FINAL SPRINT TO THE HOLIDAYS! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Bracewell's Frank Maisano was first up to identify former Alabama Rep. Parker Griffith as the last sitting congressman to switch parties. For today: How many current senators are older than 80? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to adragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

SHUTDOWN WATCH: Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin isn't expecting a government shutdown at the end of this week, though he said during a Sunday appearance on "Fox News Sunday" he couldn't be sure. POLITICO's Martin Matishak reports. "I can't rule it out, but I can't imagine it occurring," he said. Remember, facing a Friday deadline, lawmakers still aren't sure how much money they'll have to spend in fiscal year 2018 since they haven't reached a spending cap deal. POLITICO's Rachael Bade, Seung Min Kim and Jennifer Haberkorn look at the sticky situation facing the GOP this week here.

Ahead of the deadline, Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló asked congressional leaders to provide emergency assistance to his devastated island before they skip town for the holidays. "No governor should ever be put in the position of having to deny that hope in the aftermath of a catastrophic disaster due to the inaction of Congress," he said. Lawmakers from Florida and Texas have also been pushing aggressively for disaster relief in this stopgap spending package.

ICYMI: A White House document circulating among agencies and obtained by POLITICO is setting the stage for a solar trade war with China, Pro's Emily Holden reports. The administration appears to be preparing its messaging ahead of setting punitive tariffs on Chinese-made solar power equipment. The tariffs would increase the cost of solar power in the U.S. and could slow expansion of the energy source and eliminate installation jobs. But the White House paper suggests trade barriers may be necessary to foster domestic solar manufacturing, particularly for advanced solar technologies.

The document notes solar power demand in the U.S. and abroad is growing rapidly and argues "federal policies should ensure that the United States can benefit from this expansion." And it argues the administration should consider "the potential negative impact on U.S. energy security of increased reliance on imported energy technology," in carrying out an executive order on energy independence and in developing a response to the Section 201 trade case from the two domestic manufacturers. "China will likely expand its dominance to include advanced solar technologies," the paper says. "U.S. policy should be focused on creating competitive conditions for U.S. companies to thrive in the global marketplace, and compete against China and other solar players."

Suniva, one of the companies seeking the tariffs, issued a statement in response to the article: "Suniva applauds the Trump Administration for championing American manufacturing in the face of cheating by China and its proxies who want to kill American jobs and make America dependent on China for its energy and security needs."

SOMETHING ELSE TO WATCH: President Donald Trump is expected to discuss his National Security Strategy today and his administration will remove climate change from the list of national security threats, The Federalist reports. The Obama administration's Pentagon called climate change a "threat multiplier" and the former president warned back in 2015: "Climate change constitutes a serious threat to global security, an immediate risk to our national security, and, make no mistake, it will impact how our military defends our country." Secretary of State Rex Tillerson told a Senate committee back in January he didn't consider climate change an "imminent national security threat." According to excerpts, the new document will state: "Climate policies will continue to shape the global energy system. The United States will continue to advance an approach that balances energy security, economic development, and environmental protection."

UNDER SCRUTINY: A lawyer working with America Rising has been filing public records requests for EPA employees who have been critical of Administrator Scott Pruitt's leadership of the agency, the New York Times reports. "This is a witch hunt against EPA employees who are only trying to protect human health and the environment," Gary Morton, an agency employee in Philadelphia, said. That comes as a group associated with America Rising, Definers Public Affairs, has been hired by EPA for "media monitoring" services to track how the agency is being covered.

NYC PLANS 'PEOPLE'S HEARING' ON CLEAN POWER PLAN: After being snubbed by EPA for a public hearing on its plans to repeal the Clean Power Plan, New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman and New York Mayor Bill de Blasio announced Friday they'll hold a "people's hearing" on the regulation Jan. 9 where they'll hear and compile testimony for the agency. Registration here. ME readers no doubt remember Schneiderman is leading a group of states and localities defending the Obama-era regulation's legality.

DEPARTMENT OF BAD TIMING: Just a few days ahead of a Thursday vote on the future of Georgia Power's two new nuclear reactors at Plant Vogtle, Hartfield-Jackson International Airport suffered an hours-long power failure that grounded thousands of travelers as the holiday travel season kicked into high gear, USA Today reports

HAPPY ANNIVERSARY! Today marks two years since Congress passed and then-President Barack Obama signed legislation that lifted the crude oil export ban as part of a broader package that also extended prized tax credits for the wind and solar industries

GREENS SUE OVER EPA'S PLAN FOR TEXAS HAZE: Environmental groups on Friday sued EPA over its federal plan to limit haze-causing pollution from Texas power plants. The rule has been supposed to have been in place by 2007, a delay that prompted a federal court to order a plan be finalized by either Texas or EPA by September. Without a submission from Texas, EPA was forced to finalize a federal version, but environmentalists complained that the Trump administration's plan was a "sham rule" that would not reduce pollution nearly as much as the Obama administration's proposal would have. In addition to a lawsuit in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, the groups also submitted a petition for reconsideration to EPA.

KEEP AN EYE OUT: Pro's Alex Guillén notes in Energy Regulation Watch that while the holidays tend to be a slower time for regulatory news, EPA told a federal court this week that its Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking for a replacement to the Clean Power Plan will publish "in the upcoming weeks." That notice, which OMB completed its review of on Thursday, sets the stage to replace the Obama-era rule.

PUBLISH THE RULE! Three senior House Energy and Commerce Democrats — Frank Pallone, Paul Tonko and Diana DeGette — aren't pleased by Pruitt's plan to gather more input on the agency's Lead and Copper Rule and urged him to immediately move ahead with a proposed rule. "Administrator Pruitt is hiding this delay behind the guise of a novel consultation process with the states, but the states need to see the proposed rule in order to provide relevant comments," they said in a statement. FOR YOUR READING PLEASURE: POLITICO New York's Keshia Clukey takes a look at how new SUNY Chancellor Kristina Johnson, a former official with the U.S. Department of Energy under the Obama administration, is proposing the use of 21st century innovation to help solve SUNY's fiscal and infrastructure problems. The benefits of making campuses more energy efficient are threefold, she told POLITICO. The lion's share of SUNY's energy use is attributed to its approximately 2,800 buildings — 2,346 of which are state-operated, including academic buildings, hospitals and residence halls. Upgrades could include weatherizing buildings, using more efficient heating and cooling techniques, or even adding solar panels. This helps the bottom line, saving campuses money, reducing operating costs and giving "local budget relief, which allows them and the presidents to do more for the academic mission," Johnson said. Solar, wind get reprieve in final tax bill Back

By Eric Wolff and Ben Lefebvre | 12/15/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The conference tax bill released Friday by Congressional Republicans resolves a slew of issues faced by the energy industry — Wind and solar credits saved: The final tax bill, HR 1 \(115\), follows the Senate's bill when it comes to the production tax credit and the solar tax credit, meaning both are left untouched. The House bill had proposed reducing the value of the PTC and changing when a project qualified for it, and it had proposed dropping the permanent 10 percent credit for the ITC. Both credits will phase down as agreed to in a deal struck in 2015.

— MLP benefits added: It also includes language Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) proposed that would give deductions to investors in master limited partnerships, the corporate structure for many pipeline companies.

— EVs roll on: A tax credit for electric vehicles was preserved.

— Oil recovery restored: Credits for abandoned oil wells and enhanced oil recovery that were eliminated in the House version were restored in the final bill.

— Selling off the oil: The bill retains the Senate language that would sell up to $600 million in Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil to offset any shortfall from opening up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling. The Senate language forecast drilling in ANWR would generate $1 billion in revenue over 10 years, an estimate critics have said is too optimistic.

— More revenue sharing: The bill also temporarily lifts offshore Gulf of Mexico oil and gas production revenue sharing caps to $650 million annually for fiscal years 2020 and 2021, up from a previous limit of $500 million, to support coastal restoration and protection projects.

— Base erosion eased for renewables: Tax writers created some room to keep banks and other financiers of renewable projects in the game by allowing them to take 80 percent of the credits for the PTC and the ITC.

— No tax extenders: Numerous senators have been saying it for weeks now, and the bill makes it official: None of the expired tax credits for small wind, fuel cells, and other "orphans" made it into the conference bill. The extension of the nuclear tax credit that was in the House bill has also been dropped.

— Utilities still get to deduct interest: The bill preserves provisions in both the House and Senate versions that allowed utilities to continue to deduct interest on loans without the limitation placed on other businesses.

Tax bill a dream come true for some GOP wonks Back

By Bernie Becker | 12/17/2017 06:58 AM EDT

For the large contingent of Washington supply-siders and tax-cutters, the sweeping tax overhaul that President Donald Trump is poised to sign into law this week has been a generation in coming — and the culmination of half a life's work that started during Ronald Reagan's 1980s.

Grover Norquist, arguably the best-known anti-tax activist in the country, started Americans for Tax Reform at then-President Reagan's request to help marshal support for the 1986 tax overhaul. He's been working ever since to rally support for more tax cuts.

House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) for years said his dream job was to be House Ways and Means chairman, a position that would have allowed him to quarterback the sort of tax revamp that his mentor, the late Jack Kemp, helped get through Congress in 1986.

When he became Speaker, Ryan said he was reluctantly passing the title of Ways and Means chairman, and the opportunity to focus attention on tax reform, to Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas).

Now, the 2017 tax revamp will bring the American tax system more into lockstep with those conservatives' thinking than perhaps ever before — making the idea that what works for corporate America will work for the country at large a central plank of U.S. policy for decades to come, maybe even a generation or more.

"This tax cut and reform will drive further reforms and reductions for the next 50 years," Norquist said Friday.

The corporate rate would be slashed from 35 percent to 21 percent under the GOP plan, which would also allow businesses to immediately write off investments for five years and scrap Obamacare's individual mandate. In an extra bonus for the right, it also shrinks the deduction for state and local taxes, an incentive that mostly helps blue, high-tax states.

"This is a pretty historical moment for the conservative movement," said Stephen Moore, another of those supply-siders, who has over the years worked at the Club for Growth, The Heritage Foundation and The Wall Street Journal editorial page.

"I've been in this game for 30-some years. This, if it passes, will be the single biggest policy triumph for conservatives since the 1996 welfare reform. It's up there with the '81 Reagan tax cuts," added Moore, who's an informal adviser to the president and, along with fellow supply-sider Larry Kudlow, helped then-candidate Trump craft his tax plan.

The start of the conservative tax-cutting movement is frequently traced back to 1974, when a young economics professor named Arthur Laffer met an equally young Dick Cheney, then a top aide to President Gerald Ford, at a restaurant. Laffer doodled on a napkin the case that cutting taxes can increase revenues for the government, a theory now known as the Laffer Curve.

That case is maybe most famously argued by Kudlow, who worked in Reagan's White House and has spent more than 15 years defending its merits on CNBC. Perhaps even more importantly, Moore said, Kudlow worked overtime to pitch the GOP tax plan to skeptical Republicans like Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Bob Corker of Tennessee, both of whom now seem likely to back the measure.

It might be hard to imagine now, but the Republican Party hasn't always been dominated by would-be tax cutters. Former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.) once joked that "the good news is that a bus full of supply-siders went off a cliff. The bad news is that two seats were empty," according to "Showdown at Gucci Gulch," the book about the 1986 tax overhaul.

But the supply-side theory eventually won out, if in fits and starts. Reagan's 1981 tax package cut the top individual rate from 70 percent to 50 percent — with the rate getting down all the way to 28 percent in 1986.

Republicans now credit those 1981 tax cuts with sparking years of economic growth, higher wages and job creation. But with the economy floundering in 1982, Dole and other Republicans pushed through a tax increase. And Democrats have long said that there was no trickle in the GOP's "trickle-down economics," pointing to a 1990s economic boom that happened after President Bill Clinton raised taxes.

Conservatives believe the growth had more to do with a cut in the capital gains rate under Clinton's watch, which itself was followed several years later by the two rounds of tax cuts under George W. Bush.

Now, 15 years later, all that work by supply-siders has culminated in a new kind of tax reform, which marries the theory that tax cuts for business will be a boon for the economy with tax reform's customary discarding of various tax incentives that have collected over the years and that they say distort the economy

Marty Sullivan of Tax Analysts said the 2017 tax overhaul looks more like the 1981 and 2001 tax cuts enacted under Republican presidents, as opposed to tax overhauls in 1969, 1976 and 1986. The 1986 tax reform, while lowering the top corporate rate from 46 percent to 34 percent, actually hiked taxes on corporations to pay for tax relief for individuals, and to keep from adding to deficits.

"Those were all workman-like reforms where the staff and members looked hard for unfair and complicated tax breaks to take out of the code to simplify it, make it fair and reduce rates," said Sullivan, a former economist for both the Treasury Department and the Joint Committee on Taxation. "In this bill, tax cutting is the primary motivation and reform is an afterthought."

The next question is whether this bill will jolt the economy the way its supporters predict. Trump and other top Republicans have said that the economic growth created by the tax cuts will more than offset its current $1.456 trillion price tag.

But while outside analysts and JCT have found that the Republican tax plan would create hundreds of billions of dollars in new revenue, none of them have found that the plan would come close to paying for itself. On top of that, Democrats are already making it clear that they'll do everything in their power to unwind this year's tax bill, especially if they win back some power in Washington next year.

"One of the lessons of '86 is it's really hard to get tax reform, but it's even harder to keep it," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Congressional Budget Office director and president of the conservative American Action Forum. "I think it's a concern. The partisan nature makes it ripe for change the moment the Democrats get the opportunity."

For their part, conservatives say they're in better shape than ever to protect the new tax cuts. Republicans were united against former President Barack Obama's efforts to allow Bush-era rates for the wealthy to expire, though they weren't successful in the end, and Norquist notes that bipartisan efforts that erased parts of the 1986 tax overhaul came before practically all GOP lawmakers were signing his organization's pledge against tax hikes.

But Moore also called the 2017 tax cuts a "riverboat gamble," echoing the late Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker's thoughts on the 1981 Reagan tax cuts. Their success or failure, Moore added, will have a big impact on whether the supply-siders' influence grows or diminishes over the next generation.

"We say it will work, and they say it won't and this will be put to the test," Moore said. "If this doesn't work, I'll eat some crow."

Mnuchin won't rule out a shutdown, but doesn't see one coming Back

By Martin Matishak | 12/17/2017 10:00 AM EDT

Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin on Sunday wouldn't rule out the possibility of a federal government shutdown at the end of the week, but said he doesn't see one coming.

"I can't rule it out, but I can't imagine it occurring," he said on "Fox News Sunday."

"I would expect that both the House and Senate, Republicans and Democrats, understand if they can't agree on this they need to have another short-term extension to move this to January," Mnuchin added.

"We can't have a government shutdown in front of Christmas," he emphasized.

The government is set to run out of money Friday, unless Congress acts. Lawmakers are expected to take up a funding measure after they deal with the $1 trillion-plus tax bill early in the week.

House GOP leaders have proposed a partisan funding bill that covers a full year of defense spending at $640 billion but keeps the doors open at other federal agencies only until Jan. 19. Many of the provisions, however, likely won't pass muster in the Senate, adding to the time crunch.

Mnuchin declined to comment on what impact a shutdown might have on the U.S. economy, but said he "can't imagine sending government workers home for Christmas."

"I hope that Congress gets this done," he said.

The Treasury secretary also declined to weigh in on whether short-term funding bills is the right way to run the government.

"That's something we'll talk about more. Hopefully we'll look at reforms for different things next year," he said.

GOP leaders in House, Senate endorse conflicting shutdown strategies Back

By Rachael Bade, Seung Min Kim and Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/17/2017 06:22 PM EDT

Republican leaders in both houses of Congress face a sticky situation this week as they try to avert a government shutdown: Each side has promised its members things that will not fly in the other chamber.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) told moderate Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) he'd support passage of legislation by the end of the year to prop up Obamacare insurance markets — so long as she votes for tax reform. That addition, however, puts Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) in a pickle: His members are loath to be seen as bailing out a health care law they hate.

Ryan, meanwhile, green-lighted a short-term spending strategy that funds the Pentagon but does nothing for Democratic priorities — and suggested House members could leave town to try to "jam the Senate" into accepting their bill. But McConnell needs eight Democrats to pass anything, so the House plan is sure to fail in his chamber.

"Right now, they're just headed straight off a cliff," one person familiar with the negotiations said of the House. "[The] Senate's not likely to jump with them."

Instead of addressing the obvious inconsistencies, GOP leaders have tried to put off the issue and focus on tax reform for now. They're eager to delay internal spending fights until the tax package — which Republicans view as critical to maintaining their congressional majorities in the 2018 midterm elections — reaches the Oval Office for President Donald Trump's signature sometime this week

"It's going to be a bipartisan [spending] deal; [some House Republicans] are going to be unhappy with that — and you don't want to have the tax issues as the place they decide to retaliate," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a member of the House appropriations panel, hinting at House GOP fears that conservatives could hijack tax reform to make a stand on spending issues

But time is running out, and the GOP's tax-reform tunnel vision has left Republican leaders without a clear strategy for the spending legislation. All this is quietly raising concerns that the government could shut down after Friday, when, short of congressional action, federal coffers are set to dry up.

While Democrats have at times struggled to fend off GOP legislative efforts, this time they have leverage. Democratic leaders Nancy Pelosi of California and Chuck Schumer of New York appear to have backed off immigration demands they initially wanted addressed by the new year, but they're still adamant that any boosts in defense money be matched by increases in domestic spending.

Leaders in both chambers hoped to strike a deal to raise strict spending caps for both by Friday. But the so-called Big Four — Ryan, Pelosi, McConnell and Schumer — have yet to agree on those numbers. The most likely outcome, some Republicans now say, is kicking everything into 2018: They predict another short-term funding bill, leaving a broader spending and immigration agreement until January.

There has been some progress on the immigration front, aides say. A bipartisan group of seven senators met multiple times last week to try and hammer out an immigration deal that combines legislation for Dreamers — hundreds of thousands of whom are losing their temporary work permits and deportation protections due to actions by Trump — with other immigration enforcement measures.

The group includes Democratic Sens. Dick Durbin of Illinois and Michael Bennet of Colorado, and GOP Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, James Lankford of Oklahoma, Cory Gardner of Colorado and Thom Tillis of North Carolina. They want to be able to strike a deal on immigration they can subsequently present to their leadership.

It's unclear, however, whether Democrats will go along with pushing major issues into next year, upping the pressure on Republicans to come up with a funding proposal that can avert a shutdown.

First up this week is tax reform. House Republicans expect to pass the tax bill Tuesday morning, huddling for a rare Monday night conference to discuss the final package negotiated with Senate Republicans. After that, the Senate will take up the bill as the House sends them its "continuing resolution" through Jan. 19, which also includes Republicans' much-desired Pentagon funding boost.

The upper chamber is expected to amend the government funding bill and send it back to the House — which is where things could get ugly. Leadership sources in both chambers say the Senate version of the spending bill could include the bipartisan Obamacare stabilization effort, written by Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.), to satisfy Collins.

The White House is expected to back that approach because the tax bill repeals another part of Obamacare that conservatives despise: the requirement that everyone carry health insurance.

It's unclear, however, whether even a Trump endorsement would make the Obamacare language on the spending bill palatable to House conservatives. House GOP leaders during a Thursday afternoon conference last week began running the idea by lawmakers — but it didn't go over well. Multiple Republicans encouraged leaders to continue with the "jam the Senate" strategy rather than accepting changes made by the other chamber. GOP leaders said they needed to make sure the conference gives them "flexibility" to negotiate with the Senate.

Privately, senior Republicans say any House plan to stick the Senate with a bill it can't pass would be political suicide. They worry it could lead to a shutdown — which could backfire in the November midterms.

Even more complications could still arise for the spending legislation. Anti-abortion groups with strong connections to House conservatives have said recently that if the bill includes the Obamacare subsidies patch, they want it to also include language barring federal funding for abortions. Senate Democrats, whose votes are needed for passage, would likely push back.

"Any Member voting for the Alexander-Murray proposal, or other Obamacare stabilization legislation not covered by the Hyde amendment, would not only be voting to sustain what many have called the largest expansion of abortion since Roe v. Wade, but would also be voting to directly appropriate taxpayer dollars for insurance that includes abortion," wrote Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List, in a letter to lawmakers.

Beyond that, lawmakers also have to iron out several less-discussed policy matters that could wind up tied to the spending bill. One of those includes funding for a popular children's health insurance program whose funding has expired; another includes reauthorizing the government's surveillance authority.

A third has become more than a little contentious: a sorely needed disaster aid package for hurricane-ravaged areas in Texas, Florida, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

"We've been told time and time again by the speaker and the House leadership that the supplemental's going to be coming, but it never seems to come," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), one of the loudest voices urging for more aid for his home state, said last week. "The can always seems to be kicked down the road. It's a source of more than a little frustration on my part and I think on the entire Texas delegation."

Nonetheless, Trump administration officials and senior Republican lawmakers are publicly confident that funding for the government won't dry up — particularly three days before Christmas. Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin told "Fox News Sunday" that while he couldn't rule out the prospects of a government shutdown, "I can't imagine it occurring." And Senate GOP leaders, from McConnell on down, have been adamant that Congress will successfully avert one by the end of the week.

"I think we're determined that it's not going to happen, and it won't happen," Cornyn said late last week.

U.S. setting stage for solar trade war with China Back

By Emily Holden | 12/15/2017 05:13 PM EDT

An unreleased White House document offers the strongest hint yet that the Trump administration is laying the groundwork for punitive tariffs on Chinese-made solar power equipment — a step that would promote the president's "America First" trade agenda while sharply increasing the costs of solar power in the U.S.

The prospect of such tariffs, which President Donald Trump could announce in January, has deeply alarmed the U.S. solar installation industry. It warns that it could lose tens of thousands of jobs if the cost of solar spikes, slowing the booming growth that sun-powered energy enjoyed during the Obama administration.

But the White House is preparing to argue that trade barriers are needed to foster solar manufacturing inside the United States, something it calls important to both national security and the economy, according to a document draft obtained by POLITICO. The paper argues that cheap solar imports allow China to unfairly profit from Americans' use of renewable power and gain influence in the developing world's energy infrastructure

"While solar energy is forecast to play a larger role in the world's energy mix, other countries stand to benefit significantly more than U S workers," says the four-page paper, which is circulating within executive branch agencies for comment

Trump has not said whether he intends to initiate the trade barriers on solar equipment imports, but he has accused China of "ripping off" the U S in international trade and called for the U S to become energy dominant by hiking production of oil, natural gas and coal The new paper is likely to inspire a debate about whether the White House's rhetoric about creating U S -based solar manufacturing masks an effort to kneecap a growing, green alternative to fossil fuels such as coal — an energy source that Trump has repeatedly championed on the stump

While the administration has touted an "all of the above" energy approach, it has instead taken significant steps to bolster fossil fuels, proposing measures to give financial support to coal-fired power plants even as it works to repeal the Obama administration's climate rules for the power industry It has also pushed to grow U S exports of liquefied natural gas, and sent EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to Morocco this week to promote U S gas shipments

Trump must decide by Jan 26 whether to institute the tariffs that the U S International Trade Commission recommended last month, after two U S solar manufacturers, Suniva and SolarWorld Americas, filed complaints accusing Chinese competitors of undercutting them

Suniva, which is majority owned by a Chinese investor and is in bankruptcy, and SolarWorld, whose German parent is also in bankruptcy, say the flood of solar cells and panels from factories across Asia that are owned by Chinese companies has driven prices too low for them to compete

Suniva spokesman Mark Paustenbach welcomed the White House's approach

"Suniva applauds the Trump Administration for championing American manufacturing in the face of cheating by China and its proxies who want to kill American jobs and make America dependent on China for its energy and security needs," he said in a statement Friday

But the U S Solar Energy Industries Association has said the drop in solar panel prices has triggered a boom in sales across the U S , and establishing high tariffs could eliminate more than a third of the 260,000 solar jobs in the United States Solar energy prices have tumbled dramatically over the past decade, and large, utility-scale plants in the Southwest are cost-competitive with natural gas and coal-fired power plants now The industry fears that tariffs would reverse those cost declines, dealing a blow to project developers just as federal incentives for solar power phase out over the next four years

The companies suing have countered that they believe tariffs could result in a net increase in jobs across the solar industry

The Office of the U S Trade Representative heard from both sides at a hearing earlier this month and will soon send its own report to the White House

The White House also opposes incentives for renewable energy The paper advises against the federal and state tax incentives and mandates that have helped fuel the growth of renewable power, saying they are "subsidized by U S taxpayers," and "become overseas job creation programs "

The new White House paper says the international solar sector, "including its supply chain and critical minerals requirements, will grow in importance from an economic and energy security perspective," and it cites estimates that the global solar market will expand to $140 billion in 2023 from $65 billion in 2015 Chinese companies hold about 80 percent of the solar manufacturing capacity, although the U S is the second-largest market for solar energy, the paper says The U S has about 38,000 solar manufacturing jobs, and China has 1.5 million, it notes

The document says that depending on foreign countries for energy technology imports also jeopardizes U S energy independence and dominance

It suggests the U S could focus on advanced solar technologies, rather than current ones already dominated by other countries, but it doesn't offer any potential policies Trump has announced a review of the nuclear power sector, and the White House document says that might be necessary for solar and other energy sectors

The White House document claims China has used its "monopoly" to punish U S industries that are part of the global supply chain, including by imposing its own tariffs

U S producers "could benefit from moves designed to undermine China's monopoly over much of the sector and generate competition, including steps to revitalize U S manufacturing," it says "Yet questions remain about the scope and extent of those potential benefits, especially in the context of various policy options that, depending on the course chosen could backfire on the U S supply chain, while imposing minimal harm on Chinese state-owned enterprises "

'Time is running out' to slow climate change, Obama tells Coast Guard grads Back

By Sarah Wheaton | 05/20/2015 01:25 PM EDT

President Barack Obama delivered a somber lecture on the science of climate change to the graduates of the United States Coast Guard Academy on Wednesday as argued that global warming poses a threat to national security

Obama's call to cut carbon emissions, which emphasized the impact that Arctic ice melt would have on the Coast Guard, came just over a week after he opened Alaska's Arctic Coast to oil drilling — and about seven months ahead of a United Nations summit in Paris at which the president hopes to cement his legacy as a global leader on climate change

"Climate change constitutes a serious threat to global security, an immediate risk to our national security, and, make no mistake, it will impact how our military defends our country And so we need to act — and we need to act now," Obama told cadets at an outdoor ceremony in New London, Connecticut "After all, isn't that the true hallmark of leadership?"

Also on POLITICO

Bin Laden's 'bookshelf' included 9/11 conspiracy material

NICK GASS

Though he didn't name a political party or individual, Obama castigated "folks back in Washington who refuse to admit that climate change is real "

Or those, he added, "who will equivocate They'll say, 'I'm not a scientist ' Well, I'm not either But the best scientists in the world know that climate change is happening "

Obama cited a Pentagon's assessment that climate change is a "threat multiplier," telling cadets that they will be on the front lines in responding to an increase in climate refugees He contended that the terrorist group Boko Haram took advantage of drought in Nigeria, and that famine was a factor underlying the civil unrest in Syria

One of Congress's top climate skeptics, Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.), responded by calling Obama's threat assessment a "severe disconnect from reality."

In a statement that cited a litany of issues — including nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, the military success of the militant groups known as the Islamic State and potential chemical weapons in Syria — Inhofe continued: "The president's repeated failure to understand the real threat to our national security and inability to develop a coherent national security strategy has put this nation at an unknown level of risk with consequences that will span over decades."

Outside of the dire warnings, Obama took on a jaunty tone with the graduates, peppering his speech with inside jokes and references to "Swab Summer," "Rodeo Buffing" — "that looks dangerous," he said, noting that he saw the video — and apparent high jinks committed in campus buildings

Also on POLITICO

ADAM B. LERNER

"Which reminds me," he said, "in keeping with longstanding tradition, I hereby absolve all cadets serving restrictions for minor offenses."

But the majority of the speech was devoted to the challenges this generation of servicemembers will face, from budget cuts to shifting coastlines.

Obama also put special emphasis on a frigid region with potential to become a new global hot spot.

"We're witnessing the birth of a new ocean," Obama said, describing the effect of receding Arctic ice.

A White House report released Wednesday predicted that as "shorter shipping routes become more accessible and more profitable, increased ship traffic and human activity in the region will require that the United States be more prepared to respond to emergencies in this remote region."

Even as his administration warns about new dangers in the Arctic, his administration gave Shell the green light last week to drill for oil in the Arctic as part of its "all-of-the-above" energy strategy. The move infuriated environmental groups, who've tried to keep the Chukchi Sea off limits to the oil industry and fear a spill would be devastating to the ecosystem.

"The president has made it a real priority to deal with climate change — it's clearly part of the legacy he's building — and saying yes to drilling in the Arctic doesn't fit in that frame," said the Sierra Club's Lena Moffitt. "That's something they're going to have to reconcile."

POLITICO PRO

Full coverage of energy policy

In his speech, Obama emphasized his administration's efforts on the cleaner parts of his energy strategy, noting new standards to double the fuel efficiency of cars, strict new rules for coal-burning plants, and the military's experimentation with solar power and biofuels.

"Today we can be proud that our carbon pollution is near its lowest levels in almost two decades," Obama said, adding that he is committed to doubling the pace of cutting carbon emissions.

"There comes a point where the worst effects will be irreversible, and time is running out," Obama warned. "That's why I've committed the United States to leading the world on this challenge."

Obama is hoping to spearhead history's most sweeping agreement to curb carbon emissions at a climate conference in Paris in December which would set climate policy decades beyond his tenure.

"If you see storm clouds gathering or dangerous shoals ahead, you don't do nothing. You take action," Obama told the cadets. "Anything less would be dereliction of duty."

Meanwhile, the fate of one of the most symbolic environmental issues of Obama's presidency remains open. Asked whether the administration had completed its assessment of the environmental impact of the proposed Keystone XL pipeline, White House spokesman Eric Schultz replied: "That is a policy review that's underway at the State Department."

Tillerson: Climate change isn't 'imminent national security threat' Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 01/11/2017 05:08 PM EDT

Rex Tillerson challenged assertions that climate change is a major national security threat, arguing that the science linking global warming to destabilizing events around the world isn't conclusive.

"I don't see it as the imminent national security threat that perhaps others do," Tillerson, President-elect Donald Trump's pick for secretary of State, said during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing today.

Asked about the contention by many military officials and scientists that climate change is exacerbating droughts and extreme weather that in turn leads to international tumult, Tillerson said, "The facts on the ground are indisputable in terms of what's happening in terms of drought, disease." But he added, "The science behind the clear connection is not conclusive."

Tillerson also said that the fact that we can't predict climate change with "precision" doesn't mean we should do nothing.

The former Exxon Mobil CEO said he is opposed to pulling out of international climate talks in part because they give the United States a window into other countries' commitment to slashing emissions.

"I think we're better served by being at that table than leaving that table," Tillerson said

Congress approves spending deal lifting oil export ban Back

By Darren Goode | 12/18/2015 12:03 PM EDT

Congress sent a massive spending deal to the White House Friday that would lift the 40-year-old ban on crude oil exports while extending clean energy tax breaks and preserving President Barack Obama's ability to adhere to the commitments he made as part of the global climate deal reached in Paris this month

The oil and renewable provisions negotiated as part of the $1.1 trillion omnibus spending bill represent the most significant energy policy enacted in years, a compromise that delivered major wins to interests on either side of the ideological spectrum. The omnibus sailed through the House 316-113, with the winning votes split virtually evenly among the two parties. The omnibus was packaged with a $680 billion tax cut package that passed the House Thursday, and the combined bill cleared the Senate, 65-33.

The compromise handed a major victory to Republicans and oil-state Democrats. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) was the first to call for an end to the Ford-era ban on crude exports early last year, and the campaign quickly accelerated amid falling prices and the impending end to sanctions on Iran's oil industry. But it remains to be seen whether the ban's end will have much immediate impact, amid a global supply glut that has left prices well under $40 a barrel.

But Democrats gained a big haul in return. The deal extends and phases out the wind production tax credit until 2020, and phases down the solar investment tax credit until 2022. That should provide a bridge until the administration's Clean Power Plan takes hold to further boost demand for carbon-free power.

And notably, the bill contains no Republican riders targeting major elements of President Barack Obama's environmental and climate agenda and legacy. It leaves in place EPA greenhouse gas restrictions for power plants and its Waters of the U.S. rule, as well as Interior Department rules on hydraulic fracturing and stream buffer zone controls, among other high-profile initiatives.

The bill also does not block the administration's ability to contribute to the Green Climate Fund, the United Nations-run bank tasked with helping poor countries deal with the effects of climate change, to which Obama has pledged a total of $3 billion.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi overcame objections from progressive Democrats to lifting the oil export ban, arguing that Republicans' "desperate thirst" to do so led them to give up clean energy provisions that would "eliminate around ten times more carbon pollution than the exports of oil will add" and preserve the rest of the administration's climate agenda. In the end, just 18 House Democrats opposed the deal.

The lack of riders incensed some coal-state Republicans who said they were promised more by GOP leaders in a final deal. "I feel we were disregarded," said Rep. David McKinley (R-W. Va.), chair of the Congressional Coal Caucus, who voted against the spending deal.

House Appropriations Chairman Hal Rogers (R-Ky.) touted language directing Interior to consult with states on the stream buffer rule and an infusion of economic assistance to clean up abandoned coal mines, especially in Appalachia.

EPA funding would remain flat from last year around $8.1 billion — which Republicans noted also was the lowest level of funding for the agency since 2008. The Interior Department would receive $12 billion, more than $1 billion above last year. The Energy Department would see funding increased across its accounts. And the Army Corps of Engineers would see its budget rise 10 percent.

The White House backed the measure, noting it was "largely free of new unrelated ideological riders" and praised the wind and solar tax incentives as "driving significant reductions in carbon pollution and other dangerous air pollutants and providing certainty for investments in clean energy."

Despite these wins, the overall deal was viewed as a convoluted mixed bag, leading the League of Conservation Voters to decline to include it in its annual scorecard. Groups linked to the Koch brothers, as well as to more liberal environmental groups both opposed the deal, representing dissatisfaction on both poles of the energy-politics divide.

ZINKE JOINS FLIGHT CLUB: Turns out Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has also used military and charter airplanes while in office, including a charter plane he took to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports, citing documents and a department spokeswoman. That makes him at least the fourth member of President Donald Trump's Cabinet to bill the costs of non-commercial flights to U.S. taxpayers while in office. Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the agency selected those options because they couldn't find commercial flights that would work with Zinke's schedule and that ethics officials had given them the all-clear.

Among the most notable trips is a June 26 charter flight Zinke and several staffers took from Las Vegas to an airport about 20 minutes from his residence in Whitefish, Mont., at a cost of $12,375. Commercial flights between Vegas and Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Mont., are available for several hundred dollars, according to travel planning websites. During his time in Vegas, Zinke gave a motivational speech at an event for the city's new NHL team hosted by Bill Foley, chairman of Fidelity National Financial, a company whose employees were among Zinke's largest donors during his two congressional campaigns, according to The Washington Post, which also reports the plane Zinke flew on was owned by oil and gas executives.

Zinke and staff also took two chartered flights on March 31 from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. No other arrangements were available, according to Swift, though websites show commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars.

As for your next question: Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as HHS Secretary Tom Price said he would late Thursday. But Zinke will be at the Heritage Foundation today for what's billed as "a major policy address" entitled "A Vision for American Energy Dominance" and slated to take questions. More information here.

CAN YOU PUT A PRICE ON PRUITT'S NON-COMMERCIAL FLIGHTS? Amid growing criticism from members of both parties on Capitol Hill, EPA said late Thursday that Administrator Scott Pruitt wouldn't pay out of pocket for the $58,000 worth of non-commercial flights he and his staff have taken on four occasions, Pro's Emily Holden reports. "If a reimbursement was necessary, we would have been told during the approval process and acted accordingly," agency spokeswoman Liz Bowman said. EPA's general counsel provided ethics approvals for at least three of the four trips.

Concern from some Republicans: Lisa Murkowski expressed openness to adding language to a spending bill that would prevent Pruitt from taking private flights but hoped it wouldn't come to that, your ME host reports. "I don't think it's appropriate," Murkowski said regarding Pruitt's and Price's use of private aircraft. (We spoke to her before the Zinke news broke.) Meanwhile, Sen. Chuck Grassley asked Trump in a letter Thursday for information on what steps Cabinet secretaries are taking to ensure the "most fiscally responsible travel."

But not everyone was so concerned. EPW Chairman John Barrasso wanted more information before he could judge appropriateness of Pruitt's flights and would only commit to having him testify "this year." Barrasso and Majority Whip John Cornyn were among the Republicans who wouldn't answer the broad question of whether Cabinet officials should take private transportation. And others like Sen. Jim Inhofe defended the flights. "If there is a problem with it, then there would be a rule against it and there isn't one," Inhofe, a friend of Pruitt's, said. "That's why he checked first to make sure there wouldn't be a problem."

Meanwhile, Sen. Tom Udall, top Democrat on the Appropriations subpanel responsible for EPA spending, asked Pruitt in a letter for details on his flying habits and further information on his "privacy booth" that cost taxpayers $25,000. "I do think we can both agree that a fundamental part of any federal agency's 'core mission' must be the proper and responsible stewardship of taxpayer dollars," he wrote. And three House Democrats introduced a bill — the SWAMP FLYERS Act (points for creativity) — barring the U.S. of taxpayer funds on non-commercial travel.

PUERTO RICO STILL REELING: More than a week after Hurricane Maria struck, most of Puerto Rico remains without electricity, phone services and potable water as fuel shortages persist and supplies remain trapped at the port. Trump's Homeland Security Adviser Tom Bossert said the administration was providing "as much federal relief into Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands as we can muster," but the government sent a three-star general, Lt. Gen. Jeff Buchanan to help coordinate the response.

More aid sought now: House Democrats are banging the drums for another relief package now, according to Pro's Budget & Appropriations Brief. "This has to happen soon, not weeks from now, not in late October," Nydia Velazquez said at a press conference. "We need to see action as early as next week." But Speaker Paul Ryan said those aggressive timelines aren't what first-responders on the ground actually need and vowed to act on a disaster request once received from the White House. Meanwhile, 19 House Democrats asked the Natural Resources Committee to hold an oversight hearing on the government's response.

Three tweets from POTUS: "FEMA & First Responders are doing a GREAT job in Puerto Rico. Massive food & water delivered. Docks & electric grid dead. Locals trying.....really hard to help but many have lost their homes. Military is now on site and I will be there Tuesday. Wish press would treat fairly!...Puerto Rico is devastated. Phone system, electric grid many roads, gone. FEMA and First Responders are amazing. Governor said "great job!"

THEY MADE A DEAL! U.S. and Mexican negotiators overcame tensions between the two nations because of Trump's immigration and trade stances to address issues caused by shrinking supplies from the Colorado River, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. "Water is the lifeblood of this region," Jennifer Pitt, Colorado River Project director for the National Audubon Society, said. "It's just too important for the two countries not to have good relations over (it) and not have a plan in place about how to manage supplies reliably for that enormous population." Failing to reach a deal risked years of litigation in a crisis that would force choices between cutting off water supplies to either farms and sensitive wildlife habitats or to major population centers.

COMPANIES TWEAK SOUGHT SOLAR RELIEF: Suniva and SolarWorld USA submitted a joint brief to the International Trade Commission recommending different remedies to imported solar equipment but said that either option could be selected, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Suniva recommends a price floor for all solar modules that starts at 74 cents per watt and declines over the four years of the tariff, as well as tariffs for both modules and the solar cells. SolarWorld said it was seeking a quota of 220 MW on imported cells and 5,700 MW on imported modules. Trump has the final call on what to select.

Group: Use caution: The Advanced Energy Buyers Group released a letter Thursday asking the ITC not to set "excessive remedies" on imported solar products as it considers a response to the initial ruling last week that imports harmed U.S. manufacturers of solar panels. "We recommend a balanced approach with respect to remedies that avoids unduly increasing the cost of solar energy," they wrote. "This case has already had a damaging effect on solar projects, raising costs as solar providers prepare for shortages."

FAMED WOTUS JUDGE GETS A PROMOTION: The Senate confirmed Judge Ralph Erickson, 95-1, Thursday to a seat on 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren was the lone vote against. Among energy watchers, Erickson gained national attention when he issued a nationwide stay on the Obama-era Waters of the U.S. regulation back in 2015.

A LITTLE HELP FROM MY FRIENDS: Zinke's loaded up his advisory board on staffing and personnel issues with just political appointees, including several former industry lobbyists, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The move contradicts federal guidelines that recommend giving career employees an equal voice in such discussions with the Executive Resources Board.

EPA CONFIRMS DAMAGE TO HOUSTON-AREA SUPERFUND SITE: After confirming the protective cap on the San Jacinto River Waste Pits Superfund site sustained damage during Superfund Harvey, EPA directed International Paper and Industrial Maintenance Corporation, the potentially responsible parties at the site, to take "immediate action" to repair the damage. Sampling from one of the areas showed dioxins present at 70,000 nanograms per kilogram, far above the recommended clean up levels of 30 ng/kg.

EPW DEMOCRATS WANT SUPERFUND ANSWERS: All the EPW Democrats sent a letter to Pruitt Thursday asking him to affirm his agency would continue to reimburse Superfund litigation costs assumed by the DOJ Environment and Natural Resources Division, after the New York Times reported those payments may be on the chopping block. "If these cuts are adopted, neither EPA nor State regulators will be able to adequately fund site clean-ups or enforce clean-up agreements, and DOJ will be unable to prosecute polluters in order to compel clean-ups to be paid for by those who caused the contamination in the first place," they wrote.

FLOOD INSURANCE-LESS FAA BILL CLEARS CONGRESS: Senators stripped out controversial private flood insurance language and the House then approved a stopgap FAA measure H.R. 3823 \(115\) on Thursday, Pro Transportation's Lauren Gardner reports. A bipartisan group of senators objected to language in the original package encouraging private insurance companies to enter the flood arena. "We can't have a situation happen where people can't sell or buy property because you can't get a mortgage unless you get flood insurance, and you can't get flood insurance because there's none available that's cost-effective," Sen. Marco Rubio said.

MAIL CALL! BISHOP SEEKS REVIEW OF MINERAL WITHDRAWALS: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop sent a letter to Zinke and USDA Secretary Sonny Perdue asking for them to review mineral withdrawals done over the past eight years of the Obama administration. "Millions of acres of federal lands were inappropriately withdrawn from mineral access due to false premises of environmental protectionism and the intentional misuse of statutory authority," he wrote.

PELOSI CRITICIZES TIMING OF BILL WITH GUN MEASURE: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi criticized the House GOP for pushing a sportsmen's package with a provision that relaxes rules on purchasing gun silencers — expected to come up for a vote shortly — so soon after welcoming back House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, POLITICO's Heather Caygle reports. "This is not a sportsmen's package. This is an NRA wish list," a spokesman for Pelosi said. No date for a vote has yet been announced.

NOT MINCING WORDS: Former FWS biologist Felix Smith, who in the 1980s blew the whistle on the mass poisoning of migratory birds in California's Kesterson National Wildlife Refuge, sent an angry email to Zinke Wednesday blaming him for any pushback he is getting from staff. Interior Secretary Zinke traveled on charter, military planes Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/28/2017 07:54 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides have taken several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, according to documents and a department spokeswoman.

Zinke is at least the fourth senior member of the Trump administration to have used non-commercial planes at taxpayer expense, along with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and HHS Secretary Tom Price. President Donald Trump has fumed at Price's pricey travel, and Democrats say the revelations demonstrate a cavalier attitude by Cabinet members toward excessive spending.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said Zinke's charter or military plane trips were booked only after officials were unable to find commercial flights that would accommodate Zinke's schedule, and that all were "pre-cleared by career officials in the ethics office." Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as Price plans to do for some of the $400,000 tab he racked up on charter flights.

On June 26, a Beechcraft King Air 200 carried Zinke and several staffers from Las Vegas to Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Mont., about a 20-minute drive from Zinke's home in Whitefish, according to his official schedule. The flight cost $12,375, Swift said.

Zinke left after speaking at an event for the city's new professional hockey team, the "Vegas Golden Knights Development Camp Dinner," according to his schedule. Earlier in the day, he had been in Pahrump, Nev., for an announcement related to public lands.

Zinke's flight left Las Vegas at 8:30 p.m. PST and landed around 1:30 a.m. MST in Kalispell. The secretary stayed overnight at his residence, Interior documents show.

Las Vegas is one of the main connecting airports for commercial flights to Glacier International. Commercial flights between the two cities are available for several hundred dollars a ticket, according to travel planning websites.

In Whitefish, Zinke attended the Western Governors' Association's annual meeting, where he spoke for about 20 minutes without taking questions. He then had a private lunch with association members. In the afternoon Zinke was the subject of a photo shoot with GQ magazine at Lake McDonald and fished while being interviewed by Outside Magazine, the records show.

Zinke and staffers flew commercial back to Washington, D.C., the next day, according to the records.

The trip was not the first in which Interior booked a private jet for Zinke. On March 31, Interior chartered two flights to take Zinke and staff from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. Another two flights were chartered to return to St. Croix later that night.

Swift said she did not know how much the flights cost but that no other arrangements were available.

Commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars, according to travel booking websites.

In May, Zinke and his wife, Lolita, used a military aircraft to travel to Norway. From there, they flew on a military plane to Alaska for events organized by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The trip included charter planes to travel within Alaska, a common occurrence in the large, remote state. The Zinkes paid for Lolita's share of the trip, the full cost of which was not immediately available, Swift said.

Zinke also took a military helicopter from Fort Bliss to review the Organ Mountains monument in New Mexico in June, and he used a Bureau of Land Management helicopter to review the Basin and Range National Monument on July 30. "It is difficult to survey a half-million-acre piece of land with few roads by foot or car in an hour and a half," Swift said.

Along with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke took a military plane to Ravalli County, Mont., to check on wildfires in the area in August. "The military plane was used because of a very tight travel window, with no viable commercial airline options to transport two secretaries, security details, and associated USDA, Forest Service and Interior staff to Missoula in the time required," said USDA spokesman Tim Murtaugh. The cost of the flight was not immediately available, but the two agencies plan to reimburse the Air Force, Murtaugh said.

Price says he'll repay taxpayers for his private jet travel Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 09/28/2017 04:23 PM EDT

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price said he will write a personal check to the federal government for his costs of traveling on private jets and will permanently halt his use of charter flights.

"The taxpayers won't pay a dime for my seat on those planes," Price said in a statement Thursday afternoon.

The announcement follows a POLITICO investigation that found Price has taken at least 26 charter flights costing taxpayers more than $400,000 since May to conduct official business within the country. Price's travel, which was first reported over a week ago, has increasingly come under fire from President Donald Trump and former colleagues in Congress.

HHS confirmed to several media outlets that Price will write a check to the U.S. Treasury worth $51,887.31 — just a fraction of the total travel costs. The department did not confirm those details to POLITICO, which broke the story of his chartered flights. HHS did not address the costs of the staff and security officials who accompanied Price on those flights.

Price, whose use of private jets is being investigated by the HHS inspector general and Congress, said he will no longer charter flights for official business. "No exceptions," he said.

President Donald Trump on Wednesday wouldn't commit to keeping Price in his administration, saying only "we'll see" when asked whether Price would be fired. Trump has privately fumed over Price's use of expensive charter jets, and some aides have called for firing Price. Hours before Price's announcement, the White House on Thursday said it had ordered HHS to halt all private flights.

"As the president said yesterday, he's not thrilled — certainly not happy with the actions," White House press Secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said.

Many of Price's flights were between major cities that offered inexpensive alternatives on commercial airlines, including Nashville, Philadelphia and San Diego. On some of those trips, Price mixed official business with personal affairs.

Price's statement came after increasing scrutiny from the Hill. The House Oversight Committee on Wednesday launched a bipartisan investigation into the use of private planes by all Cabinet secretaries. Sen. Chuck Grassley on Thursday sent a letter asking the White House to rein in officials' travel costs.

Price's decision to reimburse just the costs of just his airfare is unlikely to satisfy Democratic lawmakers, who've ripped him for lavishly spending taxpayer dollars while advocating for major cuts to health insurance programs covering low-income Americans.

"Until @SecPriceMD has paid back the full amount of his private jet flights he is still ripping off taxpayers," tweeted Sen. Ron Wyden, the top Democrat on the Finance Committee.

Price, who appeared at a White House event on opioid abuse with First Lady Melania Trump on Thursday, gave no indication that he planned to step down amid the outcry over his private travel. Earlier in the day, Price told reporters he believed the president still supported him, but he later refused to say whether he was worried about losing his job.

"I work at the pleasure of the president," Price said on Fox News, adding that he hopes to "regain the trust" of the American people and those working in the administration. Price said he's complying with the inspector general's review and contended that all his trips passed legal review.

Other Cabinet officials' travel has also come under recent scrutiny. Department auditors are reviewing private and military flights taken Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt

Price, who represented Georgia for more than a decade in the House, has a longstanding reputation as a fiscal hawk and a staunch opponent of Obamacare. As a former chair of the House Budget Committee, he proposed federal spending plans that would have repealed the 2010 health law and culled hundreds of billions from health care entitlement programs. During his time as secretary, Price backed the White House's proposal to cut $6 billion from the National Institutes of Health and slash overall HHS spending by 18 percent. Congress has opposed those cuts.

On Thursday, Price said he regretted the concerns that his travel practices has raised.

"All of my political career I've fought for the taxpayers," Price said. "It is clear to me that in this case, I was not sensitive enough to my concern for the taxpayer."

Pruitt won't cover costs for private flights Back

By Emily Holden | 09/28/2017 06:48 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt doesn't plan to pay out of pocket for the $58,000 worth of non-commercial flights he and his staff have taken on four occasions, according to an agency spokeswoman.

Pruitt has taken three private government flights and one chartered plane. EPA has said those flights represented the only travel options for reaching scheduled events in time, including taking an Air Force plane to New York at a cost of $36,068.50 to travel to events ahead of an international energy ministers' meeting in Italy. The agency received ethics approvals from EPA's acting general counsel for three of the four trips.

"If a reimbursement was necessary, we would have been told during the approval process and acted accordingly," agency spokeswoman Liz Bowman said.

HHS Secretary Tom Price today said he would write a personal check to the federal government to cover the cost of his seat on private jet flights that cost more than $400,000 since May.

Senate Republicans offer mixed reviews on Pruitt's pricey plane trips Back

By Anthony Adragna | 09/28/2017 05:14 PM EDT

Senate Republicans were split Thursday over whether to condemn, defend or sidestep questions about EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's expensive use of charter and military planes.

Lisa Murkowski, who oversees the Appropriations subpanel responsible for EPA funding, said she was open to adding language to a spending bill that would prevent Pruitt from taking private flights, after reports this week revealed EPA spent more than $58,000 for charter flights on private or government-owned planes. But the Alaska Republican said she hopes it doesn't come to that.

"I don't think it's appropriate," Murkowski said regarding Pruitt's and HHS Secretary Tom Price's use of private aircraft. "That is clearly something that the executive reins in. You tell your people, 'Look, there's no charter flights.' You set the standard. You set what is acceptable. And I think that should be done."

Pruitt used non-commercial flights during trips to Oklahoma, North Dakota and Colorado, as well as to ensure he made a connecting flight to an energy ministers meeting in Italy. The agency's general counsel signed off on the trips, though their high cost has drawn criticism as the Trump administration seeks to slash the agency's budget by one-third.

But not everyone was ready to criticize the trips.

Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.), the former Environment and Public Works chairman and a friend of Pruitt, defended the administrator's flights.

"If there is a problem with it, then there would be a rule against it and there isn't one," Inhofe told POLITICO in an interview. "That's why he checked first to make sure there wouldn't be a problem."

Current EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) said he was "going to wait and see what comes out" before weighing in on the appropriateness of Pruitt's flights. He did not commit to holding a hearing on the issue, saying only that Pruitt would testify before the committee sometime this year.

Asked if it was generally appropriate for Cabinet officials to take private aircraft, or if he would have similarly held off criticism if it were an Obama administration official involved, Barrasso said, "I want to see what the information is." He added, "With Cabinet members, sometimes it's the only way to get from place to place."

Other Republicans declined to answer the broad question of whether Cabinet officials should take private transportation or said they were unaware of the details of Price and Pruitt's travel. "Good to talk with all of you," Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) told reporters when asked if Cabinet officials should fly in private jets.

Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), meanwhile, said he has more questions about Pruitt's and Price's plane tabs. Grassley sent a letter to President Donald Trump requesting information on what steps Cabinet secretaries are taking to ensure the "most fiscally responsible travel."

Democrats demanded a full accounting of the trips and wanted to know if Trump officials are getting different treatment than Obama Cabinet members.

"I wonder why Scott Pruitt is different from [former EPA Administrator] Gina McCarthy in terms of his needs," Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) said. "Whatever they need [in terms of security], I think we ought to give it to them, but they shouldn't get anything more than they need."

Tom Carper (D-Del.), top Democrat on EPW, called for Pruitt to testify in the near future.

"This is one of those situations where the best disinfectant is sunshine," Carper said.

House Democrats want White House briefing on Puerto Rico Back

By Heather Caygle | 09/28/2017 02:02 PM EDT

House Democrats want top Trump administration officials to brief the caucus as soon as possible on what lawmakers say has been the White House's anemic response to the devastation in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.) on Thursday invited White House Chief of Staff John Kelly and acting Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke to come speak to the caucus, according to a letter obtained by POLITICO.

"We are deeply concerned by the unfolding humanitarian crisis in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands as a result of the recent devastating hurricanes, and what has seemed to be an inadequate response by the federal government to date," wrote Crowley and several other Democrats with close ties to Puerto Rico.

"Natural disasters know no political bounds and have no party affiliations. That is why a meeting between the both of you and the House Democratic Caucus is needed," they added.

Democrats also say they're concerned by reports that the White House might not send Congress a formal request for disaster aid until several weeks from now, something lawmakers say is unacceptable given the state of the two U.S. territories.

Puerto Rico remains without power and many of its 3.5 million U.S. citizens have limited access to basic human necessities including food and clean water. The U.S. Virgin Islands and its more than 100,000 inhabitants were also devastated by the storm.

Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle have chided the Trump administration for what they say is an indefensibly slow response to help the territories after they were devastated by Hurricanes Irma and Maria.

The White House said Thursday it would temporarily grant Puerto Rico a reprieve from the Jones Act, a decades-old law that blocks non-U.S. ships from transporting goods to the island.

The Trump administration denied a similar request two days ago, with the president telling reporters Wednesday that the shipping industry had objected to granting the waiver.

But some Democrats criticized the move saying the waiver — which will last for 10 days — doesn't provide nearly enough time for supplies to get to the island to start the rebuilding process. DHS has said the waiver can be extended if necessary.

Democrats, in the letter, inviting Kelly and Duke, say the administration should also be sending telecommunication supplies to Puerto Rico to restore phone service and refrigeration units for food and medicine.

"We also cannot forget that residents of Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands are citizens of the United States, and they are deserving of our federal government's full attention and resources," the lawmakers wrote.

Other members who signed the letter include House Democratic Caucus Vice Chair Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.), Reps. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.), José Serrano (D-N.Y.), Luis Gutiérrez (D-Ill.), Darren Soto (D-Fla.) and U.S. Virgin Island Delegate Stacey Plaskett.

U.S., Mexico set aside Trump tensions for Colorado River deal Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/29/2017 05:02 AM EDT

The water-sharing pact signed this week by the U.S. and Mexico emerged despite tensions caused by President Donald Trump's policies on immigration and trade, showing the negotiators' willingness to take on problems caused by shrinking supplies from the Colorado River, according to western water experts.

That deal signed Wednesday was supported by state water agencies and major users in both countries, and sets out procedures to reduce off-take during times of drought that are expected to persist for the foreseeable future.

"Water is the lifeblood of this region," Jennifer Pitt, Colorado River Project director for the National Audubon Society, said in an interview. "It is fundamentally important to the economies of southwestern U.S. and northwestern Mexico. ... It's just too important for the two countries not to have good relations over [it] and not have a plan in place about how to manage supplies reliably for that enormous population."

Representatives from the International Boundary and Water Commission of the United States and Mexico signed the pact, called Minute 323, that largely carries forward for another nine years a prior agreement that was due to expire this year. Water levels at the Colorado River's most important reservoir, Lake Mead, have been plummeting, and both the U.S. and Mexico could have faced the threat of mandatory supply cuts starting as early as next year.

The river supplies drinking water to tens of millions of people in both countries and irrigation for millions of acres of agriculture, both of which would suffer unless the countries reached a deal.

Federal officials failed to sign a deal before the end of the Obama administration, raising fears that Trump's calls to build a wall along the Mexican border and the reopening of NAFTA would undo years of progress in the negotiations. But the officials, supported by state water agencies and Mexico water license holders, knew they had to reach a deal or risk years of litigation in a crisis that would force them to choose between cutting off water supplies to farms and sensitive wildlife habitats or to major population centers.

"In a crisis, you would have winners and losers, and some of the biggest losers would be agriculture and the environment," said Ted Kowalski, director of the Colorado River initiative at the Walton Family Foundation. "I think it's highly unlikely the Bureau of Reclamation is going to turn off the city of Las Vegas or the city of Phoenix."

So the officials continued plodding away at negotiations, hoping the Trump administration would in the end agree to a deal.

The water agency officials were "largely insulated from the political conversation between Washington, D.C., and Mexico," said Chuck Cullom, Colorado River programs manager for the Central Arizona Project. The water managers "focused on providing the greatest benefits for the country and the communities ... rather than the political winds that might be blowing in a number of directions," he said in an interview.

The basin states made reaching a deal a top priority this year, according to Pitt.

"There's a long-standing balance of power between the states and the federal government on the Colorado River where the federal government tries to as much as possible defer to the states, who are really the owners of the water. So as the states made it clear to the incoming administration this was a priority, the administration said, 'We will support you on this,'" she said.

A key sticking point in the negotiations had been Mexico's insistence that the lower basin states of California, Arizona and Nevada first agree to a drought contingency plan under which they would voluntarily conserve additional water beyond mandatory cuts in order to increase reservoir levels.

Mexico officials were worried they would be left holding the bag if a water crisis occurred before the states reached a deal. But Mexico eventually agreed to make additional cuts once the states pass a contingency plan.

Mexico is very dependent on the upstream dams in the U.S. for its water delivery, since a 2010 earthquake damaged its dams. But Mexico also took the position that the original 1944 treaty between the countries only required it to cut supplies if the U.S. suffered extreme drought, a vague term that left too much open to interpretation.

"That was a big concession for Mexico to follow our lead," said Tom Buschatzke, director of the Arizona Department of Water Resources. But the U.S. also agreed to fund $31.5 million in water efficiency projects in Mexico through 2026 and to explore the possibility of investing in a desalinization plant that could help address future water supply challenges.

What made the deal possible is "the hard work that long preceded Trump," said Stephen Mumme, a political science professor at Colorado State University. "This is a classic example of ... a situation where not doing it could be really costly, and the sheer complexity of the number of players and the importance of the U.S. stake in this policy arena really overrode the Trump administration," he said.

"It's a good example in my mind of the limits of rhetorical breast beating and name calling and wall building."

Suniva, SolarWorld modify remedy proposal in trade case Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/28/2017 07:20 PM EDT

Suniva and SolarWorld USA are pressing a U.S. trade panel to recommend that President Donald Trump institute either a floor price for imported solar equipment or tariffs plus a quota that caps the amount of solar panels and cells that can enter the country.

The two solar panel manufacturers filed a joint brief to the U.S. International Trade Commission, and each recommended different remedies, though they said that either option could be selected.

Suniva recommends a price floor for all solar modules that starts at 74 cents per watt and declines over the four years of the tariff, as well as tariffs for both modules and the solar cells. SolarWorld said it was seeking a quota of 220 MW on imported cells and 5,700 MW on imported modules.

"Both co-petitioners agree that an effective remedy must include either the co-petitioners' requested tariff plus Suniva's requested module floor price or the co-petitioners' requested tariff plus SolarWorld's requested quota," the companies said in a joint statement.

Briefs were due on Wednesday to the ITC, and the companies publicly released their proposals to today, excluding proprietary company information.

The ITC voted unanimously last week that low-cost imports had harmed the domestic solar manufacturing industry. Under the "safeguard" provisions of the Trade Act, Trump will have the final say in what tariffs to impose.

WHAT'S NEXT: The commission will have a hearing on remedies on Oct. 3.

Zinke stacks staffing board with political aides, former lobbyists Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/28/2017 03:41 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has assigned only political appointees, including several former industry lobbyists, as members of an advisory board on staffing and personnel issues, a move critics say sidelines members of the government workforce who are supposed to get a seat at the table.

The makeup of the Executive Resources Board contradicts federal guidelines that recommend giving career employees an equal voice in such discussions, and it is fueling criticism Zinke is crowding out independent experts and giving too much voice to the industries his department oversees.

The nine-member board is being led by Deputy Secretary of the Interior David Bernhardt, a former lobbyist whose clients included oil and gas interests; Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason, who worked energy issues for Kelly, Anderson & Associates, Inc.; and White House liaison Lori Mashburn, among other political staff with history of lobbying for the oil and gas industry.

Zinke established the board to "oversee all aspects of the management of executive resources," including senior managers, scientists and policy staff at the department, according to an Aug. 11 memo.

"This is very much of a pattern," said Chris Saeger, executive director of the Western Values Project, which obtained the memo through a Freedom of Information Act request and shared it with POLITICO. "They have made a practice of shuffling career staff, marginalizing them. They're sending a very clear message, that they want to consolidate power with people who are loyal to Zinke and President. "

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift did not answer questions about why Zinke included only political appointees as members of the ERB. She did point out that two career employees, acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for Human Capital and Diversity Mary Pletcher and Deputy Solicitor for General Law Ed Keable, will serve as advisers to the board.

Zinke came under fire earlier this week when he questioned the loyalty of many Interior staffers, and he has previously raised eyebrows for shuffling senior employees into jobs they did not seem suited for, in one instance reassigning a manager overseeing climate change issues to a job collecting oil and gas royalties. Interior's inspector general has launched an investigation into the staff moves.

The secretary's decision does not comport with recommendations from the Office of Personnel Management, which has suggested that such boards consist of a mix of career staff, senior executive staff and political staff.

"It is not advisable to have an ERB that is exclusively or predominantly career executives, nor is it recommended to have an ERB that is exclusively or predominantly political appointees; both perspectives should be well represented to ensure a balanced view, when possible," OPM said in a 2009 report.

House clears FAA stopgap, avoiding shutdown Back

By Lauren Gardner | 09/28/2017 04:24 PM EDT

Congress Thursday voted to extend the FAA's tax authority for six months after senators jettisoned private flood insurance language that had threatened the bill's chances, with just days before portions of the FAA's authorities were set to lapse.

After wrangling between the House and Senate over the flood insurance language, Congress wrapped the measure, H.R. 3823 \(115\), up two days before the FAA's authority to collect and spend excise taxes was set to expire.

Allowing that authority to lapse would have led to a partial shutdown of the FAA, affecting the agency's airport funding, equipment and research and development functions and leading to the furlough of thousands of employees. (Air traffic control and safety operations would have continued, albeit without pay for the employees.)

The House was forced to act a third time on the measure after a bipartisan group of senators objected to the original package's language encouraging private insurance companies to enter the flood arena.

While some of those members support changes to the National Flood Insurance Program, they've argued that any effort to promote a private market should be considered as part of broader legislation that addresses the existing federal program.

"We can't have a situation happen where people can't sell or buy property because you can't get a mortgage unless you get flood insurance, and you can't get flood insurance because there's none available that's cost-effective," Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) said.

Thursday wasn't the first time this week the House had to take a mulligan on the extension bill.

GOP leaders put the legislation, which also includes tax relief provisions for victims of recent hurricanes and extensions for certain health care programs, on the suspension calendar Monday, meaning they needed two-thirds of lawmakers present to vote in favor of the bill for it to pass. But Democrats revolted, and the vote came up short.

House leaders then tweaked the bill to broaden eligibility for tax breaks to U.S. citizens in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands — addressing a criticism lobbed by Democrats — and prepared it for a quick floor debate where only a simple majority was needed for passage; it succeeded.

But senators who are active on NFIP policy began agitating against the House bill, with Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune conceding Thursday evening that his colleagues would likely change the bill and kick it back to the House.

House leaders had left themselves some breathing room for such a scenario through the way the rule governing debate on their bill was crafted. But it wasn't clear whether the Senate would try to jam the House until Thursday afternoon, when leadership surveyed lawmakers on whether they would object to an FAA extension that dropped the flood insurance language.

While this week's drama over the FAA extension was tied to policy outside the aviation space, House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.) is still gunning for a massive overhaul of the FAA's air traffic control operations.

His broader bill, H.R. 2997 \(115\), which would strip those functions from the agency and put them under the control of a nonprofit corporation, could get a floor vote next month, provided he rounds up enough support.

Pruitt taps New York lawmaker for EPA Region 2 job Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/28/2017 11:27 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has picked New York Assembly member Pete Lopez to run EPA's Region 2 office, which covers New York and New Jersey — as well as the hurricane-devastated Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands.

Both territories suffered significant damage to their electric and water systems, with an estimated 42 percent of Puerto Ricans without access to potable water, according to the FEMA.

Lopez, a Republican, has been in the state assembly since 2007 and currently represents a district southwest of Albany. He ran to replace Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.) but dropped out of the race early last year.

"His familiarity with the region and his experience working to solve environmental problems in New York will be invaluable in helping EPA serve Americans in the Northeast and the Caribbean," Pruitt said in a statement.

Judith Enck, the Obama administration's previous Region 2 chief, told the Times Union that Lopez "cares about the environment" and is "is as good as it's going to get in this administration."

Subject: Morning Energy: Biofuel, refiner backers seek deal at White House — Pruitt pushes LNG in Morocco — Murkowski upbeat on ANWR's fate in tax plan
Date: Wednesday, December 13, 2017 5:47:44 AM

By Anthony Adragna | 12/13/2017 05:45 AM EDT

With help from Emily Holden, Alex Guillén, Eric Wolff, Ben Lefebvre and Sara Stefanini

LET'S MAKE A DEAL? The White House is hoping it can get out of a bind between its oil industry supporters and its agricultural supporters by bringing representatives for the two groups together today for a preliminary meeting on a grand bargain for the Renewable Fuel Standard, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Refiners, with some backing from unions, say they're drowning under heavy RFS compliance costs, and the biofuel industry insists it needs the mandates in the RFS to keep expanding and to grow advanced biofuels.

Who's attending? Aides from the pro-ethanol Sens. Chuck Grassley, Joni Ernst and Deb Fischer will be there for the corn-state contingent, while staffers for Sens. Ted Cruz and Pat Toomey will make the case for refiners. Staff from EPA, the Department of Agriculture and the National Economic Council will also join.

What about Congress? Sen. Jim Inhofe declined Tuesday to offer any details on the plan he and Sen. John Cornyn are working on to address the issue, but said it would have to address the exploding cost of buying biofuel credits that EPA uses to ensure refiners are blending the required amounts of biofuel into the nation's fuel supply. "The RIN values are a huge consideration because you're talking about millions and millions. And it wasn't meant to be that way. Anytime you have a value system that jumps around from eight cents to 800 dollars, that shows it's a broken system," Inhofe said.

Important context: Senators like Grassley are desperate to get Bill Northey, the nominee to be USDA undersecretary for farm production and conservation, confirmed since he'll play a crucial role in crafting the farm bill that lawmakers are three months behind schedule in drafting, Pro Agriculture's Catherine Boudreau reports. Cruz, who was upbeat after last week's meeting but declined comment on Northey, placed a hold on his selection recently after corn-state Republicans extracted concessions from EPA on the RFS.

Can there be a bargain, grand or petite? Ethanol producers have been deeply skeptical of any kind of deal to be made with the oil industry, which they feel wants to squeeze them out of the fuels market if at all possible. But it's not even clear what parameters there are for a deal. University of Illinois economist Scott Irwin said on Twitter, the mandates in the RFS drive up RIN costs. You can't push down RIN costs without undermining the mandates. "There is no 'win-win' on the RFS concerning mandates and RINs," he wrote in a thread. "Lower RINs prices go with lower mandates and vice versa. Straightforward economics."

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and API's Khary Cauthen was first to identify Erskine Bowles as the former White House chief of staff who lost consecutive Senate bids in North Carolina. NO MOORE: Sen.-elect Doug Jones shocked the political world by winning the Senate election in ruby-red Alabama on Tuesday evening, but it's worth pointing out he ran on a pretty progressive platform on environmental and climate change issues. His website says he "believe[s] in science" and opposed Trump's decision to leave the Paris accord. One thing to watch now is the committee shuffle: outgoing Sen. Luther Strange will vacate a spot on the Energy Committee (so some other Republican will get it).

HERE'S LOOKING AT YOU, PRUITT: EPA revealed Tuesday night that Administrator Scott Pruitt has been in Morocco this week promoting "the potential benefit of liquefied natural gas imports on Morocco's economy," as well as U.S.-Moroccan environmental cooperation. Pruitt's visit included a meeting with Morocco's energy minister to "discuss new and ongoing areas of collaboration under the Free Trade Agreement and the country's interest in importing LNG," according to EPA. The agency said he also met with top foreign affairs and justice officials. Morocco produces little natural gas and relies heavily on imports, although it also plans a major expansion of solar and wind power, according to the Energy Information Administration.

ROUNDUP FROM PARIS: The private sector took the center stage at the One Planet Summit in Paris Tuesday to show what they're willing and able to close the €179.6 billion ($210.9 billion) a year gap between the investment needed to fulfill the goals of the Paris climate agreement and what's foreseen in policies adopted so far. POLITICO Europe's Sara Stefanini with the roundup and here's a sampling of the goings on:

— Moving on from Trump: Six months after Trump announced he wanted to leave the Paris agreement, the world is going ahead without him. "If we're here, so many of us today, it's because we've decided not to accept America's decision," French President Emmanuel Macron said in a speech. Former U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry agreed when asked if non-state actors can make up for a lack of federal leadership: "It is possible, yes," he told reporters.

— Carbon pricing in the Americas: Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Mexico, the governors of California and Washington and the premiers of Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec launched a cooperative framework on carbon pricing.

— ING ditches coal: Dutch bank ING said that by the end of 2025 it will quit financing utilities that are over 5 percent reliant on coal-fired power in their energy mix. The bank already does not finance companies that are over 10 percent reliant on coal — up from ING's pre-Paris threshold of 50 percent. Greenpeace applauded the latest announcement.

YOU CAN'T DO THAT! Democrats vowed to keep a watchful eye after GAO found the Trump administration illegally withheld $91 million budgeted for the Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program earlier this year, your ME host reports. Top Senate Energy Democrat Maria Cantwell said in a statement: "The President cannot ignore statutory requirements or funding direction provided by Congress. I expect nothing less than Secretary [Rick] Perry's full compliance with the law." DOE ultimately relented and released all the funds.

AROUND CONGRESS — EPW LOOKS AT NRC: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee gavel in at 9:45 a.m. to vote on R.D. James' nomination to run the Army Corps of Engineers and then holds an oversight hearing on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission immediately afterwards. Watch here.

Looking at solar energy deployment: A House Science subcommittee holds a hearing at 2 p.m. entitled "Advancing Solar Energy Technology: Research Trumps Deployment." Witnesses include: Daniel Simmons, principal deputy assistant secretary with DOE's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy and Martin Keller, director of the National Renewable Energy Laboratory. Watch here.

Natural Resources holds mega-markup: Lawmakers on House Natural Resources Committee hold a markup of 15 bills today at 10 a.m. More information here.

Examining the future of North American energy trade: The House Energy and Natural Resources Energy Subcommittee holds a hearing entitled "The Impacts and Future of North American Energy Trade." Witnesses representing the National Association of Manufacturers, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers and Resources for the Future appear. Background memo and watch here.

Congressional Democrats, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, rally at 10:30 a.m. to push lawmakers to protect pensions, including those of retired miners, from cuts as they weigh end-of-year spending legislation.

INTERIOR STAFF SHUFFLE INVITES LAWSUIT: Interior Department employee Matt Allen has filed a FOIA lawsuit in an effort to determine why he and other senior employees were suddenly transferred earlier this year. Interior's Inspector General's office is already investigating Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's plans to shuffle dozens of Senior Executive Service employees, and another now-former employee filed a complaint with the Office of Special Counsel and a lawsuit after being reassigned. Allen, who became a BLM spokesman in the waning days of the Obama administration, was reassigned to a public affairs position at BSEE in September. "My client's demotion reeks of reprisal, and these documents will provide us the tools we require to prove that," plaintiff's lawyer Katherine Atkinson said in a press release. An Interior spokesperson was not immediately available to comment.

NOT GIVING UP: Senate EPW Chairman John Barrasso told ME Tuesday he's not giving up on Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemicals office even as Republican defections have put a damper on his confirmation prospects. "It's a question of how Sen. McConnell chooses to prioritize them," the Wyoming Republican said, downplaying the challenges facing Dourson, a former industry-funded toxicologist.

CURTAINS FOR GARRETT? Former New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett, Trump's pick to run the Export-Import Bank, is likely to have his nomination blocked after Sen. Mike Rounds came out against his selection on Tuesday, Pro Financial Services' Zachary Warmbrodt reports. "I believe him to be a proponent of the abolition of the bank rather than a reformer of the bank," Rounds said. "I'm looking for reformers, not abolitionists." Garrett's selection has been roundly criticized by the business community. The Senate Banking Committee has 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats, so Rounds' defection would sink the selection in committee.

MURKOWSKI UPBEAT ON ANWR'S PROSPECTS: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski told ME Tuesday she's optimistic language opening ANWR to oil and gas drilling will make it into the final Republican tax package H.R. 1 \(115\), even though a dozen of her House colleagues oppose its inclusion. "I'm feeling pretty good about where we are with ANWR right now," she said. "We just need to make sure that we're able to come together as conferees and get a package that both bodies can support."

Speaking of which, Conservation Voters of Pennsylvania and PennFuture are running a full page ad in the Philadelphia Inquirer today urging Republican Reps. Pat Meehan, Ryan Costello and Brian Fitzpatrick to vote against any final tax package that contains ANWR drilling. You'll remember they were three of the 12 House Republicans who said in the letter they opposed opening the Arctic area to oil and gas drilling.

Murkowski also said she wasn't ready to weigh in on whether Zinke's use of helicopters to attend Washington area events, like a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, was appropriate until she got more information. "I think we all recognize that there is a responsibility that we have as lawmakers, when you're using the taxpayer dollar, that you do so in a responsible way and something that's not wasteful," she said. "But I also understand that there are sometimes requirements of the job that require you to perhaps take a different mode of transportation."

And she told your ME host she hadn't been following the ongoing battle between Patagonia and Zinke, but that she too had been irked by the outdoor clothing giant's advocacy for barring drilling in ANWR last year. "Last Christmas, I actually looked at the Patagonia catalog that came to my house," Murkowski said. "I didn't think they were marketing their outdoor clothing. It was a full on effort to build support for turning ANWR into wilderness ... It was enough to get me, as a consumer, riled up enough to say 'I'm not buying Patagonia products.'"

"While this is most definitely not what Dominion wanted and gives opponents of the pipeline more time to push for rejection, the [Virginia State Water Control Board] should have rejected the certificate outright," Lorne Stockman with Oil Change International said in a statement.

SOLAR FOR SAMARITANS: EPA says it's partnering with the non-governmental organizations in Puerto Rico to provide generators or solar panels to run drinking water pumps and wells that supply water to 3 percent of the population and are not managed by the island's government. EPA and other U.S. and Puerto Rican agencies are working with Water Mission, Samaritan's Purse, Project Hope and RCAP Solutions. Solar panels have been installed in four communities and will be provided to four more before Christmas, EPA said in a press release.

More than two months after Hurricane Maria hit, about 43 percent of island residents didn't have power and 17 percent didn't have drinkable water, according to statistics issued on November 20 by the U.S. territory's government. The Natural Resources Defense Council finds that, according to government test results, more than two-thirds of the population was at potential risk of exposure to bacterial contamination in water systems.

White House to host Senate staff for biofuels talks Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/12/2017 04:16 PM EDT

The White House will host a meeting Wednesday with Senate staffers in the hopes of striking a deal between oil refiners and biofuel producers who have clashed over the Renewable Fuel Standard, sources tell POLITICO.

A White House aide confirmed the meeting would take place. Sources said it's a preliminary conversation intended to explore whether a deal can be reached to both help refiners, who say they are struggling with the costs of complying with the RFS, and continue supporting the biofuel industry that has matured under the RFS.

Industry sources and Republican Senate aides say that staff for pro-ethanol Sens. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) will attend, and aides to Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and Pat Toomey (R-Pa.) will be there to represent refiners. Staff from EPA, the Department of Agriculture, and the National Economic Council will also join the meeting.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) said her staff would also be attending the meeting, which was first reported by Reuters.

Midwestern senators scored a win when they forced EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to backtrack on efforts to alter parts of the RFS, but Cruz forced the White House to get involved after he put a hold on Bill Northey, who is up for a USDA undersecretary position.

Grassley: Senate Ag is 3 months behind in drafting farm bill Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 12/12/2017 11:10 AM EDT

Sen. Chuck Grassley said today that senators are three months behind schedule in drafting the next farm bill and that he had previously anticipated the Agriculture Committee would have advanced legislation before Christmas.

"We can't horse around any longer," Grassley told reporters during a conference call, adding that the farm bill should be finished in the first half of next year so producers have predictability.

Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts, during an interview on C-SPAN on Sunday, said he is aiming to have the panel finish a farm bill "blueprint" by February and to bring the measure to the Senate floor in early spring.

A factor that could thwart progress on drafting the farm bill is the uncertainty surrounding Bill Northey, the nominee to be USDA undersecretary for farm production and conservation, who has not been confirmed, Grassley said.

Northey, the Iowa agriculture secretary, continues to see his nomination held by Sen. Ted Cruz. He would oversee three agencies that implement key farm bill programs, including loans, commodity subsidies, crop insurance and conservation.

Cruz placed a hold on Northey in retaliation after corn-state lawmakers — Grassley included — used political power to stymie a recent effort by the EPA to weaken the Renewable Fuel Standard. Cruz and other oil-state lawmakers believe those changes create the potential for job losses among refiners, and held up Northey until a meeting with the White House could be arranged.

Cruz and company left a meeting with President Donald Trump on Thursday with a directive to find a compromise with their colleagues, but the Texas Republican did not comment on whether he'd let Northey advance.

Grassley said he hopes Northey doesn't get fed up with the politics of Washington and withdraw from consideration. He said he doesn't have any indication Northey would do that, however.

Alabama earthquake: Democrat Jones wins Back

By Daniel Strauss | 12/12/2017 06:08 PM EDT

Democrat Doug Jones defeated Roy Moore in a special election earthquake Tuesday, flipping an Alabama Senate seat to Democrats for the first time in a quarter-century and dealing a huge political setback to President Donald Trump.

The Associated Press called the race for Jones, a former U.S. attorney, who had 49.9 percent of the vote to Moore's 48.4 percent with all precincts reporting — a difference of more than 21,000 votes.

Still, Moore declined to concede, saying there were still military and other votes that need to be counted. Alabama Secretary of State John Merrill told CNN it would be "highly unusual and highly unlikely" for the outstanding ballots to change the results of the race.

In Alabama, an automatic recount is triggered when the margin between the two candidates is under 0.5 percentage points. A candidate, however, has the option of seeking a recount if the margin is wider than that but has to pay for it, Merrill said.

Barring a miracle, all of that pointed to a victory for Jones.

"I am truly overwhelmed," the Democratic told ebullient supporters in a Birmingham hotel ballroom after the race was called. "At the end of the day, this entire race has been about dignity and respect. This campaign has been about the rule of law. This campaign has been about common courtesy and decency."

Jones' win — after Moore was accused of sexual assault and other misconduct by multiple women — will shrink Republicans' already tenuous Senate majority to 51-49, just as the party approaches final consideration of its sweeping tax bill and prepares for the 2018 midterm elections in a difficult political environment.

Moore's loss does relieve Senate Republicans from one burden: Considering whether they would expel him from the chamber if he won. But the party will have a reed-thin margin for error in the coming months as it tries to push through its agenda. And Moore's defeat was a major setback for Trump, who gave the candidate a full-throated endorsement in the final days of the race, in a state he carried with over 60 percent of the vote in 2016.

"Congratulations to Doug Jones on a hard fought victory," Trump tweeted. "The write-in votes played a very big factor, but a win is a win. The people of Alabama are great, and the Republicans will have another shot at this seat in a very short period of time. It never ends!"

The election is also a major defeat for the president's former chief strategist, Steve Bannon, who as the head of Breitbart led a bare-knuckles campaign to elect Moore and drag down Jones. Bannon had cast the race as an existential showdown between the activist base and Washington elites, but only to wind up on the losing end.

The president set up the election as one with outsized consequences for his administration and the GOP, tweeting repeatedly that Alabama could not afford to elect Jones. Trump also praised Moore at a rally in nearby Pensacola, Florida, and the Republican National Committee injected late money into the race after Trump reengaged.

It was a surreal scene at Moore's election night gathering in Montgomery.

The night started out with tons of energy in the room, but it dissipated as the vote returns accumulated until eventually the room fell silent. After the race was called but before Moore delivered his concession speech, a man took the stage and sang Christmas hymns.

When Moore emerged, he would not say the race was over, telling supporters that he wanted to consult with the secretary of state's office about next steps.

"Part of the problem with this campaign is we've been painted in unfavorable and unfaithful light," Jones said. "We've been put in a hole, if you will."

Trump's late play for Moore went against the will of Senate Republicans, who abandoned Moore after women came forward to say that Moore had pursued relationships with them when they were teenagers and he was in his 30s, including one who described sexual contact with Moore when she was 14.

"The people of Alabama deemed Roy Moore unfit to serve in the U.S. Senate," said National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman Cory Gardner, who had called for Moore to be thrown out of the Senate if elected. "I hope Senator-elect Doug Jones will do the right thing and truly represent Alabama by choosing to vote with the Senate Republican Majority."

Steven Law, the president of the super PAC aligned with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, blamed Bannon for Jones' victory.

"This is a brutal reminder that candidate quality matters regardless of where you are running," Law said in a statement. "Not only did Steve Bannon cost us a critical Senate seat in one of the most Republican states in the country, but he also dragged the President of the United States into his fiasco."

As Moore's campaign fought scandal, Jones became cause of national Democrats eager to defeat the Republican. Online donors flooded his campaign with money as Jones criss-crossed Alabama focusing on what he called "kitchen table issues" (and rarely mentioning his party). His TV ads blanketed the airwaves, hammering Moore as a sexual predator while also introducing Jones as a Second Amendment-supporting federal prosecutor who had convicted Ku Klux Klansmen involved in the bombing of Birmingham's 16th Street Baptist Church during the civil rights era.

Jones rode a surge of energy among black voters and got a key bump from white-collar suburbanites who often vote Republican but turned away from the controversial Moore. The GOP nominee's history of inflammatory comments about women, Muslims and LGBT people had already damaged his standing — and the sexual misconduct allegations scared more voters away.

Moore still won college-educated white voters 57 percent to 41 percent, according to the National Election Pool exit poll — but the group shifted hard in Democrats' direction compared to past Alabama elections.

Trump prompted the special election by nominating former Sen. Jeff Sessions to be his attorney general. Jones will replace appointed Republican Sen. Luther Strange and will hold the Senate seat until 2020, when Sessions' old term expires.

GAO: Administration illegally withheld $91 million in ARPA-E funds Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/12/2017 05:17 PM EDT

The Trump administration violated federal law when it withheld $91 million budgeted for the Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program earlier this year, the GAO said in a letter released today.

House Science Committee ranking member Eddie Bernice Johnson (D-Texas) asked GAO to investigate in May amid reports the agency was withholding money for grants that were already approved. In a Nov. 29 letter to GAO, the agency confirmed all funds had been released to be dispensed.

"I hope that the Administration now understands that Federal agencies must provide lawfully directed appropriations to the programs to which they are dedicated," Johnson said in a statement. "It cannot attempt to shut down an agency or starve a program it doesn't like by withholding funds. It is illegal and we in Congress will not allow it."

ARPA-E, which the Trump administration proposed eliminating entirely in its budget this year, selects energy technology projects and awards funding as those ventures meet a series of development milestones.

The Energy Department didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

WHAT'S NEXT: Congress must decide how much funding to award ARPA-E in the future.

Interior IG probing Zinke's senior staff reshuffle Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/08/2017 05:09 PM EDT

The Interior Department's internal watchdog has launched a probe into Secretary Ryan Zinke's June reassignment of a number of senior executive staff, an official told POLITICO today.

The inspector general's office is auditing Zinke's decision to reassign dozens of senior executive service employees, including Joel Clement, who was moved from a managerial position involving climate change issues to a job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies. The office has begun interviewing key agency staff and asked the secretary's office to hand over documents, IG spokeswoman Nancy DiPaolo said.

The audit follows a request in July from Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and seven of her colleagues for Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall to look into the matter.

Depending on what the audit uncovers, it could lead to a broader investigation to determine whether any laws were broken.

WHAT'S NEXT: DiPaolo said the IG hopes to wrap up its work within a few months.

Interior official files whistleblower complaint over job reassignment Back

By Esther Whieldon and Ben Lefebvre | 07/19/2017 07:06 PM EDT

A former senior Interior Department official has filed a whistleblower complaint after the agency transferred him from a leadership position focused on climate change to a desk job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies.

In a complaint and disclosure filing with the Office of Special Counsel and in a Washington Post op-ed, former Interior Office of Policy Analysis Director Joel Clement claimed he was reassigned to a position at the Office of Natural Resources Revenue to stop him from publicly discussing climate change impacts on native Alaskan coastal communities.

Clement was among dozens of senior executive staff reassigned to other jobs in June.

Clement told POLITICO no Interior political staffers ever raised concerns about his activities prior to his reassignment. "It was kind of obvious to reassign the climate adaptation experts to the accounting office where they collect fossil fuel royalty checks. That was pretty flagrant, I would say, in terms of sending the message. So that message was received loud and clear that they wanted me to quit."

Clement said he'd like his old job back, and he hoped other staff would also complain.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the personnel moves were "conducted to better serve the taxpayer and the Department's operations."

Clement may have difficulty proving his case because agencies have wide discretion to reassign staff, according to Jeff Ruch, executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. "It sounds like he's being retaliated against because of his job, not because of any disclosure he made," Ruch said. "He's suffering due to the nature of his job, and maybe because he did it too well."

Dourson at risk of rejection as more Republicans lean no Back

By Nick Juliano and Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee to a key chemical safety job at the EPA is at risk of rejection after Republican senators balked amid accusations that he is too eager to cover for companies peddling dangerous products.

North Carolina's two GOP senators have said they will vote against confirming Michael Dourson as an EPA assistant administrator, citing a record that included work on a chemical linked to cancer deaths near a Marine Corps base in their home state. And Maine Republican Susan Collins said Thursday that she is leaning no as well — a vote that would be enough to sink his nomination.

Democrats are optimistic about turning four additional Republicans who they believe should be in play based on contamination issues back home.

Republican leaders have not decided what to do about Dourson's nomination, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said Thursday.

"We'll have to see whether it's a viable nomination, and with two against him obviously that doesn't leave us a lot of room," Cornyn told POLITICO. "We haven't made a decisions on that yet, but we'll be revisiting it."

Critics say Dourson, a former industry-funded toxicologist, regularly downplayed the risks of chemicals such as PFOA and trichloroethylene that are contaminating soil and water in communities across the country. Dourson has already begun working at EPA as a senior adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt, an arrangement Democrats have condemned as improper.

"There are all these local contamination issues across the country that have been bubbling up recently or have been out there for years, and because Dourson is this hired gun ... he's almost by nature of his job been working on these really controversial chemicals," said Jack Pratt, chemicals campaign director for the Environmental Defense Fund, which opposes Dourson's nomination.

Republican North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr said Wednesday that they could not support Dourson because of his past work as a toxicologist who was frequently hired by industry to rebut public health concerns about chemicals. Collins said Thursday that she is "leaning against" confirming him.

A legislative aide said Democrats are eyeing Republican Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Bob Corker of Tennessee and Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, although Flake, Toomey and Corker told POLITICO they're still undecided.

"Sen. Toomey remains concerned about the PFOA issue in Bucks County and Montgomery County and remains dedicated to addressing it," a spokesman for the Pennsylvania Republican said, naming two Philadelphia-area counties where toxic firefighting chemicals leached into the ground from two closed naval bases. Toomey is reviewing the nomination "with these concerns in mind," but the spokesman did not say how he plans to vote.

However, even if the nomination is pulled or rejected, Dourson will still be able to influence EPA's implementation of a major chemical safety law because he has already started working at the agency. Democrats have criticized that arrangement, though EPA says previous administrations allowed people to begin working there before being confirmed.

EPA's chemical safety office, which Dourson has been nominated to lead, has a heavy workload after Congress in 2016 passed a bipartisan law updating the Toxic Substances Control Act for the first time in nearly 40 years. The office has been charged with evaluating the safety of chemicals already in use and determining how to test new chemicals before they are allowed into the marketplace.

The near-universal support TSCA reform won in Congress last year may help explain the wariness among lawmakers about giving chemical industry allies too much of a foothold in EPA.

"They wanted to give the public some assurance that the products on their shelf are safe, and when you put the chemical industry in charge that's not going to happen," said Madeleine Foote, a legislative representative with the League of Conservation Voters.

Tillis and Burr stopped short of calling for Dourson to step down from his existing position at the agency. "I'll leave that up to the EPA to decide," Tillis told POLITICO.

Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), who has supported several Trump nominees, said he would vote against Dourson but not object to him continuing to work at EPA.

Before joining EPA last month, Dourson was a professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine's Risk Science Center, and he founded the nonprofit Toxicology Excellence for Risk Assessment, which was often conducted industry-funded research. He also previously worked at EPA from 1980 to 1995. Past clients of Dourson and his research group have included Dow Chemical, Koch Industries and Chevron, according to the Associated Press.

Critics say Dourson's research routinely concluded that chemicals were safer in far higher concentrations than those recommended by agencies like EPA, putting communities at greater risk of finding toxic substances like perchlorate, TCE or PFOA in their air or drinking water.

Pratt said Dourson's work followed a pattern.

"Over and over again these chemical companies would hire him, he'd look at the research, and say the standard that EPA or whatever regulatory body has is too strict — it should be looser," Pratt said.

EPA defended the nominee.

"Dr. Michael Dourson is a highly qualified scientist to lead EPA's Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution," EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox said in a statement. "He worked at EPA for 15 years, founded a program that characterized the health hazards of chemicals, performed pro-bono work that saved a family near Cincinnati and his expertise on TCE contamination resulted in settlements that helped 130 families outside of San Francisco."

Dourson told the Environment and Public Works Committee at his confirmation hearing last month that he did not have a thumb on the scale.

"I can give you as many or more examples of situations where the science that we brought forward as a team actually lowered the safe dose or risk position for various sponsors," Dourson told Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) at the hearing. "If confirmed, I will rely on the guidance of EPA ethics officials."

Tillis and Burr said they could not support Dourson based on his record and North Carolina's history of chemical pollution problems, such drinking water at Camp Lejeune that was contaminated for decades by chemicals including trichloroethylene. TCE is one of the first 10 chemicals EPA must evaluate under the new safety law, but Dourson has previously endorsed health standards that are 1.5 to 15 times less protective than those backed by other researchers, according to EDF.

Retired Marine Corps Master Sgt. Jerry Ensminger, whose daughter died of leukemia linked to the contaminated water at Camp Lejeune, met with Tills and aides to Burr to urge their opposition, according to the Wilmington Star News.

Among his other industry-funded work, Dourson appeared before an EPA scientific advisory panel session concerning the pesticide chlorpyrifos on behalf of CropLife America. He led a 2008 paper on acrylamide, which can form during high-temperature cooking of some starchy foods, that received funding from major food companies like Burger King, Frito-Lay and McDonald's. And he studied 1-bromopropane, a solvent linked to some neurological and reproductive disorders, in 2004 with funding from Albemarle Corp. and Ameribrom Inc.

In all cases, he recommended standards many factors less protective than public health and EPA research suggested.

He also has done work for industry-friendly state governments. In the early 2000s, Dourson helped West Virginia set drinking water guidance limits for PFOA, also known as perfluorooctanoic acid or C8, at 150 parts per billion. That was 150 times less protective than manufacturer DuPont's own internal standard of 1 part per billion and more than 2,000 times less protective than EPA's recommendation of 70 parts per trillion.

During his confirmation hearing, Dourson argued that the research had evolved significantly since his recommendation to West Virginia, saying that "the science has progressed, significantly advanced since the time of 2004 and the new science indicates a lower level." And he defended the integrity of his work overall.

"Throughout my career — with EPA, TERA and now with the University of Cincinnati — I have been objective in my work and applied sound science to come to my conclusions," Dourson said.

Trump Ex-Im Bank nominee will likely be blocked Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/12/2017 04:20 PM EDT

Scott Garrett, President Donald Trump's pick to lead the Export-Import Bank, will likely be blocked by bipartisan opposition after he struggled to convince lawmakers that he should run an agency he once tried to kill in Congress.

Garrett's fate was all but sealed Tuesday when Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) said he would oppose the former congressman's confirmation when it comes up for a vote at the Senate Banking Committee on Dec. 19. The panel has 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats, and all the Democrats are expected to oppose Garrett.

"I believe him to be a proponent of the abolition of the bank rather than a reformer of the bank," Rounds told POLITICO. "I'm looking for reformers, not abolitionists."

Rounds had raised concerns that small contractors in his state could be hurt if their larger customers lost access to financing. U.S. companies rely on the agency to provide loan guarantees to the foreign buyers of American exports.

If Garrett's nomination were blocked or withdrawn, it would be a major victory for companies and manufacturing groups, including Boeing and the National Association of Manufacturers. They have fought to stop his Senate confirmation based on his record of trying to shut down the bank while serving in Congress.

Before losing reelection in his New Jersey district last year, Garrett said the bank "embodies the corruption of the free enterprise system." As he tried to save his nomination in recent months, he struck a less aggressive tone and pledged publicly to keep the bank running.

Garrett's attempts to shore up support fell flat, and opposition to his nomination could grow before next Tuesday's vote.

Other Republicans on the committee said they had not yet made up their minds.

Sen. Tim Scott (R-S.C.), whose vote is one of the most closely watched on the panel, represents a state that's home to plants operated by Boeing and GE, two of the bank's most prominent beneficiaries. He has raised concerns with Garrett's record but has not announced how he would vote.

"My attention's all on the tax reform package," Scott said in an interview today. "I'm sure I'll have enough time before Tuesday to come to a decision."

Asked if Garrett will drop out or if the White House is looking for a new nominee, an administration official told POLITICO, "We plan on having a vote."

The administration has warned for months that if Garrett failed to advance then GOP lawmakers critical of the bank would hold up the confirmation of other nominees to head the agency. Sens. Pat Toomey (R-Penn.) and Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) have threatened to derail other Ex-Im appointees if Garrett were not cleared.

Four less controversial nominees for the bank's board are also scheduled for a committee vote on Dec. 19, and they're expected to move forward. Their confirmation would help the bank's board regain a quorum that's needed to approve transactions worth more than $10 million.

Shelby said on Tuesday that if Garrett were blocked, "a lot of us will probably vote against all of them," but he conceded that "we're probably outliers — the minority."
