"President Trump's foolish decision means America is joining Syria and Nicaragua as the only three nations in the world not part of the race to head off one of the most dangerous threats the planet has faced," Environmental Working Group President Ken Cook said in a statement. "Even such forward-thinking leaders as Vladimir Putin and Kim Jong Un signed the agreement."

The Sierra Club and LCV both promised to push ongoing action at the state and local level to accelerate decarbonization.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump is expected to formally announce his decision in the next few days.

To view online click here.

Back

Conservatives offer tentative applause for Paris withdrawal Back

By Eric Wolff | 05/31/2017 01:02 PM EDT

Conservative groups are hopeful that President Donald Trump will withdraw from the Paris climate agreement, although they are eager to hear it directly from him.

"I am super happy, but of course I don't believe in counting chickens before they're hatched," said Marlo Lewis, a senior fellow at the Competitive Enterprise Institute.

A White House official said this morning the U.S. would withdraw from the agreement, though Trump himself followed the news with a Tweet saying he would decide "in the next few days." Conservative groups have lobbied for withdrawal from the agreement, arguing it puts the U.S. at an economic disadvantage relative to other countries.

"As Yogi Berra said, 'it ain't over till it's over' but we are definitely encouraged about reports that President Trump is heading in the direction of withdrawing," said Thomas Pyle, president of American Energy Alliance.

"President Trump has demonstrated resolute leadership in his decision to withdraw the United States from the Paris Climate Agreement," said Nick Loris, an economist at the Heritage Foundation. "Without any impact on global temperatures, Paris was the open door for egregious regulation, cronyism, and government spending that would have been as disastrous for the American economy as it is proving to be for those in Europe. ... Au revoir to the Paris agreement indeed."

To view online click here.

Back

What does Trump's Paris climate decision mean? Back

By Nick Juliano | 05/31/2017 02:43 PM EDT

While President Donald Trump is keeping everyone in suspense, a White House official said Wednesday morning that he will formally withdraw from the Paris climate change agreement.

Exiting the deal would make the United States one of the only countries on Earth to altogether dismiss the threat of climate change, and risks complicating already fraught relationships with European allies and rising powers like China and India. POLITICO walks through some of the questions and answers that led to Trump's decision.

What is the Paris climate deal?

In 2015, representatives of 195 nations met in Paris and agreed to take steps designed to keep global temperature increases below 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit to avoid potentially devastating consequences related to sea level rise or extreme weather. Each government submitted its own voluntary pledge outlining steps to reduce its carbon footprint. Then-President Barack Obama said the U.S. would reduce its emissions by 2025 to about 27 percent below the level in 2005, identifying his domestic policies such as the Clean Power Plan and stricter automobile fuel-efficiency requirements as key contributors to that pledge. Countries with less mature economies, such as China and India, pledged that their emissions would eventually level off after rising for several more years — an arrangement Trump and other critics of the agreement said made it a "bad deal" for the U.S. But supporters of the Paris agreement point out that it is not legally binding and cannot force the Trump administration to continue implementing Obama's policies.

Why is Trump pulling out?

Trump has repeatedly dismissed human-caused climate change as a "bulls---" "hoax" invented by the Chinese to undercut U.S. manufacturing, and those who urged him to exit virtually all believe that scientists' warnings of more extreme weather and rising seas are overblown. Trump has also said that U.S. coal, oil and manufacturing companies are disadvantaged by efforts to reduce carbon emissions. While the question of what to do about Paris deeply divided the Trump administration, the president appears to have sided with nationalists who portrayed the agreement as antithetical to his "America First" agenda. "It was an America second, third, or fourth kind of approach. China and India had no obligations under the agreement until 2030. We front-loaded all of our costs," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt once said of the deal.

Trump's exit from the Paris deal puts the United States alongside Syria, which is embroiled in a civil war, as the only nation on Earth that does not view climate change as a policy problem. (Nicaragua, the only other country not on board with the Paris deal, is staying out because it does not believe the deal does enough to address climate change.)

What happens now?

It's unclear. Trump has several options he can use to withdraw the U.S. from the deal, and the White House has not yet detailed his plans ahead of a formal announcement the president says is still several days away. Trump may decide to treat the Paris deal as a treaty and submit it for a Senate ratification vote, which would surely fail, or he could go through a formal withdrawal process envisioned in the agreement itself, though that would take several years. Trump also could exit the previously ratified 1992 treaty that established the underlying climate negotiations that produced the treaty, but even Republican senators who said Trump should pull out of Paris did not say he should exit the broader U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change.

Does this mean EPA won't regulate greenhouse gas emissions anymore?

Not exactly. The Trump administration is already in the process of rescinding or revising Obama's climate change rules such as the Clean Power Plan, but that has nothing to do with whether the U.S. remains a part of the Paris accord. The bigger question for Pruitt is whether he is able to undermine EPA's scientific conclusion that heat-trapping gasses like carbon dioxide are a danger to the public and must be regulated by the Clean Air Act. So far, Pruitt has been hesitant to reverse that so-called endangerment finding, which has been upheld by the Supreme Court since EPA published it in 2009. Legal experts say that means Pruitt will eventually have to write new rules limiting carbon emissions from power plants and other major sources, although Pruitt has not yet announced his next steps.

Will this save the coal industry?

Doubtful. The biggest problem coal faced was electric utilities switching power plants to run on cheap natural gas unleashed by the U.S. fracking revolution. In the last decade, coal has fallen from more than 50 percent of the U.S. electricity market in 2000 to around 30 percent today, and market analysts say that share is likely to keep falling. In fact, the largest U.S. coal companies urged Trump to stick with the Paris deal, in an effort to secure more backing for technologies like carbon capture and sequestration that they believe are vital to the industry's long-term future.

Still, leaders of some smaller mining firms, such as Murray Energy CEO Bob Murray, urged Trump to pull out of Paris, saying it was an "illegal" waste of taxpayer money.

Who supports this decision?

Pruitt was perhaps the most vocal member of Trump's administration in favor of withdrawing from Paris, arguing behind the scenes that sticking with the deal would complicate his efforts to unwind Obama's climate change regulations at EPA. A group of Republican senators, including Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.), echoed that argument in an influential letter to Trump last week, saying that the deal could provide ammunition for environmentalists to use in lawsuits challenging Trump's energy agenda.

Other supporters of exiting the deal included White House chief strategist Steve Bannon, a handful of smaller energy companies, and conservative groups such as the Competitive Enterprise Institute and American Energy Alliance. And 56 percent of Republicans wanted Trump to exit the deal, according to a poll last month from POLITICO and the Harvard T.H. School of Public Health.

Who opposed it?

Trump's daughter Ivanka and son-in-law Jared Kushner were among those urging him to stick with the deal, along with Secretary of State Rex Tillerson and several Republican members of Congress including Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska). They said staying with the non-binding deal would not inhibit Trump's broader energy goals while allowing the U.S. to maintain influence in international climate change negotiations and related diplomatic efforts. Major U.S. and global energy companies, including Exxon Mobil, the top three U.S. coal producers and major tech companies like Apple and Google also sought to convince Trump to stay a part of the Paris deal. About 62 percent of Americans overall supported staying in the Paris deal, including more than six in 10 independents and 87 percent of Democrats, according to the POLITICO-Harvard poll.

What does this mean for the planet?

It's not good, but prospects weren't exactly rosy before Trump made up his mind. The emissions-reduction policies Obama put in place were insufficient to hit his U.S. target in the Paris deal even if they had been fully implemented — and Trump has already put virtually all of them on the chopping block, making any reductions more difficult to achieve.

And many scientists say the goals under the Paris agreement are themselves too modest to limit global climate the change to 3.6 degrees, and that global carbon emissions will have to reach net zero by the end of the century, a herculean task.

Any major new emissions-cutting policies will come from states like California and New York or foreign leaders in Europe and China, and activists will keep pressure on oil and coal companies to reduce their carbon footprint. Just a few hours after news of Trump's decision broke this morning, Exxon shareholders voted in favor of a resolution asking the company to report annually on how it is dealing with climate change.

To view online click here.

Back

EU and China commit to deeper climate cooperation as U.S. turns away Back

By Kalina Oroschakoff | 05/31/2017 10:02 AM EDT

The EU and China are set to pledge deeper cooperation on the Paris climate agreement and to promote clean energy technologies, according to a draft leaders' statement for their summit on Thursday and Friday seen by POLITICO.

"The EU and China consider climate action and the clean energy transition an imperative," according to the statement. "Stepping up action will provide both sides with significant opportunities."

Their commitments to step up efforts to cut emissions and implement the deal come as President Donald Trump is planning to pull the U.S. out of the Paris climate deal, according to a White House official.

In the wake of a broader U.S. retreat from its traditional international role, the two will also stress the importance of "developing global free trade and investment" and multilateralism, according to the draft.

The leaders' separate and explicit statement on climate change and clean energy is meant to show that the EU and China are stepping up as the U.S. makes a U-turn on its own climate policy.

"The fact that they're taking the time and effort to come up with a declaration of cooperation is the most important part," said Wendel Trio of the Climate Action Network Europe.

China has been a vocal advocate for climate action in recent months, a change from its previous "climate bad boy" reputation, Li Shuo of Greenpeace China told reporters on Wednesday.

The text was prepared ahead of a meeting of EU country ambassadors on Wednesday.

This article first appeared on POLITICO.EU on May 31, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

Energy union chief: U.S. climate withdrawal wouldn't 'change the course of mankind'

Back

By Kalina Oroschakoff and Anca Gurzu | 05/31/2017 11:01 AM EDT

A U.S. decision to pull out of the Paris climate deal would be "disappointing," but it wouldn't bring about the end of the world, Maroš Šefcovic, the EU's vice president for the energy union, said today.

"For Europe there is no plan B, because we do not have a planet B," Šefcovic told reporters in response to reports that President Donald Trump plans to pull out of the international agreement. "If they decide to pull out this would be disappointing, but I really don't think that this would change the course of mankind."

Šefcovic added that he's confident the business case for investing in renewables will continue to drive the American shift to clean energy, even if it withdraws.

A White House source confirmed today that Trump has decided to pull out. However, Trump later tweeted that he will announce his decision "over the next few days," adding in his trademark capital letters: "MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN!"

Meanwhile, the EU and China are forging closer diplomatic ties to fill the leadership gap left by the U.S. climate U-turn, with plans to announce enhanced cooperation on implementing the Paris deal, cutting emissions and promoting clean energy during the EU-China summit in Brussels on Thursday and Friday.

"What we are already feeling is that there are much stronger expectations from our partners across the world, in Africa, Asia and China, that Europe should assume leadership in this effort," Šefcovic said. "We are ready to do that."

This article first appeared on POLITICO.EU on May 31, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

Curbelo calls to 'redouble' climate efforts, Democrats rip Trump Back

By Eric Wolff | 05/31/2017 11:47 AM EDT

Republican Rep. Carlos Curbelo (Fla.), one of the founders of the Bipartisan Climate Solutions Caucus, said the group's members must "redouble our efforts" after news that President Donald Trump plans to withdraw from the Paris climate agreement.

Curbelo, who has raised the prospect of Trump's impeachment, was one of the few Republicans commenting on news the White House planned to pull out of the deal. Trump later tweeted he would announce a decision on the 195-nation agreement "in the next few days."

"Bipartisan #Climate Solutions Caucus must now redouble our efforts to build consensus for pro-growth clean energy policies," Curbelo tweeted.

The Democratic co-chair of the caucus, Ted Deutch (Fla.), slammed the White House news, saying Trump's decision "has the potential to irreparably harm our earth, dramatically hinder our economic growth and fundamentally change our way of life."

Other Democrats also joined in the criticism.

"President Trump's decision to pull the United States out of the Paris Climate Accord is a stunning abdication of American leadership and a grave threat to our planet's future," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a statement.

"If Trump abandons the #ParisAgreement, he's putting us on a dangerous course toward catastrophic #ClimateChange," Rep. Frank Pallone (D-N.J.), ranking member on the Energy and Commerce Committee, said on Twitter.

Andrew Cuomo, the Democratic governor of New York, promised his state would take climate action on its own.

"If Washington won't act, New Yorkers will," he said on Twitter. "We've set bold renewable energy goals and will invest in a sustainable future."

To view online click here.

Back

EPA to reconsider more provisions of oil and gas well emissions rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 05/31/2017 11:55 AM EDT

EPA today placed a 90-day stay on several additional portions of its 2016 rule setting methane emissions limits for new oil and gas industry sources.

The delay is needed as the agency considers several petitions to reconsider parts of the regulation, EPA said. The agency in April stayed some other portions of the rule, including fugitive emissions requirements, but today's announcement covers other key parts of the regulation.

Two more parts of the rule EPA will now reconsider are standards for well site pneumatic pumps and requirements for closed vent systems to be certified by a professional engineer, according to a Federal Register notice signed by Administrator Scott Pruitt on Friday and running soon.

Those requirements will be placed on hold for 90 days while EPA reviews them, and the agency "intends to look broadly at the entire 2016 Rule," not just the specific portions already identified, according to the notice.

EPA will have to take public comment on any proposed changes to the rule before finalizing them, and could subsequently face litigation.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will issue proposed changes to the rule's requirements and take public comment.

To view online click here.

Back

EPA to reconsider parts of oil and gas well emissions rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 04/19/2017 11:11 AM EDT

EPA says it will review key parts of a 2016 Obama administration rule governing methane emissions from new oil and gas wells.

The rule, also known as the oil and gas NSPS, included requirements for companies to monitor "fugitive emissions" — essentially leaks — from oil and gas production sites. But in a letter to the American Petroleum Institute and other industry groups who petitioned for reconsideration, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt says they have made a valid objection to those requirements because of an unspecified issue that arose after the comment period.

The agency has issued a 90-day stay on the fugitive emissions compliance provisions.

EPA has also agreed to review part of the rule regarding how companies could get approval for alternative methods to limit emissions, along with a provision that applied the rule to low-production wells. Neither part was included in the proposed rule and thus "the public could not have raised objections to these provisions during the public comment period," EPA said.

Those reconsiderations will be subject to a notice-and-comment rulemaking process, along with possible eventual legal challenges.

The agency did not take a position on other reconsideration requests made by industry groups.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will begin a process to reconsider these portions of the rule, a process likely to take a year or longer.

To view online click here.

Back

Russia probe scares off potential appointees Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Josh Dawsey | 05/31/2017 05:05 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's effort to fill hundreds of vacant jobs across the federal government has hit a new snag: Russia.

Potential hires are paying close attention to the expanding investigations, which have now begun to touch senior Trump aides, with some questioning whether they want to join the administration.

Four people who work closely with prospective nominees told POLITICO that some potential hires are having second thoughts about trying to land executive branch appointments as federal and congressional investigations threaten to pose a serious distraction to Trump's agenda.

"It's an additional factor that makes what was an already complicated process of staffing the government even harder," said Max Stier, head of the Partnership for Public Service, which has advised the Trump transition on hiring.

According to the nonpartisan Partnership for Public Service, the White House has announced nominees for just 117 of the 559 most important Senate-confirmed positions.

That trails the records of Presidents Barack Obama and George W. Bush, who had each nominated about twice as many people by this point in the first year of their first terms.

Trump has not yet nominated a No. 2 at the Agriculture Department, Education Department, Department of Veterans Affairs or Environmental Protection Agency, and dozens of top positions at every federal agency remain vacant. Trump's nominees for deputy secretary of Commerce and Treasury both withdrew.

One lawyer who represents prospective political appointees told POLITICO that three clients said over the past two weeks that they are no longer interested in working for the Trump administration following the appointment of Robert Mueller as special counsel overseeing the federal investigation into Trump associates' contacts with Russian officials during the campaign.

"There's no doubt in my mind that people are being very cautious, to put it mildly," this lawyer said, adding that there is growing concern in Republican circles that the caliber of hires could deteriorate if the administration's top picks drop out.

"You're going to have a situation where they're going to have trouble getting A-list or even B-list people to sign up," the lawyer added.

Others agreed. "With all that is going on now, there is certainly a greater amount of hesitation," said a former government official who regularly speaks with one of Trump's Cabinet secretaries. "They have a real talent problem that continues to grow."

A White House spokeswoman said the Russia investigation and the series of news stories that have pummeled the administration in recent weeks have had no impact on hiring. She said the president is recruiting individuals "of the highest quality."

But the steady stream of palace intrigue stories about internal tensions and plans for a staff shakeup — after months of rumors about various senior officials getting pushed out — are making it harder to persuade people to join the administration, another White House official said.

White House communications director Michael Dubke said Tuesday he will leave his role, while Trump is weighing the possibility of bringing former campaign aides Corey Lewandowski and David Bossie into the White House.

"It's not the best place to work right now, but you're still working at the White House, so there are far worse jobs," the official said.

Former Bush and Obama administration officials who worked on personnel issues told POLITICO they never struggled to find qualified candidates for top jobs.

"I can't speak to Republicans not wanting to join this administration but, as a general matter, we didn't have trouble recruiting people — quite the opposite," said Lisa Brown, who served as White House staff secretary under Obama for two years.

Along with distracting from lower-level hires, the Russia probe has slowed and complicated the process of filling the administration's highest-profile vacancy — director of the FBI.

Trump administration officials have been frustrated by the difficulties they've faced in finding a new FBI director. Top White House officials, including chief of staff Reince Priebus and chief strategist Steve Bannon, hoped to have made a decision made by now.

Instead, leading candidates Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) and former Sen. Joe Lieberman have all withdrawn from consideration. The White House is now looking at a new field of candidates, and Trump met with two possibilities — John Pistole and Chris Wray — on Tuesday.

"It's not so easy to find an FBI director in the Trump administration," the White House official said.

The official added that Trump and his senior team are aware that hiring is not moving fast enough at agencies but said that, right now, "It's just not priority No. 1."

A second White House official said he was not aware of any potential nominees dropping out because of the recent news but echoed concerns that the Russia probe would inevitably add to further delays filling empty jobs.

"The problem we are likely to have is it may be difficult to get people to focus on hiring with all of this going on," the official said.

To view online click here.

Back

Kushner tries to pretend everything's normal Back

By Annie Karni | 05/30/2017 10:08 PM EDT

There has been no rallying the troops in the White House, and no open acknowledgment from President Donald Trump's son-in-law, Jared Kushner, that he has transformed from behind-the-scenes West Wing power broker to its lead distracting story.

Kushner led three meetings in the West Wing on Tuesday — and never once acknowledged the stories about him that have dominated cable news since last week, when it was reported that during the campaign he discussed setting up a secret communications back channel to Moscow.

For the first five months of Trump's administration, Kushner has managed to stay out of Trump's line of fire, even as every other top West Wing aide has taken a turn on the outs with the president. As Trump has sought input from outside advisers on whom he should keep and whom he should can, Kushner seems to operate as a faculty member with tenure in an otherwise insecure work environment.

With his wife, Ivanka Trump, according to multiple White House sources, Kushner emerged from the holiday weekend intent on dismissing his increased public scrutiny in connection with the FBI's ongoing Russia probe as nothing more than a public relations problem that will blow over — and act like his special status in the White House has not changed.

On his first full day back after the holiday weekend, Kushner led a meeting on veterans affairs, a meeting with his Office of American Innovation and a planning meeting on a "Tech Day" at the White House next month, when he hopes to gather tech leaders in Washington to discuss modernizing government services. Kushner also conducted a series of follow-up phone calls about Trump's just-concluded overseas trip, a White House official said.

Ivanka Trump, White House sources said, was also working out of her West Wing office on Tuesday, conducting business as usual — which includes a weekly communications meeting in her office. (Kushner and his wife, who both serve as official government employees, have chosen to run their own press shop as a separate entity from the Sean Spicer-led operation down the hall, relying on their own aides to handle queries from reporters.)

The New York Times reported Sunday that Kushner and Ivanka Trump were batted down at the Trump golf course in Bedminster, New Jersey, as aides explained that Kushner has not been contacted by the FBI to discuss his role in allegedly trying to set up a back channel with the Russians. His attorney, Jamie Gorelick, reiterated her client's interest in sharing with Congress any information he has about his meetings with Russian officials. But on Tuesday, they were back to work.

At Thrive Capital, the venture capital firm co-founded by Kushner's younger brother, Josh, employees have sometimes, over the years, been greeted with motivational Post-It notes on their computer monitors, reminding them to keep their "heads down. Stay focused. Ignore the noise," even when confronted with good news.

If Kushner wanted to communicate to concerned White House officials that the game plan was to tune out the noise and keep on working, he was far less explicit about it.

That left some unease in the White House about who, exactly, was in charge. Early Tuesday, after weeks of rumors about a shakeup in the White House press shop, communications director Michael Dubke made his resignation public. But staff members believe a bigger staff shakeup is looming — The Washington Post reported over the weekend that Trump associates were discussing shipping off chief of staff Reince Priebus to serve as ambassador to Greece.

In his first press briefing in over a week, press secretary Sean Spicer did not deny that Kushner had tried to set up a back channel with the Russians. "Mr. Kushner's attorney has said that Mr. Kushner has volunteered to share with Congress what he knows about these meetings," Spicer said. "And he will do the same if he's contacted in or — and connected with any other inquiry."

When asked point blank whether the White House disputed the back channel reports, Spicer said that the question, posed by The Washington Post's Phil Rucker, "presupposed facts that have not been confirmed."

On Tuesday, Trump retweeted a Fox News story that downplayed Kushner's relationship with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak and reported that a permanent back channel was never discussed. That was the extent to which Trump himself has moved to defend his son-in-law, who was responsible for planning Trump's successful visits to Saudi Arabia and Israel last week.

But the juxtaposition between his biggest hurdle arriving on the heels of his first measurable success in the White House isn't new to Kushner. In his former office at 666 Fifth Avenue, the headquarters of his family real estate company, Kushner kept a framed photograph of the first page of Charles Dickens' "A Tale of Two Cities," according to a 2008 profile of Kushner published in the now-defunct Portfolio Magazine.

"But when you think of this, you think, 'It's the best of times, it's the worst of times,'" he said in the rare interview, referring to the first line of the Victorian novel. "But I love how we bought this building literally right after my father came out of prison, probably five, six months after. And the thought that I had was, 'It's kind of like the juxtaposition of going from the worst of times to the best of times.'"

To view online click here.

Back

Poll: Support for Trump impeachment rises Back

By Steven Shepard | 05/31/2017 06:18 AM EDT

An increasing percentage of voters want Congress to impeach President Donald Trump — even if they don't think Trump has committed the "high crimes and misdemeanors" the Constitution requires.

Forty-three percent of voters want Congress to begin impeachment proceedings, according to a new POLITICO/Morning Consult poll, up from 38 percent last week.

"If President Trump was hoping his foreign trip would shift the conversation away from scandals, he may be out of luck," said Morning Consult Co-Founder and Chief Research Officer Kyle Dropp. "Over the last week, support for beginning impeachment proceedings among voters rose from 38 percent to 43 percent."

But that's still less than the 45 percent who don't want Congress to impeach Trump, down a tick from 46 percent the week before.

Only three American presidents in history have faced legitimate impeachment threats.

Much of the support for impeaching Trump comes from political considerations, the poll shows — not a belief that Trump is actually guilty of impeachable offenses, like treason, bribery or obstructing justice.

Of those who want Congress to move toward impeachment, a 54-percent majority of those believe Trump "has proven he is unfit to serve and should be removed from office, regardless of whether he committed an impeachable offense or not." Only 43 percent of those seeking impeachment believe Trump has committed an offense that meets the high constitutional standards for removal.

The results underscore the intense partisan divisions following last year's rancorous election. A wide majority of self-identified Democratic voters, 71 percent, want Congress to impeach Trump. But more than three-quarters of GOP voters, 76 percent, don't think Congress should begin impeachment proceedings.

Despite the sharp split on impeachment, Trump's approval ratings as president have stabilized, the poll shows. For the second consecutive week, 45 percent of voters approve of the job Trump is doing, while half disapprove. That has recovered from a low of 41 percent prior to Trump's trip overseas this month.

While poll respondents were not asked explicitly to react to Trump's first foreign trip, the poll shows voters are skeptical of Trump's aspirations to help Israel and the Palestinians strike a long-sought peace deal. Only 9 percent think it's very likely Trump will be able to broker such an agreement. More say it's either somewhat likely (18 percent), not too likely (28 percent) or not likely at all (31 percent).

The POLITICO/Morning Consult poll was conducted May 25-30, beginning just after the Congressional Budget Office weighed in on Trump's chief legislative goal in the opening months of his presidency: the health care bill the House passed earlier this month. The CBO's report projected the bill, if enacted, would save the federal government $119 billion over the next decade, but 23 million fewer Americans would have health insurance.

The poll shows more voters continue to disapprove of the GOP health care bill, 47 percent, than approve, 38 percent. And the 33 percent who disapprove of the bill "strongly" far outpaces the 14 percent who approve strongly.

A 47-percent plurality of voters think the bill would make the U.S. health care system worse — more than the 32 percent who think it would make the system better. Twenty-two percent say it won't make a difference on the health care system.

Forty-seven percent of voters also believe the bill will increase their health care costs, while only 18 percent think it will lower their costs and 17 percent don't think it will have an impact.

Last week's CBO report is unlikely to improve voter perceptions of the bill. Told about both the bill's deficit savings and the reductions in health insurance coverage, only 20 percent say it would make them more likely to support the bill. Nearly twice as many, 39 percent, say it makes them more likely to oppose the measure.

The POLITICO/Morning Consult poll included interviews with 1,991 registered voters and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2 percentage points.

Morning Consult is a nonpartisan media and technology company that provides data-driven research and insights on politics, policy and business strategy.

More details on the poll and its methodology can be found in these two documents —

Toplines: <http://politi.co/2rRIjZs> | Crosstabs: <http://politi.co/2rBDJPd>

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Energy
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Afternoon Energy: Trump, Cruz to meet on biofuel — Report: "Red team" review on horizon — Barrasso to EPA: Finish RFS review
Date: Friday, December 01, 2017 4:27:29 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 12/01/2017 04:25 PM EDT

With help from Esther Whieldon

TRUMP, CRUZ TO MEET ON BIOFUEL: President Donald Trump will meet with Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and several Cabinet members next week to discuss U.S. biofuel policy and fuel efficiency standards, Andrew Restuccia and Ben Lefebvre report. The Thursday meeting is an attempt by the White House to reach a compromise between Cruz, who has held up a Trump nominee to the Agriculture Department over the administration's support for the Renewable Fuel Standard, and the farm-state lawmakers who pressured EPA to back down from potential changes to the regulations for biofuels.

The White House had until now ignored Cruz's requests for a meeting. Cruz and eight other senators sent a letter in October requesting changes to the program overseen by EPA, which sets the minimum volumes of ethanol and biodiesel to be used in the fuel market. Refiners must either purchase the biofuels to blend with their gasoline or diesel fuel, or buy credits to show their compliance — credits the refiners say are too expensive and threaten to push some refiners out of business. Read more here.

REPORT: RED TEAM ON THE HORIZON: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt could be close to unveiling his "red team" in a matter of weeks, Bob Murray, founder and CEO of Murray Energy Corp, told E&E News, referring to Pruitt's plan to hold a public debate about global warming. While attending an event at the conservative Heritage Foundation, Murray told the publication "he has been personally pushing Pruitt to challenge the endangerment finding, the scientific underpinning for past and future regulations on greenhouse gas emissions." Murray, who has been a strong backer of administration efforts to prop up the coal sector, says he met last week with Pruitt, who told him the red-team debate is imminent — and that the exercise is the first step toward a possible challenge to the endangerment finding.

Also of note: Several candidates for that "red team" role questioned scientific consensus on climate change at the Heritage event. "One theme they expressed is that carbon dioxide emissions from fossil fuels should no longer be considered a pollutant but instead an essential ingredient in maintaining a global population boom," E&E writes. Read it here.

Bueller? ... Bueller? The Sierra Club said the "coal executive" debate won't change the fact that temperatures and sea levels are rising, in a statement from National Resistance Campaign Director Maura Cowley. "Perhaps after Pruitt tries to create a false debate over climate science, he can establish a red and blue team to debate whether or not Ferris Bueller was indeed sick," Cowley said.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. I'm your host Kelsey Tamborrino. Send your thoughts, news and tips to ktamborrino@politico.com, mdaily@politico.com and njuliano@politico.com, and keep up with us on Twitter at @kelseytam, @dailym1, @nickjuliano, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

BARRASSO TO EPA: FINISH UP: The chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee is calling on EPA to quickly wrap up its studies on the environmental impact of the Renewable Fuel Standard — calling the lull "unacceptable." Republican Sen. John Barrasso hit the agency for delaying the resource conservation report until 2024, when there's a 2007 law in place that requires the agency to study and report to Congress whether the RFS will hurt air quality. EPA has also failed to update a review of the RFS' effects on resource conservation, Alex Guillén reports, something the agency's inspector general dinged last year. "Over the last several years, the U.S. Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works has heard increasing concerns about the environmental impacts of the RFS," Barrasso wrote in his letter. The chairman calls on the agency to complete the study by Sept. 30, 2018. Read the letter here.

FARENTHOLD UNMASKED: Rep. Blake Farenthold (R-Texas) used $84,000 in taxpayer money to settle a sexual harassment claim brought by his former communications director, POLITICO's Rachael Bade reports. That makes the Texas Republican the only known sitting member of Congress to have used a little-known congressional account to pay an accuser, sources told POLITICO. Lauren Greene sued Farenthold, a member of the House Oversight Committee, in December 2014 over allegations of gender discrimination, sexual harassment and creating a hostile work environment. "When she complained about comments Farenthold and a male staffer made to her, Greene said the congressman improperly fired her," Rachael writes. "... House Administration Chairman Gregg Harper (R-Miss.) told GOP lawmakers in a closed-door Friday morning meeting that only one House office in the past five years had used an Office of Compliance account to settle a sexual harassment complaint. Harper said in that one instance, the settlement totaled $84,000." Read more here.

LOL: Secretary of State Rex Tillerson today called reports that the White House is readying to fire him "laughable," POLITICO's Nolan McCaskill reports. The New York Times reported earlier this week that chief of staff John Kelly has created a plan to oust Tillerson and replace him with CIA Director Mike Pompeo, leaving Arkansas Sen. Tom Cotton to fill the void at the CIA. "It's laughable," Tillerson said of the plot, smiling. "It's laughable." The former Exxon Mobil CEO made two unscheduled trips to the White House on Thursday and was scheduled to return to the White House again today to meet with Trump and Libyan Prime Minister Fayez al-Sarraj and then lunch with the president and Defense Secretary Jim Mattis.

DEMOCRATIC SENATORS ASK IF TRUMP WILL REMOVE USDA LAND FROM MONUMENTS: Democratic Sens. Debbie Stabenow and Michael Bennett in a letter to Trump today him to clarify whether he intends to cut out any Forest Service-jurisdictional land when he shrinks Utah's Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante national monuments. Trump is expected to announce his decision on the two monuments Monday and Bennet and Stabenow, who is the ranking Democrat on the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee, said Trump's nominee for USDA general counsel testified that the agency did not recommend removing any of its forests from monument footprints.

— Arizona Rep. Ruben Gallego introduced a bill today to protect the Bears Ears monument. The bill "would protect the original acreage identified by the tribes as housing culturally sensitive artifacts and sacred lands," according to a release about the bill.

GLOBAL ACCORD MADE ON ARCTIC FISHING: Global powers have struck a deal to prevent fishing in parts of the Arctic, despite increased pressure from fishermen who are eyeing new waters opened by receding ice, POLITICO Europe's Kait Bolongaro reports. At a Washington meeting on Thursday, the U.S., along with the EU, China, Russia, Japan, Canada,

Denmark, Norway, South Korea and Iceland, negotiated a draft agreement preventing high-seas fishing in the central Arctic Ocean following five rounds of talks. Their agreement still needs to be signed and ratified, Kait writes, and "is intended to allow time for scientific research on the possibility of fishing in the Arctic." Read the draft agreement here.

OBAMA ADDRESSES CLIMATE, PARIS: Former President Barack Obama spoke to a leadership forum in India's capital today, where he said he couldn't debate climate change with people who claimed it wasn't real, the Associated Press reports. "If you're saying it's a hoax, then there's no way for us to bridge our differences in a constructive way," Obama said, while acknowledging that he could discuss the topic with people who said fossil fuels were necessary for growth in poorer nations, like India. Though Obama did not mention Trump by name, it's well known the president has called climate change a hoax.

The former president also praised India for helping broker the Paris climate agreement — Obama's landmark climate achievement, which Trump has said he will withdraw from. "It's an agreement, even though we have a little bit of a pause in American leadership, that is giving our children a fighting chance," Obama said.

LIGHTER CLICK: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement Director Scott Angelle checked out "3D seismic data on oil and gas in the Gulf." See it here.

QUICK HITS:

- Baker Hughes: U.S. drillers add oil rigs for second week in a row, Reuters.
- Judge questions Exxon's attempt to block climate fraud investigations, InsideClimate News.
- 5 takeaways from The Times's ClimateTECH conference, The New York Times.
- Google now sources 100 percent of its energy from renewables, Futurism.

WIDE WORLD OF POLITICS:

- Flynn pleads guilty to lying to the FBI
- Trump plans to declare Jerusalem the capital of Israel
- Black lawmakers wonder why Conyers has to go — but not Franken

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/newsletters/afternoon-energy/2017/12/trump-cruz-to-meet-on-biofuel-038463>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

White House ignores Cruz request for biofuels meeting Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/15/2017 09:55 AM EDT

The White House appears to have spurned a request from Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and eight other senators to set up a meeting with seven Midwestern senators to discuss the Renewable Fuel Standard.

"We won't have such a meeting," Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) told reporters today. "The White House would have to be interested in such a meeting. I've not heard from the White House."

Cruz has been blocking Iowan Bill Northey from becoming an undersecretary at the Department of Agriculture in an effort to force corn-state senators to discuss changes to the program. Last month he led a letter to President Donald Trump asking for a meeting within three weeks. That period ends today. Cruz has said he would lift the hold when he gets a meeting.

The White House did not respond to questions about setting up a meeting, nor did Cruz's office. Cruz sent a letter on Tuesday to Iowa Gov. Kim Reynolds explaining his desire to come to a compromise on the RFS to protect "liquid fuels."

Trump has consistently backed the RFS and the Midwestern senators in policy disputes, rejecting repeated efforts to change the program by a small group of refiners and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt.

WHAT'S NEXT: The final rule setting RFS requirements for 2018 and 2019 is due by Nov. 30.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump to meet with Cruz over biofuel policy Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Andrew Restuccia | 12/01/2017 04:04 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will meet with Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and several Cabinet members next week to discuss U.S. biofuel policy and fuel efficiency standards, an administration official told POLITICO on Friday.

The Thursday meeting is an attempt by the White House to reach a compromise between Cruz, who has held up a Trump nominee to the Agriculture Department nominee over the administration's support for the Renewable Fuel Standard, and the farm-state lawmakers who pressured EPA to back down from potential changes to the regulations for biofuels.

The White House had until now ignored Cruz's requests for a meeting. Cruz and eight other senators sent a letter in October requesting changes to the program overseen by EPA, which sets the minimum volumes of ethanol and biodiesel to be used in the fuel market. Refiners must either purchase the biofuels to blend with their gasoline or diesel fuel, or buy credits to show their compliance — credits the refiners say are too expensive and threaten to push some refiners out of business.

Cruz retains a hold on Trump's nomination of Bill Northey to a senior USDA post, a move seen as payback after EPA backed down from considering changes in how the biofuels program is implemented amid an outcry from farm-state lawmakers.

"The key here is they need to get Cruz something to get rid of that hold," said one industry representative familiar with the meeting.

The meeting will include Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Energy Secretary Rick Perry, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn, the administration official said, though the person added that the attendee list could change. No industry representatives are expected to attend.

While biofuels will most likely be the first topic discussed, attendees will also delve into the higher CAFE standards the Obama administration put into place, as well as octane requirements. The Trump administration has delayed implementing an increase in civil fines for automakers who violate the fuel economy standards, a move that triggered a lawsuit from environmentalists.

Cruz and Trump have had a rocky relationship in the past, including after Trump linked Cruz's father to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy during the 2016 campaign, though they have been on better terms in recent months.

Cruz's office did not reply to a request for comment, and the White House declined to comment.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump coal backer wins big under Perry's power plan Back

By Darius Dixon and Eric Wolff | 11/03/2017 05:01 AM EDT

A proposal by Energy Secretary Rick Perry to alter the nation's electricity markets would provide a windfall for a small group of companies — most strikingly one owned by coal magnate Bob Murray, a prominent backer of President Donald Trump.

Perry's plan would force consumers to subsidize ailing coal-fired and nuclear power plants with billions of dollars, in what he calls an effort to ensure that the nation's power network can withstand threats like terrorist attacks or severe weather. But his narrowly written proposal would mostly affect plants in a stretch of the Midwest and Northeast where Murray's mining company, Murray Energy, is the predominant supplier, according to a POLITICO analysis of Energy Department data.

The company and its PAC together sent $200,000 to pro-Trump election efforts last year, while Bob Murray threw an invitation-only West Virginia fundraiser for Trump in 2016.

Perry's proposal, which needs approval from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, is the Energy secretary's most aggressive step yet toward helping Trump reverse what he has denounced as former President Barack Obama's "war on coal." But while it would stimulate demand for coal, it would also increase power prices for millions of customers.

The plan has stirred up opposition from an unlikely gathering of allies, including environmental groups, the natural gas, wind and solar industries and the American Petroleum Institute, normally one of the fossil-energy world's most potent advocates in Republican politics. But it has drawn cheers from coal companies, particularly those with operations in Appalachia.

"Customers get less than nothing while a few companies and their investors get a whole lot of something," Nora Mead Brownell, a Republican former electricity regulator, said of Perry's plan, noting the high cost estimates. "Money that gets spent there doesn't get invested in doing what you really need to do, which is upgrading the grid."

Meanwhile, Bob Murray's company has publicly acknowledged that its future depends on whether Perry's plan flies.

"Murray Energy has a vital and critical interest in the outcome of this rulemaking proceeding," the company said last month in its comments to regulators. "Given the current threats to those resources, Murray Energy, along with other coal producers and related industries ... is threatened with bankruptcy and significant economic harm if those resources are forced out of the market by unreasonable and unsupportable market pricing mechanisms."

The company declined to comment on its financial status or its communications with the Trump administration. But Bob Murray has been vocal in urging Trump and Perry to aid the U.S. coal industry, after he attacked Obama as "the greatest destroyer that America has ever seen."

Since Trump's swearing-in, Murray has made personal pleas for help in face-to-face meetings with Trump and DOE officials, including Perry and Brian McCormack, Perry's chief of staff.

At those meetings in the summer, Murray urged Trump to declare a power grid emergency and force coal-fired power plants owned by one financially troubled company, FirstEnergy Solutions, to stay open even if the company sank into bankruptcy. Those plants bought about two-thirds of their coal from Murray in 2015, according to POLITICO's analysis of U.S. Energy Information Administration data.

At DOE's urging, the White House ultimately declined to declare the emergency. But Perry's new proposed rule would accomplish the same result by requiring the power markets to cover the costs to run the economically ailing plants, enabling them to keep producing power.

Ohio-based Murray Energy, the No. 5 U.S. coal producer, is the largest supplier to the dwindling number of coal-fired power plants in one stretch of the Rust Belt and Appalachia, overseen by an electricity market called the PJM Interconnection. The power plants in PJM account for roughly 44 percent of Murray's sales, according to POLITICO's analysis.

Murray's nearest competitor, industry leader Peabody Energy Corp., sold about 9 percent of its coal in that market. In total, Murray sold 24 million tons of coal to PJM merchant coal plants in 2015, far more than Peabody's 15 million tons.

"Murray is by far the largest player in the Northern Appalachian basin and de facto one of the biggest gainers if FERC acts on the DOE [proposal]," said Joe Aldina, director of coal research for the analytics and data company S&P Global.

DOE defended its proposal, and said there was a clear need for some type of action.

"There is broad and substantial support for this action beyond coal suppliers," DOE public affairs director Robert Haus said in an email, noting that even critics have called for some kind of market reform. "Filed public comments show that while supporters and critics differ on how to approach reforming the market, there is widespread consensus that FERC needs to act."

The proposal is not Perry's first effort to promote coal, which has seen its share of the national electricity supply slump from more than 50 percent a decade ago to about one-third now — a fall mostly caused by flat power consumption and gains by natural gas.

In August, Perry's department issued a report that raised questions about whether coal's decline could threaten the country's power system, and contending that coal power plants' ability to run around-the-clock and store large fuel inventories gives them advantages over natural gas or renewable power when it comes to national security. Those advantages don't help them, though, in competitive markets where power sources go head to head on price.

The DOE proposal calls for power market operators to guarantee payments to power plants that keep 90 days of fuel on site. That requirement would be virtually impossible for natural gas-fired power plants to meet — they get their fuel via pipelines — and would totally exclude wind or solar plants.

By requiring 90 days of on-site fuel, the measure would create incentives for most coal-fired power plants to increase their fuel supplies, providing a quick boost for miners.

One recent analysis by consulting firm ICF said the proposal could cost nearly $4 billion a year, while another study by Energy Innovation, a nonprofit firm that analyzes climate and energy policies, said the figure could be as high as $10.6 billion annually. Perry has dismissed concerns over the costs, asking "What's the cost of freedom?" when pressed by lawmakers.

"It's about the coal producers, frankly," said Kit Konolige, a senior utilities analyst with Bloomberg Intelligence. The rule might affect individual power producers differently, he added, but "you can certainly say it would definitely be a plus for coal miners."

Players in the power business say the rule appears to focus on the PJM market, because it would only apply to electricity generators in certain types of regional power markets. It would exclude those in regions where state regulators oversee the economics of power companies.

The rule was "certainly targeted at the PJM region," said Andy Ott, CEO of PJM, which oversees all or parts of Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Among the nation's roughly 280,000 megawatts of coal-fired power, Perry's rule is tightly written to affect only about 40,000 megawatts, according to POLITICO's analysis. Power capacity from plants owned by the companies FirstEnergy and NRG account for nearly 40 percent of that slice, according to EIA data for 2015, the most recent year for which the information is complete. Murray provided two-thirds of the coal FirstEnergy bought for its competitive plants, and only 2 percent of NRG's.

Among those plants that would benefit from the plan are four coal power generating units at FirstEnergy's Murray-supplied Sammis plant in Ohio that are set to retire within the next three years. FirstEnergy, the parent of the troubled FirstEnergy Solutions subsidiary, could see its plants sell an additional \$500 million in electricity a year if Perry's plan is enacted, but its CEO played down the notion that Perry's effort was designed to help it.

"I don't think the DOE initiative has anything to do with FirstEnergy, despite what's been reported in some of the media," CEO Chuck Jones said on an earnings call with analysts. "I think it has to do with preserving critical fuel-secure baseload generating facilities — and I think that's what it'll do, whether FirstEnergy owns them or [FirstEnergy Solutions] creditors own them or whether FES creditors sell them to a third party that we don't even know of today."

The fate of Perry's proposed rule ultimately falls to the leaders of FERC, an independent agency largely made up of technocrats that have developed the power market rules over two decades. (The agency is overseen by a five-member bipartisan panel of presidential nominees.) Perry has directed the agency to take "final action" by Dec. 11, though the agency is not required to follow his timeline.

DOE's proposal has attracted vociferous opposition from power producers and trade groups representing wind, solar and natural gas energy, and has been criticized by five former FERC chairs from both parties. Dynegy and NRG Energy, two of the power companies likely to see the biggest benefits from the plan — and which have big investments in PJM competitive coal plants — also oppose the proposal as too expensive and a distortion of the market.

DOE's plan would also provide a lifeline to money-losing nuclear plants owned by Exelon Corp., NextEra Energy and FirstEnergy. But the coal industry says its situation is the more dire.

"We don't have time to wait for regular order," said Paul Bailey, CEO of the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, noting that DOE's plan wasn't the first to tackle problems in the power markets.

"The DOE-FERC proposal just magnifies the conversation that's going on and made it more urgent. What DOE did was good," he said. "Clearly, people are focusing on this right now to a degree they wouldn't have six months ago. No doubt about that."

Alex Guillén contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Barrasso presses EPA to quickly finish RFS studies Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/01/2017 11:22 AM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) pressed EPA today to quickly finish studies of the Renewable Fuel Standard's environmental impacts.

The 2007 law shaping the RFS required EPA to study and report to Congress on whether the RFS will hurt air quality, which the agency has not done. EPA has also failed to update a review of the RFS' effects on resource conservation. EPA's inspector general dinged EPA last year for failing to complete those studies.

"Over the last several years, the U.S. Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works has heard increasing concerns about the environmental impacts of the RFS," Barrasso wrote in his letter.

The agency plans to finish the resource conservation report by the end of this month, but Barrasso blasted the 2024 target to complete the air quality impact study, calling it "unacceptable."

"EPA cannot ignore the will of Congress and the requirements of the Clean Air Act for 17 years," he wrote. "I ask that you complete this study no later than September 30, 2018."

To view online click here.

Back

Lawmaker behind secret $84K sexual harassment settlement unmasked Back

By Rachael Bade | 12/01/2017 12:24 PM EDT

Rep. Blake Farenthold used taxpayer money to settle a sexual harassment claim brought by his former spokesman — the only known sitting member of Congress to have used a little-known congressional account to pay an accuser, people familiar with the matter told POLITICO.

Lauren Greene, the Texas Republican's former communications director, sued her boss in December 2014 over allegations of gender discrimination, sexual harassment and creating a hostile work environment.

Greene said another Farenthold aide told her the lawmaker said he had "sexual fantasies" and "wet dreams" about Greene. She also claimed that Farenthold "regularly drank to excess" and told her in February 2014 that he was "estranged from his wife and had not had sex with her in years."

When she complained about comments Farenthold and a male staffer made to her, Greene said the congressman improperly fired her. She filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia, but the case was later dropped after both parties reached a private settlement.

No information was ever released on that agreement.

House Administration Committee Chairman Gregg Harper (R-Miss.) told GOP lawmakers in a closed-door Friday morning meeting that only one House office in the past five years had used an Office of Compliance account to settle a sexual harassment complaint. Harper said in that one instance, the settlement totaled $84,000.

In a statement for this story, Farenthold would neither confirm or deny that his office was responsible for that $84,000 payout.

"While I 100% support more transparency with respect to claims against members of Congress, I can neither confirm nor deny that settlement involved my office as the Congressional Accountability Act prohibits me from answering that question," Farenthold said in a statement.

Greene's lawyer, Les Alderman of Alderman, Devorsetz & Hora PLLC, also would not say whether Greene was the woman who received the $84,000 Harper referred to.

But in a joint statement both Greene and Farenthold prepared at the time of the settlement but never released — a copy of which was shared with POLITICO by Alderman on Friday — the two confirmed they reached a deal in part to save taxpayer dollars.

"[A]fter it became clear that further litigating this case would come at great expense to all involved — including the taxpayers — the parties engaged in mediation with a court-appointed mediator," the statement read. "After extensive discussion and consideration, the parties jointly agreed to accept the solution proposed by the mediator."

The statement added: "The parties believe that the mediator's solution saves the parties, and the taxpayers, significant sums that would be expended in further discovery and/or trial."

The statement also states that Farenthold "disagrees strongly" with his client's allegations and "adamantly denies that he engaged in any wrongdoing." It says the settlement included a confidentiality agreement that precludes Greene and Farenthold from discussing the case and "expressly provides that both parties deny all liability."

The Office of Congressional Ethics also investigated Greene's allegations. In a letter to the House Ethics Committee the watchdog said "there is not substantial reason to believe that Representative Farenthold sexually harassed or discriminated against [ex-staffer Lauren Greene], or engaged in an effort to intimidate, take reprisal against, or discriminate against [Greene] for opposing such treatment, in violation of House rules and federal law."

It was unclear Friday afternoon whether the discovery would have political ramifications for Farenthold, who rode the Tea Party wave to Congress in 2010. The 55-year-old hails from the the southeast corner of Texas, a safe area for Republicans.

However, a federal panel ruled over the summer that the district was drawn primarily based on race and violated the Constitution and the Voting Rights Act. Farenthold has said he would seek reelection, despite the fact that the make-up of his district may soon change and include more Democratic areas.

The filing deadline for someone to challenge Farenthold is Dec. 11.

Even if he isn't challenged, Farenthold is likely to face repercussions from fellow House Republicans for using taxpayer money to settle a harassment claim. Recent reports, including in POLITICO, revealed that $17 million has been paid out quietly to settle workplace disputes.

Harper said Friday that only $360,000 of that total involved a House office.

That, however, won't stem demands from conservatives that members who have been part of such settlements use their own personal money to reimburse the treasury.

Farenthold has a minimum net worth of $2.4 million, according to his most recent financial disclosure form.

Farenthold, a graduate of St. Mary's University School of Law, practice law for several years after college. He also worked as a radio disc jockey while in school. He later founded a web design and consulting firm before running for Congress.

Greene came to Capitol Hill as an intern in 2009, and was later promoted to full time in the office of ex-Rep. John Sullivan (R-Oak.). In early 2013, she moved to Farenthold's office, where she stayed for 18 months before her July 2014 firing.

According to Greene's complaint in court, Farenthold and his top aide, Bob Haueter, sexually harassed her, allegations that both men vehemently denied.

"Farenthold regularly drank to excess, and because of his tendency to flirt, the staffers who accompanied him to Capitol Hill functions would joke that they had to be on 'red head patrol to keep him out of trouble,'" Greene's complaint alleged. "On one occasion, prior to February 2014, during a staff meeting at which [Greene] was in attendance, Farenthold disclosed that a female lobbyist had propositioned him for a 'threesome.'"

The complaint added: "On June 10, 2014, in response to Haueter's complaint about [Greene's] shirt ... which Haueter claimed was transparent and showed [Greene's] nipples, Farenthold told [another woman staffer] that [Greene] could show her nipples whenever she wanted to," Greene's complaint asserted.

Greene said Farenthold avoided meeting one-on-one with her, and she also felt awkward about meeting with Farenthold.

When Greene complained to Farenthold directly in June 2014 about her problems with Haueter, she was "marginalized and undermined" by the Texas Republican, and then fired several weeks later, Greene asserted.

Greene took the matter to the Office of Compliance, which handles workplace disputes. She went through a month of mandatory counseling and mediation before filing suit.

John Bresnahan contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Tillerson dismisses reports of plan to oust him: 'It's laughable' Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 12/01/2017 10:47 AM EDT

Secretary of State Rex Tillerson on Friday called reports of a White House plan to oust him "laughable."

White House chief of staff John Kelly has created a plan to force Tillerson out of the State Department, according to The New York Times, which reported Thursday that CIA Director Mike Pompeo would succeed him, with Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) favored to take over the CIA.

"It's laughable," he said of the plot, smiling. "It's laughable."

Tillerson made two unscheduled trips to the White House on Thursday. He is scheduled to return to the White House again on Friday to meet with President Donald Trump and Libyan Prime Minister Fayed al-Sarraj and then lunch with the president and Defense Secretary Jim Mattis.

State Department spokeswoman Heather Nauert told reporters on Thursday that Tillerson remains "committed to doing this job." She stressed, however, that Tillerson serves at the pleasure of the president.

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said there were no personnel changes to announce Thursday and indicated that Trump maintains confidence in his secretary of State, despite their strained relationship.

"When the president loses confidence in someone, they will no longer serve in the capacity that they're in," she told reporters at Thursday's briefing.

Sanders called Tillerson "tough" and predicted that "he'll be just fine carrying his job out." Nauert similarly said Tillerson is an "unflappable" leader "whose feathers don't get ruffled very easily."

As of Thursday, Tillerson had not discussed the Times report with Trump, Nauert said. She acknowledged that Trump and Tillerson have policy disagreements but insisted the president respects his chief diplomat.

"I know that they've had certainly a cordial relationship," she said. "Where that relationship is today, I can't speak to that."

To view online click here.

Back

Global powers strike deal to prevent a scramble for Arctic fish Back

By Kait Bolongaro | 12/01/2017 01:48 PM EDT

The world's leading powers have reached a deal not to fish in the Arctic despite pressure from fishermen wanting to exploit new waters opened up by receding ice.

At a meeting in Washington late Thursday, the EU, the U.S., China, Russia, Japan, Canada, Denmark, Norway, South Korea and Iceland negotiated a draft agreement to prevent high-seas fishing in the central Arctic Ocean after five rounds of talks.

They agreed a moratorium on unregulated commercial fishing in 2.8 million square kilometers of the high seas in the heart of the central Arctic Ocean, a pristine fishing ground slightly larger than the Mediterranean. Their accord, which still needs to be signed and ratified, is intended to allow time for scientific research on the possibility of fishing in the Arctic.

Disappearing Arctic ice has sparked fears among environmentalists of a gold rush among fishermen and energy companies. Among the trawlermen, the main species of interest is Arctic cod.

"Commercial fishing has never been known to occur in this area, nor is it likely to occur in the near future," said a statement from the chairman of the Washington meeting. It added Thursday's agreement would create a scientific research program to determine whether "fish stocks exist in this area that could be harvested on a sustainable basis."

The agreement is not only the first of its kind in this region but also marks a shift in Arctic policymaking by including non-Arctic European and east Asian countries in developing the policy.

"I have been heartened to see that the EU and Asian nations have come to negotiations in a serious way," said Scott Highleyman, vice president at the Ocean Conservancy, a U.S.-based organization.

Bringing Asia into the fold

The U.S. was the driving force behind the agreement after it banned the expansion of commercial fisheries in its Arctic waters in 2009. Negotiations began in 2013 and five countries — the U.S., Canada, Russia, Norway and Denmark — signed a declaration in 2015 to push the agreement forward.

Since the election of President Donald Trump, Canada has taken the lead on the file. Ottawa is pushing to host the planned joint research and monitoring program.

Despite not being members of the Arctic Council, negotiators opted to include China, Japan and Korea — three of the world's most powerful fishing nations — into the agreement. Several experts said the Asian presence was vital to ensuring any international accord would be enforceable given the region's legal gray zone and because China and South Korea both have active ice-breaker fleets.

Dr. Peiqing Guo, one of the lead Chinese Arctic experts working on the agreement and professor at the Ocean University of China, said Beijing was keen to play a key role in the Arctic as China solidifies its influence worldwide. Guo said that part of that strategy includes developing international laws and structures to regulate the Arctic, including in international waters.

"I think China will respect the leading role played by Arctic coastal states and offer wisdom for Arctic governance instead of raising unreasonable demands. Surely, China expects to be respected and treated fairly. That is to say, mutual respect between China and Arctic coastal states," Guo said.

Tokyo is also eager to be involved because Japan's presence in the Arctic is an important part of Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's "panoramic view of diplomacy," according to Dr. Fujio Ohnishi, one of the Japanese delegation's leading Arctic researchers based at Hokkaido University.

"The Arctic is considered a very good place to realize this since it is a new issue," Ohnishi said. "But a secondary factor is that environmental change in the Arctic region affects countries like Japan."

This article first appeared on POLITICO.EU on Dec. 1, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

Flynn pleads guilty to lying to the FBI Back

By Josh Gerstein, Matthew Nussbaum and Theodoric Meyer | 12/01/2017 09:30 AM EDT

Former national security adviser Michael Flynn pleaded guilty on Friday to one felony count of lying to the FBI about conversations he had with Russia's ambassador last year, bringing the special counsel's investigation into the 2016 election deeper into President Donald Trump's inner circle.

Prosecutors said Flynn's conversations about sanctions with then-Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak in late December 2016 appeared to come after input from at least two other top members of Trump's presidential transition team.

A Republican close to the White House indicated that Jared Kushner, the president's son-in-law, was one of the transition officials named in the Flynn plea documents.

Flynn's guilty plea came as part of a deal with special counsel Robert Mueller's team, as it investigates Russian interference in the election and whether any members of the Trump campaign were involved. Flynn has pledged to cooperate fully with the ongoing investigation, including by testifying in any other criminal cases prosecutors file.

The guilty plea, made in federal court in Washington, is the latest turn of fortune for Flynn, a retired Army general who served as national security adviser for less than a month. He is accused of lying to FBI agents in January, shortly after the inauguration, about his conversations with Kislyak.

The plea also represents a devastating moment for the Trump White House, which has at various times dismissed Russian interference in the election as "fake news" and predicted that the investigation would wrap up by the end of the year.

Adding to the administration's woes, the explosive news came as Republican senators on Capitol Hill scrambled to cobble together enough votes to push through a major tax cut bill, the administration's top legislative priority. With a vote expected Friday, the day was set to be a potential high watermark for a White House that has struggled to advance substantive legislation nearly a year into Trump's first term as it has dealt with the continually brewing Russia controversy.

Flynn admitted that he told agents that he had not asked Kislyak to avoid escalating tensions over sanctions imposed by former President Barack Obama, and he also told agents he had not asked Kislyak to delay or defeat a pending resolution at the U.N. Security Council. Both of those statements proved to be false, according to court documents.

At the hearing where Flynn entered his guilty plea Friday, prosecutor Brandon Van Grack offered additional details that appeared to connect Flynn's Russian contacts to the highest levels of the Trump transition team. Van Grack said Flynn spoke with Kislyak about sanctions after a phone call on the topic with "a senior official of the transition team at Mar-a-Lago."

"Immediately after that phone call, the defendant called the Russian ambassador," Van Grack said.

Van Grack also said that the conversation with Kislyak that Flynn lied about regarding the U.N. resolution came at the direction of "a very senior member" of the Trump transition team. The prosecutor did not further identify that individual.

The resolution in question was proposed by Egypt to reprimand the Israeli government over settlement activity.

"A very senior member of the Presidential transition team directed Flynn to contact officials from foreign governments, including Russia, to learn where each government stood on the resolution and to influence those governments to delay the vote or defeat the resolution," said a written statement of facts signed by Flynn and prosecutors.

Prosecutors did not allege that anyone told Flynn to lie about his talks with the Russian ambassador, which is the crime the former national security adviser admitted to Friday.

However, the sequence of events suggests the possibility that Flynn made the false statements to the FBI not only to protect himself from a potential criminal charge for conducting unauthorized diplomatic activity, but perhaps to prevent others in Trump's orbit from falling under suspicion under that two-century-old, rarely used statute.

The White House has consistently said the national security adviser misled top aides and officials — including Vice President Mike Pence, who led the transition — about his sanctions conversations. On Friday, the administration sought to play down the severity of the situation, pointing to Flynn's brief tenure.

"Today, Michael Flynn, a former National Security Advisor at the White House for 25 days during the Trump Administration, and a former Obama administration official, entered a guilty plea to a single count of making a false statement to the FBI," White House attorney Ty Cobb said in a statement. "The false statements involved mirror the false statements to White House officials which resulted in his resignation in February of this year. Nothing about the guilty plea or the charge implicates anyone other than Mr. Flynn. The conclusion of this phase of the Special Counsel's work demonstrates again that the Special Counsel is moving with all deliberate speed and clears the way for a prompt and reasonable conclusion."

But charging documents only deepened scrutiny of who knew what, and when. It remains unclear which transition official directed Flynn to contact Russia about the U.N. resolution, and which official discussed the sanctions conversation with him. The documents also note that "other senior members" of the transition were at Mar-a-Lago when the sanctions conversation took place, raising the prospect that numerous officials were aware of the contact.

Pence, who was still governor of Indiana during the transition, has maintained that he was unaware of the content of Flynn's conversations with Kislyak. Pence was in Indiana on Dec.

21 and was slated to stay there through the holidays, according to reports at the time. He hosted his son's wedding at the governor's residence in Indianapolis on Dec. 28, and remained in the state, with the exception of a day trip to Chicago for fundraising on Dec. 30, through the end of the year.

Flynn, 58, wearing a gray suit and striped tie, stood for more than half an hour Friday morning at a lectern in the crowded courtroom of U.S. District Judge Rudolph Contreras. Flanked by his defense attorneys Robert Kelner and Stephen Anthony, the retired general seemed calm as he gave "yes" or "no" answers to a series of routine questions about whether he understood the rights he was waiving by pleading guilty.

"Mr. Flynn, I assume you've never been through this process?" asked Contreras, an appointee of President Barack Obama.

"Never, your Honor," Flynn replied.

Near the end of the lengthy back-and-forth, Contreras asked: "Do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Guilty, your Honor," Flynn said.

There were immediate signs that prosecutors are seeking to leverage Flynn's information to press forward with their investigation. No immediate sentencing date was set and Flynn was released on his own recognizance, with instructions to report to the court's probation department once a week.

Van Grack sought to put off further proceedings regarding Flynn for three months, but the judge told both sides to report to the court in writing by Feb. 1 on the status of the case. The plea agreement also includes a provision discussing the possibility that Flynn may provide information that helps prosecutors charge or convict someone else.

Flynn made no comment as he braved a crowd of reporters and camera crews to depart the courthouse after the 40-minute hearing.

In a written statement distributed by his attorneys, Flynn seemed to acknowledge that what he did was serious, but suggested it was not as grave as some of the most serious accusations made against him in recent months.

"It has been extraordinarily painful to endure these many months of false accusations of 'treason' and other outrageous acts," the retired lieutenant general and former Defense Intelligence Agency chief said. "Such false accusations are contrary to everything I have ever done and stood for. But I recognize that the actions I acknowledged in court today were wrong, and, through my faith in God, I am working to set things right. My guilty plea and agreement to cooperate with the Special Counsel's Office reflect a decision I made in the best interests of my family and of our country."

The mention of his family may have been in reference to his son Michael Flynn Jr., who served as a top aide to his father and has reportedly also come under investigators' scrutiny.

The new charge brings the criminal case into the Trump White House and raise questions about who else in the administration Mueller could be eyeing. And the news comes as a blow for the president, who defended Flynn even after he fired him for lying to Pence about the same conversations with Kislyak. Former FBI Director James Comey has said Trump asked him in February to go easy on Flynn. Trump later fired Comey.

Flynn's alleged misstatements to the bureau predate Mueller's investigation. He was named special counsel in May, taking over a series of pending investigations related to Russia after Comey's firing.

Comey took to Twitter on Friday with a message that seemed to be in response to the news: "'But [let] justice roll down like waters and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream' Amos 5:24."

Flynn was photographed and fingerprinted Friday morning at the FBI's Washington field office, as two other Trump associates, Paul Manafort and Rick Gates, were when they were charged in October. While declining to comment on Flynn specifically, an FBI source explained that this is the normal process for any arrest.

Flynn's charge comes with a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Defendants usually get far less than the maximum, particularly when they cooperate with prosecutors.

Flynn's conversations with Kislyak, especially his attempts to undercut the Obama administration's policy, appear well outside the purview of traditional actions taken during a transition.

"All governments want to meet with transition officials during the transfer of power from one president to another," Michael McFaul, a former top Obama administration official who would serve as the U.S. ambassador to Russia from 2012 to 2014, said in an emailed statement to POLITICO. "In 2008, we tried to minimize these interactions and focus on building our new foreign policy team. I never once spoke with a Russian official during the transition. That said, there is also a deft way to talk to governments about YOUR future policy ideas, abstractly, without interfering in the policies of the incumbent administration."

Democrats, meanwhile, reacted to the charge with apparent glee.

"Lock him up, lock him up, lock him up, lock him up," Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.) wrote on Twitter, repurposing the "lock her up" chant that was a hallmark of Trump's campaign, and that Flynn himself at times deployed.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the ranking member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in a statement: "Michael Flynn's guilty plea is about more than just lying to the FBI. What he lied about and when he did it are of even greater significance. This shows a Trump associate negotiating with the Russians against U.S. policy and interests before Donald Trump took office and after it was announced that Russia had interfered in our election. That's a stunning revelation and could be a violation of the Logan Act, which forbids unauthorized U.S. citizens from negotiating with a foreign power."

In 2016, Flynn was the rare establishment-type figure to come out vocally as a Trump supporter, earning him a prime speaking slot at the Republican National Convention, where, invoking Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton, he joined the crowd in chants of "Lock her up!" Trump even considered picking Flynn as his running mate, and he appeared to relish in the support from someone who served more than three decades in the military, working as a top intelligence officer in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Flynn had publicly soured on Trump's predecessor after he was ousted as the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency in 2014 by Obama, who later warned Trump against hiring Flynn. Trump ignored the warning and tapped Flynn to be his national security adviser the week after the election.

But even as he was advising Trump during the campaign, Flynn was also lobbying for a firm run by a Turkish-American businessman with ties to the Turkish government. The firm paid Flynn's company, the Flynn Intel Group, more than $500,000 last year as part of a campaign to discredit Fethullah Gulen, a Turkish cleric living in Pennsylvania whom the Turkish government has blamed for instigating a failed coup, according to lobbying disclosures.

Flynn retroactively registered with the Justice Department in March as a foreign agent because his lobbying work "could be construed to have principally benefited the Republic of Turkey," as Kelner, the defense attorney, wrote in a letter at the time. But Flynn admitted in a document released by the special counsel on Friday that he'd lied about the work he did in the registration, which Flynn's lawyers portrayed at the time as his coming clean about his lobbying work.

Flynn admitted to making "materially false statements and omissions" in his retroactive registration, including lying about the fact that the Turkish government officials were supervising and directing the work. He also misrepresented his lobbying work by stating that it was "focused on improving U.S. business organizations' confidence regarding doing business in Turkey," and lied about an op-ed he published in The Hill on Election Day in which he compared Gulen to Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini. Flynn stated in the registration in March that he'd written the op-ed voluntarily and not on behalf of Turkey or anyone else.

The document, which Flynn signed on Thursday under penalty of perjury, also contradicts the account of Ekim Alptekin, the Turkish-American businessman who hired Flynn through his company, Inovo BV. Alptekin told POLITICO in an interview in March that the Turkish government had no involvement in directing Flynn's work and that Flynn had written the op-ed in The Hill of his own accord.

"I really think that he's not very politically savvy," Alptekin said at the time. "He acts on his motivational impulse."

Unlike Manafort and Gates, Flynn hasn't been charged with breaking foreign lobbying law, perhaps because he is cooperating with Mueller's team.

Flynn's potential legal troubles extend beyond his lobbying.

Before joining Trump's campaign, he received more than $65,000 from RT, Russia's state-owned TV network, and two other Russian companies in connection with a trip to Moscow in 2015 to give a speech. Retired military personnel are barred from receiving payments from foreign governments without permission, which Flynn apparently did not obtain. Flynn also failed to mention the trip or the payments when filling out a security clearance form in January, according to Rep. Elijah Cummings of Maryland, the ranking Democrat on the House Oversight Committee. Knowingly lying on such forms is a felony.

In May, CNN reported that federal prosecutors were issuing grand jury subpoenas in Alexandria, Va., to associates of Flynn's. Later reports indicated that he asked for immunity in exchange for congressional testimony, but the request was denied. In September, his family set up a fund to accept contributions to pay for his legal defense.

Darren Samuelsohn, Andrew Restuccia and Louis Nelson contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump plans to declare Jerusalem the capital of Israel Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 12/01/2017 01:07 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and his senior aides are preparing for a Wednesday announcement that the United States recognizes Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, according to a senior administration official.

The official said the specifics of the announcement are still in flux, adding that the White House is considering having Trump unveil the plan during a speech at the National Defense University in Washington.

The move, coupled with plans under consideration to eventually move the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, could complicate efforts by Trump's son-in-law and adviser Jared Kushner to restart peace talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians.

Aides have said plans are still in flux and may change. The president had faced a Friday deadline under a 1995 law to issue a waiver allowing the embassy to remain in Tel Aviv, something presidents have routinely done since 1999.

Trump promised as a candidate to move the embassy, a longstanding concern of some American Jews and evangelical voters. He deferred taking such a step in June, signing a waiver in order to give Kushner time to work on his peace plan.

A White House spokesman said Thursday: "The president has always said it is a matter of when, not if. The president is still considering options and we have nothing to announce."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

<input type="radio"/>
Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to

<https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Energy
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Afternoon Energy: Trump's fake news on climate — Taking stock of Congress — SCOTUS wants Trump thoughts on mining dispute
Date: Monday, May 15, 2017 4:09:23 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 05/15/2017 04:04 PM EDT

With help from Alex Guillén, Esther Whieldon and Annie Snider

HOW A FAKE CLIMATE MEME GOT ON TRUMP'S DESK: President Donald Trump rarely surfs the web on his own, POLITICO's Shane Goldmacher reports — but his staff have made a habit of slipping news stories onto his desk, including the occasional internet hoax, in an attempt to press their advantage on policy.

Deputy national security adviser K.T. McFarland gave the president a printout of two Time magazine covers. One, supposedly from the 1970s, warned of a coming ice age; the other, from 2008, about surviving global warming. After reading the material, Trump quickly got riled about the media's hypocrisy. But there was a problem: The 1970s cover was fake, part of an internet hoax that's circulated for years. Staff chased down the truth and intervened before Trump tweeted or talked publicly about it. Read more here.

TAKING STOCK: POLITICO's Maggie Severns investigates Congress' most eager stock traders and found 28 House members and six senators each traded more than 100 stocks in the past two years. That places them in the potential cross hairs of a conflict of interest on a regular basis, and a handful of lawmakers, some of them frequent traders and some not, disproportionately trade in companies that also have an interest in their work on Capitol Hill.

Included in that group is Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker, who was an original cosponsor of a bill to eliminate the oil export ban in 2015, Maggie reports. Corker bought shares in Chesapeake Energy, which was part of a coalition pushing for an end to the ban, in the months leading up to Congress passing the legislation. Also of note: Oregon Democratic Rep. Kurt Schrader, who sits on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has made a substantial number of trades so far this year in companies that have an interest in the committee's health and energy work, including Exxon Mobil, Marathon Oil and Gas, Conoco Phillips, Pfizer and Eli Lilly. Schrader has made close to 700 stock trades over the past two years. Read more here.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy and happy Monday! I'm your host Kelsey Tamborrino, flagging this news that the Capitol Reflecting Pool is now more easily duck accessible. Send your thoughts, news and tips to ktamborrino@politico.com, mdaily@politico.com and njuliano@politico.com, and keep up with us on Twitter at @kelseytam, @daily1, @nickjuliano, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

SEIA CEO SAYS TRADE FIX NOT NEEDED: Solar Energy Industries Association CEO Abigail Ross Hopper in a press call today said she doesn't really see a need for any kind of trade fix in response to Suniva's request to impose trade restrictions on imported solar cells and modules. "The best way to deal with oversupply is let the market act," Hopper said. The association has come out in opposition to Suniva's petition to the U.S. International Trade Commission, arguing it would do more damage than good to US jobs and local manufacturing. Hopper added that a supply glut in the market is a common occurrence and doesn't necessarily equal dumping.

EARTHJUSTICE QUESTIONS BERNHARDT RECUSAL PLEDGE: Earthjustice in a letter to the White House Friday argued Trump's nominee for Interior Deputy Secretary, David Bernhardt, is flouting the president's ethics guidelines that require lobbyists appointed to government positions to recuse themselves from issues involving past clients for two years. Bernhardt has pledged to avoid past clients for one year. "If confirmed, Mr. Bernhardt would be charged with overseeing a vast array of public lands, wildlife and waterways related policy areas," the letter says. "A one-year recusal would not sufficiently address these conflicts and would call into serious question the administration's commitment to transparency, accountable and ethical government."

SCOTUS WANTS TRUMP THOUGHTS ON MINING DISPUTE: The Supreme Court today asked the Trump administration to weigh in on a case about state bans on mining practices on federal lands. Justices are considering the case of a gold miner prosecuted by California for using suction dredge mining, a practice prohibited by the state, to search for gold in riverbeds on a claim in a federal forest. Such a request does not indicate the justices necessarily will take the appeal, but it does mean they are giving it a closer look. The case is 16-790, Brandon Rinehart v. California.

LET THE MEETINGS BEGIN: Supporters of the Obama administration's Waters of the U.S. rule are lining up to lobby the White House as its regulatory shop considers the Trump administration's first step towards undoing it. The Natural Resources Defense Council, Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership, and Alliance of Nurses for Healthy Environments, have meetings set up over the next week and a half with the Office of information and Regulatory Affairs, which is reviewing a rule proposal from EPA to withdraw the Obama administration rule and formally revert to the previous guidelines — which remained in effect after a federal court stayed the WOTUS rule. That proposed rule is the first step as the Trump administration's EPA sets about writing its own rule defining which streams and wetlands are protected under the Clean Water Act.

MOVERS, SHAKERS: Republican lobbying firm CGCN Group is bringing on Mike Freeman as a partner. Freeman was previously counsel on the House Natural Resources Committee and before that, worked as an energy and natural resources adviser to Sen. Mike Lee. He also previously was an attorney-adviser at FERC. Freeman is not subject to the House's cooling-off period for senior staffers, meaning he's allowed to lobby his former colleagues immediately. (h/t POLITICO Influence)

CRES FORMS (c)(3): Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions today announced the launch of its CRES Forum, a 501(c)(3) nonpartisan, nonprofit organization that "will educate the public and influence the national conversation about commonsense clean energy solutions," CRES said. Charles Hernick will serve as CRES Forum's director of policy and advocacy, as well as lead the organization's policy work. In a statement, Hernick said, "It is time for commonsense, market-friendly clean energy solutions to address America's energy challenges."

FIGHT OVER FLOOD INSURANCE: A House Republican plan that would reduce the availability of government flood insurance is drawing opposition from industry groups, Pro Financial Services' Zachary Warmbrodt reports. "Insurers and builders are preparing to push back against the House Financial Services Committee's proposed overhaul of the National Flood Insurance Program, which helps protect millions of homeowners from the economic risks of flooding, but is saddled with $24.6 billion in debt following catastrophic hurricanes." More here.

QUICK HITS:

- OPEC, Russia hint at extending output cuts into 2018; oil jumps, FuelFix.
- Energy Secretary Rick Perry: I would Have Let James Comey Go If I Were President, Fox News Radio.
- Solar, wind industries pitch job growth to new administration, Bloomberg BNA.
- An endangered Republican's quest to whip votes, win allies, E&E News.

WIDE WORLD OF POLITICS:

- GOP plans could kill one of Trump's favorite tax breaks
- Sweepstakes heat up for FBI chief
- Is it time for Trump staff to lawyer up?

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/afternoon-energy/2017/05/trumps-fake-news-on-climate-022842>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

How Trump gets his fake news Back

By Shane Goldmacher | 05/15/2017 05:20 AM EDT

White House chief of staff Reince Priebus issued a stern warning at a recent senior staff meeting: Quit trying to secretly slip stuff to President Trump.

Just days earlier, K.T. McFarland, the deputy national security adviser, had given Trump a printout of two Time magazine covers. One, supposedly from the 1970s, warned of a coming ice age; the other, from 2008, about surviving global warming, according to four White House officials familiar with the matter.

Trump quickly got lathered up about the media's hypocrisy. But there was a problem. The 1970s cover was fake, part of an Internet hoax that's circulated for years. Staff chased down the truth and intervened before Trump tweeted or talked publicly about it.

The episode illustrates the impossible mission of managing a White House led by an impetuous president who has resisted structure and strictures his entire adult life.

While the information stream to past commanders-in-chief has been tightly monitored, Trump prefers an open Oval Office with a free flow of ideas and inputs from both official and unofficial channels. And he often does not differentiate between the two. Aides sometimes slip him stories to press their advantage on policy; other times they do so to gain an edge in the seemingly endless "Game of Thrones" inside the West Wing.

The consequences can be tremendous, according to a half-dozen White House officials and others with direct interactions with the president. A news story tucked into Trump's hands at the right moment can torpedo an appointment or redirect the president's entire agenda. Current and former Trump officials say Trump can react volcanically to negative press clips, especially those with damaging leaks, becoming engrossed in finding out where they originated.

That is what happened in late February when someone mischievously gave the president a printed copy of an article from GotNews.com, the website of Internet provocateur Charles C. Johnson, which accused deputy chief of staff Katie Walsh of being "the source behind a bunch of leaks" in the White House.

No matter that Johnson had been permanently banned from Twitter for harassment or that he offered no concrete evidence or that he's lobbed false accusations in the past and recanted them. Trump read the article and began asking staff about Walsh. Johnson told POLITICO that he tracks the IP addresses of visitors to his website and added: "I can tell you unequivocally that the story was shared all around the White House."

White House chief strategist Steve Bannon defended Walsh, who has since left the administration to advise a pro-Trump group, in a statement to POLITICO: "Katie was a key member of the team and is a trusted friend and ally of the White House. No one in the White House took that article seriously." Walsh declined to comment.

But the smear of one of Priebus' closest allies - Walsh was his chief of staff at the Republican National Committee — vaulted from an obscure web posting to the topic of heated conversation in the West Wing, setting off mini internal investigations into who had backstabbed Walsh.

When Trump bellows about this or that story, his aides often scramble in a game of cat-and-mouse to figure out who alerted the president to the piece in the first place given that he rarely browses the Internet on his own. Some in the White House describe getting angry calls from the president and then hustling over to Trump's personal secretary, Madeleine Westerhout, to ferret who exactly had just paid a visit to the Oval Office and possibly set Trump off.

Priebus and White House staff secretary Rob Porter have tried to implement a system to manage and document the paperwork Trump receives. While some see the new structure as a power play by weakened chief of staff — "He'd like to get a phone log too," cracked one senior White House adviser—others are more concerned about the unfettered ability of Trump's family-member advisers, Jared Kushner and Ivanka Trump, to ply the president with whatever paperwork they want in the residence sight unseen.

"They have this system in place to get things on his desk now," the same White House official said. "I'm not sure anyone follows it."

Priebus has implored staff to do so in order to abide by presidential record-keeping laws, which require cataloguing what the president sees for the archives.

Lisa Brown, who served as White House staff secretary under President Barack Obama for two years, said it can be "dangerous" when people make end-runs around paperwork procedures, leaving the president with incomplete or one-sided information at key junctures.

"It's even more important with someone like this," she said of Trump, a president notoriously influenced by the last person he has spoken to, "but the challenge is he has to buy into it."

"You know that people are going to go around the system. But then it's up to the principal to decide how to handle it," Brown added. "You need the president to say 'thanks, I appreciate it' [when he receives stories] and to hand it off to get it into a process."

McFarland, who is expected to leave the NSC for the ambassadorship to Singapore, did not respond to requests for comment about bringing the president a fake news magazine cover. But another White House official familiar with the matter tried to defend it as an honest error that was "fake but accurate."

"While the specific cover is fake, it is true there was a period in the 70s when people were predicting an ice age," the official insisted. "The broader point I think was accurate."

Trump may not be a fan of briefing books but he does devour the news. Most mornings, current and former aides say, Trump reads through a handful of newspapers in print, including the New York Times, New York Post, Washington Post and Wall Street Journal — all while watching cable news shows in the background.

He uses the Internet minimally, other than tweeting and tracking his mentions, so what other news stories he sees can be more haphazard. Trump does receive a daily binder of news clippings put together by his communications team, but White House officials disagreed about how much he reads those. White House and former campaign aides have tried to make sure Trump's media diet includes regular doses of praise and positive stories to keep his mood up — a tactic honed by staff during the campaign to keep him from tweeting angrily).

There is universal agreement among Trump advisers on this: The best way to focus the president's attention on any story is to tell him about it personally, even if it is in one of the papers he's already thumbed through. But officials say it's a high-risk, high-reward proposition because Trump's frustrations at bad stories can easily boomerang against those delivering him the news.

Still, Trump advisers are unwilling to give up the chance to directly bend the president's ear and hand him supporting documents because they have seen how he can be swayed.

When Secretary of State Rex Tillerson wanted to appoint Elliott Abrams, a veteran of the Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush White Houses, as his No. 2, someone in the president's orbit made sure Trump was freshly aware of Abram's anti-Trump comments from 2016, such as a Weekly Standard op-ed in which Abrams wrote, "The party has nominated someone who cannot win and should not be president."

Trump personally intervened to block Abrams' appointment.

More recently, when four economists who advised Trump during the campaign — Steve Forbes, Larry Kudlow, Arthur Laffer and Stephen Moore — wrote in a New York Times op-ed that "now is the time to move it forward with urgency," someone in the White House flagged the piece for the president.

Trump summoned staff to talk about it. His message: Make this the tax plan, according to one White House official present.

The op-ed came out on a Wednesday. By Friday, Trump was telling the Associated Press, "I shouldn't tell you this, but we're going to be announcing, probably on Wednesday, tax reform," startling his own aides who had not yet prepared such a plan. Sure enough, the next Wednesday Trump's economic team was rolling out a tax plan that echoed the op-ed.

Moore was at the White House that day. "Several of the White House folks came up to us and said, 'It's your op-ed that got Trump moving on this,'" Moore said. "I've probably written 1,000 op-eds on my life but that might have been the most impactful."

So who was his guardian angel in the White House?

"We still don't know," he said.

To view online click here.

Back

Reckless stock trading leaves Congress rife with conflicts Back

By Maggie Severns | 05/15/2017 05:17 AM EDT

Even a looming scandal wouldn't deter some of Congress' most eager stock traders.

Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.), President Donald Trump's nominee to be Health and Human Services secretary, was under siege, the harsh lights of a Senate hearing upon him. News reports showed he had bought shares in a tiny biotechnology company while sitting on committees that could influence the firm's prospects. A colleague, Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.), had tipped him off to the investment.

A Washington Post editorial called Price "a walking, talking example of the ways in which congressional ethics requirements are too lax." Sen. Chris Murphy demanded: "Tell me how it can possibly be OK that you were championing positions on health care issues that have the effect of increasing your personal wealth?" Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) asked him, "Doesn't this show bad judgment?"

But what many saw as a scandal, others saw as an opportunity. On the very day that Wyden was decrying Price's bad judgment, Rep. Doug Lamborn, Republican of Colorado, bought shares of the same tiny Australian company, Innate Immunotherapeutics. Within two days three more members also bought in — Republicans Billy Long of Missouri, Mike Conaway of Texas and John Culberson of Texas. Conaway added more shares the following week.

These brazen decisions to gobble up shares of a little-known firm at the very moment when such trading was being decried as an abuse of power reflects Congress' anything-goes culture around stock investments. In the pursuit of wealth, even obvious conflicts of interest are routinely ignored by members who feast on daily trades. Long, for instance, serves on a committee overseeing Obamacare, and Conaway is a deputy House whip.

The health care lawmakers who invested in Innate Immunotherapeutics are hardly alone in trading in companies that have a major interest in federal legislation, according to a three-month investigation and examination of all stock trades by members of Congress.

POLITICO found that 28 House members and six senators each traded more than 100 stocks in the past two years, placing them in the potential cross hairs of a conflict of interest on a regular basis. And a handful of lawmakers, some of them frequent traders and some not, disproportionately trade in companies that also have an interest in their work on Capitol Hill.

The investigation found that:

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse, the Rhode Island Democrat who sits on the Senate HELP Committee, which oversees health care, is a heavy investor in pharmaceutical stocks. Last November, as lawmakers closed in on a bipartisan deal over a significant medical research bill called the 21st Century Cures Act, Whitehouse bought shares in the pharmaceutical firms McKesson, Gilead, and Abbott Labs 10 days before the bill was made public. Whitehouse and his wife bought additional stock in Gilead and Amgen on Nov. 28, two days before the House voted on the bill. The day President Barack Obama signed the bill into law, Whitehouse started a series of three sales of shares in those companies.

Rep. Adam Kinzinger, Republican of Illinois, was a guest speaker at Prescient Edge, a small research and technology firm with Defense Department contracts, in January of 2016. When the company raised private capital later that year, Kinzinger bought in to the tune of $20,002. Kinzinger is now a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, which oversees issues affecting Prescient Edge.

Rep. Chuck Fleischmann, Republican of Tennessee, sits on the health care appropriations panel. As Vice President Joe Biden was pressing lawmakers to approve funding for his "Cancer Moonshot" proposal in the summer of 2016, a Fleischmann family account invested in two companies, Juno Therapeutics and Celgene, which were developing new cancer drugs. One of the investments was made a week before the Obama administration announced new measures that would speed up approval for cancer therapies.

Conaway, the Texas Republican, who is a House deputy majority whip, introduced a bill in late 2015 that would pave the way for an area nuclear waste storage facility in his district. The following spring, the storage facility's owner applied to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for approval to open. Within days, an account owned by Conaway's wife bought stock in a nuclear power company that operated in states surrounding Texas and stood to benefit from a nearby storage facility.

Sen. Bob Corker, Republican of Tennessee, was an original cosponsor of a bill to eliminate the oil export ban in 2015. He bought shares in Chesapeake Energy, which was part of a coalition of companies pushing for an end to the ban, in the months leading up to Congress passing the energy-friendly legislation. The day after it was announced that the ban would be included in a piece of must-pass legislation, Corker sold at least $500,001 of the stock in Chesapeake.

House and Senate members who are active traders insist their buying and selling is a normal part of managing their finances, as with any American who wants to save for retirement or put their kids through school. But their colleagues don't seem to agree. The clear majority of lawmakers avoid potential conflicts of interest by buying mutual funds, putting their portfolios in blind trusts or simply staying out of the stock market.

POLITICO found that 384 House members and senators who served in the 114th Congress made no stock trades over the past two years. Meanwhile, the lawmakers who are active in stock trading conducted a total of more than 21,300 trades during the past two years, but a small group of very wealthy lawmakers accounted for a significant share of those trades.

Texas Republican Rep. Mike McCaul — whose wife, Linda, is the daughter of Clear Channel communications founder Lowry Mays — reported approximately 7,300 stock transactions in an array of industries over the two-year period. Oregon Democratic Rep. Kurt Schrader, who sits on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has made a substantial number of trades so far this year in companies that have an interest in the committee's health and energy work, including Exxon Mobil, Marathon Oil and Gas, Conoco Phillips, Pfizer and Eli Lilly. Schrader has made close to 700 stock trades over the past two years.

In some cases, these very wealthy lawmakers own significant stakes in private companies that are affected by their legislative work. Conaway maintains partial ownership in oil and gas companies that stand to benefit from energy-related bills he's sponsored in Congress. GOP Kentucky Rep. Hal Rogers traded dozens of stocks while serving as chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which affects a broad array of policy areas. Rogers also maintained partial ownership of a small bank and collected at least $100,000 in dividends from the bank while chairing the committee, which is on the front lines of deciding whether to roll back Dodd-Frank regulations on banks. Under congressional rules, owning companies and sitting on corporate boards is permitted so long as members don't draw a salary. Rogers didn't respond to requests for comment.

Ethics-concerned lawmakers and experts who have labored for years to persuade Congress to regulate itself over apparent conflicts of interest were surprised by POLITICO's findings because Congress passed a law designed to curb lawmaker insider trading and stock trades just five years ago. They had assumed 2012's Stock Act, which created new disclosures about the stock trades and for the first time explicitly barred lawmakers from insider trading, had deterred most lawmakers from engaging in conflicts of interest. At the time the bill was passed, many thought the simple fear of exposure and political embarrassment would stop the conflicts of interest.

Now they aren't so sure.

"I'm deeply concerned," said Minnesota Democratic Rep. Tim Walz, an early supporter of the Stock Act who does not himself trade stocks. "If you buy stock and then do something that changes that stock, you've got to know what's going on."

In December, Congress approved the 21st Century Cures Act, a bill stocked with $6.3 billion in new funding for medical research and faster drug approval. In the months leading up to the vote, more than 1,000 lobbyists flocked to Capitol Hill to make their case for what should be included in the legislative package. It was a rare opportunity to dramatically increase the amount of federal money going into pharmaceuticals. It was also, as it turned out, a time when some of the members who contributed to the writing of the bill boosted their own portfolios of drug stocks, POLITICO found.

Whitehouse, Collins, Price and Fleischmann all invested in pharmaceutical companies over the months that the bill was being pulled together. Price traded and held multiple medical stocks, including McKesson, while contributing to the 21st Century Cures Act. Collins sat on the boards of multiple medical companies and bought and sold health care stocks while authoring parts of the bill.

Whitehouse, the veteran Democrat on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, began a series of purchases in health care stocks related to the bill in mid-November, through his own accounts and family accounts. At the time, negotiators were wrestling over the final version of 21st Century Cures and hoping to vote on it in a matter of weeks. Eager to battle prescription-drug addiction in his home state of Rhode Island, Whitehouse pushed leaders to include funding to fight opioid abuse, as well as health IT legislation. Both of Whitehouse's measures were eventually included in 21st Century Cures.

Ten days before lawmakers announced their breakthrough agreement on the bill, Whitehouse, through his and his family's accounts, bought shares in Gilead Sciences, Abbott Laboratories and McKesson, a pharmaceutical and health IT company. It was the third time that fall that he had bought McKesson shares. The three companies, which combined to spend more than $7.2 million on lobbying in 2016, had all been lobbying Capitol Hill on the 21st Century Cures Act. In the case of McKesson, the company also reported having lobbied on Whitehouse's IT bill.

Health care negotiators released the final version of 21st Century Cures on a Friday. The following Monday, Whitehouse purchased more stock in Gilead, as well as shares of the pharmaceutical company Amgen. In just over a week — with lawmakers racing against the December recess — the bill was approved by Congress. Ten days after President Barack Obama signed it, Whitehouse sold some of his stock in Gilead, Amgen and Biogen.

Asked about the trades, Whitehouse said his stockbroker acted without his knowledge.

"I don't decide on, neither am I even informed of, trades that are made in my account," Whitehouse said. "I would find out when the filing goes out. I wouldn't know anything about it at the time, and, frankly, I don't know anything about it now." Whitehouse's office provided a letter from his financial adviser that said his account was managed without his input, and he was not alerted of trades in advance.

It's a common refrain from lawmakers engaged in trades while considering legislation that would benefit their investments — their stockbrokers manage their accounts without their input. That's what Price claimed about some of his trades at his confirmation hearing as Health and Human Services secretary. It's also what Conaway, the House majority deputy whip, said about his purchases, which included the little-known Australian firm that caused Price so much trouble, Innate Immunotherapeutics.

Asked whether his investments presented conflicts of interest, Conaway said he didn't see any potential conflicts and doesn't have control over his trades.

"We have professional traders who make trades either on their own, because they have the authority, or with my wife," Conaway said. As for his purchase of shares in the nuclear company Entergy, which stood to benefit from the storage facility he advocated, he said, "That's not something I authorized personally."

Schrader, of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, also said he did not personally direct his investments. "These trades are not self-directed decisions. I check in with my team of advisers periodically for updates on my portfolio, but I am not making the day-to-day decisions," Schrader said in a statement.

Fleischmann, who purchased stock in two cancer treatment companies, said in a statement that he's proud to advocate for cancer research after having lost both his parents to the disease.

"There are no longer earmarks in Congress and I do not determine or advocate where NIH's funds specifically go once they have been allocated," Fleischmann said. "In regard to my stocks, I treat my investments like a blind trust and was unaware of the transaction since my financial adviser makes the transactions."

But Whitehouse, Conaway, Schrader, Fleischmann and other lawmakers who bought stocks in firms that stand to benefit from federal legislation haven't taken the one step that would assure that their investments were truly blind — setting up a blind trust, in which funds are managed independently without the lawmakers' knowledge.

There is a clear procedure to do so, and eight members — including such veteran lawmakers as Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, and Orrin Hatch, Republican of Utah — have taken the step. It's relatively simple: It requires hiring a manager for the trust, drawing up paperwork and submitting it to the House or Senate ethics committee. Once the blind trust is approved, the trustee takes over the fund and, over time, makes decisions on buying and selling assets. The lawmaker doesn't participate at all.

If members choose not to set up a blind trust, ethics specialists say, their claims of not being involved in their investments inevitably ring hollow.

"If you're really not going to be involved, then put it in a blind trust and let a truly independent adviser — not a family relative — make those decisions for you," said Larry Noble, general counsel at the Campaign Legal Center. "When they say, 'Well I didn't know my broker was going to buy it,' you have to start parsing words. You didn't know he was going to buy it that day? Or, you've never had a conversation with your broker about buying that kind of stock?"

And then there's the even easier path of buying mutual funds that aren't tied to a particular industry. In such investments, fund managers make the decisions to buy and sell.

"The best way to proceed for members or staff of Congress is to invest in mutual funds or other similar investment vehicles to avoid any questions or appearances that might arise around whether nonpublic information was used for stock trades," said attorney Robert Walker, former counsel for the House and Senate Ethics committees. "It might lead to a boring investment life, but that's the more prudent ethical and political course."

Now, after seeing how members are continuing to trade stocks despite the potential conflicts of interest, ethics specialists are convinced there need to be tougher laws.

There's "an urgent need" for Congress to take another look at its rules surrounding potential conflicts of interest, said Indiana University professor Donna Nagy, who has written extensively on lawmaker stock trades.

"The public shouldn't even have to ask the question of whether members of Congress have had their activities influenced by their own personal investments," Nagy said. "In the executive branch, it is a federal crime."

* * *

Indeed, if Whitehouse, Collins or Fleischmann worked at the White House or a federal agency, they could face an investigation simply for working on the health care bill while holding stocks that had an interest in the bill — regardless of whether those holdings had any effect on their decisions.

But Congress isn't nearly as tough on itself as the rest of the government.

When the need for tougher conflict-of-interest laws has been broached in the past, lawmakers have often offered two rationales for opposing them: It would be difficult to avoid conflicts of interest given the range of interests that are affected by legislation, and disclosures would have the necessary deterrent effect.

When former Washington state Democratic Rep. Brian Baird first proposed new restrictions on lawmakers' stock trades in 2006, some members went so far as to object on the grounds of the Constitution's speech and debate clause, which protects lawmakers from being sued over what they say or do in Congress, in order to protect members from being persecuted for unpopular beliefs. Others said it would be too burdensome to have to file all their trades with the ethics offices.

Baird saw another reason why lawmakers opposed the plan: "There's a subset that believes themselves to be entitled. They think of themselves as ethical innately," Baird, who left Congress in 2011, said recently. "If that were not the case, why was there so much resistance to the Stock Act?"

Baird wanted to make insider trading illegal for lawmakers, and make it easier for the press and others to find and spotlight members' stock trading. He proposed requiring lawmakers to quickly disclose their stock trades, and mandating that political intelligence operatives — who specialize in relaying Capitol Hill information to Wall Street investors — register like lobbyists do.

The bill languished for more than five years after Baird first introduced it, but the Stock Act's fortune started changing in late 2011 when a "60 Minutes" episode spotlighted dubious trades made by lawmakers. Its subjects included House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who had participated in a profitable IPO for Visa while Congress was considering legislation that would have hurt credit card companies. Within days, lawmakers leapt into action and added their names as cosponsors by the dozen. House Majority Leader Eric Cantor, keen to put new checks on Pelosi, joined reform-minded Democrats to lead the charge. The Stock Act was swept into law by the following April.

The final bill barred lawmakers from insider trading, as Baird had proposed, and required members to report all trades within 30 days. The political intelligence component was stripped from the bill by Cantor.

Since its passage, the Stock Act appears to have deterred some lawmakers from making trades. Pelosi, one of the House's wealthiest members, sold Visa shares and bought Apple and Disney, among 16 trades she made over the past two years.

But the bill's enforcement mechanisms have been hard to implement. So far, no one has been convicted of insider trading under the Stock Act. And when the Securities and Exchange Commission sought to enforce the act in recent years, it ran up against sweeping opposition in Congress.

That case involves a former Ways and Means Committee staff director, who allegedly leaked information that Medicare reimbursement rates were about to rise in 2013. The tip found its way to a political intelligence firm, Height Securities, which sent information to hedge funds that rushed to buy stock in Humana, a company that benefited from the rate hike.

When the SEC subpoenaed documents and interviews related to its investigation, House counsel refused to comply. "At least some, and perhaps all" of the information requested by the SEC is protected under the speech and debate clause, counsel argued in a letter. The committee's rebuff set the SEC on a two-and-a-half-year court struggle over the documents that was settled this spring when the two sides reached an out-of-court compromise.

The case demonstrated that "the speech and debate clause is going to be a virtually impenetrable barrier to ever proving one of these cases, even assuming there was insider trading as they defined it," said Stanley Brand, former House general counsel and lawyer at Akin Gump.

That could effectively knock out the biggest deterrence to conflicts of interest. But even if it didn't, some ethicists and lawmakers pointed out, most conflicts of interest don't rise to the level of insider trading, anyway.

For example, during a trip to his home state of Illinois last January, Kinzinger, who has represented the exurbs of Chicago since 2011, went downtown to address a group of business executives. His after-lunch topic was national security, a subject near and dear to his heart as a former Air Force pilot. The hosts of the luncheon — a small security and research firm called Prescient Edge — were soon to be of personal interest to Kinzinger, too: When the private company sought to raise money later that year, Kinzinger invested between $15,001 and $50,000, filings show.

Kinzinger's investment opportunity wouldn't be available to most of his voters. And Kinzinger, from his perch on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, remains invested in a company that receives contracts from the Defense Department, including $148,468 in 2017.

Kinzinger spokesperson Maura Gillespie said in an email that "the congressman was made aware by his financial adviser of a capital raise by the Prescient Edge and so he cleared his investment through [the ethics committee] before buying stock." Gillespie added that "should Prescient have business before the [Foreign Affairs Committee], then he would of course recuse himself, in accordance with ethics."

Meanwhile, the notion that members would police themselves closely because of fear of voter backlash has rarely materialized. Lawmakers' stocks can become campaign issues, but they are rarely the deciding factor in a race. Especially in the House, a significant group of lawmakers represent safe districts where their reelection campaigns rarely grab headlines. Kinzinger, for one, ran unopposed in 2016.

"The public can't be expected to learn about every one of these things. The press can't be expected to cover all of them," Noble said. "And if we think [trading stocks] undermines that they really have their constituents at heart, then it should be prohibited."

Corker, whose seat in red-state Tennessee is considered secure, has made a number of large stock trades over the years. As for his trade in between $500,001 and $1,000,000 in Chesapeake Energy, which he bought shortly before Congress announced its agreement to lift the oil export ban and sold shortly after, Corker spokesperson Micah Johnson said that the senator made the sale to avoid a potential conflict of interest.

"Prior to the vote . . . out of an abundance of caution and to avoid even the appearance of a conflict of interest, Sen. Corker sold his shares at a significant loss," Johnson said. (Three days after Obama signed the bill, Corker again bought Chesapeake Energy stock, which he soon sold at a profit.)

A former aide to a senator who regularly bought and sold stocks linked to his committee work described "a false sense of victimization" among lawmakers who have watched the perks of their job, like gifts and free dinners from lobbyists, get whittled away.

"This feels harmless," the aide said, but "it's one more reason why no one trusts Congress."

In the midst of the controversy over Price's purchase of Innate Immunotherapeutics, Nagy, of Indiana University, was one of several experts who penned op-eds calling for new rules to prevent lawmakers from holding stocks that conflict with their legislative work. It ran the day Price's House colleagues began picking up stock in the same firm. At the time, the possibility that other lawmakers might hear those calls and still buy stock in the same firm seemed beyond possibility.

"I had hoped it would have precisely the opposite effect," Nagy said recently.

It's highly unlikely that the lawmakers would have come across the firm Innate Immunotherapeutics had Price's purchase of discounted stock in the company not caused a public uproar. The company has no approved drugs on the market and little name recognition in the U.S.

But Collins is the company's largest shareholder and sits on its board, and Collins' family members and chief of staff are also among the biggest investors in the company. Price learned about the company from Collins, though he's maintained Collins didn't share any information about Innate Immunotherapeutics that wasn't public.

Lamborn, Long and Culberson, three of the lawmakers who bought shares in the company, each said they heard of Innate Immunotherapeutics through public channels. Lamborn spokesperson Jarred Rego said his purchase of shares in the company was done "on the open market, at fair market value, after all the media discussion about the company." Long spokesperson Hannah Smith said "Congressman Long did not learn of Innate Immunotherapeutics through a colleague, but rather through the news in January when the company became a daily topic." Culberson spokesperson Emily Taylor, said: "Representative Culberson has a lifelong friend with multiple sclerosis and is always looking into news stories and breakthroughs on MS treatments."

In addition, the POLITICO investigation revealed that yet another House member, Markwayne Mullin, Republican of Oklahoma, had bought Innate Immunotherapeutics before the flare-up during Price's confirmation hearing. Mullin's office did not respond to requests for comment.

All the members' investments in Innate Immunotherapeutics were unearthed through the disclosure forms they were required to submit under the Stock Act. But the disclosures aren't anywhere near as available as they were originally intended to be: Lawmakers envisioned Google-like search data enabling voters to quickly pull up who had traded stocks ahead of market-moving events. But Congress quietly stripped the data requirements out of the law a year after it was passed. Currently, the data is available online but not easily searchable.

Experts like Holman think the idea should be resurrected — and that lawmakers should be required to disclose much more specific information about the value of their assets and trades. Currently, they report trades within a wide dollar range. But the solution that would settle concern about conflicts of interest in the big picture, Holman and others argue, would be either to bar lawmakers from buying and selling stocks entirely, or require them to put their money into broad mutual or index funds.

But lawmakers and aides acknowledge there is no serious discussion on Capitol Hill about taking new steps to curb lawmakers' conflicts of interest. And arguments about conflicts of interest are now at least loosely tied in the public mind to Trump's refusal to release his tax returns, inflaming partisan sentiments.

"It's taken on a different overtone because of President Trump. Now it becomes, 'You guys are just trying to embarrass him with this disclosure,'" said Walz. "It's hard to get members of Congress to police themselves and to write these things. We did it because we were naive enough, we hit the right moment in time, and it went through."

And the members who raged against Price's trades have yet to follow through with legislative proposals to stop the problem.

Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington, was one of the HELP Committee members who was most forceful in her denunciation of Price, demanding, "Congressman, do you believe it is appropriate for a senior member of Congress actively involved in policymaking in the health sector to repeatedly personally invest in a drug company that could benefit from those actions, yes or no?"

In mid-March, Murray and her husband bought a series of stocks that included the pharmaceutical giants Sanofi, Gilead, Amgen and Pfizer, just as the GOP's push to replace Obamacare moved into full swing.

The purchases, a Murray aide said, were "for an account managed by a broker without guidance."

Taylor Gee contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Bernhardt vows to avoid past clients if confirmed as Interior No. 2 Back

By Esther Whieldon | 05/10/2017 05:17 PM EDT

David Bernhardt, President Donald Trump's nominee for the number two spot at the Interior

Department, is promising to recuse himself for one year from matters involving a number of oil, gas and generation companies he has represented and lobbied for if he is confirmed to the position.

In a letter and financial disclosure form posted by the U.S. Office of Government Ethics, Bernhardt said that if he is confirmed as deputy Interior secretary he would resign from his job at the law firm Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck LLP. He also pledged to step aside from matters involving any of the firm's clients for one year unless ethics officials clear him to participate.

That means Bernhardt will not be personally or substantially involved in matters involving a number of fossil fuel, electric and mining companies including Targa Resources Company LLC, Noble Energy Company LLC, Statoil Gulf Services LLC, the Independent Petroleum Association of America, NRG Energy Inc., Sempra Energy, Taylor Energy Company LLC, Cobalt International Energy and Rosemont Copper Company.

Bernhardt would also have to stay out of matters involving a number of water and wildlife conservation organizations including the Safari Club International Foundation, Garrison Diversion Conservancy District, Westlands Water District and Cadiz Inc.

As deputy secretary, Bernhardt would not only be responsible for managing day-to-day operations across the agency's nine complex and unique bureaus, but also could play a key role in implementing Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's energy development, public lands, endangered species and water infrastructure initiatives.

WHAT'S NEXT: Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski has said she hopes to hold a confirmation hearing on Bernhardt this month.

To view online click here.

Back

Here's what House Republicans want in their flood insurance bill Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 05/09/2017 06:04 PM EDT

House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling is preparing to move forward with a five-year reauthorization of the National Flood Insurance Program that would phase out coverage for certain structures and eliminate it for properties with excessive claims, according to a draft summary of the GOP bill obtained by POLITICO.

Hensarling is expected to host a meeting with committee members next Tuesday to discuss the legislation, a Republican familiar with the matter said.

The bill, which has been in development since the last session of Congress, would make several changes to the program, including:

— Four years after enactment, it would phase out NFIP coverage for residential structures where the replacement cost of the building exceeded $1 million, subject to the local availability of private sector flood insurance.

— Over the same period, NFIP would be prohibited from selling new coverage to structures being built in today's highest-risk areas.

— FEMA, which administers the program, would not be allowed to make available new or renewed coverage for any property where the aggregate amount in claims payments exceeded twice the amount of the replacement value of the property for flood damage that occurred 18 months after enactment.

— The bill would lower from 18 percent to 15 percent the cap on individual policyholders' annual rate increases.

— It would include the text of Rep. Dennis Ross's bill that would make it easier for homeowners to use private flood insurance to satisfy requirements of government-backed mortgages.

— Compensation for "Write-Your-Own" companies working with the program would be capped at 25 percent in an attempt to improve the NFIP's ability to pay claims from existing revenue.

WHAT'S NEXT: The NFIP expires at the end of September. The Senate Banking Committee has yet to release its own reauthorization bill.

To view online click here.

Back

Republicans spark fights with industry over flood insurance Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 05/15/2017 05:02 AM EDT

A House Republican plan that would curtail the availability of government flood insurance is drawing swift opposition from industry groups.

Insurers and builders are preparing to push back against the House Financial Services Committee's proposed overhaul of the National Flood Insurance Program, which helps protect millions of homeowners from the economic risks of flooding, but is saddled with $24.6 billion in debt following catastrophic hurricanes.

The public got its first comprehensive glimpse of the committee's plans last week when Republicans circulated a draft outline of several changes included as part of a five-year reauthorization of the program. Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) is planning to discuss the legislation with committee members Tuesday. Congress has until the end of September to extend the NFIP.

Already, insurers are unnerved by a proposed cap on how much compensation they would be able to receive under the NFIP's so-called Write-Your-Own program, in which private companies sell and service government-backed flood insurance policies and receive compensation.

Builders see a potential threat from a proposal that would phase out government insurance coverage for new construction in areas at high risk of flooding.

"We understand the need for reforms but we don't want reforms that are going to gut it," National Association of Home Builders Chief Executive Officer Jerry Howard said.

The early opposition underscores the political challenges that Hensarling will face as he seeks to scale back the program while balancing the desire of many stakeholders who want to maintain something closer to the status quo.

Hensarling, a fiscal conservative on a mission to lessen the government's role in financial markets, is by no means seeking to abolish the NFIP over the next few years. But even the middle ground he's staking out as he tries to hasten the growth of private competition may be too much for some interest groups.

The six-page outline Republicans released last week is wide-ranging.

Proposed changes to the NFIP would seek to open up more opportunities for a private flood insurance market, align the program's practices further with those of commercial insurers, put in place protections for customers facing rate increases, update mitigation efforts and address claims-processing concerns that arose in the wake of 2012's Hurricane Sandy.

The document appears to offer reforms that could help satisfy various sides of the debate. On Capitol Hill, the issue falls more along geographic fault lines rather than partisan divides, and it involves major business sectors including insurers, lenders and real estate interests.

Jimi Grande, senior vice president of government affairs at the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies, said the proposed steps on privatization and mitigation seem to fit "that magical lane of politically doable and directionally correct on the policy."

Yet even without bill text being introduced, there are early signs that Hensarling is testing the political limits of flood insurance reform. More flash points may flare up as groups digest the plan.

For months, insurers have been on high-alert after Financial Services Committee Republicans signaled they were looking at changes to the NFIP's Write-Your-Own program.

Their fears have become a reality. A provision in the draft proposal would cap their compensation at 25 percent of premiums that policyholders pay.

The going rate today is closer to 30 percent.

Committee spokesman Jeff Emerson said that translates to money that is going to insurers for salaries and expenses and not being used to pay claims — a factor, he added, that drives up the likelihood of the NFIP going into debt.

"Capping those costs at 25 percent would make more dollars available for covering the actual insurance part of an individual's premiums," Emerson said.

Insurance industry lobbyists, who were playing defense on the Hill well ahead of the release of the reauthorization draft, are expected to escalate their resistance.

"We oppose the attack on WYO carriers as they are not the problem," said Grande, of the mutual insurers trade group.

The Independent Insurance Agents and Brokers of America, known as The Big "I," represents businesses on the front lines of the WYO universe that help sell insurance in exchange for commissions. It has been trying to illustrate how an agent's slice of the compensation compares to the total costs for consumers.

"Based on what we know now, the Write-Your-Own program cuts appear extreme," said the group's senior vice president of external and government affairs, Charles Symington. "The Big T' will oppose them as currently written."

A separate reform threatens to alienate the construction industry.

At issue for builders is a provision that, four years after enactment, would prohibit the NFIP from selling new coverage to "future structures built in today's highest-risk areas," subject to the local availability of private flood insurance.

"For a program that already doesn't charge enough for the risks it insures ... we can't get to a sound financial footing by creating new subsidies in the future," Emerson, the committee spokesman, said. "Four years from now is a reasonable time frame to get away from that old model and have the NFIP do accurate underwriting and pricing of the new risks the program takes on."

The provision would appear to be in line with a suggestion from FEMA, which administers the program. In March testimony to the committee, FEMA deputy associate administrator Roy Wright floated the idea of identifying a time when flood policies for all new construction would be provided by the private market.

The prospect of the proposal becoming a reality, which would have ramifications for real estate development, has spurred lobbyists to fight back.

Howard, who has been advocating for a reauthorization of the program as the head of the National Association of Home Builders, said the idea is "disturbing" and "doesn't make financial sense."

"It will impact so many states and so many areas within states that you're going to find this will not be politically acceptable once we publicize it and educate members to its impact," he said.

Howard argued that new construction is "built more resiliently," and that having it in the program "would help strengthen the pool and actually cost them less because there will be fewer claims against it."

"The question that we will have to put to our members is what our position on the overall bill would be if that stayed in it," he said.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP plans could kill one of Trump's favorite tax breaks Back

By Brian Faler | 05/15/2017 05:13 AM EDT

A proposal to kill a century-old business tax provision — one that's been key to President Donald Trump's real-estate fortune — is poised to become the next great tax-reform fight in Washington.

House Republicans want the $1 trillion that ending a deduction for businesses' interest expenses would raise so they can offset the cost of slashing the corporate tax rate, one of the centerpieces of their tax-reform plans.

But that is riling a host of industries that say they have little choice but to rely on borrowed money and fear they will face big tax increases. Farmers, private equity, utilities, real estate, manufacturers and others are raising alarms in the Capitol, where Republicans are divided over the proposal.

Though it's been obscured by the long-running battle over border adjustments, as that debate fades, many predict the interest-deduction fight will soon take center stage.

"This is going to be a big deal — it just hasn't had its time yet," said John Buckley, a former head of the Joint Committee on Taxation and longtime congressional tax aide.

It's crucial to House Republicans' plans because it's their second-largest pay-for, raising even more money than border adjustments, according to an analysis by the conservative-leaning Tax Foundation.

But Trump has long backed the deduction, important to his real-estate development business — which is certain to raise anew conflict-of-interest issues for his administration.

In an interview with the Economist published Thursday, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said: "We're contemplating keeping it — that's our preference. But we'll look at everything."

There's also skepticism in the Senate.

"It's controversial," said Texas Sen. John Cornyn, the chamber's deputy Republican leader. "I think we need to be careful because there are a lot of businesses that borrow money as part of their business model."

What, if anything, to do with the break is now a "significant" part of lawmakers' tax talks, said one top Republican aide, though how vulnerable it is depends on how they decide to proceed.

If they opt to pursue a deficit-neutral tax reform, as House Republicans are pushing, there could be big changes because lawmakers will need a lot of budget savings, and the deduction represents a huge pot of cash.

If they decide to simply cut taxes, without pay-fors, there will be less pressure to cut the provision.

"Its usage will be determined by how low of a [corporate] rate members want to get to, and if it's going to be deficit-neutral or if it's going to be a tax cut," the aide said.

As part of their tax-reform plan, House Republicans want to cut the corporate rate to 20 percent, from the current 35 percent - a reduction that would be so deep that they had to look beyond the usual cast of loopholes for ways to finance it. Trump wants a 15 percent rate and he told the Economist it would be "OK" if tax cuts weren't offset.

Interest expenses have long been considered a normal business expense that companies can deduct just as they would their employees' wages or their rent. Lawmakers have rarely tinkered with the provision, let alone proposed ending it.

Back in 1987, amid a wave of debt-financed corporate takeovers, Congress considered limiting the deduction in those sorts of mergers, which sparked a big selloff on Wall Street.

"All hell broke loose," said Buckley. "The bill was quickly pulled and scrapped."

House Republicans also want to kill the deduction so they can adopt so-called expensing, which refers to allowing businesses to immediately write off the cost of their investments, instead of having to spread those deductions out over a number of years.

That's considered important for long-term growth, but experts say expensing can't be combined with the interest deduction because that would provide such rich tax benefits that the government would effectively be paying companies to buy equipment, so lawmakers have to pick one or the other.

A spokeswoman for House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) said: "Republicans have proposed full and immediate expensing for all businesses because it will deliver robust economic growth and create jobs."

Their interest-deduction proposal is backed by many economists who say the code so heavily subsidizes debt that it pushes companies wanting to raise money to turn to loans rather than equity. And that can make economic downturns more severe, some say.

"Firms go bankrupt when they cannot meet the demands of their creditors," the Tax Foundation said in a recent report. "The more a firm borrows, the more it owes in interest, and if it cannot pay interest, bondholders can make claims on the firm's physical assets to get their money back."

"In contrast, equity is much more flexible; during downturns, equity simply accepts a loss of shareholder value. It may not accept that loss happily, but it accepts it nonetheless, and there is no immediate threat to the health of the firm."

But the debate is underscoring how much some industries rely on loans. Among them: farmers, whose opposition to the plan is likely to weigh heavily on red-state Republicans.

"Farming and ranching is almost completely financed with borrowed money," said Patricia Wolff, senior director of congressional relations at the American Farm Bureau Federation. "There aren't stock options or venture capital or other ways for us to raise money so we rely almost entirely on loans from banks, life-insurance companies and from USDA programs, so anything that makes capital more expensive adds to the cost of business."

"Even with the lower proposed [tax] rates, we could see a tax increase," she said.

Critics of the plan are taking solace in the fact that Trump has long opposed the idea. It was not included in his revised tax plan rolled out last month, and he rejected the proposal during his presidential campaign, said former tax adviser Stephen Moore.

"Trump didn't like it because he's a real estate guy, and a lot of real-estate deals are financed with debt so he squashed the idea," said Moore, who helped developed the campaign's tax plan. "He felt like debt was an integral part of financing business deals so we didn't get very far with that idea."

During his campaign, Trump did eventually propose allowing manufacturers to choose between expensing and the interest break, though many experts say that is probably unworkable because Congress's nonpartisan budget analysts tend to look askance at optional proposals. That's because they assume businesses that rely on expensing will choose that, and those with big loans will opt for the interest deduction, leaving relatively few businesses paying little to the Treasury.

Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) is also wary of the House proposal, telling Bloomberg Television: "Almost everybody is borrowing at this particular point, and some borrowing in big ways, so I think that's going to be on the table, but I think it's going to be difficult to get rid of that."

Added Sen. Mike Crapo (R-Idaho), another tax writer: "There's plenty of other places in the code to achieve the necessary savings."

To view online click here.

Back

Sweepstakes heat up for FBI chief Back

By Josh Meyer | 05/14/2017 07:45 AM EDT

The moment New York Judge Michael J. Garcia appeared on a short list of potential FBI directors, his phone started buzzing with well-wishes from across the bureau's extended family.

Matthew Besheer, who once worked on the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in New York, sent Garcia a congratulatory note and then called his ex-wife to give her the news. "She was so happy she started crying," Besheer said.

Garcia is among at least 14 candidates who have emerged in the politically charged sweepstakes to replace James Comey, who President Donald Trump fired suddenly last Tuesday. Trump's selection is being scrutinized by a broad range of constituencies, many of them concerned about the future — and independence — of the FBI's investigation into Russia's meddling in the 2016 election and possible collusion by Trump associates.

The choice of a new FBI director will also signal the direction of the nation's premiere law enforcement agency under an administration with radically different views about national security, especially domestic and international terrorism, than its predecessor.

Some candidates have strong name recognition, including Mike Rogers, the former FBI agent and Republican chairman of the House intelligence committee, as well as Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn and current acting FBI Director Andrew McCabe. Others who have garnered headlines in the fast-moving selection process include former George W. Bush administration Homeland Security adviser Fran Townsend, former New York City police commissioner Ray Kelly and Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.).

The FBI Agents Association on Saturday urged Trump to nominate Rogers, saying his "unique and diverse experience" in the Army, as an FBI agent from 1989 to 1994 and his position as former chairman of the House intelligence committee "sets him apart as someone capable of confronting the wide array of challenges."

"It is essential that the next FBI Director understand the details of how Agents do their important work," said President Thomas F. O'Connor, whose association represents more than 13,000 active and retired agents.

Garcia is among the candidates winning support from normally taciturn FBI insiders even though he never worked for the famously insular bureau.

His close FBI ties came as a federal counterterrorism prosecutor in New York, when he spent much of the late 1990s traveling the world with agents pursuing Al Qaeda suspects, including the man who later masterminded the 9/11 terrorist attacks, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

"He could've had a badge in those days, because he was right in it," said FBI Special Agent Frank Pellegrino, who also worked on the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in New York. "He was right there with us. We talked to witnesses together, walked the streets together and then brought the evidence to court and put them away."

Garcia, who also served as a senior Bush administration homeland security and immigration official, declined to comment Saturday ahead of his interview with Attorney General Jeff Sessions and Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein. But he has told associates over the years that he'd be interested in the job, and his name briefly came up the last time the job was open, when President Barack Obama selected Comey in 2013.

Garcia would be the first Latino director in the FBI's 82-year history.

No president has picked his FBI director from directly within the bureau's own ranks or from the halls of Congress, perhaps due to the intended firewall between politics and federal law enforcement. Virtually all FBI directors have been either top Justice Department officials with a strong background as prosecutors, or federal judges steeped in the nuance of constitutional law.

A few of the current candidates fit that bill, including Bush administration officials such as former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, former assistant attorneys general Alice Fisher and Ken Wainstein, current U.S. District Judge Henry Hudson and former federal appellate court judge Michael Luttig. Current FBI officials Paul Abbate and Adam Lee are also on the list.

Garcia's inclusion on the short list shows the considerations in play with the search. Some insiders see it as a sign of the Trump administration wanting to take a more hard-line approach to international terrorism and the threat it poses to the United States, given Garcia's experience working on the front lines of the war on terrorism and the effort to protect U.S. borders.

"Mike is one of us, and he understands what the ultimate goal of radical fundamentalism is," Besheer said. "He'd be the perfect guy to play to catch-up, and to go after these guys more aggressively than we have been in recent years."

As an assistant U.S. attorney in Manhattan from 1992 to 2001, Garcia was a lead prosecutor on two of the most high-profile terrorism cases in U.S. history, the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa. His work not only led to convictions in those cases and two top Justice Department awards but also put him on the trail of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed at a time when the FBI and CIA were battling for turf over international counterterrorism operations.

Although Garcia moved on to other areas long before the 9/11 attacks, friends and colleagues say he would relish the opportunity to help try and convict the Al Qaeda mastermind and four alleged co-conspirators who are currently awaiting military commission trial in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Those prosecutions are led by the U.S. military, but the FBI and Justice Department play strong supporting roles, and a director with a personal connection like Garcia could help break the logjam that has prevented the case from proceeding, they say.

"Mike was on the ground, in the thick of it, working very closely with us trying to nail this guy," Besheer said of Garcia's role in the decade-long hunt for KSM, which began after he was linked to the first World Trade Center bombing. "I know it's personal to him, that it's gone on this long and justice has not been served."

Garcia moved to Washington in 2001 and served as assistant secretary of commerce for export enforcement and acting commissioner of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service before Bush appointed him assistant Homeland Security secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement from 2003 to 2005.

Bush then sent Garcia back to Manhattan as the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, where for three years he oversaw 220 prosecutors handling criminal and civil cases and many of the nation's most sensitive terrorism and counterintelligence investigations.

In 2008, Garcia joined the law firm Kirkland & Ellis, where he specialized in international legal issues, and in January 2016 he was appointed by Gov. Andrew Cuomo as an associate judge of the New York Court of Appeals, the state's highest court.

"He's always been considered incredibly solid, trustworthy, a straight shooter," said Juan Zarate, who worked with Garcia when the two were young federal prosecutors and later, when Zarate was deputy national security adviser for combating terrorism in the Bush administration from 2005 to 2009.

"I think he fits a very strong mold of someone you'd want to take the FBI job at this time in history, with a strong prosecutorial background, reputation for integrity and independence and an affinity for navigating Washington's political waters at a time when the FBI is caught in a serious investigatory but also political environment," Zarate said. "He understands politics and he understands Washington and that you serve at the pleasure of the president. But he also understands that the mission of the FBI and the Department of Justice is to execute the law and to ensure that justice is done."

Several friends and former colleagues noted that Garcia shares two qualities with Comey, his friend and former colleague, that may not help him in the FBI director sweepstakes, or on the job: a fierce independent streak and an insistence on following an investigation wherever it leads.

In 2012, Garcia was tapped to lead a special investigation into FIFA, the governing body of international soccer, and soon declared his intention to investigate suspected widespread corruption in its decision to award hosting rights for the 2018 and 2022 World Cup to Russia and Qatar.

Garcia delivered a 350-page report that FIFA never made public. After a short summary was released clearing both Russia and Qatar of wrongdoing, Garcia publicly denounced it as a whitewash, tried to appeal it and later resigned from his position as FIFA ethics investigator in protest.

To view online click here.

Back

Is it time for Trump staff to lawyer up? Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 05/14/2017 07:02 AM EDT

Veterans of White House scandals from Watergate to Plamegate have an important message for Team Trump: It's time to think about lawyering up.

In the past week, a Senate committee began issuing subpoenas in its investigation into Russian contacts with President Donald Trump's staff and other associates during the 2016 election campaign and transition, while the FBI continues its own criminal investigation. Trump himself fired FBI Director James Comey and then, in the aftermath, said the Russia probe was "made up" and appeared to threaten Comey on Twitter.

"There's obviously a risk here," said Washington white-collar defense attorney Robert Luskin. "And that's not any kind of judgment on [Trump's] personal integrity or absence of it, but the apparent fact he doesn't seem to be very sensitive about norms and about risks."

It's an axiom of Washington scandals that the cover-up tends to be worse than the crime — and it's lower- or mid-level people who wind up getting caught in the worst legal trouble, usually for tangential offenses like perjury or obstruction of justice.

The ancillary stuff, like a forgotten meeting or a discarded document, can cause the most serious problems for staffers navigating the unfamiliar, expensive and high-stakes world of grand juries, subpoenas and congressional hearings, where the prospects of perjury or obstruction of justice charges can be filed for both unintended slip-ups or intentional attempts to cover up for a superior.

"The thing you worry about in a process like that is you just make a mistake and it appears more than it is," said Rep. Sean Maloney, a New York Democratic lawmaker who served as staff secretary for President Bill Clinton during his final two years at the White House amid congressional impeachment proceedings. "We're all human beings. If someone asks you questions for two or three hours, it's easy to make a mistake."

At least some of the people who joined the Trump administration were aware of the legal risks. "I had folks who joined the administration ask that question, which should tell you something," said Luskin, who previously represented President George W. Bush's senior political adviser Karl Rove during the investigation into the leak of CIA agent Valerie Plame's identity, as well as a pair of senior officials during the probe of Clinton's Whitewater land deals.

A few of the central players in the Trump investigations already have counsel. Former campaign manager Paul Manafort, whose work in Ukraine is under review, has a lawyer, as does former White House national security adviser Michael Flynn, who last week was served with a subpoena by the Senate Intelligence Committee. Their attorneys did not respond to requests for comment.

Longtime personal Trump tax attorneys from the firm of Morgan, Lewis & Bockius sent Senate investigators a letter last week detailing some of the president's business interests tied to Russia. A spokeswoman from the firm declined comment.

John Dean, the former Nixon White House counsel who served a four-month sentence for his role in Watergate, said he doesn't expect Trump's staffers at this early stage of the investigative process to have already started hiring attorneys. But he said that can change quickly.

"It's something that happens in every White House when the contagion has started spreading," he said. He predicted the lower-level employees, including otherwise innocent secretaries and other aides who have gotten up-close interactions with the president and his senior aides, may not see the need to call for an attorney until they've been identified as potential witnesses. "They're primarily driven by fear, fear of the unknown and not wanting to make a mistake," he said.

But Dean added that some people delay retaining counsel because they think it makes them look bad. "If my history watching Watergate and what happened is any indication, the guiltier they are, the later they get lawyers," Dean said. "They don't want to either admit it in their own mind or they think they can tough it out. They think hiring a lawyer is an admission of guilt. And that's foolish."

The White House did not respond to a request for comment about whether individual staffers have retained counsel. "The entire White House staff is hard at work implementing the president's agenda for the American people," said press secretary Sean Spicer.

Outside observers say the signs are growing that Trump's staff may want to start lining up legal advice, even if it's only for preliminary discussions.

"If they have information that indicates contact with Russians or attempts to interfere, they better damn well," said former FBI agent Lewis Schiliro, who spent 25 years at the FBI before retiring in 2000 as head of the New York field office. "That's a pretty serious thing."

Along with the criminal subpoenas, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Jason Chaffetz (R-Utah) last week requested the Justice Department inspector general examine Trump's firing of Comey; the Treasury Department is reportedly going to be sharing records with Senate investigators on Trump's financial dealings with Russia and beyond; and calls keep coming from Capitol Hill Democrats to the White House to retain all documents related to ongoing criminal probes.

Looming legal proceedings can shadow interactions among staffers, exacerbating existing tensions and infighting.

"I don't know how they're getting anything done, including the people who are much lower down and have jobs with nothing to do with this," said Amanda Kane, a former associate counsel in the Obama White House. "It's a very small, insular environment there."

But others said that an investigation can sometimes serve as a rallying point for staffers. "It's a weird thing. I think you just keep doing your job. You try to stay focused and you believe in the mission," said Maloney, the former Clinton staffer, who later worked for New York Democratic Gov. Eliot Spitzer during the governor's prostitution scandal.

"What really gets you through is the relationships with your colleagues," said Maloney. "You make friends for life, and it's because you're going through the crucible together."

Trump in recent days has publicly tried to stick to his agenda. Last week, his press aides opened their daily briefings talking about an executive order on cybersecurity and his government's response to an accident at the nuclear-waste cleanup site in Hanford, Washington. The president is also preparing for his first international trip this week. On Twitter, he pointed to a recent trade move involving U.S. beef exports to China that he declared was "REAL news!"

With a friendly Republican Congress, the Trump White House so far isn't facing an independent prosecutor like Kenneth Starr, who investigated the Clintons' Whitewater deal and Bill Clinton's relationship with intern Monica Lewinsky. As Luskin put it: "I have to say compared to the Clinton years that this is a walk in a f----- park."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

<input type="radio"/>
Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Energy
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Afternoon Energy: Watchdog urges Zinke campaign probe — DOE No. 2: Nuclear needs to be "revived" — U.N. agency: CO2 levels hit record high
Date: Monday, October 30, 2017 3:26:42 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 10/30/2017 03:25 PM EDT

With help from Darius Dixon and Eric Wolff

WATCHDOG URGES ZINKE PROBE: The watchdog group Campaign Legal Center alleges in a new FEC complaint that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's congressional campaign committee participated in an illegal scheme to convert political donations into personal cash. Namely, the group says the Zinke campaign bought an RV from Zinke's wife then sold it to a friend a year later at a steep discount — suggesting the campaign either overpaid for the vehicle when it first purchased it, or it allowed Zinke's friend Ed Buttrey to pay below market value when he bought it.

The RV sale is just one of several transactions the CLC says may have provided illegal benefits to Zinke's family or friends, Esther Whieldon reports. "The group also cites hotel stays in the Virgin Islands and New York that Zinke's campaign paid for after the Montana Republican was tapped to join then-President-elect Donald Trump's Cabinet, as well as catering expenses the campaign incurred after Zinke was confirmed. CLC also says in the complaint that Zinke may have relied on a joint fundraising committee to allow donors to give money to his campaign above federal contribution limits."

"When you combine the disregard for campaign finance laws when Zinke was a candidate with the disregard that Zinke as Interior secretary has shown for the ethics laws, you certainly get a picture of an individual who may not be taking his responsibilities as an officeholder seriously," Brendan Fischer, who submitted the complaint for CLC, told POLITICO. Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift declined to comment. Read more here.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. I'm your host Kelsey Tamborrino. Send your thoughts, news and tips to ktamborrino@politico.com, mdaily@politico.com and njuliano@politico.com, and keep up with us on Twitter at @kelseytam, @dailyml, @nickjuliano, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

CARDOZA CATCHES WHITEFISH: Whitefish Energy has hired its first lobbyist as scrutiny builds over how the small Montana firm won a lucrative contract to help rebuild Puerto Rico's electric grid. Ben Lefebvre reports the company has retained former Rep. Dennis Cardoza, a "Blue Dog" Democrat from California. Cardoza said he would "meet people on the Hill" to make the case that Whitefish won the contract fairly, but he declined to provide details beyond that. Ben reports Whitefish Energy retained Cardoza last Wednesday. His firm, Foley & Lardner LLP, is in the process of filling lobbyist registration work with Congress, Cardoza told POLITICO today. His other lobbying clients include California health care, real estate and water interests, according to disclosure records. More here.

Meanwhile, the FBI is investigating how Whitefish Energy first won its no-bid contract from the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, The Wall Street Journal reports today, citing people familiar with the matter.

DOE NO. 2: NUCLEAR NEEDS TO BE 'REVIVED': Trump's Energy Department is looking for ways to cut the price of nuclear power, Deputy Energy Secretary Dan Brouillette said today, arguing that the Obama administration put up too many barriers. DOE wants "to drive down the steep cost of building nuclear reactors, costs that least partly reflect the war against nuclear energy," he said at a meeting of the American Nuclear Society. "Nuclear power needs to be revived, and not reviled in America." The phrase seems to be catching on. Last month, Energy Secretary Rick Perry said something similar about coal when visiting a mine in Pennsylvania: "For too long, coal in this country has been reviled and it's time for coal in this country to be revived."

Brouillette also cheered on Yucca Mountain — or some other nuclear waste resting place. "It needs to be done, is the simple answer. There is no 'if,' 'and,' and 'but' about it. Yucca Mountain needs to be developed or a final repository needs to be developed. If we can't get there, then I think it is important for us to look at interim solution," he said. "We will work with Congress to put this back on the table in very short order."

And after his keynote, Brouillette also said he was curious about putting a price on carbon, a notion widely supported in the nuclear community. "I'm unaware of any proposal by the administration at this point in time," he said, while noting his own recent confirmation to DOE. "It is an interesting idea, however. It is something that we should consider at some point."

MARK YOUR CALENDARS: The House Natural Resources Committee will hold two oversight hearings on Puerto Rico's hurricane recovery efforts, and the ongoing fiscal and economic crisis that preceded them, Pro Financial Services Colin Wilhelm reports. The committee will hold a previously postponed hearing at 10 a.m. on Nov. 7 titled, "Examining Challenges in Puerto Rico's Recovery and the Role of the Financial Oversight and Management Board." At 2 p.m. on Nov. 14 it will hold another full committee oversight hearing, "The Need for Transparent Financial Accountability in Territories' Disaster Recovery Efforts," and at 8:30 a.m., Tuesday, Puerto Rico's federal oversight board will hold its 10th public meeting. More here.

U.N. AGENCY: CO2 LEVELS HIT RECORD HIGH: The concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere reached a record high in 2016, surging to 145 percent above pre-industrial levels in 2016, the World Meteorological Organization said today. WMO, a U.N. agency, warns the CO2 concentration threatens "severe ecological and economic disruptions." POLITICO Europe's Sara Stefanini reports: "The global average of CO2 concentrations reached 403.3 parts per million last year, up from 400 parts per million in 2015 and the highest level in about 800,000 years, the United Nations agency said in an annual report.

"The increase was caused by human activity such as increased land use and deforestation and use of fossil fuels for energy combined with and a strong El Niño, when the Pacific Ocean becomes abnormally warm." Petteri Taalas, the organization's secretary general called for "rapid" cuts in CO2 and other greenhouse gases. "The laws of physics mean that we face a much hotter, more extreme climate in the future," Taalas said. "We are still emitting far too much and this needs to be reversed."

REFINERS TALK TO TRUMP THROUGH 'FOX & FRIENDS': An umbrella group for a small group of U.S. oil refiners, will air an ad on "Fox & Friends" all week accusing Trump of "caving to ethanol lobbyists" with his refusal to consider changes to the Renewable Fuel Standard. The Fueling American Jobs Coalition ad stands a good chance of being seen by Trump, a regular viewer of the Fox News morning show. Refiners say the RFS has been ruining their bottom line, while ethanol producers and their supporters in Congress say the program is critical to U.S. energy independence and helping American farmers. The program has divided the Republican caucus in the Senate, and last week a group of nine senators asked the Trump administration to mediate the dispute.

ROSNEFT UTILIZED AS FOREIGN POLICY TOOL: Russia is increasingly "spreading its influence around the world and challenging the interests of the United States" via its oil giant Rosneft, The New York Times reports. "But Moscow risks running into trouble, as it lends money and makes deals in turbulent economies and shaky political climates. ... Russia has been making a flurry of loans and deals all centered on the Venezuelan oil business, money that could make the difference between the government's collapse and its survival. In return, Moscow is getting a strategic advantage in Washington's backyard. President Nicolás Maduro of Venezuela was all smiles this month on a visit to Moscow seeking fresh financial backing, thanking Vladimir V. Putin 'for your support, both political and diplomatic.'" (h/t Playbook)

QUICK HITS:

- U.S. oil exports boom, putting infrastructure to the test, Reuters.
- Long-time ally of offshore drillers Oversees safety agency, The Wall Street Journal.
- Californians are keeping dirty energy off the grid via text message, InsideClimate News.
- Cliven Bundy and sons face a jury as federal trial opens In Las Vegas, NPR.

WIDE WORLD OF POLITICS:

- Manafort and Rick Gates indicted by federal grand jury on 12 counts
- Garcetti, possible 2020 hopeful, launches innovation group
- Podesta stepping down from lobbying giant amid Mueller probe

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/afternoon-energy/2017/10/watchdog-urges-zinke-campaign-probe-025293>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Watchdog urges probe of whether Zinke campaign benefited friend, family Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/30/2017 11:01 AM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's congressional campaign committee bought an RV from his wife then sold it to a friend a year later at a steep discount, a watchdog group says in a Federal Election Commission complaint that alleges an illegal scheme to convert political donations into personal cash.

The June RV sale is one of several transactions the Campaign Legal Center says may have provided illegal benefits to Zinke's family or friends. The group also cites hotel stays in the Virgin Islands and New York that Zinke's campaign paid for after the Montana Republican was tapped to join then-President-elect Donald Trump's Cabinet, as well as catering expenses the campaign incurred after Zinke was confirmed. CLC also says in the complaint that Zinke may have relied on a joint fundraising committee to allow donors to give money to his campaign above federal contribution limits.

The call for an FEC investigation adds to the scrutiny Zinke is facing over his political activity. He is already under investigation by Interior's inspector general and the independent Office of Special Counsel over travel costs he incurred as secretary to attend political events while on official business, including a fundraiser in the Virgin Islands in his first month in office.

"When you combine the disregard for campaign finance laws when Zinke was a candidate with the disregard that Zinke as Interior secretary has shown for the ethics laws, you certainly get a picture of an individual who may not be taking his responsibilities as an officeholder seriously," Brendan Fischer, who submitted the complaint for CLC, told POLITICO.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift declined to comment.

In the complaint, CLC says the Zinke campaign's RV sale could have violated federal law prohibiting using political donations for personal benefit in one of two ways: Either the campaign overpaid for the vehicle when it purchased it from Lolita Zinke for $59,100 in April 2016, or it allowed Zinke's friend Ed Buttrey to pay below market value when he bought it for $25,000 in June of this year. Records also show Zinke for Congress fund spent more than $6,000 on tires and maintenance work on the RV in 2016.

The RV would have been worth between $40,000 and $49,000 when it was sold to Buttrey, according to The Associated Press, which first reported the transaction in August. Federal law requires transactions to be for fair market value when a campaign purchases goods from a candidate's family or sells assets to someone else. CLC's complaint notes it "is extremely unlikely that the value of the RV declined by 42 percent over the course of a single year."

Buttrey, a Montana state senator who is rumored to be in the running to be nominated as an Interior assistant secretary, did not respond to a request for comment.

CLC's complaint also raises concerns that Zinke has not disclosed the dates of key expenses from the end of last year. Zinke for Congress reported a $22,744 payment to a credit card on Dec. 31, but the committee itemizes those costs, including for lodging, travel and meals, as happening on the same day, according to CLC.

Masking the dates of the actual expenses makes it impossible to know whether Zinke was actually using the funds for legitimate purposes or to subsidize his personal lifestyle. For example, knowing those details would show whether Zinke used campaign funds to pay for lodging in New York City on the same day he interviewed for the Interior secretary job in Trump Tower, Fischer said. Trump Tower is a mere 10 minute walk from the WestHouse Hotel where Zinke stayed.

The campaign also listed a $522.74 charge for lodging the Lime Inn in the U.S. Virgin Islands among the Dec. 31 payments, according to CLC's complaint. POLITICO reported last week that Zinke was in the territory in November for an event with the Virgin Islands GOP, a political action committee that critics say uses questionable fundraising practices.

Also in question are a number of payments for events reported as occurring after Zinke was sworn in on March 1. His campaign paid $2,315.52 to the Capitol Hill Club on March 12 for "event catering" and $1,750 for "Senate catering" was sent to the same address over the next two months, according to campaign finance records cited in CLC's complaint.

Swift said in an email earlier this month that the "Senate catering" payments were to help the Montana delegation continue its weekly coffees for visiting constituents until Zinke's open seat was filled by Rep. Greg Gianforte. But she could not explain the Capitol Hill Club charge and did not respond to follow-up inquiries.

CLC also says Zinke's campaign failed to disclose the underlying donors for tens of thousands of dollars it received from the Zinke Victory Fund — a joint fundraising committee that disbursed funds among his campaign; his leadership political action committee, SEAL PAC; House Republicans' campaign arm; and the Montana Republican State Central Committee. The group says this lack of transparency prevents the public from knowing whether people may have exceeded the legal $2,700 contribution cap.

To view online click here.

Back

House Natural Resources Committee schedules Puerto Rico hearings Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/30/2017 01:53 PM EDT

The House Natural Resources Committee will hold two oversight hearings on Puerto Rico's recovery efforts from both the recent hurricanes that struck the island and the ongoing fiscal and economic crisis that preceded them.

At 10 a.m. on Nov. 7 the committee will hold a previously postponed hearing, "Examining Challenges in Puerto Rico's Recovery and the Role of the Financial Oversight and Management Board."

At 2 p.m. on Nov. 14 it will hold another full committee oversight hearing, "The Need for Transparent Financial Accountability in Territories' Disaster Recovery Efforts."

At 8:30 a.m., Tuesday, Puerto Rico's federal oversight board will hold its tenth public meeting. Topics on the agenda include the board's review of contracts for the commonwealth government, the recovery of the island's electric utility, and possible revisions to the approved fiscal recovery plan for the territory. The board also plans to examine the commonwealth government's post-hurricane cash crunch and discuss its investigation into Puerto Rico's debt.

WHAT'S NEXT: Tuesday's meeting will take place in San Juan and can be livestreamed on the oversight board's site.

To view online click here.

Back

U.N. agency: CO2 concentration reached record high in 2016 Back

By Sara Stefanini | 10/30/2017 09:36 AM EDT

The concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere surged to 145 percent above pre-industrial levels in 2016, threatening "severe ecological and economic disruptions," the World Meteorological Organization warned today.

The global average of CO2 concentrations reached 403.3 parts per million last year, up from 400 parts per million in 2015 and the highest level in about 800,000 years, the United Nations agency said in an annual report. The increase was caused by human activity such as increased land use and deforestation and use of fossil fuels for energy combined with and a strong El Niño, when the Pacific Ocean becomes abnormally warm.

Carbon dioxide remains in the atmosphere for hundreds of years and in the oceans for longer, said Petteri Taalas, the organization's secretary general. He called for "rapid" cuts in CO2 and other greenhouse gases.

"The laws of physics mean that we face a much hotter, more extreme climate in the future," Taalas said. "We are still emitting far too much and this needs to be reversed."

The report comes a week before the U.N.'s annual international climate summit begins in Bonn, where negotiators from nearly 200 countries will discuss how to meet the Paris climate agreement's goals of limiting global warming to well below 2 degrees Celsius and eventually 1.5 degrees.

U.N. Environment will release a separate annual report Tuesday on the gap between climate policy commitments from governments and what's needed to reduce emissions.

This article first appeared on POLITICO.EU on Oct. 29, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump campaign aides charged in Mueller's Russia probe Back

By Matthew Nussbaum, Darren Samuelsohn and Josh Gerstein | 10/30/2017 08:50 AM EDT

Special counsel Robert Mueller's probe into President Donald Trump's campaign and Russian election interference has dramatically escalated, with authorities indicting former campaign chairman Paul Manafort and unsealing a plea deal with a foreign policy adviser who lied about meeting with Russia-linked contacts.

The moves are the first official public actions from Mueller, and while they do not directly implicate the president, they show how the special counsel is accelerating his sprawling probe into possible collusion between Trump campaign aides and the Kremlin.

Authorities on Monday morning unsealed an indictment against Manafort and fellow campaign official Rick Gates that charged the men with money laundering, making false statements and other counts. The two men pleaded not guilty in federal court on Monday afternoon. Prosecutors asked that bond be set at $10 million for Manafort and $5 million for Gates but said both may be detained at home until they can post bail.

While both Manafort and Gates had top roles in the Trump campaign, the criminal charges do not discuss any actions clearly related to the presidential race, although the indictment notes that a Ukrainian political party the men worked for had a pro-Russia outlook.

The charges, however, could be used to apply pressure on the two former officials to more fully cooperate in Mueller's larger investigation.

The more revealing details came in a 14-page document showing that George Papadopoulos, a former foreign policy adviser to Trump's campaign, cut a secret plea deal earlier this month for lying to the FBI about the campaign's outreach to Russia-related officials.

The document describes a series of conversations and meetings with contacts who he understood to have connections to the Kremlin about obtaining "dirt" on Hillary Clinton and setting up a meeting between Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Papadopoulos became a foreign policy adviser to Trump's campaign in March 2016 and went on to cultivate relationships with two individuals apparently connected to Russia, labeled in the document only as "the Professor" and the "Female Russian National." He also Papadopoulos kept campaign officials apprised of his contacts and efforts including, on at least one occasion, at a meeting which Trump himself attended.

"The Professor told defendant PAPADOPOULOS, as defendant PAPADOPOULOS later described to the FBI, that 'They [the Russians] have dirt on her'; 'the Russians had emails of Clinton'; 'they have thousands of emails.'" Papadopoulos was arrested in July.

The revelations in the plea deal appear to undercut Trump's repeated claims that the sprawling probe is nothing more than a "witch hunt" and that his campaign had no contacts with Russian officials.

Trump on Monday morning downplayed the charges against Manafort and Gates in two tweets that came before the Papadopoulos news emerged. "Sorry, but this is years ago, before Paul Manafort was part of the Trump campaign. But why aren't Crooked Hillary & the Dems the focus?????"

He added, "....Also, there is NO COLLUSION!"

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders also sought to downplay the news during the press briefing, dismissing Papadopoulos as a minor "campaign volunteer" and echoing the president's line that Manafort and Gates were indicted for activity that occurred before the campaign.

"Today's announcement has nothing to do with the president, nothing to do with the president's campaign or campaign activity," Sanders said.

She dismissed Papadopoulos' role as "extremely limited" and a "volunteer position" and said the advisory council that he sat on only met once. She said Trump did not remember specifics about the March 2016 meeting he attended with Papadopoulos.

She added that Trump had "no intention" of firing Mueller and that she expected the investigation to "conclude soon."

Manafort and Gates were indicted on 12 counts, according to a 31-page indictment unsealed on Monday morning, including money laundering, operating as unregistered foreign agents of the government of Ukraine, failing to disclose overseas bank accounts and making false statements to federal authorities.

The indictment alleges that the men set up a series of offshore companies in order to avoid taxes on their overseas lobbying work and defrauded banks in order to win loans.

The indictment of two figures central to Trump's 2016 election and the plea deal mark the most significant step yet in an investigation that has dogged Trump's presidency, even as he and other officials have tried to redirect attention on to Clinton. The implications for Trump's fledgling policy agenda are potentially catastrophic, as the cloud of Russia allegations only darkens, despite the White House's insistence that nothing will ultimately come of the federal and congressional probes.

Mueller was selected to dig into Russia's role in the 2016 election, including the hacks and release of Democrats' emails, which intelligence agencies have concluded were designed to boost Trump's campaign. Mueller, who was named after Trump fired FBI Director James Comey in May, is also tasked with determining whether any Trump associates colluded with Moscow in that effort. But the special counsel also has wide latitude to pursue any other wrongdoing he finds during his investigation.

Even before the charges were unsealed on Monday morning, White House officials moved to put distance between Trump and his former campaign chairman.

"Whatever happens today with the Mueller investigation, we don't even know that it has anything to do with the campaign, what happens today," counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway told Fox News earlier on Monday morning.

This follows previous attempts by the White House to create distance between itself and Manafort. Trump said in August that Manafort had served on his campaign for a "very short period of time." And at a briefing in March, then-press secretary Sean Spicer described Manafort as having "played a very limited role for a very limited amount of time" during the campaign.

Manafort served on the campaign from March through August 2016, and was campaign chairman from May until he resigned on Aug. 19.

He was present for events that appear critical to the investigation into possible collusion, including a meeting at Trump Tower with a Kremlin-connected lawyer who promised damaging information on Clinton. That meeting was brokered with the help of Trump's eldest son, Donald Trump Jr.

Manafort, a longtime GOP operative, had been under Justice Department investigation since early 2014 -- long before Trump announced his presidential campaign - over his ties to former Ukrainian President Viktor Yanukovich, who abandoned office in February 2014 and fled to Russia amid protests and allegations of government corruption.

The charges focused on Manafort's and Gates' lobbying work on behalf of the Ukrainian government and Yanukovich between 2006 and 2015.

The work generated tens of millions of dollars, which was then laundered through "scores of United States and foreign corporations, partnerships, and bank accounts," according to the indictment. The charges allege both tax avoidance and concealment of their work as foreign agents. Manafort laundered more than $18 million, according to the indictment.

The scrutiny into Manafort's record took on new relevance after investigators began looking at Russian interference in the 2016 election.

Gates joined the Trump campaign in the spring of 2016 along with Manafort, his longtime lobbying partner, to spearhead GOP delegate-counting efforts and avoid an internal party revolt at the Republican convention that could have cost Trump the nomination.

Gates, however, remained in Trump's chaotic orbit during the general election, working on joint fundraising and massaging internal party dynamics from the Republican National Committee even after Manafort was ousted as head of the campaign in August, after he came under fire following reports about his lobbying work for a pro-Russia party in Ukraine.

Gates later connected with Trump confidante Thomas Barrack at an election night party, according to a New York Times report, and got hired to help run the presidential inaugural committee.

After the election, Gates joined a half-dozen Trump campaign alumni — including digital director Brad Parscale and Nick Ayers, who has since become Vice President Mike Pence's chief of staff — at America First Policies, an outside group dedicated to promoting the president's agenda.

Gates left the group in March. CNN reported the departure was due to Gates's ties to Manafort, who faced increasing scrutiny over his Russian ties as the extent of Moscow's election-meddling became clear.

Gates had not been contacted by the special counsel's office, according to one associate with close ties to him, and learned of the looming charges against him in the 24 hours before the news became public.

In the past week, he had begun looking for new clients and seemed "perfectly normal," according to this person, who spoke to him. He had continued to work for Barrack.

Gates sent a note early Monday morning to friends and family apologizing for delivering bad news but proclaiming his innocence. In the note, he said he was surprised by the charges, according to a person who reviewed the note.

Some Republicans took the opportunity on Monday to reaffirm their support for the work of Mueller, with some lawmakers fearing that Trump may move to oust the special counsel.

"Months ago I & many other Republicans vowed to support Mueller investigation & allow it to work its way through process to get the facts," tweeted Rep. Jim Banks (R-Ind.). "In light of today's indictments we must continue to support and allow the integrity of the process to work."

Democrats used the indictments as an opportunity to call for expanded probes into the Russian meddling.

"Even with an accelerating Special Counsel investigation inside the Justice Department, and investigations inside the Republican Congress, we still need an outside, fully independent investigation to expose Russia's meddling in our election and the involvement of Trump officials," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a statement. "Defending the integrity of our democracy demands that Congress look forward to counter Russian aggression and prevent future meddling with our elections."

Other Democrats sought to link the indictment to the broader question of White House coziness with Russia.

"Paul Manafort and Rick Gates ran Trump's campaign and continued to be a part of his inner circle after Election Day," Democratic National Committee Chairman Tom Perez said in a statement. "This underscores the seriousness of the investigation into Donald Trump's ties to Russia. It's time for Republicans to commit to protecting this investigation and preserving the rule of law."

The Papadopoulos plea could prove far more damning for the White House in the near term than the indictments. Papadopoulos' overtures to Russians were first reported by the Washington Post in August, but that report downplayed the extent of his efforts, and the extent to which he kept senior campaign officials informed.

"It is in the best interest of our client, George Papadopoulos, that we refrain from commenting on George's case," Papadopoulos's defense attorney, Thomas Breen, said in a short statement. "We will have the opportunity to comment on George's involvement when called upon by the Court at a later date. We look forward to presenting all the facts that led to the events that resulted in this charge."

Papadopoulos was informed as early as April that the Russians had "dirt" on Clinton and "thousands of emails." In July, Trump would call on Russia to find the emails missing from Clinton's server, but he said that the comment was meant in jest.

Josh Dawsey, Michael Crowley, Louis Nelson, and Kyle Cheney contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Garcetti, possible 2020 hopeful, launches innovation group Back

By Edward-Isaac Dove | 10/30/2017 05:17 AM EDT

Prospective presidential candidates tend to launch PACs to pump money into campaigns of people who might prove helpful. Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti is starting a nonprofit with other mayors, union leaders and business executives to fund what they call innovation investments around the country.

Called Accelerator for America, the group will hold its first meeting Nov. 7 and 8 in South Bend, Indiana, timed to coincide with the anniversary of last year's election. The second meeting is already booked for February, in Columbia, South Carolina.

Garcetti announced on Sunday that, as expected, he wouldn't run for governor of California in 2018, writing on Twitter, "I am passionate about my city and my family; both are here in Los Angeles." But skipping a statewide run now clears him to continue his exploration of national politics — reelected earlier this year, his second term will now last five and a half years due to a change in the election schedule, through 2022.

The mission of Accelerator for America is to provide strategic and educational support in cities, counties and states where there are ballot initiatives for infrastructure funding. Leaders of the group will also look to invest directly in existing organizations that promote jobs and skills training that they believe can be scaled out around the country.

They begin with $1 million in funding, half of which comes from the United Brotherhood of Carpenters. More money is expected.

Garcetti, who'll be chairing the council, said the inspiration for it came from the success of last year's Proposition M in Los Angeles, which authorized $120 billion for infrastructure investment over the next decade. Its passage contrasted with the failure of the Trump administration to provide any details — let alone launch a legislative push — for its promised $1 trillion infrastructure plan.

"America's cities are here, with all due respect, to help save D.C.," Garcetti said. "We've all seen so many panels and plans and promises, but what we're missing is quick action."

On the stump, Garcetti has used a line about wanting "a Democratic voice in local politics, a local voice in Democratic politics," and he says, "I realized the same thing could be said in a nonpartisan way—a local voice in national politics, a national voice in local politics."

Garcetti said he plans to open November's meeting by listing three objectives: "helping Americans build their future," "helping Americans find their dreams," and "helping Americans live well."

When it's pointed out to him that this sounds like presidential rhetoric —especially in the context of a politician who this year has given a speech in the swing state of Wisconsin, spent a day campaigning in New Hampshire and made frequent appearances at national Democratic events —he said, "I hope it's not my platform—I hope it's a platform for local leaders."

Garcetti, whose jobs group will happen to take him to Indiana and South Carolina, added, "I'm certainly not waiting for the next presidential election to get started."

Longtime Garcetti aide Rick Jacobs will serve as CEO of the group, which is in the process of being incorporated as a 501(c)3.

Each member of the advisory council is being asked to make three suggestions for initiatives to back, and they'll look to take applications as the group develops.

"The more we can do to link up the capital and expertise that's on the coasts with the needs in the middle of the country, the better," said South Bend Mayor Pete Buttigieg, who helped develop the concept for Accelerator for America with Garcetti following conversations at meetings of the U.S. Conference of Mayors over the summer.

United Brotherhood of Carpenters general president Doug McCarron pointed out that Proposition M is expected to create 465,000 jobs over 40 years.

"We take that show on the road and we show different cities and counties what can be achieved locally," McCarron said. "There's got to be an uprising of spirit at the local level. It's really easy to point fingers at Washington."

The other advisory council members are: Nashville, Tennessee Mayor Megan Barry; Columbia, South Carolina Mayor Steve Benjamin; Dayton, Ohio Mayor Nan Whaley; Washington State Lt. Gov. Cyrus Habib; International Union of Operating Engineers general president James Callahan; Echoing Green president Cheryl Dorsey; Dollar Shave Club founder & CEO Michael Dubin; PolicyLink CEO Angela Glover Blackwell; Incite.org CEO Swati Mylavarapu; Social Capital Founder and CEO Chamath Palihapitiya; and HNTB president and CEO Rob Slimp.

All the elected officials involved so far are Democrats, though the group does expect to add Republicans to its advisory council.

To view online click here.

Back

Tony Podesta stepping down from lobbying giant amid Mueller probe Back

By Anna Palmer | 10/30/2017 01:02 PM EDT

Democratic power lobbyist Tony Podesta, founder of the Podesta Group, is stepping down from the firm that bears his name after coming under investigation by special counsel Robert Mueller.

Podesta announced his decision during a firm-wide meeting Monday morning and is alerting clients of his impending departure.

Podesta is handing over full operational and financial control to longtime firm CEO Kimberley Fritts, according to multiple sources with knowledge of the meeting. Fritts and a senior group of the Podesta team will be launching a new firm in the next one or two days. Sources said the transition has been in the works for the past several months.

"[Tony] was very magnanimous and said, "This is an amazing group of people," a source said of Podesta's remarks. Podesta also told staff he "doesn't intend to go quietly, or learn how to play golf." He said he "needs to fight this as an individual, but doesn't want the firm to fight it."

Fritts also addressed the gathering, telling staff that she is "thrilled at this opportunity" and that, "This is not about me, this is about y'all." Several other senior staff spoke about their excitement about the future of the firm. The meeting ended with a resounding ovation for Podesta.

Podesta Group did not respond to a request for comment for this story.

Podesta's decision to leave the firm came on the same day that former Donald Trump campaign aides Paul Manafort and Rick Gates were indicted on multiple charges, including money laundering, operating as federal agents of the Ukrainian government, failing to disclose overseas bank accounts and making false statements to federal authorities. Trump campaign foreign policy advisor George Papadopoulos pleaded guilty earlier this month for lying to the FBI about his contacts with Russian officials, according to court records.

The investigation into Podesta and his firm grew out of investigators' examination of Manafort's finances. Manafort organized a PR campaign on behalf of a nonprofit called the European Centre for a Modern Ukraine. Podesta Group was one of several firms that were paid to do work on the PR campaign to promote Ukraine in the U.S.

Podesta Group filed paperwork with the Justice Department in April stating that it had done work for the European Centre for a Modern Ukraine that also benefited the same Ukrainian political party that Manafort once advised. Podesta Group said at the time it believed its client was a European think tank untethered to a political party.

Podesta has long been a larger than life figure on K Street, growing his business from a boutique firm into a massive lobbying and public relations operation. He is well known for his flashy dressing, vast art collection, generous campaign donations across all levels of Democratic politics and, of course, for his brother John Podesta, Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman.

Podesta Group has struggled in the wake of the Mueller investigation. More than a dozen of its lobbying clients have cut ties with the firm this year, according to lobbying filings. Revenues have also declined: The firm brought in an estimated $4.8 million in the third quarter of 2017, down from $5.2 million in the second quarter of 2017 and from $6.1 million in the third quarter of 2016.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

<input type="radio"/>
Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Energy
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Afternoon Energy: White House growing its energy team — Court denies Exxon's docs review request — Nominees get committee vote time
Date: Tuesday, September 12, 2017 4:06:15 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 09/12/2017 04:03 PM EDT

WHITE HOUSE EXPANDS IN ENERGY: The White House has brought on new members to its energy staff, adding names to work on nuclear power and international environmental and energy issues, according to an administration official. The moves are part of the effort to build out the International Energy and Environment Directorate, which reports to both the National Security Council and the National Economic Council.

Who are they? Andrew Restuccia and Eric Wolff report the group includes John Thompson, "a State Department official who was integral to the Kigali, Rwanda negotiations last year to limit global use of a climate change-inducing coolant." The list also includes Mark Eshbaugh, also from the State Department, who was a the former energy director for the National Security Council under President Barack Obama, and Tristan Abbey, who has been detailed from the Department of Energy to focus on international energy. Aaron Weston's detail to the White House is still being worked out, Andrew and Eric write, but he currently works as an adviser to the Idaho National Laboratory. More here.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. Welcome to Tuesday. I'm your host Kelsey Tamborrino. Send your thoughts, news and tips to ktamborrino@politico.com, mdaily@politico.com and njuliano@politico.com, and keep up with us on Twitter at @kelseytam, @dailym1, @nickjuliano, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

PRUITT: NO ICAHN COMMUNICATION HERE: EPA had no email communication with former Trump adviser Carl Icahn, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt told Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse in a letter this week. In a letter, sent Monday, Pruitt said the agency searched the inboxes of 39 high-ranking officials for messages to or from Icahn between Feb. 17 and Aug. 18, but found none. Pruitt's letter comes in response to four different letters from Whitehouse and other Senate Democrats seeking information on Icahn's efforts to modify the Renewable Fuel Standard to benefit his refining company. Eric Wolff reports more here.

NOMS GET COMMITTEE VOTE: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee will vote Thursday on nominees to FERC and the departments of Energy and Interior, committee leadership announced today. The nominees include: Richard Glick and Kevin McIntyre to be members of FERC; Joseph Balash to be assistant Interior secretary for land and minerals management; David Jonas to be general counsel of DOE; and Ryan Nelson to be solicitor at Interior. While they are likely to be approved by the committee, it remains to be seen how quickly they will get a vote in the full Senate. Details here.

MORE IN #EXXONKNEW: The New York Court of Appeals today denied Exxon Mobil's request that the court continue reviewing its claim that documents related to the company's research on climate change were protected by Texas accountant-client privilege rules — effectively telling the company it must turn said documents over to the New York attorney general's office. The court also refused Exxon's motion to suspend the case pending appeal, Ben Lefebvre reports. Ben writes: "The ruling is a blow to the oil major in its fight against New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman's accusation that it defrauded investors by not making public in-house research showing how climate change could harm its oil and gas business. Schneiderman asked PricewaterhouseCoopers nearly a year ago to produce communications involving Exxon."

Schneiderman cheered the news: In a release, the AG said, "Today's Court of Appeals order affirms that Exxon and its outside auditor have an obligation to produce all the documents that our office rightfully subpoenaed. Our fraud investigation continues to move full speed ahead, despite Exxon's continued strategy of delay."

FLORIDA POWER STRUGGLES CONTINUE: More than half of Florida's utility customers were still without power statewide this morning following Hurricane Irma. The state's governor, Rick Scott, said today that 30,000 utility workers, including hundreds from other states, were focused on restoring power in Florida, POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports. "Of the more than 5.5 million households and businesses without power, more than half were Florida Power & Light Co. customers, according to an unattributed report posted at the state Division of Emergency Management website. FPL Vice President Rob Gould said he expects all customers along Florida's east coast to have power restored by the end of the weekend," Bruce writes. "Those along the west coast, where Irma came ashore and where damage was more severe, could have their power restored by Sept. 22, Gould said."

— Scott also said today delivery of fuel to gas stations is resuming, and said he is working with state and federal agencies to get ports open to tankers. "We are very focused on getting more fuel to our state," Scott told reporters in Tallahassee. "We've got to get the fuel back. We've got tankers waiting to come in." More here from Bruce.

— President Donald Trump and first lady Melania Trump will travel to Florida on Thursday to survey damage left in the wake of Hurricane Irma.

DOE AWARDS GRID SECURITY GRANTS: The Energy Department today announced $50 million in grants to improve the security and resiliency of the grid. Of the announced grants, seven will go toward resiliency, while 20 will go to cybersecurity. The cyber grants will fund projects covering vulnerability mitigation, incident response efforts and secure grid management communications, Pro Cybersecurity's Eric Geller reports. Nine national laboratories will administer the grants, in partnership with a range of military, academic and corporate partners.

NO DEBT CEILING VOTE IN DECEMBER: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said this afternoon that Congress won't vote again this year to raise the debt ceiling, Pro Budget's Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes report. "It does not eliminate the extraordinary measures that the Treasury secretary had always had," McConnell told reporters. "It doesn't mean that we won't address the debt ceiling in the future." But the vote "will not be in December," he explained. Read more.

DOE: SUNSHOT TARGET REACHED: DOE also released research today that says the solar industry achieved its SunShot Initiative-set target for utility-scale solar cost by 2020. "Largely due to rapid cost declines in solar photovoltaic (PV) hardware, the average price of utility-scale solar is now 6 cents per kilowatt-hour (kWh)," DOE said in a release. The department said it is now "looking beyond SunShot's 2020 goals with an expanded 2030 vision for the Solar Energy Technologies Office." More here.

EIA RELEASE SEPTEMBER OUTLOOK: The Energy Information Administration

released today its Short-Term Energy Outlook for September, which notes, "industry watchers across the sector will have to grapple with uncertainty regarding the timeline for the return to normal operations for critical energy infrastructure, including refineries, in the coming weeks and months," in Hurricane Harvey's aftermath. The report also forecast the average U.S. regular gasoline retail price will be $2.61/gal in September and then decrease to $2.40/gal in October. EIA forecast the share of U.S. total utility-scale electricity generation from natural gas will fall from an average of 34 percent in 2016 to about 31 percent in 2017. Coal's forecast generation share, meanwhile, increases from 30 percent last year to 31 percent in 2017.

SEIA RELEASES VIDEO ON TRADE CASE IMPACT: The Solar Energy Industries Association released a video today showcasing stories from American manufacturing workers "whose jobs are at risk due to a national trade case initiated by two foreign-owned firms," it said, ahead of the International Trade Commission's Sept. 22 solar tariff decision. "SEIA estimates that trade penalties would put one-third of those people, or 88,000 Americans, out of work in the first year," it said in a release announcing the video. Watch it here.

MAIL CALL: Sen. Ed Markey, a member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, wrote a letter to Trump today, calling for Harvey and Irma Hurricane rebuilding efforts to include climate change best practices. "Rebuilding efforts must give Americans in the impacted regions confidence that they will be better protected against devastating flooding and other climate impacts in the future, as well as reassure Americans across the country that their tax dollars are being spent sensibly," Markey writes. Read it here.

QUICK HITS:

- Billionaire Tom Steyer's PAC donates $1 million to help Virginia immigrant groups mobilize for November election, The Washington Post.
- Solar developers hoard panels as U.S. tariff threat looms, Bloomberg.
- EPA: Bulk of gasoline spill in Galena Park never escaped into waterways, Chron.
- 16 million power outages and 142 mph winds: Hurricane Irma, by the numbers, The Washington Post.

WIDE WORLD OF POLITICS:

- Russia probes pose loyalty test for Team Trump
- Kaine hits the trail again, battling 2016 ghosts on his way
- GOP lawmakers jittery over lack of tax reform details

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/afternoon-energy/2017/09/white-house-growing-its-energy-team-024558>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

White House brings on new energy staff Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Eric Wolff | 09/12/2017 01:25 PM EDT

The White House is building up its energy staff, adding new people to work on nuclear power and international environmental and energy issues, according to an administration official.

The group includes John Thompson, a State department official who was integral to the Kigali, Rwanda negotiations last year to limit global use of a climate change-inducing coolant. Bringing in Thompson, who has already started at the White House, has been seen by supporters of the Kigali amendment to the Montreal Protocol as a signal that the president would get behind the treaty.

Mark Eshbaugh was also being seconded from the State Department, but the former energy director for the National Security Council under President Barack Obama is likely to see his detail end soon.

Tristan Abbey has been detailed from the Department of Energy to focus on international energy. He has been a Republican staffer for the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

Aaron Weston's detail to the White House is still being worked out, but he currently works as an adviser to the Idaho National Laboratory, which specializes in advancing nuclear research. Previously he served as an aide to the House Science Committee.

The moves are part of the effort to build out the International Energy and Environment Directorate, led by Special Assistant to the President for International Energy and Environment George David Banks. The directorate reports to both the National Security Council and the National Economic Council.

To view online click here.

Back

Pruitt: EPA had no emails communications with Icahn Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/12/2017 02:28 PM EDT

EPA had no email communication with billionaire and former Trump adviser Carl Icahn, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt told Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) in a letter this week.

In the letter sent Monday and provided to POLITICO by an EPA official, Pruitt said EPA searched the inboxes of 39 high-ranking officials for messages to or from Icahn between Feb. 17 and Aug. 18, and they found no emails on any subject.

Pruitt's letter was a response to four different letters from Whitehouse and other Senate Democrats seeking information on Icahn's efforts to modify the Renewable Fuel Standard to benefit his refining company. Icahn was an unpaid adviser to Trump until last month, when he resigned his title after questions arose about his advocating for policies that would help his businesses.

Pruitt did acknowledge meeting with Icahn as part of his vetting process to join the Trump administration.

"Mr. Icahn was one of many of the president's advisors that I met with during my confirmation process," he wrote. "During that meeting, I made no assurances with regard to the point of obligation or any other substantive issue."

To view online click here.

Back

FERC, Interior, DOE noms set to clear committee Back

By POLITICO Staff | 09/12/2017 10:40 AM EDT

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee will vote Thursday on several nominees to FERC and the departments of Energy and Interior, committee leaders announced today.

The committee will vote on the following nominees: Richard Glick and Kevin McIntyre to be members of FERC; Joseph Balash to be assistant Interior secretary for land and minerals management; David Jonas to be general counsel of DOE; and Ryan Nelson to be solicitor at Interior.

The nominees are likely to be approved by the committee. It remains to be seen how quickly they will get a vote in the full Senate.

WHAT'S NEXT: The markup is scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m. Thursday in 366 Dirksen and will be webcast.

To view online click here.

Back

Court denies Exxon bid to shield documents in climate change case Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/12/2017 01:14 PM EDT

An appeals court judge today ruled today Exxon Mobil must turn over documents related to the company's research on climate change to the New York attorney general's office.

The New York Court of Appeals denied Exxon's request that the court continue reviewing its claim that the documents were protected by Texas accountant-client privilege rules. The court also refused Exxon's motion to suspend the case pending appeal.

The ruling is a blow to the oil major in its fight against New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman's accusation that it defrauded investors by not making public in-house research showing how climate change could harm its oil and gas business. Schneiderman asked PricewaterhouseCoopers nearly a year ago to produce communications involving Exxon.

"Today's Court of Appeals order affirms that Exxon and its outside auditor have an obligation to produce all the documents that our office rightfully subpoenaed," Schneiderman said in a press release. "Our fraud investigation continues to move full speed ahead, despite Exxon's continued strategy of delay."

An Exxon spokesman was not immediately available for comment.

The case has become a proxy fight for climate change policy, with red-state attorneys general joining Exxon in accusing Schneiderman of harassing the country's largest oil company and those in blue states defending his actions.

The House Science Committee has also opened up its own investigation into Schneiderman's review of Exxon's climate change research.

WHAT'S NEXT: Exxon is expected to reply to the appeals court ruling.

To view online click here.

Back

POLITICO Florida: More than 5M remain without power as FPL asks for patience Back

By Bruce Ritchie | 09/12/2017 12:40 PM EDT

TALLAHASSEE — More than half of Florida's utility customers remained without power statewide Tuesday morning following Hurricane Irma's devastating march across the state.

Gov. Rick Scott said Tuesday that 30,000 utility workers, including hundreds from other states, were focused on restoring power in Florida.

Of the more than 5.5 million households and businesses without power, more than half were Florida Power & Light Co. customers, according to an unattributed report posted at the state Division of Emergency Management website.

FPL vice president Rob Gould said he expects all customers along Florida's east coast to have power restored by the end of the weekend.

Those along the west coast, where Irma came ashore and where damage was more severe, could have their power restored by Sept. 22, Gould said.

"This is going to be a very uncomfortable time" Gould said. "All of us realize how tough this is, but we are going to get the power on soon."

As of 9 a.m., 58 percent of FPL customers were without power, according to the report. For Duke Energy, nearly 1.3 million of almost 1.8 million customers, or 72 percent, were without power.

For electrical cooperatives, there were 605,046 customers without power. Of the state's 1.5 million municipal power customers, 536,389 were without power.

"We have a lot of power out around the state," Scott said.

FPL shut down both nuclear units at its Turkey Point power plant near Homestead in advance of the storm and one of two units at its St. Lucie nuclear plant near Fort Pierce. Gould did not provide an update but said the utility would not announce when it will repower its nuclear units.

View the 8:59 a.m. DEM power outage report here.

This report first appeared on POLITICO Florida on Sept. 12, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

POLITICO Florida: Scott: Ports should open today to bring gasoline to state Back

By Bruce Ritchie | 09/12/2017 02:58 PM EDT

TALLAHASSEE — Gov. Rick Scott said Tuesday that delivery of fuel to gas stations is resuming and he's working with state and federal agencies to get ports open to tankers.

Motorists preparing for Hurricane Irma last week encountered closed gas stations or lines at the pump where there was no gas. Representatives of the Gasbuddy.com web site, which tracks fuel costs, have helped motorists and state agencies identify areas with fuel outages.

"We are very focused on getting more fuel to our state," Scott told reporters in Tallahassee. "We've got to get the fuel back. We've got tankers waiting to come in."

Port Everglades near Fort Lauderdale and the port of Tampa are expected to reopen Tuesday, the governor's office said. Both are major supply hubs for fuel in the state.

Both ports have terminals with fuel that have reopened to provide delivery to gas stations, the governor's office said. The Florida Highway Patrol is continuing to escort fuel delivery trucks to needed areas.

David Mica, executive director of the Florida Petroleum Association, said reopening Port Everglades and the Tampa port are critical as was getting various fuel waivers and tax relief last week to bring in fuel from out of state.

"The governor's office with regards to assistance in seeking waivers to a bundle of different regulatory type things has been great," Mica said. "The cooperation between our industry and agencies is unprecedented."

Gasbuddy.com has had representatives at the state Emergency Operations Center to help the state track fuel outages.

Patrick Dehaan, a senior petroleum analyst with GasBuddy, said the service was invited by state Division of Emergency Management Director Bryan Koon to participate at the center.

Dehaan said that, while other services were providing data, they didn't have as many users to provide updated information on the availability of fuel.

"I think we have benefited from having a large number of people who already use the app to find cheap gas," he said. "This was a natural progression to help entities help motorists."

Koon told the GasBuddy representatives on Tuesday that he would like them to make a presentation on their role in the hurricane response to other states' emergency management directors.

This story first appeared on POLITICO Florida on Sept. 12, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump to visit Florida on Thursday to survey Irma damage Back

By Louis Nelson | 09/12/2017 03:03 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and first lady Melania Trump will travel to Florida Thursday to survey damage left in the wake of Hurricane Irma, which made landfall in southwest Florida last weekend and left wide swaths of wreckage as it made its way up the peninsula.

"The president's action during these times demonstrate why he's a true leader who can bring the country together and get things done for the American people," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said at Tuesday's press briefing after announcing Trump's planned travel.

Sanders did not offer any further details on what regions of Florida Trump would visit or what he would do while there.

Shortly after Sanders' announcement, Stephanie Grisham, a spokeswoman for Melania Trump, tweeted, ".@flotus will travel to #Florida w POTUS on Thurs to survey aftermath of #HurricaneIrma."

The White House had previously teased plans for Trump to visit Florida but said any trip would not be finalized until the situation there had stabilized to the point that a presidential visit would not add undue stress to local authorities.

Trump has been outwardly engaged in hurricane response and recovery efforts in recent weeks, twice visiting the Gulf Coast, which was ravaged by Hurricane Harvey last month. He has also offered updates and encouragement on Twitter, lauding the work of first responders and promising support for storm victims.

To view online click here.

Back

DOE awards grid security grants to improve bug patching and incident response Back

By Eric Geller | 09/12/2017 10:57 AM EDT

The Department of Energy today announced $50 million in grants to improve the security and resiliency of the electric grid.

Seven of the DOE grants will go to resiliency, while 20 will go to cybersecurity.

The cyber grants will fund projects covering vulnerability mitigation, incident response efforts and secure grid management communications.

Nine national laboratories will administer the grants, in partnership with a wide range of military, academic and corporate partners.

Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Oak Ridge, Tenn., and its partners will develop "a tool to verify the integrity of firmware used in energy delivery system devices, without taking the equipment offline."

Pacific Northwest National Laboratory in Richland, Wash., will oversee an effort to "develop a secure and flexible data exchange approach for communication between control centers."

"A resilient, reliable, and secure power grid is essential to the Nation's security, economy, and the vital services that Americans depend on every day," Energy Secretary Rick Perry said in a statement.

"By leveraging the world-class innovation of the National Laboratories and their partners," he added, "this investment will keep us moving forward to create yet more real-world capabilities that the energy sector can put into practice to continue improving the resilience and security of the country's critical energy infrastructure."

To view online click here.

Back

McConnell: No December debt ceiling vote Back

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 09/12/2017 02:47 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said this afternoon that Congress won't vote again this year to raise the debt ceiling.

"It does not eliminate the extraordinary measures that the Treasury secretary had always had," McConnell told reporters. "It doesn't mean that we won't address the debt ceiling in the future."

But the vote "will not be in December," he explained.

While Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has not officially predicted how much time Congress has until the nation will reach its borrowing limit, some economists have predicted lawmakers might be able to hold out until March before risking default.

After President Donald Trump struck a deal with Democrats last week to temporarily raise the debt ceiling along with stopgap spending and disaster aid, GOP lawmakers began insisting the White House come up with a plan for cutting spending in the next effort to lift the limit.

To view online click here.

Back

DOE shifts SunShot's solar goals Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/12/2017 02:56 PM EDT

The Department of Energy is shifting the focus of its SunShot Initiative to including broader administration priorities, such as grid reliability.

The program, which had dedicated itself to lowering solar costs including both panel costs and permitting, will now also devote research dollars to resilience, reliability, and storage, DOE said today.

"With the impressive decline in solar prices, it is time to address additional emerging challenges," Daniel Simmons, acting assistant secretary for energy efficiency and renewable energy, said in a statement. "As we look to the future, DOE will focus new solar R&D on the Secretary's priorities, which include strengthening the reliability and resilience of the electric grid while integrating solar energy."

DOE was also touting the early achievement of one of its 2020 goals, reducing solar costs for utility-scale solar to 6 cents a kilowatt-hour.

To view online click here.

Back

Russia probes pose loyalty test for Team Trump Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 09/12/2017 05:10 AM EDT

Lawyers representing Donald Trump's current and former aides are giving their clients one simple piece of advice: Don't lie to protect the president.

As special counsel Robert Mueller and congressional investigators prepare to question high-ranking aides — including Hope Hicks, Reince Priebus and Sean Spicer — in the coming weeks, Trump's long history of demanding his employees' complete loyalty is being put to the test.

But Trump stalwarts know the president is closely following the media coverage of the Russia case — and the last thing they want is to be deemed a turncoat whose answers end up becoming further fuel for investigators.

Several of the lawyers representing current and former aides told POLITICO they're actively warning their clients that any bonds connecting them to Trump won't protect them from criminal charges if federal prosecutors can nail them for perjury, making false statements or obstruction of justice.

"What I always tell clients is you can't protect anybody. You can only hurt yourself," said a lawyer representing a client involved in the Russia probe. The attorney added that any overt attempts to protect Trump will raise wider suspicions of a cover-up, making matters "worse for everybody."

"Efforts to concoct a story to protect somebody are almost inevitably doomed to failure," the attorney explained. "All you do is create liability to yourself that didn't exist before."

Mueller's investigation and multiple probes on Capitol Hill have expanded to include the Trump family's interactions with Russians as well as business deals involving the Trump Organization. The federal prosecutors and congressional investigators are doing their homework as they build substantive factual records through document requests, subpoenas and interviews.

That's something the lawyers representing Trump officials say they can't impress enough on their clients, especially when one of the most potent weapons Mueller and his team have to gain leverage centers around anyone who makes misleading statements or other trip-ups.

"The lesson to be always learned is loyalty is one thing, but are you prepared to go to jail for it?" said former Whitewater special counsel Robert Ray. "The answer to that question should be no."

Recent history is littered with examples of loyal staffers who chose to shield their superiors. Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, was convicted in 2007 for lying to federal officials probing who leaked the name of a covert CIA officer, and even President George W. Bush believed Libby was guilty of trying to protect his boss.

Webster Hubbell, a former Clinton Justice Department official, served an 18-month federal sentence on fraud and tax evasion charges tied to his Whitewater work as a former law partner with President Bill Clinton and first lady Hillary Clinton. But Hubbell maintained his loyalty to the first couple while in jail, and even as he faced additional charges tied to independent counsel Kenneth Starr's probe.

Bush commuted Libby's prison sentence, but the Republican president did not heed Cheney's request for a complete pardon. Clinton also declined to grant Hubbell a pardon.

Ray, who succeeded Starr as the special counsel investigating the Clinton White House, called political loyalty a "good thing" that "makes the system work" for elected officials and their staff. But he noted it also "presents some problems when it comes to criminal investigations. These have real-life consequences to people beyond what they even imagined."

"Loyalty is not a two-way street," Ray said. "A lot of young people go to the White House and they're going to be loyal to the president and the president is going to be loyal to me. Bullshit. If it's expedient, you're going to be thrown under the bus. The loyalty isn't necessarily going to be returned. Even if it were, I'm not sure the promise or prospect of a pardon is all that comforting."

As the Trump associates face questioning, they know that loyalty is a treasured commodity in the president's orbit.

Comey testified to this before the Senate in June, explaining how Trump told him during one of their initial White House meetings, "I need loyalty, I expect loyalty." While the ousted FBI chief rejected Trump's overtures, Trump's inner circle is packed with loyalists. Cohen, in a recent interview with Vanity Fair, described how he sees himself as an extension of the president's family and will stick by Trump no matter the legal bills or criticism that his own relatives face. "I'm the guy who would take a bullet for the president," Cohen told the magazine.

Trump's most dedicated supporters even have a nickname for their club: the "Oct. 8th coalition," which White House senior adviser Kellyanne Conway told the Washington Examiner represents the people who stuck by Trump after the vulgar "Access Hollywood" videotape emerged during the heat of the 2016 campaign.

Calls for testimony have reportedly gone out to Priebus and Spicer, the former top White House aides who played roles in many of the critical early Trump decisions that have become pertinent to the Russia case, including the firings of national security adviser Michael Flynn and FBI Director James Comey.

Also of interest for Mueller and lawmakers are a pair of longtime Trump Organization hands who have had front-row seats to the president's political rise: Hicks, one of Trump's most trusted aides, now serving as White House interim communications director, and Rhona Graff, the personal secretary who is named in an email chain arranging a controversial Trump Tower meeting last summer between senior Trump campaign aides and a Russian attorney promising dirt on Hillary Clinton.

Investigators have also been pressing for answers from the president's eldest son, Donald Trump Jr., who spent five hours last week meeting with Senate staff to discuss that June 2016 meeting at Trump Tower; Michael Cohen, a personal Trump attorney under a subpoena for documents from the House Intelligence Committee; and Paul Manafort, the embattled former Trump campaign chairman.

John Dean, the former Nixon White House counsel whose public testimony before Congress played a major role in exposing the Watergate cover-up, said a president's loyalty will matter only so much when the staff starts talking to federal investigators.

"It's very interesting the way that works," he said. "I felt that loyalty to Nixon until he started trying to destroy me. That somehow drains loyalty."

Many of the Trump aides being pulled into the investigations are readying for the legal scrutiny. Hicks hired Robert Trout, a former U.S. attorney in Baltimore, as her personal counsel, while Priebus and White House counsel Don McGahn both have tapped William Burck, a former deputy counsel in the George W. Bush White House.

Others insist questions about maintaining loyalty to Trump in the Russia case is really a moot point. "There's nothing to cover up or have his back on," said a former Trump White House aide. "By all accounts, he's not involved in this."

White House attorney Ty Cobb said Trump has instructed his staff to cooperate with Mueller and congressional investigators. "The message goes out to all his people. They have to listen to their own lawyers, but the White House wants them to fully cooperate and tell the truth, and we expect they will and to the best of our knowledge that'll be the case."

Cobb also pushed back on the notion that loyalty to Trump would supersede a person telling the truth. "You can be loyal and be honorable at the same time, and that's what the president wants," he added. "Candor and honesty and anything that paints a complete picture here is in the interest of justice, the White House and the country."

A spokesman for Mueller declined comment.

As the current and former Trump associates head into congressional hearing rooms and before Mueller's grand jury, former federal prosecutors say the witnesses are likely to be mindful of how their former colleagues — Trump included — interpret their moves.

"They don't want to be seen as the John Dean among Republicans, to be the traitor who brought down the party," said a former federal law enforcement official who has worked on special counsel cases. "They also have to be concerned if they appear to be cooperating then they're the target of the White House attack machine."

Alex Whiting, a former federal prosecutor and Harvard Law professor, said Mueller may have more luck getting cooperation from recently ousted Trump officials — like Priebus and Spicer, though he noted the two men also may end up being overly cautious too.

"These guys they have their careers and reputations to be concerned about," he said.

Barbara Res, a former construction executive at the Trump Organization who worked directly under Trump, countered that loyalty is likely to matter little for anyone who has gotten such a public boot from Trump's inner circle. "Why should they be loyal to him?" she asked of aides such as Spicer and Priebus. "He treated them like crap."

To view online click here.

Back

Kaine hits the trail again, battling 2016 ghosts on his way Back

By Austin Wright | 09/12/2017 05:03 AM EDT

An aide to Tim Kaine enters a diner in Charlottesville and informs the host that the Virginia senator is about to walk in. The host smiles and cracks a joke: "You mean the guy who lost to Trump?"

Ten months after the presidential election, Kaine is still trying to shed the stigma of being the vice presidential candidate on the ticket that came up short against Donald Trump, a man so reviled by Kaine's fellow Democrats that many of them can't bear the thought of him serving out his full four-year presidential term. The senator is back on the campaign trail — stumping in Virginia for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ralph Northam and preparing for his own 2018 reelection campaign.

But even as Kaine tries to keep his focus on the next election, there are constant reminders of the last one — the only election he's ever lost. Trump, it seems, looms over everything.

Kaine isn't interested in relitigating one of the biggest electoral upsets in U.S. history. He looks visibly uncomfortable talking about the election and cautions against "overinterpreting" what went wrong.

Still, as Kaine sips coffee and takes selfies with supporters who recognize their senator, one can't help but detect some lingering resentment over the fact that voters rejected him and Hillary Clinton for a reality TV star. Trump "has frequently done things that I think are shocking for a president to do, but nothing he's done has been surprising," Kaine says. "There is nothing this guy has done that should surprise a person in this country based on the person he was before he took the oath of office."

But Kaine isn't questioning Trump's legitimacy or pining for his impeachment, saying he still hopes Trump will be a good president and wants to work with his administration on issues of mutual interest, like infrastructure.

"Look, he was elected by 63 million people in the electoral college," Kaine says. "He will be president for four years. I think you have to assume that he will."

Instead, the 59-year-old senator is fighting Trump's agenda in the Senate and focusing on what's next: a statewide race in Virginia that will be one of the first chances for Democrats to deliver a major electoral rebuke to Trump. He's working to bolster Northam and others running in Virginia's off-year election this November.

After that, he says he'll turn his attention to 2018. Kaine is urging Democrats to prioritize next year's midterm elections over the 2020 presidential contest.

"There's a lot of skirmishing to grab the microphone for 2020," he says. "If we have a good 2018, I think we'll do fine in 2020. If we have a bad 2018, it will be incredibly demoralizing and really hurt us in 2020."

Kaine and his wife, Anne Holton, discussed the senator's future in a wide-ranging interview on a recent Saturday at a diner called the Nook on Charlottesville's Downtown Mall. It was just a block from where 32-year-old Heather Heyer was killed last month when a man drove his car into a crowd of counterprotesters during a white supremacist rally.

Kaine and Holton both appear disgusted as they reflect on Trump's reaction to the rally that brought Nazis and members of the Ku Klux Klan to their state. "Why did they come to Virginia?" Kaine asks, noting that most of the participants were from out of state. "If you have a fantasy about the Civil War, Virginia plays a role in your psychosis. These people hate to see Virginia moving forward."

The interview comes amid a campaign blitz for Kaine — 13 events in three days with Northam and the state's Democratic candidates for lieutenant governor and attorney general, Justin Fairfax and Mark Herring. It's a bit of a warm-up act for the senator, who's using these campaign stops to test the messages he'll be delivering when he begins stumping for himself next year in his first-ever real reelection contest.

"I like being out on the trail a lot, and it is a little bit easier when your name isn't on the ballot," he says.

Still, when you're Kaine, there's no escaping 2016.

In Charlottesville, he is greeted by University of Virginia students wearing "Stronger Together" jackets. At a campaign event in Newport News, he's introduced to the crowd by Democratic Rep. Bobby Scott as the man who "should have been our vice president."

Even Kaine's own stump speech seeks to make sense of an election that many on the left are still struggling coming to terms with. He reminds his audiences that he and Clinton won the popular vote, and knocks Trump for promising voters "greatness" without offering any evidence of "goodness."

For Kaine, a harmonica-playing former missionary whose aw-shucks demeanor during the presidential race earned him a reputation as "America's dad," this is about the most stinging invective he's willing to hurl at a president who once retweeted a supporter who wrote that "Kaine looks like an evil crook out of the Batman movies."

Even Kaine's reelection campaign next year might not offer him the chance to move past 2016.

His only declared Republican challenger so far is Corey Stewart, a staunch Trump backer who sought to channel the real estate mogul during a bid for the GOP nomination for governor that he narrowly lost. A race against Stewart would almost certainly represent a rematch between the centrist vision put forward by Clinton and Kaine, and the take-no-prisoners approach of the populist conservative forces that powered Trump's victory.

And then there's Clinton. After retreating from the public eye for months, the former secretary of state is launching a book tour this month for her new campaign memoir, "What Happened." Many Democrats are dreading having to relive the 2016 nightmare.

Kaine says he's been in touch with Clinton "a number of times" over the phone, text and email since the election. But the senator, who tries to get through a book a week, has not read an advance copy and doesn't plan to have any role in her book tour. His first few conversations with Clinton, he says, "were more about looking in the rearview mirror." But their more recent chats "have been about looking in the windshield."

"For Hillary, it's harder because she has to grapple with, 'OK, what's next?'" he says. "I didn't have to sort of decide what's next. I'm in the Senate, and the Senate has even gotten more important because I think the Senate is playing more of the role of the adult in the room right now for the American government."

He rejects the notion that their defeat represented a rebuke of his and Clinton's moderate approach, calling the schism in the Democratic Party "superficial." He adds, though, that the party needs a "more compelling economic message," pointing to an op-ed he wrote in USA Today in which he said Democrats should focus on "growth" and touted what has become the party's new slogan, "Better skills, better jobs and better wages."

But Kaine says he's not putting himself forward as the one to lead the party out of the wilderness in 2020. He insists he has no presidential ambitions and wants to emulate the 30-year Senate career of former Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), a family friend of Kaine's who retired in 2009.

"I'm going to consider this the last job I'll ever hold," says Kaine, whose past positions include Richmond mayor, Virginia lieutenant governor and then governor. He offers the obligatory addendum that he could be "voted out" and that "you can't get presumptuous."

It's at this point that Holton chimes in to underscore her husband's decision to rule out a White House bid. "I ruled it out before he did," says Holton, a former Virginia secretary of education. "I've always thought that the office he's in is most important."

Kaine adds that he knows "my home state and being part of the political and economic and social progress of my state is what I'm really interested in." He says his committee assignments — Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Budget and Health, Education, Labor and Pensions — have positioned him well to have a major long-term impact in the Senate, both on the national stage and on issues of importance to his military-heavy home state.

In Virginia, after all, he and Clinton were the winners of last year's presidential contest.

"Virginia has seen too many people like Donald Trump in our history — demagogues who didn't understand the virtue of the Jeffersonian equality principle," he says. "We've seen Donald Trump before. In this state, we've put it behind us. We've shut the door."

To view online click here.

Back

GOP lawmakers jittery over lack of tax reform details Back

By Colin Wilhelm and Aaron Lorenzo | 09/12/2017 05:06 AM EDT

Congressional Republicans came back to Washington ready and eager to work on tax reform, but they're still missing one thing: a plan.

That's triggered frustration among rank-and-file lawmakers who feel pressure from President Donald Trump to pass a tax reform bill but have seen no plans and worry they'll be backed into a corner on legislation they haven't even seen, much like they were with the failed Obamacare repeal earlier this summer.

"This time around there is no room for error. This has got to be a home run," Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.) said, recalling the GOP's Obamacare fiasco. "I would hope everyone wants to know what's in it before you vote on it. That's the old [Nancy] Pelosi joke on health care, it turned into a colossal joke. 'You'll find out what's in it after we pass it.'"

A member of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, speaking on condition of anonymity to speak freely said, "It is frustrating and concerning that we don't have the details and yet we're going to be asked in 60 days to vote on something,"

The member suggested that congressional and administration leaders negotiating a plan are holding back information either to avoid leaks or because they haven't found enough common ground yet to share anything.

There are still disagreements among negotiators in closed-door meetings over crucial issues, including:

- The corporate tax rate, with President Donald Trump pushing for a 15 percent rate that others see as unrealistic because of its cost.
- The lack of a clear path forward on the 2018 budget, which will be used as a vehicle for tax reform.
- Allowing businesses to immediately write off the costs of equipment and other big investments.

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and top Trump economic adviser Gary Cohn are set to meet with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Senate Budget Committee members Tuesday to strategize on the budget. Mnuchin, Cohn and McConnell belong to the "Big Six" group of tax reform negotiators, along with House Speaker Paul Ryan, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch.

Republican leaders have set a goal of releasing more details this month, but not before GOP members of Ways and Means get a look and give them the OK. But with each day that passes without a plan, the rank and file seem to get more on edge.

"We want a lot more clarity on tax reform," said Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), chairman of the staunchly conservative House Freedom Caucus.

Trump's proposal for a 15 percent tax rate for corporations and other businesses remains a major sticking point, sources familiar with the talks said. The rate is now 35 percent.

But Mnuchin signaled Tuesday the administration's position may be softening.

"I don't know if we'll be able to achieve that, given the budget issues, but we're going to get this down to a very competitive level," he said at an event hosted by CNBC.

The exact number is less important than getting tax reform done, he said.

Republican congressional leaders have mildly, but publicly, broken with Trump on the rate, which they'd initially hoped was a White House negotiating position rather than a concrete goal due to its cost.

"The president's been out there talking about a 15 percent rate, the House has talked about 20, but to get it down from 35 to 20 it's about $100 billion per point," said Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), the third ranking Senate Republican.

Ryan, in a public interview hosted by The New York Times last week, said it was more realistic to meet or beat the average corporate rate of industrialized countries, 22.5 percent.

"Those numbers are really hard to make work," Ryan said when asked about a 15 percent rate, though he added that he'd let tax writers do the "exact math" on what works for budgetary purposes.

As one conservative tax activist put it, "There's still a little more separation than we originally thought," indicating that Trump's 15 percent push set an unrealistic bar. The more he pledges it, as he did at a campaign-style rally last week in North Dakota, the harder it would be for him to shift, the activist said.

The House, Senate and White House also remain divided over the budget, which Republicans plan to use as the vehicle for tax reform to get around Democratic opposition in the Senate. The budget would include "reconciliation" instructions designed to avert a filibuster.

"A budget resolution only has to do with one thing and that's tax reform," Brat said. "So if you're going to vote on tax reform, OK what's it look like? And we don't know yet. So it's very hard to vote on a budget resolution, which has as its sole objective doing tax reform, when you don't know what tax reform looks like. And so that's our objection."

In addition, the negotiators continue to wrestle over full, immediate expensing of capital investments for businesses. They are at odds over whether the provision is necessary to juice the economy or too expensive when combined with tax cuts.

Two meetings last week of the Big Six — one on Tuesday with Trump and a follow-up on Thursday — yielded little in the way of movement, at least publicly.

Mnuchin, who is one of the negotiators, told POLITICO as he left the second meeting "we are very close" to finalizing a tax reform agreement, but offered no specifics. Mnuchin also said the administration and congressional leaders were "absolutely" close to releasing a plan, a week after claiming on television that "a very detailed plan" was being shared with members of Congress.

That was news to lawmakers.

"I would think I would be in a position to see that but I haven't," said Meadows, who is one of the members of Congress closest to the administration.

Ways and Means members say they know little more at this point.

"There's nothing concrete yet," said Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla.), though he added that he thought a framework would be set soon.

Rep. Jackie Walorski (R-Ind.), another Ways and Means member, said, "The president has some final decisions to make and I think when that happens then we roll."

Though congressional Republicans remain cautiously optimistic they will be able to deliver on their promise to overhaul the tax code, they know they have a limited opportunity and fear further delay will only allow interest groups to fully mobilize to fight any changes that might curb or eliminate tax provisions important to them.

Thune said basic questions have to be answered about how to measure the costs and benefits of tax cuts, as well as to what extent they are paid for by ending existing tax breaks.

"And that, obviously, is where you start getting into the controversy," Thune said. "Because every time you kill a deduction or preference or some exemption in the code there's some constituency for that."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very

Somewhat

Neutral

Not really

Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Energy
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Afternoon Energy: White House reassures on ethanol — Job growth stays strong — Report: Murray downplays need for DOE rescue
Date: Friday, December 08, 2017 3:24:28 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 12/08/2017 03:22 PM EDT

With help from Eric Wolff

WHITE HOUSE REASSURES GRASSLEY ON ETHANOL: White House chief of staff John Kelly called Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley Thursday to reassure him that the president backs ethanol, a Grassley spokesman said. The call came after the president met with Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and other oil state senators to discuss how to help refiners. "Following the White House meeting, chief of staff Gen. Kelly spoke with Sen. Grassley over the phone and reiterated the president's unwavering commitment to ethanol, the RFS and Midwestern farmers," Grassley spokesman Michael Zona said.

JOBS GROWTH REMAINS STRONG: The economy added 228,000 jobs in November, the Labor Department said today. That's down from 244,000 in October, but helps to eliminate "any lingering worries about September's net job losses due to hurricanes in Texas and Florida," Pro Employment & Immigration's Ian Kullgren reports.

Oil and gas extraction employment rose slightly, adding 200 jobs last month to grow to 179,400, according to seasonally adjusted numbers. Coal mining shed about 400 jobs between October and November, falling to a seasonally adjusted 51,200. Both figures are above where they were a year ago, according to BLS.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. I'm your host Kelsey Tamborrino. Send your thoughts, news and tips to ktamborrino@politico.com, mdaily@politico.com and njuliano@politico.com, and keep up with us on Twitter at @kelseytam, @dailym1, @nickjuliano, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

NAH, WE'RE GOOD: Murray Energy executive Bob Murray told E&E News the fate of his company doesn't hinge on the outcome of Perry's subsidies proposal — instead, Murray Energy Corp. could survive on growing coal exports, he said. Murray told E&E that he no longer believes the company would fall if utility FirstEnergy Solutions Corp. files for bankruptcy or if the FERC doesn't enact the Energy request.

"We looked at it initially and said, 'If they go into bankruptcy at FirstEnergy Solutions, we may also,'" Murray said. "But we've since looked at it and believe that we can survive it through offsetting that loss of business with exports, which are growing. And actually, the pricing of exports now is better than domestic energy coal pricing." More here.

FERC HEADS ATTEND FIRSTENERGY-BACKED CONFERENCE: FERC's then-Chairman Neil Chatterjee and Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur were among the guests at a secret conference in Florida attended by numerous industry executives and organized by a FirstEnergy board member, according to a report from the Energy and Policy Institute, a pro-renewable energy nonprofit watchdog group. The conference in question is an annual gathering, since 2000 and organized by a the Emerging Issues Policy Forum, whose vice president and board member is Julia Johnson, current director on the board of the FirstEnergy

Corporation.

FirstEnergy is reportedly one of the driving forces of Energy Secretary Rick Perry plan to subsidize failing coal and nuclear plants. EPI points out the Florida meeting came just after Perry's proposal, which Chatterjee has signaled he supports. Chatterjee handed over the gavel this week to new FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre, who has asked DOE for another 30 days to consider the proposal.

EPI also reports that the commissioners' airfare, hotel rooms and meals were likely paid by one of Johnson's entities, potentially in violation of a FERC ethics rule. "FERC did not respond to questions from the Energy and Policy Institute about who paid the bill for FERC personnel to travel and stay at the Eau Palm Resort, instead saying that EPI needs to file a Freedom of Information Act request, which EPI has done," they write. "But EIPF paid for then-Commissioner Collette Honorable to attend the 2016 conference, which was held at the Ritz-Carlton in Key Biscayne, Florida." Read the whole report here.

TRUMP APPROVES CALIFORNIA EMERGENCY: President Donald Trump today approved an emergency declaration in California, as wildfires raging in the area went into their fifth day. The declaration orders federal assistance — via the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA — to aid state and local response efforts, POLITICO's Nolan McCaskill reports. "Specifically, FEMA is authorized to identify, mobilize, and provide, at its discretion, equipment and resources necessary to alleviate the impacts of the emergency. Emergency protective measures, limited to direct Federal assistance, will be provided at 75 percent federal funding," the White House said in a statement. Read more.

EPA WON'T FIGHT TSCA TRANSFER: EPA said today it won't fight green groups' effort to let the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit Court of Appeals hear lawsuits over one of the major implementation rules for the Toxic Substances Control Act, Alex Guillén reports. "Several lawsuits over the evaluation rule were consolidated into the Richmond, Va.,-based 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, while suits over the prioritization rule were moved to the 9th Circuit, which is based in San Francisco," Alex writes. Environmentalists have asked the 4th Circuit to transfer its suit to the 9th Circuit, while EPA has asked for the reverse. "In a short filing today, EPA said that it still believes both challenges should be heard in the same court, and said it will drop its opposition to green groups' request that the 4th Circuit move the case," Alex writes.

PRUITT TO RELEASE SUPERFUND LIST: "EPA will release its list of top-priority Superfund sites" today, a senior adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt tells Bloomberg. The list, proposed by the agency in June, "will show which Superfund sites need 'immediate and intense attention,' potentially accelerating cleanup progress and agency decisions at those sites," Bloomberg writes. " ... The list that was initially proposed would have 10 sites, and would be known as the 'Top Ten Administrator's Emphasis List.'" But Albert Kelly, Pruitt's senior adviser on Superfund issues, told Bloomberg the list to be released today has a different name, "and may not have exactly 10 sites, as proposed. He declined to provide further details ahead of the EPA's official announcement." Read more.

SEE YOU IN TWO WEEKS: The president today signed the short-term continuing resolution H.J. Res. 123 \(115\) appropriating funding through Dec. 22. and avoiding a government shutdown.

CRES TARGETS TAX REFORM: Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions today announced a digital ad buy targeting key figures on tax reform. The D.C. campaign directs to this letter from CRES to House Speaker Paul Ryan, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady and Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch. The letter applauds the chambers' tax reform bill H.R. 1 \(115\) for reducing the corporate tax rate and allowing for 100 percent expensing, but voices concerns over the Base Erosion Anti-Abuse Tax provision and the Alternative Minimum Tax.

QUICK HITS:

- Transition plan would decimate agency, except a "tiny bit," E&E.
- A Maryland paper mill burns a polluting sludge called black liquor. The state calls it clean energy, Baltimore Sun.
- BP says 2017 a success as it shifts focus to natural gas, Houston Chronicle.
- Kids' lawsuit over climate change faces big test in federal court, Bloomberg BNA.
- Baker Hughes: U.S. drillers add oil rigs for third week in a row, Reuters.

WIDE WORLD OF POLITICS:

- Final tax bill vote in House won't come next week, GOP leader says
- Collins' Obamacare deal faces moment of truth
- Trump's "fake news" mantra a hit with despots

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/newsletters/afternoon-energy/2017/12/white-house-reassures-on-ethanol-045924>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Jobs growth stays strong with 228,000 rise Back

By Ian Kullgren | 12/08/2017 08:48 AM EDT

Job creation stayed strong in November, the government reported Friday, eliminating any lingering worries about September's net job losses due to hurricanes in Texas and Florida.

The Labor Department reported 228,000 new jobs in November, down from October's 244,000 but notably higher than job growth during the months preceding September. October's gains, the largest of Trump's presidency, were, economists cautioned, inflated by the previous month's weather disruptions.

Friday's report demonstrated that the economy is still expanding at a steady clip in in the ninth year of recovery. White House Press Secretary Sarah Sanders said it showed that "President Trump's bold economic vision continues to pay off," and Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta said it reflected "optimism about the pro-growth, pro-jobs policies being advanced by President Trump's Administration."

"The job market and the economy are strong," said Mark Zandi, the chief economist for Moody's Analytics. "It would be pretty hard to derail."

The November unemployment was 4.1 percent, the jobs report showed, unchanged from October. Average hourly private-sector earnings rose 2.5 percent in October over the previous year. In October, they were up 2.3 percent.

The release comes as Trump and congressional Republicans put final touches on a tax bill that will slash the corporate tax rate and redraw tax brackets for individuals.

"The labor market is in great shape. Tax cuts should be used when the economy needs tax cuts and it doesn't need tax cuts right now," Joel Naroff, the chief economist at Naroff Economic Advisors, told Reuters.

Experts expect the tax break to give the economy a short-term boost that will likely level off by 2020.

"This may help the Rs for the 2018 election, but it will really complicate the election in 2020," Zandi said.

Labor force participation was unchanged from October's 62.7 percent and still close to its lowest level since the 1970s.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump approves emergency declaration for California to help combat wildfires Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 12/08/2017 11:55 AM EDT

President Donald Trump today approved an emergency declaration in California, where wildfires have blazed for much of the week.

Trump's declaration orders federal assistance — from DHS and FEMA — to aid state and local response efforts.

"This action will help alleviate the hardship and suffering that the emergency may inflict on the local population, and provide appropriate assistance for required emergency measures ... to save lives and to protect property and public health and safety, and to lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe in the counties of Los Angeles, Riverside, San Diego, Santa Barbara, and Ventura," the White House said in a statement. "Specifically, FEMA is authorized to identify, mobilize, and provide, at its discretion, equipment and resources necessary to alleviate the impacts of the emergency. Emergency protective measures, limited to direct Federal assistance, will be provided at 75 percent Federal funding."

The California wildfires are in in their fifth day. Fires have burned across the southern region, displacing people from their homes and tearing through buildings. Authorities issued evacuation orders for more than 100,000 people.

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders told reporters Thursday that White House and FEMA officials were "speaking regularly to state and local authorities and making sure that we're ready and able to help when needed and when requested by those authorities."

To view online click here.

Back

EPA won't fight moving TSCA lawsuit to 9th Circuit Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/08/2017 11:50 AM EDT

EPA today said that it will not oppose environmental groups' effort to switch courts for a lawsuit over one of the two major implementation rules for the reformed Toxic Substances Control Act.

Several lawsuits over the evaluation rule were consolidated into the Richmond, Va.,-based 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, while suits over the prioritization rule were moved to the 9th Circuit, which is based in San Francisco.

Seeking to avoid connected rules being litigated in different courts, EPA asked the 9th Circuit to send its suit to the 4th Circuit. Environmentalists made a similar request of the 4th Circuit to transfer its suit to the 9th Circuit.

But the 9th Circuit last month said it would not release the suit over the prioritization rule, leaving open the possibility that the 4th Circuit could transfer the evaluation rule challenge to the 9th Circuit.

In a short filing today, EPA said that it still believes both challenges should be heard in the same court, and said it will drop its opposition to green groups' request that the 4th Circuit move the case.

WHAT'S NEXT: It is unclear when the 4th Circuit will act, and it could still decide to keep the suit rather than transfer it.

To view online click here.

Back

Final tax bill vote in House won't come next week, GOP leader says Back

By Brian Faler and Colin Wilhelm | 12/08/2017 11:49 AM EDT

The House will not vote next week on a final agreement to rewrite the tax code, though House and Senate negotiators are expected to work through the weekend.

"It will not come up next week, but if it could, I would bring it up as soon as we come out of conference, because I do believe the American people are waiting for a Tax Cuts and Jobs Act," House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy told colleagues late Thursday in remarks on the House floor.

His comments come as lawmakers work behind closed doors on a compromise tax plan that they can send to President Donald Trump to sign into law. Lawmakers have provided little guidance as to when they might wrap up their work, beyond saying they want to finish this year.

Dec. 22 has been widely seen as the unofficial deadline in recent days, as that's the date federal funding will run out under a stopgap spending measure and lawmakers are expected to turn their attention to spending again.

Gary Cohn, the chairman of the National Economic Council, told CNBC Friday that "a lot of progress is being made."

"This is going to be a big weekend for the conference committee; they're spending the weekend working on taxes, and I think we'll see an enormous amount of progress over the weekend," he said.

McCarthy also announced the House would be in session the week of Dec. 18, when the congressional calendar had both chambers on recess.

To view online click here.

Back

Collins' Obamacare deal faces moment of truth Back

By Adam Cancryn | 12/08/2017 05:06 AM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins is barreling toward yet another health care showdown with her own party. But this time, she might not have the leverage to get what she wants.

Republicans who watched Collins lead the rebellion over the GOP's Obamacare repeal effort just three months ago are playing tough on yet another high-stakes bill, wagering they can do without the Maine moderate's swing vote and still claim a narrow year-end legislative win on tax reform.

Collins went along with the tax bill that repeals Obamacare's individual mandate after Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell pledged to pass a pair of bills propping up Obamacare's shaky insurance markets, including a bipartisan deal resuming payments on key subsidies that President Donald Trump halted in October.

But Speaker Paul Ryan has made clear he's not bound by the deal, and there's little urgency among House Republicans to do much of anything on health care before the end of the year. On Thursday, Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker said conservatives received assurances that talks on a spending package to keep the government open won't address Obamacare.

"The three things we were told are not gonna happen as part of our agreement: no CSRs, no DACA, no debt limit," he said, referring to efforts to fund Obamacare's cost-sharing subsidies.

That could cost Collins' support after she signaled that her vote on the final bill may hinge on the fate of the health care measures.

She told a Maine CBS affiliate Thursday night that she'd wait to see the final language from the conference committee working on the tax bill before committing her vote.

"I won't make a final decision until I see what that package is," Collins told CBS WABI 5.

One bill, known as Alexander-Murray, would temporarily restore subsidies to insurers. The second would fund a two-year reinsurance program helping health plans cover particularly expensive patients.

Senate Republicans can only afford two defections and still pass the tax bill using a fast-track procedure that requires a simple majority, with Vice President Mike Pence ready to cast the tie-breaking vote. The margin would become razor thin if Collins holds out, and Sen. Bob Corker maintains his opposition over concerns about the bill's impact on the deficit.

Yet House Republicans still chafing over the Senate's failure to repeal Obamacare insist they won't bend to Collins' demands. And while Senate Republicans are trying to keep Collins in the fold, there's little apparent worry so far that her opposition would sink the tax effort.

"I think you guys have to find something else to be concerned about," said Sen. Tim Scott, one of the 17 GOP lawmakers assigned to merge the House and Senate versions of the tax plan.

Sen. Lamar Alexander, who coauthored Alexander-Murray and has championed its inclusion in a year-end agreement, also waved off the need to pressure House Republicans on the issue.

"The House knows our position," he said. "When they see that they can lower premiums 18 percent ... reduce the debt, reduce the amount of money going to Obamacare subsidies, I think it'll be a Christmas present they'll want to give to their constituents."

One of the few moderates in a Republican conference that narrowly controls the Senate, Collins has regularly used her voice and vote to extract concessions from GOP leaders and ensure she's a central figure in negotiations.

During the health care debate, she urged the GOP to protect Medicaid and preserve more subsidies for people to buy insurance. When they stuck with their blueprint, Collins joined fellow Republicans Lisa Murkowski and John McCain in a dramatic vote that killed the months-long repeal bid.

And in the run-up to the Senate's late-night tax vote, she secured three late changes to the bill, including the expansion of a provision allowing people to deduct hefty medical bills that House Republicans had voted to eliminate entirely.

That was on top of McConnell's "ironclad commitment" to tackle the two health care bills at year's end — measures that Collins claims will help offset premium increases stemming from the bill's repeal of Obamacare's mandate that most Americans be insured.

Collins said Thursday she considers House passage of those Obamacare bills part of that commitment, even though McConnell has only publicly agreed to "supporting passage" of them and can't singlehandedly force the House to take up legislation.

Ryan hasn't officially ruled out the possibility, but declined to commit to rolling either of the bills into upcoming spending agreements. Conservatives have loudly opposed any aid for Obamacare, and even moderates who support stabilizing the health law have shrugged at the exact timing.

"What the vehicle is to get it through the system, in the House and the Senate to the president's desk, I'll leave that to our leadership," said Rep. Tom Reed, who co-chairs the bipartisan Problem Solvers Caucus.

Collins insists she's taking the long view, claiming progress Thursday on trying to win over House Republicans during rounds of private negotiations.

"I remain confident, despite your skepticism, that we will eventually get that," she said.

And as the GOP learned during the repeal debate, the whip count could shift suddenly. Sens. Jeff Flake and Ron Johnson remain wild cards, and either could conceivably join Corker and Collins in torpedoing the tax bill if they dislike the final version.

For now though, Republican leaders are signaling once again that Collins may not get everything she wants on health care — and gambling it won't cost them a second time.

"I think that these are separate issues," said Sen. David Perdue. "I'm hopeful that that won't derail this [tax bill]. We've got to get it this done and get it on the president's desk."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump's 'fake news' mantra a hit with despots Back

By Jason Schwartz | 12/08/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Authoritarian rulers across the globe are adopting President Donald Trump's favorite phrase to limit free speech, with prominent leaders or state media in at least 15 countries using his "fake news" line to denounce their critics, according to a POLITICO review.

By aligning themselves with Trump's words, despots have been able to use the U.S. president as a shield for their attacks on press freedom and human rights, said Joel Simon, executive director of the Committee to Protect Journalists.

"I'm seeing it more and more," he said. Trump, he added, "is providing a context and framework for all sorts of authoritarian leaders — or democratic leaders and others who are dissatisfied or upset by critical media coverage — to undermine and discredit reporting."

In February, for example, Syrian President Bashar Assad brushed off an Amnesty International report that some 13,000 people had been killed at one of his military prisons by saying, "You can forge anything these days, we are living in a fake news era."

In the Philippines, President Rodrigo Duterte has complained of being "demonized" by "fake news." Last month, with Trump laughing by his side, he called reporters "spies."

And in a meta-moment in July, Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro complained to RT, the Russian propaganda outlet, that the world media had "spread lots of false versions, lots of lies" about his country, adding, "This is what we call 'fake news' today, isn't it?"

Over the weekend, a state official in Myanmar attracted notice when he said, "There is no such thing as Rohingya. It is fake news," referring to the persecuted ethnic group.

Those are hardly the only examples of Trump's phrase being deployed internationally: In March, Chinese state media dismissed a prominent rights activist's account of torture as "fake news." And in May, the People's Daily ran an op-ed with the headline, "Trump is right, fake news is the enemy, something China has known for years."

During a July news conference in Warsaw with Polish President Andrzej Duda, Trump complained about "fake news" CNN, before turning to Duda and asking if he dealt with the same problems. Duda, who has cracked down aggressively on the press, smiled and nodded. That same day, after a mini-controversy over whether Duda's wife snubbed Trump for a handshake, the Polish president declared on Twitter, "Contrary to some surprising reports my wife did shake hands with Mrs. and Mr. Trump @POTUS after a great visit. Let's FIGHT FAKE NEWS."

Last week, Libyan media jumped on a Trump tweet accusing CNN of reporting "fake news" to attempt to undermine a report by the network on modern day slavery within the country.

The Russian foreign ministry's website drops big red "Fake news" stamps on stories it deems untrue.

Even Spain's foreign minister said that police violence against Catalonians during their independence referendum was "fake news," despite photos and videos to the contrary.

The list goes on to Uganda, Somaliland, Angola, Cambodia and Turkey. Leaders in Singapore, a country known for restricting free speech, have promised "Fake news" legislation in the new year.

"These governments, they're pushing the boundaries of what it's possible to get away with in terms of controlling their national media," said Steve Coll, dean of the Columbia Journalism School, "and there's no question that this kind of speech makes it easier for them to stretch those boundaries."

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders pushed back against the idea that Trump bears responsibility. "This story is really ridiculous," she said in an email. "The president isn't against free speech but we do think reporting should be accurate."

The spread of the phrase has come against a backdrop of rising violence and persecution against journalists — at the end of 2016, the Committee to Protect Journalists counted 259 reporters jailed around the world, more than any year since it began counting in 1990. (The organization expects updated numbers for 2017 soon.)

Trump's go-to insult has become such a touchstone that members of far-right groups or political parties in countries like the Netherlands or Germany often write "fake news" in English in their tweets, said Cas Mudde, an international affairs professor at the University of Georgia.

"I have seen it particularly in social media used by radical right leaders who have been clearly influenced by Trump's use," he said. "Even if they have a tweet in Dutch, there will be a hashtag #fakenews in it."

"Ironically, you could call this the soft power of the U.S.," he said. "The U.S. always had massive soft power — you just think about hip-hop or McDonald's."

Trump has claimed that he invented the term, but in reality, it predates him. In the initial 2016 election conception, "fake news" described fabricated news stories meant to deceive readers, primarily on social media. But shortly after his election, Trump began using it to refute mainstream news stories—or entire outlets—he disagreed with.

"He took this term that had been used against him and turned it into a weapon against the media itself," Simon said. "The meaning has been so diluted and distorted that it's just become an insult without a lot of meaning."

As a result, Coll said, it's obscured the concerns around actual fake news. "We've lost the engagement through that phrase with something that is truly new and important," he said. "It meant originally to refer to something distinct, but it no longer does, and that's kind of an achievement of the president's appropriation of the term."

In Singapore, for example, leaders are billing the anticipated "Fake news" law as a way to fight against the same scourge of disinformation that plagued the U.S. election. But given the regime's history of restricting free speech, it's easy to imagine it being used to squash dissent.

Ruth Ben-Ghiat, a history professor at New York University who studies authoritarianism, said that, to her, the phrase does now have a clear meaning: "It's anything that contradicts with a leader's version of reality," she said, pointing to the situation in Myanmar. "You can will away genocide, you can will away events that you didn't want people to know happened."

Ben-Ghiat recently wrote a New Yorker story asking why so many fascist memorials remain in Italy, and was stunned by the number of responses she received in Italian on Twitter that attacked her using the phrase "fake news," once again, in English.

"People still see the president of the United States as a very important figure. That's his slogan," she said. "It's one prong of a program that also is dismissing human rights, the whole turn against liberal democracy, the new illiberalism."

Leaders, of course, have been seeking to stifle dissenting voices since long before Trump, but Simon said that the cudgel of "fake news" gives them an additional tool. Traditionally, he said, repressive leaders most often justify silencing reporters by citing the fight against terrorism. "I don't think it's going to supplant anti-terror," he said, "but I think it will supplement it quite nicely."

Trump's attacks on the "fake news media" have signaled that protecting freedom of speech is not a priority for the country, essentially handing the world a permission slip, Mudde said.

"A lot of countries look to the U.S. partly for inspiration, but mostly as the policeman of the world," said Mudde. "If you see that the policeman actually doesn't care about freedom of speech and the free press anymore, you feel that you don't have to care too much either."

Coll, the Columbia dean, said that promoting freedom of speech has always been a pillar of American policy, no matter which party has been in power.

"This has been such a constant of American voicing in the world. And it's not just about press freedom, it's about religious freedom, it's about democratic participation, more recently about women's rights, about LGBT rights," he said. "To just kind of turn around and coin a phrase that gives cover in this way—it's one of those aspects of this time that we're in that you really have to step back and think about to recognize what a departure it is."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Energy
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Afternoon Energy: Zinke recommends shrinking "handful" of monuments — Infrastructure council members resign — FERC head recuses self
Date: Thursday, August 24, 2017 5:14:38 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 08/24/2017 05:11 PM EDT

With help from Alex Guillén

ZINKE WANTS TO SHRINK 'HANDFUL' OF MONUMENTS: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke won't recommend the total elimination of any of the national monuments under his review, the Associated Press reports — but he will recommend President Donald Trump shrink "a handful" of them, he said, while not specifying which ones will be targeted.

Today was the deadline for the secretary to send his recommendations to Trump on the future of 22 national monuments, following the president's April executive order to review monuments created by presidential mandate. Zinke told the AP that unspecified boundary adjustments for some monuments carved in the wilderness and ocean will be included in the recommendations he gave Trump. None of the sites would be sold off by the federal government, he said, and public access for uses such as hunting, fishing or grazing would be maintained or restored. The former Montana congressman would not say whether portions of the monuments would be opened up to oil and gas drilling, mining, logging or other industries.

The Interior Department released a public summary about process used for the report to the White House, though it did not release the report itself. But in that summary, Interior largely dismissed public comments supporting keeping the sites intact as part of an organized campaign. "Comments received were overwhelmingly in favor of maintaining existing monuments and demonstrated a well orchestrated national campaign organized by multiple organizations," the agency said in the summary describing the review process. Esther Whieldon reports if Trump ultimately decides to alter or eliminate any monuments designated by former presidents Barack Obama or Bill Clinton, he is certain to face legal challenges from conservation and environmental groups.

Already environmental groups have condemned the announcement. The Center for Western Priorities blasted out a statement decrying that "if Secretary Zinke expects Americans to be thankful because he wants to merely erase large chunks of national monuments instead of eliminating them entirely, he is badly mistaken." While the Sierra Club said "any recommendation from Secretary Zinke to shrink national monuments is hypocritical at best and ruinous at worst."

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. Send your thoughts, news and tips to ktamborrino@politico.com, mdaily@politico.com and njuliano@politico.com, and keep up with us on Twitter at @kelseyam, @daily1, @nickjuliano, @Morning_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

PROGRAMMING NOTE: Afternoon Energy will not publish from Aug. 28-Sept. 4. Our next Afternoon Energy newsletter will publish on Sept. 5. Please continue to follow Pro Energy issues here.

INFRASTRUCTURE COUNCIL MEMBERS CALL IT QUILTS: Several members of Trump's infrastructure advisory group have resigned, Pro Cybersecurity's Eric Geller reports, citing concerns that the president was not taking urgent matters like cybersecurity seriously. "You have given insufficient attention to the growing threats to the cybersecurity of the critical systems upon which all Americans depend, including those impacting the systems supporting our democratic election process," the resigning members of the National Infrastructure Advisory Council wrote in a Monday letter to Trump obtained by POLITICO. The council earlier this week approved recommendations for protecting the country's critical infrastructure from cyber threats, warning administration officials that time was running out before a major attack.

On the list of resignees: Cristin Dorgelo, who was the chief of staff at the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy during the Obama administration; former U.S. chief data scientist DJ Patil; former White House Council on Environmental Quality managing director Christy Goldfuss; and former General Services Administration chief Daniel Tangherlini. Tangherlini told POLITICO that Dan Utech, who advised Obama as deputy assistant to the president for energy and climate change, had also resigned. More here.

FERC CHAIR RECUSES SELF FROM FORMER FIRM CONFLICTS: Trump's pick to head FERC, Kevin McIntyre, says he'll recuse himself from matters relating to Jones Day, where he worked for more than two decades. In his ethics agreement filed with the Office of Government Ethics, McIntyre said he would not participate in matters involving the firm and its clients, as well as his own former clients for a year after being confirmed to FERC. McIntyre has represented South Carolina Electric & Gas Co., a SCANA subsidiary, at FERC within the past year. Darius Dixon has more.

EPA GRANTS COME UNDER SCRUTINY: Trump's EPA is undertaking a wide-ranging review of all grants to nonprofits, universities and other institutions, Annie Snider reports — and already the agency has decided to end multiple awards made during the Obama era. "The Bay Journal, a 27-year-old nonprofit news organization that covers Chesapeake Bay cleanup efforts, learned Wednesday that EPA will end a six-year grant it awarded the organization two years ago," Annie writes. "The Journal, which began as an EPA-funded newsletter, was due to receive its next annual distribution of $325,000 in February." EPA is also requiring that all new grant solicitations be approved by a political appointee in its Office of Public Affairs, according to a memo first reported by E&E News. More here.

McKINLEY: DOE COULD CHANGE MIND ON COAL PLANT EMERGENCY ORDER: Rep. David McKinley (R-W.Va.) speculated last night on a local TV news show that the Trump administration could reverse course and use its emergency power to keep coal-fired power plants operating if FirstEnergy Solutions sought bankruptcy protection. "It's not insurmountable," he said. If "other conditions change," such as utility bankruptcies or other problems, "my hope would be that DOE would reconsider and issue a different opinion," McKinley continued. "Given more facts, [Trump] may very well come out with a different decision, or have the Department of Energy come out with a different decision." DOE rejected the plea by Murray Energy CEO Robert Murray and First Energy earlier this month.

OGLETHORPE SEEKING $1.6B LOAN BOOST: Oglethorpe Power Corp., the second-largest owner of the Vogtle nuclear project, is hoping the Energy Department will pad its existing loan guarantees with an additional $1.6 billion, Darius Dixon reports. The company "received a $3.06 billion DOE loan guarantee under the Obama administration but recently asked for an increase in light of Vogtle's financial woes caused by the bankruptcy of its lead contractor Westinghouse earlier this year. "We are seeking additional funding in the range of

$1.5 [billion] to $1.6 billion,' Oglethorpe CFO Betsy Higgins said on a call with investors."

BUSINESSES PUSH FOR ISDS NAFTA INCLUSION: Three leading business organizations are pushing the Trump administration to preserve the controversial investor-state dispute settlement provision in NAFTA 2.0, "warning that their support for the renegotiation will wane if the mechanism is weakened or eliminated," Pro Trade's Megan Cassella reports. In the letter sent on Wednesday, the heads of the Business Roundtable, National Association of Manufacturers and U.S. Chamber of Commerce pushed back against common criticisms of the dispute settlement provision, which allows private companies to seek damages from government actions that violate their investment rights under a trade deal. The energy sector's support of a modernized NAFTA deal hinges directly on the inclusion of ISDS, Megan reports.

QUESTLOVE OFFERS ... CHOICE WORDS FOR EPA: Funny Or Die teamed up with the Natural Resources Defense Council in a new video, where The Roots' Questlove calls proposed cuts to EPA "f---ed up."

"The EPA was created to ensure that our air and water is safe. ... That's cool," Questlove says in the video. "However, proposed budget cuts would shrink the EPA by nearly a third, crippling the science, data collection and enforcement that protects our health — even gutting a program that tests cancer-causing radon in schools. That's f---ed up." Watch it here.

PARTY IN KAZAKHSTAN AND UKRAINE: Energy Secretary Rick Perry is leading a presidential delegation to Kazakhstan for Expo 2017 and then heading on to Ukraine next week, and he is bringing his wife, daughter, son-in-law and friends. The Energy Department told POLITICO's Playbook that Perry's family and friends will be reimbursing the government for all costs associated with the trip. (h/t Playbook)

QUICK HITS:

- U.S. oil hub on hurricane alert as Harvey nears, Financial Times.
- Comcast solar marketing deal prompts partner Sunrun to soar, Bloomberg.
- Can U.S get off overseas oil by 2020? Chron.
- Judge gives Atlantic Sunrise Pipeline possession of final holdout properties, StateImpact.

WIDE WORLD OF POLITICS:

- Kelly moves to control the information Trump sees
- Agitated Trump lashes out at McConnell, Ryan, Clapper, media
- Castro twins' political ambitions collide

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/afternoon-energy/2017/08/zinke-recommends-shrinking-handful-of-monuments-024392>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Zinke dismisses support for monuments as 'national campaign' by interest groups Back

By Esther Whieldon | 08/24/2017 02:01 PM EDT

The Interior Department today said Secretary Ryan Zinke has sent his recommendations on whether to maintain or shrink 22 national monuments to the White House, and it largely dismissed the millions of public comments supporting keeping the sites intact as part of an organized campaign.

"Comments received were overwhelmingly in favor of maintaining existing monuments and demonstrated a well orchestrated national campaign organized by multiple organizations," the agency said in a summary describing the review process.

The agency declined to provide any details about what Zinke recommended for the monuments, but he told the Associated Press earlier today that he was seeking to shrink a handful of them. Another report this week said Zinke called for sharply reducing the Bears Ears monument in Utah established by former President Barack Obama.

Zinke's summary of the process appeared sympathetic to the commenters who opposed the monuments, describing their concerns as more accurately representing the public and local business interests. Those comments sought to "protect traditional multiple use, and those most concerned were often local residents associated with industries such as grazing, timber production, mining, hunting and fishing, and motorized recreation," it said.

interior has said it conducted a thorough review of the comments.

WHAT'S NEXT: President Donald Trump will review the recommendations but it is unclear when, or even if, he will take any concrete actions which would be sure to face legal challenges.

To view online click here.

Back

Report: Zinke to call on Trump to trim a 'handful' of monuments Back

By Esther Whieldon | 08/24/2017 12:00 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke told the Associated Press today he is recommending that President Donald Trump shrink "a handful" of national monuments, though he did not specify which ones he was targeting.

The report said Zinke would not recommend that Trump revoke the designations of any of the 22 monuments that were under review, avoiding a move that would have tested the legal limits of the president's authority.

The agency has not said whether it will release a public copy of Zinke's report to the White House, which was due today, but Interior is expected to make some announcement later today, according to sources.

If Trump ultimately decides to alter or eliminate any monuments designated by former presidents Barack Obama or Bill Clinton, he is certain to face legal challenges from conservation and environmental groups. Past presidents have changed the size of monuments, but none have revoked a designation under the Antiquities Act entirely, and legal questions remain as to whether the law allows a president to fully undo their predecessors' actions.

At a June House Natural Resources Committee hearing, Zinke said the Interior and Commerce departments were focusing on "just a few" monuments.

To view online click here.

Back

White House infrastructure council members resign, citing Trump's 'insufficient' attention to cyber threats Back

By Eric Geller | 08/24/2017 11:24 AM EDT

Several members of President Donald Trump's infrastructure advisory group have resigned, citing concerns that Trump was not taking urgent matters like cybersecurity seriously.

"You have given insufficient attention to the growing threats to the cybersecurity of the critical systems upon which all Americans depend, including those impacting the systems supporting our democratic election process," the resigning members of the National Infrastructure Advisory Council wrote in a Monday letter to Trump obtained by POLITICO.

The letter also criticized the comments Trump made after this month's deadly white nationalist demonstration in Charlottesville, Va., writing that "you failed to denounce the intolerance and violence of hate groups, instead offering false equivalences and attacking the motives of the CEOs who had resigned from their advisory roles in protest."

Those resigning from the infrastructure council included Cristin Dorgelo, who was the chief of staff at the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy during the Obama administration; former U.S. chief data scientist DJ Patil; former White House Council on Environmental Quality managing director Christy Goldfuss; and former General Services Administration chief Daniel Tangherlini.

Dorgelo and Tangherlini confirmed their departures to POLITICO. Goldfuss and Patil tweeted that they had resigned. Roll Call first reported the letter and their departures.

Tangherlini told POLITICO that Dan Utech, who advised Obama as deputy assistant to the president for energy and climate change, had also resigned.

Two other people were recently removed from the NIAC's member list: Amy Pope, who was a deputy homeland security adviser during the Obama administration, and Charles Ramsey, the former Philadelphia police commissioner. They did not respond to inquiries about whether they had resigned.

A White House official confirmed on Wednesday that "several" NIAC members had resigned but said the remaining participants were "committed to the important work of protecting our nation's critical infrastructure."

The council, composed of current and former industry executives, met on Tuesday to discuss and approve a report to Trump with recommendations for protecting the nation's critical infrastructure systems, such as banks and hospitals, from cyberthreats. They urged the Trump administration to expand biennial cyberattack drills, create dedicated emergency communications networks and improve the sharing of cyberthreat data between government and industry.

The resigning members told Trump that they did not believe his administration was "adequately attentive to the pressing national security matters within the NIAC's purview, or responsive to sound advice received from experts and advisors on these matters."

"Your actions have threatened the security of the homeland I took an oath to protect," they said.

To view online click here.

Back

FERC chairman nominee pledges distance from firm, clients Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/24/2017 11:07 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's pick to lead FERC says he'll recuse himself from matters involving Jones Day, the law firm where he has worked for more than two decades.

In an ethics agreement filed with the Office of Government Ethics, Kevin McIntyre vows to not participate in matters involving the firm and its clients, as well as his own former clients for a year after being confirmed to FERC. McIntyre has represented South Carolina Electric & Gas Co., a SCANA subsidiary, at FERC within the past year.

He will also resign from the board of the Charitable Foundation of the Energy Bar Association and will not participate in FERC business involving the group for a year, and will divest from the Nuveen Virginia Quality Municipal Income Fund. McIntyre's wife works for Boeing, so he will also not engage in dockets that might have a "direct and predictable effect" on the company's financial interests.

Fellow FERC nominee Rich Glick, a Democrat, has also pledged to make sure his mutual funds don't concentrate in any one sector that exceeds $50,000.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee has scheduled a hearing for the McIntyre and Glick nominations on Sept. 7.

To view online click here.

Back

EPA puts grants under scrutiny, cuts some funding Back

By Annie Snider | 08/24/2017 02:11 PM EDT

The Trump EPA is undertaking a wide-ranging review of all grants to nonprofits, universities and other institutions, and has already decided to end multiple awards made by the Obama administration.

The Bay Journal, a 27-year-old non-profit news organization that covers Chesapeake Bay cleanup efforts, learned Wednesday that EPA will end a six-year grant it awarded the organization two years ago. The Journal, which began as an EPA-funded newsletter, was due to receive its next annual distribution of $325,000 in February.

"It's not unprecedented for a new administration to conduct a thorough review of the previous administration's funding decisions, which is currently ongoing for all grants, including those that are mid-cycle," EPA spokeswoman Amy Graham said in a statement, confirming that multiple mid-cycle grants are already on the chopping block. "We are focused on ensuring taxpayer funds are spent responsibly on programs that yield tangible results to protect clean air, land and water."

The agency is also requiring that all new grant solicitations be approved by a political appointee in its Office of Public Affairs, according to a memo first reported by E&E News.

The Trump administration called for sharp cuts for EPA in its budget blueprint, including to the Chesapeake Bay cleanup effort and other watershed programs across the country. But those programs are broadly popular with lawmakers of both parties, and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt voiced strong support for the Chesapeake Bay cleanup effort during his confirmation hearing, despite having sued over it in his previous job as Oklahoma's attorney general.

To view online click here.

Back

DOE rejects Murray Energy's request to order coal plants to remain open Back

By Alex Guillén | 08/22/2017 09:30 AM EDT

The Trump administration will not use special authority to order coal-fired power plants to remain operational, a move sought by coal producer Murray Energy and other companies, the Associated Press reported this morning.

In letters to the White House, Murray wrote that during private conversations in recent months with CEO Robert Murray, President Donald Trump had promised to grant his request for a two-year moratorium on Ohio-based FirstEnergy Solutions closing any of its coal plants, even if the company goes bankrupt. According to the letters, administration attorneys were concerned about the legality of such action. One letter said Murray was present when Trump had directly ordered Energy Secretary Rick Perry three times to grant the request to order the plants to stay open.

DOE spokeswoman Shaylyn Hynes confirmed in an email to POLITICO that DOE has rejected Murray's request.

"We look at the facts of each issue and consider the authorities we have to address them but with respect to this particular case at this particular time, the White House and the Department of Energy are in agreement that the evidence does not warrant the use of this emergency authority," she said.

Section 202(c) of the Federal Power Act authorizes DOE to order power plants to remain online during wartime or in certain emergencies. It has been used sparingly — just eight times since 2000, and never in such a sweeping manner as the two-year moratorium on closing coal plants sought by Murray.

A Murray spokesman did not immediately return a request for comment.

To view online click here.

Back

Vogle co-owner is seeking 50 percent boost in DOE financing Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/24/2017 12:27 PM EDT

The second-largest owner of the Vogtle nuclear project is hoping the Energy Department will pad its existing loan guarantees with an additional $1.6 billion, a company executive said today.

Oglethorpe Power Corp., which has a 30-percent stake in the Georgia project, received a $3.06 billion DOE loan guarantee under the Obama administration but recently asked for an increase in light of Vogtle's financial woes caused by the bankruptcy of its lead contractor Westinghouse earlier this year.

"We are seeking additional funding in the range of $1.5 [billion] to $1.6 billion," Oglethorpe CFO Betsy Higgins said on a call with investors.

In a filing with the SEC earlier this month, Oglethorpe said its initial $5 billion portion of Vogtle had increased to somewhere between $6.5 billion and $7.3 billion.

Oglethorpe's partners, Georgia Power and Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia have also requested increases to their loan guarantees.

Higgins also said that DOE is aiming to make a decision by the end of next month.

"DOE is under a tight timeframe to try to get these new loans agreed so that we can have a conditional commitment by the end of September, which is the end of the government's fiscal year," Higgins said. "They're trying to keep everything the same as it was in the first loan, if possible."

She said that it was unclear whether Oglethorpe would be expected to pay a credit subsidy on any new DOE guarantees.

WHAT'S NEXT: Vogtle's owners are expected submit a recommendation to Georgia regulators on whether to complete the project on Aug. 31.

To view online click here.

Back

Vogtle owners seek new cash infusion from loan program Trump wants gone Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/18/2017 04:50 PM EDT

Backers of the Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia are hoping Energy Secretary Rick Perry can quickly wedge more federal financial support under the massive project — just as one state regulator was skeptical that it would be a "make-or-break" decision.

Three of Vogtle's backers revealed this week that they want a bigger lifeline from the Energy Department after their long-delayed and over-budget project suffered the bankruptcy of its lead contractor and reactor designer Westinghouse this spring.

Under the Obama administration, DOE approved loan guarantees of $3.4 billion to Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, $3.1 billion to Oglethorpe Power Co., and $1.8 billion to the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia to back the Vogtle project — the nation's first set of new reactor designs in more than a generation.

Now, all three say they've filed paperwork with DOE to increase those loan guarantee levels for the Vogtle project, while declining to say how much they're now seeking.

When Congress established the loan program as part of the 2005 energy law, DOE was authorized to guarantee up to $12.5 billion in financing for nuclear energy projects in the U.S., which would potentially allow Vogtle's owners to tap another $4.2 billion. Bloomberg first reported on the new applications from Southern and Oglethorpe.

Still, Tim Echols, the vice chairman of the Georgia Public Service Commission, warned against linking Vogtle's fate to the additional DOE financing.

In June, Vogtle's co-owners secured an agreement from Westinghouse parent company Toshiba that would direct $3.68 billion to the project. But, in an SEC filing last week, Oglethorpe aired concerns that they may not be able to "fully collect" the sum if Toshiba's financial status erodes further.

"I'm not sure that the loan guarantee piece of the project equation is a make or break issue for us," Echols said by email. "The Toshiba payments are far more important."

Vogtle's sister project in South Carolina, V.C. Summer, which is set to receive a smaller payout from Toshiba, didn't initially seek assistance from DOE. But earlier this month, a DOE official said SCANA sought as much as $3 billion in grants from the agency to support the flailing project — a cash sum that is essentially 10 percent of the agency budget and would almost certainly need congressional approval. DOE rejected the request but suggested SCANA apply for a loan guarantee, which the company declined to do.

Southern is expected to tell Georgia regulators by the end of August whether it plans to proceed with all or part of the two-reactor Vogtle project.

Echols, who has supported the project for years, wrote an op-ed for The Wall Street Journal late Thursday saying that "[w]ith vision, perseverance and God's help we will make the Vogtle reactors America's next nuclear-energy flagship."

The decision on whether to approve increases for the Vogtle loan guarantees could force Perry into an uncomfortable position: He has expressed his interest in protecting around-the-clock "baseload" sources of electricity like nuclear power, but conservatives have long lambasted the loan program for distorting the energy market.

The Trump administration has called for killing the loan office in its fiscal 2018 budget proposal — a document Perry has publicly distanced himself from on Capitol Hill.

Republican spending chiefs in the House and Senate have also advanced bills that would rescind the loan guarantee authorities established under the George W. Bush administration, a move that may have closed the door on the latest request from Vogtle's owners if the legislation is ultimately signed into law before DOE acts.

"This is reversal of fortune at a pivotal time for the loan guarantee program," said David Blee, the executive director of the U.S. Nuclear Infrastructure Council, a coalition of nuclear businesses. "This demonstrates, especially in comparison to V.C. Summer, the importance of loan guarantees in propelling first-of-a-kind nuclear energy projects."

He added: "We are confident that key appropriators and authorizers will take note."

But some conservatives aren't persuaded by Summer's demise or Vogtle's woes to abandon their opposition to the loan program.

"It's a pivotal moment on the direction of whether this administration will stay true to conservative principles in energy policy that protect the taxpayers and that shift U.S. energy policy in a more market-oriented direction," said Nick Loris, an energy and environment fellow for the conservative Heritage Foundation.

Trying to shore up Vogtle with additional financing, he said, would be a "slippery slope" toward preserving DOE's loan program. "The tide is turning in the right direction for closing down the loan guarantee program. It wasn't all that long ago that this program was hailed an economic stimulus from both Democrats and Republicans."

To view online click here.

Back

3 business groups' support for NAFTA 2.0 could hinge on ISDS Back

By Megan Cassella | 08/24/2017 12:27 PM EDT

Three top business organizations are urging the Trump administration to preserve the controversial investor-state dispute settlement provision in NAFTA 2.0, warning that their support for the renegotiation will wane if the mechanism is weakened or eliminated.

"Attempts to eliminate or weaken ISDS will harm American businesses and workers and, as a consequence, will serve to undermine business community support for the NAFTA modernization negotiations," the heads of the Business Roundtable, National Association of Manufacturers and U.S. Chamber of Commerce wrote in a letter to U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer and four other top Cabinet officials.

In the letter, sent on Wednesday and obtained by POLITICO Thursday, Joshua Bolten, Jay Timmons and Tom Donohue pushed back against common criticisms of the dispute settlement provision, which allows private companies to seek damages from government actions that violate their investment rights under a trade deal.

More than 100 business groups have already written to the administration to back the provision, and a lobbyist source told POLITICO earlier this week that the energy sector's support of a modernized NAFTA deal hinges directly on the inclusion of ISDS. Liberal lawmakers and progressive groups, meanwhile, are threatening to oppose any deal that includes the provision.

The three large business groups refuted the idea that ISDS infringes on U.S. sovereignty, writing "rather, it upholds the same fundamental due process and private property guarantees protected by our Constitution, and it obligates other countries to uphold these precepts as well."

They also praised the provision for providing "neutral arbitration" for decades — it has been a feature of nearly all U.S. trade agreements, including the original NAFTA. They also noted that the U.S. government has never lost an ISDS dispute.

The letter — which was also addressed to Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross, Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn — comes as the administration is grappling with its position over ISDS.

The USTR did not take a formal stance on the provision in its formal negotiating objectives, released last month.

Adam Behsudi contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Kelly moves to control the information Trump sees Back

By Eliana Johnson and Nancy Cook | 08/24/2017 05:11 AM EDT

Confronted with a West Wing that treated policymaking as a free-for-all, President Donald Trump's chief of staff, John Kelly, is instituting a system used by previous administrations to limit internal competition — and to make himself the last word on the material that crosses the president's desk.

It's a quiet effort to make Trump conform to White House decision-making norms he's flouted without making him feel shackled or out of the loop. In a conference call last week, Kelly initiated a new policymaking process in which just he and one other aide — White House staff secretary Rob Porter, a little-known but highly regarded Rhodes scholar who overlapped with Jared Kushner as an undergraduate at Harvard — will review all documents that cross the Resolute desk.

The new system, laid out in two memos co-authored by Kelly and Porter and distributed to Cabinet members and White House staffers in recent days, is designed to ensure that the president won't see any external policy documents, internal policy memos, agency reports and even news articles that haven't been vetted. Kelly's deputy, Kristjen Nielson, is also expected to assume an integral role.

The keystone of the new system is a "decision memo" that will — for each Trump policy — integrate the input of Cabinet agencies and policy councils and present the president with various options, as well as with the advantages and drawbacks of each one.

The Kelly-Porter reforms are in many ways a reversion to the habits of previous administrations, particularly in their attempt to ensure competing views are completely and straightforwardly presented to the president.

"There is a White House policy process, tried and true, that is not endemic to Republicans or Democrats, and it includes having the various policy councils bringing in the information and perspectives from agencies and elsewhere and then having the staff secretary's office share the policy council's memo around the office to get it vetted," said Tevi Troy, who served as deputy assistant to the president for domestic policy under George W. Bush.

Porter, a Harvard Law graduate, has assumed a pivotal behind-the-scenes role in the administration, working even before Kelly's arrival to create form from chaos and to serve as an honest broker between the competing factions that populate the Trump White House. He's no stranger to the GOP's vast ideological spectrum, having served as chief of staff to Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and before that as counsel to Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), an Ivy League blueblood and George H.W. Bush partisan, as well as to tea partier Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah).

Former President Barack Obama's staff secretary prepared briefing books for the president that he took home each evening, making sure to incorporate competing viewpoints. "We really worked hard to limit the extent to which he would see anything outside of that channel," said Doug Kramer, Obama's staff secretary. "People are constantly trying to circumvent the process because they want to get to the president, particularly during emergencies."

Some Oval Office veterans say the staff secretary has in recent years taken on an outside role typically reserved for the White House chief of staff, from mediating policy disputes between senior advisers to resolving turf wars between the White House policy councils. In policy meetings on trade, for example, Porter has been left to mediate disputes between National Economic Council director Gary Cohn, who favors free trade, and protectionist Peter Navarro, the head of the White House's National Trade Council.

White House aides note that the new system is likely to slow the policymaking process. Executive orders, dashed out in a matter of days at the outset of the administration, are now likely to go through weeks of review as they are circulated to policy advisers, lawyers and the president's legislative affairs team.

But some hope that this new policymaking process will deliver legislative victories that have so far been elusive — particularly now that senior strategist Steve Bannon, who was known for skipping formal meetings to take his proposals directly to Trump, is out of the White House. One official called Bannon a "disruptive force" who did not want to follow any set path for making White House decisions.

"Gen. Kelly is instilling processes to ensure that the president has the information and analysis he needs to make decisions," said White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders. "The White House staff will continue to support the president by ensuring that the policy options presented to him reflect all relevant viewpoints, including any dissenting views."

While former White House chief of staff Reince Priebus worked to systematize the policymaking process, White House aides say Priebus spent much of his time doing damage control and never instituted a holistic approach or managed to corral the flow of people and paper through the Oval Office, which until recently served as the social hub of the White House.

The president made policy pronouncements without consulting with all the stakeholders in his own administration; absent a formal policy process, their input often didn't make it to the president's desk. "In the past, a few senior administration officials unilaterally made policy calls that everyone had to live with," said one senior administration official. "It seems like those days are over."

The drawn-out saga to repeal and replace Obamacare revealed the weaknesses of the old system. In the early days of the administration and even the Trump transition, a number of domestic policy aides developed proposals for the potential repeal and replacement of Obamacare that included giving grants to states and the use of health savings accounts. Those ideas got tossed out once Tom Price was confirmed as secretary of Health and Human Services and indicated during a meeting in the Roosevelt Room that the White House would instead back the House plan, supported by Speaker Paul Ryan and Priebus.

Priebus was insistent on this option, according to two White House officials, and called a meeting at Trump's Mar-a-Lago resort in February where the House's plan was presented as the lone option to senior advisers.

Since taking over for Priebus last month, Kelly has sought to crack down not just on sneakiness and backbiting but also to impose order more broadly. He has tasked deputy chiefs of staff Rick Dearborn and Joe Hagin with bringing some order to the president's schedule, pushing them to plan events further in advance and to include one public-facing event each day and one travel event each week, according to a senior White House aide.

He is also reworking what were once free-flowing White House meetings. Each one now includes a list of attendees to prevent aides from inserting themselves gratuitously where Kelly does not want them. Said a top White House aide: "If you're not on the list, you can't get into the meeting."

Whether a president known for freelancing can live with military discipline is another matter. "If there was not this structure beforehand and if the structure has now been created and if they adhere to it, you will get better results, but there are some 'ifs' in my statement," Troy said.

"The process works if people stick to it."

To view online click here.

Back

Agitated Trump lashes out at McConnell, Ryan, Obama, Clapper, media Back

By Matthew Nussbaum | 08/24/2017 10:23 AM EDT

President Donald Trump ditched his recent — if brief — talk of unity on Thursday, instead accusing Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and House Speaker Paul Ryan of provoking a "mess" over the debt ceiling, while also lashing out at the news media and former intelligence official James Clapper.

The declarations came in a series of tweets that Trump fired off early Thursday, which also included a retweet of a picture of himself covering an image of former President Barack Obama with the caption, "The Best Eclipse Ever!"

For days, Trump has bounced wildly between scripted messages calling for unity in the wake of Charlottesville and enthusiastic attacks on his opponents and fellow Republicans alike, underscoring how difficult a packed legislative calendar could prove in September for a president yet to achieve any substantial legislative wins while rapidly alienating his own party leadership.

Press secretary Sarah Sanders appeared to soften some of the rhetoric later Thursday, saying Trump shares leadership's desire for a "clean" debt ceiling increase and denying that a significant rift exists.

"I think the relationships are fine," Sanders said, but added: "Certainly there are going to be some policy differences, but there are also a lot of shared goals."

Trump took special aim at McConnell, who has reportedly grown weary of the president's scattershot approach to the presidency. Both McConnell's and Trump's teams had issued statements on Wednesday downplaying the tension, saying the two were working together on shared legislative goals.

"The only problem I have with Mitch McConnell is that, after hearing Repeal & Replace for 7 years, he failed! That should NEVER have happened!" Trump wrote on Twitter.

The morning missives come just two days after Trump told the crowd at a Phoenix campaign rally, "I don't do Twitter-storms."

He also brought Ryan into his congressional attacks, claiming that McConnell and Ryan rebuffed his request for an "easy" solution to avoiding a debt ceiling crisis this fall.

"I requested that Mitch M & Paul R tie the Debt Ceiling legislation into the popular V.A. Bill (which just passed) for easy approval. They.....didn't do it so now we have a big deal with Dems holding them up (as usual) on Debt Ceiling approval. Could have been so easy-now a mess!" Trump wrote Thursday on Twitter.

Congress has to raise the statutory debt limit by Sept. 29 to avoid a default on the national debt, which economists say would be a disaster for the United States. Both McConnell and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin have expressed confidence that the limit will be raised, but some Republicans are balking at the idea of an increase with no strings attached.

Mnuchin has previously asked for a clean debt ceiling increase, implying it would not be tied to other legislation.

The White House "never made a serious push" to tie the debt ceiling to the veterans bill that Trump signed on Wednesday, according to a senior GOP congressional aide, who expressed puzzlement over the public declaration. And it is unclear whether members of the hard-line House Freedom Caucus, who tend to oppose raising the debt ceiling, would have been any more amenable if it was linked to the veterans bill. House Democrats also balked at the plan, a separate GOP source said.

Trump's Thursday riff included an offensive against Clapper and the media coverage of his speeches in the wake of the violent white supremacist rally in Charlottesville, Virginia, which have veered from calls for unification to divisive off-the-script remarks.

"James Clapper, who famously got caught lying to Congress, is now an authority on Donald Trump. Will he show you his beautiful letter to me?" Trump tweeted, referencing Clapper's testimony before Congress in 2013 in which he said intelligence officials did not "wittingly" collect data on Americans.

It was not immediately clear what letter Trump was referring to. It was reported later Thursday that Clapper wrote short notes to both Trump and Hillary Clinton ahead of the election that would be delivered to the winning candidate, along with the first presidential daily briefing.

Clapper had laced into Trump following his combative speech at a Phoenix rally on Tuesday night, telling CNN, "I really question his ability to be — his fitness to be — in this office."

"I also am beginning to wonder about his motivation for it — maybe he is looking for a way out," Clapper added.

And Trump blasted the "fake news" media on Thursday morning for pointing out the whiplash nature of his speeches in recent days.

"The Fake News is now complaining about my different types of back to back speeches. Well, there was Afghanistan (somber), the big Rally (enthusiastic, dynamic and fun) and the American Legion - V.A. (respectful and strong). Too bad the Dems have no one who can change tones!" Trump tweeted.

But it appears his feud with congressional leaders has the highest stakes.

Trump's relationship with Congress, which was never strong to begin with, seems to be deteriorating rapidly. He's slated to meet with his office of legislative affairs at the White House on Thursday.

The deterioration comes at a particularly bad time, with both the debt ceiling and funding to keep the government open looming as must-pass items in September. Trump stated this week he would be willing to shut down the government if Congress does not approve money to build a wall along the southern border, which he promised during the campaign would be paid for by Mexico. Sanders did not reiterate that threat Thursday, and she dodged questions about whether Trump had backed off his demand that Mexico pay for the wall.

Some Republicans have tried to strike a more conciliatory tone ahead of the month's legislative deadlines.

McConnell, speaking at a breakfast in Kentucky, lightly dinged Trump, saying he is "a little concerned by some of the trade rhetoric" emanating from both Democrats and the White House. But the comment on the president's trade agenda was a lone point of contention in remarks that largely cast Trump and Capitol Hill Republicans as allies.

Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who regularly criticizes Trump and has become a target of the president's wrath, declined on Thursday to engage after Trump attacked him during his speech in Phoenix.

"You know, I just have to concern myself with my own campaign and my day job of being a senator," Flake said on Fox News when pressed about his relationship with Trump. "So what the president does, that's his prerogative."

Seung Min Kim, Louis Nelson and Diamond Naga Siu contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Castro twins' political ambitions collide Back

By Edward-Isaac Dove | 08/24/2017 05:15 AM EDT

Texas Democrats desperately want Rep. Joaquín Castro to run for governor next year — and they're frustrated by what they see as his twin brother's presidential ambitions getting in the way.

The congressman's decision as to whether to run against Republican Gov. Greg Abbott is caught up in the Castro brothers' unique mix of their deep personal connection and parallel political ambitions. Joaquín Castro is being hounded by Democrats to get in but is torn, according to people who've spoken with him, over whether to take on a popular incumbent with $40 million in the bank.

That's where his identical twin brother, Julián Castro, comes in. The former Housing and Urban Development secretary and 2012 Democratic convention speaker recently launched a PAC and is spending the fall writing an autobiographical, campaign-style book, and has made his interest in 2020 clear.

The brothers serve as each other's top strategists, and they've agreed that Julián's next political move takes primacy for now. One worry is that a Joaquín loss for governor — it would be an uphill battle, at best, against Abbott — would make the Castros look like losers. The other is that if Joaquin happened to pull off an upset, it would distract attention from Julián, potentially complicating his path to the White House.

Julián has talked to many people about the lack of national Democratic figures to channel the rising power of Latinos, and how well-positioned he believes he is to occupy that space. But he, too, would also be a long shot if he were to run for president in 2020.

Though Joaquín Castro is seen as unlikely to go through with it, last month Democratic National Committee Chairman Tom Perez spoke with the congressman and encouraged him to run for governor, according to a person familiar with the conversation. Several members of the Texas House delegation have also urged him to take the leap.

Both Castros are famously cautious.

"No matter what, I think Joaquín wants to do everything possible that Julián is in the best possible position to move forward with his plans," said Gilberto Hinojosa, the Texas Democratic chairman, who's eager to see the congressman jump in against Abbott.

Hinojosa and other Texas Democrats have talked to the congressman about running. State party officials reached out to operatives in Washington last week to help in the recruitment effort, according to people involved in the conversations.

Joaquín Castro isn't just seen as the strongest potential candidate — 15 months out from the election, Democrats have literally no one else. The race is seen as such a long shot that national Democrats haven't put much thought into trying to find a candidate, who they believe would likely only drain resources from other more winnable races.

Local Democrats are more optimistic. They see a tough environment for Republicans, thanks in part to Donald Trump's early woes. They're heartened by Democratic Rep. Beto O'Rourke's challenge to Republican Sen. Ted Cruz. They also believe the state's steady demographic changes are nudging the state blue, though there's no electoral evidence of it to date (Hillary Clinton did beat Donald Trump in three Republican-held congressional districts).

As for Joaquin, Democrats say he's the only one who would bring a record on issues, generate excitement on the trail, boast support from establishment Democrats and big national donors, and turn out the state's enormous Latino population. That could be enough, they argue, to get within range of making Abbott vulnerable.

"He has been a rock-solid leader on economic issues," said Jeff Rotkoff, the campaigns director at the Texas AFL-CIO. "If he so chose, he'd be a very powerful messenger."

In private conversations, Castro talks about how "the normal calculus" of politics has been scrambled by Trump. Does that mean he passes on a race because the work in Congress feels too compelling to give up, especially with the speculation that Democrats have an outside shot at winning the House next year? Or does it mean deciding what's happening in Washington and Austin is too disconcerting to not at least try to beat Abbott next year, if only to begin laying the groundwork for a multi-cycle campaign for the governor's job?

"He'd have a lot to consider on that," said Chris Turner, the leader of the Texas state House Democrats. "He's going to do what's best for Texas and the country."

Through a spokesman, Joaquín Castro declined to comment, and Julián Castro did not respond to an effort to reach him directly.

But at a news conference in Austin last week, the congressman joined state legislators blasting Abbott and the GOP for their just-concluded monthlong special session. When asked whether he'd run, Joaquin Castro left open the option in a way that people familiar with his response say was deliberate.

"It's my intention right now to run for reelection. If that changes, I'll let you know," he said, according to people present.

The governor's race isn't the only one where the Castro brothers' internal dynamics have played out. Joaquín Castro told people earlier this year that part of why he was passing on the Senate race against Cruz was to keep from butting into his brother's plans. (However, when Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) was briefly floated for the FBI director opening, Castro said he'd be interested in running for his seat. The shorter timetable of a special election would have been more favorable for Castro and he wouldn't have had to give up his House seat.)

O'Rourke is eager to run with his friend and fellow congressman as a Democratic slate: O'Rourke for Senate, Castro for governor. O'Rourke regularly encourages people to call Castro and make the case to him directly.

"I've told him as much, let him know I would do anything in my power to be successful," O'Rourke said on a drive between the kind of campaign stops in red and blue Texas that he said have convinced him Democrats have a real opportunity to win statewide. "It will take a total commitment, and obviously it's going to be tough. But there's never been a better year than this one."

Running alongside each other would help them both, O'Rourke argued.

"The state is already energized," he said. "It would be supercharged if he would get out there."

Castro was 16 years old the last time a Democrat was elected governor in Texas — Ann Richards in 1990. But beyond how tough Abbott would be to beat, there are factors that could keep Castro in Congress. His seat is safe, and in addition to his committee posts, including a spot on the Intelligence Committee, he's viewed an obvious candidate for a spot in the next generation of House Democratic leaders.

But an ability to do something substantial in the House requires being in the majority. And the path to the majority likely requires redistricting in states like Texas, where Democrats are sure they'd be able to win more races if they had a Democratic governor instead of a Republican governor helping to draw district lines.

"None of that happens unless we have a strong statewide ticket," Hinojosa said. "No one could make it stronger than Joaquín."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very

Somewhat

Neutral

Not really

Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Afternoon Energy. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: Cliff Sims
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: AFTERNOON COMMUNICATIONS BRIEFING - July 19, 2017
Date: Thursday, July 20, 2017 3:19:58 AM

white house logo

AFTERNOON COMMUNICATIONS BRIEFING

July 19, 2017

NEWS OF THE DAY

Healthcare

- The President hosted Republican senators for lunch today, and his message was simple: It's time to get repeal and replace done. INACTION IS NOT AN OPTION
 - The President said today: "I don't think we should leave town unless we have a health insurance plan, unless we give our people great health care."
 - "Any Senator who votes against is telling American you're fine with Obamacare...A yes vote will let Senators debate the future of health care and suggest different ways to improve the bill."
 - "I'm ready to act... I have pen in hand."
- The White House is open to all potential solutions:
 - A clean repeal with time built in to craft a replacement; or,
 - As the President would prefer a repeal and simultaneous replace.
- HHS Secretary Tom Price, CMS Administrator Seema Verma, and several members on the fence about the bill will attend a policy meeting tonight to hammer out the details of an agreement.
- Sen. Mitch McConnell said the Senate will vote next week on whether to proceed with the current Senate bill.

What the President likes in the current GOP bill:

- Expands tax-free health savings accounts/HSAs to increase health coverage; and use of them to pay your premiums
- Gives more control and funding back to the states; redirecting authority from Washington DC back to the states
- Stabilizes the exchanges so that those preexisting conditions are protected
- Saves Medicaid, which is on an unsustainable path, and provides better coverage for low-income Americans
- Commits $45 billion to help combat the opioid epidemic
- Repeals the individual mandate. 6.5 million Americans are choosing to PAY A TAX rather than buy insurance. We're reintroducing CHOICE
- Repeals the job-killing employer mandate
- Lowers premiums

- Expands coverage options
- Protects those with preexisting conditions
- Reforms a major entitlement program, which is a principle driver of our $20 million in debt

Background:

- Obamacare has failed
 - Since 2013 premiums have more than doubled nationwide, in Alaska up over 200 percent
 - Despite promise premiums would decrease by $2,500 on average, they have actually increased by almost $3,000
 - Biggest lie: You can keep your doctor. You can keep your plan
 - If Obamacare isn't repealed in 2018, over 1,300 counties in the US will have only one insurer
 - 40 counties have absolutely no coverage in the exchange

Commission on Election Integrity

- Election integrity matters to every American:
- By establishing this commission by executive order, President Trump is taking action to ensure the ballot box remains fair
 - The commission has been charged to:
 - Study how the registration and voting process is used in federal elections;
 - To identify the laws, rules, policies, strategies, and practices that enhance the American people's confidence in the integrity of our election system;
 - And to explore the vulnerabilities in our system that could lead to improper voter registration and even improper voting, including cybersecurity concerns
 - The commission has no preconceived notions and no preordained result:
 - It will simply gather facts and data, and at the conclusion of its work report findings
 - It's a bipartisan commission chaired by Vice President Mike Pence, with six Republicans and five Democrats members including New Hampshire's Secretary of State Bill Gardner, America's longest serving secretary of state.
 - More than 30 states have indicated their intention to provide the voter information pursuant to the law of their states:
 - The information the commission seeks is publicly available information
 - For the states refusing to participate – what do they have to hide?
 - If Democrats contend there is no voter fraud, the commission will make their case for them because it will come up with nothing
- The mainstream media's general assertion that the commission is looking for a problem in the name of voter suppression is insulting:
 - Most states haven't done an in-depth investigation on voter fraud in their state
 - A Pew Research Center study found 1.8 million dead people were listed as voters, 12 million records with incorrect data, and 2.75 million persons registered in more than one state
 - A Heritage Foundation database has compiled 1,071 cases of proven instances of voter fraud across the U.S., the bulk of them prosecuted since 2000

Budget Markup Happening Today

Background:

- The House budget resolution reshapes the federal government, including more than $200 billion in cuts to mandatory programs, while setting up a major overhaul of the tax code.

Top Line

- The House's budget resolution is a bold statement on behalf of America's future, putting taxpayers first.
- It balances the budget within 10 years, secures our national defense, and reforms welfare programs, while funding key priorities.
- Critically, the budget creates a pathway for Congress to pass and President Trump to sign pro-growth tax reform into law.
- While this budget is not exactly what the President laid out in his budget request, it is an important step forward for the American people.

Details

- Total discretionary spending for FY 2018: $1.132 Trillion
- Defense discretionary spending: $621.6 Billion
- Non-defense discretionary spending: $511 billion
- Achieves $203 billion in mandatory savings and reforms.
- Reduces government-wide improper payments by $700 billion
- Achieves $6.5 trillion in deficit reduction over 10 years.
- Produces a $9 billion surplus in FY 2027.

Ambassador to Russia

- The President has nominated Governor Jon Huntsman Jr. of Utah to be to the Ambassador to the Russian Federation.
- Gov. Huntsman has had a distinguished career as a politician, diplomat, and businessman.
- He currently serves as Chairman of both the Atlantic Council, a premier foreign policy think tank, and the Huntsman Cancer Foundation.
- His robust record of public service includes service as U.S. Ambassador to China and to Singapore, Deputy United States Trade Representative, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, and Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Trade Development.
- He was also twice elected Governor of Utah.
- In the private sector he is a director on numerous corporate boards including Hilton, Chevron, Ford Motor Company, and Caterpillar.
- He and his wife Mary Kaye are the parents of seven children.

Made in America Certification Event

- The process of certifying Made in America products is now in its infancy, and the Trump Administration is committed to assisting the private sector in quickly improving the verification and certification process.
 - We are reaching out to various organizations involved in the certification and verification process and developing a strategy, with their input, into how to defend and build the Made in America brand.
- The Made in America brand is the world's standard for quality and craftsmanship -- and its integrity must be protected.
 - Unfortunately, the brand is under attack from a flood of illegally subsidized imports and counterfeit goods.
 - When a product made in a foreign country falsely displays a Made in America label, that cuts like a knife into the heartland of America.

When that product arrives on U.S. shores at a price that is cheap only because of unfair trade practices like currency manipulation or illegal government subsidies, that is the deepest cut of all.

- Certification will help protect American companies from the counterfeiters and pirates hoping to put the famed “Made in the USA” stamp on substandard products that are not truly made by our unparalleled workers.
- We want the Made in America brand to reach every shore and to stock every shelf, and we want our workers to reap the benefits.
 - Over 70% of Americans prefer the Made in America label and even those in foreign countries equate Made in America with the highest quality and reliability.
 - The more products we make in America, the more factories we will build, the more jobs we will create, and the stronger will be our economy, communities, and tax base.
 - The Trump Administration will do everything in its power to make this happen, and helping truly American made products get the verification and protection they deserve is another important step.
- President Trump is taking aggressive action to defend companies and products that are Made in America.
 - His Department of Homeland Security is dramatically increasing its monitoring and enforcement efforts to stop the smuggling of counterfeit and pirated products into U.S. markets and to crack down on the illicit trade over the Internet of mislabeled goods.
 - His Secretary of Labor is helping to ensure we have the finest and highest skilled workforce for the future through its strong support of apprenticeships and job training programs.
 - His Department of Commerce is dramatically increasing its enforcement efforts through aggressive antidumping and countervailing duty cases, and other trade actions.
 - His U.S. Trade Representative is leading the effort to renegotiate bad trade deals and to crack down on unfair trade practices.

Unsubscribe

From: Cliff Sims
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: AFTERNOON COMMUNICATIONS BRIEFING - July 27, 2017
Date: Thursday, July 27, 2017 3:58:01 PM

white house logo

AFTERNOON COMMUNICATIONS BRIEFING

July 27, 2017

NEWS OF THE DAY

Tax Reform

Top Line:

- American families are counting on us to deliver historic tax reform. And we will.
- The American people have elected a President and Congress that are fully committed to delivering tax relief that ensures:
 - Ordinary Americans keep more of their hard-earned money
 - Our tax policies encourage investment, hiring, and growth – jobs, jobs, jobs!
- Fixing our broken tax code for families, small businesses, workers and job creators is the single most important action we can take to grow our economy and help the middle class get ahead.
- This is a once-in-a-generation opportunity to protect American jobs and make taxes simpler, fairer, and lower for hard-working American families.
- Our goals include:
 - Permanently reducing tax rates as much as possible,
 - Encouraging entrepreneurs to reinvest in their businesses,
 - Incentivizing American companies to bring back jobs and profits currently trapped overseas.

Process:

- Over many years, the members of the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee have examined various options for tax reform.
- Building on this work and receiving input from a variety of stakeholders, we now have a clear and shared vision.
 - For three months, Congressional leaders and Administration officials have been meeting regularly to develop a template for tax reform.
 - To date, the Administration-led effort has included meetings and discussions with:
 - Over 200 members of Congress
 - More than 80 trade associations
 - Hundreds of corporate executives, business owners, and grassroots organizations
- The two committees are prepared to begin producing legislation - with the Administration's leadership and support - for the President to sign.
- Our expectation is for this legislation to move through the committees this fall, followed by consideration on the House and Senate floors.

Crackdown on Leaks

From the Department of Justice Spokesperson:

- We have seen an astonishing increase in the number of leaks of classified national security information in recent months.
- This staggering number of leaks is undermining the ability of our government to function and to protect this country.
- Like the Attorney General has said, “whenever a case can be made, we will seek to put some people in jail,” and we will aggressively pursue leak cases wherever they may lead.

First Responders Event

- President Trump will be awarding the Public Safety Medal of Valor to two Capitol Police Special Agents and three Alexandria Police Officers who exhibited extraordinary valor above and beyond the call of duty as the first responders to the Alexandria, VA baseball field shooting on June 14, 2017.
- All of these individuals exhibited exceptional courage, extraordinary decisiveness and unusual swiftness of action, regardless of his or her own personal safety, in an attempt to save or protect human life.
- This event reaffirms President Trump’s dedication to the men and women who put their lives on the line to protect Americans.
- Capitol Police Officers, Alexandria Police Officers, pilots from the U.S. Park Police Aviation Unit, EMTs and doctors will be attending, as well as the Jennifer Scalise, wife of Congressman Scalise, victims of the shooting, and members of Congress.

Dems More Interested In TV Than Investigating

- The House and Senate Intelligence Committee Russia investigations haven’t even interviewed relevant witnesses and the House investigation has stalled, yet the Democrat heads of these committees seem to have plenty of time to go on TV.
- Since this President was sworn in, Adam Schiff and Mark Warner have done over 183 national TV interviews (about one per day), for 20 hours of total TV time.
 - Since the President was sworn in, Adam Schiff has done 123 TV interviews for over 14 hours on TV.
 - Since the President was sworn in, Mark Warner has done 60 TV interviews for nearly 6 hours on TV.

Foxconn Jobs Announcement

Top Line:

- The President announced that Foxconn will build a state-of-the-art manufacturing facility in Wisconsin, investing billions of dollars and creating thousands of good American jobs.
 - Foxconn’s initial investment of $10 billion will create 3,000 jobs, with the potential for up to 13,000 jobs in the future.
 - Foxconn is a world leader in manufacturing for computers, communications, and consumer electronics. The new facility will be for the production of LCD panel products.
 - The company will invest in Southern Wisconsin while a larger facility is constructed.
- The construction of this facility represents the return of LCD electronics manufacturing to the U.S.
- To make such an incredible investment, Foxconn’s leadership put their faith and confidence in the future of the American Economy under President Trump’s leadership.

- Foxconn has seen the Trump administration's work to remove job-killing regulations, to institute Buy American and Hire American policies, and to pursue the steps necessary to revitalize American Industry.
 - This includes work to repeal and replace Obamacare, cut taxes, fix our trade deals, and rebuild our infrastructure.
- "Made in America" makes sense for Foxconn, whose customers and business partners include many of the most iconic American technology companies.
 - Foxconn joins a growing list of industry leaders who understand that America's capabilities are limitless, that America's Workers are unmatched, and that America's most prosperous days are just ahead.

Additional background:

- Foxconn will construct a state-of-the-art Gen 10.5 manufacturing facility for the production of LCD panel products in Wisconsin, with potential for growth to other states.
- Foxconn and Wisconsin are signing a Memorandum of Understanding on Thursday (July 27) in Milwaukee.
- Foxconn will start immediately to set up initial capabilities in Southern Wisconsin while the larger campus is constructed over a 2.5 year period. There will be an initial $10B investment creating 3,000 jobs, which has the potential to grow to 13,000 jobs.
- Foxconn is the global leader in manufacturing services for the computer, communication and consumer electronics (3C) industry – championing innovation that touches the daily lives of people around the world.
- Headquartered in Taiwan, Foxconn helps build products for many of the leading U.S. and international brands and household names in electronics.

Sessions to El Salvador

- Pursuant to the President's executive order on enforcing federal law with respect to transnational criminal organizations and preventing international trafficking, Attorney General Jeff Sessions today is traveling to the City of San Salvador, El Salvador.
- The Attorney General will participate in a number of briefings and meetings related to MS-13, immigration, drugs, and human trafficking.
- As part of the visit, the Attorney General will be visiting the FBI's Transnational Anti-Gang ("TAG") Task Force, meeting with President Salvador Sánchez Cerén and the attorneys general from the Northern Triangle countries of El Salvador, Honduras, and Guatemala, and giving remarks at a graduation ceremony for international law enforcement.
- President Trump and Attorney General Sessions have made eradicating transnational criminal organizations like MS-13 a top priority of this administration.
- As the Attorney General said in Central Islip in April, "I have a message for any gang that targets our young people: we are targeting you, and we are coming after you." This visit demonstrates the lengths to which the Trump Administration will go in the mission to eradicate this gang and anyone who threatens the safety of our communities.
- In addition, the Attorney General's visit with our Central American partners will reaffirm and strengthen cooperation between the United States and these countries with respect to several shared law enforcement objectives:
 - Combatting organized crime, including transnational criminal gangs like MS-13; information sharing in support of investigations and prosecutions in Central America and the U.S.; and eliminating the human smuggling and narcotics networks that threaten U.S. national security.

POTUS Donates Q2 Salary to the Department of Education

- Today, the White House announced that the President's Q2 salary would go to the Department of Education.

- The funds will be used to host a Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM)-focused camp for students.
 - Yesterday, Ivanka Trump and Secretary Betsy DeVos hosted a summer reading event at the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History where the focus was on getting young girls, ages 6-10, excited about STEM.

Transgender Individuals in U.S. Military

Top Line:

- After consultation with his Generals and military experts, the President decided that the United States Government will not accept or allow transgender individuals to serve in any capacity in the U.S. Military.
- The old policy is expensive and disruptive. It erodes military readiness and unit cohesion.
- Our military must be focused on decisive and overwhelming victory and cannot be burdened with the tremendous medical costs and disruption that transgender individuals in the military would entail.

Additional background:

- The President has expressed his concern since Obama announced his policy.
- After extensive discussions with his national security team, the President decided that is in the best interest of our military to end the Obama policy.

Healthcare

Top Line

- The Senate must pass a bill and get it to the President's desk so we can finally end the Obamacare disaster once and for all.

A Clear Choice

- Chuck Schumer revealed last week that the Democrats plan is the unaffordable Bernie Sanders' single payer proposal – a total big government takeover of our health system.
 - A majority of House Democrats support it, and now the Senate Democrat leader has rolled out the red carpet to the largest government expansion in generations.
- Obamacare is dead, so the American people now face a clear choice:
 - The Republicans' patient-centered, free-market approach that will cut the deficit, lower premiums, and increase options; or,
 - The Sanders-Schumer plan that will bankrupt America and impose a government takeover of our health care system.

Background:

- Obamacare has failed
 - Since 2013 premiums have more than doubled nationwide, in Alaska up over 200 percent
 - Despite promise premiums would decrease by $2,500 on average, they have actually increased by almost $3,000
 - Biggest lie: You can keep your doctor. You can keep your plan
 - If Obamacare isn't repealed in 2018, over 1,300 counties in the US will have only one insurer
 - 40 counties have absolutely no coverage in the exchange

Russia Sanctions Bill

Top Line

- While the President supports tough sanctions on North Korea, Iran and Russia, the White House is reviewing the House legislation and awaits a final legislative package for the President's desk.

Background

- The original legislation was hastily and poorly written and contained provisions that were concerning to U.S. companies and would inadvertently weaken the current multilateral Russian sanctions.
- The Administration is pleased that the House and Senate took the time to address many of the concerns the Administration had with the original legislation.
- The Administration has always been supportive of Congress enacting tough sanctions legislation on Russia in response to nefarious cyber-behavior.
- Additionally, the Administration remains committed to keeping existing sanctions against Russia in place until Moscow reverses the actions that triggered sanctions in the first place (Ukraine/Crimea).
- While the Administration still has some concerns with specific language, the newest language provides for much more strategic sanctions against Russia and reflects our joint interest in protecting economic priorities on both sides of the Atlantic.
- As the Administration's policy review on the JCPOA continues, the President will continue to support strong sanctions outside the JCPOA that counter Iran's dangerous and destabilizing behavior.

AMERICAN HEROES WEEK

Top Line:

- This week, the President is celebrating and honoring American Heroes – our brave military service members and veterans, law enforcement officers, first responders and workers.
- Military and Vets
 - The President is committed to rebuilding our military, making sure our warriors have the tools they need to get the job done and return home safely, and ensuring they get the care they deserve.
 - Our service members sacrifice not for fame, or for money, or even for glory -- but for country.
 - Today, a new generation of American patriots are fighting to win the battle against terrorism -- risking their lives to protect our citizens from an enemy that uses the murder of innocents to wage war on humanity itself. The President is behind them 100%.
- Law Enforcement Officers and First Responders
 - The President has ushered in a new era of respect and appreciation for law enforcement – the Thin Blue Line between civilization and chaos.
 - He has made it a personal priority to ensure that our police are treated fairly and with the honor and respect they deserve – we will protect those who protect us.
 - Our first responders' skill and courage saves many lives and represents the true strength of America.
 - They will always have the support of President Trump.
 - It is time for all Americans, from all parties and beliefs, to join in a simple goal to ensure that every child in America has the right to grow up in safety, security and peace.
- Workers
 - We are a nation of builders, and the American Worker has built the greatest civilization the world has ever known.

Our workers are the keepers of the great trades and traditions that built our country, from the New York skyline to the Golden Gate Bridge.

- Every day they are on the job before dawn and after dusk, and they never quit until the job is done.
- They take pride in every part of their work, and the President takes great pride in them.

Schedule:

- Monday: The President began American Heroes Week by speaking to Boy Scouts -- the heroes of tomorrow -- at the 2017 National Scout Jamboree in Reserve, West Virginia.
- Tuesday: The President delivered a very special Salute to American Heroes in Struthers, Ohio.
- Wednesday: The President will deliver remarks to the American Legion Boys Nation and American Legion Auxiliary Girls Nation -- more heroes of tomorrow -- at the White House.
- Thursday: First Responders Event at the White House
- Friday: TBA Law Enforcement Event
- NOTE: Additional special events will be announced in the coming days.

Some Notable Accomplishments

- PROVIDING FOR OUR NATION'S VETERANS: President Trump is making sure our veterans get the care they deserve after they have sacrificed for our country.
 - Under President Trump, Department of Veterans Affairs fired over 500 employees, suspended 200, and demoted 33, as part of President Trump's efforts to restore integrity and accountability to a department charged with supporting our Nation's heroes.
 - 22 senior leaders were disciplined.
 - President Trump signed the Veterans Accountability and Whistleblower Protection Act, enabling senior Veterans Affairs officials to fire failing employees while establishing important safeguards to protect whistleblowers.
 - The Veterans Affairs administration is shifting veterans' electronic medical records to the same system used by the Defense Department, ending a decades-old rift in sharing information between the two agencies.
 - President Trump signed legislation allowing our veterans to receive care outside of the Veterans Affairs medical system.
 - The Department of Veterans Affairs has acted to increase transparency and accountability by launching an online "Access and Quality Tool" to provide veterans a way to access wait time and quality of care data.
- AMERICA FIRST FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL SECURITY: In the first six months of his Administration, President Trump has put America First in world affairs and national security.
 - President Trump has empowered the military to push back against threats to our interests and allies
 - In his first six months, President Trump worked with our partners and allies in the Middle East to defeat ISIS, leading to Iraqi forces recapturing Mosul
 - After the Syrian regime used chemical weapons against civilians, President Trump authorized strikes against the airbase that launched the chemical attacks, demonstrating our national commitment to preventing further atrocities
 - President Trump has lifted restrictions that had prevented the Secretary of Defense and our commanders in the field from fully using their judgement and expertise.
- RESTORING PUBLIC SAFETY TO AMERICAN COMMUNITIES: President Trump has been steadfast in his approach to addressing our nation's most pressing public safety issues.
 - President Trump directed a comprehensive approach to tackle transnational criminal organizations and international drug traffickers, such as the cartels that plague the southern border.
 - President Trump ordered the formation of a task force aimed at reducing violent crime that has spiked in recent years.

- President Trump is restoring law enforcement's faith that they are protected by increasing the prosecution of people who threaten law enforcement officers.
- SPURRING JOBS CREATION: President Trump's impact on the economy has been immediate, putting the American Worker back to work all across the country
 - President Trump signed the "Buy American and Hire American" Executive Order, prioritizing the interests of American businesses and workers.
 - "Buy American" promotes American industry, protecting it from unfair competition by targeting the abusive use of waivers and exceptions to laws on the books.
 - "Hire American" calls for the reform of our visa programs, ensuring that they no longer displace American workers, while fully enforcing laws governing the entry of foreign workers.
 - President Trump signed an Executive Order, making it easier for businesses to start and expand apprenticeship programs.
 - The Dow Jones Industrial Average has increased 17 percent since election day, hitting new highs 25 times this year already.
 - Since January, the economy added 863,000 jobs, including 821,000 in the private sector.
 - 79,000 construction jobs added since January.
 - 42,000 mining and logging jobs added since January.
 - 41,000 manufacturing jobs added since January.

Unsubscribe

From: Twitter
To: Ragnar Zinke
Subject: Alex Burns Tweeted: Dem poll has Flake down 27 points in GOP primary +losing to Sinema in general election
Date: Wednesday, September 13, 2017 7:56:40 PM

Your Highlights

Alex Burns
@alexburnsNYT

Dem poll has Flake down 27 points in GOP primary +losing to Sinema in general election

AZ Poll Memo 091217.pdf
Shared with Dropbox
dropbox.com

 15  130  180

Michael Steel
@michael_steel

"Heat 2" is somewhat slower-paced. twitter.com/nypost/status/
...

 75  580  3.7K

Jake Sherman
@JakeSherman

Wow. Mnuchin asked for a government jet for his honeymoon.

Treasury Secretary requested government jet for European honeymoon
Secretary Steven Mnuchin requested use of a government jet to take him and his wife on their ... more abcnews.go.com

Seung Min Kim

@seungminkim

Senate Majority Whip Dave Brat twitter.com/JakeSherman/st...

James Poniewozik

@poniewozik

Man, good thing Trump didn't have a show on a big TV network at the time; I hear this is a firing offense.

twitter.com/realDonaldTrump...

Manu Raju

@mkraju

NEWS: DOJ blocking JUDICIARY from interviewing FBI officials on COMEY firing, a sign of Mueller's interest. My story

DOJ denying Senate request to interview FBI officials

The Justice Department is preventing Senate investigators from interviewing two top FBI offic... more

cnn.com

See more on Twitter

Settings | Help | Unsubscribe

We sent this email to @DogDayInterior

Twitter, Inc. 1355 Market Street, Suite 900
San Francisco, CA 94103

THE BUREAU OF SAFETY AND ENVIRONMENTAL ENFORCEMENT
Office of Public Affairs

Date: May 22, 2017

Contact: Gregory Julian (202) 208-3985

Former Louisiana State Official Scott A. Angelle
Named as Director of the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Former Louisiana state official Scott A. Angelle will head-up the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement. As part of the Department of the Interior, BSEE fosters safe and responsible energy production on the U.S. Outer Continental Shelf through regulatory oversight of oil and gas operations. Angelle, who most recently served as Vice Chairman of the Louisiana Public Service Commission, will assume his new position May 23.

“Scott Angelle brings a wealth of experience to BSEE, having spent many years working for the safe and efficient energy production of both Louisiana’s and our country’s offshore resources,” Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke said. “As we set our path towards energy dominance, I am confident that Scott has the expertise, vision, and the leadership necessary to effectively enhance our program, and to promote the safe and environmentally responsible exploration, development, and production of our country’s offshore oil and gas resources.”

Angelle, who will serve as the fourth director in BSEE’s history, has held numerous positions in Louisiana State and Parish governments, including Interim Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Natural Resources, and St. Martin Parish President. In the aftermath of the BP oil spill, Angelle served at the request of then Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal as liaison to the federal government, and negotiated an early end of the previous administration’s drilling moratorium.

“I welcome the opportunity to serve President Trump and Secretary Zinke, and work with BSEE staff to meet the critical goal of energy dominance for our country,” said Angelle. “It is an exciting and challenging time for BSEE; I look forward to leading our efforts to empower the offshore oil and gas industry while ensuring safe and environmentally responsible operations.”

Angelle served for eight years as Louisiana’s Secretary of the Department of Natural Resources. Under his leadership, the state’s coastal permitting system was reformed, providing for efficient permitting while increasing drilling rig counts in Louisiana by more than 150 percent during his tenure. Angelle has also served as Chairman of the Louisiana State Mineral Board, and as a member of the Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors, Southern States Energy Board, and the Louisiana Coastal Port Advisory Authority.

Angelle is a native of Breaux Bridge, Louisiana, and a cum laude graduate of the University of Louisiana at Lafayette with a Bachelor of Science degree in Petroleum Land Management. He and his wife Dianne are the proud parents of five children and four grandchildren.

Established in 2011, BSEE fosters secure and reliable energy production through a program of efficient permitting, appropriate regulations, compliance monitoring and enforcement, inspections, technical assessments, and incident investigations. The position of BSEE Director is not Senate-confirmed.

More information on BSEE can be found at: <http://www.bsee.gov>

###

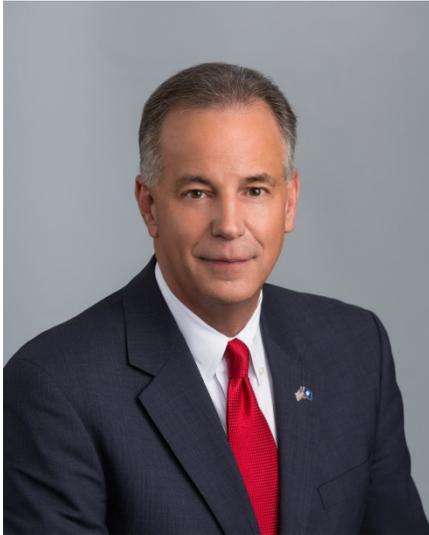

-- BSEE --

BIOGRAPHY

Scott A. Angelle

Director

Scott A. Angelle is Director, Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement (BSEE), Department of the Interior. He is responsible for promoting safety, protecting the environment and conserving resources through the regulatory oversight and enforcement of energy industry operations on the U.S. Outer Continental Shelf. He joined the bureau on May 23, 2017, following more than 30 years of reforming agencies and organizations in both the public and private sectors. His career is characterized by a strong desire to achieve results that lead to greater success for the organizations he leads.

Most recently, he served as Commissioner, District II, Louisiana Public Service Commission, an elected position he held from 2013 – 2017. As a member of the PSC, he was responsible for serving the public interest by assuring safe, reliable and reasonably-priced services for public utilities and motor carriers. He also served as a member of the Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors and a member of the board at Sunoco Logistics Partners LP.

Angelle began his work in public service in 1988 when he was elected to the St. Martin Parish Police Jury; the youngest person ever selected for the position at age 25. He was elected President of the parish body five years later; also the youngest to hold the position. During this same time he worked as a Petroleum Landman for Angelle and Donohue and Vice President for the Huval Companies with responsibilities for insurance risk management solutions in the energy, government and transportation sectors.

In 2004 he was appointed Secretary, Louisiana Department of Natural Resources, a position he held until 2012 under both the Kathleen Blanco and Bobby Jindal gubernatorial administrations. In May of 2010, he was appointed as Interim Lieutenant Governor of Louisiana during the height of the worst oil spill in U.S. history. On behalf of the state, he successfully achieved an early end to the offshore drilling moratorium imposed by the federal government. In November 2010, he returned to the position of Secretary for Natural Resources until resigning to run for Public Service Commissioner.

Angelle is a native of Breaux Bridge, Louisiana, and a graduate of Breaux Bridge Senior High School. He is a cum laude graduate of the University of Louisiana at Lafayette with a Bachelor of Science degree in Petroleum Land Management. He and his wife Dianne are the proud parents of five children and enjoy spending time with their four grandchildren.

From: Swift, Heather
To: Rateike, Bradley A. EOP/WHO; Kelly Love; Dorr, Kaelan K. EOP/WHO
Subject: article
Date: Friday, December 01, 2017 9:25:20 AM

Here's a really tremendous article from last night. Great for social.

The Toronto Star: Trump wished country 'Merry Christmas' instead of 'Happy Holidays' at tree lighting, making good on campaign promise

Jill Colvin
December 1, 2017

WASHINGTON—Ring in the holidays for the first time from Washington, U.S. President Donald Trump lit the National Christmas Tree Thursday evening, wishing the country “a Merry Christmas” — as he vowed to do during his campaign.

Taking part in the annual ritual, Trump counted down from 10 before his wife, Melania, pushed a button to set the tree aglow with golden lights and silver stars.

“Today’s a day that I’ve been looking very much forward to all year long,” said Trump. “And now, as the president of the United States, it’s my tremendous honour to finally wish America and the world a very merry Christmas.”

During his campaign, Trump had promised that, when he was elected, people would be saying “Merry Christmas again,” a reference to what he characterized as the country’s obsession with political correctness. In Trump’s view, the move toward the use of the more inclusive “happy holidays” phrase minimized the Christian celebration.

Trump was introduced by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, who called Trump “a man who loves our parks, loves our military, and loves our country. The man who brought ‘Merry Christmas’ back to our nation’s capital — and you did, sir.”

Speaking from behind a bullet-proof glass enclosure, Trump also bragged about the mild weather, which hovered in the mid-50s, and compared himself to President Ulysses S. Grant, who signed legislation making Christmas a federal holiday.

“I sort of feel we’re doing that again,” he said to an audience that included many of his family members.

The program, which will air Monday on the Hallmark Channel, was hosted by Kathie Lee Gifford and actor Dean Cain and featured performances by the Beach Boys, Jack Wagner, Wynonna Judd, Craig Campbell and others. It was a less high-profile lineup than last year, when the performers included Kelly Clarkson, Garth Brooks and Trisha Yearwood, Marc Anthony, Yolanda Adams, The Lumineers, James Taylor and Chance the Rapper.

This year marks the 95th annual National Christmas Tree Lighting. The tradition began in 1923 with President Calvin Coolidge and takes place in President’s Park, just south of the White House.

-

Heather Swift
Department of the Interior
@DOIPressSec
Heather_Swift@ios.doi.gov | Interior_Press@ios.doi.gov

From: Twitter
To: Ragnar Zinke
Subject: Ashley Parker shared: Trump, Saudi king expected to present unified front in the global war against terrorism
Date: Saturday, May 20, 2017 11:31:58 PM

Your Highlights

Ashley Parker
@AshleyRParker

What Trump and Saudi King Salman plan to say tomorrow — tonight.

Trump, Saudi king expected to present unified front in the global war against terrorism

Trump, according to an advance portion of the remarks he will deliver in Riyadh Sunday, will ... more

washingtonpost.com

66

75

Annie Karni
@anniekarni

President Trump had to travel to someone else's kingdom to get the respect he has always craved.

Saudis give Trump a reception fit for a king

At night, a large image of the president was beamed onto the outside of his hotel.

politico.com

960

2.4K

Josh Barro
@jbarro

LOCAL NEWS ANGLES FTW

Former FBI head well liked at bagel shop

[...] Comey was such a fan of Village Bagels, he referred a team of Secret Service agents to ... more

m.westport-news.com

180

850 andrew kaczynski

@KFILE

BREAKING: Sheriff David Clarke plagiarized portions of his master's thesis on homeland security

Sheriff David Clarke plagiarized portions of his master's thesis on homeland security

In all instances reviewed by CNN's KFile, Clarke lifts language from sources and credits them... more cnn.com

7.3K

9.7K

Tamara Keith
@tamarakeithNPR

Ultimately President Trump's wife and daughter also chose not to cover their heads. twitter.com/realdonaldtrum...

4.1K

7.2K

Sam Stein
@samsteinhp honestly though. Fox would have three months worth of cable programming set here if Obama were the one in this pic. twitter.com/yashar/status/...

6.2K

13K

See more on Twitter

Settings | Help | Unsubscribe

We sent this email to @DogDayInterior

Twitter, Inc. 1355 Market Street, Suite 900
San Francisco, CA 94103

From: White House Press Office
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Bedminster pool report No. 5b // More from second pool spray
Date: Thursday, August 10, 2017 5:17:02 PM

From: "Korte, Gregory" <gkorte@usatoday.com>

Date: August 10, 2017 at 4:44:10 PM EDT

Subject: Bedminster pool report No. 5b // More from second pool spray

More extended quotes from President Trump's second pool spray at Bedminster National.

On U.S. military presence in Asia: "We're going to look at what's happening in Asia. We're looking at it right now. We're constantly looking at it. I don't like to signal what I'm going to be doing, but we are certainly looking at it and obviously we're spending a lot of time looking at in particular North Korea and we are preparing for many different alternative events."

"He has disrespected our country greatly. He has said things that are horrific. And with me he's not getting away with it. He got away with it for a long time, between him and his family. He's not getting away with it. This is a whole new ballgame. He's not going to be saying those things and he's certainly not going to be doing those things. I read about we're in Guam by Aug. 15. Let's see what he does with Guam. He does something in Guam, it will be an event the likes of which nobody's seen before, what will happen in North Korea.

Q: What does that mean? "You'll see. You'll see. He'll see."

Q: Is that a dare? "It's not a dare. It's a statement. It has nothing to do with dare. That's a statement. He's not going to go around threatening Guam and he's not going to threaten the United States and he's not going to threaten Japan and he's not going to threaten South Korea. That's not a dare, as you say. That is a statement of fact."

On U.S. nuclear posture: "Nuclear to me, number one, I would like to 'de-nuke' the world. I know that President Obama said global warming is the biggest threat. I totally disagree...

"I'd like to de-nuke the world. I would like Russia, the United States and China and Pakistan and many other countries that have nuclear weapons get rid of them. But until such time that they do, we will be the most powerful nuclear nation on earth, by far.

On anti-missile defenses: "We're going to be increasing our budget by many billions of dollars because of North Korea and other reasons having to do with the anti-missile. We'll probably be able to report that over the next week., because as you know, we reduced it by 5 percent but I've decided I don't want that. We're going to be increasing the anti-missile by a substantial number of billions."

On with nuclear agreement with Iran: "I don't think they're living up to the spirit of the agreement. President Obama in his wisdom gave them $150 billion. He gave them $1.8 billion in cash. That's a hard one to figure. But that was his decision. I think it's a horrible agreement. But they are not in compliance with the agreement and they certainly are not in the spirit of the agreement in compliance, and I think you'll see some very strong things taking place if they don't get themselves in compliance.

On leak investigations: "We're looking. We're always looking. We have two leaks. You have the leaks coming out of intelligence and various departments having to do with Syria, having to do with all sorts of different places, having to do frankly with North Korea. And those are very serious. And then you have the leaks where people want to love me and they're all fighting for love. Those are not very important but certainly we don't like them. Those are little inner-White House leaks. They're not very important. But actually I'm somewhat honored by them. But the important leaks and the leaks that the Attorney General is looking at very strongly are the leaks coming out of intelligence and we have to stop them for the security and the national security of our country."

Thought about dismissing Mueller? "I haven't given it any thought. Well, I've been reading about it from you people. You say, 'Oh, I'm going to dismiss him.' No, I'm not dismissing anybody. I mean, I want them to get on with the task. But I also want the Senate and the House to come out with their findings. Now, judging from the people leaving the meetings, they leave the meetings all the time and they say we haven't found anything...."

On Mueller investigation: "We're working with him. We have a situation that's very unusual.... There was no collusion between us and Russia. In fact, the opposite. Russia spent a lot of money on fighting me. ...

"We have an investigation of something that never took place. And all I say is work with them, because this is an event that never took place. Now, as far as somebody else, where did they file the right papers, or did they forget to file a paper. You know like I guarantee that if we went around and looked at everybody who made a speech or whatever these people did, that's up to them. Did they do something wrong because they didn't file the right document or whatever? Perhaps, you'd have to look at them, but there are probably a lot of people in Washington who have done the same thing."

Given harsh criticism of Democrats, how will you bring them in on other bills like infrastructure? "Well, we'll have to see. I'm not sure that we will bring them in. Maybe we'll bring them in, maybe not. I think the infrastructure bill will be bipartisan and quite frankly, I might have more support from the Democrats. I want a very strong infrastructure bill. We've as of this moment spent over $6 trillion in the Middle East. When I say spent, we've wasted $6 trillion in the Middle East, and yet we can't fix our roads and our bridges and our schools and our airports, and I think that's a very sad situation."

On McConnell and his wife, the Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao: "Elaine is doing a very good job. We're very proud of Elaine as secretary of Transportation, as you know. She's doing a very good job. I'm very disappointed in Mitch. If he gets these bills passed, I'll be very happy with him and I'll be the first to admit it.:

Gregory Korte

White House correspondent

USA TODAY

1575 "Eye" Street, N.W., Suite 350

Washington, D.C. 20005

Office: (703) 854-8907

Cell: (202) 679-2770

Twitter: @gregorykorte

whlogo

Unsubscribe

From: Swift, Heather
To: Rateike, Bradley A. EOP/WHO; Laura Rigas
Subject: Brad - reupping this Date: Monday, October 02, 2017 9:18:00 AM

Brad - reupping this inquiry from WP last week. As it's a bit more reaching than the standard travel inquiry I wanted to double check what you all wanted us to do with it. There's A LOT of wrong information in here, such as the claim that there were political events in California, Nevada, others. I have the answers for all of these questions, just for your reference.

- OVERALL questions
- How many flights has Sec. Zinke taken on government or charter jets? Can you please provide the aircraft manifest, type of plane, destinations, dates of use, purpose, cost of the trip and source of payment for the trips?
- On what trips did Sec. Zinke's wife Lola and/or other members of Sec. Zinke's family join?
- The calendar says that spouses attended a cultural briefing with local reindeer herders on May 26 in Norway. Was Lola Zinke one of the spouses?
- Did Sec. Zinke take steps to limit the costs of his travel? If so, what were they?
- Virgin Islands
 - What was the official purpose of the U.S. Virgin Islands trip during Zinke's first month as Interior secretary?
 - What was the cost of the trip?
 - Did Sec. Zinke's wife Lola attend?
 - While some flights appear to be commercial, others are not shown, including multiple flights on March 31. Can you please provide the manifest, type of plane, cost of the trip and source of payment for the trips?
- Big Sky event
 - Sec. Zinke was in Big Sky in March 17-19, the same time Sen. Daines hosted a "weekend in the Montana mountains" benefiting the Daines Big Sky Committee. He attended multiple Daines receptions and stayed the night at Daines' home. A fundraiser flyer says requested contributions were $3,000 for PACs, $1,500 for personal.
 - What was the policy purpose of this trip?
 - Was this a political trip?
 - Who paid for Zinke's travel to the political events?
- Atlanta
 - What was the purpose of Sec. Zinke's trip to the NRA Institute for Legislative Action event in Atlanta on April 28? Was this a political event? What was the cost of flying on Air Force One, and did the DOI reimburse any other agencies for the seats of Sec. Zinke, Lola Zinke or his staff?
- April 12-20
 - During the trip, Sec. Zinke spoke at the Reagan Center in Santa Barbara and campaigned for Greg Gianforte. Was this a political trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
 - On April 15 and 16, Sec. Zinke was in Santa Barabra, including a meeting with former Congressman Bob Lagomarsino. What was the meeting about? Did these home trips entail personal or official use? The items don't say that it was "personal travel" or "paid for personally" - was it?
 - On April 17, Sec. Zinke went to the Reagan Ranch Center and met the vice president of the Young America's Foundation. What was the official policy purpose of this trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
- May 5-13: Montana, Utah, California, Montana
 - What was the official policy purpose of Sec. Zinke's trip on May 5-13?

- During the trip, Sec. Zinke gave keynote remarks to the RNC Spring Meeting Dinner and attended a rally for Greg Gianforte. Was this a political trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
 - On May 8 and May 9, Sec. Zinke traveled in a B200 Turboprop 8-passenger plane, the calendar states. Can you please provide the manifest, cost of the trip, owner of the jet and source of payment for the trips?
 - Sec. Zinke spent that weekend at home in Kalispell, Montana. He then flew to Dulles and home on Monday. Federal regulations say employees' official travel should by no means include personal use. Did these home trips entail personal use?
 - May 25-June 2: Norway, Greenland, Alaska, Idaho
 - What was the official purpose of this trip?
 - Sec. Zinke attended a reception for Rep. Don Young at Sullivan's Steakhouse. Was this a political trip? What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?
 - Sec. Zinke flew from Boise to L.A. on June 2. The June 3 and 4 dates say "Personal travel // Paid for personally" in Santa Barbara. What did Sec. Zinke pay for? How much did he pay? At what rate did he pay for the travel personally? What aircraft did he fly on? What was the total cost to government?
 - June 25-28: Nevada, Montana
 - On June 25, Sec. Zinke attended the Rule of Law Defense Fund Reception & Dinner, where he sat at a dinner table with leaders of the casino industry, the NRA, the Chamber of Commerce and Koch Industries. What was the policy purpose of Sec. Zinke's attendance? Was this a political event?
 - On June 26, Sec. Zinke flew from Las Vegas to Kalispell on a private plane tied to a Republican donor. Can you please provide the aircraft manifest, purpose, cost of the trip and source of payment for the trips? It appears Sec. Zinke spent the night afterward at his home in Whitefish; is that correct, and wouldn't that convey personal use?
 - July 20-22: Colorado
 - On July 20, Sec. Zinke gave remarks in Denver at the American Legislative Exchange Council. He also attended a Colorado Republican Committee roundtable and gave remarks at the Western Conservative Summit.
 - What was the official policy purpose of these trips? Were these trips political or personal? What were Sec. Zinke's remarks at these trips. What was the cost for this trip, and who covered the expenses?

-

Heather Swift

Department of the Interior

@DOIPressSec

Heather_Swift@ios.doi.gov | Interior_Press@ios.doi.gov

Scott A. Angelle
Director
Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement

Scott A. Angelle is Director, Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement (BSEE), Department of the Interior. He is responsible for promoting safety, protecting the environment and conserving resources through the regulatory oversight and enforcement of energy industry operations on the U.S. Outer Continental Shelf. He joined the bureau on May 23, 2017, following more than 30 years of reforming agencies and organizations in both the public and private sectors. His career is characterized by a strong desire to achieve results that lead to greater success for the organizations he leads.

Most recently, he served as Commissioner, District II, Louisiana Public Service Commission, an elected position he held from 2013 – 2017. As Acting Chairman of a five-member commission, he was responsible for serving the public interest by assuring safe, reliable and reasonably-priced services for public utilities and motor carriers. He also served as a member of the Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors and a member of the board at Sunoco Logistics Partners L.P.

Angelle began his work in public service in 1988 when he was elected to the St. Martin Parish Police Jury; the youngest person ever selected for the position at age 25. He was elected President of the parish body five years later; also the youngest to hold the position. During this same time he worked as a Petroleum Landman for Angelle and Donohue and Vice President for the Huval Companies with responsibilities for insurance risk management solutions in the energy, government and transportation sectors.

In 2004 he was appointed Secretary, Louisiana Department of Natural Resources, a position he held until 2012 under both the Kathleen Blanco and Bobby Jindal gubernatorial administrations. In May of 2010, he was appointed as Interim Lieutenant Governor of Louisiana during the height of the worst oil spill in U.S. history. On behalf of the state, he successfully achieved an early end to the offshore drilling moratorium imposed by the federal government. In November 2010, he returned to the position of Secretary for Natural Resources until resigning to run for Public Service Commissioner.

Angelle is a native of Breaux Bridge, Louisiana, and a graduate of Breaux Bridge Senior High School. He is a cum laude graduate of the University of Louisiana at Lafayette with a Bachelor of Science degree in Petroleum Land Management. He and his wife Dianne are the proud parents of five children and four grandchildren.

BSEE Director Announcement Outreach Strategy

Date/Time	Action	Audience	Notes
5-22-2017 10:00 am	DOI Announcement Press Release	DOI and BSEE media distro lists, BSEE social media
5-22-2017	DOI Announcement Press Release distributed to BSEE Congressional list	Congressional members and staff
5-23-2017 1:00 pm	BSEE introductory email	all BSEE employees
5-24-2017 1:00 pm (tentative)	Interview by phone with The Advocate reporter, Baton Rouge, LA (tentative)	Louisiana communities – Baton Rouge, New Orleans, and Lafayette	Areas of discussion – BSEE Director's intro and BSEE FY 2018 Budget Request
5-25-2017	Letter to external stakeholders	Industry, NGO's, coastal States
6-1-2017 (tentative) time TBD	Media Roundtable Discussion (in-person and phone)	Washington bureau and trade reporters	Areas of discussion – BSEE Director's intro and BSEE FY 2018 Budget Request
6-1-2017	Director's Corner (blog) posted on bsee.gov	Web site viewers	Will be supported by follow-on with social media platforms
June & July Dates TBD	Field visits and all-hands meetings	BSEE field staff	New Orleans, La gulf coast, Houston, Camarillo, CA and Anchorage, AK

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief, presented by Businesses Against the Ad Tax: Budget victory sounds starting gun for tax reform — House conservatives try to enlist Mulvaney for Senate strong-arming — White House could request December cash for opioid resp..
Date: Thursday, October 26, 2017 4:11:28 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 10/26/2017 04:08 PM EDT

AND THEY'RE OFF: With 11 months of hairy fiscal fights finally behind them, Republican budget writers made their official handoff today in the GOP's sprint toward tax reform.

The big gamble: House Speaker Paul Ryan and his top lieutenants went into this morning's momentous vote without knowing exactly how many "nays" they had to spare. GOP sources played it cool, but House Budget Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) — and plenty of others — kept eyes glued to the board through that 15-minute nail-biter, Jen and Rachael Bade explain. (Black told us later that she was willing to twist arms but was grateful it was not needed.) Ultimately, the gavel went down with a 216-212 tally, delivering a decisive — yet incredibly narrow — victory to Capitol Hill Republicans. "I am very, very excited," a grinning Ryan told reporters minutes after the vote.

Salt over the shoulder: It could have been an easier vote. Eleven of the 20 GOP "no" votes on the budget, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), came from high-tax districts desperate to keep the state and local deduction, or SALT. Most expected House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) to resolve the whole standoff late Wednesday night. But the chairman postponed the meeting at the last minute — a little bit of hardball that also signaled the budget vote was likely in the bag. And it paid off. Still, unofficial SALT spokesman Tom MacArthur (R-N.J.) said he's got at least 22 members willing to tank a tax bill later on. "There were many members who voted yes, but they were holding their nose when they did it," MacArthur told reporters after the vote. "It's not over."

A very bumpy road: Today's budget victory shows that GOP lawmakers are incredibly anxious for tax reform, willing to back a fiscal blueprint many despise, as Brian Faler explains. And they won't have to wait long to get to work. The tax plan will be released Nov. 1, with the first markup five days later.

SIGNED, SEALED, DELIVERED: President Donald Trump scrawled his name today on the disaster aid bill, H.R. 2266 \(115\), that the Senate cleared Tuesday, delivering $36.5 billion to help FEMA with recovery efforts, to relieve about half of the National Flood Insurance Program's debt and to keep Puerto Rico's government operational.

More: SALT fight still unresolved post budget vote | Lobbyists leap into budget fight | New Yorkers nearly united on SALT | California GOP votes for budget | Ryan demurs on 401\(k\) and SALT stipulations

GOOD THURSDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — Puerto Rico's governor sent a letter urging congressional leaders to pass a permanent fix for its looming Medicaid cash crunch.

#DailyBudgetFact — In New York and New Jersey's highest-taxed districts, more than 50 percent of tax filers claim the state and local deduction on their federal tax return. The Government Finance Officers Association maps it out.

* A message from Businesses Against the Ad Tax: Whether it's visiting neighborhood restaurants, shopping local, or listening to the radio, important parts of your daily life could disappear if Congress passes an advertising tax. Stand with local businesses and tell Congress NO to an ad tax that will hurt the economy and kill jobs. <http://politi.co/2yBvu6w> **

DISASTER AID

AN ALLY ON OFFSETS: The Republican Study Committee is looking to pull recruits from the White House — namely, Mick Mulvaney — ahead of a major dispute on disaster funding this fall. As Sarah reported for Pros, RSC leaders met with the budget director for an hour-long strategy session Wednesday on how to get Congress to agree to offsets for disaster money.

Two tales: Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker (R-N.C.) said he asked OMB for help "putting pressure on the Senate" and that "they've agreed to do that." But Mulvaney's spokeswoman had a different recollection of the meeting. "The goal of this meeting was not to pressure the Senate, but rather to discuss shared priorities between Congress and the administration, such as tax reform and disaster relief," OMB press secretary Meghan Burris, who attended the meeting, said in an email.

BRINGING IN BROCK: The Senate Homeland Security panel has scheduled Congress' first hearing on the government's hurricane response. Next Tuesday's hearing will spotlight FEMA Administrator Brock Long, who took the agency's helm just weeks before Hurricane Harvey. Lawmakers will also hear from the head of the U.S. Northern Command, a deputy commanding general for the Army Corps of Engineers and an assistant secretary for HHS.

More: Puerto Rico picks power utility czar | Murkowski pushes for 'modern' rebuild

HEALTH

FINALLY, AN OPIOID DECLARATION: The order Trump handed down today to combat the opioid epidemic will not deliver any new funds. But administration officials say the president may ask Congress for more cash in the end-of-year spending bill to handle the crisis, Brianna Ehley reports. The HHS public health fund currently has only about $57,000, and health officials say Trump's order falls short of what's needed to get a handle on the crisis.

More: Advocates fear policy could weaken HIV/AIDS programs | Officials were kept in the dark

CHIP'S UP NEXT: House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy announced today that the lower chamber will take up a bill, H.R. 3921 \(115\), next week to extend federal funds for the Children's Health Insurance Program, Rachana Pradhan reports. Nearly four weeks after the program's authority expired, states that rely on the federal infusion are in dire straits. And McCarthy explained that the House is proceeding now because "Minnesota's about to run out of money."

TAX

CHECKIN' OFF THE EASY STUFF: The famously amicable chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee is about to step into a sword fight. Brady is already wrestling with a restive group of GOP Northeasterners on the state and local tax deduction. But that's just the beginning, as Rachael Bade explains today. The next few weeks (and likely months) will bring countless obstacles and traps. That includes finding $4 trillion in pay-fors, actively engaging members of both chambers and avoiding Trump's wrath, as Brian Faler reports. It's such an ambitious lift that Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has privately hinted to senators that he could cancel part of Thanksgiving recess, per Seung Min Kim.

All the rest: Mnuchin's steep learning curve | Child tax credit push inches ahead | Ivanka huddles with Pelosi ally | Corker is 'all in' on tax plans | Koskinen gone at IRS

OBAMACARE

NO FORCED SUBSIDIES: The Trump administration can go on withholding Obamacare subsidies now that a federal judge has denied a request to force the payments, Adriel Bettelheim and Victoria Colliver report. A U.S. district court judge ruled Wednesday against issuing an emergency order requiring the payments be restored while a lawsuit filed by 18 states and the District of Columbia works its way through the courts.

IMMIGRATION

DRAWING LINES ON DACA: Trump reiterated Wednesday that any "DREAMers" dream must come with a "substantial" tradeoff, including funding for the so-called border wall. "I'd love to do a DACA deal, but we have to get something very substantial for it, including the wall, including security, including a strong border," Trump said, per Ted Hesson. That deal may not come together in the year-end spending deal. House Speaker Paul Ryan today disputed the Huffington Post's report this week that the speaker had privately predicted a DACA fix in the omnibus. "No decision has been made in the timing and decision on DACA," he said.

INFRASTRUCTURE

FIRST THINGS FIRST: House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.) said today that Congress needs the White House to deliver an infrastructure plan before lawmakers can get to work on a bill, which he says should come "right behind" tax reform, Lauren Gardner reports. "There's no sense in me going out there and putting something out, and then all of a sudden the president beats it down," Shuster told reporters. "We need the White House — the bully pulpit — to be saying, 'Here's our principles,' and let us go to work."

EARMARKS

— McConnell, Cornyn firmly in charge despite flak from right. POLITICO.

— New endangered species: The GOP deficit hawk. Christian Science Monitor.

— GOP chairman: No appetite for gas tax now. The Hill.

— This is why the congressional budget process is broken. Washington Post.

— Mulvaney: Tax plan is 45 percent Cohn, 45 percent Mnuchin, 10 percent me. The Hill.

— Five years after Sandy, here's how New York is spending billions in federal aid. DNA Info New York.

WE'RE COUNTING: 44 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017).

* A message from Businesses Against the Ad Tax: Across the country, small businesses are taking a stand. Congress wants to tax advertising as a way to raise revenue. Where Congress only sees dollars, small business owners see years of hard work, important jobs for their community and a way to support their families. An ad tax would hurt the ability of businesses to grow and thrive, and would impact the entire American economy.

Businesses Against the Ad Tax is a coalition of small- and medium-sizes businesses, along with business-minded organizations, committed to keeping advertising 100% tax deductible. Don't let Congress get away with a short-sighted tax proposal.

Visit BAAdTax.org to learn how you can support small businesses and stand against an ad tax.
**

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/budget-victory-sounds-starting-gun-for-tax-reform-025251>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

House narrowly passes budget — setting up mammoth tax fight Back

By Jennifer Scholtes and Rachael Bade | 10/26/2017 08:38 AM EDT

House Republicans cleared a crucial hurdle in their drive to overhaul the tax code Thursday after narrowly approving the Senate's budget.

By passing the measure, 216-212, Republicans unlocked procedural powers that allow the Senate to pass a tax bill with just 51 votes — and evade Democratic filibusters. But even with the ability to sideline Democrats, the GOP faces a daunting task as it tries to rewrite the tax code.

Heading into the vote, it was unclear whether enough GOP lawmakers would support the measure. A band of Republicans from high-tax states vowed to vote "no" on the budget unless GOP leaders scrapped plans to curb the state and local tax deduction currently in the GOP's tax proposal.

Speaker Paul Ryan and his top lieutenants were banking, however, on enough Republicans being jazzed about tax reform to back a fiscal blueprint many despise.

"A 'no' vote, as we heard from our Democrat colleagues, is to block tax reform and defend the status quo," Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) warned on the floor before the vote.

Leadership had originally sought to come up with an agreement on the nearly $1.3 trillion state and local tax break before the Thursday vote — particularly after a host of allies like Republican Reps. Lee Zeldin of New York and Tom MacArthur of New Jersey said they would need to resolve the issue before backing the budget.

But leadership suddenly postponed a negotiation session on the matter late Wednesday night, likely in a sign that enough opponents were appeased by a commitment to work toward a deal in the coming days on the state and local tax break.

The vote was filled with drama on the House floor.

As the electronic House vote board began to fill out with "yeas" and "nays," Republican holdouts like New York Rep. John Katko stood near House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.), watching the evolving tally as some waited until the last minutes to cast dissenting votes.

House Budget Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.), who kept her eyes on the board throughout the count, told POLITICO afterward that "we would have done what we needed to do to make sure we got that vote done."

Leadership's promise to work with angry lawmakers didn't work for all naysayers.

"I am voting NO," Rep. Frank LoBiondo (R-N.J.) tweeted Wednesday night, a promise he fulfilled Thursday. He was responding to a constituent asking him to oppose the budget and "a tax plan that favors the wealthy."

The early ultimatums serve as a preview of the challenge that lies before GOP tax writers, even before legislative text of the tax bill is set for release next week.

Brady said that Republicans will introduce the bill on Nov. 1 and his committee will begin considering it on Nov. 6.

"I'm going to stay at the table, so is the leadership, with our New York and New Jersey lawmakers to try to find a solution where their taxpayers are better off after tax reform," Brady said later on Thursday after meeting with GOP members from high-tax districts in those two states and others like California and Illinois.

Rep. Tom MacArthur (R-N.J.), one of 20 Republicans who voted against the budget, said at least 22 GOP House members stand together on the state and local tax issue. Dozens of others held their nose while voting yes for the budget, he added.

Delivering a pre-condition of his own, President Donald Trump tweeted Monday that there would "be no change" to the way 401(k) plans are taxed, even as key lawmakers said they are still considering alterations to the popular retirement plans.

"We might be debating the details of a tax reform plan that does not exist," Rep. Rob Woodall (R-Ga.) complained on the floor this week, noting that the bill has yet to be unveiled.

Many Republicans have refrained from publicly making demands on the fledgling tax proposal, feeling political pressure to remain flexible in the interest of ultimately achieving a policy priority seen as make-or-break for the GOP.

The budget the House passed Thursday is a far cry from the version the chamber first approved earlier this month and is unlikely to have garnered sufficient support without the tax debate hovering over it.

The House's initial plan, favored by fiscal hawks, would have required lawmakers to offset the costs of new tax cuts and to find $203 billion in extra savings from some welfare programs. But those requirements would not fly in the more moderate Senate, which passed its budget last week.

Under immense pressure to pass a tax reform bill by year's end, Republican leaders struck a time-saving deal to forgo a formal conference committee to resolve differences between the House and Senate plans.

Although many House GOP lawmakers have derided that decision and complained about the final text, most rank-and-file Republicans still quickly resigned themselves to supporting the budget in order to move on to the GOP's tax reform aspirations.

For their part, Democrats have seized on what they called the "hypocrisy" of fiscal conservatives backing a plan that would drive up the debt. The Senate budget envisions tax cuts that could add $1.5 trillion to the deficit over a decade.

"Republicans are always telling us how much they care about the deficit. But when it comes to giving their beloved tax cuts to their billionaire friends, they suddenly develop a convenient case of amnesia," Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.) said on the House floor as lawmakers teed up debate this week. "They say, 'What deficit? Don't worry, these tax breaks will pay for themselves.'"

Aaron Lorenzo contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

House Republicans throw tax orthodoxy out the window Back

By Brian Faler | 10/26/2017 02:02 PM EDT

Swallow a deficit-swelling budget? Sure. Skimp on cutting the top income tax rate? Fine. Take millions of moderate-income Americans off the tax rolls? OK. Pass a potentially 1,000-page tax bill in just a couple of weeks? Alright.

House Republicans are ready to deal when it comes to taxes. They are so desperate for a policy win, after their Obamacare repeal flameout, that they're agreeing to things that a few years ago would have had them at each other's throats.

It's not all sweetness and light, of course — there's been a major fight over Republican plans to cut a deduction for state and local taxes. And the big test will be when Republicans actually release the details of their tax legislation, now slated for Nov. 1, and everyone can see who exactly will be the losers under their plans.

But for now, once-controversial proposals are barely causing a stir.

"The American people want us to get to 'yes' on tax reform," said Jim Renacci (R-Ohio), who sits on the tax and budget committees.

It's an indication of the pressure lawmakers feel to produce a win ahead of next year's midterm elections after spending seven fruitless months trying to rescind the Affordable Care Act. Many are terrified at the prospect of facing voters next year with nothing to show for their time in power.

Even notoriously balky House conservatives are making nice.

"We've got to get the economy going — it's all about wages going up — and if I can endure some short-term pain for long-term benefits, I'm willing to do that," said Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), head of the chamber's staunchly conservative Freedom Caucus.

The latest flexibility came with Thursday's House adoption of a Senate budget plan. The annual fiscal blueprint used to be a big deal for House Republicans — Speaker Paul Ryan made his name as chairman of the Budget Committee, writing plans calling for drastic cuts in federal spending. And for years, House conservatives had demanded budgets balance the government's books.

But the fiscal blueprint they adopted Thursday does no such thing, and some lawmakers question the importance of the budget, saying they agreed to it only in order to tap the all-important reconciliation process they intend to use to move tax legislation through the Senate.

"We don't follow budgets anyway — it's really just a mechanism to get tax reform done," said Renacci.

They are also willing to compromise on their long-standing calls to cut the top income tax rate.

Just a few years ago, House Republicans walked away from a tax reform plan written by then-Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp in part because he cut the top rate only to 35 percent, from 39.6 percent. At the time, Republicans had been promising to cut the top rate to 25 percent — something they had pledged since they took over the House in 2011 — but Camp was unable to make the numbers work.

Now, Republicans are planning an even higher top rate. Their plans are still to be determined, but they may leave the top rate where it is, which President Barack Obama raised as part of the 2013 fiscal cliff agreement.

"I don't think there's anybody out there that is talking about NFL players needing a tax cut — I don't think high-powered doctors and lawyers need a tax cut," said Rob Woodall (R-Ga.), who emphasized Republicans' plans to instead cut taxes on small and large businesses.

At the same time, they're willing to take millions of Americans off the tax rolls entirely with their plans to double the standard deduction and expand a child tax credit. Just a few years ago, Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney lamented that, at the time, 47 percent of Americans did not pay federal income taxes.

Meadows defended the plan, saying: "I don't think we've said, 'Tax more people.' In fact, if anything, we've said 'Tax fewer people.'

"It's a function of putting more of their money back in their pocket," he said.

There have also been relatively few complaints about the prospect of passing a giant tax rewrite bill, the biggest in a generation, in a matter of weeks. Republicans plan to release it Nov. 1, with committee action penciled in for the following week and House approval coming later next month.

Said Pat Meehan (R-Pa.), "It's not as if these issues are things that have never been considered before — there's a lot of work that's been done.

"There's been long discussion on the outlines of this," he said.

Of course, not everyone is happy.

Republican leaders have faced a rebellion from colleagues from high-tax states over their plan to dump a deduction for state and local taxes, and lawmakers are tangling with the Trump administration over plans to push people out of 401(k) retirement plans and into Roth ones.

And some lawmakers have chafed at the secrecy surrounding the GOP tax plan.

"We don't have the details — that's why I'm frustrated," said Chris Collins (R-N.Y.).

It also remains to be seen if the mood will hold once Republican leaders unveil their bill. Though their budget allows for a $1.5 trillion tax cut, the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center figures Republicans' tax cut promises would cost some $5.5 trillion, meaning lawmakers need to come up with a whopping $4 trillion in savings.

But for now, Republicans are ready to deal.

"This is a great opportunity — I think people are seizing the moment," said Meehan.

To view online click here.

Back

Some House Republicans ratchet up threats over state and local tax clash Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 10/26/2017 01:30 PM EDT

House Republican leaders have yet to broker a deal with rank-and-file members over the federal deduction for state and local taxes, and some of them are threatening to vote against tax reform as a result.

A number cast their votes against the budget plan the House passed this morning to unlock a filibuster-proof path to sweeping tax legislation, under which the deduction has been marked for elimination.

But Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), who's in the eye of the storm, expects to find agreement.

"I'm going to stay at the table, so is the leadership, with our New York and New Jersey lawmakers to try to find a solution where their taxpayers are better off after tax reform," Brady said after meeting with GOP members from high-tax districts in those two states and others like California and Illinois.

Tom MacArthur of New Jersey, one of 20 Republicans who voted against the budget, said at least 22 GOP House members stand together on the state and local tax issue. Dozens of others held their nose while voting yes for the budget, he added.

The House adopted the Senate's budget resolution 216-212.

"Obviously the New York delegation is working close together to provide tax relief for families in our districts," said Elise Stefanik (R-N.Y.), who also voted no on the budget because of state and local tax worries. "It's still a work in progress. I'm confident that leadership is going to address the concerns of the New York delegation."

WHAT'S NEXT: Brady plans to release the tax legislation Nov. 1.

To view online click here.

Back

Interest groups weigh in ahead of House budget vote Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/25/2017 07:52 PM EDT

Key outside groups have begun to publicly weigh in on the proposed budget that Republicans plan to use as the vehicle for tax reform.

Americans Against Double Taxation, a group in favor of preserving the state and local tax deduction, urged House members to vote "no" on the budget in a release sent late today. The House plans to vote on the budget Thursday.

Repealing the state and local deduction will increase the tax burden on Americans who live in states with high local tax rates, AADT Co-Director Andrew Koneschusky argued in a statement. Koneschusky said that it would also be unfair to allow, "corporations to continue fully deducting their state and local taxes, but not individuals and families."

Meanwhile, Americans for Tax Reform, which famously promises to campaign against any candidate that raises taxes, said it would view a vote against the budget resolution as a vote against tax reform.

"Support for this budget resolution should be viewed as support for the Trump tax reform plan," ATR said in its statement. "Opposition to the budget resolution equals opposition to tax reform."

The resolution under consideration specifically identifies the elimination of the deduction individuals can take on taxes paid to state and local governments as a way to pay for lower taxes. Republicans hope to pass the resolution Thursday to speed tax reform.

To view online click here.

Back

POLITICO Pro New York: 7 of New York's 9 GOP Congress members vote against budget, citing tax deduction Back

By Jimmy Vielkind | 10/26/2017 12:54 PM EDT

ALBANY — Seven of New York's nine Republican members in the House of Representatives voted against a budget resolution that will pave the way for a larger discussion on tax reform.

The New Yorkers joined 13 Republican representatives from other high-tax states like New Jersey in opposing the budget measure, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), which cleared the House on Thursday morning by a 216-212 vote. They are upset about the potential loss of the deductibility of state and local property taxes — which is worth an estimated \$17 billion to New York taxpayers.

Two New Yorkers — Reps. Tom Reed and Chris Collins — supported the budget measure. Reps. Lee Zeldin, Pete King, Dan Donovan, John J. Faso, Elise Stefanik, Claudia Tenney and John Katko voted no.

The same seven lawmakers signed a letter in June saying they had "deep concerns" about eliminating the SALT deduction. Democrats, including Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, had challenged the Republicans — many of whom are also political targets — to vote against the budget resolution.

In a statement, Reed said his vote would pave the way for tax reform that he hopes will boost the economy and benefit his constituents overall.

"This budget is a critical step towards making reforms to our broken and outdated tax code," Reed stated. "We have a once in a generation opportunity to make positive changes that will mean more money for hardworking folks and spark our economy. The American people want and deserve a simpler, fairer tax structure. The time for tax reform is now, so let's get to it."

Faso has been consistently opposed to losing the SALT deduction, and said it cost his vote.

"I remain committed to the belief that we need comprehensive tax reform to benefit Upstate New York families and increase economic growth," he stated. "I could not, however, vote in support of a budget resolution that singled out for elimination the ability of New York families to deduct state and local taxes. I am committed to finding a solution by working with the administration, congressional leadership, and members of both parties to reform our tax code in a manner that works for middle class families in Upstate New York and will allow our economy to grow."

This story first appeared on POLITICO Pro New York on Oct. 26, 2017.

To view online click here.

Back

Northeastern Republicans vote against House budget, Californians vote yes Back

By Elena Schneider | 10/26/2017 01:29 PM EDT

Twenty Republican House members, including battleground incumbents from high-tax states, voted against the Senate GOP's budget, a key hurdle before Congress can tackle tax reform.

Eleven GOP members from the New Jersey and New York delegations voted against the budget, many of whom had voiced concern over the plan to curb state and local tax deduction.

Notably, several GOP members in contested races from high-tax states voted for the budget, including Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, the Appropriations Committee chairman, and every Republican from California, including a collection from targeted Southern California districts.

POLITICO reported that House leadership postponed a negotiation session on the matter on Wednesday night, "likely in a sign that enough opponents were appeased by a commitment to work toward a deal in the coming days on the state and local tax break."

Pennsylvania Rep. Brian Fitzpatrick, who represents a swing district, also voted against the measure.

A handful of hardline conservatives also defected, including Reps. Justin Amash (MI-03), Ken Buck (CO-04), John Duncan (TN-02), Matt Gaetz (FL-01), Lynn Jenkins (KS-02), Walter Jones (NC-03), Thomas Massie (KY-04) and Mark Sanford (SC-01).

The full list of New Jersey and New York incumbents who voted against the budget: Reps. Dan Donovan (NY-11), John Faso (NY-19), John Katko (NY-24), Pete King (NY-02), Leonard Lance (NJ-07), Frank LoBiondo (NJ-02), Tom MacArthur (NJ-03), Chris Smith (NJ-04), Elise Stefanik (NY-21), Claudia Tenney (NY-22), Lee Zeldin (NY-01).

No Democrats voted in favor of the budget.

To view online click here.

Back

Ryan demurs on 401(k), state and local tax deduction clashes Back

By Toby Eckert | 10/26/2017 12:46 PM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan today wouldn't wade into a couple of the biggest clashes to arise over tax reform — changing 401(k) savings plans and eliminating a tax deduction for state and local taxes.

Asked if he agreed with President Trump that 401(k)s should be left alone, Ryan told reporters: "I agree with comprehensive tax reform and I agree with giving the Ways and Means Committee the latitude they need to write their legislation."

After reports last week that Republicans were considering a sharply lower cap on 401(k) contributions and steering more savings to plans similar to Roth IRAs, Trump tweeted that "There will be NO change to your 401(k)." But Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady indicated Wednesday the issue was still in play.

Ryan has been a chief architect of the GOP tax plan, along with Brady, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn.

Ryan also deflected a question about a revolt by some Republicans from high-tax states over the tax negotiators' plan to eliminate the federal deduction people can take for state and local taxes they pay. Several of those lawmakers voted against a budget today, which the House narrowly passed, that will be the vehicle for the tax overhaul.

He again said it was up to the Ways and Means Committee to iron out the problem.

"I believe that the Ways and Means Committee will be working with these members in particular to find a solution," Ryan said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Ways and Means Committee plans to release its legislation Nov. 1.

To view online click here.

Back

House conservatives seek to draft Mulvaney in disaster funding fight Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/25/2017 05:21 PM EDT

A core group of House Republicans is trying to enlist White House budget director Mick Mulvaney in prodding senators amid a series of fall spending battles.

Leaders of the Republican Study Committee met Wednesday morning with Mulvaney to talk strategy on shared fiscal priorities, like requiring Congress to offset disaster relief funding.

"The goal out of this meeting is to partner with the OMB director and the White House to put pressure on the Senate to take some of these reforms seriously," Mark Walker (R-N.C.), chairman of the 170-member caucus, told POLITICO after the roughly one-hour meeting. "As we told 'em, 'We need you guys to be putting pressure on the Senate from a different angle.' And they've agreed to do that."

A spokeswoman for Mulvaney disputed Walker's takeaway.

"The goal of this meeting was not to pressure the Senate, but rather to discuss shared priorities between Congress and the administration, such as tax reform and disaster relief," OMB press secretary Meghan Burris, who attended the meeting, said in an email.

Capitol Hill leaders and White House officials are treading carefully in demanding offsets for disaster funding, with storm-ravaged communities like Puerto Rico still lacking basic public services.

Mulvaney helped set off that familiar — but politically painful — debate this week, after Walker staked a similar position on offsets earlier in the month.

The former South Carolina congressman wrote to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on Tuesday calling for at least $5 billion in spending cuts to defray the cost of the next disaster package. That figure would only partially offset the third aid request, which Mulvaney said would likely total "tens of billions of dollars" and is expected to arrive "mid-November."

Demanding offsets poses a risk in the Senate, where at least eight Democrats would need to back the strategy to overcome procedural hurdles.

Asked about disaster offsets on Wednesday, Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) struck a note of caution.

"Ordinarily, emergency spending is not offset. But I wouldn't mind, as long as we get the relief that we need. But I'm not for erecting additional obstacles to any state getting the disaster relief they need in emergencies," Cornyn said. "If we can do with offsets, fine. If we can't, then I'm fine going without."

Lawmakers have already approved more than $52 billion in emergency spending to help states and U.S. territories affected by hurricanes and wildfires this year.

With a larger package in the works, more Republicans say they expect Congress to pay for that aid — a position many conservatives, including Mulvaney, took in the wake of Hurricane Sandy in 2013.

"I think we're beyond just the direct humanitarian relief, so offsets would be appropriate," House Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said Tuesday.

But other House Republicans, like Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart of Florida, argue that their districts are still in dire financial straits.

"Reconstruction is emergency," Diaz-Balart said. "It's not reconstruction because you want to build houses on beachfront properties. It's because you've got folks who don't have houses."

The conservative Republican Study Committee is also seeking to secure Mulvaney, a former Freedom Caucus member, as an ally on other deficit-reduction bills.

House conservatives say they have received a promise from Speaker Paul Ryan to bring up symbolic legislation like the Balanced Budget Amendment in exchange for their votes Thursday on the bicameral budget resolution, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), that would pave the way for tax reform.

Seung Min Kim contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Puerto Rico board names officer to oversee power utility recovery Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/25/2017 05:23 PM EDT

Puerto Rico's federal oversight board will appoint a "chief transformation officer" for its beleaguered power authority.

The board announced plans to name Noel Zamot, a retired Air Force officer, to the position to oversee the recovery of the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority from two major hurricanes. Most of the U.S. commonwealth has been without power since Hurricane Maria hit the territory over a month ago.

The lack of electricity affects medical services, water distribution and other key portions of Puerto Rico's infrastructure.

Recently PREPA awarded a no-bid contract worth hundreds of millions of dollars to a Montana company with two employees and no record of wide-scale electrical repair that has connections to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke. The utility, which is run by the commonwealth government, announced the contract a day after Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló met with President Donald Trump and other officials in Washington.

The company, Whitefish Energy, feuded with San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulin Cruz on Twitter Wednesday afternoon, asking her if they should send their workers home after she questioned their receiving the contract.

Zamot previously served as revitalization coordinator, a position appointed by Puerto Rico's governor to work with the federal oversight board on the commonwealth's economic recovery.

The board named Zamot under its authority as the utility's trustee under the debt restructuring law passed by Congress last year. The executive director of the board argued that the role is similar to an appointment made in municipal bankruptcy.

"As the representative of PREPA under Title III of PROMESA, the Board believes the successful exit of PREPA from Title III requires adapting the pre-hurricane transformation plans with ongoing federal reconstruction efforts," said Executive Director Natalie Jaresko.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump opioid declaration falls short, say state officials Back

By Brianna Ehley and Sarah Karlin-Smith | 10/26/2017 08:56 AM EDT

President Donald Trump declared the opioid crisis a public health emergency and touted a big public advertising campaign against drug use. But he did not pump additional money into an epidemic that has ravaged communities and claimed thousands of lives.

Trump said he would act swiftly to "review and evaluate" recommendations due next week from his opioid commission, and promised to address illegal drug shipments from countries like China. But the declaration disappointed state officials and public health experts who say a lot more money is needed for a deadly epidemic that is outpacing efforts to contain it.

"People are dying," said Andrew Kolodny, executive director of Physicians for Responsible Opioid Prescribing. "We have people dying of overdoses on waiting lists for an effective treatment."

Senior administration officials told reporters that acting HHS Secretary Eric Hargan will sign the declaration on Thursday. That will allow public health agencies to swiftly redirect existing health resources to the crisis, but won't add fresh funds. It will also cut "bureaucratic delays" in hiring personnel and expand access to telemedicine, including remote prescribing of medication commonly used for substance abuse or other mental health treatment.

"We can be the generation that ends the opioid epidemic," Trump said at a White House ceremony attended by many Cabinet officials, lawmakers from affected states and families who have lost relatives to overdoses. He put a great deal of emphasis on his planned anti-drug advertising campaign, recounting how he himself had never had a drink because he heeded the advice of his older brother, who had a drinking problem and died young.

But his declaration relies largely on shifting around existing funds, rather than putting up the extra money that state officials and some in Congress say is critical for a comprehensive response to the drug epidemic that the White House itself estimates is claiming about 175 lives a day.

The HHS public health fund currently has only about $57,000 left in it, although Congress could replenish it and the department has some other emergency resources to draw on. An administration official said there are "ongoing discussions" with lawmakers about how much money is needed.

Public health and addiction experts say a multi-pronged approach is needed immediately — a national prevention strategy, greater access to substance abuse treatment and enough money for communities to stock up on naloxone, a drug that can reverse life-threatening overdoses. Some experts had urged Trump to trigger another kind of national emergency under the Stafford Act, which can unlock more federal resources and emergency powers but is usually used for more clearly delineated crises like hurricanes or fires.

The spreading opioid crisis reaches from abuse of prescription painkillers to street drugs like heroin and the even more lethal fentanyl — which Trump said he'd bring up in his coming talks with China. Drug overdoses now kill more people than traffic crashes or gun-related deaths, and there's growing fear that IV drug use will set off waves of new HIV/AIDS infections in the heartland.

Some lawmakers from hard-hit states immediately said they would be open to allocating more resources — but it's not clear how much of an appetite there is on Capitol Hill to significantly increase spending. As of now, the House and Senate appropriations bills for next year keep opioid funding levels flat. States are already getting $1 billion between 2017 and 2018 under the 21st Century Cures legislation to respond to the drug crisis.

"We're underwater," said Rep. David McKinley (R-W.Va.) during a congressional hearing earlier this week where he criticized the federal response. "I don't understand why more resources aren't flowing to help out a rural state like West Virginia." His state has the highest overdose death rate in the country.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who attended the White House event, in a statement praised Trump for taking "bold action." But the president's order will fall far short of the recommendations his Commission on Combating Drug Addiction and the Opioid Crisis made in its preliminary report in July. The final report is due next week.

It's also not clear who will spearhead Trump's effort, given that there are vacancies or acting directors in several key agencies, including the DEA and HHS. Without clear leadership, "this is going nowhere," said Georges Benjamin, executive director of the American Public Health Association.

The Christie commission in its preliminary report recommended mandatory education for doctors and waiving a longstanding federal prohibition on using Medicaid funds to pay for inpatient substance abuse treatment — which the panel said was the single fastest way to increase treatment. Trump did call for some mandatory training for federal prescribers, but the White House did not immediately release details about its breadth, and physician groups say some training has already been policy for a few years. He also outlined a policy of waiving some of the inpatient treatment Medicaid restrictions in some states, again without many specifics or a commitment for more money.

Trump also highlighted public-private sector efforts through the NIH to develop safer pain treatments. That effort too is already underway.

Michael Fraser, executive director of the Association of State and Territorial Health Officials, urged Congress to act. "The lack of resources is concerning to us since the opioid epidemic is presenting lots of challenges for states' budgets," he said.

Advocates worry about redirecting other health funds, particularly from programs such as HIV prevention.

"There are some measures in the package that suggest states could shift money away from HIV to the opioid crisis, but the fact is patients who are suffering from the opioid crisis, they have other health concerns too," said Tiffany Kaszuba, deputy director of the Coalition for Health Funding. "It's not even robbing Peter to pay Paul anymore. It's robbing Peter to pay Peter."

Even without more cash, some experts did note that HHS and other agencies could use their emergency powers to act on some other recommendations of the Christie commission. "This could set the stage for something more to come," said Cynthia Reilly, director of the Pew Charitable Trusts substance use prevention and treatment initiative.

But the declaration as unveiled Thursday did not include other priorities identified by state and local officials. For example, it won't immediately address access to the emergency overdose treatment naloxone. The price of the drug has soared in the past couple of years, making it hard for cash-strapped emergency departments to stock it. And addiction experts say that's crucial, particularly in rural areas.

Ohio was able to negotiate a lower price of naloxone for emergency medicine agencies and police officers, but at a cost of $40 a vial it's still too high for many EMS agencies, particularly as some of the stronger opioids now require multiple doses per patient, said Carol Cunningham, Ohio's state medical director for the department of public safety's EMS division and the chairperson of the National Association of State EMS Officials.

Policy experts said the administration's decision to use a public health emergency fund instead of a national emergency declaration under the separate Stafford Act is not enough.

"You show me in the past a national public health emergency declaration with no accompanying funds or even requests for funds, I'd be pretty surprised," said Andrew Kessler, who runs Slingshot Solutions, a consulting firm specializing in behavioral health and drug abuse.

Some states had hoped to see more help to build out programs that show promise. Rhode Island, for instance, wants to establish a pre-arrest diversion program so that law enforcement sends people using opioids to treatment instead of jail. "We know that prevents deaths, and criminalization does not," said Rhode Island's Health Director Nicole Alexander-Scott.

According to a summary released by the White House, but not mentioned by the president, the Department of Labor will be able to give emergency grants to states for workers displaced by the opioid crisis if funds are available. However, the administration has proposed a 40 percent cut to dislocated worker grants and training.

Trump said in August and then again last week that he would declare the crisis a national emergency, which would give the administration more tools to fight the crisis but also raise a host of legal and economic issues.

At the time, officials were considering using the Stafford Act, which is typically reserved for natural disasters and administered by FEMA. Former HHS Secretary Tom Price, White House budget director Mick Mulvaney and the White House Domestic Policy Council had objected to such a declaration because of its potential multi-billion-dollar price tag, legal issues and questions about how it could be implemented.

The more measured response speaks to the complexity of a drug epidemic that is pervasive yet not isolated in a particular time or place like a hurricane or a fire.

Another official added the administration has already spent $1 billion on the opioid crisis since the president took office. Roughly $500 million for drug addiction response efforts was provided under the 21st Century Cures Act signed into law by former President Barack Obama last year.

The declaration of public health emergency lasts 90 days but can be renewed.

Adam Cancryn, Ian Kullgren and Rachana Pradhan contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Advocates fear Trump opioid policy could weaken HIV/AIDS programs Back

By Brianna Ehley | 10/26/2017 01:58 PM EDT

Advocacy groups are raising alarms over the way President Donald Trump's declaration of a public health emergency to address the opioid crisis gives his administration authority to redirect resources from HIV/AIDS programs.

A White House fact sheet distributed today shows the administration is shuffling money from existing programs to fund a response and not spending or requesting additional funds.

HIV/AIDS patient advocates and policy experts are seizing on a line in the fact sheet stating the declaration will allow for "shifting of resources within HIV/AIDS programs to help people eligible for those programs receive substance abuse treatment, which is important given the connection between HIV transmission and substance abuse."

Public health officials have been concerned about a rise in HIV infections linked to injectable opioids since a small town in Indiana was shaken by an HIV outbreak in 2015. But advocacy groups argue a response shouldn't come at the expense of existing programs, some of which already include support for substance abuse treatment.

"This will penalize successful HIV programs that have already reduced HIV infections in the U.S.," said Greg Millett, vice president of public policy for the Foundation for AIDS Research.

Trump's declaration states that the funding would still go to people infected with HIV, but it would put a special emphasis on funding substance abuse treatment programs for those that also have addictions. According to the CDC, 6 percent of the 39,513 diagnosed HIV infections in 2015 were linked to injection drug use.

There are currently 1.1 million people in the U.S. living with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS. The number of new infections has declined by 10 percent between 2010 and 2014, according to the latest figures available from the CDC.

"Right now, we're looking at funding a response for opioids on the back of one of public health's greatest success stories," Millett said.

Public health groups said progress could be hindered if federal funding for HIV/AIDS programs is slashed. It was unclear from the fact sheet which programs the White House was referring to. An HHS spokesman said under a public health emergency declaration, up to 5 percent of the funds available in two supplemental pools of money may be shifted.

"Shifting money is not the answer, additional resources are necessary to address this growing epidemic," said Carl Schmid, deputy executive director of the AIDS Institute.

Advocacy groups have already been concerned about funding for HIV/AIDS treatment and prevention this year. Trump's budget proposed to slice CDC's HIV prevention programs by $149 million. That was rejected by Congressional appropriators and lawmakers kept the funds level, though advocates say more is needed.

"We're not seeing a serious response from this administration," Millett said.

To view online click here.

Back

Senior health officials in the dark about Trump's opioid declaration Back

By Sarah Karlin-Smith and Brianna Ehley | 10/25/2017 04:50 PM EDT

Top federal health officials responding to the opioid epidemic still don't know what President Donald Trump will say when he makes a highly anticipated announcement about the crisis Thursday afternoon.

"We don't have information about what the announcement will be, and so I can't comment on it. I honestly don't know," Assistant HHS Secretary for Mental Health and Substance Use Elinore McCance-Katz told POLITICO on Wednesday following her appearance at a House Energy and Commerce Committee hearing on the federal response to the epidemic.

She said the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, which is responsible for federal treatment programs, has not been collaborating with the White House in the run-up to the announcement, which is expected to include a formal declaration that the epidemic is a federal emergency.

CDC Principal Deputy Director Anne Schuchat was similarly out of the loop. A spokesperson for the DEA said she had no information but added that the agency will be involved "to an extent."

An administration official said the White House has asked at least one federal agency to provide estimates of how much additional funding it will need to respond to the crisis.

An HHS spokesperson pushed back on that notion and said federal agencies, including HHS and SAMHSA, have been involved in the Trump administration's response to the opioid crisis. "HHS has been working very closely with the White House on the event for tomorrow." She wouldn't confirm that the agencies have been looped in on the details of Trump's forthcoming announcement, however.

POLITICO reported last week that Trump surprised his own advisers by promising a sweeping emergency declaration over recommendations against such a move. At the time, the White House was not prepared to announce a plan, and administration officials in agencies central to the response weren't readying strategies and tactics to carry out an emergency declaration.

Trump has invited a number of lawmakers from states that have been hit especially hard by the drug crisis, including Sens. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) and Dan Sullivan (R-Alaska).

A number of advocacy groups have also been invited. None of the executives at those groups or lawmakers contacted by POLITICO say they know what will be said.

Trump could declare the emergency declaration under the Stafford Act, which could free up federal funding and allow regulatory changes throughout the government to respond to the crisis. Such declarations are traditionally used to respond to natural disasters that affect an isolated area and have a defined endpoint. Experts say adapting the approach to opioid use could be very expensive and get mired in legal questions.

Trump could also declare a public health emergency, but that would have a much narrower scope and include little money. He could also ask Congress to appropriate new money to fight the epidemic. Senate Republican appropriators and Democratic leaders on the House Appropriations Committee told POLITICO on Tuesday they had not been given a heads-up from the White House about any coming requests for new emergency spending on the epidemic.

Public health advocates are anxiously awaiting the fine print of Trump's announcement — particularly how much money he might direct to fight the crisis.

"If there is no money, I don't believe that Trump is serious. We need real action. We need real money. I'm going to be very disappointed if they don't propose something north of $1 billion," said Andrew Kolodny, executive director of Physicians for Responsible Opioid Prescribing.

Democrats appeared to be preemptively putting Trump and Republicans on notice about tackling the crisis Wednesday. A group of more than a dozen Democratic Senators introduced legislation that would invest $45 billion toward opioid abuse prevention, detection, surveillance and treatment efforts — the amount of money Senate Republicans had put toward opioid efforts in their failed Obamacare repeal bills.

"The Trump administration's plan to address the opioid epidemic has been little more than empty words and broken promises," said Sen. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), who co-sponsored the bill with Sen. Bob Casey (D-Pa.).

"I just really want to make sure that there's some real teeth to it," Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) told POLITICO. "Some of the budgets that we'd seen submitted really was taking money out of drug control issues generally. So I hope we see something innovative, and may some innovative things happening at the FDA."

Sullivan, whose state has been hard hit by opioid abuse, said he hopes the administration will repeal a rule known as the IMD exclusion that prohibits Medicaid reimbursement for substance abuse treatment in inpatient facilities with more than 16 beds.

"We have very, very few treatment centers and if you are able to have more flexibility on that rule you could have more facilities that do treatment and that's important," Sullivan said.

Health care advocates also said they were looking for a well-rounded commitment that would include prevention efforts, funding to develop less addictive pain treatments and assurances that any involvement of the justice system in an emergency declaration would be focused on getting people to treatment, not on criminal penalties.

"We need to focus on moving upstream, we're not just interested in making sure people have access to treatment. We need to think about what we can do to prevent people from becoming addicted in the first place," said Trust for America's Health's John Auerbach.

Even if Trump delivers a substantive plan, addiction experts said they'll be closely evaluating other administration actions in the coming months, noting that if the White House continues to push for a repeal of Obamacare, cuts to Medicaid or other federal health programs in next year's budget, any opioid emergency effort could be undercut, because patients won't be able to access the comprehensive health care programs needed to stay healthy.

"If the Trump administration wants to show they're serious about this, the proof will go well beyond whatever they announce Thursday," said Andrew Kessler, who runs Slingshot

Solutions, a consulting firm specializing in behavioral health policy.

Adam Cancryn contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

House to vote on CHIP funding next week Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 10/26/2017 12:09 PM EDT

The House will take up legislation next week to extend federal funds for the Children's Health Insurance Program, Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy announced today.

Federal money for the program, which insures roughly 9 million low-income children, expired at the end of September and states have resorted to temporary measures to keep their programs afloat.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee earlier this month advanced legislation H.R. 3921 \(115\) on a 28-23 party-line vote to fund CHIP for five years as well as continue money for community health centers for two years. Democrats objected to the way the measure would increase costs for wealthier seniors on Medicare and cut Obamacare's Prevention and Public Health Fund, among other steps, to pay for the bill.

McCarthy cited funding shortages with Minnesota's program as the reason for bringing the measure to the floor. "The reason why we're doing it next week, because Minnesota's about to run out of money."

McCarthy also said the chamber will vote next week on legislation H.R. 849 \(115\) to repeal Obamacare's Independent Payment Advisory Board.

Hugh Ferguson contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP's beloved taxman about to be 'the most hated guy in Washington' Back

By Rachael Bade | 10/25/2017 07:18 PM EDT

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Kevin Brady has spent the better part of a year crafting a Republican tax reform bill. But on the cusp of the plan's long-awaited unveiling, the House GOP's point man on taxes has had to retool the proposal at least twice in 48 hours.

First, President Donald Trump rejected one key element of his proposal. Then a handful of Republicans threatened to hold up the budget — and delay tax reform altogether — unless he promised to leave their favorite tax break alone.

And the bill hasn't even been made public yet.

Brady, an 11-term lawmaker from suburban Houston, is on the verge of one of the hardest assignments handed to any House member in years: shepherding a tax bill through his chamber that will, by necessity, have to gore more than a few oxen.

The job will force Brady, known for his agreeable and friendly disposition, to play bad cop with some colleagues seeking to protect plush tax loopholes — but also win over critics to ensure passage of a sorely needed legislative achievement.

"Kevin's about to go from the most popular, well-liked guy, the gentleman with a kind smile from Texas, to the most hated guy in Washington, D.C., by some group or another," said Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), who had nothing but praise for Brady but said he did not envy his job. "We've got to find a way to make the difficult decisions; Kevin's willing to do that."

Brady was tapped to lead the powerful tax-writing panel last year, when the notion that a conservative overhaul of the tax code could be signed into law seemed absurd. But GOP leaders and the Republican Party are now banking on Brady to get the bill through the House by Thanksgiving.

Brady is already running around trying to smooth potential snags. On Wednesday, after Trump summarily dismissed Brady's proposal to scale back tax-deferred retirement savings accounts, the tax chief huddled with his fellow Republicans to discuss tweaking the proposal — or risk Trump's wrath.

House GOP leaders, meanwhile, implored Brady to win over a handful of Republicans from high-tax states who were threatening to vote against the budget because he planned to curb the state and local tax deduction. Brady worked on a potential deal Wednesday while also juggling an hourlong briefing with reporters, a four-hour tax session with Ways and Means Republicans and a negotiating session with the president's daughter Ivanka Trump, who came to Capitol Hill with her own demands for the tax bill.

"It's a very challenging responsibility," said Ways and Means member Pat Meehan (R-Pa.). "I appreciate the really difficult position Kevin is in — and I think he's done a fairly admirable job at trying to resolve the tensions that are a natural part of this process."

Brady projected optimism in a brief interview this week.

"I do feel confident we are moving together as a conference," Brady said. "Now, will there be support on 100 percent of the provisions? Tax reform just doesn't work that way. And so we will work through the process, [and I will] do my very best to try to resolve all the members' concerns."

A South Dakota native, Brady was one of five kids raised by a single mom after his father, a lawyer, was shot and killed in a courtroom by a client's deranged spouse. He took an interest in leadership early in life, running for student body president of his high school. Brady paid for college with jobs as a meat packer, construction worker and waiter before taking a job as an executive at the local chamber of commerce, where he stayed for 18 years.

In 1990, almost a decade after moving to Texas, Brady ran for the state House of Representatives and won. Seven years later, he was elected to Congress and quickly joined Ways and Means, one of the most powerful committees on Capitol Hill.

Brady long had his eye on the chairmanship. In 2014, he bowed out of the chairmanship race after it became clear a more junior member of the committee, then-House Budget Chairman Paul Ryan, would win. When Ryan (R-Wis.) became speaker a year later, it looked as though Brady might once again be leapfrogged by a more junior member, Rep. Pat Tiberi (R-Ohio.) But Ryan tipped the scale in Brady's favor by endorsing him for chairman.

The job is more challenging than Brady probably imagined.

In recent months, he's had to play mediator between Republicans on his committee and GOP leaders in the House, the Senate and the White House — and they are rarely in sync.

Several Ways and Means Republicans abhorred the so-called border-adjustment proposal championed early on by Ryan as a way to help pay for tax cuts, and they grumbled privately that Brady was doing the speaker's bidding by pursuing it.

At times, Brady also upset some of his committee members by not briefing them on details being hashed out by the "Big Six" top tax negotiators — and by barring their staff from joining the tax meetings out of fear of leaks.

Still, Ways and Means Republicans have admired Brady's ability to balance the constant stress and demands of the job. Even Republicans who aren't on the committee, such as Meadows, praise Brady's legislative skills.

"Brady is one of the good guys here on the Hill who has the patience and the respect of committee members that will allow him to weather, as the speaker said, these 'Class V rapids' that are coming," said Ways and Means Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.). "We're going to stand with him and help him get through this."

Republicans say next week's tax rollout is Brady's first big test. A smooth unveiling, they hope, will create momentum and help avoid the fate of Obamacare repeal.

That's why Brady has had to rejigger his plan. Removing the state and local tax deduction to appease Republicans from New York and New Jersey, for instance, would leave a $1.3 trillion hole in Brady's bill.

It's an exercise he'll have to get used to. Tax reform, Republicans like to say, is an exercise in turning dials to find the right balance. Any tweak Brady makes for one member is bound to affect the prized provision of another lawmaker.

Brady, who is short and stout with a shaved head, might reach for humor to get him through the next few months. He is known by reporters for his fondness for corny humor and his adherence to talking points.

Asked a few weeks ago about his strategy for an upcoming Republican Conference meeting on taxes — particularly given all the diverging interests in the room — Brady joked, "Hugs for everybody!" He told POLITICO recently that the Astros winning the World Series is first in his prayers; tax reform, second.

Navigating the president's whims will take more than prayers. On Monday, Trump squashed one unpopular House GOP proposal to help pay for tax cuts: limiting tax-preferred retirement accounts.

"There will be NO change to your 401(k)," Trump tweeted.

Brady suggested Tuesday morning that the idea was still on the table. But Trump reiterated his opposition later in the day.

"I didn't want that [idea] to go too far. That's why I ended it very quickly," Trump told reporters. "I think Kevin Brady is fantastic, but he knows how important 401(k)s are."

At some point, Brady will move from trying to accommodate everyone to having to say "no." That might be hard for the Texan, who aims to please.

"He is not one of these guys who says, 'My way or the highway,'" Reed said. "He truly wants to get to a position that he understands where you're coming from, and if you're acting in good faith, he'll work with you."

Bernie Becker and Aaron Lorenzo contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

6 things that could derail the GOP's tax plans Back

By Brian Faler | 10/26/2017 05:12 AM EDT

Republicans are on the verge of adopting a budget that provides them a historic opportunity to rewrite the tax code for the first time in a generation.

But the path to victory on the biggest issue remaining on President Donald Trump's agenda this year is littered with obstacles and traps — all laid by members of the Republican Party. With the House scheduled to approve a budget Thursday, followed by plans to release their tax bill Nov. 1, Republicans are caught between the urge to cut taxes while avoiding ideas that could cause a revolt in their own party or hurt middle class taxpayers.

Here are the six ways Republicans could derail their own tax plan:

$4 trillion budget hole: The Republican budget allows them to cut taxes by $1.5 trillion, which sounds like a lot — except compared to all the promises they've made. Their plans to cut taxes on businesses and individuals would cost some $5.5 trillion, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center.

That means they have to find $4 trillion in offsetting savings to fit their tax plan into the budget. That's more in tax increases and other savings than Congress has approved in the past quarter-century combined.

Many lawmakers have no idea about the scope of changes that will be required to meet their budget numbers, and it is an open question whether Republicans can agree to take trillions with one hand while handing out trillions with the other. They've offered some indications where they'd find the money, but they haven't gone over well.

401(k) changes: One of the possible revenue raisers has ignited a feud between Hill Republican leaders and President Donald Trump. Congressional tax writers have considered sharply lowering the cap for pre-tax contributions to 401(k) savings plans and steering contributions beyond that to plans that would tax the money up front, rather than when it is withdrawn.

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady signaled Wednesday that the issue was still on the table, despite a tweet from Trump earlier this week promising, "There will be NO change to your 401(k)."

"We think we can do better," Brady told reporters.

Asked later about Brady's comments, Trump said "maybe we'll use it as negotiating. But trust me. That's one of the great things. You know, there are certain elements of deals you don't wanna negotiate with. 401(k)s — and Kevin knows it, and I think Kevin Brady is fantastic, but he knows how important 401(k)s are."

State and local tax problems: Another idea that has spawned intra-party squabbling is Republican leaders' desire to end the federal tax deduction for state and local taxes people pay, which would bring in an estimated $1.3 trillion in new tax revenue over a decade. GOP members from high-tax districts are rebelling over the idea, with some from New York and New Jersey threatening to withhold their votes from the budget unless their concerns are addressed.

The lawmakers have floated several compromises, including capping the deduction for high-income earners.

Brady said Wednesday he expected a deal to be struck before tax legislation is introduced.

"I do expect to reach an agreement with our high-tax lawmakers," he said.

Trump interference: Republicans have longed for presidential leadership on taxes, but, if anything, Trump is making things harder. He confirmed many Republicans' fears when he abruptly shot down any 401(k) changes. Earlier this year, he stunned many Republicans when he called a House-passed Obamacare repeal plan "mean," raising fears among lawmakers they might embrace controversial ideas as part of their tax-write plans only to see them trashed by Trump.

What Republicans ideally want from a president is help fighting special interests, by explaining to the public how difficult trade-offs are the price of tax reform. But Sen. Bob Corker surely spoke for many Republicans when he said Tuesday that he'd be happy if Trump just butted out of the tax debate.

"What I hope is going to happen is the president will leave this effort, if you will, to the tax-writing committees, let them do their work and not begin taking things off the debate that ought to be debated in these committees," he told ABC's "Good Morning America."

Senate filibuster: The so-called Big Six tax framework released last month was designed to get Republicans on the same page when it comes to rewriting the tax code, though it hasn't quite worked out like that. The House and Senate appear to be going in their own separate directions on issues ranging from specific tax policies like whether to kill the estate tax to how much a plan ought to cost.

Senators expect to be consulted — not handed down a pre-cooked proposal — and they don't fear Trump's wrath like many House Republicans. It doesn't help that Trump is feuding with two of the chamber's most independent-minded members, Corker and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Many fear a repeat of the Obamacare repeal debacle when the House strained to pass a plan only to watch it die as senators tried, and failed, to come up with an alternative. Asked earlier this month about the biggest impediment to tax reform, House Speaker Paul Ryan said: "You ever heard of the United States Senate before?"

Unrealistic deadlines: Republicans say they intend to finish up with taxes by the end of this year, even as they simultaneously punt a growing number of other contentious issues into December.

They'll have to agree on federal spending in order to keep the government open beyond Dec. 8. Many lawmakers also want to address the so-called DREAMers, some 700,000 undocumented immigrants threatened with deportation under a White House order issued last month. Then, earlier this month, Trump cut off Affordable Care Act subsidies to insurance companies, which lawmakers are scrambling to address amid worries it could lead to soaring premiums.

All of those are combustible issues, and would come as lawmakers try to digest a tax plan likely to run more than 1,000 pages. Some fear it could lead to another showdown over shuttering the government — blowing taxes off the radar.

Republicans have begun acknowledging the calendar may slip when it comes to taxes, with Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin saying last week that it would be "extraordinary" if lawmakers can wrap up that work by the end of the year.

To view online click here.

Back

McConnell to GOP senators: Be ready to work through Thanksgiving week Back

By Seung Min Kim | 10/26/2017 09:15 AM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell is telling his members to be prepared to work straight into the Thanksgiving break.

A similar warning last week didn't pan out, as the Senate left Washington late Thursday after clearing its budget resolution. The chamber usually adjourns for the week mid-afternoon on Thursdays and returns Monday evening.

But McConnell told GOP senators in meetings earlier this week that the chamber very well could stay in session the weekend before the week of Thanksgiving, as well as the week of the holiday, according to two senior Republican sources. The week of Thanksgiving is currently scheduled as a recess week.

Republicans are taking on an ambitious tax overhaul and also face other critical legislative tasks such as disaster aid, government funding and immigration. An increasingly vocal faction of McConnell's conference has been urging leadership to stay in session longer, even 24-7 if necessary.

In addition to legislation, McConnell and other Senate Republicans are eager to confirm President Donald Trump's nominees — particularly for the federal judiciary. The chamber is set to confirm one district judge and advance another this afternoon.

"President Trump should be commended for his strong judicial picks," McConnell said on the floor earlier this week. "The Senate is going to keep working hard to confirm them. And we're going to succeed."

To view online click here.

Back

Mnuchin crashes into steep learning curve on the Hill Back

By Nancy Cook | 10/26/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin is the de facto frontman for the administration's proposed overhaul of the U.S. tax system because of his extreme loyalty to President Donald Trump and the scores of tax policy experts and economists at his command.

But Mnuchin, a former investment banker and movie financier with no prior experience in Washington, hasn't been able to overcome Republicans' suspicion about his Wall Street background and limited conservative credentials. That may complicate White House efforts to influence debate as the details of a tax bill are written.

Republicans' simmering discontent with Mnuchin emerged full force in September, when he urged House Republicans to vote for the deal to temporarily raise the debt ceiling as part of a package that Trump had crafted with the two top Democratic leaders.

Behind closed doors, Mnuchin asked lawmakers to take the tough vote not for the president or for the party, but rather to do it for him, according to three people who attended or were briefed on the meeting. So few members felt any personal bond with Mnuchin that they were surprised he felt comfortable making such a request, and said it betrayed a lack of understanding about the way power works in Washington.

That was also the last time Mnuchin spoke to many of the people in the room, said one senior House aide.

"We will defer to the administration on who they want to put out there on tax reform, but we see the president as the top salesman," said a second House aide. "Trump supporters will watch Trump selling this, and they will be swayed by Trump, not Steven Mnuchin."

Mnuchin has had more success in relationship-building on the Senate side, cultivating Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and other powerful figures one-on-one as potential allies.

But he's encountered a steep learning curve on the nuances of tax and economic policy, according to current and former Treasury staffers and congressional aides.

"I think it has taken him awhile because he was thrown into the situation cold," said Hatch. "He has a tremendous business background."

He frequently also makes verbal gaffes during public appearances, often contradicting the White House's best-laid talking points. In mid-October at an international finance conference, Mnuchin said that eliminating the estate tax would ultimately help wealthy people — after the White House had already cast scrapping it as a way to aid farmers, ranchers and small business owners.

A senior Treasury official said Mnuchin has been working on tax reform daily since he assumed the job of Treasury secretary and continues to enjoy a very close relationship with the president, dating back to the 2016 campaign. As for Mnuchin's relationships with members of Congress, the official added that "just like any relationship, we are always working on it."

The administration declined to make Mnuchin available for comment.

Selling tax reform, a task that has bedeviled lawmakers since President Ronald Reagan's 1986 overhaul, would be difficult for any administration. Republicans are split over how much to lower tax rates and which breaks or deductions they should eliminate to offset the tax rate reduction.

Party members also cannot agree among themselves on whether a potential tax bill can and should add to the country's growing deficit, a concern to the fiscal and spending hawks in both the House and Senate.

It's even harder for Trump, who has already failed to orchestrate passage of Obamacare repeal — a signature campaign issue not just for him but for the Republican Party — and who has been unbridled in his criticism of leading GOP lawmakers in recent weeks, including Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee.

Corker, who recently met one-on-one with Mnuchin a few times at his Senate office and Treasury, said he'd been happy with Mnuchin's outreach so far.

"Look, I'm a business guy," Corker said. "I like people who talk business."

Business connections first led Mnuchin to sign on as Trump's chief fundraiser in the spring of 2016. He and Trump had known each other informally for roughly 15 years through New York City finance and real estate circles, Mnuchin recently said on a POLITICO Money podcast.

It was a job that many establishment Republicans had already passed up, said one adviser close to the administration — and it gave Mnuchin an opening to cement his relationship with Trump by traveling extensively across the country with him.

Ultimately, Mnuchin was rewarded for his efforts with one of the plummiest jobs in any administration and in economic circles — running the Treasury Department.

Mnuchin has managed to maintain an excellent relationship with the president during the administration's sometimes tumultuous nine-month run — a feat that other officials, such as Director of the National Economic Council Gary Cohn, former chief strategist Steve Bannon or former chief of staff Reince Priebus weren't able to do, according to Republican lawmakers, senior administration officials and advisers close to the White House.

"There is no question that he has gained influence and, shall we say, standing," said Larry Kudlow, an informal economic adviser to Trump dating back to the campaign. "As other people in the administration have lost ground, there is a seesaw effect, and Mnuchin's standing has improved."

That helped the Treasury secretary weather sharp criticism this past summer after his wife engaged in a tit-for-tat on Instagram over a photograph she posted of herself emerging from a government aircraft in designer clothes — a trip, it later emerged, that included a visit to Fort Knox, where the pair watched the eclipse. Mnuchin then made comments dismissing public interest in the solar event, inflaming the controversy.

After Trump's wavering condemnations of neo-Nazi violence in Charlottesville, Virginia, in August, Mnuchin publicly defended the president against charges that he'd equivocated between hate groups and counterprotesters. He did the same with the controversy over NFL players kneeling during the national anthem at games to protest police brutality against African-Americans, saying the players should "do free speech on their own time."

The fact that Mnuchin waded into the latter controversy, so far outside of the purview of the Treasury Department, led former Treasury Secretary Larry Summers to call Mnuchin on Twitter "the greatest sycophant in Cabinet history."

His loyalty has, however, paid dividends in keeping up his relationship with the president, and that has contributed to Mnuchin's status inside the White House, far more than his relations with Capitol Hill. This week, he's in the Middle East to coordinate efforts with allies to crack down on terrorist financing, and he'll be part of Trump's entourage when he travels to Asia next month.

"Most of our deep tax policy discussions with the president are with Secretary Mnuchin and Director Cohn together, all hashing out the issues and thinking the pros and cons," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas). "The interactions in that group has really proven to be valuable."

Yet Mnuchin's ability to stay in Trump's good graces has not translated into his ability to build warm relationships across Capitol Hill.

His debt ceiling comment still plagues his relationships in the House. The picture is not much better in the Senate, where he's still an unknown quantity to many members, thanks to the fact that he spent so little time in Washington before becoming Treasury secretary.

People who have dealt with Mnuchin acknowledge that he has a quiet, sometimes socially awkward manner that does not lend itself to chitchat or building instant rapport.

"He's reserved. He is not a slap-you-on-the-back type of guy," said Hatch. "But if you ask him a question, he'll answer it. There is no subterfuge with him."

Yet there remains a feeling among some Republican lawmakers and congressional aides that Mnuchin views tax reform through the lens of what is good for New York and Wall Street — a worldview that sometimes can mar his ability to sell the White House's efforts politically and throughout the heartland as a middle-class tax plan.

As one congressional aide remarked: "High finance does not always translate into tax reform."

Lately, Mnuchin has tried to combat these perceptions by hosting lawmakers or small groups at the agency's majestic downtown building, adjacent to the White House, as a way to help him forge better relationships in a comfortable setting, and lawmakers have appreciated the gesture.

The administration has also been putting other top officials out to help sell tax reform — particularly those with far deeper ties to the Hill.

Vice President Mike Pence gave a speech at the right-leaning American Enterprise Institute on Tuesday morning, while the director of the Office of Management and Budget, Mick Mulvaney, has emerged as a key and vocal player who has tried to allay lawmakers' concerns about the way any tax package could add to the deficit.

Mulvaney has strong relationships with House members, thanks to his roughly six years in the chamber. The White House also recently included Mulvaney in a closed-door session with some members of the Senate Finance Committee.

The test of Mnuchin's leadership on tax reform will come shortly, perhaps as early as next week, once detailed proposals emerge from the House Ways and Means Committee.

Then, Mnuchin will have to defend far more specific decisions on tax breaks and deductions and deploy Treasury's army of resources to help with the economic modeling and analysis, all while remaining a fierce advocate for Trump. "A big part of this will be to make sure the White House and Treasury is coming out with a consistent position," said one congressional aide. "Things will get tough. That will be the real test."

To view online click here.

Back

Ivanka Trump, Rubio say joint effort to boost child tax credit in flux Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 10/25/2017 07:44 PM EDT

Ivanka Trump and congressional Republicans are ratcheting up calls to raise the child tax credit as part of their middle-class pitch for reshaping U.S. tax laws, but they're far from settled on some key details.

They haven't yet reached agreement on how much to increase the credit from its current $1,000, for example. Boosting the credit has been Trump's top priority since her father became president, and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and other lawmakers have worked on the issue for several years.

The credit needs to be at least $2,000 because $1,800 is a break-even mark, according to Rubio. They're trying to get closer and closer to $2,000, but the proposal still needs buy-in from lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol before a figure is finalized, said Sen. Tim Scott (R-S.C.).

Nothing's a foregone conclusion, added Scott, who sits on the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee. But for Rubio, who appeared alongside Trump, Scott and other Senate and House GOP members at a press conference in the Capitol, there's not much wiggle room.

"It's actually not a very negotiable number because anything less than that doesn't really achieve the goal," Rubio told reporters. "I know they're still working through the details, but if we want to make it meaningful and make it count, it's going to have to be at or near that number, or even higher."

Failing to sufficiently expand the child tax credit would doom tax reform, he said, adding that President Donald Trump reemphasized the need to focus on the middle class in tax reform while lunching Tuesday with Senate Republicans.

Rubio, with Ivanka Trump's help, is pushing to boost the benefit to at least $2,000 and make it refundable against payroll taxes, which means taxpayers who owe no income taxes would still receive the full credit benefit. The issue matters because of decades of wage stagnation alongside escalating costs for raising a family, Trump said.

"It is a priority of this administration and it is a legislative priority to ensure that American families can thrive and that we deliver real and meaningful tax relief to middle-income Americans," she said.

Scott said the process still has to play out in Congress, with the House Ways and Means Committee expected to release legislation next week followed by a markup before the Senate takes the mantle. Despite support for boosting the credit to $2,000, the proposal still needs broader input, he said.

"We are looking forward to a vigorous debate," Scott said.

A lot of work remains to be done, Trump said.

Also still to be determined: at what income level to phase out the tax benefit for higher-income taxpayers. Trump's plan has been derided by some as little more than a benefit for upper-class Americans who don't need the help.

"We'll be dialing this in and out quite a bit," said Sen. Dean Heller (R-Nev.), another Senate Finance member. "The question is: What is the middle class?"

The numbers matter to determining how much the middle class would actually benefit, Scott said.

"I can't pretend that we have figured out those dials yet because we have not," he said.

Increasing the credit amount and ensuring refundability against payroll taxes are essential to broader tax legislation developing in Congress, because without those elements there would be tax increases on those who can least afford it, Rubio said. Refundability matters because most of the would-be beneficiaries don't have income tax liabilities, Rubio said.

"Both politically and from a policy perspective, and from a fairness perspective, you can't just produce a tax reform in which all of the benefit accrues to the people who can hire lobbyists and at the expense of the people who actually we should be helping," he told reporters in an earlier briefing.

The so-called Big Six plan from the White House and congressional GOP leaders differs on refundability. It would keep the first $1,000 of the credit refundable but make the added amount nonrefundable, something that critics have said would leave millions of low-income children without any benefit if they come from working families with incomes too low for federal income tax liability.

Rubio's plan, which he's scaled back a bit from a bill he introduced a couple of years ago with Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah), would cost about $435 billion over a decade, according to an estimate from the Joint Committee on Taxation. The Rubio-Lee bill would have increased the child tax credit to $2,500.

"We're open-minded people," Rubio said of lowering the credit proposal from the 2015 bill.

The updated Rubio proposal wouldn't index the $2,000 amount to inflation. It also doesn't directly address the fate of a tax credit for dependent care, but Rubio said it could simply get left in place alongside settling on the $2,000 figure for the child credit, rather than the initial idea to combine them into a larger, more universal credit.

The Big Six plan calls for a nonrefundable credit of $500 for non-child dependents.

Across the aisle, Sens. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) are also weighing in. They're rolling out legislation that would create a new $300-per-month, per-child credit for children under 6, plus a $250-per-month, per-child credit for those 6 to 18. Their proposal would also make the credit fully refundable.

Rubio expects both Senate and House legislation to include expanded child tax credit language when they debut.

To view online click here.

Back

Pelosi ally meets with Ivanka Trump on child tax credit Back

By Heather Caygle | 10/26/2017 09:41 AM EDT

Ivanka Trump met with Democratic Rep. Rosa DeLauro, a close ally of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, this week in an effort to gain up support for her proposal to expand the child tax credit.

Trump met with several GOP lawmakers in the Capitol Wednesday, and held a press conference with nearly a dozen Republican senators, to spotlight her pet issue. But her meeting with DeLauro is notable because Democrats have promised united opposition to the GOP's current tax reform proposal.

DeLauro has long been an advocate for expanding the child tax credit but brushed off any notion that she would work with Republicans on their current GOP framework during an interview earlier in the week.

"The current bill and the current proposal, I am opposed to," DeLauro said, before her meeting with Ivanka Trump.

But "if we have the opportunity to have a back and forth and a dialogue about what should go into a tax proposal, I will come at it from the child tax credit perspective," she added. "I want to make sure that in that bipartisan dialogue that the child tax credit is front and center."

A spokesman for DeLauro confirmed the meeting but declined to provide details of their discussion.

The House will vote Thursday on the Senate's budget resolution. If it passes, it would allow Republicans to push through a tax rewrite in the Senate without needing any Democratic votes.

Democrats are hoping GOP internal divisions trip up a partisan tax reform plan and prompt Republicans to seek bipartisan support. Democrats have vowed to oppose the current GOP plan but have said they're open to working with Republicans if this proposal fails.

Privately, though, several sources say House Democratic leaders have no intention of working with Republicans on a tax plan next year, particularly with the House majority on the line.

DeLauro brought up working together on the child tax credit during a Democratic leadership meeting Monday, but Pelosi shot down the idea down, saying Democrats are focused on defeating Republicans right now.

"You will be in the majority" if Republicans continue to stumble, Pelosi said during a closed-door caucus meeting on Tuesday, according to sources in the room.

To view online click here.

Back

Corker won't let Trump feud affect tax reform: 'I'm all in' Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 10/26/2017 08:54 AM EDT

Bob Corker on Thursday said his personal feud with the president will not affect his vote on Senate Republicans' plan to reform the nation's tax code. In fact, he said, he's "all in."

"Look, tax reform is our agenda. It's the Republican Senate agenda," Corker (R-Tenn.) told CNBC's "Squawk Box" on Thursday morning.

He added that he will "absolutely not" let his public spat with President Donald Trump shape his position on tax reform.

"It'd be like somebody in your listening audience representing their company, sitting across the table from someone they may have a low regard for, but are they gonna do something that's gonna damage their company because of that?" Corker asked. "Absolutely not. I'm all in."

The House is expected to vote later Thursday on the Senate's budget resolution. Passage would allow the Senate to approve a tax reform measure on a party-line vote using the same budget maneuver Senate Republicans deployed in their unsuccessful attempts to repeal and replace Obamacare.

To view online click here.

Back

Kautter named acting IRS commissioner Back

By Bernie Becker | 10/26/2017 10:36 AM EDT

David Kautter, the assistant Treasury secretary for tax policy, is about to add another role: acting commissioner of the IRS.

The White House announced today that Kautter, who was confirmed for the Treasury post by the Senate in August, would take over as acting chief on Nov. 13. IRS Commissioner John Koskinen's five-year term expires the day before.

The Treasury Department said in a statement that Kautter would continue his work on tax reform at the department while also working as acting commissioner. Kirsten Wielobob and Jeff Tribiano, both deputy commissioners at the tax agency, will run the day-to-day operations at the IRS, according to Treasury.

It's not uncommon for the IRS to have an acting commissioner while waiting for a new Senate-confirmed leader. Steven Miller, then the deputy commissioner for services and enforcement, took over as acting chief in November 2012 before being forced out months later over the IRS's tea party controversy.

Kautter has decades of experience in tax and accounting, with time spent at Ernst & Young, the Kogod Tax Center at American University and RSM.

Koskinen will finish out his full term despite efforts by House Republicans to remove him over the commissioner's handling of the investigation into the IRS's improper scrutiny of conservative organizations seeking tax-exempt status.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump open to DACA deal with border wall funding Back

By Ted Hesson | 10/25/2017 02:52 PM EDT

President Donald Trump said today that he's willing to strike a deal to protect so-called DREAMers covered under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program — provided the agreement includes funding for a border wall.

The president fielded reporters' questions on the White House lawn before he boarded a helicopter en route to Joint Base Andrews in Maryland.

"I'd love to do a DACA deal, but we have to get something very substantial for it, including the wall, including security, including a strong border," he said. "We have to be able to stop drugs from pouring into our nation."

Trump announced in September that he would phase out DACA, which offers work permits to undocumented immigrants brought to the United States at a young age.

DACA enrollments will begin to expire in large numbers after March 5, a cutoff date set by the administration.

The White House released a list of immigration reform principles earlier this month, but senior officials expressed willingness to negotiate.

The list includes a border wall, but also other policy changes, including a reduction in family immigration and measures targeting so-called sanctuary cities.

To view online click here.

Back

Shuster wants more infrastructure details from White House Back

By Lauren Gardner | 10/26/2017 12:25 PM EDT

Rep. Bill Shuster said today he wants the White House to show its hand on its infrastructure plan sooner rather than later, so lawmakers can be ready to move on a bill once they've tackled a tax code overhaul.

"Waiting until tax reform is done, I think it should be tucked in right behind it," he said. "Tax reform should definitely go first. We should be coming up right behind it."

Shuster said he's been in contact with some senators interested in crafting an infrastructure package, but noted that lawmakers want to wait for the administration to put out more details of what it wants the bill to look like before they begin work in earnest.

"There's no sense in me going out there and putting something out, and then all of a sudden the president beats it down," the Transportation Committee chairman told reporters.

"We need the White House — the bully pulpit — to be saying, 'Here's our principles,' and let us go to work," he added.

On the gas tax, Shuster said he doesn't "think there's a will there" for the House to consider raising it during the tax debate. "But I think as we go through the process — [with] Gary Cohn, the White House and the Senate — there'll be opportunities to talk to folks and see where we go," he said.

Figuring out a fix to the Highway Trust Fund could be a way to get Democrats on board with the tax effort, Shuster observed.

To view online click here.

Back

McConnell, Cornyn firmly in charge despite flak from right Back

By John Bresnahan | 10/25/2017 07:38 PM EDT

Despite a near constant barrage of attacks from Sean Hannity, Steve Bannon and the Breitbart wing of the GOP, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and other top Senate Republicans remain firmly in charge.

There is no threat of a leadership challenge to McConnell or any of the other highest-ranking Republicans, and their support inside the GOP Conference remains rock solid.

Yet there is also no question that Senate Republicans are feeling the heat from the unhappy GOP base, especially the strongest pro-Trump elements of the party. In response, many Republicans are tying themselves ever closer to President Donald Trump. So while the media, Democrats and even some of their own colleagues — especially those who are not seeking reelection — hammer Trump's alleged ethical lapses, poor poll numbers and legislative failures, wrapping themselves in Trump's mantle is the smartest way to survive for party leaders on Capitol Hill.

Still, Senate Republicans also cautiously wonder whether the bitterly anti-establishment mood among GOP voters — the same mood that helped propel Trump into office — will ultimately cost them their majority. By choosing staunchly conservative primary candidates who may not be able to win a general election, Republican voters would be cleansing their party of "Never Trumpers" while at the same time steering it toward minority status. It's an issue the GOP leadership has wrestled with since the beginning of the tea party movement, and it will play out again in 2018.

"In Republican primaries, we've kind of let nature take its course and nominated people who, as the majority leader said, can't win general elections. When we do that, we lose," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), who surprisingly found himself targeted by Hannity on Tuesday night. "What that means is, we have to push back on that sort of mentality and thinking because none of us want to be in the minority status where we can't get things done."

Noting Hannity's criticism of him, Cornyn pointed to a recent analysis by The Washington Post that showed he has one of the most "pro-Trump" voting records of any Senate Republican. "I try not to pay too much attention to those comments and get distracted,"

Cornyn added.

"People support our leadership team," said Republican Conference Chairman John Thune of South Dakota, No. 3 in the GOP hierarchy. "I know there's a lot of outside interest and discussion in this. But within the conference, Mitch is supported, Cornyn is supported."

Thune believes some of the assessments of GOP congressional leaders coming from conservative commentators are "ridiculous."

"I think we've got a 'saliva purity' test now that defies any rational approach to things. We've got to understand the people they're targeting this year vote with the president 99 percent of the time, they're some of the most conservative members of the Senate," Thune said.

Following the stunning retirement announcements by GOP Sens. Bob Corker of Tennessee and Jeff Flake of Arizona — who have both clashed repeatedly with Trump — Hannity on Tuesday called for McConnell and Cornyn's ouster. A close Trump ally, Hannity lashed out at several other of the president's Republican critics as well, including Sens. Ben Sasse of Nebraska, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Susan Collins of Maine.

"I have a suggestion for all you never-Trumper senators that are headed for the exits," Hannity said. "Take your other colleagues with you. Mitch McConnell, goodbye. Ben Sasse, goodbye. John Cornyn, goodbye."

Hannity's demands for new Senate GOP leadership, which are echoed strongly by Bannon and some of the Senate GOP hopefuls he's endorsed, fell flat with McConnell's colleagues.

"Sean Hannity is a friend of mine, but he's in a competitive business. He's maybe capturing some of those extreme viewers," said Sen. Jim Inhofe of Oklahoma. "We have good people in there doing a very hard job. Cornyn, he has to go out of his way not to be a purist. I think he's done a very good job."

Sen. Ron Johnson of Wisconsin, who clashed with McConnell over how the Obamacare repeal process played, said McConnell is firmly in charge despite Flake and Corker's announcements.

"I'm not sure it has any effect whatsoever," said Johnson.

Collins, who has long been targeted by Hannity and other conservative pundits, said the harsh rhetoric aimed at anyone who strays from the party line hurts Republicans in the long run.

"I think it is destructive and unproductive to be pushing out leaders or members who have been very effective," Collins said. "There's also a certain irony here. If you look at Jeff Flake's voting record, he has a very conservative voting record, one of the most conservative records. If he's not a conservative, who is?"

For his part, Trump thinks everything is wonderful with Senate Republicans, despite his Twitter and verbal barrages aimed at Corker, Flake, McConnell and others.

"I think we had a tremendous — I called it a love fest. It was almost a love fest. Maybe it was a love fest. We got standing ovations," Trump said of his meeting Tuesday with Senate Republicans. "There is great unity. If you look at the Democrats with Bernie Sanders and Hillary Clinton, that's a mess. There's great unity in the Republican Party."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief, presented by Businesses Against the Ad Tax: Senate trudges ahead on budget — Mulvaney justifies red ink for tax cuts — Democrats eye Obamacare fix in spending deal
Date: Monday, October 16, 2017 3:31:40 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Kaitlyn Burton | 10/16/2017 03:29 PM EDT

THE SHOW MUST GO ON: It's one of the Senate's biggest weeks of the year, but as we learned this morning, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell will be short a clutch vote.

Red Bull ready: The absence of Sen. Thad Cochran — who is still home in Mississippi recuperating from some health issues — likely won't dash the Senate GOP's hopes of passing a budget this week. We're told debate will still begin Tuesday, and an all-nighter on amendments is slated for Thursday. One Senate GOP aide told us today after a morning strategy meeting: "It's full speed ahead."

Plenty to read: Senate budget writers today released the full 318-page document to accompany their budget resolution, S. Con. Res. 25 \(115\). Besides a brief warning about the nation's ballooning deficit, the Senate Budget Committee uses the "print" to make a full-throated endorsement for tax reform.

Last-minute lobbying: Without Cochran, McConnell can only afford to lose two other Republicans on the budget. The good news? Sen. Susan Collins told ABC this weekend that she's likely a yes. Now, leadership is looking squarely at Rand Paul and John McCain. Still, Senate GOP leaders may have some breathing room. Sen. Bob Menendez isn't expected to make it for vote-a-rama on Thursday because he's standing trial in New Jersey, as Seung Min Kim and Burgess Everett report.

How Democrats could bring the pain: The GOP's all-nighter on amendments could be a lot more painful without Cochran, a reliable leadership ally. Even if every Republican backs the budget, Democrats could do some damage if they can convince a few recalcitrant members to side with their proposals. The one that could matter? Democrats will almost certainly propose striking out the line in the GOP's budget that waives the Senate's pay-as-you-go rule.

A 2004 repeat? The Senate GOP will be desperate to avoid the kind of "PAYGO" revolt that nearly tanked their tax plans under President George W. Bush. Back then, four centrist Republicans sided with Democrats to demand that new tax cuts didn't simply add to the deficit. Two of those who supported the mutiny back then? Collins and McCain.

GOOD MONDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — Rep. Mike Turner (R-Ohio) is seeking an explanation from the mayor of Dayton, after the city lost out on a half-million-dollar housing grant because of past mismanagement issues.

#DailyBudgetFact — U.S. crop subsidies are expected to cost about $8 billion per year over the next decade, according to the American Enterprise Institute. About $5.5 billion of that will go directly to farmers, while $2.5 billion will go toward private crop insurance companies and agents.

* A message from Businesses Against the Ad Tax: Small businesses across the country are uniting against an ad tax. Advertising is tax deductible, just like rent and utilities, because it's critical to a business's ability to raise awareness, reach new customers and hire talented employees. Don't let Congress kill small businesses by taxing advertising. Speak out at BAdTax.org. **

APPROPRIATIONS

DELAYED: With Cochran sidelined again this week, Senate appropriators are holding off on their Tuesday markups — but appear likely to resume work later in the week. The committee today postponed subcommittee meetings on fiscal 2018 Homeland Security and Interior and Environment bills, but not the full committee markup on Thursday. More scheduling changes are likely later in the week, per a GOP aide.

Countdown: Including this week, the Senate has just seven weeks in session before the Dec. 8 spending deadline.

BUDGET

RECONCILIATION, RE-IMAGINED: Just two generations ago, budget reconciliation was a simple concept. Dreamed up in 1974, it was a way to tweak spending and tax bills that had already passed to secure short-term budget fixes. For the rest of their priorities, congressional leaders still resorted to good ol' fashioned arm-twisting.

Enter ... gridlock: The renaissance of the once-obscure budget tool began in the 1990s, when President Bill Clinton realized reconciliation was his only chance to muscle through a spate of tax hikes (that ultimately helped produce a surplus). This kind of eat-your-spinach budget approach was short-lived, however. A half-decade later, the Bush administration twice used the procedural tool to enact and expand massive tax cuts that blew a hole in the federal deficit. And from there, there was no turning back, as Jeff Davis writes in POLITICO Magazine.

ENZI UNDER FIRE: The Senate is poised to pass a bare-bones budget resolution this week to pave the way for tax reform — and it's causing heartburn among Washington's budget purists. Piling onto Sen. Bob Corker's criticism last week, long-time budgeteers like Bill Hoagland and Stan Collender are pointing arrows at Budget Chairman Mike Enzi.

Airing grievances: "By allowing the budget process to be used solely to expedite the Trump tax cut bill Enzi has ignored, evaded and sidestepped his responsibilities as budget chairman," Collender wrote in his Forbes column Sunday. And Hoagland added in his own post: "The current Senate resolution's one and only purpose is to allow for the expedited consideration of a tax reconciliation bill that could add at least $1.5 trillion to the burgeoning country's debt."

DISASTER AID

BY WEEK'S END: Majority Leader Mitch McConnell hinted today that the Senate would take up the House-passed disaster relief bill in the second half of this week. "Obviously passing the budget which enables tax reform and tax reduction comes next, then the supplemental to take adequate care of those who've been harmed by the natural disasters we've been afflicted with lately," McConnell told reporters in a joint presser with President Donald Trump today. We've heard that bill could be the Senate's last vote of the week, heading to Trump's desk just before the National Flood Insurance Program runs dry.

TAX REFORM

NOT SO FAST: The Republican Party's repulsion to red ink is fading fast, Rachael Bade and Burgess Everett report today. But some deficit hard-liners are hanging on, demanding offsets for the GOP's precious tax cuts. The increasingly divisive debate is causing some hard feelings within the GOP, and could have dire consequences in the narrowly divided Senate.

Shots fired: Corker is questioning the deficit cred of Trump's budget chief, Mick Mulvaney, who was once one of the House's fiercest fiscal hawks. "Our OMB guy, I say this with humor, what happened to him?" Corker said. "He used to be the fiscal hawk."

Fighting back: In his new gig, Mulvaney argues it's A-OK to increase the deficit with tax cuts, as long as the ever-expanding economy eventually pays the bill. "Macroeconomic changes will always lead to change in the larger economy, okay?" Mulvaney told POLITICO in an interview. "You raise a tax, it has impact. You lower tax, it has impact. It just does."

WHAT THE PEOPLE THINK: A CBS News Nation Tracker poll found that the majority of Americans say Republicans' tax reform plans will favor the wealthy, Brent Griffiths reports. Here's the breakdown — 58 percent think the current proposals would favor the wealthy, 19 percent think reform would treat everyone equally, and 18 percent think the plan would favor the middle class.

OBAMACARE

A CALENDAR PROBLEM: The bipartisan duo of Sens. Lamar Alexander and Patty Murray seemed to be making steady — yet slow — progress on staving off an Obamacare market collapse this fall. The tentative plan? Two years' worth of subsidies, which they hoped would prevent premium spikes for millions. Then came the White House's decision to pull out the rug on those subsidies much earlier than expected, as Jen Haberkorn and Adam Cancryn report.

Rewriting the game plan: Democrats are now looking to stuff those Obamacare subsidies into another must-pass bill this year, like the December omnibus. But it may not be enough time. Health insurers face key deadlines over the next few weeks, and open enrollment for Obamacare kicks off in November, ready or not.

Short-term fix? In an impromptu soliloquy at the White House today, Trump repeatedly said he expects a "short-term fix" for Obamacare (in the same breath that he declared, "There is no such thing as Obamacare anymore"). Then he issued yet another timeframe for the next repeal-and-replace vote. Trump vows to have another vote in March or April, and predicted "100 percent" support from Republicans.

TRUMP ADMINISTRATION

HELP NEEDED: With Reince Priebus out, newly installed White House chief of staff John Kelly is taking a different tack to hiring. The former Homeland Security chief is giving the rest of Trump's Cabinet much more autonomy to pick top political appointees, Nancy Cook reports. Kelly's goal is to do a better job of finding candidates for the hundreds of jobs throughout the administration that remain vacant almost nine months into Trump's first term.

Slogging through: The Senate has confirmed roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government, according to the Partnership for Public Service.

IMMIGRATION

SEEING FOR THEMSELVES: As the Trump administration ratchets up its demands for a border wall, a bipartisan coalition from Congress is headed for a first-hand look at border security. House Judiciary Chairman Bob Goodlatte will lead a group of lawmakers this week on a tour of parts of the U.S.-Mexico border from Texas to Southern California. The group will include liberal Democrats like Sheila Jackson Lee and immigration hardliners like Steve King. (h/t Morning Shift)

EARMARKS

- Trump, red state Democrats warily approach each other on tax cuts. Washington Post.
- Republicans eye alternatives for getting to 20 percent corporate tax rate. Fox Business.
- Natural disasters lighten Republican attitude on deficit spending. Washington Examiner.
- Efforts to pry loose Trump tax returns hit a wall. POLITICO.

WE'RE COUNTING: 54 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017)

* A message from Businesses Against the Ad Tax: Small businesses are the backbone of the American economy and rely on advertising to grow and thrive. That's why we're uniting to fight a proposed ad tax that would hurt our businesses, customers and local communities.

Right now, 100% of a company's advertising expenses, both digital and traditional, are tax deductible. Congress may change this, which would make advertising costs more expensive and cripple a business's ability to reach new customers.

In 2014 alone, companies in the United States spent an estimated $297 billion on advertising. Roughly 20 million Americans go to work every day to support the advertising industry. Help stop this short-sighted tax proposal and tell Congress NO ad tax!

Visit BAAdTax.org to learn more. **

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/short-a-vote-senate-trudges-ahead-on-budget-025073>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Cochran still out of commission because of health woes Back

By Seung Min Kim and Burgess Everett | 10/16/2017 10:25 AM EDT

Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) will not return to Washington on Monday as planned due to continued health problems — denying Senate Republicans a reliable vote as they take up a must-pass budget later this week.

The Senate is still planning to vote on its budget this week regardless of Cochran's presence, Republican sources said. But they have little room for error with Cochran out, and GOP leaders are laboring to convince both Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky and John McCain of Arizona to support the fiscal blueprint.

Cochran's office said Monday that Cochran, who has been recovering in Mississippi from urological issues, has developed another urinary tract infection that will keep him in his home state. Doctors monitored Cochran and advised him to stay home to recover from his health conditions, his office said.

"He will continue his recuperation at home in Mississippi," Cochran's chief of staff, Brad White, said in a statement. "The senator has expressed his intention to return to the Senate when his health permits, and to fulfill his commitment and duties to the people of his state."

The statement did not indicate when Cochran, the Senate Appropriations chairman, would return to Washington, and a Cochran spokesman said only that the senator's plan is to "get back as soon as possible." The Appropriations Committee is slated to take up spending bills on Thursday, although subcommittee markups on Tuesday were postponed.

Privately, Republicans have been increasingly concerned about the health of Cochran, who is in his seventh term in the Senate.

Several sources indicated last week that Republicans are worried Cochran's absence could last through the end of the year, which would mean the chief senator overseeing government spending would not be present for the year-end funding fight. Current government funding runs out on Dec. 8.

Cochran is not up for reelection until 2020 and is viewed as a reliable leadership ally. His seat was fiercely contested in a 2014 primary, and GOP leaders poured in resources to save Cochran from the insurgent Chris McDaniel, a state senator. McDaniel is weighing a challenge to Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) next year, and could run for Cochran's seat if he ends up stepping down and a special election is scheduled.

Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), a senior member of the Appropriations Committee, is next in line to chair the committee and often plays a significant role in fiscal negotiations, a scenario that could be heightened if Cochran is gone for a prolonged period.

Cochran's absence in the Senate could also help thwart the GOP's broader agenda.

Republicans control 52 votes in the chamber, and just three defections or absences usually means that the GOP would not be able to pass a budget resolution — which is necessary to provide Republicans with procedural powers to advance a tax plan without Democratic support.

The Senate is slated to take up its budget later this week, and Paul and McCain are both viewed as potential "no" votes.

However, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), who is on trial for federal corruption charges, is also expected to be absent from the Senate this week, which would give Republicans slightly more breathing room even with Cochran's absence.

To view online click here.

Back

The Rule That Broke the Senate Back

By Jeff Davis | 10/15/2017 07:17 AM EDT

This month, as congressional leaders ready their various budget and tax proposals for fiscal year 2018, Republican hopes hinge on the use of budget reconciliation—a way to expedite the lawmaking process for certain bills by immunizing them from the threat of filibuster and limiting the scope of amendments. In short, if the House and Senate can each pass the same budget resolution, it starts a process in which they can reconcile any differences between the two bills in a final proposal both chambers then vote on.

At the moment, the House and Senate proposals for fiscal year 2018 are quite sweeping in scope. The House resolution calls for $200 billion in mandatory spending cuts, while the Senate bill would cut taxes by $1.5 trillion. If Congress can agree on a final budget resolution, House and Senate committees will have no choice but to write legislation meeting whatever "reconciliation directives" they are given by the budget resolution.

There's just one big problem: Budget reconciliation was never meant to be used like this. Once a tool to ease partisan gridlock, reconciliation has become part of the problem, used to reinforce the very problems it was designed to help fix.

As envisioned in the original 1974 Budget Act, budget reconciliation was limited in scope: a two-week exercise in late September of each year to tweak the spending and tax bills that had already passed earlier in that session. It was not built for legislation sweeping in scope and scale. Allen Schick, the Congressional Research Service specialist tasked with helping Congress draft the 1974 Act, later wrote that "reconciliation was intended to deal with legislative decisions made during the interval between adoption of the first budget resolution and consideration of [a] second resolution [in September, just before the start of the fiscal year]." But it was never used this way.

As re-imagined in 1980, budget reconciliation was a way to temper partisan gridlock: Its first major use happened under President Jimmy Carter and was largely supported by congressional Republicans as a way to circumvent the powerful Democratic "old bulls" who sat as committee chairmen. Reconciliation's subsequent uses in the 1980s required the Republican president's signature on a bill passed by a Congress in which Democrats controlled at least one chamber. Reconciliation shifted to the beginning of the annual budget cycle—instead of tweaking bills passed earlier in the year, reconciliation now had to look back at laws passed by prior Congresses. It was a useful legislative tool, but as its use became routine, it started being brandished as a weapon for increasingly partisan governance.

The turning point happened in the 1990s. President Bill Clinton's first budget got zero support from congressional Republicans, and the ensuing reconciliation bill wound up passing the Democratic Congress by just one vote in each chamber—the first time budget reconciliation had been used successfully in what turned out to be a partisan manner. A number of measures that would otherwise have had trouble getting to 60 votes in the Senate—raising the income tax rate on top earners by 8.6 percentage points, increasing gasoline taxes by 4.3 cents per gallon, delaying federal retiree cost-of-living adjustments, and increasing taxes on Social Security benefits—were now law. It was a demonstration of how reconciliation could be used to push controversial policies through the Senate without requiring the 60 votes needed to break a filibuster.

The long-term implications of this shift were not visible at the time, but it has had wide-ranging and transformative effects on the way Congress works—or doesn't. Reconciliation has helped to entrench congressional gridlock, discouraged bipartisan lawmaking, made it more difficult for complicated bills to become law and made budget deficits more inevitable.

Both statistical and anecdotal evidence indicate that partisan gridlock is a much worse problem in today's Senate than at any point in the past century. The result is that Congress enacts fewer but longer laws. GPO has used the same typeface for the Statutes at Large for more than a century. In 1974, Congress enacted 404 public laws totaling 2,359 pages of statute. In 2016, the number of laws enacted was cut almost in half, to 214, but the number of pages had increased to 3,036. The average number of pages per law has almost tripled, from 5.8 in 1974 to 14.2 pages last year.

Legislators have responded to the diminished hopes of enacting legislation the traditional way by succumbing to the temptation to take the reconciliation shortcut through the Senate rather than going through "regular order," which is the normal way of legislating—including allowing amendments, relevant committee hearings, a standard amount of floor debate and the use of the filibuster. One need only think back to the last few months of debate over repealing and replacing the Affordable Care Act—which Republicans tried to do through reconciliation rather than through regular order. In doing so, they not only lost the support of Senator John McCain, who wanted regular order used on any replacement bill, but also halted an inchoate bipartisan Obamacare fix in the Senate.

We're stuck on something of a hamster wheel: Gridlock makes reconciliation a more attractive option; reconciliation has thwarted goodwill attempts at bipartisan lawmaking; the inability to pass bipartisan bills makes gridlock more likely; and the cycle continues.

This is less important when Congress and the White House are in different hands. For instance, two years after Clinton's first reconciliation deal, Republicans took back the House and Senate, and House Speaker Newt Gingrich sent Clinton a reconciliation bill with $387 billion in entitlement cuts, which Clinton vetoed. There is little point in using a procedure that requires only 51 votes in the Senate to pass a bill if you still need 67 votes in the Senate to override a president's veto.

The urge to use reconciliation as a filibuster workaround is stronger when the same party controls Congress and the presidency. This started to come to fruition in George W. Bush's first term, when the reconciliation process was used to enact $1.25 trillion in tax cuts over 10 years (which passed with only 58 votes in the Senate), and again two years later, when those tax cuts were expanded and accelerated through reconciliation by a vote of 51-50 (with Vice President Dick Cheney breaking the tie).

The Bush tax cuts highlight another problem with reconciliation: The budget process that ushered in the age of reconciliation does not treat deficits as a problem. When the Budget Act was being written in spring 1974, the U.S. was only five years removed from a balanced budget, and there was no reason to believe that steadily increasing deficits and debt would be systemic. Accordingly, the 1974 process makes it just as easy to use the tool of reconciliation to increase deficits as it does to decrease them.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Mike Enzi's 2018 budget resolution orders the Finance Committee to produce a bill to "increase the deficit by not more than $1.5 trillion" over 10 years. It is doubtful that the legislators who created the reconciliation process in 1974 dreamed that it would be used for anything with such profound fiscal implications.

Today, Congress too frequently uses reconciliation to force specific policies through the Senate and makes the numbers fit the preferred policy, instead of the other way around. This started in FY 2001, when reconciliation was used to send one politically popular tax cut (repeal of the so-called "marriage penalty") to Clinton's desk for a veto. It reached peak granularity in the mid-2000s, when Republican senators tried to use reconciliation for the sole purpose of getting around a Democratic filibuster of legislation to open up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling. (Chairman Enzi's 2018 resolution is attempting the ANWR gambit again, ostensibly to reduce deficits by just $1 billion over 10 years, a rounding error in a major Cabinet agency's budget.)

Reconciliation was supposed to be all about numbers, not policy. In its original usage, reconciliation forced congressional committees to change whatever policies they wished in order to meet the spending and revenue totals agreed to by a majority of Congress in the budget resolution. The "Byrd Rule" reform first enacted in 1985 and made permanent in 1990—and named after its author, Senator Robert Byrd—reinforced the numbers-only nature of reconciliation, automatically jettisoning any provision from a reconciliation bill that does not directly affect revenues or outlays—unless at least 60 senators vote to save the provision.

The Byrd Rule makes reconciliation singularly unsuitable as a vehicle for enacting complicated policies into law, which is a big reason why the Affordable Care Act has always had problems. After Democrats lost Ted Kennedy's Senate seat in January 2010, they no longer had their filibuster-proof 60-seat majority to pass health care reform and were forced to implement the final version of the ACA through budget reconciliation. The reconciliation bill couldn't address anything relating to the private insurance market or other important aspects of health care that don't show up in the federal budget, which created several inconsistencies in the law that have never been fixed.

Further, reconciliation is supposed to be about short-term budget fixes, not semi-permanent trends. When reconciliation was first used, in FY 1981, the budget resolution's "window"—that is, the length of time during which a budget resolution's spending and revenue policies apply—covered only three fiscal years. The implementation of the 1990 budget agreement increased the window to five years. In FY 2002, that time span doubled to 10 years, in order to make the Bush tax cuts last as long as possible.

The problem is that budget scores and forecasts are like weather forecasts—the farther into the future they try to look, the less accurate they turn out to be. The economists at the Office of Management and Budget and Congressional Budget Office are required to estimate what interest rates, inflation, GDP growth, unemployment and demographic trends will be 10 years from now in order to model tax receipts and entitlement spending based on those assumptions. But no sane person would bet their own money on those forecasts being precisely accurate, or even generally accurate, a decade out.

In addition to keeping nonbudgetary provisions out of reconciliation bills, the Byrd Rule also prohibits reconciliation bills from carrying any fiscal provision that has costs past the expiration of the budget window—which is why the Bush tax cuts expired after 10 years, forcing the "fiscal cliff" crises. Ten years is a long time by political standards, so fiscal policies with a 10-year sunset may feel permanent, but they aren't, and Congress has a bad track record with the extension of such temporary, yet long-term, policies.

The reconciliation process showed its limits earlier this year. Nine months ago, the new Congress convened and, within its first 10 days, passed the first budget blueprint for the ongoing fiscal year 2017—done solely so that reconciliation could be used to repeal the Affordable Care Act later that year. Again, policy came before numbers: The reconciliation directives only said that the repeal bill should decrease the deficit by "at least" $1 billion over 10 years. Various incarnations of the reconciliation bill were scored as reducing deficits between $119 billion and $473 billion over 10 years, but none of them was able to get even 50 votes in the Senate. Meanwhile, the 2018 budget blueprint was kept on hold until after September 30, so as not to pre-empt the 2017 reconciliation bill.

Reconciliation initially represented a pragmatic approach to governance. Over time, its original use has been shoehorned as legislators seek to use its expedited processes to enact almost any kind legislation that affects spending or taxes—regardless of whether reconciliation is a suitable or responsible fit.

It was meant to allow a majority of Congress to work its will—if both chambers could come together, the thinking went, and declare appropriate levels of taxes and spending, the tool of reconciliation could be used to overcome legislative inertia and special interests and write a law to get to those numbers. But now, reconciliation is too often used to push controversial policies through the Senate without regard to its effect on spending and tax receipts.

Instead of the majority using reconciliation to rewrite policies that will fit within certain financial boundaries, it's now used to implement policy changes in search of a majority—with the numbers falling where they may.

To view online click here.

Back

Deficit hawks trampled in GOP tax cut stampede Back

By Rachael Bade and Burgess Everett | 10/16/2017 05:07 AM EDT

Republicans' unified control of Washington is triggering an identity crisis within the party over what it means to be a fiscal conservative in the age of Donald Trump: Do deficits even matter, or do tax cuts trump all?

If the White House and GOP lawmakers can't come to terms on the matter soon, it could very well doom Trump's cherished tax reform initiative.

Conservatives have long railed against the nation's now-$20 trillion debt. But now that they're desperate to pass a tax bill, many Republicans' repulsion to red ink is fading fast. Yet some deficit hard-liners are holding the line, insisting that tax cuts be paid for, either by axing deductions or with stiff spending cuts.

The debate is causing some hard feelings within the GOP.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) recently questioned the deficit cred of one of the House's proudest fiscal hawks before he left to become Trump's budget chief, Mick Mulvaney. In his new gig, Mulvaney is now insisting it's okay to increase the deficit with tax cuts, because an expanding economy will eventually pay the bill.

"Our OMB guy, I say this with humor, what happened to him?" Corker said in an interview. "Do you understand what I'm saying? He used to be the fiscal hawk."

Mulvaney responded in kind during an interview last week, accusing Corker of "ignoring reality."

"Macroeconomic changes will always lead to change in the larger economy, okay?" he said. "You raise a tax, it has impact. You lower tax, it has impact. It just does."

The debate highlights conflicting schools of thought over tax cuts in the party of Reagan, which could have dire consequences, particularly in the narrowly divided Senate.

Republicans say they want less debt but at the same time love a good tax cut — and are desperate to finally notch a major legislative achievement. Most Republicans are coming down on the side of tax cuts, preaching supply-side theories that tax cuts need not be paid for because they will grow the economy and eventually pay for themselves.

"In order to make good on our campaign tax promise, there probably are going to be some sacrifices made from an ideological perspective," said senior House Budget Committee member Steve Womack (R-Ark.), a longtime deficit hawk.

"I believe that the biggest remedy for our fiscal situation is growth in the economy," he added. "I am not averse to some deficit spending in order to create long-term sustained growth."

Most economists say it's unlikely that a multi-trillion-dollar tax package will pay for itself with sustained, long-term growth. That however hasn't stopped Republicans from predicting that cutting taxes will increase the GDP by a full percentage point for several years and wash away deficit concerns with new revenue.

The crux of the debate centers on "static" scores from budget-crunchers that do not account for new growth, and "dynamic" scores that predict new revenues will be produced by tax cuts.

In today's GOP, "dynamic" is in and "static" is out.

"The scoring mechanism, again, is crazy," said Sen Ron Johnson (R-Wis.). "Just agree we're going to lose money on a static scoring basis. I'm happy to live with a $2-3 trillion static loss."

Corker has been the loudest critic of this thinking, warning about a "party-like" atmosphere in the GOP, especially now that Barack Obama is out of the White House. But he's being joined by others: Sen. Todd Young (R-Ind.) told the Indiana Business Journal that "we can't assume unreasonable rates of economic growth or we're being fiscally irresponsible."

Corker's group, however, appears to be small party. While Republicans earlier this year set out to rewrite the tax code without blowing a hole in the national budget, most Hill Republicans, from GOP leaders to conservatives have started to side with Mulvaney, acknowledging that they'll grow the deficit for a time with the tax package.

"I believe Corker is going to get to the place where I am: If you do the models and look at this right, it pays for itself," said Sen. David Perdue (R-Ga.).

"I think Sen. Corker will do great in the private sector as he learns a little bit more about economics," quipped House conservative Scott Perry (R-Pa.) when asked about Corker's resistance to dynamic scoring — though Corker became wealthy as a real estate developer before he became a politician.

Freedom Caucus leader Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) argued that revenue-neutral tax reform — which ensures tax cuts are paid for by reducing tax loopholes elsewhere — is "just moving money around" and "doesn't do anything for the economy."

Meadows also predicted Republicans will never have the nerve to cut spending, so they have to pass steep tax cuts to spur growth: "What you have to do is you have to mitigate the damage by being as aggressive as you can be on tax rates, which would lessen the damage of our lack of fiscal responsibility over time."

People like Corker, however, say the idea that tax cuts will automatically pay for themselves is irresponsible — particularly because many economists have thrown cold water on that very notion. He's willing to accept some assumptions of economic growth because of tax reform, but says if in his "heart" he feels those assumptions are unrealistic, he'll vote "no."

"I'm now nervous about where this goes. I hope that in the end if it's a big deficit creator, then our caucus will not support it," Corker said.

In theory, dozens of Republicans in Congress agree with Corker. In separate interviews, pragmatists Reps. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), Adrian Smith (R-Neb.) and Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) all said they'd prefer to do revenue-neutral tax reform.

Cole said counting on supply-side growth without any pay-fors is "a little rosy" and Smith said paying for tax cuts would be best "because I think that's how we get the longest policy possible." (If provisions in the bill grow the deficit after a decade, they would likely expire under Senate budget rules.)

All three, however, signaled their willingness to vote for a tax package that adds to the deficit if the choice was that or nothing.

"I prefer it to be revenue-neutral, but I also understand the complexity of it," Dent said. Still, he seemed a little uncomfortable relying on dynamic scoring: "I don't want to be overly optimistic about how much growth will be generated."

There's also a third, smaller group of Republicans who are pushing for tax cuts to be paid for by spending cuts. The Senate's budget calls for trillions in spending reductions, but there is no enforcement mechanism for it.

The loudest member of that group is Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), who Republicans are worried will vote against whatever tax bill they produce.

"I'm a huge deficit hawk. My opinion has always been that you pay for a tax cut with spending cuts," Paul fumed. "And everybody else up here thinks you should pay for a tax cut by increasing somebody else's taxes."

Many conservatives, including Mulvaney, applaud the Paul idea but don't think it's realistic given the reluctance of Republicans to go to the mat on fiscal issues these days. They've raised the debt ceiling without cuts and spent billions on disaster aid without paying for it.

That's why it's important to cut taxes, Mulvaney argued, because growing the economy is the best shot they have.

"They simply do not have the political will on the Hill to solve this through the spending side of the equation," he said. "So we have to move to the revenue side."

To view online click here.

Back

Poll: Majority think GOP tax plan will benefit the wealthy Back

By Brent D. Griffiths | 10/15/2017 10:10 AM EDT

A majority of Americans say that Republican plans for changing the tax code will favor the wealthy.

According to a new CBS News Nation Tracker poll, 58 percent of Americans think the current proposals would favor the wealthy, 19 percent think reform would treat everyone equally, and 18 percent think the GOP plan would favor the middle class. Those feelings run counter to attempts by President Donald Trump and congressional leadership to frame the debate as being all about financial relief for the middle class.

The president has tried to court Democrats during the administration's rollout of the tax plan, reportedly hoping that even a couple of Democratic votes could make up for opposition from members of his own party to elements of the plan.

Among the president's supporters in the CBS poll, nine in 10 either like or are willing to accept the idea of the president making deals with Democrats, in principle. On the other side, a majority of the president's opponents like or would accept Democrats cutting deals with him, with many saying "deal-making is how Washington should work."

Trump has billed his effort as a Christmas gift for the middle class, but as POLITICO previously reported, the current situation with the tax code makes it hard for him to keep his promise that the wealthy would not benefit from reform.

Respondents were also asked about Trump's relationship with congressional Republicans, a topic that has received considerable attention since Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) said Trump was risking World War III and that his staff was essentially forced to become an adult day care service.

Among Republicans, 39 percent feel their party's congressional members "don't like" Trump and are actively trying to undermine him, while 37 percent say Republicans on Capitol Hill don't like the commander in chief but pretend to have an affinity for him so they can get their agenda passed.

Overall, 56 percent of respondents said that congressional Republicans do not like the president, but pretend to get along with him, 29 percent say Republicans do not like him and undermine his agenda and 15 percent say Republicans in Congress like the president and want to help him.

The CBS News poll was conducted by YouGov using a nationally representative sample of 2,371 U.S. adults reached from Oct. 11 through Oct. 13. The margin of error is plus or minus 2.5 percent.

To view online click here.

Back

Congress' uncertain path on Obamacare subsidy fix Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn and Adam Cancryn | 10/13/2017 04:21 PM EDT

Congressional Republicans were caught off guard by the Trump administration's decision Thursday to pull $7 billion in Obamacare funding next week, leaving them scrambling over whether or how to replace the critical subsidy funds.

President Donald Trump had been threatening for months to cut off the funds, which insurers use to help low-income people pay their deductibles and co-pays, but Congress had scant warning when he finally stopped them, effective immediately, less than three weeks before the Nov. 1 start of the next open enrollment season.

A bipartisan attempt by Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) to stabilize Obamacare, which would fund the subsidies for up to two years, has already encountered skepticism from GOP conservatives and growing opposition from the White House. The two lawmakers plan to keep talking — but it's a tough road.

"Under no circumstance should Congress attempt to expand Obamacare by cutting a check for President Obama's bailout of insurance companies," Rep. Mark Walker (R-N.C.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, tweeted late Thursday.

In the short term, a bill to restore the funding faces huge political hurdles on Capitol Hill, where the White House's decision has reignited the partisan warfare over the GOP's failed Obamacare repeal efforts. Democrats are already eyeing a year-end spending bill or a supplemental disaster bill as possible places to tuck in the Obamacare funding.

But without the money for the cost-sharing subsidies, which reduce the out-of-pocket health care costs for low-income people, the Obamacare markets are likely to grow more unstable over the next year, with big questions about viability in 2019.

The sudden decision to end the payments — which is likely to be thrown into the courts — presents a risky political calculation for both parties before the 2018 mid-term elections.

If Republicans negotiate with Democrats, it means taking partial ownership of a health law that is toxic to their base. If they walk away, it may not be so easy for Republicans to keep blaming Democrats for higher premiums with the GOP in control of Washington. Similarly, Democrats have to decide whether it's better to make changes to Obamacare, or to blame rising premiums on a Republican party hell-bent on taking insurance away from people as they head into the fall campaign.

Several polls have shown that while the Trump base still clamors for Obamacare repeal, much of the country wants both parties to stabilize the health law. A poll by the Kaiser Family Foundation released Friday found that 7 in 10 Americans want the Trump administration to make the health law work, not make it fail.

While they don't have a final agreement yet, Alexander and Murray have a general framework they hope will result in a deal: Republicans would support up to two years of cost-sharing payments in exchange for giving the states flexibility to get around Obamacare's requirements. But the negotiations had stalled over how to define that flexibility in a way that both parties could accept. Alexander and Murray plan to keep working when the Senate returns from a recess next week.

They have support from many governors, including some Republicans who would prefer to see a stable insurance market rather than an imploding one.

"I continue to be optimistic about our negotiations and believe we can reach a deal quickly — and I urge Republican leaders in Congress to do the right thing for families this time by supporting our work," Murray said Friday.

Before the funding was pulled, Senate Republicans were increasingly pessimistic that Murray and Alexander could reach a deal that a broad number of Republican senators could support. And they were even more skeptical that any plan they pass could get through the more conservative House, where the GOP lawmakers are still smarting from seeing their Obamacare repeal bill die in the upper chamber.

Privately, many Republicans hoped the White House would continue making the payments so that the GOP didn't have to deal with the problem. In fact, within a day of the announcement, notably few Republicans had made public statements to weigh in one way or another on the White House's decision.

Trump has often mused about throwing the Obamacare markets into chaos to force Democrats to the negotiating table. He spent months toying with pulling the subsidy funding before making the call Thursday night — just hours after signing an separate executive order paving the way for health plans that are exempt from Obamacare rules. Policy experts warn those "skinny plans" appealing to younger and healthier people could do widespread damage to the individual market on its own.

"Massive subsidy payments to their pet insurance companies has stopped," Trump tweeted afterward. "Dems should call me to fix!"

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer quickly ruled out any thought that Democrats might be pressured to give ground on health care, repeatedly telling reporters that it's up to Republicans to find a way to fund the subsidies or risk owning whatever chaos hits the markets.

"Republicans in the House and Senate now own the health care system in this country from top to bottom," he said. "Threats and bullying is not going to work. In this, politically, [Trump]'s in worse shape than we are."

With polls showing that Americans largely hold Republicans responsible for the fate of the health care system, there's little incentive to give in to any demands that would make major structural changes to Obamacare.

"Our Republican colleagues understand that they have an obligation to solve this problem," Schumer said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi urged a quick repair. Funding could be restored in a "stand-alone [bill], a vehicle that's attached to a supplemental, or down the road in the omnibus, but that's pretty far down the road; hopefully we could resolve it sooner," she said.

Republicans also have to decide whether they want to step between the increasingly hostile relationship between the White House and insurance companies. The combination of the White House decision to cut the cost-sharing payments as well as the new executive order to allow insurance companies to sell less regulated plans has the potential to further destabilize shaky markets.

"They're sending a signal as strong as they can to the insurance industry: I double dog dare you to participate" in the Obamacare markets, said Rodney Whitlock, a vice president at ML Strategies and a former GOP aide on Capitol Hill.

It was House Republicans who first objected in 2014 to the Obama administration using its executive authority to fund the subsidies — a legal challenge that they ultimately won in a district court. But when Trump won the presidency, it put the GOP in a difficult spot between pushing to end the subsidies at the risk of owning any resulting damage, or quietly reversing their stance in court.

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) said Trump's decision reaffirmed that only Congress can appropriate money.

"As Obamacare's failures continue to hurt families across the country, Congress is continuing to look for ways to provide certainty and lower premium costs for the millions of Americans still trapped in Obamacare's collapsing marketplaces," he said.

Conservative Republicans on Friday said the decision to stop the payments is an opportunity to renew the repeal debate — calling on the GOP not to accept anything less than a total replacement of Obamacare.

"We need the focus to be on repealing and replacing Obamacare," a spokesman for Walker said. "What we don't want is for the Senate to pass a bill that simply props up the failing system."

Heather Caygle contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Kelly tries to get empty administration jobs filled fast Back

By Nancy Cook | 10/15/2017 05:42 PM EDT

White House chief of staff John Kelly is giving Cabinet secretaries more autonomy to pick top political appointees, reversing efforts under his predecessor Reince Priebus to run most appointments through the West Wing.

Kelly's goal, according to 10 interviews with White House officials and advisers close to the administration, is to do a better job of finding candidates for the hundreds of jobs throughout the administration that remain vacant almost nine months into President Donald Trump's first term.

"Being somebody from the Department of Defense, normally you've got key people in place and a clear chain of command," said Leon Panetta, a former White House chief of staff himself and former Secretary of Defense, who spoke to Kelly around the time he accepted the White House job. "It's very difficult to run anything if you don't have people responsible in those positions."

Kelly entered the White House with an unusually clear understanding of the flaws of the personnel process, according to two people close to him.

As a Cabinet pick and then as Department of Homeland Security secretary, Kelly was frequently exasperated during the transition and early days of the administration over his inability to choose his own staff. He got into frequent spats with the White House over filling a handful of top jobs in his department, according to one of the people close to him.

Other Cabinet secretaries, including Defense Secretary James Mattis and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, have had their own problems with the White House personnel office, with Mattis trying to circumvent it and hire his own staff.

"Look, everyone in the White House is upset. It's both a problem of getting candidates through the bureaucracy and through the Senate. Of course Kelly is upset," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, an informal adviser to Trump whose wife, Callista, has been nominated as Trump's Vatican ambassador. "The whole system is totally screwed up."

Part of the problem stems from the Trump administration's criteria for hiring staffers and top political appointees. Potential candidates must be loyal to the administration and not have spoken harshly about the president during the campaign.

That has created a particular problem when it comes to filling national security jobs, because scores of Republican experts, many of whom served in the George W. Bush administration, signed a letter criticizing the future president before the election.

Many experienced Republicans who ordinarily would have vied for middle- and top-level posts under a Republican president also decided to sit out the Trump administration in January, starving the president of choices when it came to picking appointees.

The president himself seems willing to tolerate vacancies indefinitely.

"I'm generally not going to make a lot of the appointments that would normally be - because you don't need them," Trump told Forbes in an interview which posted last week. "I mean, you look at some of these agencies, how massive they are, and it's totally unnecessary. They have hundreds of thousands of people."

The White House press office did not respond to requests for comment.

Filling vacant jobs has taken on particular urgency in recent weeks, as the White House contends with thorny policy questions such as North Korea's growing nuclear might and the fate of the Iran deal. The administration is also trying to re-negotiate the NAFTA trade agreement and roll back parts of Obamacare through regulations and executive orders.

At the State Department, more than 78 jobs do not have a nominee out of 149 key positions, and 32 countries still don't have ambassadors in place, according to data kept by the non-partisan Partnership for Public Service.

The Treasury Department has 15 key slots open out of 28 significant Senate confirmed positions as the White House dives into selling tax reform.

Just last week, Treasury announced it would not fill its No. 2 deputy secretary slot after a second candidate dropped out of the running for it.

Kelly's own former job remains open two and a half months after he moved to the White House, with Trump nominating Kelly's No. 2 Kirstjen Nielsen this week after other potential nominees were passed over.

The Department of Health and Human Services, the agency responsible for overseeing the Affordable Care Act, lacks a Cabinet secretary after former Rep. Tom Price resigned after spending hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars to charter private jets for government trips.

So far, the Senate has confirmed roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government, according to the Partnership for Public Service.

The presidential personnel office also got off to a rocky start. Its director Johnny DeStefano, who started right after the inauguration, had to find candidates for hundreds of key Senate-confirmed jobs without an existing pool of applicants after the administration discarded lists compiled by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who was fired as transition head days after the election in November.

DeStefano also entered the job with no formal experience in executive recruiting or hiring. Previously, he worked for House Speaker John Boehner and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

At the White House, both Priebus and Steve Bannon, the former White House chief strategist, were seen as his high-level protectors. Their departures this summer have left DeStefano adrift inside Kelly's new power structure, according to two people close to the administration.

Kelly recently asked DeStefano to oversee the Office of Public Liaison, whose head George Sifakis left in August following Priebus' ouster.

DeStefano, who also retains his title as head of the personnel office, did not respond to requests for comment.

Outside conservative activists and groups are no longer blaming Senate Democrats for holding up confirmations.

Last week, over 100 conservatives released a letter to remind both the administration and Capitol Hill that "personnel is policy."

The letter demands that Senate leadership schedule committee and floor action every Thursday and Friday and to work full weeks until Trump's nominees get confirmed. Among the signatories are Edwin Meese, former Attorney General under Ronald Reagan; Becky Norton Dunlop, a former Reagan adviser who worked on the Trump transition; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, and Adam Brandon, President of FreedomWorks.

Republicans say that the slow pace of appointments impedes Trump's agenda. It ends up leaving much of the agency-level, or diplomatic work to government careerists who aren't necessarily supportive of the Trump agenda.

"The career people know how to keep the government going and respond to citizens, but if there is any desire to change what the government is doing, that is most effectively done if it is being led by a political appointee," said Clay Johnson, who oversaw presidential personnel under Bush. "So without the hundreds of political appointees at each of the key agencies, the administration of government will continue, but it will be hard for the Trump administration to change or eliminate something, or create something new."

To view online click here.

Back

Efforts to pry loose Trump tax returns hit a wall Back

By David Siders | 10/16/2017 01:08 PM EDT

LOS ANGELES — Efforts to pry loose President Donald Trump's tax returns at the state level have hit a wall, stalling in statehouses across the country including in California, a hotbed of anti-Trump resistance.

Democratic Gov. Jerry Brown vetoed legislation late Sunday that would have forced presidential candidates to make their tax returns public before appearing on the California ballot, marking the death there of a measure once ballyhooed by Democrats and open government advocates as an end-run to Trump's refusal to disclose his tax filings.

Democrats have seen similar proposals stall in more than 20 states since Trump's election. But Brown's veto here — in a deeply liberal state where Democrats control every statewide office and both houses of the Legislature — marked a new low for the offensive.

Breaking with lawmakers of his own party, Brown said in a veto message that despite "the political attractiveness — even the merits — of getting President Trump's tax returns, I worry about the political perils of individual states seeking to regulate presidential elections in this manner.

"First, it may not be constitutional," he wrote. "Second, it sets a 'slippery slope' precedent. Today we require tax returns, but what would be next? Five years of health records? A certified birth certificate? High school report cards? And will these requirements vary depending on which political party is in power?"

The veto was not unexpected, and lawmakers from Hawaii to New Hampshire and Massachusetts were preparing to redouble their efforts later this year or in 2018. But despite a barrage of proposals at the federal and state level, Trump's tax returns remain out of view.

"I would think that Californians, like New Yorkers ... want to honor the 40-year tradition of presidential candidates releasing their tax returns," said New York state Sen. Brad Hoylman, whose own measure stalled in Trump's home state.

"We have a Republican-controlled state Senate, which has been the stumbling block in my chamber for passage," he said.

In other states, some Democrats have raised concerns similar to Brown's, both about the constitutionality of the measure and about the potential to create a "slippery slope" of requirements for presidential contenders.

Hoylman said he had encouraged former Harvard Law School classmate Scott Wiener, a California state senator, to move forward with legislation in California, hoping for a "watershed moment" in the nation's most populous state. But with Brown's veto appearing increasingly likely last week, Hoylman called the anticipated outcome "really disappointing."

Democrats have been gunning for Trump's tax returns since the 2016 election, when Trump became the first president in decades not to disclose his tax returns. And with Republicans blocking efforts to force their disclosure at the federal level, many Democrats turned to the states.

By March, lawmakers in 23 states had introduced measures to force presidential candidates to release their recent tax filings, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. But some Democrats questioned the legality of compelling disclosure, and in Republican-controlled statehouses, the measure was doomed.

Vetoing a tax disclosure bill in New Jersey in May, Republican Gov. Chris Christie, a supporter of Trump, called the measure unconstitutional and a "transparent political stunt."

In California, tax-disclosure advocates found a governor highly critical of Trump. But Brown, a fourth-term Democrat, has also rejected similar disclosures of his own: In a break with long-standing tradition of gubernatorial candidates in California, Brown did not release his own tax returns in 2010 or in his reelection campaign in 2014.

In a veto message released just before midnight on California's bill-signing deadline, Brown said he hesitated "to start down a road that well might lead to an ever escalating set of differing state requirements for presidential candidates."

The bill Brown vetoed would have required, as a condition for appearing on the primary ballot, that presidential candidates file copies of their five most recent tax returns with state officials. The state, in turn, would make them public.

The legality of states requiring presidential candidates to release their tax returns has long been in doubt. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that states cannot add to the qualifications for U.S. Senate or House members, and California's own legislative counsel had released an opinion casting doubt on the constitutionality of the presidential disclosure bill.

But some legal experts had been more encouraging of the legislation, including former ethics lawyers for President Barack Obama and George W. Bush. Richard Hasen, an election law expert at University of California, Irvine, said in an email that Brown's veto would amount to a "setback" for the state-level effort.

But he said, "I doubt it would stop other states with heavy Democratic majorities from trying. If any succeed, no doubt the matter will end up in the courts."

But state-level Democrats first have to get a bill enacted. Hawaii state Rep. Chris Lee, who introduced a tax-disclosure bill in Hawaii, said that with three years until the next presidential election, "I don't think anybody's trying to rush anything." And Massachusetts state Sen. Mike Barrett, who is carrying a tax-disclosure bill in his state, said a veto from Brown "doesn't mean that Jerry Brown is the U.S. Supreme Court. It doesn't mean that he substitutes for seven justices who do this full time."

"It is true that in the short term, nothing seems to be happening on presidential tax return disclosure," Barrett said. "But it wouldn't take much for the mid-term trend to look extremely promising."

In addition to efforts by Democrats in the nation's statehouses, plaintiffs in a handful of lawsuits across the country have said they will seek to obtain Trump's filings, including in several cases targeting Trump's foreign business ties and a case in which protesters claim Trump incited violence against them at a campaign rally.

But the prospects of obtaining Trump's tax records in court are as murky as they are in state legislatures. Greg Belzley, an attorney for protesters seeking Trump's tax records in a Kentucky case, said, "Hell, man. If I had the slightest idea of where things were going in this country, or what's going on, I'd be a millionaire."

Democratic lawmakers have argued that reviewing Trump's taxes has become more significant amid ongoing questions about Trump's ties to Russia and as Trump and Republicans strive to make changes to the tax code — a position that appears to carry weight with the American public. According to recent Morning Consult/POLITICO poll, a plurality of American voters — 49 percent — say Trump should release his tax returns before any tax return proposal moves forward.

Trump has said he would not release his returns because they were being audited by the IRS, though the IRS has said there is no regulation prohibiting someone from making their returns public while under audit.

Yet absent legislation to force Trump's hand, it could be years — if ever — before his filings are disclosed.

"The only ones who care about my tax returns are the reporters," Trump said at a January press conference.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Anticipating Senate trouble, fiscal hawks demand more savings — House Republicans eye reconciliation for Dodd-Frank dismantling — Defense spending markup moved up
Date: Wednesday, June 28, 2017 4:50:36 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 06/28/2017 04:47 PM EDT

WHY MEADOWS IS TALKING BUDGET CAPS: In an unlikely twist, an obscure budget rule has compelled one of the most conservative of congressmen to beg for a budget deal with Senate Democrats.

House Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows says he got word this month of a Senate rule that would effectively kill the current House budget resolution on the floor of the upper chamber. Wotks can dig that up in section 312(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974. Because the House's proposed defense spending would violate the current budget caps, Senate Republicans would be forced to either write a budget adhering to the caps or strike a deal with Democrats to allow for more spending across the board. And so, trying to keep the long game in mind, Meadows says he has asked House Speaker Paul Ryan to start negotiating with minority party leaders in the upper chamber.

The strategy: Seeing the writing on the wall, the Freedom Caucus has come to terms with the fact that Senate Republicans will probably need to deal with Democrats — likely leading to more domestic spending — to pass a joint budget agreement and therefore unlock filibuster-proof tax reform. Meadows' suggestion to Ryan: Try for a swifter deal with the Senate, as well as more mandatory cuts. "We're looking at higher offsets because we believe the non-defense discretionary is going to be higher than $511 [billion]," Meadows told reporters today. "That's what makes the negotiations on our side even harder — we're trying to anticipate what we believe may happen on the Senate side."

Sidestepping: House GOP leaders, however, argue there's a way around that Senate rule, and it all comes down to three letters — OCO. The strategy was most recently tested in 2015, when Senate Republicans passed a budget that proposed to raise defense spending above the caps by shifting all extra money into war spending (aka overseas contingency operations), rather than counting it in the base budget. "This OCO approach is fully compliant with the BCA," a Senate Budget Committee official explained at the time. Procedurally, GOP aides say it could work again this year. But whether it can work politically is another story.

GOOD WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — In a letter to appropriators, Grantmakers in the Arts makes the case for steady or increased funding for agencies like the National Endowment for the Arts. More from Morning Education.

#DailyBudgetFact — A new survey shows general fund revenues for fiscal 2017 are coming in below forecasts in 33 states, Governing reports.

BUDGET

OUR FIRST CLUE! Now here's a committee that's plenty excited for reconciliation instructions. House Financial Services is planning to reverse two big parts of Dodd-Frank to fulfill its cost-cutting requirement under this year's budget reconciliation package. Rep. Patrick McHenry, the panel's vice chairman, said Tuesday night that he wants to target the federal government's authority to wind down failing financial institutions and seek to bring the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau's funding under congressional control, Colin Wilhelm reports. Those two provisions were the biggest cost-savers in the Financial CHOICE Act that passed the House earlier this month. The entire bill was expected to save $33.6 billion over 10 years, according to CBO.

SASSING BACK AT HERITAGE: The House Agriculture Committee hit back this afternoon against criticism from Heritage Action, saying it is "absurd" for the group to suggest Chairman Mike Conaway is impeding the House's budget agreement by refusing agriculture spending cuts, Helena Bottemiller Evich and Catherine Boudreau report. In a written statement, the panel said Conaway's farm bill advocacy "may not fit with Heritage Action's long-running campaign against America's farmers and ranchers, but it certainly isn't the reason we still don't have a budget." The committee said the chairman has — "from the beginning" — assured House Budget Chairwoman Diane Black and leadership "that we will be part of the solution."

Exhibit A: The Heritage Action statement that prompted the committee's ire said, "Conaway's apparent unwillingness to cut a paltry amount of federal spending from his committee is a slap in the face to American taxpayers and jeopardizes historic tax reform," Helena reports.

BATTLING BAT: While Freedom Caucus members aren't making specific tax reform demands in budget talks, Meadows says his group wants an understanding in principle on border adjustment's fate, Aaron Lorenzo reports. Members of the conservative caucus don't think the potential BAT revenue can be counted on and are in agreement that House GOP leaders should scuttle it because of insufficient support among Republicans.

DEFENSE

DON'T MISS THE MARKUP: House appropriators have moved up their defense markup to Thursday morning after leaders announced today that the chamber won't be voting on Friday. That means the committee's report on fiscal 2018 defense spending is now out for public consumption.

SAVING THE SPACE LAUNCH SYSTEM: Jacqueline Klimas got ahold of an Air Force memo this week that says the service "strongly objects" to an NDAA provision that would prevent the department from investing in the development of a new space launch system. And Jacqueline reports that Rep. Mike Coffman has drafted an amendment to nix that prohibition.

ENERGY

SUBCOMMITTEE SIGNOFF: House appropriators approved the energy and water spending bill out of subcommittee this morning, agreeing to nearly $38 billion for fiscal 2018. As Esther Whieldon reports, the measure comes in $209 million under current spending levels and nearly $4 billion above the president's request. There's no full committee markup on the calendar yet.

BORDER WALL

PROTOTYPE PROSPECTS: The federal government could begin construction of border wall prototypes by the end of the summer, but an exact timeline remains unclear, Ted Hesson reports. The agency is currently in the second phase of a process to solicit designs for the wall prototypes, but no contracts have been awarded, Ron Vitiello, acting deputy commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, told reporters on Tuesday.

AGRICULTURE

RIDE-A-LONGS: House appropriators approved the first agriculture spending bill of the Trump era out of subcommittee today, and it has plenty of goodies for GOP lawmakers. So many, in fact, that Catherine Boudreau made a handy list of everything from bringing back low-fat chocolate milk in schools to requiring that U.S. iron and steel be used in rural construction projects.

READY TO SNAP UP SNAP CUSTOMERS: Amazon.com has been in the news for all sorts of reasons this week, but not for its quiet play into the (currently nonexistent) online food stamps market. As Morning Ag reports, the e-commerce company is one of several online retailers enrolled in a pilot program that lets some Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program customers use their benefits online. Even more under the radar? Amazon recently rolled out rolled out a 45 percent discount on its Prime memberships for anyone with an EBT card. Those customers can't use their benefits online — yet.

TAX

IRS FEELS THE PAIN: IRS funding cuts hampered taxpayer assistance this year, according to a watchdog report released today. Aaron Lorenzo explains that taxpayers who called the IRS for help filing their returns generally fared better than those who needed other types of assistance. For example, it was more difficult for delinquent taxpayers who couldn't cover their bills right away to connect with the IRS to establish payment plans, according to Taxpayer Advocate's report to Congress.

APPOINTING LIEUTENANTS: Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch has drafted his tax reform team, Brian Faler reports. The roster: Sens. Rob Portman and Mike Enzi will focus on rewriting the international tax code. Sen. Chuck Grassley will look at the individual code. Sens. Bill Cassidy and Dean Heller will examine energy tax provisions. And Sen. Pat Roberts will work on agriculture tax issues.

OBAMACARE

WHAT NEXT? After calling off the first Obamacare repeal vote, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell says he's now hoping to strike a new deal by Friday or Saturday, with plans to have CBO analyze that proposal and to hold a vote soon after the July Fourth recess, Burgess Everett, Jennifer Haberkorn and Josh Dawsey report.

Bullying Keith Hall: Folks who were in attendance at the GOP meeting Tuesday say Republican senators quickly laid into CBO Director Keith Hall, in a seemingly genuine effort to discredit the nonpartisan referee so it doesn't derail the GOP's final health care bill. Sen. Tom Cotton asked Hall, who was hand-picked by Republicans in 2015, how the director could project millions more would be covered by Medicaid expansion in future years, wondering aloud whether the CBO could predict what was essentially a political decision left to individual states and their governors.

To feed your insatiable Obamacare appetite: 'At least very close' | 5 changes that could help Schumer's strategy | No love for Medicaid | It 'will be great, if we get it done' | Backing off Heller | Defending Medicaid | Voter opposition | 'We will not relent' | Why it just might happen

POLITICAL STRATEGY

CRAMPING THEIR STYLE: Senate Republicans are increasingly frustrated with White House actions that undermine their legislative efforts and jeopardize their chances at reelection, Alex Isenstadt and Josh Dawsey report.

EARMARKS

- How America's aircraft carriers could become obsolete. Bloomberg.
- Trump's border wall faces contracting delays, a limited budget and a September deadline. Washington Post.
- Brazil suspends passport issuance due to budget crunch. Reuters.
- House Republicans want to cut funding for administration's telecom arm. POLITICO Pro.
- Texas Medicaid cuts leave special needs kids without therapy. The Associated Press.
- NATO allies increase military spending. The Wall Street Journal.
- Opinion: Trumpcare could bring back an epidemic of abuse. The New York Times.
- Business associations to Congress: Hurry up on tax reform. POLITICO Pro.

ON TAP THURSDAY

10 a.m. — The House Ways and Means Subcommittee on Social Security, as well as the panel's Oversight Subcommittee, hold a joint hearing on challenges of Social Security coverage and payroll tax compliance for state and local governments. 1100 Longworth House Office Building.

10 a.m. — The Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Commerce, Justice and Science holds a hearing on NASA's budget. 192 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

10:15 a.m. — The Senate Appropriations Legislative Branch Subcommittee holds a hearing on the fiscal 2018 budget request for the Senate Sergeant at Arms and U.S. Capitol Police. 124 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

10:30 a.m. — The House Appropriations Committee marks up its fiscal 2018 Legislative Branch and Defense spending bills. 2359 Rayburn House Office Building.

2 p.m. — The House Appropriations Committee marks up the fiscal 2018 Commerce, Justice and Science spending bill. H-140, The Capitol.

3 p.m. — The House Appropriations Financial Services and General Government Subcommittee marks up its fiscal 2018 spending bill. 2358-A Rayburn House Office Building.

WE'RE COUNTING: 94 days until federal funding runs out, the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal and the National Flood Insurance Program expires. 459 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018). [Who knows how many] days until the nation will default if the debt limit isn't raised.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/06/anticipating-senate-trouble-fiscal-hawks-demand-more-savings-023536>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

House Republicans will seek to kill key Dodd-Frank provisions through reconciliation

Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 06/27/2017 06:41 PM EDT

The House Financial Services Committee will seek to strike down key provisions of the Dodd-Frank financial regulation law through the budgetary maneuver of reconciliation, the panel's vice chairman said.

Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) told POLITICO that the committee would target the government's authority to wind down failing financial institutions and seek to bring the CFPB's funding under the control of Congress.

Both moves are contained in the Financial CHOICE Act, the Dodd-Frank repeal bill sponsored by Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) that passed the House earlier this month.

A spokesperson for Hensarling did not immediately comment.

The House Budget Committee is weighing mandatory spending cuts to be included in the budget's instructions. If Republicans pass a budget with those instructions, and it's adopted by the Senate, it would mandate that each House committee find a certain amount of savings within its own jurisdiction.

Because reconciliation is a cost-saving measure, only items that would ensure that the budget is revenue-neutral or decrease the deficit can be added. Reconciliation allows legislation to bypass a potential filibuster in the Senate, where Democrats would otherwise be able to block the changes to the law.

Shortly before the CHOICE Act passed the House, the CBO estimated the legislation would save $33.6 billion over 10 years, mostly due to the elimination of the two targeted Dodd-Frank provisions.

The Republicans are zeroing in on Orderly Liquidation Authority, which grants the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and other agencies the power to wind down a financial institution and liquidate its assets if it fails, avoiding the bankruptcy process.

They're also seeking to place the CFPB in the normal appropriations process. The consumer watchdog is currently funded through the Fed, a point of contention with conservatives, who say that makes the bureau unaccountable to Congress.

Also being considered is repeal of part or all of the Volcker rule, which prohibits banks from trading on their own account or investing in certain funds, according to a House Republican aide.

"Whatever [Senate Banking Chair [Mike\] Crapo](#) (R-Idaho) doesn't get done in the Senate, we'll take a look at whatever else we can do in reconciliation," said Rep. Blaine Luetkemeyer (R-Mo.), chairman of the House subcommittee with jurisdiction over financial institutions.

Even though a filibuster is not possible under reconciliation, senators opposed to any portion of the budget language can raise points of order with the parliamentarian, who has final say over what can be included under the law.

That limits any changes to whatever will provide savings over time, which would prevent Republicans from pursuing another goal: turning the CFPB into a bipartisan commission rather than its current director-led structure.

Conservatives, including members of the House Freedom Caucus and Republican Study Committee, want budget cuts included in reconciliation instructions to set the table for tax reform.

But they, House Budget Chairwoman Diane Black (R-Tenn.), and the Republican leadership are wrestling with how to find enough cuts to satisfy those demands without losing the votes of moderate lawmakers, which could slow down, or kill, the budget process and tax reform with it.

Budget resolution language was expected to be introduced this week, though that has been postponed for now as Republicans work to find common ground.

To view online click here.

Back

House Ag swats back at Heritage Action on spending cuts Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich and Catherine Boudreau | 06/28/2017 03:24 PM EDT

The House Agriculture Committee on Wednesday dismissed allegations from Heritage Action that Chairman Mike Conaway's objection to agriculture spending cuts is the obstacle holding up the hotly anticipated House budget deal, calling them "absurd."

"With the farm economy in one of the biggest slides since the Great Depression, the chairman has been advocating for a budget that won't exacerbate the conditions of our farmers and ranchers in rural America and that won't impede development of the next farm bill," said Rachel Millard, a spokeswoman for the committee. "That may not fit with Heritage Action's long-running campaign against America's farmers and ranchers, but it certainly isn't the reason we still don't have a budget."

Conaway (R-Texas) has refused to make significant mandatory cuts to farm and nutrition programs as part of a budget agreement that aims to rein in federal spending and pave the way for tax reform.

"Chairman Conaway is committed to passing a budget and moving tax reform forward, and to suggest otherwise is absurd," Millard said. "From the beginning, he has assured [House Budget] Chairwoman [Diane] Black and leadership that we will be part of the solution."

Heritage Action earlier on Wednesday criticized Conaway for pushing back against the cuts, blaming him for being "at the heart of the problem" that's delayed the release of the House budget deal.

Reports last week indicated that there was likely to be $150 billion in mandatory cuts over 10 years, though it's not clear what portion of those would fall to farm bill programs. More recently, House budget leaders have reportedly sought an additional $50 billion in mandatory cuts to appease both defense hawks and the right flank of the party, a move that has incensed some committee chairmen, including Conaway.

Conaway and other farm-state lawmakers have long argued that the Agriculture Committee shouldn't have to come up with big cuts after the 2014 farm bill cost far less than anticipated. At the time, lawmakers said the bill would save taxpayers $23 billion over 10 years, but it has saved closer to $100 billion, largely due to reductions in Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program payments.

House agriculture appropriators said Wednesday they weren't even aware of the outside criticism of Conaway's pushback on mandatory agriculture spending cuts, nor have they heard objections from any of their colleagues on the right about their discretionary spending bill that largely rebukes President Donald Trump's proposed budget cuts.

Asked whether they've been hearing pushback from conservatives, Rep. Robert Aderholt (R-Ala.), chairman of the House agriculture appropriations subcommittee, and Rep. Sanford Bishop (D-Ga.), ranking member of the subcommittee, looked at each other a little puzzled.

"We've not heard anything, have we?" Aderholt asked Bishop as they took questions from reporters after holding a markup of their spending bill Wednesday.

"I've not," Bishop said. "In fact, I've heard sighs of relief from many of the stakeholders in agriculture, who are the American people, because having the highest-quality, safest and most abundant food and fiber anywhere in the world is something that most Americans want. I think that rural America is breathing a sigh of relief."

"They recognize that we do have our eyes on trying to enhance the quality of life for people who live in rural America," Bishop added.

The fiscal 2018 spending bill advanced out of subcommittee in a unanimous voice vote Wednesday.

To view online click here.

Back

Heritage Action criticizes Conaway for blocking ag budget cuts Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 06/28/2017 09:20 AM EDT

Heritage Action is criticizing House Agriculture Chairman Mike Conaway for refusing to make significant cuts to agriculture as part of the forthcoming House budget deal.

In a statement today, the conservative group noted that the House Budget Committee has postponed unveiling its budget resolution and blamed Conaway for being "at the heart of the problem."

"Chairman Conaway's apparent unwillingness to cut a paltry amount of federal spending from his committee is a slap in the face to American taxpayers and jeopardizes historic tax reform," said Dan Holler, vice president of Heritage Action. "The farm bill alone is projected to cost nearly $1 trillion over the next ten years, and work requirements for food stamps for able-bodied adults without dependents alone would yield significant savings."

Conaway, for his part, has argued that the ag committee shouldn't bear the brunt of steep cuts after the 2014 farm bill cost far less than anticipated. At the time lawmakers claimed that the bill would save taxpayers $23 billion over 10 years, but it has saved closer to $100 billion, largely due to reductions in Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program payments.

To view online click here.

Back

Top Freedom Caucus members push border adjustment debate into budget talks Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 06/27/2017 04:49 PM EDT

House Freedom Caucus leaders are demanding some clarity on the fate of the proposed border adjustment tax as part of budget talks.

They don't think the potential revenue it would raise can be counted on, said the conservative faction's chairman, Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.).

Freedom Caucus members have differing opinions on the proposed import tax, which is estimated to raise $1.2 trillion over 10 years for tax reform. But they've reached consensus that House GOP leaders should scuttle it because it lacks sufficient support among Republicans on both sides of the Capitol.

That missing link — broad GOP buy-in — is slowing the overall tax reform effort, Meadows and others have said for weeks, including at a Colorado event over the weekend hosted by the conservative billionaire Koch brothers, who vehemently oppose border adjustability.

Members of the Freedom Caucus aren't making specific tax reform demands within the budget talks, but they want an understanding in principle on border adjustment's fate, Meadows said today.

In short, he wants some directions or guardrails.

"We believe that we need to make some decisions on tax reform as part of the budget process because it has such a far-reaching implication on the budget reconciliation instructions," Meadows said.

Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio), who formerly chaired the Freedom Caucus, said he would like to see tax reform language first. That should be coupled with discretionary program savings in a budget plan, Jordan said.

In addition, Meadows wants to include all committees of jurisdiction in reconciliation instructions, in case the Senate doesn't repeal all the Affordable Care Act taxes, for example.

To view online click here.

Back

Coffman drafts amendment to scuttle space launch vehicle ban Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 06/28/2017 02:28 PM EDT

Rep. Mike Coffman has drafted an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act that would allow the Air Force to invest in development of a new evolved expendable launch vehicle for space.

The amendment, obtained by POLITICO, would remove a portion of the chairman's NDAA mark that prohibits the Air Force from spending any money on development of a new space launch vehicle. An Air Force memo strongly condemned the provision in the bill, which the service said would decrease competition and drive up the cost of launches.

The amendment from the Colorado Republican would allow money to be used for research, development, testing and evaluation of a new launch vehicle.

The Air Force now relies on two companies for its space launch needs: SpaceX and United Launch Alliance, a team of Boeing and Lockheed Martin.

The government is currently investing in development of ULA's new Vulcan launch system, something that would continue under Coffman's amendment. The bill, however, would force ULA to maintain its existing Atlas V and Delta IV launch systems.

The House Armed Services Committee is marking up its version of the fiscal 2018 defense policy bill today.

To view online click here.

Back

House subcommittee advances energy, water spending bill Back

By Esther Whieldon | 06/28/2017 11:41 AM EDT

A House appropriations subcommittee today advanced a $37.56 billion fiscal 2018 energy and water spending bill that would end an Energy Department research program and bar the agency from issuing new loan guarantees.

The Appropriations subcommittee on energy and water advanced the bill with a voice vote without making any amendments. The spending bill for the Department of Energy, Army Corps of Engineers and other agencies cuts $209 million from this year's spending levels, which is still $3.65 billion more than President Donald Trump proposed.

Top democrats on the full Appropriations Committee and subcommittee bemoaned that the bill would cut key programs that promote clean energy and other technologies and end DOE's Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program.

"The bill shortchanges renewable energy, science, by terminating ARPA-E and then doing real violence to the energy efficiency and renewable energy account," said Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio).

WHAT'S NEXT: The bill advances to the full committee, which has not announced when it will take up the measure.

To view online click here.

Back

Border wall prototype construction slated for late summer Back

By Ted Hesson | 06/27/2017 04:40 PM EDT

The federal government could begin construction of border wall prototypes by the end of the summer, but an exact timeline remains unclear, according to Ron Vitiello, acting deputy commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

CBP previously planned to start construction of the prototypes last week in San Diego, but that timeline has been delayed.

President Donald Trump's proposed 2018 budget requests $1.6 billion for new and replacement wall along the southern border, but those funds will need to be approved by Congress. In the meantime, CBP has $20 million in reprogrammed funds to begin evaluating wall designs. The spending bill signed in May also allocated $341 million to replace existing fencing.

The agency is currently in the second phase of a process to solicit designs for the wall prototypes, but no contracts have been awarded, Vitiello told reporters today.

Vitiello expressed confidence that CBP could build the 74 miles of border wall requested in the White House 2018 budget. "It's all dependent on this funding," he said. "We'll have to see what we can get accomplished with what's provided."

To view online click here.

Back

House appropriations subcommittee approves $1B less in fiscal 2018 bill for USDA, FDA and CFTC Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 06/28/2017 11:30 AM EDT

The House Appropriations agriculture subcommittee advanced a $20 billion discretionary spending bill for fiscal 2018 by unanimous voice vote Wednesday.

Overall, the panel allocated $1.1 billion less than it did in fiscal 2017 for three agencies — the Agriculture Department, FDA and CFTC. The spending bill makes cuts across the majority of programs such as farm loans, rural development, agricultural research, international food aid and efforts to control and eliminate pests and diseases.

"The reality remains that, as a country, we need to get our financial house in order and find the means to address our ever growing deficit," Robert Aderholt (R-Ala.), chairman of the Appropriations agriculture panel, said in his opening remarks. "However, this bill is not in full agreement with some of the budget proposals to defund parts of the Rural Development mission area or food aid programs."

The bill would give rural development programs $2.6 billion, down slightly from $2.88 billion in fiscal 2017. The panel listed $1.4 billion for Food for Peace and $185 million for the McGovern-Dole International Food for Education and Child Nutrition Program, which would be millions less than last year. President Donald Trump has proposed eliminating both programs.

Sanford Bishop (D-Ga.) said Republicans and Democrats on the subcommittee were able to come together and agree not to "abandon rural communities, as proposed, in the White House budget request." However, he criticized the fact that GOP House budget leaders have yet to advance a budget resolution. Thus legislators are operating in a vacuum: There is no overall spending number, subcommittees have no allocations, and the debt limit is approaching with no plan to raise it.

"Marking up just one bill at a time without a full list of allocations leaves us effectively working in the dark," he said. "Further, without a bipartisan budget deal, we will also be forced to cope with the real potential for the return of sequestration."

The bill would cut the CFTC's budget by $2 million, a blow to Republican acting CFTC Chairman Chris Giancarlo who is advocating for a $281.5 million budget for the agency. The CFTC's budget has been flat at $250 million since 2015.

The Republicans' budget cut for the CFTC "will hamper the agency [and] leave it without the tools it needs to properly massive commodities markets," said Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.).

Patrick Temple-West contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Rider check: What's in the USDA, FDA spending bill Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 06/27/2017 03:48 PM EDT

The fiscal 2018 agricultural spending bill that House appropriators released today would change some of the school nutrition standards championed by former First Lady Michelle Obama and block processed poultry imported from China from being served in those school meals.

Schools would have to demonstrate financial hardship to receive an exemption from the Obama-era whole grain standards, which aim to replace white breads, rice and other foods with whole grain-rich varieties. Also, stricter sodium reduction targets — another initiative dating to the Obama administration — would be delayed, and schools would be able to serve low-fat flavored milk as opposed to only the non-fat version. The provisions, which have been included in previous government spending bills, are similar to the policy directive that Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue signed during his first week in office.

Two provisions in the $20 billion discretionary spending bill for USDA and FDA programs also signal that House appropriators are concerned about USDA's decision to import processed chicken raised and slaughtered in China. Those products would be banned from the National School Lunch Program under the spending bill, and lawmakers outlined a list of verification and re-inspection requirements for USDA food safety officials to follow.

GOP lawmakers are already talking about how Congress will likely pass a continuing resolution to avoid a government shutdown on Oct. 1, when the fiscal 2017 spending package expires. Work in the House and Senate on all 12 appropriations bills for fiscal 2018 is months behind schedule, in part because President Donald Trump's budget arrived late. But there also is internal fighting among House Republicans over spending priorities, particularly how to pay for a large bump in defense spending, plus a crowded floor calendar in the Senate — making it likely that Congress will go the omnibus route once again.

Here are a list of other riders in the appropriations bill:

— U.S. iron, steel in rural infrastructure projects: Rural water, wastewater, waste disposal and solid waste management projects, including maintenance and repair as well as construction, would have to use iron and steel produced in the U.S. under the House spending bill. Appropriators outlined some exceptions, including if the Agriculture secretary determines that the restriction is "inconsistent with the public interest" or if U.S. iron and steel products are not available "in sufficient and reasonably available quantities" or are not of "satisfactory quality." The requirement also wouldn't apply if the cost of sourcing U.S. metals increased project costs by more than 25 percent.

— Shielding against trans-fat lawsuits: The FDA in 2015 decided to all but ban artificial trans fats, which are still used in candies, microwave popcorn and baked goods. Since then, food manufacturers have been nervous about exposure to liability, because the agency's formal phase-out doesn't start until June 2018. House appropriators inserted language into the fiscal 2018 spending legislation, as they have in previous years, that gives industry some cover from litigation by declaring that partially hydrogenated oils can't be considered unsafe until that FDA compliance period kicks in.

— Delay FDA sodium targets: House appropriators would block the FDA from issuing voluntary sodium reduction targets until the Institute of Medicine and the CDC update the Dietary Reference Intake for sodium, a move designed to shelve another Obama administration priority. The provision also was included in the omnibus spending package for fiscal 2017.

— Block SNAP retailer stocking rule: The agricultural spending bill would continue to delay USDA's final regulation requiring convenience stores that accept food stamps to stock a wider variety of healthful foods. House appropriators crafted a similar provision that made it into the fiscal 2017 omnibus after lawmakers argued the regulation created compliance costs that placed too great a burden on small businesses, which could in turn lead them to opt out of accepting food stamps, limiting where recipients could use their benefits.

The rule, which was required by the 2014 farm bill and finalized during the Obama administration, increases to seven the variety of products retailers must stock in four staple categories: meat, poultry or fish; bread or cereals; fruits or vegetables; and dairy products. The previous requirement was three varieties. The rule also redefines "staple food" to exclude products with multiple ingredients, such as TV dinners.

To view online click here.

Back

IRS filing season generally good but challenges remain, Taxpayer Advocate says Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 06/28/2017 01:44 PM EDT

Taxpayers who called the IRS for help filing their returns this year generally fared better than those who needed other types of assistance, according to a watchdog report released today.

For example, it was more difficult for delinquent taxpayers who couldn't cover their bills right away to connect with the IRS to establish payment plans, Taxpayer Advocate's report to Congress said. And though phone call service improved when assistance went through the IRS's accounts management telephone lines, the improvement was due to reduced volume, the report said.

Cuts in IRS funding hampered taxpayer assistance.

"There is no doubt many of the service constraints are attributable in significant part to funding limitations," National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson said in the report.

Olson recommended the IRS send Congress a list of core services that have been cut back or killed off, and indicate that a better spending level would bring those services back.

"If the IRS describes how it would use additional funding to improve taxpayer service with greater specificity, congressional appropriators might be convinced that additional funding would be put to good use and provide that funding," the report said.

Lawmakers on the House Appropriations Committee are set to mark up a spending bill

Thursday that includes funding for the IRS.

The revenue agency, which has had its funding cut nearly 20 percent since 2010, when accounting for inflation, would lose about 2 percent in funding for the coming fiscal year under President Donald Trump's budget proposal.

To view online click here.

Back

Hatch names tax reform deputies Back

By Brian Faler | 06/27/2017 03:33 PM EDT

Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch is asking some of his Republican colleagues on the panel to take the lead developing tax reform ideas in certain policy areas.

Sens. Rob Portman (R-Ohio) and Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) will focus on rewriting the international tax code, Hatch said today. Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) will look at the individual code. Sens. Bill Cassidy (R-La.) and Dean Heller (R-Nev.) will examine energy tax provisions, while Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) will work on agriculture tax issues.

The effort is reminiscent of the tax reform working groups Hatch set up in 2015, though that effort was bipartisan. Hatch, speaking on the Senate floor, said he invited Democrats to participate, though he complained they had "process demands" and were accusing Republicans of being "hellbent on giving massive tax breaks to the super wealthy."

The effort shows any tax overhaul will not be dictated by a handful of party leaders working in secret, Hatch said.

"I've been working to involve all of the Republican members of the Senate Finance Committee in this effort," he said. "We have a number of great senators on the committee, many of whom have put in years of work on different areas of the tax system. I think it would be foolish to let that experience and expertise go to waste."

To view online click here.

Back

Inside the GOP's surprise health care flop Back

By Burgess Everett, Jennifer Haberkorn and Josh Dawsey | 06/27/2017 11:15 PM EDT

Senate Republicans had no inkling of what they were walking into on Tuesday afternoon as they filed into the Mike Mansfield room on the Capitol's second floor.

Mitch McConnell's 51 colleagues, from his most junior members to his closest lieutenants, fully expected the Senate to vote this week on the Senate GOP's wounded Obamacare repeal bill. They knew the whip count was far worse than advertised but were ready for McConnell to either admit defeat or start a furious round of deal-making to try to win their support. They took McConnell at his word that a vote would occur, regardless of the result.

Then the Kentucky Republican shocked them all as he dispassionately informed them at the top of the meeting that the vote would be delayed, and that he would continue the painful exercise of trying to get 50 of the caucus' 52 votes for Obamacare repeal.

Never mind that McConnell and his team had previously made clear that they did not believe letting the bill hang out over the July 4 recess would improve the result of the perilous negotiations.

"It's different from what he said ... yesterday afternoon as late as 5:30 p.m.," said a Republican senator.

Senators left the meeting perplexed at what will come next, and people close to McConnell don't fully comprehend how his strategy will play out, according to interviews with senators, aides and Republican operatives.

Even Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), McConnell's deputy and perhaps his closest ally, admitted that he was a "little bit" surprised at the decision. Cornyn had said the vote was on just minutes before.

"I understand it and support it. It's important that we succeed," Cornyn said of McConnell's move. "This is more than just about health care, as important as that is. This is about keeping our promises and demonstrating our ability to govern."

If the bill failed, the GOP's base could abandon them for not following through on the party's years-long campaign against Obamacare. It would also be harder for Republicans to pay for a sweeping tax reform plan. President Donald Trump's agenda could be mortally wounded.

In recent days, McConnell spoke to White House aides, senators, political consultants and his sprawling Washington network built over decades in the Senate.

But he never tipped his hand on what might be coming.

Everyone in the Senate took him at his word that a vote would occur this week, which is why the decision to punt the bill was so surprising. But it's also true that McConnell has never been the type of leader to put a bill on the floor that he knows will fail.

McConnell made his choice because he still sees a narrow path to success. "He's not interested in coming back and having a failed vote," said a person close to McConnell.

It will be fraught with danger while trying to balance out the demands of senators from Medicaid expansion states and hard-line conservatives looking to gut Obamacare as much as possible. And his decision to delay the bill also carries great political risk because it draws out the Obamacare fight at least a couple more weeks. But he's decided it's a risk worth taking.

The episode was a stunning twist in the GOP's long-running saga to roll back Obamacare.

Before the House first pulled its bill from the floor back in March, McConnell vowed that the Senate could pass a repeal bill in a week. Then he had the Senate GOP meet nearly every day of the last two months once the House finally sent him a bill in April. Now he's trying a new tactic.

Behind closed doors Tuesday, McConnell informed the senators of his goal to strike a new deal by Friday or Saturday, with plans to have the Congressional Budget Office analyze that proposal and to hold a vote soon after the recess.

CBO Director Keith Hall was also present for the meeting, and GOP senators quickly laid into the man who's been haunting them with projections of 22 million fewer insured and short-term premium increases, according to people in attendance. It seemed to be a genuine effort by Republicans to discredit the nonpartisan referee so that the GOP's final health care bill isn't derailed by the CBO.

"CBO could stand for 'Confusing But Obtuse,'" said Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) afterward.

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) asked Hall, who was hand-picked by Republicans in 2015, how he could project millions more would be covered by Medicaid expansion in future years, wondering aloud whether the CBO could predict what was essentially a political decision left to individual states and their governors.

"I'm from the biggest potential Medicaid expansion state. And if you think Texas is expanding, you're wrong," chimed in Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), according to attendees of the closed-door meeting.

Cruz is one of those senators McConnell now must win over, but he may be easier than most. He's been working well with McConnell, once his high-profile adversary, and his attack on Hall was aimed at making his colleagues feel better about the GOP leader's bill.

McConnell and Trump must persuade all but two of the following currently opposed senators to reverse course: conservatives Mike Lee of Utah, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Ron Johnson of Wisconsin as well as the more centrist Susan Collins of Maine, Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, Rob Portman of Ohio and Dean Heller of Nevada, and surprise opponents like Jerry Moran of Kansas.

"There's several things we've put on the table. And at this point there's not much give," Capito said. "I don't know how, or if, we can get there."

"Tinkering isn't going to work, from my perspective. There would have to be a major overhaul of the bill ... to win my support," Collins said.

A few hours before the change in schedule was announced Tuesday, negotiations were really just beginning, as Cruz visited with McConnell privately. Portman met later with Vice President Mike Pence at his hideaway.

White House officials said Tuesday morning they were still angling to make deals with individual senators, hoping to deploy the $188 billion they have left over from the CBO score to pour into the bill and cut deals.

But one Republican aide involved in the process said that GOP leaders had not yet engaged in the horse-trading needed to push the bill across the finish line — a key reason McConnell called off the vote early in the week.

"The truth is, we're not even close. This is not, like, a couple of tweaks," the aide said.

McConnell has given the White House assurances he will bring the bill to a successful vote, and an anxious Trump has been told by top aides in the Oval Office that he could trust McConnell, according to one person familiar with the conversations.

Trump told aides and McConnell that he wanted to be involved in whipping votes, and two administration officials said he enjoyed doing so in the House.

But McConnell aides and advisers don't think Trump can help like he could in the House.

"Trump doesn't bring us any votes. He just doesn't," said one person familiar with the majority leader's thinking.

As the whip count became more dire in recent days, the White House became increasingly concerned about the flailing Republican bill and began to ramp up its efforts and urgency toward what could be Trump's key domestic achievement. Some, like top congressional lobbyist Marc Short and chief of staff Reince Priebus, were not as determined to have a vote this week as McConnell initially was, according to people who spoke with them.

Trump began working the phones over the weekend. On Tuesday afternoon, he hosted Paul and the two developed what Paul called a "good rapport," a significant development considering Paul is perhaps the firmest "no" vote against the GOP's repeal bill right now.

On Tuesday, Trump also invited the entire GOP caucus to the White House to make a personal pitch to a party that by the time of the meeting included at least eight senators who opposed the bill in its current form.

"Obviously, the White House must have played some role, or otherwise we wouldn't all be trundling down there," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Still, the particulars of the Senate's procedures will always, ultimately, be up to McConnell.

Some saw his delay as a positive sign, considering that the GOP leader could have simply cut bait on the bill. Instead, he is willing to expend huge amounts of political capital on a bill that could easily cost the GOP seats in Congress as soon as next year.

"More time gives opportunity," said Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.).

Others weren't so sure. After all, if the GOP follows McConnell's new timeline and strikes a deal heading into the recess, GOP senators will have nine days at home dealing with liberal activists, a new CBO score and more critical media coverage.

"Personally," said Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), "I'd just as soon work through the recess."

Eliana Johnson and Seung Min Kim contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump teases 'big surprise' on Senate Obamacare repeal effort Back

By Louis Nelson | 06/28/2017 12:47 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Wednesday suggested that "a big surprise" could be coming in the Republican effort to repeal and replace Obamacare, a tease that came hours after the president predicted that Senate Republicans are "going to get at least very close" to passing their stalled healthcare bill.

"And just to do a little official business, health care is working along very well. We could have a big surprise with a great health care package. So, now they're happy," Trump said, gesturing to a group of reporters during a meet-and-greet with the visiting World Series Champion Chicago Cubs.

"What do you mean by big surprise, sir?" one reporter shouted

"I said you're going to have a great, great surprise. It's going to be great," Trump said without elaborating further.

Earlier Wednesday, Trump had predicted that Senate Republicans are "going to get at least very close" to passing legislation to repeal and replace Obamacare, adding that "I think we're going to get it over the line."

Trump's earlier comments, which came during a roundtable discussion on energy with state, local and tribal leaders at the White House, followed a meeting Tuesday afternoon with Republican senators just hours after GOP leadership postponed a vote on its health care measure until after the July 4 recess.

The vote's postponement came after the legislation failed to gain traction among the Senate GOP rank and file. At least eight Republican senators have expressed opposition to the measure, and, with a 52-seat majority, the party can afford to lose just two GOP votes and still pass the bill.

"The meeting went really well. We're talking about a great, great form of health care," Trump said in introductory remarks captured by the White House press pool. "We have a plan, that if we get it approved — it's very tough, every state is different, every senator is different. But I have to tell you, the Republican senators had a really impressive meeting yesterday at the White House. We had close to 50 of them. We have 52, we need almost all of them. That's never easy."

"I think we're going to get at least very close, and I think we're going to get it over the line. There was a great, great feeling in that room yesterday," he continued.

The bill, Trump said, would make health care cheaper not only for individuals but also for the country. He said Obamacare is "dying" and has been a "headache for everybody" and a "nightmare for many." With the Senate's legislation, the president said, "we get rid of so much ... all of the bad parts of Obamacare are gone."

By postponing the vote, Trump said, Republicans "have given ourselves a little bit more time to make it perfect."

Asked by a reporter whether he was concerned about the Medicaid cuts in the legislation, Trump said only that "this will be great for everybody."

To view online click here.

Back

5 changes McConnell can make to get repeal bill on track Back

By Adam Cancryn | 06/27/2017 08:49 PM EDT

Mitch McConnell has little margin for error as he tries to salvage the Senate's Obamacare repeal effort over the July 4 break.

The majority leader has to craft a compromise that tears down enough of Obamacare to satisfy the party's conservative wing, while also ensuring the health benefits are generous enough to keep skeptical moderates in line. He can lose just two of the 52 Republican votes, and use Vice President Mike Pence as a tie-breaker.

Here are the five items on McConnell's menu:

The Medicaid mess

The Senate health care bill would gut the safety net program, rolling back Obamacare's expanded coverage and slashing its funding by $772 billion over a decade. And that's perhaps the main obstacle facing McConnell as he tries to win over a crucial bloc of moderate GOP senators.

Republican leaders may try to soften the blow to Medicaid to win over several holdouts by considering lengthening the phase-out of generous funding for Medicaid expansion and easing the cap on the whole program's funding. Senate Republicans hailing from expansion states — like vulnerable Nevada Sen. Dean Heller and key swing vote Rob Portman of Ohio — have pushed for a phase-out as long as seven years, far longer than the bill's current three-year track.

McConnell may also float the potential for excluding certain groups from the program's funding limits, in a bid to maintain coverage for some of the neediest Americans and relieve the financial burden on cash-strapped states.

But changes along those lines would put GOP leaders at risk of losing key conservatives who see Medicaid spending as out of control. Sen. Pat Toomey has led the charge to end the program's entitlement status, with support from several other senators eager to limit Medicaid's reach.

"Medicaid was initially set up to help the poor, women, children and the disabled," Sen. John Barrasso of Wyoming said. "It has been taken in a direction way different than that."

The battle over Obamacare's subsidies

McConnell is also likely to weigh making the Senate bill's tax credits more generous to alleviate concerns that poorer and older people wouldn't get enough aid to purchase insurance on the individual market.

The current bill scales back those subsidies and cuts off eligibility at 350 percent of the federal poverty line, compared with Obamacare's 400-percent threshold. The restructuring disproportionately benefits younger and healthier enrollees, the Congressional Budget Office projected Monday, raising concerns that older and poorer patients would be forced to pay significantly more for health care, or go without.

But Republican leaders can easily dial those subsidies back up if they are key to winning over swing votes like Sens. Susan Collins or Lisa Murkowski.

"I'm very concerned about the impact on premiums generally, particularly for that very vulnerable group between age 50 and 64," Collins said.

What may not be so easy: Getting the conservative wing to go along with the bigger tax credits. Sen. Rand Paul — perhaps the most consistent opponent of the bill — has railed against the subsidies as just a perpetuation of Obamacare. Another holdout, Sen. Ron Johnson wants to eliminate that financial aid altogether.

Rolling back Obamacare regulations

Bringing conservatives back into the fold starts with repealing as much of Obamacare as possible — and that means doing more to gut the health law's regulatory structure.

Paul and Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Mike Lee of Utah have pushed to roll back all the standards governing health insurance plans, including protections barring insurers from discriminating against people with pre-existing conditions. And Republican leaders are already halfway there: The Senate bill lets states waive additional Obamacare rules in a bid to further lower premiums.

"I have been very clear from the beginning how to get my vote," Cruz said.

But conservatives' remaining demands are extensive, and include adding provisions — such as medical malpractice reform and allowing insurers to sell across state lines — that could disqualify the bill under the Senate's strict reconciliation rules that are essential if McConnell is to pass the bill with a simple majority.

If he eliminates Obamacare's protections for sick Americans, McConnell also risks inviting the backlash that nearly doomed the House GOP's repeal bill. That controversy prompted Sen. Bill Cassidy to declare he wouldn't support any bill that leaves the sick without access to care. And if moderate GOP senators are already worried about whether the bill maintains coverage for the most vulnerable, further gutting Obamacare's protections likely won't get them any closer to "yes."

The Planned Parenthood problem

The easiest tweak Senate Republicans can make to the bill could also be among its most controversial: stripping out a provision that defunds Planned Parenthood for one year.

Collins and Murkowski — who have long been critical of zeroing out the organization's funding — are drafting an amendment that would preserve the funds. Incorporating that into the Senate's revised bill could go a long way toward winning those two crucial moderates. It would also come at little tangible economic cost since it has no effect on the rest of the bill.

But it risks upsetting the vast majority of Republican senators who saw this as their chance to finally cut Planned Parenthood's funding after multiple failed attempts to do so. McConnell would have to take his colleagues' temperature before he makes any final decision and weigh whether he can endure the additional backlash from influential anti-abortion groups.

Adding enticements, including more money to combat opioid abuse

McConnell has roughly $188 billion to spend on sweeteners to the health care bill, thanks to CBO's estimate that it would reduce the deficit by far more than the House-passed version of repeal. That gives him room to dole out aid for senators' pet issues in hopes of winning their votes, and it could go a long way toward addressing some moderates' concerns.

Boosting funding to fight the opioid epidemic ravaging many states would likely be a strong inducement for holdouts like Ohio's Portman and West Virginia's Shelley Moore Capito.

"This bill will not ensure access to affordable health care in West Virginia, does not do enough to combat the opioid epidemic that is devastating my state, cuts traditional Medicaid too deeply, and harms rural health care providers," Capito said in a statement laying out her complaints about the legislation.

Republican leaders could also funnel more money into tax credits to reduce the burden of premiums in Alaska's particularly expensive individual market to lock in Murkowski's vote, and respond to a range of asks from senators across the spectrum.

Sen. Marco Rubio, for example, said he's mulling his own set of proposals aimed at shoring up Florida's Medicaid and individual markets. Of course, sweeteners targeted to specific senators could sow discontent among the rest of the conference, especially those keen on preserving the bill's deficit savings. That puts further pressure on McConnell to spend his billions wisely.

To view online click here.

Back

How Schumer kept Dems united on Obamacare Back

By Seung Min Kim and Elana Schor | 06/28/2017 05:08 AM EDT

Chuck Schumer fired off a warning at a caucus-wide retreat in January: Senate Republicans will try to pick off Democrats, one by one, to join the GOP effort to dismantle Obamacare.

If that happens, Schumer said in Shepherdstown, West Virginia, Democrats are finished. And so the 48-member caucus must stick together to try to save it.

With that message, relayed by a source familiar with the episode, the New York Democrat and newly minted minority leader swiftly united an often-squabbling caucus against efforts to repeal Obamacare.

Months later, it helped deliver a major, though perhaps temporary, victory Tuesday when Mitch McConnell's bid to repeal Obamacare stalled — a cause that had similarly united Republicans for the seven years since the landmark health care bill became law.

Now, as Senate GOP leaders punt a key vote on their health care bill until after the July 4 recess, Schumer faces his next challenge in his first major legislative battle as the top Senate Democrat: keeping his party and grass-roots allies mobilized for at least two more weeks, as Republicans rewrite their plan and hunt for votes.

Schumer also has to protect his moderate members up for reelection in 2018, who already have faced repeated attacks from the National Republican Senatorial Committee over their pledge to shield Obamacare from efforts to unravel it. President Donald Trump has also previewed that playbook, tweeting Tuesday that a "failed, expensive and dangerous ObamaCare" was the Democrats' legacy. Trump is already trying to blame Democrats for obstructionism for any problems with the health system.

"Complacency is not something that we can countenance. We have to continue letting people know how bad this is," Schumer told reporters on Tuesday. "Despite the fact that they have an amazing message machine... on this issue, it has sunk through. Only 17 or 16 percent of Americans support Trumpcare. They are really getting the message. We're gonna keep doing that."

Liberal activists were not always certain they could count on him to aggressively take on the GOP.

But earlier this year, Schumer quickly worked to ensure all 48 members of the Democratic Caucus — from Joe Manchin of West Virginia to Bernie Sanders of Vermont — would take a firm stance against repealing Obamacare, a position that solidified in January as efforts to dismantle the law ramped up.

"When they saw that I — in no way, shape or form — could vote to hurt every part of my state, every demographic in my state, I think that gave him the [sign] that we're going to be united on this," Manchin said.

That included any attempts from Republicans, limited as they were, to quietly reach out to Democrats on potential bipartisan health care talks.

When GOP Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Bill Cassidy of Louisiana — who had been shopping around their own Obamacare replacement proposal — asked centrist Democrats including Manchin, Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota and Joe Donnelly of Indiana to chat about health care, Schumer gave the moderates the green light to go ahead, as long as they stressed that complete repeal was off the table.

"Whenever we started to do what each of us do, which is try to go solve a problem, he would remind us that there would be a time for that, but first we had to be together and send a message: It's not OK to unravel the health care system," Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, one of Schumer's closest allies, said. "And he's been very effective."

A consummate dealmaker at heart, Schumer has nonetheless embraced a role leading a restive Democratic Party eager to oppose President Donald Trump at essentially every turn.

The minority leader has added Sanders and other liberal upstarts such as Jeff Merkley of Oregon and Brian Schatz of Hawaii to his broader leadership team. Merkley holds a standing meeting with liberal groups such as MoveOn.org, Our Revolution, UltraViolet and the Progressive Change Campaign Committee every other Thursday, often relaying feedback from the coalition back to Schumer.

One Senate Democratic aide said of Schumer: "I think he's realized the value of the activist communities out there."

"We have a diverse caucus and he's got just as much enthusiasm among the moderates as he does among the progressives," Schatz said. "And I think he's adapted very quickly to the age of Trump and the era of social media. These are difficult times but he's the right leader for these difficult times."

Schumer's relationship with the left wasn't always as warm as it became in the last weeks of the heated health care fight.

Liberal activists pressed Senate Democrats for a procedural blockade in protest of the GOP's secretive Obamacare repeal process, but the caucus didn't ramp up obstruction tactics until after passage of a bipartisan Russia sanctions bill. Another provocative maneuver, to shut down committee hearings, could have disrupted high profile testimonies, particularly in the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Angel Padilla, policy director at the anti-Trump group Indivisible, said activists "were really nervous" as they first urged Democratic senators to ramp up the opposition: "We thought, 'They're not going to do it because they're Democrats and they don't do this stuff.'"

After Democrats held their first Monday night talk-a-thon savaging the Republican repeal bill last week, however, activists rallied to their side — while constantly nudging for more resistance.

Democratic leaders "are learning to be receptive to where people are," said Center for American Progress Action Fund campaign director Emily Tisch Sussman. "Understandably, they still have some deference to process, particularly in the Senate versus the House. ... So they're getting there."

Still, the unity Schumer cultivated helped Democrats more easily exploit the divisions in the Republican Conference, whose members ranged from those who were fretful that dismantling Obamacare would harm their constituents to those who were frustrated that the repeal didn't go far enough.

Schumer and the Democrats were handed some gifts along the way, including a private comment made by Trump himself that the House version of Obamacare repeal was "mean." They also set out a goal of defeating the health care bill on a procedural vote to begin debate, rather than filibustering the bill with endless amendments once it got to the floor, as activists initially sought.

The New York Democrat is well aware that heeding the ornery spirit of the liberal grass roots can bring huge energy to Democrats' push to hamper Trump's agenda. Now that the GOP has postponed the repeal vote, activists are expecting him to not forget that lesson.

"The moment Democrats announced they were going to start shutting down business as usual in the Senate, health care leapt back onto the front page of newspapers, Republicans started falling off the bill," MoveOn Washington director Ben Wikler said in an interview. "We are optimistic that Democrats have seen the effects of standing and fighting and are going to keep doing it."

Sen. Cory Booker of New Jersey, warned that the postponed vote could prove a temporary victory if Republicans regroup after the Fourth of July recess. And he urged the Democratic base to maintain this week's level of energy and public pressure.

"I just hope that we use this time to wake more Americans up" to the consequences of Obamacare repeal, he said in an interview. "One of the biggest dangers we have right now is complacency, is silence, is people sitting on the sidelines."

To view online click here.

Back

How the GOP Turned Against Medicaid Back

By Joshua Zeitz | 06/27/2017 05:41 PM EDT

In May 1965, just weeks before Lyndon Johnson signed Medicaid into law, his administration launched Head Start, an enrichment program for preschool-aged children from poor families.

The program's administrators were appalled by the poor health of their students. In Jacksonville, Florida, more than half of participating children were anemic, and between one-quarter and one-third suffered hearing and sight problems. In Beaufort County, South Carolina, 90 percent of kids suffered from hookworms and roundworms. In Boston, almost one-third of Head Start youngsters showed signs of physical or mental health illnesses.

Rotting teeth, vitamin deficiency, chronic infections—50 years ago in the United States, this was how many 3- and 4-year-olds from poor families lived.

Then came Medicaid—an afterthought tacked onto the administration's Medicare bill, and one that LBJ scarcely mentioned when he signed both measures into law. Medicaid's roots were humble, its ambitions modest. As originally conceived, the program provided health insurance to poor children, poor pregnant women and some qualifying parents. In its first year, its budget was less than $1 billion—about $7.7 billion in today's dollars.

Over 50 years, successive Congresses and presidential administrations vastly expanded the program's scope to cover 80 million people, or almost one-quarter of the population. Its budget last year was $378 billion. To be sure, it has never enjoyed the popularity of Medicare, which covers a much more politically powerful constituency: seniors. But it has proven highly durable. Despite the GOP's preference for smaller government and lower taxes, for many decades, Medicaid enjoyed broad backing from Republican leaders.

That was then. Now, congressional Republicans have proposed taking a hacksaw to Medicaid—a move that will, according to the Congressional Budget Office, leave many millions of poor people uninsured. For Democrats, the Senate GOP's Better Care Reconciliation Act, which ends Medicaid's entitlement status, is a "monstrosity." For many Republicans, it is nirvana. "You and I have been dreaming of this since I have been around, since you and I were drinking at a keg," House Speaker Paul Ryan told Rich Lowry, editor of National Review, earlier this year. That position isn't widely popular: Amid much public outcry, the Senate postponed its anticipated vote on BCRA this week. But it testifies to the GOP's full metamorphosis from the Party of Ronald Reagan to the Party of Ayn Rand.

Still, there's more to the story. Republicans are right to observe that Medicaid was never supposed to grow as big as it did. Its framers intended the program to help a small few who were unable to capture the full benefits of America's postwar prosperity. In their hubris, 1960s liberals assumed that a booming economy would continue to grow in perpetuity. They didn't anticipate industrial decline, growing inequality, an explosion of single-parent households or the contraction of America's unionized workforce and, with it, employer-based health insurance.

For 50 years, Medicaid proved a highly elastic Band-Aid for many of America's economic wounds. Its desecration will leave us in an unfamiliar and dangerous place.

Though many conservatives regard the Great Society as a radical exercise in wealth and income redistribution, in fact, LBJ did not generally support quantitative measures like cash transfers or a guaranteed minimum income. Instead, his administration assumed that in a robust and growing economy, qualitative measures like education, job training and access to health care and food security would ensure that every American had an opportunity to share in the nation's prosperity. For those temporarily or permanently unable to capture a share of this affluence, the government would provide compensatory assistance.

This thinking reflected conventional postwar exuberance. In recent memory, the United States had clawed itself out of the Great Depression, mobilized its economy to defeat fascism on two continents, and generated unprecedented, sustained growth. "A generation ago," observed the veteran journalist Walter Lippmann in 1964, "it would have been taken for granted that a war on poverty meant taking money away from the haves and turning it over to the have-nots ... But in this generation a revolutionary idea has taken hold. The size of the pie can be increased by intention, by organized fiscal policy and then a whole society, not just one part of it, will grow richer."

The debate over health care followed this same trajectory. Twenty years earlier, in the waning days of the New Deal era, liberals fought unsuccessfully to extend universal health coverage to all Americans. At every turn, powerful opposition from the American Medical Association and congressional Republicans stymied their efforts. But by the 1960s, it was no longer clear that they even needed to pass national health care. After World War II, major employers began extending unionized employees such benefits as paid vacations, annual cost-of-living raises and private health insurance. What liberals once assumed government would need to do for its working-class citizens, private industry now offered on a contingent basis. By 1960, 100 million Americans—56 percent of the country—enjoyed access to private health plans.

In light of this reality, liberals scaled back their efforts and focused on two discrete categories of people: senior citizens, who by definition did not have access to employer-based insurance, and the very poor—especially children and single mothers—who were likewise left behind. Medicare and Medicaid were quintessential Great Society programs: limited in ambition in scope and designed to help groups of citizens who could not, by virtue of their age or condition, capture the advantages of prosperity.

The Social Security Amendments of 1965—the official name of the bill that established both programs—passed Congress with bipartisan support. In the House, 65 Republicans supported the legislation; 73 GOP members joined Southern Democrats in opposing it. In the Senate, Republicans voted 13 to 14 in favor of the bill. Though many conservative Republicans agreed with Reagan that Medicare represented "a short step to all the rest of socialism," a large number of moderate and liberal GOP members openly supported government health care for the oldest and poorest Americans.

In the quarter-century that followed, Medicaid expanded both in scope and size. With strong bipartisan support, Congress extended the program to include disabled adults who qualified for Supplementary Security Income and allowed states to care for those in need of psychiatric care or suffering mental disabilities. Richard Nixon signed both measures into law. Reagan tried unsuccessfully to convert Medicaid into a block-grant program in 1981—meaning it would no longer be funded according to the number of people who qualified for it (much like other entitlement programs, including Medicare or the federal home mortgage deduction). Instead, it would receive a fixed level of funding. If need surpassed available funding, states would be forced to cut enrollment or services. But Reagan later changed course. With overwhelming bipartisan support in Congress, he signed a series of bills that sharply raised the income eligibility level for women and children, created new categories of mandatory or optional coverage, and made it easier for people who lost eligibility because of rising incomes to remain in the program during a transition period.

All told, the number of Medicaid recipients rose from 4 million in 1966—the year of its inception—to 35.8 million in 1992. Most of that expansion occurred under Republican presidents and with the strong support—or at least consent—of GOP members of Congress.

Indeed, Republicans didn't set their sights on Medicaid until the mid-1990s, when Newt Gingrich's conservative revolution turned the party's caucus to the hard right. That trend accelerated during the presidency of George W. Bush, as the GOP attempted—to no avail—to privatize Social Security and convert Medicaid into a block-grant program. Since the passage of the Affordable Care Act, which vastly expanded Medicaid, and the advent of the Tea Party, Republicans have existed in a perpetual state of war with Medicaid.

But it wasn't always so.

Medicaid grew by congressional and presidential fiat, but also by virtue of sweeping economic change.

It was originally intended to serve a small population of individuals unable to avail themselves of America's seemingly boundless prosperity. But after 1973 the economy began to sputter. Military spending on the Vietnam War, as well as a series of supply shocks in the food and energy sectors, generated a decade of runaway inflation. Inflation was accompanied, in turn, by rising unemployment, particularly in the manufacturing sector, which had for many years had formed the backbone of America's prosperous, postwar middle class. Increasingly, it seemed that compensatory measures would not help poor people in urban ghettos, declining coal towns in Appalachia, or post-industrial cities capture prosperity that simply no longer existed.

During the decade in which John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson governed, the American economy expanded at an average annual rate of 7.5 percent each year. The country has not seen growth like this since. When Donald Trump promised to deliver 4 percent annual growth, one expert surmised that it would be a "monumental task" to achieve anything near those results.

To be sure, in the years since LBJ left office, America has experienced periods of sustained economic expansion. But the blessings of limited economic growth have accrued principally to the wealthiest Americans. Between World War II and 1973, real wages grew steadily at an annual rate of between 2 and 3 percent, enabling millions of American workers to enjoy unprecedented upward mobility. After 1973, average wage growth slowed dramatically. Over the next three decades, household wages remained essentially flat, but only because more women entered the workforce even as men's wages fell. Families with two wage earners were just able to maintain parity and then some; families headed by single parents fell behind.

The problem is that the structure of the American family has changed markedly since 1965, when roughly 5 percent of all children were born out of wedlock. Today, roughly 40 percent of all children—including 67 percent of black children, 25 percent of white children and 42 percent of Latino children—are born into single-parent households.

At the same time, record-setting numbers of working-age adults have slipped out of the workforce; they are neither employed nor seeking employment, a trend that has alarmed conservatives and liberals alike. And those who are employed are much less likely to belong to unions or to enjoy access to defined benefits pensions and health insurance. From 1999 to 2014, the percentage of non-elderly Americans enrolled in employer-based insurance fell from 67 percent to 56 percent. Only 37 percent of persons living below the poverty line even have access to such coverage.

Medicaid was designed, and by increments expanded, to help certain disadvantaged groups: struggling single parents and their children, disabled workers, impoverished older people not yet eligible for Medicare, the underemployed, the working poor. But 50 years ago, no one expected the number of people in these categories to total one-quarter of the nation. It is a testament to the program's elasticity that it has been able to paper over the inequities of the modern American economy for so long.

Medicaid is an entitlement program and has been since its inception. Its funding varies depending on how many people qualify for it at any given time. In this sense, it is countercyclical. During economic downturns, more people need it, and more people receive it. Over two-thirds of its spending benefits children, the elderly, or the blind and disabled. It covers costs for 64 percent of seniors in nursing homes and almost half of all births. It keeps afloat hundreds of rural hospitals, whose clients are disproportionately poor and elderly.

We don't need to guess what will happen when many millions of qualifying poor and elderly people are denied access to Medicaid. We already know. We need look no further than the first class of Head Start students—3- and 4-year-olds with worms and anemia. Or elderly citizens who testified before the Senate in 1959—seven years before the launch of Medicare and Medicaid. One retiree from Tampa, Florida, wondered what would happen if he or his wife should require long-term care. "I will have to seek some charity institution and submit to the humiliation of what they call a necessity, and pronounce to the whole world that I am only a pauper, a beggar," he bitterly informed the committee. That was what happened when elderly people who worked hard all their lives exhausted their resources and couldn't afford a nursing home.

To be sure, Medicaid has grown far beyond its original mandate. Perhaps that's OK, given the structural changes to the U.S. economy since 1965. Or maybe we should devise a better way to ensure that people who are struggling economically can see a doctor or receive necessary care. But that's not the discussion we're having. The Senate bill is the Fahrenheit 451 of health care. It isn't an attempt to insure more people—or the same number of people—with greater efficiency or better outcomes. It throws people off insurance to pay for tax cuts benefiting the wealthiest Americans, as Republican skeptics like Maine Sen. Susan Collins have noted.

The problem isn't simply that the Republican Party opposes higher taxes or state-sponsored health programs. Some of its leaders can't even get their heads around the idea of insurance—the means by which people mitigate risk, together. In the year 2017, GOP members of Congress honestly wonder aloud why men should be compelled to buy into plans that cover prenatal services. Shared risk and shared reward: It's a concept so simple—so fundamental to living in a society—that they teach it in preschool. It's why women who have children pay into insurance plans that also benefit men who develop testicular cancer. But today's Republican Party has grown radically anti-social in outlook. It no longer resembles in the slightest degree the party of Everett Dirksen, Hugh Scott or Norris Cotton—Jacob Javits, Clifford Case or Margaret Chase Smith. All voted for Medicaid in 1965.

Working from a blank slate a half century ago, Republicans and Democrats created Medicaid, together. Over the next 25 years, they expanded it, together.

If Republicans dismantle the program this week, they will do so alone. It will then fall to Democrats to pick up the pieces. When they do, they may no longer feel bound by economic assumptions that guided postwar liberals—assumptions about a forever growing economic pie that no longer reflect our diminished national economic reality. In devising their solution to the problem, Democrats may propose—and the electorate might endorse—measures far more radical than conservatives can possibly imagine.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump: Obamacare repeal bill 'will be great, if we get it done' Back

By Madeline Conway | 06/27/2017 04:54 PM EDT

The Senate Republican bill to repeal Obamacare "will be great, if we get it done," President Donald Trump told GOP lawmakers shortly after party leaders delayed a vote on the legislation today.

"This will be great, if we get it done," Trump told senators gathered in the White House for a meeting about the stalled health care effort. "And if we don't get it done, it's just going to be something that we're not going to like, and that's OK and I understand that very well."

"But I think we have a chance to do something very, very important for the public, very, very important for the people of our country that we love," he added, before asking reporters to leave the meeting.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell had intended to bring the proposal to repeal the Affordable Care Act, former President Barack Obama's signature legislative achievement, to the Senate floor as early as today for a procedural vote. But several conservative and moderate Republicans came out in opposition to the bill Monday and today, and enough said they opposed the key procedural vote to start debate on the measure to stop the overall momentum.

Republican leaders now say they intend to return to health care following the Senate's July Fourth recess.

To view online click here.

Back

Pro-Trump group pulls ads criticizing Heller over Obamacare Back

By Alex Isenstadt | 06/27/2017 06:22 PM EDT

A pro-Trump outside group will pull its ads assailing GOP Sen. Dean Heller over his opposition to the now stalled Obamacare repeal bill — a move that follows massive backlash from senior Republicans who called on the organization to stop attacking the Nevadan.

America First Policies had begun airing TV and radio ads on Tuesday savaging Heller for his planned 'No' vote, with spots charging that Heller had broken his "promise" to voters that he would dismantle Obamacare — a stunning attack on a member of the president's own party and the most vulnerable Republican up for re-election in 2018.

But on Tuesday evening — just a few hours after the TV and radio ads went up and after Senate Republicans tossed plans to vote on the legislation this week — the group, which is staffed with several of the president's top campaign aides, decided to stop running the ads, two senior Republicans familiar with the decision told POLITICO.

An America First Policies official said the decision followed Heller's decision to appear at the White House with other Republicans on Tuesday, arguing that it was evidence that he was open to negotiating on the bill.

The purpose of launching the campaign, this official argued, was to pressure Heller into coming to the negotiating table — which he'd now done.

Anger over the TV ads became a topic of discussion at the White House meeting, with Heller himself raising them as a point of concern, according to a spokeswoman for the Nevada senator.

"Let's just say that I would say it was maybe a background issue" during the meeting, said South Dakota Sen. John Thune.

Since the group announced the offensive on Friday, it has come under fire from Republicans, including Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, who privately fumed that the attack would make it harder to get Heller's support. McConnell's political team also reached out to the group, pleading with them to stop the commercials.

A number of senior Republicans, including former top officials at the National Republican Senatorial Committee, also spoke out against the barrage, saying it would make Heller's already difficult re-election even tougher.

Seung Min Kim contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Emboldened industry lobbyists try to scale back Medicaid cuts Back

By Adam Cancryn and Paul Demko | 06/27/2017 07:08 PM EDT

Hospitals, doctors and nursing homes have one last chance to shape a Republican bill to repeal and replace Obamacare they say will hurt millions of old, poor and sick Americans — and their own bottom lines.

After being on the sidelines for much of the repeal debate, the groups see an opening in the meltdown of the Senate health care bill. They're particularly worried about the legislation's proposed deep cuts to Medicaid, the country's largest insurance program, which covers 74 million people.

Medicaid "was established to prevent our country's most vulnerable citizens from being left behind, and it's truly become a lifeline for millions of Americans," said Rick Pollack, CEO of the American Hospital Association, during a call with reporters on Tuesday. "Even Republican senators are sounding alarm bells over the harm these deep cuts would cause for vulnerable patients in their states."

A coalition of the nation's largest provider groups is airing ads across 12 states this week linking the Senate bill to worse care for millions, including children, the disabled and the elderly. Health care lobbyists are targeting shaky senators both in D.C. and in their home states, hammering home the idea that Medicaid cuts could skyrocket charity care and force hundreds of small and rural hospitals out of business. And on Monday, the trade group representing nearly 14,000 nursing homes broke its silence to deliver a scorching indictment of Senate Republicans' bid to remake Medicaid.

"We genuinely believe that if the senators had any idea of the extent of the impact on [nursing homes] in the country that they'd never be proposing this," American Health Care Association President Mark Parkinson said. "If they adopt this bill, the future of long-term care as we know it will be very different."

Insurers are taking a less combative stance, but they're also warning that the cuts would have grave consequences. The Association for Community Affiliated Plans has released an ad criticizing the Senate plan that it says will run during MSNBC's "Morning Joe" program. Last week, a group of 10 major Medicaid plans sent a letter to Senate leaders blasting the GOP repeal bill, arguing that it would cripple state budgets and hurt efforts to combat the opioid crisis.

"If the goal is to reform the Medicaid program and reduce costs, there are different ways of going about it than just taking a hatchet to the budget," said John Baackes, CEO of L.A. Care Health Plan, one of the signatories to the letter.

The lobbying effort still pales in comparison to the scorched-earth tactics of the health insurance industry that derailed former President Bill Clinton's proposed health care overhaul more than two decades ago. But the effort has been bolstered by the Congressional Budget Office's projection that the bill would leave 15 million more Medicaid-eligible Americans uninsured over a decade, and cut federal payments to states by a quarter.

Soon after the CBO report was released, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) vowed to oppose the bill unless it was made more generous. Sen. Dean Heller (R-Nev.), whose state expanded Medicaid under Obamacare, previously came out against the legislation over its cuts to the program.

That leaves Senate Republican leaders in a bind: If they soften the Medicaid cuts to placate moderates, they're likely to antagonize conservative hardliners. That dynamic is making it difficult to arrive at a compromise that can attract 50 votes.

Senate Republicans kept such disagreements out of the headlines for weeks by drafting their repeal plan behind closed doors, vowing that it would be superior to the House version. But as soon as the draft legislation became public, those fissures came into view — and health care lobbyists were waiting to exploit the divisions.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell bowed to that reality Tuesday in announcing that Republicans would continue to work on the bill and not hold a vote before the July 4 recess — a deadline that he'd previously indicated was non-negotiable.

"Legislation of this complexity almost always take longer than anybody would hope," McConnell told reporters. "But we're going to press on."

The uncertainty is likely to further embolden industry lobbyists. Even before Tuesday's announcement, they were expressing confidence that they could prevail on key expansion-state senators in Alaska, Arizona, West Virginia and Ohio.

"This is not fine wine," said one lobbyist, describing the unhappiness with the bill among Republican senators. "It does not get better with age."

Hospital groups are working closely with expansion-state governors, including Ohio's John Kasich, Arizona's Doug Ducey and Nevada's Brian Sandoval, to exert pressure on senators.

The CBO score projecting coverage losses and deficit savings gave the industry groups some sense of how much they can ask for.

"Having the Senate bill provides a level of clarity we didn't have before," said Tom Nickels, AHA's executive vice president for government relations and public policy. Nickels described the industry as being in "purgatory" between hammering the House bill and trying to anticipate the Senate bill.

The Senate plan notably went further than the House bill in curbing future Medicaid spending. The upper chamber would have eventually limited Medicaid spending growth per beneficiary to the consumer price index, which is far below the current growth rate.

"No element of our health care system has come close to CPI cost growth, certainly in my lifetime," said Ceci Connolly, CEO of the Alliance of Community Health Plans. "That's an unrealistic aspiration."

That's one area where Republicans might scale back the cuts. But it's tough to see how they're going to significantly reduce the CBO projection of 15 million fewer insured while continuing to scrap Obamacare's Medicaid expansion.

Already, Senate Republicans have given up on making radical changes to the individual market. Their plan calls for subsidies to be available to individuals with incomes up to 350 percent of the federal poverty level, down from 400 percent under Obamacare.

That's a far cry from seven years of campaign promises to completely dismantle the federal health care law. Despite the challenge forging consensus, Senate Republicans insist that they'll eventually coalesce around a repeal package that fulfills that goal.

"You're dealing with people's lives with health care," Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) told reporters Tuesday, after it was announced that the repeal vote would be delayed. "I'd rather do it right than do it fast. But obviously you can't wait forever."

To view online click here.

Back

Poll: Fewer than 4-in-10 voters back GOP health bill Back

By Steven Shepard | 06/28/2017 06:18 AM EDT

Just 38 percent of voters approve of the Republican plan to repeal and replace Obamacare, according to a new POLITICO/Morning Consult poll conducted before Senate leaders pulled the latest version of their bill in an effort to win over more GOP votes.

That's fewer than the 45 percent who disapprove of the Republican health care bill. Another 17 percent say they don't know or have no opinion of the bill.

Six in 10 Republican voters approve of the bill, but a quarter of members of President Donald Trump's party disapprove. The numbers among Democrats are a mirror image: Twenty-five percent approve, and 64 percent disapprove. But independents tilt against the measure: Only 30 percent approve, and 43 percent disapprove.

The intensity gap is on the side of the bill's opponents: Thirty-one percent of voters overall "strongly" disapprove of the bill, roughly double the 16 percent who "strongly" approve.

The results are similar to voters' views of the health care bill that recently passed the House — though the wording of the poll question was changed in this new survey to reflect the Senate's consideration of its own measure.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said Tuesday that the chamber would not take up the bill this week as previously planned. The POLITICO/Morning Consult poll was conducted June 22-24 — prior to both the Kentucky senator's Tuesday announcement and the release on Monday of the Congressional Budget Office's report on the bill's effects.

Other measures in the poll also point to the bill's challenges. More voters think the bill will make the nation's health care system worse (41 percent) than believe will make it better (29 percent). More think it will increase costs for their families (42 percent) than think it will decrease those costs (21 percent). Thirty-eight percent think the bill will hurt the quality of health care, and only 26 percent think quality would be improved.

Though the poll was conducted before the CBO released its projection that 22 million fewer Americans would have health insurance if the Senate bill became law, the report confirms voters' beliefs: Forty-six percent say they expect the bill would decrease the number of Americans with health insurance, while only 21 percent believe more people would be insured.

As Senate Republicans attempt to recalibrate the bill to rein in moderate and conservative defectors, voters are divided on the scope of the effort. Thirty-eight percent say the legislation goes too far in making changes to the health care system, and another 23 percent say it doesn't go far enough.

It's a split that exists within the GOP, as well.

"The tension between moderate Republicans and hard-liners that is playing out in the Senate is mirrored in the polling," said Kyle Dropp, Morning Consult co-founder and chief research officer. "While 31 percent of Republican voters think the Senate bill doesn't go far enough in making changes to the health care system, 18 percent thinks it goes too far."

Republicans in both chambers have focused on advancing health care legislation solely with votes in their own conferences, but the POLITICO/Morning Consult poll shows more voters trust Democrats to handle the issue. Forty-six percent of voters trust Democrats in Congress more to handle health care, while only a third trust Republicans more.

President Donald Trump remains far more popular with GOP voters than the Republican health care bill: 80 percent of Republicans approve of the job Trump is doing. But Trump's overall approval rating is still underwater: 45 percent of voters approve of his job performance, and 51 percent disapprove.

The POLITICO/Morning Consult poll surveyed 1,994 registered voters and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2 percentage points.

Morning Consult is a nonpartisan media and technology company that provides data-driven research and insights on politics, policy and business strategy.

*More details on the poll and its methodology can be found in these two documents —
Toplines: <http://politi.co/2sO62tj> | Crosstabs: <http://politi.co/2rYF3II>*

To view online click here.

Back

Trumka: 'We will not relent' in fight against GOP health care bill Back

By Ian Kullgren | 06/28/2017 11:13 AM EDT

AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka said today he will keep mobilizing forces to kill the GOP health care bill.

In a conference call with reporters, Trumka said the AFL-CIO is pouring resources into five key states — Ohio, Alaska, West Virginia, Nevada and Maine — to sway on-the-fence Republicans. The efforts include TV and social media ads, public rallies, town halls and phone drives to get voters to call senate offices.

"We will not relent until it's dead and gone," Trumka said.

Trumka took credit, in part, for eroding support in the Senate and delaying a vote on the bill.

"Working people brought this bill to a screeching halt," Trumka said. "We mobilized in record time, and we're not about to step down."

To view online click here.

Back

Why I'm Not Betting Against Mitch McConnell Back

By Jeff Greenfield | 06/28/2017 01:34 PM EDT

If you're planning to watch Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell cajole a clutch of disaffected Republican colleagues into casting a "yes" vote for the moribund health care bill, arm yourself with a scorecard and calculator. With nearly $200 billion to allocate—assuming that effort doesn't infuriate his more conservative colleagues—you can expect a blossoming of catchy catchphrases to describe the efforts of a wily negotiator whose capacity for pulling legislative rabbits out of hats should never be underestimated.

Remember the "Cornhusker Kickback," the derisive term Republicans used in 2010 to describe the goodies that Democrats bestowed on Nebraska to win over their foot-dragging senator, Ben Nelson? Well, we've already seen the "Aleutian Advantage," aimed at the high cost of medical care in Lisa Murkowski's Alaska. Soon we may see the "Badger Bestowal" (for Wisconsin's Ron Johnson), the "Buckeye Benefaction" (for Ohio's Rob Portman), the "Pine Tree Premium" (for Maine's Susan Collins) and the "Sunflower Subsidy" (for Pat Roberts and Jerry Moran of Kansas).

The run-up to the actual vote (assuming McConnell does not fold his cards and give up) is going to feature running tabs on every cable news channel and political website, along with daily prediction models and betting odds. With that kind of frenzied coverage, it's hard to remember that there are some fundamental underpinnings to this fight that are worth keeping in the front of your mind:

1. The Vote Will Be Close, Because That's the New Normal.

Once upon a time, major social legislation was the product of bipartisan consensus. In 1935, Social Security was passed by votes of 372-33 in the House and 77-6 in the Senate. Thirty years later, Medicare passed 313-115 in the House and 68-21 in the Senate; a plurality of House Republicans and 13 GOP senators voted "aye." But over the past quarter-century, a very different pattern has emerged. President Bill Clinton's tax and budget proposals passed by a single vote in the Senate—Vice President Al Gore broke a 50-50 tie—and with a 219-213 vote in the House. George W. Bush's prescription drug plan passed 220-215 in the House, but only after GOP leaders held the vote open for hours. Barack Obama's stimulus proposal won exactly 60 votes in the Senate—the bare minimum to avoid a filibuster—and his Affordable Health Care Act won the same 60-vote minimum. And the House's bid to "repeal and replace Obamacare" passed earlier this year with 217 votes—one more than the bare minimum, due to vacancies. That bill was nearly defeated because of the polarization of the parties, and in particular the threat of primaries within the Republican Party by foes of anything that smacks of government regulation or taxes. Now, competing cross-pressures on Republican conservatives and moderates all but assure that McConnell will have almost no margin for error.

However ...

2. There's Enormous Incentive Not to Let the President Lose a Key Vote

In every one of those key votes, the president prevailed. Why? Because, when the vote is that close, no member of Congress wants to be seen as the person who inflicted a poetical defeat on a president of his or her own party. Back in 1993, then-Senator Bob Kerrey—no fan of Clinton's character or policies—decided at the last minute to support Clinton's budget proposal, telling him: "I could not and should not cast a vote that brings down your presidency." Further, these reluctant party members have often been rewarded with significant concessions. Clinton abandoned any effort at an energy tax to win over suburban Democrats; Obama's health care plan bent heavily toward insurance companies to help win the support of Senator Joe Lieberman, whose state of Connecticut was home to many insurance companies. At Lieberman's insistence, the bill also dropped the whole idea of a "public option," a step toward a single-payer system dear to the hearts of more progressive Democrats.)

And in this case, concessions are even more likely because ...

3. "Winning" Matters Way More Than What's Actually in the Bill

There's a story about a spectator at a bullfight who sees a vendor selling "Hot Meat Pies." When he bites into one, it's cold, doughy and meatless. When he complains, the vendor says: "No, no— 'Hot Meat Pie' is just the name of the pie."

That is where the Republicans are today. They have spent seven years promising their base that they will "repeal and replace Obamacare." At this point, that is all that matters. To quote political analyst Vince Lombardi, "Winning isn't everything, it's the only thing." So, if it takes a substantial increase in Medicaid funding—if it takes firm protection for people with preexisting conditions—or, alternatively, if it takes letting states permit grossly inadequate insurance policies—that is what will be in the bill. The one likely invulnerable provision is the massive cut in taxes for the affluent; abandoning that would be akin to the Roman Catholic Church declaring that the Trinity is just a suggestion. You can see this mentality in a recent column by conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt, who chastised wayward Republican senators that "to vote 'no' on whatever compromise arrives is to express contempt for the Republican Party as a whole."

Complicating the negotiating is something we have never seen before, namely ...

4. The President Has No Idea What's in the Bill and No Idea Whether He'd Back It If He Did Know

In every recent case, presidents were fully engaged in the struggles to shape these bills. Clinton and Obama were policy wonks; George W. Bush, while often painted as detached when it came to details, was a full partner in the struggle to get his prescription drug plan through the House. Trump, on the other hand, is on record as declaring that 2 plus 2 equals 5, or 7, or 86. By that I mean he has promised to fully protect Medicaid, lower premiums, decrease deductibles and increase benefits, all at a lower cost. His familiarity with the process can be gauged by the fact that he a) threw a victory party after the House passed the bill, and b) later declared the bill as "mean" and "a piece of s—." During the first round of House negotiations, my colleague Tim Alberta reported, the president had trouble cutting a deal "because he lacked familiarity with the legislation itself"; this week, the New York Times reports that the president seems not to have understood that the Senate bill's centerpiece is a massive tax cut.

It is not too much to say that if someone suggested he "repeal and replace Obamacare" by taking the Medicare law and striking "over 65" from it, Trump would embrace the idea with enthusiasm. The problem for McConnell and his colleagues, then, is that the only assurance they have that the president will not undercut whatever deal they strike is that he has the same focus on detail as Governor William J. LePetomane in "Blazing Saddles."

Taken together, these underlying realities suggest that, if you're betting on history to repeat itself, McConnell will get 50 votes for his bill. But betting on history these past two years has proven to be a fool's wager; if McConnell does manage to pass the bill, it will be the legislative equivalent of squaring a circle.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate GOP seethes at Trump impulsiveness Back

By Alex Isenstadt and Josh Dawsey | 06/27/2017 09:06 PM EDT

Top GOP officials and senators say White House chaos and impulsiveness are crippling efforts to expand the Republican Senate majority in 2018, unraveling long-laid plans and needlessly jeopardizing incumbents.

There's a widespread sense of exasperation with the president, interviews with nearly two dozen senior Republicans reveal, and deep frustration with an administration they believe doesn't fully grasp what it will take to preserve the narrow majority or add to it.

The most recent flash point involves Nevada Sen. Dean Heller, who was attacked by a White House-sanctioned outside group after announcing his opposition to the now stalled Obamacare repeal bill. Heller, the most endangered GOP incumbent up for reelection in 2018, was initially targeted with a surprise $1 million digital, TV and radio assault — an act of political retaliation that stunned senators and other top GOP officials.

The TV and radio commercials, produced by America First Policies — which is staffed by a number of Trump's top campaign aides — accused Heller of refusing to keep his "promise" to dismantle Obamacare.

The offensive reflected Trump's mounting frustration with Capitol Hill Republicans who refuse to advance his stymied legislative agenda and was designed to send a loud message that it's time to get on board. Yet it infuriated Majority Leader Mitch McConnell himself, who privately fumed that it would make it harder to get Heller's support for the legislation. Some McConnell allies reached out to the organization directly to express their displeasure and to plead with it to cease the attacks, reasoning that it could badly hurt Heller's already challenging reelection bid.

"I share the administration's frustration on members wavering on repeal, but the answer is not to attack the most vulnerable member of the conference," said Rob Jesmer, a former National Republican Senatorial Committee executive director.

By Tuesday evening, after several senators complained directly to the president about the anti-Heller ads during a meeting earlier in the day at the White House, the group decided to stop airing the spots. Heller himself brought up the commercials during the meeting, a spokesman for the senator confirmed. (An America First Policies official insisted that the group pulled the commercials because Heller showed up to the White House discussion, arguing that his presence demonstrated he was willing to negotiate on the bill.)

"[Halting the ads] was a responsible decision that I'm hopeful leads to a good working relationship going forward," said Josh Holmes, a former McConnell chief of staff.

McConnell has also been stewing about another race: the Alabama Senate primary, which has turned into a personal priority for the majority leader. For weeks, McConnell and top political aides had been asking the Republican National Committee to release coordinated funding to help newly appointed Sen. Luther Strange, who is trying to fend off a large field of GOP primary opponents in a late summer special election. The NRSC and another McConnell-allied group, Senate Leadership Fund, are already aggressively boosting the Alabama senator.

Yet after weeks of requests, no RNC expenditures have been granted, and Senate Republican strategists began to wonder whether the requests had simply been lost in a bureaucratic logjam — or worse, whether the anti-establishment president was reluctant to have the national party wade into a contested primary.

The lack of commitment caused so much consternation that McConnell and Strange brought the matter directly to the White House, asking for the administration to approve of the funding. Strange has talked directly to Trump about it, according to two sources briefed on the matter. McConnell personally lobbied chief of staff Reince Priebus, a former RNC chief of staff who remains plugged into the committee's operations.

As of Tuesday morning, however, according to a RNC official, the national party still hadn't given final approval.

White House spokespersons did not respond to a request for comment.

In Arizona, where Republican Sen. Jeff Flake, a Trump critic, is facing a difficult reelection, Trump-fueled primary worries are intensifying. Prior to the 2016 election, Trump vented openly about Flake's criticism of him — at one point, backstage before a campaign rally in Arizona, telling top aides animatedly that he wanted to find a Republican opponent to challenge the senator in 2018, according to two people familiar with the exchange. The administration's anger at Flake has flared anew amid his criticism of the president's decision to fire former FBI Director James Comey.

Flake has already drawn a Trump-friendly primary opponent in former state Sen. Kelli Ward, and two other allies of the president — Trump 2016 campaign COO Jeff DeWit and former state GOP chair Robert Graham — could also try to unseat him.

Republican officials say they expected some turbulence as they learned to coexist with a president who is, at heart, a political newcomer who is relatively unfamiliar with congressional politics. But even so, the wild unpredictability of the Trump White House has led to considerable consternation and rattled a GOP firmament that views next year's Senate election landscape as a golden opportunity to expand the majority.

"No committee likes instability, and it appears they're creating instability," said Rob Collins, who as NRSC executive director during the 2014 cycle helped to lead the successful GOP push to seize control of the upper chamber.

Appearing before a small group of donors and activists recently, NRSC Chairman Cory Gardner (R-Colo.) expressed concern about how the political environment is making it harder to get candidates into races and said the wooing of potential Senate candidates was going slower than expected, said one person who was present for the private gathering.

Potential contenders, he said, were deeply uncertain about whether to enter races given the challenging political conditions and worried that things could get worse.

An NRSC spokeswoman said "our recruitment efforts are going as planned" and disputed the notion that Gardner had concerns about Trump or the political environment.

"Chairman Gardner, who didn't get into his Senate race until March of 2014, knows firsthand that candidates do not need to announce early in a cycle to win," said Katie Martin, the spokeswoman.

Trump has already complicated the GOP's 2018 candidate recruitment plans, dating back to just before the inauguration, when the president nominated Montana Republican Ryan Zinke to the Interior secretary post. McConnell had been pursuing Zinke for months, viewing the congressman as a prized recruit who could defeat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester in 2018, and had met with him to discuss a possible race. Top party strategists had reviewed polling data suggesting that Zinke would start out the contest in a virtual dead heat with the incumbent.

When he found out that Trump was about to tap Zinke for the Cabinet post, McConnell launched a late effort to get him to reconsider. He phoned several White House officials and explained to them that Zinke was a top prospect in the Montana race, one whom Senate Republicans had been after for months, said one person familiar with the calls. It didn't work.

McConnell had been pushing the White House to appoint a pair of red-state Democratic incumbents up for reelection in 2018, West Virginia Sen. Joe Manchin and North Dakota Sen. Heidi Heitkamp, to Cabinet positions — a gambit that would have improved the GOP's odds of seizing their seats.

Yet Trump ignored the advice. While Manchin and Heitkamp were invited to Trump Tower — something they were happy to publicize to their conservative constituents — neither was tapped. In the months since, Manchin, who faces the hurdle of running for reelection in a state that Trump won by over 40 percentage points, has eagerly presented himself as something of a White House ally — a rare Democrat who is willing to work with the president.

The image of Manchin being close to the president — fed by a photo of Manchin seated next to Trump in the White House, and by the tales the senator tells of his phone conversations with the commander in chief — have created headaches for the NRSC, which has planned to target the West Virginia seat aggressively. At the committee's Capitol Hill offices, said one senior Republican, discussion about how to contend with the perception that Manchin is working with the president has come up in meetings.

For Senate Republicans, not everything about the Trump White House has been negative. Among party operatives, there is extensive praise reserved for Vice President Mike Pence, who has emerged as the administration's de facto ambassador to Republicans planning for next year's races.

Pence has begun promoting the party's Senate contenders. During a stop in West Virginia, Pence asked to take a photo with GOP Rep. Evan Jenkins, who is challenging Manchin, and then posted the picture on his Twitter feed, accompanied by the caption: "Enjoyed seeing Rep. @EvanJenkinsWV while visiting Charleston, WV today. Thanks to his leadership we will Make America Great Again."

"There is nothing more powerful than a fully engaged and fully functional White House," said Jesmer. "One that is using its political arm to sell its agenda on TV and online. One that is using the prestige of Air Force One and Air Force Two to garner significant grass roots and earned media. And one that has a coordinated messaging strategy with allies on the Hill, the Cabinet and stakeholders."

For now, the GOP will have to be content with the president's efforts in Florida, one of the swing states he won in 2016. During a recent visit, Trump began a speech by noting that he wanted the state's Republican governor, Rick Scott, to run for Senate in 2018. It was an unexpected move, given that other Republicans might be interested in seeking the seat and because presidents typically don't weigh in on primaries at such an early stage in the election cycle.

"I hope he runs for Senate," he said, before interrupting himself. "I know I'm not supposed to say that."

Seung Min Kim contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

House Republicans want to cut funding for administration's telecom arm Back

By John Hendel | 06/28/2017 03:59 PM EDT

House Republicans want to slash the fiscal 2018 budget for the Commerce Department's telecom and tech arm even more than the Trump administration budget would. Legislative text unveiled this afternoon would allocate $30 million for the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, about a quarter less than what it's received in recent years and $6 million less than what the White House suggested in its proposal.

NTIA is the administration branch responsible for helping manage wireless spectrum owned by federal government agencies such as the Department of Defense. It's also run several initiatives to spur broadband deployment and helped get the FirstNet public safety broadband network off the ground. The agency recently described in its budget justification many tasks it would not be able to perform even if only funded at $36 million.

The GOP measure would also forbid "NASA and the Office of Science and Technology Policy [from] engaging in bilateral activities with China unless authorized or certified via procedures established in the bill," the House Appropriations Commerce, Science and Justice subcommittee noted. It would allocate $865 million for the National Institute of Standards and Technology, a cut of $87 million from the current fiscal year but $140 million more than the White House recommendation.

The subcommittee plans to take up the measure for markup Thursday.

Republicans also unveiled the Financial Services funding bill, which would cut the FCC budget from about $340 to $322 million, on par with what the White House requested. The Financial Services subcommittee will mark up that bill on Thursday as well.

To view online click here.

Back

Business associations to Congress: Hurry up on tax reform Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 06/28/2017 03:25 PM EDT

Some of Washington's most influential business lobbies just gave Congress a clear message on tax reform: Hurry up.

"In the short-term, we urge you to press forward with the adoption of a Fiscal Year 2018 concurrent budget resolution including reconciliation instructions that would aid the swift passage of comprehensive, pro-growth tax reform," the groups wrote in a rare joint letter addressed to leaders of both parties in both chambers of Congress.

Signing on to the letter were the Chamber of Commerce, the Business Roundtable, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business.

Tax reform advocates have become increasingly restive about the pace of the effort, particularly with Congress and the White House bogged down on repealing and replacing Obamacare.

"We understand that the Senate is actively considering health care legislation, but it is important that the House start the budget process now, so that reconciliation instructions will be available to move tax reform legislation expeditiously," the groups wrote.

"The federal tax code has weighed America down for far too long. You now have a once-in-a-generation opportunity to substantially improve America's economy, but accomplishing this task may well require the special legislative procedures attendant to a budget resolution's reconciliation instructions," they added.

House lawmakers have reached an impasse over the level of spending cuts to include in instructions for reconciliation, a budget maneuver that Republicans plan to use to avert a Democratic filibuster in the Senate. Conservatives, including House Budget Committee Chair Diane Black (R-Tenn.), are pushing for spending cuts to be tied to the reconciliation instructions House Speaker Paul Ryan wants to use for tax reform.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Budget hawks explain away deficit-growing tax plan — McConnell: Budget floor vote expected after recess — DeVos anticipates up to $6.5M security tab
Date: Tuesday, October 03, 2017 3:53:10 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 10/03/2017 03:50 PM EDT

ON DEFENSE: Both chambers will take key votes this week to push their budget resolutions closer to reconciliation. And that laser-sharp focus on tax reform is putting self-described fiscal conservatives in a tight spot.

Even OMB Director Mick Mulvaney is now talking about the "need to have new deficits." And Sen. Bob Corker, who's taken so much heat for the Senate's $1.5 trillion tax outline, has begun his own damage-control operation — telling anyone who will listen that he won't back a plan that would add "one penny" to the deficit.

Who's the judge? But Corker has also made clear that he won't be making his final decision based on the tallies of the two official scorekeepers: CBO and JCT. Instead, he's sticking by the well-worn GOP argument that only a dynamic score (one that factors in potential economic growth) will matter. That viewpoint doesn't translate to reconciliation, however, because the Byrd rule makes dynamic scoring difficult (if not impossible) to use. With that in mind, folks like Corker contend that the $1.5 trillion in deficit-growing wiggle room is just a necessary legislative fallacy. "This is a vehicle to get through parliamentary issues, period," he said.

Pay no mind: The Senate Budget Committee will spend two full days marking up its fiscal 2018 plan this week (not that Corker thinks you should care). "Look, the budget itself is always a joke. It's a total joke, it's not worth the paper that it's written on," he said. "To spend more than five minutes looking at the budget is like spending five minutes too much time on it."

Timing: The Senate's budget is expected to make it to the floor after next week's recess, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said today. The Senate will be out for the week following Columbus Day.

GOOD TUESDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc(s) of the day — CBO estimates that the House GOP's bill to ban most abortions after 20 weeks could cost as much as $335 million over 10 years. The bill, H.R. 36 \(115\), the Pain-Capable Unborn Child Protection Act, would result in additional births and lead to increased spending on Medicaid.

Two House Democrats wrote this week to the Interior Department's inspector general, calling for an investigation into how often Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife has joined him on taxpayer-funded charter or military flights. More from Esther Whieldon.

#DailyBudgetFact — The average single parent paid \$12,536 in taxes in 2015. A single person with no children paid an average of $17,387 that year.

EDUCATION

RENEWING DeVOS' SECURITY CONTRACT: An agreement governing Education Secretary Betsy DeVos' protective detail — which is provided around the clock by the U.S. Marshals Service — was just renewed for fiscal 2018, Caitlin Emma reports. And an Education Department official says $6.54 million is the "high water mark" the department doesn't plan to exceed for those expenses over the next year. (DeVos' setup is unique since Education secretaries are usually protected by the department's own small security force.)

DISASTER AID

A FEW MORE WEEKS: The White House is expected to formally request its next funding package for hurricane recovery in "mid-October," McConnell told reporters today, just after hosting a meeting with representatives from Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

OFF SCRIPT DOWN SOUTH: "I hate to tell you Puerto Rico, but you've thrown our budget a little out of whack," Trump told local officials after touching down this afternoon on the hurricane-ravaged island, where he's now face to face with the "politically motivated ingrates" he has slammed on Twitter over the last few days, Matthew Nussbaum notes. While Trump continues to say the federal government's response has been stellar, local officials — like U.S. Virgin Islands Del. Stacey Plaskett — contend that there's a "disconnect" between what the Puerto Rican people need and what the feds are providing, Jacqueline Klimas and Colin Wilhelm report.

WIRELESS WORKAROUND: At the FCC, Chairman Ajit Pai is asking commissioners to quickly approve up to $76.9 billion in funding flexibility to repair wireline and wireless communication networks in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, John Hendel reports. The order would let companies use money from the commission's universal service program fund, typically reserved for funding broadband deployment in hard-to-reach areas.

BUDGET

CALLING HER SHOT: Two days before her budget resolution lands on the floor, Rep. Diane Black is pulling a Babe Ruth and pointing to the bleachers. "We're gonna pass it," the Budget chairman said confidently as she exited this morning's GOP conference meeting, skirting the question of how solid that tally will emerge. "We're going to have enough votes up on that board to pass that bill."

About those next steps ... We also asked Black if she's made a decision on whether to stay on as chairman through the joint conference committee, but no dice. "I'm just going to take this one step at a time," she said.

'A STARTING POINT': Democrats on the Budget Committee have fired the starting guns in this fall's budget negotiations, calling for $603 billion in defense discretionary and $570 billion in domestic spending in fiscal 2018. John Yarmuth, the top Democrat on that panel, today called it a "starting point," adding that he's aiming for the same kind of compromise that Congress achieved in April. "I think that's actually a very good model for what we might see in December," Yarmuth told reporters.

Pushing for parity: The Democratic budget touts "the idea of parity" for defense and nondefense funding — though that doesn't mean equal spending for both. It just means raising spending by the same amount, which — in this case — is $54 billion above the caps. In contrast, the Progressive Caucus' budget would put defense and domestic spending at the same $570 billion level — amounting to a much bigger boost on the domestic side. When asked why he didn't seek equal funding levels in the Democratic wish list, Yarmuth said "we're trying to have some degree of fiscal responsibility in the budget as well, so that's really the compromise we made."

Countdown to caps: Yarmuth says he doesn't expect negotiations over budget caps to begin in earnest until November. But the issue is clearly on his radar. "There is some support on the Republican side to do that. How extensive it is, we don't know yet," Yarmuth told a group of advocates today. "But I think the potential is there to do that." The Kentucky Democrat noted that some House appropriators, like Hal Rogers, are on his side.

LEADERSHIP

RYAN WENT TO BAT FOR PRICE: In the minutes before the White House announced Tom Price's ouster Friday, House Speaker Paul Ryan apparently made a last-ditch plea to prevent the HHS secretary's dismissal, Josh Dawsey and Rachael Bade report. According to two people with knowledge of the call, White House chief of staff John Kelly dialed up the speaker before the Trump administration announced Price's resignation. Despite the secretary's pricey travel habits, Ryan reportedly urged Kelly to reconsider, touting Price's experience in Congress and work in the administration.

APPROPRIATIONS

COLLINS WEIGHS HER OPTIONS: Senate appropriator Susan Collins says she's given herself until mid-October to decide whether to leave her influential perch for a gubernatorial run back home. And as Burgess Everett writes today, the Maine Republican is truly torn. "Given the contentious environment in Washington right now, my voice and vote matter a great deal," the Transportation-HUD cardinal said. "On the other hand, if I were fortunate enough to be elected governor, I could work more directly on job creation."

HEALTH CARE

PARTISAN PAY-FORS: It's usually pretty easy to get Democrats on board with funding the Children's Health Insurance Program. But the five-year proposal the House Energy and Commerce Committee released Monday night is no sure bet for bipartisan backing. As Rachana Pradhan explains, Republicans are proposing to fund the package by increasing means-testing in Medicare for wealthier seniors, allowing states to remove lottery winners from state Medicaid programs, changing Medicaid's third-party liability policy, cutting more than $6 billion from Obamacare's Prevention and Public Health Fund and changing the Affordable Care Act's grace period for missing premium payments.

Clock's ticking: Since the committee is just now moving this week to mark up the bill — four days after federal funding for the program expired — states are working to keep their programs afloat until Congress ultimately clears a new extension, Brianna Ehley explains. The Kaiser Family Foundation says at least 10 states will deplete funds by year's end. And some states say they expect to terminate enrollment at the start of 2018 or shift eligible kids to other government insurance programs if Congress doesn't act in time.

ENTITLEMENTS

WELFARE REVAMP IN THE WORKS: The White House is working on an executive order aimed at tightening requirements under welfare programs, Andrew Restuccia reports. Federal agencies received a draft order for comment last week, according to two administration officials. One of the officials said the draft calls on agencies to propose new rules, including tighter work requirements, as well as streamlining or eliminating redundant services and establishing metrics for holding agencies accountable for program performance. The order is also expected to encourage greater cooperation with state and local governments.

FLOOD INSURANCE

JUICING THE DEBATE: Besides funding the government by Dec. 8, Congress must also take on the (potentially trickier) task of extending the National Flood Insurance Program beyond that date — as cries for a revamp are amplified by the fact that the program has now hit its $30 billion borrowing cap. But Zachary Warmbrodt explains that the controversy last week over whether to attach a flood insurance rider to the FAA bill, H.R. 3823 \(115\), actually seems to have breathed new life into the overhaul effort.

COAST GUARD

IF YOU DON'T ASK ... House lawmakers are urging the Coast Guard to submit a detailed request for emergency funding to cover agency damage from recent hurricanes, Tanya Snyder reports. During a House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee hearing today, subcommittee leaders Duncan Hunter and John Garamendi encouraged Coast Guard officials to give the White House facility-by-facility accounts and photos of the more than $320 million in property damage the agency sustained.

TRANSPORTATION

SHUSTER'S PREDICTION: House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster says he hopes the Trump administration releases its next batch of infrastructure principles "in the next week or so," Lauren Gardner reports.

EARMARKS

- Reliant on Medicaid dollars, small hospitals shut down maternity wards just to stay afloat. POLITICO Magazine.
- Tax cuts, sold as fuel for growth, widen gap between rich and poor. The New York Times.
- How devastated Puerto Rico really is, by the numbers. VICE.
- Connecticut towns grapple with big funding cuts amid budget deadlock. The Wall Street Journal.
- Some congressional Republicans question tax plan over deficit costs. Washington Post.

WE'RE COUNTING: 66 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017).

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/budget-hawks-explain-away-deficit-growing-tax-plan-024894>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Grijalva asks Interior IG to include Zinke's wife in travel probe Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/02/2017 04:10 PM EDT

Two House Democrats are calling on the Interior Department's inspector general to investigate how often Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife joined him on taxpayer-funded charter or military flights in light of her involvement in a Republican Senate campaign.

Lolita Zinke is chairing the campaign of Troy Downing, a businessman who is vying to unseat Sen. Jon Tester next year.

"Because the secretary's spouse is leading a senate campaign in Montana, tax-payer funded travel for Mrs. Zinke, especially to or from Montana, deserves heightened scrutiny," wrote Raúl M. Grijalva and Donald McEachin in a letter today to Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall, the top watchdog within Interior. Grijalva is the top Democrat on the House Natural Resources Committee, and McEachin is ranking member of its oversight subcommittee.

POLITICO reported earlier today that the IG's office has opened an investigation into Zinke's travels.

The inspector general's office has not decided on the scope of its investigation but it is "focused on the secretary's travel at this point," said Nancy DiPaolo, IG spokeswoman. The investigation, which was launched Friday, "is at its earliest phases," she said. "We'll likely be looking into travel, modes of travel, costs and schedules, etc."

To view online click here.

Back

DeVos' security detail could cost up to $6.54M over the next year Back

By Caitlin Emma | 10/02/2017 06:20 PM EDT

Education Secretary Betsy DeVos' security detail could cost up to $6.54 million from now through the end of September 2018, an Education Department official told POLITICO on Monday.

That projected cost is seen as a "high water mark" that the agency doesn't plan to exceed, said spokeswoman Liz Hill.

An agreement governing DeVos' protective detail — which is provided around the clock by the U.S. Marshals Service — was just renewed for fiscal 2018, which began on Saturday.

The Education Department paid the marshals $5.28 million for her protective detail from February through September of this year — about $2.5 million less than what was projected.

That's because both agencies were able to find cost savings, Hill said. For example, DeVos

pays for the marshals to fly with her on her own private plane, which reduces travel costs, she said. DeVos foots the bill for the plane.

It's extremely unusual for the Education secretary to be protected by marshals — the past four Education secretaries have been protected by the Education Department's own small security force.

Drew Wade, a spokesman for the U.S. Marshals Service, said he couldn't disclose the number of employees protecting DeVos or the "nature of threats against the secretary" due to "reasons of operational security."

The agreement signed by the Education Department and the U.S. Marshals Service includes salaries and benefits for the marshals, their travel and per diem expenses, one "leased and equipped limousine" for DeVos and other vehicles, according to a copy of the first agreement signed by both agencies, obtained by POLITICO through a Freedom of Information Act request. That first agreement is dated March 28.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump brings harsh edge to Puerto Rico trip Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Nolan D. McCaskill | 10/03/2017 05:03 AM EDT

President Donald Trump brought a jarring tone to Puerto Rico as he was briefed on the hurricane devastation, appearing to blame the U.S. territory for having "thrown our budget a little out of whack" and complimenting officials for sustaining only 16 deaths, compared with the much higher human toll of Hurricane Katrina.

"I hate to tell you, Puerto Rico, but you've thrown our budget a little out of whack because we've spent a lot of money on Puerto Rico," Trump said Tuesday in his first public remarks from the island, which declared a form of bankruptcy in May. "And that's fine."

The president also appeared to boast that the death toll in Puerto Rico pales in comparison to the more than 1,800 fatalities that followed Katrina in 2005.

"We saved a lot of lives," said Trump, who added that "every death is a horror" and broached what he called "a real catastrophe" in Katrina.

"Sixteen people versus in the thousands," the president said, overstating Katrina's death toll.

"You can be very proud of all of your people, all of our people working together," he told Gov. Ricardo Rosselló. "Sixteen versus literally thousands of people. You can be very proud. Everybody around this table and everybody watching can really be very proud of what's taken place in Puerto Rico."

Trump came face to face Tuesday with the "politically motivated ingrates" he slammed on Twitter just days before, landing in Puerto Rico after spending much of the past week boasting about a wildly successful response effort that hasn't matched the reality of the hurricane-ravaged island — and after picking a fight over the weekend with the San Juan mayor.

The visit comes as he's also attempting to be soother-in-chief for the nation after a shooting in Las Vegas left at least 59 dead on Sunday night — the first time he's had to navigate two disasters of national scope that are politically perilous for any president, but especially one prone to off-the-cuff riffs.

The Puerto Rico stop marks only the start of emotionally charged travels for Trump this week. On Wednesday, he is scheduled to travel to Las Vegas to meet with the families of victims of Sunday's massacre.

Trump struck a somber tone in his first public comments on the deaths in Las Vegas, decrying the "act of pure evil" and calling for unity. On Tuesday, though, he traded the scripted and controlled setting of the East Room for a storm-ravaged island where more than half of the residents remain without access to drinking water and only 5 percent of the island has electricity.

Trump extended praise to his administration and Rosselló, Puerto Rico's Democratic governor. And he asked Puerto Rico's Republican non-voting congresswoman, Jenniffer González, to repeat past praise of the administration's response for the television cameras.

"He's not even from my party, and he started right at the beginning appreciating what we did," Trump said of Rosselló. "Right from the beginning this governor did not play politics. He didn't play it at all. He was saying it like it was, and he was giving us the highest grades. And on behalf of our country, I wanna thank you."

Trump, however, sought to have the plaudits reciprocated, noting that he watched González say "such nice things about all of the people that have worked so hard" the other day and asking her to repeat her compliments.

"Jenniffer, do you think you can say a little bit [of] what you said about us today?" Trump asked. "And it's not about me. It's about these incredible people, from the military to FEMA to first responders. I mean, I've never seen people working so hard in my life. Perhaps you could say, Congresswoman?"

Cameras captured the president engaging in a conversation with a hurricane victim, asking multiple questions and commending public officials in closing. And the pool of reporters following the president described a pair of bizarre basketball-related exchanges.

Trump asked a teenager if he played basketball and was going to the NBA. After handing out bags of rice at a church, Trump began shooting paper towels into the crowd — mimicking the motions of a jump shot.

Trump has courted controversy by blasting on Twitter the "poor leadership ability" of Puerto Rican officials, who he said "want everything to be done for them." Trump also said the island's leaders "are not able to get their workers to help," and he accused Carmen Yulín Cruz, the Democratic mayor of San Juan — who repeatedly slammed the Trump administration's response to Hurricane Maria — of trying to score partisan political points by criticizing him.

"We have done a great job with the almost impossible situation in Puerto Rico. Outside of the Fake News or politically motivated ingrates," Trump tweeted on Sunday.

All the while, he's kept up an upbeat tone about the response. He told reporters in the Oval Office on Monday that it's "amazing what's been done in a very short period of time." He added: "There's never been a piece of land that we've known that was so devastated."

Other officials have echoed his attitude. "The federal government is doing everything within our powers and capabilities to first focus on the life-sustaining and life-saving measures as well as on the rebuilding process," press secretary Sarah Sanders told reporters on Monday.

Even with sourness from the weekend's controversial tweets lingering, some see a reason for guarded optimism. Luis Fortuno, who served as the territory's governor from 2009 to 2013 and is now a lobbyist in Washington, was working to deliver supplies in San Juan on Saturday morning when he received a call from Trump.

"The White House is already thinking of the next phase, the reconstruction phase," Fortuno said in an interview. "I think that this time around they are thinking outside the box," about more than just bringing Puerto Rico back to the infrastructure status it had prior to Maria.

But Trump will have to do more than just sing the praises of his own response to the storm.

"People don't want to hear 'Hey, we're doing great,' and they don't want to hear, 'Hey, we're doing awful,'" said Tevi Troy, a senior George W. Bush aide who wrote a book, "Shall We Wake the President?", about White House disaster response. What they want, Troy said, is concrete information about what's being done to help them and how long it will take to get back to normal.

It's an added bonus if federal and local elected officials show a united front, Troy added. He pointed to President Barack Obama's famous visit to New Jersey with Republican Gov. Chris Christie after Superstorm Sandy days before the 2012 presidential election as evidence that such bipartisan accord is possible.

But while Trump had political allies at his side in Texas and Florida — where Govs. Greg Abbott and Rick Scott have been energetic supporters — he's working alongside Democratic politicians who are for the most part strangers in Puerto Rico.

It is unclear whether Trump will meet with Cruz, the San Juan mayor. She has been invited to participate in Tuesday's events, Sanders said Monday.

Trump appears to have learned lessons following his first visit to a disaster scene, when he was widely criticized for making a trip to Texas in the wake of Hurricane Harvey that didn't involve actually meeting with — or even mentioning — any victims. In a subsequent trip to Texas and a trip to Florida after Hurricane Irma, Trump met with people directly affected by the storm, giving out hugs and supplies at shelters.

Trump's White House received generally high marks for its handling of Harvey and Irma in Texas and Florida. But that narrative has changed as the full scope of devastation from Maria has come into view — and as Trump devoted his attention to picking a fight with the NFL over player protests during the national anthem.

"He seemed to be in full operational mode in Texas and Florida, and then his energy tapered off when it got to Puerto Rico," said Douglas Brinkley, a presidential historian at Rice University.

The initial poor handling was compounded by Trump's weekend Twitter feud, he added.

"It made him look small, not big," Brinkley said, and it potentially complicates the optics for Tuesday's trip, when optics are of significant political importance. "It's going to be extremely awkward. ... The possibilities of being booed or hissed at are very large."

Colin Wilhelm contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Puerto Rico still in crisis as Trump arrives Back

By Jacqueline Klimas and Colin Wilhelm | 10/03/2017 05:05 AM EDT

When President Donald Trump arrives in Puerto Rico on Tuesday, he'll find an island on the verge of spiraling into a deepening crisis, with 95 percent of the power grid still knocked out and more than half of the 3.4 million residents lacking access to clean drinking water.

Answering calls for a more robust federal response, including from the three-star general leading efforts on the ground, the military is deploying additional forces and sending 18 more aircraft to help provide medical care and reach isolated communities. That's on top of the more than 12,600 federal employees — including 7,000 troops and 700 FEMA workers — who are already clearing roads, providing security, distributing generators and handing out fuel, water and millions of meals in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

But all of that still may not be enough. Much of the help isn't matching what people actually need, in what Del. Stacey Plaskett (D-U.S. Virgin Islands) on Monday called a "disconnect" with federal officials.

And Democrats who visited FEMA headquarters on Monday said they were discouraged by what they heard and blasted the Trump administration's leadership.

"The government is not responding with the urgency that is needed," Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) said on a conference call with reporters Monday. "There is no dollar estimate for what is needed because there is no plan in place."

Sen. Richard Blumenthal (D-Conn.) agreed, praising federal responders and military personnel on the ground but highlighting the disparity between the size of recovery force and the scale of devastation.

"Instead of 5,000 of our men and women in uniform, there should be 50,000," he said.

Plaskett, in an interview, cited the Army Corps of Engineers' repairs to the Virgin Islands' potable water system as an example of how aid attempts have gone awry. Most residents on the islands live in rural areas and don't use the water system, instead relying on cisterns to collect rainwater under their homes, Plaskett said. That means that, even with the water system repaired, many are still without access to drinking water — something she said the Army did not realize.

There are some signs of improvement. Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló said Monday that wait times for gas are down to under an hour, compared to six or seven hours just a few days ago, and 37 percent of the island's residents now have cell service. FEMA Administrator Brock Long, who arrived in San Juan on Monday, said he saw rush-hour traffic and people cutting lawns.

"The bottom line is what I saw was progress being made today," Long said. "I didn't see anybody in a life-threatening situation at all."

Alejandro De La Campa, the leader of the FEMA region that includes Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, said 65 percent of grocery stores and almost 70 percent of gas stations are open.

Despite FEMA's assessment, power is still out on much of the island. Officials said residents in populated areas should get power back "within weeks or a couple months," but those in more remote areas could be without power for up to 10 months.

The Army Corps of Engineers has distributed 79 generators to critical facilities, like hospitals and sewer stations, with 400 more on the way, said Lt. Gen. Todd Semonite, the commanding general. But most hospitals are still without power, and the fact that most of Puerto Rico's telecommunications grid continues to be down makes it hard for federal and local authorities to know where an emergency response that could save lives is needed.

Over the weekend, Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Buchanan, who is leading the federal response in Puerto Rico, told PBS that the damage is "the worst I've ever seen" and said the military would be sending more resources.

Luis Fortuño, the former governor of Puerto Rico, said he's seen a difference in San Juan since Buchanan's appointment last week.

"As soon as the general came down, things started moving in the port," said Fortuño, now a Partner at Steptoe and Johnson, which lobbies on federal health care funds for Puerto Rico.

Fortuño said he told Trump that the island needs more military aid and a longer waiver to the Jones Act allowing foreign ships to make deliveries to the territory during a phone call on Sept. 30.

"The president expressed his personal commitment" to see the recovery through, said Fortuño.

"The White House is already thinking of the next phase, the reconstruction phase," Fortuño said. "I think that this time around they are thinking outside the box," to not only restore Puerto Rico to its pre-Maria state, but devote resources to improve the territory's infrastructure.

The Trump administration has yet to submit to Congress a supplemental funding request for FEMA to cover the costs of disaster relief, but a proposal is expected later this week and early estimates put the requested figure at $10 billion to $15 billion. The White House maintains that emergency funding for FEMA passed last month after Hurricane Harvey will suffice until mid-October.

Trump's visit could improve his understanding of the problem, said James Norton, a former deputy assistant secretary at the Department of Homeland Security who worked on the Hurricane Katrina relief package under former President George W. Bush.

Seeing a hurricane-ravaged area firsthand can "really have an impact on your thinking," Norton said.

"People are in a situation where they have no lights, no power, no water. They're looking for answers from government," he said. "I just think they'll be wanting to know what else is coming, what other help is coming."

To view online click here.

Back

Pai unveils FCC proposal to help rebuild Hurricane Maria-ravaged telecom networks

Back

By John Hendel | 10/03/2017 12:40 PM EDT

FCC Chairman Ajit Pai unveiled a proposal today designed to help with the rebuilding of damaged communications networks in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, still racked by problems following Hurricane Maria. He circulated the order internally within the agency Monday.

"I shared with my colleagues an order that would quickly make available up to $76.9 million of funding to repair wireline and wireless communication networks and restore communications services in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands," Pai said in a statement.

The order would let companies use money from the commission's universal service program fund, typically reserved for funding broadband deployment in hard-to-reach areas. It would also let companies receive such funding early, Pai said: "Instead of receiving a standard monthly payment, carriers could elect this month to receive seven months' worth of funding immediately in order to expedite repair and restoration efforts."

Pai urged commissioners to approve the order as soon as possible and said he would place it on the Oct. 24 meeting agenda if not approved by then.

To view online click here.

Back

Ryan asked White House to reconsider ousting Price Back

By Josh Dawsey and Rachael Bade | 10/03/2017 01:22 PM EDT

Speaker Paul Ryan last week urged the White House to reconsider ousting Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price, his longtime friend who had come under fire for often using a taxpayer-funded private jet for travel, according to two people with knowledge of the call.

John Kelly, the White House chief of staff, called the Wisconsin Republican minutes before the departure was announced Friday afternoon. It was a heads-up call, one White House official said.

Ryan urged Kelly to reconsider and touted the Georgia Republican's experience in Congress and work in the administration, one of the people familiar with the call said.

Price has long had the speaker's ear on policy matters and was part of Ryan's old "Jedi Council," a group of fiscal conservative rabble-rousers who used to powwow when Republicans were in the minority.

But Kelly made clear that Price was out, and the call quickly ended, one of the people said.

A spokeswoman for Ryan and a White House spokesman declined to comment on the call.

The conversation reflected a private disagreement between the White House and Ryan's office — not an unprecedented occurrence — even as the two sides have tried to show a public alliance to advance a repeal of Obamacare, tax reform and other legislative priorities.

It also shows how the decision to oust Price caused some angst on Capitol Hill.

Price officially resigned on Friday after he came under fire for his frequent use of private and government planes for travel, at a cost to taxpayers of more than $1 million since May. POLITICO revealed in a series of articles that Price flew at least 26 times on private aircraft, a sharp break with his predecessors' practice. He also used military aircraft for multi-national trips to Africa, Europe and Asia.

Even though the jet scandal was the direct cause of Price's ouster, the secretary had slowly lost the president's trust over a number of months. Price rarely attended Oval Office strategy meetings, was seen as having insufficient influence on Capitol Hill, and was associated in Trump's mind with the repeated failure to repeal Obamacare.

Ryan, however, has long considered Price a top ally with a similar mindset. The two met with other conservatives for weekly policy breakfasts during the "Jedi Council" days. And Price also stuck by Ryan's side when he first proposed his controversial GOP budget privatizing Medicare.

After Price resigned last Friday, Ryan released a statement calling him a "good man" and "superb secretary" — as well as a friend.

"Tom Price is a good man," Ryan said. "He has spent his entire adult life fighting for others, first as a physician and then as a legislator and public servant. He was a leader in the House and a superb health secretary. His vision and hard work were vital to the House's success passing our health care legislation. I will always be grateful for Tom's service to this country and, above all, his continued friendship."

To view online click here.

Back

Collins agonizes over decision to ditch the Senate Back

By Burgess Everett | 10/03/2017 05:00 AM EDT

Sen. Heidi Heitkamp was watching TV recently when she saw a report that Susan Collins was considering a run for Maine governor and soliciting advice on the decision.

The North Dakota Democrat quickly shot a text message to her Republican colleague: "Don't do it."

A move by Collins to seek the governorship would rock the Senate and the broader political landscape. In a chamber controlled by just 52 Republicans, Collins and a handful of other centrist senators can decide the fate of President Donald Trump's agenda. And a run by Collins for governor could eventually cost the GOP one of its last congressional footholds in New England.

Collins is torn over whether to leave her prominent perch as one of the Senate's few true moderate legislators, according to her colleagues. If Collins had made up her mind by now, said Sen. Angus King (I-Maine), "she already would have announced it."

In an interview, Collins said the buzz about her prolonged indecision is "accurate." She initially planned to make up her mind by the end of September, but pushed back her deadline to mid-October as she wrestled with the GOP's recent Obamacare repeal effort.

"Given the contentious environment in Washington right now, my voice and vote matter a great deal," Collins said. "On the other hand, if I were fortunate enough to be elected governor, I could work more directly on job creation."

She added: "That's why it's such a difficult decision to make. And I'm trying to figure out where I matter most."

A Governor Collins would leave centrists like Heitkamp even more lonely in the Senate. But Heitkamp acknowledges that Collins is feeling a tug to return to Maine full time: "Fundamentally, she wants to go home."

"She is [up in the air]. And I think she had hoped to make a decision before this," said Heitkamp, who herself weighed retirement before announcing this year she'd run for a second term. "I desperately hope she doesn't run."

There's also risk for the fourth-term senator. She could face a primary challenge in the gubernatorial race, fueled by term-limited Republican Gov. Paul LePage's open disdain for Collins' opposition to Obamacare repeal proposals. And if Collins runs, it would likely fuel Democrats' push to take back the Senate in 2020, since most Republicans believe she's the only person from her party who can hold the seat.

In 2012, when Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) retired, King walloped the GOP candidate. So the first thing Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) did when he took over as the Senate GOP's campaign chairman was set out to persuade Collins to run again in 2014. She won reelection with 68 percent of the vote and Republicans took the chamber for the first time in eight years.

King is begging her not to leave. And in an unusual display of bipartisanship in the Senate, so are moderate Democrats.

"She's so important to the country here," said Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.). "We don't have enough folks like her."

Republicans are fretting Collins will join retiring Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and create a wave of pragmatic GOP senators fleeing the chamber. Though Collins holds sway as one of the chamber's few swing votes, she also faces the frustration of watching her party constantly doing the opposite of what she'd like — from trying to repeal Obamacare on party lines, to refusing to hold a hearing on Supreme Court nominee Merrick Garland, to nominating Donald Trump.

In the latest Obamacare repeal effort, even after party leaders had written her off as an automatic "no," she came under unyielding pressure from the White House. Vice President Mike Pence called her last Saturday as she drove across the state, a conversation that got so in-depth that Collins pulled her car over.

They talked for 40 minutes. Not even two days later, Collins came out in opposition, delivering the knockout blow. And she says another party-line shot is unwise.

"I don't think having a partisan approach to an issue that affects one-sixth of our economy and affects millions of Americans is the right way to go," Collins said.

Collins is reevaluating her career amid some ominous developments for a politician with her profile. Prominent deal-makers in Congress are retiring just as a new wave of strident conservatives are trying to break in. Meanwhile, Republicans say they want to take another stab next year at a party-line repeal of Obamacare, and they're weighing doing the same thing on tax reform.

Collins would enjoy more autonomy and control over the agenda as governor of Maine, a job she sought unsuccessfully in 1994.

Asked whether she would run, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) cited his surprise with Corker's decision and said: "You never know with these people."

"I always expect her to act in a way that she thinks is best for Maine," said McCain, who is close with Collins and understands any aversion she might have to her current situation. "Am I happy with the environment here? Of course not. Nobody could be."

Collins said her committee work and seniority "really matter" — but she is tantalized by the opportunity to help the less prosperous parts of the state, where shuttered paper mills and an aging population have devastated the economy.

"I'm from the northern part of the state, which needs a lot of help ... two-thirds of the state is losing population and opportunity," she said. "I have some ideas for economic development that only a governor can pursue."

Maine Republicans say Collins would likely have to navigate the divide between the Trump and establishment wings of the Republican Party if she runs. LePage spent September slamming her opposition to the Graham-Cassidy health repeal bill as "shameful" as the two sparred over whether the bill would have been good for the state.

Phil Harriman, a political analyst and former Republican state senator, said LePage's attacks on Collins could be damaging given his sway over the state party, though she'd be a clear front-runner in a general election.

"It would be more complicated, at least in the Republican primary," Harriman said. "If it was today, I would say she'd probably face a primary challenge."

Collins is cognizant of the state's complicated political environment. In the past two decades, Maine has had Republican, Democratic and independent governors. Collins, Snowe and King have been among the most independent-minded senators in recent years. And Trump won an electoral vote in the northern part of the state, pushing Maine into swing-state territory.

Asked about LePage's performance, Collins was diplomatic. But she acknowledged the yawning difference between her measured moderation and his bombastic sound bites.

"I support many of Gov. LePage's policies," she said. "Obviously, he and I have very different styles and we disagree on what the impact of what Graham-Cassidy would have been."

While Republicans are fretting that the GOP's flailing governance of Washington will push Collins to join the retiring Corker and Pennsylvania Rep. Charlie Dent, it's not uncommon for senators to mull leaving the dysfunctional chamber for executive office. Most, like Heitkamp and Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), eventually decide to stay in D.C.

Manchin was the outlier among senators interviewed for this story, who hope that Collins will stay put. The West Virginia senator said she should run if "she thinks she has a shot for it."

"Best job in the world. Oh my god. There's no comparison," said Manchin, a former governor. "You never deny somebody who has that opportunity to do something good for their state."

To view online click here.

Back

Energy and Commerce unveils five-year CHIP funding bill Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 10/03/2017 12:11 AM EDT

The House has drafted legislation to extend funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program for five years, according to text posted late Monday night by the Energy and Commerce Committee.

The bill was released after Congress failed to act ahead of a Sept. 30 deadline to continue funding for the program, which covers roughly 9 million low-income children. Several states are poised to run out of funds before the end of the year and are scrambling for contingencies, in the event that Congress does not move quickly and children risk losing their benefits.

The CHIP provisions in the House bill mirror an agreement reached by Senate Finance Committee leaders last month to continue funding through fiscal 2022, according to a GOP aide. The legislation would in two years begin to wind down Obamacare's 23 percent funding boost in the federal match rate to states, and make tweaks to the law's "maintenance of effort" requirements that prevented states from reducing eligibility for the program.

The bill also includes $1 billion in Medicaid funds for Puerto Rico and would modify reductions in Medicaid disproportionate share payments to hospitals.

Energy and Commerce will mark up the CHIP bill and several others on Wednesday at 1 p.m., including legislation to repeal Obamacare's Independent Payment Advisory Board and a bill to extend community health center funding that also expired at the end of September. The Senate Finance Committee will also mark up its CHIP funding extension bill, S. 1827 \(115\), that day.

To view online click here.

Back

House GOP proposal to pay for CHIP program likely to rankle Democrats Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 10/03/2017 09:34 AM EDT

House Republicans' package to extend funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program and other public health programs would use Obamacare's prevention fund and entitlement programs to pay for it — moves that could threaten bipartisan backing for the bill.

Republicans as part of their five-year CHIP funding extension want to increase means-testing in Medicare for wealthier seniors, allow states to remove lottery winners from state Medicaid programs and change Medicaid's third-party liability policy that dictates who pays claims for enrollees before Medicaid must be responsible for costs. Their legislation to continue community health center funding for two years would cut more than $6 billion over a decade from Obamacare's Prevention and Public Health Fund, which the GOP has frequently criticized as a "slush fund," and revise the Affordable Care Act's 90-day grace period for missing premium payments down to 30 days.

The pay-fors are likely to rankle Democrats ahead of an Energy and Commerce Committee markup Wednesday. Democrats have pushed for a five-year funding extension for CHIP, a program with bipartisan support that covers roughly 9 million children and whose federal money expired on Saturday.

"The legislation offered last night by committee chairman [Greg Walden (R-Ore.)] is not a bipartisan agreement," a spokesperson for committee Democrats said Tuesday morning.

In the past, both parties have agreed to changes in Medicare that boost the premiums of wealthier seniors, but Democrats oppose GOP efforts to scrap the ACA's prevention fund and have criticized the Medicaid lottery winner proposal.

The CHIP provisions in the House bill mirror an agreement reached by Senate Finance Committee leaders last month to continue funding through fiscal 2022, according to a GOP aide. The legislation would begin to wind down Obamacare's 23 percent funding boost in the federal match rate to states in two years, and make tweaks to the law's "maintenance of effort" requirements that prevented states from reducing eligibility for the program. Fiscal conservatives have taken issue with Obamacare's funding bump because it led to roughly a dozen states' CHIP programs being fully paid for by the federal government.

The House bill also includes $1 billion in Medicaid funds for Puerto Rico and would eliminate $2 billion in reductions in Medicaid disproportionate share payments to hospitals for 2018.

Energy and Commerce will mark up its CHIP bill and several others on Wednesday at 1 p.m. The Senate Finance Committee also marks up its CHIP bill Wednesday morning.

To view online click here.

Back

States rush to preserve children's health coverage Back

By Brianna Ehley | 10/02/2017 07:21 PM EDT

States are scrambling to shore up the government health insurance program that covers 9 million low-income kids after Congress failed to meet the deadline to renew its funding over the weekend.

A number of state officials are looking for ways to keep their programs afloat, hoping Congress will approve money for the federal Children's Health Insurance Program before they have to cut off coverage.

Despite bipartisan agreement to continue the program, lawmakers missed a Sept. 30 deadline to renew funding. Many say they still have time to get money to states, despite progressive groups decrying over the weekend that Republicans allowed the program to "expire."

While states won't run out of money immediately, at least 10 will deplete funds by the end of the year, according to the nonpartisan Kaiser Family Foundation. If Congress doesn't approve funding by then, some state officials say they expect to terminate enrollment in the beginning of next year or shift eligible kids to other government insurance programs with potentially less federal support.

"This is a terrible situation for everyone who relies on CHIP to be a functioning program," said Minnesota Department of Human Services Commissioner Emily Piper.

Without getting new funding from Congress soon, Minnesota is considering tapping into its unspent federal allotment for 2017, which would fund the program for about nine months. Doing so, however, would come with a federal penalty of $10 million to the state.

"It would carry us forward, but it would be a financial strain to the state's budget," Piper said.

CHIP, now in its 20th year, is jointly funded by the federal government and the states. Historically, the federal government has provided an average of 71 percent of the funding, but a provision in the Affordable Care Act boosted federal funding to the states by 23 percentage points over the past two years.

Lawmakers say they are still planning to fund CHIP this year, though they haven't acted with urgency so far. The Senate last month unveiled a bipartisan measure, S. 1827 (115), that funded the program for five years and preserves Obamacare's funding raise for two years before it's gradually phased out. The bill was overshadowed by the GOP's last-ditch failed effort to dismantle Obamacare, but lawmakers are expected to mark it up in committee this week.

The House, meanwhile, is also expected to hold a markup on a CHIP measure this week but has not yet released a bill, which is expected to be drastically different than the Senate's. Sources say the House is unlikely to keep the enhanced Obamacare funding for more than one year. Its bill is also expected to include funding for community health centers and other health programs, which could make it hard to pay for.

State officials say the funding uncertainty is already causing logistical headaches.

"Even if Congress comes back and gives them all the money in the world, it's very distracting and destabilizing," said Matt Salo, executive director of the National Association of Medicaid Directors.

Like Minnesota, Utah is considering moving eligible children to Medicaid if the money runs out, said Utah Medicaid Director Nate Checketts. The state is also considering moving some kids to the Obamacare insurance marketplaces, where they can get subsidized coverage. However, officials are still working through the logistics.

Colorado is also looking at Obamacare's marketplaces as a fallback option. The state's CHIP program, which is expected to run out of money by the end of January without action from Congress, plans to notify families in mid-December that coverage may be terminated, triggering a qualifying event that allows them to purchase Obamacare coverage through the state's exchange. More than 75,000 children and nearly 800 pregnant women are currently enrolled in Colorado's program.

"Families want to know as soon as their coverage is potentially threatened," said Colorado Medicaid Director Gretchen Hammer. "Families know that they have coverage through January, and they want to know what their options are."

California's Department of Health Care Services said it's still business as usual for the state's CHIP program, which receives more than $2 billion a year and covers about 1.3 million children and pregnant women. The program is expected to run out of funding in December.

"Right now, it is a tough balance between the reality of a true urgency facing state CHIP programs and not wanting to create panic for families whose children depend on CHIP coverage," said Kristen Golden Testa, director of the California health program at The Children's Partnership.

In Texas, funding is expecting to dry up in January or February for a program covering nearly 400,000 children and 36,000 pregnant women in the state. Texas budget writers estimated Texas would receive $3.2 billion in federal funding for CHIP over 2018 and 2019.

"With so many families across the coast impacted by Hurricane Harvey, CHIP and Medicaid help families maintain coverage," said Lou Fragoso, president of Texas Children's Health Plan, which covers 430,000 people in Texas, about 15 percent of whom receive CHIP. "This is critical, especially for those in communities devastated by the recent storm and flooding."

The Texas health department has warned that it would begin winding down the CHIP program after funding runs out early next year. But close observers say the state hasn't made serious preparations because Congress is widely expected to continue funding the program.

Victoria Colliver, Rachana Pradhan, Renuka Rayasam and Joanne Kenen contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump administration weighing executive order on welfare Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 10/02/2017 04:34 PM EDT

Trump administration officials are mulling an executive order that would instruct federal agencies to review low-income assistance programs, part of a coming effort to make sweeping changes to the country's welfare system.

The White House began circulating a draft order to federal agencies for comment last week, according to two administration officials, who were granted anonymity to discuss the internal deliberations.

One of the officials said the draft order calls on agencies to review existing regulations and propose new rules that conform to a set of broad welfare principles, including tighter work requirements that encourage recipients to shift back into the labor force.

The order also calls for streamlining or eliminating duplicative services and establishing metrics for holding agencies accountable for program performance. It also encourages greater cooperation with state and local governments.

The initiative comes as President Donald Trump shifts attention to his ambitious tax reform initiative in the wake of his failed effort to repeal Obamacare. Administration backers of the welfare executive order hope he signs it before Thanksgiving, one of the officials said.

But another official cautioned that the conversations about the order are "very preliminary at this stage," adding that the final outcome is uncertain. The order has not yet gone through the strict policy-vetting process put in place by White House chief of staff John Kelly.

"We aren't going to comment on rumors about future potential Executive Orders," White House spokeswoman Natalie Strom said in an email. "When we have something to release, we'll let you know."

The draft order, which has been under discussion by an internal White House-led working group since this past spring, doesn't target any specific program, according to one of the officials who had reviewed it, but instead calls for a high-level overview of programs across federal agencies.

The agencies in the process of reviewing the order include the Department of Health and Human Services, the Labor Department, the Agriculture Department, the Treasury Department, the Education Department and the Commerce Department.

Administration officials have been talking to members of Congress for months to discuss a broader effort to rethink the government's welfare programs. The last major welfare reform came in 1996, under President Bill Clinton.

Liberals have long criticized the 1996 bill, asserting that it hurt millions of low-income Americans. Since then, Democrats have fiercely opposed efforts to weaken welfare programs, arguing that Republicans are using the banner of welfare reform to target poor people.

Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio) and Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) have introduced wide-ranging legislation that would make changes to welfare programs, including by imposing tighter work requirements on recipients of food stamps, also known as the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program.

Jordan and Lee have said they modeled their legislation on the 1996 welfare legislation, which imposed new work requirements and limits on welfare recipients.

Trump mentioned the issue in both his January inaugural address and his February speech to a joint session of Congress. "Millions lifted from welfare to work is not too much to expect," Trump said in his February remarks.

The president's fiscal year 2018 budget proposal called for massive cuts to the social safety net, including food stamps, Social Security disability insurance benefits and the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program.

"If you're on food stamps and able-bodied, we need you to go to work," White House Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney told reporters earlier this year.

To view online click here.

Back

Flood insurance talks reinvigorated after FAA debate Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 10/02/2017 06:22 PM EDT

A short-lived controversy over whether to attach a flood insurance rider to last week's FAA extension bill has breathed new life into monthslong negotiations aimed at overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program.

Senators on both sides of the aisle said commitments were made to keep talking after a provision intended to help the private flood insurance market was stripped out of the FAA bill.

"It sharpens people's minds," said Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.), who led efforts to remove the flood provision from the FAA bill and has drafted broader legislation to reauthorize the government flood insurance program. "They understand it has to be dealt with now."

Congress has about two months to come up with a plan before the National Flood Insurance Program expires on Dec. 8. Neither chamber has passed a bill to get it done and only the House has moved legislation out of committee.

In the Senate, one of the biggest sticking points has been a proposal, S. 563 \(115\), from Sens. Dean Heller (R-Nev.) and Jon Tester (D-Mont.) intended to make it easier for private companies to offer flood insurance outside the government program.

After months of unresolved negotiations, the issue was front and center last week after the House attached its version of the private flood insurance bill to the must-pass FAA legislation, H.R. 3823 \(115\). House Republicans passed the package despite pushback from Republicans and Democrats who didn't want the proposal included.

The opposition was based partly on the merits of the policy change. Though the House passed a previous version of the private flood insurance bill with wide support, there remains concern on both sides of the aisle about how greater private sector competition would weigh on the National Flood Insurance Program, which is heavily in debt to the Treasury after a series of devastating hurricanes. One of the concerns is that private insurers will "cherry pick" low-risk policies and leave the government with those most susceptible to losses.

"There's a pretty significant lack of understanding over what this provision will do in a vacuum," Rep. Garret Graves (R-La.) said, adding that he supports the private flood insurance bill as part of "overall reform."

Part of it was about getting a bigger flood insurance bill done. In a letter last week, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and a group of senior Democrats, including House Financial Services ranking member Maxine Waters of California, warned that the House FAA bill attempted to "prejudge negotiations on a bipartisan reauthorization of the National Flood Insurance Program."

The private flood insurance provision is a high priority for House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), who has been leading the House GOP's efforts to draft a broader bill reauthorizing the program. The House version of the FAA bill with the flood insurance item would have taken a major issue off the negotiating table. Hensarling has said the private flood insurance proposal could help provide homeowners with more affordable options.

"I don't oppose this policy," Waters said on the House floor last week. "I voted for it last Congress, and I voted for it when we marked it up in committee this year. But moving this bill, at this time, while ignoring all the other policy responses needed for the flood insurance program and the ongoing natural disasters in our country, is simply irresponsible."

It was clear even before the House passed the FAA bill that it would be a problem in the Senate, where the private flood insurance provision has gotten much less traction. Senators including Cassidy and John Kennedy (R-La.), who has his own flood insurance reauthorization bill, quickly pushed back and had support from Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) co-sponsored an amendment with Cassidy and Kennedy that struck the flood insurance proposal from the FAA bill. The amendment and the scaled-back FAA bill sailed through the Senate, and the House passed it in little time.

Rounds and Kennedy sit on the Senate Banking Committee, which has jurisdiction over the flood insurance program and has been the home of bipartisan negotiations for months. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), the committee's ranking member, said "we didn't ask for this language from the House." Senate Banking Chairman Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) has said he supports the underlying private flood insurance proposal.

"We can find some middle ground but this is not middle ground," Rounds said.

Kennedy said the action last week would help with getting a bigger flood insurance bill done.

"I've received assurances from many of my friends on the Democratic side that they're anxious to get with us and try to work something out," he said, adding that Schumer was among them.

Tester said he too had gotten a commitment from Schumer to "negotiate in good faith" on a bill.

"We were having a hard time getting people to negotiate this issue," he said. "That should not be the problem going forward. Commitments have been made to do that."

To view online click here.

Back

Lawmakers press Coast Guard to demand more funding Back

By Tanya Snyder | 10/03/2017 11:40 AM EDT

House lawmakers want the Coast Guard to recoup some of their hurricane-sustained losses as part of an emergency supplemental — but underscored that the service will need to ask for it.

The Coast Guard sustained more than $320 million worth of property damage from Hurricanes Irma and Harvey, with numbers not yet available for Hurricane Maria. That's on top of $77 million worth of unfunded damage from Hurricane Matthew last year.

In his opening statement at a hearing today, House Transportation Coast Guard Subcommittee Chairman Duncan Hunter noted that the Coast Guard, situated as it is outside Department of Defense, "has not been included in defense budget protections or increases" and in fact "has seen budget reductions requiring the elimination of over 1,500 positions between fiscal years 2013 and 2015."

"It's important that the Coast Guard go to the president at this point and say, 'look, this is what we've incurred and we need to be included in supplemental,'" Hunter told Coast Guard officials, saying it makes it easier for Congress to do their jobs if the budget request comes from the president.

Ranking member John Garamendi noted the need for the Coast Guard to supply facility-by-facility accounts of the damage, with pictures.

Beyond infrastructure, Rear Admiral William Kelly said the resiliency and retention of an over-stressed workforce keeps him up at night — something he acknowledged in response to Rep. Brian Mast's question, "How close are you coming to not being mission ready?"

To view online click here.

Back

Shuster hopes for new infrastructure principles soon Back

By Lauren Gardner | 10/03/2017 11:37 AM EDT

House Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Penn.) told reporters today he hopes the Trump administration releases its next batch of infrastructure principles "in the next week or so" as Republicans continue to work on a tax code overhaul.

"We've been talking to the administration for the last several months — developing, talking, giving them our advice on what we think is doable, what's not doable. We've seen their outline, but that's continuing to be adjusted, and we hope they're going to make it public in the next week or so," the Pennsylvania Republican said. "It'll be more of an outline or principles, so that we can move forward with sort of putting meat on the bone."

Shuster said a package can't move forward without input from the Ways and Means Committee on how to pay for it.

"I think they'll move pretty closely together, because I also believe that if tax reform gets slowed up a little bit somewhere or gets stuck, infrastructure is something that I think brings a lot of people on board with tax reform, especially when you go to the Senate when it's such a tight margin," he said.

Shuster said he doesn't think an infrastructure bill can get done without including without some mix of non-federal funding. A House Democrat told reporters last week that President Donald Trump had criticized public-private partnerships as a way to finance an infrastructure package during a meeting with lawmakers.

"I think it's an all-of-the-above solution" with P3s and states, Shuster said.

To view online click here.

Back

Rural Hospitals Are Dying and Pregnant Women Are Paying the Price Back

By Lisa Rab | 10/03/2017 05:39 AM EDT

BOONE, N.C.—Three years ago, Lucia Parker gave birth to her first child surrounded by people she loved. Her mother, sister, and husband were by her side at Blue Ridge Regional Hospital, and the nurses attending her were family friends. Each of them took turns massaging her back. They lifted her out of a birthing tub and gave her an epidural when the labor pains grew too intense. By the time her son was born, there was not a dry eye in the room. "It felt like family," Parker says.

The hospital, in Spruce Pine, North Carolina, was 25 minutes from Parker's home. But this February, when her second baby is due, she won't be able to deliver there. Instead, she plans to drive an hour-and-a-half southwest to Mission Hospital in Asheville, on mountain roads that could be slick with ice and snow, to give birth in a room with nurses and staffers who are strangers. "I have no idea how that's actually going to work," she says. "I am not gonna know anybody when I have this baby." She doesn't have much of a choice. Blue Ridge's labor and delivery unit, which delivered 173 children last year, shut down on September 30. The next closest hospital with a maternity ward, McDowell Hospital in Marion, is roughly an hour southeast of Parker's home, but she's afraid to drive there in labor. To reach it, she would have descend 1,400 feet in elevation, navigating a road with curves so tight motorcycle riders call it "The Devil's Whip."

Parker is not alone. As Congress debates repealing and replacing the Affordable Care Act, rural hospitals are in a kind of purgatory, unsure about their Medicaid budgets and the private health insurance that sustains them. At least 81 rural hospitals have shut down across the country since 2010, according the North Carolina Rural Health Research and Policy Analysis Center at UNC. The pace of closures has been increasing since the Great Recession, but the current health care policy limbo—which leaves hospitals and insurers unable to predict their income—exacerbates the problem. "The uncertainty is really impinging providers, particularly hospitals, from making the kinds of decisions that might put them on a better footing," says center director Mark Holmes.

Parker lives in an impoverished swath of rural Appalachia where the hospitals are particularly vulnerable. In her Congressional district, 20 percent of families with children live below the poverty line and more than 40 percent of residents—roughly 318,000 people—rely on some form of publicly-funded health care. Another hospital in the district, Angel Medical Center in Franklin, North Carolina, shut down its maternity ward in July, after officials said the unit was losing $2 million a year. And Parker's congressman, Republican Mark Meadows, has not intervened to keep them open. The Freedom Caucus chairman has been one of the nation's most vocal critics of Obamacare, favoring legislation that ends insurance subsidies and makes deep cuts to Medicaid.

Any cuts to Medicaid would hurt rural hospitals, says Diane Calmus, government affairs and policy manager for the nonprofit National Rural Health Association. Seventy-five percent of patients in the Mission Health system—the nonprofit that runs Blue Ridge, Angel, and four other western North Carolina hospitals—are either uninsured or on Medicare or Medicaid. These hospitals were especially hard hit when the Republican-led North Carolina General Assembly refused to expand Medicaid in 2013. Eighteen other states made the same decision, and the impact was clear: more than 70 percent of the rural hospitals that shut down in the past seven years were in 16 of those states. Four hospitals in rural North Carolina have closed since 2013, and Blue Ridge has been losing money every fiscal year since 2013. Last year it lost $3.1 million. Charity care—services that no one pays for—at rural hospitals has increased more than 50 percent since Obamacare passed. "We have a rural hospital closure crisis," Calmus says.

Holmes and other experts say the lack of Medicaid expansion is not the only cause of the crisis. They point to low Medicaid reimbursement rates, patients who can't afford their deductibles, consolidation of hospital ownership, declining rural populations, medical staffing shortages, and a longstanding trend of Southern hospitals struggling to make ends meet. "You really have a death by a thousand paper cuts situation here," Holmes says. But if a hospital wants to stay open, Calmus says, it may close a unit that is well-known for losing money: the maternity ward.

A recent study by researchers at the University of Minnesota found that more than half of the nation's rural counties no longer have hospital obstetric services, and 9 percent of them lost those services between 2004 and 2014. Katy Kozhimannil, an associate professor at the University of Minnesota School of Public Health who co-authored the study, says hospital officials make these decisions only after weighing the community's needs against their ability to keep their doors open. More than half of all births at rural hospitals are funded by Medicaid, but the program reimburses hospitals at half the rate private insurance would. Low birth rates in rural areas compound the problem, because there are fixed costs for maintaining around-the-clock nurses, technicians, doctors and equipment. Mothers in Yancey County, where Parker lives, had 182 babies in 2015, compared to mothers in Buncombe County, which contains Asheville, who had 2,625 babies that year. "Obstetrics... is not a money maker for hospitals anywhere," Kozhimannil says. "At some point, it just becomes untenable to have the staff available."

Mission Health officials say the decision to close the labor and delivery unit at Blue Ridge was not a financial one. They blame low birth rates at the hospital and concerns about "clinical quality and safety standards," says Cara Truitt, regional advocacy director for Mission Health. Truitt pointed out that Blue Ridge had just one full-time obstetrician on call to deliver babies, and officials worried about providing the "general surgery support" needed to perform C-sections. By contrast, McDowell Hospital in Marion has three obstetricians, and Mission is currently investing $45 million to rebuild that hospital, with five new delivery rooms and a C-section suite slated to open next year.

But many of Blue Ridge's doctors and nurses don't buy that argument. In addition to the obstetrician, four other people currently deliver babies at Blue Ridge, and two of them are family practice physicians trained to perform C-sections. The real challenge, some argue, is not quality but quantity: Blue Ridge was projected to deliver 200 babies this year, which was not enough to offset its expenses. "It appears to us that the motive to close labor and delivery was largely financial," the hospital's medical providers wrote in a joint public statement released this summer. "Hospitals across the country face financial challenges. Labor and delivery units usually lose money."

Mission concedes that the closure of Angel Medical Center's labor and delivery unit was due, in part, to uncertainty over the future of Obamacare and the lack of Medicaid expansion in North Carolina. If the state had expanded Medicaid, Mission would be $8 million "better off," instead of $34 million behind its budget goals, Mission CEO Ron Paulus told the local newspaper in May. (Paulus, through a spokesperson, declined to be interviewed for this story).

In April, senior Mission officials discussed the hospitals' predicament with Meadows, who told local reporters he was shocked by the announcement that Angel's labor and delivery unit would close. "Obviously it came as a bit of a surprise to me, but the decision was not predicated on anything we're working on in regards to the repeal and replace of Obamacare—it was an independent business decision that was made," Meadows told the Smoky Mountain News.

Meadows also denied that Medicaid expansion would have helped Angel keep its maternity ward open. "When looking at expanding Medicaid, it was mostly going to be for able-bodied single adults—that's a totally different argument," he said. In fact, pregnant mothers were covered by Medicaid before Obamacare passed. But Kozhimannil says an expansion would have sent more Medicaid payments to other parts of the hospital, and helped sustain money-losing operations, such as maternity wards.

Hospitals like Blue Ridge also receive special Medicaid funding, known as disproportionate share hospital payments (DSH), which help cover the cost of serving impoverished patients. Under Obamacare, those payments were supposed to disappear. In theory, they would be replaced by more patients receiving Medicaid coverage. But after many states refused to expand Medicaid, Congress repeatedly delayed the DSH funding cuts. They were slated to take effect on October 1, slashing $2 billion in federal funding from hospitals like Blue Ridge in the next fiscal year.

In May, Meadows said he was trying to find a way to avoid that funding cut. "I'm working with colleagues in the Senate on how we can work with what they call the disproportionate payment for Mission and other hospitals," he told the Smoky Mountain News. "We now have to look at how we can make sure there's incentive for taking care of those with critical needs and also keep providers financially viable." It's unclear if Meadows' negotiations were successful. His press secretary did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

In the last week of September, the doctors at Blue Ridge delivered a baby every day, sometimes more than one. "The system is not ready for our department to close," Dr. Dorothy DeGuzman said. DeGuzman, a family practice physician trained in high-risk obstetrics and C-sections, has been delivering babies at Blue Ridge for six years. Now she's afraid the hospital will not be able to help women who need an emergency C-section. "And then a baby will die, and possibly a mother."

A 2011 study of more than 49,000 pregnant women in Canada found that traveling more than an hour to give birth led to higher rates of babies being admitted to neonatal intensive care units. Mothers also have more unplanned deliveries when hospitals close their maternity wards. "They end up delivering in their car on the way to the hospital, on the side of the road, [or] in the emergency room," Calmus says.

Truitt, the Mission spokesperson, downplayed such health risks. In the "very, very rare cases" when a woman needs to give birth on her way to another hospital, she says, Blue Ridge can deliver the baby in its emergency room, and have an ambulance transport the mother and newborn to Asheville or Marion.

But DeGuzman also worries her more impoverished patients will stop going to their prenatal appointments, which could affect the health of their babies. Blue Ridge will continue to offer prenatal care, but many women prefer to see the same doctors for their pregnancies and delivery. Calmus says lower-income women might intend to drive to Asheville for such appointments, and then stop showing up because they have to take a day off work, or can't afford the gas to drive three hours round trip. And they won't have DeGuzman there to remind them. After she learned Blue Ridge's maternity ward would shut down, DeGuzman accepted a job in California. She and the obstetrician who works at Blue Ridge are both leaving because they don't want to stop delivering babies. This means the women of Yancey and Mitchell counties are losing two of the three doctors in the area who perform C-sections. "In rural America, many physicians are connected to the hospital, and when the hospital cuts service lines closes, they do lose that workforce," Calmus says. "And the workforce doesn't come back."

The people who live near Spruce Pine understand what a loss this will be. This summer, families and doctors protested the closure of Blue Ridge's maternity ward, and many were frustrated by Mission's response. "They elected to close labor and delivery at Blue Ridge, sending us back to a level of care we have not experienced in this community since the 1960's or 70's," Dr. Elizabeth Peverall, who cares for newborns at Blue Ridge, wrote in a letter to the editor of the local paper.

Some residents wonder how they will attract more young people and jobs to the area if mothers have no place to deliver their babies. Katie Willett, another patient of DeGuzman's, said she would like to see a birth center open in the area. However, Kozhimannil, the University of Minnesota professor, says birth centers, which are primarily staffed by midwives, face many of the same financial challenges as hospitals. And it would be tough for one to open without a nearby obstetrics unit available to handle C-sections.

Meanwhile, Willett's second child is due in February. She's considering delivering at a birth center in Asheville, about an hour away from her home near Blue Ridge. But she's not happy about it. "I've told Dorothy [DeGuzman], I can't imagine this process—pregnancy and labor and delivery—not here and not with her by my side," Willett says. If she goes into labor when it's snowing in the middle of the night, Willett and her husband will pack extra blankets and water in their car and start driving toward Asheville or Marion—whichever path is safest. "Worst case scenario, I think we'd have to consider the road."

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Budget writers prepare to compromise — Democrats unveil their own plan — White House could issue disaster request this week
Date: Monday, October 02, 2017 4:49:48 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 10/02/2017 04:45 PM EDT

HOLA, OCTOBER: We're certainly not legislating at light speed here, but the 10th month of the Gregorian calendar doesn't look nearly as grim as once predicted. For starters, fiscal 2018 has begun without any furlough plans for federal workers. And both chambers are slated for real budget action this week.

Put this in your Palm Pilot: The Senate Budget Committee will begin marking up its resolution at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday, with a second crack at it beginning at 10:30 a.m. Thursday. On to floor action in the House, the lower chamber plans to vote Thursday (sometime before the fly-away time of 3 p.m.) on its own budget resolution, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\).

And then: Yes, this is surely progress. But Congress' budget writers have a lot of work to do in the weeks to come, as they try to reconcile major differences between their two fiscal plans, as Sarah reports today. The most glaring divergence, of course, is that the House's proposal assumes no new deficit spending, while the Senate's resolution would allow tax writers to add $1.5 trillion without offsets.

What gives? Because of the Senate's political dynamic, the onus will probably fall on House lawmakers to give up the most during conference negotiations. And at least some of the lower chamber's fiscal hawks seem prepared to back a final product that's far less conservative than their dream deal. With a lot of coaching from leadership, many GOP legislators are already writing off the ideological loss as a necessary concession to clinch an even bigger win: tax reform. "What's become clear this year is that the budget is not a budget," Rep. Mark Sanford (R-S.C.), a member of the usually uncompromising Freedom Caucus, tells us. "At best, it's a vehicle for tax reform and a variety of other conservative hopes and dreams."

GOOD MONDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — In its first report, the Trump administration's Council of Economic Advisers called regulation "a tax on the economy" that has slowed U.S. economic growth by an average of 0.8 percent a year since 1980. More from Lorraine Woellert.

#DailyBudgetFact — The federal government has awarded $154,728 to six grant recipients in the first two days of fiscal 2018. Last fiscal year, the government doled out more than \$662.7 billion in grants.

BUDGET

DEMOCRATS' DREAM DOC: Democratic budget writers unveiled a multitrillion-dollar fiscal wish list today to counter their Republican peers' budget resolution. Like the GOP plan, Democrats would scrap federal spending caps under the Budget Control Act. But Democrats would spend $603 billion on defense discretionary and $570 billion on domestic programs, compared with the GOP's plan to spend $621.5 billion on defense and $511 billion on domestic. Summary | Text | Tables.

Bright blue blueprint: The document, drafted by Rep. John Yarmuth (D-Ky.), is jam-packed with liberal policy goals, like a minimum wage hike, paid parental leave, Pell Grant boosts, drug rebates for Medicare and an immigration overhaul. The only department that would see cuts over a decade would be Agriculture. The rest would see gradual — or in some cases, sharp — increases. In turn, the plan would balloon the deficit to about $6.7 trillion after 10 years, up from $562 billion at the end of fiscal 2017.

It's all relative: Yarmuth argues the minority party's plan would keep U.S. debt at a "sustainable" level by maintaining roughly the same level of debt held by the public — 77.5 percent this year, compared with a projected 76.9 percent over 10 years. "Unlike the Republican proposal, which betrays hardworking families to give massive tax breaks to the wealthy, our budget invests in education, infrastructure, health care, and our national security," Yarmuth wrote in a statement.

OCO crackdown: Democrats say they would fund overseas contingency operations, or OCO, at requested levels for fiscal 2018. But that war fund would disappear starting in fiscal 2019, substantially curtailing the Pentagon's budget.

EVEN BLUER: Meanwhile, Reps. Mark Pocan (D-Wis.) and Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) unveiled the Progressive Caucus' fiscal 2018 budget proposal. The 51-page document was filed as an amendment to the House GOP budget scheduled for floor action this week. The Progressive Caucus plan pitches a $2 trillion infrastructure and job investment, as well as $200 billion for hurricane relief and climate change research.

DISASTER RELIEF

THE NEXT INFUSION: The White House is preparing to issue another disaster aid request even quicker than initially expected. The $10 billion to $15 billion proposal could make it to lawmakers by week's end, Playbook scoops.

Tallying it up: Costs are piling up as the federal government runs triage in a half-dozen hurricane-ravaged states and territories, as shown in an internal FEMA memo obtained by POLITICO.

— Housing recovery has cost $1.2 billion as of Sept. 29, with 54 percent of housing inspections completed in Texas, about 17 percent in Florida and about 39 percent in Puerto Rico.

— More than 114,000 flood insurance claims add up to more than $3.3 billion so far.

— Small Business Administration loans tally about $627 million, with 71 percent processed from Harvey and 35 percent processed from Irma.

— New SNAP payments will cost nearly $119 million and benefit about 360,000 people.

— The USDA has estimated more than $4 billion in crop insurance liabilities.

The next step: Budget chief Mick Mulvaney hinted this weekend that damage assessment has already begun in Puerto Rico. "The search-and-rescue effort is over," he told CNN on Sunday. "We have made it to every single place on the island to make sure that folks are safe."

THE MILITARY'S MISTAKES: President Donald Trump has blamed the "big water" (you know, the Atlantic Ocean) for slowing the government's response in the Caribbean. But in 2010, the U.S. military responded robustly to destruction in Haiti, an island just about 400 miles away from Puerto Rico. Back then, the USS Carl Vinson arrived within three days of the earthquake, and the Air Force airlifted 15,000 Americans within days. Ahead of Maria, however, the military actually pulled out hundreds of troops. Afterward, service members were slowly redeployed and left largely without a plan, Richard Parker writes for POLITICO Magazine.

Too early for pom-poms? Trump has been his administration's biggest cheerleader on the response to Puerto Rico (as evidenced by David Cohen's tick-tock of recent tweets). And POTUS' cheery tone hasn't gone unnoticed from on-the-ground responders, as Matthew Nussbaum and Marc Caputo note. "It's kind of like a football coach at halftime saying, 'Hey, we're winning,'" Thomas Atkin, a former Coast Guard admiral, told POLITICO. "You still have half a game to play."

More: Trump's risky fight | 'Grudge presidency' | Mulvaney jabs San Juan mayor, too | Islanders make their escape | Florida braces for evacuees

TAX

LINE DRAWN ON DEFICIT: Sen. Bob Corker, newly freed from a reelection battle next year, is threatening to oppose the GOP's tax bill if it adds "one penny" to the deficit, Patrick Temple-West reports. There will be some flexibility, of course. The Tennessee Republican says he's willing to use a "reasonable score on dynamic growth" — meaning a cost estimate that factors in potential GDP gains, and not the "static" version from CBO. (Speaking of the nonpartisan budget office, House Democrats want that official score before any markups, Aaron Lorenzo reports today.)

THE MUST-HAVES: Mulvaney says there are just two non-negotiable pieces of the White House tax plan: lowering rates for average workers and businesses. "This really is about the middle class and the corporate tax rate," Mulvaney said on CNN's "State of the Union," Patrick reports.

More for the middle: House Speaker Paul Ryan also spent Sunday morning talking up the GOP tax plan to middle-income earners. On his list: doubling the standard deduction, increasing the child tax credits, scrapping the so-called marriage penalty and keeping the homeowner tax break, as Patrick notes for Pros.

More: Remember the Kansas experiment? | Tech firms go big

WHITE HOUSE

KELLY HOLDS THE PERMISSION SLIPS: Amid Tom Price's resignation Friday, Cabinet officials were informed that they'll now need top-level permission to take private flights on the government's dime. The ultimate decider of who gets to avoid commercial air travel, and when: White House chief of staff John Kelly, Matthew Nussbaum reports.

Fat lady hasn't sung: The Trump administration's private-plane pains definitely didn't end with Price's ouster. As Ben Lefebvre reports today, the Interior Department's inspector general has just opened an investigation into Secretary Ryan Zinke's use of taxpayer-funded charter planes, after the watchdog "received numerous complaints." And EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt is also still not in the clear.

More: Price regrets 'distraction' | Who will replace him? | Just the nail in the coffin | Obamacare game-changer? Not so much.

FBI

GUESS WE'LL NEVER KNOW: A federal judge has ruled that the FBI doesn't need to disclose how much it paid last year to get a private firm to unlock the iPhone associated with the 2015 terrorist attack in San Bernardino, Calif., Josh Gerstein reports. Helpful hint: Then-FBI Director James Comey said last year that the cost was more than he was expected to make in salary during the remainder of his term as head of the FBI — approximately $1.4 million.

HEALTH CARE

PLUNGING PREMIUMS: The average monthly premium for a Medicare Advantage plan will be $30 in 2018, a 6 percent decline from this year, Paul Demko reports. The number of Medicare Advantage plans available nationwide will increase from about 2,700 to more than 3,100. And the average premium for prescription drug coverage in 2018 will be $33.50 — down from $34.70 this year.

EARMARKS

- Replacing faulty heart devices costs Medicare $1.5 billion in 10 years. New York Times.
- Trump says he's trying to 'reduce size of government' — but he's really not. USA Today.
- Mnuchin: Can't guarantee tax cut for entire middle class. Reuters.
- Mortgage investors question taxpayer cost of Wells Fargo seizures. POLITICO Pro.
- Op-ed: The U.S. can no longer afford deficit-increasing tax cuts. The Wall Street Journal.

WE'RE COUNTING: 67 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017).

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/budget-writers-prepare-to-compromise-024871>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Dueling GOP budgets head for collision in quest for tax reform Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/02/2017 05:23 AM EDT

House and Senate Republicans stand poised to wage war over their dueling versions of a budget resolution that would unlock the GOP's long-desired tax reform.

Senate Republicans rolled out their fiscal 2018 budget on Friday, and the two chambers' choices couldn't look more different. The House budget would require a tax plan that does not add to the deficit, while the Senate edition would allow tax writers to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit over 10 years.

One key element the two budget resolutions do share is the special power to write a tax reform bill that requires just a simple majority vote to advance in the Senate. If they fail, Republicans give up their shot at a tax overhaul without the need for Democratic support — which may mean no tax reform at all.

The high-stakes battle over that budget divergence will come to a head during the next few weeks, as both the House and Senate aim to pass their budgets and then steam toward a compromise.

Rep. Steve Womack, who is rumored to be in line as the next Budget Committee chairman, says tax reform will be the "ultimate test for leadership," riddled with policy differences that will challenge lawmakers to consider the legislative long game. That starts with fundamental disagreements over the content of the differing budgets that would jump start the tax debate by giving a green light to the separate reconciliation process.

"There will be a myriad of reasons why people will have certain issues that they want to bring forward. To some, it will be the cuts on the mandatory side that were advanced by our '18 budget resolution. To others, it will be the potential adding to the deficit and the potential consequences for long-term debt," Womack (R-Ark.) told POLITICO.

Already, it appears some of the House's fiscal hawks will be more willing this time to cede on their fundamental demands for deficit neutrality and sizable spending cuts. The House's ambitious fiscal agenda is jam-packed with spending cuts and program overhauls.

Rep. Mark Sanford (R-S.C.), a member of the conservative House Freedom Caucus, said it's his "sense of the conference at this point" that many fiscal conservatives will be more conciliatory than usual during budget negotiations. Republicans are under intense political pressure to begin work writing their tax reform.

What makes it easier, Sanford said, is that the budget resolution is a largely symbolic document that already falls short of the ideal many Freedom Caucus members desire. Even in the House's conservative outline, most of the difficult cuts wouldn't take place for several years.

"The budget is just a tattered document," Sanford said. "At this point, it is what it is — which is maybe a vehicle for tax reform."

Budget negotiations are even trickier in the Senate, where Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) can only lose a handful of votes. Already, McConnell has had to personally intervene in tax-related disputes among members threatening to hold up the Senate's budget.

"I'll tell you what the budget resolution will be — whatever the Senate can pass," Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) said last week. "A lot of people have a hard time understanding that."

Laying out ultimatums, warns Sen. John Neely Kennedy (R-La.), will greatly impede conference negotiations on a final, bicameral product.

"I hope the House realizes what the Senate realizes — and that is the American people are very impatient with us right now," Kennedy said. "Everybody's not gonna be happy. But I don't wanna see somebody say, 'Well, because you didn't do this, I'm taking my toys and going home.'"

In the House, GOP leaders have from the start tried to push the lower chamber's budget resolution toward a final product the Senate would be more willing to accept.

Last spring, House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) convinced House Budget Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) to trim the initial goal of $500 billion in mandatory cuts to about $203 billion. And Ryan urged lawmakers during a closed-door conference meeting to remain flexible on final budget instructions and specific tax cuts.

"Don't draw any red lines. Don't say, 'I've got to have this, I've got to have that,'" Rep. Tom Cole said Ryan instructed lawmakers.

Under the House budget, any tax reconciliation bill would have to include the $203 billion in mandatory cuts achieved largely by cutting safety net programs. That prompted some GOP moderates to warn of the political optics of cutting food stamps or Medicaid to pay for corporate tax breaks.

The House budget also lays out strict parameters to prevent a tax plan from adding to the deficit, even short-term. And that language has given heartburn to Budget panel members like Rep. Jim Renacci (R-Ohio), who almost voted against the resolution because he was afraid it doesn't provide tax writers with enough funding flexibility to achieve desired cuts.

The final budget agreement, Renacci notes, will likely emerge "a little more flexible" due to Senate input.

The House's fiscal conservatives have already conceded that they expect to lose some battles over the final budget resolution.

Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), head of the House Freedom Caucus, said he supports the Senate's calls for adding $1.5 trillion to the deficit over 10 years because it "allows for us to be very aggressive on tax cuts." But the North Carolinian is firm on his insistence that the final product can't simply be a "shell" for reconciliation.

For fiscal hawks like Meadows, concessions to achieve tax reform could be ugly marks on otherwise pristine records of opposing bills that don't meet all of their deficit-reducing demands.

House Republicans will likely be forced to abandon calls for roughly $200 billion in mandatory cuts — the most ever proposed by a budget committee through reconciliation. They'll also be expected to sign on to a budget that breaks the party's cardinal rule: Achieving balance within 10 years.

Due to the tight time frame for tax reform, the House Budget Committee is hoping the Senate will be more likely to adopt some of the lower chamber's ideas, "rather than finding a middle ground on every single provision," one House GOP aide said.

"If they want to do $1.5 trillion, then maybe the compromise is they look at mandatory spending," the aide said.

Senate budget writers have assumed offsets of their own, giving the Energy and Natural Resources Committee the task of finding at least $1 billion over a decade — projected savings expected to result from opening up oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Jennifer Scholtes contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump economists say deregulation would boost economic growth Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 09/30/2017 02:02 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's Council of Economic Advisers called regulation "a tax on the economy" that has slowed U.S. economic growth by an average of 0.8 percent a year since 1980.

In its first report, the three-member panel counted some 400 "economically significant regulations" created over the last eight years.

"Though each well-intended rule aims to enhance social welfare, it is crucial to separate the intention of a given regulation from its actual impact on the economy," they wrote. "The restrictions imposed by excessive regulations create unnecessary costs that are borne by families and business owners alike and lower U.S. GDP growth."

To view online click here.

Back

SCOOP: Trump administration to ask for more relief funds Back

10/02/2017 06:37 AM EDT

SCOOP: MORE DISASTER MONEY -- The Trump administration will ask Congress to approve another between $10 billion and $15 billion for the FEMA disaster relief fund this week, according to sources with knowledge of the request. We hear the magic number will be $13 billion. This is meant to begin to cover the cost of the spate of recent natural disasters, including the storm in Puerto Rico.

THE LATEST ON PUERTO RICO ...

-- "San Juan mayor in hurricane spotlight after Trump tweets," by AP's Danica Coto in San Juan: "In Puerto Rico's hurricane-ravaged capital, it seems Carmen Yulin Cruz is everywhere these days: handing out bags of ice, wading through chest-deep floodwaters, hugging people in need of comfort. Cruz has long won attention across the island for her hands-on style of leadership in San Juan. But this week she rose to international prominence as a target of Twitter attacks by U.S. President Donald Trump — including one tweet Sunday calling her and others 'politically motivated ingrates.' ... A graduate of Boston University and Carnegie Mellon, she is also a former member of the island's House of Representatives."

<http://bit.ly/2x77rih>

-- POOL REPORT DU JOUR - AFP's Michael Mathes, quoting Trump at the Presidents Cup golf tournament in Jersey City, New Jersey: "'On behalf of all of the people of Texas, and... if you look today and you see what's happening, how horrible it is but we have it under really great control, Puerto Rico. And the people of Florida who have really suffered over this last period of time with the hurricanes,' Trump said before presenting the trophy to US captain Steve Stricker. 'I want to just remember them, and we're going to dedicate this trophy to all those people who went through so much, that we love, that are part of our great state, really a part of our great nation,' Trump said. Back to golf: 'Our team USA -- wow did you play well.'"

To view online click here.

Back

Highlights from the Sunday shows Back

10/01/2017 12:42 PM EDT

SUNDAY BEST -- SAN JUAN MAYOR CARMEN YULIN CRUZ to GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS on ABC'S "THIS WEEK": "People are being told to register via Internet for FEMA relief, when we don't have any Internet or very little Internet, even in the San Juan metropolitan area. I recognize the good heart that the FEMA people have. They want to help. But they just don't have the resources, and it's not me who's saying it.

"General Buchanan, a three star general appointed now to take care of the situation, said two days ago, we just don't have the resources in order to handle the logistical support that is needed in San Juan and Puerto Rico. But we have done all that we can. People are out there. They're cleaning the streets. Community kitchens are coming up and we are getting tons of donations. On Thursday, I got three pallets of water, four pallets of food and four pallets of baby supplies from FEMA. All of this, I gave to the mayor of Comerío, a town whose mayor had come to the FEMA distribution center and had been told just wait until next Monday, because we have nothing."

-- CHRIS WALLACE talks to FEMA DIRECTOR BROCK LONG on "FOX NEWS SUNDAY": "We can chose to look at what the mayor spouts off or what other people spout off, but we can also choose to see what's actually being done."

-- CNN'S JAKE TAPPER speaks with OMB DIRECTOR MICK MULVANEY on CNN'S "STATE OF THE UNION": TAPPER: "Let me show you one last tweet from President Trump, and then we will get to tax reform. He wrote -- quote -- 'To the people of Puerto Rico, do not believe the #fakenews.' Director Mulvaney, as I'm sure you know, 95 percent of the people of Puerto Rico are without power, 89 percent have no cell service. So they're not seeing this news that the president is attacking. But beyond that obvious disconnect, these stories that CNN is reporting on the ground in Puerto Rico, firsthand accounts from American citizens in dire need, without food, without water, without power, do you think these stories are fake?"

MULVANEY: "No, I -- what you all have done -- I have watched a lot of the coverage of showing what's happening on the ground -- is entirely accurate. I think what you have not shown, however, is the federal effort that we have got in place down there, and the fact that the governor has been very complimentary of the administration. Again, I think there's more than 70 mayors on the island of Puerto Rico, and yet you seem to spend a lot of attention on the one from San Juan. So, I think that's where the president's pushback is. I don't know if there's been coverage, for example, that we have now made it to every single town. The search-and-rescue effort is over. We have made it to every single place on the island to make sure that folks are safe."

To view online click here.

Back

The Military Was Ready in Texas and Florida. What Went Wrong in Puerto Rico? Back

By Richard Parker | 10/02/2017 09:59 AM EDT

Nearly two weeks after Hurricane Maria's landfall, the Trump administration's military aid to Puerto Rico may not be too late if it can save lives and ease the suffering of millions. But it is undisputedly arriving in amounts too little and too slowly, in sharp contrast to recent responses around the world and, most recently, elsewhere in the United States during this hurricane season.

Over the past few years, the military has conducted textbook operations in Pakistan, Japan, Thailand and Haiti—pumping in massive amounts of aid after devastating earthquakes and hurricanes in those countries, no matter how rough or isolated the conditions. Just weeks ago, the military response to Hurricane Harvey in Texas was rapid and powerful. In preparation for Hurricane Irma, the Trump administration again ordered up an extensive military relief operation.

But when Hurricane Maria struck at full strength several days later—precisely as advertised, and similar in scale to Harvey—the U.S. military simply called off the huge resources it had mustered for Hurricane Irma. An inadequately small military contingent was left on its own for nearly two weeks to help with the damage. If there was a plan for disaster relief it was not publicly apparent. And on-scene commander—crucial in crises this large—was not appointed until nearly 10 days after landfall.

No less an authority than the three-star general who reversed the disastrous initial federal response to Hurricane Katrina back in 2005, retired Army Lt. Gen. Russell Honoré, said as much. "We're replaying a scene from Katrina," he said on National Public Radio about Maria on Thursday. "We started moving about four days too late." That seems overly generous.

The voyage of the Amphibious Ready Group (ARG) led by the assault vessel USS Kearsarge helps tell the tale quite starkly. I know the Kearsarge personally; she was my salty, floating home away from home during the spring of 1999, when I covered the Kosovo War.

The Kearsarge might be impressive, but it's important not to overestimate it and the other ships in the group, Wasp and Oak Hill. An amphibious ready group such as this is designed to project a comparatively small amount of power—there are only about 2,400 marines and a relative handful of aircraft aboard—with stunning precision and speed. It is neither meant to fight a whole war alone nor save millions of people on its own.

On August 31, the Kearsarge and company headed for the Texas Gulf Coast—six full days after Hurricane Harvey made its own devastating landfall. That might seem late, but the saving grace, of course, was that other military assets reached Texas first.

Indeed, Hurricane Harvey in Houston provided a preview of how the military normally responds to humanitarian disasters. Within six days, military search and rescue filled the skies, as HH-60s flew overhead while C-130s and 17 giant C-17 and two C-5 cargo planes from as far away as Utah and New York, ferried in supplies—despite closed civilian airports. The Coast Guard alone flew in 42 helicopters and seven cargo planes. Medical patients were evacuated to San Antonio. The U.S. Northern Command sent nearly 70 more helicopters. Over 6,000 active duty troops arrived along with 5,000 and then 6,000 more members of the Texas National Guard, maneuvering in nearly 300 high-water trucks, Chinook helicopters and boats.

With Hurricane Irma ominously approaching Florida, the Kearsarge and company turned east. The military's preparations for Irma were as awesome in their scale as they had been for Harvey. Some 8,000 troops of the Florida National Guard were not only activated but, like a wartime army, maneuvered across the state as Irma craftily perplexed forecasters as to where, precisely, it would strike. Other states pitched in thousands of additional guard troops. (All of this information is drawn from Northern Command's and other public military statements.)

At sea and in the air the response built up like a clenched fist. The Kearsarge amphibious group was not only on its way but the carrier USS Abraham Lincoln made for the Keys with the support vessels USS Iowa Jima, New York and San Jacinto. And much of the entire helicopter aviation brigade of the fabled 101st Airborne Division—the world's largest helicopter army—prepared to deploy, packing its choppers into C-5 cargo planes.

The Air Force readied what's known as an air bridge: a continual flow of big C-17, C-5 and C-130 cargo planes. A U.S. military air bridge can move entire divisions—tanks, 10,000 troops, equipment and all—into combat halfway around the world overnight. This time, though, it would carry 14 million meals, water, fuel and equipment. Indeed, because of the overwhelming response, the Kearsarge was freed up to ferry British marines into the hard-hit British Virgin Islands.

But then Irma struck the Keys, spared Miami and spent itself bouncing up Florida's west coast. And suddenly, the Kearsarge's group was sailing alone into the Caribbean. It and its sister vessels headed to Dominica to evacuate that devastated island. Wasp stayed, peeled off to the U.S. Southern Command, as the rest of the group headed for Puerto Rico, arriving the day after Maria roared across it and the neighboring U.S. Virgin Islands. Kearsarge and Oak Hill were left to put a small advance party ashore in Puerto Rico to assess the situation the day after the storm and set up air traffic control. Helicopter search and rescue operations were launched and supplies were ferried ashore.

And everything else? Vanished. The Lincoln and other vessels left their posts in Florida turned back north. After dropping off fresh water in Florida, the Lincoln turned north and made port in Virginia by September 15. National Guard units returned home. The air armada of what would have been hundreds of aircraft and helicopters bound for Irma never appeared after Maria. An Army photographer captured the 101st offloading its helicopters from the C-5s in the dark, even as Maria approached.

In Washington, the president has given himself and his administration "A-pluses" for their response to Maria, claiming his administration is "doing a very good job." At the same, time, the military leadership has come off as brutally slow and suspiciously defensive. For example, testifying on Capitol Hill last Tuesday, Gen. Joseph Dunford, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, reportedly squawked that the ports and airports weren't readily accessible.

Maybe not. A relatively small number of military flights—three to six daily until recently—landed at the international airport in the capital, San Juan, which also serves as the main air base for the Puerto Rican National Guard. Now those numbers of flights are to ramp to 10 daily. And yes, the vast majority of old military facilities in the American commonwealth are shuttered.

Yet there are 15 airports or airfields in Puerto Rico, including on the smaller and remote islands of Culebra and Vieques. The Culebra airport is short but big enough for large helicopters. The Vieques airport has a runway 4,300 feet long. That's plenty big enough for a C-130, which needs a runway just 3,000 feet in length and 60 feet in width, according to the Defense Technical Information Center. The U.S. Coast Guard, a far smaller service, has reportedly been ferrying water and food via air into the airport there; if the limited air assets of the Coast Guard can make it, it stands to reason that the Air Force and Navy can, too.

On Wednesday, by the Pentagon's own count, nine airports in Puerto Rico were open. Only Thursday did the Northern Command announce that it was "adjusting" from a small seaborne operation to a larger airlift, emphasizing big cargo planes. Three harbors in Puerto Rico and eight in the Virgin Islands were serviceable to one degree or another, according to the military.

And yet in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, American citizens are waiting for the USNS Comfort hospital ship, which won't arrive until next week. Ten days after landfall there was no real air bridge. Likely dozens upon dozens of heavy helicopters are needed to move supplies until trucks are offloaded. And reservist units specifically trained for long-term humanitarian relief, water purification, medical care and military police? As of this writing, there is absolutely no sign of them. Ten days in, a few Marines, small Army elements and the Puerto Rican National Guard were ashore on their own.

In contrast, the United States eventually put 60,000 federal and reserve troops into New Orleans after Katrina after 2005, Honoré noted. Puerto Rico will need far more, he said. As in all things in the military there is a manual for responding to humanitarian disasters. The most recent version is JP 3-29, geared primarily for foreign operations, but generally applicable. This 203-page volume from the Joint Staff at the Pentagon spells out—in excruciating detail—what to and what not to do in these circumstances.

It's this kind of detail that created successes under brutal circumstances from Pakistan to Japan to Thailand—and Haiti in 2010, when the USS Carl Vinson arrived just three days after an earthquake and the Air Force airlifted 15,000 Americans within days.

In the case of Maria, at first blush, three things appear to have not been done. The first is adequately preposition forces and assets. The second is the timely appointment of an on-scene commander; the U.S. Northern Command did not appoint combat veteran Brig. Gen. Richard Kim until 10 days after landfall. The third is a detailed plan. Planning is paramount, according to the manual. And if there was one, it certainly was not publicly announced as were military relief efforts for Irma and Harvey—even though Maria's strength and trajectory were known a full four days before landfall.

The Trump administration has sought, desperately, to shift the blame and claim that this was somehow a surprise—even though a direct hit was forecast days beforehand. Later, Lt. Jeffrey Buchanan, the three-star land forces commander at Northern Command, even claimed that the hurricane's effect was not foreseeable. Again, suspiciously defensive. If the military didn't think Maria was serious, then why did it evacuate its own aircraft on the island to Guantanamo Bay?

For the military, Maria may be a singular stain upon a noble and sterling record built not on taking—but saving—lives. The Trump administration is due a serious reckoning. That's because for millions of fellow Americans in the Caribbean this is serious, if not deadly, business.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump tweets of progress in Puerto Rico Back

By David Cohen | 10/01/2017 10:02 AM EDT

President Donald Trump began Sunday with a trio of tweets extolling his administration's response to the disastrous situation in Puerto Rico in the aftermath of Hurricane Maria.

His positive remarks were in contrast to some of those he made Saturday, and some were met with criticism who thought they were inaccurate.

Trump's tweets began: "We have done a great job with the almost impossible situation in Puerto Rico. Outside of the Fake News or politically motivated ingrates ...

"... people are now starting to recognize the amazing work that has been done by FEMA and our great Military. All buildings now inspected ...

"... for safety. Thank you to the Governor of P.R. and to all of those who are working so closely with our First Responders. Fantastic job!"

His tweets were in contrast to some he wrote Saturday in which he assailed the mayor of San Juan and the news media — and seemingly mocked the population of Puerto Rico as lazy.

"Such poor leadership ability by the Mayor of San Juan, and others in Puerto Rico, who are not able to get their workers to help. They want everything to be done for them when it should be a community effort," he tweeted Saturday.

It wasn't clear whether Trump's claims Sunday were true. CNN, for instance, quoted the governor of Puerto Rico as saying that some areas of the island remain basically isolated, casting doubt on Trump's claim that "all buildings now inspected."

A White House official later clarified that "in the case of the President's tweet, inspections should equate to searches" — and added: "2,649 is the number of structures searched as of September 30th related to Hurricane Maria, which covers both Puerto Rico and St. Croix."

The official noted that various humanitarian missions continued.

San Juan's mayor, speaking on ABC's "This Week," pushed back against the president.

Mayor Carmen Yulin Cruz rejected the president's notion she was not coordinating with FEMA. "I was in FEMA the — a couple of days afterwards, when they were at the San Juan Marriott. I was invited to visit and we have been communicating ever since," she told host George Stephanopoulos.

Cruz added: "I know the good heart of the American people, and I know that when a mayday sound goes off, they come to the rescue. They did it in Haiti. They did it in Africa. They've done it all over the world. We just want it to be done here, in a Caribbean nation that has 3.5 million U.S. citizens."

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) tried to walk a fine line in the dispute between Trump and Cruz.

"I don't spend a lot of time thinking about it, to be honest with you, because right now, having lived through four hurricanes, nothing like what Puerto Rico's facing, you know, our desire is to be a voice and a force for positive results, helping people," he told John Dickerson on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Rubio added: "I do think every minute we spend in the political realm bickering with one another over who's doing what, or who's wrong, or who didn't do right, is a minute of energy and time that we're not spending trying to get the response right."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump's upbeat Puerto Rico rhetoric clashes with reality on the ground Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Marc Caputo | 09/29/2017 09:08 PM EDT

President Donald Trump says his administration is deftly responding to the devastating hurricane that leveled Puerto Rico, but the jarring gap between his rhetoric and the dramatic reports about dire conditions there is raising fresh questions about the effectiveness of recovery efforts on the island.

As his administration grapples with the third hurricane to hit the United States in a matter of weeks, and as the relief operation in Puerto Rico kicks into gear, Trump has repeatedly said he's getting positive reviews. "Puerto Rico Governor Ricardo Rossello just stated: 'The Administration and the President, every time we've spoken, they've delivered,'" Trump tweeted Friday.

But nine days after Hurricane Maria knocked out the island's power, communications system and some roadways, Americans there are still struggling to get supplies and phone service.

"There's always a danger whenever you start responding in a way that says, 'Hey we've done a great job,' and there are still people in need," said Thomas Atkin, a former Coast Guard admiral and principal deputy assistant secretary of defense under President Barack Obama. "It's kind of like a football coach at halftime saying, 'Hey, we're winning.' You still have half a game to play."

Publicly, Trump and Gov. Ricardo Rosselló have praised each other, with the president claiming Friday morning on Twitter, "FEMA and First Responders are amazing. Governor said 'great job!'" But while Rosselló has repeatedly expressed gratitude for the federal help, he told MSNBC on Friday that the federal "response still is not where it needs to be."

Part of the problem is, as Trump has said, that it's more difficult to move resources to Puerto Rico than to Texas or Florida, which were also hit by major storms recently.

"This is a lot harder than people think," said Craig Fugate, Obama's FEMA director who was largely praised for his work at the agency.

But Puerto Rico's government also was less prepared for Hurricane Maria than Texas or Florida were. Puerto Rico's electrical grid was already decayed from years of neglect and was damaged further by Hurricane Irma days before Maria hit. Once the power and cell service were knocked out, along with the roads, the government's ability to operate was crippled.

At the same time, federal officials are hampered in how decisively they can respond in Puerto Rico. Local leaders bristle at the idea the military should take over operations, for example, valuing their independence from Washington. Instead, they have requested more helicopters, military help to fix roads, and faster approval from the Federal Aviation Administration for companies seeking to fix communications systems.

"Puerto Rico isn't Texas. It isn't Florida. It's a world of its own. And it's a complete mess," said one official, in a telephone interview from San Juan, who is assisting the administration and didn't want to speak publicly for fear of upsetting the alliance between the governments in San Juan and Washington.

The sense that the Trump administration's response has been off-key has not helped.

When Trump has tried to point out Puerto Rico's infrastructure problems, he has come across as blaming it, bringing up that the island was in debt "to Wall Street and the banks which, sadly, must be dealt with," as he tweeted Monday. Pointing out the difference in preparedness compared to Texas and Florida reads as "talking down to the victim," said Tevi Troy, who served as a deputy assistant to President George W. Bush for domestic policy when Hurricane Katrina hit.

Local officials dispute that characterization as well. "We've been here for 10 days and we still don't have reliable communications ... And that's our fault? That's bad management on our part?" asked one Puerto Rico official who also did not want to be named so as not to disrupt relations with Washington.

Trump raised congressional ire on Wednesday when he explained a reluctance to waive the Jones Act, a shipping law, because he was hearing from "a lot of shippers and ... a lot of people who work in the shipping industry that don't want the Jones Act lifted." The administration waived the act on Thursday and said it had done so as soon as Puerto Rico's governor made the request.

The rest of the administration has talked up its own actions, too. Acting Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke called the Puerto Rico response a "good news story," though she later clarified that she was not satisfied. "This is textbook, and it's been done well," homeland security adviser Tom Bossert echoed, calling the response "unprecedented."

And, in a repetition of one of Trump's own favorite lines, he added: "They're going to come out bigger, better and stronger than ever."

Critics have fired back against the early celebratory talk.

"Damn it, this is not a good news story," San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz told CNN on Friday. "This is a people are dying story. This is a life or death story. This is a there's a truck-load of stuff that cannot be taken to people story. This is a story of a devastation that continues to worsen because people are not getting food and water."

The relief official who spoke to POLITICO from San Juan said mainland officials need to reorient their thinking about the depth of the problems in Puerto Rico.

"We have to think of this as societal collapse: no power, no water, no food, no nothing," the official said. "We came in thinking this would be a traditional model of disaster response ... It is up to us to keep everything moving. Civil society is pretty much gone, and we didn't realize that until like 36 or 48 hours ago. And who knows when it's going to end."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump picks risky Puerto Rico fight Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Marc Caputo | 09/30/2017 07:50 AM EDT

The natural disaster in Puerto Rico has escalated into a firestorm for President Donald Trump, whose Saturday Twitter attack on the mayor of San Juan drew harsh condemnations, new charges of insensitivity, and warnings about political fallout.

In a series of Saturday morning tweets, Trump blasted the "poor leadership ability" of Puerto Rican officials, who he said "want everything to be done for them." Trump also said the island's leaders "are not able to get their workers to help," and accused the Democratic mayor of San Juan — who has publicly criticized his administration's response to Hurricane Maria — of scoring partisan political points.

Even Republicans were uncomfortable seeing television images of suffering Puerto Ricans juxtaposed with Trump's fighting words, tweeted from his luxury golf course in Bedminster, New Jersey.

"He is definitely not helping," said Republican state Rep. Bob Cortes, a Puerto Rico native who lives in Central Florida, which has seen a huge influx of Puerto Rican families in recent years. Cortes added that the controversy "gives [Democrats] a platform to register new voters."

Other Republicans also worry that Trump's comments could be a godsend to Democrats in Florida—a swing state whose Puerto Rican population of more than 1 million is expected to swell as people flee the storm's aftermath.

Ten days after Maria ravaged the island, most of Puerto Rico is still without power and many of its 3.4 million residents, most of them U.S. citizens, lack basic supplies like food and water. Critics say the Trump administration has been slow to help, with some invoking the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans a decade ago.

The perception that George W. Bush oversaw an incompetent and insensitive response to Katrina dealt a crippling blow to his presidency from which he never recovered, helping to drive his approval ratings to the low 20s. Trump officials scoff at the comparison with Katrina, saying their response to Maria has been appropriate.

In Washington, Democrats were swift to condemn Trump's tweets Saturday.

Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, released a statement calling Trump's tweets "abhorrent, baseless, and ... beneath the dignity of the office of the Presidency."

"Lives are on the line and people are dying," he added.

Trump's early morning broadsides, which began at 7:19 a.m., came after San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz slammed the administration's response repeatedly on Friday amid growing media coverage of the devastation on her island.

"We are dying here," Cruz said in an emotional plea. "If anybody out there is listening to us, we are dying, and you are killing us with the inefficiency and the bureaucracy." Puerto Rican officials say Maria killed at least 16 people there — a number experts believe will grow significantly.

From Bedminster, Trump defended his response while dismissing Cruz as a partisan.

"The Mayor of San Juan, who was very complimentary only a few days ago, has now been told by the Democrats that you must be nasty to Trump," Trump wrote on Twitter. "Such poor leadership ability by the Mayor of San Juan, and others in Puerto Rico, who are not able to get their workers to help."

Trump added that the Puerto Ricans "want everything to be done for them when it should be a community effort. 10,000 Federal workers now on Island doing a fantastic job."

But Republicans are anxious about the political effect the Puerto Rico crisis might have on Trump's national standing as well as their fortunes in Florida, where Gov. Rick Scott is mulling a bid against Democratic incumbent Sen. Bill Nelson next year. The past four top-of-the-ticket races in Florida were decided by 1.2 percentage points or less. Puerto Rican voters already tend to favor Democrats.

"It is a political nightmare for both Trump and Scott," a consultant associated with the Republican National Committee said in a text message. He said the disaster and Trump's "asinine response to criticism" have given Democrats "a way to 1) energize Puerto Rican voters in Florida and 2) motivate Puerto Rican residents who will be Florida residents after this disaster."

While echoing those concerns, Cortes also said Puerto Rico deserves its share of the blame, thanks to the commonwealth's endemic corruption and mismanagement. "It took a storm of this magnitude to show how underprepared they were," Cortes said.

Meanwhile, the White House is fighting against the narrative that it has been slow to act. Trump's Saturday schedule lists five phone calls to discuss the storm response, including one with Federal Emergency Management Agency administrator Brock Long.

Trump also reiterated his plan to visit the island on Tuesday, saying he would "hopefully" stop off in the U.S. Virgin Islands.

Trump's White House social media director, Dan Scavino, joined the fray on Twitter, calling Cruz a "hater" and "an opportunistic politician." Cruz denied that her criticism of Trump was fueled by personal animus.

"Actually, I was asking for help," she told MSNBC on Saturday morning. "I wasn't saying anything nasty about the president." Cruz noted that even Trump's point man for the disaster recovery effort, Army Lt. Gen. Jeff Buchanan, said on Friday that the number of U.S. troops assisting is "not enough." (Buchanan said more manpower and equipment like helicopters were headed to the island.)

Trump's tweets also targeted media outlets that have dedicated increasing amounts of air time to the suffering and chaos on the pummeled island.

"Fake News CNN and NBC are going out of their way to disparage our great First Responders as a way to 'get Trump.' Not fair to FR or effort!" he wrote.

Under mounting pressure, in recent days Trump officials have defended their relief effort as a success. On Thursday, acting Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke called the response "a good news story."

The comment only inflamed frustrations on an island where a sense of helplessness prevails, however.

"Damn it, this is not a good news story," Cruz told CNN on Friday. "This is a people are dying story. This is a life or death story. This is a there's a truckload of stuff that cannot be taken to people story. This is a story of a devastation that continues to worsen because people are not getting food and water."

Cruz, a liberal Trump critic, initially avoided tussling with the president for fear that it would become a distraction to relief efforts and "not productive."

But as the week unfolded, Puerto Rico officials felt their pleas for faster action and less red tape went unheeded. Then, on Thursday, Trump touted the recovery effort on Twitter, writing, "Governor said 'great job!'" That was an apparent reference to Cruz, who finally let loose with harsh criticism.

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) also pointed to problems on the island in a Friday tweet, writing that criticism of the Trump administration response is "missing [the] main problem." FEMA "has sent lots of aid problem is distribution once it gets to #PuertoRico," Rubio wrote.

Rubio, though, warned the Trump administration privately and publicly that Puerto Rico could become a "Katrina-like" situation.

Behind the sharp debate over disaster response are internal political tensions on the island. Cruz is eyeing the job of Puerto Rico's Republican governor, Ricardo Rossello, who has taken pains to avoid publicly criticizing Trump. She is developing strong ties to Florida Democrats and met Wednesday with Miami Beach Mayor Philip Levine, a likely candidate for Florida governor, when he delivered 7,000 pounds of relief supplies to the island.

About 24 hours later, Florida's Republican governor met with Rossello in Puerto Rico, then debriefed Trump on the disaster response over lunch the following day.

"This is not a time for politics," Scott said on the White House lawn Friday, saying that Rossello is "going through an unbelievable crisis."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump's Puerto Rico response tests the limits of his fondness for grudges Back

By Annie Karni | 10/01/2017 03:53 PM EDT

President Donald Trump may not have a cohesive foreign policy doctrine or any clear ideological underpinning for his domestic agenda.

But he has a firm personal outlook on life that has driven him as a businessman, a candidate and now as president — one he outlined succinctly at an early campaign stop in Dubuque, Iowa, last year. "When people treat me unfairly," he warned, "I don't let them forget it."

Until this weekend, when Trump spent two days engaging in a personal feud with the mayor of San Juan, Trump's "grudge presidency" had not been tested by a humanitarian crisis in which lives were being lost in real time — and where there was no natural constituency for his explosion of grievances.

"We have done a great job with the almost impossible situation in Puerto Rico," the president tweeted Sunday morning from his golf club in Bedminster, New Jersey. "Outside of the Fake News or politically motivated ingrates, people are now starting to recognize the amazing work that has been done by FEMA and our great Military."

The message followed a series of tweets on Saturday lashing out at Carmen Yulín Cruz, the mayor of San Juan, accusing her of "such poor leadership ability" in not getting people on the ground to help.

It was a direct response to her emotional news conference Friday night, in which she begged the president for more help. "We are dying here," Cruz said, slamming down two thick binders of documentation that San Juan had provided to the Federal Emergency Management Agency to obtain help.

In another world, Cruz's frustration with the layers of bureaucracy standing between her wiped-out city and food and water delivery might have been in line with Trump's own interest in cutting regulations and red tape.

The props she used were similar to charts Trump has wielded at news conferences to demonstrate how obtuse the country's permitting and regulatory process can be. But Cruz's plea was interpreted by Trump as a personal insult.

"I am asking the president of the United States to make sure somebody is in charge, that is up to the task of saving lives," she said. "If anybody out there is listening to us, we are dying, and you are killing us with the inefficiency."

On Twitter, Trump noted that Cruz had been "very complimentary" to him in the past. "They want everything to be done for them," he complained, "when it should be a community effort."

To longtime Trump watchers, Trump's personal reaction to Cruz was par for the course. Last weekend, he revoked an invitation for NBA star Stephen Curry to visit the White House with his team after Curry slighted him by saying he did not want the team to make the trip.

From the perch of the presidency, he has gone after morning show hosts such as Mika Brzezinski; lawmakers from his own party, such as Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain; and members of his own Cabinet — most notably, Attorney General Jeff Sessions. He has even taken on the NFL.

Trump's criticism of Cruz was in line with how he has reacted for years to individuals who have criticized him personally.

"This stretches back to Trump's earliest days in the New York media ecosystem," said Republican strategist Rick Wilson, a frequent Trump critic. "He's a creature of the New York Post Page Six culture, and so beefs, grudges, feuds — either real or contrived — came to be associated in his mind with exposure and success. Sadly, now, of course, he's the commander in chief of the greatest nation on earth."

This time, White House officials joined in, defending Trump's feud with the mayor.

"My understanding is that as of yesterday, she had not even been to the FEMA operation center in her own city," budget director Mick Mulvaney said Sunday morning on CNN, referring to Cruz. "It is unfortunate that the San Juan mayor wants to sort of go against the grain. We'd love to have her on the team as we all pull in the same direction."

White House communications adviser Mercedes Schlapp posted on Twitter a Daily Caller interview with another Puerto Rican mayor, who accused Cruz of not participating in meetings with FEMA. "Puerto Rican mayors support federal response & POTUS leadership & humanitarian efforts," she posted on Twitter. "Liberal Media won't cover other side."

Cabinet secretaries were dispatched to the Sunday shows to explain, once again, why there was nothing surprising about Trump's unusual behavior. "When the president gets attacked, he attacks back," Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin explained on "Meet the Press." "I think the mayor's comments were unfair given what the federal government has done."

Behind the scenes, the White House press office churned out "readouts" of Trump's calls with other Puerto Rican officials — including a former governor, now working as a lobbyist in Washington, who "thanked the president for his leadership and commitment to the people of Puerto Rico."

Trump allies shrugged off the weekend back-and-forth. "Donald Trump is never going to attend a sensitivity class," said Chris Ruddy, the chief executive of Newsmax and a longtime Trump friend. "I think everyone has figured that one out. I think he's done a pretty good job handling this storm so far."

In the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey, Trump saw his response as a political opportunity to demonstrate empathy and get credit for delivering results. On Saturday, he tweeted that he and first lady Melania Trump would be visiting Puerto Rico this week, but otherwise, he was old-school Trump.

"This lack of empathy, of being able to put yourself in someone else's shoes during the worst catastrophe the island has seen — the fact that this is what he's focusing on while people are still not being communicated with, makes me ill," said Democrat Melissa Mark-Viverito, the speaker of the New York City Council and a native of Puerto Rico.

Mark-Viverito visited San Juan last weekend as part of a group of 25 representatives from New York City, she said. She defended Cruz's criticisms of the government response, based on what she saw.

"I was there last weekend, and I didn't see any FEMA representation on the ground," she said. "I went knocking on doors with the mayor — people were not waiting for the government, they were getting in their bulldozers and clearing paths. I didn't witness any sort of federal representation."

To view online click here.

Back

Mulvaney criticizes San Juan's mayor Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 10/01/2017 10:06 AM EDT

A White House official added criticism on the mayor of San Juan, Puerto Rico, a day after President Donald Trump's condemnations on Twitter.

In an interview on CNN's "State of the Union," Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney questioned San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz's response to Hurricane Maria.

"My understanding is that as of yesterday, she had not even been to the FEMA operation center in her own city," Mulvaney said, referring to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"It is unfortunate that the San Juan mayor wants to sort of go against the grain. We'd love to have her on the team as we all pull in the same direction."

As of Saturday, 10 days after Hurricane Maria ravaged the island, most of Puerto Rico was still without power and many of its 3.4 million residents, most of them U.S. citizens, lacked basic supplies like food and water. Critics say the Trump administration has been slow to help, with some invoking the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans in 2005.

Trump has said he will be going to Puerto Rico on Tuesday. He also tweeted after his initial criticism of Cruz: "Results of recovery efforts will speak much louder than complaints by San Juan Mayor."

San Juan has a population of about 347,000, according to a 2016 estimate by the Census Bureau.

Mulvaney also criticized media coverage of the administration's response to the crisis in Puerto Rico.

"I've known from Day One that there are folks who want to see this administration fail," Mulvaney said.

The media have not shown "the federal effort that we have in place down there," he said. "There are more than 70 mayors on the island of Puerto Rico, and yet you seem to spend a lot of attention on the one from San Juan. I think that's where the president's pushback is."

To view online click here.

Back

Puerto Rico's Exodus Begins with a Trickle Into Orlando Back

By Francisco Alvarado | 09/29/2017 07:42 PM EDT

ORLANDO—A few times a day, on no particular schedule, a plane pulls up to a gate at the airport here and disgorges a hundred and fifty or more exhausted, anxious, and very often hungry people. Only three hours before, they were among thousands of panicked storm victims, packed into a sweltering airport in San Juan, clamoring for an $800 seat on anything with wings that might ferry them away from the devastation left nine days ago by Hurricane Maria. Now, in the air-conditioned comfort of Concourse D, they are safe in a country that is technically their own, but they are not home.

The halting parade of evacuees that has passed through the Orlando airport over the past week—and through Miami's airport, too—lacks the visual drama of earlier crises in the Caribbean, when oppression, natural disaster or plain desperation pushed Cubans and Haitians onto crude homemade rafts or into the holds of leaky fishing trawlers. But this is every bit an exodus of that order. The means of escape is not a harrowing ordeal, but what's being left behind most certainly is. And those lucky enough to get out are not so exhausted that they can't summon anger at the government officials who they feel paid them less heed than hurricane victims on the mainland.

When Roberto Marquez and his wife Lourdes arrived at Luis Muñoz Marín International Airport in San Juan around 5:30 a.m. on September 25, they found utter chaos. "There were a few thousand people already there," the 53-year-old attorney said. "There was no power, no ventilation, no cell service and no security guards. Just airline employees sort of winging it."

The couple had tried to leave Puerto Rico before Hurricane Maria slammed into the island five days earlier, but were unable to find available seats. After the storm with its 155-mile-per-hour winds passed, Marquez was able to reach his sister in Florida, who booked two tickets on a Southwest Airlines flight scheduled to depart on September 22. It was cancelled because the airport had not reopened. Two days later, when a few flights resumed, Marquez and his spouse drove to the airport. "We had to physically be there in order to get on a list for a flight on Monday," he said. "On Monday, we were told to get in a long line of people who were being picked to get on a plane on a first-come, first-served basis."

After waiting for nearly four hours, the Marquezes boarded a Southwest jet that was supposed to depart for Orlando at 9:30 a.m. The flight didn't take off for another two hours. Marquez estimates the plane carried 166 passengers, including dozens of elderly people and unaccompanied children. "There was an old lady who had an oxygen mask and needed dialysis," Marquez said. "The man sitting in front of me was a renal patient. And I counted seven children who were 2-years-old or younger."

Marquez's sister picked them up and drove them 90 miles to Tampa, where the couple intend to stay indefinitely. "My plan is to work from Tampa for as long as I can," Marquez said. "To be honest, things were pretty bad in Puerto Rico before Maria hit us. I don't know if I am going back."

Marquez is not alone. Between September 24—the first day departing flights resumed—and September 28, more than 3,000 passengers from San Juan have arrived at Miami International Airport (Orlando airport officials could not provide similar arrival numbers). Most will likely resettle in Central Florida, which in recent years has become home to more than 1 million Puerto Ricans seeking job opportunities and financial stability as the U.S. territory continues to slog through a crippling debt crisis that has driven unemployment to 10 percent. Hurricane Maria, which left most of the island's 3.4 million people without electricity, knocked out a third of the hospitals, leveled thousands of homes and tore up hundreds of miles of road, only hastened the collapse.

"I've heard an estimated 15,000 Puerto Ricans from the island will be in Central Florida by mid-October," said Ney Rivera Garcia, a founding member of Orlando-based Puerto Rican Action Initiative. "We are preparing to do whatever we can to help our brothers and sisters."

Garcia was among dozens of volunteers packing up supplies and essentials inside El Centro Borinqueño, a large Puerto Rican community center and event venue in Orlando. The 64-year-old Puerto Rican activist said he was able to purchase airline tickets at $800 each for his daughter, his son-in-law and his granddaughter. They live in Bayamon, a city in Puerto Rico's northern coast that experienced heavy floods. "She called my wife to let us know she was fine right after the storm," Garcia said. "But it's been two days that I haven't heard from her."

Elected officials in Orange County are just beginning to figure out how to deal with the coming onslaught of Puerto Rican storm evacuees, who cannot be turned away since they are U.S. citizens. Orange County Mayor Teresa Jacobs could not be reached for comment, but in a September 28 memo to county commissioners, she said she spoke with Governor Rick Scott to determine what resources will be available to assist individuals and families who have left or plan to leave Puerto Rico.

"The governor has assured me that he is working directly with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to meet the needs of those evacuees," Jacobs wrote. "Not only must our federal government partners have a plan, a number of local entities, from schools to hospitals to social service agencies, must also be ready to welcome our friends from the storm-battered island."

However, some evacuees blame FEMA and the Trump administration for providing a slow, disinterested response to the calamity enveloping Puerto Rico. Javier Colom arrived in Orlando on a JetBlue flight Wednesday morning. The 31-year-old from Mayagüez, Puerto Rico's eighth-largest municipality, said he and three friends sustained themselves for almost a week on a diet of fruit, crackers, peanut butter and water.

He said the federal government has been dragging its feet compared to the response after Hurricane Harvey inundated the Houston area and only days later Florida was raked from south to north by an equally monstrous Hurricane Irma. "Whether we are here or in Puerto Rico, we are still U.S. citizens," Colom said. "We have sent our people to wars and to defend this country. We deserve respect from the people in charge who can help us."

Garcia echoed Colom's criticisms. "We are treated like second-class citizens," Garcia said. "We are seen as immigrants just like any Mexican or anyone from a Latin American country."

Meanwhile, Hurricane Maria refugees continue trickling through Orlando International Airport. On a Wednesday afternoon, family members anxiously waited outside the terminal's concourse D for relatives arriving on a Southwest plane.

Francisco Marrero, a husky Puerto Rican with gelled black hair, woke up at 7 a.m. and drove four hours from Miami to pick up his wife, Karla, and his daughters, Amber and Inara. After the hurricane hit, he didn't hear from his wife for almost three days. "Those were the most stressful days of my life," he said. "I wasn't able to calm down until I heard her voice."

Marrero relocated from Gurabo, a city in central Puerto Rico, to Miami two months ago. His wife and kids were supposed to join him the week Hurricane Maria hit the island. "God moved heaven and earth to bring them here," he said. "I had a stable job in Puerto Rico, but I got a better job offer in Miami. So there was no thinking twice about it."

Karla said she had been staying with her parents, whose home got flooded, but did not sustain any wind damage. "It was an extremely frustrating experience not being able to let my husband know we were okay," she said. "Our plan now is to stay here and live in Florida."

Nearby, Marlene Santiago held up a white poster stamped with the Puerto Rican flag that read, "Welcome home! Mom and dad, we missed you!"

Spotting her parents William and Marjorie Santiago, she ran into their arms and held them in a long embrace. "I was hysterical," Marlene Santiago said. "For three days, I didn't know anything about my parents."

She said a family friend had to drive an hour-and-a-half from Ponce, where her father and mother were staying, to San Juan in order to get phone service and call her to let her know they were fine. Marjorie Santiago said she and William had been trying to catch a flight to

Orlando since Sunday. "We waited for six hours and had no luck," the 74-year-old retiree said. "We went back on Tuesday early in the morning and waited until around 5 p.m."

The Santiagos finally got seats the following day when William, a diabetic, started to show signs of low blood sugar. "The conditions in the San Juan airport are horrible," Marjorie Santiago said. "It is incredibly hot because there is no air conditioning. Everybody there is desperate to get out."

To view online click here.

Back

Corker: Lobbying battle ahead for tax breaks Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 10/01/2017 12:09 PM EDT

As Congress takes the driver's seat in advancing President Donald Trump's tax plan, a fierce lobbying battle is about to begin as people try to keep special tax breaks from being eliminated, a top Senate Republican said on Sunday.

Four days after Trump released a landmark tax reform proposal, members of his administration deflected questions about who specifically will pay lower taxes. Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney said Congress' tax-writing committees now have to get into the knotty details.

As that process begins, lobbyists will be fighting to protect trillions of dollars in special tax breaks for various business sectors and individuals, said Sen. Bob Corker, speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"Every lobbyist in the world is going to be up here fighting those," the Tennessee Republican said. If those lobbyists successfully twist arms in Congress, the deficit might explode as a result of the tax legislation, he said.

Corker — who announced last month he will not run for reelection in 2018 — has said he will not vote for a tax reform bill that adds to the deficit.

In the budding tax plan, "I am willing to accept a reasonable score on dynamic growth," said Corker referring to a budget measuring technique that includes an estimate of the potential economic boost to the economy from tax cuts.

Still, if the tax legislation looks as if it would add "one penny to the deficit," Corker said he would oppose it.

"Everyone was a fiscal hawk, kind of, not really, but kind of up until the election," Corker said of congressional Republicans. "Now it's like there is a party going on up here."

The deficit "is the greatest threat to the nation," Corker said.

Mnuchin, speaking on ABC's "This Week," said that when economic growth is taken into account, the president's tax plan would reduce the deficit.

"Under our plan, we believe this will cut the deficit by $1 trillion," Mnuchin said. "And that's with a conservative, 2.9 percent GDP over the 10-year period of time."

To view online click here.

Back

Ways and Means Democrats demand tax reform score before markup Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 10/02/2017 11:18 AM EDT

House Ways and Means Democrats want an official score before any tax reform legislation gets marked up, they said in a letter to the panel's GOP chairman, Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas).

President Donald Trump and congressional Republicans have laid out a framework for a tax bill, but they've left a number of blanks for policy decisions that are still being made.

The 16 Democrats who signed the letter Sept. 28 want better transparency.

"It would be an insult to our constituent families and companies to push forward a back-of-the-envelope tax reform bill based on partisan guesswork instead of economic analysis," they wrote.

Republicans shouldn't follow the same process they have in developing legislation to overturn the Affordable Care Act, the letter said.

The Joint Committee on Taxation should provide a conventional revenue estimate that would indicate what tax reform would cost relative to federal receipts, a distribution analysis to show who would shoulder any costs or gain any benefits from changes to existing tax laws and an explanation of how overhauling the tax code would affect the U.S. economy.

"It is critical that any consideration of tax reform be delayed until JCT has issued this analysis," the letter said.

Unofficial estimates of the framework tax plan, which make assumptions about changes under consideration, have shown the proposal would widen the federal deficit and benefit the top 1 percent of earners more than anyone else. Republicans in the White House and Congress have disputed those assumptions.

To view online click here.

Back

OMB's Mulvaney: Trump has 2 'red lines' in tax bill Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 10/01/2017 09:34 AM EDT

Cutting tax rates for corporations and the middle class are two "red lines" that President Donald Trump has established as tax legislation develops in Congress, the White House budget director said Sunday.

Responding to a question about whether rich people would benefit from Trump's tax proposal, Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney said debates about details of the tax plan will start in the House of Representatives this week. As that effort progresses, Trump has two overarching objectives, Mulvaney said, speaking on CNN's "State of the Union."

"There are two real red lines," he told host Jake Tapper. "When it comes to the middle class, they will pay less, and it will be easier for them to pay."

Secondly, "the corporate rate has got to come down," he said. "We were pushing for 15 [percent]. We got some pushback from the House and Senate leadership, so the 20 percent proposal is on the table right now."

"When you hear the president say he doesn't really care what happens to the top 1 percent, that's real for him. This really is about the middle class and the corporate tax rate," Mulvaney said.

To view online click here.

Back

Speaker Ryan sets out tax bill objectives Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 10/01/2017 01:43 PM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan laid out some of the tax provisions he wants included in the tax legislation that is expected to begin in Congress this week.

Speaking Sunday on "Face the Nation" on CBS, Ryan said middle-class people will benefit from the legislation, along with corporations.

"We're going to double your standard deductions so you can file your taxes on a postcard," the Wisconsin Republican said.

"We're going to take people who are in the 10 percent bracket and put a lot of that money in a zero percent tax bracket. We're taking the 15 percent bracket down to 12 percent. We're going to get rid of the marriage penalty. We're going to increase the child tax credit."

Additionally, tax incentives for home buying, charitable giving and education spending will all be maintained, Ryan said.

Asked whether the tax plan will increase the national debt, Ryan said it would not.

"This will have to be a deficit-neutral tax bill," he said, adding that "this tax code and this tax reform will give us faster economic growth. Faster economic growth helps raise the economy, which raises revenues. And that helps us tackle the deficit."

To view online click here.

Back

Schumer points to Kansas to criticize Trump's tax plan Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 10/01/2017 01:12 PM EDT

In a warning shot to Republicans crafting landmark tax legislation, Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said on Sunday that Kansas' experiment with tax cuts foreshadows what can happen if the GOP relies on "fake numbers" to support its effort.

Speaking on CBS' "Face the Nation," Schumer rebutted assertions by the Trump administration that the president's tax plan is not designed to cut taxes for rich Americans.

"It's completely focused on the wealthy and the powerful. Not on the middle class," Schumer said.

The New York Democrat also attacked Republicans' assertion that the tax plan won't add to the deficit. Kansas' 2012 tax cuts led to a budget deficit that forced the state to cut funding for schools and infrastructure, Schumer said. Facing a major budget deficit, Kansas lawmakers in June approved legislation that rolled back many of Gov. Sam Brownback's tax cuts.

"This idea that cutting taxes on the wealthy, this trickle-down economics which the Republican Party loves, does not create growth," Schumer said. "It never has."

He insisted that if Republicans want to get anywhere with Trump's tax plan, they need to work with Democrats.

"They have to consult us," he said. "They can't just put down a plan and say, 'Bipartisanship is you guys come over and do what we want,' when it's against our principles."

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) was dubious of the idea that the plan wouldn't overwhelmingly benefit the rich.

"For Trump to go on television that, oh, this doesn't benefit the wealthy is absolutely outrageous," he said on CNN's "State of the Union." "Of course, it benefits the wealthy. And of course it benefits large multinational corporations."

The 2016 presidential candidate added: "We are living in a moment of massive income and wealth inequality. The very, very rich are getting richer. Middle class is shrinking."

To view online click here.

Back

Silicon Valley all in on tax reform Back

By Steven Overly | 09/30/2017 07:03 AM EDT

Silicon Valley is racing to support and shape President Donald Trump's multitrillion-dollar tax proposal, despite months of distancing itself from his policies on everything from immigration to climate change.

The Republican proposal to slash corporate tax rates and ease taxation of companies' overseas earnings has vast implications for the tech industry, which counts the wealthiest companies on earth among its ranks. The companies have responded by marshaling an army of lobbyists, some with connections to a Trump administration that many of their customers and liberal employees loathe.

Tech companies tapped 546 tax lobbyists in the first half of 2017, more than during any of the previous six years, according to data from the Center for Responsive Politics.

No other policy issue facing tech companies in Washington — and there are many of late — stands to have as great an impact on their businesses as an overhaul of the tax code. Tech giants want Congress not only to chop the corporate tax rate but to allow them to pay less tax if they bring back home the cash they hold abroad. Apple, Microsoft, Cisco, Google's parent Alphabet and Oracle top the list of U.S. companies with the biggest overseas cash piles, according to Bloomberg data compiled in June. Apple alone has a staggering $246 billion in cash outside the U.S.

Those numbers help explain why the tech sector — despite its frequent fractures with Trump — has resisted calls to fully disengage from the administration: It needs to keep a foot in the door as Republicans draft and usher through their plans for a major tax overhaul.

"There are also times where we disagree with their point of view and where they want to take policy, and we speak up at that point," said Linda Moore, the CEO of TechNet, an industry advocacy group. But she added: "We do want to support them on tax reform. That is a great example where: 'We're behind you 100 percent. What can we do to help you get that done?'"

That stance doesn't sit well with liberal activists who have been urging Silicon Valley to abandon Trump since the earliest days of his administration.

"Tech companies like to paint themselves as innovative, ethical and inclusive institutions. However, when it comes to tax reform, many are tempted to follow their bottom line in a corporate free-for-all," said Reem Suleiman, a senior campaigner with the progressive group SumOfUs.org. "So Silicon Valley has a dilemma: Stand up for the values it touts, or take advantage of Trump's corporate coup over our democracy."

On the lobbying front, tech firms have sought out Trump-connected lobbyists for tax and other issues. Amazon tapped Trump transition staffer Dan McFaul and Trump campaign fundraiser Brian Ballard, both of Ballard Partners, at the start of the year. Microsoft worked for a time with Navigators Global's Andy Keiser, who also worked on the transition, and brought on Sextons Creek's Bill Smith, a longtime aide to Vice President Mike Pence.

Tech CEOs have also been their own advocates. Tax reform was one of the topics discussed in June at closed-door meetings between senior White House officials and tech executives, including Apple CEO Tim Cook and Amazon CEO Jeff Bezos. Industry leaders made a separate appeal directly to National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin in a private meeting earlier this year.

That behind-the-scenes influence building has ramped up even as tech companies publicly condemn the president's actions on a range of other issues. With each controversial decision emanating from the White House — banning travelers from certain Muslim-majority countries, abandoning the Paris climate deal and responding to racist violence in Charlottesville, Va., by blaming "many sides" — tech CEOs have blasted the policies as bad for the economy and American competitiveness.

The decision to end the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program this month drew a particularly strong reaction from industry players, including the chief executives of Google, Apple, Facebook and many other firms. Microsoft President Brad Smith even said Congress should make legal protections for DREAMers a greater priority than tax reform — a bold stance that turned out to be an outlier in the tech industry.

The tech sector has resisted pressure to cut all its ties with the president, with some executives like Cook explaining their decision as a patriotic or moral duty to provide counsel to whoever is in the White House. "I feel a great responsibility as an American, as a CEO, to try to influence things in areas where we have a level of expertise," Cook told Bloomberg Businessweek in June.

Those efforts may be bearing fruit if the Republican tax framework released Wednesday is any indication. Though devoid of many details, the proposed plan would drop the corporate tax rate to 20 percent from 35 percent, preserve research and development tax credits, effectively eliminate U.S. taxes on future overseas revenue and allow corporations to bring home trillions of dollars they have stashed abroad at a one-time low tax rate — all provisions the tech industry has fought for.

Tech companies, like other big corporations, assert that money brought back to the U.S. could be used to hire workers or build factories, an argument that dovetails with Trump's America-first economic agenda. In May, when Cook announced plans for a $1 billion fund to invest in U.S. advanced manufacturing projects, he said Apple would borrow the money because the "bizarre" U.S. tax code makes it financially painful to repatriate its overseas cash.

The issue has also taken on greater urgency as foreign regulators start raising questions about companies' offshore tax strategies, lobbyists said. The European Commission in 2016 slapped Apple with a 13 billion euro penalty for allegedly accepting a sweetheart tax deal from Ireland.

While tech's vocal opposition to Trump during the election and on recent social policies leaves a "bitter taste" for some Republicans, ultimately GOP leaders want Silicon Valley involved in the tax reform effort, said Keiser, the principal at lobby shop Navigators Global who served on Trump's transition team.

"Getting tax reform right and encouraging broad economic growth is far more important to the policy and the politics than trying to extract a pound of flesh against tech, one of America's most important industries," Keiser said.

To view online click here.

Back

Price resigns from HHS after facing fire for travel Back

By Dan Diamond, Rachana Pradhan and Adriel Bettelheim | 09/29/2017 04:57 PM EDT

HHS Secretary Tom Price resigned Friday in the face of multiple federal inquiries and growing criticism of his use of private and government planes for travel, at a cost to taxpayers of more than $1 million since May.

The White House said the former seven-term Georgia congressman, 63, offered his resignation earlier in the day and that President Donald Trump had accepted it.

Price becomes the first Trump administration Cabinet secretary to step down. The White House said Trump asked Deputy Assistant Health Secretary Don Wright to serve as acting secretary of the agency, which has an annual budget $1.15 trillion and includes the Medicare and Medicaid programs, as well as the FDA, NIH and CDC.

As late as Thursday, Price said he believed he had the president's support. But the tumult surrounding his travel became another distraction for an administration already reeling from the defeat of repeated Senate efforts to repeal Obamacare and criticism for its hurricane relief efforts in Puerto Rico.

Price ran afoul of Trump in part because his actions seemed to symbolize everything the president had inveighed against with his vow to "drain the swamp." The fallout extended to a Cabinet-wide crackdown with the announcement Friday night that chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Price, in his resignation letter, expressed regret that "recent events" distracted from efforts to overhaul the health care system. "In order for you to move forward without further disruption, I am officially tendering my resignation as the Secretary of Health and Human Services effective 11:59 PM on Friday," he wrote.

Senate Democrats quickly served notice they were preparing for a potential confirmation fight over Price's successor, saying the next HHS secretary must not undermine Obamacare. Under Price, the department cut the law's enrollment period in half and slashed advertising and outreach for the enrollment period starting in November.

"The next HHS secretary must follow the law when it comes to the Affordable Care Act instead of trying to sabotage it," said Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

"Tom Price's replacement needs to be focused on implementing the law as written by Congress and keeping the president's promise to bring down the high cost of prescription drugs," Senate Finance ranking Democrat Ron Wyden of Oregon said in a statement.

House Speaker Paul Ryan, a close ally, praised Price as a dedicated public servant. "His vision and hard work were vital to the House's success passing our health care legislation," Ryan said in a statement.

POLITICO revealed that Price flew at least 26 times on private aircraft at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, a sharp break with his predecessors' practice. Many of Price's flights were between major cities that offered inexpensive alternatives on commercial airlines, including Nashville, Philadelphia and San Diego.

On some of those trips, Price, an orthopedic surgeon, mixed official business with leisure. He took a government-funded private jet in August to get to St. Simons Island, an exclusive Georgia resort where he and his wife own land, a day and a half before he addressed a medical conference he and his wife have long attended. In June, HHS chartered a private jet to fly Price to Nashville, where he owns a condominium and where his son resides. Price toured a medicine dispensary, spoke to a local health summit organized by a friend and had lunch with his son, an HHS official confirmed.

Price also used military aircraft for multi-national trips to Africa, Europe and Asia, at a cost of more than $500,000 to taxpayers. The White House said it had approved those trips but not the private jets within the United States.

Price tried to defuse the controversy by promising on Thursday to reimburse the government for the approximately $52,000 cost of his own seat on his domestic trips. But that wasn't enough to tamp down the scandal, which had infuriated the president and prompted a bipartisan inquiry from the House Oversight Committee and separate calls for accountability from lawmakers including Republican Sen. Chuck Grassley. The inspector general of Price's own agency is reviewing if Price complied with federal travel regulations.

The White House put Cabinet officials on notice Friday that it would crack down on use of private planes, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft."

Mick Mulvaney, director of the Office of Management and Budget, sent out the memo soon after Price's resignation was made public, reminding department and agency heads that, by regulation, "Government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft should not be used for travel by Government employees except with specific justification."

The issue of Cabinet members' travel has already extended beyond Price: POLITICO reported Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides took several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights in the Caribbean. Zinke dismissed the furor as a "little B.S." during a Friday appearance at the Heritage Foundation.

Price's wife, Betty, accompanied him on the military flights, while other members of the secretary's delegation flew commercially to Europe.

HHS spokeswoman Charmaine Yoest said Price reimbursed the agency for his wife's travel, but declined to elaborate.

White House officials have groused about Price's frequent travels, with one senior White House official saying the HHS secretary was "nowhere to be found" as they mounted a last-ditch unsuccessful push to repeal Obamacare.

Congressional Democrats attacked Price for advocating spending cuts to the health agencies he oversaw and health care programs while spending taxpayer dollars on private jets. "There could not be a clearer statement of the Trump administration's priorities," Sen. Maggie Hassan (D-N.H.) said. Key Democrats overseeing health issues in Congress had formally requested that HHS's inspector general review Price's travel practices.

In June, Price defended a proposed fiscal 2018 budget for HHS that included a $663,000 cut to the agency's $4.9 million annual spending on travel, or roughly 15 percent. "The budgeting process is an exercise in reforming our federal programs to make sure they actually work — so they do their job and use tax dollars wisely," Price told the Senate Finance Committee on June 8.

Ethical questions dogged Price even before questions about his travel arose. During his Senate confirmation hearing to helm HHS, Price faced pointed questions about his personal investments in health care companies during his time in Congress. Democrats called on government ethics officials to investigate Price's health care stock trades, following reports that he got a sweetheart deal from a biotech company and invested in Zimmer Biomet, a medical device-maker, just days before writing legislation that would have eased regulations on the sector.

The Senate confirmed Price by a 52-47 margin in February after he maintained full Republican support.

Price carved out a reputation as a staunch fiscal conservative during his decade-plus tenure in the House of Representatives. He generally supported reducing government spending on health care while shifting more of the financial burden onto individuals. Like most conservatives, he's supported privatizing Medicare so that seniors would receive fixed dollar amounts to buy coverage and limiting federal Medicaid spending to give states a lump sum, or block grant, and more control over how they could use it.

To view online click here.

Back

White House to Cabinet: No private air travel without Kelly's approval Back

By Matthew Nussbaum | 09/29/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The White House cracked down on Cabinet officials' use of private planes Friday, telling them chief of staff John Kelly must approve almost all travel on "government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft," after Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price resigned over his own taxpayer-funded flights.

Mick Mulvaney, the director of the Office of Management and Budget, sent out the memo soon after Price's resignation was made public. His exit came after a series of POLITICO reports about his frequent use of private planes to conduct government — and sometimes personal — business.

"In light of recent events, the President has asked me to remind the heads of all executive departments and agencies of Administration policies on travel," Mulvaney wrote.

He reminded the department and agency heads that, by regulation, "Government-owned, rented, leased, or chartered aircraft should not be used for travel by Government employees except with specific justification."

"However, beyond the law and formal policy, departments and agencies should recognize that we are public servants," Mulvaney wrote. "Every penny we spend comes from the taxpayer. We thus owe it to the taxpayer to work as hard managing that money wisely as the taxpayer must do to earn it in the first place."

Mulvaney added: "Put another way, just because something is legal doesn't make it right."

Officials should stick to commercial travel "with few exceptions," he wrote.

In the wake of the controversy, other administration officials' travels have come under scrutiny. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has used military planes for some trips, POLITICO reported, while EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin have also raised eyebrows with their travel itineraries.

President Donald Trump was livid over the Price scandal and accepted his resignation on Friday.

"We have great secretaries, and we have some that actually own their own planes, so that solves that," Trump told reporters earlier on Friday.

To view online click here.

Back

Interior watchdog opens investigation into Zinke's travel Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/02/2017 02:13 PM EDT

The Interior Department's inspector general's office has opened an investigation into Secretary Ryan Zinke's use of taxpayer-funded charter planes, a spokeswoman said Monday.

The watchdog has "received numerous complaints" and launched its investigation late last week, said Nancy K. DiPaolo, spokeswoman for Interior's Office of the Inspector General.

Zinke is one of several members of President Donald Trump's Cabinet to face questions over his expensive travel, along with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and former HHS Secretary Tom Price, who resigned Friday.

The secretary has flown on government-owned or -chartered aircraft several times this year, including one $12,000 trip from Las Vegas to an airport near his hometown in Montana and another trip in the Caribbean, as POLITICO reported last week.

The Las Vegas trip has attracted particular scrutiny, because Zinke was appearing at an event affiliated with a major campaign donor that kept him from catching a commercial flight to Montana. He gave a motivational speech to a dinner for the Las Vegas Golden Knights, a new hockey team owned by Bill Foley, the chairman of Fidelity National Financial. Employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and associated companies have donated nearly $200,000 to Zinke's past congressional campaigns.

A watchdog group, the Campaign for Accountability, was among those who asked Interior's IG to investigate. The group said Zinke's Vegas speech "seems to be a special favor provided to a major political supporter of both Sec. Zinke and the president at taxpayer expense."

Zinke last week called the attention paid to the events "a little B.S." and said he followed the law. On Friday evening, after Price's resignation, the White House cracked down on non-commercial travel by Cabinet members. "[J]ust because something is legal doesn't make it right," Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney wrote in a memo to agency heads.

To view online click here.

Back

Price said he regrets 'distraction' in resignation letter Back

By Brianna Ehley | 09/29/2017 05:51 PM EDT

Former HHS Secretary Tom Price said in his official resignation letter to President Donald Trump he regrets that "recent events" created a distraction from his administration's objectives, according to a copy shared by the White House Friday evening.

Price resigned following POLITICO reports of his use of private jets totaling more than $400,000 at the taxpayers' expense.

"I regret that the recent events have created a distraction from these important objectives," Price wrote. "Success on these issues is more important than any one person. In order for you to move forward without further disruption, I am officially tendering my resignation as the Secretary of Health and Human Services effective 11:59 PM on Friday, September 29, 2017."

Price sent an internal email to HHS employees about 30 minutes before the White House announced his resignation. Price told his former colleagues he will "always treasure" his nearly eight months leading HHS.

"What a great joy it has been to serve with you," Price wrote, according to the email obtained by POLITICO. "Please know I shall be thinking of you and encourage you to remember the people, patients, and partnerships we're all privileged to serve."

He closed: "Duty is Ours - Results are the Lord's!"

Dan Diamond contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Who will replace Price? Back

By Joanne Kenen and Jennifer Haberkorn | 09/29/2017 05:42 PM EDT

Tom Price hadn't even stepped down when the Washington policy world was buzzing about who was likely to replace him.

A dozen names are being talked about as the next HHS secretary, including several belonging to those already serving in the administration. But of course President Donald Trump often defies Washington's conventional wisdom.

The rumored short list includes former Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who would sail through Senate confirmation but would probably be considered too moderate on Obamacare, and Dr. Mehmet Oz, a cardiothoracic surgeon made famous by his talk show, which Trump has appeared on. Other current or former members of Congress who could be considered include Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.) and former Rep. Dave Camp.

Here are the names getting particular attention:

Seema Verma: The administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services is responsible for those two big health care entitlement programs and much of Obamacare. She is close to Vice President Mike Pence, having helped create conservative Medicaid makeover plans for Indiana and several other red states.

Verma has limited management experience, having run a small consulting firm, and HHS is a sprawling health and social services agency that includes everything from the National Cancer Institute to Head Start. During the failed Obamacare repeal efforts in Congress, however, she earned plaudits for her ability to quietly explain to Republican lawmakers the various repeal bills, and how they would impact specific states. She's already been confirmed by Congress once — by a 55-43 vote.

Rick Scott: The Florida governor won praise from Trump after Hurricane Irma tore through his state and has publicly said he is weighing a Senate run next year against Bill Nelson. But Democrats have turned up the heat on the two-term governor over the tragedy at a Hollywood, Fla., nursing home following the storm that claimed 12 victims.

Scott is a former hospital executive who became CEO of Columbia/HSA. He and Trump have known each other for two decades, and Trump likes Scott's record as governor and as a business tycoon. Scott chaired a super PAC that promoted Trump's candidacy during the presidential campaign. But Scott's former company also faced huge fines for health care fraud.

Scott Gottlieb: Trump's FDA commissioner has been in and out of government, holding prior jobs in the FDA as well as in CMS, where during the George W. Bush administration he worked on the implementation of the Medicare drug benefit. He's a physician and medical school professor who has also been affiliated with the American Enterprise Institute.

The conservative Gottlieb favors looser rules for what drug and device makers are able to tell doctors about unapproved uses of their products. But he has surprised some Democrats with his outreach to FDA career staff who may not share all his views and his transparency. His blog posts, speeches and access to the media offer a big contrast to Price, who has been noticeably inaccessible.

David Shulkin: The Veterans Affairs secretary is a Trump favorite, and the only Cabinet nominee to be unanimously confirmed. However, Shulkin has come under criticism for combining leisure with business on his official travel — he attended a Wimbledon championship tennis match, toured Westminster Abbey and took a cruise on the Thames while meeting this summer with European officials about veterans' issues, The Washington Post reported Friday. Shulkin did fly commercial, but his wife's expenses were covered by taxpayers, according to the Post.

A physician and former health administrator, Shulkin is also the only member of Trump's Cabinet who is a holdover from the Obama years; he served as the VA's undersecretary of health in that administration. Now he's trying to get the massive, scandal-plagued VA health care back on track to serve around 9 million Americans a year. He has made the agency's performance and improvement programs public and transparent. He still sees patients — in person and via telemedicine.

Marsha Blackburn: The longtime House Republican has conservative credibility on Obamacare, having been a chief critic of the program in the House Energy and Commerce Committee, and on social issues such as abortion, having led the House's investigation into Planned Parenthood funding last year. But the Tennessee representative has no experience in the health care industry or running a major organization, and she is said to be eyeing retiring Sen. Bob Corker's Tennessee seat.

Don Wright: The longtime HHS bureaucrat, doctor and public health expert was named acting HHS secretary Friday following Price's resignation.

Wright, whose focus is emergency preparedness and infectious disease, had been the acting assistant secretary for health at HHS — a role he's held since February. He is also the deputy assistant secretary for health and director of the Office of Disease Prevention and Health Promotion.

Wright was appointed by George W. Bush to serve as the alternate U.S. delegate to the WHO Executive Board and served as HHS principal deputy assistant secretary for health during the Bush administration, according to his HHS biography.

Bobby Jindal: The former Louisiana governor was a rival of candidate Trump in the 2016 campaign, and the rivalry was deep and visceral, although he eventually said he'd support Trump. But Jindal is steeped in health care. He was doing health policy academically and professionally before he entered politics. He studied health systems at Oxford, headed his state's Department of Health and Hospitals at age 24, was executive director of a national bipartisan Medicare commission, worked in HHS under George W. Bush, served in Congress, and then became governor. He is deeply conservative, economically and socially, and favors a deregulated free-market health care system.

Rick Santorum: The former Pennsylvania senator, another one-time Trump rival in the 2016 GOP race, is a favorite of religious conservatives because of his staunch anti-abortion views. He popped up on the national health care stage last month as he worked with Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Bill Cassidy (R-La.) on their last-ditch but failed effort to pass an Obamacare repeal bill before the legislative window for a 50-vote win closed Sept. 30.

Ben Carson: The retired neurosurgeon and former rival for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination is another long shot. Carson, now HUD secretary, was supposedly in the mix for HHS when Trump initially named his Cabinet. Some reports at the time citing his associates said he had turned it down.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump's breaking point with Price Back

By Andrew Restuccia, Josh Dawsey and Dan Diamond | 09/29/2017 09:06 PM EDT

Tom Price's downfall was his penchant for pricey jets.

But his demise was months in the making, as the president continued to lose trust in the HHS secretary who rarely attended Oval Office strategy meetings, had little sway or influence on Capitol Hill, and was associated in the president's mind with one of the administration's biggest defeats — the failure to repeal Obamacare.

Of particular notoriety: A picture of Price in March drinking at Bullfeathers, a famed Capitol Hill bar, as his colleagues tried to wrangle votes for the president's signature initiative.

Price's lack of goodwill with Trump and other senior administration officials ultimately doomed his chances of survival, even though many administration officials believed the furor would blow over when news first broke that Price spent hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars on private jets.

By early this week, however, it became clear that the growing firestorm over Price's travel was only getting worse. The White House believed HHS had badly handled the response to the controversy — and was caught off guard by the facts. And it was hard to find a power player in the White House who would defend Price to the president.

POLITICO published five stories over the last 10 days that revealed Price had spent more than \$1 million in taxpayer money on travel since May, including overseas flights on military aircrafts and more than two dozen domestic trips on private planes.

Other media outlets amplified the revelations, with cable news frequently running damaging chyrons and reporters peppering Trump and press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders about the growing scandal throughout the week.

The president grew more angry, fuming to West Wing aides about the optics of a member of the administration spending so lavishly. The almost daily drip of revelations — including that Price took a government-funded private jet in August to get to a Georgia resort where he and his wife own land — further incensed the president.

Meanwhile, Trump was intensely frustrated by his unsuccessful health care push and associated Price with the failure, several aides said. He joked at a rally in July he would fire Price if he didn't get the votes for the Obamacare repeal.

While the White House has weathered a steady stream of mini-scandals since Trump took office, this one was different, according to administration officials, because it made Price look like the kind of creature of Washington that the president had railed against on the campaign trail.

Trump himself blasted Price on Friday for what he suggested was frivolous spending in light of the administration's efforts to impose fiscal conservatism on the federal government.

"I've saved hundreds of millions of dollars," the president told reporters on Friday when he was asked if he had lost confidence in Price. "So I don't like the optics of what you just saw."

Administration officials grew increasingly certain on Friday that Price would be ousted, but the final decision happened quickly, according to aides, who had cautioned as late as Friday afternoon that Trump might change his mind.

Though he nurtured a reputation as a ruthless boss on The Apprentice, Trump often hesitates to fire people — and sometimes takes weeks to make a final decision. In this case though, the president was counseled that the travel stories had become a distraction from his policy agenda, especially his tax reform push, according to an administration official.

There was also little personal chemistry between the two men.

The president was initially attracted to Price because he was a doctor, a supporter and "looked the part," one adviser with direct knowledge said, plus he was given positive reviews from House Speaker Paul Ryan and others on Capitol Hill.

He soon became a bit player in the administration.

Price was often left out of senior level meetings in the Oval Office on Obamacare repeal, even as other top deputies attended, according to several people with knowledge of the matter.

The president and a number of top aides had little faith in his political instincts.

Leading the effort to negotiate with senators on the Hill was CMS Administrator Seema Verma and Marc Short, head of legislative affairs. Two senior White House officials said Price's relationships at the Capitol were not as good as he promised — and that some members preferred not to deal with him. Many members saw him as prickly and not particularly likable, one senior GOP aide said, damaging his ability to negotiate.

Andrew Bremberg, the head of the White House's Domestic Policy Council, was more involved in policy decisions than Price, these people said.

Price was often out of town during key stretches of the presidency, and while several senior officials said they weren't aware of his private jet use, there was a general consensus that he was often nowhere to be found.

"I didn't know he was on private jets," one senior administration official said. "I knew he was never there."

Price's press office initially reassured the White House that the story would quickly pass and argued that Price needed charter jets to respond to public health emergencies like the recent hurricanes.

After POLITICO identified at least 17 charter flights that took place before the first storm — Hurricane Harvey — hit in late August, and included flights that did not appear to be for urgent public health priorities, HHS then changed its argument: Price needed charter aircraft "to accommodate his demanding schedule," a spokesperson allowed last week.

As he often does when making a big decision, the president began making calls on Thursday night and Friday morning to ask whether he should fire Price.

Trump also told aides that if Price had a defense, he would give it. "I don't think he has any defense for it," one person said, summarizing Trump's comments. "He is just taking it."

Price did make a last-ditch effort to save his job, announcing on Thursday that he would reimburse the federal government for the cost of his seat on the domestic flights, a figure that reportedly totals nearly $52,000 — just a fraction of the total cost of the trips. The president didn't like that Price was only offering to pay back some of the flights, and was struck by TV coverage that showed the total cost as more than $1 million, officials said.

The secretary also tried to go on Fox News and assuage the president. It didn't work.

Rumors began swirling in HHS early Friday that Price might be fired. But, in an apparent sign of how quickly the final decision was made, Price was conducting business as usual late Friday.

Just minutes before Price's resignation became official, the secretary sent an email to HHS officials outlining next steps on the "Reimagine HHS initiative," a broad reorganizational effort of the department that was expected to result in staff reductions. The email outlined senior HHS officials who will be spearheading the process.

"Thank you for all your dedication and support, and we look forward to being in touch soon," Price wrote, according to the email, which was obtained by POLITICO.

Across town at the White House, Trump's chief of staff John Kelly was calling Hill leadership to tell them Price was out.

One senior official said the tipping point was when the White House couldn't contain the scandal and it became an administration-wide story.

Other members of Trump's Cabinet were coming under increased criticism for their use of military and private aircraft, including Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin.

"Got to the point he was causing problems for everybody," this person said. "He could have lasted maybe if it didn't just get worse every day."

To view online click here.

Back

Price was never a player on Obamacare repeal Back

By Adam Cancryn | 09/29/2017 08:43 PM EDT

Former HHS Secretary Tom Price was chosen by President Donald Trump because he was a doctor and a rising star on Capitol Hill who could drive the Obamacare repeal effort.

But in his short tenure, Price not only misread the politics of repeal, he failed to assert himself as a power player on the No. 1 priority of his party, according to administration officials, lobbyists and state and federal officials involved in the repeal effort. He was sidelined from the administration's efforts to sell lawmakers on GOP repeal proposals. More important, he never developed a close relationship with President Trump, which made it impossible to him to survive revelations that his use of private jets and military aircraft cost taxpayers more than $1 million.

"As a physician and former House member who understands health care policy, his inability to convince his former colleagues to pass health care reform is a black mark," one health care lobbyist said. "... To call it a disappointment would be an understatement."

While Price could not convince enough lawmakers to vote for repeal, he did use his power as the nation's top health regulator to weaken the law that his party was unable to overturn through legislative action.

Under his watch, HHS shortened the Obamacare enrollment period, reduced marketing and outreach, slashed enrollment assistance, cut HealthCare.gov's online hours — and used Twitter, news releases and YouTube videos to discredit the law.

"His private jet use may have been what did him in, but his real offense was overseeing and directing President Trump's sabotage of health care for millions of people," said Sen. Chris Murphy, (D-Conn.). "Insurers are raising premiums because this administration is intentionally undermining our health care system."

In many other ways, his brief tenure fell short, say lobbyists and Hill sources.

A powerful House committee chairman with ties to House leadership and allies on both the economic and social conservative wings of his party, Price charged into the Health and Human Services Department armed with an expansive agenda and a mandate to reshape the nation's health care system in his conservative vision.

But he leaves office largely without tangible accomplishments after just seven months marked by ongoing scandal and an inability to turn his ambitious rhetoric into reality.

"It's a short list," said Tom Miller, a resident fellow at the right-leaning American Enterprise Institute. "But he was able to make a lot of progress in establishing clearer rules" for how government officials should travel.

Along the way, Price frustrated his congressional colleagues as well as the White House, deflated morale across the agency and disappeared at perhaps the GOP's biggest health care moment in decades — the failed push to repeal and replace Obamacare.

A POLITICO investigation revealed that Price had taken more than $400,000 worth of taxpayer-funded charter jets — and at least another half-million worth of military flights overseas. That travel — some of which occurred as the White House and Senate Republicans were trying and failing to pass Obamacare repeal — reportedly infuriated the president and prompted his statement Friday that he'd decide Price's future later in the day. Price later submitted his resignation, writing that he regretted the "distraction" his travel habits had created.

Still, some Capitol Hill Republicans feel Trump was too quick to run away from Price once the first story broke. In July, the president publicly joked that Price would get fired if he wasn't able to repeal Obamacare.

"He apologized, paid his portion, we should have moved on," said one Republican aide.

A staunch conservative, Price's ascension to HHS appeared to signal a sharp turn for the nation's health care priorities. The former congressman and orthopedic surgeon had long railed against heavy-handed government regulation, and led the push for changes that went beyond Obamacare — including efforts to scale back both Medicare and Medicaid.

But the Georgia Republican was dogged from the start by ethical questions over hundreds of thousands of dollars of health care stock trades he made while in Congress, delaying his nomination and putting his conduct under a microscope. Senate Democrats boycotted a vote on his nomination over the revelations, and a House lawmaker later asked the SEC to investigate him for violating stock trading laws.

Inside HHS, Price quickly alienated career staffers, throwing a wrench in his efforts ramp up work within the agency. In one of his first big speeches to HHS staffers, Price spent much of his talk trashing the agency's work on Obamacare and warning he planned to reorganize the department and potentially trim staff.

"I heard from so many people on that day how tone-deaf and disappointing that was," said Aisling McDonough, a former CMS staffer. "You're not convincing anyone there."

And as the House struggled to sell its plan for repealing and replacing Obamacare, Price drew fire for promising the GOP bill would lower premiums and ensure that nobody lost coverage — claims that ran directly counter to projections from the CBO. After that, OMB Director Mick Mulvaney emerged as the administration's chief pitchman for the House repeal bill.

When the repeal push moved to the Senate, he was even less helpful to the GOP, according to Republican sources on Capitol Hill. CMS Administrator Seema Verma, Vice President Mike Pence and head of legislative affairs Marc Short met more often or made calls to influential senators such as Lisa Murkowski and Susan Collins.

Largely left out of the legislative push, Price sought to unravel Obamacare from within the agency — a task that has so far amounted to policy changes likely to curtail access to and awareness of the upcoming open enrollment period.

HHS in recent weeks said it would slash its Obamacare outreach budget by 90 percent, as well as sharply cut grants sent to organizations on the front lines of the enrollment effort. It's also taking the federally run sign-up site — HealthCare.gov — offline for 12 hours every Sunday except for one during an already-shortened enrollment period.

"Every day is another challenge," an executive at one state insurance exchange vented. "You can't say one positive thing about connecting people to health insurance? Why? I don't understand."

Elsewhere in the agency, initiatives aimed at remaking the health care system are just getting under way. HHS has signaled it will slow the transition toward paying doctors based on their quality of care, rather than the quantity — a decision reflecting Price's desire to reduce the burden on small physicians. It was also planning to ramp up experimental work to alter Medicare.

And medical equipment companies are set to benefit from an expected halt to a competitive bidding program that would've cut government payments to the industry, a shift that Price supported while in Congress.

But most of those changes had yet to get off the ground before Price's travel scandal brought his tenure to an abrupt end.

As the stories grew increasingly worse on Price, Trump fumed and told aides that if Price had a defense, he would give them. "I don't think he has any defense for it," one person said, summarizing Trump's comments. "He is just taking it."

Josh Dawsey and Jennifer Haberkorn contributed to this story.

To view online click here.

Back

Medicare premiums will decrease slightly for 2018 Back

By Paul Demko | 09/29/2017 05:43 PM EDT

Premiums for Medicare Advantage and Part D prescription drug plans will decrease slightly next year, CMS announced today.

The average monthly premium for a Medicare Advantage plan will be $30 in 2018, a 6-percent decline from this year.

CMS expects 20.4 million Medicare beneficiaries — just over a third of all enrollees — to choose private plans for next year.

The number of Medicare Advantage plans available nationwide will increase from about 2,700 to more than 3,100.

The average premium for prescription drug coverage in 2018 will be $33.50 — down from $34.70 this year. It's the first time that premiums have declined since 2012.

Medicare open enrollment runs from Oct. 15 to Dec. 7.

To view online click here.

Back

Mortgage investors question taxpayer cost of Wells Fargo seizures Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 10/02/2017 02:39 PM EDT

Mortgage investors asked regulators for an accounting of taxpayer costs after Wells Fargo seized $91 million in a trust account meant to benefit bondholders.

In a letter to Mel Watt, director of the Federal Housing Finance Agency, and Mark McWatters, chairman of the National Credit Union Administration, the Association of Mortgage Investors said it had concerns about the impact on bonds owned by Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac and credit unions.

"We respectfully ask that you confirm whether any government sponsored enterprises or related credit union entities are holders of any certificates in the affected trusts described below; the extent to which these egregious remittances have implications on the U.S. taxpayers; and, any consequences to the safety and soundness of the enterprises and the credit union system," AMI wrote in the Sept. 28 letter.

In December 2016, BlackRock, Pimco, TIAA-CREF, Prudential and other investors sued Wells Fargo in New York State Supreme Court, alleging wrongful conduct and breach of duty over the trustee's management of hundreds of residential mortgage bonds. As a trustee, Wells is a gatekeeper between homebuyers and bondholders, ensuring that investors who own pools of mortgages receive their principal and interest payments every month.

In June, Wells Fargo withheld $91 million in mortgage principal and interest proceeds from bondholders, prompting Pimco to accuse the company of "looting" trust money to pay its legal fees. In August, Fitch Ratings declared $2.4 billion in residential mortgage-backed securities at a high risk of default because of the Wells action, making those bonds less valuable.

"The infusion of private mortgage capital into the market is essential," AMI wrote in its letter to regulators. "The issues arising from Wells Fargo's actions have many obvious implications on the availability and affordability of mortgage credit."

Wells Fargo has asked the court to dismiss both complaints.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Diane Black sees her ticket out of town — House watchdogs demand federal travel logs — House border wall bill could complicate year-end spending deal
Date: Wednesday, September 27, 2017 4:48:33 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 09/27/2017 04:44 PM EDT

ON A GLIDE PATH: The House Freedom Caucus announced this afternoon that its almost three dozen members will be putting away their knives that have been aimed at the GOP budget, ending Rep. Diane Black's epic, nine-month quest to get herself a floor vote.

With conservative opposition melting away, GOP sources tell us that long-awaited budget vote on H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\) could happen as soon as next week — a timeline that House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy also gave members today, per Rachael Bade.

Keeping her cool: Standing beside House Speaker Paul Ryan this afternoon at a press conference formally presenting the Republican tax plan, Black was surely thinking, "Can I get a hallelujah?" But the Budget Committee leader, eager to switch to full-time gubernatorial campaigning back home in Tennessee, isn't declaring legislative victory just yet. "I'm very encouraged by what came out about the Freedom Caucus," Black said, adding that she's still counting prospective votes and will make an announcement on timing Thursday.

That magic moment: The Freedom Caucus breakthrough landed just hours after top White House and congressional Republicans first briefed lawmakers on details of their tax plan this morning, as Rachael reports. It wasn't everything the Freedom Caucus was demanding to know before backing the budget — but it's close. We've got individual rates (12, 25 and 35 percent), a corporate rate (20 percent) and a small business rate (15 percent). Republicans even offered some details on repatriation, calling for a special reduced-tax "holiday" for global businesses to bring home offshore profits.

Hell-raising to come: But it won't all be a piece of cake, despite what Sen. Bob Corker might lead you to believe. Deficit hawks are almost certain to demand more details about how the GOP will afford trillions of dollars in tax cuts. We know Republicans plan to defray the costs by peeling away some popular business benefits — like a break for interest investments — but they're going light on specifics, as Brian Faler explains.

All the rest: What's in the Big 6 plan | Reversing course on tax cuts for wealthy | A rogue messenger? | The 'losers' will keep guessing | First hearing on the books | Joe Donnelly joins Trump for speech | Homebuilders on board

GOOD WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — Sen. John McCain sent a letter this week urging DHS to waive the Jones Act — which mandates that only U.S.-owned and -operated ships can enter U.S. ports — to speed up hurricane relief in Puerto Rico. But senior DHS officials have made clear that a waiver is unlikely, Tanya Snyder reports.

#DailyBudgetFact — Between 2010 and 2016, the federal government spent an average of $1.668 billion annually to fight fires. That's a jump from the $703 million spent, on average, each year between 1990 and 1999. POLITICO Pro's DataPoint illustrates that progression.

OVERSIGHT

ANOTHER PRIVATE JET PROBE: The House Oversight Committee began demanding travel logs today from federal agencies, hoping to root out inappropriate uses of private jets and government aircraft, Dan Diamond reports. The letters to the White House and 24 federal agencies follow POLITICO reports that HHS Secretary Tom Price has frequently opted to travel by private jet — on the taxpayer's dime — as well as watchdog investigations into Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin's travel habits.

It gets juicier: In all his jet-setting, Price took a government-funded private plane to an exclusive Georgia resort where he owns land and another flight to Nashville, where he stayed less than six hours and had lunch with his son, Dan Diamond and Rachana Pradhan report.

POTUS' ire: President Donald Trump said this afternoon that he's looking into Price's travel patterns, Louis Nelson reports. "I am not happy about it, and I let him know it," the president said in a brief exchange with reporters. And McCain called Price's behavior "disturbing," saying today that he thinks "it's something that needs to be investigated," Adam Cancryn reports.

Voters disapprove: In a new POLITICO/Morning Consult poll, 64 percent of respondents said it was inappropriate for Price to take private aircraft, while 16 percent said it was A-OK.

APPROPRIATIONS

HOLY HIPAA VIOLATION: Apparently Senate Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran is home recovering from a medical issue. How do we know? The president of the United States tweeted about it this morning: "With one Yes vote in hospital & very positive signs from Alaska and two others (McCain is out), we have the HCare Vote, but not for Friday!" It only took Cochran spokesman Stephen Worley a little over an hour to tweet an explanation: "Sen. Cochran is in Mississippi recuperating from a urological issue, but is not in the hospital."

IT'S THERE IF THEY WANT IT: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has formally fast-tracked the House fiscal 2018 omnibus spending bill for future floor debate. McConnell's move to begin the "Rule 14" process doesn't mean the partisan bill will get a vote anytime soon, but one aide points out that it could serve as a future vehicle for spending bills. Congress has until Dec. 8 to pass its next appropriations package.

AGRICULTURE

SPEAKING OF NATURAL DISASTERS: A bipartisan group of senators is pushing for some major changes to the national forest firefighting fund in Congress' next hurricane relief package, Sabrina Rodriguez reports. It's already the most expensive year on record for the U.S. Forest Service's firefighters, forcing the agency to dip into other accounts for extra change — a practice called "fire borrowing."

A silver lining: Even Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue is behind the idea. "I think there's a silver lining in a crisis," he said, adding, "We've seen people coming together, whether in fires or hurricanes. There may be more empathy there." Sen. Ron Wyden jumped in and argued that Congress has "never had a better shot of finally getting fire borrowing ended."

MORE HELP FOR COTTON? Agriculture leaders, including Perdue and House Agriculture Chairman Mike Conaway, are pushing the White House to renew a cotton subsidy program in the wake of damage from Hurricane Harvey, Catherine Boudreau reports. The cost-sharing program, which totaled about $300 million in payments last year, has not yet been reauthorized for 2017. But Conaway says the help is much needed "in between farm bills" — something that's especially true in hurricane-ravaged regions like his home state of Texas.

DISASTER AID

RUBIO RALLIES FOR PUERTO RICO: Sen. Marco Rubio has become the first GOP voice to say the Trump administration needs to step up assistance to Puerto Rico following Hurricane Maria, Marc Caputo reports from Miami. "There's going to have to be a lot more hands-on federal engagement for us to be able to successfully carry out the mission," Rubio told POLITICO on Tuesday, before delivering a similar message in a face-to-face meeting with Vice President Mike Pence. "There's going to have to be additional federal presence beyond simply assisting the Puerto Rican government. We're going to have to consider more federal assets deployed."

DEBT, BE GONE: While the Caribbean islands struggle, investors holding billions in debt owed by Puerto Rico's electric authority are offering a loan including $1 billion in new funding and the cancellation of $150 million in existing debt, Colin Wilhelm reports.

GROUNDS FOR AN EXCEPTION? Puerto Rico's delegate to Congress is urging Perdue to make five key disaster-relief programs available to help the island's farmers recover, Jenny Hopkinson reports. In a letter to USDA this week, Resident Commissioner Jenniffer González-Colón said that — while producers on the island aren't eligible for assistance under the programs she cited — the back-to-back storms created an extreme emergency that warrants special action by USDA.

IMMIGRATION

SHUTDOWN-SPURRING SALVO? House Republicans laid out a plan this afternoon to authorize $10 billion for Trump's dream of a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border. And although the legislation wouldn't actually appropriate any cash, it pegs an ambitious negotiating stance ahead of the real funding fight in December. As Rachael explains, that kind of border wall allocation is highly unlikely to fly in the Senate, potentially spelling shutdown before year's end.

PROTOTYPE TIME: Meanwhile, construction is now underway on eight border wall prototypes in the San Diego area, Ted Hesson reports. Four of the sample walls will be made of concrete and four of "other materials."

EMPLOYMENT

OLDER WORKERS, HIGHER COSTS: Thanks to slow-moving hiring practices and a bunch of baby boomers who haven't retired at predicted rates, the U.S. government's workforce has grown significantly older than the American workforce overall, Danny Vinik writes for The Agenda. Today, just 17 percent of federal workers are under 35 years old. (In the private sector, almost 40 percent are.) More than a quarter of federal employees are now older than 55. And that means higher costs.

Why's that? A study from last year found that an older labor force is less productive and even makes young workers less productive. There's also evidence that older people are less able to learn new skills. And studies have found that older workers are more expensive, due to their greater use of health care services — costs that fall directly on the federal government, which self-insures its workforce.

OBAMACARE

CAN'T STOP, WON'T STOP: And just when we thought GOP repeal efforts were officially dead, Sen. Lisa Murkowski switches on the life support with the most noncommittal of closed-door comments. Jennifer Haberkorn, Burgess Everett and Seung Min Kim give the blow by blow on the death (and potential revival?) of the Graham-Cassidy plan.

More: Trump plans executive order | McConnell's dreadful day | Bipartisan health care talks resume | Heritage opposes efforts to prop up Obamacare | But governors are for it | Trump: 'We will have the votes'

EARMARKS

- House passes bill to reauthorize child home visiting program. POLITICO Pro.
- Report: Afghan forces lost $700 million in US ammo. Military Times.
- Trump backs off vow that private sector should help pay for infrastructure package. The Washington Post.
- VA running out of money for private health care program. The Associated Press.
- Farm, green groups push for increased conservation funding. POLITICO Pro.

WE'RE COUNTING: 72 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017). Three days until the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/09/diane-black-sees-her-ticket-out-of-town-024803>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Everything you need to know about the Big 6 tax plan Back

By Brian Faler | 09/27/2017 11:01 AM EDT

After months of closed-door negotiations, the "Big Six" on Wednesday unveiled its long-awaited plan to rewrite the tax code. The task now is selling the sweeping proposal to rank-and-file lawmakers. Republicans hope to get a bill to President Donald Trump's desk by the end of the year. Here's what you need to know about the plan negotiated by the top Republican lawmakers and administration officials:

For individuals: The big surprise here is that Republicans are backing away from plans to slash taxes on the rich. They are floating the idea of some sort of surtax on the well-to-do, though details are scant. That's a major shift from what Republicans campaigned on in last year's elections, when they proposed steep tax cuts for the wealthy. But they are trying to head off the inevitable attacks from Democrats, and maybe even win some of their support.

"We are committed to making sure the tax code is at least as progressive as the exiting tax code, that it does not shift the tax burden from high-income to low- and middle-income taxpayers," a senior administration official told reporters.

Their plan would make a number of other changes to the individual side of the code, including collapsing the number of tax brackets to three from seven, with the top rate set at 35 percent but leaving open the possibility that it could be set higher for some. They would nearly double the standard deduction to $24,000 for couples while getting rid of the personal exemption.

Though many supply-side Republicans are skeptical of the child tax credit, the Big Six is calling for a major expansion of the popular break, while offering no details on how it might be increased. They're also proposing a new $500 credit for non-child dependents like seniors.

They want to repeal the estate tax along with the alternative minimum tax, which was originally meant to ensure that the wealthy don't avoid taxes altogether.

The plan calls for keeping education-, retirement- and work-related breaks, without getting into specifics.

The Big Six — which includes the top House and Senate leaders, the chairmen of the two chambers' tax-writing committees, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn — didn't provide specifics about how the individual provisions would work, such as when the different tax brackets would kick in. So it's hard to know if the aggregate effect of the various changes would really leave the relative tax burden among different groups untouched.

But an administration official says: "When all the pieces add up, that's what you'll see."

For businesses: As expected, the plan calls for cutting the corporate rate to 20 percent, from the current 35 percent. Small businesses would pay 25 percent. Companies would be allowed to immediately write off investment expenses, though only for five years.

On the international front, the U.S. would adopt a "territorial system" where the government would no longer attempt to tax companies' overseas earnings. At the same time, though, the plan proposes a foreign minimum tax to prevent businesses from moving abroad to avoid U.S. taxes altogether.

"For companies that are operating in tax haven countries, we do want to make sure there is at least a certain level of tax," the official said.

It would offer a so-called repatriation holiday, allowing multinationals to bring home offshore profits at a reduced tax rate, though the plan offers few details. The corporate alternative minimum tax would be eliminated. The Republican plan would keep a popular research and development tax credit, and also an incentive to invest in low-income housing.

So who are the losers? Not a lot of detail here, though in some ways this is the most important question with Republicans' tax plans.

It calls for killing a long-standing deduction for state and local taxes. It would also partially reduce a break for business interest expenses, though details are few. Republicans say they will get rid of "most" itemized expenses, though they're hanging onto some of the largest, including deductions for mortgage interest and charitable contributions.

Republicans will need a lot more than that though to live within the budgets they're developing. While their plans call for trillions in tax cuts, Senate Republicans are writing a budget calling for a $1.5 trillion tax cut while House Republicans want the plan to be deficit neutral.

How much is this going to cost? No word here, with Republicans saying that will be determined by whatever lawmakers agree to as part of their budget — though the assumption appears to be their plan will ultimately increase the budget deficit. "We are going to have a budget resolution from the House and Senate, which is going to tell us how much we can add to the deficit."

Other surprises: Republicans aren't proposing to cut the capital gains rate, though that's been part of the party's tax orthodoxy for decades. They also aren't calling for any changes in the Earned Income Tax Credit, though there has been a lot of bipartisan agreement on expanding this wage supplement for the working poor for childless adults. Currently, the program — the government's biggest assistance program to the poor — heavily favors those with children.

Sorry Paul Ryan: Though House Speaker Paul Ryan and House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) have spent an enormous amount of time working on tax reform, the agreement released Wednesday rejected or scales back many of their ideas. Border adjustments — which generally would have taxed imports but not exports — are nowhere to be found, of course. Their other top priority, those business investment provisions — known in the tax world as "expensing" — are only temporary.

The Big Six only agreed to partially reduce the business interest deduction, which House Republicans wanted to eliminate. The plan is committed to maintaining the current progressivity of the tax code, something Ryan has previously rejected.

Unanswered questions: Aside from missing details on how exactly the various provisions would work, there are other TBDs such as how Republicans will prevent rich people from disguising themselves as small businesses in order to tap the lower 25 percent rate. The plan also calls for allowing both expensing and interest deductions, which tax experts across the political spectrum call a bad idea because the combination of the two can allow people to create tax shelters.

What's next: The next major step for Republicans is passing a budget. They need it to tap the so-called reconciliation maneuver they're relying upon to muscle their tax plans through the Senate over Democrats' objections. Without it, their tax plans — at least as currently written — are dead.

Said Brady: "Without a budget, there's no tax reform."

The Republican leaders will start selling the plan to rank-and-file members immediately, with a meeting Wednesday at the National Defense University to discuss it.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump defies GOP over tax cuts for the rich Back

By Rachael Bade and Aaron Lorenzo | 09/26/2017 02:10 PM EDT

President Donald Trump — eager to work with Democrats on tax reform — upended Republican leaders' plans to cut taxes for the rich just as the party is set to unveil its much-awaited tax proposal.

During a meeting at the White House on Tuesday, Trump made a point of telling GOP and Democratic lawmakers that his top tax advisers — Gary Cohn and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, both very affluent individuals — won't see their tax bills reduced. Both men nodded in agreement, sources in the room told POLITICO.

Though Trump has insisted before that the wealthiest taxpayers wouldn't benefit from his plan, the timing of the assertion roiled what Republicans were hoping would be a unified tax reform rollout on Wednesday. Instead of lowering the top income bracket to 35 percent, as congressional leaders wanted, multiple GOP sources say they will now say that the top rate is open to negotiation — and that a tax surcharge could be imposed on the most affluent.

"What we heard is that things were negotiable," said Rep. John Larson (D-Conn.), a Ways and Means Committee member who attended the meeting. "But [Trump] couldn't have been more clear about it being a middle-class, working-class, lower-class tax cut."

The last-minute scramble on perhaps the most politically sensitive piece of tax reform came a day before Speaker Paul Ryan and Vice President Mike Pence were set to rally the House GOP Conference around a newly minted GOP tax proposal. It highlights the fickle nature of the tax talks: Republican leaders had been working on a partisan tax bill, but Trump wants to work with Democrats, too. And seared by the failed effort to push a partisan health care bill through Congress, top White House officials are wary a GOP-only tax bill will fail, too.

While Trump told House Ways and Means Committee members that the top rate is "negotiable," his message contradicts the very blueprint being sketched out by the so-called Big Six. The group writing the GOP tax bill — which includes Cohn, Mnuchin, Ryan, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and the tax committee chairmen in both chambers — had intended to reduce the top rate of 39.6 percent rate to 35 percent, according to multiple Hill and administration sources.

Not every Republican on the Hill is balking at Trump's message, though conservatives have long called for rate reductions for everyone, including the upper class. In fact, there's now quiet talk among GOP Ways and Means members that they could leave the 39.6 percent rate for top earners in a fourth bracket, even as top tax writers were hoping to condense the seven tax brackets to three. Lawmakers could set a lower rate on business investments because that's money they're plowing into the economy, not just sitting on it, they say.

"I, too, share concerns about a tax reform that is going to target the wealthy individuals," said New York Republican Rep. Tom Reed, another tax panel member who attended the meeting. "My priority are the Americans working paycheck to paycheck, middle-class folks who need relief from the broken tax code."

Rep. Mike Kelly (R-Pa.), an early Trump supporter and top congressional ally, said Trump clearly wants to work with both sides of the aisle: "I think the real call is from the White House about how things become integrated and how much it becomes bipartisan, and I think the president, the way he spoke today, he's looking to make sure bipartisan elements are there."

Democrats are skeptical. Larson noted that "there wasn't a person in the room he didn't agree with," calling Trump a "good salesman." Others say they've heard Trump talk out of both sides of his mouth plenty of times before. Trump seemed undecided on the top rate Tuesday, while also pledging to eliminate the estate tax, which would disproportionately benefit the wealthy.

"Trust everyone, but cut the cards. ... I say that as it relates to taxes," Larson said. "The devil is in the details ... so, we'll see."

Democrats also note that congressional leaders haven't taken the same tack as the leader of their party — excluding Democrats from tax talks nearly altogether. In a letter to Ryan on Tuesday night, just hours after meeting with the White House, House Democratic Caucus Chairman Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.) asked the speaker to allow Democrats to attend Wednesday's tax retreat.

"I am deeply concerned by Republicans' go-it-alone approach to tax reform, which is occurring despite eagerness from House Democrats to engage in the process," he wrote. "I respectfully ask you expand this [retreat] to include House Democrats."

That doesn't mean Trump won't try to win them over. It's why he hosted Republicans and Democrats from the tax panel at the White House just two weeks after huddling with the bipartisan Problem Solvers Caucus.

Ways and Means ranking Democrat Richard Neal kicked off the meeting by making the case that tax reform should benefit not the rich, but the middle class. Trump agreed, saying he's "prepared to negotiate with Democrats" on rates and vowing the GOP bill "would not be helpful to the wealthy," Neal said.

The president didn't discuss specifics of the tax reform outline he's scheduled to discuss Wednesday in Indiana, the Massachusetts Democrat continued. He did say in public remarks before the meeting that the plan would include "nearly doubling the standard deduction that most families take on their taxes, and increasing the child tax credit."

GOP insiders say the administration — and Trump in particular — are sensitive to accusations that their plan would benefit top earners. That's not only because Trump's populist base is mostly middle-class earners but also because he and his Cabinet members are incredibly wealthy — and they don't want to be seen as throwing kickbacks to one another.

In fact, at one point during the tax meeting, Trump pointed to Mnuchin and Cohn and said they won't get a cut. The two nodded their heads, according to Larson, and said on cue: "We're not getting any tax breaks."

Rep. Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.) soon after gave an impassioned speech about working mothers and the need for child care assistance in the tax code. Trump became excited, exclaiming something along the lines of: "I've got to get you to talk to Ivanka because that's all she talks to me about," according to one member in the room.

Kelly said Trump told Sánchez: "Linda, you are going to be really, really happy tomorrow when we bring this up. You're going to be so surprised that nobody's going to be able to say anything bad about it."

Asked about the exchange post-meeting, Sánchez gave an eye roll. After Trump "assured me that I would love their proposal on child care and that tomorrow I would be thanking him," she said she retorted: "Can I get that in writing? Because I'm a lawyer."

"He said, 'Oh, my daughter talks about that all the time.' And I said, 'Well, I'd love to talk to her about it because I've been working on that for several years,'" Sánchez mimicked. "We'll see if they're sincere in wanting to work on that but he guaranteed me that I would love it. I would love it."

Sánchez also said Trump told the room the tax rate for multinationals to bring earnings back to the U.S would be 10 percent: "Apparently, he picked the rate himself. Other people wanted lower, and he thought 10 was a nice, round number, apparently."

Republicans aren't sure what to make of Trump's comments about bipartisan tax reform. Many are privately skeptical that he can cut a deal with Democrats on taxes.

Overtures aside on the top individual tax rate and child tax credit, Ways and Means Democrats are also approaching the potential opportunity with a dose of skepticism.

"There are a ton of unanswered questions because they didn't release any of the details of what tax reform would look like," said Rep. Ron Kind (D-Wis.), who added that Trump's invite the day before he was scheduled to release the updated tax reform plan was a bit late for his taste. "It's nice to be there on the takeoff and not just the landing."

Kind also questioned the partisan path Republicans have taken on taxes to date, and still plan to, by using the budget reconciliation process to secure passage with a simple Senate majority. That would block Democrats from filibustering the bill.

"This may have been a carefully choreographed show," said Rep. Brian Higgins (D-N.Y.), who added that he's nonetheless hopeful for a bipartisan opportunity on taxes.

Heather Caygle contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump hits the road to sell tax plan - but some worry what he'll say Back

By Nancy Cook and Ben White | 09/26/2017 07:23 PM EDT

President Donald Trump is expected to tout the Republicans' new tax blueprint as one of the biggest tax cuts in recent American history at a Wednesday rally in Indiana - but Republican lawmakers, lobbyists and others are worried about exactly what he'll say.

Administration officials and top congressional leaders are calling for a 20 percent top rate for corporations. But the president has demanded in multiple meetings that tax negotiators stick with a 15 percent corporate rate even as senior congressional Republicans and members of his own administration including National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn told him such a number wasn't possible without blowing up the deficit.

"He's the one guy left in Washington who still wants a 15 percent corporate rate," said one person close to the president and the tax reform discussions. "They could put 20 percent down on paper and he could go out and say 15 percent anyway. He goes to these tax meetings and people just hammer him but he still wants 15 percent."

The president said Wednesday on his way to Indiana that "20's my number."

"I wanted to start at 15 so that we got 20," he told reporters. "I'm not negotiating that number. I am not going to negotiate. That's the number I wanted to get to. I wanted to start at 15 to get there. We really had to start there because of the complexity of the numbers, but 20 is a perfect number."

Trump has a habit of going off-script at public events, editorializing and extemporizing. That's exacerbating fears that the president could upend months of behind-the-scenes negotiations by the so-called Big Six—a group of White House officials, Hill Republican leaders, and committee heads—over the blueprint document Trump will introduce to the greater public in Indiana.

"Politically, he should be focused on what he does best - by calling the blueprint the greatest, biggest, super, all of the superlatives - and then allow everyone to focus on filling in the blanks of a tax bill," said one Republican lobbyist with ties to the administration.

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, a long-time Trump loyalist dating back to the campaign, has tried to convince the president that the proposal is a good starting point that can be improved through the legislative process, said an adviser with close ties to the administration.

"It's not as fundamental reform as many of us would like it to be," said Republican Rep. Devin Nunes of California following a meeting of the House tax writing committee on Monday, "but we can get real reform."

The White House did not respond to a request for comment.

The Republican blueprint, developed by administration officials, congressional leaders, and heads of the House and Senate tax-writing committees, will suggest deep cuts to both the corporate and individual tax rates; a new type of international tax system called a territorial system; the temporary phasing in of full expensing for five years to allow businesses to immediately deduct capital investments; and the doubling of the standard deduction for individuals and an expansion of the child tax credit, a pet project of the president's daughter and adviser Ivanka Trump, according to several people familiar with the plan.

It will also call for the elimination of the deduction for state and local taxes, a benefit that primarily helps voters in blue states such as California, Massachusetts, New Jersey and New York. But the proposal will not go into detail as to which other deductions congressional lawmakers might target to pay for deep rate cuts, except for noting the mortgage interest and charitable deductions are no longer on the table.

The negotiators opted to leave out the deductions they wanted to eliminate because they could not agree on the final list and did not want to provoke D.C.'s well-paid army of tax lobbyists, according to two people familiar with the negotiations.

"K Street lives and gets paid to kill tax reform," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, president of the conservative think tank, American Action Forum, and a former director of the Congressional Budget Office. "That is the generic issue with tax reform. It is routinely blown up by the business community."

But at the moment, the bigger concern is the divide between the Big Six tax proposal and the president's personal preferences, because it leads to a lack of confidence in the negotiations, said one former House Republican aide.

"Lawmakers are worried about having the rug pulled out from them," the aide said.

Other congressional aides trusted the process of constructing a tax bill and seeking Republican lawmaker support more than they trusted the White House.

"The president is always full of surprises. That is something built into our psyches as we move forward," said one senior congressional aide. "That is why it is important to have a document, so the White House, House, and Senate are on the record, saying 'This is what we want to achieve.' There is a clear recognition on the part of the members that failure of tax reform will have deep consequences for 2018. That kind of motivation helps."

The Big Six blueprint is expected to suggest bringing the corporate rate down to 20 percent, while condensing individual tax rates to three income brackets of 12 percent, 15 percent and 35 percent. That would represent an increase in the bottom rate of 2 percent, something Democrats are likely to attack on Wednesday.

But administration officials say that the doubling of the standard deduction and other credits in the bill will actually make most low-income tax filers better off under the new proposal. The blueprint will also suggest that lawmakers writing the tax bill could add another, higher top rate for the highest incomes. That would be aimed at deflecting Democrats' nascent arguments that the tax plan would be a boon for the wealthy.

On Tuesday morning, Trump told a group of bipartisan tax writers at a White House meeting that the top rates for individuals was "negotiable," contradicting the Big Six document that suggests lowering it to 35 percent.

It will be hard for analysts to assess the actual impact on Americans' bottom lines because the blueprint will not include details on the ranges of incomes that the rates will apply to and exactly which deductions will change - leaving voters with a half-portrait of how their financial lives could change under this potential tax overhaul.

The president has also repeatedly said he does not want to cut taxes on the wealthy, something that will be very difficult for Capitol Hill Republicans to pull off if they kill the alternative minimum tax and the estate tax while lowering the rate that individuals pay on "pass-through" business income.

Sources close to the process said the plan would include a proposed 25 percent rate for business entities and individuals who report business income on their personal returns along with "guardrails" to prevent abuse of that rate by wealthy doctors, lawyers and other professionals trying to reclassify their ordinary income as business income. But the people close to the process say this is mostly a placeholder and that there is no real mechanism available yet to create these guardrails.

The question of how to tax, or even define, businesses that fall under the proposed 25 percent rate has vexed the tax negotiators. The Big Six officials also could not agree on the issue of full expensing - which allows businesses to immediately deduct capital investments such as equipment but is also a costly provision.

In the end, they opted to include a phase-in of full expensing temporarily for five years as a win for House Speaker Paul Ryan and Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady. Those House leaders had to stand by earlier this summer as Big Six negotiators abandoned one of their key ideas to raise revenue through a border adjustment tax.

At a dinner on Monday night with conservative leaders, the president spoke about tax reform in an upbeat and engaged manner, said one attendee.

"He didn't get everything he wanted out," said the source who attended the dinner with social conservative leaders. "If he could wave a magic wand, it's not going to be that proposal but it will still be very good."

Rachel Bade and Colin Wilhelm contributed reporting

To view online click here.

Back

GOP tax plan likely to keep losers guessing Back

By Brian Faler | 09/27/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Don't expect many answers Wednesday to one of the most closely guarded secrets in the Capitol: who gets screwed under Republicans' tax plans.

The long-awaited proposal set to be released by the so-called Big Six will be heavy on the GOP's tax cut desires and light when it comes to explaining whose taxes will have to go up to help control costs.

Republicans' game plan is to essentially launch a sneak attack on cherished tax breaks, in order to give opponents as little opportunity as possible to mount a counteroffensive.

It's not that Republicans don't necessarily know who they want to foot the bill for their plans. But they aren't ready to identify them all — and are willing to weather accusations they are ducking hard choices and blowing up the budget — in order to deprive the losers of a head start on lobbying.

"They're going to withhold them as long as they can," said one former Republican tax aide. "If you don't give the details on how to pay for it, people can't really lobby against it."

The question of who will pay is the biggest unknown in their tax plans. The proposal will call for a litany of tax cuts, including reducing the corporate rate to 20 percent from the current 35 percent, while reducing taxes on unincorporated businesses to 25 percent. It will propose nearly doubling the standard deduction, expanding a tax credit for having children and creating a special low rate on multinational companies' overseas earnings.

The cost of all that would run in the trillions, and Republican leaders don't plan to simply cut taxes and leave it at that. They want to at least partially defray the cost with offsetting tax increases.

In the Senate, Republicans are working on a budget that will allow them to cut taxes by a total of $1.5 trillion. In the House, their budget would require them to not add to the deficit.

Republicans have offered some indication where they intend to find savings, such as by eliminating a long-standing deduction for state and local taxes, and also by paring a break for business interest payments. But they've been vague on many of the specifics, and they'll need much more than that to fit within their budget.

Interest groups are anxiously awaiting details on who will have to pay under Republicans' plans.

"I'm just sitting here on pins and needles, like the rest of town," said Jerry Howard, head of the National Association of Home Builders.

His group has already prepared advertisements both supporting and opposing the Republican proposal, depending on the ultimate plan.

"We're prepared for any eventuality," he said. "We're going to be ready to fight for or against whatever is in the tax bill."

A small coterie of party leaders and their tax aides surely have an idea of how they intend to make their numbers work, tax veterans say.

But the timing of showing your hand on pay-fors and exactly what to reveal is a delicate thing. Republican leaders are under pressure from rank-and-file colleagues, especially House conservatives, to begin filling in the blanks of their plan. Some conservatives say they won't vote for a budget, needed to move any tax plan, without more information.

So the trick is to provide enough detail to satisfy lawmakers whose votes they'll need — and enough specifics to make their plan appear credible — but not so much that they get eaten alive by lobbyists.

The Big Six includes House Speaker Paul Ryan, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady, National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin.

Their plan won't include many details on pay-fors, said Rep. Jim Renacci, a Republican tax writer.

"The statement will be a generalization of a platform that we want to get to," he said.

Some say the recent debate over House Republicans' plans to create a "border adjustable" business tax was an example of how not to approach this.

They were transparent about how they wanted to finance a big chunk of their tax plans, with a proposal that would have essentially taxed imports while allowing exports to be sold tax free. But Republicans announced the plan last year, long before they ever had a chance to push it into law, and opponents mounted such a furious lobbying campaign that the idea overshadowed the rest of their tax-reform plan. It was later dropped.

It's not just that Republicans don't want to give lobbyists a jump on their plans.

They also don't know how many offsets they'll need exactly, because they haven't agreed on how much their plan will ultimately cost. They'll need a lot more pay-fors if the House, whose plan is deficit neutral, gets its way than if they can borrow $1.5 trillion as the Senate is proposing.

What's more, the Big Six has been divided over how deeply to go after the business interest deduction and other breaks, with senators pushing for smaller cuts. The House and Senate are likely to go separate ways on many of the pay-fors.

Howard, of the home builders group, says he's worried about a phalanx of provisions: the cap on deductible mortgage interest, the tax rate on small businesses, the interest deduction, a credit for investing in low-income housing and plans to expand the standard deduction, among others.

His group has hired economists who previously worked for Congress' Joint Committee on Taxation and also the House Ways and Means Committee to crunch the numbers on what Republicans' tax plan in its entirety would mean for them, in order to help them to decide whether to support or oppose it.

Howard says he's uncertain if Wednesday's release will provide enough details to make that judgment.

"I don't know the answer to that," he said. "I have to assume that we'll have enough information, and be prepared as if that's the case. If it's not, we'll remain on hold."

If Republicans don't include those details in Wednesday's plan, it could be a while before more details are released.

Brady says he won't release the legislative text of his plan, spelling out how exactly it will work, until after Republicans have a budget in place. Some don't expect Republicans to release those details until shortly before the tax committee formally takes up a plan — next month at the earliest. Republicans are pushing to get a bill to President Donald Trump's desk by the end of the year.

Not everyone thinks hiding the pay-fors is a worthwhile strategy.

"You don't have to do it this way — in fact, it's really stupid," said John Buckley, a former longtime Democratic tax aide.

"If it can't sit out there and survive, it's not worth pursuing, in my opinion," he said.

What's more, he said, even if Republicans are able to muscle controversial changes through Congress now, before opponents can stop them, lobbyists will inevitably be back, trying to undo the changes.

"If you succeed in ramming it through, well, Congress meets again," he said. "What the hell do you think is going to happen next year?"

To view online click here.

Back

Hatch sets international tax reform hearing for next week Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 09/26/2017 05:25 PM EDT

The Senate Finance Committee will hold a hearing on international tax reform Oct. 3.

The hearing will follow Wednesday's unveiling of a Republican tax reform framework that committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) helped negotiate. Republicans have been pushing for the adoption of a "territorial" tax system, which would generally exempt the foreign income of U.S. companies from domestic taxation.

"There are a variety of changes we can make to the U.S. tax code to help American companies better compete in the global market and put an end to the perverse incentives that have caused jobs and investment to move overseas," Hatch said in a statement.

The witnesses at the hearing will be Brett J. Wells, a law professor at the University of Houston; Kimberly Clausing, an economist at Reed College in Portland, Ore.; Stephen E. Shay, a lecturer at Harvard Law School; and Itai Grinberg, a law professor at Georgetown.

WHAT'S NEXT: The hearing will be at 10 a.m. in room 215 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

To view online click here.

Back

Democratic senator to appear with Trump at tax reform event Back

By Daniel Strauss and Matthew Nussbaum | 09/26/2017 07:05 PM EDT

Sen. Joe Donnelly (D-Ind.) will ride with President Donald Trump on Air Force One to a tax reform event in Indiana on Wednesday, two people familiar with the plans confirmed.

It's the latest example of an endangered Democratic senator from a red state looking to show some bipartisan credibility by appearing with Trump as he makes his push for tax cuts.

Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), earlier in September, flew with Trump to a tax reform speech in her home state and appeared onstage with him.

Republicans are looking to increase the pressure on Donnelly, who is up for reelection in 2018 in the deeply conservative state. Along with Trump's visit this week, Vice President Mike Pence is making at least three trips to Indiana over September and October to push for tax reform. His first visit came last week.

Six Republicans are running in the primary to face Donnelly, including Reps. Luke Messer and Todd Rokita. Messer will be at the Wednesday speech.

To view online click here.

Back

Homebuilders endorse Trump tax plan in split with industry Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 09/27/2017 11:23 AM EDT

The National Association of Home Builders endorsed the White House tax plan and called for "creative thinking" on tax incentives for homeownership.

"It's a winning combination," NAHB Chief Executive Officer Jerry Howard told POLITICO. "We think the Gang of Six hit a home run here." He cited the tax cuts for businesses and the middle class, as well as the plan's "clearly stated commitment to homeownership."

The endorsement is a major shift for the group, which had vowed to challenge an increase in the standard deduction. Raising the deduction, they argued, would devalue the mortgage interest deduction.

It also opens a crack in the housing industry's united front against any tax changes that would diminish incentives for homeownership.

Howard said he was encouraged by language in the framework endorsing homeownership. Replacing the mortgage interest deduction with a tax credit is one option, he said.

"I think that's something that might be on the table," he said. "We think it's time for creative thinking."

The White House will release its plan later today.

To view online click here.

Back

House Oversight Committee launches investigation into agency travel following Price reports Back

By Dan Diamond | 09/27/2017 10:27 AM EDT

House investigators want answers from HHS Secretary Tom Price and other Cabinet officials about their use of government-owned aircraft or private jets for travel.

The request from the House Oversight Committee is the latest government scrutiny of Price's use of private jets, which was first reported by POLITICO last week.

Under Federal Travel Regulations, officials are advised to take the "most expeditious" means of transportation and "by no means should include personal use," Chairman Trey Gowdy and ranking member Elijah Cummings write in a sample letter addressed to Price, who served more than a decade in the House before joining Trump's administration. Similar letters were sent to 23 other agencies and the White House.

POLITICO has reported that Price has spent more than $400,000 on taxpayer-funded private jet travel since May. A story on Tuesday detailed how Price's trips blended personal and professional travel, including a $17,760 round trip on a charter jet to Nashville, where Price stayed less than six hours and had lunch with his son. Price has said he will halt all private jet travel pending the outcome of an HHS inspector general's review.

Other Trump administration officials have come under scrutiny for their travel. Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has faced questions after his flight on a government plane to Kentucky, where he reportedly watched the solar eclipse, as well as his request — later withdrawn — to use a government plane on his honeymoon. EPA Secretary Scott Pruitt also has used non-commercial planes for some of his official travel, CBS News reported on Tuesday.

Gowdy and Cummings are seeking details on senior officials' use of non-commercial planes, including the airplane manifest, the trip's destination and purpose, the cost of the trip and the dates of use. Agencies were asked to respond by Oct. 10.

To view online click here.

Back

Price's private-jet travels included visits with colleagues, lunch with son Back

By Dan Diamond and Rachana Pradhan | 09/26/2017 06:51 PM EDT

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price took a government-funded private jet in August to get to St. Simons Island, an exclusive Georgia resort where he and his wife own land, a day and a half before he addressed a group of local doctors at a medical conference that he and his wife have long attended.

The St. Simons Island trip was one of two taxpayer-funded flights on private jets in which Price traveled to places where he owns property, and paired official visits with meetings with longtime colleagues and family members. On June 6, HHS chartered a jet to fly Price to Nashville, Tennessee, where he owns a condominium and where his son resides. Price toured a medicine dispensary and spoke to a local health summit organized by a longtime friend. He also had lunch with his son, an HHS official confirmed.

An HHS official said both the Georgia and Tennessee trips were for official government business and were paid for by the department.

Richard Painter, who served as the top ethics official for President George W. Bush, said Price's trips may have been legal but were ethically dubious.

"To use a charter flight on something that combines personal and government business, I think it's highly unprofessional and really inappropriate," Painter said — especially if personal business represented a disproportionate part of the trip.

HHS has long maintained that Price, whose use of chartered aircraft is under investigation by the HHS inspector general, has not violated Federal Travel Regulations, which state that officials can charter a plane only if "no scheduled commercial airline service is reasonably available (i.e., able to meet your departure and/or arrival requirements within a 24-hour period, unless you demonstrate that extraordinary circumstances require a shorter period) to fulfill your agency's travel requirement."

Like some of the other 26 flights that Price took on corporate jets since May identified by a POLITICO review, the trip to Tennessee appears to have occurred despite the existence of multiple commercial flight options. The trip to Georgia, while less direct, also could have been accomplished with a routine connecting flight through Atlanta's busy international airport.

On Aug. 4, Price flew a Dassault Falcon 2000 twin jet from Raleigh, North Carolina, where he had given a speech to a flu vaccine manufacturer, to Brunswick Golden Isles Airport, which is about a half-hour drive from St. Simons Island. It was the same plane that had shuttled him between five states in four days, one that HHS had chartered through Classic Air Charter for more than $86,000, according to federal contracts.

The plane arrived in Brunswick at 4:02 p.m. the afternoon before the start of the two-day Medical Association of Georgia retreat and roughly 40 hours before Price addressed the group, according to airport records and people familiar with the event. At about the same time, there were connecting commercial flights from Raleigh to Brunswick via Atlanta that would have gotten Price to St. Simons Island that evening.

Painter questioned why Price needed to travel on Friday afternoon to St. Simons Island when his speech wasn't until Sunday.

"One night is appropriate for a speech in Georgia, not two nights," Painter said, given that Price was traveling around the East Coast.

The Nashville trip offered even more commercial options. On June 6, Price took a Learjet 55 — a $17,760 round-trip flight, according to a federal contract — that departed from Washington Dulles International Airport at 9:12 a.m. ET and touched down in Nashville at 9:44 a.m. CT.

Two commercial flights that morning followed similar itineraries. An American Airlines plane departed Reagan National Airport at 9:05 a.m. ET and landed in Nashville at 9:39 a.m. CT. A Southwest Airlines flight left Baltimore-Washington International at 9:18 a.m. ET and arrived in Nashville at 9:54 a.m. CT.

Commercial airline tickets with government discounts would have cost between $102 and $333 per person round-trip between the two cities, according to the U.S. General Services Administration.

The afternoon event was the first-ever Healthy Tennessee Summit organized by Dr. Manny Sethi, an orthopedic surgeon and prominent local Republican who's met with President Donald Trump and was featured as an "Obamacare victim" in a White House video posted in June.

Sethi, who says he hasn't given money to Price, has nonetheless donated $15,000 to the Tennessee Republican Party since May 2016; the party's Twitter feed hailed Sethi last year as "one of our closest friends." Sethi also said that Price has been a mentor for years.

In his remarks, Price reminisced about his longtime fondness for Sethi, and both men referenced Price's personal ties to the city — chiefly, that his only son went to Vanderbilt University and still lives in the city. Price also owns a condominium in Nashville valued at more than $150,000, according to county records.

Price's agenda in Nashville, which was planned just days in advance and came as Senate Republicans were trying to pass a bill repealing major parts of Obamacare, was also lightly scheduled, say individuals with knowledge of Price's travels. Price spent less than 90 minutes combined between his two scheduled events — about an hour touring the Dispensary of Hope medication dispensary in the morning, and about 20 minutes giving his speech at the Healthy Tennessee Summit in the afternoon.

The trip was so last-minute that Price wasn't part of the summit's formal meeting agenda; attendees were given a handout with the secretary's biography. Reporters weren't informed when Price would be speaking until less than an hour before he arrived at the summit. The meeting website still lists an outdated agenda.

Local health care leaders said the trip was a surprise to them too. "We heard that he was here on the day of" his visit, said one health care business executive who often works with lawmakers. "I only know what I read in the [paper] about his trip."

Meanwhile, Price didn't take any questions at the summit and promptly left for the airport when his speech was done by 2:40 p.m. His charter plane departed less than 40 minutes later.

Sethi, the summit's organizer, said he felt lucky to get even a few minutes with the secretary because Price's time was so valuable.

"In Nashville, there were like 20 other things on his docket," Sethi said.

One of them was lunch with his son, Robert Price, who is a musician in Nashville. It occurred during a nearly three-hour block of Price's schedule between when Price departed the Dispensary of Hope around 11:30 a.m. CT — "He had to leave for the rest of his Nashville meetings," said a staff member at the dispensary — and his arrival at the health care summit around 2:15 p.m. CT.

Painter said Price's trip to Nashville raised multiple ethical concerns. Despite spending nearly $18,000 on a Learjet, Price spent just five-and-a-half hours in the city and with only two official visits on his calendar — an hourlong tour of the dispensary and a 20-minute speech — that bookended his lunch with his son.

"If [Price] flew out there commercial and he had a lunch with his son, no one would bat an eyelid," Painter said. "But he's combining all these different ways of stretching it," Painter added, listing off the expensive charter flight, Price's personal lunch and choosing to make a speech to a little-known group run by a prominent Republican.

"They're playing games with the rules," Painter said.

The trip to St. Simons Island, the largest of the "golden isles" on the coast of Georgia and a popular destination for well-heeled professionals from Atlanta and other Georgia cities, was also lightly scheduled.

Both Price and his wife were on familiar turf. An orthopedic surgeon from the Atlanta area whose involvement with the Medical Association of Georgia helped launch his political career, Price spoke for about an hour on Sunday, Aug. 6, to a group of roughly 20 doctors involved in the Georgia Physicians Leadership Academy, as did other Georgia state lawmakers who are physicians, including Price's wife, Betty Price.

Price has taught communications skills at the physician leadership development event for nine years, according to a spokesperson for the Medical Association of Georgia. The group said it did not pay for his travel or any other expenses related to the St. Simons meeting.

Both Price and his wife, a physician and a member of the Georgia state House of Representatives, have longstanding ties to the island. For years, Price held congressional fundraisers at the King and Prince Resort — the same venue that hosted the physicians' retreat — often on the first weekend of August, the same days that he visited this year.

Local property records show that the Prices, who reside in the Atlanta suburbs, also own undeveloped land on St. Simons that Price valued at more than $1 million in financial disclosure forms this year.

Price was originally scheduled to take a charter flight to Georgia on Thursday, Aug. 3, one of three planned stops that day beginning with an opioids roundtable in Illinois and with a short layover in Raleigh, North Carolina, to visit Seqirus, the flu vaccine manufacturer. But while the roundtable, featuring GOP congressman Darin LaHood, took place as planned, the North Carolina and Georgia trips were rescheduled as Price went back to Washington for one night.

Price then flew down to Raleigh on Friday, Aug. 4, for a brief stopover before continuing on to the Georgia resort later that day.

"It was a 45-minute visit," said a spokesperson for the Raleigh-based drug vaccine manufacturer. "I think he had something else to get to."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump on whether he'll fire Price over charter flights: 'We'll see' Back

By Louis Nelson | 09/27/2017 01:12 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Wednesday expressed sharp displeasure with Secretary of Health and Human Services Tom Price over his use of pricey private jets at taxpayers' expense, saying "we'll see" when asked by reporters if he would fire Price.

"I was looking into it and I will look into it. And I will tell you personally, I'm not happy about it," Trump said in a brief exchange with reporters. "I am not happy about it. I'm going to look at it. I am not happy about it, and I let him know it."

POLITICO revealed that Price has flown 26 times on private aircraft since last May at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, a break with the practice of his predecessors, who generally took commercial flights.

The Department of Health and Human Services has said Price did not violate federal travel regulations, which allow for chartered aircraft when "no scheduled commercial airline service is reasonably available." A POLITICO review, however, showed that many of Price's private flights were matched closely by commercial options available at a fraction of the cost.

In an interview last weekend, Price said he would stop taking taxpayer-funded private flights, telling Fox News that "We've heard the criticism. We've heard the concerns. We take that very seriously and have taken it to heart."

Among the private flights booked by Price was a June day trip to Nashville, Tenn., where he toured a medical dispensary, spoke at a health summit organized by a friend and had lunch with his son. Price also took a chartered flight last month to a resort in Georgia where he and his wife own property, arriving a day and a half before he was to address a medical conference.

The White House has sought to distance itself from Price's behavior, with press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders declining to offer a defense of the secretary's flight choices and telling reporters this week that they were not "White House-approved travel."

Spokespeople for the Department of Health and Human Services did not immediately return an email seeking a response from Price.

The secretary's travels have also drawn the attention of the House Oversight Committee, which launched an investigation Wednesday into the use of private aircraft by Price and other senior government officials. The Health and Human Services Department's inspector general has also launched an investigation into Price's use of chartered planes.

"We welcome this review," Price said of the inspector general's review in his Fox News interview last weekend. "We want to make certain that we have the full confidence of not just this administration, but the American people."

That Price has made a habit of chartering aircraft for his travels as a cabinet member is especially notable given his past criticism of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), whom Price, then a member of Congress, lambasted in 2010 for "flying over our country in a luxury jet."

To view online click here.

Back

McCain wants full investigation into Price's 'disturbing' private-jet travel Back

By Adam Cancryn | 09/27/2017 02:03 PM EDT

Sen. John McCain today called for a full investigation into HHS Secretary Tom Price's use of private jets, calling reports of his taxpayer-funded travel "disturbing."

"I think it's something that needs to be investigated, and frankly it's disturbing from the information I've read," the Arizona Republican said. "It's the taxpayer's dime."

McCain's comments came after President Donald Trump told reporters he's "not happy" about Price's pattern of chartering private planes and declined to say whether Price's job was safe.

POLITICO found that Price has flown 26 times on private aircraft since last May, costing taxpayers at least $400,000. Price has said he will stop using charters pending a formal review by his department's inspector general.

To view online click here.

Back

Poll: Voters say Price's charter flights are inappropriate Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 09/27/2017 07:14 AM EDT

Nearly two-thirds of registered voters disapprove of HHS Secretary Tom Price's decision to charter private jets to conduct official business, a new POLITICO/Morning Consult poll shows.

Sixty-four percent of voters said it was inappropriate for Price to take private aircraft, which costs tens of thousands of dollars more than commercial flights. Sixteen percent said the trips were appropriate.

The poll asked voters about five flights Price took on the East Coast two weeks ago, which POLITICO first reported last week. Price flew to Maine to participate in a discussion with a health care industry CEO, and then he made trips to health clinics in New Hampshire and Philadelphia to discuss efforts to fight the opioid epidemic.

POLITICO has identified at least 26 charter flights Price has taken since May at a cost of at least $400,000 to taxpayers.

The poll was conducted from Sept. 22-24. During that time, Price said he would stop taking private jets for official business pending a review by the HHS inspector general. Democratic lawmakers have also sought a detailed accounting from HHS on Price's use of private jets.

Most voters said they hadn't read or heard much about Price's travel.

"The news that Secretary Price was flying private made waves in Washington, but the polling suggests it has not captured national attention," said Morning Consult co-founder and Chief Research Officer Kyle Dropp. "Just 18 percent of Americans say they heard a lot about the news, and an additional 25 percent said they heard some."

HHS has defended Price's use of private planes as necessary to accommodate his demanding schedule, especially amid pressing priorities like responding to hurricanes and addressing the opioid crisis. However, many of the flights were unrelated to those issues and were to cities with frequent, inexpensive commercial options. POLITICO has identified at least 10 charter flights Price took since May that were not related to either the opioid crisis or hurricane response, including flights to conferences in Maine, San Diego, Calif., and Aspen, Colo.

The POLITICO/Morning Consult poll also found that 26 percent of voters have a favorable view of Price, while 25 percent view him unfavorably.

Price, a former House Budget Committee chairman, represented Georgia in Congress for more than a decade and had a reputation as a fiscal hawk and fierce opponent of Obamacare.

The White House has sought to distance itself from Price's travel practices. President Donald Trump over the weekend said the issue was being looked into, and press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said the White House didn't approve the trips. White House counselor Kellyanne Conway accompanied Price on trips to at least six states.

The poll surveyed 1,987 registered voters and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 2 percentage points.

Morning Consult is a nonpartisan media and technology company that provides data-driven research and insights on politics, policy and business strategy. More details on the poll and its methodology can be found in these two documents — topline here and crosstabs here.

To view online click here.

Back

Senators, Perdue look to Maria aid for fire-funding fix Back

By Sabrina Rodriguez | 09/26/2017 07:36 PM EDT

A bipartisan group of six senators, including Senate Finance ranking member Ron Wyden, believe a potential aid package for hurricane-ravaged Puerto Rico could also provide a means of revamping the way the federal government funds wildfire prevention and suppression.

"We have never had a better shot at finally getting fire borrowing ended than we do this upcoming period, when we're going to have another disaster package," Wyden (D-Ore.) said today as Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue hosted a briefing on U.S. Forest Service funding and the 2017 wildfire season.

Wyden and five other senators — Mike Crapo (R-Idaho), Steve Daines (R-Mont.), Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), Jim Risch (R-Idaho) and Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) — echoed Perdue's call for Congress to quickly find a permanent solution to the Forest Service's ballooning wildfire-suppression costs, which have exceeded \$2 billion for the current fiscal year — making 2017 the most expensive year on record for the Forest Service.

Fire-suppression spending in fiscal 2017 has reached 55 percent of the Forest Service's budget, a marked increase from just 15 percent in the 1990s. As wildland fires have increased in frequency and in the amount of time it takes to extinguish them, the Forest Service routinely borrows from fire-prevention programs to fight ongoing blazes.

Perdue argues that lasting changes to the Forest Service's budget are needed to prevent officials from having to hoard money intended for fire-prevention efforts — such as prescribed burns, harvesting and insect control — which could exacerbate the problem in the long run.

Lawmakers from both parties on Tuesday spoke in general terms that leadership on Capitol Hill understands the severity of the problem. Wyden and other senators left open the possibility of a legislative solution apart from a possible aid package for Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, however. Crapo, for one, emphasized that Congress needs to act as soon as possible to shore up the Forest Service's funding, whether in the form of a relief measure for Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands or targeted legislation.

"I agree with you," Perdue said in response to Crapo, noting that the spate of hurricanes in recent weeks could serve to increase public awareness of the government's approach to disaster relief — wildland fires included.

"I think there's a silver lining in a crisis," Perdue said, adding: "We've seen people coming together, whether in fires or hurricanes; there may be more empathy there."

The secretary also believes that OMB could make changes to give him added flexibility to manage the Forest Service's budget. He said that when he last spoke to officials at OMB he got a "favorable signal" that "they were moving in that direction," though he cautioned he has not received a "definitive" answer.

The widespread nature of the damage Puerto Rico sustained during back-to-back hits by Hurricanes Irma and Maria likely means the White House could be weeks away from submitting a formal request to Congress for an aid package, POLITICO reported earlier Tuesday. Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer is demanding that lawmakers approve a relief measure by week's end to boost recovery efforts in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

Wyden said Schumer has indicated that funding for wildland fires is "priority business."

It's also a problem that is forecast to get worse. The Forest Service estimates fire-suppression efforts will represent two-thirds of its budget by 2021, with spending increasing by about $100 million each year during that period.

To view online click here.

Back

Conaway: Cotton growers waiting on OMB to approve assistance Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 09/26/2017 04:01 PM EDT

The White House Office of Management and Budget is reviewing a proposal from USDA to renew a program that subsidizes cotton growers' ginning costs, House Agriculture Chairman Mike Conaway said today.

Conaway told reporters he hopes the damage Hurricane Harvey inflicted on the cotton crop in southeast Texas will help OMB see the value of approving the cost-share program again this year — and that Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue is advocating for it.

"We have to help the president understand how helpful that would be in between farm bills," Conaway said, noting the committee is aiming to release its version of the legislation by the end of this year or early next year. "Cotton farmers need help now."

In June 2016 USDA sent about $300 million in payments to cotton growers under the ginning assistance program, and the industry has been lobbying for something similar this year.

The 2014 farm bill included a crop insurance program designed specifically to assist cotton growers during an economic downturn, but growers have been critical of the program, which has had lackluster sign-up rates. They argue the ginning assistance program is needed until Congress can devise a more permanent solution, either via an appropriations bill or the next farm bill.

USDA and OMB did not immediately return requests for comment.

To view online click here.

Back

Puerto Rico electric utility bondholders offer emergency loan Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/27/2017 09:00 AM EDT

Investors holding billions in total debt owed by the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority will offer a loan including $1 billion in new funding to the beleaguered government-backed utility.

The loan would also cancel $150 million of existing debt, as the bondholders propose to exchange $1 billion of existing bonds for $850 million in new debt. The investors plan to pitch the proposed cash infusion as a way to finance repairs to Puerto Rico's electrical grid, which Hurricane Maria knocked out, and matching funds for the utility to qualify for matching grants from FEMA.

Bondholders making the offer say they would ask for no principal or interest to be paid for two years.

On top of the obvious humanitarian aspects of Puerto Rico's post-Maria recovery, the devastation of the natural disaster has thrown into even greater doubt the possibility that bondholders will see money owed to them by the commonwealth's government.

"The PREPA Bondholders have consistently attempted to work constructively with PREPA, the Government of Puerto Rico, and the Oversight Board [put in place by Congress] to forge a path towards rehabilitating PREPA's operations and finances — and today's commitment reflects this," said Stephen Spencer of Houlihan Lokey, the financial advisory firm advising

PREPA bondholders, in a release. "Our thoughts are with the people of Puerto Rico ... during this difficult time and we hope that this capital commitment will provide bridge financing and matching funds as required by FEMA legislation while supporting the Commonwealth's recovery."

To view online click here.

Back

Puerto Rico's rep in Congress urges USDA to provide disaster-relief funding Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 09/26/2017 04:47 PM EDT

Puerto Rico's non-voting representative in Congress urged Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue to make five key disaster-relief programs available to help the island's farmers recover from Hurricanes Maria and Irma.

In a letter to USDA today, Resident Commissioner Jenniffer González-Colón said that while producers on the island aren't eligible for assistance under the programs she cited, the back-to-back storms created an extreme emergency that warrants special action by USDA. She requested that the Livestock Indemnity Program, the Livestock Forage Disaster Program and the Emergency Assistance for Livestock, Honeybees and Farm-Raised Fish Program be applied to Puerto Rico along with initiatives that aid the forestry industry.

"Puerto Rico has a substantial agriculture sector, but it is now destroyed," González-Colón wrote in the letter, which she posted to her Twitter account. Entire crops of key staples like bananas, plantains and coffee were wiped out, she said, and the storms severely damaged about 80 percent of the island's poultry infrastructure, killing an estimated 1.9 million birds. Fruit groves, pastureland and dairy production infrastructure also were significantly affected, she added.

"To ensure the fastest possible recovery of Puerto Rico's agriculture, everything that can be done must be done, including making the island eligible for all USDA disaster assistance programs," González-Colón wrote.

González-Colón also tweeted that she had spoken to Perdue about her request. In response, a USDA spokesman told POLITICO that during that conversation, Perdue "pledged all resources and flexibilities at USDA's disposal as Puerto Rico begins to recover."

To view online click here.

Back

House Republicans propose $10 billion for Trump's border wall Back

By Rachael Bade | 09/27/2017 03:28 PM EDT

House Republicans on Wednesday unveiled a plan to provide $10 billion for President Donald Trump's border wall with Mexico, a bill unlikely to clear the Senate but which could fuel a shutdown fight in December.

Homeland Security Committee Chairman Mike McCaul (R-Texas) said his panel will vote on the legislation next week. The bill also would add 10,000 more border patrol agents and Customs and Border Protection officers, tap the National Guard to patrol the southern border and target people who have overstayed visas.

"Now that we have a partner in the White House who has made this a top priority, it's time to send a bill to President Trump's desk so we can deliver the American people the security they have long demanded and deserve," McCaul said in a statement.

The bill represents Republicans' opening salvo in both the looming year-end government funding fight and high-stakes negotiations over undocumented immigrants brought to the United States as children.

It almost certainly won't pass the Senate, where at least eight Democrats would be needed to clear a 60-vote threshold.

Still, the measure foreshadows Republican negotiating positions in the fight over the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, which Trump announced earlier this month he would end absent action from Congress. Trump has said the wall need not be part of any bipartisan deal to codify the program, but House Republicans want the wall on the table.

While the bill authorizes funds for the wall, it does not actually appropriate the money. But it shows that Republicans are intent on fighting for the wall ahead of debate to keep the government from running out of money in the second week of December.

Trump has said he wants a shutdown rumble over his wall money, which Democrats have rejected. He and some conservatives feel they could win a public relations battle if that were to occur. GOP leaders disagree and believe Republicans would face an intense backlash if the government shuts down.

To view online click here.

Back

Border wall prototype construction begins Back

By Ted Hesson | 09/26/2017 06:18 PM EDT

Construction will begin today on eight border wall prototypes, according to an announcement by U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

The prototypes will be built in the San Diego area. Four of the sample walls will be made of concrete, and four of "other materials."

Each of the prototypes will be 18-30 feet high and "will inform future design standards," according to CBP.

Ronald Vitiello, acting CBP deputy commissioner, said the prototypes will help the agency "incorporate all the tools necessary to secure our border."

Caddell Construction Company, one of the companies awarded a contract to build the prototypes, paid $3 million to settle a Justice Department fraud investigation in 2012, POLITICO reported earlier this month.

The company did not admit wrongdoing in the case.

To view online click here.

Back

America's government is getting old Back

By Danny Vinik | 09/27/2017 05:02 AM EDT

It's no secret that American workers are getting older. Even as millennials become the biggest cohort in the labor force, the median age of all U.S. employees has crept up from 30 to 42 over the past 30 years. But when it comes to getting older, a POLITICO analysis finds, the private sector has nothing on the U.S. government.

The U.S. just elected the oldest new president in history, and Congress, too, has been getting consistently older, with its average age now up around 60.

But the vast majority of the government consists of the 2 million-strong federal civilian workforce. And thanks to slow-moving hiring practices and a huge cohort of baby boomers who haven't retired at the predicted rates, it has grown significantly older than the American workforce overall. Today, just 17 percent of federal workers are under 35 years old. (In the private sector, almost 40 percent are.) And more than a quarter of federal employees are now older than 55.

In some agencies, the upward age shift is even starker. Sixty nine percent of NASA's workforce is over 45 years old. At the Department of Housing and Urban Development, it's 70 percent. At the tiny Government Printing Office, it's even more extreme—80 percent.

In principle, there's nothing wrong with older workers: They have more experience than younger ones and employers often report that they are more attentive at work. Age discrimination is not just illegal, but strips companies of experience and judgment; it's fair to say that plenty of Silicon Valley companies might benefit from the perspective of a more experienced cohort of employees. But workplaces that shift too far in any direction can suffer. There is evidence that offices with more older workers are less productive and, due to their workers' age, more expensive; health care costs are especially high, and a wave of retirements would leave the government on the hook for a major increase in pension spending. And broadly speaking, if the government is supposed to reflect America accurately—making small and large policy decisions that affect every aspect of the country—it's only reasonable to expect that the federal workforce should reflect the generational makeup of the country.

Given the stereotypes about government employees, it's easy to assume that federal worker protections have led to a vast army of aging-in-place bureaucrats who simply can't be removed. But organizational experts and former federal human resource managers say the problem is more complicated than that, and more troubling for good governance. They see an ineffective hiring system that is decades out of date. They have spent years warning policymakers that rules and laws were inhibiting their ability to hire and train new employees. The aging of the federal workforce, they say, is a symptom of Washington's inability to keep up with modern-day management practices and to plan for the future—as well as a system hamstrung by rigid federal employment directives, some of which, ironically, were aimed at freshening up the workforce.

"It's not so much a matter that old people are stupid and young people are smart," said Don Kettl, a professor at the University of Maryland who has written extensively on government management. "It's that smart agencies develop a plan for a pipeline. The federal government's biggest problem is it's not very good at pipeline planning."

IT WASN'T SUPPOSED to happen this way—or at least, for years, government analysts were worried they'd be facing the opposite problem. In 1988, the Hudson institute published an influential report called "Civil Service 2000" on the future of the federal workforce, warning that a glut of workers in their mid-careers would start leaving in 2002. That warning was supported by a raft of research suggesting a large block of middle-aged workers would all be entering their retirement years at the same time, wiping out huge amounts of institutional knowledge and swamping the government in a "retirement tsunami."

But nearly 30 years later, that tsunami hasn't arrived—and many experts think it never will. Instead, baby boomers have simply hung onto their jobs. "What we've really seen is the impact of better health and longer lives and people wanting to work together," said Myra Howze Shiplett, who served in various personnel positions across the federal government and also authored a report in 1999 warning of a retirement crisis. Said another expert: "It's been the coming crisis for 25 years."

What happened instead is that the government workforce has simply shifted older and older. Over the past 20 years, the percentage of full-time federal workers younger than 45 has gone down, while the percentage over 55 has grown dramatically, up 83 percent, according to a POLITICO analysis of data from the Office of Personnel Management. Workers at the very youngest end, under the age of 24, represent just 1.2 percent of federal employees, compared with 13 percent in the private sector. In part, that's because federal workers are much more likely than private sector workers to have a graduate level degree (29 percent vs. 11 percent), but it still is a remarkably small fraction of the overall federal workforce.

Most government agencies don't have a mandatory retirement age, so with an economy that provides less and less job security for workers, it's not exactly a surprise that many government employees have decided to continue working late into their careers.

Specialists on human resources interviewed for this story say this does have consequences. When I asked them about the effects of an aging workforce, many mentioned technology: A federal government operating in a time of smartphones and social media is staffed largely by people who grew up before the Web was invented, and many before computers arrived in homes. "A lot of the cyber crooks out there are themselves younger, and having people who are part of the video game culture improves your ability to be able to figure out how the other side is going to come at you," said Kettl, adding, "Of course it's ageist, but it's also a fact."

This belief isn't universal, and there isn't actually much evidence either way on whether younger people are more technologically savvy than older people. But younger people use technology more, and have grown up with high expectations in areas where government often falls short, such as customer service, user experience and response time.

There isn't much academic research on how an aging workforce affects an organization more broadly, either. Surveys of employers have found that older workers are more experienced and focused on their work. But a study from last year found that an older labor force is less productive—and even makes young workers less productive as well, though it's unclear why. There's also evidence that older people are less able to learn new skills. And from a budgetary perspective, studies have found that older workers are more expensive, due to their greater use of health care services. These costs fall directly on the federal government, which self-insures its workforce.

Organizational experts say that the experience and talents of older workers make them a critical piece of any organization, but having a workforce with balanced ages is important for other reasons, including ensuring that the government—the entity that creates, implements and enforces policies—has a steady influx of new perspectives and fairly represents the interests of all Americans. Private sector companies put huge resources into recruiting and training younger workers under the belief that those workers will have a different viewpoint and new ideas. Said Sean Morris, who leads Deloitte's federal human capital office: "The iconic companies, the ones most able to innovate and change to the ever increasing number of missions, are those that have a much more balanced number of generations."

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT is well aware that its workforce is getting older, and it's trying to address the issue. Human capital officers—the people who manage agency personnel—have carefully tracked the numbers, attempting to recruit younger workers and replenish their ranks. But according to many former chief human capital officers, these efforts have been stymied, running into a thicket of bureaucratic rules and well-intentioned but poorly designed policies.

To experts, the problem is simple: The government simply isn't designed to recruit and hire a modern workforce. The classification system for federal workers, for instance, dates back to 1949, and despite real progress in updating it, the rules still create huge challenges for agencies by forcing them to fit workers into certain prescribed categories rather than giving them the flexibility to hire and pay workers as they see fit. There's no exact government-wide hiring policy. It is filled with exemptions and carve-outs, and thick with paperwork; the closest thing to an official manual is a 351-page handbook published by the Office of Personnel Management.

One rule that has especially bedeviled hiring managers is the veterans preference. The rule, which dates back to a law passed in 1944, was intended to force agencies, if faced with two similarly qualified candidates, to hire a military veteran over a non-vet. But numerous human resource experts said that in practice it creates almost a lock for veterans in many jobs: Because the hiring process effectively re-defines "similarly qualified" to encompass candidates with very different skill levels, veterans often get chosen by rule over considerably more qualified competitors.

"The veterans preference, it started in a good way. Right thing to do," said Rebecca Contreras, former chief human capital officer at the Treasury Department, who is now president of AvantGarde, a consulting firm on human capital management. "But it's taken over and inhibited a lot of agencies, and has locked down the opportunity to take anyone who is not a veteran."

Congress also makes the job harder: Federal hiring is highly dependent on the federal budget, and Washington's dragged-out budget battles can be huge obstacles to hiring. Lawmakers rarely complete the budget process on time, often passing a stopgap measure when they can't agree on spending levels. These so-called "continuing resolutions" appear innocuous—after all, the government stays open—but within agencies, they cause confusion and impose a de facto hiring freeze on most offices. Hiring officers have no idea how many workers they can hire. Often, they have to delay even planning their staffing levels, never mind actually recruiting and hiring candidates, until Congress reaches a more permanent deal.

According to former human resource officers, former President Barack Obama inadvertently made the problem worse with his own initiative to recruit younger workers—a new program that created more problems than it solved. This was part of Obama's attempt to make government "cool" again and bring in a younger, more diverse workforce. Jeri Buchholz, formerly NASA's chief human capital officer, remembered getting strict orders from Obama's OPM on whom to recruit: "Early career people, veterans and Hispanics."

In 2010, Obama issued an executive order creating something called the Pathways Program, which both streamlined existing internships and fellowships, and made it harder for agencies to use such programs to circumvent the veterans preference. Obama officials didn't see these goals as contradictory, believing that agencies shouldn't have trouble complying with the preference. "It should be seen as an opportunity," said Shelley Metzenbaum, who had a top position overseeing personnel in Obama's budget office.

On the latter goal, Pathways succeeded—OPM found that the percentage of veteran hires rose from 24 percent in fiscal 2009 to 33 percent in fiscal 2014. Overall, nearly a quarter of federal workers are veterans, compared to just 5 percent of the private sector workforce. But former human capital officers said it created huge hiring challenges, and the data show that many agencies nearly stopped hiring through Pathways altogether. In another critical way, Pathways hasn't worked: Though the reforms were supposed to help bring younger people into government, the average age of people in the Pathways program was 27.1, up from 25.4 under previous programs.

These trends are worrisome for the age of the federal workforce—and that is evident in the data. The percentage of new hires younger than 30 fell from 37 percent in fiscal 2011 to 35 percent in fiscal 2016, according to OPM data. It's unfair to blame that entirely on Obama or Pathways. After all, the government went through sequestration, and agencies faced intermittent hiring freezes during those years. That made workforce planning exceptionally hard and especially limited the government's ability to recruit younger workers. But despite Obama's efforts to recruit younger workers, nothing much has changed, and in fact new government workers now skew slightly older.

"They need to do targeted outreach, targeted sourcing, targeted marketing," said Contreras. "It all goes back to having the right people on the right seat on the right bus. How is the government going to do that if they don't make a comprehensive effort across the board?"

NONE OF THIS means that there haven't been some smaller successes. Obama, for instance, implemented new programs to bring young tech workers into the government, including 18F, an agency created in 2013 to help government agencies improve their digital products, and the U.S. Digital Service, both of which brought workers from companies like Google and Amazon into the government for short stints. The goal was to infuse private-sector tech expertise into the workforce without tying down workers for years. It's widely seen as a big success, reducing the time between interview and offer letter to 30 days, compared with around six months for most agencies.

If there is one agency that has succeeded in trying new hiring practices and recruiting a younger workforce in recent years, it is the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, created in 2011 under the Dodd-Frank financial reform law. Fifty seven percent of CFPB workers are younger than 45—a number roughly in line with private-sector norms and higher than any other federal agency.

But the CFPB's success is also an indictment of the current hiring system: The CFPB has the distinct advantage of being a new agency, without a legacy workforce. In addition, the agency was accused of ageism in the hiring process. Three people sued the CFPB after its applications were rejected saying they were denied employment "because of their age." The agency denied the accusation and the case was settled out of court.

Can President Donald Trump turn around the federal behemoth? He's promised to run the government like a private-sector company and tasked his son-in-law, senior adviser Jared Kushner, with modernizing government through the newly created Office of American Innovation. But there are a lot of reasons for skepticism that an influx of younger workers will enter the government anytime soon. One of Trump's first moves was a hiring freeze, and though it has since been lifted, it sent an immediate bad signal to potential candidates considering government careers, experts said. More importantly, Trump is very unpopular with young people: One recent poll found that 62 percent of millennials disapprove of his job performance, compared to just 22 percent who approved. (He's more popular among older Americans—but not with federal employees, who overwhelmingly disapprove of his performance.) And if the economy continues to improve, workers will have other job options instead of working for Uncle Sam.

In addition, Trump doesn't have the personnel in place to undertake a major overhaul of federal hiring practices. His nominee to head OPM, the most important personnel office, hasn't yet been confirmed—his initial nominee withdrew in August, and he named a new candidate in September. That means he'll go nearly a year in office without his top adviser on personnel issues.

Analysts say there's a small but real chance the imbalance could solve itself in a way that becomes a crisis of its own. Thirteen percent of the federal workforce—more than 100,000 workers—are now over the age of 60. At the departments of Education, Labor and Treasury, around 6 percent of the workforce is already over 65; at HUD, that figure is almost 9 percent. There's only one possible conclusion to these trends: At some point, these workers really are going to retire. When they do, the agencies will lose decades of institutional knowledge across programs and jurisdictions, forcing them to compete for replacements in a tight labor market with a government more unpopular than at almost any point in its history.

After decades of predictions that haven't come true, most experts are reluctant to continue forecasting a retirement tsunami, but they are worried. One former Obama official described it to me as "more like termites in the basement as opposed to a wolf at the door"; Dan Blair, who was director of OPM during the George W. Bush administration, had a different metaphor. "I liken it to osteoporosis," he said. "It may not affect day-to-day operations until something really breaks down."

Washington has had decades to prepare for this moment, but despite real efforts by multiple administrations, nothing much has changed. When that tsunami hits, or the termites finally reach the foundation, Congress may finally start paying attention—but by then it might already be too late.

To view online click here.

Back

Inside the life and death of Graham-Cassidy Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn, Burgess Everett and Seung Min Kim | 09/27/2017 05:06 AM EDT

Sen. Lindsey Graham offered a eulogy for the GOP's Obamacare repeal effort on Tuesday, but seized on one bright spot as a reason not to give up after a parade of health care disappointments.

During a closed-door party meeting to discuss their terms of surrender, he told fellow Republicans that Sen. Lisa Murkowski, who opposed repeal over the summer, said she'd be open to his plan under other conditions, according to GOP senators in the room.

The decision on Tuesday not to vote on the Graham-Cassidy bill marked the fourth Obamacare repeal bill failure since the summer began. But Republicans say they're not going to stop, and Murkowski's decision not to oppose the bill provided a small victory in an otherwise painful defeat.

"Today to me, it's not a matter of if, it's now when," Graham said of repealing the Affordable Care Act. "Because this idea makes sense. Let's say we fail. Let's say we continue to fail. You've seen the damage done to the party, donors, people upset. The good news is I see enthusiasm for the first time among Republicans about an alternative to Obamacare."

Graham's positive spin comes just two weeks after he and Sen. Bill Cassidy had to publicly plead with President Donald Trump and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to get on board with a last-gasp Obamacare bill. They then went on a legislative binge, running around Washington to lobby the White House senators and conservative groups to at least not kill their effort.

The Graham-Cassidy push was aided by "the fact this wasn't a leadership exercise," said Sen. John Thune of South Dakota, the No. 3 GOP senator.

At one point, the bill seemed to have a real chance of success. And then it ran into the same hurdles that killed every other GOP health plan. Ultimately, a number of Senate Republicans remain wary of transforming the U.S. health system in such a haphazard process — especially with plans to make deep cuts to Medicaid and roll back protections for people with pre-existing conditions.

And yet the sudden spurt of momentum behind Graham-Cassidy, once considered a long shot, underscores how nervous Republicans are about facing voters in 2018 without fulfilling their top campaign promise or having much of a legislative record.

What hasn't changed is that there are three hard "nos" against Obamacare repeal: Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Susan Collins of Maine, not to mention other quietly skeptical senators.

In fact, Graham's best friend, McCain, turned out to be more out of reach than the moderate Murkowski.

The Arizona senator left a closed-door meeting of Senate Republicans on Tuesday holding an article listing the problems his state would see if the bill became law, as he grumbled to reporters about the rushed process to write the bill.

"There was no point. Everyone knows where I am," McCain said Tuesday in an interview. "I've said incessantly I want hearings, I want votes, I want input."

Both Graham and Cassidy say they merely ran out of time. Other Republicans say the effort was thwarted by bad information — early drafts had errors or misleading information — and last-minute changes that made members uncomfortable about what they'd be voting on.

"I can't be on CNN defending something if it's in its 27th iteration when I think it's the third iteration. That's not the way I do business," said Sen. John Kennedy (R-La.). "I don't even know what the last version looked like."

Graham told his Republican colleagues in the closed-door meeting Tuesday that Murkowski "likes the idea of sending the money to Alaska and getting the hell out of the way. But the process and the constant changes just made getting her vote impossible at this point," according to a Republican senator in the room.

And so, Senate Republicans succumbed to the reality Tuesday that despite getting close to fulfilling their seven-year-old campaign pledge, they wouldn't have time to rally the final votes before the procedural power to pass legislation with only a majority expires on Saturday.

And Murkowski's position gives Republicans enough latitude to say that Obamacare repeal is not dead, simply on the back burner, as they focus on scoring a legislative win with tax reform.

Murkowski said Tuesday she could "get behind" the idea of block granting health care funds to the states, but she trashed a "hard deadline and lousy process."

"The U.S. Senate cannot get the text of a bill on a Sunday night, then proceed to a vote just days later, with only one hearing - and especially not on an issue that is intensely personal to all of us," she said in a statement.

Vice President Mike Pence told Republicans on Tuesday that they need to repeal Obamacare by the end of this Congress, GOP senators said, ensuring that the Obamacare debate will be part of the 2018 mid-term elections, just like it was in every election since 2010.

But unless the Senate math shifts, Republicans are no closer to 50 votes than they were on the July evening when McCain dramatically ended the previous GOP repeal effort. And after Collins confirmed on Monday that she's the third Republican to oppose the bill, its fate was sealed.

"It took 18 months for them to pass Obamacare," Graham said of Democrats. "It's gonna take us a while for us to replace it."

The discussion at the closed-door GOP meeting Tuesday was short on health care and long on tax reform. It seemed that after talking about health care for four months, there wasn't much left to go over and most Republicans had all come to the same conclusion: Another failed vote would only heighten the bad vibes in the party. A vote McConnell's office said could happen this week was pulled.

Cassidy and Graham first began gently pushing their proposal to turn Obamacare funding into block grants for the states in July, when Senate Republicans were previously in the throes of the Obamacare repeal effort.

"And it was appealing to people," said Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "Block grants are something we've all supported."

That effort faded quickly as the GOP attempted a slapdash "skinny" repeal, which then failed with McCain's dramatic opposition.

The push to repeal Obamacare took on new life after a party lunch meeting two weeks ago at the Senate GOP's campaign headquarters. There, they were presented with a dour assessment of the party's finances as donors rebelled against a party that had abandoned its promise.

"Failure of health care has made the problem we had worse. It's not just [contested] primaries but donors. Let me tell you, online giving went down 40 percent after we failed on health care. Pledges to the Republican Party went down 60 percent. And I understand that," said Graham, who cheekily called such feedback "employer assessments."

Some Republicans were hopeful that the Senate effort would mirror the House's multiple attempts at Obamacare repeal: After the leadership-driven effort failed, members would pick up the pieces and deliver.

"The leader felt like they ought to be able to enjoy at least a little bit of the fruits of that effort and see where it went. They kept gaining momentum, and I think there was a hope that our members that weren't there last time were there this time," Thune said.

But again, the effort came down to the same handful of skeptics: Murkowski, Paul, McCain, Collins. Graham and Cassidy wrote off Paul and Collins relatively quickly, assuming they would be impossible to budge. They spent much of their time trying to woo the Alaska Republican, and hoped that Graham's friendship with McCain would be enough to move him to a "yes" vote.

Still, some Republicans held out hope.

"I always knew it was going to be hard," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). Asked if he ever thought they would triumph, he said, "Yeah, I actually did."

Graham and Cassidy are an unlikely pair. Cassidy has been promoting Medicaid block grants for years and Graham wanted to deliver on a crucial GOP campaign pledge. Graham, never a health policy wonk, told fellow Senate Republicans during Tuesday's lunch that he's learned more than he wanted to about health care, according to one senator.

Graham called the recent push the "most amazing journey of my life" and insisted that the idea of block granting health care dollars to states — an idea that former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) passed on to Graham at the Senate barbershop earlier this year — would be the basis of any conservative Obamacare repeal plan in the future.

"I think we have an idea that people can rally around," Graham said. "We now have an idea that I think Republicans understand, that the average person can understand."

And a growing faction of Senate Republicans are becoming more emboldened despite their failures, echoing Pence's message inside the GOP lunch on Tuesday that the push to repeal Obamacare needs to continue into next year.

"Obviously there's a lot of discouragement about not being able to do it but there's also a very strong attitude that we're not going to stop trying," Sen. Mike Crapo (R-Idaho). "We can't. We just have to keep working at it."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump says he'll sign executive order allowing purchase of health care across state lines

Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill and Paul Demko | 09/27/2017 01:51 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Wednesday said he will likely sign an executive order allowing Americans to purchase health care across state lines.

But the idea is broadly opposed by state insurance commissioners, consumer advocates and insurers, and has been a failure in states where it's been tried.

"I'll probably be signing a very major executive order where people can go out across state lines, do lots of things and buy their own health care, and that will be probably signed next week," Trump told reporters on Wednesday afternoon. "It's being finished now. It's gonna cover a lot of territory and a lot of people — millions of people."

Trump's remarks revived a theme from his presidential campaign and came a day after the collapse of Senate Republicans' efforts to repeal Obamacare with a simple majority.

Trump didn't elaborate on how he would allow insurance to be sold across state lines. But most insurance experts find it hard to imagine how an executive order could supplant existing state regulations, and believe such a move would likely spark a legal challenge.

"Health insurers already have the ability to sell insurance in multiple states as long as they comply with state consumer protection and licensing laws, which many already do," said Mike Considine, CEO of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, in a statement to POLITICO. "The NAIC has long been opposed to any attempt to reduce or preempt state authority or weaken consumer protections."

Washington Insurance Commissioner Mike Kreidler, a Democrat, said he didn't know how an executive order could ever be binding on a state. "I just can't imagine it having that kind of impact. State law is going to supersede an executive order."

Trump and other Republicans have long touted sales across state lines as a sure-fire way to bolster competition and drive down prices. The Affordable Care Act allows states to form compacts to test the concept.

But state insurance commissioners — even Republicans — health plans and consumer advocates warn that without strong federal standards, as currently exist with Obamacare, it would likely lead to a "race to the bottom" with insurers flocking to the states with the least stringent rules. Skeptics also worry that there wouldn't be any accountability for insurers that engage in shoddy business practices if state regulations are stripped away.

"I do not believe that state insurance commissioners, nor state legislatures or governors, will look kindly to anything that would pre-empt our ability to protect our consumers," said Maryland Insurance Commissioner Al Redmer Jr., a Republican appointee.

Several states — including Wyoming, Maine and Georgia — have already tried allowing across-state sales, and it's been a colossal bust. The chief reason: There's been zero interest from insurers. That's in part because creating competitive provider networks in states where they don't have any current customers is incredibly difficult.

In addition, insurers in states with tough regulations are fearful of having to compete against out-of-state plans that don't have to adhere to the same rules.

"My insurers here absolutely cringe when you talk about across-state sales," Washington state's Kreidler said.

But Sen. John Kennedy (R-La.) argues that taking away states' rights to regulate their insurance markets is just what's needed to spur competition.

"If I see a plan in Arizona that I want to buy, I ought to be able to buy," Kennedy said. "What's going on right now is you have these little fiefdoms in each state where the insurance commissioners want to keep control."

Adam Cancryn contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Mitch McConnell's dreadful day Back

By John Bresnahan, Burgess Everett and Josh Dawsey | 09/27/2017 05:07 AM EDT

For Mitch McConnell, Tuesday was about as bad as it could get.

A vulnerable incumbent senator, Luther Strange of Alabama, lost handily to Roy Moore, who used the Senate leader as his campaign punching bag. McConnell pulled the plug — again — on repealing Obamacare. One of his close allies, Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), announced his retirement.

And President Donald Trump is back on McConnell's case, dubbing him "weak" at a private dinner with conservative activists on Monday evening.

McConnell's job is in no immediate danger, and he hopes to pivot quickly to tax reform. Yet months of woes are now taking their toll on the GOP leader's agenda, and his caucus.

"It's been a hard summer for all of us," admitted Sen. John Thune of South Dakota, the No. 3 GOP senator.

Asked Tuesday whether he was having a "tough day," McConnell ignored the question. And that was before Corker announced his retirement and Moore won.

"We haven't given up on changing the American health care system," McConnell said. "We're not going to be able to do that this week, but it still lies ahead of us, and we haven't given up on that."

McConnell's long-shot bid to save Strange, who had Trump's backing as well, failed spectacularly as the former Alabama attorney general was trounced by Moore in the deep red state. And that soon could be a daily problem for McConnell. Moore, twice ousted as a judge on the Alabama Supreme Court for defying federal edicts, has openly said he wants to dump McConnell as the top Senate Republican.

"Judge Roy Moore in the U.S. Senate means the END of Mitch McConnell's reign as Majority Leader," Moore vowed in one fundraising pitch. Moore now faces Democrat Doug Jones in the Dec. 12 general election.

Moore's win came just hours after McConnell, faced with unwavering opposition from a trio of his GOP colleagues, was forced to ditch the latest GOP proposal to repeal and replace Obamacare. McConnell's choices were grim: Hold another failed vote, or concede another defeat.

McConnell chose to call it quits and perhaps try again next year. Yet it was another embarrassing setback in McConnell's failed months-long effort to overturn the 2010 Affordable Care Act, and it came at an even heavier price this time — more problems for McConnell from the occupant of the Oval Office.

Trump spent much of August publicly bashing McConnell but stopped after the two held a private meeting several weeks ago. But now the president is bad-mouthing the Senate leader again.

During a dinner with conservative activists on Monday night at the White House, Trump laid into McConnell, according to two attendees. Trump told the activists that McConnell was "weak" because he couldn't pass the GOP health care plan, and the president complained at length about how Republicans had failed him on the issue, while asking the activists what they should do next.

Trump added that he was disappointed in McConnell for not changing the Senate filibuster rule so that only 51 votes are needed to pass legislation, also dubbing McConnell's resistance to the idea as "weak." That criticism does not ring true to Senate Republicans, given that Democrats have barely been able to use the filibuster due to McConnell mostly holding party-line votes.

A McConnell spokesman declined to comment.

A person briefed on the meeting noted Trump took aim at far more than McConnell during the meeting, distancing himself from Strange and whacking Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as well. Trump called McCain "disgraceful" on health care and mocked his thumbs-down gesture on the Senate floor against a GOP proposal in July, complete with a facial expression, attendees said.

After the race was called Tuesday, McConnell vowed to support Moore in the general election despite the candidate's opposition to him personally.

"He ran a spirited campaign centered around a dissatisfaction with the progress made in Washington. I share that frustration," McConnell said of Moore in a statement. "Senate Republicans will be as committed to keeping Alabama's Senate seat in Republican hands with Roy Moore as we were with Luther Strange."

McConnell's support in the Republican Conference remains solid despite what Trump, Moore and former Trump aide Steve Bannon say about him. Bannon has launched a crusade against the Senate leader and Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Ohio) since leaving the White House.

"It's not even a close question there," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn said of McConnell's position. "It's not easy being majority leader, which is why many people choose not to run for it."

The way to put an end to anti-McConnell challengers, Cornyn said, is "you win. Really, it's about that simple."

After ushering through the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch, McConnell has found himself in a box. Trump will receive the lion's share of credit for legislative victories that McConnell or Ryan engineered, but the president has made clear he'll blame the GOP leaders when bills falter.

Trump might turn to Democrats again in search of victories — as he did earlier this month to put off a fight over the budget and debt ceiling — which would again test McConnell and Ryan's loyalty to the president.

Some Republicans said that at least in the case of Obamacare, McConnell was not to blame for the failure of the proposal pushed by Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Bill Cassidy (R-La.).

"The whole health care thing right now was sort of inspired by Graham and Cassidy, and the president, who kept it alive. I don't think Mitch has much ownership other than to try to see if there's a path forward," Thune said.

Thune added that Strange's situation in Alabama was a "unique set of circumstances. I think everybody in a lot of these places, particularly primary voters, want to send a message to Washington."

Strange was appointed to the seat by former Republican Gov. Robert Bentley, who later resigned in a sex scandal. Strange's appointment didn't sit well with Alabama voters. The Senate Leadership Fund, a pro-McConnell super PAC, dumped $9 million into the race in a bid to derail Moore, but he proved far too strong. And Trump's endorsement of Strange proved to be too little, too late.

"What happens today in Alabama with Luther Strange has nothing to do with Mitch McConnell. It has everything to do with Alabama," Sen. Cory Gardner of Colorado, chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said before the results were tallied.

Personal loyalty to McConnell remains high among his colleagues. They remember him as a two-term chairman of the NRSC. He led the fight against former President Barack Obama for eight years. And he got Gorsuch onto the Supreme Court, which is Trump's only real win in Congress so far.

When it comes to who to blame for a difficult year with just a 52-seat majority, McConnell's colleagues refuse to point to the majority leader as the source of the problem. They criticize each other, not McConnell.

"You can only fight with the troops that you've got," Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said of McConnell's predicament.

To view online click here.

Back

Alexander, Murray to meet for bipartisan health talks Back

By Burgess Everett | 09/27/2017 12:18 PM EDT

GOP Sen. Lamar Alexander will meet with Democratic Sen. Patty Murray on Wednesday to try to salvage their bipartisan health care efforts, Alexander said in an interview.

House and Senate Republican leaders rejected the effort last week, preferring instead to try another partisan attempt at Obamacare repeal. Alexander said now that that's collapsed, he's going to try again with Murray to stabilize insurance markets.

Still, Alexander said he needs broader buy-in than just a deal between him and Murray, the two leaders of the Senate's health committee.

"We're going to see if it's possible to find some bipartisan consensus that can get a result," Alexander said. "I'm talking to her, I'm talking to Republicans and I'm talking to some Democrats."

Senate Republicans say they are still wary of any "bailout" of insurance companies and are skeptical Democrats will make concessions. But Murray did make an offer to Alexander that would allow the sale of some cheaper plans and more state flexibility before their effort ended.

Democrats have said they were very close to striking a deal until GOP leaders stomped on it.

"Chairman Alexander and I had been making great progress toward our goals of stabilizing the market and reducing premiums — with many members on and off our committee — until Republican leaders pulled the rug out from under us," Murray said Tuesday. "Now — the two weeks since our last hearing have been wasted."

Some Republicans also still want to make another go at Obamacare repeal next year, in an all-GOP effort. But Alexander insisted the two approaches are compatible, as the repeal bill sponsored by Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Bill Cassidy of Louisiana to block-grant health care to the states would kick in mostly in 2020 and Alexander and Murray are focused on stabilizing premiums in 2018 and 2019.

"Whether or not the Cassidy bill will pass, we need to do the kind of things I'm thinking about," Alexander said.

To view online click here.

Back

Heritage Action vows to fight bipartisan bids to shore up Obamacare Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 09/26/2017 05:09 PM EDT

Heritage Action served notice it will oppose efforts to prop up Obamacare marketplaces in the aftermath of Republicans' latest failed attempt to repeal the health care law.

"Some lawmakers will reflexively demand a 'bipartisan market stabilization' in response to Obamacare's deteriorating markets. That is unacceptable," the conservative group's CEO, Michael A. Needham, said in a statement today. "Repealing and, ultimately, replacing Obamacare will eventually require moderate Republicans to come to the table and follow through on their repeated campaign promises."

Heritage said as congressional Republicans shift their attention to tax reform, they shouldn't accept Obamacare as settled law but push for repeal in the near future.

Senate HELP Chairman Lamar Alexander and ranking Democrat Patty Murray presided over a series of hearings on shoring up the marketplaces before GOP leaders mounted a last-ditch effort to pass a repeal plan by Lindsey Graham and Bill Cassidy. Alexander this week said the climate wasn't conducive for follow-up collaborations.

"My goal wasn't just to get a bipartisan agreement; it was to get a bipartisan result and I didn't see any way to get one in the current political environment," Alexander said on Monday. "That environment hasn't changed, maybe it does change — but it hasn't."

To view online click here.

Back

Governors push Congress to resume bipartisan health care talks Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 09/27/2017 02:14 PM EDT

One day after Senate Republicans admitted defeat on their latest Obamacare repeal plan, the nation's governors are pushing Congress to resume bipartisan efforts to stabilize the health insurance marketplaces.

Senate HELP Committee leaders said today they would explore the possibility of reviving bipartisan talks, which were sidelined by repeal efforts.

"We applaud the renewed commitment of Sen. Lamar Alexander and Sen. Patty Murray to find a bipartisan solution to insurance market stabilization and we encourage Congress to support and engage in their effort," the National Governors Association wrote.

The governors also pushed Congress to reauthorize funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program, which is set to expire on Saturday.

Governors are calling on Congress to fully fund the Affordable Care Act cost-sharing subsidies, which President Donald Trump has threatened to pull. They're also asking to speed up the process for applying to Obamacare state innovation waivers, as well as providing new flexibility to test health reforms.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump: 'We will have the votes' for Obamacare repeal Back

By POLITICO Staff | 09/27/2017 08:27 AM EDT

President Donald Trump today said the attempt to repeal and replace Obamacare isn't dead, tweeting that "we will have the votes on Healthcare" but not for Saturday's reconciliation deadline.

"We will have the votes for Healthcare but not for the reconciliation deadline of Friday, after which we need 60. Get rid of Filibuster Rule!" he tweeted.

On Tuesday, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell chose not to hold a vote on Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Bill Cassidy's (R-La) Obamacare repeal bill after it became clear there wasn't enough support for it.

The Graham-Cassidy bill was the GOP's last-ditch effort to overturn former President Barack Obama's signature health care legislation through the process known as reconciliation, which allows them to approve a bill with 50 votes instead of the typical 60 required by Senate filibuster rules.

Trump also tweeted "With one Yes vote in hospital & very positive signs from Alaska and two others (McCain is out), we have the HCare Vote, but not for Friday!" His mention of a hospitalized senator appears to be a reference to Sen. Thad Cochran, who is recuperating at home in Mississippi from a urological issue.

Cochran spokesman Stephen Worley said the senator is not in the hospital, however.

Seung Min Kim contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

House passes bill to reauthorize child home visiting program Back

By Caitlin Emma | 09/26/2017 05:15 PM EDT

The House today voted 214-209 to reauthorize the Maternal, Infant and Early Childhood Home Visiting program, which expires at the end of the month.

The federal home visiting program is aimed at assisting low-income families with young children. The bill, H.R. 2824 \(115\), would reauthorize the program for five years and comes with a controversial state matching requirement, opposed by Democrats. The House approved an amendment introduced by Democratic Rep. Suzan DelBene of Washington, however, that would strike the matching requirement for Indian tribes or tribal organizations.

The House later this week will consider H.R. 2792 \(115\), the Control Unlawful Fugitive Felons Act or CUFF Act, which House Republicans want to use to fund the home visiting program reauthorization by prohibiting Supplemental Security Income payments to people with an outstanding arrest warrant for a felony or for violating a condition of probation or parole. Democrats have blasted the CUFF Act as a pay-for, saying it destroys the opportunity for a bipartisan reauthorization of the home visiting program.

Republican Sen. Chuck Grassley of Iowa last week introduced S. 1829 \(115\), the Senate version of the bill to reauthorize the home visiting program. Democrats have hailed the Senate version as bipartisan because it doesn't include the state matching requirement or the CUFF Act as a pay-for.

To view online click here.

Back

Farm, green groups push for increased conservation funding Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 09/27/2017 11:52 AM EDT

Conservation groups are pushing for more funding and reporting requirements in the next farm bill, but with money tight on Capitol Hill, it's unclear if such programs will see any boost.

The list of recommendations released today from 26 groups — including the National Sustainable Agriculture Coalition, National Farmers Union, Trust for Public Land and the Environmental Working Group — calls for a reversal of the roughly $6 billion in cuts that were made in the 2014 farm bill reauthorization, which were reduced more in the appropriations process. They also want more enforcement to ensure that taxpayer money is going to good use.

"We stand united in saying that cuts to farm bill conservation programs must come to an end, and that we now must reverse these cuts and bring conservation investments in line with resource need and producer demand," the groups said in the recommendations.

Also included were calls to expand nationwide Sodsaver requirements — an initiative to discourage converting grassland into cropland by reducing subsidies on crop insurance premiums for farmers to do so. The rules currently apply to farmers in just six states.

Many of the recommendations are unlikely to sit well with farm groups and GOP lawmakers, who say conservation programs should be voluntary. They will likely want few changes in the next farm bill in an effort to get the measure passed quickly.

And with even less money from Congress for the reauthorization — the committees are expected to have to make \$10 billion in spending cuts — they argue that money should be used to help cotton and dairy farmers who have been struggling with what are said to be inadequate insurance and support programs.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: GOP lawmakers deride White House's noncommittal debt limit strategy — Black: Budget expected on the floor in two weeks — Even Mnuchin can't say when the U.S. will reach its borrowing limit
Date: Friday, September 08, 2017 4:48:14 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 09/08/2017 04:45 PM EDT

FOOL ME ONCE: Begrudgingly, they went along. But Republican lawmakers are determined not to get sidelined a second time, after holding their noses through the hard-to-swallow vote this morning on a debt ceiling increase, stopgap spending and disaster aid.

The vote that ended one of the most productive workweeks in recent memory has stirred the kind of intraparty strife that's sure to make for a tense December, as rank-and-file Republicans prepare to protest another "clean" debt ceiling increase while learning just how much leverage President Donald Trump has ceded to their Democratic counterparts.

Throwing tomatoes: As Rachael Bade and Kyle Cheney report, House Republicans booed when OMB Director Mick Mulvaney refused to commit this morning to reducing spending as part of the next debt ceiling hike. During that meeting, Mulvaney and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin got an earful from the roomful of congressional Republicans — many of whom say they emerged more disgruntled than when they entered the gathering, which was supposed to be a kumbaya-inspiring experience.

Mostly counterproductive: Republican Study Chairman Mark Walker told Sarah this morning that he personally asked Mnuchin what the December vote on raising the debt ceiling will look like. "The Treasury secretary could not answer that, and many of us found that very frustrating," Walker said. The meeting went so badly, he explained, that the Cabinet members seem to have done more harm than good to the whip count for the morning vote. "I would probably say they lost a few votes, rather than gaining a few," Walker said.

Shameless plug: Tune in at 10 a.m. Sunday to C-SPAN Newsmakers for Sarah and Bloomberg reporter Anna Edgerton's full interview with Walker.

Tired eyes? Check out our latest Nerdcast, on how Republicans are still reeling from Trump's debt ceiling deal.

GOOD FRIDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — A cadre of defense industry groups is calling on Congress to enact a full-year spending measure and renew the debt ceiling before the December deadline. More from Connor O'Brien.

#DailyBudgetFact — While Mnuchin maxed out his campaign contributions to Donald Trump with more than $5,000 in donations, the Treasury secretary and his wife gave more than $13,000 to Hillary Clinton's campaigns for Senate and the presidency since 2000, as well as lesser sums to several other Democrats, according to OpenSecrets.org. Rep. Ryan Costello noted the irony this morning of "a Democratic donor Treasury secretary" trying to convince Republicans to vote for a "clean" debt ceiling alongside a fiscal hardliner like Mulvaney.

BUDGET

FINALLY ON THE FLOOR? House Budget Chairman Diane Black told us today that she expects her fiscal 2018 budget to debut on the House floor the week of Sept. 25. She says the whipping operation isn't quite done, though: "We still some cleanup to do — we do."

DEBT DEAL

COMING AROUND AGAIN: Even Mnuchin couldn't tell GOP lawmakers today exactly how much time they have until the next bruising debt ceiling fight. But the folks at Bipartisan Policy Center have a guess: "Sometime in March 2018." There's a big caveat, of course. "The uncertainty this far out — including yet-to-be-determined spending for Hurricanes Harvey and Irma and the possibility of income tax changes — cannot be overstated," the nonpartisan group says.

IT'S OFFICIAL: It's hard to overstate how remarkable it is that the House and Senate have already passed a continuing resolution and a debt ceiling bill a full 22 days ahead of schedule. The House easily cleared the package — which also includes $15.25 billion in disaster aid — this morning, as Jen reports. Our takeaways:

— Hastert Rule achieved: House Speaker Paul Ryan walked away with a win after 113 Republicans voted for the legislation, outpacing the 90 "no" votes from his party (yep, we've got the list).

— Military above most: Still peeved by Congress' decision to opt for another stopgap bill, half of the 34 Republicans on House Armed Services voted against the package, Connor O'Brien points out.

— Didn't even get all the Texans: Twenty-one out of 25 Texas lawmakers voted for the package. Those opposed? Reps. Jeb Hensarling, Mac Thornberry, Joe Barton and Sam Johnson. (More on Thornberry's decision from Connor.)

— The press release game: A dig through our inboxes shows how Republicans will explain their votes back home. As Kyle Cheney aptly noted, House Republicans who voted against today's package called it a "debt ceiling bill." For those in favor, it was a "disaster relief bill."

APPROPRIATIONS

MINIBUS DECELERATES: So much for that Saturday vote! House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy announced late Thursday night that there won't be any more work on the GOP minibus until next week. We had been expecting late votes tonight, but McCarthy reversed course to make sure coastal lawmakers can get home safe before Hurricane Irma strikes, as Sarah reports.

What's next: Lawmakers will churn through debate on the three remaining bills: Labor-HHS-Education, Financial Services and Commerce-Justice-Science as soon as they get back. Expect multiple days of debate because there are still nearly 200 amendments to go.

Calvert's big moment: The House churned through nearly 80 amendments related to EPA and Interior Department funding in the last 24 hours. Tuning into that lengthy debate, Morning Energy lays out the top issues to watch for the omnibus in December: Park maintenance, Environmental justice program funding, State grants for clean water, Offshore drilling, Water monitoring for mine spills, and Clean Air Act regulations.

DENT BOWS OUT: After more than dozen years in Congress, Rep. Charlie Dent will call it quits after 2018, Kyle Cheney and Alex Isenstadt report. The Tuesday Group leader and appropriations cardinal confirmed this week that he won't be seeking reelection, noting that he "never planned on serving" more than five or six terms (he's now in his seventh). And as Theodoric Meyer scoops this afternoon, Dent has already hired Ivan Adler and John Hesse of the McCormick Group, who specialize in landing clients new jobs on K Street.

AWKWARD APOLOGY: Thursday night's debate on the Interior-EPA appropriations package delivered one of the most heated moments of the whole week. Rep. Don Young, Alaska's sole House member, lost his temper during a debate over wildlife management and lashed out at Rep. Pramila Jayapal, saying the freshman lawmaker "doesn't know a damn thing what she's talking about." The 84-year-old Republican also repeatedly referred to Jayapal, 51, as "young lady."

Girl power: The Washington Democrat demanded that Young withdraw his remarks, which — after several tense minutes — he did. Young then returned to the floor to apologize. "I recognize it was out of order, so I hope you accept my apology," he said.

The next 'she persisted' moment: Female-focused groups like NARAL quickly turned the moment viral. Jayapal seized on the attack on Twitter. "A message to women of color out there: stand strong. Refuse to be patronized or minimized. Let the small guys out there be intimidated by you," she wrote. (Even Chelsea Clinton joined in.)

AGRICULTURE

FARM SAFETY NET'S ENOUGH? Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue said today that lawmakers seem reluctant to passing a supplemental disaster assistance package for U.S. farmers and ranchers affected by this year's hurricanes and wildfires, Catherine Boudreau reports. "I think Congress is somewhat hesitant to open up a supplemental disaster program on top of the crop insurance program," Perdue told reporters.

Go to the source: The secretary also said today that his department needs to "appeal to appropriators and Congress ... to fix the fire funding problem once and for all," Jenny Hopkinson reports.

Tack it on: A dozen senators wrote to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell this week, asking that funding to fight wildfires be included in any future disaster aid packages so the Fire Service doesn't have to pilfer hundreds of millions of dollars from other accounts to cover its deficit from wildfire season.

OBAMACARE

FILLING THE VOID: Health care advocates say they have no clue how they'll fill the major funding gap left by the Trump administration as they look to promote Obamacare signups this fall. Federal health officials will be working with a budget of about $10 million for the entire sign-up season, which starts Nov. 1 — down from $100 million last time around.

Wishful thinking: Ever since the White House pulled out the rug last week, several prominent Obama allies have been in talks to raise the money themselves, Rachana Pradhan reports. But some involved with that effort are less than optimistic. "To just think that somebody will come in and have $50 million is just ... that's going to be a very, very difficult ask," one person told Rachana.

TRANSPORTATION

GOOD NEWS FOR GATEWAY? Emerging from their meeting with Trump this week, New Yorkers said they're optimistic the president will, in fact, commit federal funding for Gateway rail project, Dana Rubinstein reports. POTUS made no firm commitment, though, to the nearly $30 billion project.

HEALTH CARE

UNEXPECTED REBUKE: We don't say this often, but Senate Democrats struck political gold on abortion policy during an appropriations markup this week. As Jen Haberkorn writes, Senate spending leaders delivered a double challenge to the Trump administration on Thursday, prompting some key Republicans to vote against the package.

A two-fer: The newly approved State and Foreign Operations bill, S. 1780 \(115\), would undo the White House's funding ban for NGOs that perform or promote abortion, the so-called global gag rule. Senators also voted to preserve the always-controversial Title X family planning program and the Teen Pregnancy Prevention Program — a direct shot at Trump.

Across party lines: On the global gag rule, GOP Sens. Susan Collins and Lisa Murkowski sided with Democrats, while Democrat Joe Manchin voted to retain it.

IMMIGRATION

PAPER MACHE BORDER WALL? The Department of Homeland Security announced the names this week of four companies awarded contracts to construct border wall prototypes, Ted Hesson reports. The structures, which will offer an alternative to concrete wall designs, are expected to be built this fall in the San Diego area and will be between 18 and 30 feet high.

EARMARKS

— How Washington traps disaster victims. POLITICO Magazine.

— Searching for $1 Billion: Inside the Pentagon's struggle to match Trump's Air Force One boast. Defense News.

— North Carolina, still reeling from Hurricane Matthew, stares at Irma. The New York Times.

— Illinois Governor to Borrow Up to $6B to Pay Off Late Bills. The Associated Press.

— Cochran, Leahy bring back bill to boost Farm to School grant program. POLITICO Pro.

WE'RE COUNTING: 22 days until federal funding runs out, the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Sept. 30, 2017). 387 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018). [Who knows how many] days until the nation will default if the debt limit isn't raised.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/09/gop-lawmakers-deride-white-houses-noncommittal-debt-limit-strategy-024515>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

House Republicans lash Mnuchin, Mulvaney behind closed doors Back

By Rachael Bade and Kyle Cheney | 09/08/2017 11:54 AM EDT

It was supposed to be a call to unity.

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney joined a closed-door GOP Conference meeting Friday to try to rally wary Republicans around a debt ceiling bill they hated.

But the huddle quickly went off the rails when Rep. Tim Walberg stood up to say President Donald Trump needed to play more with the team. The Michigan Republican said he was all for bipartisanship, but he argued that Trump shouldn't have blindsided the conference when he struck a deal with Democratic leaders Nancy Pelosi and Chuck Schumer, undercutting GOP leadership.

Walberg was the first of more than a dozen lawmakers who echoed that same sentiment, according to sources in the room. Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker of North Carolina asked Mnuchin why he even bothered meeting with conservatives over the summer if he was just going to ignore their input entirely. Another lawmaker said Trump "pissed off a whole lot of people in here" when he went against a joint leadership-White House plan to advocate for a longer debt limit increase that took the issue off the table until after the midterm elections.

And the room booed when Mulvaney and Mnuchin refused to commit to spending cuts during the next debt ceiling debate — and then asked for their vote on the current legislation.

"[Mnuchin's] last words, and I quote, were 'Vote for the debt ceiling for me,'" Walker said as he left the meeting. "You could hear the murmurs in the room there. There was some hissing and I don't know if there was booing but there were some groans."

Republicans are putting Trump on notice: Don't do this to us again.

Ultimately, 133 House Republicans, more than half of the GOP Conference, voted for Trump's agreement with Democrats when the House passed the legislation Friday morning, 316-90. But most did so out of obligation to help the victims of Hurricanes Harvey and Irma — not for anyone in the Trump administration.

"There's a lot of disappointment in the decision that the president made, and the way our leadership was treated. That's a sore spot," said former House Appropriations Chairman Hal Rogers (R-Ky.). "However, this bill — we have no choice but to raise the debt ceiling, and we have no choice but to help those people in desperate need in Texas and other places. ... But it's not a happy camp."

Most Republicans seethed as they exited the conference meeting and headed to the floor. They said they were shell-shocked that they were being scolded into raising the nation's borrowing limit without spending cuts by a GOP administration — especially by Mnuchin, a longtime Democrat, and Mulvaney, once among the House's most ardent critics of raising the debt ceiling without conservative reforms.

"If it wasn't so serious it kind of would have been funny," said Rep. Ryan Costello (R-Penn.)

"When you have a Democratic donor Treasury secretary saying we as a Republican Congress need to vote for this and an OMB director I don't believe ever supported a clean debt ceiling ... say we need to do this, it's kind of 'Where am I right now?'" he said.

Lawmakers gave a particular earful to Mulvaney, who they remember adamantly rejecting previous debt ceiling increases and pushing to tie disaster aid to spending cuts, most notably after Hurricane Sandy hit New York and New Jersey in 2012.

"He would've been in the audience doing most of the shouting," said Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) "I remember him during Sandy. I don't forget."

Rep. Darrell Issa cracked that Mulvaney, a former Freedom Caucus conservative, should find 43 vacancies in the administration for Freedom Caucus members, suggesting they might abandon their principles and back what Rep. Bill Flores (R-Texas) has been calling a "crap-sandwich" if he gave them a job.

Lawmakers — and Mulvaney himself — laughed, knowing full well it was a pointed jab at the budget director conservatives say sold out his ideology when he joined the Trump administration.

Most of it was not lighthearted, however.

The room booed when Mulvaney refused Texas GOP Rep. Joe Barton's request that he commit to reducing spending as part of the next debt ceiling hike. Lawmakers also repeatedly voiced frustration that the administration refused to commit to tackling conservative priorities in December, when a confluence of fiscal fights — including a long-term government spending agreement — are expected.

Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), chairman of the hard-line House Freedom Caucus, downplayed the tension in the room, suggesting differences were philosophical, not personal: Many lawmakers were eager to vote for relief for Hurricane Harvey victims, but they were also torn over lifting the nation's borrowing limit.

But one thing was clear, he said. Democrats won the week.

"I think that they would be accurate in suggesting that Democrats had a win on this because there are no structural reforms to the debt ceiling that was included with the debt ceiling vote," Meadows said. "Indeed, it's the first time I can recall we're increasing the debt ceiling without something conservative being attached to it."

To view online click here.

Back

Nerdcast: Republicans reel from debt ceiling deal Back

By POLITICO Staff | 09/08/2017 05:41 AM EDT

It's time for Episode 71 of the Nerdcast, POLITICO's podcast on the White House and politics. Tune in each week to geek out with us as we dive deep into the political landscape and the latest numbers that matter.

Subscribe and rate the Nerdcast on iTunes. Listen on your smartphone here, listen on your desktop here.

Datapoint: 3. On Wednesday, President Trump agreed to Democratic leaders' plan to raise the debt ceiling, fund the government for 3 months and provide Hurricane Harvey aid, much to Republicans' dismay.

Datapoint: 3. That's the number of paragraphs in former President Obama's statement in response to the Trump White House's decision to end DACA. But within those nine paragraphs, Obama never addressed Trump directly.

Datapoint: 15 percent - That's Trump's target for the top corporate tax rate. The current rate is 35 percent. The group of GOP congressional leaders and administration officials known as the "Big Six" are scrambling to make the math work.

To view online click here.

Back

Defense industry groups call for full-year government funding Back

By Connor O'Brien | 09/08/2017 10:46 AM EDT

A cadre of defense industry groups is calling on Congress to enact a full-year spending measure and renew the debt ceiling before the next likely deadline in December to avoid a shutdown or default.

In a letter to House and Senate leaders in both parties today, industry groups call for "consistent and uninterrupted funding."

"Our government needs to be functioning to protect our security and grow our economy," the letter argues. "We must continue to pay our troops, government civilians and the contractors who support them. Vital weapons programs and maintenance and logistics efforts need to continue without interruption."

The Senate on Thursday passed a temporary continuing spending resolution as part of a package that also includes a debt limit increase and Hurricane Harvey aid. The House is expected to pass the stopgap measure today. The measure funds the government and extends the federal borrowing limit through Dec. 8.

The House is also expected to pass its remaining full-year appropriations bills next week as well. The Senate has yet to pass any fiscal 2018 appropriations bills.

The letter was signed by heads of 10 defense industry groups, including the Aerospace Industries Association, the National Defense Industrial Association and the Professional Services Council of the United States.

To view online click here.

Back

House sends Harvey aid package to Trump with debt ceiling boost Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 09/08/2017 10:36 AM EDT

The House easily cleared a package Friday to provide more than $15 billion in disaster aid for victims of Hurricane Harvey, raise the debt ceiling and fund the government for three months.

President Donald Trump is expected to swiftly sign the bill, which delivered on the fiscal deal he struck with Democrats earlier this week. The House passed the legislation 316-90, a day after the Senate passed it, 80-17.

The measure takes care of most of Congress' must-pass items this month, with extensions still needed by Sept. 30 for the Children's Health Insurance Program and the Federal Aviation Administration.

Trump administration officials have said the president wanted to clear the legislative decks to ensure tax reform remains the policy focus this fall.

But House Republicans, who have derided the strategy since the president first settled on it, continued to condemn Trump's move as they headed to vote Friday morning on the package many felt forced to support.

Punting on the debt limit until Dec. 8, Republican lawmakers argue, will give Democrats the upper hand, since the GOP likely will have to bargain with the minority party for votes to continue government funding — now set to expire on the very same day.

"There's a lot of sentiment that the president's decision empowers Democrats in December to withhold support for a further debt extension and a funding bill, that it emboldens them and it empowers them to make our job much more difficult in December," Rep. Hal Rogers (R-Ky.) said. "It empowers the Democrats to bargain, when they really had no bargaining position the way we were headed."

Many Republicans expressed disappointment that House leaders and Trump administration officials didn't entertain debate on cutting spending along with raising the debt ceiling.

In a House GOP meeting Friday morning with Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and White House budget director Mick Mulvaney, several Republicans pressed the Cabinet officials to commit to a strategy for handling deficit spending the next time Congress must vote to raise the debt limit, according to lawmakers who attended the meeting.

"Show us a plan," Rep. Jeff Duncan (R-S.C.) said he told Mnuchin. "We can't just keep borrowing money. We're going to be $22 trillion in debt."

Several House Republicans said they were told Friday morning that the Federal Emergency Management Agency could run out of disaster relief funding by day's end.

While the bill would infuse that account with $7.4 billion, that money could run dry in as little as a few weeks, especially if Hurricane Irma lives up to the destructive potential predicted of the storm set to hit Florida by Saturday.

Lawmakers whose districts lie in the new hurricane's potential path, and who also opposed the final aid vote Friday, are already beginning to defend their opposition.

"I voted for Harvey funding earlier in the week. It's this mess, where they combine all this, that bothers me," said Duncan, who represents the northwestern portion of South Carolina, bordering Georgia. "And if next week South Carolina or Georgia or Florida comes back because of the hurricane, I'll vote for pure disaster relief funding then, just like I did this week."

To view online click here.

Back

Thornberry, citing CR, votes against Harvey relief-debt limit bill Back

By Connor O'Brien | 09/08/2017 11:25 AM EDT

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry today voted against legislation that provides aid for Hurricane Harvey in his home state of Texas and raises the debt ceiling, citing the inclusion of a three-month continuing spending resolution.

The measure, which will keep the government funded through Dec. 8, easily passed the House 360-90. But Thornberry, a longtime critic of stop-gap spending for defense programs, said the bill would exacerbate military readiness problems.

"Continuing resolutions do enormous, lasting damage to the American military," the Texas Republican said in a statement. "We are witnessing an alarming increase in accidents, growing evidence of a force under stress, and an eroding technological position when compared with our adversaries."

"Not only does this bill fail to remedy those problems, it makes them worse," he said.

The package, H.R. 601 \(115\), passed the Senate yesterday by a similarly wide 80-17 vote. Thornberry's Senate counterpart, Arizona Republican John McCain, also voted against the bill.

Thornberry added that he supports emergency assistance in the wake of Hurricane Harvey but argued the bill's three-month debt limit increase "does not provide the certainty that financial markets and our economy need."

To view online click here.

Back

House delays minibus votes until next week Back

By Sarah Ferris | 09/07/2017 09:53 PM EDT

House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy announced the postponement tonight of the GOP's eight-bill spending bundle, citing the impending landfall of Hurricane Irma.

Prolonging the spending debate into a second week, the House's only task Friday will be a 12:30 p.m. vote on the Senate-passed fiscal deal, H.R. 601 \(115\), which includes more than $15 billion in disaster aid. It would also raise the nation's borrowing limit and keep the government open through Dec. 8.

McCarthy said the House would halt work on its so-called "minibus," H.R. 3354 \(115\), until next week to accommodate lawmakers whose districts are in the path of Hurricane Irma. Lawmakers have roughly 200 amendments remaining to debate on four separate spending titles.

"As we continue to track Hurricane Irma, I know many of our members in the southeastern United States are anxious to get home to get their families and constituents," the majority leader said, adding that he wants to ensure members "can get home safely."

To view online click here.

Back

GOP moderate Charlie Dent won't seek reelection to House in 2018 Back

By Kyle Cheney and Alex Isenstadt | 09/07/2017 07:58 PM EDT

Pennsylvania Rep. Charlie Dent, a Republican who occupies a swing district, will not seek reelection in 2018, he confirmed in a statement on Thursday night.

Dent issued a statement emphasizing his lengthy career in public office and noting that he "never planned on serving" more than five or six terms — but he's now in his seventh.

Dent said his decision was the product of periodic discussions that began during the government shutdown in 2013 and continued into the mid-summer, when a small group of friends, family and staff decided he wouldn't run again.

Dent described himself as a member of the "governing wing of the Republican Party" and said he's always sought to "fulfill the basic functions of government, like keeping the lights on and preventing default."

"Regrettably, that has not been easy given the disruptive outside influences that profit from increased polarization and ideological rigidity that leads to dysfunction, disorder and chaos," he said.

Dent's retirement comes the day after another swing district Republican, Washington Rep.

Dave Reichert, announced he was calling it quits. Florida Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, another moderate, is also retiring. Democrats are certain to target all three seats in next year's midterms. Dent's announced departure comes one day after state Rep. Justin Simmons said he would challenge him in a primary.

Dent spent much of 2017 opposing President Donald Trump's agenda, to the chagrin of hard-line conservatives, who vowed to oppose him. Last Friday, 125 conservative allies of the president converged in Dent's district in Northeast Pennsylvania to voice their opposition to his actions in office.

Dent is leader of the centrist Tuesday Group. He has openly questioned the the GOP's proposed budget and the president's efforts on tax reform.

Dent's decision seemed to catch his primary rival, Simmons, off guard on Thursday evening.

"I guess the polling must have been really bad. Can't say we were expecting this," he said.

Simmons has feuded with Dent in recent weeks as he inched closer to mounting a primary challenge. He contended that Dent failed to adequately support Trump's agenda and that Dent had lost touch with the Republican Party in his district, as well as nationally. Dent fired back at Simmons last week, releasing a series of text messages, including one in which Simmons asked for his endorsement.

Simmons formally entered the race on Wednesday, and said he "absolutely" thinks Dent decided to retire because of the challenge.

"I think right now we could say, 'Mission Accomplished,'" Simmons said. "We wanted to make sure we got a more conservative candidate in the seat, and now we can do that."

Simmons spoke Friday at a rally organized by groups aligned with Trump, who descended on Dent's district and called for his ouster. At the time, Dent rejected complaints that he doesn't support Trump, arguing that he was willing to work with the president.

"At the same time," he added, "I am not a sycophant."

President Donald Trump carried Pennsylvania's 15th District with nearly 52 percent of the vote in 2016. But former President Barack Obama also won it once, and Democrats have long coveted the seat, which Dent protected even during wave elections last decade.

Cristiano Lima contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Perdue: Congress 'hesitant' to pass supplemental disaster relief for agriculture Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 09/08/2017 01:31 PM EDT

Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue said Friday Congress is "somewhat hesitant" to pass a supplemental disaster assistance package for U.S. farmers and ranchers affected by this year's hurricanes and wildfires.

"It remains to be seen how the crop insurance program will work," Perdue told reporters following a swearing in ceremony for U.S. Forest Service Chief Tony Tooke. "I think Congress is somewhat hesitant to open up a supplemental disaster program on top of the crop insurance program. If there are unmet needs, I believe Congress will have the compassion to do that."

Perdue said the farm safety net should be structured so it is sufficient to meet producers' needs on an ongoing basis, including after natural disasters, instead of leaving farmers and ranchers in a position where they must rely on Congress to enact a supplemental disaster assistance measure to respond to recovery needs.

The secretary said he hopes Hurricane Irma, which is projected to strike Florida as soon as Saturday night, will lose some of its steam before it makes landfall in the continental U.S. and that it doesn't bring the catastrophic levels of rain that Hurricane Harvey dropped on southeast Texas. Florida is the heart of the U.S. citrus industry, and the state also has a robust produce sector, he said, noting that if Irma tracks north toward Georgia and the Carolinas it could devastate peanut, poultry and cotton production.

Irma was a Category 5 storm — the strongest possible measure — when it struck islands in the Caribbean, but it was downgraded to a Category 4 on Friday morning, Reuters reported. Even so, the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency warned Friday that the storm could lay waste to parts of the southeast.

"Hurricane Irma continues to be a threat that is going to devastate the United States in either Florida or some of the southeastern states," FEMA Administrator Brock Long said during a press briefing, according to the wire service report.

To view online click here.

Back

Perdue pushes lawmakers for funding to fight fires Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 09/08/2017 11:51 AM EDT

Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue called on appropriators to provide appropriate funding to the U.S. Forest Service to fight fires, arguing that the service doesn't have the resources it needs for prevention.

In remarks this morning during a ceremony for new Chief Tony Tooke, Perdue tasked the longtime Forest Service staffer to work with him on getting Congress to recognize the true cost of fighting forest fires.

"You can have the right leadership and the right people ... but if you don't have the resources and the means of dependable funding, that's an issue," Perdue said.

"We need to appeal to appropriators and Congress and the law-writers to fix the fire funding problem once and for all," the secretary added.

The Forest Service spends about 55 percent of its budget on fire suppression, up from 15 percent a decade ago. With fires raging across the Pacific Northwest, Perdue warned that the price tag could be even higher this year. As fires have become more common and larger, the Forest Service has had to pull from other parts of its budget, including fire prevention, in order to cover the costs.

Perdue said he met with OMB Director Mick Mulvaney on Thursday to explain the issue, but Congress still needs to act to fix the problem.

"When we leave a fuel load out there because we have not been able to get to it because of a lack of dependable funding, we are asking for trouble," Perdue said.

To view online click here.

Back

Obamacare advocates face daunting outreach effort after HHS cuts Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 09/08/2017 10:54 AM EDT

Obamacare supporters are scrambling to assemble an Obamacare enrollment plan after they were blindsided by the Trump administration's decision to slash spending on outreach for the law's next sign-up season.

But with less than two months until open enrollment begins, advocates are quickly finding that building a robust counter-messaging program to an administration opposing the Affordable Care Act will be a daunting task. Funding is limited, the sign-up window has been cut in half, and Obamacare advocates say their efforts couldn't possibly match the reach of the federal government.

"There's really nothing we can do to completely fill this void without the federal government stepping in," said Dara Taylor with Community Catalyst, a national consumer health advocacy group. "We were definitely surprised by this decision and extremely disheartened."

HHS last week said it would cut Obamacare advertising from $100 million in the previous enrollment period to $10 million for the sign-up season beginning Nov. 1. The administration is also slashing funding for in-person enrollment aides known as navigators from $63 million to $37 million.

In light of the steep cuts, prominent former Obama officials have been exploring a new fundraising effort to promote enrollment. Yet some involved in the talks privately admit they don't expect significant financial support from foundations or the health care industry.

"To just think that somebody will come in and have $50 million is just ... that's going to be a very, very difficult ask," said one person familiar with the efforts.

Even though Obamacare supporters had been expecting the Trump administration to reduce support for 2018 enrollment, they were still surprised by the size of the cuts. Before HHS announced its decision, Community Catalyst and other national groups had already been planning to provide more support to local organizations that help enroll people, Taylor said.

The Trump administration's decision to cut outreach comes not long after one of the largest enrollment organizations shut down operations earlier than expected after declining financial support. Enroll America, which had close ties to the Obama White House, at one point ran a field campaign in 11 key states to supplement the previous administration's outreach. Young Invincibles, an advocacy group for young adults, will carry on some of Enroll America's efforts for the 2018 sign-up season in certain states, including Florida, Illinois, North Carolina and Texas.

Barring an unforeseen financial windfall, advocates say many groups will have to find new ways to promote enrollment and recruit new groups to help.

"Even if we all got together and were able to get a bunch of money to be able to help with outreach and enrollment efforts, there's going to be a gap," said Liz Hagan, associate director of coverage initiatives at consumer advocacy organization Families USA.

Protect Our Care, a group started by former Obama officials earlier this year to oppose Republican efforts to repeal the health law, is also involved in crafting an outreach plan. The group recently hired veteran Democratic operative Brad Woodhouse as campaign director.

Outside groups, including the Center for American Progress and Indivisible, are already using social media to publicize the enrollment period. However, former Obama health officials say social media, while helpful in advertising the law to younger demographics, has a limited reach.

Television advertising "is the best vehicle to get new people in the door," said Josh Peck, the former chief marketing officer at CMS.

HHS is not expected to purchase any TV ads for the 2018 enrollment season, which the Trump administration shortened from three months to six weeks in states using HealthCare.gov for enrollment. Department officials suggested the administration, in addition to purchasing digital ads, will use emails and text messages to communicate with Obamacare enrollees.

About 12.2 million people signed up in Obamacare plans in the previous enrollment season. As of mid-March, roughly 10 million people were still enrolled.

Former Obama health officials worry that even an aggressive outside enrollment campaign won't be enough to boost sign-ups. Ultimately, they say, advocates can't come close to matching the federal government's data for targeting prospective customers.

"The administration knows who's coming to visit the website and might need a nudge," said Leslie Dach, a former top HHS official and campaign chairman of Protect Our Care. "They know who has enrolled the last time around. They hold the keys to communication, and they've made it clear that they will not do anything to make the law work."

To view online click here.

Back

Senate appropriators rebuke Trump on abortion policy Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 09/07/2017 06:56 PM EDT

Senate appropriators on Thursday dealt a twofold rebuke to the Trump administration on abortion policy, though it is almost certain the changes won't become law.

The Senate Appropriations Committee approved a fiscal 2018 foreign relations funding bill containing language that would undo a Trump administration prohibition on funding for nongovernment organizations that perform or promote abortion.

The committee also adopted an amendment by Democrat Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire that would undo the Republican policy known as the "Mexico City policy" or the "global gag rule" in a 16-15 vote. Republicans Susan Collins of Maine and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska voted with panel Democrats to scrap the policy while West Virginia Democrat Joe Manchin voted to retain it.

The policy bars federal aid to foreign organizations that provide or promote abortion. In the past, it applied only to organizations that got family planning funding. Under President Donald Trump, it was extended to apply to all organizations that get global health money, potentially including maternal health programs, anti-Zika efforts and the expansive PEPFAR program to stop HIV/AIDS.

Overriding the ban — which Republican presidents customarily put in place days after being inaugurated — would mark an embarrassment for the Trump administration. But the appropriations bill is quite unlikely to be finalized as written. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) noted at the markup the GOP-led House would insist on keeping the Trump policy in place.

"This is the same debate we have every year, probably with the same outcome," he said.

The Appropriations Committee also voted Thursday to instruct the administration to run the Title X family planning program and the Teen Pregnancy Prevention Program as they were under the Obama administration. Trump administration officials have floated changes to both programs.

The Susan B. Anthony List, an anti-abortion group, chastised Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies, for introducing the bill with the prohibition on changing the programs.

"In the face of the horrors of Planned Parenthood's activities, Sen. Blunt allowed his own bill to move forward in a way that continues Obama administration policy to protect the abortion industry," SBA List president Marjorie Dannenfelser said.

Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.) voted against the appropriations bill in part because of the Title X language.

"As written, the bill does not just provide funding for family planning programs, it also prohibits the Secretary of the Health and Human Services Department from changing the current rules for the issuance of Title X grants," a spokesperson for Lankford said in a statement. "Placing this kind of limitation on the current administration is completely unacceptable."

Blunt said during the hearing that he would have backed an amendment from Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) to allow the administration to change Title X. But Daines pulled the amendment because he knew it would likely fail in the committee, Blunt said.

To view online click here.

Back

CBP announces contracts for wall designs of 'other materials' Back

By Ted Hesson | 09/07/2017 04:47 PM EDT

U.S. Customs and Border Protection announced today the names of four companies awarded contracts to construct border wall prototypes of "other materials."

The prototypes will be between 18 and 30 feet high and are expected to be built this fall in the San Diego area.

The designs will offer an alternative to concrete wall prototypes slated for construction in the coming weeks.

The companies are Caddell Construction of Montgomery, Ala., KWR Construction of Sierra Vista, Ariz., ELTA North America of Annapolis Junction, Md., and W. G. Yates & Sons Construction of Philadelphia, Miss.

Last week, CBP announced the companies awarded contracts to build the concrete wall prototypes. Two of the companies — Caddell Construction and W. G. Yates & Sons — were also given contracts for the designs of "other materials."

POLITICO reported that Caddell paid more than $3 million in 2012 to settle a Justice Department criminal investigation into whether it defrauded the U.S. government when it participated in a program to help small business contractors.

To view online click here.

Back

How Washington traps disaster victims Back

By Danny Vinik | 09/08/2017 05:17 AM EDT

When a devastating flood struck Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in August last year, Scott Rotolo returned home to nearly $100,000 in flood damage. Wanting to rebuild as quickly as possible, he contacted the Federal Emergency Management Agency for help. The agency directed him to the Small Business Administration—Washington's frontline emergency lender—and he applied for, and accepted, a low-interest loan to rebuild his house and replace his possessions.

To Rotolo, a 39-year-old IT worker, it seemed like the smart financial decision: The government offers a low interest rate, and the money got him back into his house quickly. He and his family moved back in March. But a few months later, he realized that that he'd made a big mistake: Because he took out a disaster loan—just over $100,000 that he needed to pay back with interest—he was not eligible for the federal disaster grants that came available a few months ago. The news came as a big surprise, Rotolo said in an interview: he didn't see any notice from FEMA or the SBA that taking out a loan would block him from getting a disaster grant. "Because I was responsible," he said, "I'm being punished."

As Louisiana has begun dispersing nearly $2 billion in disaster grant money over the past few months, people in the disaster-relief world are sounding the alarm that many disaster victims can be unwittingly caught in the trap that snared Rotolo. Thanks to a rule originally passed to prevent double-dipping by unscrupulous disaster victims, some of the neediest people in devastated areas can actually lose their access to relief grants.

It's not clear how many people have actually been rebuffed for grants, though Rotolo is one of 18,000 people approved for a disaster loan after the 2016 Louisiana floods, all of whom would be affected by the rule. State officials say it's the top complaint they are hearing from disaster victims as they try to rebuild. "This is the number one issue that folks are running into," said Richard Carbo, deputy chief of staff for Louisiana Governor John Bel Edwards.

"This was a massive issue 11 years ago," said Adam Knapp, who was the policy director for the Louisiana Economic Development agency after Katrina and now is the CEO of the Baton Rouge Area Chamber of Commerce. "It was a massive issue after Sandy. It was a massive issue after our flood and still is. It's just a forgotten issue."

This week, as a Hurricane Harvey relief bill moves quickly through Capitol Hill, officials in Louisiana are trying to convince Congress to fix the issue—so far, with no luck. On Wednesday, Louisiana Governor John Bel Edwards sent a letter to congressional leaders requesting they include language in the Hurricane Harvey relief bill that ensures disaster victims are not penalized for receiving an SBA loan. Neither the $7.9 billion bill passed by the House Wednesday nor the $15 billion bill passed by the Senate on Thursday included any such language, but state officials are continuing to press lawmakers. "Congress needs to act," said Carbo.

The problem has its roots in America's two-tiered system for delivering money to disaster victims. The first and most immediate form of relief is loans: The Small Business Administration issues low-interest loans to struggling homeowners and businesses, giving them access to cash as quickly as a few weeks after the disaster, which they have to pay back with interest. The second form of relief is grants, which are more valuable—homeowners don't need to pay them back—but can take much longer to receive.

The catch: every dollar for which disaster victims are approved for an SBA loan is a dollar less they can receive from a federal grant. In other words, if a victim who is eligible for $120,000 in assistance is offered a $90,000 SBA loan, she can only receive grants worth $30,000—no matter if she accepts or declines the loan.

The rule means that many people are now finding themselves boxed out of grant money they'd otherwise be qualified to receive. In some cases, disaster-relief experts and state officials said, they simply aren't aware that when applying for loans, they're closing off the chance to get a far more valuable grant later. "It always catches people off guard," said Robin Keegan, the former executive director of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which was created following Hurricanes Katrina and Rita to oversee the recovery.

Already, lawyers working with Harvey victims say they are unsure how to advise their clients, worried that applying for an SBA loan could prevent them from receiving grant money in the future. "It is very frustrating," said Tracy Figueroa, a lawyer at Texas RioGrande Legal Aid who leads its office of disaster assistance.

These rules arose to prevent a problem known as "duplication of benefits"—or, colloquially, double-dipping. After Hurricane Katrina in 2005 and major floods in the Midwest in 2008, a federal audit found that due to a bureaucratic failure, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which issues one of the two main kinds of disaster grants, sent money to people who'd already received an SBA loan to cover their losses. Such double dipping, which is prohibited by federal law, cost the government almost $1 billion, money that could have gone to other victims. The new rules, issued by HUD in 2011, were designed to prevent such bureaucratic mistakes from happening again, ensuring that federal assistance reaches those who need it most.

But state officials and disaster experts say, the rules have gone too far. Along with preventing double dipping, they say, the rules penalize people who would have been better off waiting for federal grant money—leaving them saddled with thousands of dollars in debt instead of a simple payout by the government. "Now is when homeowners are really fully finding out how much their SBA loan is a barrier for them," said Knapp. "It's a policy choice that the federal government has made."

HUD and the SBA did not respond to a request for comment.

A former HUD official who asked not to be named because she no longer speaks for the agency defended the current rules, arguing that if a disaster victim without insurance has the resources to rebuild—in other words, they can repay an SBA loan—then they should receive a loan rather than a grant. "If folks don't have flood insurance and they get an SBA low-interest loan, isn't that a fair benefit?" The former official further argued that allowing people who are eligible for an SBA loan to receive a grant from HUD would be expensive and unfair. "They are just expecting that they should just get a grant to rebuild. You are penalizing homeowners that pay for flood insurance."

State officials and many disaster experts see this problem differently, believing that even people with the means to rebuild deserve some grant money, instead of being saddled with tens of thousands of dollars in loans. "Sometimes the fact that you are bankable and can take out an SBA loan doesn't mean you are as well-resourced that you can take on that burden of debt," said Keegan, who is now the director of Resilient Baton Rouge, a group formed last year to provide behavioral health services to last year's flood victims. "What I've heard a lot in implementation woes of these programs is people are dipping into savings, retirement benefits or a college fund just to make ends meet."

More importantly, they say, agencies must do a much better job explaining to disaster victims that applying for an SBA loan can hurt them in the future when they seek grant money. Asked whether agencies make that information clear, Figueroa said, "Not at all."

"It's hard for somebody who is on the phone with FEMA and being told that you better apply for that SBA loan because otherwise we can't even think about giving you FEMA money," she said. "They are applying for stuff, doing whatever they need to scrape together a way to begin to recover and then grant programs come out later and [they say,] 'Oops sorry you got a loan so we can't give you this grant.'"

A FEMA spokesperson said that the agency warns people about the ban on duplication multiple times: when they first register for FEMA assistance, on the eligibility letter they receive, and also in a release form when registering. "This form places the applicant on notice that they are required to return any FEMA assistance that is covered by another source such as insurance," the spokesman wrote in an email.

Controversy around the "duplication of benefits" rules also arose after Superstorm Sandy when New York lawmakers and Governor Andrew Cuomo worried that HUD would attempt to claw back money that victims had received through disaster grants and from a flood insurance settlement. The lawmakers successfully negotiated a waiver that protected certain, low-income victims from clawbacks by FEMA for certain overpayments.

Edwards would like to see a much bigger change: It's only fair, he says, to allow people who receive an SBA loan to take advantage of HUD disaster grants as well. In February, he sent a letter to the congressional delegation asking for a legislative change to either forgive SBA disaster loans taken out by victims of last year's flooding—in other words, turn the loans into outright grants—or to allow those victims to also receive HUD grants. In August, he sent a letter to Ben Carson, the secretary of HUD, asking for a regulatory change that would effectively accomplish the same thing. In that letter, Edwards appealed not just for his state but for disaster victims elsewhere in the U.S. "This is, perhaps, the single biggest change we can make to support homeowners," he wrote, "not just in Louisiana, but across the country."

Scott Rotolo says he's hoping that Edwards' efforts will succeed. If he had known that the SBA loan would have made him ineligible for a grant, he said he would have taken out a private loan at the market interest rate, and then applied for a grant when that money became available. Now it's too late. The SBA loan is effectively a second mortgage on a house he just moved into last year. "I can't maintain the lifestyle I had before," he said. "I'm just right there in the middle class and I don't have an extra $430 a month."

"It's going to be tough," he added. "But I'll find a way."

To view online click here.

Back

Cochran, Leahy bring back bill to boost Farm to School grant program Back

By Sabrina Rodriguez | 09/07/2017 06:57 PM EDT

Two members of the Senate Agriculture Committee from opposite sides of the aisle — Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) — reintroduced a measure on Wednesday to expand the Farm to School grant program and increase its annual authorized funding level by $10 million.

The program, administered by USDA, connects schools to locally produced farm foods and works to educate students on healthy eating habits. It is authorized at $5 million per year and has more than 40,000 participating schools.

Cochran, chair of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and Leahy, the panel's ranking member, first introduced the measure in 2015. Their second-go, S. 1767 \(115\), would increase the number of eligible schools and expand it to preschools, summer programs and after-school programs.

Barriers that prevent farmers from taking part would be reduced under the so-called Farm to School Act of 2017, and the maximum grant award would be lifted, to $200,000.

"Nearly half of all school districts participate in farm-to-school activities because this program both encourages healthier eating habits among children and supports local farmers," Leahy said in a statement. "It's a natural partnership with benefits all around — children, communities, farmers and schools all win under this formula."

The measure also would give the Agriculture Secretary one year from date of passage to submit a report to the Senate and House agriculture committees as well as the House Committee on Education and the Workforce on progress in identifying and removing regulations that block development of farm-to-school arrangements.

A companion bill, H.R. 3686 \(115\), was introduced in the House on Wednesday by Reps. Jeff Fortenberry (R-Neb.) and Marcia Fudge (D-Ohio).

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: House (finally) passes a budget — Senate budget panel trudges through amendments — Walker demands disaster aid offsets
Date: Thursday, October 05, 2017 4:07:08 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 10/05/2017 04:03 PM EDT

IT'S OUTTA HERE: Just a few weeks ago, it wasn't clear first-term Budget Chairman Diane Black would ever get the votes. Today, the rookie became a congressional celebrity on the floor of the House, as she won the prize rarely achieved by Budget Committee leaders: Passage of a comprehensive budget plan.

The resolution, of course, is mostly symbolic. But this year's version showcases key conservative goals that might otherwise never get a vote on the House floor. Sarah ticks through the five things the document reveals about GOP priorities.

Hugs and high-fives: After this summer's unanimous committee vote, only 18 House Republicans voted against the document, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), today. (We hear several were specifically taking a stand against the GOP's plans to eliminate the state and local tax deduction.) When the gavel struck, with a 219-206 tally, a visibly jovial Black was surrounded by GOP supporters handing out high-five and hugs.

Up next: The Senate is expected to approve its own budget out of committee today, with plans to pass it on the floor the week of Oct. 16. The first steps to creating a conference committee, however, likely won't begin until November, Black said today. As one of the few Republicans who would have a seat at that table, Black said her top priorities in those joint talks would be tax reform, of course, as well as reducing deficits.

But first, party! The double-tasking Tennessee gubernatorial candidate says she's still undecided about whether to stay on as chairman through the conference. If not, she'll allow her successor (potentially Steve Womack) to pick up where she left off. "I'm going to celebrate today, and we'll make that decision later," Black said.

GOOD THURSDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — Dozens of House Republicans, led by Senate Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry, urge President Donald Trump to make national security "the top priority" of budget negotiations this fall. More from Gregory Hellman.

#DailyBudgetFact — New York residents pay about $41 billion more in federal taxes than they received in federal spending, according to the state comptroller. That means for every federal tax dollar paid by New York residents, the federal government sent 84 cents back to the state. The average return for every tax dollar nationwide is $1.18.

BUDGET

MARATHON MARKUP: The Senate Budget Committee is still in the midst of its all-day markup. And while the budget resolution won't be public until the end, you get a sneak peek. According to an internal report we nabbed, the resolution would set up a record $695 billion budget for the Pentagon after 10 years and slash spending for domestic departments, including Agriculture, Transportation and Energy. Sarah sums it up.

The gist of debate: In case you haven't been glued to the webcast, lawmakers have spent much of the markup bickering about the definition of the word "cut." Democrats have for days been slamming their GOP colleagues for targeting Medicare under the budget resolution, claiming that the Republican document would cut the program by $473 billion over a decade. But Republicans say that's a misleading assessment. "We're not cutting anything," Sen. Ron Johnson said, batting back at Democratic complaints. "We're just trying to reduce the rate of growth and spending to stop mortgaging our kids' future."

End in sight? The committee will go through votes this afternoon and into the evening on dozens of (mostly Democrat-backed) amendments, with a final vote expected around the dinner hour. Check out the panel's Tumblr for the blow by blow.

DISASTER AID

WALKER DEMANDS OFFSETS: It's always been a politically risky position — insisting recovery aid be offset as images of destitute disaster victims still populate the evening news. But Republican Study Chairman Mark Walker is climbing out on that limb. Sarah serves up the scoop for Pros, reporting late Wednesday that Walker is calling for spending cuts to cover the White House's new $29 billion disaster aid request. "We're going to come out strong for those to be offset," Walker says. "Just because Republicans are in charge doesn't mean deficits and debts no longer matter."

TOO LITTLE, TOO LATE: Congress is expected to clear the latest aid request later this month. But Colin Wilhelm explains that Puerto Rico might run out of money before that funding comes through.

NFIP DEBT, BE GONE: Rolled into the new aid request, the Trump administration is calling on Congress to cancel $16 billion in debt the National Flood Insurance Program has accrued by paying out more in claims than it takes in from premiums, Zachary Warmbrodt notes.

WHITE HOUSE

BUSINESS OR PLEASURE (OR BOTH?): Ethics watchdogs say Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke is combining politics with his official duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon report.

CATCHING PRICE: Details of former HHS Secretary Tom Price's jet-setting habits have only come out over the last few weeks. But our Dan Diamond and Rachana Pradhan have been chasing this story for five months. Check out their account of the painstaking reporting that ultimately led to the Cabinet secretary's ouster.

PROBING PRUITT: Reps. Peter DeFazio and Grace Napolitano sent a letter this week asking the EPA's inspector general to investigate Administrator Scott Pruitt's use of round-the-clock security and a $25,000 soundproof phone booth.

DEFENSE

EXTRA INFUSION? House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry says the Pentagon could get extra money under the impending disaster aid package — but only if DoD officials ask. "Get your act together," Thornberry says he told Pentagon leaders, "and if you have a pressing need that we can get a head start on between now and December, get it up to us." Thornberry highlights maintenance and missile defense funding as urgent needs he hopes the Pentagon would request, Connor O'Brien reports.

HEALTH CARE

A BARGAINING CHIP: Once-bipartisan efforts to extend funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program are running into problems in the House. The Energy and Commerce Committee approved a bill late Wednesday that would keep the money flowing for five years, but with some severe cuts to Obamacare programs. Not a single Democrat voted to advance the measure, as Rachana Pradhan reports. One of the House bill's key pay-fors would increase means-testing for Medicare for wealthier seniors — a proposal Democrats have attacked.

ENROLLMENT SEASON'S UPON US: Obamacare's sign-up window begins in less than a month, and the whole operation is expected to be drastically different than before the Trump administration took control. As Paul Demko and Adam Cancryn explain, the federal government has gutted outreach and marketing, slashed funding to outside enrollment groups and left state officials in the dark on key details — making for what is expected to be a shorter, quieter and more chaotic enrollment period.

AGRICULTURE

STANDING UP FOR SNAP: The top Democrat on the Senate Agriculture Committee, Debbie Stabenow, took her chamber's budget writers to task this week for their planned cuts to the USDA. Senate Republicans are counting on $21 billion in cuts to agricultural programs over a decade to help achieve the symbolic "balanced budget."

TAX

CORKER CRANKS UP DEMANDS: Sen. Bob Corker is going further with his tax reform ultimatums, now insisting that he will only support a proposal that reduces deficits based on a solid growth model, Sarah reports. "Unless it reduces deficits, and does not add to deficits — with reasonable and responsible growth models — and unless we can make it permanent, I don't have any interest in it," Corker told fellow Budget Committee members during round one of this week's markup.

More: Pressuring Trump-state Democrats | Fighting to preserve state and local deduction

EARMARKS

— States worry federal funding for Children's Health Insurance Program won't come in time. Wall Street Journal.

— Budget Chair Black sticks around for now. The Hill.

— The deficit: A tax problem, not a spending problem? Bloomberg BNA.

— Deficit hawks voice worry over direction of tax plan. The Hill.

— Why some scars from the recession may never vanish. The New York Times.

— Thornberry: 'I'd get rid of all' the budget caps. POLITICO Pro.

— Why tax cuts will only get harder from here. Bloomberg.

— Fertilizer companies call for more money for farm bill conservation, research. POLITICO Pro.

WE'RE COUNTING: 64 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017).

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/house-finally-passes-a-budget-024937>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

What the House budget reveals about GOP priorities Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/05/2017 02:29 PM EDT

House Republicans on Thursday gave the stamp of approval to a sweeping budget resolution that has been dubbed the conference's most conservative fiscal statement in 20 years.

The budget — nearly a year in the works and arriving months late — has been at the center of the GOP's ambitions this fall because of its procedural power to unlock a filibuster-proof tax bill. The Senate Budget Committee is working on its own version of the fiscal 2018 budget and it's expected to come to the floor yet this month.

The budget communicates the majority party's key principles, though they may never make it into law, and the House GOP version shows that:

— They want to overhaul the tax code: Above all else, House GOP lawmakers say their budget demonstrates a commitment to draft a tax reform plan. House Freedom Caucus members — and moderates — stifled their many objections in the interest of unsealing the reconciliation process that allows tax reform to pass in the Senate with a simple majority vote.

— A cut in entitlements is a must: The GOP's dramatic plan to overhaul Medicare, developed by Speaker Paul Ryan when he was Budget Committee chairman, has become a must-have in conservative budgets. This year's budget, however, would go further by requiring GOP chairmen to find $203 billion over 10 years in savings from entitlement programs like food stamps, agricultural subsidies and housing assistance.

— The Pentagon's budget would grow: Republicans struck a rare compromise between fiscal hawks and defense hawks this year to propose a massive Pentagon budget of $620 billion for the current fiscal year. That figure, the results of months of wrangling, is a compromise between the $640 billion desired by defense hawks and the $603 billion request from the White House.

— The desire to repeal Obamacare is alive: The GOP keeps its seven-year-old promise to root out ex-President Barack Obama's health care law, which includes repealing billions of dollars worth of subsidies, tax increases and the Medicaid expansion. In place of Obamacare, the GOP budget would enact the House-passed replacement package, that failed in a dramatic Senate vote earlier this year.

— Fighting deficits remains central: The hallmark of most conservative budget plans is the ability to achieve balance over 10 years. The House GOP budget projects it would lead to a surplus within a decade, with the help of rosy economic growth projections and severe across-the-board domestic cuts that would likely never make it into law.

To view online click here.

Back

House passes budget in first step toward tax reform Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 10/05/2017 11:56 AM EDT

The House passed a budget today that paves the way for tax reform, slashes spending over 10 years and calls for lawmakers to find at least $203 billion in extra savings from mandatory programs.

After months of intra-party wrangling, GOP leaders succeeded in advancing the fiscal 2018 resolution, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), on a 219-206 vote.

The deal is far from done, however, since the Senate has yet to bring its own plan to a floor vote, and budget writers must ultimately reconcile the differing packages during conference negotiations.

Because Senate Republicans have a smaller majority than their House counterparts, House Republicans are already bracing for a final product that's far different than the plan they have now sent to the Senate.

Before passage this week, House Budget Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) touted her proposal's most fiscally conservative tenets, noting that the budget resolution would instruct congressional committees to cut billions of dollars from mandatory programs that pay for food stamps, housing aid and student loans.

"Can we not acknowledge that there are some programs that perhaps have fraud, waste and abuse we can take care of? ..." Black said on the floor. "That's what this budget does. It says, 'Open up your minds, think differently, let's not do things the same old way and keep putting the same old programs out there that maybe aren't working.'"

But Democrats contend that those budget instructions would take from the poor while the plan's reconciliation language enables Republicans to pursue tax cuts for the nation's wealthiest individuals.

To view online click here.

Back

Thornberry pushes Trump to keep defense spending hike high on agenda Back

By Gregory Hellman | 10/05/2017 01:39 PM EDT

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) is leading 153 of his colleagues today in commending President Donald Trump for backing a level of $700 billion in annual funding for national defense, in an effort to signal the significant Republican support in the House for increasing defense funding, a committee aide told POLITICO.

It comes as Trump is attempting to rally support in Congress for an overhaul of the nation's tax code.

"Restoring our military strength and defending the country is as important to America's success as reforming the tax code, ensuring healthcare for Americans and growing the economy," the letter states.

During his address last month to the U.N. General Assembly, Trump declared: "It has just been announced that we will be spending almost $700 billion on our military and defense. Our military will soon be the strongest it has ever been."

The Budget Control Act limits annual defense spending to $549 billion, not including war funding contained in a separate Overseas Contingency Operations account.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate GOP budget plan boosts Pentagon, cuts domestic spending Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/05/2017 11:41 AM EDT

The Senate GOP's fiscal 2018 budget resolution would reduce or rein in spending for many domestic programs across the government, while setting up a record $695 billion budget for the Pentagon after 10 years.

The Senate Budget Committee's 10-year fiscal plan would slash spending for domestic departments including agriculture, transportation and energy, according to an internal report obtained by POLITICO. The so-called chairman's mark, which contains a decade's worth of spending breakdowns, is not yet public.

One of the biggest cuts would hit the nation's transportation programs. That budget would be slashed by $11.29 billion over 10 years, down to $77.8 billion. And that department's mandatory funding would be sliced further, from $55.4 billion to $37.6 billion during that period.

Agriculture funding would be reduced by roughly $2 billion, down to $20.2 billion after 10 years, with the biggest chunk of savings coming from mandatory programs like crop subsidies.

Democrats argue the impact of the GOP's proposed cuts would actually be higher when compared to ever-rising spending projections from the Congressional Budget Office. Sen.

Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) has said agriculture cuts would amount to about \$21 billion over a decade.

Other agencies would see their budget levels essentially flatline over 10 years, including international affairs, community development and science and technology.

The military, meanwhile, would see its budget rise from $557.2 billion to $695 billion over 10 years, assuming that Congress can reach a deal to lift its current spending caps.

The biggest spending boosts, besides the military, would go toward health programs with ballooning costs like Medicare. But as Democrats have pointed out, the Republican plan to increase Medicare spending would actually amount to a cut of nearly $500 billion over 10 years when compared to the current baselines.

CBO has projected that Medicare would cost $8.532 trillion over 10 years. The GOP budget tables would spend $8.059 trillion on Medicare — a difference of $472.9 billion.

The Senate Budget Committee is expected to advance its budget resolution later this afternoon.

Tucker Doherty contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

RSC chief stakes opposition to hurricane relief without offsets Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/04/2017 10:50 PM EDT

The Republican Study Committee's chairman is threatening to oppose the next round of hurricane relief funding if Congress doesn't cut spending to cover the costs.

"We're going to come out strong for those to be offset," Rep. Mark Walker (R-N.C.) told POLITICO late Wednesday. "Just because Republicans are in charge doesn't mean deficits and debts no longer matter."

Walker said he has for weeks told fellow lawmakers, including those in leadership, to demand offsets. Now he is going public with his position as Congress considers the White House's new $29 billion disaster aid request.

Lawmakers are expected to vote mid-month on the fresh aid plan, which includes $13 billion in Federal Emergency Management Agency funding that would not count toward Congress' annual spending limits.

GOP leaders have signaled there are likely to be more requests to come, and the price tag for hurricane recovery could total hundreds of billions of dollars.

So far, Congress has allocated $15 billion in emergency funding since the three devastating storms began ravaging the U.S. and its territories with Hurricane Harvey's initial blow in late August.

Walker's demands are likely to incite a years-old fiscal fight within the GOP over whether emergency spending should add to the nation's deficit.

Prominent conservatives, including Vice President Mike Pence and House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), have for years argued that disaster relief should be offset.

"Congress must ensure that a catastrophe of nature does not become a catastrophe of debt," then-congressman Pence said in a 2005 floor speech that has resurfaced in recent weeks.

In 2011, a similar demand by House conservatives brought the government to the brink of shutdown.

Walker proposes Congress consider reshuffling money from accounts like the Energy Department's loan program for manufacturing fuel-efficient cars.

This year, a majority of House Republicans already agreed to bend the pay-as-you-go requirement for the $15 billion hurricane relief package (H.R. 601 \(115\)) enacted last month. Ninety Republicans, including Walker, opposed the legislation, which also funded the government through Dec. 8 and temporarily suspended the debt ceiling.

On future packages, Walker said he believes "the bulk" of the House's Republicans will join in opposition if there are no offsets.

The first emergency package was different, he argues, because it was an immediate response when "there were people's lives in the balance" and it "wasn't an overwhelming amount."

Walker stressed that he isn't planning to hold a disaster package "hostage" but wants to remind fellow Republicans that they, too, have campaigned against runaway spending.

"We just want to say, 'Hey, we're waving a flag out here,'" Walker said. "If we don't have the money, then is it not due diligence to go find out where money is being spent frivolously?"

To view online click here.

Back

White House seeks nearly $30B in disaster aid package Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/04/2017 06:13 PM EDT

The White House this afternoon formally requested nearly $30 billion in emergency funding for its ongoing recovery efforts in hurricane-battered regions like Puerto Rico, Florida and Texas.

In a letter to congressional leaders, the Trump administration asked for $12.8 billion for FEMA's disaster relief fund, $16 billion for the National Flood Insurance Program and $576.5 million for the forest service's firefighting fund.

"We need the help of Congress to stabilize the affected communities and replenish dwindling and depleted funds," Office of Management and Budget chief Mick Mulvaney wrote. He said the money should be classified as "emergency spending," meaning it would not require spending offsets.

House and Senate appropriators immediately released statements in support of the White House's request and pledged to act quickly. House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) said he would "put legislation forward as soon as possible."

Rep. Nita Lowey, his Democratic counterpart on the panel, said she supported Trump's request for FEMA, but added it needed to go further.

"Congress should add to this request by appropriating funding for flexible Community Development Block Grants; rebuilding coastlines, roads, transit systems, airports, ports, and other infrastructure; small business loans; and repairs to military installations and other federal facilities damaged in the storms," said Lowey, of New York.

The White House's request had previously been reported by POLITICO.

To view online click here.

Back

Oversight board, Democrats sound alarm over federal aid to Puerto Rico Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/04/2017 04:59 PM EDT

President Donald Trump may have promised Puerto Rico more aid, but the island could run out of money before it gets there.

The commonwealth is already insolvent, owing far more money than it could ever pay back. But the actual cash that the government uses to function, which was already drained, may run out by mid-October due to spending on the emergency response to Hurricane Maria.

Congressional Democrats criticized the Trump administration for taking longer to submit a funding request for the emergency response than it did following Hurricane Harvey, which mainly pounded Texas.

"We got a relief package on Texas in what, four or five days?" said Rep. Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) on Tuesday. "[Republicans] said sometime next week," for passage of a relief package that would include disaster aid funding for Puerto Rico, Grijalva said. "That'll take it into 15, 16 days."

The administration was expected to present a $13 billion emergency funding request for FEMA to Congress today.

The bipartisan federal board established by Congress to oversee Puerto Rico's finances also sounded alarms over the commonwealth's ability to pay for immediate essential services, like police and emergency responders.

"Your immediate and bold assistance is urgently needed to minimize loss of life, support critical emergency response efforts, and provide tools to support the island's recovery," the board wrote in a letter sent to Congress on Tuesday night.

In addition to an expedited relief package, the board made an unusual request for a low-interest loan from the federal government to provide Puerto Rico with more financial flexibility as a short-term emergency measure.

In a press call on Wednesday Rep. Rob Bishop, chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, which has jurisdiction over Puerto Rico, said the panel would evaluate their request.

The board also prepared Congress for a massive price tag to rebuild the commonwealth. In its letter, the board cited an early report from Moody's Analytics, an investment and economic research firm, that estimates Puerto Rico's recovery will cost $95 billion.

"I can't predict what Congress as a whole will do," Bishop said, when asked about the federal loan request and a relief package. But he said his committee will consider modifying the PROMESA law that created the oversight board and allowed the island to restructure its $70 billion in bond debt in a process similar to bankruptcy.

Changes could include giving the board more authority and placing the U.S. Virgin Islands, which has higher debt per capita than Puerto Rico, under the same restructuring and oversight board process.

What Bishop did not predict is what Trump proposed in an interview with Fox News Tuesday night: eliminating Puerto Rico's debt.

"Let's see how this thing plays out in the future," said Bishop, referring to the process Puerto Rico is in now.

Bishop also said his committee will play "a lead role in the overall strategy and the rebuilding process," and work closely with the U.S. Treasury Department and other agencies in the Trump administration as that process unfolds.

To view online click here.

Back

White House proposes flood insurance reforms, debt cancellation Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 10/04/2017 06:05 PM EDT

The White House has outlined for congressional leaders several proposed changes to the National Flood Insurance Program as part of a disaster assistance request that includes canceling $16 billion of the program's debt.

In a letter to House and Senate leaders, Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney said the NFIP required "immediate financial relief to fulfill its obligations to its policyholders" but "must also be reformed to place it on a sound financial footing and to enable the private market for flood insurance to expand."

Lawmakers have been debating for several months what to do with the program as part of a long-term reauthorization bill. There was some overlap with what the administration proposed today, but a number of the White House's ideas will probably face pushback by lawmakers and industry groups.

The proposed changes from the White House include establishing a means-tested affordability program for low-income policyholders, giving FEMA authority to discontinue coverage for "extreme repetitive loss properties," phasing out new policies for certain new construction and prohibiting the NFIP from selling new flood insurance policies for commercial structures. The list includes proposals intended to help grow the private flood insurance market.

Mulvaney said the recent hurricanes resulted in projected losses of $16 billion. By the latter part of this month, he said the NFIP will have fully exhausted its financial resources, including its $30 billion borrowing authority, and will be unable to pay claims.

"Put plainly, the NFIP is not designed to handle catastrophic losses like those caused by Harvey, Irma and Maria," he said.

WHAT'S NEXT: Mulvaney said it was urgent that Congress act on the disaster request for the NFIP and other programs "as expeditiously as possible."

To view online click here.

Back

Interior secretary draws flak for mixing politics, official travel Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/04/2017 07:31 PM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little B.S."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Justice Department's Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips he takes outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then-Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity. Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations, that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Eric Wolff contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

How We Found Tom Price's Private Jets Back

By Dan Diamond and Rachana Pradhan | 10/04/2017 05:25 PM EDT

The first tip came from a casual conversation with a source back in May: Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price was using private jets for routine travel, possibly in violation of federal travel rules that allowed such flights only when commercial options weren't available.

But it was a tip and little else—no times, no names of charter services and not even a schedule from a notoriously secretive Cabinet secretary.

So we embarked on a months-long effort to win the trust of sources, both in and outside of HHS, who were in a position to know about the secretary's travel. This required numerous meetings and phone calls, sometimes after hours, seeking to confirm what the original source acknowledged was just secondhand information. Neither of us had ever reported a story of this difficulty before.

Price's lack of transparency made our job harder. In the initial months following his confirmation on February 10, he hadn't made his schedule public, unlike past secretaries. Bare-bones reports of events outside Washington usually were posted on the agency's website after they happened. But there were few places and times—not enough information to take either to charter services, sources inside HHS or anyone else in a position to know about the flights. And we faced another problem: Because the planes Price was taking were private, their arrivals and departures weren't recorded on public databases.

That meant we had to re-create Price's schedule from scratch if we were to have any hope of matching his trips to chartered flights. We reviewed the HHS summaries of Price's meetings. We scoured news sites for reports of Price speeches outside Washington. We obsessively tracked his appearances on social media. Putting all this information together, we built a database of Price's trips.

That task became somewhat easier in July, when Price's public relations staff began sending out notices to reporters of upcoming trips—a common practice in previous administrations—but it wasn't until late August that the reports of the secretary's travel plans became more regular.

This created an opportunity to stake out the airport and watch Price get on and off the plane, the surest way to determine that he was using charter aircraft on dates and times when commercial flights were also available. But which airport was Price traveling from?

There were several missed opportunities, when we either went to the wrong airport or the right airport at the wrong time. Then, in September, we received an official notice from HHS that Price would be traveling to the Philadelphia area to meet with people affected by addiction to opioid painkillers. By the morning of September 15 — when Price took a private jet to travel from Washington to Philadelphia, a distance of roughly 125 miles — we had figured out that Price was using the private jet terminal at Dulles International Airport, 28 miles outside of Washington.

That Friday morning, we camped out at the Dulles charter terminal. A little after 8 a.m., we saw two SUVs and a police escort roll onto the tarmac, as the cars discharged passengers who then boarded a distinctive 30-seat charter plane with a golden belly. By 8:30 a.m., we watched the charter jet take off, heading north, and tracked it to Philadelphia using FlightAware, an airline tracking website.

It was strong evidence, but it wasn't enough. We hadn't seen the faces of Price or the other passengers — including White House counselor Kellyanne Conway, who went on that opioid trip. Using social media and help from sources, we kept tabs on the movements of Price and Conway in Philadelphia, tracing when they wrapped up the event and headed to the airport.

By the time Price boarded the private jet at Philadelphia International Airport for the return trip to Dulles in early afternoon, we had figured out how to get the best view of the Dulles tarmac: Rachana drove by the charter jet terminal, timing her approach so she could best see the jet field, while Dan stood in the airport's main terminal, tracking the plane through his phone and counting down its arrival to Rachana, before hustling out to a patch of concrete that offered a view of the tarmac, too.

It was enough. We saw the distinctive golden plane taxi around to the private-jet terminal. We saw a man with Price's build and shock of white hair walking across the tarmac. We saw the SUVs and police escort come out to greet him and the other passengers before speeding them away.

After that, we pieced together his itinerary for the entire week by calling sources, looking for photos of events on social media and compiling HHS notices for his travel plans. We even called charter plane companies—including the one that Price had used—to figure out how much the trips cost. And we purchased flight data that offered the precise times for departures and arrivals of flights to validate what sources had said was Price's schedule. That also enabled us to compare Price's actual departures and arrivals with commercial flight options, train travel and even the cost of traveling by SUV. This was especially important: We wanted to compare the cost of Price's jets with that of commercial transportation, revealing a potential waste of taxpayer dollars.

While there was evidence that Price had been using charters for months, our first story stuck to what we had established beyond any doubt: The round-trip to Philadelphia, as well as three other flights in the previous two days.

On Monday, September 18, we sent our questions to HHS and repeatedly asked for a meeting or phone call with Price, but were rebuffed. After more than 24 hours, HHS issued a terse statement that, yes, the secretary used charter flights, but mostly for public health emergencies. The statement asserted that there was no violation of federal regulations, but offered no further explanation.

The publication of our first story—headlined "Price's private-jet travel breaks precedent"— shook loose new sources of information and gave fresh impetus for us to go back to our earlier efforts to reconstruct Price's schedule of trips. We matched the dates of Price's trips to contracts for charter air service on USAspending.gov, the government database of all federal outlays. And we established the precise times of Price's departures and arrivals through an exhaustive search of data we gathered from airports across the country. By Thursday, the matches were solid enough to go with a follow-up story: "Price traveled by private plane at least 24 times."

As we looked at our growing database, we noticed some peculiarities about his trips. For instance, there was a Friday afternoon charter flight that took him to an island off the Georgia coast, even though he didn't have any formal events scheduled for nearly two days. We checked property records, HHS financial disclosures and fundraising records from Price's political career and realized the former Georgia congressman had long-standing ties to St. Simons Island: He and his wife regularly visited during the summers, both for fundraisers and to participate in the local medical association, and they owned undeveloped land worth more than $1 million there.

A day trip by Price to Nashville didn't seem to make much sense as a priority for the HHS secretary, either. We could find only about 90 minutes' worth of events on Price's calendar, and many Nashville-area health care leaders told us they hadn't even known he was coming. But once again, Price had a personal tie: His son lived in the city and the secretary himself owned property there. And the reporters were able to track down, and get HHS to confirm, that Price had lunch with his son that day.

That led to our next story: "Price's private-jet travels included visits with colleagues, lunch with son."

Though all our stories to this point were about taxpayer-funded charter flights, our sources insisted that his use of military aircraft bore scrutiny, too. Arguably, his use of military planes on trips to Europe and Asia—at a cost of more than $500,000, based on our review of invoices obtained through sources—was excessive for an HHS secretary, even if it was vetted by normal channels. Plus, the presence of Price's wife, Betty, on the trips raised more questions. We followed up with HHS, the White House and scrutinized the travel practices of previous HHS secretaries before publishing our report on Thursday, September 28, "Price took military jets to Europe, Asia for over \$500K."

By then, the stories had become a national issue, with President Donald Trump among many other officials questioning Price's decisions on travel. Our colleagues on POLITICO's White House and Congress teams helped us keep track of the growing outrage. By Friday, September 29, Trump sent a strong signal that Price wouldn't be around too much longer, telling reporters before he departed for his New Jersey golf club that they'd hear more about the fate of his HHS secretary that evening.

When word came of Price's resignation later that afternoon, at 4:36 p.m., we weren't sure what to do at first—we were in the middle of reporting a follow-up article. By that point, we had put in almost a thousand hours of work on the Price investigation. But we thought back to when we spotted that plane with the distinctive golden belly on the Dulles tarmac, just two weeks earlier, the moment that our slow-burn investigation became a real and consequential story.

To view online click here.

Back

Thornberry pushed Pentagon for supplemental request for disaster bills Back

By Connor O'Brien | 10/05/2017 10:13 AM EDT

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry today said he urged Pentagon leaders to request supplemental funding as Congress prepares to consider emergency disaster relief funding.

"I told them, there's going to be more disaster money," the Texas Republican said. "Get your act together, and if you have a pressing need that we can get a head start on between now and December, get it up to us."

President Donald Trump on Wednesday formally requested $30 billion in emergency funding for hurricane recovery in Puerto Rico, Florida and Texas as well as wildfire assistance. House and Senate appropriators quickly signaled their support for the request and pledged to act quickly on legislation.

Thornberry highlighted maintenance and missile defense funding as urgent needs he had hoped the Pentagon would request. He added that he had spoken to White House Office of Management and Budget director Mick Mulvaney about the issue, and while he said extra funding could be added to upcoming disaster relief legislation, "practically speaking DoD needs to ask for it."

The chairman criticized the Pentagon for not requesting more money and both the department and Congress for accepting stopgap continuing spending resolutions.

"Unfortunately, we have conditioned the department in a bad way," he said.

Thornberry made the comments at the conservative Heritage Foundation, where the think tank rolled out its annual "Index of Military Strength." The report, which rates threats and the readiness of each of the military services, concludes the military services remain in "marginal" state of readiness and are trending towards "weak."

To view online click here.

Back

Energy and Commerce clears CHIP bill in party-line vote Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 10/04/2017 08:36 PM EDT

The House Energy and Commerce Committee this evening advanced legislation along party lines to extend funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program for five years.

The CHIP legislation, which was approved in a 28-23 vote after gaining no support from Democrats, mirrors an agreement reached by Senate Finance Committee leaders last month to continue funding through fiscal year 2022. The bill would begin to wind down Obamacare's 23 percent increase in federal matching funds to states in two years, and make tweaks to the law's "maintenance of effort" requirements that prevented states from reducing eligibility for the program. It was also amended to help the U.S. Virgin Islands with Medicaid funds, building on the $1 billion in the underlying bill for Puerto Rico.

House Republicans proposed to pay for the CHIP legislation by increasing means-testing in Medicare for wealthier seniors, allowing states to remove lottery winners from state Medicaid programs and change Medicaid's third-party liability policy, which dictates who pays claims for enrollees before Medicaid is responsible for costs. Those pay-fors drew objections from Democrats.

"Wealthy seniors already pay much more than others for their premiums," ranking Democrat Frank Pallone said.

Republicans argued the offsets were reasonable.

"We're not cutting back any major program, and I think it's a good thing that we do offset the spending," Joe Barton (R-Texas) said.

Lawmakers are still set this evening to consider a separate bill funding community health centers for two years, as well as legislation repealing Obamacare's Independent Payment Advisory Board.

The committee earlier today cleared seven bills addressing various Medicare issues, including extending the Independence at Home Demonstration for two years, and requiring Medicare coverage for a type of DNA test to diagnose prostate cancer.

To view online click here.

Back

Democrats accuse Trump of 'sabotage' on Obamacare signups Back

By Paul Demko and Adam Cancryn | 10/05/2017 12:40 PM EDT

Obamacare's first open enrollment season under the Trump administration will be shorter, quieter and likely, more chaotic — and even the law's most ardent supporters are worried there's little they can do to change that.

With less than a month before sign-up begins, the federal government has gutted outreach and marketing, slashed funding to outside enrollment groups and left state officials in the dark on key details.

The enrollment window is only half as long as in previous years. HealthCare.gov — the main sign-up site for more than half the country — will be shut down for 12 hours nearly every Sunday. And in the White House and Congress, Republican leaders continue to insist the entire market is on the brink of collapse.

While the Trump administration failed to repeal Obamacare, it's doing everything it can to whack it administratively — pulling resources from implementation and taking steps that seem aimed at reducing sign-ups for the law's fifth open enrollment. As a result, even the law's supporters acknowledge that Obamacare enrollment will likely drop for a second straight year as more young and healthy people jump ship — putting even more stress on fragile markets and driving a fresh round of partisan bickering over who's to blame.

"They're trying to sabotage the markets," said Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), warning that Republicans are fully responsible for the law's fate. "It's now all them. It is all them. One hundred percent."

Republicans insist that if enrollment tanks, it will be because of rising premiums and dwindling choices.

"A much bigger driver than a government agency trying to get you to enroll is what's going on in the market itself," said Alaska Sen. Dan Sullivan. "Our market has been the poster child of the disaster."

CMS has defended the reductions as a bid to reduce wasteful spending, contending most people are already aware of open enrollment and don't need as much help. Officials have said they cut funds to navigator groups that failed to meet their enrollment targets last year. Navigators dispute that, however, saying that agency didn't account for people they helped enroll in Medicaid, advised to automatically re-enroll in Obamacare, or helped to start applications but who finished at home.

A CMS spokesperson also emphasized that individuals will still enjoy a range of options to help them sign up this year, including local insurance agents and brokers and certified application counselors.

The impact of the cuts will be felt most acutely in the 28 mostly red states that rely solely on the federal government to run open enrollment. The Trump administration's 90 percent cut to its advertising budget means individuals won't see television ads urging them to visit HealthCare.gov. Its decision to eliminate 40 percent of federal grant money to enrollment assistance groups means far fewer on-the-ground resources, especially compared with states like California and Massachusetts that continue to pour resources into state outreach.

Concern about the cuts has already spurred a counter-offensive led by former Obama administration officials Lori Lodes and Josh Peck, who oversaw outreach and education for HealthCare.gov. Their new nonprofit — called Get America Covered — is planning to do some of the outreach that federal health officials won't, enlisting celebrities and pushing out information aimed at getting people covered.

Several Senate Democrats have talked with Get America Covered about turning their own political networks into a makeshift campaign to drive people to HealthCare.gov.

"If the administration is going to try to undermine open enrollment, we're going to have to build a massive operation outside of Washington," said Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.), who met Tuesday with the group. "I'm going to be helpful in any way that I legally can be, including pushing the message out and helping raise money for it."

Still, Obamacare's supporters admit there's little chance of matching the federal government's vast reach or resources. The Obama administration used every imaginable option to spur sign-ups over the last few years. Even then, enrollment had begun to plateau at about 10 million — less than half the level originally projected by the CBO.

With half the enrollment time and millions less to spend, those closely involved with the enrollment effort say they'll struggle to build on that number — especially coming off a bruising repeal fight marked by President Donald Trump's claims the law is already dead.

"The recent repeal efforts have created a great deal of political noise," said Jessie Menkens, who oversees outreach efforts for the Alaska Primary Care Association, which lost about 25 percent of its federal funding this year. "It has caused a lot of confusion and it has caused a sense of unease."

Congressional Republicans, though, say that Obamacare was already in a free fall before the Trump administration took office. They note that nearly half the counties in the country have just a single insurer selling plans, and premiums have skyrocketed in many places.

"I think Obamacare is sabotaging enrollment because the costs are so high, the choices are so limited," said Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.).

Those problems, while real, are unlikely to cause the markets to implode. That's because there's a core group of millions of enrollees who receive generous subsidies tied to their incomes. So even if premiums jump, many of those customers won't see their monthly bills increase, making them unlikely to drop coverage.

Beyond those people, though, the lack of advertising and outreach is likely to put a big dent in Obamacare's sign-ups.

"My fear, of course, is that people will lose coverage because they didn't do what they needed to do to re-up," said Margarita Labarta, CEO of Florida's Meridian Behavioral Healthcare, which saw its federal grant cut from $550,000 in 2017 to just over $40,000 now. That wasn't even enough to fund one full-time worker, she said, so the group turned down the money.

Just one group is now doing outreach work in the 17-county, predominantly rural area where Meridian works, she said.

In Louisiana, funding for the main statewide navigator group was cut 72 percent. The hit forced Navigators for a Healthy Louisiana to lay off 14 people and make very tough choices. It reassigned its remaining five navigators to the communities where they've seen the highest enrollment, leaving broad swaths of the state without anywhere to turn for in-person help.

"North Louisiana — the entire upper part of the boot — is without navigator services," said Brian Burton, the group's state director. "It leaves more people needing assistance and fewer people to assist them."

It also remains unclear what will happen once HealthCare.gov opens for business. Randy Pate, who heads the CMS office that oversees Obamacare implementation, told staffers last week that the agency is making it easier to find the sign-up site, and for people to enroll through insurers and brokers.

But at the same time, it's planning to shut down HealthCare.gov for 12 hours on five of the six Sundays during open enrollment — a popular time for people with weekday jobs to sign up. The open enrollment period itself has been compressed from 12 weeks to six, from Nov. 1 to Dec. 15.

"What we're doing is focusing on those things we can control," said Cheryl Gardner, the CEO of New Mexico's health exchange, which manages its own marketplace but relies on the HealthCare.gov website. "These [outages] are pretty long and right in the middle of open enrollment, which is really inconvenient."

State officials have also complained that CMS is keeping them in the dark on how it plans to manage the expected crush of people trying to access the website. A CMS spokesperson said that call center staffing will be consistent with prior years and that they'll use waiting rooms and a callback service to ensure everyone who wants to enroll by the deadline can do so. But the agency has not said how many call center employees will be dedicated to open enrollment, or if it has a contingency plan should HealthCare.gov suffer technical problems, said Heather Korbolic, the head of Nevada's state health exchange.

That all adds up to big questions about how enrollment under the Trump administration will actually work.

"The good thing is that the bar is so low and they're doing so little, that anything people do on the outside is going to have an impact," Lodes said. "But nothing can replace the government."

To view online click here.

Back

Corker cranks up demands for deficit-reducing tax plan Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/04/2017 04:42 PM EDT

Sen. Bob Corker said this afternoon that he will only support a tax plan that reduces federal deficits based on a "reasonable and responsible" growth model, throwing another wrench into the GOP's tax overhaul effort.

Corker had previously said he would not support a bill that "adds one penny" to the deficit. Now he is going further in his demands, complicating work for Republican tax writers who are trying to balance the desire for aggressive tax cuts with ultimatums from fiscal hawks.

The Tennessee Republican told fellow budget panel members today that he won't back a bill "unless it reduces deficits."

"Let me say that one more time: Unless it reduces deficits, and does not add to deficits — with reasonable and responsible growth models — and unless we can make it permanent, I don't have any interest in it," Corker said.

Although Corker has not said which models he will use to measure the plan's impact on the deficit, he has already dismissed reliance on CBO estimates, which do not allow "dynamic" scoring of tax plans and are likely to show the proposal costing money over a decade.

The two-term senator, who recently announced he is retiring from Congress, also went on a tear against the budget process.

"I have difficulty putting that much energy into discussing this budget document, because this is some of the most meaningless work that we do here," Corker said. "There's nothing about this that is that particularly serious."

To view online click here.

Back

AFP pressures Trump-state Democrats on tax reform Back

By Kevin Robillard | 10/05/2017 06:00 AM EDT

Americans for Prosperity is spending $4.5 million on television ads to push three Democratic senators up for reelection next year to back the GOP's plan for tax reform.

The group is spending $2 million to pressure Sen. Joe Donnelly in Indiana, $1.5 million to persuade Sen. Tammy Baldwin in Wisconsin and $1 million to goad Sen. Claire McCaskill in Missouri. All three senators are up for reelection in 2018 in states President Donald Trump won during the 2016 election cycle.

"We've heard the grassroots in Wisconsin, Missouri and Indiana calling for tax reform loud and clear," Americans for Prosperity President Tim Phillips said. "If these senators are in touch with their constituents, they already know the overwhelming demand for Congress to deliver on this bold, pro-growth plan that makes the tax code simpler, fairer and flatter."

The ads feature a young woman speaking direct to camera about the impact of tax cuts.

"People are sick of politics," she says. "I am too. But fixing our broken tax system isn't about politics — it's about helping people. It means the powerful, the well-connected, politicians — they'll stop benefiting from a rigged system. It means everyday Americans will have more to spend on what's important to them."

The ads then show a black-and-white image of the state's senator. "Sen. Baldwin is standing in the way of a simple, fair tax system," the woman says, as instructions to call the senator appear on screen.

The ending for the ad targeting Donnelly is subtly different. "Don't let Sen. Donnelly stand in the way of a simple, fair tax system," the woman says.

Donnelly, along with North Dakota Sen. Heidi Heitkamp and West Virginia Sen. Joe Manchin, declined to sign a letter spearheaded by Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer laying out Democratic principles on tax reform. Those three senators are considered more likely to back the GOP tax reform proposal than other Democrats. The Schumer letter said Democrats could not back legislation cutting taxes for the wealthy or adding to the deficit.

Americans for Prosperity wants the Democratic senators to back the tax reform framework released by congressional leaders last week, and noted all three senators had previously talked about the need to simplify the tax code and lower corporate rates.

Watch the ads here, here and here.

To view online click here.

Back

Talks to preserve state and local tax deduction underway in House Back

By Colin Wilhelm and Aaron Lorenzo | 10/04/2017 03:36 PM EDT

Early signs of compromise are emerging over the federal deduction for state and local taxes.

Members of leadership are listening to rank-and-file concerns over the issue, which, according to some, top-ranking Republicans did less of when they got pushback on the border adjustment tax pushed by House Speaker Paul Ryan, according to multiple congressional aides privy to the talks.

The state and local topic bubbled to the top of the agenda during the House Republican Conference tax reform retreat late last month. The issue has arguably become the top tax reform concern for numerous Republicans.

That's given confidence to GOP defenders of the deduction from high-tax states like New York, New Jersey and Illinois. They believe their message resonates among Republican leaders in Congress who have proposed eliminating the benefit as part of a more comprehensive bill to overhaul U.S. tax laws.

GOP leaders need votes for that broader tax reform, and with backers of the deduction threatening to hold back their support, there's opportunity for a compromise.

Rep. Tom MacArthur (R-N.J.) met with Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) to discuss the issue Tuesday night. MacArthur said the unified Republican blueprint wouldn't have enough votes to pass the House without a compromise.

"It can't pass in this form," he said Wednesday, adding that Brady and other Republican House leaders were receptive to feedback from him and other advocates of keeping a federal deduction for local property taxes. "Leadership and Ways and Means crafted a policy that I know they believe in and they'd love to have it pass today. There aren't the votes for it."

Rep. Kenny Marchant (R-Texas), a member of Ways and Means, agreed.

"It's a concern for a lot of the members," he said.

A Brady spokesperson agreed that he's willing to listen, while a Ryan spokesperson declined to comment.

MacArthur has Ways and Means allies on the issue, particularly Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.), as well as Republicans off the committee from high-tax states like his own.

"I think we're winning the argument," a congressional staffer said on condition of anonymity to avoid jeopardizing the still-ongoing talks. "Many more members are educated and engaged on this issue, and the brass is realizing they need the votes, so there is early talks of a compromise."

House Republican leaders and Ways and Means members held their first in a series of listening sessions Tuesday afternoon on the portion of the tax code that affects individual taxpayers.

They plan to hold a total of five sessions on other aspects of tax reform, part of an ongoing effort to make all Republicans comfortable with what their leadership wants them to vote on and avoid a repeat of the failed health care reform effort earlier this year.

Republicans from states that have low or no income taxes but pockets of higher property taxes, like Texas, may also align with high-income-tax-state Republicans on the issue. Sweetening the pot by keeping property taxes deductible from federal taxes could give Republicans from both types of states a win to bring home to their constituents and prevent an overall tax increase on some of their higher-income voters.

Texas' taxes are "all local but they're high," Marchant said.

MacArthur said he wants to combine the deduction for local property taxes with the mortgage interest deduction to form one unified housing credit, and he's open to phasing it out at higher income levels.

Another option would let individuals deduct either mortgage interest or property taxes, but not both, and Reed has argued for making the deduction a credit that could get scaled down at high incomes.

Still, support for ending the deduction is strong among other Republicans. Conservatives argue that doing away with the deduction would force states and municipalities to lower their own taxes or drive away residents.

Ending it would also raise more than $1 trillion to offset individual rate cuts and other benefits Republicans would like to add to the tax code.

MacArthur and other Republicans who come from high-tax states reject the notion that the deduction gives high-tax states and localities a free ride.

"These same people are running around Congress saying, 'Well, why should low-tax states subsidize high-tax states?'" he said. "Why? Because these high-cost states are already subsidizing everyone else," by paying more in federal taxes than they receive back in funding from the federal government.

To view online click here.

Back

Thornberry: 'I'd get rid of all' the budget caps Back

By Connor O'Brien | 10/05/2017 12:35 PM EDT

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry today endorsed repealing both caps on defense and domestic spending set by the 2011 Budget Control Act.

"If it were up to me, I'd get rid of all the caps on defense and domestic," Thornberry, a Texas Republican, said at a Heritage Foundation event where the conservative think tank unveiled its annual "Index of Military Strength" report.

House- and Senate-passed defense policy legislation, H.R. 2810 \(115\), calls for more than $70 billion above the limits set by the law. Thornberry has previously said he's open to increasing domestic spending to boost the defense budget.

In recent years, Republicans have pushed to circumvent the caps for defense spending while Democrats have argued for equal increases for defense and domestic funding. But some defense hawks have recently called for repealing all the caps, arguing limits on discretionary spending have hobbled the Pentagon without forcing reductions in mandatory spending.

"Obviously they failed because none of that has happened," Thornberry said of the budget law. "Instead, the 15 ... percent of the budget that is defense has born 50 percent of the cuts."

Thornberry said massive votes for the National Defense Authorization Act in both chambers show "overwhelming consensus that we have cut too much" from the military "and that we need to turn it around."

He also predicted lawmakers would strike a budget deal and said "the sooner it happens, the better."

"I believe there will be a deal," Thornberry said. "I suspect there will be a domestic and a defense component to any final agreement."

To view online click here.

Back

Fertilizer companies call for more money for farm bill conservation, research Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 10/05/2017 01:17 PM EDT

The fertilizer industry is urging Congress to include incentives for farmers to adopt precision nutrient management approaches and to increase research funding in the next farm bill.

In a letter sent Wednesday to the chairmen and ranking members of the House and Senate Agriculture committees, the Fertilizer Institute urges lawmakers to make a priority Conservation Innovation Grant projects related to new fertilizer technologies. The letter also recommends funding to give growers incentives to adopt better fertilizer management and to require reporting on fertilizer use.

The group also asks that research into nutrient management be a high priority in USDA research programs and grants. It wants lawmakers to provide "strong funding" to the competitive grant programs of the Agriculture and Food Research Initiative and to reauthorize the Foundation for Food and Agriculture Research.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: House budget writers aim for deal by next week — Appropriators pitch hybrid effort to raise both budget caps and debt limit — Freedom Caucus wavers on welfare reform
Date: Wednesday, June 14, 2017 4:54:29 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 06/14/2017 04:51 PM EDT

ONE WEEK TO DO IT ALL? Rep. Diane Black (R-Tenn.) still doesn't know if she has enough votes to pass the House GOP's budget on the floor. But the always-optimistic budget ringmaster has officially set her sights on June 21 for the long-awaited markup.

As we reported for Pros this afternoon, the House Budget Committee informed Democratic staff today that it's "possible" the big markup would be held in exactly one week. The GOP budget staff isn't confirming (or denying) that date, and one aide close to the process made clear that budget unity is still very much a work in progress. "We're fighting for next week and trying to get an agreement," the aide said.

Wishful thinking: A Wednesday markup is certainly tentative and will likely depend on how the House GOP's members-only budget meeting goes on Friday morning — if that huddle even happens now that the House isn't voting that day. House Speaker Paul Ryan is expected to take the mic to convince members to work toward a deal — and fast. Next week is likely the panel's last chance to get its resolution on the calendar before the July 4 recess. Budget writers can also only hold off those anxious appropriators for so long until they start using their own numbers to craft spending bills (exhibit A: the House Appropriations Committee will hold that MilCon-VA markup Thursday afternoon).

Getting to yes: Black has a few more key moments before Friday to shape a budget resolution that can pass the floor, including a meeting on Thursday morning with the House Freedom Caucus. The conservative caucus met last night to talk budget but didn't take an official position, according to a spokeswoman, possibly signaling that members are keeping an open mind until their chat with Black. The full budget committee also has two meetings this week.

GOOD WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) are introducing a bill today that would provide a $5,000 tax credit to employers who hire individuals participating in a federal- or state-registered apprentice program. More from Morning Shift.

#DailyBudgetFact — The CBO is asking for its own budget bump this year, requesting $49.9 million for fiscal 2018. Check out Director Keith Hall's testimony before House appropriators this week.

BUDGET

LET'S MAKE A DEAL: It lasted only about 60 seconds, but there was some serious bipartisan budget talk at one of those lesser-known appropriations hearings today. Breaking up some in-the-weeds global finance chatter, Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) told Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin that Congress should immediately strike a deal to raise both the budget caps and the debt ceiling this month.

'Budgetary stability': "I would like to suggest to you — if you could take this back to the White House — that we ought to enter into a bipartisan budget agreement and tie the debt ceiling to that, before the end of July," the moderate Republican appropriator said. "I think that would be extremely important, to provide not only stability for the markets, but budgetary stability for all of us." Dent predicts "a lot of bipartisan support" for that strategy.

Seriously, did they plan this? Just minutes later, Rep. David Price (D-N.C.) gave the idea a glowing review. "That's an important request, and I endorse it wholeheartedly," Price said. The 20-year House veteran lamented that the lack of a budget deal was already threatening to cause a government shutdown in September. "For once, let's anticipate that. For once, let's get ahead of the game," Price said. "Do the budget agreement now that will let us do our work and avoid that kind of destabilizing scramble at the end of the fiscal year."

TAX

WAVERING ON WELFARE REFORM: In a departure from their usual instinct to put their principles above political practicality, some Freedom Caucus members are saying it might not be worthwhile to insist welfare reform be included in a tax overhaul. As Colin Wilhelm reports, Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) and former Chairman Jim Jordan (R-Ohio) are trying to sell the welfare ultimatum. But in doing so, the Senate could reject the budget, leaving tax reform without a vehicle to pass into law unless they can gather support from Democrats. Some Freedom Caucus devotees, however, say it could be the key to getting enough GOP votes in the House.

BAT still a non-starter: The Freedom Caucus' leaders don't want anything to do with the "border adjustment" tax House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) has proposed. And Brady's pitch this week to make it a five-year transition period didn't bring any naysayers on board, Colin notes.

DEBT CEILING

TRILLION-DOLLAR DIFFERENCE: If some in the Freedom Caucus have their way, Congress may only have another 18 months until the next debt ceiling debacle. Chairman Mark Meadows is now eyeing a strategy to lift the debt ceiling by roughly $1.5 trillion, compared to the $2.5 trillion the Trump administration has considered, Rachael Bade reports. That stricter spending cap would push off the next debt ceiling fight until just after the 2018 elections (naturally).

DEFENSE

TOP HAWK WOOS FISCAL HAWKS: Meadows says Rep. Mac Thornberry's ideas were well-received when the House Armed Services chairman made his pitch this week for funding DoD at $640 billion and not President Donald Trump's proposed $603 billion. "The key that unlocks it all is coming up with a budget agreement," Meadows told reporters. "Whether it's $603 [billion] or $640 [billion] or somewhere in between, I think a number of us are willing to look at that, in anticipation that we may have to look at other areas, whether it's welfare reform, tax reform, or some of the other issues." More from Morning Defense.

GO YOUR OWN WAY: Defense Secretary James Mattis defended the Trump administration's decision not to set a specific time frame for a troop drawdown, arguing today that reductions will be based on conditions on the ground, not arbitrary deadlines, per Gregory Hellman. "I believe what we have to do is get to a point that the Afghan security forces, working for a government that can win the affection and respect of its people, can carry out the security," Mattis told senators.

BOEING'S BOTTOM LINE: Boeing's executive vice president said today that she likes Trump's focus on getting the best deal for taxpayers, though she declined to say whether the president's leadership has been good or bad for the company's business, Jacqueline Klimas reports. Leanne Caret says conversations with the president on the Air Force One program have been a "great opportunity" for Boeing to show the president that the company understands a good business deal. But it's gotta hurt to see comments like Trump's tweet in December about his intention to "cancel" the program over its "out of control" costs.

OBAMACARE

ROSIER REPEAL ESTIMATE? MAYBE NOT: Folks at the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget have been number-crunching the new Obamacare repeal estimate. And they say the fresh opinion from Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services actually concludes that the House-passed health care bill could increase the debt by $409 billion over the next decade. The nonprofit also ticks off the reasons the opinions from CBO and CMS are not apples to apples, including the fact that CBO does its scores on a fiscal-year basis while CMS uses calendar years and each agency uses a different baseline for its analysis for starting assumptions.

WHY YOU GOTTA BE SO MEAN? It's been a bruising week for the House health care bill, and the hits keep on coming. Speaking to a group of GOP senators on Tuesday, Trump borrowed words from a Taylor Swift hate song to describe the other chamber's bill. (This is only a few weeks after Trump himself made calls to sway on-the-fence Republicans.) Looking ahead to the 2018 midterms, the president instructed the Republican senators to write a bill that's more easily defensible, Burgess Everett, Jennifer Haberkorn and Josh Dawsey report. On the House side, the backdoor criticism isn't sitting well with the members who are already uneasy about backing a bill projected to cut off coverage for 23 million people.

PAPERS, PLEASE: As long as Obamacare is still around, House Republicans want to do a triple-check that undocumented immigrants aren't receiving federal dollars to pay for their health insurance. The House passed a bill along party lines on Tuesday that would step up immigration status checks for people who seek health care tax credits, Ted Hesson reports.

FINANCIAL SERVICES

WINNING OVER INSURERS: Insurance trade groups that threatened to oppose the House GOP's proposal to overhaul the National Flood Insurance Program appear to have won concessions and are now offering their support, Zachary Warmbrodt reports. What's changed? House Financial Services leaders are rumored to have eased up on their proposed cap on compensation for private firms that work with the program.

CALENDAR

MULVANEY COMES HOME TO CONGRESS: OMB Director Mick Mulvaney has another appearance on Capitol Hill in exactly one week. The former congressman will be testifying about his own agency's budget at the House Appropriations' financial services subcommittee hearing at 2 p.m. on June 21.

SHOOTING SHAKES UP SCHEDULE: Today's agenda was supposed to be packed again with budget-related hearings and markups. But the shooting this morning has largely cleared the congressional schedule. Among the events canceled or delayed: the House's vote on a health care bill that's part of the repeal agenda, a hearing on reauthorizing the Children's Health Insurance Program, a flood insurance markup, and a markup on a bill to reauthorize DHS. But a handful of Trump's Cabinet officials did make it up to Capitol Hill this morning, including Secretary of State Rex Tillerson and Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin. Read on for highlights.

STATE DEPARTMENT

NO VACANCY SIGN: Tillerson spent a good part of this week brushing off reports that his understaffed department is causing troubles for diplomacy. At his third appearance on Capitol Hill, he said there "really is not" a backlog of work because of the number of people in temporary posts. "Every job is filled today," Tillerson said, adding that lower-ranking officials have agreed to hold the "acting" positions until their replacements arrive.

The MYOB plan: Tillerson also took a stab today at laying out Trump's vision for foreign policy when pressed about the potential harms of the president's "America First" budget and agenda. Calling out the "mistakes" of former administrations that focused on nation-building, Tillerson said Trump is "not into government-building or changing government." Speaking for Trump, the secretary said, "I think what he was saying is, there's a lot of conflict that can be created when we try to go too far in imposing our way of life on others."

TREASURY

GOING GLOBAL: Mnuchin looked a little out of his comfort zone in the hot seat before House appropriators this afternoon, answering questions about everything from Russia to international aid programs. The former Goldman Sachs banker made clear that he's still learning on the job: "I feel like I've gotten a PhD in the last 100 days."

Under fire — from the GOP: Mnuchin, who oversees more than a dozen international aid programs, acknowledged that the White House has "made difficult cuts" in areas like the World Bank. Those cuts, he said, were intended to "fund the military to its proper level." But even GOP lawmakers weren't buying it. "We don't want to end up with a contradiction whereby, in our effort to increase our military's capacity, that we end up hollowing out the very things that build up the conditions for international stability," Rep. Jeff Fortenberry (R-Neb.), a noted defense hawk, told Mnuchin.

JOBS

APPRENTICESHIP OVERSIGHT IS OVER: A top adviser to the president says Trump will now roll out his executive order on apprenticeship on Thursday, Ian Kullgren reports. Trump had planned to sign the directive this afternoon in conjunction with a policy speech at the Labor Department. But the address was canceled after this morning's shooting. The pending directive would virtually eliminate oversight of government-subsidized apprenticeship programs, according to a source familiar with a draft of the plan. Ian explains that the executive order would shift certification of federally funded apprenticeship programs from the Labor Department to grant recipients, a move that effectively would eliminate government oversight.

Ivanka's input: During a White House meeting today with Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta and more than a dozen CEOs, Ivanka Trump highlighted the skills gap among women and minorities and said the government needs to do more.

Think small: The apprenticeship push marks an evolution for the White House, which now seems to be catching on to the benefits of focusing on small policy wins rather than potentially insurmountable efforts like tax overhaul, Obamacare repeal and major infrastructure investment, Nancy Cook and Andrew Restuccia explain.

STICKING UP FOR NAFTA: As the Trump administration prepares to begin renegotiating NAFTA this summer, U.S. manufacturers urged the White House this week not to destroy business ties among the three countries that support 2 million American manufacturing jobs, Doug Palmer reports.

CYBER

McAULIFFE PLEADS FOR CASH: Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe says he told Trump that the federal government needs to fork over more money to help states with cybersecurity, Tim Starks reports.

EARMARKS

— Marco Rubio enlists Ivanka Trump to promote bigger child tax credit. Bloomberg.

— A year after declaring victory on sanctuary cities, Culberson still at war. Houston Chronicle.

— Frelinghuysen opponent gets financial boost. NJ Advance Media.

— VA warns of surprise budget gap, insists no delays in care. The Associated Press.

— Fact Check: These statements by Trump's Cabinet don't match policy. The New York Times.

ON TAP THURSDAY

9 a.m. — The House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee holds a hearing on the DoD budget request. 2359 Rayburn House Office Building.

11 a.m. — The House Appropriations Transportation, Housing and Urban Development Subcommittee holds a hearing on the DOT budget request. 2358-A Rayburn House Office Building.

11 a.m. — The House Appropriations Interior and Energy Subcommittee holds a hearing on the EPA budget request. 2007 Rayburn House Office Building.

2 p.m. — The House Appropriations Committee marks up its fiscal 2018 funding bill for military construction and Veterans Affairs programs. 2359 Rayburn House Office Building.

10 a.m. — The Senate Appropriations Labor-HHS subcommittee holds a hearing on the budget request for the Department of Health and Human Services. 138 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

WE'RE COUNTING: 108 days until federal funding runs out, the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal and the National Flood Insurance Program expires. 473 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018). [Who knows how many] days until the nation will default if the debt limit isn't raised.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/06/house-budget-writers-aim-for-deal-by-next-week-023311>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Budget committee markup 'possible' next week Back

By Sarah Ferris | 06/14/2017 03:38 PM EDT

The House Budget Committee notified Democratic staff today that it aims to mark up its long-awaited budget resolution next Wednesday, an aide confirmed.

Republican leaders on the panel gave official word to their Democratic counterparts that a hearing is "possible" next week.

The committee's GOP staff said they could not confirm the tentative plans for a markup, which would follow Republicans' high-profile budget gathering scheduled for Friday.

"We're fighting for next week and trying to get an agreement," one GOP aide close to the budget process said.

At that meeting, House Speaker Paul Ryan is expected to lay out various scenarios for budget and appropriations this year. The gathering is considered a last-ditch attempt to resolve GOP infighting over the fiscal 2018 budget before GOP leaders decide to abandon the document and set spending levels informally instead.

To view online click here.

Back

Freedom Caucus still divided on tax reform Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 06/13/2017 07:00 PM EDT

The House Freedom Caucus remains divided over its approach to tax reform.

The group has debated its official stance on tax reform for the last two weeks, with caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) and former Chairman Jim Jordan (R-Ohio) attempting to steer the group towards unified opposition to the plan favored by House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and in favor of tying welfare reform to tax reform.

"I do believe that we'll have some official position if we can get to the 80 percent threshold," Meadows said.

He and Jordan oppose the border adjustment provision in the plan put forward by House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), and Meadows has echoed the Trump administration's position that tax cuts do not have to be deficit neutral.

"Our position, should we take one on tax reform, is not an indictment on [Brady's] ability to try to encourage, inform and educate our members as much as drawing a conclusion that outside of the Freedom Caucus, as well as inside of the Freedom Caucus, there doesn't seem to be much support for the border adjustment tax," Meadows added.

Jordan and Meadows want to use caucus votes to force House Republican leadership to tie welfare reform to tax reform in budget instructions necessary for a maneuver to bypass a potential filibuster of tax reform in the Senate. But in doing so the Senate could reject the budget, leaving tax reform without a vehicle to pass into law unless they can gather support from Democrats.

"I don't think it's necessary" to tie to welfare reform to tax reform, said Freedom Caucus member Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas). "But I think it might be helpful. If you're not going to get any Democrat votes, welfare reform is popular enough amongst our base that that helps you get the votes for tax reform, which is more controversial."

The hardline conservative group has discussed taking an official position on tax reform, with several members opposed to border adjustment, but has yet to take a formal position. Some members argue that combining a sweeping welfare reform with a tax package, in part as a replacement to offset the cost of lowering tax rates, would poison the well for reforming the tax code.

"The pitch I'm going to make is that tax reform is such a big deal to the country and to the world, with the U.S. being much of the world's economic engine. We need to focus on just getting this right." said David Schweikert (R-Ariz.), the one Freedom Caucus member who sits on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee. "I'm going to encourage my friends out there [not to tie the two together]. Big time tax reform is going to be the biggest thing any of us ever vote on. Tying externalities, no matter how important they are, just make the votes more difficult."

To view online click here.

Back

Opponents unswayed by Brady's plan to phase in import tax provision Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 06/13/2017 09:53 PM EDT

Opponents of a controversial tax on imports weren't swayed by a five-year transition period proposed Tuesday by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Kevin Brady.

Brady (R-Texas) had signaled earlier that phasing in the "border adjustment" provision, which would tax imports but not exports in a bid to juice domestic production, was most likely part of a plan to tamp down opposition to the plan.

Opponents gave it a thumbs down anyway.

"Phasing in flawed, unnecessary policy is not a solution; in fact, it is likely to create more problems than it solves," Heritage Action CEO Michael Needham said in a release. "Rather than creating additional economic uncertainty, congressional leaders need to declare the border adjustment tax dead. Only then can a serious conversation on advancing real, pro-growth tax reform move forward."

Americans for Prosperity — a group aligned with the Koch brothers — and import-dependent retailers issued similar statements.

A spokesperson for Brady pointed to previous remarks Brady gave about Heritage Action's recently announced opposition to his plan.

Brady had noted that the Heritage Foundation previously advocated border adjustment as part of a tax system that would end taxation of the profits U.S. businesses earn abroad and that are already taxed by foreign governments. That is in line with Brady's proposal in his blueprint.

"That bold tax reform proposal is included in the House GOP Blueprint," Brady said in a statement.

Committee Republicans were caught off-guard by the timing of Brady's announcement.

"I haven't talked to him today about it, he might've said something at a meeting I wasn't at," Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.) told reporters. "It's something we're going to dig into, the fact that he did bring it up today and find out the impact of that."

The border adjustment has drawn the most opposition to the House GOP's tax reform plan so far. Brady has been promising to address opponents' concerns.

"A very gradual five-year phase-in really resolves a lot of the challenges," he said at an event Tuesday morning.

The conservative-leaning Tax Foundation, which has been supportive of Brady's tax reform blueprint, estimates that a five-year transition would decrease the amount of money that the provision raises by $220 billion over ten years. As originally drawn, the provision was meant to raise more than $1 trillion to fund other tax cuts.

It's unclear how much the potential exemptions Brady mentioned for financial services and telecommunications may also decrease the expected revenue.

Likewise, Brady suggested his final draft could allow small businesses to continue to take advantage of the interest deduction for business debt. His blueprint proposes eliminating the deduction in favor of the immediate write off of large purchases made by businesses.

"They often don't have access to capital markets," he said during the same public remarks in which he floated his proposal for border adjustment transition.

But advocates of preserving the interest deduction didn't jump on board.

"When lawmakers set out to reform the tax code, their stated goals were economic growth and simplification. Proposals that eliminate interest deductibility for some businesses and retain it for others, however, fail to accomplish either of these objectives," said BUILD Coalition spokesman Mac O'Brien.

Republicans on Brady's committee wanted to reserve full judgment until they knew more about what the chairman was proposing. But Buchanan and others sounded encouraged by Brady's proposal.

"A lot of businesses have told me in reference to that, 'Don't just put everything in Day One, give us time to adjust, and we can adjust,'" Buchanan said.

Rep. Mike Kelly (R-Pa.), another committee member, had not heard details but sounded encouraged by the idea of giving importers and the economy time to adjust.

"Huge increases in the cost of products don't really work well," said Kelly, who hasn't taken a stance on border adjustment.

Proponents of border adjustment say that it will drive a rise in the value of the dollar that will offset any increased cost of products caused by the import tax, but critics argue that's unrealistic.

Rep. David Schweikert (R-Ariz.), a supporter of the border adjustment provision, was curious about Brady's proposed carve outs

"You would have to design some very unique, hopefully elegant rules" for the exemptions, he said.

To view online click here.

Back

Meadows: Freedom Caucus eyeing $1.5 trillion debt ceiling increase Back

By Rachael Bade | 06/13/2017 11:17 PM EDT

Some House Freedom Caucus conservatives want to raise the debt ceiling by a smaller amount than the Trump administration would like — just long enough to clear the 2018 mid-term elections, the group's leader said Tuesday.

The Freedom Caucus has not taken an official position on a specific number. But Chairman Mark Meadows emerged from a group meeting Tuesday night saying some of his conservative colleagues are looking at a $1.5 trillion lift in the nation's borrowing cap.

The North Carolina Republican said that's smaller than the $2.5 trillion he believes the White House wants.

"The White House wants $2.5 trillion, is what I heard. We're more in the $1.5 trillion range," Meadows said. "It's not an official position, but some members of the Freedom Caucus have been discussing $1.5 trillion as a specific amount in a debt ceiling increase."

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has asked Congress to raise the debt ceiling before the August recess, leaving Republicans just a few weeks to cobble together a plan. Freedom Caucus members want to address the matter before the recess, but they're asking for spending reforms and debt-payment prioritization to accompany any lift in the nation's borrowing limit.

GOP leaders, however, have all but thrown out that idea and are signaling that they're more likely to work with Democrats since the debt ceiling has to pass the Senate, meaning it will need eight Democratic votes.

While few have discussed numbers, let alone settled on a plan, Meadows suggested the $1.5 trillion would push the deadline for addressing the contentious issue again past the mid-term elections.

To view online click here.

Back

Mattis opposes arbitrary timeline for keeping U.S. troops in Afghanistan Back

By Gregory Hellman | 06/14/2017 01:30 PM EDT

Defense Secretary Jim Mattis today criticized setting deadlines for the presence of U.S. troops in Afghanistan, telling a Senate panel that withdrawing troops "on a timeline rather than consistent with the development of the government and the security forces" has encouraged the Taliban.

"Other nations pulled their forces out as well, and furthermore the Taliban was emboldened," Mattis told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

In an exchange with Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.), Mattis insisted that victory in Afghanistan remains achievable as long as troop reductions are made based on conditions on the ground.

"I believe what we have to do is get to a point that the Afghan security forces, working for a government that can win the affection and respect of its people, can carry out the security," Mattis said.

Mattis' comments follow President Donald Trump's decision on Monday to delegate the decision for setting troop levels to the defense secretary. There are currently 8,400 U.S. troops in the country.

Mattis sought to reassure Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) that the president remains an "active participant" the development of a new strategy.

"I don't keep any secrets from the president," Mattis said. "The president is keenly interested, not in all the tactical details, but in getting the strategy right."

The administration's Afghanistan strategy, he added, aims to pursue reconciliation between the Afghan government and the Taliban. "We have a strategy that will involve reconciliation as fundamental, knowing that all wars have to end sometime. But it takes two to tango."

To view online click here.

Back

Boeing exec likes Trump's focus on cost cutting Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 06/14/2017 12:12 PM EDT

Boeing's executive vice president said today she liked President Donald Trump's focus on getting the best deal for taxpayers, though she declined to say whether the president had been good or bad for the company's business.

As a taxpayer, Leanne Caret said she appreciated the president's emphasis on reducing costs.

"What I like, and I think what we've all seen, is that he's focused on business results and he's focused on getting a great deal for our taxpayer, and I think all of us as taxpayers should want that same thing," she said at a Defense One Global Business Briefing

Asked directly if Trump had been good or bad for business, she responded: "I don't think there is a good or bad."

Trump has tweeted about multiple Boeing programs, including the contract to build a new Air Force One. Prior to the inauguration, the president-elect tweeted that he would "cancel" the program over its "out of control" costs

Caret said that conversations with Trump on the Air Force One program have been a "great opportunity" for Boeing's CEO to show the president that the company understands a good business deal.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump knocks House health care bill as too harsh Back

By Burgess Everett, Jennifer Haberkorn and Josh Dawsey | 06/13/2017 02:57 PM EDT

President Donald Trump directed Senate Republicans to pass a generous health care bill at a meeting with more than a dozen GOP senators on Tuesday, arguing that the austere House health care bill is difficult to defend, according to people familiar with the meeting.

The president also said Republicans risk getting savaged in the 2018 midterms if they fail to repeal Obamacare after a seven-year campaign against the law.

But he made clear that the Senate needs to pass a bill that Republicans are able to more easily defend and is not viewed as an attack on Americans from low-income households, as the House bill has been portrayed by critics, the sources said. He also advocated more robust tax credits for people who buy insurance on the individual market, a move that would increase the bill's cost.

Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), who is pushing the Senate to slow the repeal of Medicaid expansion, indicated Trump is concerned about the people who are enrolled in the program for low-income Americans.

"He talked about the need to take care of people," Portman said of the president.

The gathering included 13 GOP senators of varying ideological stripes, from the moderate Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska to the conservative Mike Lee of Utah and Ted Cruz of Texas. The meeting left some Republicans on Capitol Hill with the impression that Trump is siding with more moderate Republicans, particularly when it comes to winding down Obamacare's Medicaid expansion, which brought insurance coverage to millions of people.

Trump has told associates that news coverage of the House health care bill was "terrible," in the words of one associate who has spoken with him.

Trump threw a party in the Rose Garden celebrating the passage of the House bill and has publicly called it "terrific."

But aides and associates said he has not liked the news coverage and has shown little interest in what is in the bill — but wants it to be received well.

Conservatives want to wind down the expansion quickly and curtail future Medicaid spending, while more centrist senators are trying to preserve as much coverage as possible. Republicans said Trump spent a significant portion of the meeting observing senators disagreeing over the matter.

Murkowski, who, like Portman, is from a state that expanded Medicaid, said she made it clear to the president that she is concerned about repealing the expansion.

"I reinforced that I think Medicaid expansion has been very important to the state of Alaska," she said.

Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), who is arguing to constrain future Medicaid spending to a rate lower than the House bill provides, said finding the sweet spot "remains a challenge."

"It feels like we're making a little bit of progress. It's slow, but it was always going to be a tough slog," said Toomey, who attended the meeting.

A White House official said Trump did not take a firm position on Medicaid, which is the subject of much deliberation within the Senate Republican Conference. Seema Verma, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, attended both the White House meeting and a subsequent GOP lunch on health care, playing point for the administration on the matter.

And rather than instructing senators to meet hard deadlines, Trump urged Republicans to have a more orderly process than the chaotic one in the House. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell is trying to call for a vote this month, though it may slip until July due to ideological disagreements and the difficulty of drafting such a complex bill.

The president asked Republicans to set aside their vast policy differences and find consensus.

"The message really was, 'I know you have your differences, but work through them and let's figure out a way to get it done,'" said Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.). "We have to get a product."

"He wants us to pass this bill and improve this House bill," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch of Utah told reporters.

Republican senators believe it will be at least a week before a coherent blueprint emerges for the GOP to chew over. Leaders are still going back and forth with the Congressional Budget Office to lay out options for Medicaid and tax credits and how much each option would cost.

Hatch told reporters that he doesn't think there will be a bill this week. If that prediction holds, it would be difficult for the Senate to vote on legislation before the Fourth of July recess.

McConnell refused to tell reporters when a bill might be released or how long it would be available to the public before a vote.

"We'll let you see the bill when we finally release it," McConnell said. "Nobody's hiding the ball here."

Trump has taken a much more hands-off approach to the Senate bill than he took with the House version. Many senators expect the president to weigh in with more one-on-one or group lobbying as the GOP gets closer to moving a bill to the Senate floor.

"He'll be a big help, but I think the timing is important. And he'll be an important part of this," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas). "We need to consult among ourselves and come up with a consensus."

Adam Cancryn contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump rattles House GOP over health care comments Back

06/14/2017 06:41 AM EDT

IMAGINE IF you're a House Republican, and voted for the leadership's health-care bill in May after being told that you were doing the newly elected president a solid. You listened to the White House's pleading -- perhaps you got a phone call from Vice President Mike Pence, Chief of Staff Reince Priebus or even the president himself. The administration was on the Hill nonstop to push their legislation. You explained to your constituents that the late-in-the-game changes made to the bill helped cover more people. You celebrated with him in the Rose Garden after passage.

NOW YOU HEAR THE PRESIDENT has gone behind closed doors and told senators the House bill is "mean" and says it doesn't do enough to cover people. Wouldn't that anger you? Well, it's angering a lot of House Republicans, who believe their president put them at political risk with that comment. A Senate health care bill was always going to be more moderate than the House version. If you're a House Republican, are you going to help the White House next time after the president privately just dumped all over you after you cast a vote for him? A lot of GOP lawmakers are buzzing about it, and many are none too pleased with the president right now . Story: "AP sources: Trump tells senators House health bill 'mean,'" by Alan Fram. <http://apne.ws/2t0vZnB>

ONE MORE QUICK THOUGHT -- Republicans on the Hill spent years decrying behind-the-scenes machinations of government. Now they have an attorney general that is refusing to discuss his conversations with the president. And a Senate majority that seeking to pass a major health-care bill without hearings.

To view online click here.

Back

House passes bill to check immigration status for tax credits Back

By Ted Hesson | 06/13/2017 05:33 PM EDT

The House approved a bill today that would require the federal government to check the citizenship and immigration status of people who seek a premium tax credit for health insurance.

The Verify First Act, sponsored by Rep. Lou Barletta (R-Pa.), calls for the Social Security Administration, DHS and the Department of Health and Human Services to work together to root out fraud.

The tax credit is meant to help lower- and middle-income families obtain health insurance through the marketplace. Republican critics, however, claim the credit has led to hundreds of millions of dollars in unwarranted tax breaks doled out to undocumented immigrants.

The measure, which passed largely along party lines with a vote of 238-184, would be tied to the enactment of the Republican health care plan.

To view online click here.

Back

Flood insurance compromise wins over insurers Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 06/14/2017 12:28 PM EDT

Insurance trade groups that threatened to oppose House legislation that would overhaul the National Flood Insurance Program appear to have won concessions and are now offering their support.

One of the changes in the compromise would ease a proposed cap on compensation for private firms that work with the NFIP, people familiar with the matter said.

Spokesmen for Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Rep. Sean Duffy (R-Wis.), who chairs an insurance subcommittee, did not immediately confirm the revisions.

The committee postponed a markup of the legislation following this morning's shooting at a congressional baseball practice.

One of the changes expected to appear when the committee takes up the legislation would address insurance industry pushback against a cap on compensation for insurers participating in the NFIP's "Write Your Own" program. Under the arrangement, private companies sell and service government-backed flood insurance policies.

A bill that the committee was scheduled to mark up today would have limited compensation to 25 percent of premiums that policyholders pay. Sources said a new compromise would set the cap at 27.9 percent, phased in over three years, with a mandate that FEMA reduce costs from current levels by at least 1.5 percent within three years.

Two of the groups that threatened to oppose the legislation, in part because of the cap, now appear to be on board.

The Property Casualty Insurers Association of America sent a letter to the committee saying it backed the amended NFIP package. The National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies sent a separate letter saying the revised legislation had its "full support."

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee is expected to provide updates on the timing of the markup this afternoon.

To view online click here.

Back

Scalise in 'critical' condition after mass shooting Back

By Louis Nelson and John Bresnahan | 06/14/2017 08:19 AM EDT

A gunman opened fire at a congressional baseball practice in Alexandria, Virginia, on Wednesday morning, wounding House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, members of his security detail, a congressional staffer, and a lobbyist in a scene that one lawmaker said could have been a "massacre."

There were no immediate fatalities as a result of the shooting, although President Donald Trump announced during a televised address Wednesday morning that the shooter had died as a result of injuries sustained in an exchange of gunfire with U.S. Capitol Police.

A law enforcement source briefed on the investigation identified the gunman as 66-year-old James T. Hodgkinson of Illinois.

Scalise's office said Wednesday morning that he was undergoing surgery after being shot in the hip and transported to MedStar Washington Hospital Center. The hospital later tweeted that Scalise remains in critical condition. House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) told reporters that Scalise's surgery had been completed.

"Prior to entering surgery, the Whip was in good spirits and spoke to his wife by phone. He is grateful for the brave actions of U.S. Capitol Police, first responders, and colleagues," his office said. "We ask that you keep the Whip and others harmed in this incident in your thoughts and prayers."

In his remarks, the president called Scalise "a very good friend," "a patriot" and "a fighter," and said the prayers of his family, the nation and the world were with him.

"We may have our differences but we do well in times like these to remember everyone who serves in our nation's capital is here because, above all, they love our country. We can all agree we are blessed to be Americans," Trump said in his statement, delivered from the White House's Diplomatic Room.

Tim Slater, the FBI special agent in charge of the Washington Field Office, told reporters at a press conference from the scene that it was too early in the investigation to label the incident an act of terrorism or determine whether it constituted an assassination attempt. Likewise, he could not say whether members of Congress had been specifically targeted.

Shortly after the shooting, McCarthy announced via Twitter that the House would not hold any of its scheduled votes on Wednesday, although Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said votes in that chamber would go on as scheduled. House Speaker Paul Ryan did summon House members to the floor at noon on Wednesday, where he and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi delivered remarks.

"We are all horrified by this dreadful attack on our friends and on our colleagues and those who serve and protect this Capitol," Ryan said after some brief parliamentary procedures to open the House. "We are united in our shock. We are united in our anguish. An attack on one of us is an attack on all of us."

"To my colleagues, you're gonna hear me say something you've never heard me say before: I identify myself with the remarks of the Speaker," Pelosi said. "We are not one caucus or the other in this House today, but we speak for each other in saying we send our thoughts and prayers to our colleague Steve Scalise."

Former congresswoman Gabby Giffords (D-Ariz.), who also was the victim of a shooting incident, described the shooting as "an attack on all who serve and on all who participate in our democracy."

"I am heartbroken for the pain of Congressman Scalise, the other victims, and their family, friends, and colleagues who survived. I am thankful for the great courage of Capitol Police, who were my protectors after I was shot and became my friends," said Giffords, who was among the 19 people wounded during a 2011 shooting in which six people died. "I also know the courage it takes to recover from a shooting like this, and I know Steve and everyone there this morning have such courage in great supply."

Hodgkinson, the shooter, featured a prominent photo of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) on his Facebook page, and Sanders said Wednesday in remarks on the Senate floor that Hodgkinson had volunteered for his 2016 presidential campaign. He offered his prayers for Scalise and the shooting's other victims, denouncing the attacker who had once supported his White House bid.

"I have just been informed that the alleged shooter at the Republican baseball practice is someone who apparently volunteered on my presidential campaign. I am sickened by this despicable act," Sanders said. "Let me be as clear as I can be. Violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society and I condemn this action in the strongest possible terms. Real change can only come about through nonviolent action, and anything else runs against our most deeply held American values."

Also among the victims was Zack Barth, a legislative correspondent in the office of Rep. Roger Williams (R-Texas), one of the GOP baseball team's captains. Williams wrote on Twitter that Barth was "receiving medical attention but doing well and is expected to make a full recovery."

Another victim, confirmed by Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas), was Matt Mika, a lobbyist for Tyson Foods and a former House GOP aide for Rep. Tim Walberg (R-Mich.) who was receiving treatment at George Washington University Hospital in Washington. His family issued a statement saying he remains in critical condition.

The hospital, which had previously said two shooting victims were there in critical condition, later amended that statement to announce that one of the patients had died. The hospital did not announce the identities of the patients and would not say if the deceased shooter was one of them.

Two other victims were members of the Capitol Police Department's Dignitary Protection Division, officers charged with protecting Scalise because of his role in House leadership. Capitol Police Chief Matthew Verderosa said that the officers, later identified as Crystal Griner and David Bailey, were in "good condition" and "have not suffered any life-threatening injuries at this point."

Verderosa said the Capitol Police officers on the scene exchanged fire with the gunman. Multiple lawmakers who were at the practice credited Scalise's protective detail with fighting back against the shooter and stopping him from having free reign to attack the otherwise unarmed attendees at the practice.

The FBI later said in a statement that a second lawmaker "sustained minor injuries and was also transported by a medic unit." Williams is believed to be the congressman the FBI referenced.

Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) told reporters that Williams may have sprained his ankle trying to protect people but wasn't shot. "He has had medical attention," Barton confirmed.

He also lamented that "members are not looked at as people anymore."

"We're kind of looked at as I won't say targets, but people think they can come to our town hall meetings and say just the most obnoxious things and we not feel it personally," he said. "I can assure you, every member of Congress is a person. He has family, and while we try not to show it, sometimes we do take it personally."

There was increased security at the Capitol on Wednesday in the wake of the shooting, with police blocking off the area surrounding the main entrances to the House and Senate. Only members of Congress were allowed in while others were sent through the visitors' gallery.

The lawmakers were practicing for the annual congressional baseball game at a field in Alexandria when the shooting began just after 7 a.m. The game itself, a popular bipartisan event held each summer, is scheduled for Thursday evening at Nationals Park and will go on as planned.

Rep. Mo Brooks (R-Ala.) described on CNN how Scalise was wounded in the shooting, explaining in a phone interview that the GOP whip was among the first to be shot and was hit while standing in the area of second base.

"He'd crawled into the outfield but leaving a trail of blood. We started giving him some liquids," said Brooks, who was not hit.

Sen. Rand Paul vividly recounted the scene in his own CNN interview, and gave credit to Scalise's protective detail for saving lives. "Nobody would have survived without the Capitol Hill police," Paul said on CNN. "He was just killing everyone — he would've. It would have been a massacre."

"And having no self-defense, the ... field was basically a killing field. If you were to run out while the killer was still shooting, he could have shot anybody," he continued.

GOP Rep. John Duncan (R-S.C.), who left the practice before the shooting began, told reporters that he had spoken to a man, believed to be the shooter, as he was departing who asked if the people on the field were Republicans or Democrats. He said he had shared his account with the Alexandria Police Department and that he believed the man he spoke to was the shooter "based on the profile that I saw on TV."

Brooks identified a handful of other lawmakers in attendance at Wednesday morning's practice, including Paul, Barton, Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Reps. Ron DeSantis (R-Fla.), Chuck Fleischmann (R-Tenn.), Brad Wenstrup (R-Ohio), Gary Palmer (R-Ala.) and Williams. Brooks said Wenstrup, a medical doctor, immediately attended to victims, including Scalise.

"I felt like I was back in Iraq as a surgeon," Wenstrup, a former combat surgeon in the U.S. Army Reserve, told CBS News.

Brooks told CNN that the gunman fired from behind the field's third base dugout.

"And I look around and behind third base in the third base dugout, I see a rifle," Brooks said. "And I see a little bit of a body and then I hear another bam and I realize there is an active shooter. At the same time I hear Steve Scalise over near second base scream. He was shot."

The Alabama congressman went on to describe that he never saw Scalise lose consciousness, though there was a 10- or 15-foot trail of blood behind him as he crawled from the infield into the outfield.

Brooks then realized that the rifle was a semiautomatic weapon as chaos ensued.

"The gun was a semiautomatic," he said. "It continues to fire at different people. You can imagine all the people in the field scatter. I run around to the first base side of home plate. We have a batting cage with plastic wrapped around it to stop foul balls. I was lying on the ground as gunfire continued."

Worried that the plastic batting cage would do little to protect him and staffers from gunshots, Brooks said he took a gamble to get to cover.

"Heard a break in the gunfire and decided to take a chance. Ran from home plate to the first base dugout for better cover. There were a number of congressmen and congressional staffers who helped us lying on the ground," he said.

Flake, who had just batted when the incident occurred, said the gunman was shot. "There was a lot of yelling going on," he said.

There were approximately 25 members at the field, Flake said. One staffer was shot while on the field, and ran with a wound to the dugout, Flake said.

"He had a lot of ammo," Flake said, explaining why it took several minutes to get the situation under control.

Flake, in an interview with reporters at the scene, estimated that the entire incident lasted around 10 minutes. He said one victim, a female Capitol Police officer, was airlifted away from the scene.

"Just a harrowing scene," said Rep. Chuck Fleischmann (R-Tenn.), who ran into a dugout when the shooting started. "If this gunman had come into [the] dugout, we would have been sitting ducks."

Fleischmann said the incident "seemed to go on forever... It seemed like it took forever to subdue the gunmen."

Fleischmann added: "It was just horrible... The fear factor was horrific."

The shooting took place in a neighborhood baseball field near a dog park that was full of early-morning dog walkers. As the shooting started, neighbors on the adjoining streets heard what they described as "dozens" of shots as people in exercise clothing began to flee past their homes.

Virginia House of Delegates member Mark Levine decried the politics that have killed gun control efforts in the state. Asked if it's the right time to talk politics, he cried out, "Then when is the right time?!"

Trump canceled a planned event at the Department of Labor scheduled for Wednesday, while Pence canceled a morning speech to the National Association of Home Builders. At the group's annual D.C. gathering, Rep. Peter Roskam (R-Ill.) called for a moment of silence.

"I thought I was going to come up here and charm you on tax reform, but we're here on a very different day," Roskam told those assembled. "Will you just pray for these people and their families."

In the wake of the shooting, Democrats canceled a press conference announcing a lawsuit against Trump. The Senate also postponed a hearing examining a budget request for the Capitol Police.

Kyle Cheney, Jake Lahut, Heather Caygle, Clea Benson, Negassi Tesfamichael, Toby Eckert, Caitlin Emma, Anna Palmer, Burgess Everett, Nolan D. McCaskill and Diamond Naga Siu contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

House cancels vote on GOP health bill Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 06/14/2017 09:59 AM EDT

The House has delayed today's scheduled vote on a health care bill that's part of the GOP's Obamacare replacement agenda following a gunman's attack on a congressional baseball practice in Alexandria, Va., this morning.

The House was supposed to vote on H.R. 2372, which would allow veterans to receive American Health Care Act tax credits.

The House Energy and Commerce health subcommittee also canceled this morning's hearing on reauthorization of the Children's Health Insurance Program.

To view online click here.

Back

House Financial Services won't mark up flood insurance bills today Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 06/14/2017 11:12 AM EDT

The House Financial Services Committee will not mark up several flood insurance bills today following the shooting at a congressional baseball practice.

"Further updates on timing will be provided later this afternoon," Financial Services staff director Kirsten Mork said in an email to others on the committee. "Thanks to everyone for your flexibility. Please keep those wounded in your thoughts and prayers."

To view online click here.

Back

House Homeland and Judiciary markups delayed after shooting Back

By Ted Hesson | 06/14/2017 11:32 AM EDT

A pair of legislative markups in House committees were delayed today following a shooting that injured House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.), members of his security detail, and a congressional staffer.

The House Judiciary Committee moved to noon a markup previously scheduled today for 10 a.m. The committee will consider a bill that would clamp down on the refugee resettlement program.

The House Homeland Security Committee also delayed until noon a markup of bill to reauthorize DHS. The department has not been reauthorized since its creation in 2002.

The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee proceeded with a 10 a.m. hearing on "Ideology and Terror: Understanding the Tools, Tactics and Techniques of Violent Extremism."

In opening remarks, Chairman Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) referenced the shooting, which took place as members of Congress practiced in Northern Virginia for an annual baseball game.

"There's no way anybody can deny we have a problem worldwide in terms of extremism and violence," he said. "We witnessed it just a few hours ago on a practice field for a charity baseball event."

To view online click here.

Back

Adviser suggests Trump will sign apprenticeship executive order tomorrow Back

By Ian Kullgren | 06/14/2017 02:04 PM EDT

A top adviser to President Donald Trump indicated that Trump would give his address on apprenticeships tomorrow and sign a related executive order.

"Tomorrow, the president will remind all Americans once again," of the importance of skills trades, said Reed Cornish, a technology adviser to the president. "[He] will direct our resources toward apprenticeships and skills based-learning."

Trump had been scheduled to sign the executive order and give a policy speech today at the Labor Department. The White House called off the event after news of the shooting that wounded House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) and Republican staffers during a baseball practice in Alexandria, Va., this morning. A White House spokesman couldn't confirm Cornish's statement.

Cornish joined the president's eldest daughter Ivanka Trump, Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta and more than a dozen CEOs for a roundtable discussion on apprenticeships in the Indian Treaty Room of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building. Ivanka Trump opened the discussion by expressing sorrow for the shooting and then turned the discussion to jobs. She highlighted the skills gap among women and minorities and said the government needs to do more.

"We must do better than this, and technical education plays a critical role," Ivanka Trump said.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump speech at DOL canceled Back

By Marianne LeVine | 06/14/2017 10:44 AM EDT

The White House canceled President Donald Trump's speech to the Labor Department after a shooting this morning at a congressional baseball practice in Alexandria, Va.

Trump was expected to discuss executive actions to encourage private-sector apprenticeship programs. The speech was scheduled for 3 p.m.

A White House spokesperson told reporters: "We will provide you updates on the schedule for today as we have them."

A separate White House event, a CEO roundtable discussion about apprenticeships with Ivanka Trump, is still scheduled to take place today.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump expected to change certification for apprenticeships Back

By Ian Kullgren | 06/13/2017 06:35 PM EDT

President Donald Trump is expected to sign an executive order Wednesday that would virtually eliminate oversight of government-subsidized apprenticeship programs, according to a source familiar with a draft of the plan.

The draft executive order would shift certification of federally funded apprenticeship programs from the Labor Department to grant recipients, a move that effectively would eliminate government oversight. Right now, companies that receive government funds must report certain information to the Labor Department; under Trump's plan, the companies would essentially monitor themselves, the source said.

Trump is expected to sign the order in conjunction with a policy speech at the Labor Department Wednesday afternoon.

The president's plan would also propose more than doubling the amount allotted for for apprenticeship grants, adding $100 million to Trump's existing 2018 budget request of $90 million. The budget request represented only a one percent increase. The source — who was briefed by a colleague that reviewed a draft of the order last Friday — said the order didn't say how that funding increase would occur; it would almost certainly require approval from Congress.

Trump has sought to make workforce development the focus for his administration this week. He traveled to Wisconsin today with his eldest daughter, Ivanka Trump, to host a roundtable on apprenticeships at Waukesha Technical College. On Wednesday he will meet with more than a dozen CEOs on the subject.

To view online click here.

Back

White House names CEOs expected to attend workforce roundtable Back

By Steven Overly | 06/14/2017 08:46 AM EDT

Executives from Siemens USA, CA Technologies, Northrop Grumman and DXC Technology are among those expected to attend a roundtable discussion on apprenticeships and other workforce issues at the White House today, according to administration officials.

Ivanka Trump and Reed Cordish will lead that conversation as part of the White House's weeklong emphasis on creating apprenticeships to better match workers' skills to vacant jobs. President Donald Trump is then expected to speak and sign an executive order at the Department of Labor.

Amazon previously confirmed that Dave Clark, the company's senior vice president of worldwide operations, will attend the events.

The full list of attendees includes:

Trump Administration:

Secretary Wilbur Ross, Department of Commerce;
Secretary Elaine Chao, Department of Transportation;
Secretary Alexander Acosta, Department of Labor;
Administrator Linda McMahon, Small Business Administration;
Ivanka Trump, Adviser to the President;
Gary Cohn, Director of the National Economic Council;
Reed Cordish, Assistant to the President;
Christopher Liddell, Director of Strategic Initiatives;
Dina Powell, Assistant to the President

Executives:

Julie Sweet, North American CEO, Accenture;
Lee Styslinger, Chairman and CEO, Altec;
David Clark, SVP of Worldwide Operations, Amazon;
Mike Gregoire, CEO, CA Technologies;
David Cordani, President and CEO, Cigna;
Ashok Vemuri, CEO, Conduent;
Larry Merlo, President and CEO, CVS Health;
Andrew Liveris, Chairman and CEO, Dow;
Mike Lawrie, Chairman, President and CEO, DXC Technology;
William Brown, Chairman, President and CEO, Harris;

Mike Petters, President and CEO, Huntington Ingalls Industries;
Marillyn Hewson, Chairman, President and CEO, Lockheed Martin;
Wes Bush, Chairman, President and CEO, Northrop Grumman Corp;
Kathryn Wylde, President and CEO, Partnership NYC;
Dan Houston, Chairman, President and CEO, Principal Financial Group;
Blake Moret, President and CEO, Rockwell Automation;
Judith Marks, CEO, Siemens USA;
John Barrett, Chairman, President and CEO, Western & Southern Financial Group

To view online click here.

Back

Trump tries to master the art of the tiny Back

By Nancy Cook and Andrew Restuccia | 06/14/2017 05:18 AM EDT

Bill Clinton salvaged his presidency by focusing on small-ball policy wins. Now Team Trump is trying to master the art of thinking tiny.

Faced with a rising drumbeat of scandal stemming from ongoing Russia probes, President Donald Trump is continuing to pursue a big, complicated legislative agenda — repealing Obamacare, reforming the tax system and passing an infrastructure package.

Any of those would be hard to achieve in perfect circumstances, but with the GOP ideologically fragmented and the White House distracted by legal trouble, it's increasingly difficult to imagine Trump landing a big win. Veterans of past White Houses say if the president wants to keep Republican voters on his side, it's time to turn his attention to putting forward discrete, achievable policy proposals that he can actually get done.

"It is the only strategy," said Ari Fleischer, former White House press secretary under President George W. Bush. "Trump will never be able to land a knockdown punch with policy until he has a Rose Garden signing ceremony, but he can at least keep delivering jabs."

The White House seems to be getting the message. For months, executive branch actions to unwind or rewrite regulations got little notice. But in recent weeks, wonkier policies are getting more fanfare, with briefings for reporters and appearances by Cabinet officials in the press room.

On Wednesday, Trump is expected to announce the reorganization of government job training programs at the Labor Department as part of the White House's "workforce development week" — the latest in the administration's recent efforts to highlight tangible, limited goals like privatizing air traffic control or slashing regulations.

An administration official said the White House is planning more policy-themed weeks in the coming months, including one on energy tentatively scheduled for late June. The official said the weeks are aimed at unifying the White House's message.

White House spokeswoman Natalie Strom cited Trump's appointment of Justice Neil Gorsuch and his moves to roll back Obama-era regulations as successes: "The media has been ignoring the significant policy victories the president has been achieving for our country since the day he got into office, from pulling back onerous Obama-era regulations to putting Justice Gorsuch on the Supreme Court to stepping up for American jobs in trade negotiations, but the American people haven't."

Yet, despite the White House's best efforts, Trump has often undercut his team's efforts at message discipline, distracting from infrastructure initiatives last week and his jobs proposals this week with angry tweets about fake news, leaks and the investigations against him.

In a briefing with reporters last week, Marc Short, White House director of legislative affairs, said the president is an effective messenger for the administration's policy proposals.

"He may not have a conventional style in doing that, but many of his efforts are extremely helpful to us in getting our legislative agenda accomplished," Short said — though he acknowledged that there's "no doubt" that the Russia investigations distract lawmakers from Trump's policy agenda.

Both Clinton and President Barack Obama salvaged the latter halves of their presidencies with these kinds of policy rollouts. As a former governor, Clinton often felt most comfortable in campaign mode, so the Clinton White House filled his schedule with events and deployed his entire Cabinet to amplify policy announcements on everything from increasing home ownership to expanding the number of police officers on the beat.

"Presidential terms are like a nine-inning baseball game — you go from pitch to pitch, batter to batter, inning to inning," said former Clinton White House staffer Chris Lehane, who helped manage the fallout from the administration's scandals, which included impeachment proceedings. "It is a grind and requires discipline and teamwork from everyone on the squad."

After the Democrats were dealt a brutal defeat in the 2010 midterm election, Obama changed his focus from big legislative achievements like the stimulus bill, Obamacare and banking regulations. In the years that followed, he reoriented his White House toward a greater use of executive power and issued a series of orders, actions and regulations on everything from climate change to nutrition, immigration, policing and education.

"In any administration, you want to show activity, but showing activity and results is not the same thing," said Cecilia Muñoz, director of the White House Domestic Policy Council under Obama. "We worked hard to find things where we could have impact and measure the impact."

Other White House alumni agreed.

"It's very important to maintain a very steady drumbeat of very positive news," said former Clinton adviser Dick Morris, now a Republican who has praised Trump. Morris said that making consistent progress on smaller issues is "maybe more important" than big-ticket items like the repeal of Obamacare. "If you do those right, they'll overcome the negatives that are coming out in the attack," he said.

But, while conservatives are ready for any wins, some worry that any sustained focus on small-ball policy issues will distract the administration from its bigger promises.

Trump "needs someone on his team with discipline to say you may be bored about talking about health care, but our allies and voters aren't," said Club for Growth President David McIntosh.

"They're skipping around from one subject to the next," he added, calling for a "focused executive-type approach that says these are our top three goals and we're going to keep focusing on them until we hit this out of the park."

McIntosh and other conservatives said one possible model for Trump is Ronald Reagan's aggressive push for tax cuts in the 1980s. The then-president gave a televised speech in 1985 that officially launched the most recent overhaul of the tax code. President George W. Bush similarly led the way in the push to slash tax rates in 2001.

Conservatives hope that Trump can do the same for policy initiatives — big or small — given his remarkable ability to drive the news cycle.

"While health care and tax reform are mired in figuring out a path forward, they should pursue things unilaterally," said Rohit Kumar, former domestic policy director and deputy chief of staff to Sen. Mitch McConnell. "But if I were running a Republican political campaign in 2018, I don't think I would be comfortable trying to build a case just on the small-ball stuff. You need to also have health care and tax."

Another question: Whether the president can stick to his administration's strategy of touting small ball policy ideas amid so many other distractions. The White House organized a series of events last week to draw attention to the administration's $1 trillion infrastructure plan, but Trump started the week with an angry tirade against his own Justice Department for rewriting his travel ban and criticisms of London Mayor Sadiq Khan, who was dealing with a terrorist attack.

"Much of the conversation is not focused on the policymaking but on Russia and the president's tweets and that rarely enhances the policy direction of any administration," Muñoz said. "Any administration faces headwinds. What is interesting is how many headwinds they have created for themselves."

Darren Samuelsohn contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Manufacturers to Trump: Don't hurt NAFTA ties that support 2 million U.S. jobs Back

By Doug Palmer | 06/13/2017 05:27 PM EDT

U.S. manufacturers that President Donald Trump says will benefit from his NAFTA renegotiation are urging his administration not to destroy business ties among the three countries that support 2 million American manufacturing jobs.

"Manufacturers have been working on this really since the election, given the prominence this issue took," Linda Dempsey, vice president of international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers, told POLITICO. "We rolled up our sleeves with our members.

We took a serious look at the agreement."

That deep dive resulted in a 35-page set of comments filed late Monday with the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, which is preparing for the start of negotiations with Canada and Mexico as early as August.

In contrast to Trump's characterization of NAFTA as a disaster for American manufacturing, NAM argued that the 23-year pact has helped make the sector bigger and stronger than ever.

"More than two decades since the NAFTA was implemented, U.S. value-added manufacturing hit a record-high of $2.18 trillion in 2016, nearly double its level of $1.13 trillion in 1993," NAM said in its comments. "That growth has been fueled in significant part by the more than tripling of U.S. manufactured goods exports to $1.27 trillion in 2016 compared to $411 billion in 1993."

Trade with Canada and Mexico, which currently represents about one-third of U.S. manufacturing exports, played a major role in that expansion. "These two nations purchase more U.S. manufactured goods than the next 10 foreign countries combined," NAM said.

Besides praising the current agreement, the manufacturing group also offered ideas for strengthening NAFTA: further reducing trade barriers, making it easier for goods to cross borders and crafting rules to cover new areas like the digital economy.

In tune with the Trump administration's heavy emphasis on enforcement of U.S. laws against unfair trade practices, the group also recommended the three countries work together against foreign companies that flout the rules.

"We have this very integrated North American economy that has grown in significant part because of the underlying agreement, but yet we have trade cheating coming in from third countries," Dempsey said. "What do we need to do to address that?"

One option would be for Canada and Mexico to pass legislation similar to what Congress approved last year to strengthen the U.S. government's ability to go after companies that evade anti-dumping and countervailing duties it imposes, she said.

In recent weeks, both Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross and U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer have adopted the business community's mantra that the NAFTA renegotiations must "first do no harm" to the existing trade pact.

But Trump's intense focus on reducing bilateral trade deficits has created a great deal of nervousness in both Mexico City and Ottawa about the direction the talks could take.

Hoping to reduce the role the trade deficit could play in driving the NAFTA negotiations, NAM argued in its brief that the U.S. manufacturing trade with Canada and Mexico "has been generally balanced in recent years."

In the worst-case scenario, from a free-trade perspective, the United States could pressure Mexico and Canada in the NAFTA talks into a series of "managed trade" arrangements to address the deficits, said Fred Bergsten, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Examples include voluntary restraint agreements, where NAFTA partners would agree to limit certain exports to the United States, and voluntary import enhancement pacts, where they would agree to buy more of certain U.S. products, he said.

Such proposals would likely get a stony reception from Mexico, said Antonio Ortiz-Mena, a former Mexican trade negotiator now at the Albright Stonebridge Group, a policy analysis firm.

"It's a terrible idea, so I don't think that should be contemplated," Ortiz-Mena said, calling instead for a "deep renegotiation" of NAFTA that would cover much more trade in services than the original pact, as well as reducing non-tariff barriers.

Such barriers on the U.S. side would include restrictions on Mexico and Canada's ability to participate in federal and state government procurement projects, Ortiz-Mena said, identifying an area where U.S. union groups strongly oppose any openings.

At the same time, Mexico should insist that the rules of origin for automotive trade among the three NAFTA countries not become "overly restrictive," despite the desire of U.S. union groups to tighten them up in a misguided attempt to return jobs to the United States, he said.

To view online click here.

Back

McAuliffe urged Trump to hike cybersecurity funding for states Back

By Tim Starks | 06/14/2017 01:04 PM EDT

Gov. Terry McAuliffe told President Donald Trump at a National Governors Association reception that the federal government needs to ship more money for cybersecurity to states, Virginia's chief executive said today.

McAuliffe relayed the Trump conversation at an NGA event during an interview with POLITICO. He also said Congress needs to help with funding.

"I met recently with the president, spent time talking to him about infrastructure," said McAuliffe, who chairs NGA. "I specifically talked about cyber with the president."

"The federal government needs to invest in the infrastructure of cybersecurity at the state level," he added. "The funding is the key to all of this."

The spending could go toward "some actual hard costs that go into what you need to do with your framework, but it's also a lot of education, a lot of training," he said.

McAuliffe said there should be a single cybersecurity-focused committee in the House and Senate, and that Congress should pass a regular budget as opposed to a continuing resolution.

"They can't even pass a budget and they print money," he said.

McAuliffe has focused his tenure as NGA chair on hardening state-level networks, which have historically lagged on cybersecurity due to lack of funding and expertise.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: House puts disaster aid on next week's docket — Senate budget coasts through committee — Treasury watchdog demands more details on Mnuchin's future trips
Date: Friday, October 06, 2017 2:31:53 PM

By Sarah Ferris | 10/06/2017 02:29 PM EDT

The Budget and Appropriations Brief will not publish on Monday, Oct. 9. We'll be back Tuesday, Oct. 10. In the meantime, get your fiscal fix here.

RALLYING FOR PUERTO RICO: For the half-dozen states and territories pounded by hurricanes last month, more relief is on the way this month.

Next week, the House is poised to take up its second disaster aid package in roughly five weeks. We're told the package will closely track the White House's aid request this week, which sought $12.8 billion to replenish FEMA's disaster fund and another $16 billion to wipe out debt in the National Flood Insurance Program. The Senate would take up the aid bill immediately after returning from its recess on Oct. 16.

What Texas wants: If congressional leaders do choose to match the White House's request, they'll be putting aside a plea from one of the largest congressional delegations. Texas' 38-member delegation — as well as its governor, Greg Abbott — sent a letter Thursday begging appropriators to broaden the scope of its aid package. On their wish list for Hurricane Harvey victims: $10 billion for the Army Corps of Engineers, $7 billion for Community Development Block Grants and $450 million for the Small Business Administration.

Not this round: But we're told that any non-FEMA, non-flood insurance funding will probably have to wait. Mario Diaz-Balart, a GOP appropriator from Florida, tells us more cash will certainly be needed for the community block grants program — just not yet. "That takes a little bit longer, but that's coming as well." Another appropriator, Hal Rogers, said they're focused squarely on FEMA right now. As for the other programs? "We'll see. We're just now getting into disaster recovery."

Fears of a 'short attention span': Democrats on the House appropriations panel are making a similar push to plus up these programs ASAP. "The danger, obviously, is the longer you go without having done it, the less urgency there is. The less the suffering is on people's mind. We tend to have a short attention span around here," one Democratic aide told us today.

GOOD FRIDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — The CBO released its annual self-assessment on the accuracy of its economic forecasting, defending its record as "comparable in quality" to the administration and private sector estimates.

#DailyBudgetFact — President Donald Trump's fiscal 2018 budget predicts that annual revenue will grow 34 percent, or a total of $1.1 trillion, over six years by assuming aggressive economic growth. The White House budget projects that yearly employee compensation will be 35 percent higher in 2022 compared to 2016.

BUDGET

BIG LEAP FORWARD, BUT LITTLE FANFARE: After months of anticipation, it was a mostly anticlimactic moment for Senate budget-writers. Just before 5 p.m. on a flyaway day, the Budget Committee advanced its fiscal 2018 resolution along party lines, as Jen reports. Few lawmakers actually stuck around to hear Chairman Mike Enzi's closing remarks, after the Wyoming Republican sensed the anxious recess-mode lawmakers and told them, "Everybody can leave."

Bad timing: In an unfortunate twist for Enzi, the big budget vote took place at almost the exact time that Rep. Tim Murphy resigned. (More on that juicy story here.)

Ch-ch-changes: Over the day-long markup, the panel agreed to eight out of several dozen amendments, but none that would fundamentally reshape its reconciliation plan. The biggest tweak came from Cory Gardner, with an amendment to repeal Obamacare's contentious Independent Payment Advisory Board, as Jen reports. Two notable Democratic amendments: One from Tim Kaine to block cuts to Medicare and Medicaid, and another from Patty Murray to boost hurricane disaster aid.

Next steps: The Senate is expected to take up the budget sometime the week of Oct. 16. Passage would kick off a conference committee with the House, likely sometime in November. And by the time that process is done, GOP tax-writers hope to have the text of their bill ready to go.

TAX

POLITICAL DOWNSIDE OF A TAX CUT: Extra-conscious of optics recently, Republicans have been seeking out a magic formula that would cut taxes for the middle class without delivering a boon to the wealthy. As Brian Faler reports today, it turns out that's a lot harder than it seems. Because the top 1 percent now pays about 45 percent of all federal income taxes, it's virtually impossible to lower rates without helping out those high earners. Democrats, meanwhile, are ready to pounce.

NOT GIVING IN: Desperate for pay-fors, the White House is refusing to concede in the inter-party fight over long-standing state-and-local tax deduction. Republicans from high-taxed states like New Jersey and Connecticut have been throwing tantrums to keep it. (Several even voted against the budget resolution in protest, House Budget Chairman Diane Black told us Thursday.) But administration officials are maintaining it's needed, as Toby Eckert reports today. Recall that eliminating the state-and-local deduction could save $1.3 trillion over 10 years, according to the Brookings Institution.

ECONOMY

AFTER THE STORM: The U.S. economy lost jobs last month for the first time since 2010, and the trio of late-summer hurricanes are likely to blame, Marianne LeVine reports. A total of 33,000 jobs were lost in September, and that doesn't include Puerto Rico. Still, White House chief economic adviser Gary Cohn points to wage growth and the still-dropping unemployment number as the "real bright news."

ADMINISTRATION

LEGAL, BUT LACKING DETAIL: Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin is off the hook for his use of government-funded planes, a federal watchdog determined on Thursday. But he's going to have to step it up when it comes to providing a "standard of proof" for $811,797.81 worth of taxpayer funded travel, as Victoria Guida reports.

Not another 'boilerplate statement': The inspector general's office calls out Mnuchin for supplying "a single boilerplate statement" to justify his trips, "despite the fact that the memo clearly calls for a more rigorous and complete provision of facts and arguments."

CASE CLOSED?: Ex-HHS Secretary Tom Price has officially paid up for some of the private travel that prompted his resignation. "As he said he would, Dr. Price, prior to stepping down, wrote a personal check to the U.S. Treasury for the expenses of his travel on private charter planes," an HHS official told Rachana Pradhan. Health officials said Price would reimburse the government roughly $52,000 after he opted for private jets instead of flying commercial.

EARMARKS

— FEMA removes statistics about drinking water access and electricity in Puerto Rico from website. Washington Post.

— The next three major hurdles for the GOP's tax plan. Washington Post.

— Warning signs emerge in GOP's tax reform push. The Hill.

— Help wanted: Staff shortages under Trump slow policy changes. Reuters.

WE'RE COUNTING: 63 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017).

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/house-puts-disaster-aid-on-next-weeks-docket-024959>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Senate committee pushes through budget for floor action Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 10/05/2017 04:18 PM EDT

The Senate Budget Committee swiftly approved a fiscal 2018 budget plan this afternoon that would give legislators the leeway to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit over a decade so as to overhaul the tax code.

The budget resolution, advanced 12-11, is expected to be considered on the Senate floor the week of Oct. 16.

If the chamber passes the measure, a conference committee will work to hammer out differences between the Senate's plan and the version (H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\)) the House passed earlier in the day and craft a joint budget resolution.

The Senate's budget resolution calls for a $695 billion defense budget after 10 years, as well as drastic spending reductions to many domestic departments.

During the markup, the panel rejected an amendment in a party-line vote that would strike instructions in the budget that allow Congress to find $473 billion in savings from Medicare over a decade.

Democrats have made those provisions their No. 1 complaint with the budget document, producing their own analysis on the potential changes to Medicare and calling on President Donald Trump to threaten a veto over that language.

Republicans argue that their budget would not cut Medicare but would simply allow Congress to slow the program's rate of growth.

"We've now seen this amendment filed in many different forms. But every single version was formed with politics in mind," Senate Budget Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) said. "My Democrat colleagues want to find a clever way of making the false accusation that somehow through this budget Senate Republicans are cutting Medicare."

To view online click here.

Back

Inside Tim Murphy's reign of terror Back

By Rachael Bade, Jake Sherman and John Bresnahan | 10/05/2017 11:02 PM EDT

Rep. Tim Murphy, a staunch anti-abortion advocate, thought he could withstand the media furor that engulfed him after reports that he'd encouraged his extramarital lover to end her apparent pregnancy.

He was wrong.

Just one day after announcing he would retire after the 2018 election, Murphy reversed course and told Speaker Paul Ryan he was resigning effective Oct. 21. Murphy's abrupt decision ended a 15-year career on Capitol Hill in a shocking manner. The 65-year-old Pennsylvania Republican was so safe in his conservative district that Democrats hadn't even fielded an opponent against him during the past two election cycles.

Ironically, Murphy's swift collapse came not because of text messages he sent to a woman with whom he was having an extramarital affair, encouraging her to have an abortion as first reported by the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette on Tuesday. In fact, fears among senior Republicans about a potential wave of negative stories on how Murphy ran his congressional office were what ultimately pushed him out the door.

Multiple top House Republicans during the past 24 hours pressured Murphy to resign once it became clear that the House Ethics Committee might have to investigate allegations tied to his reported mistreatment of staffers. Numerous GOP sources were aware of systemic problems in Murphy's office, including high staff turnover, which had been the topic of gossip and speculation for years.

The Post-Gazette had reported on a June 2017 memo in which Murphy's longtime chief of staff, Susan Mosychuk, warned the Pennsylvania Republican that he was mistreating and "harassing" staff, causing 100 percent turnover.

But Mosychuk is a source of controversy herself.

A number of former Murphy staffers told POLITICO that it was Mosychuk's behavior that drove them to leave Murphy's office. And these ex-aides said the combination of Murphy and Mosychuk — who had a close personal relationship, according to GOP lawmakers and staffers — made the situation intolerable. Mosychuk was promoted to Murphy's chief of staff in 2004, just a year after becoming his legislative director.

According to these aides, Mosychuk regularly engaged in brutal verbal abuse of lower-ranking aides, from calling aides "worthless" and their work "garbage" to asking derisively, "Do you or do you not have a fucking college degree?"

Ex-staffers said Mosychuk kept white noise machines throughout Murphy's congressional office so constituents waiting in the front room couldn't hear her screaming. If Mosychuk was angry at staffers, she would make them take the stairs instead of the elevator, so they couldn't ride with her, according to one former employee who witnessed it.

Mosychuk would even call staffers out of their bathroom breaks to demand they return to the office, or yell at them for taking too long to use the restroom. Many younger aides did not take lunch breaks, eating at their desks because they were scolded for leaving. One new employee quit after just a couple days because he was dressed down for using a paper clip instead of a staple on a briefing packet, multiple sources said.

"It was one of the worst places I have ever worked in my life. There was screaming. Intimidation. Nothing you ever did was right," Nick Rodondo, Murphy's former district director, told Pittsburgh radio station KDKA's "Marty Griffin Show."

Rodondo said the two of them were fond of each other — he said he saw them feed each other at events — but terrible to many others.

"Susan Mosychuk was no better than [Murphy]. She wrote that memo to cover her butt," he continued. "I know, Marty. I know what these people are like. To call them creeps is an affront to creeps."

Prior to his resignation, POLITICO had begun seeking information from Murphy office's about whether Mosychuk earned more in outside income than was allowed under House rules. For several years, she received payments from Murphy's congressional office as well as his campaign.

During 2008, Mosychuk was paid $231,500 — $156,500 for her official duties and $75,000 from the campaign, according to House disbursement records and her annual financial disclosure form. But permissible outside income for top aides that year was capped at $25,830, according to the House Ethics Committee.

In 2010, Mosychuk earned nearly $158,600 for her congressional duties and reported more than $47,000 in income from the campaign, according to her disclosure report. House rules capped such outside income at $26,550 that year.

Mosychuk, through a Murphy spokeswoman, said she took "leave without pay" from her official duties to do campaign work and was therefore allowed to earn more than the ethics threshold permits.

"Ms. Mosychuk's salary and compensation is documented, reported and in full compliance with all the rules prescribed by the House Committee on Ethics," Carly Atchison, Murphy's communications director, said in a statement. "As a matter of public record, this includes both her congressional salary and compensation earned from the campaign while on [leave without pay] status in 2008 and 2010, fully documented and compliant with House rules."

However, House disbursements records show Mosychuk was paid every quarter of that year and does not appear to have taken more than a few weeks off. The only time her pay dipped in 2008 was in the third quarter, when she earned about $7,000 less than her usual salary, a loss of roughly two weeks' pay. Mosychuk was paid $75,000 from Murphy's reelection campaign that year, far more than she could have normally earned during such a short period for political work.

In the third quarter of 2010, Mosychuk similarly made about $8,000 less than her usual quarterly earnings, though she earned $47,000 from the Murphy re-election committee. Again, this suggests Mosychuk was being paid an inordinate amount for political work covering a relatively brief time-frame.

Mosychuk did not respond to questions about her political work.

Ethics experts said that such a high campaign salary for what would have been a relatively short time on leave might violate the spirit, if not the letter, of House rules.

"There is a rule about outside income, and it is a serious matter to violate that rule," said Larry Noble, senior director and general counsel at Campaign Legal Center, a campaign watchdog group.

Murphy's office did not respond to the allegations of Mosychuk's alleged verbal abuse of former workers. Some said they've gone to therapy or that it took years to rebuild their self-confidence.

"I tried to forget all of it because it was so horrible," said one former Murphy employee. "Screaming was an everyday thing. The manipulation and the mind games. ... Everybody in that office was depressed."

Another former staffer called it a "culture of intimidation" while a third said, "It took me a long time to have any confidence in myself."

Murphy's career started to unravel in early September, when he was forced to admit to an affair with Shannon Edwards, a Pittsburgh-area psychologist half his age. Edwards' husband had sought to depose the congressman as part of their divorce proceedings. Murphy fought the deposition, which would expose the affair to his constituents, but lost in court.

On Tuesday, the scandal erupted when the Post-Gazette reported that Murphy had suggested Edwards get an abortion during a pregnancy scare, citing leaked text messages between the two.

"And you have zero issue posting your pro-life stance all over the place when you had no issue asking me to abort our unborn child just last week when we thought that was one of the options," Edwards texted to Murphy in late January, according to the Post-Gazette.

Edwards was responding to a Facebook post by Murphy, touting his anti-abortion position in Congress. Murphy is a member of the House Pro-Life Caucus and voted this week for legislation to ban abortions after 20 weeks.

The story also highlighted a toxic work environment in Murphy's office, pointing to Mosychuk's memo, which she titled: "Office Conduct and Behavior: Harassment/Legal Compliance." Mosychuk accused Murphy of causing 100 percent turnover in the office because of a "pattern of sustained inappropriate behavior."

Mosychuk warned Murphy that his actions could be seen as "harassment" of staffers. She highlighted two June incidents in which Murphy was "storming around as we walked in, and as we sat down for prep — having just arrived literally moments ago — you started in on the [legislative director] and verbally abused him, harassed him, chastised him and criticized all his work products."

"You called many of the work products that he literally gave up his weekend to produce as 'useless,'" Mosychuk wrote in the memo. "You pushed other documents off the table onto the floor because they weren't what you wanted. Then you got angry and demanded we find the documents that you had just thrown on the ground."

Several ex-employees who spoke with POLITICO, however, said that while Murphy was a tough boss, Mosychuk was the real reason they quit their jobs. They were flabbergasted that Mosychuk dressed down Murphy for conduct she regularly engaged in herself.

"The description in the memo is not what he does; it's what she would do," said one ex-staffer. "She was the one who would verbally abuse staff. He was bad, but you can deal with a tough member. She was literally terrorizing people."

Murphy's and Mosychuk's treatment of staff has long been known on Capitol Hill. Senior Republican lawmakers and aides said they often sympathized with people who worked there after hearing horror stories.

One former staffer said another aide in the different Capitol office once insisted on doing something nice for her because "I know you work in Murphy's office and could use something good." That same staffer would later go on to encourage people coming into the Murphy office for interviews, or applying to work for the congressman, to turn around and run.

"I would say, 'You don't want to be here unless you're going to be homeless tomorrow,'" she said.

Asked why they never reported these actions to the Office of Compliance, which oversees employment matters in Congress, two former staffers said they looked into the matter but were afraid it'd get back to Mosychuk and that she and Murphy would ruin their careers.

"It's not like a private company where you have an HR department," said one former Murphy employee. "It was a culture of abuse and a culture of corruption. There really is no oversight."

To view online click here.

Back

Senators vote to allow repeal of Medicare oversight board Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 10/05/2017 05:15 PM EDT

Senators added language to their budget document this afternoon allowing the repeal of the controversial board created in the health care law to control rising costs of Medicare.

The Senate Budget Committee approved an amendment by voice vote that would allow the panel's chairman to nix the still-dormant Independent Payment Advisory Board.

Cory Gardner (R-Colo.) offered the IPAB-killing proposal as an alternative to a failed amendment Democrats put forward. That amendment would have done away with GOP language allowing Congress to reduce Medicare spending by nearly $500 billion over 10 years.

"The IPAB board would give superpowers to a committee to cut Medicare outside of Congress, to make budgetary decisions in Medicare without the approval of Congress and then have great power over Congress," Gardner said. "So if we want to protect Medicare, let's adopt this amendment, protect Medicare, repeal the IPAB board and actually do something for our seniors — instead of trying to fool the American people into believing that an increase is actually a cut."

The future of the IPAB language or how it would play out is unclear. The budget was approved by the committee but still must be passed by the Senate, and then differences with the House-passed budget would be ironed out by a House-Senate conference committee.

In the House, the Ways and Means Committee approved a bill, H.R. 849 \(115\), with bipartisan backing earlier in the week that would repeal IPAB.

Kaitlyn Burton contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

No tax cut for the wealthy? Easier said than done Back

By Brian Faler | 10/06/2017 05:00 AM EDT

Republicans want to make the middle class the big winners in their tax plans, but here's the thing: Average Americans already pay a small share of income taxes.

Those levies are primarily borne by people much further up the income ladder, with the top 0.1 percent of earners projected to pay more to the IRS than the bottom 80 percent combined. This year, official government data show, the top 20 percent will pay 95 percent of all income taxes.

That's why some say it's becoming increasingly difficult to cut taxes, especially tax rates, without favoring the rich.

"It's basically impossible to have a large tax cut that doesn't involve most of the benefits going to high-income groups just because that's who pays taxes now," said Adam Looney, who was deputy assistant Treasury secretary for tax analysis in the Obama administration.

That's a big political problem for Republicans who want their plans to rewrite the tax code focused on helping the politically all-important middle class. They know voters take a dim view of cutting taxes on the rich, and want to fend off inevitable attacks from Democrats that the GOP's tax plans amount to a giveaway to millionaires and billionaires.

Republicans have already rewritten their plans to avoid giving so much to the wealthy. They've dropped plans to cut taxes on capital gains, and they're considering a to-be-determined higher tax bracket on the rich.

Earlier this year, in a sign of Republicans' nervousness over the issue, lawmakers dropped plans to kill an investment surtax on the wealthy as part of their Obamacare repeal plans, amid complaints it would disproportionately help the top 1 percent.

They've also repeatedly slammed a report last week by the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center showing their proposal would mostly help high earners.

"Do you know who we think about when we think about tax reform and tax relief?" House Speaker Paul Ryan asked Thursday during an event in Maryland to promote tax reform.

"We think about the moms and dads who go to bed worrying about the next day, whether or not they can make ends meet — we're thinking about the people in this country who are living paycheck to paycheck," he said. "The purpose of tax relief is: Give middle-income taxpayers a tax cut."

But the challenge for Republicans goes beyond the particulars of the "Big Six" tax framework released last week or the TPC analysis.

They are confronting a tax system where the tax burden is increasingly bunched up at the top of the income spectrum, thanks to huge earnings gains by the rich and the fact that the U.S. has one of the most progressive income tax systems in the world.

The top 1 percent — about 1 million families earning at least $379,000 — will pay 45 percent of all individual income taxes collected this year, and almost one-third of taxes overall, including corporate, payroll, estate and excise taxes.

More modest income gains among average Americans, as well as repeated efforts by Congress to cut taxes on low- and middle-income people, mean those groups are shouldering a declining share of the tax burden.

The average federal tax rate on people in the middle three income quintiles — those whose earnings put them in the 21st to 80th percentile of incomes — has fallen by 30 percent since 1979 to 13.8 percent, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. Rates on low-income people have declined even further, by 57 percent, to 3.3 percent.

"The fact that they don't pay very much in taxes means that it's very hard to provide them with a large tax cut," said Looney, now a fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Not just that: It's hard to cut tax rates on moderate-income people without simultaneously benefiting the rich. That's because everyone pays the same marginal tax rates on, say, their first $50,000 in income, regardless of how much they make in total. So cutting, for example, the 15 percent tax bracket helps the poor and rich alike.

The challenge for Republicans is compounded by the fact that they aren't simply trying to cut taxes on middle-income people. They also want to promote economic growth by reducing rates on businesses.

They plan to slash the corporate rate to 20 percent, from the current 35 percent — which President Donald Trump has called non-negotiable — while cutting taxes on unincorporated businesses to 25 percent.

But that exacerbates their income distribution problems, because those taxes are disproportionately paid by high earners who would be the primary winners if they're cut.

Almost half of the corporate tax will be paid this year by the top 1 percent, according to Treasury. Economists believe the corporate tax is mostly passed onto companies' shareholders. And nearly 60 percent of so-called Schedule E income — which includes earnings by S corporations, partnerships and limited liability companies — will accrue this year to people making more than $1 million, according to projections by Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation.

If lawmakers really wanted to cut moderate-income people's taxes, some say they should reduce payroll taxes, the biggest levies people earning less than $200,000 now pay.

But that comes with its own political baggage.

For one thing, the main payroll tax funds Social Security, and cutting that 12.4 percent charge would hurt the old-age program's finances — and no politician wants to be accused of undermining it.

That payroll tax was also designed to create the sense among payers that they paid directly into the program and are therefore owed checks when they retire, and many lawmakers are wary of eroding that link.

Thirdly, it would face procedural problems in Congress. Republicans want to use so-called budget reconciliation to move their tax plan through the Senate, over Democratic objections, and changes to payroll taxes are not allowed in such measures.

That's why some Republicans are turning to what's been a Democratic strategy for helping people who owe little in taxes: expanding "refundable" tax credits. Those allow people to receive a check from the government when the credits exceed their tax bills.

Republicans are particularly focused on expanding the $1,000 child tax credit, promising to increase the maximum size and loosen the program's eligibility rules. They haven't decided specifics, though Sens. Marco Rubio and Mike Lee are demanding lawmakers at least double the credit.

"The tax reform framework released by the Trump administration and Senate and House leadership last week sets up tax reform so that the amount of tax relief working families receive will be largely dependent upon how much the child tax credit is increased," Rubio said in an analysis released Thursday.

He wants to allow people to begin claiming it against their payroll taxes.

"Making the child tax credit refundable against payroll tax liability is essential to meaningfully cutting taxes for America's working class families, as the majority of American workers pay more in payroll taxes than they do income taxes," it said.

Expanding refundable credits is controversial among Republicans, though, because it can take people off the income tax rolls altogether and, in the federal budget, many of the credits count as increasing spending, not cutting taxes. And it's expensive.

Some supply-siders complain it does little for economic growth.

Republicans are also borrowing an idea from former House Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp: imposing a surtax on the rich.

They haven't said how it would work, or even if it will definitely be included, but Camp — who was also trying to avoid disproportionately helping the wealthy as part of his own tax reform plan — created a particularly onerous tax on the rich that dunned everything from their retirement contributions to their health care benefits.

Even if lawmakers can find a way to give people at different income levels the same percentage tax cut, it may not sound equal to voters when those percentages are converted into dollars — giving a millionaire a 5 percent tax cut can seem a lot bigger break than a similar-sized cut for some making $50,000.

But Ryan Ellis, a conservative tax consultant, says most people don't care how much the rich receive in tax cuts so long as they get what they consider to be meaningful reductions as well.

"Ask a family making $87,000 with two kids if they could use an extra $1,200," he said.

"The Jones family doesn't give a s--- if distribution tables that JCT or Treasury or TPC put out are skewed at some end because of the pass-through rate — they don't know or care about any of that," said Ellis. "To them, it's a new refrigerator, it's a vacation they couldn't take.

"That's the way they look at it, that's the way Republicans look at it, and that's how we sell tax relief to the middle class."

To view online click here.

Back

White House digs in on eliminating state and local tax deduction Back

By Toby Eckert | 10/05/2017 03:40 PM EDT

The White House is maintaining a hard line on wiping out a deduction for state and local taxes as part of tax reform, despite efforts in Congress to negotiate a compromise on the issue.

"The president's been clear about his position, and we're moving forward with the framework that we've laid out," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said today when asked whether the administration was open to negotiation.

Republican lawmakers who represent high-tax areas are rebelling against plans to do away with the federal deduction people can take for property taxes and other state and local levies. They are urging GOP leaders, who have endorsed ending the deduction, to strike a deal that would preserve the benefit in some form.

A spokeswoman for House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said Wednesday that he is willing to listen to the members' concerns.

Opponents of the deduction argue that it primarily benefits upper-income taxpayers and encourages some states and localities to maintain high tax rates. Ending it would also raise more than $1 trillion to offset individual rate cuts and other benefits Republicans would like to add to the tax code.

Sanders said that "80 percent of the [deduction's] benefit goes to six-figure filers."

"The fact is, it isn't fair and it doesn't make sense for working Americans across the country to subsidize the very wealthy in a few states," she said at her regular media briefing.

To view online click here.

Back

Economy lost 33,000 jobs in September Back

By Marianne LeVine | 10/06/2017 08:36 AM EDT

The economy lost jobs in September for the first time in seven years, a consequence of late-summer hurricanes.

The Labor Department reported Friday morning that the economy lost 33,000 jobs, down from 169,000 jobs added in August.

Prior to the jobs report, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said Hurricane Harvey in Texas and Hurricane Irma in Florida could have "direct and indirect effects on employment, hours, and earnings." The monthly jobs figure does not include jobs numbers for Puerto Rico, which is still struggling to recover from Hurricane Maria.

"In the midst of a hurricane, nobody is hiring," said Megan Greene, chief economist at Manulife Asset Management.

In a statement, William Wiatrowski, the acting commissioner for the Bureau of Labor Statistics, explained that during the survey week, which includes the 12th of the month, "many employees in areas affected by the hurricanes were likely off payrolls."

The jobs report also included some positive news. September unemployment, the report showed, was 4.2 percent, down from August's 4.4 percent, and the lowest level since February 2001. "We do not believe the hurricanes had a discernible effect on the national unemployment rate," Wiatrowski said in his statement.

In addition, average hourly private-sector earnings rose 2.9 percent in September over the previous year, the largest increase since December 2016. In August, they were up 2.7 percent. The hurricane may have skewed wage growth. Pantheon Macroeconomics' Ian Shepherdson wrote in a note to clients that wages were up "probably because the people who temporarily dropped off payrolls are lower paid than average."

Another bit of good news was that labor force participation ticked up to 63.1 percent, up from August's 62.9 percent and the highest level since March 2014.

Appearing on Bloomberg TV, White House chief economic adviser Gary Cohn said "there is some noise in the number because of the hurricane" but that "you discount that noise out and you're looking ... at the wage growth and you're looking at the unemployment number, which is the real bright news here."

President Donald Trump appeared Thursday to be trying to get out in front of Friday's jobs report, which analysts had predicted would show a slowdown, when he tweeted: "Stock market hits an ALL-TIME high! Unemployment lowest in 16 years! Business and manufacturing enthusiasm at highest level in decades!" Trump's "lowest in 16 years" claim reached back to the unemployment number for July, when it was 4.3 percent. In August, unemployment ticked up to 4.4 percent.

Republicans and Democrats both acknowledged this was more a hurricane report than a jobs report. In a written statement, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) said that "it's clear from this jobs report that Hurricanes Harvey and Irma not only devastated communities in Texas and Florida, they devastated their local economies as well."

Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.), ranking member of the Joint Economic Committee, said that the "job numbers underscore the gravity of the task at hand — to rebuild families' lost homes, businesses, and communities in the wake of the devastating hurricanes."

Analysts did not seem alarmed by the job loss. Gus Faucher, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group Inc., told Bloomberg: "I don't think this is indicative of problems in the labor market -- it's because of the hurricanes." He added that "the economy is in decent shape, the labor market continues to improve, and we'll bounce back to job growth in the final three months of 2017."

Still, Elise Gould, senior economist at the left-leaning Economic Policy Institute, said in a statement that even factoring in the hurricanes, "such a loss—on top of net downward revisions in July and August—is concerning for an economy that is still recovering. In order just to keep up with the working-age population growth, we need to add at least 90,000 jobs a month."

The unfavorable jobs report comes as Trump prepares to nominate a Federal Reserve chair. Last week, Trump said he would make a decision in the next "two or three weeks."

Ben White contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Treasury inspector general finds no wrongdoing in Mnuchin plane travel Back

By Victoria Guida | 10/05/2017 05:07 PM EDT

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has not violated any laws with his use of government-funded planes but should provide more detail on why he needs them in the future, the department's inspector general found in a report released Thursday.

Mnuchin has flown on military aircraft seven times since becoming secretary, at a cost of approximately $811,797.81, and will do so again later this month, according to the report. He has never expensed a private charter flight.

"I see no violation of law in these requests and uses," OIG Counsel Rich Delmar wrote in the report.

"What is of concern is a disconnect between the standard of proof called for in [a 2011 memo from then-White House chief of staff William Daley], and the actual amount of proof provided by Treasury and accepted by the White House in justifying these trip requests," he added.

The report was prompted by requests after Mnuchin's trip to Kentucky with his wife, Louise Linton, who famously posted a picture of herself leaving the plane on Instagram and drew attention to the designer brands she was wearing.

According to the report, a fare was estimated for Linton's travel, for which Mnuchin reimbursed the government.

A flight to Miami, which cost over $40,000, would have cost only about $700 per person on a commercial flight, according to the report.

In the eight approved flights — which do not include Mnuchin's withdrawn request to use a government-funded plane for his honeymoon — the trips were classified as White House support missions. To qualify as such a mission, the president "must have specifically directed that the travel occur" by personally requesting the assignment.

"In almost all cases a single boilerplate statement constituted the whole analysis and justification for designation and use of military aircraft, despite the fact that the memo clearly calls for a more rigorous and complete provision of facts and arguments," the OIG report read.

But Delmar then noted that budget director Mick Mulvaney on Sept. 29 issued a memo related to government-funded travel, which "strongly suggests more rigor will be required in future requests."

Treasury spokeswoman Molly Meiners noted that the inspector general's review "identified no violation of law, regulation, or ethics requirements in connection with the Department's requests."

"The Inspector General suggested certain enhancements to the longstanding approval process, which we intend to incorporate fully going forward," she said in a statement.

Mnuchin personally owns a small plane, according to his financial disclosure form, but it might not be able to support secure communications required by the secretary in his role on the National Security Council.

"The Inspector General confirmed that the Secretary is 'required by applicable authority and policy to have access to secure communications at a high level of classification at all times — including both official and personal travel,'" Meiners said.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: House Republicans take 'minibus' victory lap — Black won't rule out October budget vote — Tillerson teases at restructuring vision
Date: Thursday, September 14, 2017 5:55:49 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 09/14/2017 04:44 PM EDT

CHEST-THUMPING TIME: It was the kind of morning House Speaker Paul Ryan needed amid a month of GOP horrors. After four late-night Rules Committee meetings and eight days of floor debate — spanning nearly two months — the House finally (albeit narrowly) passed that $1.2 trillion spending package, as we reported for Pros.

This marks the first time since 2009 that all 12 spending bills have cleared the chamber on time, as Ryan was quick to point out. "We achieved conservative victories for the president's agenda, for our agenda," the speaker declared at a press conference, surrounded by the Republican cardinals who helped make it happen. "It's been a long time coming."

They did it! Remember the "GOP omnibus" idea that even some conservatives didn't think was possible? Four months later, Rep. Tom Graves' long-shot idea is on its way to the Senate. "We've clearly sent a strong message," Graves (R-Ga.) told us today, talking excitedly about punting pressure to the upper chamber. "The ball is now in their court."

Well that was close: The package, H.R. 3354 \(115\), passed by just 13 votes, with 25 lawmakers playing hooky, 14 Republicans voting no and a single Democrat (Minnesota Rep. Collin Peterson) voting yes. Breaking it down.

Quiet again — for now: This is a clear win for appropriators, who slogged through one of the most intense markup seasons in years. By our count, the House hasn't passed more than eight appropriations bills in one season since 2012. And none have been traditionally thorny measures like Labor-HHS-Education, Agriculture or State-Foreign Operations. Of course, appropriators are far from the finish line. Lawmakers and staffers must now produce either a second stopgap or a full-blown, bicameral omnibus by Dec. 8.

Red meat: Republicans are going to be talking about this one for a while, even when they're ultimately forced to sign a bipartisan deal in December. The just-passed GOP goodies they can tout: A $1.6 billion down payment for President Donald Trump's border wall, zero dollars for Planned Parenthood or key climate change programs, some Dodd-Frank dismantling, repeal of Obamacare's individual mandate and the paring down of environmental regulations.

Can't forget the caps: Nobody likes to talk about the BCA, but ... the bill approved today includes $621.5 billion in defense spending, far above the $549 billion allowed by law. As Democrats pointed out today, that package would trigger $72 billion in automatic cuts from the military if it was actually signed into law. "Without an agreement to raise Budget Control Act spending caps, we will just face another crisis in December," Rep. Nita Lowey (D-N.Y.) warned.

GOOD THURSDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — GAO has released a report on funding gaps in the Rural Housing Service, finding that the agency's fiscal issues have resulted in delayed payments to landlords and the loss of rental units. More from Christine Haughney.

#DailyBudgetFact — The federal government will pay a total of $705 billion in federal health care subsidies — excluding Medicare — for people under 65 this year, according to a new report from the CBO. That figure already accounts for the taxes and penalties that are intended to help fund those subsidies.

PRO POLICY SUMMIT

STAR-STUDED HIGHLIGHTS: Today's policy summit included 17 different panel discussions with officials from nearly every corner of the government.

— What about the deficit? Budget hawk Kent Conrad dismissed Congress' chances of trying to tackle the national debt this year. "We're in what I would call concern-about-the-debt-free zone," the former Budget Committee chairman said, Eli Okun reports.

— Two-party tax overhaul is possible: Rep. Richard Neal, the top Democrat on the House's tax-writing panel, said today there's "room for conversation" with Trump on tax reform efforts this year. "The administration seems to be in sync with the middle class positions that we would adopt," Neal, of Massachusetts, said, per Colin Wilhelm.

— Shoot for the moon: Rep. John Culberson, a top House appropriator, called for a huge boost in the nation's space budget. The Texas Republican said the U.S. should spend as much as 2 percent or 3 percent of its GDP on space exploration — an increase from the 0.5 percent currently being spent, as Jacqueline Klimas reports.

— Addressing drug costs: The health insurance industry's top lobbyist lamented today that lawmakers aren't paying enough attention to actually lowering the price of drugs. "We all sit here and say we want to cover more people, [but we] can't do that if we don't deal with the underlying cost problem," said Marilyn Tavenner, the head of America's Health Insurance Plans.

BUDGET

WON'T SAY 'OCTOBER': As House lawmakers jet off for a weeklong recess, House Budget Chairman Diane Black tells us she's still aiming for a vote when they return. Asked today about voting the final week of September, Black said, "That would be great." But the Tennessee Republican wouldn't say whether she'd be willing to wait until October. "I don't want to box ourselves in with 'yes,' 'no' or 'in between' because we're still doing some work."

NOT BITING: Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows said Wednesday that his tax huddle with Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady hasn't changed his stance on the budget. "We will guarantee that we have enough information before we vote for the budget," Meadows, R-N.C., said, as Colin and Aaron Lorenzo report.

STATE

TILLERSON'S VISION: Secretary of State Rex Tillerson sent an email to department employees this week, offering a glimpse into his restructuring plans. Our Nahal Toosi got her hands on the internal email. And she reports that Tillerson said he aims to save as much as $10 billion over five years by restructuring the department and better aligning, if not outright merging it, with USAID.

DISASTERS

REBUILDING BETTER: In an about-face for the Trump administration, HUD Secretary Ben Carson says post-hurricane rebuilding will be done to withstand future storms and flooding if federal funds are used, Lorraine Woellert reports. Just last month, Trump signed an executive order nixing a rule that projects have to be built to withstand extreme flooding if the feds are ponying up. Taxpayer advocates were not pleased about Trump's dismissal of the Federal Flood Risk Management Standard, arguing that requiring "smarter" construction ultimately saves federal dollars.

FANNING OF FLAMES ... OF REFORM? After years of talks, Republicans from Western states say they're serious about overhauling the federal government's fire management system in the next few months. A group of lawmakers, including Sen. Steve Daines of Montana and Rep. Greg Walden of Oregon this week that they're hoping to use one of the many must-pass bills this year to advance their own reforms, Catherine Boudreau reports. The chief goal is a permanent fix to what's called "fire borrowing" — when the Forest Service maxes out on its firefighting budget and is forced to take money from other accounts, like insect and disease programs or hazardous fuel programs.

TREASURY

ON THE TAXPAYER'S DIME: Following on Insta-gate, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin is now fielding flak for trying to use a military jet for his European honeymoon earlier this year. ABC News, citing undisclosed sources, first reported that Mnuchin put the request in writing and that it led to an "inquiry" by the Treasury Department's Office of Inspector General. Henry C. Jackson and Josh Dawsey have got the details.

FLOOD INSURANCE

CAN THEY FIX IT? Acknowledging that Congress will need to pass legislation — and soon — to lift the National Flood Insurance Program's borrowing limit, some Republicans say now's the time for broader reform to get the system "on a sustainable path," Zachary Warmbrodt reports.

AGRICULTURE

HOW LOW CAN WE GO? The "error rate" in the nation's $71 billion food stamp program has reached record lows in recent years. But Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) wants to bring that key metric back under scrutiny in the upcoming debate on the farm bill, Helena Bottemiller Evich and Catherine report. SNAP has one of the lowest fraud rates in the government, though critics have pointed to the multiple ongoing investigations into how exactly that rate is calculated. After a 2002 federal crackdown on misspent SNAP dollars, the number of states with a 6 percent payment error rate went from 13 to 45 today. A top USDA official says the department plans to publish an updated error rate by June 2018 after not issuing one for the past two years amid the investigations, Catherine explains.

DEFENSE

NDAAs ROADBLOCK: The Senate is expected to scoot through the rest of debate on the National Defense Authorization Act today or Monday. But several funding-related proposals stopped amendment consideration this week, Connor O'Brien explains. Armed Services Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) declared "an impasse" Wednesday night, saying "we simply can't get an agreement." The stalled amendments include a proposal to repeal the sequester as a budget-cutting mechanism, a tweak to beef up Buy American requirements for the Pentagon for items used overseas and a plan to strip limitations on medical research funded by the Pentagon. Budget-watchers are keenly tracking the sequestration amendment.

TAX

DEADLOCK, MEET DEADLINE: With just 11 days until they are expected to release an initial tax plan, the "Big Six" remain deeply divided over how to rewrite the code. Brian Faler reports this afternoon that top congressional and administration negotiators remain at loggerheads over a number of items, including plans to reduce a deduction for state and local taxes, as well as one for corporate interest expenses.

JEALOUS OR JUST NERVOUS? As POTUS continues to meet with Democrats on tax reform, many GOP lawmakers worry the strategy will derail the party-line effort they've been pursuing, Rachael Bade and Burgess Everett explain. Proof that Trump is willing to pander hardcore to the desires of Democrats on this one: He says he's even entertaining requests to raise taxes on wealthier people and says "the rich will not be gaining at all with this plan," Nolan D. McCaskill reports.

Harder, still: Contrary to the president's tweet this week, hurricane recovery seems to be complicating tax reform efforts. As Brian explains, lawmakers are certain to spend tens of billions more to assist those stricken by the storms, which may give some Republicans second thoughts about simultaneously adding billions to the deficit with their tax plans. And the idea of special tax legislation to help storm victims adds to the complexity.

IMMIGRATION

BORDER WALL TO THE BACK BURNER: Democratic leaders Nancy Pelosi and Chuck Schumer say Trump told them over Chinese food Wednesday night that he's not going to be demanding border wall money in any kind of 'DREAMers' bill, our team reports today. But POTUS insists he's not giving up on the border structure, telling pool reporters today that the wall "will come later."

INFRASTRUCTURE

WHITE HOUSE GUIDANCE TO COME: The Trump administration is preparing more details on what it wants to see Congress accomplish with infrastructure legislation. But that guidance won't come until tax overhaul's rolling, Andrew Restuccia and Lauren Gardner report. The Trump administration has still yet to divulge details about where it expects to get the $200 billion federal investment the president has touted, except to say it would come from cuts to other programs.

CYBER

HACKER-FIGHTING FUNDS: Reps. Mark Meadows and Jim Langevin are introducing a bill that would allow states to apply for federal grants to update election technology after proving they have adopted federal cybersecurity standards, Cory Bennett reports. The measure matches a bipartisan amendment that Sens. Amy Klobuchar and Lindsey Graham are trying to get attached to the NDAA bill the Senate's currently debating.

LABOR

MINIMUM WAGE HIKE: The hourly minimum wage for federal contractors will increase to $10.35 in January 2018, up from the current $10.20, Marianne Levine reports. The tipped minimum wage will also increase to $7.25 an hour, up from the current $6.80.

EARMARKS

- Harvey heats up inflation data, raising odds Fed will raise interest rates. CNBC.
- House adopts after-school amendment in spending bill, rejects three other provisions. POLITICO Pro.
- NATO official details alliance's budgetary, capability challenges. Defense News.
- This is the crazy tax math Trump must master, fast. Bloomberg Businessweek.
- How the Bernie Sanders plan would both beef up and slim down Medicare. The New York Times.

WE'RE COUNTING: 85 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017), 16 days until the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/09/house-republicans-take-minibus-victory-lap-024605>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

House sends $1.2T spending package to certain rejection in Senate Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 09/14/2017 12:14 PM EDT

The House on a 211-198 vote Thursday passed a mammoth fiscal 2018 spending bill that reflects Republican priorities but stands no chance of making it through the Senate in its current form.

The 12-measure bundle, H.R. 3354 \(115\), would provide $1.2 trillion in government funding. But House leaders have yet to negotiate a politically feasible compromise with the Senate and — in particular — with Senate Democrats who can block spending bills on procedural votes. That means the legislation will not be signed into law by the start of the new fiscal year on Oct. 1.

Instead, Congress cleared a spending patch, H.R. 601 \(115\), last week that will continue federal funding at current levels through Dec. 8, when leaders hope to have reached a bicameral deal.

"The appropriations package before us this morning puts the House on the right path to completing its annual appropriations work for the entire federal government," House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) said on the floor just before passage. "The results are bills that represent our shared values and priorities."

But Frelinghuysen's Democratic counterpart, Rep. Nita Lowey of New York, complained that passage of the package "gets us no closer to enacting full-year funding ..."

"Majority leadership must immediately convene bipartisan discussions to develop a new budget agreement with realistic caps on defense and nondefense spending," Lowey said.

House Republicans called a vote in July on passage of the first four measures in the package, picking off the most noncontroversial bills to advance with Democratic support.

Because the remaining eight contain thornier policy issues and harder-to-swallow topline numbers for those in the minority party, GOP leaders launched an extensive whipping operation more than a month ago to ensure enough Republicans would be on board to pass the second chunk — no easy task considering the House's most ardent fiscal hard-liners are not accustomed to voting for federal spending bills of any kind.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), an appropriations cardinal, told POLITICO in late August that GOP leaders were still whipping the final package and had yet to secure the requisite commitments for passage, more than a month after they first began tallying support.

Even over the week and a half leading up to the vote, some GOP leaders remained uncertain about the final outcome.

"There's nothing in the bag," House Rules Chairman Pete Sessions (R-Texas) said before his panel began the first of two late-night meetings to tee up the package. "Do I believe we are going to present the conference and the House a package that they will be able to see as worthy of us moving on? Yes, I do."

For most of the 12 bills in the package, funding levels come in below current spending but above President Donald Trump's budget request.

The most drastic spending cut would be made in the division covering the State Department and foreign operations, which would receive $47.4 billion — $10 billion, or about 17 percent, less than current levels.

The departments of Defense, Homeland Security and Veterans Affairs, as well as the legislative branch, would see funding boosted.

The legislation includes $1.6 billion to build several structural barriers along the U.S.-Mexico border, but would not fund a so-called border wall in the way the president has promised.

Before the legislation was debated on the House floor, GOP leaders took special procedural steps to delete two controversial amendments that had been adopted during committee consideration.

Without allowing lawmakers to go on record on the floor, in July leaders plucked language that would have phased out the 2001 war authorization. Then this month, they removed provisions that would have allowed federal employment for immigrants who have been granted waivers under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program.

In total, House leaders allowed floor debate on more than 460 amendments and dedicated eight work days to the package over a more than two-month span.

To view online click here.

Back

GAO flags problems with rural housing subsidies Back

By Christine Haughney | 09/14/2017 11:16 AM EDT

Budget cuts, poor estimates of rental costs and government bureaucracy all contributed to the funding gaps that USDA's rural housing service suffered in the 2013-15 fiscal years, according to a GAO report.

GAO released the results of its findings about how an agency, which provides $1.4 billion in annual rental subsidies to landlords housing more than 270,000 low income rural households, could run out of money. Funding problems were so dire that some payments to landlords were delayed and even lost some rental units.

Some of GAO's suggestions to the agency included trying to improve its rental assistance estimation methods and make sure that there are more accurate assumptions used in budget requests. The agency did not comment on the suggestions.

To view online click here.

Back

Congress failing to seize moment on cutting debt, panelists say Back

By Eli Okun | 09/14/2017 11:53 AM EDT

Congress has many options for tackling long-term debt, but it probably won't take up any of them soon, panelists said at the POLITICO Pro Policy Summit today.

"We're in what I would call concern-about-the-debt-free zone," said former Sen. Kent Conrad, a North Dakota Democrat.

The panelists weren't optimistic about the prospects for debt reduction in the current tax reform push. House Republican leaders plan to release more details this month.

"The dream died when the border-adjustment tax died," said James Pethokoukis, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. "I'd almost rather have this whole tax reform debate stop and think hard" about long-term solutions.

Pethokoukis admonished conservatives for not seizing the moment: "It is a profound mistake by Republicans to not at all focus on how in the future we are going to get those revenues.

The national debt surpassed \$20 trillion for the first time last week, and Conrad said Social Security could be insolvent by as early as 2029. "There is a fiscal reality out there that has to be dealt with," he said.

But nobody wants to tackle long-term reform of the so-called entitlement programs or new approaches to revenue, said Bill Gale, a senior fellow in economic studies at the Brookings Institution. "We need to be figuring out ways to deal with it," Gale said, adding that a carbon tax and value-added tax would be two revenue generators.

To view online click here.

Back

Neal: 'Room for conversation' with administration on tax reform Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/14/2017 01:43 PM EDT

The top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee expressed optimism about possible bipartisan coordination on tax reform.

Rep. Richard Neal (D-Mass.) said at today's POLITICO Pro Policy Summit that he thinks there's "room there for conversation" on "building out" tax reform around provisions aimed at aiding the middle class.

"I think there's some room given that for the moment, just for the moment, that the administration seems to be in sync with the middle class positions that we would adopt," he said.

Still, Neal said, "the key is to pay attention to the distribution tables," as to who would benefit from tax reform the most. He also raised concerns over the president's rhetoric on the topic.

"I think the president from time to time has used words interchangeably like 'tax cut' and 'tax reform,'" Neal said.

His comments follow recent deals and talks between President Donald Trump and congressional Democrats on the debt ceiling, federal spending, tax reform and immigration.

To view online click here.

Back

Top House space appropriator calls for boost in space budget Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 09/14/2017 10:38 AM EDT

The top House appropriator who oversees NASA funding said today he'd like to see the space budget increase to 2 or 3 percent of gross domestic product — a huge increase from the .5 percent currently being spent.

Rep. John Culberson (R-Texas) said at the POLITICO Pro Policy Summit the country was spending 4 percent of GDP on space exploration when it was working on the Apollo mission, but that it has dropped significantly. It'll take a large discovery to "electrify" the public to support increased spending on space and NASA, he said.

Culberson predicted that big discovery will be the discovery of life on Europa, one of Jupiter's moons. This discovery is so important that he actually legally required NASA to complete the mission to Europa in the space appropriations bill being considered on the House floor today.

"It is illegal for NASA not to fly this mission," he said.

Culberson emphasized the need for NASA to explore, calling it the "interplanetary highway system." And said he envisions private companies playing a large role in the future of space flight, comparing it to "catching a cab outside the hotel" for low-Earth orbit.

"I'm a big believer in the yellow pages test. If you can find a government service in the yellow pages, you ought to privatize it as much as you can," he said.

To view online click here.

Back

Freedom Caucus leader uncommitted on budget after tax briefing Back

By Bernie Becker and Aaron Lorenzo | 09/13/2017 06:23 PM EDT

Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) suggested Wednesday that he didn't have enough information yet on the emerging GOP tax plan to commit to vote for the House budget resolution.

"We will guarantee that we have enough information before we vote for the budget," Meadows, the chairman of the conservative House Freedom Caucus, said after GOP lawmakers met with Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) on tax reform.

House conservatives have said that they want more details on what the White House and GOP leaders are proposing in a tax overhaul before they vote for a budget. Republicans will need to pass a budget if they want to revamp the tax code with a simple majority vote in the Senate.

Meadows said that he got the "distinct impression" from the meeting with Brady that a GOP tax package would not allow companies to immediately and fully write off new investments, an idea that was in last year's House Republican blueprint.

The tax bill would have "accelerated expensing" provisions, according to Meadows, who added that GOP leaders were still shooting to lower the corporate rate to the 20 percent range.

Brady has long pushed for both lower corporate rates and more robust expensing provisions. The joint statement on tax reform that senior administration officials and top Republican lawmakers released in July called for "unprecedented capital expensing," and Brady repeated "unprecedented" twice when quizzed after Wednesday's meeting on whether he'd back down from full expensing.

WHAT'S NEXT: Tax reform negotiators are expected to release more details of a proposal on Sept. 25.

To view online click here.

Back

Tillerson offers peek into State Dept. redesign plan Back

By Nahal Toosi | 09/13/2017 06:46 PM EDT

Secretary of State Rex Tillerson hopes to save as much as $10 billion over five years under his plan to restructure the State Department by better aligning, if not outright merging, it with USAID.

In an email sent to State Department employees Wednesday, Tillerson offered just a glimpse into his plan to reshape the department, a blueprint that he said he would submit to the White House Office of Management and Budget this week.

The redesign effort also includes changes to the U.S. Agency for International Development. It is being watched closely by lawmakers and diplomats on edge over President Donald Trump's proposed drastic cuts to the foreign affairs budget.

In the email, a copy of which was shared with POLITICO, Tillerson writes that he wants to update the information technology system, offer more flexible programs for employees with families, and further empower the State Department's top leaders.

His main point, however, focused on ways to better coordinate what the State Department does with what USAID does. Tillerson never explicitly says he wants to merge the two entities, which would probably require congressional approval, but leaves the impression that he wants to eliminate redundancies.

"Our redesign plan seeks to align State and USAID foreign assistance and policy strategies, capabilities, and resources to execute foreign policy priorities more effectively," Tillerson writes. "It includes several ambitious proposals with investments that will generate a minimum deliverable of 10 percent [$5B] in efficiencies relative to current [FY2017] spending over the next five years, with an aspirational general interest target of up to 20 percent [$10B]."

Tillerson acknowledges that some of his restructuring plans will require congressional approval, but notes that some efforts are already underway. For instance, he is taking steps to reduce the number of special envoys at the department.

The changes will be unveiled "on a rolling basis," Tillerson said. "Once a solution is ready to go, we're going to put it to work as soon as we can."

Some State Department employees were left scratching their heads by the email and eager for more details. "It's lots of business school buzzwords with no tangible details," one employee said of Tillerson's message.

The future of the State Department is of concern to not only its employees but also to lawmakers. Both Republicans and Democrats have put up fierce resistance to Trump's proposal to cut the department's and USAID's annual budget by roughly a third. Tillerson has left numerous top leadership positions at State empty as he has pulled together his restructuring plan, further alarming lawmakers.

A key Senate panel last week passed legislation that kept the level of foreign affairs funding roughly on par with that of recent years, a rebuke to both Trump and Tillerson.

To view online click here.

Back

Carson vows new construction will be built to withstand future storms Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 09/14/2017 10:47 AM EDT

New construction backed by federal disaster recovery funds after Hurricanes Harvey and Irma will be built to withstand future storms and flooding, Housing and Urban Development Secretary Ben Carson said.

"As you rehabilitate or construct units, it's very, very important to learn the lessons of what made them so vulnerable in the first place and build that into the new construction," Carson told POLITICO. "That's a high priority for us."

"These things will happen again," he said. "Now is the time to be thinking of that."

Last month, President Donald Trump signed an executive order rolling back environmental reviews and flood-protection standards.

HUD, which will manage the bulk of recovery spending in Houston and Florida, will make sure all affordable housing units lost to the storms will be replaced or repaired, Carson said.

"We will get all the people who were dependent on us taken care of," he said.

WHAT'S NEXT: HUD is still assessing storm damage and Congress is likely to approve more federal aid.

To view online click here.

Back

Republicans aim to overhaul fire management, budget by year's end Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 09/13/2017 04:05 PM EDT

A group of Republican lawmakers is working on a legislative package that would revamp federal forest management and the way wildfire suppression is funded amid severe blazes in the Northwest.

Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) said lawmakers are looking at "three to four" measures Congress must pass before the end of the year that could be used as the vehicle for the reforms.

"There will be a package that I hope to see on the president's desk before the end of the year to address the fire borrowing issue, as well as forest management," Daines said today during a press conference with Senate EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) and Reps. Greg Walden (R-Ore.) and Cathy McMorris Rodgers (R-Wash.).

Efforts to fight wildfires routinely drain funds from the U.S. Forest Service's budget and forces the agency to borrow from other programs, including fire prevention efforts like forest thinning, fire breaks and prescribed burns.

U.S. Forest Service Chief Tony Tooke said the agency at the end of last week had to begin moving money from other accounts — potentially upwards of $300 million — in order to cover the costs of fighting Northwest wildfires.

"Normally we deal with 20 large fires this time of year. Now there are 80 and we have a shortage of resources," Tooke said.

Barrasso is planning to hold a hearing on Sept. 27 on two bills designed to expedite the U.S. Forest Service's process for carrying out fire prevention activities, according to a committee aide: S. 605 \(115\) and S. 1731 \(115\).

To view online click here.

Back

Treasury Secretary Mnuchin asked for government jet for honeymoon Back

By Henry C. Jackson and Josh Dawsey | 09/13/2017 10:03 PM EDT

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin asked for a military jet to take him and his wife, actress Louise Linton, on their European honeymoon earlier this summer, the Treasury Department confirmed on Wednesday.

ABC News, citing undisclosed sources, first reported that Mnuchin put the request in writing and that it led to an "inquiry" by the Treasury Department's Office of Inspector General.

Mnuchin and Linton traveled to Scotland, France and Italy after their wedding in late June. The request for a military plane eventually was deemed unnecessary after further consideration.

A Treasury Department spokesman released a statement Wednesday evening acknowledging that Mnuchin had requested the jet, but said the secretary had done so because he wanted to maintain secure communications during extended travel.

As a member of President Donald Trump's National Security Council, Mnuchin "has responsibility for the Office of Terrorism and Financial Intelligence," the spokesman said. "We have multiple issues around the world where the secretary is directly involved in national security, notably North Korea, Iran, and Venezuela, among others."

The spokesman added: "It is imperative that he have access to secure communications, and it is our practice to consider a wide range of options to ensure he has these capabilities during his travel, including the possible use of military aircraft."

Requests for military jets are fairly unusual, though not unprecedented, for personal travel. Such trips can cost tens of thousands of dollars to operate per hour. Treasury secretaries tend to fly on commercial airlines but have used government planes for overseas work trips.

Mnuchin, one of the wealthiest members of Trump's Cabinet, is a former Goldman Sachs banker and movie producer who also made millions in real estate. He is a key figure for Trump, serving as lead administration official on tax reform, Trump's top domestic priority.

His use of government aircraft was already under scrutiny after he took Linton on a trip to Louisville and Fort Knox in Kentucky in July.

A government investigator is looking into whether Mnuchin used the trip to get a better view of the solar eclipse with Linton. Mnuchin has denied that, saying he was in Kentucky for work meetings on tax reform. He also has said he will reimburse the government for Linton's travel costs.

Linton herself stirred controversy this summer when she lashed out at a commentator on Instagram who had criticized her on social media for flying on a government jet with Mnuchin. Linton eventually apologized.

To view online click here.

Back

Will hurricanes open door to flood insurance overhaul? Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 09/13/2017 06:41 PM EDT

The National Flood Insurance Program is facing a shortfall of billions of dollars to cover claims from Hurricanes Harvey and Irma, forcing Congress to once again expand the deeply indebted program's ability to borrow from the Treasury.

For some lawmakers, it will be an opening to push for lasting policy changes intended to expand private flood insurance options outside the government backstop and rein in the subsidies offered by the program.

It might also open the door to a broader debate about whether it makes sense for one government department to be in debt to another — in this case the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Treasury.

"It's an opportunity," Rep. Tom MacArthur (R-N.J.) said of talks to raise the borrowing authority. "We're either just going to bump that authority or use that as an occasion to really pass a reform bill that puts the NFIP on a sustainable path."

It's a fight that Congress will have to engage in over the weeks to come, and one that could complicate efforts for the government to quickly pay claims to thousands of Texas and Florida residents affected by Harvey and Irma.

FEMA revealed Wednesday that it expects Harvey alone to cost the flood insurance program $11 billion, a figure that would overwhelm its $1.5 billion cash on hand as well as a $1 billion layer of reinsurance coverage and $5.8 billion that it has left to borrow.

"As you do that math, it will exceed the current spending authorities," said Roy Wright, the FEMA official overseeing the program.

Less than three weeks since Harvey made landfall, FEMA has received 84,000 claims from the hurricane and has issued initial payments totaling $177 million — numbers that Wright said "will continue to climb very, very rapidly." He did not provide estimates on the impact of Hurricane Irma. Wright said he had enough resources to pay for "the early stages of this" into next month.

"Congress will have to lift the NFIP borrowing authority $15-25 billion in the next 60 days or the program will implode and fail the homeowners who did the right thing and bought insurance," said Barry Scanlon, a former FEMA official and congressional staffer who later founded the consulting firm DCMC Partners.

Lawmakers have known for weeks that they would likely be called upon to shore up the flood insurance program. Some immediately saw it as an opportunity to advance reform proposals that have failed to move in the last several months as Congress struggled to reauthorize the program before its Sept. 30 expiration. Last week, lawmakers extended the program through Dec. 8 as part of a Harvey aid package.

Senate Banking Chairman Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) said in an interview last week that legislative vehicles drafted in response to Harvey "might present opportunities for us to move a flood insurance bill."

"I would be open to adding some part of the ultimate, broader flood insurance bill as we move along," he said. "I've always been that way. I've felt when we extend the debt ceiling we need to get some fiscal reforms to go with it."

Last week, House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) tried unsuccessfully to attach one of his flood insurance policy priorities to the bill that extended the program until Dec. 8.

The rider that he wanted was intended to encourage more private insurers to enter the flood insurance market, which is dominated by the government.

"There is no reason for a permanent taxpayer subsidy when competition can often provide protection at a lower cost," he said at a conference in Washington yesterday.

Hensarling, an outspoken fiscal conservative, has doubled down on his criticisms of the program in the wake of the hurricanes.

"I believe after Harvey and after Irma it would be insane for the federal government to simply pay to rebuild the same homes in the same fashion in the same place," he said. "Shame on us if we do, because the fatalities and economic carnage will simply continue."

A debate over whether to allow the program to borrow more will put a spotlight on a bigger question that has divided Republicans: Why does it make sense for the flood insurance program to pay hundreds of millions of dollars per year in interest to the Treasury?

Hensarling's approach to balancing the program's books has been to shrink its footprint, escalate rates and introduce more private capital. But others in the GOP are on board with proposals that would attack the debt more directly.

Sens. John Kennedy (R-La.) and Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) have a bill that would freeze interest on the NFIP's debt, freeing up potentially $400 million per year that could go toward mitigation or affordability assistance. Co-sponsors of their bill, S. 1368 \(115\), include Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Bill Cassidy (R-La.).

In the House, Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), the top Democrat on the Financial Services Committee, has called for the program's debt to be forgiven.

MacArthur, a Financial Services Committee Republican who had an earlier career as an insurance executive, said he too was contemplating whether to raise the issue of how the interest payments burden the program. He acknowledged he was "probably a little bit on an island with this one."

MacArthur said he didn't think it would be responsible to wipe out the debt but said he was open to freezing the interest.

"Sure, you borrow money, you gotta pay it back," he said. "But do we have to charge interest to ourselves?"

To view online click here.

Back

Roberts eyes SNAP error rates ahead of farm bill Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich and Catherine Boudreau | 09/13/2017 08:34 PM EDT

Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) is planning to zero in on how USDA calculates the error rate for the food stamp program during a hearing on Thursday — adding a new layer to the already thorny politics heading into the 2018 farm bill debate.

It's the only hearing the committee is planning to have on the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, which represents the lion's share of farm-bill spending, ahead of reauthorizing the five-year law. The first panel is scheduled to examine whether the USDA's quality control process ensures states are reporting accurate error rates for SNAP, according to committee aides.

SNAP is one of the most scrutinized federal programs, in part due to its price tag of about $71 billion a year, and is a target for cuts by GOP leaders in Congress. Defenders of the nutrition assistance program often highlight its low error rate as an example for other agencies to follow, but ongoing investigations into its accuracy have the potential to open the program up to new criticism.

Senate Ag staff are careful to note that Roberts' interest is not in taking an axe to the program, but rather in taking a much closer look at how it is being administered, especially if there are potential taxpayer savings.

"This is not about pushing people off the program; this is about how the program is run," a committee aide said.

The percentage of SNAP dollars issued to either ineligible households or to eligible households in excessive amounts was 2.96 percent in 2014, according to department data. There was also an underpayment rate of .69 percent that year, bringing the total error rate to 3.66 percent.

The lineup for the hearing on Thursday signals the committee intends to examine the issues that USDA's Office of the Inspector General raised about the error rate in the past. Expected to testify is Brandon Lipps, acting deputy undersecretary and administrator of Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services at the USDA's Food and Nutrition Service, as well as two witnesses from the USDA's Office of the Inspector General: Gil Harden, assistant inspector general for audit, and Ann Coffey, assistant inspector general for investigations.

How USDA calculates SNAP's national error rate — a measurement of whether applications were accurately approved and whether benefits sent to participants were too high or too low — is a technical, two-tiered process based on reports by state administrators. It is the states' role that's likely to be under the most scrutiny during the hearing on Thursday.

The states have long had financial incentives — and penalties — based on their error rates. The USDA rewards states with low error rates with bonuses totaling $48 million each year.

The USDA Office of the Inspector General began investigating the error rate in March 2013, however, and in September 2015 issued a lengthy report on its findings: States had purposefully weakened the integrity of the quality control process in order to lower error rates.

During this dust-up, USDA Food and Nutrition Service began its own review and has since directed 42 states to develop and submit corrective action plans. As a result, the agency didn't issue error rates for 2015 or 2016.

Anti-hunger advocates agree that ensuring the error rate is correct is absolutely crucial for the integrity of the program — they want an accurate rate, too. But there are also concerns that this renewed focus could come at a bad time for SNAP, which is already being eyed for cuts under the House Republican budget plan and by factions in the party that will no doubt have their knives out in the lead-up to the farm bill.

The second panel at the hearing, which could run several hours, will cover a broader suite of nutrition topics, likely ranging from the SNAP Employment & Training programs to SNAP-Ed and the Emergency Food Assistance Program. Its diverse list of panelists includes: Sam Schaeffer, CEO and executive director of the Center for Employment Opportunities; Bryan Parker of the Community Food Bank of Eastern Oklahoma; Jimmy Wright of Wright's Markets Inc.; Diane Schanzenbach of Northwestern University's Institute for Policy Research; and Brian Riendeau, executive director of Dare to Care Food Bank.

To view online click here.

Back

USDA to resume publishing annual SNAP error rates in 2018 Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 09/14/2017 11:59 AM EDT

The USDA plans to publish an error rate for SNAP by June 2018 after not issuing one for the past two years amid investigations into what was determined to be unreliable data, a top department official said today.

States were purposefully hiding errors from the USDA — potentially dating back to 2004, Brandon Lipps, acting deputy undersecretary of Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services, told the Senate Agriculture Committee.

The agency has plans with 42 states to address the problem. Lipps said that following through with those plans "gives confidence to our statisticians" that the SNAP error rate for 2017 will be accurate.

Chairman Pat Roberts said it was unacceptable that the integrity of the SNAP program can't be verified because in all but a few states, the process used to measure errors has failed. "Thus, the level of erroneous payments states have made when administering this program is completely unknown," he said.

Roberts cited past SNAP error rates — most recently reported in 2014 at 3.6 percent — to emphasize that billions in taxpayers dollars were at stake.

The error rate, which is a measurement of whether applications were accurately approved and whether benefits sent to participants were too high or too low, was called into question by the USDA Office of Inspector General. In September 2015, it issued a lengthy report on its findings.

FNS also conducted its own review, and the Department of Justice has begun investigations into an unknown number of states.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate could finish NDAA today or Monday, McCain and Schumer agree Back

By Connor O'Brien | 09/14/2017 11:29 AM EDT

Senate Armed Services Chairman John McCain and Minority Leader Chuck Schumer today agreed the National Defense Authorization Act could see a final vote as early as today or Monday.

On the Senate floor, the pair reiterated their goal to pass the bill, H.R. 2810 \(115\), as soon as possible.

"Is it reasonable to assume that we could finish this up today, or set a time Monday?" the Arizona Republican asked.

"Absolutely," the New York Democrat responded.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) filed a motion to cut off debate on the bill Wednesday. But McCain said he was still working to secure votes on four key amendments, including a repeal of budget sequestration.

"We are still negotiating ... to see if we can come to an agreement on those, and I'm guardedly optimistic," McCain said. "We'll know later on this morning or early this afternoon."

To view online click here.

Back

Senate deadlocked on four NDAA amendments as McConnell moves to end debate Back

By Connor O'Brien | 09/13/2017 07:14 PM EDT

The Senate is deadlocked on four key amendments to the National Defense Authorization Act, Armed Services Chairman John McCain said this evening.

The stalemate resulted in Majority Leader Mitch McConnell moving to end debate on the bill (H.R. 2810 \(115\)) just before the Senate adjourned for the day.

Speaking on the Senate floor, the Arizona Republican declared "an impasse" on the four amendments. "We simply can't get an agreement," he said.

The stalled amendments, according to a committee spokeswoman, are: a Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) proposal to repeal the sequester as a budget-cutting mechanism; a Mike Lee (R-Utah) amendment barring indefinite detention; a Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.) amendment beefing up Buy American requirements for the Pentagon for items used overseas; and a Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) amendment stripping limitations on medical research funded by the Pentagon.

The chairman urged senators to work out their differences to allow votes on the proposals.

"Unfortunately, the majority leader will have to file cloture and ... then move forward with the bill, which in my view could be finished tomorrow," McCain said.

"I hope overnight my colleagues on both sides would sit down and figure out, as we have a number of these amendments, a way that we can reach a point where we can have up-or-down votes on these amendments, which are important to the nation," he added.

The Senate also adopted a package of 104 non-controversial amendments, including proposals from both Democrats and Republicans.

To view online click here.

Back

AIA backs Cotton NDAA amendment to repeal sequestration Back

By Connor O'Brien | 09/14/2017 11:53 AM EDT

The Aerospace Industries Association is throwing its weight behind an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act to repeal sequestration.

In a statement, AIA President and CEO David Melcher said the industry group "strongly supports" an amendment from Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) to the defense policy bill H.R. 2810 \(115\) that would eliminate sequestration — the procedural mechanism used to enforce spending caps set under the Budget Control Act.

"The caps are so inadequate that Congress has raised them every year since the BCA was signed into law," Melcher said. "The sequester mechanism, as we saw in 2013, is a disruptive and harmful process, making across-the-board cuts to thousands of line items government-wide after appropriations have been signed into law."

Cotton's amendment doesn't repeal the caps, but would take away their primary enforcement mechanism for both defense and domestic programs, a move Melcher called a "good first step."

Cotton's amendment is one of four proposals Senate Armed Services John McCain (R-Ariz.) is pushing the Senate to vote on before it completes consideration of the NDAA. But the Senate is deadlocked on whether to allow the votes.

To view online click here.

Back

Big Six still divided over basic elements of tax reform Back

By Brian Faler | 09/14/2017 01:19 PM EDT

The "Big Six" are deeply divided over how to rewrite the tax code, including how to finance long-promised cuts in individual and corporate rates.

Though House Republicans are promising to release a plan the week of Sept. 25, the top congressional and administration negotiators remain at loggerheads over a number of items, including plans to reduce a deduction for state and local taxes, as well as one for corporate interest expenses.

"Right now, the Senate and the House are pretty far apart," said one Republican aide. "There's serious frustration."

Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), himself a member of the Big Six, fired a warning shot Thursday, saying his panel will not be a "rubber stamp" for whatever is proposed.

One major issue is whether to adopt a plan that would allow companies to immediately deduct the cost of their investments, sources say.

Known as "expensing," it's a top priority for House Republican leaders because many economists say it's one of the best things lawmakers can do for economic growth. What's more, House Speaker Paul Ryan has already compromised on one of his other top priorities, a now-discarded proposal to create a "border adjustable" business tax that would have hit import-reliant companies.

But the deduction is hugely expensive, and Senate Republicans believe it won't fly in their chamber. The White House, not to mention many in the business community, is much more interested in cutting the corporate tax rate as deeply as possible, though that is also pricey at roughly $100 billion for each percentage point reduction.

The Big Six are also divided over how sharply to cut a long-standing deduction for corporate interest expenses. House Republicans have proposed ending it entirely, which would raise some $1 trillion, covering a big chunk of the cost of any plan. But the break is important to many companies, and other negotiators want to only reduce it.

The group is also at odds over eliminating a long-standing deduction that individuals can take for the state and local taxes they pay. Ryan has repeatedly called for eliminating it entirely, calling it a subsidy for state governments, but some are concerned over what that would mean for upper-middle-class people.

Hatch, meanwhile, is pushing a so-called corporate integration plan that would shift some of corporations' tax burden onto their shareholders. He believes that would be a more cost-effective way of reducing the tax burden companies actually pay, though the idea has not gotten much traction with House Republicans.

In a sign of the tensions, Hatch signaled Thursday that he would treat the long-promised tax framework only as a guidepost — not necessarily a binding commitment.

His tax-writing committee won't be "anyone's rubber stamp," Hatch said.

"The group — some have deemed us the Big Six — will not dictate the direction we take in this committee," he said.

"Any forthcoming documents may be viewed as guidance or potential signposts for drafting legislation," he said. "But, at the end of the day, my goal is to produce a bill that can get through this committee."

The Big Six negotiators have been working for months behind closed doors trying to get the House, Senate and White House on the same page regarding the overall contours of any tax rewrite. The process was set up to avoid a repeat of the Obamacare repeal debacle, when House Republicans muscled a plan through their chamber only to watch it collapse in the Senate.

The group is comprised of Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Ryan, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), Hatch, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn.

Republicans are racing to push tax legislation through Congress by the end of the year, before next year's midterm elections begin to loom. It is Republicans' top priority on Capitol Hill, and many lawmakers fear voters will punish them if they fail on taxes after their Obamacare plans fell apart.

With the Big Six divided, Trump has begun sounding out Democrats on a possible bipartisan tax deal. Rep. Richard Neal (D-Mass.), the top Democrat on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said his side may be able to work with the administration.

"I think there's room here for some agreements," he said, pointing to Trump's recent suggestions that he may not cut taxes on the wealthy.

That contradicts a string of independent assessments of Trump's previous tax plans that found they would primarily benefit the top 1 percent of earners.

"He seems to be more interested in Democratic positions on taxes," Neal said. "It seems to me pretty clear that he's not headed towards 2001 and 2003"-style tax cuts.

Brady, speaking today at POLITICO's Pro Policy Summit, agreed Trump may end up turning to Democrats for a deal.

"If Republicans aren't willing to unite and deliver on tax reform, he'll find someone else" to work with, Brady said.

Aaron Lorenzo and Colin Wilhelm contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP shudders as Trump courts Democrats on taxes Back

By Rachael Bade and Burgess Everett | 09/13/2017 06:30 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's courtship of Democrats on tax reform is dividing congressional Republicans on the merits of a bipartisan bill — and could upend the party-line strategy that White House and GOP leaders have been pursuing for months.

Trump has talked tax reform with two bipartisan groups of senators and House members since Tuesday, dining with swing state Democrats and hobnobbing with centrists in the lower chamber. He told them he wants their votes on a tax bill, even entertaining a Democratic request to raise taxes on wealthier individuals.

"If they have to go higher, they'll go higher, frankly," Trump told reporters Wednesday just before his meeting with the House Problem Solvers Caucus, a cluster of moderate Republicans and Democrats pushing him for a bipartisan tax bill.

Raising taxes on the rich is the polar opposite of supply-side economics espoused by Republicans. Indeed, while GOP leaders welcome Democratic votes on tax reform, they're loath to compromise on key provisions of their plan.

Tax decision-makers in the "Big Six" — House Speaker Paul Ryan, Senate Majority leader Mitch McConnell, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, White House economic adviser Gary Cohn and the GOP chairmen of the House and Senate tax-writing committees — opted months ago to pursue a partisan tax bill, all but writing off Democrats. They aim to pursue tax reform via budget "reconciliation," a procedural tool that allows them to evade a 60-vote threshold in the Senate, where the GOP controls just 52 seats.

Now, GOP leaders and conservative lawmakers are warning that a Trump alliance with Democrats could upend all those plans.

"It'd be a mistake to assume that if we're going to lose some Republicans that we can make up for it with a few Democrats," said Sen. John Thune of South Dakota, the third-ranking Republican.

But that opinion is at odds with the emerging White House sentiment that Democrats could provide the votes to get a tax bill over the finish line — and perhaps even reach 60 votes in the Senate.

Skepticism in the House is just as pronounced. It's one thing for Trump to cut a three-month spending deal with Democrats; overhauling the tax system with the help of the opposition party is another matter entirely.

"Trump is talking about doing bipartisan stuff with Chuck and Nancy on taxes, and I don't want to open the door to that until we see what this [GOP] tax plan looks like," said Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.). "If we can reach across the aisle and get them on board, heck yes. But my guess is: They're not going to be too thrilled about jacking up the supply side."

Trump suggested Wednesday that the wealthy "will not be gaining at all with this plan," predicting that their tax rates will remain "pretty much where they are" or even increase. But Republicans of all stripes — especially in the Big Six — believe taxes should be reduced across the board.

"We need rates to come down for every American," said Rep. Andy Barr (R-Ky.). "When you have a taxpayer that's a [small business] that might have a $1 million income, that's not $1 million to an individual person. That's a job-creating small business!"

Not every Republican denounced Trump's comments. After meeting with the president Wednesday afternoon, Problem Solvers Caucus leader Tom Reed (R-N.Y.) praised Trump for "not worrying about the extremes on either side of the party."

"What you saw today was a president who's leading for the American people, and that's what it's about: getting the deal done," he said on Fox News.

Some Senate Republicans are also excited by the possibility of a bipartisan deal — even if it would likely move the bill far to the left of where Republicans would go on their own.

"Why don't you start with a bipartisan discussion, see if you can find areas of agreement? Which is the point I made to President Trump ... that was my advice," said Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), who attended a bipartisan dinner at the White House on Tuesday.

After Republicans failed to repeal Obamacare on their own, top White House officials began worrying that the chamber wouldn't be able to pass a tax bill on a party-line basis, either.

While they're fine with the Big Six continuing to pursue a GOP tax bill, administration officials believe they'll need a handful of Senate Democrats to pass legislation and will need to strike a deal at some point.

Hence the invitation to swing-state Democratic Sens. Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota, Joe Donnelly of Indiana and Joe Manchin of West Virginia to dine with Trump on Tuesday — then the Problem Solvers the day after.

Speaking to reporters at a Christian Science Monitor breakfast Tuesday, White House Director of Legislative Affairs Marc Short acknowledged as much, saying Trump wanted a bipartisan tax plan after finding that Republicans were "not reliable" on Obamacare repeal.

"We don't feel like we can assume that we can get tax reform done strictly on a partisan basis," he said. "So it is wise for us, not just from a policy perspective but from a vote-counting perspective, to try to reach out and earn the support of Democrats as well."

Senate GOP leaders, however, warn that relying on Democrats is short-sighted. Don't expect Heitkamp, Manchin or Donnelly to come through, they say, if Republicans are three votes short.

Democrats are "never there if you need 'em," said Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.).

While GOP leaders haven't publicly discouraged Trump from wooing moderate Democrats, they believe those Democrats are just flirting politically with the president. Many of them are up for reelection in states that Trump won, so it's in their interest to at least appear open to a deal.

In the end, though, "their fear of political retribution from leadership and their base I think will make it hard for them" to side with Republicans, said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas). "I hope I'm wrong, but I'm not optimistic."

Still, after the Obamacare debacle, some Senate Republicans agree with the White House that Senate Republicans could come up short if they go the GOP-only route. A number of rank-and-file members told Politico on Tuesday that it's very possible they'll need a handful of Democrats even to get 50 votes.

"We're going to need some Democratic votes to get this passed, most likely," said Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.). Added Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.): "I don't know of any tax reform bill that could eventually pass — given the circumstances we faced in our party — without Democratic votes."

It's the cost of that support that has Republicans worried.

Trump budget director Mick Mulvaney, a former member of the House Freedom Caucus, told Fox Business Network on Wednesday that it's "fair" to assume Democratic buy-in would result in a watered-down tax plan.

"I think the president recognizes that," he added.

Nancy Cook and Josh Dawsey contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump: Rich people won't benefit 'at all' from tax plan Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 09/13/2017 04:02 PM EDT

President Donald Trump declared Wednesday that the rich won't be getting richer under his administration's tax plan and even signaled a willingness to raise taxes on the wealthy.

"The rich will not be gaining at all with this plan," he told reporters ahead of a meeting with a bipartisan group of House members at the White House.

No formal plan currently exists, but Republicans in Congress expect to unveil details of its effort to reform the nation's tax code by the week of Sept. 25.

For his part, Trump outlined four principles for tax reform on Wednesday: Simplify the tax code and make it fair; slash taxes "substantially"; encourage companies to hire Americans and grow in America; and return trillions of dollars that businesses have parked overseas.

"It'll be the largest tax decrease in the history of our country for the middle class," he said.

The president also stressed that his administration is focused on reducing taxes for the middle class and jobs — "jobs meaning companies," he noted.

Trump added that he would like to see a 15 percent corporate tax rate, a figure Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin conceded may be unachievable, "and much lower than that for individuals."

Asked if wealthy individuals would have to pay higher taxes, Trump said, "I think the wealthy will be pretty much where they are."

"If we can do that, we'd like it. If they have to go higher, they'll go higher, frankly," he said. "We're looking at the middle class, and we're looking at jobs."

To view online click here.

Back

Hurricane relief could bring headwinds for tax reform Back

By Brian Faler | 09/14/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Hurricane recovery efforts are beginning to complicate Republican plans to remake the tax code.

Lawmakers are certain to spend tens of billions more to assist those stricken by the storms, which may give some Republicans second thoughts about simultaneously adding billions to the deficit with their tax plans. Democrats have already begun pounding them on the issue, and lobbyists are looking for opportunities to insert provisions that may be unrelated.

What's more, Republicans want to move special tax legislation to help storm victims, even as time runs short for a tax-code revamp they hope to push through Congress by the end of the year.

The risk is that lawmakers from affected area will want to be generous to their constituents, much as Congress was in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. Back then, lawmakers created more than 40 tax breaks for storm victims. Among the beneficiaries were businesses that hired the displaced, volunteers who assisted with the cleanup, and recipients of the Earned Income Tax Credit — a wage supplement — who couldn't work during the recovery.

Going back to that playbook could blow up their still-developing hurricane response into a major production just as time is at a premium, sapping energy and momentum from the GOP's larger plans for the tax code.

"They have to walk the line carefully between, 'What are we trying to do on tax reform?' and 'What kind of relief can we give on hurricane relief,' without distracting too much from the tax-reform efforts," said John Gimigliano, a former Republican tax aide who helped put together the Katrina tax-aid packages.

Caught in the middle is House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady. As a member of the so-called Big Six, he's helping spearhead efforts to rewrite the code, Republicans' top priority in Congress ahead of next year's elections.

But he also represents a Houston-area district that was hit by Harvey and is seeking help from Congress.

Asked about the potential for the hurricane tax bill to distract from Republicans' broader tax ambitions, Brady said: "While it does take some time, because we want to make sure we get the tax provisions right, right now we're continuing to stay on the timetable on tax" reform.

He ticked off several ideas he believes could win bipartisan support, including allowing storm victims to tap their retirement accounts early without having to pay customary penalties; easing rules surrounding a deduction for casualty losses; and softening restrictions on tax-deductible charitable contributions.

But lawmakers still don't know exactly what the affected states will need, he said.

"How do we get our small businesses back up and running? How do we get customers to them? How do we help these families rebuild?" Brady asked. "For some, the waters have not yet receded so they don't yet have a good assessment of either property or economically of what they're looking for."

"We're consulting with our members and our communities now," he said.

Lobbyists are already eyeing the coming legislation as a potential vehicle for their favorite projects, regardless of how closely they're related to the hurricanes.

"People are thinking through, 'Is there something that I've been working on that I can tie to this that makes sense,'" said Ryan Ellis, a conservative tax consultant.

A Republican tax aide is already fielding pitches from K Street.

"I've got tons of emails that say, 'Hey there's going to be a tax title and this would be a good thing,'" the aide said. "I don't know what the appetite is for that stuff right now. The optics would look bad if you start Christmas tree-ing it up, with a bunch of crap that doesn't make any sense."

Democrats, meanwhile, are already casting Republicans' broader tax plans as unaffordable in the face of hurricane cleanup costs.

"A tax cut, particularly one for the very wealthy, is not going to help Florida or Texas rebuild from these storms," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said Wednesday.

"We're about to add billions to the deficit to rebuild parts of our country, something we absolutely should do because it's an emergency," he said. "But that makes it even more important that tax reform be fiscally responsible."

Last week, Congress approved more than $15 billion in aid, in what will be the first tranche of assistance. Though disaster-aid packages are usually associated with things like FEMA or flood insurance, historically they've had a tax component as well.

It was particularly large in 2005, when Republicans — then, as now, in charge of the entire government — spent months on legislation providing Hurricane Katrina victims with a host of tax breaks. There were special provisions for those who provided free housing to the displaced and who were rehabbing historic structures. There were expanded education credits.

Businesses received incentives to keep their workers on even when they couldn't operate and to provide employees with housing. They were granted preferences allowing them to write off expenses associated with environmental cleanups where petroleum products had been released.

State governments were granted authority to issue tax-preferred bonds to help with the rebuilding.

All of that put a major burden on Congress' tax-writing committees, which had to write rules on how it would all work (they included a restriction stipulating the bonds couldn't be used to finance things like massage parlors, liquor stores or country clubs).

Lawmakers may face uncomfortable questions from constituents if they don't approve aid on the scale seen with Katrina, said Gimigliano, now a tax adviser at KPMG.

"Every circumstance is unique and what was needed in New Orleans may not be needed in Houston or that's needed in Florida," he said. "But if they do something narrower they're going to have to explain why does this 2017 bill look like that, when the 2005 bill looks like that."

All of the work on a relief package would not only eat up precious time and energy, it may also affect how Republicans write their broader tax plans. It will surely be harder to get rid of tax provisions storm victims are now relying upon. For example, that break for casualty losses, which allow people to write off property lost in things like storms and fires, appeared to be on the chopping block with Republicans' tax overhaul, though Brady says he wants to expand it.

Likewise, Republicans may feel pressure to be consistent across their storm assistance and their tax rewrite plans. If they want to expand, say, the New Markets Tax Credit to help storm-stricken areas recovery, they'll have a harder time proposing to eliminate it as part of their larger tax plans.

It may even complicates Republican plans to use a so-called current policy baseline for tax reform. They want to use that because it would save them hundreds of billions of dollars, making it easier to make the math behind their tax plans work. But applying that standard to what will likely be temporary tax provisions to help storm victims would make their assistance plans appear far more expensive.

To be sure, Republicans now have a template of sorts with past disaster relief bills, giving them a menu of possible options from which they can choose as they write their Harvey and Irma assistance plans.

Moreover, the politics are different this time around.

Back in 2005, congressional Republicans were trying to show the public they were on top of the Katrina disaster, after the Bush administration was heavily criticized for its response to the storm. This time, Republicans know their broader tax plans are key to their electoral fortunes.

"Tax reform is obviously what we're all ginned up for, and that's the priority, but at the same time, we know we have to do these [hurricane] things too," said Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y). "And we can do both."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump, Democrats confirm outline of DACA deal, despite denials Back

By Burgess Everett, Josh Dawsey, Rachael Bade and Louis Nelson | 09/13/2017 11:19 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and Democratic congressional leaders reached a tentative agreement Wednesday night to provide a pathway to citizenship for young immigrants known as Dreamers — but after a conservative backlash, the president and his aides sent conflicting signals about how firm the agreement was.

After a meeting with Trump at the White House on Wednesday night, Democratic leaders Chuck Schumer and Nancy Pelosi said they had come to terms with Trump on a plan that would provide protection for Dreamers in exchange for beefed-up border security — but, notably, no additional funding for a border wall.

"We all agreed on a framework: Pass DACA protections and additional security measures, excluding the wall. We agreed that the president would support enshrining the DACA protections into law," Schumer (D-N.Y.) said on the Senate floor Thursday.

The news triggered an outcry from the right, which accused Trump of abandoning his tough-on-immigration campaign stance. So Trump and his aides rebutted Democrats' claims that an agreement had been struck — while at the same time acknowledging the outlines of a deal.

"No deal was made last night on DACA. Massive border security would have to be agreed to in exchange for consent. Would be subject to vote," Trump tweeted.

Added White House spokeswoman Lindsay Walters: "By no means was any deal ever agreed upon."

Yet it seemed to be a matter of semantics. Speaking briefly to reporters shortly after his tweet, Trump said he and the Democratic leaders were close to a deal on the Obama-era Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, but that any agreement would hinge on "massive border security," adding that funding for a border wall will come "a little bit later."

He also said he had spoken to House Speaker Paul Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and that both are "on board" with a DACA-for-border-security deal with Democrats. The meeting Wednesday night did not include Ryan and McConnell, whom Trump spurned for Pelosi and Schumer on a fiscal deal last week.

"Well, we want to get massive border security, and I think that both Nancy Pelosi and Chuck Schumer, I think they agree with it ... we're fairly close, but we have to get massive border security," the president said. "Ryan and McConnell agree with us on DACA. We're very much on board. I spoke to them, yes."

Responding to accusations he was backing "amnesty," Trump also said Thursday: "We're not looking at citizenship. We're not looking at amnesty. We're looking at allowing people to stay here."

Contrary to Trump's suggestion before boarding Air Force One that he had already conferred with Republican leadership about a DACA deal, Ryan said he spoke to Trump about the deal while the president was in the air Thursday. The speaker was insistent that no deal has been struck and that true negotiations have not even begun.

"There is no agreement. The president and the chief of staff called me from Air Force One today to discuss what was discussed. And it was a discussion, not an agreement or a negotiation," the speaker told reporters Thursday. "We have not begun negotiations. What we're doing is talking with ourselves here in our majority to make sure we're all on the same page ourselves before we proceed on all of these things, and it's right and proper that the president talks with the other party, the Wisconsin Republican said. "These were discussions, not negotiations. There isn't an agreement."

Following Trump's tweets on Thursday morning, Schumer and Pelosi said that while the details still need to be hammered out, Trump was not directly contradicting the pact reached at dinner. They said they agreed to forgo the wall as part of this deal with the president — though he would still pursue it — and that a border security package still had to be hammered out but could include new technology and roads.

"If you listened to the president's comments this morning, [Budget] Director [Mick] Mulvaney's comments this morning, it is clear that what Leader Pelosi and I put out last night was exactly accurate," Schumer said.

Trump also didn't deny Thursday morning that building the border wall could be separate from any DACA deal. But he emphasized that the wall, which he says is currently under construction "in the form of new renovation of old and existing fences and walls, will continue to be built." Schumer and Pelosi vowed to continue opposing it.

The agreement came as a surprise to most Republican leaders on Capitol Hill, according to two GOP aides, the second time Trump has blindsided them this month after his deal with Pelosi and Schumer on the debt ceiling.

Trump seems to enjoy spending time with the Democrats. A senior White House official said the dinner was "jovial" and there was frequent laughter — and Trump seemed very pleased afterward. The official expects more meetings among the president and the two top Democrats.

But some Republicans accused Trump of backing away from his core campaign promises. Rep. Steve King of Iowa said if the deal is true, the "Trump base is blown up, destroyed, irreparable and disillusioned beyond repair. No promise is credible."

After much waffling, Trump last week said he would follow through on his campaign promise to end DACA. But the president, who has often expressed sympathy for Dreamers, first gave Congress six months to come up with a legislative solution.

The news of a deal with Democrats drew swift condemnation from conservatives, including from media outlets and pundits that have traditionally bolstered the president. Breitbart News, helmed by former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon, featured headlines including "Amnesty Don" and "Dems declare victory as Trump caves on DACA."

Conservative commentator Laura Ingraham was similarly critical of the reported deal, slamming the president in a series of posts to her Twitter account. "BUILD THE WALL! BUILD THE WALL!...or...maybe...not really," Ingraham wrote online Wednesday night.

"When does American working class w/out real wage increase in 15yrs & who send their kids to overcrowded public schools get amnesty?" Ingraham asked on Twitter on Thursday morning.

Trump spent all day Wednesday talking about cutting such a deal, floating a similar framework while huddling with bipartisan members of the House Problem Solvers Caucus. Three sources in the room from both sides of the aisle said Trump suggested he would accept new border security measures for a fix of the Dreamer program he sought to rescind — and that he'd let his demands on the wall pass, for now.

One lawmaker present said Trump specifically suggested he could accept the DREAM Act, which includes a path to citizenship for those who migrated to the U.S. as minors.

"He said, 'We got to get the wall done, but maybe we could do them separately,'" one person in the room told POLITICO on Wednesday afternoon, several hours before Trump's meeting with Democratic leaders. "He said maybe we do border security, but maybe not the wall."

The sources briefed on the meeting declined to estimate how much border security would be provided under the plan or what the specifics would entail, a key part of any agreement, given the wide range of possibilities that border security could contain. This spring, Congress approved more than $1 billion in new border security.

The leaders and the president also did not agree on when such a package would be passed; both chambers of Congress are controlled by Republicans. But one person briefed on the meeting said Trump and the Democrats want it done "sooner rather than later."

Another person at the Problem Solvers Caucus meeting earlier Wednesday said: "He's not giving up on the wall, and we're not giving up on the wall. But it doesn't have to be on DACA."

Trump may still push for the border wall in a spending bill in December, according to congressional Republican aides, but White House staff publicly backed off that path this week as well. Instead, Trump focused on cutting a deal with the political opposition on DACA.

In an earlier meeting between House leaders, Pelosi told Ryan that Democrats want to see action on DACA in the next few weeks — a deadline most congressional Republicans consider unrealistic.

House Republican leaders insist they have six months, until March, to codify protections for Dreamers. But Democrats want to see a legislative solution by Oct. 5, the deadline for current DACA recipients whose permits expire during the six-month period to renew their applications.

The meeting with Schumer and Pelosi kicked off with a long discussion about trade and China, a second aide briefed on the meeting said.

Heather Caygle contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

White House official: Infrastructure principles waiting on tax overhaul Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Lauren Gardner | 09/13/2017 03:35 PM EDT

The White House is working on a set of more-detailed principles for Congress to use to craft wide-ranging infrastructure legislation, but it won't appear until after policymakers make progress on a tax overhaul, an administration official told POLITICO today.

"Our position is to be ready to go when the president decides to transition" to infrastructure, the official said.

The White House will rely on Congress "quite a bit" to take the lead on an infrastructure bill, the official said, adding that members have asked for more specifics on how the administration plans to attract more state and private sector money for those projects. "We'll do the principles, they'll do the drafting," the official said.

The official noted the administration's "one federal decision" concept, which they hope will prevent bickering and slow-walking between agencies tasked with approving project permits. The Council on Environmental Quality will have an initial list of actions it plans to take to expedite the permitting process to be published in tomorrow's Federal Register.

The official didn't divulge details about where the $200 billion of federal money the administration has touted will come from, except to say it would be derived from savings generated from cuts to other programs.

To view online click here.

Back

House bill aims to get states grant money to fight hackers Back

By Cory Bennett | 09/13/2017 03:58 PM EDT

A House Freedom Caucus member has joined with a cyber-focused Democrat to introduce a bill that aims to help states strengthen the digital defenses protecting their electoral systems.

The measure would allow states to apply for federal grants to update election technology after proving they have adopted federal cybersecurity standards. Republican Rep. Mark Meadows and Democratic Rep. Jim Langevin are behind the bill, which they dubbed the Protecting the American Process for Election Results, or PAPER, Act.

The measure is a House companion to a bipartisan upper chamber amendment that Sens. Amy Klobuchar and Lindsey Graham are trying to get attached to the annual defense authorization bill, which is currently being debated. The lawmakers believe Congress must help states prepare to fight off election hackers after a 2016 presidential race destabilized by alleged Russian cyberattacks.

"The PAPER Act would be a major step forward in securing our election process, updating the security of our voter logs, and allowing for efficient and effective audits of election results," Meadows said in a statement.

Langevin, who co-chairs the Congressional Cybersecurity Caucus, said the measure would help "the people on the front lines to ensure that the most fundamental right in our democracy, the right to vote, is not impinged by foreign powers."

The PAPER Act would direct the federal Election Assistance Commission to develop election cybersecurity recommendations for states. The states that adopt these guidelines would then become eligible for federal grant money to help upgrade their election systems.

To view online click here.

Back

Minimum wage for federal contractors to rise in January 2018 Back

By Marianne LeVine | 09/14/2017 11:10 AM EDT

The hourly minimum wage for federal contractors will increase to $10.35 in January 2018, up from the current $10.20, according to a notice in the Federal Register.

In addition, the tipped minimum wage will increase to $7.25 an hour, up from the current $6.80.

The wage hikes are in response to a 2014 executive order from President Barack Obama that raised the hourly minimum to $10.10 and the tipped minimum to $4.90 for workers "performing work on or in connection with covered Federal contracts," beginning in January 2015.

To view online click here.

Back

House adopts after-school amendment in spending bill, rejects three other provisions

Back

By Mel Leonor | 09/13/2017 07:45 PM EDT

The House rejected today three amendments to the Education portion of its spending bill, H.R. 3358 \(115\), but adopted one that would boost funding for after-school programs by $100 million.

Proposed by Rep. Nita Lowey (D-N.Y.), the amendment that was adopted, 228-188, would reduce funding for the administration of the Education Department while boosting funding for the 21st Century Community Learning Centers program, which funds academic programs during non-school hours.

The House rejected an amendment by Rep. Jason Lewis (R-Minn.) 263-153 that would have increased funding for Career and Technical Education state grants by $70.2 million.

The House also rejected an amendment by Rep. Glenn Grothman (R-Wis.) to reduce funding for three Education Department offices, 285-131. Grothman's amendment would have reduced funding for the department's Program Administrator, Office of Inspector General and Office of Student Aid Administration by 2 percent.

Lawmakers rejected a Joe Courtney (D-Conn.) amendment to increase funding for magnet schools by $1.18 million by reducing funding for charter school grants, 212-204.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

<input type="radio"/>
Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to

<https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: House Republicans zero in on defense spending deal — Democrats lay out fiscal 2018 demands — Senate awaits budget score on GOP repeal plan
Date: Monday, June 26, 2017 3:33:49 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 06/26/2017 03:28 PM EDT

IT'S ALL HAPPENING: House appropriators are forging ahead with their closed-door defense markup tonight. And yes, since they didn't call the whole thing off, you can be sure House Budget Committee leaders have agreed to be a bit more generous to the Pentagon in this year's budget resolution.

As Sarah reported for Pros this weekend, those budget writers are getting mighty close.

Weekend work: Appropriators released the fiscal 2018 defense bill Sunday afternoon after plenty of back and forth between Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry and Budget Chairwoman Diane Black. The bill gives $584 billion for base Pentagon spending and an extra $74 billion in war funding. If you're thinking that figure falls short of the many defense numbers we've been tossing around this month ($603 billion versus $621 billion versus $640 billion), don't fret. This is just the money for DoD. More will go to military construction and nuclear programs under the Energy Department, Connor O'Brien explains.

HITCHING A RIDE: One interesting nugget from the just-released defense bill: House appropriators want to make it harder for the Pentagon to shutter unneeded bases. Those closures, colloquially called "BRAC," could save as much as $2 billion per year, according to defense leaders, Connor O'Brien tells us.

GOOD MONDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — A poll commissioned by the American Federation of Teachers found that nearly three quarters of respondents oppose the Trump administration's proposal to cut education funding by more than 13 percent. More from Morning Education.

#DailyBudgetFact — Seventy-nine years ago a federal minimum wage went into effect under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Congress initially set the wage at 25 cents an hour, which amounted to about $3.50 in current dollars. More from our This Day in Politics series.

Tweet du jour: Our @seungminkim tweeted over the weekend that @JohnCornyn is leaving the door open to delaying the health care vote. Responding today, the senator tweets: "I am closing the door. We need to do it this week before double digit premium increases are announced for next year."

APPROPRIATIONS

IS IT SEPTEMBER ALREADY? Democrats are already drawing their lines in the sand for this fall's spending fight, with almost 100 days to go until the deadline. Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, joined by four Democratic appropriators, sent a letter today urging GOP leaders to strike a deal to avert the looming sequester.

Playing the long game: Without congressional action this fall, those automatic spending cuts — which have never before gone into effect for a full fiscal year — would cut billions from both defense and domestic programs. Most appropriators, even Republicans, say there's no way to avoid lifting the caps at some point. But it's certainly not top of mind.

The Democrats are demanding:

- Parity be protected (AKA raising caps equally for both defense and non-defense)
- All 12 spending bills get passed — "not just a select few"
- No "poison pill" riders
- No "border wall" or "deportation force" funding

MORE MARKUPS: Still no budget yet, but House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen is cruising right along. Heads of the Commerce, Justice and Science panel, as well as the Financial Services subcommittee, will hold markups on Thursday for fiscal 2018 bills. The former will begin at 2 p.m and the latter at 3 p.m.

By our count, we've got:

- One bill to be considered by full committee this week (Legislative Branch)
- Five bills to be considered by subcommittees this week (Defense; Agriculture; Energy and Water; Commerce, Justice and Science; and Financial Services)
- One bill already passed by full committee (Military Construction and Veterans Affairs)
- Four bills remaining (Homeland Security; Interior; Labor, Health and Education; State and Foreign Operations)

OBAMACARE

THE SCORE YOU'VE BEEN WAITING FOR (ROUND THREE): CBO is expected to release another analysis today of the GOP's effort to repeal Obamacare, weighing in on Senate Republicans' latest iteration. And budget analysts predict the score is likely to say the legislation would leave millions more uninsured than Obamacare, Adam Cancryn and Dan Diamond report. Meanwhile, Senate Republicans are busy moving the goalposts, planning to release a revised version of their bill as early as today, in an effort to quell growing dissent, Burgess Everett and Jennifer Haberkorn explain. Seldom have GOP leaders faced a more arduous whipping operation than now, with lawmakers from all wings of the party withholding support, Elana Schor and Seung Min Kim note.

We've got you covered on Obamacare coverage:

Sen. Ron Johnson ... slams the repeal plan, wants to 'slow the process down,' and isn't bluffing.

GOP opposition: Skepticism remains | Invitation to naysayers | Freedom Caucus holds fire

President Donald Trump weighs in: Dems 'own Obamacare' | Remember keep your doctor.

keep your plan'

States impact: Single-payer dreaming put on hold | Freedom to sell across state lines | GOP governors could be secret weapon

Political angling: Why Dems can't break through | Trump political arm tells GOP to get in line | Koch-backed group calls health fight 'humbling' | Pro-Trump group targets Heller

EDUCATION

SCOTUS SPEAKS: States can no longer close their coffers when religious schools come knocking. The Supreme Court ruled this morning that states can't deny funding for religious schools simply because they are religious, Benjamin Wermund reports. The court ruled 7-2 that Missouri wrongly denied a church a state grant for a playground "simply because of what it is — a church."

Vague on vouchers: The ruling, hailed as a victory by religious groups, is vague about hotly debated school choice policy, however. The court doesn't say whether states can legally prevent public money (in the form of tuition support) from going to religious organizations.

FALLING BEHIND: Supporters of a closely watched voucher program in Indiana got some bad news this morning. A new study found that Indiana students who received a voucher to swap their public educations for private schooling saw "substantial annual achievement losses" in math in their first few years, Caitlin Emma reports. A glimmer of hope? Students who stuck with private schools appeared to "make up" the difference in math scores within three to four years.

IMMIGRATION

'THE WALL' HAS ALREADY STALLED: Construction of the Trump administration's border wall prototype was supposed to begin last week in San Diego, but the Union-Tribune reports that bids for the $20 million project are still being reviewed. U.S. Customs and Border Protection declined to say what caused the delay, or whether the agency has reviewed options for putting solar panels on the structure, Ian Kullgren reports for Morning Shift.

DEFENSE

SUCK IT UP: In a Q&A with Greg Hellman, Sen. Deb Fischer complained that the upper chamber should be more lickety-split in moving forward on defense spending. "I have found that very frustrating that we pass a NDAA, and two weeks later we can't get on a defense appropriations bill," she said. "We all vote for authorization of these programs and then won't even take up an appropriations bill to fund them. I don't know how you go home and justify that to people in your state. So, I think, suck it up, we need to start doing our job and taking on appropriations bills."

JOBS

MINIMUM WAGE WOES: University of Washington researchers are out today with a study showing that Seattle's $13 minimum wage has reduced the hours of low-wage workers by 9.4 percent. The study examined the first two hikes in Seattle's $15 minimum wage law, from $9.47 to $11 in 2015 and to $13 in 2016. The first round had little effect, the research found. But in the second, hours for low-wage workers fell by 3.5 million per quarter, Ian Kullgren explains.

ENTITLEMENTS

CAN'T HAVE IT BOTH WAYS: In her latest episode of The Global Politico podcast, Susan Glasser chats with Rep. Adam Kinzinger, who points to Trump's infrastructure investment plan and refusal to tamper with Social Security as flashpoints for the presidency. If you want to increase military spending and drive down the debt, "it's going to take entitlements," Kinzinger says. "Both sides know that," he adds. "We just pretend like it's not the case."

The infrastructure mismatch: Kinzinger says he's personally "very supportive" of Trump's infrastructure dreams. "We have to build this country," he said. "And frankly, as a conservative Republican, if you read the Constitution, it outlines the role of the federal government in infrastructure." But the vision could be a tougher sell, "with other members who are more budget hawk-focused," Kinzinger warns.

POLITICAL STRATEGY

HOPEFUL, BUT WORRIED: Reporting from Colorado, Kevin Robillard sets the scene for us at the summer seminar meeting of the Koch brothers' network of conservative groups: Donors see a major opportunity this year to achieve years-old Republican goals of reforming the tax code and passing a new health care law. But they are also consumed with worry that the GOP will somehow blow the chance it has been waiting for — whether because of an unfocused president or fretful congressional Republicans.

EARMARKS

- $6.5 billion debt for 100,000 residents of U.S. Virgin Islands. The New York Times.
- Johnson: 'Where the Senate health bill fails.' The New York Times.
- How the right gets Reagan wrong. POLITICO Magazine.
- Senate Democrats: Boost domestic spending, not just defense. The Associated Press.
- Corporate tax rate at 28% seen as more likely than historic cut. Bloomberg News.

ON TAP TUESDAY

9:30 a.m. — The Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Interior and the Environment holds a hearing on EPA's budget. 124 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

10 a.m. — The House Appropriations Committee holds a hearing on the budget for the United Nations and international organizations. 2359 Rayburn House Office Building.

10 a.m. — The Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Financial Services and General Government holds a hearing on budgets for the SEC and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. 138 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

10:30 a.m. — The Senate Appropriations Labor-HHS Subcommittee holds a hearing on the Labor Department's budget. 192 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

WE'RE COUNTING: 96 days until federal funding runs out, the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal and the National Flood Insurance Program expires. 461 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018). [Who knows how many] days until the nation will default if the debt limit isn't raised.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/06/house-republicans-zero-in-on-defense-spending-deal-023491>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Budget committee nearing deal with defense hawks Back

By Sarah Ferris | 06/24/2017 04:40 PM EDT

The House Budget Committee is nearing an agreement with defense hawks to advance its long-awaited budget resolution next week, a GOP aide familiar with the talks confirmed Saturday.

The House GOP's tentative deal would cap base defense spending at $621 billion for fiscal year 2018 — the same level proposed by budget-writers last week, but with a $10 billion boost to war spending.

The budget committee would also agree to raise defense levels by 5 percent annually over the next three years.

As part of the compromise, the House Budget Committee bumped up its request for mandatory cuts through reconciliation. The committee will now seek $200 billion in cuts over 10 years, up from $150 billion.

The dispute over defense spending remains the key sticking point as the House Budget Committee aimed to release its markup next week.

The updated numbers came out of Friday meetings between Budget Chairwoman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) and House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry.

Budget-writers are seeking to nail down the figures this weekend, ahead of the Monday night markup of the House's defense appropriations bill.

To view online click here.

Back

House defense spending bill released Back

By Connor O'Brien | 06/25/2017 07:55 PM EDT

The House Appropriations Committee today released fiscal 2018 defense spending legislation.

Text of the measure is here, and a summary is here.

The legislation allocates $584 billion for the base Pentagon budget and an extra $74 billion in war funding.

The bill appears to conform to an emerging House Republican spending framework, which calls for $621 billion in national defense spending, including funding for the Pentagon's base budget, military infrastructure programs and nuclear programs under the Energy Department.

Like the House Armed Services Committee version of the National Defense Authorization Act, the legislation funds more active-duty Army troops than requested by the Pentagon, as well as a higher 2.4 percent military pay raise. It also funds procurement of 11 Navy ships as well as 84 F-35 Joint Strike Fighters, 24 F/A-18 Super Hornets and 56 Army UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters.

The Defense Appropriations Subcommittee is set to mark up the measure in a closed session Monday evening.

To view online click here.

Back

Defense spending bill bars a new BRAC Back

By Connor O'Brien | 06/26/2017 08:45 AM EDT

The newly released House defense appropriations bill would prohibit a new round of base realignment and closure.

The fiscal 2018 defense spending measure is set to be marked up by the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee today.

If adopted by the full House, the provision, which would bar funding "to propose, plan for, or execute" a BRAC, would be a blow to Pentagon efforts to close excess infrastructure, which defense leaders have said could save as much as $2 billion a year once implemented.

The Pentagon's budget proposes waiting until 2021 to implement BRAC.

In recent years, the Pentagon has faced staunch skepticism from many lawmakers wary of closing bases in their home states as well as the upfront costs of a BRAC and whether the proposal would generate savings. So, it appears unlikely Congress would greenlight a new round of base closures this year.

The House version of the National Defense Authorization Act includes no provision barring BRAC, but doesn't specifically authorize a new round either.

To view online click here.

Back

CBO score sure to add to McConnell's headaches Back

By Adam Cancryn and Dan Diamond | 06/26/2017 05:26 AM EDT

The CBO is poised to tell Senate Republicans this week that their health plan will leave millions more uninsured than Obamacare — with the losses estimated from 15 million to 22 million over a decade, according to a half-dozen budget analysts polled by POLITICO.

"What I can say with confidence is that the Senate bill will lead to very large coverage losses," predicted Matt Fiedler of the Brookings Institution, which had previewed the CBO score of the House bill in March but declined to do so for the Senate. "The only question is how large."

And that could complicate GOP leaders' attempts to corral wavering moderates as they race to lock down votes ahead of a possible vote by week's end to give President Donald Trump his first legislative victory.

Uncommitted moderates, like Sens. Rob Portman of Ohio, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, will face increasing pressure to oppose the bill. All hail from states that have expanded Medicaid, where hundreds of thousands of newly covered Americans might lose coverage.

Some senators have already staked out opposition to significant declines in coverage. "I cannot support a bill that's going to result in tens of millions of people losing their health insurance," Sen. Susan Collins of Maine said on Thursday.

Senate Republicans can afford to lose only two votes to pass their bill through the budget reconciliation process on a party-line vote.

The CBO score of the House bill — which was released 10 days before an initially planned floor vote and projected a coverage decline of 24 million people — was a factor in House Speaker Paul Ryan's decision to cancel the vote in late March, as many moderates said they couldn't vote for the legislation as written and needed more time to review it. Rep. Ryan Costello (R-Pa.), who voted for the bill in committee, was among the handful of House Republicans who ended up deciding to vote against the bill after the CBO score.

But nearly all House members ended up backing the final bill without waiting for an updated score. Several weeks later, the budget analysts found a coverage decline of 23 million over a decade for that plan.

The CBO score of the Senate bill, expected as early as Monday, is nearly certain to project major declines in coverage because of the bill's significant funding cuts to Medicaid, budget experts said.

Given the bill's myriad waiver possibilities and the time crunch, some organizations said they aren't bothering to run formal analyses this time.

"We gave up," said one budget expert who has analyzed the Republican bill. "Too much uncertainty."

By all accounts, there is no threshold uninsured number that would kill the bill. GOP senators are already attempting to inoculate themselves from political blowback by assailing the budget office's reliability, a running attack by the party since the health care process began.

"I have a lot of questions about the accuracy of the CBO," said Wyoming Sen. John Barrasso.

Republican budget experts have bemoaned those attacks. "Should Republicans take CBO seriously? Somewhat tongue-in-cheek, they have no choice," said Bill Hoagland, who was an early employee of the budget office and later worked for former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "The rules and procedures under the Budget Act require that cost estimates be prepared by CBO."

Doug Holtz-Eakin, a former head of the CBO and the leader of the conservative American Action Forum, says he's upset by some of the criticism but understands where it comes from, too.

"I believe it's reasonable for people to disagree where CBO comes down sometimes," Holtz-Eakin said. "I don't like it when people attack the integrity of CBO or somehow accuse them of tilting the playing field. But they're just going to struggle with this. They are."

Some Republicans like Ryan have attacked the CBO's projections but also touted numbers published by the office — when it suits them.

"The CBO does a great job, by and large, on how much something costs," Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price said on Sunday. "They do a relatively poor job on what the coverage consequences of a health plan are."

Hoagland observed that Republicans "like the spending savings associated with the reduction in Medicaid, but they don't like the number estimated to reduce coverage."

"You can't have it both ways," he said.

While the Senate bill includes many similar provisions as the House bill, it also includes changes to Obamacare subsidies and other insurance market reforms that could make the decline slightly smaller.

Some Senate Republicans have spent years praising the CBO's reliability and accuracy; Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley has repeatedly said that CBO is "like God" in Washington.

"There are those who will want to discount a CBO score," said Sen. Jerry Moran of Kansas. But "it's what we have here, it's what we utilize, and I think it's an important discussion."

Several senators said they're explicitly waiting for the CBO report to understand the broader implications of the bill. "There is a possibility when we see the CBO score that the Republican plan spends more than the Democrats have been spending," said Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), who has been a critic of the GOP health care effort.

"My analysis is that [consumers'] out-of-pocket costs would increase under the Senate bill," Collins said. "That's one of my major concerns, we'll have to see what CBO says."

That kind of scope is one reason the CBO projections are so important, budget analysts say.

"I would be very, very worried for Republicans to dismiss the CBO estimates," Hoagland said. "It was established specifically for the purpose of what we're going through — an objective analysis of [major] Congressional legislation."

To view online click here.

Back

Senate GOP revises health bill in hunt for votes Back

By Burgess Everett and Jennifer Haberkorn | 06/26/2017 08:29 AM EDT

Senate Republicans released a revised version of their bill to repeal Obamacare Monday and are preparing further changes to overcome deep opposition in the party toward last week's initial effort, according to people familiar with the matter.

The updated text is intended to promote continuous health coverage, which was left out of the discussion draft released Thursday and is designed to encourage people to buy insurance ahead of an emergency.

The Republican leadership and its allies as well, as President Donald Trump, are working furiously to tamp down criticism of the legislation and a voting timetable that will provide perhaps just a couple days for senators to review the final product.

Trump called undecided GOP senators including Ron Johnson of Wisconsin, Rand Paul of Kentucky, Ted Cruz of Texas and Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia to feel them out on healthcare, said White House press secretary Sean Spicer on Monday afternoon.

In a pointed exchange with conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt on Monday, Johnson said the bill does "nothing adequate to bring down the premiums" and said that Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) should allow more time before a vote. Hewitt responded: "That's why you got reelected, to pass this bill this week. It's a disaster not to do so."

"You don't have to do it this week. I just completely disagree ... I see what leadership's trying to do. They're trying to jam this thing through," Johnson said.

Pressed on how he will vote if forced to do so this week, Johnson said he prefers not to kill the bill: "I've not said I'm a no. But I'm not a yes yet."

Despite the complaints, Republicans are still expecting a vote this week as McConnell aims to reach a conclusion before the July 4 recess.

After previously leaving the door open to a vote next month, party whip John Cornyn of Texas said on Twitter that "we need to do it this week before double digit premium increases are announced for next year."

Most people in the party's leadership believe that letting the bill hang out over a recess will result in more "no" votes and hurt the GOP's momentum. Earlier on Monday, the president also suggested that the party could let insurance markets collapse if the bill fails this week.

"Republican Senators are working very hard to get there, with no help from the Democrats. Not easy! Perhaps just let OCare crash & burn!" Trump said in a tweet.

Adding to the GOP's problems, the American Medical Association — the nation's largest trade group of physicians — announced its opposition to the Republican bill Monday because it would violate medicine's standard to "first, do no harm." The medical group supported the passage of Obamacare, an endorsement Republicans have long held against the organization

Republicans did get one nod of approval. Insurance company Anthem said the Senate bill "will markedly improve the stability of the individual market and moderate premium increases" but acknowledged the company is still reviewing the "challenges the current bill proposes" to Medicaid.

A number of Republican senators have balked at the initial draft of the bill, with several more moderate members blasting it from the center for its strict future Medicaid spending constraints and more conservative senators like Johnson railing against the bill as only a partial repeal of Obamacare.

The revised Senate bill would include a six-month "lock out" period in which people who don't have insurance have to wait before their policy takes effect. The lock out would apply to people who have been uninsured for at least 63 days; people would not have to pay their premiums during that time. The House bill would have allowed insurance companies to charge uninsured people up to 30 percent more for up to one year.

This proposal represents the GOP alternative to Obamacare's individual mandate, which is deeply unpopular but helps keep insurance markets afloat.

A White House official said there will be big changes to the bill after the Congressional Budget Office score, which will determine "how much can be given to the moderates."

Sen. Dean Heller (R-Nev.) shocked Republicans on Friday by strongly opposing the current draft of the bill for its Medicaid cuts, even after McConnell had implored senators not to take hard lines and remain open to continuing negotiations. A Trump-affiliated outside group has threatened him with attacks ads.

Changing minds in the Senate may prove far more difficult than in the House.

Heller is the most vulnerable Republican senator up for reelection next year, and it may be politically helpful for him to oppose a bill that cuts benefits to low-income voters in his state. On the flip-side, Johnson and conservative Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky and Mike Lee of Utah may feel less pressure from the president and McConnell to support a bill they view as imperfect because they were just reelected to six-year terms last fall.

CBO announced it will release its analysis on Monday, which could affect the positions of many Republicans. The CBO score is likely to reflect the revisions dealing with continuous coverage, which may help improve the bill's coverage numbers.

Shortly after the bill text was released Thursday, senior Republican aides acknowledged the policy was missing from the bill and they were still trying to find legislative language that would get by the parliamentarian. If they can't get anything through, they would rely on HHS Secretary Tom Price to tighten enrollment rules, according to a Republican source.

Because Republicans are keeping the requirement that insurance companies accept everyone regardless of their pre-existing conditions, which is expensive for insurance companies, the GOP needs some policy to encourage people to buy insurance. Without it, insurance companies would experience a death spiral of too many costs coming in and not enough healthy people to balance it out.

Josh Dawsey contributed to this story.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate Republicans skeptical Obamacare repeal can pass this week Back

By Elana Schor and Seung Min Kim | 06/25/2017 02:23 PM EDT

Senate Republicans are casting doubt on their leaders' plans to vote this week on repealing Obamacare, with lawmakers from all wings of the party so far withholding support from the massive reshaping of the health care law that they campaigned on for seven years.

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky faces problems from seemingly every corner of his conference, and — from wary moderates to conservatives and even leadership allies — few Republicans were willing Sunday to predict the Senate repeal bill could pass this week, before lawmakers leave Washington for a weeklong July 4 recess.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) outlined "very serious concerns" about GOP leaders' bill on ABC's "This Week," saying that "it's certainly going to be very difficult" for McConnell to win the 50 votes he needs to pass it on such a tight time frame.

Collins said her biggest problems with the Republican Obamacare repeal bill are its steep Medicaid cuts and effects on older Americans' premiums. The draft would let insurers charge older people more for plans than Obamacare does.

On the other ideological end of the GOP Conference, conservatives were also flashing yellow lights.

"There's no way we should be voting on this" before the recess, Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) told NBC's "Meet the Press," urging his party's leaders to "not rush this process."

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn, speaking to reporters at the Koch Brothers' donor conference in Colorado Springs, said he was unsure if Republicans would be able to round up the votes. He said the party needed to move quickly, and things were on schedule for a vote this week.

"We don't have the luxury of waiting around. It's not going to get easier," Cornyn said, identifying Aug. 1 as a "drop-dead line."

Asked if President Donald Trump was doing enough to help the bill over the finish line, the Texas Republican responded: "We're trying to hold him back a little bit."

It is not yet clear what changes McConnell would accept to win over critics. An attempt in the House of Representatives in March to quickly push through Obamacare repeal legislation was unsuccessful, but Republicans narrowly passed a tweaked version a little more than a month later. GOP leaders, including President Donald Trump, have said the Senate draft is open to negotiation.

Still, the surprising level of criticism from Republicans so far — no Democrats are expected to support repealing Obamacare — has made Senate leaders' goal to vote this week seem optimistic.

Johnson, for example, emerged as an unexpected skeptic after the push to repeal Obamacare helped propel him into office in 2010. He joined three other conservatives Thursday — just hours after McConnell released the details — to announce they would not vote for the legislation in its current form.

The GOP leadership's problems grew deeper on Friday, when Sen. Dean Heller of Nevada, widely viewed as the most vulnerable Republican senator on the ballot next year, also came out in opposition to the bill.

In addition to the five senators who have announced that they don't support the Republican health care measure as currently written, several others remain publicly up in the air.

"Right now, I am undecided," said Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.), who had crafted an Obamacare alternative with Collins that had gained little traction with the rest of the conference. "There are things in this bill that adversely affect my state that are peculiar to my state."

Cassidy urged Senate GOP leaders to slow the bill down: "I don't know quite why the rush."

"I, frankly, would like more days to consider this," Cassidy said. "That'll probably be a discussion coming back. I think a few more days to consider will be helpful."

Republicans are also facing resistance from key governors worried about the bill's cuts to Medicaid. A forthcoming estimate from the Congressional Budget Office about the bill's impact on premiums and the number of the uninsured could turn off lawmakers who are on the fence.

The CBO report is expected early this week. On "Fox News Sunday," Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price attempted to pre-empt the analysis by arguing that the agency has been "woefully inadequate" in predicting the coverage impact of health care measures.

Rural health groups, medical organizations and other hospital associations have already come out in opposition. During a debate on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) pointedly noted to Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) that the head of the Wyoming Hospital Association and the CEO of a major Wyoming hospital had both announced opposition to the GOP health care measure. (Barrasso responded that the hospital CEO hadn't read the bill.)

Republican Ohio Gov. John Kasich on Sunday declined to urge Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio) to oppose the bill but underscored his own opposition.

"I'm not saying just kill the bill," Kasich told CNN. "Let's get something that is going to work ... stabilizing all these issues around insurance and coverage, and then get to the heart of the matter, which is the rising costs of health care — frankly, which this bill doesn't begin to even do."

Planned Parenthood remains a sticking point for some; the bill cuts off its federal funding for a year. Collins, who along with Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) opposes defunding the women's health group, said Sunday that she is "optimistic we'll prevail" on that issue, though removing that language could alienate social conservatives who have long advocated cutting funds for Planned Parenthood.

Another conservative opposing GOP leaders' current bill, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said on Sunday that his party's leadership has "promised too much." He focused his frustration on how much the GOP repeal bill leaves intact Obamacare's subsidies for health coverage.

"I will get to yes if they change their approach," Paul said in an interview with ABC. "And will they change their approach if they don't get 50? I think they ought to. Why don't we whittle it down to what the whole caucus agrees on?"

Administration officials and Senate leaders tried to downplay the internal discord, saying they would work with Paul, Heller, Johnson and Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Mike Lee of Utah to modify the bill to win them over.

"Every one of them is committed to a fundamental change away from Obamacare and central government control and into local control and patients making decisions," Barrasso, a member of leadership, said of the five GOP holdouts.

Barrasso added: "I believe we'll get it passed, and that's the only way we can fundamentally change away from Obamacare."

Nebraska Sen. Ben Sasse, speaking to donors, said he was about 40 percent done reading the legislation. But he wasn't prepared to say he would vote for it. Koch network leaders have been critical of the proposal, but haven't announced outright opposition.

"This is largely a Medicaid reform package," Sasse said, lamenting Republicans didn't have the 60 votes necessary for a "full repeal or full replace piece of legislation."

Pressed by the moderator for a position, Sasse dodged. "This session is actually on the record, right? There's press here?," he said. "I have nothing to announce today."

Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), speaking on CBS' "Face the Nation," also stressed to his conservative colleagues that the GOP measure was a "first step" and "not the last step." Meanwhile, Price argued that the legislation would stabilize insurance markets so insurers would return to communities they've recently abandoned, while offering flexibility to both consumers and to states.

"It's significant reform," Price said on Fox. "It's a move in a much better direction, because it is a patient-centered move."

If McConnell cannot muster 50 votes to take up his Obamacare repeal bill this week, it remains unclear whether he would return to the effort after July 4 or move on to other top GOP priorities, including tax cuts and raising the federal debt limit.

"I think they have, at best, a 50-50 chance of passing this bill," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York said on "This Week."

Should Republicans fail to push repeal through the Senate, Schumer said, he would reach out to the White House to renew his offer of a bipartisan discussion on ways to fix Obamacare without repealing the law.

Some Republicans said they thought McConnell could still pull it off.

"This is still a work in progress, although the leader of the United States Senate is very good at establishing coalitions to see that legislation passes," Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) said on Fox's "Sunday Futures." "I just don't know whether the votes will be there by the end of the week."

Kevin Robillard contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP Sen. Johnson slams new health care bill in NYT op-ed Back

By Louis Nelson | 06/26/2017 08:04 AM EDT

The Senate legislation introduced last week to repeal and replace Obamacare falls short of addressing systemic problems in the U.S. health care industry, a Republican lawmaker who opposes the bill wrote in a New York Times op-ed published Monday.

Sen. Ron Johnson of Wisconsin, one of five GOP senators who has announced opposition to the repeal-and-replace measure, said the bill does not go far enough in undoing certain Obamacare provisions and follows too closely in the mold of past government solutions instead of taking problem-solving strategies from the private sector.

"Like many other senators, I had hoped that this was where things were headed during the last several weeks as the Republican bill was discussed," Johnson wrote. "We're disappointed that the discussion draft turns its back on this simple solution and goes with something far too familiar: throwing money at the problem."

With a 52-seat majority in the Senate, Republican leaders can afford to lose the support of just two members of their caucus and still pass the repeal-and-replace legislation that has been a top GOP priority for years. Republican leadership in the Senate has said the chamber will vote on the bill later this week.

Johnson said it was unacceptable that the GOP proposal leaves in place a provision banning insurers from denying coverage to those with pre-existing conditions or charging them more, rules he said "drive up the cost of insurance for everyone." Also unacceptable are increases for health care subsidies, he wrote.

In attacking Obamacare itself, the Wisconsin senator recalled the words of former President Bill Clinton, who described the health care legislation as "the craziest thing in the world" during a campaign stop on behalf of his wife, 2016 Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, a remark that quickly became a GOP talking point despite the former president's subsequent backtracking.

Obamacare, Johnson said, has "virtually eliminated the power of consumer-driven, free-market discipline from one-sixth of our economy." He pointed to laser eye surgery, which grew cheaper and more prevalent when it was not covered by most insurance plans, as evidence that health care is not immune to market forces.

A better solution than the one currently on the table would further loosen regulations, Johnson said, "so that Americans can choose to purchase insurance that suits their needs and that they can afford." The Wisconsin senator said protections for individuals with pre-existing conditions should be modeled on pre-Obamacare programs in states like his own, which relied on high-risk pools.

With regulations sufficiently loosened, Johnson wrote, "the market [can] begin to rein in the underlying cost of health care itself and reduce the cost of taxpayer subsidies." He left open the option of working with Senate leadership to alter the bill enough for him to support it.

"Republican leaders have told us the plan unveiled last week is a draft, open to discussion and improvement," Johnson wrote. "I look forward to working with Senate leadership and the president to improve the bill so it addresses the plight of the forgotten men and women by returning freedom and choice to health care."

To view online click here.

Back

Johnson: No quick Senate vote on Obamacare overhaul Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 06/25/2017 11:21 AM EDT

One of the Republican senators initially opposing legislation to overhaul Obamacare said he does not want a quick vote on the bill.

Sen. Ron Johnson, speaking today on NBC's "Meet the Press," said "I'm not a 'yes', yet" on the bill unveiled last week by Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. Johnson is joined by Sens. Rand Paul, Ted Cruz and Mike Lee and Dean Heller in initial opposition to the bill.

"What I'd like to do is slow the process down, get the information, go through the problem-solving process actually reduce these premiums that artificially driven up because of Obamacare mandates," Johnson said.

"I would like to delay the thing," he said. There is no way we should be voting on this next week ... I have been encouraging leadership, the White House anybody I can talk to for quite some time let's not rush this process. Let's have the integrity to show the American people what it is."

Other Republicans said they are skeptical about a vote this week.

"I hate to say this but I just don't know whether the votes will be there by the end of the week," Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) said on Fox News.

To view online click here.

Back

The surprising GOP holdout on the Senate's health bill Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 06/24/2017 07:36 AM EDT

Ron Johnson stormed Washington in 2010 by railing against Obamacare, becoming one of the law's harshest and most persistent critics. Now, with the Senate on the brink of repealing the law, he's one of the surprise holdouts threatening to block the bill.

The Wisconsin Republican says Senate leaders are rushing the vote before he and the public can analyze it and are not doing enough to actually bring down premiums. He joined with a trio of Senate conservatives on Thursday who say they're open to negotiation but can't support Majority Leader Mitch McConnell's bill as it is.

"It's not a bluff," Johnson told POLITICO. "Until I have the information where I am certain this is ... in the best interest for the folks in Wisconsin — that this puts us in a better position tomorrow than we are today — I'm not going to be voting yes."

By joining with Sens. Rand Paul, Ted Cruz and Mike Lee, Johnson has significant leverage. McConnell can only lose two of his 52 Republicans for the bill to still pass — so he'll have to pick off at least two conservatives, depending on whether he can keep every other Senate Republican on board. McConnell's job got tougher Friday when Sen. Dean Heller (R-Nev.) said he would oppose the bill for being too conservative — because it doesn't protect states that expanded Medicaid under Obamacare.

The opposition from Paul, Cruz and Lee was somewhat expected. And even the opposition from Heller was not surprising, given that he is facing the Senate GOP's toughest reelection race next year.

But Johnson is rarely such a thorn in the side of GOP leaders.

Johnson's chief concerns are ensuring there is enough time to analyze the bill, driving down premiums and protecting states that refused Medicaid expansion as Wisconsin did. His opposition did not come as a surprise to Republicans working on the bill, who said he has been extremely vocal in closed-door GOP conference meetings. Johnson, a former business owner and accountant, has argued that Republicans need to rely less on politics and more on policy experts such as actuaries and insurance executives to craft their bill — a request that leadership tried to meet by bringing them to meetings.

Johnson, as well as the other Senate conservatives opposing the original draft, have been careful to leave wiggle room for negotiation, honoring McConnell's request to not publicly slam the door shut. Republicans working on the bill believe they can win over the Wisconsinite by connecting him with experts and officials who can address his concerns, such as CEOs of insurance companies or Wisconsin institutions.

"I've been voicing this repeatedly throughout the process," Johnson said of his need for information. After Thursday's meeting where Senate leaders unveiled the legislation, "I had a number of staff members come over offering to provide whatever information I need, which is good."

GOP leaders say the strongest argument they have for winning over Johnson — or any other Republican on the fence — is that they all promised to repeal Obamacare.

"Everybody needs to be thinking about voting no and particularly if you're the vote that takes it down," a Republican senator said of the leadership strategy. "We can afford to lose a couple but after that," the senator said, trailing off.

That argument may carry more resonance with Johnson — or embolden him to ensure the GOP bill goes as far as possible to repeal Obamacare. Johnson had made a mark in Washington by opposing Obamacare. Much of his 2010 Senate race against the Democratic incumbent, Russ Feingold, was focused on disparaging the recently passed health care law. Since then, Johnson has sponsored many anti-Obamacare bills and even tried to take an Obamacare legal challenge to the Supreme Court.

But Johnson is beholden to few in Washington. He largely self-financed his 2010 race as a political neophyte. In his reelection race last year, establishment Republicans largely gave up on Johnson's reelection chances and sent precious campaign dollars elsewhere in the country.

Johnson says he wants to see a CBO score on the health bill, which is expected early next week — just days before McConnell plans to hold a vote. He said he needs time to analyze the bill's impact on the health system, doctors and hospitals.

"I have a hard time believing I'll have that information prior to when leadership may want to vote on this," he said Thursday.

Johnson raised his concerns about Medicaid funding levels with President Donald Trump at a White House meeting with other lawmakers last week. His other major beef is that the bill won't do enough to reduce premiums — a chief complaint among Cruz, Lee and Paul. They would like the bill to repeal Obamacare's requirement that insurance companies accept everyone regardless of a pre-existing condition — a political non-starter with many other Republicans. The Senate conservatives say there are other ways to protect people with medical problems, such as high-risk pools.

"The primary driver of premium increases is guaranteed issue," Johnson said, referring to the Obamacare protection for pre-existing conditions. "We really should be talking about providing individuals the freedom to purchase the kind of health care products they want to buy not being dictated by the federal government."

To view online click here.

Back

Senate Republicans skeptical Obamacare repeal can pass this week Back

By Elana Schor and Seung Min Kim | 06/25/2017 02:23 PM EDT

Senate Republicans are casting doubt on their leaders' plans to vote this week on repealing Obamacare, with lawmakers from all wings of the party so far withholding support from the massive reshaping of the health care law that they campaigned on for seven years.

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky faces problems from seemingly every corner of his conference, and — from wary moderates to conservatives and even leadership allies — few Republicans were willing Sunday to predict the Senate repeal bill could pass this week, before lawmakers leave Washington for a weeklong July 4 recess.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) outlined "very serious concerns" about GOP leaders' bill on ABC's "This Week," saying that "it's certainly going to be very difficult" for McConnell to win the 50 votes he needs to pass it on such a tight time frame.

Collins said her biggest problems with the Republican Obamacare repeal bill are its steep Medicaid cuts and effects on older Americans' premiums. The draft would let insurers charge older people more for plans than Obamacare does.

On the other ideological end of the GOP Conference, conservatives were also flashing yellow lights.

"There's no way we should be voting on this" before the recess, Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) told NBC's "Meet the Press," urging his party's leaders to "not rush this process."

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn, speaking to reporters at the Koch Brothers' donor conference in Colorado Springs, said he was unsure if Republicans would be able to round up the votes. He said the party needed to move quickly, and things were on schedule for a vote this week.

"We don't have the luxury of waiting around. It's not going to get easier," Cornyn said, identifying Aug. 1 as a "drop-dead line."

Asked if President Donald Trump was doing enough to help the bill over the finish line, the Texas Republican responded: "We're trying to hold him back a little bit."

It is not yet clear what changes McConnell would accept to win over critics. An attempt in the House of Representatives in March to quickly push through Obamacare repeal legislation was unsuccessful, but Republicans narrowly passed a tweaked version a little more than a month later. GOP leaders, including President Donald Trump, have said the Senate draft is open to negotiation.

Still, the surprising level of criticism from Republicans so far — no Democrats are expected to support repealing Obamacare — has made Senate leaders' goal to vote this week seem optimistic.

Johnson, for example, emerged as an unexpected skeptic after the push to repeal Obamacare helped propel him into office in 2010. He joined three other conservatives Thursday — just hours after McConnell released the details — to announce they would not vote for the legislation in its current form.

The GOP leadership's problems grew deeper on Friday, when Sen. Dean Heller of Nevada, widely viewed as the most vulnerable Republican senator on the ballot next year, also came out in opposition to the bill.

In addition to the five senators who have announced that they don't support the Republican health care measure as currently written, several others remain publicly up in the air.

"Right now, I am undecided," said Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.), who had crafted an Obamacare alternative with Collins that had gained little traction with the rest of the conference. "There are things in this bill that adversely affect my state that are peculiar to my state."

Cassidy urged Senate GOP leaders to slow the bill down: "I don't know quite why the rush."

"I, frankly, would like more days to consider this," Cassidy said. "That'll probably be a discussion coming back. I think a few more days to consider will be helpful."

Republicans are also facing resistance from key governors worried about the bill's cuts to Medicaid. An forthcoming estimate from the Congressional Budget Office about the bill's impact on premiums and the number of the uninsured could turn off lawmakers who are on the fence.

The CBO report is expected early this week. On "Fox News Sunday," Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price attempted to pre-empt the analysis by arguing that the agency has been "woefully inadequate" in predicting the coverage impact of health care measures.

Rural health groups, medical organizations and other hospital associations have already come out in opposition. During a debate on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) pointedly noted to Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) that the head of the Wyoming Hospital Association and the CEO of a major Wyoming hospital had both announced opposition to the GOP health care measure. (Barrasso responded that the hospital CEO hadn't read the bill.)

Republican Ohio Gov. John Kasich on Sunday declined to urge Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio) to oppose the bill but underscored his own opposition.

"I'm not saying just kill the bill," Kasich told CNN. "Let's get something that is going to work ... stabilizing all these issues around insurance and coverage, and then get to the heart of the matter, which is the rising costs of health care — frankly, which this bill doesn't begin to even do."

Planned Parenthood remains a sticking point for some; the bill cuts off its federal funding for a year. Collins, who along with Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) opposes defunding the women's health group, said Sunday that she is "optimistic we'll prevail" on that issue, though removing that language could alienate social conservatives who have long advocated cutting funds for Planned Parenthood.

Another conservative opposing GOP leaders' current bill, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said on Sunday that his party's leadership has "promised too much." He focused his frustration on how much the GOP repeal bill leaves intact Obamacare's subsidies for health coverage.

"I will get to yes if they change their approach," Paul said in an interview with ABC. "And will they change their approach if they don't get 50? I think they ought to. Why don't we whittle it down to what the whole caucus agrees on?"

Administration officials and Senate leaders tried to downplay the internal discord, saying they would work with Paul, Heller, Johnson and Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Mike Lee of Utah to modify the bill to win them over.

"Every one of them is committed to a fundamental change away from Obamacare and central government control and into local control and patients making decisions," Barrasso, a member of leadership, said of the five GOP holdouts.

Barrasso added: "I believe we'll get it passed, and that's the only way we can fundamentally change away from Obamacare."

Nebraska Sen. Ben Sasse, speaking to donors, said he was about 40 percent done reading the legislation. But he wasn't prepared to say he would vote for it. Koch network leaders have been critical of the proposal, but haven't announced outright opposition.

"This is largely a Medicaid reform package," Sasse said, lamenting Republicans didn't have the 60 votes necessary for a "full repeal or full replace piece of legislation."

Pressed by the moderator for a position, Sasse dodged. "This session is actually on the record, right? There's press here?," he said. "I have nothing to announce today."

Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), speaking on CBS' "Face the Nation," also stressed to his conservative colleagues that the GOP measure was a "first step" and "not the last step." Meanwhile, Price argued that the legislation would stabilize insurance markets so insurers would return to communities they've recently abandoned, while offering flexibility to both consumers and to states.

"It's significant reform," Price said on Fox. "It's a move in a much better direction, because it is a patient-centered move."

If McConnell cannot muster 50 votes to take up his Obamacare repeal bill this week, it remains unclear whether he would return to the effort after July 4 or move on to other top GOP priorities, including tax cuts and raising the federal debt limit.

"I think they have, at best, a 50-50 chance of passing this bill," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York said on "This Week."

Should Republicans fail to push repeal through the Senate, Schumer said, he would reach out to the White House to renew his offer of a bipartisan discussion on ways to fix Obamacare without repealing the law.

Some Republicans said they thought McConnell could still pull it off.

"This is still a work in progress, although the leader of the United States Senate is very good at establishing coalitions to see that legislation passes," Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) said on Fox's "Sunday Futures." "I just don't know whether the votes will be there by the end of the week."

Kevin Robillard contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Price invites GOP foes of Obamacare overhaul to keep talking Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 06/25/2017 09:57 AM EDT

A top Trump administration official leading Obamacare overhaul efforts sought Sunday to placate members of his own party in the Senate who are opposing legislation unveiled last week.

Tom Price, secretary of Health and Human Services, said on "Fox News Sunday" that President Donald Trump and others are talking with the five Senate Republicans who have said they do not support the Senate version of an Obamacare overhaul. They are Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky, Ted Cruz of Texas, Mike Lee of Utah, Ron Johnson of Wisconsin and Dean Heller of Nevada.

Those senators have said "we want to be able to support this bill," Price said about conversations with the five holdouts.

Responding to a question about Heller's opposition over concerns about Medicaid, Price said, "Medicaid isn't the only vehicle to be able to purchase coverage or to be able to have coverage." And to Paul, Price said that Obamacare's "penalties go away" in the Senate legislation. "There are 6.5 million folks who are paying $3 billion for the privilege of not purchasing that coverage," said Price.

"What we're trying to do here, admittedly, is to thread a needle to make it so that, as the president says, every single American needs to be able to have access to the kind of coverage that they want," Price said, adding that conversations with Republican holdouts are ongoing.

"That's the nature of the legislative process, and that's what we'll be working through this week."

To view online click here.

Back

Freedom Caucus holds fire on Senate Obamacare repeal bill Back

By Kyle Cheney and Rachael Bade | 06/25/2017 07:12 AM EDT

The most hard-line conservatives in the House are taking an unusually cautious approach to the Senate's Obamacare replacement, promising to keep an open mind about whatever their colleagues across the Capitol send back.

It's a change in strategy for the House Freedom Caucus.

When House leaders first released a health care bill in February, for instance, group members took to television talk shows to pan the plan as "Obamacare lite," furious that it didn't, in their eyes, do enough to unravel the 2010 health care law.

They also threatened to withhold their support until changes were made, and later won concessions.

For now, those hardball tactics have disappeared. As the Senate looks to pass its own health care legislation this week, those same House conservatives are taking a more measured approach — even as several conservatives in the Senate are currently balking at the bill.

"I would like it to be better, but if this is the best we can do across the whole conference and the whole Congress, I have to respect that," said Rep. Scott Perry (R-Pa.), a Freedom Caucus member.

Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said last week that he — and the majority of the group — would likely back the Senate measure if it includes a few changes offered by conservative ally Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas). And he's signaled in recent weeks a willingness to bend on other Freedom Caucus priorities, including state waivers for Obamacare regulations that were essential to winning over the hard-liners' support in the House just a few weeks ago.

As senators began negotiating, the Freedom Caucus refrained from taking formal positions on ideas floating around the upper chamber that many in their ranks would have once rushed to oppose. And Freedom Caucus vice chair Jim Jordan (R-Ohio) on Thursday said it's unlikely that they'll weigh in on the plan soon.

It's a notable change in tone from the typically rigid negotiating tactics of the Freedom Caucus. And it's all aimed squarely at allowing their Senate colleagues breathing room to conduct difficult negotiations.

"I'm optimistic that in the effort to find 51 votes in the Senate and 218 votes [in the House], that some of those compromises are being made," Meadows told reporters Thursday, hours after the Senate released its initial health care plan.

Since the House passed its bill in May, the Freedom Caucus has kept a low profile, freeing Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to find consensus without conservative House members blasting his every move.

In an interview late last month, Meadows even joked that his involvement would probably just tank the Senate process: "Leader McConnell doesn't need Mark Meadows to tell how to get consensus in the Senate. And quite frankly, the more that Mark Meadows tries to help him get consensus, the more difficult it is for him to get consensus, and I'm very self-aware of that."

It's more than just simple courtesy. McConnell is working in a highly polarized Senate to cobble together 50 votes for a health care package. With no Democrats expected to support the measure, he can afford to lose only two of the chamber's 52 Republicans.

Already, four conservative senators — Cruz, Mike Lee (R-Utah), Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) — have said they can't support the bill without amendments to dismantle more of Obamacare. A fifth senator, Dean Heller (R-Nev.), is pulling in the opposite direction, warning that the initial bill cuts too deeply into Medicaid and Obamacare's protections for him to support it.

Meadows and the Freedom Caucus are still hoping to assert themselves before the final version of the bill is passed, but they're doing it in uncharacteristically subtle ways.

The group's leaders, including Meadows, Jordan and Raúl Labrador (R-Idaho), have kept in touch with conservative senators, especially Lee, as well as Johnson.

Meadows has also quietly been working with mainstream Senate Republicans to ward off changes that might erode conservative support — and to signal just how far his allies might be willing to go in accepting more moderate tweaks to the bill.

For example, he's spoken to Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) about Thune's plan to increase tax credits for poorer individuals while cutting them on the wealthy. The Freedom Caucus has advocated against proposals for a refundable tax credit, but Meadows signaled in May that he's open to Thune's proposal.

Meadows also indicated several weeks ago that the Senate preference for a multiyear phase-out of Obamacare's Medicaid expansion won't necessarily be a deal-breaker, even though conservatives have grumbled that the House's shorter window was already too generous. And Meadows even indicated that he could possibly back the Senate bill if it weakens a conservative-favored provision that the House included: allowing states to waive core Obamacare coverage standards.

"If the waivers come out, there will be a number of other options that are put in their place that could potentially be just as meaningful in driving down premiums," he said.

There are also indications the Freedom Caucus' muted approach could change. One conservative source said the group's current stance isn't necessarily indicative of its posture this week, as negotiations in the Senate continue.

Perhaps the most crucial bellwether for conservative support the fate of Cruz's proposed amendments. The Texas firebrand has suggested allowing consumers to use their Obamacare tax credits to purchase insurance products that fall short of the health care law's coverage standards. That "consumer choice" amendment, along with a few other conservative additions, would virtually guarantee a majority of the Freedom Caucus' support, Meadows said Thursday.

Another flash point will come this week, when the Congressional Budget Office indicates the economic and coverage impact that the Senate bill is likely to have. CBO's analysis suggested that the House bill would result in 23 million fewer people with health coverage in the next decade, a metric that spooked some moderate senators, who deemed the House measure a nonstarter.

Conservatives will be looking a different CBO number: how the Senate bill affects premium increases, the most important thing to them.

"If CBO says this will continue to bring down premiums, and it protects pro-life and Planned Parenthood defunding and all, I'm open to it," Jordan said of the Senate proposal Thursday.

In the meantime, the drumbeat of news that insurers are pulling out of Obamacare's individual market exchanges has provided fuel for Republicans to push ahead with their plans. And it appears to be making it easier for some conservatives to swallow compromises.

"Is the bill that the Senate kicked out or the House bill my dream bill? No, it is not," Perry said. "However, the context is, what's happening now is failing, and we have an obligation to do what we can to fix it as best we can."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump: All Dems do is 'delay and complain. They own Obamacare!' Back

By Louis Nelson | 06/26/2017 09:08 AM EDT

Democrats who have loudly opposed Republican efforts to repeal and replace the Affordable Care Act "have no policies or ideas," President Donald Trump wrote online Monday morning, and are themselves responsible for the controversial healthcare legislation that GOP lawmakers have campaigned against for years.

"The Democrats have become nothing but OBSTRUCTIONISTS, they have no policies or ideas. All they do is delay and complain. They own ObamaCare!" Trump wrote on Twitter Monday morning. He followed up shortly with a second health care-related post: "Republican Senators are working very hard to get there, with no help from the Democrats. Not easy! Perhaps just let OCare crash & burn!"

The president's promise to repeal and replace his predecessor's signature healthcare legislation is nearing a key hurdle this week, when the Senate is scheduled to vote on a bill that would undo Obamacare. If passed, it would need to be reconciled with the House version, passed weeks ago, before making its way to Trump's desk.

Trump's labeling of Democrats as obstructionists has been a regular refrain, but with majorities in both the House and Senate, it is Republicans, not Democrats, who have thus far been the biggest obstacle to the president's repeal-and-replace promise.

It took GOP legislators in the House of Representatives two tries to pass a repeal-and-replace measure after weeks of working to strike a compromise between arch-conservative and moderate Republican members. The final version wound up passing by just a handful of votes.

And in the Senate, where the GOP majority is tighter, Republicans can afford to lose just two members of their caucus and still pass their bill to repeal and replace Obamacare. Already five GOP senators have expressed opposition to the bill, although all have left open the possibility that they could support it if changes are made.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump defends GOP health care bill, blasts Obamacare Back

By Rebecca Morin | 06/24/2017 11:10 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Saturday criticized the Affordable Care Act and Democratic opposition to the Senate's Obamacare repeal bill as he continues to push for its passage.

"Democrats slam GOP healthcare proposal as Obamacare premiums & deductibles increase by over 100%. Remember keep your doctor, keep your plan," the president wrote in an early morning tweet.

Senate Republicans unveiled their plan to repeal Obamacare — the Better Care Reconciliation Act — on Thursday. The bill needs 50 votes to pass but lacks the support of Senate Democrats and several Republican lawmakers.

According to new analysis released last week by Oliver Wyman Health, an actuarial firm, premiums could increase by 40 percent by 2018 under Obamacare.

White House spokeswoman Sarah Huckabee Sanders initially would not commit the White House to endorsing the plan during a Thursday press briefing. But Trump tweeted his support for the bill Thursday evening.

"I am very supportive of the Senate #HealthcareBill. Look forward to making it really special! Remember, ObamaCare is dead," Trump wrote Thursday night.

To view online click here.

Back

California's single payer dreaming put on hold Back

By Victoria Colliver | 06/23/2017 08:43 PM EDT

California's Assembly speaker on Friday decided not to advance the state's high-profile single-payer legislation, calling the effort "woefully incomplete," and sending it back to the Senate for more work.

The decision, which comes a day after the U.S. Senate released its version of the GOP plan to repeal Obamacare, deals a blow to Senate Bill 562, authored by state Sen. Ricardo Lara.

"We are disappointed that the robust debate about healthcare for all that started in the California Senate will not continue in the Assembly this year," Lara said in a statement. "This issue is not going away, and millions of Californians are counting on their elected leaders to protect the health of their families and communities."

This speaker's move does not kill SB 562 because it's been introduced in the first year of a two-year session.

"The Senate can use that time to fill the holes in SB 562 and pass and send to the Assembly workable legislation that addresses financing, delivery of care, and cost control," said Assembly Speaker Anthony Rendon in a statement, in which he described himself as a supporter of single payer, but noted the bill has "potentially fatal flaws."

The bill's primary sponsor, the California Nurses Association, immediately condemned the Speaker's decision, calling his late Friday afternoon announcement "a cowardly act, developed in secret without engaging the thousands of Californians who have rallied to enact real health care reform."

"Speaker Rendon's decision is especially ironic given the pending action by the U.S. Senate to withdraw health coverage for millions of Americans, including Californians, and drastically increase costs for tens of millions more of the most ill among us," Deborah Burger, co-president of the union, said in a statement.

The legislation will remain in the Assembly Rules Committee, Rendon said, "until further notice."

To view online click here.

Back

Senate repeal bill could free health insurers to sell plans across state lines Back

By Dan Diamond | 06/23/2017 05:41 PM EDT

An under-the-radar provision in the Senate's Obamacare repeal bill would take a step toward the longtime GOP goal of allowing health insurance sales across state lines.

Section 139 of the bill released Thursday would take away state regulators' ability to approve the participation of plans in their small-group health insurance market, paving the way to speed new plan offerings across the country.

Senate Budget Chairman, Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), who authored the provision, says it will help small businesses band together through trade associations and set up or join health plans that cross state lines. But it's spooking state insurance regulators, who warn the measure could destabilize the small group market.

The bill would modify the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, the federal statute overseeing workplace benefits. A small group health plan certified to sell in one state would be automatically approved in any other state where it seeks to do business, barring objection from the Labor secretary.

The provision was a "pleasant surprise," said Neil Trautwein, vice president of health care policy at the National Retail Federation, which supports expanding trade association health plans. The NRF consulted with Enzi's office on the provision, but even Trautwein was unsure it would be included in the Senate health bill.

The bill allows multi-state plans to sell health insurance to small businesses across state lines — without being subject to regulation in each state. That would mark an unprecedented change in how those plans get sold and could dilute oversight in the broader insurance market, officials warn.

"This is exactly the thing that many of us who are insurance commissioners have been worried about," California Insurance Commissioner Dave Jones said. "Federal regulation that would preempt state regulation."

"This allows one state to impose its view of health care on all 50 states," added Beth Sammis, an industry expert and former regulator in Maryland.

As written, the provision only affects the small business market, which covers about 18 million people nationwide. But Jones and others say it would quickly destabilize that market, where premiums have been growing slowly in recent years even as the individual market has experienced significant turbulence. It could also spark broader efforts to roll back state insurance regulations.

In one hypothetical example, a plan could incorporate in a state that has relatively lax regulations — such as Georgia or Mississippi — and then sell in a market like Massachusetts, which has much stricter rules. States currently have broad powers to regulate how insurers settle claims, provider networks and what insurers must cover, among other requirements.

Some conservatives have long called for deregulating the insurance market, and President Donald Trump has pushed for the sale of insurance across state lines. However, his administration had said it would pursue this policy through additional legislation, arguing that Republican lawmakers couldn't advance the idea under the strict budget process being used to pass the Obamacare repeal bill.

An Enzi spokesperson said that the office worked with the Senate parliamentarian to ensure that the provision would pass under strict budget reconciliation rules. Enzi's office said permitting small businesses to band together to form or join regional health plans will allow them to negotiate better prices and benefits than they could have gained on their own.

"Senator Enzi is aware that insurance commissioners have expressed concerns with the ability for individuals, or groups, to buy insurance over state lines," the spokesperson said. "He believes such changes are ultimately better for [consumers] but is willing to listen and work with insurance commissioners who have concerns."

Industry experts agree that the Senate bill's provisions could potentially lead to cheaper health insurance premiums upfront, if small businesses buy less comprehensive coverage for their employees. But they also warn that those employees could then be hurt by higher out-of-pocket costs later.

They further fear the provision could spark a race to the bottom as plans flock to incorporate in states with lax regulations and then sell nationwide. That would undercut plans that choose to remain incorporated in states with stricter regulations and end up paying higher prices as a result.

"There is a serious concern what this could do to the small group market — which is stable right now," an official at the National Association of Insurance Commissioners told POLITICO. "Throwing this bomb in there could cause some disruption."

Even in states like Tennessee, where the individual insurance market is facing real problems, the small group market is performing well. "We have a lot more insurers participating in the small group market," Insurance Commissioner Julie McPeak said.

Concern about selling across state lines unites regulators in red states and blue states. Maryland Commissioner Al Redmer Jr., appointed by that state's GOP governor, said that any effort to weaken state regulations would hurt his ability to safeguard consumers.

"Insurance departments around the country are concerned about individual [states] not having the ability to protect their citizens," Redmer said. And "state legislatures around the country will have heartburn," too.

To view online click here.

Back

Republican governors could be secret weapon against health care bill Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 06/24/2017 09:05 AM EDT

A handful of GOP governors opposed to their party's proposals to overhaul Medicaid could potentially kill Mitch McConnell's effort to repeal Obamacare.

Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval, a Republican moderate who has hammered the repeal efforts for months, helped to deliver Sen. Dean Heller to the "no" column Friday. He stood next to Heller in the governor's conference room in Las Vegas as the Nevada Republican announced he could not vote for the Senate repeal plan as written.

"I cannot support a piece of legislation that takes insurance away from tens of millions of Americans and hundreds of thousands of Nevadans," said Heller, becoming the fifth senator to go public with a threat to vote against the bill since it was unveiled. "It's going to be very difficult to get me to a yes."

Other GOP governors, including Ohio's John Kasich and Arizona's Doug Ducey, are pressing their own lawmakers — including Rob Portman (R-Ohio) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) — to oppose or alter provisions the state executives fear would cut billions in Medicaid funding to their budgets over the next decade.

Governors have no authority over their lawmakers, of course, and their sway is as much about personal relationships as it is about state politics. But even a handful of strongly opposed Republican governors could provide political cover for their senators to oppose the legislation.

And that could be a problem for McConnell, who can afford to lose only two of his 52 members to pass the bill, which could see a floor vote as soon as next week.

Kasich, for instance, whose state expanded Medicaid, has spearheaded much of the opposition to GOP plans to restructure Medicaid, but it is unclear yet whether he has persuaded Sen. Rob Portman, the state's one GOP senator.

"Gov. Kasich is going to speak out every day until the vote is taken," said John Weaver, a Republican political strategist who advises Kasich. "What influence that has on Rob Portman? I have no idea."

Portman is among the moderates also being wooed by McConnell. A co-leader of a group of GOP senators from states that expanded Medicaid, the Ohio senator has sought a longer phase-out of that program and wants more money to address the opioid crisis since many substance abusers have gotten treatment through Medicaid. He has not said how he plans to vote.

Ducey, meanwhile, wrote a letter to McCain obtained by POLITICO expressing support for repealing Obamacare, which he called "a policy disaster," but outlining his objections to the Senate draft: He complained about a three-year phase-out of Medicaid expansion funding, saying he would not have enough time to plug holes in the state's budget. He asked for more explicit Medicaid flexibility — and he said that federal funding for the program needs to grow at a rate exceeding that of medical inflation.

"Medicaid must be able to pay for the real-world costs of providing care," Ducey wrote. Arizona's Medicaid agency on Friday released an analysis that the draft Senate bill could cost the state roughly $7 billion between 2018 and 2026.

McCain, who has said he would consult Ducey and other state leaders, has not said how he will vote.

With only two days since the text of a bill written in secret was released publicly, most senators have declined to say how they will vote. But several say they are consulting with their governors and other state leaders before they make a decision.

After the release of the bill, Heller said he would share it with Sandoval to help determine whether it is good for his state. "As I have consistently stated, if the bill is good for Nevada, I'll vote for it and if it's not - I won't," he said in a statement.

Roughly 24 hours later, Heller stood alongside Sandoval announcing his opposition. "I think we can do better," said Sandoval, a moderate who is term limited in 2018. "If you don't have access to meaningful healthcare and you can't get the care that you need, nothing else really matters."

The issues for most Republican governors relate to how the GOP plan treats Medicaid, a federal-state program that provides health coverage to the poor, the elderly and the disabled — approximately 74 million in all. Sixteen red states expanded Medicaid under Obamacare.

The Senate bill would phase out that expansion over three years — a longer window than allowed for in the House legislation but one that moderates say isn't long enough. It also proposes to eliminate Medicaid's status as open-ended entitlement, a sweeping change that some argue could threaten care for tens of millions of children, pregnant women, the elderly and disabled individuals.

In addition, the plan would cap federal Medicaid funds to states based on the number and type of enrollees, with the funds growing in sync with medical inflation until 2025, after which they would drop to the lower rate of general inflation. That has caused alarm among many state officials in both parties, who say those types of spending reductions are not tenable.

Aware of the huge role that Medicaid plays in their states, most senators say they're consulting with their colleagues back home.

"I have to tell you that I try to respect and respond to the elected leaders in my home state," McCain said Thursday during his weekly Facebook Live town hall. "In this particular case, because Arizona is a Medicaid-expansion state, it is even more important."

North Carolina Sen. Thom Tillis, whose state has a Democratic governor but a GOP-controlled state Legislature said he planned to be talking with state legislative leaders this weekend.

"As complex as it is, there are really only a handful of levels you need to look at and see how it affects your state," he said.

Jennifer Haberkorn contributed reporting.

To view online click here.

Back

Why Dems can't break through on Obamacare repeal Back

By Elana Schor | 06/26/2017 05:05 AM EDT

Even before Senate Republicans released their Obamacare repeal plan last week, a call went out from liberal activists: Head to the airport and greet departing senators with a furious protest.

About five dozen demonstrators showed up at Reagan National Airport, chanting loudly and hoisting signs that read "Don't Take Away Our Health Care" and "Resist." Organizers hailed the turnout given the short notice, but the contrast with the thousands of people who flocked to the last airport protests — against President Donald Trump's travel ban — was inescapable.

And compared with the tea party fervor aimed at Democrats when they worked to pass Obamacare seven years ago, this year's liberal defense of the law hasn't mustered the same energy to seize, and stay in command of, the nation's attention.

For weeks now, liberal activists and Democratic senators have struggled to capture the public's focus in their campaign to halt Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell's momentum to repeal Obamacare. Now that the GOP bill is public, its expected coverage losses are likely to make it as deeply unpopular as the House's plan — yet the left is facing a perilously narrow window to pick off wavering Republican senators and sink the bill before this week's vote.

That messaging crisis is not for lack of trying. But progressives have been stymied by Republicans' strategy of keeping the bill behind closed doors as well as a crowded media landscape fixated more on Trump's tweets and Russia scandal than on the intricacies of Medicaid spending. And then there's money: Democrats have been vastly outspent by Republicans in ad wars over Obamacare repeal.

Even if they break through the clutter this week by flooding the GOP with public anger, they may be too late to save Obamacare.

"What we want is for this to be in the headlines, on the front page of newspapers every morning, and it hasn't been because it's been such a secretive process," Angel Padilla, policy director of the liberal group Indivisible, said in an interview.

Even after 43 disability-rights activists, including many in wheelchairs, got dragged out and arrested outside McConnell's office Thursday, Padilla said he saw "most of the evening news programs still talking about tapes" of former FBI Director James Comey that Trump initially suggested existed before saying they don't.

"It's been really frustrating."

Now, Democrats haven't been entirely unsuccessful.

Raucous town hall meetings organized by Indivisible and other groups earlier this year spooked GOP lawmakers and garnered significant media coverage. And only 16 percent of the public now thinks the House-passed measure, which largely mirrors the Senate bill, is a good idea, according to last week's NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll — strong evidence that Democratic attacks are resonating. Obamacare itself is more popular than ever.

"The numbers for the Republican health care bill are lower than I remember for the [Affordable Care Act]," said David Axelrod, a former top adviser to President Barack Obama. "The one element that is missing is the significant ad spending we saw on the anti-ACA campaign."

The Democratic group Save My Care and AARP have escalated their advertising push in defense of Obamacare in recent days, but it is not likely to match opponents' campaign. American Action Network, a nonprofit with ties to House Speaker Paul Ryan, spent more than $8 million on TV and radio advertising during House debate on repeal; a pair of progressive groups spent less than $2 million by that point.

Another former top Obama adviser, Anita Dunn, disputed the notion that liberals are having more trouble this year than the tea party did in 2009 and 2010, arguing the GOP's plan is now polling poorly and that Republicans are "hiding from their constituents" by holding fewer town halls and rushing to pass the bill.

"But there are some significant differences — President Obama made ACA his focal point and there were no scandal stories (like Russia) competing in the space," emailed Dunn, who served as White House communications director at the start of the Affordable Care Act debate. "The Democrats ran an open and public process, with hearings, witnesses, and many opportunities for the other side to organize around."

And while Trump-era marches have drawn tens of thousands into the streets to call for action against climate change, support immigrants and demand the president's tax returns, none have focused on opposing Obamacare repeal. In contrast, thousands of tea party activists descended on the Capitol to protest final passage of the health care law in March 2010. Liberals may try something similar, with activists spreading the word on Twitter about forming "a massive human chain" at the Capitol on Wednesday, the day before a possible Senate vote.

Senate Democrats are powerless to stop the bill on their own, because Republicans are using procedural maneuvers to circumvent a filibuster. But they have tried a variety of tactics lately to try to bring public pressure to bear on the GOP.

Last week, they launched a procedural blockade to spotlight Republicans' avoidance of hearings on their repeal bill. They held a talk-a-thon that stretched until midnight, with a series of senators speaking on the floor. A trio of Democratic senators, Cory Booker of New Jersey, Chris Murphy of Connecticut and Brian Schatz of Hawaii, jumped in a cab and recorded their trip to the Congressional Budget Office to try to unearth the proposal.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) took the save-Obamacare show on the road over the weekend, drawing more than 1,000 people to the first of three rallies against repeal that he and MoveOn.org held in Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia.

Democrats have also sought to elevate the personal stories of those threatened by the bill, which would cost millions of low-income Americans their health insurance and gut key consumer protections, all while slashing taxes for the wealthy and insurers. They held numerous news conferences with constituents who would be harmed by the bill and promoted a push on social media with the hashtag #AmericaSpeaksOut.

But the left has been unable to fuel a viral phrase, like conservatives' false "death panel" charges, or to find a single pro-Obamacare face to rise from the pack and take aim at Trump — much as Gold Star father Khizr Khan or former Miss Universe Alicia Machado did during last year's presidential campaign.

"The thing that really elevates someone's story from merely provoking empathy to becoming iconic is when Republicans or the right-wing media attack a grass-roots hero," said MoveOn Washington director Ben Wikler.

During the House's Obamacare repeal debate, it appeared briefly that late-night talk show host Jimmy Kimmel might take the mantle after an emotional speech about his infant son, who had a health crisis, went viral. But the House, after serious struggles, passed its bill. And then the debate went quiet in public, particularly as Republicans sidestepped recess-week town halls following earlier tense confrontations with constituents.

Sen. Tom Carper admitted in an interview that he isn't sure whether Democratic messaging has broken through yet. But the Delaware Democrat argued that his party has successfully branded the GOP repeal bill with at least one label: secret.

"The press doesn't know what's going on. We don't know what's going on. Some of the Republicans don't know what's going on," Carper said. "That's got to be disconcerting to average, normal people who have misgivings about this place anyway."

Hammering the Senate GOP's Obamacare repeal as too radioactive to draft in public may prove liberals' most compelling tactic against a bill that could see a vote less than one week after its release and as changes remain under consideration.

"If I'm a vulnerable Republican senator, I'm breathing a sigh of relief that McConnell took active measures to minimize the news coverage, but I'm panicked what signal that secrecy sent to voters," said Democratic strategist Jesse Ferguson, a veteran of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee during the original Obamacare battle.

"It doesn't take a Ph.D. in health policy for voters to figure out he kept it secret because it would be bad for them, and his plotting has made an unpopular bill even more reviled," said Ferguson, who is now working with several groups opposed to repeal.

Ultimately, progressives might find one thing in common with the Obama-era tea party: Both might fall short on Capitol Hill, only to take revenge at the polls.

For all its energy on the ground at the time, the right failed to stop the health care law from being passed.

With complete control of Washington and a commitment to their policy goals, Democrats were willing to plow ahead regardless of the political ramifications. Republicans now find themselves in a similar position.

A GOP wave toppled House Democrats from power in 2010, and Democrats are predicting that Republicans will suffer in 2018 if their bill becomes law.

"Unlike the ACA, which grew more popular as its effects and benefits kicked in, [repeal] will become even more unpopular as the law's effects of people losing health care and paying more for less coverage become a reality," Dunn said.

House Republicans may be nervous, but Senate Republicans face a highly favorable electoral map next year, potentially easing most GOP senators' fears of backing the controversial proposal.

Democrats, meanwhile, are expressing optimism that they can marshal the massive public pushback needed to derail the legislation this week.

"I think people are starting to get it," Murphy told POLITICO soon after the GOP bill emerged. "They realize that this is not theoretical anymore. This is something terrible about to happen to them."

From the sidelines of the airport protest, Working Families Party organizer Zach Weinstein agreed. "Now it seems like we're all on the same page — on the grass-roots side, on the inside," he said. "Hopefully we can stop this thing once and for all."

To view online click here.

Back

Trump political arm to GOP: Get in line Back

By Alex Isenstadt | 06/25/2017 08:38 PM EDT

A new campaign by top White House allies targeting the GOP's most vulnerable senator over health care sends a loud message to those resistant to the Trump agenda: We're coming after you.

America First Policies, a White House-backed outside group led by the president's top campaign advisers, has launched a $1 million attack against Sen. Dean Heller of Nevada, who on Friday announced that he opposed the Senate's recently unveiled Obamacare repeal plan.

That included a Twitter and digital ad campaign targeting the senator, including a video that accuses him of "standing with" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a reviled figure in conservative circles.

"Unacceptable," the video says. "If you're opposed to this bill, we're opposed to you."

America First Policies is set to expand its campaign early this week with TV ads that will go after the Nevada senator.

The offensive aims both to punish Heller and to sway his vote, and it is a stunning act of political retaliation against a member of the president's own party — one who faces a perilous path to reelection in 2018. Senior Republicans, many of whom are deeply worried about Heller's political standing and increasingly nervous about the midterms, were shocked and spent the weekend measuring the possible fallout.

Those close to the White House say the attack is an outgrowth of President Donald Trump's mounting frustration over his stymied legislative agenda and anger at Capitol Hill Republicans whom he sees as unhelpful.

In a Saturday tweet, Trump hinted at his displeasure after multiple senators expressed concerns with the bill: "I cannot imagine that these very fine Republican Senators would allow the American people to suffer a broken ObamaCare any longer!"

By targeting Heller, America First Policies is telegraphing to recalcitrant Republican lawmakers — even those trying to navigate treacherous political waters at home — that they will be punished if they don't go along with the Trump agenda. Other Republicans could soon face similar attacks.

Brian Walsh, president of America First Policies, said after Heller's Friday news conference that the group's senior leadership — including former Republican National Committee chief of staff Katie Walsh, Trump fundraiser Tommy Hicks, and Nick Ayers, a longtime top strategist for Vice President Mike Pence — determined that "it was time to make a strong statement."

"For the greater part of a decade, the GOP has promised to repeal and replace Obamacare, taken dozens of votes to do so; now, with the ability to keep that promise on the horizon, legislators are wavering," Walsh said. "Sen. Heller's decision to walk away is unacceptable and sends the wrong message to the rest of the senators who are still working to get to 'yes.'"

Within 90 minutes of Heller's announcement, the group had mobilized. Determined not to let the news fade on a summer Friday afternoon, Brad Parscale, the digital director on Trump's presidential campaign who now works with America First Policies, directed an anti-Heller Twitter offensive aimed at ginning up anger among Trump supporters. Spending just over $100,000, the organization encouraged people to tweet at Heller and his staffers, created algorithms that tied Heller with Pelosi, and promoted a "HellerVotesYes" hashtag.

On Saturday morning, America First Policies itself tweeted: "Why did @SenDeanHeller lie to voters about #RepealAndReplace? He's now with @NancyPelosi. NOT GOOD! #HellerVotesYes."

For America First Policies, the move represented something of an about-face. During the House health care debate this spring, White House officials said the group was too passive and should have pressured Republicans who opposed the repeal effort. As Congress entered the summer months, the group promised a more muscular effort to promote the president's agenda.

The anti-Heller move, however, rankled allies of Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, who keeps a close eye on his party's 2018 plans and is deeply sensitive to attacks on his members. Several McConnell political advisers said they received no warning and vented that it was a serious misstep, especially with the party holding just a two-seat majority.

Heller's team was also blindsided and infuriated by the barrage, said one adviser to the Nevada senator. But, fearful of further antagonizing the White House, they refrained from hitting back.

"I have a lot of respect for the team running this organization but think attacking fellow Republicans is a big mistake and a bad strategy," said Brian Walsh, a former top National Republican Senatorial Committee official (who is not related to America First Policies' Brian Walsh or Katie Walsh). "There are 10 Senate Democrats running for reelection in states won by President Trump, including several by double digits. Money and energy on the Republican side should be focused on turning those seats red and not on a circular firing squad."

The offensive isn't entirely without precedent. In 2009, as then-President Barack Obama's health care push got underway, a White House political arm began airing commercials in the states of vulnerable Democratic senators — some facing reelection — who had voiced concerns about the legislation. The ads annoyed then-Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, who at one point called them a "waste of money."

Yet the pro-Obama ads, which did not mention the Democratic senators' names, were not nearly as hostile as the pro-Trump ones, which accused Heller of lying and described his behavior as "unacceptable."

The animosity between Trump's allies and Heller is not new. During his 2016 campaign, Trump struggled to win over Capitol Hill Republicans, including the Nevada Republican, who made it known — repeatedly — that he was no fan of the GOP candidate. In June 2016, Heller was quoted as saying he had no intention of voting for Trump. Trump has since made clear to top advisers he doesn't view the Nevadan as an ally, said two people close to the president.

When the Senate health care debate heated up last week, Heller was once again in the White House cross hairs. In conversations with the administration, the senator made clear he was leaning against supporting the bill. But Trump advisers thought he was using the bill to play political games — a view that only intensified on Friday afternoon when Heller made his announcement alongside GOP Gov. Brian Sandoval, a past Trump critic who also opposes the health care legislation.

"He needs to come back to the table and work to get to 'yes.' Period," said America First Policies' Walsh. "I think we are making that crystal clear."

To view online click here.

Back

Koch-backed group calls health fight in Congress 'humbling' Back

By Kevin Robillard | 06/25/2017 09:15 PM EDT

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — The head of the Koch brothers-backed Americans for Prosperity admitted to donors on Sunday that the group was caught "flat-footed" by the fight in Congress to replace Obamacare, as the group seeks to influence Republican proposals it says do not go far enough to repeal the 2010 law.

"We fully expected a repeal vote," Americans for Prosperity President Tim Phillips told hundreds of donors at the Koch network's annual seminar at the Broadmoor Resort. "We were caught flat-footed when it didn't happen."

He added: "This has been humbling for us."

Americans for Prosperity and other Koch network groups have been critical of the GOP replacement efforts, arguing they don't do enough to rein in costs or undo President Barack Obama's signature achievement. The group opposed the first House repeal attempt but backed a later version negotiated by House Freedom Caucus Chair Mark Meadows and New Jersey Rep. Tom MacArthur.

The group has been critical of the Senate's draft, with Phillips telling reporters on Saturday the proposal was "disappointing," but has stopped short of out-and-out opposing the law.

Sen. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.), speaking to a donor lunch, declined to take a position on the legislation. But he pointed out Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn in the crowd and said he had a bruise on his collarbone from Cornyn putting his thumb on him. Two other senators in attendance, Mike Lee of Utah and Ted Cruz of Texas, have said they oppose the current version of the legislation.

Cornyn, speaking to reporters, said the bill was on track for a vote this week but acknowledged that it would be tough to get the votes needed for passage.

"It's going to be close," he said.

Phillips warned the donors they had a limited amount of time to change policy at the federal level because of the looming 2018 elections. The network's top priority in that time? Tax reform, not health care.

"We have a window of about 12 months until the 2018 election grinds policy to a halt," he said. "We've learned from health care that we can't take anything for granted."

The group sent three members of the House Freedom Caucus — Florida Rep. Ron DeSantis, North Carolina Rep. Mark Meadows and Virginia Rep. Dave Brat — to pitch their vision for tax reform to reporters. The group strongly opposes proposals for a border adjustment tax, which both House Speaker Paul Ryan and Ways and Means Committee Chair Kevin Brady have backed.

"The B.A.T. is D.O.A. in the Congress," DeSantis said. "The Phillies have a better chance of winning the World Series this year than BAT has [of] passing." (The Phillies have the worst record in baseball and are 25 games under .500.)

Meadows said President Donald Trump told him he doesn't support the tax either.

"The speaker now understands that he does not have the votes on the BAT," he said of Ryan.

Network leaders said they also were pleased with the Trump administration's efforts on the federal judiciary, regulatory reform, education reform and in other areas. But the group warned donors significant losses in the midterm elections could block progress.

"This midterm election cycle is far more difficult than in recent years," said Emily Seidel, a top official at Freedom Partners, another Koch-backed organization. She said liberal political groups were seeing donations booming and had growing budgets to match the donors' largesse. "We are facing a reinvigorated left."

To view online click here.

Back

States must support some church programs, high court rules Back

By Benjamin Wermund and Caitlin Emma | 06/26/2017 11:02 AM EDT

The Supreme Court chipped away Monday at the traditional wall separating church and state, ruling 7-2 that states cannot exclude religious institutions from state programs that have a purely secular intent — in this case, making playgrounds safer.

However, the court framed its decision narrowly in Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia vs. Comer, declining to say how far states could go to fund the school choice programs being pushed by President Donald Trump as part of his sweeping school choice agenda.

The decision written by Chief Justice John Roberts held that Missouri wrongly denied a church a state grant "simply because of what it is — a church." But it stopped short of addressing the constitutionality of provisions in 39 states, including Missouri's, that bar public money from supporting religious organizations. Those provisions, known as Blaine Amendments, have been an obstacle to many school voucher programs, which channel taxpayer money to help low-income families pay tuition for private schools, many of which are run by religious groups.

Still, religious rights and voucher proponents, including Education Secretary Betsy DeVos, celebrated the ruling as an incremental win, while most groups opposed to taxpayer funding of religious groups denounced it.

Roberts took pains to underscore the narrowness of the decision in a footnote, saying "this case involves express discrimination based on religious identity with respect to playground resurfacing. We do not address religious uses of funding or other forms of discrimination."

Significantly, Justices Neil Gorsuch and Clarence Thomas objected to the footnote, arguing it made the ruling unnecessarily vague.

"I worry that some might mistakenly read it to suggest that only 'playground resurfacing' cases, or only those with some association with children's safety or health, or perhaps some other social good we find sufficiently worthy, are governed by the legal rules recounted in and faithfully applied by the Court's opinion," Gorsuch wrote.

White House spokesman Sean Spicer said the decision "reaffirms that the government cannot discriminate against individuals or organizations, simply because they or their members hold religious beliefs."

The Center for Education Reform, an advocacy group seeking expansion of vouchers, praised the court for its support of religious rights and pledged to work to bring other cases to enable the justices "to review the constitutionality of Blaine Amendments and pave the way for parents to decide the best educational opportunities for their children, be they private, religious or public in nature."

On the other side, the National Education Association, a teachers union that took Missouri's side, applauded the high court for steering clear of a broad decision that would affirm voucher plans.

"Today's ruling means that those state constitutional provisions remain as safeguards against such voucher proposals and returns to the legislative branches the question of whether vouchers make any sense," NEA President Lily Eskelsen García said.

Harvard professor Martin West said the opinion won't stop states from denying vouchers to religious schools based on their Blaine Amendments.

"One of those challenges, if successful at the state level, could then provide an another opportunity for the Supreme Court to clarify the issue," he said.

"Gorsuch and Thomas write separately to say that they see no distinction between denying funds based on the identity of a religious institution and their use of the funds," he added. "They would clearly be on board with a broader ruling."

The Institute for Justice, a libertarian advocacy group that defends school choice programs in court — including a Colorado program under challenge — called Monday's ruling a victory, but said the high court needs to take up the Colorado case to settle the larger issues.

"Sooner or later, the U.S. Supreme Court will need to address the lingering bigotry of Blaine Amendments that stand out like scars in state constitutions across the nation," Institute for Justice President Scott Bullock said in a statement. "The Court should now take up the Douglas County case and explicitly reject government discrimination against the free and independent choices of parents who choose religious schools for their children in school choice programs."

Some advocates for a strict separation of church and state described the decision as a blow.

"This ruling threatens to open the door to more taxpayer support for religion, which is at odds with our history, traditions and common sense," Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said in a statement.

A lengthy dissent by Justice Sonia Sotomayor and joined by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg took strong exception to Roberts' decision, saying it "slights both our precedents and our history, and its reasoning weakens this country's longstanding commitment to a separation of church and state beneficial to both."

Daniel Mach, director of the ACLU Program on Freedom of Religion and Belief which took the state's side in the case, called the decision disappointing — but expressed relief it did not go further.

"Religious freedom should protect unwilling taxpayers from funding church property, not force them to foot the bill," Mach said. "The court's ruling, however, focuses specifically on grants for playground resurfacing, and does not give the government unlimited authority to fund religious activity."

Back

Study finds 'substantial' losses in math for Indiana voucher students Back

By Caitlin Emma | 06/26/2017 09:00 AM EDT

Indiana students who left public schools for private schools using a voucher saw "substantial annual achievement losses" in math in their first few years and no difference in reading, compared to students who stayed in public schools, according to a new study.

But the students who remained in private schools for three or four years "make up what they initially lost relative to their public school peers" in math scores, found R. Joseph Waddington of the University of Kentucky and Mark Berends of the University of Notre Dame — two researchers who've studied Indiana's school voucher program for years.

The poorest-performing students, meanwhile, tended to return to public schools.

The researchers note that they observed a relatively small number of students across three and, especially, four years and cautioned against premature conclusions.

"These year three and four estimates may also point to student persistence, as the lowest achieving students who receive a voucher and attend a private school tend to return to a public school," the study suggests. "Additional years of testing data and information from teachers and principals will shed more light on these trends — and possible explanations for them — across years of the program."

The analysis looked at Indiana students in grades three through eight who transferred from public to private school using a voucher during the first four years of the program, or the 2011-12 through 2014-15 school years.

Voucher students typically entered private school "substantially behind their private school peers." During the first two years of the voucher program, "many private schools lacked the capacity or experience in educating new students who are academically behind," the study says.

Some teachers and principals also reported that voucher students struggled with changes in norms and expectations, like homework requirements.

"As expectations or norms may be different in private schools than public schools, voucher students attending private schools for the first time could be put at a disadvantage beyond negative math scores," the report says.

The statewide results are similar to a previous study by the two researchers, which found Indianapolis students who left public school for a private school saw achievement losses in math and no benefits in reading.

To view online click here.

Back

POLITICO Pro Q&A: Sen. Deb Fischer Back

By Gregory Hellman | 06/25/2017 04:01 PM EDT

Sen. Deb Fischer worries about the Pentagon's timetable for modernizing the nation's nuclear arsenal — and that a slip in one program could undermine the effort.

"If we don't stay on schedule, or if something unforeseen would happen that would throw [a program] off the rails, then that's going to be an issue," the chairwoman of the Senate Armed Services Strategic Forces Subcommittee told POLITICO.

Senior military officers have warned Congress this year that little slack exists for delay in the development of key nuclear programs.

The Republican senator from Nebraska, though, is hopeful that military commanders will now have a freer hand under President Donald Trump to talk about their needs for increased funding, including more money for nuclear modernization, than during the Obama administration.

"We've seen it at hearings," Fischer said. "There's been a difference in the last five months in what they're presenting to the committee."

Fischer, whose home state of Nebraska hosts the headquarters of U.S. Strategic Command at Offutt Air Force Base near Omaha, also said she hopes the Pentagon's nuclear posture and ballistic missile defense reviews will detail the Trump administration's priorities for funding its proposed nuclear overhaul.

The senator also pushed back against the creation of a "Space Corps," a proposal championed by House Armed Services Strategic Forces Chairman Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), as an unnecessary layer of bureaucracy.

"Now, we're going to have a space force, and what's next?" Fischer asked. "I don't want to create more layers that respond slowly to really important areas like space and cyber, where many times you need a quick response."

POLITICO sat down with the senator in her Capitol Hill office to discuss pressing defense issues and her goals for her subcommittee ahead of its scheduled closed markup of the fiscal 2018 National Defense Authorization Act Monday afternoon.

These excerpts have been edited for length and clarity.

What are your thoughts on the president's topline defense budget proposal? Is it sufficient?

I'm pleased that he had an emphasis on national defense and security. I think, obviously, those are my priorities for the federal government. And I liked that he did that. In looking at the department's budget of course the area that we focus on the most is with nuclear modernization. That's obviously a priority. And this secretary of Defense and previous ones have made it clear that it's a priority as well for the department.

What were your takeaways from the nuclear modernization proposal? Specifically, some of your colleagues were pleased with the $1 billion increase at the National Nuclear Security Administration. Is that sufficient?

I think it is. Through the whole modernization portfolio that we have...the thing that I'm concerned about the most is the timetable. Because we have a lot of projects that are coming due at the same time. So if we don't stay on schedule, or if something unforeseen would happen that would throw [a program] off the rails, then that's going to be an issue...

But, I've received assurances that yes, everything's on schedule, it's going to work out fine. I've even asked, 'well, do you need more money in this area or this area,' and been told that no, they really don't at this point.

Turning toward the subcommittee markup...tell me a little bit about some of the priorities are going to be there.

I think it's going to be fine...You know, it's really a pretty bipartisan subcommittee.

What I find amazing this year and one thing I really wanted to accomplish as chairman — and I spoke with Sen. [Joe] Donnelly (D-Ind.) about it — we just felt it would be really important to educate members and that was going to be a focus.

So, the first subcommittee hearing we had...Gen. [Robert] Kehler there, to be able to speak, obviously, with authority, but also with kind of reassuring members too, just about what our nuclear program is, the importance of the triad, the importance of deterrence, and not do so in a threatening manner.

Are there any specific programs your subcommittee is prioritizing or that should be looked at as part of the authorization process?

Obviously, the areas that I focus on are the ones under the subcommittee's jurisdiction. So, it's [nuclear] modernization, it's space, it's missile defense. Looking at STRATCOM, making sure we can move forward...on the command center.

Cyber is something we talk about a lot, but we don't have a plan for. It's a criticism I would say I levied at the last administration on different defense issues. That we just didn't hear a plan. And I have commented to this administration as well that we need a plan and we need a plan on cyber....It needs to be laid out. But not just for Congress but for our allies, ...our friends and our adversaries as well.

What do you mean by a plan for cyber?

I mean how we act and react to cyber aggression... A lot of people compare cyber to nuclear, and they think that because you have nuclear deterrence, cyber deterrence is going to work as well. I don't necessarily buy into that...

There's no definition on what an act of war is in cyberspace. There are no international norms when it comes to cyberattacks. You know, those are questions that I think need to be answered and need to be answered soon, if we're going to keep up...in this new war-space.

You said you were also looking at STRATCOM as well. Any specific oversight concerns with STRATCOM that you're looking at?

Nothing specific right now, just to look that the command-and-control center stays on schedule.

What are your expectations of the nuclear posture review and ballistic missile defense review the administration is conducting?

Obviously, I want to see the triad...be reaffirmed there. On the posture review, I hope to see the emphasis on what are the priorities and where should funding really go. And [for the Defense Department] to be honest about if we do need increased funding, to just say, 'we need it.' I don't know if that's always been the case in the past. ... The military is always very careful not to be political and I don't think it would be political, I just think they need to be truthful in what their conclusions really are.

Are there any programs that you can point to where you feel like, perhaps in the past they've underestimated the amount of funding they need?

I don't know...if necessarily they've underestimated programs. I think they follow directives they are given. They work for a commander-in-chief.

Don't you feel there's been a difference even in testimony this year? ... It's like, why didn't you say this before? I understand the position they're in, but it's frustrating as a member who's trying to provide resources that this country needs...not get the full picture...I understand they serve the commander-in-chief, but they serve this country as well.

To be clear, you feel like military commanders have a bit of a freer hand now than in the Obama administration to talk about the damage the sequester has had?

We've seen it, we've seen it at the hearings. I don't want to leave the impression that they haven't spoken up in the past. They have. At every hearing, there's a question about sequestration and it's a bad thing, and yes, they've always agreed with that. But...there's been a difference in the last five months in what they're presenting to the committee. And, obviously, that comes from Secretary [Jim] Mattis, but there's definitely a difference.

Is there a compromise you can see with Democrats that would lift the defense budget caps?

I would hope that my colleagues on the other side will at least be able to get on defense appropriations bills. I have found that very frustrating that we pass a NDAA and two weeks later we can't get on a defense appropriations bill.

We all vote for authorization of these programs and then won't even take up an appropriations bill to fund them. I don't know how you go home and justify that to people in your state...

So, I think, suck it up, we need to start doing our job and taking on appropriations bills. And then you need to make a tough decision:

Are you going to fund this program or are you going to fund that program? Are you really going to back up the words you say at a committee about defense needing more money and then be willing to make a choice, between a program in the Department of Defense and not increase funding for other discretionary programs?... It's a dollar for dollar, I don't support that.

Related to the nuclear posture review, what in your view is the best way to deal with Russian violations of the INF Treaty?

It's obviously going to be up to the military...and the secretary of Defense to provide options to the president on what to do. I think there has to be firmer stand taken, then just saying, yes, you violated this treaty. Because now, we're into...the third year since the cruise missile test occurred...

We're looking now at deploying missiles. Do we just keep saying no you should do that? Or should there be consequences? And obviously there needs to be consequences...

We just passed a sanctions bill ... Sanctions are always an option. ... Or again, depending on what options the department's going to provide to the president, there are actions that can be taken...Either with interceptors, or taking them out on the ground, or developing our own.

If Russia does not come back into compliance with the treaty, would you support sanctions or developing our own missiles?

I would support a plan that can lay out options in a manner that provides...a decisive end-state. And we haven't seen that in the past. But it would just be nice to hear plans.

Sanctions is an option...but, as I mentioned, there are other actions that can be taken as well.

Are there any specific military space programs that you are eyeing or have oversight concerns about? Additionally, are there military space reform initiatives that you would support?

With space, I think many members of the committee have had their eyes open to challenges that we face...And I just think there's a lot of concern about where we are and where other countries are with regard to space, and what's happening in space.

Congressman Rogers has suggested that we need to look at how we encourage personnel in the Air Force to pursue space careers. He's also talked about the idea of a Space Corps. Is that something you would support?

The congressman's been in my office to talk about that. I'm not sold on a space force right now.

Why is that?

I worry about having a force for everything. You know we just started a new U.S. Cyber Command. There's talk about a cyber force now. Now, we're going to have a space force and what's next?

I don't want to create more layers that respond slowly to really important areas like space and cyber, where many times you need a quick response.

So it's a bureaucracy concern?

Yea, I would say that would be part of it. And it's difficult to find trained individuals. But I would say that the services are training people, in cyber areas especially, to be able to respond to these...areas. I have to be convinced...on what we would gain from the creation of [a Space Corps]. The congressman makes a good case. I just haven't agreed with him on it. He said he'll be back.

There has been some concern out there with the pace of nominations to the Pentagon. Is that a concern that you share as well and if so, how would you like to see it addressed?

I encourage the president and the administration to get us names, not just with the Defense Department, but for all the agencies. There's a lot of spots to fill.

Do you have any management concerns about the Pentagon in the meantime?

I haven't seen any. It's nice to have phone calls returned. And it's nice to have staff...call different departments and have their phone calls...answered.

But yes, there needs to a quicker pace in staffing of all the departments. But we've been fortunate in our office in working with the administration.

To view online click here.

Back

Study: Seattle minimum wage increase cut worker pay Back

By Ian Kullgren | 06/26/2017 09:00 AM EDT

Seattle's $13 minimum wage has reduced the hours of low-wage workers by 9.4 percent, according to a study released by University of Washington researchers this morning.

The study examined the first two hikes in Seattle's $15 minimum wage law, from $9.47 to $11 in 2015 and to $13 in 2016. The first round had little effect, the research found. But in the second, hours for low-wage workers fell by 3.5 million per quarter.

The reduction in hours, paired with a modest 3 percent increase in wages, had a sizable effect on the amount of money workers take home. According to the study, low-wage workers — defined as earning less than $19 per hour — took an average pay cut of $125 per month in 2016.

The findings are likely to inflame the partisan debate over minimum wage. The left-leaning Economic Policy Institute already released a lengthy rebuttal, arguing the analysis "suffers from a number of data and methodological problems" that skew the data toward job loss.

The authors warn that their findings shouldn't be used to frame the national debate over minimum wage. They caution that differences in regional economies could produce different results for minimum wage hikes elsewhere.

To view online click here.

Back

Rep. Adam Kinzinger: The Full Transcript Back

By Susan B. Glasser | 06/26/2017 05:19 AM EDT

Subscribe to The Global POLITICO on iTunes here. | Subscribe via Stitcher.

Glasser: Hi, I'm Susan Glasser, and welcome back to The Global POLITICO. I am delighted to have Congressman Adam Kinzinger, once again, as our guest this week. And really, it's a great opportunity. I've wanted to have him as a Global POLITICO almost since I launched this podcast, now five months, more or less, which is exactly how long—

Kinzinger: Congrats, by the way.

Glasser: Which is exactly the length of the Trump presidency. The reason I always wanted to have you, Congressman, as a guest is I've often thought back to a conversation that we had last summer, so just about a year ago now, at the Republican National Convention in Cleveland.

At the time, perhaps it was a little bit of an academic discussion over what kind of a foreign policy President Donald Trump might be. But I'll set the stage for you a little bit. Just that morning, The New York Times had had an interview with Donald Trump. And I believe you were already a little bit not sure that you really could support your party's nominee. He would then take the stage the next day and make his acceptance speech. A very kind of dark vision of America that echoed his future inaugural, "American carnage" speech. But at that point, that hadn't happened.

But New York Times had had this fascinating interview with Donald Trump in which he raised all sorts of questions about American foreign policy. And I was amazed to have you come in there, and sit down, and just sort of say exactly what you thought. And your analysis holds up pretty strongly a year later. And so, I thought we'd start with a quote from that event of a year ago.

You said, "Donald Trump believes in strongmen. Vladimir Putin is a strongman. He's a tough guy, and I think that attracts Donald Trump. I call it a 'narcissistic foreign policy.' Coming from Donald Trump is the idea that [the] world needs us; that if we're going to be in Korea, or have troops in Germany, they need to pay us. I am offended by the idea I'm some kind of protection racket, or some kind of mercenary force."

What you called it at the time was "a very dark but seductive foreign policy. It's very dangerous." OK. A year later, a "narcissistic foreign policy." In a way, that might be the best description I've seen yet. People are always trying to impose doctrines on Donald Trump. Do you still think "narcissistic foreign policy" fits?

Kinzinger: You know, I think it's very interesting to me to look at where we are, versus rhetoric of a year ago. I've actually been very pleased with what I've seen out of this presidency — the bombing of the airfield in Syria, holding to the redline, pushing back against redline crossings in Syria. I think, you know, by actions, pushing back against Russia, not necessarily words. So, I've been impressed with that.

At the same time, you have the actions compared to the words, and the words have still been, you know... You go to NATO — and think there has to be an understanding. Yes, NATO needs to pay more money. It needs to meet its commitment to national defense. But the reality is, we're not doing NATO a favor. NATO, as much as anything, is doing us a favor. We're helping each other. That's what mutual defense is about.

And so, I think I would like to see more words about the fact that, you know, our involvement in the world is not just out of the charity of heart, it's out of necessity. We're not in South Korea just because we love the South Koreans. There is a strategic interest to us there. The South Koreans already pay for half of our troops that are stationed there. It's actually cheaper to have a troop in South Korea than it is like in Alabama because of that.

And so I think, to an extent, the words have been still somewhat of a narcissistic view of why America exists in the world. But the actions of the administration, I've actually been pretty happy with.

Glasser: Well, you're capturing sort of, I think, what we've all observed. There's Donald Trump and his Twitter feed, and his personal instincts and views about foreign policy. And now, of course, he has an entire administration — or maybe not a fully staffed one. We can talk about that later. But he has an administration. He's hired a secretary of defense who's widely respected. He's hired a national security adviser. A secretary of state.

And so trying and struggling, I think we all are, to figure out what's the balance between the people he's put into power, the existing policies that their departments represent, and then the role that the president himself plays. We had a pretty stark demonstration of that over the last couple weeks when we had Trump, once again, seeming to make foreign policy by tweet on North Korea and China, for example. We are very confused. What is our policy in the Middle East?

So how do you look at that? You're up here on Capitol Hill, obviously, so you're not sitting in the room, but you're debating this with your colleagues in the Foreign Affairs Committee. How do you look at the difference between the president himself and this whole foreign policy and national security infrastructure that we have?

Kinzinger: Well, I've never been in the White House in terms of in power, or been in the administration, so it's hard for me to say. You know, the president definitely has final say in terms of anything on foreign policy, but there's also a structure that acts beyond him. There are decisions that are made. For instance, shooting down an Su-22 in Syria was probably not something that the president directly gave the order to [do], but he did give the leverage to his commanders to make that decision. So it's kind of hard to tell where that falls.

There's also the issue of, look, President Trump is a good entertainer, and, frankly, he knows how to communicate with people he needs to communicate to. And he understands that kind of idea of "American first" is really attractive to people, so he says it. You know, "NATO needs us. We're doing them a favor." That idea.

But what I've seen in action is he seems to be giving a pretty significant amount of leverage to his team, which is what we want to see. For instance, as we learn about what the future of Afghanistan's going to be, and the amount of troops, and everything else, he seems to be empowering Secretary Mattis and others to make that decision, and that's a good thing.

So it's a dichotomy I don't think I can figure out in terms of the difference between the words of the president and the actions. But I'll tell you, I've been happy with the actions. The words, not so much.

Glasser: So, you know, last year in our conversation at the RNC, you said, "The president is a dictator on foreign policy." And that was part of the reason you had so many concerns, recognizing there were few constraints on his action. And of course, the question of what role Congress can play is one that a lot of people have been asking. How does it look now that you're trying to think about what are the constraints you would want to put around a president in the Oval Office on foreign policy? You guys are considering a Russia sanctions bill right now. Tell me a little bit about the balance between executive and legislative power in the Trump era.

Kinzinger: I believe, when it comes to foreign policy, in a very strong executive branch— and I'm probably the minority view in Congress in this— everybody wants to have their say. The problem is between House and the Senate, there's 535 of us. And all of us out here think that we could be a good commander in chief. So you have 535 members of Congress that all have their idea of how to fight ISIS, how to push back against Syria, et cetera.

And the problem is, in this complicated world where it's not about, you know, in the 1700s, when you declare war against England, it takes three months to even get the message there. This is all real-time things. We find out there's a chemical attack, or there's a fighter bombing our allies. You know, that kind of stuff. This has to be leverage given to the president.

So I would vote for and like to see us pass a use-of-force authorization against ISIS. I don't think the president needs it, but I think we should. The problem is, you have members of Congress out here that want to put constraints in it. You know, a time limit, a troop limit. You cannot, as members of Congress, tie the hands of the president. You give him a goal, which is destroy ISIS, and you let him decide how to get here.

And then, on things like Russia, I do think Congress can play a strong role in sending a message to the administration and to Russia that Congress believes that sanctions, at this point, are the best thing to deal with what's been going on. I do think there is a role for Congress to play, but I give a lot of military leverage to the president because I just don't — I know my colleagues out here. I love them all, but a lot of them don't know anything about the military or warfare, and they think they do.

Glasser: Well, and we should note, of course, that you served in both Iraq and Afghanistan. I think that's part of what gives you a different perspective in general on foreign policy. You've rated it as a much more important reason why you're in Congress ...

Kinzinger: Right.

Glasser: ... in the first place than most of your colleagues. But let's drill in a little bit on that Russia sanctions bill, because it's an interesting case study. It's one of the first examples that's come up where you have clearly a policy disagreement by, I would say, the majority of Republicans on Capitol Hill, who are eager to show that they still favor a tougher approach to Vladimir Putin and to Russia than President Trump has personally indicated.

You have this bill coming over from the Senate and there's a sense though that here, on the House side, is where Trump's allies may try to water it down or change it.

Kinzinger: Right.

Glasser: What are the dynamics inside the Republican Conference here?

Kinzinger: I haven't sensed the dynamics within the conference yet. I think this is so new. And we just assumed this was going to happen. It's so new. What we're hearing today, as of the day we're talking, is that there is a blue-slip issue. Fine, maybe that's the case. You know, revenue originating from the House versus the Senate. That needs to be fixed.

But I think if there is an attempt to water this down, there will be some holy hell from some of us that would be very upset about this. Look, you have interests. I don't want to name names, but it's the same kind of special interest that opposed Russian sanctions in the past, that I specifically talked to and said, 'Don't you dare come in here because of that.' And they're trying to do it again, and they're scaring members. You have European nations that are trying to meet with all of us that are saying — you know, specifically Germany. Germany is saying they're worried about this pipeline issue.

Well, look, Germany shut down all of their nuclear plants, so they became reliant on natural gas. So don't come in to me with a sad story. I love Germany. My family originated from Germany, but don't come in here because you guys screwed up your power grid, and say that you're basically inept to respond to the Russians.

Let's see how this blue-slip issue goes about, but I think you will see a House that is very, very eager to make sure this thing passes.

Glasser: That's so interesting about Germany. So basically, they're worried that in an almost overreaction to Trump and the fear of him being too accommodating to the Russians, they're worried that Congress would go in the other direction, in effect, and potentially make things worse with the Russians, and compromise their ability, as they see it, to negotiate with their big neighbor.

Kinzinger: Yes, basically. But you know, you have to be tough. I understand that they have an interest and a concern. You have to protect your own people. Germany is a very successful country. But again, they shut down all of their nuclear plants in an overreaction to some things, and so, there's some price to pay for it. Now, we should continue to work with Germany to make sure we're exporting natural gas, to make sure that they have the ability to exploit their natural gas, and the allies in the region.

But we've got to do everything. The one-trick pony of Russia is their ability to export natural gas. That's their best foreign policy tool because their jets can barely fly. It's that ability to do natural gas. And keep in mind, the economy of Russia is about the size of — just a little larger than the economy of Illinois. And we have 50 states. They have one big one.

Glasser: Well, it's funny. When I was Moscow correspondent at the very beginning of Putin's tenure, he used to talk, without irony, in saying his goal to make sure that Russia's economy would grow to be as big as Portugal's, the smallest member of the European Union at the time.

Kinzinger: That's right.

Glasser: You know, and I think that's revealing about what they inherited from the Soviet Union as well.

Kinzinger: That's right.

Glasser: So, I think your example about this House, the sanctions bill, is really interesting because it suggests all of the competing politics around Russia right now, which has emerged as this major foreign policy issue of the Trump administration. One of the things that I think I and others are struggling to understand is what has gone on with the politics of Russia in the Republican Party as a result of candidate Trump, now President Trump's different rhetoric about Vladimir Putin.

You've seen an amazing turnaround in the polls, certainly, which suggests that Republicans who used to be the sort of get-tough-on-Russia party have flip-flopped dramatically in terms of public opinion surveys. And it's now Democrats, by and large, who express much more hawkish views about Russia.

Kinzinger: Well, I welcome them finally, by the way, to be Russia hawks because they weren't a few years ago.

Glasser: But that's right. Both parties have shown that they are very flexible, shall we say, in their ideology. What does that mean though here on Capitol Hill? Have your Republican colleagues really changed their mind about Vladimir Putin?

Kinzinger: You know, I hope not. Some have, you know. I have a few friends that basically express a lot of—they believe this kind of idea, which is so flawed it's unbelievable, that it's either a strongman or terrorism, right? Bashar Assad in Syria, and Russia's backing him, or it's just chaos and ISIS everywhere. I don't believe that.

I mean, I don't think strongmen work anymore anyway because with internet, with the ability to communicate, people don't like to be oppressed. I know we may think they do, but they don't. And so, they'll throw off the shackles of dictatorship. People sometimes see the Russians and they buy into this idea that bombing hospitals, bombing schools, basically beating the crap [out] of the Muslims, basically, somehow will help us when this war on terror. And all it does, frankly, is create more enemies.

But in terms of the broader politics of Russia, I was disappointed once when I saw a poll that said, "Vladimir Putin is more popular among Republicans than Barack Obama." And I say, look, I was no fan of President Obama. I think he's a good man, but I would much rather him as my president than Vladimir Putin, who kills his political enemies. And I'll just say briefly, it shows how much people need leadership on foreign policy.

Glasser: Well, that's been your consistent theme all along, is that you need to lead and not follow ...

Kinzinger: Amen.

Glasser: ... when it comes to foreign policy, which is not necessarily how our political class is generally defined.

Kinzinger: That's true.

Glasser: . . . Somebody said to me — I said I was going to interview you today, and they said, "Well, you know, I feel like he's become sort of the John McCain of the House when it comes to foreign policy in the Republican Party." That's not always an easy role to play. What is it like to be out there disagreeing where you do on issues of principle with the White House, with the administration? Do you get a lot of pushback here?

Kinzinger: You do, but I have a lot of respect for Senator John McCain. He was the first guy to call for a surge in Iraq. Everybody thought he was crazy for that, and it worked. I have a lot of respect for him.

The thing I've learned, so in 2013, I was one of the few House Republicans with Mike Pompeo, frankly, to actually call for giving the president the authority to bomb Syria. The calls in my office at that time were ballistic, of people asking me to resign, I'm a warmonger, everything else. History has proven correct that that would have been the right thing to do.

Look, the job's not particularly fun, and I get elected because I want to make a difference, and I want to make an impact. That's what's fun for me; serving the people in my district, making a big impact on the international front. And so, you know, you ask what's it like. It's actually kind of invigorating to sometimes stand up and just say what needs to be said.

Glasser: Early on, I was envisioning like the internal monologue of John McCain every day, waking up, you know, after January 20. And sort of like, "OK, do I tweet about this one?" Like, you know, "Do I let this one go? What do I pick a fight on and what do I not?" What are your principles for sort of like, "OK. When do I go on TV to say like, 'Enough is enough?'" Which fights do you pick?

Kinzinger: It's almost a day-to-day decision. I like President Trump and I like a lot of the things he's doing as a Republican. You know, again, I mention foreign policy. The actions in foreign policy are good. The agenda on domestic policy. The area where I will pick a fight, or have a disagreement — I think that's a better word to say — is something that's egregious on foreign policy. A tone, a political tone.

I've tried to make as well as foreign policy and representing my district, political tone a big issue. I yearn for the day that we can get back to disagreeing without threatening people's lives and breaking up Thanksgiving dinner. And so, that's another area I'll pick a disagreement on. But it's really a moment-by-moment choice. I'm not out looking to argue with the president. Like I said, I like him. But on areas where I feel like my responsibility is to America and to my district, it's not to the Republican Party.

Glasser: What do you see, by the way, as flashpoints other than Russia? That obviously is an area where the center of gravity, politically, on Russia had been very different than what Trump came in talking about. Are there other areas that you're constantly sort of making that balance? I mean, trade was something that seemed like it would become a much bigger issue. It still might, in terms of Republicans being free traders up here on the Hill, and having a president who is talking in much more protectionist terms.

Kinzinger: I think trade is a big issue. I mean, I'm a free trader, fair trade, right? But what we've seen is the president basically has said, "OK, we're going to kill the Pacific Trade Agreement," which I think was a mistake. But at the same time, you know, we haven't pulled out of NAFTA. I think we're going to be negotiating some one-on-one trade agreements. So I do think he followed through on his promise, but at the same time, it's not quite what people thought he was going to be.

I think we have a tendency — you know, I'm actually very supportive of the president on the issue of infrastructure. We have to build this country. And frankly, as a conservative Republican, if you read the Constitution, it outlines the role of the federal government in infrastructure. I get dismayed when I hear some of my colleagues say the federal government shouldn't have a role. But I think that could be a flash point with other members who are more budget hawk-focused.

And the other, I'd say lastly, is just the budget, in general, can be a flash point. We want to increase military spending, but at the same time, to really deal with the debt in this country, it's going to take entitlements. We all know that. Both sides know that. We just pretend like it's not the case.

We have to reform Social Security. For a guy my age, 39 years old, you can make changes to it to save it for my parents. But you know, the president made a promise not to touch it, and so we're going to continue to try to cut the military, or cut discretionary spending, when we know what the real problem is.

Glasser: OK, I thought we had left Russia behind, but the truth is we have to go back to it. We've avoided it for how many whole minutes? Nineteen whole minutes.

Kinzinger: All right.

Glasser: The Russia investigation, which is not the same thing as the Russia policy conversation, this is the shadow that's sort of hanging over ...

Kinzinger: Yeah.

Glasser: ... all of these conversations. After James Comey's testimony, you said, "President Trump, without a doubt, acted improperly," although we would wait and see what the actual investigative conclusion is. I don't know if you saw it, but I was struck today by an op-ed that former Senator Lowell Weicker, a Republican from Connecticut, wrote in the New York Times ... he's the last surviving members of the Watergate Select Committee.

And he wrote about basically the duties of members of Congress in this kind of a situation. And I thought it was very interesting because, of course, he is making the argument that it was much more bipartisan. That Republicans as well as Democrats, if you go back and listen to the Watergate tapes, which he said he'd been doing recently, that you can't tell really, just by listening to the voices which party a member of Congress is in.

Kinzinger: Yes.

Glasser: I suspect that would not be the case if you listened to the Comey questioning, and you didn't know whether the senator was a Republican or a Democrat. You would probably guess pretty quickly.

Kinzinger: Yes.

Glasser: What is your responsibility as a member of Congress in an investigation of the president?

Kinzinger: Well, it's to be a check on the executive branch. It's to uphold the Constitution, and it's to do the right thing. You know, it's interesting, I think President Trump has brought some of this on himself by just the constant tweeting, right? You know, talking about tapes, talking about this kind of stuff. And I wish he would do what President Clinton did, which was say, "Hey, look, the investigation will go on. I have work to do for the American people." That's good for America, the Republican Party, and the president if he did that.

But at the same time, I've said we deserve answers. Look, I do care about 2018, and I care about 2020 as a Republican. But my deepest burden in this whole situation is not about that. It's about the institution of government because when people have their faith in this government undermined -- right, or left, or in between -- if you believe that we're not getting to the answers, or there's doubt that there was collusion with Russia — and I personally don't think the president colluded with Russia.

But I think we'll figure that out through this process of this investigation. That's what American people need is to know that justice has been served. To know we can hold our leaders, especially the president, accountable to concerns. That's what makes us unique. In Iran, you're not going to be able to have a commission to investigate the ayatollah. It's just not going to work. It's not going to happen in Russia.

It's unique about us because that's how this institution, which represents people from all different countries, backgrounds, colors, creeds, ethnicities, that's how we've worked, is we believe we hold our government accountable. And that's frustrating to some of us out here sometimes because, you know, Congress has a 9 percent approval rating. But it's our favorite pastime to hold our politicians accountable and dislike them. We just need answers.

If there's nothing here and Mueller comes out and says it, this is going backfire against the left pretty big.

Glasser: You watched the Comey testimony?

Kinzinger: Most of it, yes.

Glasser: Just tell me about your reaction. I mean, neither you nor I, in our lifetime, has ever seen the director of the FBI go under oath and call the president of the United States a liar.

Kinzinger: Right. Well, I mean, it's disappointing that he said it or had to say it. You know, the world is watching this. And I believe America's job is to be an example of self-governance to a world drowning in chaos. And then, when we're drowning in our own chaos, it doesn't really help us with that mission.

But at the same time, in watching that there was no smoking gun to say, you know, the president obstructed justice. As I mentioned, I think he acted improperly. I think probably most people would admit that. But that's very different than saying obstructed justice. I do think truth matters in general.

Glasser: Just to be clear, you could imagine a situation where the investigation fills out that picture and ...

Kinzinger: Yes, whichever way.

Glasser: ... makes the point that it's obstruction. You're not saying you don't ...

Kinzinger: That it is or is isn't. Yes.

Glasser: Right. You're just saying that the testimony itself did not ...

Kinzinger: Right.

Glasser: ... conclusively prove that to you.

Kinzinger: Yes. And I'm not a lawyer, and I don't frankly quite know what that rises to. But on the broader point, which is the issue of truth, I learned in Sunday school growing up that there is an absolute truth, and truth matters. Sometimes people can see truth through a different lens, but there is truth. And where I really worry is that people don't believe in truth anymore. They believe in simply what comports with their world view.

So they go on the website that has all the news stories that shows what they believe back at them. Some people go on this news site over here, and it's created this problem where people only believe what they already pre-believe. That's confirmation bias. That's a scary thing when there's no truth anymore. And that's another thing that bothers me. It worries me.

Glasser: I'm sure you get some of that from you constituents or people out there. What about up here on Capitol Hill? Do you think that people live in information bubbles here as members of Congress?

Kinzinger: It's a good question. I think some do, but I also think the men and women I work with on both sides of the aisle are actually really, really impressive people. And I think they can see both sides of arguments. One of the things that I lament, that I wish we could do differently is, people see us fight, but they never see when the cameras are off, we're actually buddies out here. And that's what I wish we could show more of.

But, yes. So there's probably some confirmation bias with people, but I think for the most part, I have a lot of respect for the people I work with, and I think they get good news from great sources.

Glasser: It was a pretty talking-point-laden response that you saw, the public response to the Comey testimony, right? You had Republicans saying, "There's no smoking gun." You had Democrats saying, "This is the gravest accusation made in a hearing since Watergate." That doesn't really — you know, it's not inspiring to people, right?

Kinzinger: Well, and what it does is, again, if you're a Republican, you just say — I think, frankly, the Democrats have been way overly dramatic. I think any new piece of information that hits the news, they are just screaming impeachment. Not all of them — some of them. And that's worn way old. That's gotten way old. But there are some on our side that, you know, deny everything is real, and that gets way old too.

Glasser: Just as a thoughtful person, regardless of where it would lead, what are questions that you have? You and I are both basically spectators here. We're reading these stories as they appear in the New York Times and the Washington Post. What are some specific questions that you would ask if you were on that committee?

Kinzinger: Well, I think bottom line, up front, what I'd want to know is, who was talking to the Russians if in fact that was happening. Why? What were the discussions? Because I think it's possible that there were some in his circle that were talking to them, that, you know, he didn't know about. Again, I don't this rises up to him, frankly, from what I've seen.

I'd want to know that. I'd want to know what happened after. A lot of different questions about that. But I think when it's all said and done, I'm putting a lot of faith in Robert Mueller, who I think is a great American, to really just do the right thing, and get people the answers they need.

Glasser: As you've thought about it in your head, are there any lines that if they were crossed, would really change your thinking about this for you? For example, the president has already publicly said in the NBC News interview with Lester Holt that he fired Director Comey with the Russia probe and its escalation in mind. Does that trouble you? What are your own redlines?

Kinzinger: It's concerning. I don't want to put what my redlines are because, again, as a not-legal expert, I don't know what rises to illegal, or improper, or not. And so, I think in those hypotheticals, it's kind of dangerous to put my redlines out there. I want to see, frankly, just what the answers are here, and then we can make a decision. I hope there's nothing to any of this, and I hope that the president has a very successful four or eight years.

Glasser: You mentioned the Democrats sort of shouting impeachment at every new newspaper article. What does that feel like up here on Capitol Hill? Is it something that people are actually talking about sort of in a process way, like nuts and bolts?

Kinzinger: Not really. Actually, to be honest with you, no. I don't know within Democratic circles if they are. But on our side, no. I mean, we don't think that that's going to happen. But the Democrats are the ones who are talking about it, and so I'm sure they're having their conversations about that.

But, no. It's not something we're talking about. We're trying to focus on our agenda out here, and you know, we've had some difficulty getting some of that over the finish line. And so, that's where we're really doubling down.

Glasser: That's a very diplomatic way of putting it. You mentioned incivility and how this was one of the issues that you've tried to pick up on. You're wearing right now a sticker in honor of your colleague, Congressman Scalise. After the recent shooting, you just put out on Twitter the other day, you know, an example of some of the incredibly—I don't even know how to characterize it.

Kinzinger: Evil. I say evil.

Glasser: Evil public discourse aimed at you and other Republicans after this shooting, and the idea that people would respond to this by basically saying, "He deserved it," things like that. Have you see a marked deterioration in discourse over the last year as a result of this 2016 election?

Kinzinger: Yes. I mean, look, both sides are responsible. And I think if somebody says only the other side is responsible, they're responsible for this. They're part of the problem. Both sides had it. President Obama had a lot of threats against him. We know about that. I've never seen it this bad though, personally. When somebody puts a tweet saying, "I wish you were on second base during the shooting," or, "I wish the plane had hit the Capitol instead of being taken out by the hero passengers because it would be better off for our country," or, "Lincoln deserved to be assassinated." Those kinds of things are what they're saying.

I thought it was important to put that out there because as a Christian, frankly, I believe that the best way to expose darkness is to bring it to light, and so people can see the kind of thoughts. And I don't do it to say, "Woe is me." Like, I've got thick skin. I can handle it. But I think people need to see the kind of discourse out there. And frankly, it's got to change.

We can have arguments and debates, and we should, and we should have passionate debates. Sometimes they should get too heated, but when it breaks up Thanksgiving dinner, and when Mom and Dad are in the basement watching news and getting angry, and having heart attacks, that's when it's gone too far.

Glasser: And what about the use of the presidential bully pulpit to name call and things like that? Does that have an effect?

Kinzinger: Yes, it does. It's all the way from a guy that's on the city council to the president of the United States. We all have a responsibility to bring the tone back to civility. That includes the president, and I hope we're seeing more of that.

Glasser: Well, I can see that you have a very busy schedule up here today, but I want to just circle back at the very end to the questions that originally prompted this conversation, which are really about your own, very unusual experience as a veteran of Iraq and Afghanistan, in a Congress where mostly that's not the case.

Kinzinger: Right.

Glasser: You have some thoughts about how to reengage the United States really in Afghanistan, in the Middle East. You've been very critical of President Obama's policy in those places. What is your view about what is possible right now? Is there a more winning scenario for how the U.S. could engage?

Kinzinger: I think we have to understand that we are in a generational fight. I think the mistake that was made at the beginning of the war on terror was this belief that if we just liberated Afghanistan, or did whatever, it would be over. We're not fighting a state in ISIS. We're fighting an ideology, and ideologies are only defeated from within.

I look at this as like the Cold War, just with more shooting. It took us 50 years, and basically a second and third generation, to over throw the cloak of communism from within. That's what it's going to take in this. And where I think we're shortsighted, which is my concern — we'll defeat the Islamic State, but there'll be ISIS 2, and Al Qaeda 3, and ISIS 5 that comes along. We've got to fight the next generational war on terror against and with the 7- and 8-year-olds.

Now, I say that to sound controversial. What I mean is those 7- and 8-year-olds right now who are internally displaced from the evil of Assad, they're the ones that, if they're given no hope and no opportunity, are going to be easy recruits for the next generation of ISIS. If they're given hope, and opportunity, and the ability to read, an optimistic view of the world, they're way less recruitable. That's why you don't see huge recruitings in the United States, because people have opportunity.

And so I think we have to focus on that next generational fight to be successful.

Glasser: So congressman, we started with our conversation a year ago, on your views about Donald Trump and foreign policy at a time when neither you nor I probably thought he was going to become president.

Kinzinger: Or him. He didn't think so.

Glasser: Or him. Exactly. So, you know, as you look ahead over the next year, what do you think we're going to be talking about a year from now?

Kinzinger: You know, it's really hard to tell. I think we'll have answers to this investigation, and so we'll talk about that, whatever that looks like. I think on a foreign policy front, I think stuff in Syria will come to a head, and I don't know if that means escalation, or if that means de-escalation. But I think we're going to have some kind of a very different situation there. I think ISIS will probably be destroyed, but that's actually going to be the beginning of our difficulties.

And so, you know, it will be interesting a year from now. Stuff has changed so fast in the last year that I've learned it's really hard to predict. But I do believe that we are in a world that while capitalism has brought people way more opportunity, and way more hope, there are a lot of low-grade battles everywhere. As Americans, we have to remember that our job is to be an example of self-governance to billions that are desperate for a taste of what we have.

Glasser: You talked about picking your battles. You know, you have picked a few with the president; a notoriously thin-skinned president. Has there been any retaliation for you?

Kinzinger: No, not at all. In fact, the couple times I've met with him, he's been very complimentary. And so, I'll continue to do what I think is the right thing for my country and my district. You know, if that means call out the president or support him, I want to support him whenever I can, and I'll oppose him when I have to.

Glasser: Thank you so much.

Kinzinger: You bet.

Glasser: That's Congressman Adam Kinzinger. I'm delighted to have him as the guest on this week's Global POLITICO. And of course, you can always tune to in on iTunes or whatever is your podcast platform. Subscribe to us, and email me anytime at SGlasser@politico.com. Thanks again.

To view online click here.

Back

Koch network donors eye Trump and Congress warily on health care, taxes Back

By Kevin Robillard | 06/26/2017 01:13 PM EDT

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — Conservative donors see a major opportunity this year to achieve years-old Republican goals of reforming the tax code and passing a new health care law. But they are also consumed with worry that the GOP will somehow blow the chance it has been waiting for — whether because of an unfocused President Donald Trump or fretful congressional Republicans.

That combination of hope and concern infused the summer seminar meeting of the Koch brothers' network of conservative groups. Before a gathering of over 400 donors at the luxury Broadmoor Resort, Koch officials spoke of an enticing but narrow window to pass major tax and health care legislation, even though Republicans control the presidency and both chambers of Congress.

"We have a window of about 12 months until the 2018 election grinds policy to a halt," said Tim Phillips, the president of Americans for Prosperity, the network's grassroots organizing group.

After waiting eight years for another Republican president, some Koch network donors now worry that the current one could end up being an obstacle.

Trump "doesn't have a core philosophy that we have," said Colorado energy executive Chris Wright. Wright, who said he voted for Libertarian presidential nominee Gary Johnson in 2016, added: "We don't have a clear, consistent direction from the top."

"I think we have 10 months and a rare opportunity to shrink the influence of the government on the economy," Wright said. "The one we have now who can sell the public is Paul Ryan, but he doesn't have the bully pulpit. The person with bully pulpit is not a great seller of ideas and progress."

The Koch network, organized by brothers Charles and David Koch, is a collection of conservative donors who have donated billions over the decades to everything from Republican politicians to school choice efforts to university think tanks in an effort to move the country in their ideological direction. The group's allies and former staffers hold key positions throughout the Trump administration, and the network announced plans earlier this weekend to spend nearly \$400 million on politics and policy over the next two years.

The Koch network declined to directly back Trump's candidacy in the election last year. Top network officials have been pleased with his administration's court appointments and work on tax reform, and were ecstatic about legislation he signed last week reforming the Department of Veterans Affairs. But they were sharply critical of Attorney General Jeff Sessions' stance on criminal justice reform and the GOP efforts to repeal Obamacare, arguing the Senate bill doesn't do enough to lower premiums and totally repeal the law. (The network isn't officially opposing the Senate proposal, but is working to make it more conservative.)

But individual donors in the network have donated significant sums to Trump and super PACs backing him, including Doug Deason, a Texas-based donor who is the son of IT billionaire Darwin Deason.

Deason was more bullish on Trump, particularly praising his pick of Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch. "Anything other than Gorsuch is gravy," Deason said. "Even if he just tweeted and pissed people off now, I'd be happy."

But he also said he and a group of about ten other Dallas-area donors planned to withhold checks from out-of-state Senate and House GOP incumbents until Trump's agenda, including Obamacare repeal and tax reform, made it through.

Deason said Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell needed to "grow a pair." "We want to send a message about how important this is," he said.

At the same time, Deason said he had recently met with leaders from America First Policies, a nonprofit backing Trump's agenda that launched attacks on Nevada Sen. Dean Heller for opposing the Senate health care bill, arguing it cut Medicaid too harshly and did too little to lower premiums.

Deason wasn't the only donor who worried about whether congressional Republicans will ultimately pass major legislation.

Bob Fettig, a Wisconsin metal fabrication company owner, was optimistic about the chances for tax reform. "It looks like they're serious, and they're actually going to do something to simplify it," he said.

But Fettig added: "The big question is, when it gets down to vote time, are they going to introduce all kinds of amendments to undo the simplicity of it?"

"A lot of people are frustrated with our government in general because politicians don't do what they say they're going to do," Fettig continued. "I'm confident that Trump will continue to push forward. ... Politicians are continuing to be politicians."

Despite the apprehension, none indicated they were ready to shut off the money faucet into GOP campaign wallets. Even Deason, who said he had organized Texas donors to deny Republicans campaign cash until Trump's agenda is passed, admitted he might not be able to follow through.

When a reporter asked if he would donate to Republican senators next summer when McConnell called even if the president's agenda flopped, he responded with a shrug: "Yeah."

To view online click here.

Back

How the Right Gets Reagan Wrong Back

By Henry Olsen | 06/26/2017 07:51 AM EDT

For nearly 30 years, the Republican Party has increasingly resembled a religion, with Ronald Reagan as its deity. Party leaders endlessly quote him, and every GOP presidential nominee until Donald Trump ran on a platform they thought was barely changed from Reagan's 1980 campaign. No wonder conservative talk radio icon Rush Limbaugh calls our 40th president "Ronaldus Magnus": Ronald the Great.

This religion's creed—let's call it Reaganism—is simple. Government and taxes are bad, private entrepreneurship and supply-side economics is good. Social conservatism and unofficial endorsement of Christianity is essential to national well-being. Around the world, America should speak loudly, carry the biggest stick and never be afraid of using it. Proclaim and practice these truths and political success will be yours.

This canon has been repeated for so long that it seems self-evidently true to Republicans and movement conservatives. But it's simply not the sum of what Reagan believed.

I discovered this while researching my new book on Reagan's life. I learned that election returns show Americans don't want what Reaganism's high priests are preaching. More crucially, I learned that everything I thought I knew about Reagan was wrong—that Reaganism misrepresents Reagan's own views.

Reagan's conservatism actually fit squarely within Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal consensus, not the anti-New Deal conservatism that forms Reaganism's heart.

Heresy! some readers will cry. How can a man who backed Barry Goldwater, who said that "libertarianism is the heart of conservatism," and who told America that "government is not the solution to the problem, it is the problem" be a New Deal conservative? The answer is that while all those statements are true, they exist in the context of a much more pro-government world view than Reaganism admits.

The young Reagan was an ardent devotee of FDR and the Democratic Party. His friends from that era say he memorized FDR's "fireside chats" and incessantly prattled on about New Deal liberalism. Many assume that his political outlook changed so much as he moved to the right that he rejected FDR and the New Deal. But Reagan always said "I didn't leave the Democratic Party, the Democratic Party left me." Taking that line seriously is the first step to getting Reagan right.

Reagan's early conservative talks before he rose to national fame during Goldwater's bid for the presidency in October 1964 argued that certain government social programs weren't needed to meet "humanitarian aims." He would criticize bureaucrats who bossed people around or programs that gave aid to people who didn't need it. He did not, however, join other conservatives and say New Deal programs were unconstitutional or an improper thing for government to do. Nor, if the programs genuinely met a legitimate need, did he criticize them for costing too much.

Quite the contrary. I just about fell off my chair in the Reagan Library when I heard him say this in a 1958 speech: "In the last few decades we have indulged in a great program of social progress with many welfare programs. I'm sure that most of us in spite of the cost wouldn't buy many of these projects back at any price. They represented forward thinking on our part."

He repeated similar sentiments in every speech I listened to, even saying in 1961, "Any person in the United State who requires medical attention and cannot provide for himself should have it provided for him." That year, he supported an alternative to Medicare called the Kerr-Mills Act that gave federal funds to states so they could help poor senior citizens pay for medical care, even writing to a longtime friend that "if the money isn't enough I think we should put up more."

Reagan did not change his stripes as he became conservatism's hero, and continued to preach his own unique conservative vision. He told viewers of the October 1964 "Time for Choosing" speech endorsing Goldwater, the speech that made him a national political star, that conservatives were for "telling our senior citizens that that no one in this country should be denied medical care for lack of funds." He campaigned for governor of California saying talk "in America of left and right" was "disruptive talk, dividing us down the center." He said his "Creative Society," intended to be a non-bureaucratic alternative to Lyndon Johnson's "Great Society," wasn't "some glorified program for passing the buck and telling people to play Samaritan and solve their problems on their own while government stands by to hand out Good Conduct ribbons." And when he became governor, he pushed through a then-record tax increase after his efforts to "cut, squeeze, and trim" government could not balance the budget.

He didn't alter his views when he ran for and became president, either. He often said, "Those who, through no fault of their own, must depend on the rest of us" would be exempt from budget cuts. He pushed through three tax increases as president, one of which made Social Security solvent for the past 35 years.

Reagan got these ideas from FDR, and often paraphrased lines uttered by his one-time idol. The line that government should support "those who, through no fault of their own," could not support themselves came from FDR, who used that exact phrase frequently to describe who deserved government help. In the Time for Choosing speech, Reagan chastised liberals by saying "the trouble with our liberal friends is not that they're ignorant; it's that so much they know isn't so." Reagan had adapted that line from a nearly identical variant uttered by FDR in his seventh fireside chat. Even Reagan's famous closing statement in the 1980 presidential debate against Jimmy Carter, when he asked Americans if they were better off than they were four years ago, was a direct paraphrase of a section of FDR's fifth fireside chat.

Conservative Republicans who didn't cotton to FDR didn't notice this, but the blue-collar voters who became known as "Reagan Democrats" sure did. During his governor's race, Reagan's margins were an astounding 36 percent to 44 percent larger than those of the 1962 Republican gubernatorial nominee, Richard Nixon, in towns dominated by blue-collar whites. He did dramatically better than other Republican presidential nominees in similar counties and towns when he ran for president, too. As one person told Reagan biographer Lou Cannon in 1984, "He isn't really like a Republican. He's more like an American, which is what we really need."

Republicans and conservatives have forgotten those elements to Reagan's thought and appeal, and have suffered at the polls ever since. The Republican nominee for president has received a majority of the popular vote only once since 1988. Most tellingly, Republican nominees before Trump consistently lost the Reagan Democrat-dominated states of Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, and Pennsylvania, winning only one of those states (Iowa) in one race (2004).

When Republicans have come out victorious, it's been mainly because the Democratic alternative has been worse, or because those Republicans have tacitly rejected Reaganism's creed. The current congressional majority, for example, is due to the 2010 and 2014 waves, which were clearly a reflection of anger at President Barack Obama rather than an endorsement of Reaganism. And Republican domination of statehouses and state legislatures has resulted mainly because these representatives have rejected Reaganism. Republican governors and state legislatures have continued to increase the size of government, cutting taxes on the margin but largely following the real Reagan by keeping services strong first. Governors like Kansas' Sam Brownback, who tried to buck this consensus by cutting services to make up for deficits caused by large tax cuts, have failed. Even deep-red-state voters like most of the Big Government set in motion by FDR's New Deal.

Meanwhile, Republicans on the national level are ignoring Reagan's legacy by focusing too much on cutting popular programs and providing large tax cuts to people who are already doing quite well. House Speaker Paul Ryan's insistence on making Medicare and Medicaid fiscally sustainable has led to plans that could end up denying medical care to the people who need these programs most. Texas Senator Ted Cruz's presidential campaign put forth a tax plan that would have lowered the top rate paid by the richest taxpayers to a mere 10 percent, cutting federal revenues by over $8 trillion at a time when the aging of baby boomers would have started to significantly increase federal spending. It's not that the Democrats' solutions are any better, by the way, but the lesson of the 2012 election was that tired and stale Democratic proposals, even when pronounced by an unpopular standard bearer, beat Reaganism.

Trump is the most surprising and most recent example of Reaganism's political failure. In 2016, he made active government in the service of the "forgotten American," a phrase FDR and Reagan also used to describe working- and middle-class Americans, the centerpiece of his campaign. He trounced 16 GOP adversaries, most of whom (especially Cruz) campaigned on Reaganism's principles. He then received an overwhelming swing vote from blue-collar whites—the same vote Reagan got, in exactly the regions of the country where Reagan did well—to capture the White House. He was the first Republican since Reagan to capture Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa and Pennsylvania.

Trump is far from Reagan's second coming: His tenure in office is decidedly unlike the Gipper's in his tone and his approach to Russia. And he has veered in the direction of Reaganism at times: For one, the president supported Ryan's Obamacare replacement bill (even though he later called it "mean" and the bill will cost many of those Trump Democrats their health care). Trump's tax reform principles also veer far toward the supply-side "cut taxes for the rich" approach Reaganism advocates, providing little-to-no direct tax relief for the Trump Democrats who put him in the Oval Office. But even so, Trump remains the Republican leader least wedded to Reaganism in many years. In fact, his combination of support of an active government in service of the average worker with other traditional GOP concerns such as deregulation and support for the pro-life agenda more closely mimics what Reagan actually said and believed than any other GOP national leader since. No wonder the types of voters who went for Reagan voted for Trump, too.

Reagan's campaign slogan in 1980 was simple, yet profound: "The Time is Now: Reagan." That is as true today as it was then. Replace Reaganism with the real Reagan, and the Republican Party can become "the New Republican Party" he spoke of before the Conservative Political Action Conference's 1977 annual meeting.

That party, he said, was the party of "the man and the woman in the factories, the farmer, the cop on the beat." It was a party that shunned ideology and recognized that conservatives come in different stripes with different concerns and priorities. It was a party that would make certain that "working men and women" would "have a say in what goes on in the party." Without saying it directly, he implied it would be a party that interprets rather than tacitly opposes FDR's New Deal.

Reagan made that point clear toward the end of his career. On Columbus Day, 1988, he told a group of Italian-Americans in New Jersey that the "party of FDR and Harry Truman" wasn't dead. Instead, "the party that represents people like you and me, the party that represents a majority of Americans," was alive—in the GOP. "You see," he told his audience, "the secret is when the left took over the Democratic Party, we took over the Republican Party."

Conservatives face a rendezvous with destiny, a time for choosing. They can choose to follow the false prophets of Reaganism, and thereby hand power over to the left for decades to come. Or they can embrace the real Reagan and finally create the new Republican Party he dreamed of, a party that can make America the shining city on a hill he always knew we could be.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: House tax writers seek offsets despite $1.5 trillion budget leeway — Obamacare signups expected to fall as subsidy rises — Puerto Rico dissolves controversial contract
Date: Monday, October 30, 2017 4:09:31 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 10/30/2017 04:06 PM EDT

HARD WAY ANYWAY: In an ideal world, Congress could cut taxes without jacking up the debt or hiking other taxes. But reality — and reconciliation — make it an exercise in seesawing with a double-pan scale.

As all you budget experts know, the fiscal 2018 resolution, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), adopted last week could alleviate some of that hassle, allowing the tax cuts to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit. But a number of House tax writers say they plan to offset the bill expected to be unveiled Wednesday, Aaron Lorenzo explains. (Sorry, senators.)

The catch: We're not talking about tit-for-tat spending cuts here. Get ready for the GOP to rely on the often-nebulous, and always controversial, task of dynamic scoring — assuming tax breaks will spur economic growth and then estimating a specific dollar amount produced by that revving. Never mind that a new analysis by the Tax Policy Center concludes that the Republican tax plan would reduce revenue by about $2.4 trillion over a decade, Colin Wilhelm and Toby Eckert explain.

Still not enough: Even if that scoring turns out to be mighty dynamic, there's just no way Republicans can guesstimate their way around paying for at least some of the $5.5 trillion price tag their tax plan is expected to bear. And so the hunt for revenue offsets continues. Potentially kicking in some cash, the mortgage tax credit appears to be back on the chopping block, Lorraine Woellert reports. Then tipping that scale in the other direction, the itemized property tax deduction now seems to be safe, Toby and Colin note.

The trade-offs are tricky, since a lot of folks lose when you ax existing tax breaks. Morning Tax author Bernie Becker articulates that conundrum today in his three-part video explainer on loopholes and the U.S. tax code.

All the rest: Property-tax deduction could help | GOP tosses conservative playbook | Bill remains shrouded in secrecy | White House says Trump remains committed to immediate corporate cut

GOOD MONDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — A CRS report publicly released today states that the House bill H.R. 2997 \(115\) to separate air traffic control operations from the FAA would trigger an automatic budget sequester if costs are not offset. More from Tanya Snyder.

#DailyBudgetFact — In 2015, 40 states reported 2,436 new cases of acute hepatitis C, although the CDC estimates the actual number is 13.9 times higher, due at least in part to the opioid epidemic. More from POLITICO's DataPoint team.

Quote du jour: "I'm sorry, but it's just really hard to take your question seriously when there's two Tyrannosaurus rexes right out there," White House budget director Mick Mulvaney said during a tax reform panel in South Carolina last week, after he was distracted by a parade of employees dressed up for Halloween, per The Herald.

FREEDOM CAUCUS FLUB: Last Wednesday's brief erroneously identified Rep. Matt Gaetz (R-Fla.) as a member of the House Freedom Caucus. Sorry for the error.

OBAMACARE

OPEN SEASON: With bare-bones operations and hardly any advertising, Obamacare is expected to bring in a lot fewer sign-ups this fall, Paul Demko, Rachana Pradhan and Adam Cancryn explain. But the total cost of Obamacare payments is still almost certain to rise as the government is forced to subsidize those exploding premium costs. The average monthly federal subsidy will be $555 in 2018, compared to $382 this year, Paul reports for Pros today. Sign-ups begin Nov. 1.

Picking up the tab: Much of Obamacare's spiking premiums can be explained by President Donald Trump's actions — including his decision to cancel a key subsidy program earlier this month. CBO predicted that cutting off those payments would jack up Obamacare's cost by $194 billion over a decade because customers' subsidies are tied to the cost of their premiums. Then last month, the budget office estimated that the federal government would spend $47 billion on subsidies in 2018.

More: CMS sets rules for 2019 marketplaces | Dramatic state-to-state differences on enrollment

DISASTER RELIEF

CATCH AND RELEASE: After days of backlash, the Puerto Rican government and Montana-based Whitefish Energy are dissolving their contentious, $300 million contract. Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló publicly called for the cancellation of the contract Sunday morning, after previously resisting any change to the deal, Colin Wilhelm reports. Whitefish was hired to rebuild the island's electrical grid, which remains devastated weeks after Hurricane Maria.

Not off the hook: The no-bid contract, made using emergency funds, will likely come under scrutiny as officials from FEMA and other government agencies head to Capitol Hill for two separate oversight hearings this week.

More: Whitefish staffs ups in Washington | Zinke on defense

FINALLY, A FIRE-BORROWING FIX? The House will vote this week on a bill intended to help the federal government with the ever-growing costs of wildfires in the West. Rep. Bruce Westerman, the Arkansas Republican who authored the bill, says the Forest Service would no longer have to dip into other accounts after draining its firefighting budget — a perennial problem known as "fire-borrowing."

How it works: The bill, H.R. 2936 \(115\), would let the secretaries of Agriculture and Interior declare a major disaster if their departments would otherwise run out of firefighting money that year. Although the measure wouldn't allocate new money, it would allow reshuffling of existing funds. Separate from the funding issue, the bill also contains more controversial forest management reforms that have angered environmentalists.

WHITE HOUSE

HITTING THE LINKS: For decades, presidents have used the golf course to earn the loyalty of fellow politicians. And in many ways, Trump has followed that trend, successfully tapping into the power of an 18-hole outing with the likes of Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe. But POTUS hasn't become fast friends with all of his golf partners, Darren Samuelsohn explains. For one, there's only a small field of lawmakers who are good enough to compete with the president on the course, says Rep. John Yarmuth of Kentucky, the Budget Committee's ranking Democrat (and both a member and property owner at Trump's semi-private golf club in Ireland).

'Tough call': And then there's the fact that members of the minority party are reluctant to be seen swinging a club next to a political foe like Trump. "I'm not sure there's a lot of Democrats who'd want to go out and spend four hours with him," Yarmuth said. Personally receiving an invite from Trump would be "a very tough call," he added, arguing that he wouldn't necessarily want to "tarnish" his only presidential golf experience thus far (with President Barack Obama in 2015).

AGRICULTURE

HARVEY RUINS 'ONE OF BEST CROPS EVER': Hurricane Harvey caused more than $200 million in crop damage for Texas farmers — many of whom were banking on a record year, according to a new analysis from Texas A&M University. Cotton farmers saw half of the losses, or about $100 million, amounting to just a slice of the state's $2.5 billion cotton crop last year, Jenny Hopkinson explains. "Many South Texas or coastal area cotton farmers were on the verge of harvesting one of the best crops ever in Texas," says Doug Steele, a researcher at Texas A&M.

DEFENSE

MOUNTING COSTS: The Pentagon has spent more than $1.4 trillion on war operations since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Connor O'Brien reports. A new government report shows the U.S. military has spent more in Afghanistan than Iraq on a year-to-year basis since 2010. But more has been spent in Iraq overall — $748 billion, compared to $687 billion spent in Afghanistan.

AUMF price tag: The ever-growing costs of war are sure to come under scrutiny tonight when Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson appear before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Both are likely to face a barrage of questions about the prospects of open-ended warfare against global extremists.

EDUCATION

DEVOS IS DOWNSIZING: The Office of Federal Student Aid has begun offering buyouts — including early retirement — to longtime employees to help shrink the education department, The Washington Post reports. A department employee could receive as much as $25,000 under that offer, Kimberly Hefling adds.

EARMARKS

- John Boehner unchained. POLITICO Magazine.
- How a Republican idea for reducing Medicare costs could affect you. The New York Times.
- Connecticut's budget solution: State capital gets more, small towns get less. The Wall Street Journal.
- Is $45 billion the White House's opioid funding ask? Prescription Pulse.
- Opinion: GOP has murdered the federal budget. Forbes.
- Study: GOP tax plan will explode deficit. The Hill.
- Debate over sanctuary cities gets a test run in Virginia governor's race. The Wall Street Journal.

WE'RE COUNTING: 41 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017).

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/10/house-tax-writers-look-for-offsets-despite-15-trillion-budget-leeway-025296>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

A $1.5 trillion gift to the House Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 10/30/2017 05:01 AM EDT

House Ways and Means Republicans gained a good deal of breathing room on tax reform with House passage of the Senate budget last week.

It simply makes some tough choices easier.

"Of course it does," said Rep. Mike Kelly (R-Pa.), who's fighting to keep a number of longstanding tax benefits related to the cost of doing business, like deductions for borrowing and advertising expenses and a credit for construction in economically depressed communities.

Not only does the budget plan deliver a filibuster-proof pathway — known as reconciliation — for a broad bill to redraw U.S. tax laws, it also comes with $1.5 trillion in headroom for tax cuts to add to the deficit.

The original budget resolution the House passed earlier this month included some spending cuts and instructions for revenue-neutral tax legislation, leaving less latitude for tax reform. But Senate Republicans crafted their budget more flexibly and left the spending cuts out, and that's the roadmap going forward on both sides of the Capitol.

The $1.5 trillion frees House Republicans of the yoke of revenue neutrality.

A number of GOP Ways and Means members say they still plan to offset the tax legislation they're scheduled to roll out on Wednesday, when counting on economic growth they believe the bill will produce under so-called dynamic scoring. The Senate's deficit figure is based on traditional scoring.

"In order to make this move in the most timely manner, we accepted their instructions but we're going to continue to move on our plan, and our plan is for offsets on a dynamic basis," said Rep. Tom Rice (R-S.C.).

A dynamic score will come from the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation after Ways and Means finishes its business on the bill, expected after several days of a markup set to begin Nov. 6, said Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas).

But committee members admit that not even dynamic scoring can make up for $1.5 trillion in a tax package expected to cost some $5.5 trillion in total in order to reduce the corporate tax rate to 20 percent, cut other business tax rates to 25 percent and lower individual tax rates almost across the board, among many other changes.

But they're not prepared to forecast a final House figure, either.

"Those are the numbers we're still working on based on all the changes," said Rep. Jim Renacci (R-Ohio). "This is their way of passing a budget, which is a gimmick, we pass our budget. In the end, we haven't followed a budget since 1974 in this Congress so this is a way to get tax reform done. It's that simple."

When former Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp introduced tax reform legislation in 2014, it was based on years of development under revenue-neutral strictures imposed by the Republican from Michigan.

GOP members of the committee then and now griped that those limits were unnecessary because of their belief that tax cuts will yield economic growth, and they didn't want to pare back some benefits long baked into the tax code that are designed to motivate business expansion. And those sentiments aren't unique to Republicans on the tax-writing panel.

The hunt for revenue offsets in the current overhaul effort has been hard enough, Kelly said.

Most recently, fights have broken out over proposals to eliminate the federal deduction for state and local taxes and to alter when taxes get collected on retirement contributions. Fully repealing the deduction could raise about $1.3 trillion over a decade and the retirement move $750 billion, though bartering for compromise on both ideas would generate less revenue.

Republican lawmakers from high-tax districts in New York and New Jersey are pressuring their party leaders to back off outright repeal of the state and local tax deduction. The budget passed by a narrow 216-212 margin largely because of state and local tax worries among many of the 20 Republicans who voted against it.

Some are now threatening to withhold their support for tax reform.

In the dispute over retirement plans, President Donald Trump has warned tax writers to keep their hands off 401(k)s. But Brady and his Senate counterpart, Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), have refused to rule out changes.

Before the current squabbling over those issues, House Speaker Paul Ryan and Brady kept up a protracted fight over their import tax idea that would have raised more than $1 trillion over the 10-year budget window, but they lost.

Hence the ongoing quest for revenue, which has occupied a lot of time in private meetings between Brady and Republican Ways and Means members over the past two days.

Republican senators who first approved the budget's $1.5 trillion allowance believe about a third of it is accounted for by considering current policy rather than current law, though the latter is used by the Congressional Budget Office.

Growth of about 0.4 percent a year over the current CBO projection of economic expansion would make up the remaining balance of roughly $1 trillion.

Brady plans to introduce it Nov. 1 and then open official committee debate the week after. The markup is expected over multiple days, Brady said. A traditional score will be released when the markup begins, he said.

And despite all the wrangling over offsets and how much economic punch their tax plan will ultimately deliver, Ways and Means Republicans are projecting confidence.

"For us to get rates down, we've got to get rid of a lot of things," said Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.). "I'm not worried about any of this."

To view online click here.

Back

TPC analysis: GOP tax plan would slow economy long-term Back

By Colin Wilhelm and Toby Eckert | 10/27/2017 04:23 PM EDT

A new analysis of the GOP tax reform plan concludes that it would boost the economy in the short term but slow it over the long term, reducing federal revenue by around $2.4 trillion over a decade.

The study by the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center runs counter to White House estimates. A study published today by the White House Council of Economic Advisers, for instance, estimates an economic boost of up to 5 percent in the long term just as the result of business tax cuts.

The TPC study was based on a dynamic score of the tax overhaul framework released by Hill Republican leaders and the Trump administration in September, along with assumptions derived from the administration's April outline and the "Better Way" plan House Republicans released in 2016.

"TPC found that the Framework would boost the economy in the short-run as people spend some of their increased after-tax income and businesses increase investment, temporarily raising output relative to its potential level," Howard Gleckman, a senior fellow at the Center, wrote in a blog post. "However, over time the tax cuts — and the increased deficits they produce — squeeze the overall supply of capital, raise the cost of borrowing, and lower firms' level of investment. The smaller capital stock also diminishes wage growth, which in turn reduces labor supply."

The report is likely to draw strong pushback from the White House and congressional Republicans. They fiercely disputed an earlier TPC report that concluded the wealthy would be the biggest winners under the GOP tax plan.

To view online click here.

Back

Ryan loses key ally on tax reform after switch on breaks for homeowners Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 10/28/2017 04:59 PM EDT

The National Association of Home Builders on Saturday accused House Speaker Paul Ryan of abruptly reversing course on a mortgage tax credit proposal and announced it would oppose the tax-reform proposal that GOP lawmakers expect to unveil on Wednesday.

The about-face by the housing-industry lobbying group strips Republicans of a powerful ally. Tax breaks for homeowners have long been one of the flash points of any attempt to rewrite the nation's tax laws.

"All the resources we were going to put into supporting are now going to go into opposing the plan," NAHB Chief Executive Officer Jerry Howard told POLITICO.

Homebuilders and other groups had been working with Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) on a plan to preserve tax breaks for homeowners. House Republicans have been planning to weaken the deduction that home mortgage borrowers currently get for the interest they pay on their mortgages by raising the standard deduction, leading much of the housing lobby to line up against the plan.

As an alternative, Brady had agreed to a tax credit that would combine mortgage interest and local property taxes, Howard said.

Friday night, Brady told Howard that that idea had been rejected by House leadership. In a phone call Saturday, Ryan said rank-and-file members weren't comfortable with the concept of a homeownership tax credit, Howard said.

"I don't think it's fair of the speaker to take a concept that his own committee chair is in favor of and deep-six it without vetting it with the conference," Howard said.

"He told me there wasn't enough time and the concept would not be put into the document," Howard said. "I told the speaker candidly we had shopped the proposal to the White House and we had support there."

A Ryan spokeswoman confirmed the call had taken place but had no other comment.

Brady said in a statement that tax writers will restore an itemized property tax deduction to the plan and suggested that the fight over the mortgage tax break wasn't over.

"Homebuilders have been great partners in developing a new home credit that helps more Americans with both their mortgage and property taxes by expanding this tax relief to homeowners who don't itemize," Brady said. "I hope members of Congress will examine it closely to determine if they want it included before tax reform heads to the president's desk."

A person familiar with the tax discussions said rank-and-file House members aren't well-versed on the concept of a mortgage and property tax credit. The idea also wasn't consistent with the original GOP framework, this person said.

The framework called for preservation of "tax incentives for home mortgage interest" but didn't explicitly endorse the mortgage-interest deduction.

The mortgage-interest deduction has been widely criticized by economists and housing advocates because most of its benefits flow to wealthier Americans. A tax credit, by contrast, reach more low- and moderate-income buyers, especially under the GOP framework, which increases the standard deduction.

"Under the framework, the mortgage-interest deduction becomes simply a subsidy for the very wealthy," Howard said. "It doesn't do anything to promote homeownership."

Colin Wilhelm contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Property-tax deduction could help GOP reform bill Back

By Aaron Lorenzo, Jimmy Vielkind and Colin Wilhelm | 10/29/2017 02:48 PM EDT

House tax writers' decision to allow an itemized deduction for state and local property taxes in their reform plan could be a step toward quelling a revolt against the plan by Republican lawmakers from high-tax states.

Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady announced the change on Saturday, an apparent concession in a hard-fought battle that led 20 House GOP lawmakers to vote against the budget bill — the vehicle for a tax overhaul — last week. Some of those lawmakers also threatened to withhold their votes from the tax-reform bill, which House leaders plan to release on Wednesday, unless their concerns were addressed.

Brady and other House GOP leaders have been seeking to end the federal deduction for state and local taxes that people pay, as part of their tax overhaul. But Republican lawmakers from high-tax districts in New York, New Jersey and other states have been pushing back, saying it would amount to a tax increase on their constituents.

"At the urging of lawmakers, we are restoring an itemized property tax deduction to help taxpayers with local tax burdens," Brady said in an emailed statement Saturday.

In an early sign that the move could be softening the opposition of some lawmakers, Rep. Dan

Donovan (R-N.Y.), the only GOP House member who represents a district within New York City's five boroughs, described it as a positive development on Sunday.

"I'm grateful to the Chairman and House leaders for listening to the argument that I and others made about the basic unfairness of double taxation, and I look forward to analyzing the tax relief proposal in its entirety next week," said an email from Donovan, whose constituents pay city and state income taxes.

Donovan was one of the seven New York House Republicans who voted against budget passage in the House last week, the same seven who penned a letter in June outlining "deep concerns" over losing the state and local tax deduction. Only two Republicans from New York's House delegation voted for the budget and declined to sign the letter: Reps. Tom Reed, a Ways and Means member, and Chris Collins.

Rep. Leonard Lance (R-N.J.) had a similar, if more cautious, reaction to Brady's comments.

"This is a step in the right direction but I will need to see legislative text to determine if this proposal is in the best interest of New Jersey," Lance, one of four Garden State Republicans to oppose the budget, said in an email. "We already send more than enough money to Washington. I am pleased this debate has reminded lawmakers from other states of that fact. There is more work to be done on the SALT issue."

Despite the positive reaction from Donovan and Lance, it's unclear whether Brady's move will be enough to end the fight. A coalition of state and local governments and service providers criticized it as a half-measure, noting it did not address state and local income and sales taxes.

"Chairman Brady's partial elimination plan for the state and local tax (SALT) deduction would insert the heavy hand of Washington into state and local finance decisions, dictate winners and losers among states, and unfairly penalize taxpayers in states that rely significantly on income taxes," Americans Against Double Taxation said in a statement. "We will vigorously oppose this plan and continue to work for the preservation of the full state and local tax deduction, which has stood for more than 100 years."

The fate of the state and local tax deduction has been one of the thorniest problems to arise so far in Republicans' tax-reform effort.

To view online click here.

Back

House GOP tosses conservative playbook in bid for tax reform Back

By Brian Faler | 10/29/2017 07:09 AM EDT

House Republicans are so desperate for a win on taxes that they're agreeing to proposals that would have caused internal party warfare just a year or two ago.

They're considering forgoing a big cut in the top income tax rate on the rich, offering moderate-income Americans so many tax breaks that many would be excused from paying taxes entirely and passing a potentially 1,000-page tax bill few have seen within a matter of weeks. Last week, they agreed to a budget that ignored their demands for deep cuts in federal spending just so they could pass a tax bill using a special procedure that enables them to move forward without any Democratic votes.

It's an open question whether Republicans will be as flexible when party leaders release their entire tax bill, due Nov. 1, and everyone can see exactly who will be the losers under their plan. They already have some internal battles, with Republicans from high-tax states fighting a proposal to dump a long-standing deduction for state and local taxes.

But for now, once-controversial proposals are barely causing a stir, a sign lawmakers are willing to move beyond their party's orthodoxy on taxes and into a more freewheeling debate on how to rewrite the code.

"The American people want us to get to 'yes' on tax reform," said Rep. Jim Renacci (R-Ohio), who sits on the tax and budget committees.

It's an indication of the pressure lawmakers feel to produce a win ahead of next year's midterm elections after spending seven fruitless months trying to rescind the Affordable Care Act. Many are terrified at the prospect of facing voters next year with nothing to show for their time in power.

Even notoriously balky House conservatives are making nice.

"We've got to get the economy going — it's all about wages going up — and if I can endure some short-term pain for long-term benefits, I'm willing to do that," said Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), head of the chamber's staunchly conservative Freedom Caucus.

The latest flexibility came with Thursday's House adoption of a Senate budget plan. The annual fiscal blueprint used to be a big deal for House Republicans — Speaker Paul Ryan made his name as chairman of the Budget Committee, writing plans calling for drastic cuts in federal spending. And for years, House conservatives had demanded budgets balance the government's books.

But the fiscal blueprint they adopted Thursday does no such thing, and some lawmakers question the importance of the budget, saying they agreed to it only in order to tap the all-important reconciliation process they intend to use to move tax legislation through the Senate.

"We don't follow budgets anyway — it's really just a mechanism to get tax reform done," said Renacci.

They are also willing to compromise on their long-standing calls to cut the top income tax rate.

Just a few years ago, House Republicans walked away from a tax reform plan written by then-Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp in part because he cut the top rate only to 35 percent, from 39.6 percent. At the time, Republicans had been promising to cut the top rate to 25 percent — something they had pledged since they took over the House in 2011 — but Camp was unable to make the numbers work.

Now, Republicans are planning an even higher top rate. Their plans are still to be determined, but they may leave the top rate where it is, which President Barack Obama raised as part of the 2013 fiscal cliff agreement.

"I don't think there's anybody out there that is talking about NFL players needing a tax cut — I don't think high-powered doctors and lawyers need a tax cut," said Rep. Rob Woodall (R-Ga.), who emphasized Republicans' plans to instead cut taxes on small and large businesses.

At the same time, they're willing to take millions of Americans off the tax rolls entirely with their plans to double the standard deduction and expand a child tax credit. Just a few years ago, Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney lamented that, at the time, 47 percent of Americans did not pay federal income taxes.

Meadows defended the plan, saying: "I don't think we've said, 'Tax more people.' In fact, if anything, we've said 'Tax fewer people.'"

"It's a function of putting more of their money back in their pocket," he said.

There have also been relatively few complaints about the prospect of passing a giant tax rewrite bill, the biggest in a generation, in a matter of weeks. Republicans plan to release it Nov. 1, with committee action penciled in for the following week and House approval coming later next month.

Said Rep. Pat Meehan (R-Pa.), "It's not as if these issues are things that have never been considered before — there's a lot of work that's been done.

"There's been long discussion on the outlines of this," he said.

Of course, not everyone is happy.

Republican leaders have faced a rebellion from colleagues from high-tax states over their plan to dump a deduction for state and local taxes, and lawmakers are tangling with the Trump administration over plans to push people out of 401(k) retirement plans and into Roth IRAs.

And some lawmakers have chafed at the secrecy surrounding the GOP tax plan.

"We don't have the details — that's why I'm frustrated," said Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.).

It also remains to be seen whether the mood will hold once Republican leaders unveil their bill. Though their budget allows for a $1.5 trillion tax cut, the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center figures Republicans' tax cut promises would cost some $5.5 trillion, meaning lawmakers need to come up with a whopping $4 trillion in savings.

But for now, Republicans are ready to deal.

"This is a great opportunity — I think people are seizing the moment," said Meehan.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP tax bill shrouded in secrecy Back

By Aaron Lorenzo and Seung Min Kim | 10/28/2017 06:55 AM EDT

Rank-and-file House Republicans are increasingly alarmed by the secrecy shrouding the massive tax bill their party leaders plan to ram through Congress next month.

Just days ahead of the legislation's release, GOP members of the House Ways and Means Committee are still in the dark on numerous details being ironed out by the powerful tax-writing committee's chairman, Kevin Brady (R-Texas), and his staff. And they're blaming the panel's top-down approach for the uncertainty.

"There are a lot of open issues," said Rep. Jim Renacci (R-Ohio), echoing comments made by several of his colleagues on the committee.

Heading into the weekend, question marks remained on at least two high-profile proposals to offset the cost of slashing individual and business tax rates: curbing federal deductions for state and local taxes and business interest as well as potential changes to taxing retirement savings.

The uneasy feeling among members extends to their tax aides, who've been excluded from a recent series of hours-long member meetings with Brady and his tax counsels.

Several personal office tax staffers to committee Republicans indicated that they're grappling with how to brace their bosses for the coming lobbyist wave. Well-funded special interests are ready to pounce on the tax bill when Brady brings it out Nov. 1; aides are worried about the onslaught, particularly over any surprises in the legislation.

"You could potentially see some bombs in there," one aide said.

Part of the logic behind restricting access to the text stems from an eagerness to keep lobbyists at bay for as long as possible. There's also precedent; former Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp introduced tax reform legislation in 2014 after keeping final language under tight wraps until soon before the now-retired Michigan Republican released it. (And when he did, the bill bombed.)

But lawmakers, even those on the tax-writing committee, simply don't always have the same level of understanding of the issues in play as their professional staff, the same aide said on condition of anonymity because of sensitivities around the talks.

Aides aren't expected to join the next series of Ways and Means Republican meetings, which are scheduled for Monday afternoon and all day Tuesday. Brady has said he plans to introduce the tax bill on Wednesday, and begin considering it in committee the following week.

"Chairman Brady and Ways and Means members will meet next week to discuss final details before they introduce the tax reform text," said a spokeswoman.

Aides have been told they'd receive a briefing before the bill emerges, but that huddle could come as late as Tuesday night, another Ways and Means staffer said.

Even President Donald Trump's chief tax negotiators haven't been fully briefed, though Treasury Department officials were supposed to get looped in a bit more over the weekend, a Ways and Means aide said.

The approach by House Republicans stands in stark contrast to the other end of the Capitol, where top Senate Republicans want to ensure all GOP senators feel they have buy-in from the start — a desire to avoid retracing the steps that led to their failed Obamacare repeal attempt.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has convened meetings with Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and a handful of key Republicans on the Senate's tax-writing panel, as well as GOP senators not on the committee, to gauge their needs, aides said.

"It's so complex and there are so many moving parts," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas). "We've tried to learn our experience on health care and do better on taxes."

Republicans on the Finance Committee have paired up with other GOP senators in a buddy system of sorts to ensure all GOP senators are included in the process. For instance, South Dakota Sen. John Thune, the No. 3 Senate Republican who sits on the Finance Committee, has been in touch with Sen. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.), who in turn has been lobbying to include her paid leave tax credit proposal in the overall GOP blueprint.

Sen. Bob Corker, the retiring Tennessee Republican who has repeatedly raised concerns about the potential deficit-busting impact of a GOP tax bill, has also met privately with McConnell and Finance Committee Republicans to lay out his priorities, a spokeswoman said. Corker has also spoken with Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.).

Senate GOP leaders will also ensure their tax proposal, expected to be released sometime after House Republicans unveil their legislation next week, gets considered by the Senate Finance Committee — another marked difference from the botched health care process.

Cornyn, the second-ranking Senate Republican, sketched out an ambitious goal of passing its tax legislation by Thanksgiving — giving GOP senators just under four weeks to move legislation overhauling the tax code even though the actual bill has not been released.

"We can be up and running in a day. We know where we want to go," insisted Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), the chairman of the Finance Committee. Still, Hatch added of the GOP conference-wide lobbying effort: "Everybody wants something. They're all over us on what they want."

House and Senate Democrats, meanwhile, have been almost completely shut out of the discussions.

Republicans plan to use powerful budget reconciliation procedures that circumvent Democratic filibusters, so broad bipartisan support won't be required.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump remains committed to immediate corporate tax cut, Sanders says Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/30/2017 02:50 PM EDT

President Donald Trump remains committed to an immediate cut to the corporate tax rate, White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said today when asked about the possibility of phasing in the cut as part of a tax overhaul.

"We haven't changed our principles since this process started," she told reporters.

Sanders said she "doesn't anticipate" Trump will change his stance on an immediate cut that would drop the corporate income tax rate to 20 percent from the current marginal rate of 35 percent.

Phasing in the rate cut could accommodate congressional budget rules that Republicans will use to bypass a potential filibuster in the Senate.

WHAT'S NEXT: Detailed plans for the corporate rate are expected to be included in the tax legislation that Republicans plan to unveil Wednesday.

To view online click here.

Back

CRS: Air traffic control spinoff bill would trigger sequester Back

By Tanya Snyder | 10/30/2017 02:55 PM EDT

The House GOP bill that would separate air traffic control operations from the FAA would trigger an automatic budget sequester if costs are not offset, according to the Congressional Research Service.

A CRS memo dated Oct. 13 but released today by Transportation Committee Democrats asserts that the projected $98.5 million deficit increase that would result from the plan would force Congress to implement the sequester plan lawmakers agreed to in 2011.

The CBO determined the amount of the projected deficit last month.

CRS noted that if no additional legislation was recorded on the PAYGO scorecard, which tracks five- and 10-year deficit impacts from proposed legislation, and if no legislation was enacted to prevent a sequester from occurring, "then under the law a sequester would be triggered which would require across-the-board cuts to non-exempt mandatory spending programs to make up for the amount of the debit."

Democratic Reps. Peter DeFazio and Rick Larsen wrote in a Dear Colleague letter following the release of the CRS memo that the bill, H.R. 2997 \(115\), would "cause billions of dollars of cuts to Medicare over the next decade" as well as cuts of "billions of dollars from other critical programs, including accrual payments to the Military Retirement Fund, Federal Emergency Management Agency National Flood Insurance Fund expenses, and agriculture funding."

To view online click here.

Back

Confusion clouds open enrollment with Republicans still eager to dismantle Obamacare

Back

By Paul Demko, Rachana Pradhan and Adam Cancryn | 10/29/2017 06:56 AM EDT

Obamacare is about to have its worst open-enrollment season ever — and that's no accident.

President Donald Trump and Republicans in Congress still aim to dismantle the 2010 law. Making it look bad helps their cause, even as they've failed repeatedly to repeal or replace Obamacare. The new theory for Republicans: If fewer people enroll in Obamacare, there will be less of a constituency to save it.

"I think it's going to implode on its own," said Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.), a strong ally of the president on the Hill. But with Trump undoing his predecessor's rules and policies, "to some extent, perhaps he's expediting the implosion."

When the fifth open-enrollment season opens on Wednesday, it will look a lot different than when Barack Obama was in office. Trump won't be going on TV comedy shows to urge people to sign up. His chief of staff won't be talking up the value of health insurance on sports radio. His Cabinet won't be crisscrossing the country to energize sign-up drives.

And if enrollment dips — as health care policy experts predict — the poor numbers will be used as evidence by Trump and Republicans that Obamacare is failing.

"Maybe this enrollment period will produce the kind of problems necessary to get everybody's attention that we need to get our house in order, and do the work we need to do to get the program fixed," said Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.).

From the day he took office, Trump and his administration have taken steps to undermine the markets, including gutting outreach and marketing. Competition in the Obamacare exchanges has diminished, with nearly half the counties nationwide having just one insurer selling plans. Premiums have skyrocketed — partly because Trump himself cut off federal subsidies, leaving the insurers facing billions in extra costs.

On Sunday morning, Trump tweeted about the situation anew. "As usual, the ObamaCare premiums will be up (the Dems own it), but we will Repeal & Replace and have great Healthcare soon after Tax Cuts."

And the noise created by Republicans' repeated failed attempts to dismantle the federal health care law has sowed vast confusion about the status of the marketplaces, as several polls have shown.

That chaos has been compounded by Trump's repeated assertions that Obamacare has somehow ceased to exist — despite the fact that more than 10 million Americans obtain insurance through the law's insurance exchanges.

"Obamacare is finished," Trump said earlier this month. "It's dead. It's gone."

Shrinking enrollment will erode the markets politically — and weaken them, practically.

Enrollment dropped nationwide this year. Trump officials turned off the outreach spigots immediately after they took office, and they dampened the last-minute surge of sign-ups right before the cut-off date on Jan. 31. Joshua Peck, who served as chief marketing office for HealthCare.gov in the Obama administration, estimates that at least 1.1 million fewer Americans will enroll in coverage next year due to the Department of Health and Human Services' cuts in Obamacare advertising.

Yet Republicans might be putting themselves in political peril if they're seen as intentionally making wobbly markets more wobbly. Most polls have shown that the public will blame Republicans — by a roughly 2-to-1 margin — for future problems with Obamacare.

"I don't think President Trump and the Republicans in Congress realize it's on them now," said Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.). "So if they have trouble with the Affordable Care Act because of their efforts to undermine it, the public's going to blame them even if they try to say it's someone else's fault."

Trump's decision to cut off cost-sharing subsidy payments, which insurers rely on to reduce costs for low-income Obamacare customers, further rattled the marketplaces. But fears that it could spark a mass exodus of insurers, and potentially lead to market collapses in some states, haven't materialized.

That's in large part because insurers were able to boost premiums for next year in order to make up for the lost federal payments. Insurers will still take a short-term financial hit, but they should be on steady financial ground for 2018.

"The CSR hand grenade, if it was thrown in January or February of this year, would have forced a lot of carriers to do midyear exits and it would have destroyed the exchanges in some states," said Dave Anderson, an insurance expert at Duke University, using shorthand for "cost-sharing reduction" subsidies. "Pulling CSRs in mid-October was a nothing-burger."

On top of all the confusion about those subsidies — because they affect the insurers, but don't have a direct impact on the costs for people who get subsidized — the enrollment window that wraps up on Dec. 15 is roughly half the amount of time of earlier years.

Consumers who are currently enrolled and don't renew by that date will be automatically re-enrolled in a plan soon after the sign-up window closes, according to the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Officials also plan to deploy similar tools that queue customers during high-traffic times on HealthCare.gov.

But anyone without insurance who thinks they have until January to sign up, like they did last year, will be out of luck.

"You've got a lot of confusion out there about what is truly available in the market," said Alexis Miller, a senior vice president at Highmark, which sells Obamacare plans in Pennsylvania, Delaware and West Virginia. "All of that is hitting our members right now."

Another wild card is what effect cuts to marketing and outreach will have on enrollment. The Trump administration reduced federal spending on advertising by 90 percent and chopped grants to organizations that help individuals sign up for coverage by 40 percent.

For the first time, the federal government won't promote HealthCare.gov through television ads — a tactic that Obama-era health officials argue was most effective in reaching the broadest range of potential enrollees.

The Trump administration has also pulled back on community partnerships that played a key role in reaching important but harder-to-attract demographics like minorities, younger enrollees and rural residents. And in some states, the budget cuts forced in-person assistance groups to close up shop.

"It's been very clear how much the void of the administration not doing what they've done in the past is being felt across the country," said Lori Lodes, a former Obama health official and the co-founder of Get America Covered, a nonprofit formed to help promote Obamacare's open enrollment period.

Get America Covered will run its own digital outreach campaign during enrollment, and is trying to piece together a network of businesses and health care groups to boost awareness. But Lodes openly admits it'll be difficult to fully counter the confusion created by Trump's repeated insistence that Obamacare is already "dead."

"We don't know what sort of impact that will have," she said. "There are just so many asterisks."

Insurers are stepping up their own efforts to fill the void; it's their customers, after all. Michigan's Priority Health, for example, is running television ads aimed at enticing potential customers to call and get a copy of a booklet: "Separating Fact From Fiction in the Age of Health Care Reform." The insurer has also boosted the number of webinars it's holding to help educate brokers about its coverage options.

"Plans are stepping it up, but they can't mirror exactly what the marketplace had been doing in the past," said Kelley Turek, executive director of exchange operations and policy at America's Health Insurance Plans.

Some Obamacare-friendly states are also marshaling additional resources to make up for the cuts to federal outreach and marketing. Pennsylvania is spending $100,000 on a campaign that includes television, radio and digital ads. The spots will direct potential customers to HealthCare.gov, as well as Consumers' Checkbook, a plan comparison tool.

"I believe that this campaign can make a difference," said Jessica Altman, the state's acting insurance commissioner, on a call with reporters last week. But she criticized the federal government's decision to chop Obamacare ads down to $10 million this year because of the void it creates.

"Our resources are certainly not as great as those of the federal government," she said.

It remains to be seen whether the Trump administration will be a reliable partner for insurers going forward. So far, they don't see any signs of outright sabotage, and they've gotten used to rolling with the punches when it comes to Obamacare.

"This is our fifth rodeo," said Marty Anderson, chief marketing officer for Wisconsin's Security Health Plan. "None of those rodeos have been the same. Each one has been challenging in and of itself."

To view online click here.

Back

Soaring premiums will cause ACA subsidies to increase by nearly 50 percent Back

By Paul Demko | 10/30/2017 09:34 AM EDT

Premium subsidies for Obamacare customers will rise by nearly 50 percent next year because of huge rate hikes, according to an analysis by HHS of rate filings in the 39 states that rely on HealthCare.gov for enrollments.

The average monthly federal subsidy will be $555 in 2018, compared to $382 this year. Premium subsidies are expected to be more than twice as high as they were in 2016.

Premiums are skyrocketing in part because of President Donald Trump's decision to scrap cost-sharing-reduction payments, which insurers utilize to lower the out-of-pocket costs for low-income Obamacare customers. Most insurers are jacking up rates next year - often by 15 percent or more — to compensate for the removal of federal funding.

The rate hikes in most states are being loaded onto silver plans, which are the only ones that qualify for cost-sharing-reduction payments, in order to blunt the financial pain on Obamacare customers who don't qualify for subsidies.

The monthly premium for the second-most-expensive silver plan — which is used to determine subsidy levels — will increase by an average of 37 percent — from $300 to $411 — for a 27 year old enrollee.

Obamacare customers will also have fewer choices when the 2018 open-enrollment season starts on Wednesday. Nearly one in three current enrollees will find just a single insurer selling plans, up from 20 percent of Obamacare customers this year who faced monopoly markets.

Eight states will have just a single carrier in every county.

To view online click here.

Back

ACA marketplace rules emphasize state flexibility, reducing regulatory burdens Back

By Paul Demko | 10/27/2017 05:09 PM EDT

The Trump administration's proposed Obamacare marketplace rules for 2019 emphasize increasing state flexibility and reducing federal regulatory burdens.

The approach reflects an executive order signed by President Donald Trump on his first day in office that directed agencies to scrap regulatory requirements to the greatest extent possible under the Affordable Care Act.

"Over time, issuer exits and increasing insurance rates have threatened the stability of the individual and small group Exchanges in many geographic areas," the 300-plus page rule states at the beginning, a stark change in tone from regulations put forth by the Obama administration.

In addition, it states that the focus will be on "enhancing the role of States in these programs and providing States with additional flexibilities, reducing unnecessary regulatory burden on stakeholders, empowering consumers, and improving affordability."

In particular, the Trump administration is proposing to make it easier for states to seek waivers of federal rules around medical loss ratios and to loosen the requirements for organizations that work on Obamacare outreach efforts.

CMS is also proposing raising the threshold at which federal rate review is triggered. Currently, federal regulators review any premium increase above 10 percent, but the proposal would push that to 15 percent.

The administration is also stepping back from encouraging insurers to sell "standardized plans." CMS intends to no longer emphasize those offerings on HealthCare.gov.

"We seek to encourage free market principles in the individual market, and to maximize innovation by issuers in designing and offering a wide range of plans to consumers," the rule states.

To view online click here.

Back

State Week: ACA open enrollment to vary dramatically state-by-state Back

By Renuka Rayasam | 10/27/2017 01:01 PM EDT

With help from Dan Goldberg, Victoria Colliver, Alexandra Glorioso and Rachana Pradhan.

The experience of shopping for Obamacare health plans will vary more than ever from state to state when open enrollment kicks off next week.

Overall premiums for the average silver plan will rise about 34 percent this year, but there will be huge variations among the states, according to a study from Avalere Health.

The average silver plan premium will rise 69 percent in Iowa, which withdrew a waiver it hoped would stabilize its market, after the Trump administration signaled it would reject the application. Wyoming, Virginia and Utah will also see silver plan premium hikes in excess of 60 percent.

Meanwhile some states have been able to buck the trend.

Alaska, which was able to get federal approval for a reinsurance program that helps health plans deal with costlier patients, will see the average silver plan premium decline by 22 percent. Arizona and North Dakota will also see silver plan premiums decrease, according to the Avalere study.

And while shoppers on the federal exchange have just six weeks to select a plan for 2018, some states with their own marketplaces have extended deadlines. New York and California, for example, have extended open enrollment through Jan. 31, 2018.

On to the rest of state news. Tips and story ideas always welcome at rreyasam@politico.com and @renurayasam.

CALIFORNIA — Single payer came back into the limelight this week as a special assembly committee held two days of hearings in Sacramento, the first in a series of hearings on how California could achieve universal health coverage for all residents. The first day of the hearings focused on California's current system, while speakers examined universal health care in other countries on the second day. The California Nurses Association derided the committee hearings for failing to do anything — they're for information-gathering only — and called for more immediate action. Single payer also received attention this week as the issue proved to be the biggest dividing point among the top four Democratic candidates hoping to succeed Gov. Jerry Brown. More here.

NEW YORK — Gov. Andrew Cuomo signed a bill expanding the Clean Indoor Air Act. New Yorkers will no longer be allowed to vape in indoor areas where they are not permitted to smoke tobacco. The Clean Indoor Air Act was enacted in 2003 and bans smoking in most workplaces, hospitals, restaurants and bars and many other indoor public spaces. People wishing to use vaporizers or electronic cigarettes will have to follow the same rules.

WASHINGTON — Average premiums for individual market plans will rise roughly 36 percent for 2018, with 10 percent of the increase attributable to President Donald Trump's decision to stop paying cost-sharing subsidies, according to state regulators. Insurance Commissioner Mike Kreidler approved 11 health insurers to sell 74 plans on the state's individual market. Washington is one of 18 states and the District of Columbia that sued the Trump administration over the decision to scrap CSRs.

ARIZONA — The state Supreme Court on Thursday heard arguments on the legality of a key part of Arizona's Medicaid expansion, the Arizona Republic reports. Arizona GOP legislators sued the state over a hospital assessment that is being used to cover the state's share of expansion costs, arguing the financing mechanism was illegally enacted because it did not pass with a two-thirds majority required for tax increases. Lower courts have sided with Arizona's Medicaid agency. If state lawmakers prevail, coverage could be jeopardized for roughly 400,000 people covered by expansion.

FLORIDA — The state's health care agency turned down a request from Florida state Sen. Rene Garcia, from Southeast Miami, to extend the deadline for companies to bid on Florida's Medicaid Managed Care Program. In the request, laid out in an October letter acquired by POLITICO Florida, Garcia questioned whether the agency had enough time to review and answer questions on bid invitations because of Hurricane Irma. Companies could respond in early August to receive responses by the agency on Sept. 15. Irma made landfall in Miami on Sept. 10. The agency responded that it did have time to review the bids, but wouldn't discuss them further because it is in a "statutory blackout" period for negotiations.

TEXAS — The case of an undocumented girl in South Texas, who was detained after an emergency gall bladder surgery, has thrust the Office of Refugee Resettlement, the Health and Human Services division responsible for the care of unaccompanied minors, back in the spotlight this week. The 10-year-old girl, who has cerebral palsy, was brought to the country from Mexico by her mother, when she was a baby. On her way to the emergency procedure at a hospital in Corpus Christi from her home in Laredo, Rosa Maria Hernandez was apprehended at a border check point. Agents followed her to the hospital and after the procedure placed her in a shelter for unaccompanied minors in San Antonio. Immigration officials have now stepped up enforcement actions in hospitals and other former safe zones, according to multiple news reports. Rep. Joaquín Castro (D-Texas) has called on the administration to release the girl from federal custody.

ON THE MOVE: Theodore Mazer, a San Diego otolaryngologist, was installed as the California Medical Association's 150th president during the physician organization's annual meeting last weekend in Anaheim. Mazer, a CMA member for 29 years, has served on the CMA Board of Trustees since 2002, and is a past president of the San Diego County Medical Society and a delegate to the American Medical Association.

HIGHLIGHTS

A federal court judge in San Francisco refused to grant an emergency order to resume CSR payments requested by attorneys general from 18 states and the District of Columbia.

States may roll back children's health coverage without money from Congress.

The House is set to vote on extending CHIP funds next week.

Massachusetts' Obamacare waiver was rejected for 2018.

Trump's decision to end CSRs will cost the federal government more money in Florida.

A federal appeals court cleared the way for an undocumented teen to get an abortion.

To view online click here.

Back

Puerto Rico utility cancels controversial energy contract Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/29/2017 02:56 PM EDT

Puerto Rico's Electric Power Authority canceled its $300 million contract with Whitefish Energy, a Montana-based company, after additional scrutiny surrounding the repair contract worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

The move comes after Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló called for the cancellation of the contract Sunday morning. Rosselló's public call to the federal oversight board of Puerto Rico happened after days of resisting any change to the contract, according to a source with knowledge of the situation.

A spokesperson for the governor did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Rosselló publicly objected last week to the oversight board's installation of an emergency chief transformation officer to oversee the recovery of PREPA, Puerto Rico's beleaguered government-backed power utility, after the board filed in court to do so last week. That board-installed officer is placed above PREPA's Executive Director Ricardo Ramos, who signed off on the Whitefish contract. That contract uses federal funds overseen by the utility to repair Puerto Rico's electrical grid, most of which remains offline weeks after Hurricane Maria hit the island.

The law passed by Congress last year allows the board to act as trustee for any Puerto Rico government entities that seek to reorganize their debt in court, a process similar to bankruptcy. A judge overseeing the restructuring of Puerto Rico's debt granted the request, according to a court document.

Several congressional committees sent investigative inquiries about the contract last week, and members of the House Natural Resources Committee also sought information as to why Rosselló did not seek to activate "mutual aid" agreements with nearby states to increase the number of work crews available, an action Rosselló ultimately took Sunday.

"Transparent accountability at PREPA is necessary for an effective and sustained recovery in Puerto Rico," said Parish Braden, a spokesperson for that committee, in an email to POLITICO. "Immediate actions must also be responsibly aligned with long-term rebuilding and revitalization efforts. Success depends on the cooperation and coordination of the Governor, the Oversight Board, PREPA's Chief Transformation Officer and federal partners."

In a news conference Sunday, Rosselló urged the immediate end of an agreement between PREPA, and Whitefish Energy, a two-year-old company whose selection for a no-bid contract worth hundreds of millions of dollars has drawn intense political scrutiny. Rosselló also criticized the federal government for a delay in sending brigades from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

In a news release sent Sunday, Rosselló said his comments were "intended to reaffirm our commitment to transparency in the contracting process in the government of Puerto Rico and to achieve the highest degree of efficiency possible in the restoration of the power grid of our island, in the shortest amount of time possible."

"The goals I established are aimed at achieving 30 percent of the power generation capacity. I am grateful for the effort that the PREPA staff is doing together with the contracted companies," Rosselló said in the release. "At the moment, PREPA and its contractors have 404 brigades working on the island, while the [Army Corps of Engineers] has seven."

Earlier this month, The Washington Post reported that Whitefish had previously employed the son of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and that the company was selected despite having no experience in large-scale electrical repairs and with only two full-time employees. The company has subcontracted out its work on the island.

Since then the contract, initiated by PREPA using federal emergency funds, has come under congressional scrutiny and put Zinke on the defensive.

Zinke on Friday said he had "absolutely nothing to do" with the awarding of the contract to Whitefish, which is from his hometown. "Any attempts by the dishonest media or political operatives to tie me to awarding or influencing any contract involving Whitefish are completely baseless. Only in elitist Washington, D.C., would being from a small town be considered a crime," Zinke wrote in a statement.

To view online click here.

Back

Whitefish Energy hires first lobbyist as scrutiny of Puerto Rico contract mounts Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/30/2017 12:44 PM EDT

Whitefish Energy has retained a former House Democrat to lobby on its behalf, following numerous calls for investigations into how the small Montana firm won a lucrative contract to help rebuild Puerto Rico's electric grid.

Former Rep. Dennis Cardoza, a "Blue Dog" Democrat from California, said he would "meet people on the Hill" to make the case that Whitefish won the contract fairly, but he declined to provide details beyond that. Lawmakers from both parties have called for investigations into how the small, 2-year old company from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's hometown won a $300 million contract to help Puerto Rico recover from Hurricane Maria. The Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority said it would cancel the contract Sunday after an outcry over how the recently formed, two-man company was hired in the first place.

Congress is not the only one looking into Whitefish's operations in Puerto Rico. The Wall Street Journal reported on Monday that the FBI has opened an investigation into the contract, citing people familiar with the matter.

Whitefish Energy retained Cardoza last Wednesday, and his firm Foley & Lardner LLP is in the process of filling lobbyist registration work with Congress, Cardoza told POLITICO Monday. Cardoza's other lobbying clients include California health care, real estate and water interests, according to disclosure records.

The law firm has advised Whitefish Energy on contract issues in the past, Cardoza said, but declined to say exactly when that business relationship began.

"They've been a client for a while," Cardoza said.

Whitefish has not previously had any registered federal lobbyists working on its behalf, according to disclosure records.

Puerto Rico's federal oversight board, which Congress put in place to oversee the territory's economic and fiscal recovery, plans to focus much of its scheduled meeting Tuesday on the beleaguered electric utility, according to a source familiar with the agenda.

Zinke said Friday he had "absolutely nothing to do" with the company or how it won the contract.

In a statement Sunday, Whitefish said it was "very disappointed" with Puerto Rico's decision to cancel the contract, a move the company said would further delay restoring power to the island's residents.

Colin Wilhelm contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Zinke says he had 'absolutely nothing to do with' Puerto Rico contract Back

By Cristiano Lima and Ben Lefebvre | 10/27/2017 03:53 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke on Friday said he had "absolutely nothing to do" with Puerto Rico awarding a small, for-profit company from his hometown a $300 million contract to repair the island's electrical grid in the wake of Hurricane Maria.

"Any attempts by the dishonest media or political operatives to tie me to awarding of influencing any contract involving Whitefish [Energy Holdings] are completely baseless. Only in elitist Washington, D.C., would being from a small town be considered a crime," Zinke wrote in a statement.

"Neither myself nor anyone in my office has advocated for this company in anyway (sic)," he continued. "After the initial contract was awarded, I was contacted by the company, on which I took no action. All records, which are being made available to appropriate officials, will prove no involvement."

Zinke's statement came after the White House denied any role by the federal government in the deal between Whitefish Energy and the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority.

"This is a contract that was determined by the local authorities in Puerto Rico, not something that the federal government played a role in," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said at Friday's briefing.

Sanders added: "But as we understand, there is an ongoing audit and we'll look forward to seeing the results of that later."

Sanders said President Donald Trump and Zinke discussed the controversy during their meeting on Friday and that the interior secretary said he had no involvement in the contract being awarded to company.

Zinke "reiterated once again that we have no role, the federal government, specifically he had no role in that contract," Sanders said.

Multiple congressional committees are probing the controversial contract, which awarded the task of restoring transmission and distribution lines damaged or destroyed by the powerful Hurricane to a small, 2-year-old company that had only two full-time employees on its payroll as the storm hit in September.

The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee late Friday became the latest panel to probe the business deal. Committee Chairman Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) and ranking member Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) asked the Department of Homeland Security to review the contract to determine whether the Federal Emergency Management Agency will be responsible for reimbursing PREPA the cost of Whitefish Energy's work.

Sanders' and Zinke's comments distancing the Trump administration from the decision to solicit Whitefish's services echo a statement released earlier Friday by FEMA.

"The decision to award a contract to Whitefish Energy was made exclusively by Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority (PREPA)," the agency said in a statement. "FEMA was not involved in the selection."

FEMA added it had "significant concerns" with how officials in Puerto Rico acquired the company's services and that it had not yet confirmed "whether the contract prices are reasonable."

Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rossello said Friday, according to ABC, that there will be "hell to pay" if any wrongdoing is discovered in the contract being awarded to Whitefish.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump finds golf isn't the way to Congress' heart Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 10/28/2017 06:58 AM EDT

One weekend in early June, President Donald Trump tested out his golf course diplomacy with Sen. Bob Corker, making the Tennessee Republican one of his first congressional partners at his Northern Virginia country club.

The pair shared a cart and partnered up in a match that included former NFL quarterback Peyton Manning. They discussed both politics and policy — "a little of it all," Corker recalled in an interview earlier this week — and there wasn't much in the way of the trash talking that Trump is known for on the green.

"Honestly, it was enjoyable," Corker told POLITICO. "You learn a lot about him personally."

But that springtime round hasn't stopped Corker from undercutting Trump since then, firing off a series of blistering attacks in media interviews and Twitter against a president who he characterized as in need of "adult daycare."

Trump also didn't have much luck with another recent golfing partner: Kentucky Republican Sen. Rand Paul. Just days after the former 2016 GOP presidential primary rivals played at the president's members-only Virginia golf course, Paul sided against Trump on a critical budget resolution vote that the president hopes can pave the way for a wider measure cutting taxes.

The president found some early success using golf to his advantage in office, inviting Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe to play with him at two of his South Florida courses in February to cement their personal relationship — a favor Abe is planning to repay by hosting a golf game when Trump visits Tokyo next weekend. But it has worked less well in Washington, where the president hasn't been able to leverage his nearby golf club into close relationships on Capitol Hill.

Trump's other recent golfing partner has been South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, who said in an interview that his two rounds with the president over back-to-back October weekends have helped pave the way for him to be critical of the White House in a way that can ultimately advance his agenda.

"I said I want to beat you on the golf course," Graham said in an interview. "But the best thing I can do for you is tell you what I think and be respectful about it. Here's the one thing about playing golf, and you're getting to know someone, you're far less likely to take gratuitous shots because you've spent time with them."

Graham hasn't missed a beat in playing this role. He recently praised Trump for assembling a strong national security team that's "good for the Republican Party." And after a recent visit to South Carolina together aboard Air Force One, Graham jumped at the president's offer of a helicopter ride back to the White House.

But Graham remains a critic on one of the biggest White House sore spots: the Russia investigations. The senator a few weeks before his first golf outing with Trump issued a scathing warning to the president over the notion of firing special counsel Robert Mueller, saying it "could be the beginning of the end" of his administration. Last weekend on NBC's "Meet the Press," Graham said Trump continues to have "a blind spot on Russia I still can't figure out."

Missouri GOP Sen. Roy Blunt — a member of GOP leadership who cautioned that he's "not in the club championship ranks" of golfing ability — said it wasn't clear whether the president's recent overtures on the golf course have been productive in building support for Republican policies.

"I don't think it hurts," Blunt said. "Anything that builds relationships is generally helpful, though I'd like to see ... more specific votes that respond to the investment of time."

Trump is likely at the tail end of his weekend golf trips this year to his Washington-area course. He leaves on Friday for a 12-day, five-nation Asia trip, and he won't have many warm weekends left in 2017 by the time he returns to the capital.

Meantime, the president's private Mar-a-Lago club in Palm Beach beckons. It will open again for the season around Halloween, and Trump has his pick of three South Florida golf courses with his name on them, including one that's a short motorcade ride from his beach home.

Trump's bid to connect with lawmakers through golf is limited in no small part by a lack of people who play at his level. Former House Speaker John Boehner was the last congressional leader known to seriously golf. But he retired two years ago, and the current ranks of House and Senate leadership are bare when it comes to the type of quality player Trump prefers. The field of good golfers among rank-and-file members is small, too.

"I would not call it widespread at all," said Rep. John Yarmuth, a Kentucky Democrat who is both a member and property owner at the president's semi-private golf club in Ireland.

By all accounts, Trump is a top-notch player. Golf Digest in January ranked him No. 1, ahead of John F. Kennedy, Dwight Eisenhower and Gerald Ford, among the 16 most recent presidents who played the game. But his skills — and desire to keep a round moving — also can work against him when it comes to finding playing companions from the political ranks.

"It's almost that he's too good," said Mike Sommers, a former Boehner chief of staff. "You can't see him driving through the rough helping someone find their ball."

Chris Ruddy, a Trump friend and Mar-a-Lago member, said Trump likes golfing only with people around his skill level. "He doesn't enjoy playing with real amateurs. He likes to move around quick. Someone who isn't great is slower," said Ruddy, CEO of the conservative website Newsmax.

Ohio Republican Rep. Jim Jordan, a conservative Freedom Caucus founder, said he plays golf on some weekends back home with his brother-in-law. But he said he'd fall into the category of amateur golfer who would suggest that Trump — should he ever offer an invitation — try looking elsewhere.

"He wouldn't enjoy playing with me because I'm nowhere near that handicap level," Jordan said. "If the president asks you to do something, you'd consider that. But I'd also tell him, 'Mr. President, I'm not very good. You might want to play with someone else.'"

Another obstacle for Trump to forge golfing connections in Washington: his schedule. Playing as often as he does on Saturdays and Sundays doesn't match up well with members of Congress who make it a point to go back to their states and districts on the weekends.

Sen. David Perdue, a Georgia Republican ranked by Golf Digest last year as the best golfer among members of Congress, said he had just discussed playing 18 holes with Trump when the president visited the Capitol for a GOP luncheon earlier this week.

"I've been invited for sure," Perdue said. But Perdue said that finding a date in recent weeks has been challenging because of his commitments back in Georgia.

While Perdue said he expects to talk political shop when he does finally play golf with Trump, he also expects the round to be heavy on the social side.

"I'm not sure he's using it as a tool," Perdue said. "It's a personal thing to do. This man has friends and uses it that way. He uses it to get relaxation. He uses it to think."

Ruddy said he also doesn't see Trump as trying to use golf to win allies or policy converts. "The idea that somehow you get an inside track just because you play golf is just a nonstarter," he said. "Trump uses it as a good way to understand people and hear them out."

Trump repeatedly disparaged President Barack Obama for golfing as much as he did during eight years in office. But Trump has ended up playing even more golf than his Democratic predecessor.

In his first 40 weeks in office in 2009, Obama played 23 rounds of golf. Trump, during that same period of time this year, has played at least 32 rounds that have been confirmed by either the White House, social media reports or journalists traveling with the president. There have also been another 28 times where Trump was known to be at one of his country clubs and seen as likely playing golf, according to data compiled by the website Trump Golf Count.

Trump and Obama have also followed similar paths in eschewing fellow politicians as their playing partners. Obama often filled out his golfing foursome with longtime staffers and close friends. In fact, just five of the 333 rounds that the Democratic president played over his two terms were with members of Congress, according to a tally kept by CBS News reporter Mark Knoller. Obama played golf only three times with foreign leaders.

For Trump, the playing partners he's had who have been publicly named have included longtime friends like New York real estate executive Richard Levine and professional athletes, including Washington Redskins quarterback Kirk Cousins and PGA professional Rory McIlroy.

Golf during Trump's life prior to politics — and Washington — was all about making money. He frequented the links with his fellow golf-obsessed Manhattan billionaires and CEOs. His name is also attached to 12 courses in the U.S., including the iconic "Blue Monster" Doral in Miami, and five more abroad in Dubai, Ireland and Scotland.

Partisanship also wasn't a factor in who Trump teed off with. In 2012, for example, former President Bill Clinton in a CNN interview — conducted by guest host Harvey Weinstein, standing in for Piers Morgan — volunteered this about Trump: "I love playing golf with him."

But 2012 is not 2016. And the idea of hitting the links with the president is hardly seen as a smart career move for a Trump critic — especially in the smartphone era, in which club members and guests frequently post video and pictures of Trump whenever he's at one of his courses.

"I'm not sure there's a lot of Democrats who'd want to go out and spend four hours with him," said Yarmuth, the ranking member of the House Budget Committee and a serious golfer who plays at about the same level as the president.

Asked whether he'd entertain playing golf with Trump, Yarmuth hedged. He waited nearly six years before finally getting out on a course with Obama — at Joint Base Andrews in suburban Washington in 2015.

"That'd be a very tough call for me," Yarmuth said. "I say it because I so cherish my one presidential golf experience. I don't want to necessarily tarnish it. I'd like to keep it as my only presidential golf memory because it was so good."

Burgess Everett contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Texas farmers took $200 million hit from Harvey Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 10/27/2017 03:54 PM EDT

Hurricane Harvey caused more than $200 million in damage to Texas farmers when it hit the coast of the state in late August, according to a new analysis from Texas A&M University.

Cotton farmers saw half of the losses, or about $100 million. Roughly 200,000 bales of cotton on the stalk and another 200,000 harvest bales destroyed or severely damaged — a huge hit to farmers in the region who were expecting one of the best crops of all time. In total terms, however, it is a small percentage. Last year, the state's cotton crop was worth $2.5 billion, according to the USDA.

The livestock industry saw $93 million in damage, which accounts for not only the loss of cattle, but also destruction of hay and fences from the storm.

And rice and soybean growers took an $8 million hit. The USDA is estimating that the rice production from the region will be down 618,000 hundredweight as compared to forecasts before the storm, and 1,700 acres of soybeans along the Texas coast are reported to be lost, Texas A&M reports.

"The effects of Hurricane Harvey will linger for quite some time with our Texas farmers and ranchers," Doug Steele, director of Texas A&M's extension service, said. "Many South Texas or coastal area cotton farmers were on the verge of harvesting one of the best crops ever in Texas, while some ranchers were unable to save some cattle from insurmountable flood waters."

To view online click here.

Back

Total war costs since 9/11 top $1.4T, Pentagon report finds Back

By Connor O'Brien | 10/30/2017 11:08 AM EDT

The military has spent over $1.4 trillion in war costs since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, according to a new Pentagon report — the vast majority split between operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The effort in Afghanistan has cost $687.6 billion through June, while operations in Iraq have cost $748.1 billion — including the U.S.-led war between 2003 and 2011 and the ensuing U.S.-led military campaign against the Islamic State that began in 2014, which has totaled $17.1 billion through June.

The report was released publicly by the Federation of American Scientists. Previous versions of the report can be found here.

To view online click here.

Back

Education Department to offer voluntary buyout payments Back

By Kimberly Hefling | 10/28/2017 09:45 AM EDT

The Education Department has notified Office of Federal Student Aid staff members that it that will begin offering voluntary buyouts to some employees to shrink the division, the Washington Post reported.

Staff members were informed of the early retirement and voluntary incentive separation payments in a memo on Friday, according to the Post.

It's not clear how many employees could be potentially affected. Typically, the most a department employee would receive as part of such an offer is $25,000.

An Education Department spokeswoman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The Trump administration has said that streamlining government agencies is a priority.

To view online click here.

Back

John Boehner Unchained Back

By Tim Alberta | 10/29/2017 06:00 PM EDT

WEST CHESTER, Ohio—He swings the golf club like a right-hander, which he is, but putts as a southpaw. Maybe it's a metaphor for a conservative politician who often turned to liberals in crunch time, but I'm too busy losing $20 on this hole to appreciate it. We're on the green now, surveying his 10-foot par attempt, a modest breeze transporting his tobacco cologne. With a posture as unique as his personality—back hunched over nearly parallel to the turf, left shoulder dipped well below the right, fingers interlocked around a grip of blue rubber—he gazes downward and shuffles his feet. The veins are still dancing in his muscular, leathery legs as the blade retreats from the ball, and it's apparent within moments of their reunion that something isn't right. As the Titleist Pro V1 finds its resting place, several feet shy and slightly west of its final destination, he can't mask his frustration. "Nice one, Boner," he mutters.

To play golf with John Boehner is to learn there are unwritten rules governing the use of the word Boner. When spoken by his close friends—"Thatta boy, Boner!"—it's almost always to congratulate him on a good shot. When the former U.S. House speaker uses it—"Aww, Jesus, Boner!"—it's almost always to rebuke himself for a bad one. Today he is saying it with ruinous frequency.

We're on Boehner's home course, the Wetherington Golf and Country Club, on a Monday afternoon in early June. Tucked away in West Chester, Ohio—an affluent enclave of suburban Cincinnati, part of his old district—the club is hosting a charity fundraiser, dubbed the "Boehner Classic," benefiting a nearby Boys & Girls Club. The former speaker is one of two star attractions; the other is his friend, the professional golfer Fuzzy Zoeller, a character known more for his off-color jokes than his two major championships. With wealthy donors ponying up to play alongside them—but some of his old buddies also in town—Boehner decides to form a group of nine players, myself and Zoeller included, and creates a team scramble that pits five golfers against the other four.

But something isn't right with the former speaker's game. Long considered one of Washington's finest golfers, he is spraying shots left and right with choppy, self-doubting swings. Sensing my surprise, Boehner says his handicap has skyrocketed since leaving Congress two years ago. After he misses that 10-foot putt, and we climb into our cart, I ask why. "You have to concentrate while you hit the ball," he tells me. "That's my biggest problem in golf these days. I just can't concentrate. I could always concentrate on what I had to do. But these days ... " Boehner pauses for several seconds, then pulls hard on the Camel 99 wedged between his knuckles. "I just can't concentrate."

To outsiders, Boehner might just be the happiest man alive, a liberated retiree who spends his days swirling merlot and cackling at Speaker Paul Ryan's misfortune. The truth is more complicated. At 67, Boehner is liberated—to say what he spent many years trying not to say; to smoke his two packs a day without undue stress; to chuckle at the latest crisis in Washington and whisper to himself those three magic words: "Not my problem." And yet he is struggling—with the lingering perception that he was run out of Congress; with his alarm about the country's future; and with the question of what he's supposed to do next. After leaving office, Boehner says a longtime family friend approached him. "You've always had a purpose—your business, your family, politics," the friend said. "What's your purpose now?" Boehner says the question gnaws at him every day.

We met three times over the summer, his most candid and revealing series of interviews since a third attempted coup on his speakership led him to say to hell with it and retire early. The first interview was in June at Wetherington; the second in July at Burning Tree Club, a private, all-male establishment in Bethesda, Maryland; the third in September following a joint fundraiser with Ryan at the Bengals vs. Packers game in Green Bay, Wisconsin. In the whole of our conversations, he asked only five or six times for something to remain off the record. In those instances, I agreed. Everything else was fair game—and he did not disappoint. From his text messages with George W. Bush, to his scathing critiques of conservative media and his former antagonists on Capitol Hill, to his disgust at America's being stuck with a choice between Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton, the former speaker held little back.

What I discovered from 18 hours on the record with him, and dozens more with his friends, is that for all the talk of Boehner living the dream in retirement—mowing and manicuring his lawn, fiddling around at his workbench, spending time with his grandson—he is lacking a certain peace. It's the type of tranquility that accompanies the knowledge that your life's work won't be remembered as a failure; that the party and the institution you gave everything to aren't collapsing because of mistakes you might have made.

Boehner is a fascinating and paradoxical figure in his own right. He was the brilliant salesman who couldn't get his own members to buy. The back-slapping creature of K Street who never took a single earmark. The gruff chain-smoker who weeps at the mere mention of schoolchildren. The Midwestern everyman who won't be seen in public without a clean shave and an ironed shirt. The bartender's son who became speaker of the House.

But the story of Boehner's 25 years in Washington is also the story of the Republican Party, the Congress and American politics in the post-Ronald Reagan era: an account of corruption and crusading, enormous promises and underwhelming results, growing ideological polarization and declining faith in government. The same centrifugal forces that made Boehner's job impossible have bedeviled his successor, Ryan, and kept the GOP majorities in Congress from passing any landmark legislation in 2017. Now, as the revolutionary fervor that swept Boehner into the speakership degenerates into a fratricidal conflict centered around Trump, the former speaker's frontline view of the Republican civil war is essential to understanding what went wrong.

On the eve of his golf outing, I find myself on Boehner's back patio. He's hosting a barbecue for friends who came to Ohio for the fundraiser, and we get acquainted as Boehner works several outdoor grills, Camel in his left hand and tongs in his right. Among others seated around the table, sipping Maker's Mark 46 from blue plastic cups and smoking cigars, are Dick, who owns a winter home near Boehner's on Florida's Marco Island; Ed, who also spends winters on Marco Island but still runs a business out of western Ohio; and Mick, the longtime chief of staff in Boehner's personal office who lives nearby. All three promise that I'm in for a treat. They aren't lying: Boehner has prepared a feast of teriyaki-marinated flank steaks, his specialty; chunks of seared beef tenderloin; grilled chicken breasts; a salad of avocado, tomatoes and fresh mozzarella; au gratin potatoes; a sweet corn skillet; and baked crescent rolls. As we eat, someone jokes that the only thing missing are hot dogs. Boehner looks up from his plate. "I've never had a hot dog for dinner in my life," he says, stone-faced.

After we eat, Boehner sits across from me, reaches for a lighter and indicates he's ready to talk. Boehner smokes two packs a day and has a habit of pinching off the smoldering end of his cigarette, rolling the butt into a ball and shoving it into his pocket. (On the back nine a day later, Boehner stops at a receptacle and scoops from his pocket some two dozen smoke-stained balls.) Of his 11 siblings, one has passed away. It was lung cancer. Boehner says this doesn't concern him—"If I was going to die from smoking cigarettes, I'd already be dead"—but I notice that his laughs, which come often and easy, are almost always accompanied by coughs. Ah-heh. Ah-heh.

Breaking the ice, I mention some news of the day—that Trey Gowdy appears likely to become chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. The previous chairman, Jason Chaffetz, had abruptly announced his resignation from Congress; House conservatives had hoped that Jim Jordan, a senior member on the committee, might pursue the chairmanship. Boehner grins. "Gowdy—that's my guy, even though he doesn't know how to dress," he says. Then Boehner leans back in his chair. "Fuck Jordan. Fuck Chaffetz. They're both assholes."

And away we go.

Boehner's beef with Chaffetz, who would later join Fox News as a paid contributor, is not personal—just that he's a "total phony" who possessed legislative talent but focused mostly on self-promotion. "With Chaffetz," Boehner says, "it's always about Chaffetz."

His problems with Jordan, the founding chairman of the ultraconservative House Freedom Caucus, run much deeper. To Boehner and his allies, Jordan was the antagonist in the story of his speakership—an embodiment of the brinkmanship and betrayal that roiled the House Republican majority and made Boehner's life miserable. Although he would tell me in later conversations that he holds no grudges against anyone, today Boehner unloads on his fellow Ohioan. "Jordan was a terrorist as a legislator going back to his days in the Ohio House and Senate," Boehner says. "A terrorist. A legislative terrorist."

If he sounds exasperated, it's because this is the central irony of his career: A quarter-century before the conservative insurgency stormed Washington and derailed his speakership, John Boehner was the conservative insurgency.

ACT I

Boehner's pursuit of national office was his first rebellion against the establishment.

When the news broke in 1989 that Ohio Congressman Donald "Buz" Lukens, a Republican, had paid a 16-year-old for sex—and was trying to get her mother a government job—the party bosses tried pushing him out. Lukens wouldn't budge. So they coalesced around a challenger: former GOP Congressman Tom Kindness, who had held the seat prior to Lukens. Months went by before Boehner, a state representative who had made himself wealthy selling corrugated boxes and injection-molded plastics, jumped into the race—much to the displeasure of party leaders. Boehner didn't have insider connections or family favors to cash in; one of a dozen kids who grew up in a two-bedroom home and cleaned floors in his father's shot-and-a-beer saloon, he worked as a janitor to pay for college and first took elected office as a township trustee before later winning a statehouse seat.

Armed with little name recognition and even less support, Boehner poured his own money into the race—nearly emptying his family's bank account by spending $150,000 on the campaign. "It was too much money," Debbie Boehner, his wife, tells me. Her husband nods. "I put it all on the line." Money wasn't Boehner's problem; it was his name. Almost everyone in the district pronounced it Boner. "Think about this," Mick tells me on the patio, laughing so hard he can barely finish. "You had a guy named Kindness running against a guy named Boner." Defying expectations, Boehner won the primary and gained the party's support. That included help from Paul Ryan, a local college Republican who volunteered that fall. "I didn't know him," Ryan says. "I thought his name was Boner."

By then, the Democrats' post-Watergate zeal for reform had long since faded, and the House was widely seen as the oozing center of the Washington swamp—an out-of-control legislative slum that invited malfeasance and vice. It was against this backdrop that Boehner, a newcomer, made it his mission to clean up Congress. "He indicated he wanted to be very aggressive and very much involved in reform efforts, and he brought a lot of energy to it," Newt Gingrich, who was then the second-ranking House Republican, remembers of the freshman lawmaker.

Almost from the day he arrived on Capitol Hill in January 1991, Boehner found himself arguing with employees of the House Bank—a financial institution for members of Congress only—who explained that his paycheck could be deposited only with them. These rules vexed the rookie legislator. Months later, he spotted a statistic from the Government Accountability Office audit of the House Bank: more than 8,000 of its checks had bounced. "They needed all of us to keep our money in those accounts so they could have a big enough float to keep the bank alive," Boehner recalls. After discussing this realization with six of his fellow freshman Republicans, they agreed to expose the rot. As they did so, in the form of a privileged resolution, Boehner tells me, Speaker Tom Foley and Majority Leader Dick Gephardt—both Democrats—approached him on the House floor, as did Bob Michel, the Republican minority leader. "All three of them said essentially the same thing," Boehner remembers. "'We didn't do anything wrong, and we won't do it again.'" As Boehner and Co. dug deeper, probing the bank's finances and pushing for the disclosure of members whose accounts were overdrawn, they earned a nickname: the Gang of Seven. Less than a year into his first term, as Americans seethed over the improprieties exposed by these freshman renegades—with Democrats, the majority party, shouldering the blame—the House Bank was closed. And Boehner's star was born.

The Gang's work wasn't finished. Over the next several years they turned their attention to other targets, including the scandal-plagued House Post Office, leading to the indictment and imprisonment of House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, a powerful Illinois Democrat. Sensing an opportunity to seize Washington's moral high ground and win back the House after 40 years in the minority—President Bill Clinton's own troubles would be icing on the cake—Gingrich enlisted Boehner to help draft the "Contract with America," a list of promises to voters.

As he helped guide the party's midterm strategy, Boehner's high-profile role made him a hero to reform-minded conservatives seeking office across the country in part of what would later be dubbed the "Republican Revolution" of 1994. Richard Burr, who today is the senior senator from North Carolina, was campaigning for a House seat that year and remembers hearing about Boehner. "I think John was probably the first one that actually intended to drain the swamp. He was a radical," Burr says. "The closest example would be a Freedom Caucus guy today." Jordan, running his first race for the statehouse that year, recalls fawning over his future nemesis. "Here's a guy who's fighting to clean things up in Washington."

Republicans won the majority, and Boehner, leveraging his newfound celebrity, ran for the No. 4 spot in House leadership: conference chairman. Gingrich had become speaker with Michel's retirement, and he had a different person in mind for conference chair. But Boehner won anyway, cashing in on favors he had accumulated by virtue of his status as a prodigious young fundraiser.

At freshman orientation following the 1994 midterms, Boehner, now a four-year veteran of the House, sat with three incoming members—Burr, Saxby Chambliss of Georgia and Tom Latham of Iowa—and discovered they had much in common. The four would become inseparable. "There's a very small cadre of things that makes John Boehner like you," Burr says. "We all liked red wine. At the time most of us used tobacco products. ... John had his, let's say, peculiarities about him. He was not shy to be critical of one's hair or one's dress if in fact he found it to be outside of what he perceived to be appropriate or the norm. And I think we were the only three people that were willing to put up with his crap. So, we became his best friends."

Boehner's fastidiousness would become legendary among colleagues. Friends say he would iron virtually every piece of clothing—shirts, undershirts, boxer shorts, pants, suit jackets, ties. Patrick McHenry, currently the chief deputy whip, recalls how, on his first day in Congress in 2005, Boehner walked into the cloakroom and spotted him eating an ice cream sandwich. They had never met. Boehner lit a cigarette and scowled at him. "Don't do that," he said, pointing to the frozen snack. "Why?" McHenry replied. "You're gonna be a fatass," Boehner told him.

This is Boehner's way of showing affection; after he calls me "shithead" for the umpteenth time on the golf course, his buddy Dick leans over. "You know that means he likes you, right?" (His buddies have the same towel-snapping style. At one point, I hit a low, screaming drive. "You know what your problem is?" Fuzzy Zoeller asks me. "L.O.F.T." I nod, saying I should tee my ball higher. "No," he shakes his head. "Lack of fucking talent." Boehner howls with approval.)

Having watched Gingrich stalk the halls of Congress, rarely making eye contact with colleagues—much less greeting them—Boehner knew he needed to engage members while still being himself. "You grow up in a bar and you learn to mix it up with people," Boehner says. "It was a way of building relationships, as goofy as it sounds. And if you've got a relationship with people, you've got a chance to move them."

Those relationships failed to save him from what looked like a political death sentence.

The year 1994 didn't just usher in new leadership to the House and the GOP; it marked a profound shift in Washington's partisan relations. Gingrich, a master messenger with a zero-sum approach to ideological warfare, perfected the art of launching poll-tested attacks on Democrats as "radicals" who threatened liberty. With a penchant for turning personal disagreement into political Armageddon, Gingrich weaponized the speakership as never before.

"The beginning of the scorched-earth policy really began with Gingrich winning in the mid-'90s, the Gingrich revolution, and the enormous pressure put on moderate Republicans to walk away from anything remotely approaching a compromise," says former Vice President Joe Biden, who was then a senator from Delaware.

Another change, one that would later inform some of the opposition to Boehner's speakership, was the consolidation of power at the expense of committee chairmen and rank-and-file members. "Gingrich basically created a process where the speaker was the epicenter of the House," says Joshua Huder, a senior fellow at Georgetown University's Government Affairs Institute.

As the fourth-ranking House Republican—behind Gingrich, Majority Leader Dick Armey and Majority Whip Tom DeLay—Boehner could see the toll these institutional transformations took on GOP members, who felt disempowered by Gingrich's imperial style. After Clinton won reelection in 1996, Republicans grew restless. The GOP had suffered terribly from Gingrich's handling of a lengthy government shutdown from December 1995 to January 1996—a lesson that informed Boehner's aversion to such tactics years later—as well as his constant public feuding and a barrage of ethics charges against him. In January 1997, Gingrich became the first speaker ever reprimanded for an ethics violation.

That summer, several members of the extended Republican leadership huddled to discuss a coup against Gingrich; when the speaker learned of their plotting, they scrambled to protect themselves and Gingrich remained in power. It has long been considered fact that Boehner and Armey joined this mutiny. But Boehner insists he was never involved. He claims that DeLay and Republican leadership chairman Bill Paxon were the masterminds, both eyeing promotions, and that "when it all blew up, they dragged me and Armey into it with them." He sighs. "DeLay and I were never close. Matter of fact, half the stab wounds in my back are from him." The one person who believed Boehner's story was Gingrich. "John is a very honest guy. He'll be honest with you negatively and he'll be honest with you positively," Gingrich says. "I never doubted him."

Whatever role Boehner played, the damage was done. Gingrich stepped down after Republicans lost five seats in the 1998 midterms, and when heir apparent Bob Livingston shockingly announced that he would decline the speakership—amid swirling reports of extramarital shenanigans—Dennis Hastert, the chief deputy whip, became speaker. Armev and DeLay kept their posts. But there was blood in the water, and Boehner became "the sacrificial lamb," Chambliss says, losing his job as conference chair to J.C. Watts of Oklahoma.

"Most people thought I was going to leave," Boehner says of his humiliating defeat. Instead, he recalls telling his then-chief of staff, Barry Jackson, as they left the vote: "I'm never going to let 'em see me sweat. They're never going to see an ounce of disappointment on my face. We're just going to earn our way back."

Two years later—on the heels of George W. Bush's 2000 election—the chairmanship of the House Education and the Workforce Committee opened up, and Boehner saw his chance. Roy Blunt, a Missourian and the chief deputy whip, remembers Boehner's presentation to the Steering Committee: He brought metal lunchboxes personalized with members' names, and folded up inside were his education policy papers. Boehner lacked seniority, but "it was the right thing to do to bring him back into a more active role in the House," Blunt recalls.

The timing was serendipitous: Bush wanted to show the American people that Washington was still functioning after the September 11 terrorist attacks, and signing a major, bipartisan overhaul of education would be just the thing. Boehner, a golfing buddy of the president's, found himself paired with Ted Kennedy, the liberal lion of the Senate, crafting the most ambitious K-12 bill in American history. "Ted Kennedy was a great compromiser. Everybody thought he was rigid, just wanted his way. That is not Ted Kennedy," says Harry Reid, who then served as Senate majority whip. "And for Boehner, Ted was perfect, because he was always willing to do a deal."

The result, No Child Left Behind, was the linchpin to Boehner's political reclamation project—even though the federal government's intrusion into state and local education policymaking spawned a conservative backlash still felt today. Boehner blames "the implementation" of the bill, but makes no apology for breaking with party orthodoxy in writing it. Passage of NCLB might have been the genesis of the right's caricature of Boehner as a spineless centrist, but it also cemented his reputation as an effective dealmaker. "To some members that probably defined him as more moderate than they would like," Blunt says. "To others it defined him as a guy with capacity to get hard things done."

By 2006, the party was reeling—two prolonged wars, ballooning deficit, skyrocketing debt—and Democrats were threatening to take back the House. DeLay had been promoted to majority leader, and Blunt to majority whip; both men loomed as obstacles for Boehner's designs on climbing back into the leadership. But DeLay's indictment in late 2005 opened the door. His resignation sparked an intense five-month period of jockeying for the role of majority leader: Boehner, Blunt and John Shadegg, chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, all wanted the job. Blunt tallied 110 votes on the first ballot, shy of the majority he needed; ahead of the second ballot, Paul Ryan, a member of Shadegg's operation, informed Boehner's team that they would throw their votes to him. The comeback was complete: Boehner was elected House majority leader in what he describes as the best day he ever had in Congress.

Boehner had made the leadership election a referendum on the GOP's ethical lapses—fittingly but ironically, considering he was bludgeoned in 1995 for distributing Big Tobacco's campaign checks on the House floor. Having apologized and pushed to ban that very practice, Boehner preserved his reputation as a reformer and was now working to fulfill a campaign promise nobody thought he could keep: banning earmarks.

The funding of pet projects in lawmakers' districts helped leadership to keep members in line, but fueled a culture of venality and waste; boondoggles like the "Bridge to Nowhere," a 2005 project calling for a $223 million earmark to construct a bridge to a remote, sparsely populated Alaska island, became symbols of congressional excess. Boehner never accepted an earmark in Congress—and he enjoyed railing against those who did. His heckling once provoked Don Young, an Alaskan himself, to pin Boehner against a wall inside the House chamber and hold a 10-inch knife to his throat. Boehner says he stared Young in the eyes and said, "Fuck you." (Young says this account is "mostly true," but notes that the two became good friends, with Boehner later serving as his best man.)

Boehner made good on his promise. He rolled the powerful Appropriations Committee and rid the House of earmarks, claiming a watershed victory for good government. History will judge it as perhaps Boehner's most significant achievement—and one that made running the House all the more difficult.

ACT II

He wasn't majority leader for long.

With public opinion turning sharply against Bush—his handling of the Iraq War, Hurricane Katrina and the economy, specifically the early stages of the housing bubble—Democrats took advantage of a demoralized Republican base and won back the House in 2006, picking up 31 seats and handing Nancy Pelosi the speaker's gavel. It wasn't all bad for Boehner: Hastert's retirement cleared the way for him to become the top House Republican.

Although nobody knew at the time, Hastert would become another in a long string of prominent congressional Republicans to be disgraced by scandal. In 2015, Hastert reached a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, acknowledging that he had delivered hush money to one of several male former high school students he had sexually abused. The Boehners, like others who knew him, were dumbfounded. "Denny Hastert was the nicest guy," Debbie says. "But you know what? His wife never came to D.C." Did they ever notice anything unusual, I ask? "Only his staff," Boehner tells me. "He had more gay staff than anybody I knew—at a time when it was a bit unusual." He pauses. "OK, fine. I didn't care. But when all this stuff broke a couple years ago, it took my breath away."

Now minority leader, Boehner spent much of 2008 corralling difficult votes to prop up a sinking economy and an unpopular, lame-duck president. Jordan, who arrived in the class of 2006, remembers watching during his freshman term as the leader straddled a line between his inner conservatism and his loyalty to the president and the party. This reached a memorable climax in late September 2008, when two-thirds of the House GOP voted against a bailout package requested by Bush and Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson—sending global markets tumbling and Boehner scrambling to find votes. A revised bill passed four days later, averting catastrophe, but the uprising had officially begun.

Republicans, having spent and borrowed extravagantly during the Bush years—and expanded the reach of the federal government with No Child Left Behind, the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit, and the bailouts—now faced a conservative backlash. Pivoting sharply, GOP lawmakers greeted the election of Barack Obama in 2008 with unified opposition to his stimulus package. This brought accusations of hypocrisy. "People thought we had spent too much. Thought the tax cuts were too much," Boehner says. "OK, fine—we need to look ahead. We've got a spending problem."

With Democrats controlling the White House and both chambers of Congress in 2009 and 2010, Boehner felt obligated to hold the line and galvanize the party faithful who had failed to mobilize behind Senator John McCain, the centrist-leaning 2008 nominee. He led the charge against the stimulus, the Affordable Care Act, Dodd-Frank financial regulation, and cap and trade, and his leadership was unquestioned in the GOP conference; Boehner's fiery floor speech denouncing the ACA shortly before its passage was his high-water mark among colleagues. "Look at how this bill was written," the minority leader said on the House floor in March 2010. "Can you say it was done openly?" Republicans and Democrats shouted in response. "With transparency and accountability?" The shouts continued. "Without backroom deals struck behind closed doors, hidden from the people? Hell no, you can't!"

Out in the provinces, however, the party was transforming, with implications that would prove fateful for Boehner: Rallies nationwide featured Paul Revere imitators waving "Don't Tread on Me" flags, and candidates for Congress were aligning with the so-called Tea Party in denouncing both Obama's overreach and the excesses of the previous GOP administration in equally strident terms. They promised to come to Washington as a new breed of Republican—revolutionaries promising ideological purity rather than partisan achievement. "It was very appealing in running for Congress to say that you would never settle for less than 100 percent," recalls Blunt, who left the House and won a Senate seat in 2010.

The uprising put Boehner in a predicament as Republicans stampeded back into the House majority that November, flipping 63 Democrat-held seats. The new speaker had campaigned on a generic but effective message—"Where are the jobs?"—that revealed a traditional sensibility about how to oppose the president. Boehner wanted Obama gone, but he wasn't much for stunts and gamesmanship; his goal was to prove in 2011 and 2012 that Republicans could be trusted once again as a responsible governing party, thus aiding Obama's defeat in 2012.

"When I saw that Boehner was becoming speaker, I thought that was a positive thing," Biden tells me. "I thought there could be actually some work together, some collaboration together, and we could actually get some things done. But I thought, most of all, he was going to treat the president with more respect than some of his colleagues had."

The class of 2010 wasn't interested in collaboration. These rowdy freshmen lawmakers saw Boehner's "Hell no" speech as a blueprint for their slash-and-burn strategy. When they realized after arriving in D.C. that he would not lead accordingly, dozens of them gravitated toward someone who would: Jordan, the newly installed chairman of the Republican Study Committee. When I ask about those factions forming in 2011, Jordan cites the "Hell no" speech and shrugs. "That's the John Boehner we were hoping for."

The Republican Party's incipient civil war moved quickly from the campaign trail to Capitol Hill. The fundamentally irreconcilable approaches of Boehner and Jordan, and the members who followed them, produced an increasingly volatile series of intraparty collisions during the new GOP majority's first term in 2011 and 2012.

Some of this owed to Boehner's not taking the campaign rhetoric of his new colleagues at face value. "These were people who ran against Washington and planned on voting that way," explains Tim Huelskamp, who was elected in the 2010 wave and then lost his Kansas district's Republican primary in 2016. Boehner rejects the notion that he was ill-prepared to deal with these rookie legislators, but his allies concede there was a blind spot. "He thought of himself as someone who was of the Tea Party mentality before the Tea Party was a thing ... so I think there were some assumptions made that he got these people, and that they would see he was one of them," says Anne Bradbury, Boehner's former floor director. "But that really never came together."

Some of the freshmen took one look at Boehner—the golf-tanned back-slapper who wore handsome, tailored suits and rented his D.C. apartment from a registered lobbyist—and saw the embodiment of everything they were sent to destroy. "They never gave him a fair shake," says Kevin McCarthy, the California congressman who was then Boehner's majority whip.

One thing everybody agrees on: The debt-ceiling negotiations that summer of 2011 marked the beginning of the end of Boehner's speakership.

Facing an August deadline to raise the nation's borrowing limit, which gave conservatives occasion to take a symbolic stand against fiscal irresponsibility, the speaker appeased his members by declaring that every new dollar of debt must be offset by commensurate spending cuts. The speaker hoped this "Boehner Rule" would project strength from his young, untested conference, but it backfired: Conservatives repeatedly balked at potential compromises being discussed by Boehner and Obama, believing they had leverage to hold out for a better deal.

They rallied around a plan called Cut, Cap and Balance, which required a hike in the debt ceiling to be accompanied by a cut in federal spending, a cap on future levels of spending and an amendment to the Constitution requiring Congress to balance its budget. The proposal, which Boehner privately derided as "Snap, Crackle and Pop," passed the House in mid-July but was rejected out of hand by Obama and the Reid-run Senate. Boehner, staring down the August deadline, moved on; conservatives were irate that leadership had caved. "It was the most popular Republican vote we had taken," Huelskamp says. "And 18 hours later he caved to Obama on some stupid deal and we all went home dejected for the August recess."

Jordan and Senator Jim DeMint of South Carolina, who helped craft the Cut, Cap and Balance legislation, urged the GOP leadership in both chambers to force the issue—to "fight," as conservatives loved to say, and let the public decide which party was right. To Boehner, this was a futile strategy—Democrats controlled the White House and the Senate, leaving him with few cards to play. But the debt-ceiling mess was only a taste of things to come—DeMint would later haunt Boehner as president of The Heritage Foundation, whose lobbying arm, Heritage Action, pressured GOP lawmakers into defying the speaker at every turn. "He ran Heritage into the ground," Boehner told me after DeMint was fired this summer. "Heritage was a respected conservative think tank, and he turned it into some half-assed political operation."

The rising influence of Heritage and other "outside groups" on the right—Club for Growth, FreedomWorks, Tea Party Patriots—made the speaker's job infinitely harder. Egged on by an angry GOP base, they repeatedly cornered Republicans into fights they couldn't possibly win. The defining implosion of their first year in the majority came in late July when it was revealed that Jordan's staff had been conspiring with outside groups to pressure RSC members—Jordan's own members—to vote against Boehner's debt deal. It was a stunning breach of decorum and a confirmation of what Obama had already figured out: that Boehner wasn't dealing from a place of strength. Jordan apologized profusely to the conference, but it was too late. Whatever trust once existed between the warring GOP factions had vanished, never to return—and it destroyed Boehner's credibility with Democrats.

"He could practically never deliver his votes," Pelosi tells me. When I ask Boehner about this, during a rain delay at Wetherington, he smirks. "It's hard to negotiate when you're standing there naked," he says. "It's hard to negotiate with no dick."

It didn't help that Boehner spent part of that summer negotiating the biggest deal in modern political history—and keeping his members entirely in the dark about it.

Boehner's conservative foes criticized him as cautious at best and gutless at worst, but he is better understood as a calculated gambler. For instance, he greenlit Ryan's controversial, safety-net-slashing budget proposals at a time when many party leaders were running away from them, because he felt voters would reward the GOP for taking a stand on entitlement spending. The speaker wasn't afraid of going big. But the circumstances had to be right. And in June 2011, they were.

What began as a bipartisan photo-op—18 holes at the Andrews Air Force Base course with Obama and Boehner teaming against Biden and Ohio Governor John Kasich—ended with a suggestion from Boehner that the debt-ceiling predicament actually gave them the chance for a once-in-a-lifetime deal to address America's longer-term crisis: the retirement of the baby boomer generation and the strain it placed on the country's finances. Republicans might agree to increased revenue via eliminating tax deductions and loopholes (violating conservative orthodoxy) if Democrats could agree to spending cuts and entitlement reforms (violating liberal orthodoxy). Obama signaled his openness to the idea, and for the next five weeks their teams worked in secret to hammer out a compromise, knowing that fury awaited in their respective bases.

On Sunday, July 17, it appeared they had a deal. Boehner and Virginia Representative Eric Cantor—whom the speaker had reluctantly brought into the negotiations, knowing the majority leader's distrust of Obama could poison the talks—worked out some final details that morning at the White House. When the president returned from church, Boehner says, he invited them both into the Oval Office and shook their hands. Some fine-tuning remained, but in Boehner's mind the so-called grand bargain was done. The framework included reforms to Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security; $1.2 trillion in cuts to discretionary spending; and $800 billion in new revenue. "I was one happy son of a bitch," Boehner tells me.

The next 48 hours changed everything. On Tuesday morning, the so-called Gang of Six—three senators from each party who had been discussing their own sweeping fiscal agreement—announced a briefing for their colleagues at the Capitol. They unveiled a separate framework, totally unaware of what Obama and Boehner had agreed to. This deal included significantly more revenue. Chambliss, by then a senator, was one of the GOP Gang members and had no idea—because Boehner had been negotiating with the president in private—that their announcement would kill the speaker's deal with the White House. Obama saw that Republican senators were endorsing a deal that included far more revenue, and knew there was no way he could sell the grand bargain to his liberal base. When he came back with a counteroffer, seeking a higher revenue number, it validated Cantor's warnings about not trusting the president. And by that point Boehner's members had heard enough about the grand bargain to know they didn't like it—with the $800 billion revenue figure, much less something higher.

So the deal fell apart, and the two sides peddled their competing versions of events: Boehner's team said the White House moved the goal posts, while Obama's allies said the speaker couldn't sell his own members on the deal. "The White House tried to spin this a million different ways," Boehner tells me. "But we had a deal. They walked away from it." When I ask Biden about this, he takes a long pause. "I think they had a genuine misunderstanding," he says. "I think John is completely sincere, but ... we had this Rubik's cube we were constantly struggling with as to whether or not what was being sold by John in the House was going to be able to be delivered, and what was being sold in the Senate was able to be delivered."

Harry Reid insists his caucus would have provided enough votes for passage, despite deep reservations among Democrats. And he says to this day he blames the Gang of Six for scuttling the grand bargain by releasing a framework that had no chance of becoming law. "They may get mad at me now, I don't care. I knew it would never work," Reid says of the Senate proposal. "It was a doomed failure. I told them that. So, I was hoping Boehner and Obama would move forward."

There is truth in both arguments: that Obama walked away and Boehner couldn't convince his people. That said, knowing how his career ended, Boehner counts the grand bargain as his "biggest disappointment"—not only because the national debt just blew past $20 trillion, with no hope of entitlement fixes on the horizon, but also because at least there would be something big to show for the heartburn he endured as speaker. "If I could have pulled this deal off, they could have thrown me out the next day," Boehner says. "I would have been the happiest guy in the world."

Having lost the faith of the White House as an effective partner, and the confidence of his right flank to do its bidding, Boehner approached the remainder of the term warily in hopes of avoiding self-inflicted wounds that would hurt GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney's chances of defeating Obama. Instead, after the president won reelection, Boehner was soon back at the negotiating table dealing with yet another crisis. This time, it was the so-called fiscal cliff, in which the expiration of the Bush-era tax cuts and harsh, automatic spending cuts agreed to in 2011 (following the grand bargain's collapse) would take effect simultaneously in 2013—risking to send the country back into recession.

Obama had campaigned in 2012 on the proposal that tax rates should jump for individuals making more than $200,000 annually. After weeks of haggling following his victory, the president offered a concession: $400,000 for individuals. Boehner made a counteroffer of $1 million. Had the entire House GOP rallied behind that idea, they might have forced Obama's number higher. But a larger number of Republicans, having pledged to an outside group never to raise taxes, period, refused to go along. A dejected Boehner conceded defeat in a private conference meeting, and, in a remarkable moment of vulnerability, recited the Serenity Prayer used in 12-step addiction programs.

Boehner was running out of patience. The day before, Reid had blasted him from the Senate floor, saying he ran the House like a dictator. "I don't do angry. Nobody on my staff has ever seen me angry," Boehner tells me. "But that little son of a bitch got under my skin." When he arrived at the White House for a meeting with the president and congressional leaders, Boehner spotted Reid talking with Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell. "I walked right up to him and said, 'Harry, you can go fuck yourself. You ever listen to that shit that comes out of your mouth?'" Boehner imitates a flustered Reid, then adds: "I thought McConnell was going to have a heart attack."

(Reid adds an interesting detail. "Then he said, 'We've got to get along better,'" Reid recalls, grinning. "That's one reason I like him. He's not a phony. ... He wanted me to know that he wanted us to get along. So that was his way of telling me." Boehner agrees; he says they became "really good friends" after the incident, and today construction is underway on a new think tank at the University of Nevada Las Vegas, which they will co-chair. Boehner visited in August and Reid tells me they went sightseeing together like an old married couple; he even put down the car window so Boehner could smoke as they drove.)

The fiscal cliff further diminished Boehner's standing on the right. When the new Congress convened in January 2013, some two dozen House conservatives plotted to overthrow him. Any speaker needs a majority of votes cast on the House floor on the first day of a new Congress; Huelskamp and others concluded that if 17 Republicans voted against Boehner, that would force a second ballot—and he would step aside out of shame. Huelskamp says the coup participants "signed their names in blood" the night before the vote—not literally—and he was stunned the next day to see just 12 of them follow through. Boehner survived, but was embarrassed by the revolt. It was the first attempt on his speakership, though not the last.

The resentment toward Boehner was rooted in many grievances, some more legitimate than others. Without question, he ran the House in a top-down fashion inherited from Gingrich, centralizing the policymaking process in leadership offices and spurning input from back-bench members. He would also anger conservatives by allowing deadlines to creep up, refusing to state the conference's strategy because he knew they would disapprove—and then he would jam them at the last minute. There also was outrage at his punitive tactics. In late 2012, he had kicked Huelskamp and several other conservatives off key committees as punishment for their votes against leadership initiatives. It was predictable: The earmark ban had robbed Boehner of his best tool to incentivize on-the-fence members, leaving him to lead with all sticks and few carrots. With outside groups actively recruiting primary challengers, members in red districts often saw no political upside in voting with the leadership—a dynamic Boehner could not counter.

Things improved somewhat after the 2013 speaker vote, when Boehner privately assembled a group of five House conservatives—Ryan, Jordan, Tom Price, Jeb Hensarling and Steve Scalise—to discuss a cease-fire. This temporarily ended the hostilities. But by summer, Republicans were engaged in another brutal internecine conflict—this time over immigration.

A bipartisan group of eight senators had crafted a comprehensive immigration bill that appeared to have support in the House GOP. But in June, when the Senate passed it—68 to 32, with 14 Republicans voting yes—House members found themselves under siege from constituents and conservative groups. The fatal flaw: It provided a path to citizenship, albeit a winding one, for people in the country illegally. Many conservatives could support a path to legal status but not citizenship; Democrats, on the other hand, essentially took a citizenship-or-nothing approach. Boehner was boxed in: He wanted immigration reform, and personally didn't mind citizenship—especially for minors brought to the U.S. unwittingly. But putting the bill on the floor meant it might pass into law with perhaps as few as 40 or 50 of his members voting yes. Conservatives would never forgive him for overruling the vast majority of his membership. Looking back, Boehner says not solving immigration is his second-biggest regret, and he blames Obama for "setting the field on fire." But the former speaker doesn't mention the nativist voices in his own party that came to dominate the debate, foreshadowing the presidential campaign three years later. Ultimately, the speaker's immigration quandary boiled down to a choice between protecting his right flank and doing what he thought was right for the country—and Boehner chose the former.

It wasn't the only time. That summer, conservatives were also getting an earful about the Obamacare exchanges opening on October 1. House Republicans had voted repeatedly to repeal the law but the Senate refused to act, and their constituents, justifiably, wanted to know why Obamacare still existed when they had been promised otherwise. "Somehow, out on the campaign trail, the representation was made that you could beat President Obama into submission to sign a repeal of the law with his name on it," Cantor says. "And that's where things got, I think, disconnected from reality." (In Ohio, listening to his pals groan about Obamacare, Boehner explains why his former colleagues haven't repealed it: "Their gonads shriveled up when they learned this vote was for real.")

Republicans' penchant for overpromising and underdelivering would ultimately enable the ascent of Donald Trump, who positioned himself as a results-oriented outsider who would deliver where politicians had failed. In the shorter term, it invited something less dramatic: a government shutdown. Eager to demonstrate that all options were being exhausted to defeat Obamacare, Ted Cruz in the Senate and conservatives in the House concocted a plan: Because the government needed new funding on October 1, the same day the exchanges would open, they would propose funding the rest of the federal government—while defunding Obamacare.

Boehner objected. Not only would Democrats never go for it; Republicans would be blamed for the resulting government shutdown. "I told them, 'Don't do this. It's crazy. The president, the vice president, Reid, Pelosi, they're all sitting there with the biggest shit-eating grins on their faces that you've ever seen, because they can't believe we're this fucking stupid.'" (Boehner, at one point, surprises me by saying he's proud of Cruz—whom he once called "Lucifer in the flesh"—for acting responsibly in 2017. Do you feel badly about calling him Lucifer, I ask? "No!" Boehner snorts. "He's the most miserable son of a bitch I've ever had to work with.")

After railing against the defund strategy, however, Boehner surveyed his conference and realized it was a fight many members wanted—and some needed. Yielding, he joined them in the trenches, abandoning his obligations of governance in hopes of strengthening his standing in the party. But the 17-day shutdown proved costly. Watching as Republicans got butchered in nationwide polling, the speaker finally called a meeting to inform members that they would vote to reopen the government and raise the debt ceiling. "I get a standing ovation," Boehner says. "I'm thinking, 'This place is irrational.'"

By spring 2014 it appeared Boehner's days were numbered. A bigger bloc of members—not all of them troublemakers—told me at the time they would vote him out at the end of the year, replacing him with a new speaker for the next Congress. What they didn't know is that Boehner had already decided to step down, having instructed his three most trusted staffers to lay out his options for retiring at the end of 2014.

In a digital-time-stamped memo written in November 2013, titled "The End," those staffers—chief of staff Mike Sommers, deputy chief of staff Dave Schnittger and personal office chief of staff Mick Krieger—presented Boehner with three choices. "Option 1" meant announcing in January 2014 his plan to leave at the end of the year. "Option 2" meant announcing that plan in August. "Option 3" meant announcing it in November, after the midterm elections.

Boehner ruled out Option 1, deciding that yearlong leadership races would invite further discord and make legislating hopeless. But he never had the chance to decide between Options 2 and 3. That's because on June 10, 2014, as Boehner dined at Alberto's, his favorite Capitol Hill ristorante, Sommers called him with stunning news. Cantor—his majority leader and heir apparent—had lost his primary in Virginia's 7th District to a little-known challenger whose campaign was boosted by Tea Party groups and right-wing radio hosts. "I was pissed," Boehner tells me. "Because in my mind, I was done." ("That was the worst campaign ever run," Boehner adds of Cantor's defeat. "I never saw anything like it.")

Boehner's next call was to Ryan, asking him to become majority leader and slide into the speakership the following year. "He called me that night and said, 'You've got to do this job,'" Ryan tells me. "And I was like, 'There's no way I'm doing this job. You've got to stay.'" Boehner consulted with friends and determined there was only one course of action. "I remember telling him, 'You don't have a choice. This conference falls apart if you leave now,'" Chambliss says.

Cantor's loss triggered a leadership shuffle: McCarthy was promoted to majority leader, and Scalise was elected whip. The new chief deputy whip, McHenry—who admits to being "a bomb-thrower" his first three years in Congress and viewing Boehner as a nincompoop—tells me his view changed upon joining the speaker at his daily management meetings. "I'm in there and it's this realization—Oh, wait a second. Boehner does actually care about policy. He understands the dynamics of the conference. He understands where all these different groups are." He laughs. "Like, who is this guy?" McHenry wishes other conservatives had his vantage point. "He could see through opportunities without having to make the 50 or 75 phone calls that I made."

On the golf course in Ohio, Boehner singles out McHenry as an example of how some lawmakers mature after initially acting like "anarchists." He also makes a prediction: "McHenry's going to be the speaker one day."

Republicans took back the Senate in 2014 but little changed. If anything, conservative voters grew angrier at the lack of results. "There were a lot of no-win situations," Scalise says. "You go and pick fights with the Senate, but in the end, they've got a totally different set of rules that made it hard for any of our reforms even to get to the president's desk." McCarthy adds, "I remember telling Mitch McConnell one time, 'Your rules are gonna get the speaker thrown out."

Boehner was unenthused about returning in 2015. Convinced that he was taking one for the team by staying, he was more anxious than anyone had ever seen him in January, when conservatives organized a second mutiny on the floor. "He was puffing cigarettes faster than usual, and that's hard to do," says Chambliss, who sat with Boehner during the speakership vote. "It obviously worked out. But from then on, I think it was only a matter of time for John to make the decision that this wasn't worth it."

Wounded by that January uprising, and seeing no light at the end of the tunnel—Jordan that same month had co-founded a new group, the House Freedom Caucus, designed to push leadership even harder than the Republican Study Committee had—Boehner plotted a new exit strategy. He would announce his retirement on his birthday, November 17.

But Boehner's plans were thwarted once again. Mark Meadows, another co-founder of the Freedom Caucus, sent shock waves through Congress on his birthday—July 28—by filing a "motion to vacate." The idea was to force another floor vote on the speakership, gambling that this time Boehner would either lose or step down to avoid the spectacle.

When news broke of Meadows' move, Boehner's allies were furious. They implored him to call up the motion and hold the vote immediately, in a show of strength. Boehner wanted to think. And after meeting the next day with Jordan and four other Freedom Caucus members, the speaker decided against it. They had urged him not to hold the vote before August recess, since the Republicans who supported him would then spend the month getting pummeled back home. Boehner found himself agreeing. "He's like, 'I don't want to make members take that vote,'" Ryan, who urged a same-day vote, recalls Boehner telling him. "Totally selfless. Always thinking about protecting the membership."

To be clear: Boehner was never going to lose the speakership. In another internal memo—this one digital-time-stamped September 16, 2015, and titled "Save the Institution"—Sommers explained to Boehner that his survival would be ensured if Pelosi had Democratic members vote "present" when the motion came up. If they did, Boehner could win with a simple majority of Republican votes cast—which was never in doubt, as the number of GOP defectors was between 20 and 40. In a subsequent meeting, Boehner broached the idea with Pelosi and she agreed. "You can't have 30 people in your caucus decide they're going to vacate the chair," she tells me. "He knew I had—not his back, but the institution's back."

And yet the maneuver didn't sit well with Boehner—especially since he was dead set on leaving in November anyway. "It would be awful for the institution. We hadn't gone through this in 100 years," he says. "All these Republicans were going to get crap at home for supporting me, only to have me leave soon after that." Boehner is still angry with Meadows, who canceled an interview for this article, for putting him in that position: "He's an idiot. I can't tell you what makes him tick."

On September 24, Pope Francis addressed Congress—a visit Boehner had worked for years to secure—and he says everything clicked. "I never saw members happier than they were the day the pope was there. Democrats, Republicans, House, Senate. Everybody was happy."

In his D.C. apartment that night, Boehner told his wife what he was thinking of announcing. "And then I went to bed and slept eight hours. Like a baby. It was unbelievable." The next morning, after his customary breakfast at Pete's Diner, "I looked at that statue of the Virgin Mary next to St. Peter's Church, and I decided, all right, today's the day," Boehner recalls. "And as soon as I decided that, I thought, you know, the press is going to think I got forced out of here. I just want them to understand there's not one moment of trepidation in this. So, I'm going to walk out there singing 'Zip-a-dee-do-dah.' I made those decisions at the same moment."

Boehner was not forced out—at least, not in any technical or parliamentary sense. And there is no question he felt unburdened by the decision to finally throw in the towel. But the singing routine betrayed the fact that he was hardly his normal, cheerful self in those final months. "He was just kind of emotionally done," says Bradbury, his former aide. "The fact that he felt like he'd given and given to the conference and the country, and this is how he was rewarded, when he didn't want to be there anyway—" she stops herself. "It was very disheartening for him."

ACT III

"Nothing good happens after 10 p.m."

These are words Boehner lived by throughout his career. In a capital city where booze flows freely and parties run late and lawmakers live away from spouses, he decided long ago it would behoove him to be in bed by 10 o'clock. This also allowed him to rise early, take his long walk for coffee, wolf down some eggs at his favorite greasy spoon and read the newspapers before work. Retirement has meant adjustments—Boehner makes his own breakfast and spends his days dialing into conference calls, giving paid speeches or doing housework—but one constant remains: asleep by 10. On my first night in Ohio, just as the conversations were getting loose and the cocktails were getting stiff, Boehner informed the patio crowd he was turning in. It was 9:45.

But the next night was different. After the golf outing, and a reception in the clubhouse, Boehner hopped in his customized golf cart—a retirement gift from his congressional colleagues—and zipped across three moonlit fairways and into his driveway. I figured it was time to say goodnight. But Boehner invited me in for a nightcap. What followed, over bottomless glasses of wine, can only be described as Boehner unshackled. On several occasions, Debbie warned him to stop telling me things; when he ignored her, she would put a couch cushion over my recording device. The highlight was Boehner telling me a story about George W. Bush—and prefacing it by saying, "I shouldn't tell you this." Debbie, opening a bottle of red in the kitchen, barked: "Then don't!"

Boehner leans back in his favorite recliner, retrieving a glowing cigarette from its ashtray. "So I get a text from 43 about a month ago, maybe six weeks ago." Boehner's close friend Ed, who joined our nightcap, interjects: "Off the record?" Boehner waves him off: "It doesn't matter." He lets out a thick cough, smoke escaping his mouth, and continues. "So 43 says, 'Hey, are you talking to Ryan? Are you giving him advice?' I said, 'Yeah, if he calls I give him advice.'" Boehner takes a long, satisfied drag. "And he texts me back: 'He needs to call you more.'"

Boehner erupts into a long, uncontrollable cough-laugh. It is 10:40 p.m.

The anecdote underscores how Boehner and Bush are "two peas in the same pod," as the former speaker says, a pair of even-keeled gents who tried to ignore the stresses of their respective jobs and who enjoy commiserating now that they are both retired. (Boehner tells me that when Bush, while in office, refused to join Burning Tree—due to the optics of a president golfing someplace women aren't allowed—he told the commander in chief, "You're a pussy." Years later, when Bush became a member after leaving the White House, Boehner says he told Bush: "You're still a pussy.")

But the story also speaks to a concern for Boehner these days: the well-being of his successor. Ryan never wanted the job; it took Boehner more than a year to convince him, and there were drastic measures involved. When McCarthy abruptly decided he would not run for speaker, everyone knew Ryan was the only unifying choice. And Boehner knew which buttons to push: The speaker called Cardinal Timothy Dolan, archbishop of New York and president of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, asking him to pressure Ryan. Dolan obliged, phoning the congressman and piling on more of the "Catholic guilt" Boehner had employed.

It worked, of course. But it's clear Boehner feels a little guilt himself. Ryan now holds the thankless job he was desperate to escape, and finds himself buffeted by the same internal forces. "And then there's the White House," Boehner tells me, rolling his eyes. "Dysfunction is a relative term. Right now it looks like I was a genius."

Even before Trump was elected, Boehner was back in the Capitol one day and visited the speaker's office. Ryan, he says, looked at him wearily: "This job is a lot harder than I thought." When I ask Ryan about this, he confirms the story and laughs. "And I wanted to say, 'You ass, you stuck me with this sh—'" He stops himself. But it's been a tough day, and the speaker needs to vent. "Just getting people to agree on how to do things that are in their own interest is hard to do. Getting people to agree, getting to consensus, on things that are basic and axiomatic, is really hard to do," Ryan tells me. "You need more of a degree in psychology than you need in economics." (Ryan has, however, found comfort in torturing Boehner: The speaker inherited his predecessor's security detail, and whereas Boehner demanded they be freshly shaven every day, Ryan let them grow unruly beards—pictures of which are often texted to their former boss, code name "Tan Man.")

The Freedom Caucus has begun to squeeze Ryan, much as it did to Boehner—warning him that without changes his tenure could be similarly endangered. And Ryan, as Boehner did, is telling friends that he's losing patience with the job. When I tell Jordan about Boehner's description of him—"a legislative terrorist"—and ask about whether he's holding the speakership hostage, he flashes surprise and eventually irritation. "Oh, my goodness. I feel sorry for the guy if he's that bitter about a guy coming here and doing what he told the voters he was gonna do. Wow. I feel bad for him," Jordan says. "But in the end, we were not doing what the voters elected us to do and what we told them we were going to do. We just weren't. And I would argue the same thing is happening now."

Jordan's veiled threat only partially explains the frustration written all over Ryan's face when we meet: Earlier that day, after Ryan scoffed at a Democratic proposal to pass a short-term extension of the debt ceiling, Trump met with Pelosi and Democratic Senate leader Chuck Schumer and gave them exactly what they wanted. "Um, yeah, that one—yeah, that's kind of par for the course these days," Ryan tells me, his tie loosened and a sense of resignation in his voice. "This is a presidency that offers some surprises." Weeks later, when I ask Boehner about Trump's deal with the Democrats, he erupts into a cough-laugh. "My guess is that he thought he was doing everybody a favor. He had no idea he was cutting off McConnell and Ryan's legs."

Trump himself is less a source of apprehension for top Republicans than what he represents: a fracturing of the party and a corollary decline in its ability to govern. "We basically run a coalition government without the efficiency of a parliamentary system," Ryan complains.

When I ask Boehner whether the Republican Party can survive this, he cuts me off. "There is no Rep—" He stops himself. "You were about to say, 'There is no Republican Party,' I tell him. He shrugs. "There is. But what does it even mean? Donald Trump's not a Republican. He's not a Democrat. He's a populist. He doesn't have an ideological bone in his body." So who, I ask, is the leader of the party? "There is nobody," he says.

I ask Boehner what he thinks historians will make of his speakership. "They'll be talking about the end of the two-party system," he replies.

In our months of conversations, Trump was the lone subject about which Boehner seemed reluctant to speak freely. Timing was partly to blame: Weeks before I came to Ohio, Boehner in a paid speech had described Trump's presidency as "a complete disaster." It brought angry voicemails from then-chief of staff Reince Priebus, who carried stern words from Trump himself. "The White House isn't real happy with me right now," Boehner said at the time. His caution faded somewhat as summer wore on. When I saw him six weeks later at Burning Tree—fresh off a blockbuster report that Donald Trump Jr. had met with a Russian government official during the campaign in hopes of gaining compromising information on Hillary Clinton—Boehner greeted me in the parking lot with a knowing grin. Before I said anything, he shook his head and muttered, "What a shit show." But our most interesting exchange came in Green Bay, after a hearty meat-and-potato breakfast, when I raised the matter of this summer's march in Charlottesville, and Trump's equivocations. "I do not believe that he is a racist. I do not believe that he is a white supremacist," Boehner tells me. "He has clearly done some things to lead people who never liked him to say those things about him." So, I ask, how can Trump fix that? Boehner arches an eyebrow. "Is it fixable?"

Boehner worries about the deepening fissures in American society. But he sees Trump as more of a symptom than the cause of what is a longer arc of social and ideological alienation, fueled by talk radio and Fox News on the right and MSNBC and social media on the left. "People thought in '09, '10, '11, that the country couldn't be divided more. And you go back to Obama's campaign in 2008, you know, he was talking about the divide and healing the country and all of that. And some would argue on the right that he did more to divide the country than to unite it. I kind of reject that notion." Why is that? "Because it wasn't him!" Boehner replies. "It was modern-day media, and social media, that kept pushing people further right and further left. People started to figure out ... they could choose where to get their news. And so what do people do? They choose places they agree with, reinforcing the divide."

He continues: "I always liked Rush [Limbaugh]. When I went to Palm Beach I would always meet with Rush and we'd go play golf. But you know, who was that right-wing guy, [Mark] Levin? He went really crazy right and got a big audience, and he dragged [Sean] Hannity to the dark side. He dragged Rush to the dark side. And these guys—I used to talk to them all the time. And suddenly they're beating the living shit out of me." Boehner, seated in his favorite recliner, lights another cigarette. "I had a conversation with Hannity, probably about the beginning of 2015. I called him and said, 'Listen, you're nuts.' We had this really blunt conversation. Things were better for a few months, and then it got back to being the same-old, same-old. Because I wasn't going to be a right-wing idiot."

Boehner believes Americans are ill-informed because of their retreat into media echo chambers, one of two incurable causes of the country's polarization. Another is inextricably related: the unwillingness of lawmakers to collaborate across the aisle, for fear of recriminations from the base. Boehner says the fact he and Obama golfed together only once—and agreed that it was usually better for him to sneak into the White House—speaks to how the two parties punish compromise. He doesn't foresee this toxic political climate improving, ticking off potential fixes—term limits, redistricting reform—that he says won't make a bit of difference. "It's going to take an intervening event for Americans to realize that first, we are Americans," he says. An intervening event? "Something cataclysmic," he responds, gazing upward.

Boehner often felt more welcome among Democrats than he did within his own party. When he made his retirement announcement, he told me, Obama called him and said, "Boehner, you can't do this, man. I'm gonna miss you." Biden feels the same way. "The only way we're going to get this back together again," he says, "is with some more John Boehners."

The starkest divide in recent Washington has been between longtime pols like Boehner and Biden who yearn for a more amicable time, and newcomers who view the bitter acrimony of the Bush and Obama years as normal. The fever might have broken in 2016, Boehner says. But the parties chose the two most polarizing nominees in modern history. "The only Republican who Hillary Clinton possibly could have beaten was Donald Trump, and the only Democrat that Trump possibly could have beaten was Clinton," Boehner smirks. "Three hundred and thirty million Americans, and we got those two."

Boehner spent six hours getting photographed around the Capitol in September. He wore a salmon-colored tie for certain shots and a blue tie for others; the photographs will inspire his official portrait, which will probably be hung in the speaker's lobby in late 2018—around the three-year anniversary of his departure. The ceremony will give Boehner occasion to see his old friends, as well as the "assholes." It will also serve as an opportunity to consider his legacy.

As a young House member, Boehner was instrumental in cleaning up Congress. As a committee chairman, he wrote and ushered through one of the premier policies of the Bush administration—even if the results were not what he envisioned. And as speaker, Boehner accomplished more than conservatives will ever give him credit for: winning significant spending cuts under a Democratic president; protecting the overwhelming majority of Americans from a tax hike; keeping earmarks banned despite having every reason to bring them back; and his proudest accomplishment, finding a permanent "Doc Fix," which solved a nagging problem with the Medicare payment formula and could produce nearly $3 trillion in savings over the next three decades.

"He came to Congress wanting to burn it to the ground," says Sommers, his former chief of staff. "And by the time he left, he was the ultimate institutionalist."

Yet that assessment will be overshadowed by posterity's more existential observations: that Boehner's 25 years in Washington saw the dissolution of a party, the vandalizing of a government and the splintering of a nation. That Boehner watched as the GOP transformed from the party of George H.W. Bush into the party of Donald Trump. That Boehner funded and helped recruit a class of majority-makers who ended up driving him from office and destabilizing the Congress he cares deeply about. The triumph of John Boehner is that he achieved reform and ascended to the speakership and often rose above the uncompromising dogma of both parties; the tragedy is that he came to Congress an insurgent only to be swallowed by the insurgency, and that he wasted key opportunities, as with the shutdown and immigration battles of 2013, to lead in a way that might have quelled it. "At times," Sommers admits, "we fed the beast that ate us."

Boehner's own district is the ultimate case in point: His successor is Warren Davidson, who was endorsed by Jordan in the GOP primary and has since joined the Freedom Caucus. "He's one of these guys that's caught in two worlds," Boehner says. "They helped him get elected, he felt allegiance to them, he signed up with them. But I'm not sure he's really one of them."

I didn't see the famously weepy Boehner get emotional during our time together, with one exception. The night of the golf outing, Ed tells me that toward the very end of Boehner's speakership he called his friend to share a poem called "Builder or Wrecker." Debbie asks Ed to recite it. He obliges, and I glance over at Boehner. His face is contorted. By the end of the poem he is sobbing and unable to speak. "He's a builder," Ed whispers to me. "Not a wrecker."

"Have you found your purpose?" I ask him outside the breakfast joint in Green Bay. Boehner shakes his head. "It will become clear. But you can't force the big guy to give you an answer," he says. "Just do the right things for the right reasons, and good things will happen."

With that, we prepare to part ways. The two House speakers enjoyed an overtime thriller at Lambeau Field the day before. Now Ryan has flown back to Washington, where a circular firing squad awaits. As for Boehner, he's jumping in a rental car and pushing farther north in Wisconsin, where Mick, his former staffer, owns a massive wooded property. There, the two will do what retirees do best—sit around and tell stories about the old days. It would make for a more restful experience if Boehner weren't thinking, in the back of his mind, about his story being written—here and in the history books. It's no wonder he can't concentrate.

Boehner shakes my hand and smiles softly. "Be nice to me," he says.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

<input type="radio"/>
Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Mulvaney pinch hits during House budget crunch — Frelinghuysen lawyers up — OMB cheers CBO's Trump budget analysis
Date: Thursday, July 13, 2017 4:40:49 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes, Sarah Ferris and Luis Sanchez | 07/13/2017 04:35 PM EDT

HERE TO HELP: House Budget Chairman Diane Black is teaming up with the White House in an absolute last-ditch attempt to drag that budget resolution across the finish line. As Rachael Bade and Sarah report today, OMB Director Mick Mulvaney has already started calling up his former House GOP colleagues, urging them to get in line behind the long-delayed proposal.

Scratching backs: Budget leaders are leaning on Mulvaney to convince the Freedom Caucus holdouts to back the GOP budget plan. And the OMB chief is totally game, of course, because he needs that very same budget resolution to achieve tax reform. (And we're sure the fiscal hawk is plenty keen on those mandatory cuts, too). As OMB spokesman John Czwartacki told us by phone today: "The White House sees tremendous value on a 2018 budget resolution passing both chambers of Congress."

How'd we end up here? Mulvaney's enlistment comes after a morning meeting with Black, House Speaker Paul Ryan, Vice President Mike Pence and White House legislative liaison Marc Short. This is by far the most high-profile budget huddle this year — just nine legislative workdays before the House adjourns for recess. (Yes, Senate leaders were MIA. But on a frenzied day like today, we'll cut them some slack).

Conservatives dig in: Multiple Freedom Caucus members, including Reps. Dave Brat and Jim Jordan, made clear today that they remain hard "no"s on the budget. They're still seeking more clarity on the GOP's plans for tax reform and, possibly, more mandatory savings. "I don't think that is a radical position," Jordan said. Meanwhile, Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows is preparing to be wooed. "We're not there from a budget agreement standpoint. Are we willing to get there? Yes," Meadows told reporters today. "Are we willing to try to find a compromise? Yes."

GOOD THURSDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes), sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris) and lsanchez@politico.com.

Doc of the day — Written testimony of GAO's Cindy Brown Barnes on federally funded early learning and child care programs.

#DailyBudgetFact — Women now make up about 46.8 percent of all U.S. workers, spiking dramatically from 29.6 percent in 1950, according to Pew Research. But the share of women in the labor force may never exceed the 50 percent mark despite that decades-long growth. The Bureau of Labor Statistics projects that share will peak at 47.1 percent in 2025 before gradually decreasing again.

APPROPRIATIONS

ACTION-PACKED: By day's end, appropriators in both chambers will have held five markups, working from 10 a.m. until what's shaping up to be a late night. Can't keep it all straight? We've got you covered:

MILCON IS DONE! The Senate Appropriations Committee gave voice vote signoff this afternoon to the $88.9 billion MilCon-VA bill, as Greg Hellman reports. And since the House panel has already completed work on its version, that's a wrap. No word yet on a date for a floor vote in either chamber, though.

DRAGGING ON: After four hours of amendment debate, the 10 a.m. House markup for the Commerce, Justice and Science bill is still not over. Appropriators plan to return no earlier than 5 p.m. to polish off that one and the Financial Services measure. Sarah reports that things got pretty political during the first round of debate, with roll call votes on amendments aimed at revoking Jared Kushner's security clearance.

NEXT UP: Separate House subcommittees take up the State and Foreign Operations bill and the Labor-HHS and Education measure this afternoon.

WEDNESDAY RECAP: Two more House bills and the first (!) in the Senate coasted through subcommittee Wednesday afternoon. Catch up: EPA would see smallest budget in decade | DHS bill puts focus on immigration | Heftier MilCon-VA bill would fund 214 projects

The same afternoon, House appropriators released their final two bills — State and Foreign Operations and Labor-HHS and Education. All you need to read: Cuts to foreign aid, climate change efforts | DOL faces 11 percent cut | Modest cuts to CDC | Health IT cut by one-third | Education cuts less drastic than Trump | Trump's school choice proposals left bare

POLITICAL STRATEGY

FRELINGHUYSEN LAWYERS UP: House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen spent almost $32,000 this spring on legal counsel after a House ethics complaint accused him of targeting a bank employee who was active in a local progressive group, Maggie Severns reports. "It was a prudent move given the politically-motivated ethics complaints that came from the professional left," spokesperson Mike DuHaime says.

POTUS BUDGET

CBO — FOE NO MO: Forget the fact that CBO says the president's budget wouldn't actually balance over a decade. As we report for Pros, OMB says the new budget office analysis only underscores the fact that President Donald Trump's plan is the best ever. "We are thrilled that CBO confirms that the president's proposed budget resulted in the largest deficit reduction they have ever scored," OMB spokeswoman Meghan Burris said in a written statement following the release this morning of CBO's annual analysis. "CBO agrees that this is the largest deficit reduction package in American history."

Not publicly, at least: Perhaps remembering the way the administration dwelt on historical comparisons during #InaugurationGate, CBO staff has opted not to get involved in ranking Trump's budget against those of past presidents. On a call with reporters today, experts said they don't compare estimates on how each budget would affect deficit reduction. But they conceded that the budget office relied on the White House's own economic estimates because so many of Trump's policy proposals lack specifics.

Brianna Ehley sums up the health-focused estimates in the new analysis.

EPA

DISMISSING TRUMP'S REQUEST: Alex Guillén has nabbed an internal EPA memo showing that the House's fiscal 2018 Interior-EPA spending bill boosts funding for several programs the White House sought to cut, including the Superfund program and Brownfields projects. Alex has got those totals and more for Pros.

OBAMACARE

IT'S OUT: Senate Republicans dropped their latest replacement bill this afternoon and — surprise! — it does include that controversial amendment Sens. Ted Cruz and Mike Lee have proposed to allow skimpier health plans in the marketplace. The news, which was scooped by our Burgess Everett and Jen Haberkorn, came as a shock even to Lee, who tweeted just after their story broke that he hadn't even seen the language in the bill. (He can read the full text here.)

What else? The other big changes include keeping some Obamacare taxes on the wealthy, as Aaron Lorenzo reports, as well as boosting subsidies for the poor and devoting more money to fighting the opioid epidemic. Much more from Paul Demko.

Where it stands: The goal is still a vote next week, but opposition is hardening within the Senate's conservative and moderate flanks. On the same day Sen. Rand Paul ruled out supporting the bill, Sen. Susan Collins vowed to oppose a motion to proceed.

Pressure building: Trump warns he'll be 'very angry' if it flops | Conservative groups push Cruz-Lee plan | No easy path toward 'repair' | Centrists feel sidelined | Graham offers his own Plan B

HEALTH

AIDS CRUSADE: At least so far, appropriators are tossing aside Trump's proposals to slash funding for HIV/AIDS prevention and treatment in fiscal 2018. The Labor, HHS and Education bill House appropriators are marking up in subcommittee this afternoon keeps funding steady for each program charged with that work and would boost NIH overall. Still, AIDS activists — worried that the final dole will be reflective of the president's request — are in full fight mode now, trying to keep their concerns on lawmakers' radars, Renuka Rayasam reports.

Doesn't jibe: While the president pledged support for HIV and AIDS testing and treatment on National HIV Testing Day last month, his budget sends a very different message, proposing a $180 million cut to the CDC's HIV/AIDS and sexually transmitted infection prevention account, a $550 million reduction in NIH AIDS research and a $58.8 million cut from Ryan White, a federal program that provides medical care and support services for the uninsured living with HIV and AIDS.

DEFENSE

AUMF ALTERNATIVE: After a chat Wednesday with Ryan, Rep. Barbara Lee says she thinks House Republicans plan to strip her AUMF amendment from the fiscal 2018 defense spending bill and replace it with language that would ask the Defense Department to detail what it wants in a new war authorization, Austin Wright reports.

CASH, NOT CORPS: Air Force Secretary Heather Wilson tells POLITICO that her service needs more resources for space operations, not a new org chart. But the Air Force's top acquisition official for space said today he's "excited" by the congressional focus on space, regardless of the organizational shakeup. NDAA update: The Rules Committee didn't allow a floor vote on the amendment to nix Space Corps creation in the bill that's on the House floor today.

BETTER BACK BRAC: Heritage issued a "key vote" for NDAA, calling on House members to support an amendment on the floor today that would strip language barring a new round of base closures. But that amendment was defeated despite the conservative group's efforts, Connor O'Brien reports. The chamber also voted down Democratic amendments to cut defense spending and promote domestic budget increases.

CONGRESS

CAMPAIGN CASH FOR SECURITY: The Federal Election Commission gave blanket permission today for lawmakers to use campaign money to install or upgrade home security systems, Maggie Severns reports. Appropriators are still gung-ho about allowing lawmakers to use their office allowances to pay for extra security in light of the shooting last month at a Congressional Baseball Game practice.

TRANSPORTATION

REPATRIATION, REBORN: Sen. Ron Wyden says he thinks the idea of using repatriation revenues to pay for infrastructure is en vogue again, Tanya Snyder reports. "I think the idea has a pulse again," he told a crowd at the American Road and Transportation Builders Association conference today. "I think it's something that [the Trump administration is] willing to ruminate over."

ENERGY

CUTS TO AVOID CUTS: Rep. Mike Simpson says the Energy Department doesn't plan to issue any new commitments from its controversial loan program during the course of Trump's first term and that cutting funds and authorities for the program helped avoid cuts elsewhere in the fiscal 2018 Energy and Water spending bill, Anthony Adragna and Darius Dixon report.

CAMPAIGNS

MANCHIN RAISES $1.4M: As two of his GOP challengers face a brutal primary battle, Senate appropriator Joe Manchin is squirreling away cash for his 2018 reelection bid. Elana Schor reports that the West Virginia Democrat raised more than $1.4 million in the second quarter, up from the $553,000 he took in during the first quarter.

EARMARKS

— Yellen: 'Quite challenging' for U.S. to reach 3 percent growth in five years. POLITICO Pro.

— GOP House members seek to cut education budget — but not nearly as deeply as Trump proposed. The Washington Post.

— How wild horses of the West would die under Trump budget. USA Today.

— US budget deficit rose in June to $90.2 billion. Associated Press.

— Chao: Administration wants to explore long-term Highway Trust Fund fixes. POLITICO Pro.

ON TAP FRIDAY

10 a.m. — The House Ways and Means Committee holds a hearing on Social Security solvency. Rayburn House Office Building Room 2020.

WE'RE COUNTING: 80 days until federal funding runs out, the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal and the National Flood Insurance Program expires. 445 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018). [Who knows how many] days until the nation will default if the debt limit isn't raised.

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/07/mulvaney-pinch-hits-during-house-budget-crunch-023738>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

GOP leaders enlist Mulvaney to help with budget woes Back

By Rachael Bade and Sarah Ferris | 07/13/2017 02:15 PM EDT

House GOP leaders are enlisting a familiar face to help with their budget woes: President Donald Trump's budget director, Mick Mulvaney, a former Freedom Caucus member.

Mulvaney, the Office of Management and Budget director, committed to GOP leaders at a Thursday morning that he would help muster support to get the budget passed. Republican leadership and House Budget Chairwoman Diane Black are hoping he'll be particularly helpful in wooing his former colleagues and good friends on the Freedom Caucus, whose opposition has become one of the last major hurdles to passing the budget.

Freedom Caucus leaders, who have pushed hard to include mandatory cuts to welfare programs in the budget, have said they will not support the fiscal plan until they get the details of the House's tax reform proposal. Only, tax reform details are still far off, insiders say. And GOP leadership, not to mention Black, are eager to move on the budget.

An OMB official confirmed that Mulvaney would be "working the phones" as well as making in-person pitches.

"The White House wants to be helpful in any way it can," OMB spokesman John Czwartacki said by phone Thursday. "The White House sees tremendous value on a 2018 budget resolution passing both chambers of Congress."

The decision to enlist Mulvaney came amid a Thursday morning huddle between Speaker Paul Ryan, Vice President Mike Pence, Black (R-Tenn.) and White House legislative liaison Marc Short.

The meeting followed several calls between Mulvaney and Black this weekend.

Several GOP sources following the budget process closely said they think Mulvaney's pitch will work, allowing Black to move the bill through committee as soon as next week. Two members of the committee, Reps. Mark Sanford of South Carolina and Mario Diaz-Balart of Florida, told POLITICO on Wednesday that they were told to expect a Budget Committee markup next week.

Mulvaney's first task will be helping Black move the bill through the panel, where some conservatives like Rep. Dave Brat and Gary Palmer, both Freedom Caucus members, have not said they will back the budget.

Republicans cannot move a tax reform package without passing the fiscal blueprint, and Black has already taken on GOP leadership as well as other Republican committee chairs to try to include in the budget entitlement cuts to win over far right lawmakers. Many moderates have balked at the proposal, with as many as 20 centrist Republicans in the Tuesday Group threatening to vote against such a plan — almost enough to block it.

Still, some Freedom Caucus members say those cuts are not enough. Vice chairman Jim Jordan (R-Ohio) suggested during a news conference Wednesday that $200 billion in mandatory cuts was, essentially, a rounding error compared to the nation's larger spending issues.

Meadows also said the group would need to see the details of the tax plan.

"Without decisions on tax reform, there will not be enough votes to pass it in the House because of the conservative concerns," Meadows said.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate Appropriations Committee approves Milcon-VA bill Back

By Gregory Hellman | 07/13/2017 01:34 PM EDT

The Senate Appropriations Committee approved by voice vote today the fiscal 2018 Military Construction, Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies Appropriations bill, including $88.9 billion in discretionary funding.

The committee adopted several amendments to the bill, including one offered by Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Sen. Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.) that would allow veterans to participate in state-approved medical marijuana programs.

The committee also approved a provision that would increase funding for medical and prosthetic research at the Veterans Affairs Department by $17 million and another that would create a two-year pilot program to provide grants to nonprofit veterans service organizations to complete facility upgrades.

A summary of the bill is available here.

To view online click here.

Back

Republicans defeat amendments targeting Kushner security access Back

By Sarah Ferris | 07/13/2017 03:12 PM EDT

Republican appropriators today unanimously blocked Democratic attempts to revoke the security clearance of embattled White House adviser Jared Kushner.

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz said she was targeting Kushner's top-secret access in the wake of his meeting with a well-connected Russian lawyer last year.

"If Jared Kushner can't be counted on to come clean about his meetings ... then he can't be trusted to be in possession of our nation's most trusted information," Wasserman Schultz said during a markup of the fiscal 2018 Commerce, Justice and Science spending bill. "This is someone who deserves to have his security clearance revoked."

In a 30 to 22 vote, the House Appropriations Committee defeated the first amendment, which would cut off clearance for White House staffers who are under investigation for "aiding a foreign government."

With the same tally, the panel defeated another amendment that would have removed top-secret access for anyone who "deliberately fails" to disclose meetings with foreign nationals when applying for a security clearance.

"I would think that every single one of us would want to make sure that the individuals who are the closest advisers to the president of the United States do not have access to this information when they are under investigation," Wasserman Schultz said.

Texas Republican Rep. John Culberson, who oversees the appropriations bill, dismissed the attempt as a "political stunt."

To view online click here.

Back

House panel advances Interior, EPA spending bill Back

By Esther Whieldon | 07/12/2017 03:55 PM EDT

A House Appropriations subcommittee today advanced a bill that would shrink the EPA's fiscal 2018 funding to the lowest level the agency has seen in a decade and cut the Interior Department's spending by 7 percent.

With a voice vote, the Interior, Environment, and Related Agencies Subcommittee approved the bill without making any amendments. The bill would cut EPA's budget by $528 million to $7.5 billion and fund Interior at $11.9 billion.

The subcommittee's top Democrat, Rep. Betty McCollum of Minnesota, said the cuts to the EPA are "too deep and unnecessary." And she bemoaned that the measure includes a number of riders, including ones that would block the EPA from finishing a court-mandated rule on hardrock mining, protect the agency's move to withdraw the Waters of the U.S. regulation from legal challenges and delay implementation of the 2015 ozone standard until 2025.

The language also includes some riders involving the Endangered Species Act that would block the Interior Department from listing the sage grouse under the law or spending money on the grey wolf, which is listed as endangered or threatened in a number of other states. Interior in May complied with a court order to delist the grey wolf in Wyoming.

Chairman Ken Calvert said the bill "continues to invest in water infrastructure and cleaning up contaminated land. These programs help create jobs and spur economic development in communities all across the nation."

WHAT'S NEXT: The bill now advances to a full committee vote, which has yet to be announced.

To view online click here.

Back

House subcommittee approves DHS spending bill that would cut TSA funding Back

By Stephanie Beasley | 07/12/2017 05:43 PM EDT

The House Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee approved a DHS spending bill today via voice vote, despite Democrats' misgivings about immigration-related provisions in the bill and a decrease in TSA funding.

David Price was the only member to oppose the bill, although other Democrats, including full committee ranking member Nita Lowey, voiced concerns about including funding for President Donald Trump's immigration crackdown. Subcommittee ranking member Lucille Roybal-Allard said she could not fully back the bill so long as measures supporting Trump's "malignant rhetoric" on immigration remained. She urged appropriators to instead put more funding toward hiring Customs officers, maintaining TSA's reimbursement program for airports that hire local law enforcement and VIPR teams, she said.

The bill approved by the subcommittee would bump DHS funding to $51.1 billion, a 4 percent increase over this year's budget, to help the agency build a U.S.-Mexico border wall and hire more immigration officers, among other items. However, the $7.2 billion budget for TSA is about $160 million below what the agency received for fiscal 2017.

Members are expected to offer amendments at the full committee markup of the bill.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate Appropriations panel approves military construction, VA bill Back

By Gregory Hellman | 07/12/2017 03:27 PM EDT

The Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction, Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies today approved $88.9 billion by voice vote for fiscal 2018.

The bill includes $9.5 billion to fund 214 military construction projects — $1.8 billion more than the fiscal 2017 level but $246 million less than the Trump administration's budget request.

Within the military construction portion of the measure is $307 million to fund projects that are part of the European Reassurance Initiative and an additional $154 million to support NATO's response to Russia in the Middle East and North Africa.

The bill would also appropriate $1.4 billion for military family housing, $575 million to support construction for the National Guard and reserve forces and $331 million for projects supporting overseas contingency operations in the Middle East.

The bill also includes $78.4 billion for the Veterans Affairs Department — a record amount, according to the committee, and $4 billion more than the fiscal 2017 level. Additionally, the bill would provide $70.7 billion in advance funding for veterans health care in fiscal 2019.

The full Senate Appropriations Committee is scheduled to mark up the bill Thursday morning.

To view online click here.

Back

Appropriators propose deep cuts to State Department Back

By Sarah Ferris | 07/12/2017 04:32 PM EDT

The House Appropriations Committee seeks to dramatically slash funding for State Department programs ranging from the U.S. Agency for International Development to climate change in its newly released fiscal 2018 spending bill.

The State and Foreign Operations measure, released this afternoon, would set total spending at $47.4 billion for the upcoming fiscal year, cutting about $10 billion from current levels.

That total matches with the proposed spending level POLITICO reported on Tuesday.

The majority of the cuts would come from "reductions to nonessential or lower-priority international programs," according to the committee.

The bill would slice payments to the United Nations and shrink funding for international anti-poverty programs like USAID. It would also eliminate funding for programs long disputed by GOP lawmakers, including the Green Climate Fund, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change and the U.N. Population Fund.

House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen said in a statement that it is "more important than ever" for the U.S. to invest in global security. He also touted the bill for spending money only where it is most needed to "ensure U.S. dollars are being put to good use to expand democracy and peace, and provide critical humanitarian assistance in war-torn, disaster-affected and impoverished areas or the world."

The proposed spending cuts do not go as far as the Trump administration's proposed budget, which called for capping State Department spending at $37.6 billion. That same fiscal outline also called for drastic reductions to global diplomacy and aid programs, while cutting off funds for climate change research.

To view online click here.

Back

House Appropriations Committee proposes 11 percent cut to DOL Back

By Ian Kullgren | 07/12/2017 06:36 PM EDT

The House Appropriations Committee on Wednesday introduced a spending bill that would cut the Labor Department budget by 11 percent, with the biggest reductions to employment training.

Under the bill, the Employment Training Administration would be slashed by 15 percent, or $1.5 billion. The Mine Safety and Health Administration would get a 4 percent cut, which according to appropriators would track the continuing decline in coal mining jobs. Jobs Corps programs would see a slight cut of less than 1 percent, and veterans training would get an increase of 2 percent.

The proposed cuts are a far cry from the 21 percent reduction in President Donald Trump's budget, but still represent a sharp decline in funding compared to other agencies. The Education Department, by comparison, would get a 3.5 percent, while the Health and Human Services Department would get cut by just 1 percent.

"This bill reflects Republican priorities to cut spending and focus investments in programs our people need the most — public health and medical research, biodefense, fundamental education, and proven programs that increase job growth, for example," House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) said in a statement. "It also includes important provisions to stop government overreach."

The bill includes a rider preventing enforcement of the fiduciary rule, which requires financial brokers to act solely in clients' best interests, irrespective of commissions and fees, when giving retirement investment advice. Part of the rule took effect in June, and part is set to take effect in January, though the Trump DOL is weighing whether to delay that portion.

Two other riders aim to make it easier for seafood companies to employ seasonal H-2B workers and continue an overtime exemption for insurance claim adjusters if they're working in disaster-stricken areas.

The House Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee today approved a spending bill that would boost funding for the Homeland Security Department by 4 percent.

The legislation includes $1.6 billion to allow the Trump administration to build wall and fencing on the southern border.

The subcommittee's ranking member, Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.), did not support the measure because of its intense focus on interior immigration enforcement.

"The trauma that is being inflicted on entire communities throughout our country cannot be overstated," she said.

Ted Hesson contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

House appropriators propose modest cuts to CDC Back

By Brianna Ehley | 07/12/2017 05:38 PM EDT

House appropriators are proposing $7 billion in funding for the CDC next year, a modest decrease from last year, but far more than floated in President Donald Trump's budget blueprint.

The House Appropriations Committee's proposal — $1 billion above the president's request — is a stark rebuke to the White House's massive 17 percent proposed cut to the agency.

House Appropriations' Labor-HHS subcommittee Chairman Tom Cole (R-Okla.) has been widely critical of Trump's proposed cuts to public health. At a hearing earlier this year, he said, "I always say the CDC is every bit as important in defending the lives of Americans as the Pentagon is, in some ways more."

Still, the proposal represents $198 million below last year's funding levels.

Appropriators maintain the ACA's Prevention and Public Health Fund. However, both the Senate and House Obamacare repeal bills zero out the fund, so it is unclear whether that money will be available to the agency next year. The fund makes up roughly 12 percent of the CDC's total budget.

The bill also includes the longstanding ban on the use of federal dollars to advocate for gun research.

To view online click here.

Back

House bill to cut ONC budget by 35 percent Back

By David Pittman | 07/12/2017 05:08 PM EDT

The HHS spending bill released by the House this afternoon cuts ONC's budget to $39 million, a reduction of 35 percent, and slices AHRQ's funding by $24 million while maintaining it as a standalone agency.

The House Appropriations spending level for ONC is in line with the Trump administration's request in May. The White House also sought to dissolve AHRQ — which gets $300 million in the House budget — and give its work to the NIH.

Health IT groups had decried the White House budget proposal, noting that the cuts would come as ONC's plate is piled high with tasks required under the 21st Century Cures Act.

CHIME said at the time it would be "extremely difficult, if not impossible" for ONC to continue efforts on interoperability, standards and certification with $38 million.

At a time when the bipartisan Cures and the Precision Medicine Initiative require intensive health IT work, said Tom Payne, chair of the board of the American Medical Informatics Association, the budget "stops progress in its tracks."

The budget justification for ONC said it would streamline the agency's work, focusing on interoperability and other essential topics. It would largely cut workforce devoted to EHR adoption, privacy, care transformation, consumer activity and clinical quality, as well as the office that works on the Federal Health IT Strategic Plan.

HHS's Office for Civil Rights would receive roughly $39 million under the House spending bill.

The subcommittee that oversees the HHS is scheduled to mark up the bill Thursday afternoon.

To view online click here.

Back

House appropriators release 2018 education funding bill Back

By Michael Stratford | 07/12/2017 04:32 PM EDT

Republican House appropriators today released their bill to fund the Education Department for fiscal 2018.

The bill seeks an overall $2.4 billion cut to education funding. That's a less drastic reduction compared with the $9.2 billion that President Donald Trump had proposed axing from the department in his budget earlier this year.

The subcommittee will mark up the bill Thursday at 4:30 p.m. in 2358-C of the Rayburn House Office Building.

Read the bill text here.

To view online click here.

Back

House GOP appropriators balk at DeVos 'school choice' proposals Back

By Michael Stratford | 07/12/2017 08:02 PM EDT

Republican House appropriators largely disregarded Education Secretary Betsy DeVos' proposal to spend about $1.4 billion on "school choice" policies in the fiscal 2018 education funding bill released Wednesday.

The spending bill, which will be marked up Thursday, does not fund the bulk of the three main school choice priorities outlined in the Trump administration's budget request.

Trump and DeVos had proposed directing $1 billion in Title I money for poor students to a new grant program for school districts that would allow students to attend the public school of their choice. House appropriators didn't bite on that plan. The GOP bill calls for keeping funding for Title I at $15.9 billion, which is roughly the same as its funding for the current year.

In addition, the bill does not include the $250 million that the Trump administration proposed for expanding and studying school vouchers that would allow low-income students to select the private school of their choice.

The Republican bill would provide a $28 million boost to funding for charter schools, bringing total funding for the Charter Schools Program grants to $370 million. But that falls short of the $500 million that Trump requested for the program, which would have amounted to a nearly 50-percent increase in funding.

The administration pitched the school choice proposals as a first step toward making good on the $20 billion school choice plan that Trump promised during his campaign. Trump has called on Congress to pass legislation expanding school choice options, calling it a civil rights issue.

Outside of the appropriations process, the Trump administration has been eyeing a federal tax credit scholarship proposal as a way to advance its school choice agenda. It's unclear if such a proposal will be folded into a broader tax overhaul at some point.

The plan could funnel billions of dollars to working class families to help pay for private school tuition. A number of school choice advocacy groups are pushing for it, but it could face some resistance from lawmakers who aren't looking to over-complicate the tax code.

Caitlin Emma contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Frelinghuysen spent $32K on lawyers after letter to bank Back

By Maggie Severns | 07/13/2017 12:51 PM EDT

Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen's (R-N.J.) campaign spent close to $32,000 this spring on legal counsel after a House ethics complaint accused him of targeting a bank employee who was active in a local progressive group.

Frelinghuysen paid the law firm Wiley Rein $27,120 in May and June, according to the report, and paid the New Jersey law firm Herold Law an additional $4,867. He had not paid law firms for legal counsel in other recent campaign finance disclosures, and spokesperson Mike DuHaime confirmed in an email that Frelinghuysen had hired the counsel after the ethics complaint was filed.

"It was a prudent move given the politically-motivated ethics complaints that came from the professional left," DuHaime said.

Frelinghuysen, who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, was under fire in mid-May after he sent a fundraising letter to a board member at local Lakeland Bank in which he appeared to target a local activist named Saily Avelenda, who helps lead a group called NJ 11th for Change.

At the bottom of the letter, Frelinghuysen warned organizers were trying to further an "agenda of limited government, economic growth, stronger national security" and added, "P.S. One of the ringleaders works in your bank!" The Campaign for Accountability filed a complaint asking House investigators to look into whether Frelinghuysen had violated ethics rules when he singled out the bank employee.

To view online click here.

Back

White House celebrates CBO's assessment of Trump's budget Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 07/13/2017 12:30 PM EDT

The Trump administration is raving about the CBO's prediction that the president's budget would shrink the federal deficit by about one-third of projected levels over the next decade.

"We are thrilled that CBO confirms that the president's proposed budget resulted in the largest deficit reduction they have ever scored," OMB spokeswoman Meghan Burris said in a written statement following the release this morning of CBO's annual analysis. "CBO agrees that this is the largest deficit reduction package in American history."

CBO staff subsequently told reporters that the budget office does not track how each president's plan ranks compared to others on predicted deficit reduction, and they conceded that the budget office relied on the White House's own economic estimates because so many of President Donald Trump's policy proposals lack specifics.

The budget experts said they relied on the administration's own projections, for example, in calculating the budget effects of plans like Obamacare repeal, tax reform, infrastructure investment and Postal Service overhaul "because the agencies judged those estimates to be achievable targets." But they assumed no costs or savings for proposals that were less detailed.

In their analysis, CBO and the Joint Committee on Taxation predict deficits would shrink relative to the size of the economy through fiscal 2027, ranging from between 2.6 percent and 3.3 percent of GDP over that time. Their analysis does not jibe, however, with the Trump administration's claim that the budget would achieve balance over a decade.

To view online click here.

Back

Interior Dept. ordered to close Twitter accounts after inauguration tweets Back

By Louis Nelson and Cristiano Lima | 01/20/2017 04:47 PM EDT

Interior Department officials have been ordered to shut down the organization's official Twitter accounts indefinitely after the National Park Service shared tweets comparing attendance at President Donald Trump's inauguration against former President Barack Obama's.

"All bureaus and the department have been directed by incoming administration to shut down Twitter platforms immediately until further notice," said an email obtained by the Washington Post circulated to Park Service employees Friday.

Earlier Friday the verified Twitter account for the National Park Service retweeted a post from New York Times reporter Binyamin Applebaum showing side by side images of the crowds at Trump's inauguration and at President Barack Obama's record-setting 2009 swearing-in. Obama's, on the left, shows a jam-packed National Mall while Trump's, on the right, is more sparsely populated.

The photos were seen as stark evidence that Trump's prediction of an "unbelievable, perhaps record-setting turnout" did not come to fruition.

The organization also retweeted another user commenting that the whitehouse.gov website had been "scrubbed clean" of pages discussing civil rights, climate change and health care.

Interior Department officials were then given an "urgent directive" to close their official accounts "until further directed." An investigation into whether the tweets were intentional, accidental or part of a hack, is underway, according to the report.

The directive encompasses the department's numerous bureaus and offices, effectively shutting down dozens of official government accounts.

The retweet was particularly jarring given that the NPS stopped providing official crowd estimates for events on the Mall, including inaugurations, after a dispute over counts at the Million Man March in 1995 prompted a lawsuit threat.

To view online click here.

Back

CBO: Trump budget reduces mandatory federal health spending by $1.9T Back

By Brianna Ehley | 07/13/2017 11:54 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's budget proposal would reduce mandatory federal spending on health care by $1.9 trillion, or 13 percent, over the next decade, according to a new analysis by the nonpartisan CBO.

The report, released today, projects the bulk of the savings — about $1.25 trillion — would come from repealing the Affordable Care Act. The CBO estimates another $610 billion would come from proposed changes to Medicaid.

Trump's $4.1 trillion budget for 2018, released in May, proposed reducing federal Medicaid spending by $800 billion over the next decade.

CBO said that the administration's proposal "did not specify the policies that would achieve those savings" so the budget scoring agency interpreted the White House's estimate as "indicating a target for the budgetary effects of the detailed policies that might be proposed in the future."

The Senate's Obamacare repeal bill, released last month, would reduce federal Medicaid spending by $722 billion over the next decade, according to a CBO analysis. An updated version of that bill is expected to be released today and be scored by the CBO.

To view online click here.

Back

EPA memo details more spending changes in House bill Back

By Alex Guillén | 07/13/2017 12:53 PM EDT

The House's 2018 Interior-EPA spending package boosts funds for several programs with bipartisan support that the White House had sought to cut, according to an internal EPA memo obtained by POLITICO.

The Superfund program would get a $28.6 million boost, up to $1.09 billion, and Brownfields projects would get an extra $10 million, up to $90 million for 2018, according to the memo, from EPA's acting chief financial officer, David Bloom. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has said he will prioritize those cleanup programs, although the administration's budget request sought to cut the Superfund budget by about a third.

House Republicans also would give an extra $15 million for the diesel emissions reduction grant program, which would receive $75 million in 2018, according to the memo.

For other programs, the House bill proposes cuts to programs that Trump sought to keep fully funded, such as the Clean Water State Revolving Fund. The House bill would cut $250 million from the clean water SRF, dropping it to $1.14 billion. The other SRF, for drinking water, would see its funding stable at $863 million.

The bill would leave untouched a slate of categorical grants that help states pay for implementing and enforcing environmental laws and for environmental projects, according to the memo.

At least two programs targeted by Trump are still in line for belt-tightening: a Mexican border initiative that would be zeroed out and a $10 million cut for a program to pay for water and wastewater infrastructure in Alaska Native villages.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House Appropriations Committee will mark up the bill on July 18.

Annie Snider contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Senate Republicans one vote away from Obamacare repeal failure Back

By Burgess Everett, Jennifer Haberkorn and Sarah Karlin-Smith | 07/13/2017 08:59 AM EDT

The Senate Republican effort to repeal Obamacare is on the cusp of defeat, with two Republican senators threatening to kill the measure before the Senate can even start debate.

GOP leaders released a modified draft of their legislation to repeal and replace Obamacare Thursday, hoping to win senators' support with additional funding for combating opioids and a controversial measure that would allow insurance companies to sell plans that don't comply with Obamacare consumer protections.

But the plan immediately ran into near-fatal opposition.

Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) said they would vote against allowing debate to even start. Several other Republicans — including Sens. Jeff Flake, Rob Portman, Mike Lee and John Hoeven — said they were undecided.

"I'm not there yet" on supporting bill or the motion to proceed, said Portman, who opposed a previous version of the bill. "My position remains the same. ... There's been some progress made on opioids, an issue that I have focused on a lot. Another $45 billion. But we still have concerns about Medicaid expansion."

"I'm still digesting it," Flake told reporters. "I'll be doing that for a while."

If just three Republicans oppose the procedural motion planned for next week, the seven-year effort to repeal Obamacare would end before the Senate can even formally start debate in a stunning embarrassment for the GOP.

"We gotta get on the bill. ... If we don't at least get on the bill, we're never going to know," said Sen. John Thune of South Dakota. "I think it's probably going to be whipped over the next few days."

Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee said Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell will take up a motion to proceed to the bill next Tuesday, adding, "This isn't a vote on the merits of the bill. This is a vote on whether to even to talk about it."

McConnell also promised action: "We will be voting next week," he told reporters.

Portman, as well as Sens. Dean Heller, Lisa Murkowski and Shelley Moore Capito — all of whom have raised issues with prior drafts of the bill — huddled with McConnell Thursday afternoon to try to bring the bill back from the brink.

McConnell unveiled the plan on Thursday morning at a closed-door, GOP members-only meeting before posting the text online. Unlike their previous bill, which faced stiff resistance across the conference, it would maintain some Obamacare taxes on the wealthy, provide new financial support to help low-income people purchase health insurance and allow people to pay for insurance with pre-tax money.

The amendment to allow insurers to sell noncompliant plans, which is backed by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), could be altered or removed later, sources said. The amendment would allow the sale of cheap, deregulated insurance plans as long as Obamacare-compliant plans are still sold.

It is not yet clear whether the inclusion of Cruz's proposal will be enough for conservatives. Lee has previously advocated for the amendment with Cruz, but Cruz has been handling the lion's share of negotiating with McConnell. Lee is not yet supportive of the latest version because he's unaware of its content, a spokesman for Lee said.

Cruz said if his language stays, he will support the bill. He said if it is removed it will do "substantial damage" to bill's support.

Flake threw his support behind the Cruz amendment on the show, but declined to say whether that is enough to get him to vote yes.

Both Cruz and Lee had threatened to vote against starting on the bill if it didn't have the amendment; more than a half-dozen other Republican senators have stated they don't support the bill. Any three senators' opposition would end the GOP's Obamacare repeal effort on a procedural motion planned for next week, but McConnell is encouraging senators to open debate on the bill and amend it later.

Republicans saw Thursday's meeting as an airing of all the GOP's grievances about the latest draft and to help determine whether the party can move forward. McConnell pulled an earlier version of the bill last month amid stiff resistance from conservative and moderate Republicans.

Senators are already angling for more changes. An amendment from Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) would direct much of Obamacare's federal funding directly to the states that could offer a starting point for Congress if the Senate GOP's partisan effort fails next week, according to a summary of the bill obtained by POLITICO.

Some Republicans worry that the Cruz proposal could result in split risk pools, one with sick people with pre-existing conditions and the other with healthy young people. Centrists are worried the proposal would undermine protections for people with pre-existing conditions. Cruz and Lee dispute that and will argue it will likely lower premiums and allow people to opt out of Obamacare.

Several senators said it was their understanding that Cruz's latest draft would combine those risk pools, though Republicans said the details of how it would work are murky.

The Cruz amendment would deliver insurance companies subsidies for high-risk Americans with pre-existing conditions under Obamacare's regulations. If insurance companies offer those plans, they could sell cheap plans that are not subject to those regulations.

Some Republican senators now believe it will be a victory to even open debate on the legislation passed by the House, one senator familiar with the negotiations said.

"I don't even know that it's going to get to a vote," said GOP Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

If that procedural vote is successful, a freewheeling amendment process will begin. At some point, McConnell will introduce a substitute that will represent the Senate's draft bill. It may be different than what is introduced on Thursday and could be subject to amendment on the Senate floor next week. The bill, in other words, will be a work in progress until the final vote.

The Congressional Budget Office is analyzing two versions of the bill, one with the Cruz amendment and one without. The Cruz amendment is in brackets in the bill, indicating it is subject to change.

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas declined to say when the CBO score of the Cruz amendment would be released. The analysis for the rest of the draft is expected Monday.

In addition to Cruz and Lee, Paul has cited huge problems with the bill. Paul, who argues the bill keeps too much of Obamacare, has said including the Cruz proposal would not be enough to get his support.

At the other end of the GOP conference, several moderates, including Collins and Murkowski, are worried that the bill would hurt people with pre-existing conditions and others who got coverage under Obamacare. A number of Republicans are uncomfortable with spending reductions to Medicaid, which covers more than 70 million Americans, including families from low-income households, people with disabilities and seniors.

Cornyn, who is responsible for gathering the votes for the bill, said there is no other plan that can get 50 votes.

"If you vote 'no' on this bill, it essentially is a vote for Obamacare because that's what we're going to be left with," Cornyn said on Fox News Thursday morning. "If Sen. Paul can show me 49 other votes for his bill, then I would be all for it. But, unfortunately, the practicality is we have to pass a bill."

The proposal will also give states new flexibility on their Medicaid funding if a public health emergency — such as a Zika outbreak — takes place. The block grant option would also allow states to add the newly eligible Medicaid population to coverage under the block grant.

The bill also includes $70 billion more than the first draft of the bill's $112 billion for state-based health care initiatives to drive down premiums. It will include $45 billion for fighting drug addiction and would ease the sale of low-premium "catastrophic" insurance plans.

John Bresnahan contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Full text: New Senate GOP health care bill Back

06/22/2017 11:10 AM EDT | Updated 06/22/2017 12:19 PM EDT

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.
AMENDMENT NO.IIIII Calendar No.III
Purpose: In the nature of a substitute.
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES—115th Cong., 1st Sess.
H. R. 1628

To provide for reconciliation pursuant to title II of the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 2017.

Referred to the Committee on IIIIIIIII and ordered to be printed

Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE intended to be proposed by IIIIIII

Viz:

1 Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the fol-
2 lowing:

3 SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

4 This Act may be cited as the "Better Care Reconcili-
5 ation Act of 2017".

6 TITLE I

7 SEC. 101. ELIMINATION OF LIMITATION ON RECAPTURE OF 8 EXCESS ADVANCE PAYMENTS OF PREMIUM
9 TAX CREDITS.

10 Subparagraph (B) of section 36B(f)(2) of the Inter-
11 nal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by adding at the 12 end the following new clause:

2

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(iii) NONAPPLICABILITY OF LIMITA-
2 TION.—This subparagraph shall not apply
3 to taxable years ending after December 31,
4 2017."

5 SEC. 102. RESTRICTIONS FOR THE PREMIUM TAX CREDIT.

6 (a) ELIGIBILITY FOR CREDIT.—

7 (1) IN GENERAL.—Section 36B(c)(1) of the In-
8 ternal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended—

9 (A) by striking "equals or exceeds 100 per-10 cent but does not exceed 400 percent" in sub-11 paragraph (A) and inserting "does not exceed 12 350 percent", and

13 (B) by striking subparagraph (B) and re-
14 designating subparagraphs (C) and (D) as sub-
15 paragraphs (B) and (C), respectively.

16 (2) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN ALIENS.—

17 (A) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (2) of sec-
18 tion 36B(e) of the Internal Revenue Code of 19 1986 is amended by striking "an alien lawfully
20 present in the United States" and inserting "a 21 qualified alien (within the meaning of section
22 431 of the Personal Responsibility and Work
23 Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996)".

24 (B) AMENDMENTS TO PATIENT PROTEC-
25 TION AND AFFORDABLE CARE ACT.—

3

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (i) Section 1411(a)(1) of the Patient
2 Protection and Affordable Care Act is
3 amended by striking "or an alien lawfully
4 present in the United States" and insert-
5 ing "or a qualified alien (within the mean-
6 ing of section 431 of the Personal Respon-
7 sibility and Work Opportunity Reconcili-
8 ation Act of 1996)".

9 (ii) Section 1411(c)(2)(B) of such Act
10 is amended by striking "an alien lawfully
11 present in the United States" each place it
12 appears in clauses (i)(I) and (ii)(II) and 13 inserting "a qualified alien (within the 14 meaning of section 431 of the Personal Re-
15 sponsibility and Work Opportunity Rec-
16 onciliation Act of 1996)".

17 (iii) Section 1412(d) of such Act is 18 amended—

19 (I) by striking "not lawfully
20 present in the United States" and in-21 serting "not citizens or nationals of 22 the United States or qualified aliens
23 (within the meaning of section 431 of 24 the Personal Responsibility and Work
4

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.
1 Opportunity Reconciliation Act of

2 1996)", and

3 (II) by striking "INDIVIDUALS

4 NOT LAWFULLY PRESENT" in the 5 heading and inserting "CERTAIN
6 ALIENS".
7 (b) MODIFICATION OF LIMITATION ON PREMIUM AS-8 SISTANCE AMOUNT.—
9 (1) USE OF BENCHMARK PLAN.—Section
10 36B(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is 11 amended—
12 (A) by striking "applicable second lowest
13 cost silver plan" each place it appears in para-
14 graph (2)(B)(i) and (3)(C) and inserting "ap-
15 plicable median cost benchmark plan",
16 (B) by striking "such silver plan" in para-
17 graph (3)(C) and inserting "such benchmark 18 plan", and
19 (C) in paragraph (3)(B)—
20 (i) by redesignating clauses (i) and
21 (ii) as clauses (iii) and (iv), respectively,
22 and by striking all that precedes clause
23 (iii) (as so redesignated) and inserting the 24 following:

5
ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.
1 "(B) APPLICABLE MEDIAN COST BENCH-
2 MARK PLAN.—The applicable median cost
3 benchmark plan with respect to any applicable
4 taxpayer is the qualified health plan offered in 5 the individual market in the rating area in 6 which the taxpayer resides which—
7 "(i) provides a level of coverage that
8 is designed to provide benefits that are ac-
9 tuarially equivalent to 58 percent of the 10 full actuarial value of the benefits (as de-11 termined under rules similar to the rules of 12 paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 1302(d)
13 of the Patient Protection and Affordable
14 Care Act) provided under the plan,
15 "(ii) has a premium which is the me-
16 dian premium of all qualified health plans
17 described in clause (i) which are offered in 18 the individual market in such rating area
19 (or, in any case in which no such plan has 20 such median premium, has a premium
21 nearest (but not in excess of) such median 22 premium)", and
23 (ii) by striking "clause (ii)(I)" in the 24 flush text at the end and inserting "clause
25 (iv)(I)".

6
ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (2) MODIFICATION OF APPLICABLE PERCENT-
2 AGE.—Section 36B(b)(3)(A) of the Internal Revenue
3 Code of 1986 is amended—

4 (A) in clause (i), by striking "from the ini-
5 tial premium percentage" and all that follows
6 and inserting "from the initial percentage to 7 the final percentage specified in such table for 8 such income tier with respect to a taxpayer of 9 the age involved:

"In the case of household income (expressed as a percent of the poverty line) within the following income
tier:

Up to Age 29 Age 30-39 Age 40-49 Age 50-59 Over Age 59

10 (B) by striking "0.504" in clause (ii)(III)

11 and inserting "0.4", and

12 (C) by adding at the end the following new 13 clause:

14 "(iii) AGE DETERMINATIONS.—For 15 purposes of clause (i), the age of the tax-
16 payer taken into account under clause (i)
17 with respect to any taxable year is the age
18 attained before the close of the taxable
19 year by the oldest individual taken into ac-
7

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 count on such taxpayer's return who is
2 covered by a qualified health plan taken
3 into account under paragraph (2)(A)."

4 (c) ELIMINATION OF ELIGIBILITY EXCEPTIONS FOR 5 EMPLOYER-SPONSORED COVERAGE.—

6 (1) IN GENERAL.—Section 36B(c)(2) of the In-
7 ternal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by striking
8 subparagraph (C).

9 (2) AMENDMENTS RELATED TO QUALIFIED
10 SMALL EMPLOYER HEALTH REIMBURSEMENT AR-11 RANGEMENTS.—Section 36B(c)(4) of such Code is 12 amended—

13 (A) by striking "which constitutes afford-
14 able coverage" in subparagraph (A),
15 (B) by striking "the amount described in 16 subparagraph (C)(i)(II) for such month" in 17 subparagraph (B) and inserting "1/12 of the 18 employee's permitted benefit (as defined in sec-
19 tion 9831(d)(3)(C)) under such arrangement",
20 (C) by striking subparagraphs (C) and (F)

21 and redesignating subparagraphs (D) and (E)
22 as subparagraphs (C) and (D), respectively, and 23 (D) in subparagraph (D), as so redesignig-
24 nated, by striking "subparagraph (C)(i)(II)"
25 and inserting "subparagraph (B)".

8

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (d) MODIFICATION OF DEFINITION OF QUALIFIED
2 HEALTH PLAN.—

3 (1) IN GENERAL.—Section 36B(c)(3)(A) of the 4 Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by in-
5 serting before the period at the end the following:
6 "or a plan that includes coverage for abortions
7 (other than any abortion necessary to save the life
8 of the mother or any abortion with respect to a 9 pregnancy that is the result of an act of rape or in-10 cest)".

11 (2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made
12 by this subsection shall apply to taxable years begin-
13 ning after December 31, 2017.

14 (e) INCREASED PENALTY ON ERRONEOUS CLAIMS OF 15 CREDIT.—Section 6676(a) of the Internal Revenue Code
16 of 1986 is amended by inserting "(25 percent in the case
17 of a claim for refund or credit relating to the health insur-
18 ance coverage credit under section 36B)" after "20 per-19 cent".

20 (f) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Except as otherwise provided 21 in this section, the amendments made by this section shall 22 apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 2019.

23 SEC. 103. MODIFICATIONS TO SMALL BUSINESS TAX CRED-
24 IT.

25 (a) SUNSET.—

9

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (1) IN GENERAL.—Section 45R of the Internal
2 Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by adding at the 3 end the following new subsection:

4 "(j) SHALL NOT APPLY.—This section shall not
5 apply with respect to amounts paid or incurred in taxable
6 years beginning after December 31, 2019."

7 (2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made
8 by this subsection shall apply to taxable years begin-
9 ning after December 31, 2019.

10 (b) DISALLOWANCE OF SMALL EMPLOYER HEALTH
11 INSURANCE EXPENSE CREDIT FOR PLAN WHICH IN-12 CLUDES COVERAGE FOR ABORTION.—

13 (1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (h) of section
14 45R of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is 15 amended—

16 (A) by striking "Any term" and inserting

17 the following:

18 "(1) IN GENERAL.—Any term", and
19 (B) by adding at the end the following new 20 paragraph:

21 "(2) EXCLUSION OF HEALTH PLANS INCLUDING
22 COVERAGE FOR ABORTION.—The term 'qualified
23 health plan' does not include any health plan that 24 includes coverage for abortions (other than any 25 abortion necessary to save the life of the mother or 10

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 any abortion with respect to a pregnancy that is the 2 result of an act of rape or incest).".

3 (2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made
4 by this subsection shall apply to taxable years begin-
5 ning after December 31, 2017.

6 SEC. 104. INDIVIDUAL MANDATE.

7 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 5000A(c) of the Internal
8 Revenue Code of 1986 is amended—

9 (1) in paragraph (2)(B)(iii), by striking "2.5
10 percent" and inserting "Zero percent", and 11 (2) in paragraph (3)—

12 (A) by striking "$695" in subparagraph

13 (A) and inserting "$0", and 14 (B) by striking subparagraph (D).

15 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by
16 this section shall apply to months beginning after Decem-
17 ber 31, 2015.

18 SEC. 105. EMPLOYER MANDATE.

19 (a) IN GENERAL.—

20 (1) Paragraph (1) of section 4980H(c) of the 21 Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by in-
22 serting "($0 in the case of months beginning after 23 December 31, 2015)" after "$2,000".

24 (2) Paragraph (1) of section 4980H(b) of the 25 Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by in-11

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 serting "($0 in the case of months beginning after
2 December 31, 2015)" after "$3,000".

3 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by
4 this section shall apply to months beginning after Decem-
5 ber 31, 2015.

6 SEC. 106. STATE STABILITY AND INNOVATION PROGRAM.

7 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 2105 of the Social Secu-
8 rity Act (42 U.S.C. 1397ee) is amended by adding at the 9 end the following new subsections:

10 "(h) SHORT-TERM ASSISTANCE TO ADDRESS COV-
11 ERAGE AND ACCESS DISRUPTION AND PROVIDE SUPPORT
12 FOR STATES.—

13 "(1) APPROPRIATION.—There are authorized to 14 be appropriated, and are appropriated, out of monies
15 in the Treasury not otherwise obligated,
16 $15,000,000,000 for each of calendar years 2018
17 and 2019, and $10,000,000,000 for each of calendar
18 years 2020 and 2021, to the Administrator of the 19 Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (in this 20 subsection and subsection (i) referred to as the 'Ad-
21 ministrator') to fund arrangements with health in-
22 surance issuers to address coverage and access dis-
23 ruption and respond to urgent health care needs
24 within States. Funds appropriated under this para-
25 graph shall remain available until expended.

12

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(2) PARTICIPATION REQUIREMENTS.—

2 "(A) GUIDANCE.—Not later than 30 days
3 after the date of enactment of this subsection,
4 the Administrator shall issue guidance to health
5 insurance issuers regarding how to submit a no-
6 tice of intent to participate in the program es-
7 tablished under this subsection.

8 "(B) NOTICE OF INTENT TO PARTICI-
9 PATE.—To be eligible for funding under this
10 subsection, a health insurance issuer shall sub-11 mit to the Administrator a notice of intent to 12 participate at such time (but, in the case of 13 funding for calendar year 2018, not later than 14 35 days after the date of enactment of this sub-
15 section and, in the case of funding for calendar
16 year 2019, 2020, or 2021, not later than March 17 31 of the previous year) and in such form and 18 manner as specified by the Administrator and 19 containing—

20 "(i) a certification that the health in-
21 surance issuer will use the funds in accord-
22 ance with the requirements of paragraph
23 (5); and

13

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(ii) such information as the Adminis-
2 trator may require to carry out this sub-
3 section.

4 "(3) PROCEDURE FOR DISTRIBUTION OF
5 FUNDS.—The Administrator shall determine an ap-
6 propriate procedure for providing and distributing
7 funds under this subsection.

8 "(4) NO MATCH.—Neither the State percentage
9 applicable to payments to States under subsection
10 (i)(5)(B) nor any other matching requirement shall

11 apply to funds provided to health insurance issuers
12 under this subsection.

13 "(5) USE OF FUNDS.—Funds provided to a 14 health insurance issuer under paragraph (1) shall be 15 subject to the requirements of paragraphs (1)(D)
16 and (7) of subsection (i) in the same manner as 17 such requirements apply to States receiving pay-
18 ments under subsection (i) and shall be used for the 19 activities specified in paragraph (1)(A)(ii) of sub-
20 section (i).

21 "(i) LONG-TERM STATE STABILITY AND INNOVATION
22 PROGRAM.—

23 "(1) APPLICATION AND CERTIFICATION RE-
24 QUIREMENTS.—To be eligible for an allotment of 25 funds under this subsection, a State shall submit to 14

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 the Administrator an application, not later than 2 March 31, 2018, in the case of allotments for cal-
3 endar year 2019, and not later than March 31 of 4 the previous year, in the case of allotments for any 5 subsequent calendar year) and in such form and 6 manner as specified by the Administrator, that con-
7 tains the following:

8 "(A) A description of how the funds will be 9 used to do 1 or more of the following:

10 "(i) To establish or maintain a pro-
11 gram or mechanism to provide financial as-12 sistance to help high-risk individuals, in-13 cluding by reducing premium costs for 14 such individuals, who have or are projected
15 to have a high rate of utilization of health
16 services, as measured by cost, and who do
17 not have access to health insurance cov-
18 erage offered through an employer, enroll
19 in health insurance coverage under a plan
20 offered in the individual market (within 21 the meaning of section 5000A(f)(1)(C) of 22 the Internal Revenue Code of 1986).

23 "(ii) To establish or maintain a pro-
24 gram to enter into arrangements with 25 health insurance issuers to help stabilize
15

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 premiums and promote State health insur-
2 ance market participation and choice in
3 plans offered in the individual market
4 (within the meaning of section
5 5000A(f)(1)(C) of the Internal Revenue
6 Code of 1986).

7 "(iii) To provide payments for health
8 care providers for the provision of health
9 care services, as specified by the Adminis-
10 trator.

11 "(iv) To provide assistance to reduce
12 out-of-pocket costs, such as copayments,
13 coinsurance, and deductibles, of individuals
14 enrolled in plans offered in the individual
15 market (within the meaning of section
16 5000A(f)(1)(C) of the Internal Revenue
17 Code of 1986).

18 "(B) A certification that the State shall 19 make, from non-Federal funds, expenditures for 20 1 or more of the activities specified in subpara-
21 graph (A) in an amount that is not less than 22 the State percentage required for the year
23 under paragraph (5)(B)(ii).

16

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(C) A certification that the funds pro-
2 vided under this subsection shall only be used
3 for the activities specified in subparagraph (A).

4 "(D) A certification that none of the funds
5 provided under this subsection shall be used by 6 the State for an expenditure that is attributable
7 to an intergovernmental transfer, certified pub-
8 lic expenditure, or any other expenditure to fi-
9 nance the non-Federal share of expenditures re-
10 quired under any provision of law, including 11 under the State plans established under this 12 title and title XIX or under a waiver of such 13 plans.

14 "(E) Such other information as necessary
15 for the Administrator to carry out this sub-
16 section.

17 "(2) ELIGIBILITY.—Only the 50 States and the 18 District of Columbia shall be eligible for an allot-
19 ment and payments under this subsection and all 20 references in this subsection to a State shall be 21 treated as only referring to the 50 States and the 22 District of Columbia.

23 "(3) ONE-TIME APPLICATION.—If an applica-24 tion of a State submitted under this subsection is 25 approved by the Administrator for a year, the appli-
17

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 cation shall be deemed to be approved by the Admin-
2 istrator for that year and each subsequent year
3 through December 31, 2026.

4 "(4) LONG-TERM STATE STABILITY AND INNO-

5 VATION ALLOTMENTS.—

6 "(A) APPROPRIATION; TOTAL ALLOT-
7 MENT.—For the purpose of providing allot-
8 ments to States under this subsection, there is 9 appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury
10 not otherwise appropriated—

11 "(i) for calendar year 2019,

12 $8,000,000,000;

13 "(ii) for calendar year 2020,

14 $14,000,000,000;

15 "(iii) for calendar year 2021,

16 $14,000,000,000;

17 "(iv) for calendar year 2022,

18 $6,000,000,000;

19 "(v) for calendar year 2023,

20 $6,000,000,000;

21 "(vi) for calendar year 2024,

22 $5,000,000,000;

23 "(vii) for calendar year 2025,

24 $5,000,000,000; and

18

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(viii) for calendar year 2026,

2 $4,000,000,000.

3 "(B) ALLOTMENTS.—

4 "(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a
5 State with an application approved under 6 this subsection with respect to a year, the 7 Administrator shall allot to the State, in 8 accordance with an allotment methodology
9 specified by the Administrator that ensures
10 that the spending requirement in para-
11 graph (6) is met for the year, from 12 amounts appropriated for such year under 13 subparagraph (A), such amount as speci-
14 fied by the Administrator with respect to 15 the State and application and year.

16 "(ii) ANNUAL REDISTRIBUTION OF 17 PREVIOUS YEAR'S UNUSED FUNDS.—

18 "(I) IN GENERAL.— In carrying
19 out clause (i), with respect to a year
20 (beginning with 2021), the Adminis-
21 trator shall, not later than March 31
22 of such year—

23 "(aa) determine the amount
24 of funds, if any, remaining un-

19

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 used under subparagraph (A)

2 from the previous year; and

3 "(bb) if the Administrator
4 determines that any funds so re-
5 main from the previous year, re-
6 distribute such remaining funds
7 in accordance with an allotment
8 methodology specified by the Ad-
9 ministrator to States that have 10 submitted an application ap-
11 proved under this subsection for 12 the year.

13 "(II) APPLICABLE STATE PER-
14 CENTAGE.—The State percentage
15 specified for a year in paragraph
16 (5)(B)(ii) shall apply to funds redis-
17 tributed under subclause (I) in that
18 year.

19 "(C) AVAILABILITY OF ALLOTTED STATE
20 FUNDS.—

21 "(i) IN GENERAL.—Amounts allotted
22 to a State pursuant to subparagraph (B)(i)
23 for a year shall remain available for ex-
24 penditure by the State through the end of 25 the second succeeding year.

20

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(ii) AVAILABILITY OF AMOUNTS RE-
2 DISTRIBUTED.—Amounts redistributed to
3 a State under subparagraph (B)(ii) in a 4 year shall be available for expenditure by 5 the State through the end of the second
6 succeeding year.

7 "(5) PAYMENTS.—

8 "(A) ANNUAL PAYMENT OF ALLOT-
9 MENTS.—Subject to subparagraph (B), the Ad-
10 ministrator shall pay to each State that has an 11 application approved under this subsection for a 12 year, the allotment determined under paragraph 13 (4)(B) for the State for the year.

14 "(B) MATCH REQUIRED.—

15 "(i) IN GENERAL.—The Administrator
16 shall pay each State that has an applica-
17 tion approved under this subsection for a
18 year, the Federal percentage of the allot-
19 ment determined for the State under para-
20 graph (4)(B) for the year.

21 "(ii) FEDERAL AND STATE PERCENT-
22 AGES DEFINED.—For purposes of clause
23 (i), the Federal percentage is equal to 100
24 percent reduced by the State percentage

21

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 for that year, and the State percentage is

2 equal to—

3 "(I) in the case of calendar year

4 2019, 0 percent;

5 "(II) in the case of calendar year

6 2020, 0 percent;

7 "(III) in the case of calendar

8 year 2021, 0 percent;

9 "(IV) in the case of calendar

10 year 2022, 7 percent;

11 "(V) in the case of calendar year

12 2023, 14 percent;

13 "(VI) in the case of calendar

14 year 2024, 21 percent;

15 "(VII) in the case of calendar

16 year 2025, 28 percent; and

17 "(VIII) in the case of calendar

18 year 2026, 35 percent.

19 "(C) ADVANCE PAYMENT; RETROSPECTIVE

20 ADJUSTMENT.—

21 "(i) IN GENERAL.—If the Adminis-

22 trator deems it appropriate, the Adminis-

23 trator shall make payments under this sub-

24 section for each year on the basis of ad-

25 vance estimates of expenditures submitted

22

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 by the State and such other investigation

2 as the Administrator shall find necessary,

3 and shall reduce or increase the payments

4 as necessary to adjust for any overpayment

5 or underpayment for prior years.

6 "(ii) MISUSE OF FUNDS.—If the Ad-

7 ministrator determines that a State is not

8 using funds paid to the State under this

9 subsection in a manner consistent with the 10 description provided by the State in its ap-

11 plication approved under paragraph (1),

12 the Administrator may withhold payments,

13 reduce payments, or recover previous pay-

14 ments to the State under this subsection

15 as the Administrator deems appropriate.

16 "(D) FLEXIBILITY IN SUBMITTAL OF

17 CLAIMS.—Nothing in this subsection shall be

18 construed as preventing a State from claiming

19 as expenditures in the year expenditures that

20 were incurred in a previous year.

21 "(6) REQUIRED USE FOR PREMIUM STABILIZA-

22 TION AND INCENTIVES FOR INDIVIDUAL MARKET

23 PARTICIPATION.—In determining allotments for 24 States under this subsection for each of calendar
25 years 2019, 2020, and 2021, the Administrator shall 23

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 ensure that at least $5,000,000,000 of the amounts
2 appropriated for each such year under paragraph
3 (4)(A) are used by States for the purposes described
4 in paragraph (1)(A)(ii) and in accordance with guid-
5 ance issued by the Administrator not later than 30
6 days after the date of enactment of this subsection
7 that specifies the parameters for the use of funds for 8 such purposes.

9 "(7) EXEMPTIONS.—Paragraphs (2), (3), (5),
10 (6), (8), (10), and (11) of subsection (c) do not 11 apply to payments under this subsection."

12 (b) OTHER TITLE XXI AMENDMENTS.—

13 (1) Section 2101 of such Act (42 U.S.C.

14 1397aa) is amended—

15 (A) in subsection (a), in the matter pre-
16 ceding paragraph (1), by striking "The pur-
17 pose" and inserting "Except with respect to 18 short-term assistance activities under section
19 2105(h) and the Long-Term State Stability and 20 Innovation Program established in section
21 2105(i), the purpose"; and

22 (B) in subsection (b), in the matter pre-
23 ceding paragraph (1), by inserting "subsection
24 (a) or (g) of" before "section 2105".

24

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (2) Section 2105(c)(1) of such Act (42 U.S.C.
2 1397ee(c)(1)) is amended by striking "and may not
3 include" and inserting "or to carry out short-term
4 assistance activities under subsection (h) or the 5 Long-Term State Stability and Innovation Program
6 established in subsection (i) and, except in the case
7 of funds made available under subsection (h) or (i),
8 may not include".

9 (3) Section 2106(a)(1) of such Act (42 U.S.C.
10 1397ff(a)(1)) is amended by inserting "subsection
11 (a) or (g) of" before "section 2105".

12 SEC. 107. BETTER CARE RECONCILIATION IMPLEMENTA-
13 TION FUND.

14 (a) IN GENERAL.—There is hereby established a Bet-15 ter Care Reconciliation Implementation Fund (referred to 16 in this section as the "Fund") within the Department of 17 Health and Human Services to provide for Federal admin-
18 istrative expenses in carrying out this Act.

19 (b) FUNDING.—There is appropriated to the Fund,

20 out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appro-
21 priated, $500,000,000.

25

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 108. REPEAL OF THE TAX ON EMPLOYEE HEALTH IN-
2 SURANCE PREMIUMS AND HEALTH PLAN
3 BENEFITS.

4 (a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 43 of the Internal Rev-
5 enue Code of 1986 is amended by striking section 4980I.

6 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by
7 subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after
8 December 31, 2019.

9 (c) SUBSEQUENT EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amend-
10 ment made by subsection (a) shall not apply to taxable
11 years beginning after December 31, 2025, and chapter 43
12 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended to read 13 as such chapter would read if such subsection had never 14 been enacted.

15 SEC. 109. REPEAL OF TAX ON OVER-THE-COUNTER MEDICA-
16 TIONS.

17 (a) HSAS.—Subparagraph (A) of section 223(d)(2)
18 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by strik-
19 ing "Such term" and all that follows through the period.

20 (b) ARCHER MSAS.—Subparagraph (A) of section
21 220(d)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amend-
22 ed by striking "Such term" and all that follows through 23 the period.

24 (c) HEALTH FLEXIBLE SPENDING ARRANGEMENTS
25 AND HEALTH REIMBURSEMENT ARRANGEMENTS.—Sec-
26

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 tion 106 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended
2 by striking subsection (f).

3 (d) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

4 (1) DISTRIBUTIONS FROM SAVINGS AC-
5 COUNTS.—The amendments made by subsections (a)
6 and (b) shall apply to amounts paid with respect to 7 taxable years beginning after December 31, 2016.

8 (2) REIMBURSEMENTS.—The amendment made
9 by subsection (c) shall apply to expenses incurred
10 with respect to taxable years beginning after Decem-
11 ber 31, 2016.

12 SEC. 110. REPEAL OF TAX ON HEALTH SAVINGS ACCOUNTS.

13 (a) HSAS.—Section 223(f)(4)(A) of the Internal 14 Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by striking "20 per-15 cent" and inserting "10 percent".

16 (b) ARCHER MSAS.—Section 220(f)(4)(A) of the In-
17 ternal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by striking "20
18 percent" and inserting "15 percent".

19 (c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by

20 this section shall apply to distributions made after Decem-
21 ber 31, 2016.

22 SEC. 111. REPEAL OF LIMITATIONS ON CONTRIBUTIONS TO 23 FLEXIBLE SPENDING ACCOUNTS.

24 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 125 of the Internal Rev-
25 enue Code of 1986 is amended by striking subsection (i).
27

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by
2 this section shall apply to plan years beginning after De-
3 cember 31, 2017.

4 SEC. 112. REPEAL OF TAX ON PRESCRIPTION MEDICA-
5 TIONS.

6 Subsection (j) of section 9008 of the Patient Protec-
7 tion and Affordable Care Act is amended to read as fol-
8 lows:

9 "(j) REPEAL.—This section shall apply to calendar
10 years beginning after December 31, 2010, and ending be-
11 fore January 1, 2018."

12 SEC. 113. REPEAL OF MEDICAL DEVICE EXCISE TAX.

13 Section 4191 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986
14 is amended by adding at the end the following new sub-
15 section:

16 "(d) APPLICABILITY.—The tax imposed under sub-
17 section (a) shall not apply to sales after December 31, 18 2017."

19 SEC. 114. REPEAL OF HEALTH INSURANCE TAX.

20 Subsection (j) of section 9010 of the Patient Protec-
21 tion and Affordable Care Act is amended by striking "
22 and" at the end of paragraph (1) and all that follows
23 through "2017".

28

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 115. REPEAL OF ELIMINATION OF DEDUCTION FOR 2 EXPENSES ALLOCABLE TO MEDICARE PART D
3 SUBSIDY.

4 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 139A of the Internal Rev-
5 enue Code of 1986 is amended by adding at the end the 6 following new sentence: "This section shall not be taken
7 into account for purposes of determining whether any de-
8 duction is allowable with respect to any cost taken into 9 account in determining such payment."

10 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by
11 this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after
12 December 31, 2016.

13 SEC. 116. REPEAL OF CHRONIC CARE TAX.

14 (a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (a) of section 213 of 15 the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by striking
16 "10 percent" and inserting "7.5 percent".

17 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by

18 this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after
19 December 31, 2016.

20 SEC. 117. REPEAL OF MEDICARE TAX INCREASE.

21 (a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (b) of section 3101 of 22 the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended to read
23 as follows:

24 "(b) HOSPITAL INSURANCE.—In addition to the tax
25 imposed by the preceding subsection, there is hereby im-
26 posed on the income of every individual a tax equal to 1.45
29

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 percent of the wages (as defined in section 3121(a)) re-
2 ceived by such individual with respect to employment (as 3 defined in section 3121(b))."

4 (b) SECA.—Subsection (b) of section 1401 of the In-
5 ternal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended to read as fol-
6 lows:

7 "(b) HOSPITAL INSURANCE.—In addition to the tax
8 imposed by the preceding subsection, there shall be im-
9 posed for each taxable year, on the self-employment in-10 come of every individual, a tax equal to 2.9 percent of the 11 amount of the self-employment income for such taxable
12 year."

13 (c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by 14 this section shall apply with respect to remuneration re-
15 ceived after, and taxable years beginning after, December
16 31, 2022.

17 SEC. 118. REPEAL OF TANNING TAX.

18 (a) IN GENERAL.—The Internal Revenue Code of 19 1986 is amended by striking chapter 49.

20 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by 21 this section shall apply to services performed after Sep-
22 tember 30, 2017.

23 SEC. 119. REPEAL OF NET INVESTMENT TAX.

24 (a) IN GENERAL.—Subtitle A of the Internal Rev-
25 enue Code of 1986 is amended by striking chapter 2A.
30

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by
2 this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after
3 December 31, 2016.

4 SEC. 120. REMUNERATION.

5 Paragraph (6) of section 162(m) of the Internal Rev-
6 enue Code of 1986 is amended by adding at the end the 7 following new subparagraph:

8 "(I) TERMINATION.—This paragraph shall
9 not apply to taxable years beginning after De-
10 cember 31, 2016."

11 SEC. 121. MAXIMUM CONTRIBUTION LIMIT TO HEALTH SAV-12 INGS ACCOUNT INCREASED TO AMOUNT OF

13 DEDUCTIBLE AND OUT-OF-POCKET LIMITA-
14 TION.

15 (a) SELF-ONLY COVERAGE.—Section 223(b)(2)(A)
16 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by strik-
17 ing "$2,250" and inserting "the amount in effect under 18 subsection (c)(2)(A)(ii)(I)".

19 (b) FAMILY COVERAGE.—Section 223(b)(2)(B) of 20 such Code is amended by striking "$4,500" and inserting
21 "the amount in effect under subsection (c)(2)(A)(ii)(II)".

22 (c) COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT.—Section
23 223(g)(1) of such Code is amended—

24 (1) by striking "subsections (b)(2) and" both 25 places it appears and inserting "subsection", and

31

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (2) in subparagraph (B), by striking "deter-
2 mined by" and all that follows through " 'calendar
3 year 2003'." and inserting "determined by sub-
4 stituting 'calendar year 2003' for 'calendar year
5 1992' in subparagraph (B) thereof."

6 (d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by
7 this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after
8 December 31, 2017.

9 SEC. 122. ALLOW BOTH SPOUSES TO MAKE CATCH-UP CON-
10 TRIBUTIONS TO THE SAME HEALTH SAVINGS
11 ACCOUNT.

12 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 223(b)(5) of the Internal 13 Revenue Code of 1986 is amended to read as follows:

14 "(5) SPECIAL RULE FOR MARRIED INDIVIDUALS
15 WITH FAMILY COVERAGE.—

16 "(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of individ-
17 uals who are married to each other, if both 18 spouses are eligible individuals and either
19 spouse has family coverage under a high de-
20 ductible health plan as of the first day of any 21 month—

22 "(i) the limitation under paragraph
23 (1) shall be applied by not taking into ac-
24 count any other high deductible health
25 plan coverage of either spouse (and if such 32

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 spouses both have family coverage under
2 separate high deductible health plans, only
3 one such coverage shall be taken into ac-
4 count),

5 "(ii) such limitation (after application
6 of clause (i)) shall be reduced by the ag-
7 gregate amount paid to Archer MSAs of 8 such spouses for the taxable year, and

9 "(iii) such limitation (after application
10 of clauses (i) and (ii)) shall be divided 11 equally between such spouses unless they 12 agree on a different division.
13 "(B) TREATMENT OF ADDITIONAL CON-
14 TRIBUTION AMOUNTS.—If both spouses referred
15 to in subparagraph (A) have attained age 55
16 before the close of the taxable year, the limita-
17 tion referred to in subparagraph (A)(iii) which 18 is subject to division between the spouses shall 19 include the additional contribution amounts de-
20 termined under paragraph (3) for both spouses.
21 In any other case, any additional contribution
22 amount determined under paragraph (3) shall 23 not be taken into account under subparagraph
24 (A)(iii) and shall not be subject to division be-25 tween the spouses."

33

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by
2 this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after
3 December 31, 2017.

4 SEC. 123. SPECIAL RULE FOR CERTAIN MEDICAL EXPENSES
5 INCURRED BEFORE ESTABLISHMENT OF 6 HEALTH SAVINGS ACCOUNT.

7 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 223(d)(2) of the Internal
8 Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by adding at the end
9 the following new subparagraph:

10 "(D) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN MEDICAL 11 EXPENSES INCURRED BEFORE ESTABLISHMENT
12 OF ACCOUNT.—If a health savings account is 13 established during the 60-day period beginning
14 on the date that coverage of the account bene-
15 ficiary under a high deductible health plan be-16 gins, then, solely for purposes of determining 17 whether an amount paid is used for a qualified
18 medical expense, such account shall be treated
19 as having been established on the date that 20 such coverage begins."

21 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by 22 this subsection shall apply with respect to coverage under 23 a high deductible health plan beginning after December
24 31, 2017.

34

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 124. FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO STATES.

2 (a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding section 504(a),
3 1902(a)(23), 1903(a), 2002, 2005(a)(4), 2102(a)(7), or 4 2105(a)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 704(a),
5 1396a(a)(23), 1396b(a), 1397a, 1397d(a)(4),

6 1397bb(a)(7), 1397ee(a)(1)), or the terms of any Med-
7 icaid waiver in effect on the date of enactment of this Act
8 that is approved under section 1115 or 1915 of the Social 9 Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1315, 1396n), for the 1-year pe-
10 riod beginning on the date of enactment of this Act, no
11 Federal funds provided from a program referred to in this 12 subsection that is considered direct spending for any year
13 may be made available to a State for payments to a pro-
14 hibited entity, whether made directly to the prohibited en-
15 tity or through a managed care organization under con-
16 tract with the State.

17 (b) DEFINITIONS.—In this section:

18 (1) PROHIBITED ENTITY.—The term "prohib-
19 ited entity" means an entity, including its affiliates,
20 subsidiaries, successors, and clinics—

21 (A) that, as of the date of enactment of 22 this Act—

23 (i) is an organization described in sec-
24 tion 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue
25 Code of 1986 and exempt from tax under 26 section 501(a) of such Code;

35

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (ii) is an essential community provider
2 described in section 156.235 of title 45,
3 Code of Federal Regulations (as in effect
4 on the date of enactment of this Act), that
5 is primarily engaged in family planning
6 services, reproductive health, and related
7 medical care; and

8 (iii) provides for abortions, other than 9 an abortion—

10 (I) if the pregnancy is the result
11 of an act of rape or incest; or

12 (II) in the case where a woman
13 suffers from a physical disorder, phys-
14 ical injury, or physical illness that 15 would, as certified by a physician,
16 place the woman in danger of death
17 unless an abortion is performed, in-
18 cluding a life-endangering physical 19 condition caused by or arising from 20 the pregnancy itself; and

21 (B) for which the total amount of Federal 22 and State expenditures under the Medicaid pro-
23 gram under title XIX of the Social Security Act
24 in fiscal year 2014 made directly to the entity
25 and to any affiliates, subsidiaries, successors, or

36

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 clinics of the entity, or made to the entity and
2 to any affiliates, subsidiaries, successors, or 3 clinics of the entity as part of a nationwide
4 health care provider network, exceeded
5 $350,000,000.

6 (2) DIRECT SPENDING.—The term "direct
7 spending" has the meaning given that term under 8 section 250(c) of the Balanced Budget and Emer-
9 gency Deficit Control Act of 1985 (2 U.S.C. 900(c)).

10 SEC. 125. MEDICAID PROVISIONS.

11 The Social Security Act is amended—

12 (1) in section 1902 (42 U.S.C. 1396a)—

13 (A) in subsection (a)(47)(B), by inserting

14 "and provided that any such election shall cease
15 to be effective on January 1, 2020, and no such 16 election shall be made after that date" before 17 the semicolon at the end; and

18 (B) in subsection (l)(2)(C), by inserting

19 "and ending December 31, 2019," after "Janu-
20 ary 1, 2014,";

21 (2) in section 1915(k)(2) (42 U.S.C.

22 1396n(k)(2)), by striking "during the period de-
23 scribed in paragraph (1)" and inserting "on or after 24 the date referred to in paragraph (1) and before
25 January 1, 2020"; and

37

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (3) in section 1920(e) (42 U.S.C. 1396r-1(e)),

2 by striking "under clause (i)(VIII), clause (i)(IX), or 3 clause (ii)(XX) of subsection (a)(10)(A)" and insert-
4 ing "under clause (i)(VIII) or clause (ii)(XX) of sec-
5 tion 1902(a)(10)(A) before January 1, 2020, section
6 1902(a)(10)(A)(i)(IX),".

7 SEC. 126. MEDICAID EXPANSION.

8 (a) IN GENERAL.—Title XIX of the Social Security
9 Act (42 U.S.C. 1396 et seq.) is amended—

10 (1) in section 1902 (42 U.S.C. 1396a)—

11 (A) in subsection (a)(10)(A)—

12 (i) in clause (i)(VIII), by inserting

13 "and ending December 31, 2019," after
14 "2014,"; and

15 (ii) in clause (ii), in subclause (XX),

16 by inserting "and ending December 31, 17 2017," after "2014," and by adding at 18 the end the following new subclause:

19 "(XXIII) beginning January 1, 2020, 20 who are expansion enrollees (as defined in 21 subsection (nn)(1));"; and

22 (B) by adding at the end the following new
23 subsection:

24 "(nn) EXPANSION ENROLLEES.—

38

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(1) IN GENERAL.—In this title, the term 'ex-

2 pansion enrollee' means an individual—

3 "(A) who is under 65 years of age;

4 "(B) who is not pregnant;

5 "(C) who is not entitled to, or enrolled for,

6 benefits under part A of title XVIII, or enrolled

7 for benefits under part B of title XVIII;

8 "(D) who is not described in any of sub-

9 clauses (I) through (VII) of subsection

10 (a)(10)(A)(i); and

11 "(E) whose income (as determined under 12 subsection (e)(14)) does not exceed 133 percent

13 of the poverty line (as defined in section

14 2110(c)(5)) applicable to a family of the size in-

15 volved.

16 "(2) APPLICATION OF RELATED PROVISIONS.—

17 Any reference in subsection (a)(10)(G), (k), or (gg)

18 of this section or in section 1903, 1905(a), 1920(e),

19 or 1937(a)(1)(B) to individuals described in sub-

20 clause (VIII) of subsection (a)(10)(A)(i) shall be

21 deemed to include a reference to expansion enroll-

22 ees."; and

23 (2) in section 1905 (42 U.S.C. 1396d)—

24 (A) in subsection (y)(1)—

39

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (i) in the matter preceding subpara-

2 graph (A), by striking ", with respect to"

3 and all that follows through "shall be equal

4 to" and inserting "and that has elected to

5 cover newly eligible individuals before

6 March 1, 2017, with respect to amounts

7 expended by such State before January 1,

8 2020, for medical assistance for newly eli-

9 gible individuals described in subclause

10 (VIII) of section 1902(a)(10)(A)(i), and,

11 with respect to amounts expended by such

12 State after December 31, 2019, and before

13 January 1, 2024, for medical assistance

14 for expansion enrollees (as defined in sec-

15 tion 1902(n)(1)), shall be equal to the 16 higher of the percentage otherwise deter-

17 mined for the State and year under sub-

18 section (b) (without regard to this sub-

19 section) and";

20 (ii) in subparagraph (D), by striking

21 "and" after the semicolon;

22 (iii) by striking subparagraph (E) and
23 inserting the following new subparagraphs:
24 "(E) 90 percent for calendar quarters in 25 2020;
40

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(F) 85 percent for calendar quarters in 2 2021;
3 "(G) 80 percent for calendar quarters in
4 2022; and
5 "(H) 75 percent for calendar quarters in
6 2023."; and

7 (iv) by adding after and below sub-
8 paragraph (H) (as added by clause (iii)),
9 the following flush sentence:

10 "The Federal medical assistance percentage deter-
11 mined for a State and year under subsection (b)
12 shall apply to expenditures for medical assistance to 13 newly eligible individuals (as so described) and ex-
14 pansion enrollees (as so defined), in the case of a
15 State that has elected to cover newly eligible individ-
16 uals before March 1, 2017, for calendar quarters
17 after 2023, and, in the case of any other State, for 18 calendar quarters (or portions of calendar quarters)
19 after February 28, 2017."; and

20 (B) in subsection (z)(2)—

21 (i) in subparagraph (A)—

22 (I) by inserting "through 2023"
23 after "each year thereafter"; and 24 (II) by striking "shall be equal

25 to" and inserting "and, for periods

41

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 after December 31, 2019 and before
2 January 1, 2024, who are expansion
3 enrollees (as defined in section
4 1902(n)(1)) shall be equal to the 5 higher of the percentage otherwise de-
6 termined for the State and year under 7 subsection (b) (without regard to this 8 subsection) and"; and

9 (ii) in subparagraph (B)(ii)—

10 (I) in subclause (III), by adding 11 "and" at the end; and

12 (II) by striking subclauses (IV),
13 (V), and (VI) and inserting the fol-
14 lowing new subclause:

15 "(IV) 2017 and each subsequent year
16 through 2023 is 80 percent.".

17 (b) SUNSET OF ESSENTIAL HEALTH BENEFITS RE-

18 REQUIREMENT.—Section 1937(b)(5) of the Social Security
19 Act (42 U.S.C. 1396u-7(b)(5)) is amended by adding at 20 the end the following: "This paragraph shall not apply
21 after December 31, 2019."

22 SEC. 127. RESTORING FAIRNESS IN DSH ALLOTMENTS.

23 Section 1923(f)(7) of the Social Security Act (42
24 U.S.C. 1396r-4(f)(7)) is amended by adding at the end
25 the following new subparagraph:

42

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(C) NON-EXPANSION STATES.—

2 "(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a
3 State that is a non-expansion State for a
4 fiscal year—

5 "(I) subparagraph (A) shall not 6 apply to the DSH allotment for such
7 State and fiscal year; and

8 "(II) the DSH allotment for the 9 State for fiscal year 2020 shall be in-
10 creased by the amount calculated ac-
11 cording to clause (iii).

12 "(ii) NO CHANGE IN REDUCTION FOR 13 EXPANSION STATES.—In the case of a
14 State that is an expansion State for a fis-
15 cal year, the DSH allotment for such State
16 and fiscal year shall be determined as if 17 clause (i) did not apply.

18 "(iii) AMOUNT CALCULATED.—For 19 purposes of clause (i)(II), the amount cal-
20 culated according to this clause for a non-
21 expansion State is the following:

22 "(I) For each State, the Sec-
23 retary shall calculate a ratio equal to 24 the State's fiscal year 2016 DSH al-
25 lotment divided by the number of indi-
43

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 viduals enrolled in the State plan
2 under this title for such fiscal year.

3 "(II) The Secretary shall identify
4 the States whose ratio as so deter-
5 mined is below the national average of 6 such ratio for all States.

7 "(III) The amount calculated
8 pursuant to this clause is an amount
9 that, if added to the State's fiscal 10 year 2016 DSH allotment, would in-
11 crease the ratio calculated pursuant to 12 subclause (I) up to the national aver-
13 age for all States.

14 "(iv) DISREGARD OF INCREASE.—The 15 DSH allotment for a non-expansion State
16 for the second, third, and fourth quarters
17 of fiscal year 2024 and fiscal years there-
18 after shall be determined as if there had 19 been no increase in the State's DSH allot-
20 ment for fiscal year 2020 under clause
21 (i)(II).

22 "(v) NON-EXPANSION AND EXPANSION
23 STATE DEFINED.—In this subparagraph:

24 "(I) The term 'expansion State'
25 means with respect to a fiscal year, a 44

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 State that, as of the date of enact-
2 ment of this subparagraph, provided
3 for eligibility under clause (i)(VIII) or 4 (ii)(XX) of section 1902(a)(10)(A) for 5 medical assistance under this title (or 6 a waiver of the State plan approved
7 under section 1115).

8 "(II) The term 'non-expansion
9 State' means, with respect to a fiscal 10 year, a State that is not an expansion
11 State."

12 SEC. 128. REDUCING STATE MEDICAID COSTS.

13 (a) IN GENERAL.—

14 (1) STATE PLAN REQUIREMENTS.—Section
15 1902(a)(34) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C.
16 1396a(a)(34)) is amended by striking "in or after 17 the third month before the month in which he made 18 application" and inserting "in or after the month in 19 which the individual made application".

20 (2) DEFINITION OF MEDICAL ASSISTANCE.—

21 Section 1905(a) of the Social Security Act (42 22 U.S.C. 1396d(a)) is amended by striking "in or 23 after the third month before the month in which the 24 recipient makes application for assistance" and in-45

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 sserting "in or after the month in which the recipient
2 makes application for assistance".

3 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by
4 subsection (a) shall apply to medical assistance with re-
5 spect to individuals whose eligibility for such assistance
6 is based on an application for such assistance made (or 7 deemed to be made) on or after October 1, 2017.

8 SEC. 129. PROVIDING SAFETY NET FUNDING FOR NON-EX-
9 PANSION STATES.

10 Title XIX of the Social Security Act is amended by 11 inserting after section 1923 (42 U.S.C. 1396r-4) the fol-

12 lowing new section:

13 "ADJUSTMENT IN PAYMENT FOR SERVICES OF SAFETY
14 NET PROVIDERS IN NON-EXPANSION STATES

15 "SEC. 1923A. (a) IN GENERAL.—Subject to the limi-
16 tations of this section, for each year during the period be-
17 ginning with fiscal year 2018 and ending with fiscal year
18 2022, each State that is one of the 50 States or the Dis-
19 trict of Columbia and that, as of July 1 of the preceding 20 fiscal year, did not provide for eligibility under clause
21 (i)(VIII) or (ii)(XX) of section 1902(a)(10)(A) for medical 22 assistance under this title (or a waiver of the State plan
23 approved under section 1115) (each such State or District
24 referred to in this section for the fiscal year as a 'non-25 expansion State') may adjust the payment amounts other-26 wise provided under the State plan under this title (or a 46

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 waiver of such plan) to health care providers that provide
2 health care services to individuals enrolled under this title
3 (in this section referred to as 'eligible providers') so long
4 as the payment adjustment to such an eligible provider
5 does not exceed the provider's costs in furnishing health
6 care services (as determined by the Secretary and net of 7 payments under this title, other than under this section,
8 and by uninsured patients) to individuals who either are 9 eligible for medical assistance under the State plan (or 10 under a waiver of such plan) or have no health insurance
11 or health plan coverage for such services.

12 "(b) INCREASE IN APPLICABLE FMAP.—Notwith-
13 standing section 1905(b), the Federal medical assistance
14 percentage applicable with respect to expenditures attrib-
15 utable to a payment adjustment under subsection (a) for 16 which payment is permitted under subsection (c) shall be 17 equal to—

18 "(1) 100 percent for calendar quarters in fiscal 19 years 2018, 2019, 2020, and 2021; and

20 "(2) 95 percent for calendar quarters in fiscal
21 year 2022.

22 "(c) ANNUAL ALLOTMENT LIMITATION.—Payment
23 under section 1903(a) shall not be made to a State with 24 respect to any payment adjustment made under this sec-
47

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 tion for all calendar quarters in a fiscal year in excess
2 of the $2,000,000,000 multiplied by the ratio of—

3 "(1) the population of the State with income
4 below 138 percent of the poverty line in 2015 (as de-
5 termined based the table entitled 'Health Insurance
6 Coverage Status and Type by Ratio of Income to

7 Poverty Level in the Past 12 Months by Age' for the 8 universe of the civilian noninstitutionalized popu-
9 lation for whom poverty status is determined based 10 on the 2015 American Community Survey 1-Year
11 Estimates, as published by the Bureau of the Cen-12 sus), to

13 "(2) the sum of the populations under para-
14 graph (1) for all non-expansion States.

15 "(d) DISQUALIFICATION IN CASE OF STATE COV-
16 ERAGE EXPANSION.—If a State is a non-expansion for a
17 fiscal year and provides eligibility for medical assistance
18 described in subsection (a) during the fiscal year, the 19 State shall no longer be treated as a non-expansion State
20 under this section for any subsequent fiscal years."

21 SEC. 130. ELIGIBILITY REDETERMINATIONS.

22 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1902(e)(14) of the Social 23 Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1396a(e)(14)) (relating to modi-24 fied adjusted gross income) is amended by adding at the 25 end the following:

48

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(J) FREQUENCY OF ELIGIBILITY REDE-
2 TERMINATIONS.—Beginning on October 1,
3 2017, and notwithstanding subparagraph (H),
4 in the case of an individual whose eligibility for 5 medical assistance under the State plan under 6 this title (or a waiver of such plan) is deter-
7 mined based on the application of modified ad-
8 justed gross income under subparagraph (A)
9 and who is so eligible on the basis of clause
10 (i)(VIII), (ii)(XX), or (ii)(XXIII) of subsection
11 (a)(10)(A), at the option of the State, the State
12 plan may provide that the individual's eligibility 13 shall be redetermined every 6 months (or such 14 shorter number of months as the State may 15 elect)."

16 (b) INCREASED ADMINISTRATIVE MATCHING PER-
17 CENTAGE.—For each calendar quarter during the period
18 beginning on October 1, 2017, and ending on December
19 31, 2019, the Federal matching percentage otherwise ap-
20 plicable under section 1903(a) of the Social Security Act
21 (42 U.S.C. 1396b(a)) with respect to State expenditures
22 during such quarter that are attributable to meeting the 23 requirement of section 1902(e)(14) (relating to determina-24 tions of eligibility using modified adjusted gross income)
25 of such Act shall be increased by 5 percentage points with 49

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 respect to State expenditures attributable to activities car-
2 ried out by the State (and approved by the Secretary) to

3 exercise the option described in subparagraph (J) of such 4 section (relating to eligibility redeterminations made on a
5 6-month or shorter basis) (as added by subsection (a)) to 6 increase the frequency of eligibility redeterminations.

7 SEC. 131. OPTIONAL WORK REQUIREMENT FOR NON-8 DISABLED, NONELDERLY, NONPREGNANT IN-9 DIVIDUALS.

10 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1902 of the Social Secu-
11 rity Act (42 U.S.C. 1396a), as previously amended, is fur-
12 ther amended by adding at the end the following new sub-
13 section:

14 "(oo) OPTIONAL WORK REQUIREMENT FOR NON-
15 DISABLED, NONELDERLY, NONPREGNANT INDIVID-
16 UALS.—

17 "(1) IN GENERAL.—Beginning October 1,
18 2017, subject to paragraph (3), a State may elect to 19 condition medical assistance to a nondisabled, non-20 elderly, nonpregnant individual under this title upon 21 such an individual's satisfaction of a work require-
22 ment (as defined in paragraph (2)).

23 "(2) WORK REQUIREMENT DEFINED.—In this
24 section, the term 'work requirement' means, with re-
25 spect to an individual, the individual's participation
50

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 in work activities (as defined in section 407(d)) for 2 such period of time as determined by the State, and
3 as directed and administered by the State.

4 "(3) REQUIRED EXCEPTIONS.—States admin-
5 istering a work requirement under this subsection
6 may not apply such requirement to—

7 "(A) a woman during pregnancy through
8 the end of the month in which the 60-day pe-
9 riod (beginning on the last day of her preg-
10 nancy) ends;

11 "(B) an individual who is under 19 years
12 of age;

13 "(C) an individual who is the only parent
14 or caretaker relative in the family of a child
15 who has not attained 6 years of age or who is 16 the only parent or caretaker of a child with dis-
17 abilities; or

18 "(D) an individual who is married or a 19 head of household and has not attained 20
20 years of age and who—

21 "(i) maintains satisfactory attendance
22 at secondary school or the equivalent; or

23 "(ii) participates in education directly
24 related to employment."

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (b) INCREASE IN MATCHING RATE FOR IMPLEMEN-
2 TATION.—Section 1903 of the Social Security Act (42
3 U.S.C. 1396b) is amended by adding at the end the fol-
4 lowing:

5 "(aa) The Federal matching percentage otherwise ap-
6 plicable under subsection (a) with respect to State admin-
7 istrative expenditures during a calendar quarter for which 8 the State receives payment under such subsection shall,
9 in addition to any other increase to such Federal matching
10 percentage, be increased for such calendar quarter by 5
11 percentage points with respect to State expenditures at-12 tributable to activities carried out by the State (and ap-13 proved by the Secretary) to implement subsection (oo) of 14 section 1902."

15 SEC. 132. PROVIDER TAXES.

16 Section 1903(w)(4)(C) of the Social Security Act (42
17 U.S.C. 1396b(w)(4)(C)) is amended by adding at the end
18 the following new clause:

19 "(iii) For purposes of clause (i), a de-
20 termination of the existence of an indirect
21 guarantee shall be made under paragraph
22 (3)(i) of section 433.68(f) of title 42, Code
23 of Federal Regulations, as in effect on 24 June 1, 2017, except that—

52

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(I) for fiscal year 2021, '5.8
2 percent' shall be substituted for '6
3 percent' each place it appears;
4 "(II) for fiscal year 2022, '5.6
5 percent' shall be substituted for '6
6 percent' each place it appears;
7 "(III) for fiscal year 2023, '5.4
8 percent' shall be substituted for '6
9 percent' each place it appears;
10 "(IV) for fiscal year 2024, '5.2
11 percent' shall be substituted for '6
12 percent' each place it appears; and 13 "(V) for fiscal year 2025 and 14 each subsequent fiscal year, '5 per-
15 cent' shall be substituted for '6 per-16 cent' each place it appears."

17 SEC. 133. PER CAPITA ALLOTMENT FOR MEDICAL ASSIST-
18 ANCE.

19 Title XIX of the Social Security Act is amended—
20 (1) in section 1903 (42 U.S.C. 1396b)—
21 (A) in subsection (a), in the matter before
22 paragraph (1), by inserting "and section
23 1903A(a)" after "except as otherwise provided

24 in this section"; and

53

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (B) in subsection (d)(1), by striking "to
2 which" and inserting "to which, subject to sec-
3 tion 1903A(a),"; and

4 (2) by inserting after such section 1903 the fol-
5 lowing new section:

6 "SEC. 1903A. PER CAPITA-BASED CAP ON PAYMENTS FOR 7 MEDICAL ASSISTANCE.

8 "(a) APPLICATION OF PER CAPITA CAP ON PAY-
9 MENTS FOR MEDICAL ASSISTANCE EXPENDITURES.—

10 "(1) IN GENERAL.—If a State which is one of 11 the 50 States or the District of Columbia has excess 12 aggregate medical assistance expenditures (as de-
13 fined in paragraph (2)) for a fiscal year (beginning 14 with fiscal year 2020), the amount of payment to 15 the State under section 1903(a)(1) for each quarter
16 in the following fiscal year shall be reduced by 16 % of 17 the excess aggregate medical assistance payments
18 (as defined in paragraph (3)) for that previous fiscal 19 year. In this section, the term 'State' means only the 20 50 States and the District of Columbia.

21 "(2) EXCESS AGGREGATE MEDICAL ASSISTANCE
22 EXPENDITURES.—In this subsection, the term 'ex-
23 cess aggregate medical assistance expenditures'
24 means, for a State for a fiscal year, the amount (if 25 any) by which—

54

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) the amount of the adjusted total med-
2 ical assistance expenditures (as defined in sub-
3 section (b)(1)) for the State and fiscal year; ex-
4 ceeds

5 "(B) the amount of the target total med-
6 ical assistance expenditures (as defined in sub-
7 section (c)) for the State and fiscal year.

8 "(3) EXCESS AGGREGATE MEDICAL ASSISTANCE
9 PAYMENTS.—In this subsection, the term 'excess ag-

10 gregate medical assistance payments' means, for a 11 State for a fiscal year, the product of—

12 "(A) the excess aggregate medical assist-
13 ance expenditures (as defined in paragraph (2))
14 for the State for the fiscal year; and 15 "(B) the Federal average medical assist-16 ance matching percentage (as defined in para-17 graph (4)) for the State for the fiscal year.

18 "(4) FEDERAL AVERAGE MEDICAL ASSISTANCE
19 MATCHING PERCENTAGE.—In this subsection, the 20 term 'Federal average medical assistance matching

21 percentage' means, for a State for a fiscal year, the 22 ratio (expressed as a percentage) of—
23 "(A) the amount of the Federal payments
24 that would be made to the State under section
25 1903(a)(1) for medical assistance expenditures
55

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 for calendar quarters in the fiscal year if para-
2 graph (1) did not apply; to

3 "(B) the amount of the medical assistance
4 expenditures for the State and fiscal year.

5 "(5) PER CAPITA BASE PERIOD.—

6 "(A) IN GENERAL.—In this section, the 7 term 'per capita base period' means, with re-
8 spect to a State, a period of 8 consecutive fiscal 9 quarters selected by the State.

10 "(B) TIMELINE.—Each State shall submit 11 its selection of per capita base period to the 12 Secretary not later than January 1, 2018.

13 "(C) PARAMETERS.—In selecting a per 14 capita base period under this paragraph, a 15 State shall—

16 "(i) only select a period of 8 consecu-
17 tive fiscal quarters for which all the data
18 necessary to make determinations required
19 under this section is available, as deter-
20 mined by the Secretary; and

21 "(ii) shall not select any period of 8
22 consecutive fiscal quarters that begins with 23 a fiscal quarter earlier than the first quar-
24 ter of fiscal year 2014 or ends with a fiscal 56

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 quarter later than the third fiscal quarter
2 of 2017.

3 "(D) ADJUSTMENT BY THE SECRETARY.—

4 If the Secretary determines that a State took 5 actions after the date of enactment of this sec-
6 tion (including making retroactive adjustments
7 to supplemental payment data in a manner that 8 affects a fiscal quarter in the per capita base
9 period) to diminish the quality of the data from 10 the per capita base period used to make deter-
11 minations under this section, the Secretary may 12 adjust the data as the Secretary deems appro-
13 priate.

14 "(b) ADJUSTED TOTAL MEDICAL ASSISTANCE EX-
15 PENDITURES.—Subject to subsection (g), the following
16 shall apply:

17 "(1) IN GENERAL.—In this section, the term

18 'adjusted total medical assistance expenditures'
19 means, for a State—
20 "(A) for the State's per capita base period
21 (as defined in subsection (a)(5)), the product
22 of—
23 "(i) the amount of the medical assist-
24 ance expenditures (as defined in paragraph 25 (2) and adjusted under paragraph (5)) for 57

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 the State and period, reduced by the
2 amount of any excluded expenditures (as
3 defined in paragraph (3) and adjusted
4 under paragraph (5)) for the State and pe-
5 riod otherwise included in such medical as-
6 sistance expenditures; and
7 "(ii) the 1903A base period popu-
8 lation percentage (as defined in paragraph 9 (4)) for the State; or 10 "(B) for fiscal year 2019 or a subsequent 11 fiscal year, the amount of the medical assist-
12 ance expenditures (as defined in paragraph (2))
13 for the State and fiscal year that is attributable 14 to 1903A enrollees, reduced by the amount of 15 any excluded expenditures (as defined in para-16 graph (3)) for the State and fiscal year other-
17 wise included in such medical assistance ex-
18 penditures and includes non-DSH supplemental 19 payments (as defined in subsection
20 (d)(4)(A)(ii)) and payments described in sub-
21 section (d)(4)(A)(iii) but shall not be construed
22 as including any expenditures attributable to 23 the program under section 1928 (relating to 24 State pediatric vaccine distribution programs).
25 In applying subparagraph (B), non-DSH sup-
58

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 plemental payments (as defined in subsection
2 (d)(4)(A)(ii)) and payments described in sub-
3 section (d)(4)(A)(iii) shall be treated as fully at-
4 tributable to 1903A enrollees.
5 "(2) MEDICAL ASSISTANCE EXPENDITURES.—
6 In this section, the term 'medical assistance expendi-
7 tures' means, for a State and fiscal year or per cap-
8 ita base period, the medical assistance payments as 9 reported by medical service category on the Form
10 CMS-64 quarterly expense report (or successor to 11 such a report form, and including enrollment data
12 and subsequent adjustments to any such report, in 13 this section referred to collectively as a 'CMS-64 re-

14 port') for quarters in the year or base period for 15 which payment is (or may otherwise be) made pur-
16 suant to section 1903(a)(1), adjusted, in the case of 17 a per capita base period, under paragraph (5).

18 "(3) EXCLUDED EXPENDITURES.—In this sec-
19 tion, the term 'excluded expenditures' means, for a 20 State and fiscal year or per capita base period, ex-
21 penditures under the State plan (or under a waiver 22 of such plan) that are attributable to any of the fol-
23 lowing:

59

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) DSH.—Payment adjustments made
2 for disproportionate share hospitals under sec-
3 tion 1923.

4 "(B) MEDICARE COST-SHARING.—Pay-
5 ments made for medicare cost-sharing (as de-
6 fined in section 1905(p)(3)).

7 "(C) SAFETY NET PROVIDER PAYMENT AD-
8 JUSTMENTS IN NON-EXPANSION STATES.—Pay-
9 ment adjustments under subsection (a) of sec-
10 tion 1923A for which payment is permitted
11 under subsection (c) of such section.

12 "(4) 1903A BASE PERIOD POPULATION PER-
13 CENTAGE.—In this subsection, the term '1903A base
14 period population percentage' means, for a State,
15 the Secretary's calculation of the percentage of the 16 actual medical assistance expenditures, as reported
17 by the State on the CMS-64 reports for calendar
18 quarters in the State's per capita base period, that 19 are attributable to 1903A enrollees (as defined in 20 subsection (e)(1)).

21 "(5) ADJUSTMENTS FOR PER CAPITA BASE PE-
22 RIOD.—In calculating medical assistance expendi-
23 tures under paragraph (2) and excluded expendi-
24 tures under paragraph (3) for a State for the State's 25 per capita base period, the total amount of each type 60

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 of expenditure for the State and base period shall be
2 divided by 2.

3 "(c) TARGET TOTAL MEDICAL ASSISTANCE EXPEND-
4 ITURES.—

5 "(1) CALCULATION.—In this section, the term
6 'target total medical assistance expenditures' means,
7 for a State for a fiscal year and subject to para-
8 graph (4), the sum of the products, for each of the 9 1903A enrollee categories (as defined in subsection 10 (e)(2)), of—

11 "(A) the target per capita medical assist-

12 ance expenditures (as defined in paragraph (2))
13 for the enrollee category, State, and fiscal year;
14 and
15 "(B) the number of 1903A enrollees for 16 such enrollee category, State, and fiscal year, as 17 determined under subsection (e)(4).
18 "(2) TARGET PER CAPITA MEDICAL ASSISTANCE
19 EXPENDITURES.—In this subsection, the term 'tar-
20 get per capita medical assistance expenditures'
21 means, for a 1903A enrollee category and State—
22 "(A) for fiscal year 2020, an amount equal
23 to—
24 "(i) the provisional FY19 target per
25 capita amount for such enrollee category
61

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (as calculated under subsection (d)(5)) for
2 the State; increased by
3 "(ii) the applicable annual inflation
4 factor (as defined in paragraph (3)) for 5 fiscal year 2020; and
6 "(B) for each succeeding fiscal year, an 7 amount equal to—
8 "(i) the target per capita medical as-
9 sistance expenditures (under subparagraph
10 (A) or this subparagraph) for the 1903A
11 enrollee category and State for the pre-
12 ceding fiscal year; increased by
13 "(ii) the applicable annual inflation
14 factor for that succeeding fiscal year.
15 "(3) APPLICABLE ANNUAL INFLATION FAC-
16 TOR.—In paragraph (2), the term 'applicable annual 17 inflation factor' means—
18 "(A) for fiscal years before 2025—
19 "(i) for each of the 1903A enrollee
20 categories described in subparagraphs (C),
21 (D), and (E) of subsection (e)(2), the per-
22 centage increase in the medical care com-
23 ponent of the consumer price index for all 24 urban consumers (U.S. city average) from 62

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 September of the previous fiscal year to
2 September of the fiscal year involved; and
3 "(ii) for each of the 1903A enrollee
4 categories described in subparagraphs (A)
5 and (B) of subsection (e)(2), the percent-
6 age increase described in clause (i) plus 1
7 percentage point; and
8 "(B) for fiscal years after 2024, for all

9 1903A enrollee categories, the percentage in-
10 crease in the consumer price index for all urban 11 consumers (U.S. city average) from September 12 of the previous fiscal year to September of the 13 fiscal year involved.

14 "(4) DECREASE IN TARGET EXPENDITURES
15 FOR REQUIRED EXPENDITURES BY CERTAIN POLIT-
16 ICAL SUBDIVISIONS.—

17 "(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a State
18 that had a DSH allotment under section
19 1923(f) for fiscal year 2016 that was more than 20 6 times the national average of such allotments
21 for all the States for such fiscal year and that 22 requires political subdivisions within the State
23 to contribute funds towards medical assistance
24 or other expenditures under the State plan
25 under this title (or under a waiver of such plan)
63

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 for a fiscal year (beginning with fiscal year
2 2020), the target total medical assistance ex-
3 penditures for such State and fiscal year shall 4 be decreased by the amount that political sub-
5 divisions in the State are required to contribute
6 under the plan (or waiver) without reimburse-
7 ment from the State for such fiscal year, other
8 than contributions described in subparagraph
9 (B).

10 "(B) EXCEPTIONS.—The contributions de-
11 scribed in this subparagraph are the following:

12 "(i) Contributions required by a State
13 from a political subdivision that, as of the 14 first day of the calendar year in which the 15 fiscal year involved begins—

16 "(I) has a population of more 17 than 5,000,000, as estimated by the 18 Bureau of the Census; and 19 "(II) imposes a local income tax

20 upon its residents.

21 "(ii) Contributions required by a
22 State from a political subdivision for ad-
23 ministrative expenses if the State required
24 such contributions from such subdivision
64

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 without reimbursement from the State as
2 of January 1, 2017.

3 "(5) ADJUSTMENTS TO STATE EXPENDITURES
4 TARGETS TO PROMOTE PROGRAM EQUITY ACROSS
5 STATES.—

6 "(A) IN GENERAL.—Beginning with fiscal
7 year 2020, the target per capita medical assist-
8 ance expenditures for a 1903A enrollee cat-
9 egory, State, and fiscal year, as determined
10 under paragraph (2), shall be adjusted (subject
11 to subparagraph (C)(i)) in accordance with this 12 paragraph.

13 "(B) ADJUSTMENT BASED ON LEVEL OF 14 PER CAPITA SPENDING FOR 1903A ENROLLEE

15 CATEGORIES.—Subject to subparagraph (C),
16 with respect to a State, fiscal year, and 1903A
17 enrollee category, if the State's per capita cat-
18 egorical medical assistance expenditures (as de-19 fined in subparagraph (D)) for the State and 20 category in the preceding fiscal year—

21 "(i) exceed the mean per capita cat-
22 egorical medical assistance expenditures
23 for the category for all States for such pre-
24 ceding year by not less than 25 percent,
25 the State's target per capita medical as-

65
ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 sistance expenditures for such category for
2 the fiscal year involved shall be reduced by 3 a percentage that shall be determined by 4 the Secretary but which shall not be less
5 than 0.5 percent or greater than 2 percent;
6 or

7 "(ii) are less than the mean per capita
8 categorical medical assistance expenditures
9 for the category for all States for such pre-
10 ceding year by not less than 25 percent,
11 the State's target per capita medical as-
12 sistance expenditures for such category for 13 the fiscal year involved shall be increased
14 by a percentage that shall be determined
15 by the Secretary but which shall not be 16 less than 0.5 percent or greater than 2
17 percent.

18 "(C) RULES OF APPLICATION.—

19 "(i) BUDGET NEUTRALITY REQUIRE-
20 MENT.—In determining the appropriate
21 percentages by which to adjust States' tar-
22 get per capita medical assistance expendi-
23 tures for a category and fiscal year under 24 this paragraph, the Secretary shall make 25 such adjustments in a manner that does
66

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 not result in a net increase in Federal pay-

2 ments under this section for such fiscal
3 year, and if the Secretary cannot adjust
4 such expenditures in such a manner there
5 shall be no adjustment under this para-
6 graph for such fiscal year.

7 "(ii) ASSUMPTION REGARDING STATE
8 EXPENDITURES.—For purposes of clause
9 (i), in the case of a State that has its tar-
10 get per capita medical assistance expendi-
11 tures for a 1903A enrollee category and 12 fiscal year increased under this paragraph,
13 the Secretary shall assume that the cat-
14 egorical medical assistance expenditures
15 (as defined in subparagraph (D)(ii)) for 16 such State, category, and fiscal year will 17 equal such increased target medical assist-18 ance expenditures.

19 "(iii) NONAPPLICATION TO LOW-DEN-
20 SITY STATES.—This paragraph shall not
21 apply to any State that has a population
22 density of less than 15 individuals per 23 square mile, based on the most recent data
24 available from the Bureau of the Census.

67

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(iv) DISREGARD OF ADJUSTMENT.—
2 Any adjustment under this paragraph to
3 target medical assistance expenditures for 4 a State, 1903A enrollee category, and fis-
5 cal year shall be disregarded when deter-
6 mining the target medical assistance ex-
7 penditures for such State and category for 8 a succeeding year under paragraph (2).

9 "(v) APPLICATION FOR FISCAL YEARS
10 2020 AND 2021.—In fiscal years 2020 and 11 2021, the Secretary shall apply this para-
12 graph by deeming all categories of 1903A
13 enrollees to be a single category.

14 "(D) PER CAPITA CATEGORICAL MEDICAL 15 ASSISTANCE EXPENDITURES.—

16 "(i) IN GENERAL.—In this paragraph,
17 the term 'per capita categorical medical as-
18 sistance expenditures' means, with respect
19 to a State, 1903A enrollee category, and 20 fiscal year, an amount equal to—

21 "(I) the categorical medical ex-
22 penditures (as defined in clause (ii))
23 for the State, category, and year; di-
24 vided by

68

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(II) the number of 1903A en-
2 rollees for the State, category, and
3 year.

4 "(ii) CATEGORICAL MEDICAL ASSIST-
5 ANCE EXPENDITURES.—The term 'categor-
6 ical medical assistance expenditures'
7 means, with respect to a State, 1903A en-
8 rollee category, and fiscal year, an amount
9 equal to the total medical assistance ex-
10 penditures (as defined in paragraph (2))
11 for the State and fiscal year that are at-
12 tributable to 1903A enrollees in the cat-
13 egory, excluding any excluded expenditures
14 (as defined in paragraph (3)) for the State
15 and fiscal year that are attributable to 16 1903A enrollees in the category.

17 "(d) CALCULATION OF FY19 PROVISIONAL TARGET
18 AMOUNT FOR EACH 1903A ENROLLEE CATEGORY.—Sub-
19 ject to subsection (g), the following shall apply:

20 "(1) CALCULATION OF BASE AMOUNTS FOR PER
21 CAPITA BASE PERIOD.—For each State the Sec-
22 retary shall calculate (and provide notice to the 23 State not later than April 1, 2018, of) the following:

24 "(A) The amount of the adjusted total
25 medical assistance expenditures (as defined in 69

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 subsection (b)(1)) for the State for the State's
2 per capita base period.

3 "(B) The number of 1903A enrollees for
4 the State in the State's per capita base period
5 (as determined under subsection (e)(4)).

6 "(C) The average per capita medical as-
7 sistance expenditures for the State for the 8 State's per capita base period equal to—

9 "(i) the amount calculated under sub-
10 paragraph (A); divided by

11 "(ii) the number calculated under sub-
12 paragraph (B).

13 "(2) FISCAL YEAR 2019 AVERAGE PER CAPITA
14 AMOUNT BASED ON INFLATING THE PER CAPITA
15 BASE PERIOD AMOUNT TO FISCAL YEAR 2019 BY CPI-16 MEDICAL.—The Secretary shall calculate a fiscal 17 year 2019 average per capita amount for each State
18 equal to—

19 "(A) the average per capita medical assist-
20 ance expenditures for the State for the State's 21 per capita base period (calculated under para-22 graph (1)(C)); increased by

23 "(B) the percentage increase in the med-
24 ical care component of the consumer price index
25 for all urban consumers (U.S. city average)
70

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 from the last month of the State's per capita
2 base period to September of fiscal year 2019.
3 "(3) AGGREGATE AND AVERAGE EXPENDI-
4 TURES PER CAPITA FOR FISCAL YEAR 2019.—The
5 Secretary shall calculate for each State the fol-
6 lowing:

7 "(A) The amount of the adjusted total
8 medical assistance expenditures (as defined in 9 subsection (b)(1)) for the State for fiscal year
10 2019.

11 "(B) The number of 1903A enrollees for 12 the State in fiscal year 2019 (as determined 13 under subsection (e)(4)).

14 "(4) PER CAPITA EXPENDITURES FOR FISCAL
15 YEAR 2019 FOR EACH 1903A ENROLLEE CATEGORY.—

16 The Secretary shall calculate (and provide notice to 17 each State not later than January 1, 2020, of) the 18 following:

19 "(A)(i) For each 1903A enrollee category,
20 the amount of the adjusted total medical assist-
21 ance expenditures (as defined in subsection 22 (b)(1)) for the State for fiscal year 2019 for in-23 dividuals in the enrollee category, calculated by 24 excluding from medical assistance expenditures
25 those expenditures attributable to expenditures
71

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 described in clause (iii) or non-DSH supple-
2 mental expenditures (as defined in clause (ii)).

3 "(ii) In this paragraph, the term 'non-
4 DSH supplemental expenditure' means a pay-
5 ment to a provider under the State plan (or 6 under a waiver of the plan) that—

7 "(I) is not made under section 1923;

8 "(II) is not made with respect to a
9 specific item or service for an individual;

10 "(III) is in addition to any payments
11 made to the provider under the plan (or 12 waiver) for any such item or service; and 13 "(IV) complies with the limits for ad-

14 ditional payments to providers under the 15 plan (or waiver) imposed pursuant to sec-
16 tion 1902(a)(30)(A), including the regula-
17 tions specifying upper payment limits
18 under the State plan in part 447 of title

19 42, Code of Federal Regulations (or any 20 successor regulations).
21 "(iii) An expenditure described in this
22 clause is an expenditure that meets the criteria
23 specified in subclauses (I), (II), and (III) of 24 clause (ii) and is authorized under section 1115
25 for the purposes of funding a delivery system
72

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 reform pool, uncompensated care pool, a des-
2 igned State health program, or any other
3 similar expenditure (as defined by the Sec-
4 retary).

5 "(B) For each 1903A enrollee category,
6 the number of 1903A enrollees for the State in 7 fiscal year 2019 in the enrollee category (as de-
8 termined under subsection (e)(4)).

9 "(C) For the State's per capita base pe-
10 riod, the State's non-DSH supplemental and 11 pool payment percentage is equal to the ratio
12 (expressed as a percentage) of—

13 "(i) the total amount of non-DSH 14 supplemental expenditures (as defined in 15 subparagraph (A)(ii) and adjusted under 16 subparagraph (E)) and payments described 17 in subparagraph (A)(iii) (and adjusted 18 under subparagraph (E)) for the State for 19 the period; to

20 "(ii) the amount described in sub-
21 section (b)(1)(A) for the State for the 22 State's per capita base period.

23 "(D) For each 1903A enrollee category an 24 average medical assistance expenditures per 73

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 capita for the State for fiscal year 2019 for the 2 enrollee category equal to—

3 "(i) the amount calculated under sub-
4 paragraph (A) for the State, increased by 5 the non-DSH supplemental and pool pay-
6 ment percentage for the State (as cal-
7 culated under subparagraph (C)); divided
8 by

9 "(ii) the number calculated under sub-
10 paragraph (B) for the State for the en-
11 rollee category.

12 "(E) For purposes of subparagraph (C)(i),
13 in calculating the total amount of non-DSH
14 supplemental expenditures and payments de-
15 scribed in subparagraph (A)(iii) for a State for 16 the per capita base period, the total amount of 17 such expenditures and the total amount of such 18 payments for the State and base period shall 19 each be divided by 2.

20 "(5) PROVISIONAL FY19 PER CAPITA TARGET
21 AMOUNT FOR EACH 1903A ENROLLEE CATEGORY.—

22 Subject to subsection (f)(2), the Secretary shall cal-
23 culate for each State a provisional FY19 per capita
24 target amount for each 1903A enrollee category
25 equal to the average medical assistance expenditures
74

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 per capita for the State for fiscal year 2019 (as cal-
2 culated under paragraph (4)(D)) for such enrollee
3 category multiplied by the ratio of—

4 "(A) the product of—

5 "(i) the fiscal year 2019 average per
6 capita amount for the State, as calculated
7 under paragraph (2); and

8 "(ii) the number of 1903A enrollees
9 for the State in fiscal year 2019, as cal-
10 culated under paragraph (3)(B); to 11 "(B) the amount of the adjusted total

12 medical assistance expenditures for the State
13 for fiscal year 2019, as calculated under para-
14 graph (3)(A).

15 "(e) 1903A ENROLLEE; 1903A ENROLLEE CAT-
16 EGORY.—Subject to subsection (g), for purposes of this 17 section, the following shall apply:

18 "(1) 1903A ENROLLEE.—The term '1903A en-
19 rollee' means, with respect to a State and a month
20 and subject to subsection (i)(1)(B), any Medicaid
21 enrollee (as defined in paragraph (3)) for the month,
22 other than such an enrollee who for such month is 23 in any of the following categories of excluded indi-
24 viduals:

75

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) CHIP.—An individual who is pro-
2 vided, under this title in the manner described
3 in section 2101(a)(2), child health assistance
4 under title XXI.

5 "(B) IHS.—An individual who receives
6 any medical assistance under this title for serv-
7 ices for which payment is made under the third
8 sentence of section 1905(b).

9 "(C) BREAST AND CERVICAL CANCER
10 SERVICES ELIGIBLE INDIVIDUAL.—An indi-
11 vidual who is eligible for medical assistance
12 under this title only on the basis of section

13 1902(a)(10)(A)(ii)(XVIII).

14 "(D) PARTIAL-BENEFIT ENROLLEES.—An

15 individual who—

16 "(i) is an alien who is eligible for

17 medical assistance under this title only on

18 the basis of section 1903(v)(2);

19 "(ii) is eligible for medical assistance

20 under this title only on the basis of sub-

21 clause (XII) or (XXI) of section

22 1902(a)(10)(A)(ii) (or on the basis of a

23 waiver that provides only comparable bene-

24 fits);

76

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(iii) is a dual eligible individual (as

2 defined in section 1915(h)(2)(B)) and is

3 eligible for medical assistance under this

4 title (or under a waiver) only for some or

5 all of medicare cost-sharing (as defined in 6 section 1905(p)(3)); or

7 "(iv) is eligible for medical assistance

8 under this title and for whom the State is

9 providing a payment or subsidy to an em-

10 ployer for coverage of the individual under

11 a group health plan pursuant to section

12 1906 or section 1906A (or pursuant to a

13 waiver that provides only comparable bene-

14 fits).

15 "(E) BLIND AND DISABLED CHILDREN.—

16 An individual who—

17 "(i) is a child under 19 years of age;

18 and

19 "(ii) is eligible for medical assistance

20 under this title on the basis of being blind

21 or disabled.

22 "(2) 1903A ENROLLEE CATEGORY.—The term

23 '1903A enrollee category' means each of the fol-

24 lowing:

77

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) ELDERLY.—A category of 1903A en-

2 rollees who are 65 years of age or older.

3 "(B) BLIND AND DISABLED.—A category

4 of 1903A enrollees (not described in the pre-

5 vious subparagraph) who—

6 "(i) are 19 years of age or older; and

7 "(ii) are eligible for medical assistance

8 under this title on the basis of being blind

9 or disabled.

10 "(C) CHILDREN.—A category of 1903A

11 enrollees (not described in a previous subpara-12 graph) who are children under 19 years of age.

13 "(D) EXPANSION ENROLLEES.—A cat-
14 egory of 1903A enrollees (not described in a 15 previous subparagraph) who are eligible for 16 medical assistance under this title only on the 17 basis of clause (i)(VIII), (ii)(XX), or 18 (ii)(XXIII) of section 1902(a)(10)(A).

19 "(E) OTHER NONELDERLY, NONDISABLED,
20 NON-EXPANSION ADULTS.—A category of 21 1903A enrollees who are not described in any 22 previous subparagraph.

23 "(3) MEDICAID ENROLLEE.—The term 'Med-
24 icaid enrollee' means, with respect to a State for a 25 month, an individual who is eligible for medical as-78

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 sistance for items or services under this title and en-
2 rolled under the State plan (or a waiver of such
3 plan) under this title for the month.

4 "(4) DETERMINATION OF NUMBER OF 1903A
5 ENROLLEES.—The number of 1903A enrollees for a
6 State and fiscal year or the State's per capita base
7 period, and, if applicable, for a 1903A enrollee cat-
8 egory, is the average monthly number of Medicaid
9 enrollees for such State and fiscal year or base pe-
10 riod (and, if applicable, in such category) that are 11 reported through the CMS-64 report under (and 12 subject to audit under) subsection (h).

13 "(f) SPECIAL PAYMENT RULES.—

14 "(1) APPLICATION IN CASE OF RESEARCH AND 15 DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS AND OTHER WAIVERS.—

16 In the case of a State with a waiver of the State
17 plan approved under section 1115, section 1915, or 18 another provision of this title, this section shall 19 apply to medical assistance expenditures and medical 20 assistance payments under the waiver, in the same
21 manner as if such expenditures and payments had 22 been made under a State plan under this title and 23 the limitations on expenditures under this section
24 shall supersede any other payment limitations or 25 provisions (including limitations based on a per cap-
79

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 ita limitation) otherwise applicable under such a
2 waiver.

3 "(2) TREATMENT OF STATES EXPANDING COV-
4 ERAGE AFTER FISCAL YEAR 2016.—In the case of a
5 State that did not provide for medical assistance for 6 the 1903A enrollee category described in subsection

7 (e)(2)(D) during fiscal year 2016 but which provides
8 for such assistance for such category in a subse-
9 quent year, the provisional FY19 per capita target
10 amount for such enrollee category under subsection
11 (d)(5) shall be equal to the provisional FY19 per 12 capita target amount for the 1903A enrollee cat-
13 egory described in subsection (e)(2)(E).

14 "(3) IN CASE OF STATE FAILURE TO REPORT
15 NECESSARY DATA.—If a State for any quarter in a 16 fiscal year (beginning with fiscal year 2019) fails to 17 satisfactorily submit data on expenditures and en-
18 rollees in accordance with subsection (h)(1), for such 19 fiscal year and any succeeding fiscal year for which 20 such data are not satisfactorily submitted—

21 "(A) the Secretary shall calculate and
22 apply subsections (a) through (e) with respect
23 to the State as if all 1903A enrollee categories
24 for which such expenditure and enrollee data
80

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 were not satisfactorily submitted were a single
2 1903A enrollee category; and

3 "(B) the growth factor otherwise applied
4 under subsection (c)(2)(B) shall be decreased
5 by 1 percentage point.

6 "(g) RECALCULATION OF CERTAIN AMOUNTS FOR 7 DATA ERRORS.—The amounts and percentage calculated
8 under paragraphs (1) and (4)(C) of subsection (d) for a 9 State for the State's per capita base period, and the 10 amounts of the adjusted total medical assistance expendi-
11 tures calculated under subsection (b) and the number of 12 Medicaid enrollees and 1903A enrollees determined under 13 subsection (e)(4) for a State for the State's per capita 14 base period, fiscal year 2019, and any subsequent fiscal 15 year, may be adjusted by the Secretary based upon an ap-
16 peal (filed by the State in such a form, manner, and time,
17 and containing such information relating to data errors
18 that support such appeal, as the Secretary specifies) that 19 the Secretary determines to be valid, except that any ad-
20 justment by the Secretary under this subsection for a 21 State may not result in an increase of the target total
22 medical assistance expenditures exceeding 2 percent.

23 "(h) REQUIRED REPORTING AND AUDITING; TRANSI-
24 TIONAL INCREASE IN FEDERAL MATCHING PERCENTAGE
25 FOR CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES.—

81

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(1) REPORTING OF CMS-64 DATA.—

2 "(A) IN GENERAL.—In addition to the
3 data required on form Group VIII on the CMS-

4 64 report form as of January 1, 2017, in each
5 CMS-64 report required to be submitted (for 6 each quarter beginning on or after October 1,
7 2018), the State shall include data on medical 8 assistance expenditures within such categories
9 of services and categories of enrollees (including
10 each 1903A enrollee category and each category
11 of excluded individuals under subsection (e)(1))
12 and the numbers of enrollees within each of 13 such enrollee categories, as the Secretary deter-
14 mines are necessary (including timely guidance
15 published as soon as possible after the date of 16 the enactment of this section) in order to imple-
17 ment this section and to enable States to com-
18 ply with the requirement of this paragraph on 19 a timely basis.

20 "(B) REPORTING ON QUALIFIED INPA-
21 TIENT PSYCHIATRIC HOSPITAL SERVICES.—Not
22 later than 60 days after the date of the enact-
23 ment of this section, the Secretary shall modify
24 the CMS-64 report form to require that States
25 submit data with respect to medical assistance
82

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 expenditures for qualified inpatient psychiatric
2 hospital services (as defined in section
3 1905(h)(3)).

4 "(C) REPORTING ON CHILDREN WITH 5 COMPLEX MEDICAL CONDITIONS.—Not later
6 than January 1, 2020, the Secretary shall mod-
7 ify the CMS-64 report form to require that 8 States submit data with respect to individuals
9 who—

10 "(i) are enrolled in a State plan under 11 this title or title XXI or under a waiver of 12 such plan;

13 "(ii) are under 21 years of age; and 14 "(iii) have a chronic medical condition

15 or serious injury that—

16 "(I) affects two or more body
17 systems;

18 "(II) affects cognitive or physical 19 functioning (such as reducing the abil-
20 ity to perform the activities of daily
21 living, including the ability to engage
22 in movement or mobility, eat, drink,
23 communicate, or breathe independ-
24 ently); and

25 "(III) either—

83

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(aa) requires intensive
2 healthcare interventions (such as
3 multiple medications, therapies,
4 or durable medical equipment)
5 and intensive care coordination to
6 optimize health and avoid hos-
7 pitalizations or emergency de-
8 partment visits; or 9 "(bb) meets the criteria for 10 medical complexity under existing 11 risk adjustment methodologies
12 using a recognized, publicly avail-
13 able pediatric grouping system
14 (such as the pediatric complex
15 conditions classification system
16 or the Pediatric Medical Com-
17 plexity Algorithm) selected by the 18 Secretary in close collaboration
19 with the State agencies respon-
20 sible for administering State
21 plans under this title and a na-
22 tional panel of pediatric, pedi-
23 atric specialty, and pediatric sub-
24 specialty experts.

84

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(2) AUDITING OF CMS-64 DATA.—The Sec-
2 retary shall conduct for each State an audit of the 3 number of individuals and expenditures reported
4 through the CMS-64 report for the State's per cap-
5 ita base period, fiscal year 2019, and each subse-
6 quent fiscal year, which audit may be conducted on 7 a representative sample (as determined by the Sec-
8 retary).

9 "(3) AUDITING OF STATE SPENDING.—The In-
10 spector General of the Department of Health and 11 Human Services shall conduct an audit (which shall 12 be conducted using random sampling, as determined
13 by the Inspector General) of each State's spending
14 under this section not less than once every 3 years.

15 "(4) TEMPORARY INCREASE IN FEDERAL
16 MATCHING PERCENTAGE TO SUPPORT IMPROVED
17 DATA REPORTING SYSTEMS FOR FISCAL YEARS 2018
18 AND 2019.—In the case of any State that selects as 19 its per capita base period the most recent 8 consecu-
20 tive quarter period for which the data necessary to 21 make the determinations required under this section
22 is available, for amounts expended during calendar
23 quarters beginning on or after October 1, 2017, and 24 before October 1, 2019—

85

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) the Federal matching percentage ap-
2 plied under section 1903(a)(3)(A)(i) shall be in-
3 creased by 10 percentage points to 100 percent;

4 "(B) the Federal matching percentage ap-
5 plied under section 1903(a)(3)(B) shall be in-
6 creased by 25 percentage points to 100 percent;

7 and

8 "(C) the Federal matching percentage ap-
9 plied under section 1903(a)(7) shall be in-
10 creased by 10 percentage points to 60 percent
11 but only with respect to amounts expended that 12 are attributable to a State's additional adminis-
13 trative expenditures to implement the data re-
14 quirements of paragraph (1).

15 "(5) HHS REPORT ON ADOPTION OF T-MSIS
16 DATA.—Not later than January 1, 2025, the Sec-
17 retary shall submit to Congress a report making rec-
18 ommendations as to whether data from the Trans-
19 formed Medicaid Statistical Information System
20 would be preferable to CMS-64 report data for pur-
21 poses of making the determinations necessary under 22 this section."

86

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 134. FLEXIBLE BLOCK GRANT OPTION FOR STATES.

2 Title XIX of the Social Security Act, as amended by
3 section 133, is further amended by inserting after section
4 1903A the following new section:

5 "SEC. 1903B. MEDICAID FLEXIBILITY PROGRAM.

6 "(a) IN GENERAL.—Beginning with fiscal year 2020,
7 any State (as defined in subsection (e)) that has an appli-
8 cation approved by the Secretary under subsection (b)
9 may conduct a Medicaid Flexibility Program to provide 10 targeted health assistance to program enrollees.

11 "(b) STATE APPLICATION.—

12 "(1) IN GENERAL.—To be eligible to conduct a 13 Medicaid Flexibility Program, a State shall submit
14 an application to the Secretary that meets the re-
15 quirements of this subsection.

16 "(2) CONTENTS OF APPLICATION.—An applica-
17 tion under this subsection shall include the fol-
18 lowing:

19 "(A) A description of the proposed Med-
20 icaid Flexibility Program and how the State will 21 satisfy the requirements described in subsection
22 (d).

23 "(B) The proposed conditions for eligibility

24 of program enrollees.

25 "(C) A description of the types, amount,
26 duration, and scope of services which will be of-
87

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 fered as targeted health assistance under the
2 program, including a description of the pro-
3 posed package of services which will be provided
4 to program enrollees to whom the State would 5 otherwise be required to make medical assist-
6 ance available under section 1902(a)(10)(A)(i).

7 "(D) A description of how the State will
8 notify individuals currently enrolled in the State
9 plan for medical assistance under this title of 10 the transition to such program.

11 "(E) Statements certifying that the State
12 agrees to—

13 "(i) submit regular enrollment data
14 with respect to the program to the Centers
15 for Medicare & Medicaid Services at such 16 time and in such manner as the Secretary
17 may require;

18 "(ii) submit timely and accurate data
19 to the Transformed Medicaid Statistical
20 Information System (T-MSIS);

21 "(iii) report annually to the Secretary
22 on adult health quality measures imple-
23 mented under the program and informa-
24 tion on the quality of health care furnished
25 to program enrollees under the program as 88

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 part of the annual report required under
2 section 1139B(d)(1);

3 "(iv) submit such additional informa-
4 tion not described in any of the preceding
5 clauses of this subparagraph but which the 6 Secretary determines is necessary for mon-
7 itoring, evaluation, or program integrity
8 purposes, including—

9 "(I) survey data, such as the 10 data from Consumer Assessment of 11 Healthcare Providers and Systems
12 (CAHPS) surveys;

13 "(II) birth certificate data; and 14 "(III) clinical patient data for 15 quality measurements which may not

16 be present in a claim, such as labora-
17 tory data, body mass index, and blood
18 pressure; and

19 "(v) on an annual basis, conduct a re-
20 port evaluating the program and make
21 such report available to the public.
22 "(F) An information technology systems
23 plan demonstrating that the State has the capa-
24 bility to support the technological administra-
89

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 tion of the program and comply with reporting
2 requirements under this section.

3 "(G) A statement of the goals of the pro-
4 posed program, which shall include—

5 "(i) goals related to quality, access,
6 rate of growth targets, consumer satisfac-
7 tion, and outcomes;

8 "(ii) a plan for monitoring and evalu-
9 ating the program to determine whether 10 such goals are being met; and 11 "(iii) a proposed process for the State,

12 in consultation with the Centers for Medi-
13 care & Medicaid Services, to take remedial
14 action to make progress on unmet goals.

15 "(H) Such other information as the Sec-
16 retary may require.

17 "(3) STATE NOTICE AND COMMENT PERIOD.—

18 "(A) IN GENERAL.—Before submitting an 19 application under this subsection, a State shall 20 make the application publicly available for a 30
21 day notice and comment period.

22 "(B) NOTICE AND COMMENT PROCESS.—

23 During the notice and comment period de-
24 scribed in subparagraph (A), the State shall 25 provide opportunities for a meaningful level of 90

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 public input, which shall include public hearings
2 on the proposed Medicaid Flexibility Program.

3 "(4) FEDERAL NOTICE AND COMMENT PE-
4 RIOD.—The Secretary shall not approve of any ap-
5 plication to conduct a Medicaid Flexibility Program
6 without making such application publicly available
7 for a 30 day notice and comment period.

8 "(5) TIMELINE FOR SUBMISSION.—

9 "(A) IN GENERAL.—A State may submit
10 an application under this subsection to conduct
11 a Medicaid Flexibility Program that would 12 begin in the next fiscal year at any time, sub-
13 ject to subparagraph (B).

14 "(B) DEADLINES.—Each year beginning
15 with 2019, the Secretary shall specify a dead-

16 line for submitting an application under this 17 subsection to conduct a Medicaid Flexibility
18 Program that would begin in the next fiscal 19 year, but such deadline shall not be earlier than 20 60 days after the date that the Secretary pub-
21 lishes the amounts of State block grants as re-
22 quired under subsection (c)(4).

23 "(c) FINANCING.—

24 "(1) IN GENERAL.—For each fiscal year during 25 which a State is conducting a Medicaid Flexibility
91

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 Program, the State shall receive, instead of amounts
2 otherwise payable to the State under this title for 3 medical assistance for program enrollees, the 4 amount specified in paragraph (3)(A).

5 "(2) AMOUNT OF BLOCK GRANT FUNDS.—

6 "(A) FOR INITIAL YEAR.—Subject to sub-
7 paragraph (C), for the first fiscal year in which 8 a State conducts a Medicaid Flexibility Pro-
9 gram, the block grant amount under this para-
10 graph for the State and year shall be equal to 11 the Federal average medical assistance match-
12 ing percentage (as defined in section
13 1903A(a)(4)) for the State and year multiplied
14 by the product of—

15 "(i) the target per capita medical as-16 sistance expenditures (as defined in section 17 1903A(c)(2)) for the State and year for 18 the enrollee category described in section
19 1903A(e)(2)(E); and

20 "(ii) the number of 1903A enrollees in 21 such category for the State for the second
22 fiscal year preceding such first fiscal year,
23 increased by the percentage increase in 24 State population from such second pre-
25 ceding fiscal year to such first fiscal year,
92

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 based on the best available estimates of the 2 Bureau of the Census.

3 "(B) FOR ANY SUBSEQUENT YEAR.—For
4 any fiscal year that is not the first fiscal year
5 in which a State conducts a Medicaid Flexibility
6 Program, the block grant amount under this
7 paragraph for the State and year shall be equal
8 to the block grant amount determined for the 9 State for the most recent previous fiscal year in 10 which the State conducted a Medicaid Flexi-
11 bility Program, except that such amount shall 12 be increased by the percentage increase in the 13 consumer price index for all urban consumers

14 (U.S. city average) from April of the second fis-
15 cal year preceding the fiscal year involved to 16 April of the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year
17 involved.

18 "(C) CAP ON TOTAL POPULATION OF 1903A
19 ENROLLEES FOR PURPOSES OF BLOCK GRANT
20 CALCULATION.—

21 "(i) IN GENERAL.—In calculating the
22 amount of a block grant for the first year
23 in which a State conducts a Medicaid
24 Flexibility Program under subparagraph
25 (A), the total number of 1903A enrollees
93

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 in the 1903A enrollee category described in 2 section 1903A(e)(2)(E) for the State and
3 year shall not exceed the adjusted number
4 of base period non-expansion enrollees for 5 the State (as defined in clause (ii)).

6 "(ii) ADJUSTED NUMBER OF 2016
7 NON-EXPANSION ENROLLEES.—The term
8 'adjusted number of base period non-ex-
9 pansion enrollees' means, with respect to a
10 State, the number of 1903A enrollees in
11 the enrollee category described in section
12 1903A(e)(2)(E) for the State for the 13 State's per capita base period (as deter-14 mined under section 1903A(e)(4)), in-
15 creased by the percentage increase, if any,
16 in the total State population from the last
17 April in the State's per capita base period
18 to April of the fiscal year preceding the fis-19 cal year involved (determined using the 20 best available data from the Bureau of the 21 Census) plus 3 percentage points.

22 "(D) AVAILABILITY OF ROLLOVER
23 FUNDS.—

24 "(i) IN GENERAL.—To the extent that
25 the block grant amount available to a
94

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 State for a fiscal year under this para-
2 graph exceeds the amount of Federal pay-
3 ments made to the State for such fiscal
4 year under paragraph (3)(A), the Sec-
5 retary shall make such funds available to 6 the State for the succeeding fiscal year if 7 the State—

8 "(I) satisfies the State maintenance of effort requirement under 9 paragraph (3)(B); and
10 "(II) is conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program in such succeeding 11 fiscal year.
12 "(ii) USE OF FUNDS.—Section
13 1903(i)(17) shall not apply to funds made 14 available to a State under this subparagraph and a State may use such funds for 15 other State health programs (as defined or 16 approved by the Secretary) or for any 17 other purpose which is consistent with the 18 quality standards established by the Secretary under clause (iii).

19 "(iii) QUALITY STANDARDS.—

20 "(I) IN GENERAL.—Not later
21 than January 1, 2020, the Secretary
22 shall

23 ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.
24 shall establish quality standards applicable to a State's use of funds made 25 available to the State under this subparagraph.

26 "(II) ALLOWABLE USES.—In establishing quality standards under 27 this clause, the Secretary shall not 28 prohibit a State from using such 29 funds for—

30 "(aa) a program that is not
31 related to health care, provided
32 that using the funds for such 33 program is otherwise consistent
34 with the standards; or

35 "(bb) the State maintenance of effort expenditures required
36 under paragraph (3)(B).

37 "(3) FEDERAL PAYMENT AND STATE MAINTENANCE OF EFFORT.—

38 "(A) FEDERAL PAYMENT.—Subject to subparagraph (D), the Secretary shall pay to each 39 State conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program under this section for a fiscal year, from 40 its block grant amount under paragraph (2) for 41 such year, an amount for each quarter of such
42 year

43 ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.
44 1 year equal to the Federal average medical assistance percentage (as defined in section 45 1903A(a)(4)) of the total amount expended

4 under the program during such quarter, and 5 the State is responsible for the balance of the 6 funds to carry out such program.

7 "(B) STATE MAINTENANCE OF EFFORT
8 EXPENDITURES.—For each year during which a

9 State is conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Pro-
10 gram, the State shall make expenditures for 11 targeted health assistance under the program in 12 an amount equal to the product of—

13 "(i) the block grant amount deter-
14 mined for the State and year under para-
15 graph (2); and

16 "(ii) the enhanced FMAP described in 17 the first sentence of section 2105(b) for 18 the State and year.

19 "(C) REDUCTION IN BLOCK GRANT
20 AMOUNT FOR STATES FAILING TO MEET MOE
21 REQUIREMENT.—

22 "(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a
23 State conducting a Medicaid Flexibility
24 Program that makes expenditures for tar-
25 geted health assistance under the program
97

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 for a fiscal year in an amount that is less
2 than the required amount for the fiscal
3 year under subparagraph (B), the amount
4 of the block grant determined for the State
5 under paragraph (2) for the succeeding fis-
6 cal year shall be reduced by the amount by 7 which such expenditures are less than such 8 required amount.

9 "(ii) DISREGARD OF REDUCTION.—
10 For purposes of determining the amount of 11 a State block grant under paragraph (2),
12 any reduction made under this subpara-
13 graph to a State's block grant amount in 14 a previous fiscal year shall be disregarded.

15 "(iii) APPLICATION TO STATES THAT 16 TERMINATE PROGRAM.—In the case of a
17 State described in clause (i) that termi-
18 nates the State Medicaid Flexibility Pro-
19 gram under subsection (d)(2)(B) and such 20 termination is effective with the end of the 21 fiscal year in which the State fails to make 22 the required amount of expenditures under 23 subparagraph (B), the reduction amount
24 determined for the State and succeeding
98

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 fiscal year under clause (i) shall be treated
2 as an overpayment under this title.
3 "(D) REDUCTION FOR NONCOMPLIANCE.—
4 If the Secretary determines that a State con-
5 ducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program is not
6 complying with the requirements of this section,
7 the Secretary may withhold payments, reduce 8 payments, or recover previous payments to the 9 State under this section as the Secretary deems 10 appropriate.

11 "(4) DETERMINATION AND PUBLICATION OF 12 BLOCK GRANT AMOUNT.—Beginning in 2019 and 13 each year thereafter, the Secretary shall determine 14 for each State, regardless of whether the State is 15 conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program or has 16 submitted an application to conduct such a program,
17 the amount of the block grant for the State under 18 paragraph (2) which would apply for the upcoming 19 fiscal year if the State were to conduct such a pro-
20 gram in such fiscal year, and shall publish such de-
21 terminations not later than June 1 of each year.

22 "(d) PROGRAM REQUIREMENTS.—
23 "(1) IN GENERAL.—No payment shall be made
24 under this section to a State conducting a Medicaid
99

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 Flexibility Program unless such program meets the 2 requirements of this subsection.

3 "(2) TERM OF PROGRAM.—

4 "(A) IN GENERAL.—A State Medicaid
5 Flexibility Program approved under subsection
6 (b)—

7 "(i) shall be conducted for not less
8 than 1 program period;

9 "(ii) at the option of the State, may 10 be continued for succeeding program peri-
11 ods without resubmitting an application
12 under subsection (b), provided that—

13 "(I) the State provides notice to 14 the Secretary of its decision to con-
15 tinue the program; and 16 "(II) no significant changes are 17 made to the program; and

18 "(iii) shall be subject to termination
19 only by the State, which may terminate the 20 program by making an election under sub-
21 paragraph (B).

22 "(B) ELECTION TO TERMINATE PRO-
23 GRAM.—

24 "(i) IN GENERAL.—Subject to clause

25 (ii), a State conducting a Medicaid Flexi-
100

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 bility Program may elect to terminate the 2 program effective with the first day after 3 the end of the program period in which the 4 State makes the election.

5 "(ii) TRANSITION PLAN REQUIRE-
6 MENT.—A State may not elect to termi-
7 nate a Medicaid Flexibility Program unless
8 the State has in place an appropriate tran-
9 sition plan approved by the Secretary.

10 "(iii) EFFECT OF TERMINATION.—If a
11 State elects to terminate a Medicaid Flexi-
12 bility Program, the per capita cap limita-
13 tions under section 1903A shall apply ef-
14 fective with the day described in clause (i),
15 and such limitations shall be applied as if 16 the State had never conducted a Medicaid
17 Flexibility Program.

18 "(3) PROVISION OF TARGETED HEALTH ASSIST-
19 ANCE.—

20 "(A) IN GENERAL.—A State Medicaid
21 Flexibility Program shall provide targeted 22 health assistance to program enrollees and such 23 assistance shall be instead of medical assistance
24 which would otherwise be provided to the enroll-
25 ees under this title.

101

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(B) CONDITIONS FOR ELIGIBILITY.—

2 "(i) IN GENERAL.—A State con-
3 ducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program
4 shall establish conditions for eligibility of 5 program enrollees, which shall be instead
6 of other conditions for eligibility under this 7 title, except that the program must provide 8 for eligibility for program enrollees to 9 whom the State would otherwise be re-
10 quired to make medical assistance available
11 under section 1902(a)(10)(A)(i).

12 "(ii) MAGI.—Any determination of 13 income necessary to establish the eligibility
14 of a program enrollee for purposes of a 15 State Medicaid Flexibility Program shall 16 be made using modified adjusted gross in-
17 come in accordance with section
18 1902(e)(14).

19 "(4) BENEFITS AND SERVICES.—

20 "(A) REQUIRED SERVICES.—In the case of 21 program enrollees to whom the State would oth-

22 erwise be required to make medical assistance
23 available under section 1902(a)(10)(A)(i), a 24 State conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Pro-
102

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 gram shall provide as targeted health assistance
2 the following types of services:

3 "(i) Inpatient and outpatient hospital
4 services.

5 "(ii) Laboratory and X-ray services.

6 "(iii) Nursing facility services for indi-
7 viduals aged 21 and older.

8 "(iv) Physician services.

9 "(v) Home health care services (in-
10 cluding home nursing services, medical 11 supplies, equipment, and appliances).

12 "(vi) Rural health clinic services (as 13 defined in section 1905(1)(1)).

14 "(vii) Federally-qualified health center
15 services (as defined in section 1905(1)(2)).

16 "(viii) Family planning services and 17 supplies.

18 "(ix) Nurse midwife services.

19 "(x) Certified pediatric and family
20 nurse practitioner services.

21 "(xi) Freestanding birth center serv-
22 ices (as defined in section 1905(1)(3)).

23 "(xii) Emergency medical transpor-
24 tation.

25 "(xiii) Non-cosmetic dental services.
103

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(xiv) Pregnancy-related services, in-
2 cluding postpartum services for the 12-
3 week period beginning on the last day of a
4 pregnancy.

5 "(B) OPTIONAL BENEFITS.—A State may,
6 at its option, provide services in addition to the 7 services described in subparagraph (A) as tar-
8 geted health assistance under a Medicaid Flexi-
9 bility Program.

10 "(C) BENEFIT PACKAGES.—

11 "(i) IN GENERAL.—The targeted
12 health assistance provided by a State to 13 any group of program enrollees under a 14 Medicaid Flexibility Program shall have an 15 aggregate actuarial value that is equal to 16 at least 95 percent of the aggregate actu-
17 arial value of the benchmark coverage de-

18 scribed in subsection (b)(1) of section 1937
19 or benchmark-equivalent coverage de-
20 scribed in subsection (b)(2) of such sec-
21 tion, as such subsections were in effect
22 prior to the enactment of the Patient Pro-
23 tection and Affordable Care Act.
24 "(ii) AMOUNT, DURATION, AND SCOPE
25 OF BENEFITS.—Subject to clause (i), the 104

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 State shall determine the amount, dura-
2 tion, and scope with respect to services
3 provided as targeted health assistance
4 under a Medicaid Flexibility Program, in-
5 cluding with respect to services that are re-
6 quired to be provided to certain program
7 enrollees under subparagraph (A) except 8 as otherwise provided under such subpara-
9 graph.

10 "(iii) MENTAL HEALTH AND SUB-
11 STANCE USE DISORDER COVERAGE AND 12 PARITY.—The targeted health assistance
13 provided by a State to program enrollees
14 under a Medicaid Flexibility Program shall 15 include mental health services and sub-
16 stance use disorder services and the finan-
17 cial requirements and treatment limitations
18 applicable to such services under the pro-
19 gram shall comply with the requirements
20 of section 2726 of the Public Health Serv-
21 ice Act in the same manner as such re-
22 quirements apply to a group health plan.
23 "(iv) PRESCRIPTION DRUGS.—If the 24 targeted health assistance provided by a
25 State to program enrollees under a Med-
105

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 icaid Flexibility Program includes assist-
2 ance for covered outpatient drugs, such
3 drugs shall be subject to a rebate agree-
4 ment that complies with the requirements
5 of section 1927, and any requirements ap-
6 plicable to medical assistance for covered
7 outpatient drugs under a State plan (in-
8 cluding the requirement that the State pro-
9 vide information to a manufacturer) shall 10 apply in the same manner to targeted
11 health assistance for covered outpatient
12 drugs under a Medicaid Flexibility Pro-
13 gram.

14 "(D) COST SHARING.—A State conducting
15 a Medicaid Flexibility Program may impose
16 premiums, deductibles, cost-sharing, or other
17 similar charges, except that the total annual ag-
18 gregate amount of all such charges imposed
19 with respect to all program enrollees in a family 20 shall not exceed 5 percent of the family's in-21 come for the year involved.

22 "(5) ADMINISTRATION OF PROGRAM.—Each
23 State conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program
24 shall do the following:

106

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) SINGLE AGENCY.—Designate a single
2 State agency responsible for administering the
3 program.

4 "(B) ENROLLMENT SIMPLIFICATION AND
5 COORDINATION WITH STATE HEALTH INSUR-
6 ANCE EXCHANGES.—Provide for simplified en-
7 rollment processes (such as online enrollment
8 and reenrollment and electronic verification)
9 and coordination with State health insurance
10 exchanges.

11 "(C) BENEFICIARY PROTECTIONS.—Estab-
12 lish a fair process (which the State shall de-
13 scribe in the application required under sub-14 section (b)) for individuals to appeal adverse 15 eligibility determinations with respect to the 16 program.

17 "(6) APPLICATION OF REST OF TITLE XIX.—

18 "(A) IN GENERAL.—To the extent that a 19 provision of this section is inconsistent with an-
20 other provision of this title, the provision of this 21 section shall apply.

22 "(B) APPLICATION OF SECTION 1903A.—

23 With respect to a State that is conducting a
24 Medicaid Flexibility Program, section 1903A
25 shall be applied as if program enrollees were

107

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 not 1903A enrollees for each program period
2 during which the State conducts the program.

3 "(C) WAIVERS AND STATE PLAN AMEND-
4 MENTS.—

5 "(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a
6 State conducting a Medicaid Flexibility
7 Program that has in effect a waiver or 8 State plan amendment, such waiver or 9 amendment shall not apply with respect to 10 the program, targeted health assistance

11 provided under the program, or program
12 enrollees.

13 "(ii) REPLICATION OF WAIVER OR 14 AMENDMENT.—In designing a Medicaid
15 Flexibility Program, a State may mirror
16 provisions of a waiver or State plan
17 amendment described in clause (i) in the 18 program to the extent that such provisions
19 are otherwise consistent with the require-
20 ments of this section.

21 "(iii) EFFECT OF TERMINATION.—In
22 the case of a State described in clause (i)
23 that terminates its program under sub-
24 section (d)(2)(B), any waiver or amend-
25 ment which was limited pursuant to sub-
108

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 paragraph (A) shall cease to be so limited
2 effective with the effective date of such ter-
3 mination.

4 "(D) NONAPPLICATION OF PROVISIONS.—
5 With respect to the design and implementation
6 of Medicaid Flexibility Programs conducted
7 under this section, paragraphs (1), (10)(B),
8 (17), and (23) of section 1902(a), as well as 9 any other provision of this title (except for this 10 section and as otherwise provided by this sec-
11 tion) that the Secretary deems appropriate,
12 shall not apply.

13 "(e) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

14 "(1) MEDICAID FLEXIBILITY PROGRAM.—The 15 term 'Medicaid Flexibility Program' means a State
16 program for providing targeted health assistance to 17 program enrollees funded by a block grant under 18 this section.

19 "(2) PROGRAM ENROLLEE.—

20 "(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'program
21 enrollee' means, with respect to a State that is 22 conducting a Medicaid Flexibility Program, an 23 individual who is a 1903A enrollee (as defined 24 in section 1903A(e)(1)) who is in the 1903A
109

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 enrollee category described in section
2 1903A(e)(2)(E).

3 "(B) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.—For pur-
4 poses of section 1903A(e)(3), eligibility and en-
5 rollment of an individual under a Medicaid
6 Flexibility Program shall be deemed to be eligi-
7 bility and enrollment under a State plan (or

8 waiver of such plan) under this title.
9 "(3) PROGRAM PERIOD.—The term 'program
10 period' means, with respect to a State Medicaid
11 Flexibility Program, a period of 5 consecutive fiscal 12 years that begins with either—
13 "(A) the first fiscal year in which the State
14 conducts the program; or 15 "(B) the next fiscal year in which the 16 State conducts such a program that begins
17 after the end of a previous program period.
18 "(4) STATE.—The term 'State' means one of 19 the 50 States or the District of Columbia.
20 "(5) TARGETED HEALTH ASSISTANCE.—The 21 term 'targeted health assistance' means assistance
22 for health-care-related items and medical services for 23 program enrollees."

110

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 135. MEDICAID AND CHIP QUALITY PERFORMANCE
2 BONUS PAYMENTS.

3 Section 1903 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C.
4 1396b) is amended by adding at the end the following new
5 subsection:

6 "(aa) QUALITY PERFORMANCE BONUS PAYMENTS.—

7 "(1) INCREASED FEDERAL SHARE.—With re-
8 spect to each of fiscal years 2023 through 2026, in 9 the case of one of the 50 States or the District of 10 Columbia (each referred to in this subsection as a 11 'State') that—

12 "(A) equals or exceeds the qualifying
13 amount (as established by the Secretary) of 14 lower than expected aggregate medical assist-
15 ance expenditures (as defined in paragraph (4))
16 for that fiscal year; and

17 "(B) submits to the Secretary, in accord-
18 ance with such manner and format as specified
19 by the Secretary and for the performance pe-
20 riod (as defined by the Secretary) for such fis-
21 cal year—

22 "(i) information on the applicable
23 quality measures identified under para-
24 graph (3) with respect to each category of 25 Medicaid eligible individuals under the 26 State plan or a waiver of such plan; and 111

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(ii) a plan for spending a portion of
2 additional funds resulting from application
3 of this subsection on quality improvement
4 within the State plan under this title or

5 under a waiver of such plan,
6 the Federal matching percentage otherwise ap-
7 plied under subsection (a)(7) for such fiscal 8 year shall be increased by such percentage (as 9 determined by the Secretary) so that the aggre-
10 gate amount of the resulting increase pursuant 11 to this subsection for the State and fiscal year
12 does not exceed the State allotment established
13 under paragraph (2) for the State and fiscal
14 year.

15 "(2) ALLOTMENT DETERMINATION.—The Sec-
16 retary shall establish a formula for computing State
17 allotments under this paragraph for each fiscal year
18 described in paragraph (1) such that—

19 "(A) such an allotment to a State is deter-
20 mined based on the performance, including im-
21 provement, of such State under this title and 22 title XXI with respect to the quality measures
23 submitted under paragraph (3) by such State
24 for the performance period (as defined by the 25 Secretary) for such fiscal year; and 112

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(B) the total of the allotments under this
2 paragraph for all States for the period of the 3 fiscal years described in paragraph (1) is equal
4 to $8,000,000,000.

5 "(3) QUALITY MEASURES REQUIRED FOR
6 BONUS PAYMENTS.—For purposes of this subsection,
7 the Secretary shall, pursuant to rulemaking and 8 after consultation with State agencies administering
9 State plans under this title, identify and publish
10 (and update as necessary) peer-reviewed quality
11 measures (which shall include health care and long-12 term care outcome measures and may include the 13 quality measures that are overseen or developed by 14 the National Committee for Quality Assurance or 15 the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality or 16 that are identified under section 1139A or 1139B)
17 that are quantifiable, objective measures that take 18 into account the clinically appropriate measures of 19 quality for different types of patient populations re-
20 ceiving benefits or services under this title or title
21 XXI.

22 "(4) LOWER THAN EXPECTED AGGREGATE
23 MEDICAL ASSISTANCE EXPENDITURES.—In this sub-
24 section, the term 'lower than expected aggregate

113

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 medical assistance expenditures' means, with respect

2 to a State the amount (if any) by which—
3 "(A) the amount of the adjusted total med-
4 ical assistance expenditures for the State and
5 fiscal year determined in section 1903A(b)(1)
6 without regard to the 1903A enrollee category
7 described in section 1903A(e)(2)(E); is less
8 than

9 "(B) the amount of the target total med-
10 ical assistance expenditures for the State and 11 fiscal year determined in section 1903A(c) with-12 out regard to the 1903A enrollee category de-
13 scribed in section 1903A(e)(2)(E)."

14 SEC. 136. GRANDFATHERING CERTAIN MEDICAID WAIVERS; 15 PRIORITIZATION OF HCBS WAIVERS.

16 (a) MANAGED CARE WAIVERS.—

17 (1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a State with 18 a grandfathered managed care waiver, the State
19 may, at its option through a State plan amendment,
20 continue to implement the managed care delivery
21 system that is the subject of such waiver in per-22 petuity under the State plan under title XIX of the 23 Social Security Act (or a waiver of such plan) with-24 out submitting an application to the Secretary for a
25 new waiver to implement such managed care delivery

114

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 system, so long as the terms and conditions of the 2 waiver involved (other than such terms and condi-
3 tions that relate to budget neutrality as modified
4 pursuant to section 1903A(f)(1) of the Social Secu-
5 rity Act) are not modified.

6 (2) MODIFICATIONS.—

7 (A) IN GENERAL.—If a State with a
8 grandfathered managed care waiver seeks to 9 modify the terms or conditions of such a waiv-
10 er, the State shall submit to the Secretary an 11 application for approval of a new waiver under 12 such modified terms and conditions.

13 (B) APPROVAL OF MODIFICATION.—

14 (i) IN GENERAL.—An application de-
15 scribed in subparagraph (A) is deemed ap-
16 proved unless the Secretary, not later than 17 90 days after the date on which the appli-
18 cation is submitted, submits to the State—

19 (I) a denial; or

20 (II) a request for more informa-
21 tion regarding the application.

22 (ii) ADDITIONAL INFORMATION.—If

23 the Secretary requests additional informa-
24 tion, the Secretary has 30 days after a

25 State submission in response to the Sec-
115

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 retary's request to deny the application or
2 request more information.

3 (3) GRANDFATHERED MANAGED CARE WAIVER

4 DEFINED.—In this subsection, the term "grand-
5 fathered managed care waiver" means the provisions
6 of a waiver or an experimental, pilot, or demonstra-
7 tion project that relate to the authority of a State
8 to implement a managed care delivery system under 9 the State plan under title XIX of such Act (or under 10 a waiver of such plan under section 1115 of such 11 Act) that—

12 (A) is approved by the Secretary of Health
13 and Human Services under section 1915(b),
14 1932, or 1115(a)(1) of the Social Security Act
15 (42 U.S.C. 1396n(b), 1396u-2, 1315(a)(1)) as 16 of January 1, 2017; and

17 (B) has been renewed by the Secretary not 18 less than 1 time.

19 (b) HCBS WAIVERS.—The Secretary of Health and 20 Human Services shall implement procedures encouraging
21 States to adopt or extend waivers related to the authority
22 of a State to make medical assistance available for home
23 and community-based services under the State plan under 24 title XIX of the Social Security Act if the State determines 25 that such waivers would improve patient access to services.

116

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 137. COORDINATION WITH STATES.

2 Title XIX of the Social Security Act is amended by
3 inserting after section 1904 (42 U.S.C. 1396d) the fol-
4 lowing:

5 "COORDINATION WITH STATES

6 "SEC. 1904A. No proposed rule (as defined in section
7 551(4) of title 5, United States Code) implementing or 8 interpreting any provision of this title shall be finalized
9 on or after January 1, 2018, unless the Secretary—

10 "(1) provides for a process under which the 11 Secretary or the Secretary's designee solicits advice
12 from each State's State agency responsible for ad-
13 ministering the State plan under this title (or a 14 waiver of such plan) and State Medicaid Director—

15 "(A) on a regular, ongoing basis on mat-
16 ters relating to the application of this title that 17 are likely to have a direct effect on the oper-
18 ation or financing of State plans under this title
19 (or waivers of such plans); and

20 "(B) prior to submission of any final pro-

21 posed rule, plan amendment, waiver request, or 22 proposal for a project that is likely to have a di-
23 rect effect on the operation or financing of 24 State plans under this title (or waivers of such 25 plans);

117

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(2) accepts and considers written and oral
2 comments from a bipartisan, nonprofit, professional
3 organization that represents State Medicaid Direc-
4 tors, and from any State agency administering the 5 plan under this title, regarding such proposed rule;
6 and

7 "(3) incorporates in the preamble to the pro-
8 posed rule a summary of comments referred to in 9 paragraph (2) and the Secretary's response to such 10 comments."

11 SEC. 138. OPTIONAL ASSISTANCE FOR CERTAIN INPATIENT 12 PSYCHIATRIC SERVICES.

13 (a) STATE OPTION.—Section 1905 of the Social Se-
14 curity Act (42 U.S.C. 1396d) is amended—

15 (1) in subsection (a)—

16 (A) in paragraph (16)—

17 (i) by striking "and, (B)" and insert-
18 ing "(B)"; and

19 (ii) by inserting before the semicolon
20 at the end the following: ", and (C) subject
21 to subsection (h)(4), qualified inpatient
22 psychiatric hospital services (as defined in 23 subsection (h)(3)) for individuals who are 24 over 21 years of age and under 65 years
25 of age"; and

118

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (B) in the subdivision (B) that follows
2 paragraph (29), by inserting "(other than serv-
3 ices described in subparagraph (C) of para-
4 graph (16) for individuals described in such 5 subparagraph)" after "patient in an institution
6 for mental diseases"; and

7 (2) in subsection (h), by adding at the end the 8 following new paragraphs:

9 "(3) For purposes of subsection (a)(16)(C), the term
10 'qualified inpatient psychiatric hospital services' means,
11 with respect to individuals described in such subsection,
12 services described in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1)
13 that are not otherwise covered under subsection
14 (a)(16)(A) and are furnished—

15 "(A) in an institution (or distinct part thereof)
16 which is a psychiatric hospital (as defined in section

17 1861(f)); and
18 "(B) with respect to such an individual, for a 19 period not to exceed 30 consecutive days in any 20 month and not to exceed 90 days in any calendar
21 year.

22 "(4) As a condition for a State including qualified
23 inpatient psychiatric hospital services as medical assist-24 ance under subsection (a)(16)(C), the State must (during 25 the period in which it furnishes medical assistance under 119

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 this title for services and individuals described in such
2 subsection)—

3 "(A) maintain at least the number of licensed
4 beds at psychiatric hospitals owned, operated, or 5 contracted for by the State that were being main-
6 tained as of the date of the enactment of this para-
7 graph or, if higher, as of the date the State applies
8 to the Secretary to include medical assistance under 9 such subsection; and

10 "(B) maintain on an annual basis a level of 11 funding expended by the State (and political subdivi-12 sions thereof) other than under this title from non-
13 Federal funds for inpatient services in an institution
14 described in paragraph (3)(A), and for active psy-
15 chiatric care and treatment provided on an out-
16 patient basis, that is not less than the level of such 17 funding for such services and care as of the date of 18 the enactment of this paragraph or, if higher, as of 19 the date the State applies to the Secretary to include
20 medical assistance under such subsection."

21 (b) SPECIAL MATCHING RATE.—Section 1905(b) of 22 the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395d(b)) is amended 23 by adding at the end the following: "Notwithstanding the 24 previous provisions of this subsection, the Federal medical 25 assistance percentage shall be 50 percent with respect to 120

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 medical assistance for services and individuals described
2 in subsection (a)(16)(C)."

3 (c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by
4 this section shall apply to qualified inpatient psychiatric 5 hospital services furnished on or after October 1, 2018.
6 SEC. 139. SMALL BUSINESS HEALTH PLANS.

7 (a) TAX TREATMENT OF SMALL BUSINESS HEALTH
8 PLANS.—For purposes of applying subchapter B of chap-
9 ter 100 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, title XXVII
10 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 300gg et 11 seq.), and part 7 of title I of the Employee Retirement
12 Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1181 et seq.),

13 a small business health plan as defined in section 801(a)
14 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974
15 that is offered to employees shall be treated as a group
16 health plan, as defined in section 2791 of the Public
17 Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 300gg-91).

18 (b) IN GENERAL.—Subtitle B of title I of the Em-
19 ployee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29
20 U.S.C. 1021 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end
21 the following new part:

121

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "PART 8—RULES GOVERNING SMALL BUSINESS
2 RISK SHARING POOLS

3 "SEC. 801. SMALL BUSINESS HEALTH PLANS.

4 "(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this part, the 5 term 'small business health plan' means a fully insured
6 group health plan, offered by a health insurance issuer in 7 the large group market, whose sponsor is described in sub-
8 section (b).

9 "(b) SPONSOR.—The sponsor of a group health plan
10 is described in this subsection if—

11 "(1) such sponsor is a qualified sponsor and re-
12 ceives certification by the Secretary;

13 "(2) is organized and maintained in good faith,
14 with a constitution and bylaws specifically stating its 15 purpose and providing for periodic meetings on at 16 least an annual basis;

17 "(3) is established as a permanent entity;

18 "(4) is established for a purpose other than 19 providing health benefits to its members, such as an 20 organization established as a bona fide trade asso-21 ciation; and

22 "(5) does not condition membership on the 23 basis of a minimum group size.

122

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "SEC. 802. FILING FEE AND CERTIFICATION OF SMALL
2 BUSINESS HEALTH PLANS.

3 "(a) FILING FEE.—A small business health plan
4 shall pay to the Secretary at the time of filing an applica-
5 tion for certification under subsection (b) a filing fee in 6 the amount of $5,000, which shall be available to the Sec-
7 retary for the sole purpose of administering the certifi-
8 cation procedures applicable with respect to small business
9 health plans.

10 "(b) CERTIFICATION.—

11 "(1) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 6 months
12 after the date of enactment of this part, the Sec-
13 retary shall prescribe by interim final rule a proce-
14 dure under which the Secretary—

15 "(A) will certify a qualified sponsor of a 16 small business health plan, upon receipt of an 17 application that includes the information de-
18 scribed in paragraph (2);
19 "(B) may provide for continued certifi-
20 cation of small business health plans under this 21 part; and
22 "(C) shall provide for the revocation of a
23 certification if the applicable authority finds
24 that the small business health plan involved
25 fails to comply with the requirements of this 26 part.

123

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(2) INFORMATION TO BE INCLUDED IN APPLI-
2 CATION FOR CERTIFICATION.—An application for
3 certification under this part meets the requirements
4 of this section only if it includes, in a manner and 5 form which shall be prescribed by the applicable au-
6 thority by regulation, at least the following informa-
7 tion:

8 "(A) Identifying information.

9 "(B) States in which the plan intends to 10 do business.

11 "(C) Bonding requirements.

12 "(D) Plan documents.

13 "(E) Agreements with service providers.

14 "(c) FILING NOTICE OF CERTIFICATION WITH 15 STATES.—A certification granted under this part to a 16 small business health plan shall not be effective unless 17 written notice of such certification is filed with the appli-
18 cable State authority of each State in which the small 19 business health plans operate.

20 "(d) NOTICE OF MATERIAL CHANGES.—In the case
21 of any small business health plan certified under this part,
22 descriptions of material changes in any information which 23 was required to be submitted with the application for the 24 certification under this part shall be filed in such form
25 and manner as shall be prescribed by the applicable au-
124

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 thority by regulation. The applicable authority may re-
2 quire by regulation prior notice of material changes with 3 respect to specified matters which might serve as the basis
4 for suspension or revocation of the certification.

5 "(e) NOTICE REQUIREMENTS FOR VOLUNTARY TER-
6 MINATION.—A small business health plan which is or has 7 been certified under this part may terminate (upon or at 8 any time after cessation of accruals in benefit liabilities)
9 only if the board of trustees, not less than 60 days before

10 the proposed termination date—
11 "(1) provides to the participants and bene-
12 ficiaries a written notice of intent to terminate stat-
13 ing that such termination is intended and the pro-
14 posed termination date;

15 "(2) develops a plan for winding up the affairs
16 of the plan in connection with such termination in 17 a manner which will result in timely payment of all 18 benefits for which the plan is obligated; and 19 "(3) submits such plan in writing to the appli-
20 cable authority.

21 "(f) OVERSIGHT OF CERTIFIED PLAN SPONSORS.—

22 The Secretary has the discretion to determine whether any 23 person has violated or is about to violate any provision
24 of this part, and may conduct periodic review of certified
25 small business health plan sponsors, consistent with section 504, and apply the requirements of sections 518, 519,
125

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

2 and 520.

3 "(g) EXPEDITED AND DEEMED CERTIFICATION.—

4 "(1) IN GENERAL.—If the Secretary fails to act
5 on a complete application for certification under this
6 section within 90 days of receipt of such complete
7 application, the applying small business health plan
8 sponsor shall be deemed certified until such time as 9 the Secretary may deny for cause the application for 10 certification.

11 "(2) PENALTY.—The Secretary may assess a
12 penalty against the board of trustees and plan spon-
13 sor (jointly and severally) of a small business health
14 plan sponsor that is deemed certified under para-
15 graph (1) of up to $500,000 in the event the Sec-
16 retary determines that the application for certifi-
17 cation of such small business health plan sponsor
18 was willfully or with gross negligence incomplete or 19 inaccurate.

20 "(h) MODIFICATIONS.—The Secretary shall, through 21 promulgation and implementation of such regulations as 22 the Secretary may reasonably determine necessary or ap-
23 propriate, and in consultation with a balanced spectrum
24 of effected entities and persons, modify the implementa-
25 tion and application of this part to accommodate with min-
126

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

imum disruption such changes to State or Federal law
2 provided in this part and the (and the amendments made
3 by such Act) or in regulations issued thereto.

4 "SEC. 803. REQUIREMENTS RELATING TO SPONSORS AND 5 BOARDS OF TRUSTEES.

6 "(a) BOARD OF TRUSTEES.—The Secretary shall en-
7 sure that Board of Trustees of a small business health
8 plan certified under this part complies with the require-
9 ments such Secretary sets forth with respect to fiscal con-
10 trol and rules of operation and financial controls.

11 "(b) TREATMENT OF FRANCHISES.—In the case of 12 a group health plan that is established and maintained
13 by a franchisor for a franchisor or for its franchisees—

14 "(1) the requirements of subsection (a) and sec-
15 tion 801(a) shall be deemed met if such require-16 ments would otherwise be met if the franchisor were 17 deemed to be the sponsor referred to in section
18 801(b) and each franchisee were deemed to be a 19 member (of the sponsor) referred to in section
20 801(b); and

21 "(2) the requirements of section 804(a)(1) shall 22 be deemed met.

127

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "SEC. 804. PARTICIPATION AND COVERAGE REQUIRE-
2 MENTS.

3 "(a) COVERED EMPLOYERS AND INDIVIDUALS.—The 4 requirements of this subsection are met with respect to 5 a small business health plan if, under the terms of the 6 plan—

7 "(1) each participating employer must be—

8 "(A) a member of the sponsor;

9 "(B) the sponsor; or

10 "(C) an affiliated member of the sponsor,
11 except that, in the case of a sponsor which is 12 a professional association or other individual-
13 based association, if at least one of the officers, 14 directors, or employees of an employer, or at 15 least one of the individuals who are partners in 16 an employer and who actively participates in 17 the business, is a member or such an affiliated 18 member of the sponsor, participating employers
19 may also include such employer; and 20 "(2) all individuals commencing coverage under 21 the plan after certification under this part must 22 be—

23 "(A) active or retired owners (including 24 self-employed individuals), officers, directors, or 25 employees of, or partners in, participating em-
26 ployers; or

128

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(B) the dependents of individuals de-
2 scribed in subparagraph (A).

3 "(b) INDIVIDUAL MARKET UNAFFECTED.—The re-

4 quirements of this subsection are met with respect to a
5 small business health plan if, under the terms of the plan,
6 no participating employer may provide health insurance
7 coverage in the individual market for any employee not
8 covered under the plan, if such exclusion of the employee
9 from coverage under the plan is based on a health status-
10 related factor with respect to the employee and such em-
11 ployee would, but for such exclusion on such basis, be eligi-
12 ble for coverage under the plan.

13 "(c) PROHIBITION OF DISCRIMINATION AGAINST EM-
14 PLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES ELIGIBLE TO PARTICIPATE.—

15 The requirements of this subsection are met with respect
16 to a small business health plan if information regarding 17 all coverage options available under the plan is made read-
18 ily available to any employer eligible to participate.

19 "SEC. 805. DEFINITIONS; RENEWAL.

20 "(a) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this part:

21 "(1) AFFILIATED MEMBER.—The term 'affili-
22 ated member' means, in connection with a sponsor—
23 "(A) a person who is otherwise eligible to 24 be a member of the sponsor but who elects an 25 affiliated status with the sponsor, or

129

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(B) in the case of a sponsor with mem-
2 bers which consist of associations, a person who
3 is a member or employee of any such associa-
4 tion and elects an affiliated status with the 5 sponsor.

6 "(2) APPLICABLE STATE AUTHORITY.—The
7 term 'applicable State authority' means, with respect
8 to a health insurance issuer in a State, the State in-
9 surance commissioner or official or officials des-
10 igned by the State to enforce the requirements of 11 title XXVII of the Public Health Service Act for the 12 State involved with respect to such issuer.

13 "(3) FRANCHISOR; FRANCHISEE.—The terms
14 'franchisor' and 'franchisee' have the meanings given 15 such terms for purposes of sections 436.2(a)
16 through 436.2(c) of title 16, Code of Federal Regu-
17 lations (including any such amendments to such regu-18 lation after the date of enactment of this part).

19 "(4) HEALTH PLAN TERMS.—The terms 'group
20 health plan', 'health insurance coverage', and 'health
21 insurance issuer' have the meanings provided in sec-
22 tion 733.

23 "(5) INDIVIDUAL MARKET.—

24 "(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'individual
25 market' means the market for health insurance

130

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 coverage offered to individuals other than in
2 connection with a group health plan.

3 "(B) TREATMENT OF VERY SMALL
4 GROUPS.—

5 "(i) IN GENERAL.—Subject to clause
6 (ii), such term includes coverage offered in 7 connection with a group health plan that 8 has fewer than 2 participants as current 9 employees or participants described in sec-
10 tion 732(d)(3) on the first day of the plan
11 year.

12 "(ii) STATE EXCEPTION.—Clause (i)
13 shall not apply in the case of health insur-
14 ance coverage offered in a State if such 15 State regulates the coverage described in 16 such clause in the same manner and to the 17 same extent as coverage in the small group 18 market (as defined in section 2791(e)(5) of 19 the Public Health Service Act) is regulated
20 by such State.

21 "(6) PARTICIPATING EMPLOYER.—The term
22 'participating employer' means, in connection with a 23 small business health plan, any employer, if any in-24 dividual who is an employee of such employer, a 25 partner in such employer, or a self-employed indi-
131

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 vidual who is such employer (or any dependent, as
2 defined under the terms of the plan, of such indi-
3 vidual) is or was covered under such plan in connec-
4 tion with the status of such individual as such an
5 employee, partner, or self-employed individual in re-
6 lation to the plan.

7 "(b) RENEWAL.—A participating employer in a small
8 business health plan shall not be deemed to be a plan
9 sponsor in applying requirements relating to coverage re-
10 newal."

11 (c) PREEMPTION RULES.—Section 514 of the Em-
12 ployee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29
13 U.S.C. 1144) is amended by adding at the end the fol-
14 lowing:

15 "(e) Except as provided in subsection (b)(4), the pro-
16 visions of this title shall supersede any and all State laws
17 insofar as they may now or hereafter preclude a health
18 insurance issuer from offering health insurance coverage
19 in connection with a small business health plan which is 20 certified under part 8."

21 (d) PLAN SPONSOR.—Section 3(16)(B) of such Act
22 (29 U.S.C. 102(16)(B)) is amended by adding at the end

23 the following new sentence: "Such term also includes a 24 person serving as the sponsor of a small business health
25 plan under part 8."

132

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (e) SAVINGS CLAUSE.—Section 731(c) of such Act is
2 amended by inserting "or part 8" after "this part".

3 (f) COOPERATION BETWEEN FEDERAL AND STATE
4 AUTHORITIES.—Section 506 of the Employee Retirement
5 Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1136) is amended
6 by adding at the end the following new subsection:

7 "(d) CONSULTATION WITH STATES WITH RESPECT
8 TO SMALL BUSINESS HEALTH PLANS.—

9 "(1) AGREEMENTS WITH STATES.—The Sec-
10 retary shall consult with the State recognized under 11 paragraph (2) with respect to a small business
12 health plan regarding the exercise of—

13 "(A) the Secretary's authority under sec-
14 tions 502 and 504 to enforce the requirements
15 for certification under part 8; and

16 "(B) the Secretary's authority to certify
17 small business health plans under part 8 in ac-
18 cordance with regulations of the Secretary ap-
19 plicable to certification under part 8.

20 "(2) RECOGNITION OF DOMICILE STATE.—In 21 carrying out paragraph (1), the Secretary shall en-
22 sure that only one State will be recognized, with re-
23 spect to any particular small business health plan,
24 as the State with which consultation is required."

133

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (g) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by
2 this section shall take effect 1 year after the date of the 3 enactment of this Act. The Secretary of Labor shall first
4 issue all regulations necessary to carry out the amend-
5 ments made by this section within 6 months after the date
6 of the enactment of this Act.

7 TITLE II

8 SEC. 201. THE PREVENTION AND PUBLIC HEALTH FUND.

9 Subsection (b) of section 4002 of the Patient Protec-
10 tion and Affordable Care Act (42 U.S.C. 300u-11) is 11 amended by striking paragraphs (3) through (8).

12 SEC. 202. SUPPORT FOR STATE RESPONSE TO OPIOID CRI-
13 SIS.

14 There is authorized to be appropriated, and is appro-
15 priated, out of monies in the Treasury not otherwise obli-
16 gated, $2,000,000,000 for fiscal year 2018, to the Sec-
17 retary of Health and Human Services to provide grants
18 to States to support substance use disorder treatment and 19 recovery support services for individuals with mental or 20 substance use disorders. Funds appropriated under this 21 section shall remain available until expended.

22 SEC. 203. COMMUNITY HEALTH CENTER PROGRAM.
23 Effective as if included in the enactment of the Medi-
24 care Access and CHIP Reauthorization Act of 2015 (Pub-25 lic Law 114-10, 129 Stat. 87), paragraph (1) of section
134

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 221(a) of such Act is amended by inserting ", and an ad-
2 ditional $422,000,000 for fiscal year 2017" after "2017".
3 SEC. 204. CHANGE IN PERMISSIBLE AGE VARIATION IN 4 HEALTH INSURANCE PREMIUM RATES.

5 Section 2701(a)(1)(A)(iii) of the Public Health Serv-
6 ice Act (42 U.S.C. 300gg(a)(1)(A)(iii)) is amended by in-
7 serting after "(consistent with section 2707(c))" the fol-
8 lowing: "or, for plan years beginning on or after January
9 1, 2019, 5 to 1 for adults (consistent with section 2707(c))
10 or such other ratio for adults (consistent with section 11 2707(c)) as the State may determine".

12 SEC. 205. MEDICAL LOSS RATIO DETERMINED BY THE 13 STATE.

14 Section 2718(b) of the Public Health Service Act (42 15 U.S.C. 300gg-18(b)) is amended by adding at the end the 16 following:

17 "(4) SUNSET.—Paragraphs (1) through (3)
18 shall not apply for plan years beginning on or after 19 January 1, 2019, and after such date any reference 20 in law to such paragraphs shall have no force or ef-
21 fect.

22 "(5) MEDICAL LOSS RATIO DETERMINED BY
23 THE STATE.—For plan years beginning on or after 24 January 1, 2019, each State shall—

135

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(A) set the ratio of the amount of pre-
2 mium revenue a health insurance issuer offering
3 group or individual health insurance coverage
4 may expend on non-claims costs to the total
5 amount of premium revenue; and

6 "(B) determine the amount of any annual 7 rebate required to be paid to enrollees under 8 such coverage if the ratio of the amount of pre-9 mium revenue expended by the issuer on non-
10 claims costs to the total amount of premium
11 revenue exceeds the ratio set by the State under 12 subparagraph (A)."

13 SEC. 206. WAIVERS FOR STATE INNOVATION.

14 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1332 of the Patient Pro-
15 tection and Affordable Care Act (42 U.S.C. 18052) is 16 amended—

17 (1) in subsection (a)—
18 (A) in paragraph (1)—
19 (i) in subparagraph (B)—
20 (I) by amending clause (i) to 21 read as follows:
22 "(i) a description of how the State
23 plan meeting the requirements of a waiver
24 under this section would, with respect to 136

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 health insurance coverage within the
2 State—

3 "(I) take the place of the require-
4 ments described in paragraph (2) that
5 are waived; and

6 "(II) provide for alternative
7 means of, and requirements for, in-
8 creasing access to comprehensive cov-
9 erage, reducing average premiums,
10 and increasing enrollment; and"; and

11 (II) in clause (ii), by striking
12 "that is budget neutral for the Fed-
13 eral Government" and inserting "
14 demonstrating that the State plan
15 does not increase the Federal deficit";
16 and

17 (ii) in subparagraph (C), by striking
18 "the law" and inserting "a law or has in 19 effect a certification";

20 (B) in paragraph (3)—
21 (i) by adding after the second sen-
22 tence the following: "A State may request
23 that all of, or any portion of, such aggre-
24 gate amount of such credits or reductions
137

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 be paid to the State as described in the 2 first sentence.";

3 (ii) in the paragraph heading, by 4 striking "PASS THROUGH OF FUNDING"
5 and inserting "FUNDING";

6 (iii) by striking "With respect" and 7 inserting the following:

8 "(A) PASS THROUGH OF FUNDING.—With 9 respect"; and

10 (iv) by adding at the end the fol-
11 lowing:

12 "(B) ADDITIONAL FUNDING.—There is au-
13 thorized to be appropriated, and is appro-
14 priated, to the Secretary of Health and Human

15 Services, out of monies in the Treasury not oth-
16 erwise obligated, $2,000,000,000 for fiscal year
17 2017, to remain available until the end of fiscal 18 year 2019, to provide grants to States for pur-
19 poses of submitting an application for a waiver
20 granted under this section and implementing 21 the State plan under such waiver.

22 "(C) AUTHORITY TO USE LONG-TERM
23 STATE INNOVATION AND STABILITY ALLOT-
24 MENT.—If the State has an application for an 25 allotment under section 2105(i) of the Social 138

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 Security Act for the plan year, the State may
2 use the funds available under the State's allot-
3 ment for the plan year to carry out the State
4 plan under this section, so long as such use is 5 consistent with the requirements of paragraphs
6 (1) and (7) of section 2105(i) of such Act
7 (other than paragraph (1)(B) of such section).

8 Any funds used to carry out a State plan under 9 this subparagraph shall not be considered in de-10 termining whether the State plan increases the 11 Federal deficit."; and

12 (C) in paragraph (4), by adding at the end
13 the following:

14 "(D) EXPEDITED PROCESS.—The Sec-
15 retary shall establish an expedited application
16 and approval process that may be used if the 17 Secretary determines that such expedited proc-
18 ess is necessary to respond to an urgent or 19 emergency situation with respect to health in-20 surance coverage within a State.";

21 (2) in subsection (b)—

22 (A) in paragraph (1)—

23 (i) in the matter preceding subpara-
24 graph (A)—

139

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (I) by striking "may" and insert-
2 ing "shall"; and

3 (II) by striking "only if" and in-
4 serting "unless"; and

5 (ii) by striking "plan—" and all that 6 follows through the period at the end of 7 subparagraph (D) and inserting "plan will 8 increase the Federal deficit, not taking 9 into account any amounts received through 10 a grant under subsection (a)(3)(B).";

11 (B) in paragraph (2)—

12 (i) in the paragraph heading, by in-
13 serting "OR CERTIFY" after "LAW";
14 (ii) in subparagraph (A), by inserting
15 before the period ", and a certification de-
16 scribed in this paragraph is a document,
17 signed by the Governor, and the State in-18 surance commissioner, of the State, that 19 provides authority for State actions under 20 a waiver under this section, including the 21 implementation of the State plan under 22 subsection (a)(1)(B)"; and 23 (iii) in subparagraph (B)—
24 (I) in the subparagraph heading,
25 by striking "OF OPT OUT"; and 140

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 (II) by striking " may repeal a
2 law" and all that follows through the
3 period at the end and inserting the 4 following: "may terminate the author-
5 ity provided under the waiver with re-
6 spect to the State by—
7 "(i) repealing a law described in sub-
8 paragraph (A); or
9 "(ii) terminating a certification de-
10 scribed in subparagraph (A), through a 11 certification for such termination signed by 12 the Governor, and the State insurance
13 commissioner, of the State.";
14 (3) in subsection (d)(2)(B), by striking "and 15 the reasons therefore" and inserting "and the rea-
16 sons therefore, and provide the data on which such 17 determination was made"; and
18 (4) in subsection (e), by striking "No waiver"
19 and all that follows through the period at the end
20 and inserting the following: "A waiver under this
21 section—
22 "(1) shall be in effect for a period of 8 years
23 unless the State requests a shorter duration;
24 "(2) may be renewed for unlimited additional 8-25 year periods upon application by the State; and 141

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 "(3) may not be cancelled by the Secretary be-
2 fore the expiration of the 8-year period (including
3 any renewal period under paragraph (2)).".
4 (b) APPLICABILITY.—Section 1332 of the Patient
5 Protection and Affordable Care Act (42 U.S.C. 18052)
6 shall apply as follows:
7 (1) In the case of a State for which a waiver

8 under such section was granted prior to the date of 9 enactment of this Act, such section 1332, as in ef-
10 fect on the day before the date of enactment of this 11 Act shall apply to the waiver and State plan.

12 (2) In the case of a State that submitted an ap-
13 plication for a waiver under such section prior to the 14 date of enactment of this Act, and which application
15 the Secretary of Health and Human Services has 16 not approved prior to such date, the State may elect
17 to have such section 1332, as in effect on the day
18 before the date of enactment of this Act, or such 19 section 1332, as amended by subsection (a), apply to 20 such application and State plan.

21 (3) In the case of a State that submits an ap-
22 plication for a waiver under such section on or after 23 the date of enactment of this Act, such section 1332, 24 as amended by subsection (a), shall apply to such 25 application and State plan.

142

ERN17282 Discussion Draft S.L.C.

1 SEC. 207. FUNDING FOR COST-SHARING PAYMENTS.

2 There is appropriated to the Secretary of Health and
3 Human Services, out of any money in the Treasury not
4 otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary
5 for payments for cost-sharing reductions authorized by the 6 Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (including ad-
7 justments to any prior obligations for such payments) for 8 the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act
9 and ending on December 31, 2019. Notwithstanding any 10 other provision of this Act, payments and other actions
11 for adjustments to any obligations incurred for plan years
12 2018 and 2019 may be made through December 31, 2020.

13 SEC. 208. REPEAL OF COST-SHARING SUBSIDY PROGRAM.

14 (a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1402 of the Patient Pro-
15 tection and Affordable Care Act is repealed.

16 (b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The repeal made by sub-
17 section (a) shall apply to cost-sharing reductions (and pay-18 ments to issuers for such reductions) for plan years begin-
19 ning after December 31, 2019.

To view online click here.

Back

Taxes on high incomes preserved as part of latest ACA replacement, as expected Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 07/13/2017 12:57 PM EDT

Taxes on top earners' investment income would remain under a new Affordable Care Act replacement bill released today by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

The draft legislation would also preserve a Medicare payroll tax on high-income taxpayers.

Keeping both taxes in place would provide revenue to offset costs associated with maintaining some health insurance coverage through the legislation; congressional scorekeepers have estimated repealing the two taxes would cost nearly $231 billion over a decade.

The 3.8 percent net investment income tax and 0.9 percent Medicare tax, adopted as part of the ACA, hit individual taxpayers whose annual income exceeds $200,000 and joint filers who earn more than $250,000 per year.

McConnell's latest bill would also keep a tax on some health insurance executives.

Other revenue-related provisions in the legislation include letting taxpayers use pre-income tax money in their health savings accounts to pay for insurance premiums. That would increase coverage, according to the same scorekeepers at the CBO and Joint Committee on Taxation who made the revenue forecasts on the investment and payroll taxes.

It would also let those who sign up for catastrophic insurance use tax credits to help pay their premiums.

The bill would repeal several taxes put in place under the ACA, including ones on prescription drugs, medical devices and tanning salons. It would also repeal limits on flexible spending account contributions.

To view online click here.

Back

Revised Senate repeal bill keeps Obamacare taxes, adds funding for poor and opioid epidemic Back

By Paul Demko | 07/13/2017 12:09 PM EDT

Senate Republicans' latest health bill keeps some Obamacare taxes on the wealthy and directs more than $100 billion in new spending to help low-income Americans buy coverage and combat the opioid epidemic.

A revised Obamacare repeal plan also includes a proposal, designed to mollify conservatives, that would allow insurers that sell plans meeting Obamacare's coverage requirements to also sell skimpier, less expensive plans that don't comply with the law.

The new proposal seeks to thread the needle between conservatives and moderates after the Senate's original repeal package sparked opposition from all corners of the GOP caucus. Republicans hope to vote on the new bill next week.

It would keep Obamacare's net investment income tax and an additional Medicare Health Insurance Tax, and it would no longer scrap a tax break for high-earning health insurance executives.

The latest draft, however, doesn't make any significant changes to the Medicaid overhaul proposed in the original plan, which would cut nearly $800 billion from the entitlement by rolling back Obamacare's expansion of the program and capping payments for each enrollee.

The latest plan does make some minor changes to the Medicaid program that could address the concerns of some senators. For example, it would allow the cap on Medicaid payments to be lifted in the event of a medical emergency, a provision sought by Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, which has been battling the Zika outbreak.

The Senate would direct an additional $70 billion to help states lower costs for low-income insurance customers. That's in addition to $112 billion that was in the original bill.

It also adds $45 billion to address the opioid crisis, which could help win over moderates like Sen. Rob Portman of Ohio and Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia.

Conservative advocacy groups at first reacted cautiously to the new plan.

"Over the past two weeks, conservatives have rightly fought to interject additional consumer choice and competition into an otherwise deteriorating market," Heritage Action CEO Michael Needham said in a statement. "It is encouraging to see some of those concepts being considered by the Senate Republican Conference."

The legislation is slated to receive a CBO score on Monday. But the analysis is not expected to cover the amendment being pushed by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) that would allow insurers to sell plans that don't meet Obamacare's coverage requirements.

That provision could still be removed or changed before the legislation comes up for a vote. Insurers have warned that it would be unworkable because sicker, more expensive customers would be segregated in one risk pool and premiums would skyrocket.

"I think they're trying to find a way to make his approach workable in the context of the other, broader insurance marketplace," said Sen. John Thune of South Dakota, a member of the GOP leadership team, before entering a meeting to discuss the new draft.

Many prominent provisions in the original plan were retained. They include making tax credits available to Americans earning up to 350 percent of the federal poverty level, as opposed to 400 percent under Obamacare. The plan would also allow insurers to charge older enrollees up to five times as much as their younger customers — compared to a 3-to-1 ratio permissible under current law. Those marketplaces changes would be implemented beginning in 2019.

The Senate bill would still appropriate funding for Obamacare's cost-sharing subsidies for 2018 and 2019, which insurers have said are crucial for stabilizing the individual market in the near term.

The revised legislation would continue to defund Planned Parenthood for one year — a position that will antagonize moderates such as Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska.

The Senate bill would also do away with Obamacare's unpopular individual mandate. Instead it would try to incentivize individuals to maintain continuous coverage by allowing insurers to freeze out an individual for six months if they don't.

In addition, most of Obamacare's taxes, including those that target health insurers and medical device manufacturers, would be repealed. Implementation of the current law's "Cadillac tax" on expensive plans would be delayed until 2026.

To view online click here.

Back

Trump: I'll be 'very angry' if the GOP health care bill fails Back

By Negassi Tesfamichael | 07/12/2017 03:45 PM EDT

President Donald Trump lamented that he'll be "very angry" if the Republican effort to repeal ObamaCare collapses.

"I will be very angry about it and a lot of people will be very upset," Trump said on the possibility of the bill to repeal Obamacare failing, adding, "but I'm sitting waiting for that bill to come to my desk. I hope they do it."

Trump's comments were excepts from an interview with televangelist Pat Robertson of CBN News out Wednesday. The full interview is set to air on the 700 Club Thursday.

His comments to Robertson stand in contrast to his earlier statement in late June on the GOP's bill, when he noted that "if we don't get it done, it's just going to be something that we're not going to like, and that's okay."

Trump noted how often Republicans have touted repealing the landmark 2010 health care bill.

"They've been promising it for years. They've been promising it ever since Obamacare which is failed," Trump said. "It's a failed experiment. It is totally gone. It's out of business and we have to get this done."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell is trying to win support from several moderate Republicans and key conservatives in the coming days. He announced Tuesday that the Senate would stay in session through the first two weeks of August, shortening the summer recess considerably.

"He's got to pull it off. Mitch has to pull it off," Trump said of the Kentucky Republican. "He's working very hard. He's got to pull it off."

To view online click here.

Back

Conservative groups endorse Cruz-Lee plan Back

By Adam Cancryn | 07/12/2017 04:10 PM EDT

Conservative groups are backing Sen. Ted Cruz's bid to let insurers sidestep Obamacare's regulations, warning that its inclusion in the Senate GOP repeal bill is necessary to win their support for the measure.

The organizations this afternoon called the proposal the only path to rolling back Obamacare short of full repeal and slammed moderate Senate Republicans for wavering on their pledge to dismantle the 2010 health law.

"I've heard from hundreds of people around the country who are wondering, what's wrong with Republicans?" Tea Party Patriots President Jenny Beth Martin said on a call with reporters. "We delivered. And they are not."

The endorsement of the proposal, which Cruz developed with Sen. Mike Lee, comes after multiple insurance groups and even some Senate Republicans panned the idea. The plan would effectively set up a two-tiered market, allowing insurers to sell some plans that don't meet Obamacare's coverage requirements. That's prompted concerns that it would undermine protections for people with pre-existing conditions and potentially destabilize the broader insurance market.

But conservatives on the call — which also included FreedomWorks and Club for Growth — called the proposal the only element of the GOP's health care bill that approaches true repeal. They've also launched a website backing the Cruz-Lee plan.

"The last eight years, the whole movement has focused on the repeal of Obamacare," said former Sen. Jim DeMint, who was recently ousted as president of The Heritage Foundation. "Not fulfilling this promise is a huge issue for conservatives, for Republicans and for the country itself."

To view online click here.

Back

Bipartisan fixes won't come easily if GOP's repeal effort collapses Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn and Adam Cancryn | 07/12/2017 07:59 PM EDT

Pivoting to a bipartisan fix of Obamacare won't be quick or easy if Senate Republicans' repeal efforts fail.

A handful of Republicans are preparing potential repairs to the existing health care system as a fallback option, talking up the prospect of a compromise that could win some Democratic support to fix Obamacare and stabilize the market.

But many in the GOP privately say they might need a break between seven years of repeal attempts and a sudden repair effort. And some Democrats are already calling for single-payer health care — an automatic non-starter for Republicans. The sharp political divide underscores just how hard it would be for the parties to come together amid the ashes of a failed repeal.

"I don't think Republicans can do that," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said of giving up repeal. "I think we have to live up to our intention that we're going to change it."

Republican leaders, who fanned fears that the health system will collapse under Obamacare, are still scrambling to get the 50 votes needed to pass a repeal bill as planned next week. But some lawmakers are working on Plan B. The goal would be to shore up insurance markets, which are struggling in some parts of the country under sky-high premiums or a lack of insurers willing to offer coverage. But the parties disagree about how to do so: Democrats would want to add funding, and Republicans would want to change or repeal pieces of Obamacare.

The most prominent challenge is cost-sharing reduction subsidies, an $8 billion piece of the health care law that President Donald Trump could stop at a moment's notice. Insurance companies say that uncertainty has caused them to increase premiums.

Even Republicans say finding a solution won't be easy.

"It would have to be more than just bailing out insurance companies," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas).

The prospect of a failed repeal vote heading into the August recess threatens to further fragment Senate Republicans already at odds over how to tackle health care. The conference would have to decide whether to keep the repeal movement alive or admit defeat, a difficult prospect given their seven-year-long campaign pledge and Trump's frequent calls for repeal.

Conservative Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) wants a renewed push for repealing Obamacare outright — despite the fact that Senate Republicans as a group have already rejected that strategy.

"The president has indicated he's open to a clean repeal. So has the vice president," Paul said.

On the other end of the spectrum, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Bill Cassidy (R-La.) are holding up their own plan — which would let states keep Obamacare if they want — as a fresh bipartisan rallying point. But even their most likely Democratic collaborators have balked at core parts of the proposal.

Some Republicans say the bill currently on the Senate floor is evidence the GOP has backed off its full repeal effort — proof, they say, that they're already working on repairing the health care law.

"That's what we've just been discussing for the last several weeks," said Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.). The current Senate draft — "it's repair."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) charitably likened a bipartisan bill being written by his friend Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) to a "noose around my neck," hinting at fatigue over another round of Obamacare talks.

The failure of a repeal bill would put Democrats at a philosophical crossroads, too. They could craft a compromise that appeals to moderates, or rally the base with an all-out push for a public option or single-payer system.

High-profile senators like Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) have made single-payer a key plank of their political platforms, energizing liberal groups intent on pushing the party further to the left. And if the GOP's repeal bid fails, it'll only intensify the outside pressure on Democrats to seize the momentum and demand that any reforms include a public option at the very least.

That's not a battle that Democrats have either the votes or the political will to fight at this point — there's still considerable skepticism even within the party about single-payer, and Republicans are sure to refuse any attempt to give the government more control over health care.

"In this environment, that's all it'll be," said Montana Sen. Jon Tester, a moderate Democrat, of liberals' hopes for single-payer. "It's just talk."

"It's totally unrealistic to think, I think, that in a Republican administration with a Republican House and Republican Senate, that this is the moment in time that single-payer would be viable," said Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), another moderate. "It doesn't make much sense to me."

But there's just as much concern about disillusioning voters by appearing soft on health care and overly willing to compromise, especially if Republicans are emerging from a spectacular legislative meltdown. Democrats in recent days have tried to find a middle ground, proposing a series of small Obamacare fixes and emphasizing the need to shore up the markets ahead of any broader health care overhaul.

"The Affordable Care Act's made a lot of progress. Now is the time to fix it," said Rep. Ami Bera (D-Calif.), one of 10 House Democrats pushing a five-point plan to stabilize Obamacare.

And in the Senate, several lawmakers have met with moderate Republicans in a bid to find common ground. Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.) this week introduced a bill to provide more subsidies to middle-income people to help them buy health insurance.

But even those overtures come with the requirement that any bipartisan package needs to improve Obamacare by pouring significantly more money into the system.

"We need to make sure that these subsidies that are currently funded by the federal government in the exchanges, that reduce co-pays, reduce deductibles for poor people — make sure that that funding continues," said Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.), referring to the cost-sharing program.

He added that any big health care bill also needs to maintain or strengthen Obamacare's individual mandate, an already unpopular provision that would likely be a non-starter for many Republicans.

A repair bill would mark the first major changes to Obamacare since it was approved in 2010.

Most major legislation is followed up by fixes. But there have been very few changes to the Affordable Care Act — and those that have been enacted were very narrow.

Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.) said the difference now is that the repeal effort has driven tremendous public attention to health care.

"This repeal bill was supposed to sweep through the House and Senate in January, and it's mid-July now," she said. "I don't think the American public is going to fall asleep after this."

If the GOP bill fails next week, Republicans would have three weeks of August to go home, regroup and potentially tone down the partisan rhetoric — something that normally doesn't happen during recess.

Heated rhetoric, said Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), "doesn't cool during the month of August. It gets hotter."

To view online click here.

Back

Senate moderates sidelined in new Obamacare repeal bill Back

By Burgess Everett and Rachana Pradhan | 07/12/2017 06:52 PM EDT

In a closed-door meeting of Senate Republican chairmen Wednesday, Lisa Murkowski ripped GOP leaders' attempt to scale back Medicaid spending in their Obamacare repeal bill.

The two matters were unrelated, she argued, because the Affordable Care Act did not change Medicaid spending levels across the entire program. The independent-minded Alaska senator was backed up by Sen. John Hoeven of North Dakota, a Republican generally aligned with leadership, according to senators and people familiar with the conversations.

"The ACA allowed for Medicaid expansion. The ACA didn't address traditional Medicaid. ... Why do we not focus on the urgency of the concerns with the ACA?" she said in an interview afterward. "Let's deal with the urgency of the issue. Let's set Medicaid off to the side."

GOP leaders are set to unveil a new version of their health bill Thursday, but no major changes have been made to satisfy senators concerned about winding down Obamacare's Medicaid expansion and aggressive Medicaid cuts over the next decade. So even as Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell struggles to keep restive conservatives like Ted Cruz and Mike Lee on board, lingering concerns from moderates like Murkowski could signal the bill's demise.

McConnell needs 50 votes simply to open debate on the bill next week, and he is well short of that number, GOP senators said.

"Not right now. But we don't need them right now," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), the party's chief vote counter. "We're going to need them next week."

Republicans are planning to pump billions more into the health care system to reduce premiums for low-income people, fight opioid addiction and give states money to make health care innovations. But Cornyn said Medicaid is still "one of the biggest challenges" leaders face.

About a dozen Republican senators have been meeting regularly to air their concerns about changes to the Medicaid program. And since Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) is almost certainly a "no" vote, just two of them could stop the whole measure in its tracks next week on a key procedural vote to take up the bill.

"No breakthroughs. There's been a lot of discussions. ... We remain in the same camp," said

Sen. Dean Heller, one of the stiffest GOP opponents, who is up for reelection in increasingly blue Nevada. "Fundamentally, they haven't changed the bill."

McConnell has told senators they will have a chance to amend the bill on the floor and test the popularity of their push to make Medicaid benefits more generous. But Republicans, both conservative and moderate, have instead pressed for all their preferences to be included in the GOP's base bill, which many suspect will be introduced at the end of the amendment process and overwrite all the changes to the bill.

And a number of Republicans simply don't believe the Obamacare repeal effort should include major entitlement reform on a partisan basis, which could lead to Republican political ownership of curtailed benefits in the coming years and potentially sweeping electoral losses.

The Senate bill seeks to trim federal Medicaid spending by $772 billion over 10 years, and the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office estimates it would result in 15 million fewer people being enrolled in Medicaid in a decade.

"Why not take out the issue of the [Medicaid spending] inflation rate and have a series of amendments? ... Just don't deal with it in the base bill," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). "A number of us are making the point — I'm not the only one — that Obamacare, except for the expansion, did not change base Medicaid."

Murkowski said she has made a similar point directly to President Donald Trump, who ran promising to protect Medicaid and trumpeted his stance as being different from those of other Republican presidential candidates.

McConnell has also previously argued that in a divided government, bipartisan work is the best way to tackle entitlement reform. Some senators privately say they are uncomfortable changing Medicaid spending without any buy-in from Democrats, who have attacked the GOP relentlessly for writing a bill that would cut taxes for the wealthy and benefits for the poor.

The Senate bill would end Medicaid as an open-ended entitlement in 2020 by capping how much federal funding government gives to states, and unwinds Obamacare's Medicaid expansion funding starting in 2021. One of the biggest sticking points is the decision to allow federal Medicaid payments to only grow in line with inflation starting in 2025, a proposal insisted upon by Senate conservatives to rein in spending.

To some extent, the Senate bill is even more conservative than the House's bill when it comes to Medicaid, because the House plan calls for Medicaid growth that at least matches medical inflation, which rises faster.

But removing the overhaul of Medicaid or letting federal payments grow at a more generous rate may not solve the GOP's math problem. Fiscal conservatives have bought into the bill as an opportunity to restructure Medicaid, and yanking those provisions could cost considerable support on the right. Republicans expect that the conservative-tilting Medicaid language has not changed during the flurry of rewrites over the past two weeks.

"I don't know that we'll see any changes in this particular proposal," Sen. Mike Rounds of South Dakota said Wednesday. "I do think that that's an item which is still a negotiable item in the future. There are some states out there that get impacted differently than others. And so when we look at it, you want to be fair."

Sen. Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, has clashed repeatedly with advocates of more generous Medicaid spending, such as Sen. Rob Portman of Ohio. Toomey said people who disagree with him on which inflation rate to use are "just waiting for the crisis to occur" in the government's finances.

"If we're not willing to slightly slow down the rate of growth at a distant point in the future of the program that is actually driving this deficit the most, if we're not willing to do even that you just need to admit you want to have the crisis," Toomey said Wednesday.

Asked Wednesday whether his opposition to the bill over Medicaid cuts has changed, Portman bluntly answered: "No."

Jennifer Haberkorn contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Graham introduces repeal back-up plan Back

By Burgess Everett | 07/13/2017 11:20 AM EDT

A new health care proposal from GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham that would direct much of Obamacare's federal funding directly to the states could offer a starting point for Congress if the Senate GOP effort fails next week, according to a summary of the bill obtained by POLITICO.

The bill from Graham is intended to appeal to Republicans as a replacement plan for Obamacare, while he hopes to sell the effort to Democrats as a repair plan. It would keep all of Obamacare's taxes except for the Medical device tax but block grants about $110 billion in federal health care funding to the states. It is not intended to compete with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell's plan, a Republican aide said, but likely will be offered as an amendment to the bill next week to test its support.

"Instead of having a one-size-fits-all solution from Washington, we should return dollars back to the states to address each individual state's health care needs. Just like no two patients are the same, no two states' health care needs are the same. A solution that works in California may not work in Virginia," Graham said of the bill. "These funds are already being spent on Obamacare, but instead of having Washington decide, we'll empower each individual state to choose the path that works best for them."

Graham has been working with Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.) on the proposal. Cassidy and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) introduced a bill earlier this year that would allow states to keep Obamacare if it's working for them or reform the law if they oppose it, and Graham's bill takes a similar approach in some areas.

The bill would end Obamacare's individual and employer mandates for insurance but retain its protections for people with pre-existing conditions. The billions in federal funds that would be redistributed to the states would be restricted to health care use.

To view online click here.

Back

Once laying out ambitious goals, AIDS activists are now trying to prevent slide backwards Back

By Renuka Rayasam | 07/12/2017 05:55 PM EDT

ATLANTA — AIDS activists who until recently had been crafting plans to end the epidemic in the United States are now fighting to keep the virus on the radar of federal policy makers.

Advocates fear that HIV/AIDS policies under President Donald Trump — combined with decisions about the future of Obamacare coverage — would devastate those living with the virus or at risk of infection, who are disproportionately in poor, minority communities in the South.

Trump in a statement on National HIV Testing Day last month pledged continued support for HIV and AIDS testing and treatment. But nearly six months after taking office, he has not yet named a director for the Office of National AIDS Policy or laid out his views on programs like needle exchange.

In June, six members of the Presidential Advisory Council on HIV/AIDS resigned. In a Newsweek op-ed, they called out Trump's lack of "understanding and concern."

Trump proposed deep budget cuts to HIV/AIDS programs at the CDC and other federal agencies. Among the cuts he wanted: more than $180 million in the CDC's HIV/AIDS and sexually transmitted infection prevention budget, $550 million from NIH AIDS research, and $58.8 million from Ryan White, a federal program that provides medical care and support services for the uninsured living with HIV and AIDS.

The House Appropriations Committee released its Labor, Health and Human Services budget for fiscal 2018 on Wednesday, rejecting Trump's proposed cuts. The House panel hasn't proposed any new funds but it did maintain 2017 funding levels for the CDC's HIV/AIDS and sexually transmitted infection prevention budget as well as Ryan White. NIH got a budget boost — though the director will have a big say in directing money to specific research areas.

The Senate is still working on its appropriations bill.

Congress' efforts to repeal Obamacare and roll back Medicaid could endanger coverage for some people living with the virus. If people with HIV infection lose their Medicaid coverage, it would further stretch the Ryan White program.

States that expanded Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act cut uninsured rates of people living with HIV by half from 14 percent in 2012 to 7 percent in 2014, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation. As of 2014, Medicaid covered more than 40 percent of people living with HIV and last year accounted for 30 percent of federal spending on HIV, according to Kaiser.

The Trump administration's actions contrast with his predecessors. The Obama administration appointed an AIDS office director within a month, and announced its national HIV/AIDS strategy in a year and a half.

"It's been six months and we don't have a lot of leadership," said Carl Schmid, deputy executive director of The AIDS Institute. "We are concerned about the future." Schmid and other activists interviewed though were cautiously optimistic about Trump's appointment last week of Georgia state health commissioner Dr. Brenda Fitzgerald to head the CDC.

The CDC estimates that 1.1 million people in the country have HIV. The overall number of newly infected people declined by 18 percent between 2008 and 2014. But HIV diagnosis in gay and bisexual African-American men between the ages of 13 to 24 increased a disturbing 87 percent between 2005 and 2014.

Any additional cuts that are enacted for 2018 would come on the heels of congressional cuts of about $9 million in HIV/AIDS efforts — roughly $5 million from the CDC's sexually transmitted infection prevention budget and $4 million from the Ryan White program.

With Fitzgerald just moving into her position as director, CDC officials last week would not comment on the budget outlook. But activists and HIV/AIDS policy leaders are alarmed, both by the national challenges and those here in the South.

The White House proposed cuts would be devastating to states that draw on federal funding to support prevention and treatment, said Murray Penner, executive director at the National Alliance of State and Territorial AIDS Directors. More than three out of four state and local health departments would have to scale back HIV testing, which is crucial to preventing the disease's spread, and getting people into treatment early, before the disease progresses and they start showing symptoms, he said.

A White House spokesperson countered that the administration is working "diligently" on health-related policies such as HIV and AIDS and as evidence pointed to the appointment of Katy Talento to the White House Domestic Policy Council. From late 1998 through 2000 she worked at Washington's Whitman-Walker Clinic, a pioneering HIV health center. But more recently she's been identified with her anti-contraception stance.

Oliver Clyde Allen III, executive director of The Vision Community Foundation in Atlanta and a member of the presidential advisory council who has chosen not to resign, said he's seen no movement so far on concrete policies that lower infection rates and provide treatment to HIV infected patients. He's still hopeful, but acknowledged, "I have not seen, as of yet, compassion or major attention to HIV or communities that are impacted by it."

"Press releases are just press releases," he added. "They aren't tangible things."

Michelle Ogle, one of six council members who did quit, is skeptical.

"We don't have a seat at the table," said Ogle, director of infectious diseases at the Warren-Vance Community Health Center in North Carolina. "You can't advise people that don't want advice."

She said that the administration didn't seek the council's input on the proposed budget or about how Affordable Care Act replacement legislation would affect people living with HIV/AIDS.

The epicenter of the disease has shifted to gay and black communities in rural areas in the South, which accounted for more than half of all new HIV diagnosis in the country in 2015, according to the CDC.

Cathalene Teahan, president of the Georgia AIDS Coalition, said a lot of the administration appointees have had experience with HIV in the South and they understand the challenges. She's worked with both HHS Secretary Tom Price, a former member of Georgia's congressional delegation, and new CDC director Fitzgerald.

"They understand that, they get it," said Teahan, who also worked with Price's wife, Betty, a member of the Georgia House, on promoting a needle exchange measure, which ultimately died, in the state legislature.

But Ogle points out that these same southern states are the ones that haven't kept ahead of the epidemic. Most of the southern states did not expand Medicaid, and the CDC says that people living with HIV are three times more likely to die in some Southern states, which lag in testing and treatment, than in regions like the Midwest.

Last month, for example, Mississippi's state health department announced it would start charging patients a $25 fee for HIV and STD tests, even as Jackson, the state's capital, struggles with some of the highest HIV diagnosis rates in the country, according to The Clarion-Ledger.

"The South is a bellwether for what will happen in other parts of the country, where there are large rural communities," Ogle said. "It's starting to bubble now, but this volcano will erupt if this budget goes through."

To view online click here.

Back

Ryan, Lee meet to discuss war authorization Back

By Austin Wright | 07/12/2017 04:19 PM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan met today with Barbara Lee (D-Calif.) to discuss a path forward on a new war authorization to update the 16-year-old resolution that sets the parameters for the U.S. war on terrorism, according to Lee spokesman Christopher Huntley.

Ryan and Lee had a "robust discussion" on the House floor, Huntley said, about an amendment put forward by Lee last month that would repeal the 2001 authorization for use of military force. Her amendment was adopted with widespread support from Democrats and Republicans on the Appropriations Committee, a stunning rebuke to House GOP leaders.

Ryan called the amendment a "mistake" in an interview last month with RealClearPolitics, fueling speculation he might move to strip it from this year's defense appropriations bill.

Ryan spokeswoman AshLee Strong declined to comment on today's meeting but noted Ryan's objections to the Lee amendment.

"There is a way to have this debate, but this, which endangers our national security, is not it," Strong said.

On Tuesday, Lee said in an interview that stripping her amendment from the spending bill would be a "slap in the face" to the "democratic process."

"People are beginning to really recognize, Democrats and Republicans, that the 2001 resolution was a blank check," Lee said. "We've got to reassert Congress's role and do our job. We've been missing in action."

John Bresnahan contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Ryan tries to control growing movement to re-open war debate Back

By Austin Wright | 07/12/2017 04:11 PM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan met with anti-war Democratic Rep. Barbara Lee on Wednesday as he sought to take control of growing bipartisan demands for a new debate on the 16-year-old military fight against terrorism.

Ryan and Lee had a "robust discussion" on the House floor about an amendment she pushed through the House Appropriations Committee last month that would repeal Congress' 2001 authorization for force against groups like Al Qaeda, Lee spokesman Christopher Huntley said.

That vote was a surprising victory for Lee and was seen as a rebuke of the House Republican leadership, which has stymied past rank-and-file efforts seeking a new vote on the war authorization.

After her meeting with Ryan, Lee said she believes House GOP leaders plan to strip her amendment from this year's defense appropriations bill and instead move forward with a measure being crafted by Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.). The Cole provision would ask the Defense Department to spell out what it would want in a new war authorization.

"They should not remove this from the bill," Lee said in an interview. "This was put in as part of the democratic process."

Cole acknowledged he was working on an amendment intended to go into the appropriations bill in lieu of Lee's amendment. He said his measure, which is being proposed as an amendment to a defense policy bill now being considered on the House floor, was designed to "nudge" Congress toward passing a new war authorization. "We should be working with the administration to craft an AUMF that they think helps them get the job done," he explained.

Ryan has insisted that the issue must be taken up in stand-alone piece of legislation — including a full debate in the proper committee of jurisdiction — and not as an amendment rammed into a spending bill. The Wisconsin Republican called Lee's amendment a "mistake" in an interview last month with Real Clear Politics, fueling speculation that he might move to strip it from this year's defense appropriations bill.

"There is a way to have this debate, but this, which endangers our national security, is not it," Ryan spokeswoman AshLee Strong told POLITICO on Wednesday.

But Ryan is facing new pressure to commit to some process for updating the legal basis for the war in Afghanistan and U.S. military operations against the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria — a group that didn't exist in 2001. If he doesn't, he could face a revolt not only from Democrats who want to rein in President Donald Trump but from leading members of his own party.

"People are beginning to really recognize, Democrats and Republicans, that the 2001 resolution was a blank check," Lee said in an interview Tuesday. "We've got to reassert Congress' role and do our job. We've been missing in action."

The California congresswoman also met Wednesday with Cole, a senior member of the House Appropriations Committee who is closely aligned with GOP leadership.

Cole said Tuesday that he and Lee were trying to "find a more acceptable way to move forward." He said he supports passing a new force authorization but thinks there are better ways to do it than attaching one to a larger spending bill.

"They ought to be convening hearings on this in the appropriate committees and having a debate," he said.

The problem, for those demanding that Congress take action, is that no such hearings or discussion have occurred.

Lee, who was the only member of Congress to vote against the 2001 force authorization, said House leaders have failed to take action to pass a new war resolution, despite years of bipartisan calls to do so.

Her amendment is designed to force Congress to debate the issue, repealing the 2001 resolution 240 days after enactment. Lee has been putting forward similar measures for years now — making it all the more surprising when Republicans on the appropriations panel backed her amendment last month.

Congress in 2015 tried and failed to pass a resolution setting parameters for the war against the Islamic State, with the White House and lawmakers putting forward a half-dozen proposals. Some would have covered a three-year time frame, confined operations to Iraq and Syria and limited the use of U.S. ground combat troops.

The effort collapsed in a partisan dispute, with Democrats pushing for tighter restrictions and Republicans saying they didn't want to curb the president's ability to fight terrorists.

The Trump administration believes that current law gives it the authority to carry out U.S. operations against the Islamic State and is not seeking a new war authorization, according to a National Security Council spokesperson who spoke on the condition of not being named.

"The United States has the legal authority to prosecute the campaign against Al Qaeda and associated forces, including against ISIS, and is not currently seeking any new or additional congressional authorization for the use of force," the spokesperson said.

Without a new military authorization, the ongoing U.S. war on terrorism will continue to be bound by the measure approved more than 15 years ago after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

That existing resolution authorizes force against those who aided or took part in the 2001 attacks — and has generally been interpreted as targeting "Al Qaeda and associated forces." It has no time frame or geographic limitation.

As a result, the Bush, Obama and now Trump administrations have invoked it as justification to go after suspected terrorists all over the world, from the Philippines to the Horn of Africa, and even on the "high seas," according to the Congressional Research Service.

"We're operating off an obsolete AUMF," said Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.), another long-time proponent of repealing the 2001 resolution. "I know these guys are trying to protect their members from casting a tough vote, but none of us have our lives on the line in Afghanistan right now. We owe it to the men and women who are serving there to at least debate whether what we're doing there makes sense."

John Bresnahan contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Air Force secretary says more resources, not Space Corps, can solve challenges Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 07/12/2017 07:11 PM EDT

Air Force Secretary Heather Wilson says that what the Air Force needs to operate better in space is more resources and more acquisition flexibility, not a new organizational chart in the Space Corps.

To reach that end, she's defended an Air Force budget to Congress that includes a 20 percent increase in spending on space, a significantly larger increase than other sectors of the budget.

"Why is changing the org chart the answer to the problem?" Wilson told POLITICO. "The root cause of this problem is the adversary is modernizing faster than we are, and a lack of resources for space — not because they weren't asked for, but because of sequester — and we've had something like 30 [continuing resolutions] in the last 10 years."

But Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.) said business as usual is clearly no longer cutting it as adversaries like Russia and China expand their space programs.

"The Air Force has had a couple of decades to fix this problem that we have in space, and they haven't," Rogers told POLITICO. "To continue to let the Air Force and DoD do what they've been doing is not an option."

The House's version of the National Defense Authorization Act, H.R. 2810 \(115\), which is on the House floor this week, would require Wilson to create a Space Corps within the Air Force by Jan. 1, 2019. It would be led by a four-star chief of staff with a seat at the Joint Chiefs' table.

Rogers, who chairs the House Armed Services Strategic Forces Subcommittee, said a Space Corps is the right solution to help the Air Force be more agile and focused on space because it would both create a group of people for whom space dominance — not air dominance — is the No. 1 priority, and protect the space budget from funding other Air Force priorities, like fighters or bombers.

"The Air Force has been using the space budget for their money pot," Rogers said. "That's the main reason they're fighting this."

Wilson, however, said she is pushing back against the proposal because it would create division and "fiefdoms" at a time when services are trying to be more joint, and distract the Air Force with bureaucratic reshuffling at a time when warfighting demands airmen's focus.

"I don't know how that would be possible, to implement it without increase in cost and the bureaucracy associated," she said.

Rogers rejects criticism that the proposal would create more bureaucracy or cost more, saying that it would essentially just fence off the current space workforce and the existing hierarchy that supports it.

While Rogers said that creating the Space Corps would create a group of people whose top priority is space, Wilson said that by dividing that group from the rest of the Air Force, it would also diminish the warfighting culture among that space workforce that is being cultivated now that it is facing a contested environment.

"Space was always benign. ... Now it's changing to a warfighting ethos," Wilson said. "It is a different ethos, and it's helped by being engaged with officers who are in combat every day."

"I think you may freeze in place a culture of benign operations. I'm not sure that's helpful," she added.

Rep. Mike Turner (R-Ohio) has introduced an amendment to the NDAA to strip out the requirement to create a Space Corps and instead increase the study of the proposal, something that was praised on Wednesday in letters from both Wilson and Defense Secretary Jim Mattis. The House Rules Committee has not yet decided whether the amendment will be in order.

Wilson said Air Force officials are engaging with members, many of whom she said were surprised the plan made it into the final bill and "have some concerns about it."

But Rogers said Turner was the lone dissenting voice when the proposal was debated in the Strategic Forces Subcommittee and that she felt confident he would have broad bipartisan support in the full House if it comes for a vote.

Asked if she might see a place for a Space Corps within the Air Force sometime in the future, Wilson stressed that now is not the time, but left the door open.

"When we're routinely going to Mars, that starts to change the game a little," she said.

To view online click here.

Back

Air Force acquisition official 'excited' by congressional space focus Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 07/13/2017 12:45 PM EDT

The Air Force's top acquisition official for space said today he's "excited" by the congressional focus on space, regardless of the proposed Space Corps organizational shakeup that top Pentagon leaders have slammed.

Brig. Gen. Mark Baird said the debate surrounding the Space Corps proposal on Capitol Hill is "a good sign because people are now focusing on this problem that we have."

"The organizational what boxes are where and all that — that's going to be decided and debated way above my pay grade, but I'm excited to see we have so much focus on it," he said at the Defense One Tech Summit.

"I'll salute and drive on whatever they tell us to do, but the focus is what's exciting to me," he added.

Other members of the panel from industry and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency declined to comment on the proposal.

Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and Air Force Secretary Heather Wilson have both publicly criticized the proposal to stand up a Space Corps within the Air Force. Rep. Mike Turner (R-Ohio) introduced an amendment to the House fiscal 2018 National Defense Authorization Act to strip it out, but the House Rules Committee decided it was not in order.

That means the creation of a Space Corps remains in the bill being considered now on the House floor. It's unclear, though, if the Space Corps will survive reconciliation with the developing Senate legislation.

To view online click here.

Back

Heritage Action backs BRAC amendment Back

By Connor O'Brien | 07/12/2017 05:46 PM EDT

The conservative advocacy group Heritage Action for America is urging House members to allow a new round of military base closures and realignments.

The group issued a key vote in support of an amendment to the fiscal 2018 National Defense Authorization Act H.R. 2810 \(115\) from Rep. Tom McClintock (R-Calif.) that would strip out a provision prohibiting a new BRAC round.

Permitting a BRAC "should not be controversial," Heritage Action argued.

"By prohibiting a new round of BRAC, members of Congress are undermining Pentagon priorities in order to protect unnecessary military infrastructure in their district or state," the group said.

A statement of administration policy released by the White House today also noted the Trump administration's objections to barring BRAC, which the Pentagon has requested for 2021.

McClintock's amendment is likely to see debate tonight on the House floor.

To view online click here.

Back

House scuttles BRAC, Gitmo amendments to NDAA Back

By Connor O'Brien | 07/13/2017 03:34 PM EDT

The House today disposed of a slew of amendments to the fiscal 2018 National Defense Authorization Act H.R. 2810 \(115\), including rejecting proposals to overturn prohibitions on new military base realignments and closures and transferring detainees to the U.S. from the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The House rejected, 175 to 248, a proposal from Rep. Tom McClintock (R-Calif.) that would have struck a provision that bars the Pentagon from implementing a new round of BRAC. The Pentagon had requested authority to conduct such a new round in 2021.

Lawmakers also rejected, 167 to 257, an amendment from Rep. Jerry Nadler (D-N.Y.) that would have removed an NDAA provision barring the transfer of Guantanamo detainees to the U.S.

The House also rejected, 198 to 225, an amendment from Rep. Mike Conaway (R-Texas) to prohibit the Pentagon from entering into new biofuels contracts while the Budget Control Act remains law.

To view online click here.

Back

Democratic NDAA budget proposals quashed in the House Back

By Connor O'Brien | 07/13/2017 03:14 PM EDT

The House defeated two Democratic budget amendments to the fiscal 2018 National Defense Authorization Act H.R. 2810 \(115\) to cut defense spending and promote domestic budget increases.

Lawmakers rejected, 75 to 35, an amendment from Rep. Jared Polis (D-Colo.) that would have mandated a 1 percent reduction in defense spending, except for personnel and health accounts.

Polis called the proposed cut, which would have amounted to a $6 billion to $7 billion reduction, "extremely reasonable" that could be taken out of "many overfunded accounts." But Republicans fired back that the cuts were arbitrary and ignored efforts in the NDAA to fill unfunded needs.

The House also rejected, 179 to 245, an amendment from Reps. Mark Pocan (D-Wis.) and Pramila Jayapal (D-Wash.) calling for increases in the defense budget to be matched with equal increases in domestic discretionary spending.

Republicans slammed the measure for proposing to "condition" military funding on extra money for domestic agencies.

"That holds the military hostage to a domestic political agenda," argued House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas). "And I think that is fundamentally wrong at every level."

But the committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Adam Smith of Washington state, fired back, noting President Donald Trump's budget proposes boosting defense spending with massive cuts to non-defense spending.

"It is beyond insulting to say if you support any sort of domestic spending you don't care about the troops," Smith said.

To view online click here.

Back

FEC allows lawmakers to spend campaign funds on home security Back

By Maggie Severns | 07/13/2017 12:34 PM EDT

The FEC unanimously adopted a plan today allowing members of Congress to use their campaign funds to install or upgrade home security systems.

The FEC took up the issue after the House sergeant-at-arms sent a request to the commission last month, explaining that lawmakers are increasingly facing threats to their safety and asking if campaign funds could be used to help upgrade their homes. While the FEC had occasionally allowed lawmakers to spend campaign funds on home security on a case-by-case basis, there was no guidance allowing lawmakers to do so without bringing the issue to the FEC first.

Commissioners, especially Democratic Commissioner Ellen Weintraub, expressed concern during the meeting that granting the request would inadvertently give lawmakers leeway to install security systems in order to increase their home values. Eventually, commissioners reached a compromise deal designed to allow lawmakers to upgrade their security systems with language designed to prevent abuse of the new system.

To view online click here.

Back

Wyden: Repatriation funding for infrastructure idea 'has a pulse again' Back

By Tanya Snyder | 07/13/2017 10:43 AM EDT

Sen. Ron Wyden said this morning that he thinks the pendulum is swinging back in favor of the idea of paying for infrastructure with the revenues from the repatriation of overseas corporate profits.

"I think the idea has a pulse again," he told a gathering of the American Road and Transportation Builders Association in Washington. "I think it's something that [the Trump administration is] willing to ruminare over. And part of it is, I think they know you have obligation to come up with smart policies to get that $2.3 trillion back — one — and two, it's pretty hard to find other sources of money for the important work that needs to be done."

Wyden said that there seems to be consensus among senior Republicans that a tax overhaul package should include a repatriation component, and when he asks about using a portion of it for infrastructure, "they don't say, 'no way, no how.'"

The fact that there "are not a lot of other places to go" for infrastructure funding and the fact that Sens. Chuck Schumer and Rob Portman had made a lot of headway on a bipartisan plan along those lines both contribute to the resurgence of the idea.

"My own judgment: I think there is more Republican interest in repatriation, A. And B, some of that money being used for infrastructure than people may know," Wyden said.

To view online click here.

Back

Simpson: DOE not expecting new loans for 4-5 years Back

By Anthony Adragna and Darius Dixon | 07/12/2017 05:44 PM EDT

The Energy Department doesn't plan to issue any new commitments from its controversial loan program during the course of President Donald Trump's first term, Rep. Mike Simpson said today.

"There is nothing on the horizon for a loan guarantee for the next several years — at least four or five," the House energy spending chief said in the Capitol, relaying information he said came from DOE.

The Idaho Republican said that cutting funds and authorities for the loan program helped avoid cuts elsewhere in the energy and water appropriations bill.

"It's a choice. The loan guarantee program I support, but there's just no money for it right now," Simpson said. "Does that mean there won't be in the future? We'll see."

Trump's fiscal 2018 budget proposes to eliminate DOE's energy loan guarantee program. The House spending bill would bar DOE from issuing new loan guarantee commitments after Sept. 30, and cuts the office's net appropriation compared to the current fiscal year. But the House bill would allow the agency to spend up to $2 million — using fees it collects from loan recipients — to cover its administrative expenses.

WHAT'S NEXT: The energy and water appropriations bill is headed to the House floor but the timing of a vote is unclear.

To view online click here.

Back

Manchin raises more than $1.4m in second quarter Back

By Elana Schor | 07/13/2017 05:25 AM EDT

Sen. Joe Manchin raised more than $1.4 million for his reelection in the second quarter of this year, according to data shared in advance with POLITICO, and has almost $3.5 million on hand as two of his GOP challengers face a brutal primary battle.

Manchin's second-quarter fundraising more than doubles the $552,000 he took in during the first three months of the year, giving a major boost to the West Virginia Democrat — who also faces his own primary challenge from a liberal activist backed by a group of former Bernie Sanders aides.

"West Virginians are tired of partisan negativity getting in the way of good government," Manchin said in a statement. "I'm running on a record of consensus-building on behalf of the people of the Mountain State — hard-working West Virginians who deserve elected leaders who always put their interests ahead of politics."

Manchin already faces two GOP opponents, Rep. Evan Jenkins (R-W.Va.) and West Virginia Attorney General Patrick Morrisey, who jumped into the race this week after taking repeated shots at Jenkins. The likely bitter Republican primary fight could further lift Democratic hopes of holding onto Manchin's seat in a state that President Donald Trump carried by 42 percentage points last year.

Jenkins raised $367,726 in the first quarter of this year and had $1.035 million on hand, according to his campaign finance disclosures. He has yet to release fundraising totals for the second quarter. Manchin's Democratic primary challenger, Paula Swearengin, has yet to post any fundraising disclosures with the Federal Election Commission.

Manchin did not raise money online during the second quarter, according to his campaign.

His new fundraising totals follow a series of robust second-quarter reports from other Senate Democrats running for re-election next year in Trump states, including $3.1 million for Claire McCaskill of Missouri and $2.6 million for Sherrod Brown of Ohio.

To view online click here.

Back

Yellen: 'Quite challenging' for U.S. to reach 3 percent growth in five years Back

By Victoria Guida | 07/13/2017 12:32 PM EDT

Federal Reserve Chair Janet Yellen said today it would be "quite challenging" for the U.S. economy to reach 3 percent growth in the next five years, which Trump administration officials have said is their goal.

During testimony before the Senate Banking Committee, Yellen cited "miserable" productivity growth of 0.5 percent for the past five years. She said U.S. productivity would have to increase by at least 2 percent annually to accelerate economic growth. And she said the workforce is not expanding, another factor working against greater productivity.

But she welcomed any efforts by Congress to achieve faster economic growth.

Yellen also said there are "distortions" in the corporate tax code that are hurting productivity.

"Tax reform could have a favorable effect on productivity," she said.

She said it "depends on the details" of what Congress ultimately does but added that "there is scope there to have a favorable impact on long-term economic growth."

WHAT'S NEXT: The Trump administration and congressional Republicans say they intend to reach a unified tax reform plan in the fall.

To view online click here.

Back

Chao: Administration wants to explore long-term HTF fixes Back

By Brianna Gurciullo | 07/13/2017 03:24 PM EDT

Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao said today that the Trump administration wants to explore long-term fixes to the Highway Trust Fund, including possibly through a vehicle miles traveled fee.

"We actually have begun to look at perhaps using different kinds of measurements for funding highways, and one of which is the mileage, using mileage travel as a parameter as well," Chao said at a Senate Appropriations subcommittee hearing. She was responding to questions from transportation subcommittee Chairwoman Susan Collins (R-Maine). Chao specifically mentioned several state-level VMT pilot projects that are ongoing.

Chao added that the administration is working on plans to pay for its $1 trillion infrastructure program.

"We are looking at ways with which to fund the infrastructure proposal, which is why it has taken us quite a while to come up with the proposal and the details," she said.

To view online click here.

Back

Was this Pro content helpful? Tell us what you think in one click.

Yes, very	Somewhat	Neutral	Not really	Not at all

You received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Budget & Appropriations Brief. To change your alert settings, please go to <https://www.politicopro.com/settings>

This email was sent to heather_swift@ios.doi.gov by: POLITICO, LLC 1000 Wilson Blvd. Arlington, VA, 22209, USA

From: POLITICO Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief
To: heather_swift@ios.doi.gov
Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Old budget caps reign during Obamacare wait — Appropriators dig in on Comey funding request — GOP tries to keep focus on health care, tax reform
Date: Thursday, May 11, 2017 5:02:57 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 05/11/2017 04:57 PM EDT

BACK TO THE CAPS: Senate Republicans aren't exactly in a rush to finish up the GOP's health care package anytime soon, signaling a slow-moving schedule that budget watchers worry will logjam this year's spending bills. But GOP appropriators tell us they don't plan to wait for official budget documents from either chamber to begin drafting bills, even if they don't have a precise dollar figure to spend. "We're starting now," Sen. John Hoeven (R-N.D.), who leads the spending subcommittee on agriculture, said this week.

Gotta start somewhere: There is at least a launch point, appropriators say, though it's not very popular among that crowd. Without a new budget agreement to replace the 2015 Obama-Boehner deal, Congress has to go back to the roughly $1.156 trillion topline from the much-maligned Budget Control Act of 2011. "Unless we have a different number, that's the topline," Hoeven told us.

Tied hands: Any official numbers will likely be on hold until GOP leaders agree to a fiscal 2018 budget resolution, which can't happen until health care is done, as the legislation is tied to the fiscal 2017 budget. That leaves appropriators largely in the dark as they kick off their hearings in the next few weeks.

The bipartisan anti-sequester bloc: Some defense hawks within the GOP have already called for scrapping the 2011 caps, at least for military spending. But that effort would run into certain objections from Democrats, who say they won't agree to lift spending levels for defense without an equal boost to domestic programs. Some, like Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.), say there's bipartisan agreement to find a deal to kill the sequester. "The underlying law is sequestration, which is disastrous and I imagine unacceptable to both parties," Murphy, a Senate Appropriations Committee member, told us.

Stay tuned: The battle over budget caps is just beginning. Over the next few weeks, watch for a big coordinated push from Democrats to raise those spending levels for both domestic and defense.

GOOD THURSDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: @jscholtes and @sarahnferris.

Doc(s) of the day — A report from the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities warning that 40 million women would be impacted by the deep Medicaid cuts in the House GOP's health care plan.

The executive director of the Environmental Integrity Project urges EPA's inspector general to investigate Administrator Scott Pruitt's decision to reassign 10 criminal investigators to his personal security detail, calling the assignments "a wasteful use of taxpayer funds."

#DailyBudgetFact — Last year's House GOP budget, which was written by former Rep. Tom Price, would have cut $14 billion from Social Security and $449 billion from Medicare over 10 years. President Donald Trump, who has since picked Price for his Cabinet, has promised not to cut from either program.

DOJ

DIGGING INTO COMEY'S FUNDING REQUEST: Democratic appropriators want the details, of course, on ousted FBI Director James Comey's alleged request for more cash to run the election-meddling investigation. And spending committee leaders in both chambers have now put in formal requests with the Trump administration. In a letter today to Attorney General Jeff Sessions and another letter to Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein, Democratic appropriators urged the administration to turn over critical information on potential Russian interference.

Ain't no date: For their part, Senate appropriators asked for answers at least 72 hours before the committee's hearing on the Justice Department's fiscal 2018 request. Looking to put that hearing on your calendar? Tough luck. It hasn't been scheduled.

They want to know:

- The details of any request for more resources to investigate Russian meddling in the U.S. election process.
- Whether the funding is needed for fiscal 2017 or fiscal 2018.
- How the request was communicated from the FBI to DOJ.
- Whether similar requests were made to the White House, including OMB, or lawmakers.
- What response the FBI received.
- Any "other constraints" that might limit the FBI in conducting a thorough investigation into the matter.

Shaking another tree: Meanwhile, in the investigation (of the investigation), Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) placed a hold this week on a nominee for a key economic sanctions job and said he would maintain it until the Treasury Department produces documents related to Russia's ties with Trump, Zachary Warmbrodt reports.

POLITICAL STRATEGY

EYES ON THE PRIZE, GUYS: Trying not to get enveloped now by the cloud of Comey controversy, Republican lawmakers are keeping their heads down, trying to focus on their biggest legislative lifts. Burgess Everett and Rachael Bade explain: "For all the Democratic outrage over Comey, Republicans can successfully enact legislation on certain issues, like health care and taxes, if they maintain party unity and abide by strict Senate rules. And that has the GOP thinking it can proceed apace on its agenda. ... But now there is renewed focus on the Senate's slow-moving Russia investigations, the GOP's resistance to calling for a special prosecutor or select committee and the confirmation of a new FBI director, all of which will consume precious time and political capital."

Meanwhile, Republican tax writers say the Comey firing isn't going to slow them down, Aaron Lorenzo and Colin Wilhelm report.

OBAMACARE

TWO-BY-TWO — HURRAH, HURRAH: GOP leaders in the Senate are calling on members to talk out their ideas for repealing and replacing Obamacare. In the latest meetup, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Majority Whip John Cornyn and HELP Chairman Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) hosted Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Bill Cassidy (R-La.). "The working group that counts is all 52 of us," McConnell said, pushing back against criticism that the 13-senator working group on health care doesn't include a single woman. Jennifer Haberkorn explains today that the main problem with involving all 52 Republican senators is that leaders will wind up with 52 different ideas about what the legislation should entail.

Your daily Obamacare roundup: Repeal gets 21 percent approval | Republicans flub their response | MacArthur gets called a liar and tries to defend his vote | Dems see newly vulnerable GOP seats | Aetna completely withdraws from marketplaces | Can California push back?

AGRICULTURE

DRAIN THE ... PASTURE? Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue may have been one of the last Cabinet secretaries to get an official sign-off from the Senate, but he's about to become the first to launch a major department overhaul. The USDA is about to get a Trump-ian "Farmer First" revamp intending to make good on the president's promise to shake up the federal bureaucracy, our Pro Ag team reports.

A demotion for rural development: While there are no layoffs expected, there will be high-level staffing shifts and a resource rearrangement. The USDA will eliminate its undersecretary position for rural development, which coordinates billions in loans and grants related to housing, health care and water in hard-to-reach areas. In its place will be an entire position and branch focused on trade. TBT: Trump has already called for a 21 percent cut in the USDA's budget, largely targeting grants. And programs like the Rural Business and Cooperative Service were also put on the chopping block.

'You grow it, we sell it': Perdue outlined the plan in his own words in The Wall Street Journal today, promising to be an "unapologetic advocate" for American products. "My message for farmers is simple: 'You grow it and we'll sell it,'" Pro reports.

FINANCIAL SERVICES

KEEP THAT FANNIE-FREDDIE MONEY COMING: As head of the country's mortgage finance agency, Mel Watt says he has the power to hoard Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac profits for the mortgage giants themselves — rather than letting those funds flow back to the Treasury. But Senate Banking Chairman Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) is warning Watt not to play that card, Lorraine Woellert reports. "Suspending dividend payments will lead some to believe that reform is not urgent," Crapo told Watt during a hearing today. "I would encourage you to work with this committee to make sure this does not occur."

Lorraine has also got more on Crapo's proposal for a Fannie-Freddie overhaul and Watt's warning that the cost of getting a home loan could rise if the companies aren't retooled.

Russian roulette: The mortgage companies are reliant on a $258 billion line of credit from Treasury to cover losses. And some investors say drawing on that lifeline could trigger market volatility and reduce confidence in the companies. But some in Congress say that's an overhyped forecast. Challenging Watt to draw on the lifeline to see what would happen, Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) called the risk of a violent market reaction "one of the most baseless arguments I've ever heard" and challenged Watt to draw on the funds to prove his point. Watt says he "can't afford" to take that risk, though.

TAX

HERE WE GO: The House Ways and Means Committee will hold its first tax reform hearing next Thursday, Bernie Becker reports. The committee says the focus will be on "how tax reform will grow our economy and create jobs across America." Witnesses will be announced next week.

Widening the divide: Trump and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said today that the administration's "preference" is to keep the corporate interest deduction in the tax code, further highlighting the gulf between the administration and House Republicans on an overhaul, Colin reports.

Deduction pleas: A bipartisan group of more than 120 House lawmakers is urging leaders to preserve advertising as a tax-deductible business expense, Kaitlyn Burton reports.

EARMARKS

- Trump wants $800 billion, 10-year cut in entitlement programs. Roll Call.
- Conservative groups say infrastructure plan must be fiscally sound. POLITICO Pro.
- Saudis boost U.S. ties with $40 billion investment. Bloomberg.
- Six-figure payouts for sick leave spur outrage, calls for overhaul. The Wall Street Journal.
- Trump taps David Kautter for Treasury's top tax policy post. POLITICO Pro.

WE'RE COUNTING: 141 days until federal funding runs out, and the Children's Health Insurance Program and National Flood Insurance Program expire. 506 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018).

To view online:

<https://www.politicopro.com/tipsheets/budget-appropriations-brief/2017/05/obamacare-holdup-constrains-congress-to-old-budget-caps-022798>

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Wyden puts hold on Treasury nominee in bid to get Trump-Russia documents Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 05/10/2017 06:24 PM EDT

Sen. Ron Wyden today placed a hold on a nominee for a key economic sanctions job and said he would maintain it until the Treasury Department produces documents related to Russia's ties with President Donald Trump.

The Oregon Democrat is targeting Sigal Mandelker, Trump's nominee for Under Secretary of the Treasury for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence. Wyden's office cited an announcement by Sen. Mark Warner (D-Va.) who said yesterday that the Senate Intelligence Committee had asked Treasury's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network for information on Trump and his aides.

Wyden is the ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee.

"We have to follow the money if we are going to get to the bottom of how Russia has attacked our democracy," Wyden said in a statement. "That means thoroughly review any information that relates to financial connections between Russia and President Trump and his associates, whether direct or laundered through hidden or illicit transactions. The office which Ms. Mandelker has been nominated to head is responsible for much of this information."

White House spokeswoman Natalie Strom said the administration fully expects Mandelker to be confirmed soon.

"I can't say I'm shocked that Senate Democrats are looking for any excuse to hold up the President's unquestionably qualified nominees," Strom said. "It's unfortunate that they're willing to play political games with a law enforcement post that is typically handled without this kind of partisan maneuvering."

WHAT'S NEXT: Mandelker is scheduled to testify before the Senate Banking Committee Tuesday.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP scrambles to shield agenda from Comey fallout Back

By Burgess Everett and Rachael Bade | 05/10/2017 06:23 PM EDT

Senate Republicans sat down Wednesday for their first lengthy party meeting since FBI Director James Comey's unexpected sacking. But as the Comey controversy raged outside the stately Mansfield Room and all over cable news, inside their caucus room senators barely uttered a word about it.

Republicans are desperately trying to quarantine the Comey storyline to the Senate Intelligence Committee and work toward their overarching goals of revamping the tax code and health care system. But it may not be as easy to get over as past controversies: Instead of responding to Trump's tweets or an inflammatory speech, this time the GOP is dealing with Trump's actions and their rippling repercussions.

The scrums of reporters haranguing senators over Comey reached new highs on Wednesday, creating unwieldy crowds and exasperated senators who kept getting asked the same question. But inside the GOP lunch, the discussion was almost entirely related to repealing Obamacare, a topic that's difficult enough for Republicans to tackle, senators said. The only mention was a short recitation by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of his position that there should be no special prosecutor investigating Russian meddling in the 2016 election and possible collusion between Trump's campaign and Moscow.

"Absolutely [Comey's firing is] important. But in terms of the issues before us, I don't think it affects us," said Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.).

For all the Democratic outrage over Comey, Republicans can successfully enact legislation on certain issues, like health care and taxes, if they maintain party unity and abide by strict Senate rules. And that has the GOP thinking it can proceed apace on its agenda.

"The health care effort right now is 100 percent Republican. So it's not really affecting [it]," said Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "Issues that you deal with that are done in a bipartisan way, sometimes it has an effect. In this particular case, it's having zero effect ... there was no discussion."

But now there is renewed focus on the Senate's slow-moving Russia investigations, the GOP's resistance to calling for a special prosecutor or select committee and now, the confirmation of a new FBI director, all of which will consume precious time and political capital.

And Republican leadership was unable to shake the Comey storyline; in fact, as McConnell took the floor on Wednesday, dozens of Democrats were staring back at him, hoping for a response to Trump's decision to fire Comey.

During a factory tour and a business roundtable in Columbus, Ohio Wednesday, House Speaker Paul Ryan's pitch for tax reform kept getting interrupted by reporters asking questions about the Comey firing. Ryan's team specifically designed the tour to launch House Republicans' push to rewrite the tax code. But while he was speaking to local business leaders, Ryan's Twitter account was lighting up about his lack of response to Comey's ousting.

And some Republicans fret that all the public attention on Comey is going to bleed into their legislative efforts. Asked whether Comey's dismissal could affect the Senate's work, Sen. Susan Collins of Maine replied: "I think it already has."

"Anytime you have a controversy like this, at least in the short-term, it will be a hindrance going forward with legislation — that's just the reality," Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) said in an interview. "Yesterday, everyone was talking about health care. Today, all anyone is talking about is Comey and the FBI and Russia."

Other Republicans insisted their focus on Obamacare is dictated by what they are hearing from their constituents, not the Trump news of the day that roils the Capitol at a pace that's difficult for lawmakers to keep up with. As Sen. David Perdue (R-Ga.) put it: "I doubt that any Republican senator, other than talking to media, are gonna sit around talking about what do we do about the FBI."

"It's a feeding frenzy in the media and they're enjoying it," said Sen. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.). "The media enjoys this a lot more than normal people do."

But inside the Capitol, there was already evidence that Trump's firing of Comey — and Republicans' defense of Trump — was infecting the upper chamber. Senate Democrats wielded their limited procedural leverage on Wednesday and cancelled all hearings after 11:30 a.m., halting much of the Senate's work for the day. Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) came to the Senate floor to declare the episode "another low."

Republicans don't believe Democrats can keep objecting to hearings devoted to national security and foreign policy, but Democrats wouldn't rule out further actions to scuttle the Senate's daily agenda. And they said that until Republicans agree to an independent investigation, working on bipartisan legislation — which is most of the Senate's business other than party-line efforts on health care and taxes — will be extremely difficult.

"Credibility is a key issue here. Not in this building, but in the public eye," said Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, the No. 3 Senate Democrat. "The best way to establish credibility on whatever issues are in front of us is to make sure we have independent people pursuing the questions around Russia."

Rep. Tom Reed, who leads the bipartisan "No Labels" caucus, tried to downplay the impact Comey's firing would have on his push for moderate Democrats and centrist Republicans to work together. The New York Republican argued that Comey's dismissal "is not a partisan issue" and therefore won't affect the group's work.

"As Americans, both Republican and Democrat, we all care about a fair and non-politicized examination of the facts and that our principles are protected," he said.

That, however, may prove to be wishful thinking.

Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin recently met with more moderate House Democrats in the bipartisan "No Labels" caucus to let them know Trump wants Democrats' help reforming the tax code. The conversations, people on both sides of the aisle said, were productive, giving hope to the administration that they could work with the left.

But Comey's firing is likely to cripple the administration's attempts to woo Democrats to the table on taxes.

"His agenda was on life support already. He just pulled the plug himself," said a senior Democratic aide of Trump.

Even if bipartisan collaboration is something of a dream right now, Republicans don't need Democratic support to clinch new health care and tax laws, because they are using powerful budget reconciliation procedures that can circumvent Democratic filibusters in the Senate.

But though the House narrowly passed a healthcare bill last week, Senate Republicans are already beginning to bog down in policy disagreements.

Questions about Comey aren't making efforts to find solutions any easier.

"Health care is tough enough," said Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

Seung Min Kim and Jennifer Haberkorn contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

GOP dismissive of tax reform complications from Comey's firing Back

By Aaron Lorenzo and Colin Wilhelm | 05/10/2017 03:52 PM EDT

Republican tax writers don't expect President Donald Trump's controversial firing of James Comey to slow their efforts to reform the tax code.

Instead, they vowed to keep advancing their overhaul efforts as planned, regardless of potential Democratic obstruction related to Comey's dismissal as FBI director.

"The Democrats are stopping everything no matter what, so it isn't just [Comey]," said Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). "They'll just use any excuse to clog this place up. They hate Trump so badly that's what they're doing."

A forward-focused sentiment also echoed across the Capitol, with Ways and Means Republicans carrying on as planned, according to spokeswoman Emily Schillinger. "Ways and Means Republicans are working with the administration and the Senate and continuing to move forward on pro-growth tax reform," she said.

But Senate Democrats could slow things down if they aren't satisfied with Republican plans to resolve Comey's dismissal. They want a special counsel to investigate Russian involvement in Trump's election victory.

"This obviously is an overriding question and I think the majority leader is going to want to talk through how to proceed," said Senate Finance ranking member Ron Wyden (D-Ore.). "Clearly this will very significantly affect the floor, and I think it remains to be seen about committees."

Some analysts saw Comey's firing as an impediment for Trump's economic agenda.

"This dismissal will certainly slow legislative progress on tax reform and other pro-growth measures as Congressional Republicans will spend the coming weeks either deflecting or defending the decision," wrote Compass Point LLC's Isaac Boltansky.

To view online click here.

Back

52 ways to repeal Obamacare Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 05/11/2017 05:14 AM EDT

Senate Republicans want to do their own Obamacare repeal plan — but nearly all 52 Republicans have their own ideas about how it should look.

With his razor-thin majority, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell can afford to lose only two GOP votes. That turns each senator into a de facto powerbroker with the ability to shape — or kill — legislation simply by aligning with two other members.

More of those alliances appear to be springing up almost daily, underscoring McConnell's challenge to wrangle 50 votes for any legislation.

"All 52 members of the conference and hopefully Democrats will be interested in working through the issues," said Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.). "There's going to be a lot of people involved in all the discussions."

In one corner are five Republicans led by Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Bill Cassidy of Louisiana, among the most outspoken GOP critics of the House legislation, who want to give states the power to enact their own plans — including Obamacare if they choose to keep it.

Another group of centrists — Sens. Rob Portman of Ohio, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia and Gardner— worry about repealing Obamacare's Medicaid expansion, which has provided coverage to millions of their residents and pumped billions of federal dollars into their states.

So far, individual lawmakers have not publicly drawn a line against repealing the Medicaid expansion, but some have come close. What to do about that program, which covers almost 1 out of 4 Americans, is the single biggest fault line in the Senate's repeal debate.

Then, there is the official working group of 13 lawmakers backed by Senate Republican leadership that is hoping to bridge the conservative-centrist divide — even though the group has an optics problem because it has not a single woman senator.

McConnell on Tuesday — pushing back on criticism about lack of diversity — downplayed the importance of the working group entirely.

"The working group that counts is all 52 of us," McConnell said.

McConnell, Majority Whip John Cornyn and HELP Chairman Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) also met Wednesday with Collins and Cassidy, part of an effort to hear from members beyond just the 13-member working group.

"They are meeting with everybody in the conference and we just happened to be the two up today," Cassidy said. "They know our plan, of course. They're trying to meet with everybody in the conference."

At this point, Republican leaders are trying to keep the Senate tent as wide as possible — in part to keep every member of the GOP focused on fulfilling the seven-year-old campaign pledge to repeal Obamacare without throwing rhetorical bombs that might make the process even more difficult.

"We know that we have to get at least 50 votes," said Alexander, who will play a key role in the process. "Everyone has a point of view. We want to make sure everyone is involved so this is a good way to do it."

But if and when Republicans get closer to putting pen to paper, there will inevitably be winners and losers — and some of those losers are likely to get angry enough to publicly criticize the process.

For now, though, they are diving deep on policy: They plan to hold meetings on health policy almost every day the Senate is in town. Both the 13-member working group and the full Republican conference have discussed how to give states greater flexibility on Medicaid "in a way that doesn't pull the rug out from under anyone who is served by Medicaid," Alexander said.

Each lawmaker, meanwhile, has their own parochial concerns.

"I don't know that there's 52 ideas but there's a bunch," said Sen. John Boozman (R-Ark.), whose state was considered a GOP model for using Obamacare's Medicaid funding to pay for private health insurance for participants.

Portman and Capito have emerged as two of the key senators on preserving at least some aspects of Medicaid expansion. Along with Murkowski and Gardner, they wrote a letter to McConnell in March expressing big reservations about the House's plan to undo Medicaid expansion without offering stability for those currently enrolled in the entitlement for the poor.

On Tuesday, another group of senators from states that expanded the program under Obamacare met to discuss their options. They included: Portman, Capito, Gardner, Cassidy, Dean Heller of Nevada, Todd Young of Indiana, John Hoeven of North Dakota, as well as two senators from non-expansion states: Thom Tillis of North Carolina and Collins.

Some senators, meanwhile, are operating as a working group of one.

"I'm not part of a working group," said Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), who says he won't be left out of the debate. "My office is a working group."

Burgess Everett contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Poll: Just 21 percent approve of House's Obamacare repeal bill Back

By Louis Nelson | 05/11/2017 01:47 PM EDT

Less than a quarter of American voters surveyed in a new poll released Thursday by Quinnipiac University approve of the legislation passed last week by the House of Representatives to repeal and replace the Affordable Care Act.

Fifty-six percent of those polled said they disapprove of the legislation, dubbed the American Health Care Act, while just 21 percent said they support it. The support for the legislation represents an improvement over the 17 percent who said they supported the iteration of the bill that failed to pass the House in March.

Overall 66 percent said they disapprove of President Donald Trump's handling of healthcare, while 32 percent said they approve of it.

Forty-nine percent of respondents said the AHCA will hurt the nation, while 29 percent said it will help it and 13 percent said it will have no impact. Republican voters - 48 percent of whom supported the AHCA in the poll - were the only group with a positive view of the bill. Every other gender, party, age, educational and racial group opposed the legislation.

The legislation has proven especially controversial because it offers states the option to pull out of an Obamacare provision mandating that insurers not charge individuals with preexisting conditions more for coverage. Both Trump and GOP leadership had promised that any Obamacare replacement leave intact protections for those with preexisting conditions.

The repeal-and-replace legislation removes the mandate that all Americans purchase health insurance or else pay a penalty and also undoes a requirement that insurers cover certain services and conditions.

Seventy-five percent of respondents - and 59 percent of Republicans - said it is a "bad idea" to allow states to opt out of cost-lowering protections for those with preexisting conditions. Sixty-four percent of those polled said they approved of the current Obamacare provision that stops insurance companies from charging more for those with preexisting conditions.

Asked about the president's proposal to reform the tax code, 74 percent of respondents and 66 percent of Republicans said they would disapprove of it if it "significantly" increases the national debt, something Trump told The Economist in an interview released Thursday could be possible in the short term. Forty-six percent said they would approve of the tax plan if it resulted in spending cuts, while 45 percent said they would disapprove in such a scenario.

Among those polled, 49 percent said Trump's tax plan would hurt the nation while 29 percent said it will help it and 13 percent said it will not have an impact. Sixty-three percent said the wealthy will benefit the most under the president's proposal, while 27 percent said the same of the middle class.

The Quinnipiac University poll was conducted from May 4-9, reaching 1,078 voters nationwide via landlines and cell phones. The poll's margin of error was plus-or-minus three percentage points.

To view online click here.

Back

Republicans flub defense of health care vote Back

By Kyle Cheney | 05/11/2017 05:13 AM EDT

House Republicans celebrated passing legislation to repeal Obamacare last week — but apparently forgot to figure out how to talk about the feat back home.

The result has been a messaging mess, as lawmakers returned to their districts for a weeklong recess to face furious Obamacare defenders.

In interviews and at town halls packed with pro-Obamacare protesters, Republicans have struggled to explain the plan they just approved. Lawmakers are telling audiences conflicting things about how the bill would affect consumers. Others slammed a process they actively participated in or admitted they hadn't read the entire bill before voting on it — even though GOP leaders spent months hawking a website called ReadTheBill.gop.

Rep. Raúl Labrador (R-Idaho) told frustrated constituents on Monday that "nobody dies because they don't have access to health care" — a gaffe he quickly walked back a day later.

Labrador announced his candidacy for Idaho governor on Tuesday morning, and Democrats are already planning to use the comments against him.

Though many of the lawmakers who backed the legislation immediately shuttled to the White House to celebrate in the Rose Garden alongside President Donald Trump, they're still grappling with what to tell their constituents about it. There's even disagreement within the ranks over whether they should've taken a victory lap for a bill that still has to go through the Senate, where it's likely to be substantially rewritten.

"I don't think it's something to celebrate," Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) said Tuesday on New York radio station WABC. "I think there are still improvements that have to be made in it. But it's too serious a topic to be out there having a celebration on it."

House leaders opted against arming GOP lawmakers with talking points heading into their early-May recess week. Instead, leaders organized a question-and-answer session for members, led by lawmakers who authored the bill. The session, they believed, would address last-minute changes to the measure and frame potential responses to concerns from constituents.

GOP leaders have also been pointing members and staff to ReadTheBill.gov to brush up on how the measure would protect people with preexisting conditions and other issues.

Nonetheless, lawmakers have given a mishmash of responses about the significance of the most important vote they've taken so far this year.

At one town hall this week, Rep. Rod Blum (R-Iowa) agreed with a constituent who described the bill's approval as "rushed." He said he backed the measure because it was preferable to Obamacare, but he ripped the process that House leaders employed to push the bill through — without hearings and lacking updated fiscal analysis from the Congressional Budget Office.

"It was rushed, and there should have been hearings," Blum told a crowd packed with Obamacare supporters.

Rep. Jeff Denham of California, one of 23 Republicans representing a district won by Hillary Clinton last year, told constituents that the legislation, which was approved without a single Democratic vote, passed after a "bipartisan" process. In North Dakota, Republican Rep. Kevin Cramer said the bill's shortcomings were the result of arcane Senate budget rules that prohibited an up-or-down vote on repealing Obamacare altogether.

And in TV interviews the day the AHCA passed the House, Reps. Tom Garrett (R-Va.) and Chris Collins (R-N.Y.) said they didn't believe any of their colleagues had read the entire text before passing the bill.

Garrett, a member of the hard-line conservative House Freedom Caucus, defended his comments on Tuesday during a town hall in tiny Moneta, Virginia. He was pressed about conservatives' past vows to provide ample time to read legislation.

"Not only did our team read that bill," Garrett said, "I would wager that if you line me up against any member of either party as it relates to the intricacies of the [bill] ... I could acquit myself very well."

Garrett faced a town hall packed with Obamacare supporters who interrupted repeatedly as he defended the plan. One constituent said her father lived with brain cancer for eight years before dying of pneumonia.

"But if he had lost those benefits at any point in the eight years he had cancer, there's no way he would've gotten coverage," the constituent said. "What did my dad do to make you think that he deserved to pay more — would've deserved to pay more because he got sick?"

Garrett responded by recounting his mother's lengthy battle with cancer, which she survived.

"I won't discount anyone's personal story," he said, adding that while he may differ with some constituents on the legislative remedy, it's "an honest disagreement."

For many Republicans, including those from competitive districts who voted in favor of the GOP plan, the safer choice was to skip town halls altogether. Those who did hold them often earned constituents' grudging respect for at least showing up.

Cramer, at his event in North Dakota, answered detailed questions about the tax credit system that the Republican plan would create, as well as why he disagrees with calls for a universal health care system. When one constituent asked him how the bill would guarantee health care benefits, Cramer replied, "Everybody wants a guarantee that they get what they want. That's not America."

Rachael Bade and David Siders contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

Republicans flub defense of health care vote Back

By Kyle Cheney | 05/11/2017 05:13 AM EDT

House Republicans celebrated passing legislation to repeal Obamacare last week — but apparently forgot to figure out how to talk about the feat back home.

The result has been a messaging mess, as lawmakers returned to their districts for a weeklong recess to face furious Obamacare defenders.

In interviews and at town halls packed with pro-Obamacare protesters, Republicans have struggled to explain the plan they just approved. Lawmakers are telling audiences conflicting things about how the bill would affect consumers. Others slammed a process they actively participated in or admitted they hadn't read the entire bill before voting on it — even though GOP leaders spent months hawking a website called ReadTheBill.gop.

Rep. Raúl Labrador (R-Idaho) told frustrated constituents on Monday that "nobody dies because they don't have access to health care" — a gaffe he quickly walked back a day later. Labrador announced his candidacy for Idaho governor on Tuesday morning, and Democrats are already planning to use the comments against him.

Though many of the lawmakers who backed the legislation immediately shuttled to the White House to celebrate in the Rose Garden alongside President Donald Trump, they're still grappling with what to tell their constituents about it. There's even disagreement within the ranks over whether they should've taken a victory lap for a bill that still has to go through the Senate, where it's likely to be substantially rewritten.

"I don't think it's something to celebrate," Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) said Tuesday on New York radio station WABC. "I think there are still improvements that have to be made in it. But it's too serious a topic to be out there having a celebration on it."

House leaders opted against arming GOP lawmakers with talking points heading into their early-May recess week. Instead, leaders organized a question-and-answer session for members, led by lawmakers who authored the bill. The session, they believed, would address last-minute changes to the measure and frame potential responses to concerns from constituents.

GOP leaders have also been pointing members and staff to ReadTheBill.gov to brush up on how the measure would protect people with preexisting conditions and other issues.

Nonetheless, lawmakers have given a mishmash of responses about the significance of the most important vote they've taken so far this year.

At one town hall this week, Rep. Rod Blum (R-Iowa) agreed with a constituent who described the bill's approval as "rushed." He said he backed the measure because it was preferable to Obamacare, but he ripped the process that House leaders employed to push the bill through — without hearings and lacking updated fiscal analysis from the Congressional Budget Office.

"It was rushed, and there should have been hearings," Blum told a crowd packed with Obamacare supporters.

Rep. Jeff Denham of California, one of 23 Republicans representing a district won by Hillary Clinton last year, told constituents that the legislation, which was approved without a single Democratic vote, passed after a "bipartisan" process. In North Dakota, Republican Rep. Kevin Cramer said the bill's shortcomings were the result of arcane Senate budget rules that prohibited an up-or-down vote on repealing Obamacare altogether.

And in TV interviews the day the AHCA passed the House, Reps. Tom Garrett (R-Va.) and Chris Collins (R-N.Y.) said they didn't believe any of their colleagues had read the entire text before passing the bill.

Garrett, a member of the hard-line conservative House Freedom Caucus, defended his comments on Tuesday during a town hall in tiny Moneta, Virginia. He was pressed about conservatives' past vows to provide ample time to read legislation.

"Not only did our team read that bill," Garrett said, "I would wager that if you line me up against any member of either party as it relates to the intricacies of the [bill] ... I could acquit myself very well."

Garrett faced a town hall packed with Obamacare supporters who interrupted repeatedly as he defended the plan. One constituent said her father lived with brain cancer for eight years before dying of pneumonia.

"But if he had lost those benefits at any point in the eight years he had cancer, there's no way he would've gotten coverage," the constituent said. "What did my dad do to make you think that he deserved to pay more — would've deserved to pay more because he got sick?"

Garrett responded by recounting his mother's lengthy battle with cancer, which she survived.

"I won't discount anyone's personal story," he said, adding that while he may differ with some constituents on the legislative remedy, it's "an honest disagreement."

For many Republicans, including those from competitive districts who voted in favor of the GOP plan, the safer choice was to skip town halls altogether. Those who did hold them often earned constituents' grudging respect for at least showing up.

Cramer, at his event in North Dakota, answered detailed questions about the tax credit system that the Republican plan would create, as well as why he disagrees with calls for a universal health care system. When one constituent asked him how the bill would guarantee health care benefits, Cramer replied, "Everybody wants a guarantee that they get what they want. That's not America."

Rachael Bade and David Siders contributed to this report.

To view online click here.

Back

MacArthur endures town hall trial-by-fire Back

By Ryan Hutchins and Katie Jennings | 05/11/2017 12:49 AM EDT

WILLINGBORO, N.J. — At his Wednesday night town hall, Rep. Tom MacArthur, one of the chief architects of the revamped GOP Obamacare replacement plan, was called a liar. A man who said his wife had battled breast cancer stood to say MacArthur was the "single greatest threat to my family in the entire world." Another demanded to know whether it's "true that rape can be considered a pre-existing condition."

For nearly five hours, MacArthur faced an onslaught as he spoke here at a community center in the bluest town in this South Jersey-based swing district. Dozens of protesters gathered outside, some lying on the parking lot holding signs in the shape of tombstones. Inside, the congressman was shouted down by constituents and others in the audience of 250 people.

It was a prime example of the anger, confusion and raw emotion surrounding the GOP's replacement health care plan, and a glimpse at why the party's House majority suddenly seems in jeopardy in 2018.

A week ago, MacArthur was standing beside President Donald Trump in the White House Rose Garden, celebrating with other Republicans after the bill narrowly cleared the House of Representatives.

It was largely thanks to MacArthur, a sophomore congressman and multimillionaire insurance executive, that the proposal was even revived. After an earlier version of the bill proved so untenable that House Speaker Paul Ryan said he saw no path forward, MacArthur negotiated an amendment to appease the hard-line conservative Freedom Caucus, garnering enough support for the measure to pass.

Now, the moderate Republican is being targeted by Democrats as a poster boy in their fight against the American Health Care Act. The town hall was the culmination of a tumultuous few weeks for a politician who's been talked about as a future leader of the Republican party in New Jersey and represents one its few remaining swing districts, where voters backed Barack Obama in 2012 and Trump in 2016.

MacArthur's role may have scored points with the president, House leadership and thousands of voters in his district who live on the other, more Republican-friendly side of New Jersey's Pine Barrens, but it turned fellow moderates against him and led to questions about whether he'll continue to be a co-chair of the Tuesday Group.

Democrats are already plotting a challenge. Andrew Kim, a former national security adviser to President Barack Obama, is exploring a potential run against MacArthur and has raised nearly $50,000, according to his crowd-funding website.

Save My Care, a coalition of pro-Obamacare advocacy groups, is targeting MacArthur as part of a larger $500,000-plus TV ad campaign against Republicans who back the plan.

And here at home, his work on the health bill has made him an enemy to many of his Democratic constituents.

Afterward, when asked by reporters if he was concerned about his political vulnerability, MacArthur had a ready answer.

"Well I'm not. It's as simple as that," he said. "If you try to do this job with this constant eye on the political ramifications, you'll have no courage to ever do anything that matters."

Despite the rage he faced on Wednesday, he stayed calm as he stood at the center of the room for hours on end. He did not raise his voice and only grew testy at few moments.

He spent much of the evening insisting that his amendment would not alter one of Obamacare's most popular provisions: coverage for people with pre-existing conditions.

"Nobody with a pre-existing condition will either be declined coverage or priced out of being able to buy insurance," MacArthur said, eliciting loud boos from the crowd.

"You're a liar. Have you read your own bill?" someone yelled from the audience.

While the bill says insurers cannot deny coverage for people with pre-existing conditions, it would allow states to apply for waivers from certain Obamacare provisions, which could potentially result in higher premiums for sicker people.

The waivers, MacArthur said, would only apply to the seven percent of the U.S. population that is covered by the individual health insurance market.

"Many of you get it through your jobs and if you work for a company with more than 50 people, it's a non-issue. Many of you get it from Medicare," he said. "In all of those plans I just described, this bill does not touch this [pre-existing conditions] issue."

But his assurances rang hollow with constituents who kept asking what the cost would be for people with pre-existing conditions, even if it was the case that coverage would be guaranteed.

"You are the reason I stay up at night," said Geoff Ginter, the man whose wife battled breast cancer, shouting at the congressman for 12 straight minutes as a police officer stood nearby.

As outrage over Obamacare repeal has grown in recent months, many congressional Republicans have resisted calls to hold in-person town halls or opted for call-in forums, like MacArthur's fellow delegation member Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen.

Frelinghuysen, chair of the House Appropriations Committee and the state's highest-ranking member, voted in favor of the Obamacare repeal bill after opposing an earlier version. He, like MacArthur, was hammered by constituents over the issue of pre-existing conditions during a teletown hall earlier this week.

The state's three other Republicans — Reps. Leonard Lance, Frank LoBiondo and Chris Smith — all said they couldn't vote for a bill that would negatively impact their districts, particularly over concerns about the rollback of federal funds for Medicaid expansion.

MacArthur also faced many angry questions about Trump, his policies and the investigations into potential collusion with Russia. He wouldn't back calls for an independent prosecutor, saying he wanted to see what the FBI and Congress turn up. But he dodged other questions on the whole.

"Folks, I didn't come here to defend the president tonight," he said about half an hour into the town hall.

By and large, however, the focus was on health care. It's a deeply personal topic for MacArthur, whose special needs daughter Grace died at age 11. The cost of her health care totaled more than $1 million.

"I want to go back to my daughter," MacArthur said during his opening remarks to the crowd as he sought to establish the framework that informed his decision on the bill.

"Shame! Shame on you!" someone from the audience yelled.

"I'm will say, shame on you," he responded.

But it was also a deeply personal topic for several people who asked questions, including one man who said his wife died just two months ago from brain cancer. The man, Michael Maguire, said his medical bills, too, totaled more than $1 million but were mostly covered by insurance. Without that, he said, he'd be losing his house.

"I can't imagine what you're going through," MacArthur said.

"You went through worse," the man replied. "That's why I can't rationalize where you're coming from."

To view online click here.

Back

MacArthur defends GOP Obamacare repeal bill to angry town hall crowd Back

By Katie Jennings | 05/10/2017 10:25 PM EDT

Rep. Tom MacArthur defended his support for the GOP Obamacare replacement bill to a crowd of angry constituents Wednesday night in Willingboro, N.J., the bluest town in his swing district.

MacArthur, a multimillionaire insurance executive and moderate Republican, helped broker the deal with the hard-line conservative Freedom Caucus that passed the House last week.

He spent much of the evening insisting that his amendment would not alter one of Obamacare's most popular provisions: coverage for people with pre-existing conditions.

"Nobody with a pre-existing condition will either be declined coverage or priced out of being able to buy insurance," MacArthur said, eliciting loud boos from the crowd.

"You're a liar. Have you read your own bill?" someone yelled from the audience.

A few days earlier, the second-term congressman stood beside President Donald Trump on the White House lawn as Republicans claimed victory, but in his home district he was besieged by residents who said the deal would have a devastating impact.

While the bill says insurers cannot deny coverage for people with pre-existing conditions, it would allow states to apply for waivers from certain Obamacare provisions, which could potentially result in higher premiums for sicker people.

The waivers, MacArthur insisted, would apply only to the 7 percent of the U.S. population that is covered by the individual health insurance market.

"Many of you get it through your jobs, and if you work for a company with more than 50 people, it's a non-issue. Many of you get it from Medicare," he said. "In all of those plans I just described, this bill does not touch this [pre-existing conditions] issue."

But his assurances rang hollow with constituents who kept asking what the cost would be for people with pre-existing conditions, even if it were the case that coverage would be guaranteed.

Joseph Zetkolic, an 18-year-old high school student from Jobstown, asked MacArthur whether rape would be considered a pre-existing condition.

"How did it pass your conscience to allow rape to be considered a pre-existing condition, forcing women to choose between justice and silence for their affordable health care?" he asked as the crowd erupted into a standing ovation.

"You cannot be denied coverage or charged more," MacArthur responded.

To view online click here.

Back

Democratic group argues elusive GOP House targets are vulnerable on health care Back

By Scott Bland | 05/10/2017 06:24 PM EDT

A new polling memo from a Democratic outside group argues that three Republican House members who have been targeted in past elections and represent districts President Donald Trump carried — Reps. Rod Blum (IA-01), Bruce Poliquin (ME-02) and Fred Upton (MI-06) — are newly vulnerable after the passage of the House GOP Obamacare repeal.

Democratic groups and activists have had a broad discussion in the early days of the Trump administration about where to target their resources, and the surveys conducted for Patriot Majority USA, a Democratic nonprofit, advocate for investment in these and other seats outside Clinton-GOP crossover districts in 2016. The Democratic polling has the incumbents' favorability in low territory and shows the Republicans trailing generic Democrats in ballot tests.

Patriot Majority USA just started running TV ads on health care in all three districts. The mixed-mode polls were conducted by Clarity Campaign Labs before the advertisements were released.

In Blum's Eastern Iowa district, 25 percent of respondents said his vote for "the Republican plan to replace Obamacare" made them more likely to vote for him, versus 46 percent who said it made them less likely to support Blum. The surveys were weighted based on midterm turnout in each district in past elections.

