For Poliquin, 29 percent said the health care bill made them more likely and 43 percent said less likely to support him. And for Upton — who helped broker the passage of the bill with a late amendment — 27 percent of respondents in his district said his support of the bill made them more likely to support him, versus 42 percent who said it made them less likely.

Republicans are not conceding the message war over health care; earlier this week, a report from the GOP firm WPA Intelligence argued that House Republicans could minimize any damage on health care by comparing the goals of their still-unfinished legislation against Obamacare in House battleground districts. In the meantime, though, Democrats are trying to play offense in the House.

Though Trump carried all three districts in the Patriot Majority USA polling in 2016, with between 49 and 51 percent of the vote, his favorable rating is underwater in two of them. Thirty-nine percent rate Trump favorably in Blum's district versus 45 percent who rate him unfavorably, while the split is a closer 41-44 in Upton's district. In Poliquin's district, 46 percent view Trump favorably and 40 percent view him unfavorably. The incumbents themselves are all seen more unfavorably than favorably, by between 4 and 8 percentage points.

And in two districts, respondents said they would vote for a generic "Democratic challenger" over the Republican House member. Blum got 32 percent to 47 percent for the generic Democrat — who bears none of the negatives that Republicans will saddle on the Democratic nominee in IA-01 — in his district, while Upton trailed with 37 percent to 41 percent for an unnamed Democrat. In Maine, Poliquin was essentially tied, with 43 percent to 44 percent for a Democrat.

Clarity Campaign Labs contacted landlines with automated calls and cellphones with live callers from May 7-8. The sample sizes were 769 voters in IA-01, 805 voters in ME-02 and 797 voters in MI-06. The margins of error are plus or minus 3.5 percentage points in IA-01, 3.3 points in ME-02 and 3.4 points in MI-06.

Aetna withdrawing entirely from Obamacare marketplaces Back

By Paul Demko | 05/10/2017 05:46 PM EDT

Aetna announced it will not sell coverage in individual marketplaces in Nebraska or Delaware, marking the company's complete withdrawal from the Obamacare exchanges.

Both states will potentially be left with just one remaining insurer in 2018. Further, Nebraska's lone insurer, Medica, has already warned it would leave Iowa after becoming the sole option in that state's marketplace.

Aetna cited losses totaling $700 million in the individual market in the last three years as the reason for its withdrawal. The company expects to lose an additional $200 million despite shedding almost three quarters of its individual market members since last year. The insurer had 255,000 individual members at the end of March.

Aetna is now the second large national insurer to completely withdraw from the exchanges. Humana announced its total exit in February.

Despite the big losses in the Obamacare markets, Aetna continues to see revenue growth in other government programs, primarily Medicare and Medicaid. Roughly half of its premium revenues came from government programs last year, up from 38 percent prior to full implementation of the Affordable Care Act.

Can California push back against the GOP health plan? Back

By Victoria Colliver | 05/10/2017 04:21 PM EDT

Even the state leading the resistance to President Donald Trump could turn out to be a major loser under his health care plan.

The Obamacare repeal bill narrowly approved in the House last week could cost California's Medicaid program \$24 billion by 2027 and cause premiums to skyrocket as much as 49 percent on the state's insurance market. And a California law requiring insurers to cover abortion could prevent federal insurance tax credits from flowing to the state altogether.

Though the Senate is expected to produce a more moderate repeal bill, states like California that fully implemented Obamacare are bracing for reduced federal support — and likely fewer consumer protections. And though California would try to salvage as much of Obamacare as possible, not even a state that large could backfill a multibillion-dollar budget hole that would be left by the repeal effort.

"The question is not one of state law protections; it's if the federal funds are pulled out from under us, we can't keep the gains we made," said Kim Lewis, managing attorney of the National Health Law Program's California office.

Here's where California could be vulnerable to repeal efforts:

Essential benefits: The House bill allows states to waive key Obamacare protections, including a ban on charging sick people more and minimum benefit requirements — ranging from emergency care and hospitalization to mental health services and prescription drug coverage. If those opt outs remain in the repeal legislation, California could face pressure to shed some of its consumer protections to keep premiums down and prevent insurers from fleeing the state.

In that case, though, the Legislature would need to approve legislation removing some coverage mandates California has put into state law. For instance, California has required all insurers to cover maternity care since 2012. In other areas, such as mental health and substance abuse, the ACA beefed up state insurance mandates.

"We do have a lot of protections, but we are very vulnerable," said Jennifer Templeton Dunn, a lecturer at San Francisco's UC Hastings College of the Law who focuses on women's health and reproductive rights.

A study by the left-leaning Center on Budget and Policy Priorities estimates a recent version of the House plan would raise premiums and out-of-pocket costs for those enrolled in the state exchange, Covered California, by an average of nearly $2,800 by 2020.

Medi-Cal: The House bill cuts federal funding for Medicaid by $880 billion, or 25 percent, over 10 years. That could mean major coverage losses in Medi-Cal, which covers one in three Californians.

Under the Republican plan, states could choose block grants or per capita funding. Experts expect California would opt for per-capita funding, which would likely be more generous and cover more people.

"Even with a per-capita cap, ultimately California is a big loser," said Lewis of the National Health Law Program, adding that advocates would "look at all possible [legal] challenges to efforts to dismantle Medicaid."

Abortion coverage: State law requires all plans offering maternity coverage to cover abortion in California. But a measure in the GOP's American Health Care Act that would prohibit federal tax credits from being used to pay for insurance that covers abortion services. So that would effectively ban tax credits for all California residents as long as the state still mandates maternity care.

The state's abortion coverage protections are rooted in a 1981 state Supreme Court ruling. This could set up a legal showdown between the state and the federal government.

"We should sue to challenge that because that's an incredible overreach by the federal government," said California Insurance Commissioner Dave Jones.

But Jones, who is running for state attorney general in 2018, still thinks it would be a tough case for California to make.

"We should do everything we can ... but, the fact of the matter is, there are few areas where the federal government won't be able to assert preemption," he said.

Marketplace regulations: California may look to fight back against Obamacare changes that the Trump administration already implemented through regulation. These include shortening the exchange enrollment period and increasing verification requirements for people seeking coverage through special enrollment periods.

Anthony Wright, executive director for Health Access California, said he believes California may be able to claim jurisdiction to assert more control over the Obamacare marketplace it runs. For instance, he said California should try to maintain a three-month enrollment season in 2018, instead of the six-week period under new Trump administration rules.

Pre-existing conditions: Under the House bill, states could allow insurers to charge sick patients more if they set up a high-risk pool to help cover people with pre-existing conditions.

California has been down that road before with its Major Risk Medical Insurance Program, a program set up in 1991 that provided a last-ditch option for people who could not get insurance anywhere else.

Like other states' high-risk pools, California's didn't work very well. It charged enrollees the highest rates available on the private market, so it was unaffordable for many, and the program had a waiting list.

Not even Republican governors opposed to Obamacare seem to be eager to set up high-risk pools, so it's hard to imagine California would take that option.

Inside Trump's 'farmer first' USDA reorganization Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich, Jenny Hopkinson and Catherine Boudreau | 05/11/2017 09:00 AM EDT

The Trump administration is planning a major organizational shakeup at USDA, rearranging resources and mission areas to elevate the department's work to promote U.S. farm exports and manage nearly 200 million acres of national forest and grasslands.

The blueprint, which Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue is slated to unveil today in Cincinnati, is more of a realignment than a deconstruction, but it takes the Trump administration's conservative, anti-Beltway mantra of scaling back the government's sprawling apparatus and applies it to one of the largest federal departments, with a headcount of just under 90,000 and a reach felt in every state. If President Donald Trump is the "America First" president, then his plan for USDA is "Farmers First" — and heavily geared toward trade.

A staff reduction is not in the cards, the department said. The reshuffling moves conservation programs to pair them with other farm services and divides USDA's operations into two spheres — one dedicated to domestic agriculture, the other to export promotion. It may well raise the profile of the Forest Service, traditionally a large but lesser-known wing of the department that manages millions of acres of federal lands, but the plan also risks being viewed as deemphasizing development work in America's rural areas, which are associated with farming but populated by tens of millions of workers whose hands have never met the soil.

First and foremost, USDA is making good on one of the agribusiness sector's top asks by creating a new sub-cabinet post dedicated to promoting U.S. agricultural exports. The undersecretary for trade would arrive at a time of low commodity prices driven by a global surfeit of commodities like corn, soybeans and wheat — a cropland conundrum for which bolstering trade relationships overseas is seen as the surest solution.

"Food is a noble thing to trade. This nation has a great story to tell and we've got producers here that produce more than we can consume," Perdue said, in a statement to be released this afternoon. "And that's good, because I'm a grow-it-and-sell-it kind of guy."

As part of the plan, USDA is moving its expansive rural development portfolio to report directly to the secretary, to "ensure that rural America always has a seat at the table," the department said. In the announcement Perdue will make this afternoon at a grain transportation facility, the department notes that nearly 85 percent of America's "persistently impoverished" counties are rural and that rural childhood poverty rates are at their highest point since 1986.

But the administrative change up will no doubt be seen by some interests as a demotion for rural development programs, since it bumps them from the sub-cabinet level.

"The proposed reorganization is a stunning reversal of decades of dedication by USDA to rural development as a central tenet of their work and mission," Greg Fogel, policy director at the National Sustainable Agriculture Coalition, said in an email to POLITICO. "It flies in the face of the will of Congress — who recently passed a FY 2017 budget that increased support for the critical, job-creating programs provided through the Rural Development Mission Area — and the American public, particularly the rural communities that brought President Trump to the White House."

To make room for the new undersecretary position and branch that will focus solely on trade, Perdue seeks to eliminate its undersecretary for rural development, a post that's dedicated to coordinating billions in loan and grant programs supporting rural housing, health care and water issues, among other things. The department argues the reorganization places agencies in a more logical order, aligning services in a way that makes more sense for the farmers and ranchers who depend on them.

The reshuffling jives with much of the prescriptions laid out in the Trump administration's skinny budget proposal, in March. That plan called for a 21-percent cut to the department's discretionary spending, which appears like it would be accomplished, at least in part, through a "reduced Rural Development workload" and by encouraging conservation planning by the private sector. International food aid and discretionary programs at the Rural Business and Cooperative Service were also put on the chopping block. Largely spared from cuts were nutrition assistance programs, food safety efforts and wildfire funding.

The department sent a report to Congress this morning detailing its reorganization concept. It was not immediately clear whether any of these moves would require a congressional blessing. The changes include the following highlights:

Creation of an undersecretary for trade and foreign affairs

The 2014 farm bill directed USDA to create a new undersecretary post dedicated to trade promotion and to reorganize the department to bring trade-related work under the same umbrella. Perdue committed during his confirmation hearing to establishing the post. The former Georgia governor said then and has repeated often that expanding agricultural trade is a priority for the Trump administration, an assurance that's done little to assuage fears about Trump's threat to withdraw from NAFTA — a free trade agreement that's been a boon to farmers — if Mexico and Canada won't renegotiate it.

Former Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack had explored the mandate, though he often warned Congress that it would be a complicated move to execute because of USDA's varied international trade activities. As the end of the Obama administration approached, Vilsack questioned the appropriateness of undertaking the administrative changes needed to establish the post because making those moves would have deprived the next administration of a say.

Under the plan, USDA would move the Foreign Agricultural Service into the new branch overseen by the new undersecretary.

Elimination of the undersecretary for rural development

The law stipulates the department is not to exceed seven undersecretaries. To make room, USDA will eliminate the undersecretary for rural development. The change is likely to infuriate advocates who support development, creating a potential theme of opposition to Perdue's leadership of the department. Rural development — a mission area that includes some $200 billion in loan and investment programs — would become an office similar to USDA's Office of Civil Rights and be led by a lower-ranking official.

NRCS moved under the farm services umbrella

The Natural Resources Conservation Service would be shifted to the farm services side of Perdue's revamped department, joining the Farm Service Agency and the Risk Management Agency. The thinking there is to make the conservation service more focused on farming practices and perhaps less concerned with wildlife conservation and private lands, sources said.

Create an undersecretary for farm production and conservation

This newly titled position would oversee the Farm Service Agency, the Risk Management Agency, and the Natural Resources Conservation Service. "This domestically oriented undersecretary, will provide a simplified one-stop shop for USDA's primary customers, the men and women farming, ranching, and foresting across America," USDA noted in a press release slated for release this afternoon.

Elevation of the Forest Service

Because NRCS is being moved, the undersecretary for natural resources and environment will focus more attention on the workings of the Forest Service. The USDA release said that "a reduction in USDA workforce is not part of the reorganization plan." In some ways, a greater emphasis on the Forest Service is consistent with USDA's overall headcount: the agency's 30,000 employees account for about a third of USDA's total staff, and it oversees about 10 percent of the continental United States.

Perdue op-ed details USDA reorganization Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 05/11/2017 08:24 AM EDT

Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue has detailed his "significant reorganization" plan for USDA in an op-ed in The Wall Street Journal, explaining that its centerpiece will be creation of an undersecretary for trade and foreign agricultural affairs, "whose focus will be on promoting U.S. food, fiber and fuel around the world."

"This realignment will help me, as agriculture secretary, to be an unapologetic advocate for American products," he wrote. "My message for farmers is simple: 'You grow it and we'll sell it.'"

Crapo warns Watt not to retain Fannie and Freddie profits Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 05/11/2017 11:21 AM EDT

Senate Banking Chairman Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) warned Mel Watt against suspending Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac dividend payments to taxpayers.

"Suspending dividend payments will lead some to believe that reform is not urgent," Crapo told Watt, director of the Federal Housing Finance Agency. "I would encourage you to work with this committee to make sure this does not occur."

Watt said he has the authority to withhold Fannie and Freddie profits without approval from Congress and said it's something he has considered as conservator of the companies. The government-backed entities send quarterly dividends to taxpayers as part of a contract with Treasury. That preferred stock purchase agreement, or PSPA, can be amended.

"Modest changes to the PSPA would be the first and most prudent way to address this issue, but if that fails, the responsibility for that risk falls back on me as the conservator of these enterprises," Watt said. "We cannot afford to run that risk."

Fannie and Freddie shareholders, led by speculators such as Fairholme Fund and Paulson & Co., want the dividend payments eliminated so the companies can rebuild capital, a move seen by some as a first step toward releasing the mortgage giants from government conservatorship.

As of Jan. 1, the companies, which oversee $5 trillion in home loans, will be totally reliant on a $258 billion line of credit from Treasury to cover any losses. Drawing on that lifeline could trigger market volatility and reduce confidence in the companies, according to some investors.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) called the risk of a violent market reaction "one of the most baseless arguments I've ever heard." He challenged Watt to draw on the Treasury lifeline to prove his point.

"Believe me, I can't afford to take that risk," Watt said. "I can't afford to say it's theoretical."

WHAT'S NEXT: Watt will send Crapo a paper outlining the legality of amending the PSPA.

Crapo highlights securitization, risk transfer at Fannie and Freddie Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 05/11/2017 10:25 AM EDT

Senate Banking Chairman Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) called reform of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac "a key priority" for the current Congress.

In opening remarks at a hearing on the housing finance system, Crapo raised concerns about the companies' common securitization platform and credit-risk transfer. Here are highlights.

— "While Fannie and Freddie are currently earning profits, if the housing market experiences a downturn, taxpayers could again be on the hook for billions of dollars."

— "One significant undertaking is the creation of the common securitization platform (CSP). The platform was originally intended to function like a market utility — independent from the enterprises — that would be used to issue both agency securities and private label securities. The platform has instead been developed specifically for securities issued by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. One important question as we embark on housing finance reform is whether we should utilize the CSP or consider other alternatives, such as expanding the Ginnie Mae platform.

— "Another important development in housing finance is the increased transfer of credit risk from the enterprises to the private sector. I encourage FHFA and the enterprises to continue to experiment with different forms of risk transfer, including both front end and back end structures."

Watt warns of rising risk and costs related to Fannie, Freddie Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 05/11/2017 10:01 AM EDT

Mel Watt, the top regulator of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, warned lawmakers that the cost of getting a home loan could rise if the companies aren't retooled.

In testimony before the Senate Banking Committee, the director of the Federal Housing Finance Agency reiterated his call for legislative reform of the government-backed mortgage companies, which, by law, will have drained all their capital on Jan. 1. Here are highlights of Watt's written statement.

— "Neither enterprise will have the ability to weather any loss it experiences in any quarter without drawing further on taxpayer support. This is not a theoretical concern."

— "It is especially irresponsible for the enterprises not to have such a limited buffer because a loss in any quarter would result in an additional draw of taxpayer support and reduce the fixed dollar commitment the Treasury Department has made to support the enterprises. We reasonably foresee that this could erode investor confidence. This could stifle liquidity in the mortgage-backed securities market and could increase the cost of mortgage credit for borrowers."

— "I have said repeatedly, and I want to reiterate, that these conservatorships are not sustainable and they need to end as soon as Congress can chart the way forward on housing finance reform."

— "It is important for all of us to recognize that the conservatorships have led to numerous reforms of the enterprises and their operations, practices, and protocols that have been extremely beneficial to the housing finance markets and have reduced exposure and risks to taxpayers."

House Ways and Means announces first tax reform hearing this year Back

By Bernie Becker | 05/11/2017 01:22 PM EDT

The House Ways and Means Committee will hold a hearing on tax reform next Thursday, as GOP lawmakers press ahead in their efforts to overhaul the tax code.

A committee release today said the hearing — the first it will hold this year on overhauling the tax code — would focus on "how tax reform will grow our economy and create jobs across America." The hearing's witnesses won't be announced until next week, according to a committee spokeswoman.

House Republicans are seeking to shift their concentration to tax reform after passing their Obamacare replacement last week. But even some GOP lawmakers have said that President Donald Trump's decision to fire FBI Director James Comey this week could complicate their efforts to pass big policy items.

Republicans are still searching for consensus among themselves as they're trying to pass a tax overhaul this year.

For instance, the House GOP released a tax reform blueprint last year that includes a border adjustment that taxes imports while exempting exports, an idea that Senate Republicans generally believe can't make it through their chamber. The White House also has said it has concerns about that proposal.

The May 18 hearing will start at 10 a.m. in room 1100 of the Longworth House Office Building.

Interest deduction draws White House support as Trump talks taxes with Economist

By Colin Wilhelm | 05/11/2017 02:07 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said the administration's "preference" is to keep the corporate interest deduction in the tax code, further highlighting the gulf between the administration and House Republicans on tax reform.

Trump and Mnuchin made their comments during a lengthy interview published Thursday by The Economist.

When asked whether the White House was contemplating getting rid of the deduction, Mnuchin said, "No, we're contemplating keeping it. That's our preference. But we'll look at everything."

Asked his view, Trump said: "No, I would say probably. ... I think we're contemplating is the word. And it hasn't been determined yet, but we're contemplating."

The deduction is used frequently in the real estate industry, where Trump made his fortune, and private equity, an industry that Mnuchin and other members of the Cabinet have strong connections to.

Utilities and the agriculture sector have also expressed reservations about what effect eliminating the deduction would have on them.

In the past, Trump has spoken favorably of the corporate interest deduction — which would be eliminated by the House GOP plan, in part to pay for the plan, but also as a fundamental reform.

As POLITICO has reported, White House opposition to eliminating interest deduction was expected because private equity and commercial real estate — two industries predominantly represented in the administration through the president, his family, and Cabinet members — are particularly interested in keeping the deduction.

During the interview, Trump went through much of his thinking on broad swathes of economic policy, ranging from trade to taxes to healthcare. Here are the most notable tax-related parts of the interview:

Paying for tax reform vs. 'priming the pump': Trump said it was "OK" if his tax plan balloons the deficit "because it won't increase it for long." Trump characterized doing so as "priming the pump."

"You know, if you don't do that, you're never going to bring your taxes down," he said.

Trump told The Economist he "came up" with the term prime the pump "a couple of days ago and I thought it was good." However, the term has been used in economic circles since at least the 1930s.

House Republicans want tax reform to be deficit-neutral. But Mnuchin has said repeatedly that tax reform would "pay for itself" by unleashing robust economic growth.

"[E]conomic growth under the Trump administration could increase revenues as much as $2 [trillion] over the ten-year period of time," Mnuchin told The Economist. "So priming the pump in the short term leads to growth."

Not feeling BAT-ty: Trump continued to be lukewarm about what is perhaps the signature (and most controversial) aspect of the House GOP tax blueprint, the 20 percent tax on imported goods and services.

"We are dealing with Congress ... because it's not really what I'm considering," he said.

House tax writers say their "border adjustment" tax, which wouldn't apply to exports, would encourage more domestic production.

Trump's solution appears to be a new tax on goods made by companies that outsource manufacturing.

"You can build all you want out of country, I hope you enjoy your plant," Trump said. "But when you build your car, you're going to have a 35 [percent] tax when you bring it back in.

And if your numbers work, we wish you well. But that's what you're going to have. You're going to have a 35 [percent] tax."

Trump also continued to advocate a "reciprocal tax," though it remained unclear exactly what he means by that.

"I'm for open trade, free trade, but I also want smart trade and fair trade," Trump told The Economist. "But they'll say, 'He's not a free-trader,' at 10 [percent]. But if I say we're putting a reciprocal tax on, it may be 62 [percent] or it may be 47 [percent], I mean massive numbers, and nobody can complain about it. It's really sort of an amazing thing."

Trump also professed his affection for a value-added tax, which would be a non-starter for congressional Republicans unless Trump attempted to eliminate the income tax to correspond with it.

"Well the concept of VAT I really like. But let me give you the bad news," Trump said. "I don't think it can be sold in this country because we're used to an income tax, we're used to a ... people are used to this tax, whether they like it or don't like, they're used to this tax."

Taking on all deductions (except interest and charitable): Echoing the tax principles his top economic lieutenants, Mnuchin and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn, released last month, Trump said eliminating nearly every deduction in the tax code is on the table.

"There are more deductions ... now you're going to get an interest deduction, and a charitable deduction," he told The Economist. "But we're not going to have all this nonsense that they have right now that complicates things ..."

Infrastructure back on the table? Trump once again indicated that the administration could pair tax reform with an infrastructure plan to attract Democratic support.

"We may align it with infrastructure, which they like," he said.

That appeared to contradict Mnuchin, who last week said "we're probably not gonna do that."

No tax returns for tax reform: Trump also ruled out releasing his tax returns as a way to bring Democrats to the bargaining table.

"I would never do it," he said. "That would be ... I think that would be unfair to the deal. It would be disrespectful of the importance of this deal. Because the only people that find that important are the reporters."

However, numerous polls have shown large majorities of Americans think Trump should disclose his taxes.

In the interview, Trump continued to say he would likely release his returns voluntarily when out of office.

House members push to keep advertising deduction Back

By Kaitlyn Burton | 05/11/2017 01:33 PM EDT

A bipartisan group of more than 120 House lawmakers urged Speaker Paul Ryan and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to preserve advertising as a tax deductible business expense in a tax overhaul.

The letter was led by Reps. Kevin Yoder (R-Kan.) and Eliot Engel (R-N.Y.).

"Any measure that would tax advertising — and therefore would make it more expensive — cannot be justified as a matter of tax or economic policy," the members wrote.

They added, "we ask that any changes in our tax system be meaningful, economically sound, and do not threaten the impacts of advertising on jobs and the economy."

Numerous corporate and non-profit interests are stepping up their efforts to preserve tax breaks as talks heat up over tax reform between Congress and the White House.

The Association of National Advertisers supported the letter in a blog post published Wednesday.

"Advertising's immediate deductibility has been an important part of the tax code for more than 100 years, and it is even more relevant today given the fast pace of the marketplace. Advertising is a vital driver of our economy, and we urge Congress to not impose a burden on the selling process when they consider tax reform," said Dan Jaffe, the head of ANA's government affairs office.

An earlier version of the letter was sent during the last session of Congress.

Conservative groups say infrastructure plan must be fiscally sound Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 05/11/2017 03:31 PM EDT

Conservative political groups have called on Congress and the Trump administration to ensure any infrastructure proposal that is put forward makes "fiscal responsibility" a priority.

In a letter led by Americans for Prosperity and cosigned by dozens of other organizations, including Heritage Action and the Club for Growth and Americans for Tax Reform, activists urged the administration to avoid adding to the deficit in developing a plan.

Administration officials like OMB Director Mick Mulvaney have said the White House's infrastructure plan will involve at least $200 billion in new spending.

The groups warned the White House against using repatriated corporate tax revenue to fund infrastructure spending. They argued spending money that is brought back from overseas "has little to do with transportation issues and instead is a symptom of our broken federal tax code that should be addressed in the context of comprehensive tax reform."

The groups are also pushing the White House to cut federal spending, rather than use tax increases or "budget gimmicks," to keep the deficit down.

Other suggestions from the groups include eliminating or reforming environmental regulations, repealing a wage law for federally funded projects that they say makes projects more expensive and allowing state and local governments to determine the priorities of projects.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Trump administration's comprehensive budget, which comes out later this month, may provide further insight into how it plans to move forward with its infrastructure plans.

Trump taps David Kautter for Treasury's top tax policy post Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 05/10/2017 07:28 PM EDT

President Donald Trump officially nominated David Kautter to serve as the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for tax policy, according to a White House announcement late today.

He's been working most recently in the private sector, as partner-in-charge of the Washington National Tax practice for the audit, tax and consulting firm RSM US LLP. Immediately before that, Kautter was in academia at American University, following more than three decades at Ernst and Young.

His nomination would give a shot in the arm to the administration's efforts on tax reform, which haven't gotten too far off the ground since not many Treasury tax policy positions have been filled.

Kautter has been expected to be Trump's pick for the tax policy assistant secretary slot since March, news that was first reported by POLITICO. Multiple deputy assistant secretary positions remain unfilled underneath the post Kautter would assume, if confirmed.

His nomination requires Senate approval.

In addition to his private sector and academic jobs, Kautter also worked on Capitol Hill as tax legislative counsel for former Sen. John Danforth (R-Mo.).

Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Senate fires salvo into the fall budget fight — Price's jet-setting costs him his job — Cochran plans mid-October return
Date: Friday, September 29, 2017 5:21:20 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 09/29/2017 05:18 PM EDT

LET THE GAMES BEGIN: Finally. We've got our hands today on the Senate Budget Committee's ever-important fiscal 2018 plan — the checkered flag in the race to pave the way (or majorly complicate plans) for the GOP's do-or-die tax overhaul.

In most regards, the Senate budget resolution is exactly what we expected — a $1.5 trillion allowance for tax reform, and not much else. It calls for some spending cuts, but barely any that could make it into law. (Of course, that's a heck of a lot different than the House version, which runs the gamut of conservative wish lists, complete with $203 billion in "real" mandatory cuts.) We've got all the deets for Pros, plus text and tables.

Committees, get busy: Reconciliation instructions were awarded to just two panels: the Finance Committee (presumably for tax reform) and the Energy and Natural Resources Committee (presumably for oil drilling in the Arctic), as Nick Juliano reports. Other once-rumored instructions, like Dodd-Frank rollbacks for the Banking Committee or student aid reforms for the HELP Committee, weren't touched.

The scorekeeper speaks: Senate Budget Chairman Mike Enzi's budget proposes shrinking the deficit from $693 billion to $424 billion in 10 years — a difference of nearly $1 trillion, per the CBO. Still, that's not the kind of balance-over-a-decade rhetoric on which the GOP prides itself.

In between the lines: The budget makes no mention of the Senate health panel, which likely means Obamacare will escape a full blow next year. But most experts say the GOP could take a sledgehammer to the law under its Senate Finance Committee instructions. (Think repealing Obamacare taxes or penalties.) Also notable, the Senate includes a dose of messaging by including 15 "reserve funds," including for Obamacare repeal. Technically, this language could prove practical by providing spending flexibility in potential bills. But the reality is, the language is mostly symbolic.

Other key takeaways:

— PAYGO waived: As expected, the budget resolution would waive the Senate "pay as you go," or PAYGO, rule for any reconciliation bill this year. Still, the Senate would have to take another vote to dodge the Senate's "statutory PAYGO" down the road.

— More flexible CBO rules: Under the budget, lawmakers would no longer have to wait 28 hours to vote on a bill after receiving a CBO score.

— Tighter rules for OCO: The Senate budget would create a new point of order involving controversial overseas contingency funding, or OCO. This is straight off a budgeteer's wish list, in an attempt to stem congressional number-fudging that's so common with military money.

#DailyBudgetFact — The Senate GOP budget plan would lead to GDP growth of about 1.3 percent over the next two years, compared with 1.6 percent under current law, CBO estimated today. But in later years, real GDP growth is expected to be higher, with an average of 2 percent annually.

ADMINISTRATION

PRICE IS OUT: Trump decided today to give Tom Price his signature "You're fired!" dismissal, after the HHS secretary stuck taxpayers with the bill for his flights on private jets.

Growing tab: Over the last few days, the accounting of Price's taxpayer-funded trips has risen. The secretary took numerous trips abroad on military planes this year, totaling about $500,000, Rachana Pradhan and Dan Diamond report. And on some of those trips to Europe and Africa this spring, Price's wife tagged along. The secretary apologized this week and pledged to repay the government for his domestic trips using private planes, our dynamic health care duo reports. Price has also tried to explain away his alleged transgressions, though, arguing that his jet travel was part of an all-out effort to carry out Trump's "very ambitious agenda," Cristiano Lima notes.

Please stop: The White House said earlier this week that it had intervened, asking HHS to "halt" the practice of approving charter flights.

LEAKY FAUCET: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke is at least the fourth senior member of the Trump administration to have been caught using private planes at taxpayers' expense, Ben Lefebvre reports. Zinke and his aides have taken several non-commercial flights, including a $12,000 charter plane to events in the secretary's hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands.

'A little B.S.': The former Montana congressman's response to the allegations? It's "a little B.S." Zinke contends that all his travel plans were made "only after department officials determined no other flights were available," Ben reports. And the secretary doesn't intend to pay out of pocket for the $58,000 worth of non-commercial flights he and his staff have taken, Emily Holden reports.

MIXED REVIEWS: Congressional lawmakers are far from unified in their opinions of the Cabinet secretaries' travel logs. Senate Republicans are split, for example, over whether to defend or condemn EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's use of charter and military planes, Anthony Adragna explains.

AHEAD OF THE GAME: Department of Veterans Affairs Secretary David Shulkin has launched a website that will list every one of his official work trips, Dan Diamond reports. That includes — so far — five trips on Air Force One. Under the private aircraft travel section, Schulkin's staff writes: "None to date."

APPROPRIATIONS

STILL RESTING UP: As part of his ongoing medical recovery, Senate Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) announced late Thursday that he won't be returning to Washington until Oct. 16. "My physician told me today I am improving, but recommended I remain at home in Mississippi another week," Cochran wrote, explaining that he plans to return after the Senate's mid-October recess to "continue work on the appropriations process."

DISASTER AID

STILL DEBATING A DOLLAR AMOUNT: Facing growing backlash over their response to hurricane-wrought Puerto Rico, Trump tweeted this morning that "Puerto Rico has been destroyed by two hurricanes" and that "big decisions will have to be made as to the cost of its rebuilding!" (Some lobbyists are already tossing around the "half-trillion dollar" figure.)

HEALTH

THE CONSEQUENCES OF INACTION: Community health centers across the country face a funding cliff this weekend as authority expires for the Community Health Centers Fund, which supplies 70 percent of the facilities' funding, Renuka Rayasam explains. Local officials say they are putting off hiring and expansion to conserve funds until Congress acts. And many are worried about other lenders pulling back financing due to the uncertainty of the federal grants.

TAX

FIRST OF MANY: A prized pay-for in the GOP's tax plan has already generated an opposition campaign on Capitol Hill. Republican tax writers want to eliminate the ability to deduct state and local taxes, a potential windfall of government revenue. Just as you might expect, GOP lawmakers from higher-taxing northeastern states are putting up a fight, as Aaron Lorenzo and Rachael Bade report.

'SOME PIECE OF CRAP': Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) is the only member of the GOP's "Big Six" who was actually here during Congress' last major overhaul of the tax code. So the Senate Finance chairman is acutely aware of the many challenges of getting there — from the budget to a vote on final passage, Bernie Becker reports. But the No. 1 biggest hurdle? His "fellow senators."

"I don't want it to be some piece of crap," Hatch told reporters this week, "which we're so used to around here."

MAKE 'EM CARE: GOP lawmakers have an enthusiasm problem when it comes to rewriting the tax code, Colin Wilhelm explains. Recent polls show that only around 20 percent of people think tax reform should be a top priority — while Republicans hope to spend nearly 100 percent of their political energy on it this fall.

FINANCIAL SERVICES:

TRILLION WITH A 'T': A long-awaited federal watchdog report has found that rolling back part of Dodd-Frank enabled several major banks to hold onto trillions of risky assets last year, increasing risks for taxpayers. Four large banks were holding onto $10.5 trillion in derivatives contracts in federally insured parts of their operations as of last fall, Victoria Guida reports. "It leaves taxpayers potentially holding the bag if things go bad," Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) said in a statement. Those Dodd-Frank rules went out the window as part of the 2015 spending deal.

EDUCATION

CHARTER SCHOOL CASH DASH: The Education Department awarded more than $250 million in grants this week for the creation and expansion of public charter schools. Caitlin Emma explains that nine states will split more than $144 million. Seventeen nonprofit charter school management organizations will get a cut of more than $52 million to expand and replicate high-quality charters. And eight organizations will share more than $56 million to enhance the credit of charter schools.

Senate Republicans unveil budget blueprint to tee up tax reform Back

By Sarah Ferris | 09/29/2017 01:01 PM EDT

Senate Republicans released their long-awaited budget blueprint Friday for the upcoming fiscal year, paving the way for a tax overhaul without the need for Democratic buy-in.

The 89-page plan, which the Senate Budget Committee spent months drafting, sets up the special power of budget reconciliation GOP leaders can use to advance tax reform with just a 50-vote threshold in the Senate.

Nov. 13 is the tentative deadline for tax writers to submit their plans for an overhaul to the budget panel.

Under the budget proposal, Republican tax writers can add up to $1.5 trillion to the deficit over 10 years, giving lawmakers more flexibility as they attempt a once-in-a-generation revamp of the U.S. tax code. With more wiggle room to slash revenue, GOP legislators hope they will be able to go even lower on tax rates for individuals and corporations.

The $1.5 trillion figure comes out of a compromise struck this month between deficit hawk Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and tax-writer Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), who both sit on the budget panel. Corker had sought a revenue-neutral tax plan, while Toomey had called for as much as $3 trillion in lost revenue over 10 years.

"This budget is especially important because it will allow us to get to work on our pro-growth, pro-family, pro-jobs tax reform plan," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) wrote in a statement Friday.

As expected, the Senate's pared-down version veers drastically from the House version. The House budget would require a tax plan that does not add to the deficit, though some tax writers feared that approach would force Republicans to seek less-ambitious tax cuts.

In an unsurprising but contentious move, Senate budget writers ditched long-time conservative calls for mandatory cuts. While the House budget would deliver $203 billion in mandatory cuts, the Senate asks only one committee to find $1 billion in savings over 10 years — a disparity sure to be a sticking point when both chambers seek a compromise during conference negotiations in the weeks to come.

The only savings in the Senate version would come from the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which has been tasked with finding at least $1 billion over a decade.

Lawmakers widely expect that projected savings to come from opening up oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

The Senate budget blueprint does not appear to give Republicans another shot at repealing Obamacare next year, as some lawmakers have advocated.

The Senate Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over most Obamacare programs, is expected to focus entirely on tax reform with its $1.5 trillion instruction.

Obamacare's fate is not assured, though, since some budget experts say the Finance Committee could choose to use its existing instructions to rollback Obamacare, or simply seek authority to do so in another — separate — budget resolution next year.

In recent months, Senate budget writers had also mulled reforms for Dodd-Frank financial rules and student aid programs, according to multiple sources. But the budget document does not include instructions for either the Senate Banking Committee or the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee.

Senate Budget Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) wrote in a statement that the blueprint "puts our nation on a path to balance," in part by reducing spending by $5 trillion over 10 years. But the budget resolution itself includes no details on how lawmakers could achieve that spending surplus.

In sharp contrast to the House budget, the Senate's would comply with the budget caps mandated by sequestration. (If the Senate chose to ignore the sequester, it would violate a budget rule and prompt a point-of-order on the floor).

Under the upper chamber's plan, the military's budget would be capped at $549 billion over the next year, to comply with current law. The House budget, which is not subject to points of order, boosts defense spending to $621.5 billion.

The Senate Budget Committee plans to hold a vote on the fiscal outline next week and is expected to have enough GOP support for approval.

Senate budget opens door to ANWR debate Back

By Nick Juliano | 09/29/2017 12:02 PM EDT

The Senate Budget released this morning opens the door for oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve or other off-limits areas without having to overcome a Democratic filibuster.

The budget asks the Energy and Natural Resources Committee to find $1 billion for deficit reduction, according to a summary. That money could come from authorizing new drilling in ANWR, a longtime priority of Alaskans including ENR Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski.

POLITICO reported earlier this week on the plan to include the pro-drilling language in the budget. Authorizing ANWR through budget reconciliation would allow Republicans to circumvent a filibuster, but could be a risky strategy as two GOP senators have opposed such provisions in the past.

EPW Democrats call for meeting with Chao on infrastructure plan Back

By Lauren Gardner | 09/29/2017 01:31 PM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Democrats want a meeting with Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao as her "third-quarter" deadline for the Trump administration to provide its infrastructure plan to Congress will pass by this weekend.

"We request that you and any other appropriate Administration officials meet with us to share the Administration's long-awaited trillion dollar infrastructure plan," they wrote in a letter made public today. "Following quickly thereafter, we would hope that you will be able to formally transmit the Administration's plan to Congress so that we may understand the Administration's priorities as we get to work on developing a comprehensive infrastructure investment package."

Chao and other administration officials have repeatedly promised to begin engaging with lawmakers on the details of an infrastructure plan this fall, though now that's expected to be pushed back until Congress makes progress on a tax code overhaul.

During a meeting with GOP and Democratic lawmakers this week, President Donald Trump appeared to flip his position on including public-private partnerships as a way to finance what he's said will be a $1 trillion package. Rep. Brian Higgins (D-N.Y.) said the president even criticized Vice President Mike Pence's home state of Indiana for trying to use a P3 to pay for a major road project.

Grassley asks Trump to curb expensive travel by administration officials Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/28/2017 04:07 PM EDT

Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) wants to know how President Donald Trump will curb private air travel by top members of his administration, including EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt.

"Please detail what steps the administration has taken to ensure that cabinet secretaries use the most fiscally responsible travel in accordance with the public trust they hold and the spirit and letter of all laws, regulations, and policies that apply," Grassley wrote in a letter to President Donald Trump today.

Grassley criticized reports of travel by military aircraft or charter jet by Pruitt, Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price, and Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin. EPA has spent $58,000 on Pruitt's travel this year, including a charter flight to visit to the Gold King Mine in Colorado.

Noting that HHS Secretary Price has said he will not use charter jets while his department's inspector general reviews his travel, Grassley writes, "This development should be copied government-wide."

Price took military jets to Europe, Asia for over $500K Back

By Rachana Pradhan and Dan Diamond | 09/28/2017 06:56 PM EDT

The White House approved the use of military aircraft for multi-national trips by Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price to Africa and Europe this spring, and to Asia in the summer, at a cost of more than $500,000 to taxpayers.

The overseas trips bring the total cost to taxpayers of Price's travels to more than $1 million since May, according to a POLITICO review.

Price pledged on Thursday to reimburse the government for the cost of his own seat on his domestic trips using private aircraft — reportedly around $52,000 — but that would not include the cost of the military flights.

Price's wife, Betty, accompanied him on the military flights, while other members of the secretary's delegation flew commercially to Europe.

HHS spokeswoman Charmaine Yoest said Price has reimbursed the agency for the cost of his wife's travel abroad, but declined to say when he did so. Price has been under intense criticism since POLITICO revealed his extensive use of charter aircraft for domestic flights last week. His travel expenditures are subject to reviews by the HHS inspector general and the House Oversight Committee. Democratic and Republican senators have also demanded information about Price's travel expenditures.

The White House assesses the use of military aircraft for overseas travel by Cabinet members on a case-by-case basis. Secretaries whose jobs involve national security functions are more likely to require military jets, but the White House occasionally approves the use of military planes for other members of the Cabinet.

"Use of military aircraft for Cabinet and other essential travelers is sometimes an appropriate and necessary use of resources," said Raj Shah, White House principal deputy press secretary.

But one of Price's recent predecessors, Kathleen Sebelius, who served for five years under President Barack Obama, said she never took a military plane on her many trips overseas; she always flew commercially. Sylvia Mathews Burwell, who served as HHS secretary for the final 2½ years of the Obama administration, used a military jet for travel to Havana, Cuba, according to former HHS aides.

It is not clear whether Burwell, who did not respond to requests for comment, used military planes on other trips overseas. Two former aides said her husband accompanied her on the trip to Cuba and reimbursed the government for the costs of the trip.

But Yoest said, "It's our understanding that previous secretaries have never reimbursed for spousal travel," referencing Burwell's trip to Cuba.

Price's overseas trips on government planes included stops in Berlin, Geneva, Beijing, Ho Chi Minh City and Tokyo, where he attended world health meetings and met with other high-level officials. In May, Price also visited Liberia, where he discussed the nation's response to the Ebola virus that ravaged the West African country three years ago.

"The trips he's gone on make total sense," one former HHS official said of Price. "It's just how he got there."

Yoest, the HHS spokeswoman, said the use of military aircraft — known as Milair — was necessary both for Price's security and his ability to communicate with the department.

"In both instances, those were Milair flights that were pre-approved," said Yoest. "We don't have a deputy secretary that's been confirmed ... Milair is important for maintaining security and having secure communications, as well."

A White House official confirmed that President Donald Trump's staff approved the flights. Trump has been sharply critical of Price's use of chartered aircraft on domestic flights, saying "we'll see" when asked whether he would fire Price over the issue.

The Trump administration pointed to statistics showing that it approved fewer trips abroad on military aircraft compared with the first eight months of the Obama administration: There were 77 military trips during the first eight months of the Trump administration, compared with 94 at the same point during the Obama years, according to a White House official.

"This @WhiteHouse has cut down on use of military aircraft for travel," Shah tweeted on Wednesday, linking to a McClatchy article.

"Fact: Trump [administration] authorized fewer flights on military aircraft by senior govt officials than previous [administration]," press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders echoed.

During six terms as a Republican House member from Georgia, Price had cultivated a reputation as a fiscal hawk keen on reining in federal spending.

In June, Price defended a proposed budget for HHS that included a $663,000 cut to the agency's $4.9 million annual spending on travel, or roughly 15 percent. "The budgeting process is an exercise in reforming our federal programs to make sure they actually work — so they do their job and use tax dollars wisely," Price testified in front of the Senate Finance Committee on June 8.

Nonetheless, his travel tab has exceeded $1 million when accounting for both the overseas trips and the more than two dozen trips he has taken on private planes domestically since May.

For instance, Price took a Gulfstream C-37B owned by the Department of Defense for a weeklong trip in late May through Africa and Europe. The six legs of travel, which represented about 30 hours of flight time, were projected to cost $311,418.25, according to an invoice reviewed by POLITICO.

On May 17, Price flew to Liberia, where he met with President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf and other top officials to discuss global health security and public health emergency preparedness, according to an HHS readout of his meetings. He then went to the G-20 health ministers meeting in Berlin, which was held May 19 and 20. His ultimate destination was the World Health Assembly in Geneva, Switzerland, where he stayed until May 24.

HHS secretaries routinely attend the World Health Assembly, often accompanied by a large delegation, as well as other ministerial meetings with world health officials. This year's delegation included nearly 50 people, all of whom were HHS staff or federal employees — except for Price's wife, a physician who was listed as an adviser.

Price, his wife and eight HHS personnel took the Gulfstream from Berlin to Geneva on Sunday, May 21, an HHS official confirmed. The 95-minute trip was projected to cost taxpayers almost $16,000, according to an invoice.

There are multiple commercial flight options on that route, such as several daily flights by EasyJet, for about $260 per ticket or less. The German airline Lufthansa is currently running a promotion for one-way flights between Berlin and Geneva for just $60.

Other members of the U.S. delegation to the World Health Assembly contacted by POLITICO said they did not take military aircraft to get to Geneva for the conference.

Price chalks up jet travel to Trump's 'very ambitious agenda' Back

By Cristiano Lima | 09/28/2017 07:28 PM EDT

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price said Thursday that his use of federal money to travel on private jets was part of an all-out effort to carry out President Donald Trump's "very ambitious agenda."

Price, who came under investigation after POLITICO revealed that he had taken at least 26 charter flights on official business since May, at a cost of more than $400,000, said in an interview on Fox News that he regretted the impact his decisions had on taxpayers. But the secretary also continued to defend the trips for having been approved through the "normal process" and thus having been "deemed appropriate official travel."

Pressed on how he could square the costly travel with his fiscally conservative ideals, Price said the flights were booked partially out of a desire to fulfill Trump's plans.

"These were 10 trips with 26 different legs," he said. "We have a very ambitious agenda and we were trying our doggone best to accomplish the issue mission and the president's agenda."

He added: "Clearly, we weren't sensitive to the taxpayer, which is why I've taken the actions I've taken."

Price announced earlier Thursday that he would write a personal check to the federal government to cover his costs of traveling on private jets and that he would permanently halt the use of charter flights for official business. The announcement came as Price faced increased criticism from within the Trump administration, with the president fuming over the reports and some White House aides calling for Price's removal from office.

Although Price said Thursday he believed he still had "the confidence of the president," when asked later on Fox whether he was concerned about his job security, Price seemingly dodged, saying, "I work at the pleasure of the president."

He added: "I look forward to gaining — regaining the trust the American people ... may have lost in the activities that I took, and to not only regain the trust of the American people but to regain the trust of the administration and the president."

Following Price's comments Thursday on Fox, POLITICO reported that the White House approved the use of military aircraft for multinational trips by Price to Africa and Europe this spring, and to Asia in the summer, to the tune of more than $500,000. This brings the total taxpayer cost of Price's travels to more than $1 million since May, according to a POLITICO review.

White House asked HHS to halt charter flights amid Price scrutiny Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 09/28/2017 03:55 PM EDT

The White House has asked the Department of Health and Human Services to "halt" the practice of approving charter flights, press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said today.

"That's something that we're certainly looking into from this point forward and have asked a halt be put, particularly at HHS, on any private charter flights moving forward — until those reviews are completed," she said.

POLITICO reported last week that HHS Secretary Tom Price has used more than $400,000 in taxpayer money to fly on private jets. Price, who said over the weekend that he would stop relying on charter flights pending an inspector general review, told reporters earlier today that he believes he still has the confidence of President Donald Trump.

"As the president said yesterday, he's not thrilled — certainly not happy with the actions,"

Sanders said, largely echoing the president's previous comments on his Cabinet secretary. "We're definitely looking at the issue. They're conducting both an internal and an IG full review."

Asked if Price will keep his job atop HHS, Sanders said, "We're gonna conduct a full review and we'll see what happens."

Price's travel is also facing new scrutiny from Congress. Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) today asked the White House to explain how it's making sure Cabinet officials keep travel costs under control.

Zinke calls travel controversy 'a little B.S.' Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/29/2017 12:38 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke dismissed the furor around his use of private aircraft as "a little B.S." in a speech Friday at the Heritage Foundation.

Zinke spoke less than 24 hours after revelations about his use of private planes, including a $12,000 flight from an event with a big donor to his hometown and a trip in the Caribbean. He is at least the fourth member of the Trump administration to face questions over his use of private or military planes at taxpayer expense.

"All this travel was done only after department officials determined no other flights were available," Zinke told the audience at Heritage. "Every time I travel, I submit travel plans to the department, who determines line by line that I follow the law. And I follow the law."

Zinke confirmed that he had taken three charter flights since being confirmed in March, but he did not go into detail about the events.

In one case, he chartered a $12,375 flight from Las Vegas to an airport near his hometown of Whitefish, Mont. Commercial flights are available between the two locations, but Interior officials said none could accommodate his schedule because he was speaking at a dinner for the Las Vegas Golden Knights, a new professional hockey team owned by Bill Foley, the chairman of Fidelity National Financial and a major Zinke backer.

Employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and associated companies gave nearly $200,000 to Zinke's campaigns, according to the campaign watchdog group Center for Responsive Politics.

Democrats and environmentalists say the trip was inappropriate, especially in the wake of Zinke's comments earlier this week questioning the loyalty of nearly a third of his employees.

"Secretary Zinke has the nerve to blow your tax dollars on easy living and then tell oil executives that a third of his own workforce isn't loyal to the Trump administration," Rep. Raul Grijalva, the top Democrat on the House Natural Resources Committee, said in a statement. "Loyalty to this White House means treating taxpayer money like a piggy bank. He's the one with the ethics problems, not the employees he threw under the bus. Firing other Interior Department employees for ethical lapses is a fine step, but he needs to follow the same standards he applies to his team."

Zinke and several other Trump cabinet members have come under fire in recent weeks for using private jets and military aircraft for official business. HHS Secretary Tom Price accrued more than \$1 million in such transportation since May, saying yesterday he would personally repay a fraction of the total cost.

Pruitt won't cover costs for private flights Back

By Emily Holden | 09/28/2017 06:48 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt doesn't plan to pay out of pocket for the $58,000 worth of non-commercial flights he and his staff have taken on four occasions, according to an agency spokeswoman.

Pruitt has taken three private government flights and one chartered plane. EPA has said those flights represented the only travel options for reaching scheduled events in time, including taking an Air Force plane to New York at a cost of $36,068.50 to travel to events ahead of an international energy ministers' meeting in Italy. The agency received ethics approvals from EPA's acting general counsel for three of the four trips.

"If a reimbursement was necessary, we would have been told during the approval process and acted accordingly," agency spokeswoman Liz Bowman said.

HHS Secretary Tom Price today said he would write a personal check to the federal government to cover the cost of his seat on private jet flights that cost more than $400,000 since May.

Senate Republicans offer mixed reviews on Pruitt's pricey plane trips Back

By Anthony Adragna | 09/28/2017 05:14 PM EDT

Senate Republicans were split Thursday over whether to condemn, defend or sidestep questions about EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's expensive use of charter and military planes.

Lisa Murkowski, who oversees the Appropriations subpanel responsible for EPA funding, said she was open to adding language to a spending bill that would prevent Pruitt from taking private flights, after reports this week revealed EPA spent more than $58,000 for charter flights on private or government-owned planes. But the Alaska Republican said she hopes it doesn't come to that.

"I don't think it's appropriate," Murkowski said regarding Pruitt's and HHS Secretary Tom Price's use of private aircraft. "That is clearly something that the executive reins in. You tell your people, 'Look, there's no charter flights.' You set the standard. You set what is acceptable. And I think that should be done."

Pruitt used non-commercial flights during trips to Oklahoma, North Dakota and Colorado, as well as to ensure he made a connecting flight to an energy ministers meeting in Italy. The agency's general counsel signed off on the trips, though their high cost has drawn criticism as the Trump administration seeks to slash the agency's budget by one-third.

But not everyone was ready to criticize the trips.

Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.), the former Environment and Public Works chairman and a friend of Pruitt, defended the administrator's flights.

"If there is a problem with it, then there would be a rule against it and there isn't one," Inhofe told POLITICO in an interview. "That's why he checked first to make sure there wouldn't be a problem."

Current EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) said he was "going to wait and see what comes out" before weighing in on the appropriateness of Pruitt's flights. He did not commit to holding a hearing on the issue, saying only that Pruitt would testify before the committee sometime this year.

Asked if it was generally appropriate for Cabinet officials to take private aircraft, or if he would have similarly held off criticism if it were an Obama administration official involved, Barrasso said, "I want to see what the information is." He added, "With Cabinet members, sometimes it's the only way to get from place to place."

Other Republicans declined to answer the broad question of whether Cabinet officials should take private transportation or said they were unaware of the details of Price and Pruitt's travel. "Good to talk with all of you," Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) told reporters when asked if Cabinet officials should fly in private jets.

Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), meanwhile, said he has more questions about Pruitt's and Price's plane tabs. Grassley sent a letter to President Donald Trump requesting information on what steps Cabinet secretaries are taking to ensure the "most fiscally responsible travel."

Democrats demanded a full accounting of the trips and wanted to know if Trump officials are getting different treatment than Obama Cabinet members.

"I wonder why Scott Pruitt is different from [former EPA Administrator] Gina McCarthy in terms of his needs," Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) said. "Whatever they need [in terms of security], I think we ought to give it to them, but they shouldn't get anything more than they need."

Tom Carper (D-Del.), top Democrat on EPW, called for Pruitt to testify in the near future.

"This is one of those situations where the best disinfectant is sunshine," Carper said.

Shulkin says no charter jets as VA secretary, launches new website tracking his travel

By Dan Diamond | 09/29/2017 01:36 PM EDT

Department of Veterans Affairs Secretary David Shulkin today posted details about his official travel since Jan. 20 and said that he hadn't taken charter jets since the start of the Trump administration.

Cabinet officials have been under scrutiny for their use of non-commercial aircraft. POLITICO first reported last week that HHS Secretary Tom Price has taken more than 26 trips on charter jets since May, often without announcing his itinerary in advance.

Shulkin — an Obama administration holdover with unusual bipartisan support in Congress — announced a new website that includes Shulkin's itineraries and details about his use of non-commercial jets. The VA said the site will be updated within five business days after the conclusion of an official trip.

Shulkin described this as the latest move toward transparency at an agency that has been mired in scandal over the past several years. Shulkin has also posted wait times at VA facilities, lists of disciplinary actions against employees and other data.

Information on the flight habits of other Cabinet secretaries has been trickling out since the Price travel revelations. Education Secretary Betsy DeVos travels on her own private jet and foots the bill for U.S. marshals on the flights, her department told POLITICO last week. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has also taken several private and military flights.

Trump faces growing backlash over Puerto Rico response Back

By Louis Nelson | 09/29/2017 11:18 AM EDT

President Donald Trump and his aides are facing a growing backlash over their response to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Maria in Puerto Rico, with federal teams on the island struggling to deliver aid to those in need even as the White House trumpets its efforts as a success story.

The tension over the Trump administration's self praise spilled out on Friday morning, with the San Juan mayor lashing out at acting Secretary of Homeland Security Elaine Duke, who said on Thursday that the Maria relief efforts are a "good news story."

"Damn it, this is not a good news story. This is a people are dying story. This is a life-or-death story," San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz said on CNN. "When you have to pull people down from their buildings — I'm sorry, but that really upsets me and frustrates me. You know, I would ask her to come down here and visit the towns, and then make a statement like that which frankly it is an irresponsible statement."

Trump, who is preparing to visit Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands on Tuesday, has also lavished praise on his administration's response, writing on Twitter Friday morning that "Puerto Rico Governor Ricardo Rossello just stated: 'The Administration and the President, every time we've spoken, they've delivered.'"

A day earlier, Trump wrote that "FEMA & First Responders are doing a GREAT job in Puerto Rico. Massive food & water delivered... Wish press would treat fairly!" adding in a post later Thursday that Puerto Rico's "governor said 'great job!'"

On Friday morning, Trump opened a speech on tax reform by pledging, "We will not rest ... until the people of Puerto Rico are safe," while also explaining that his administration has been handed an immensely difficult situation.

"This is an island surrounded by water. Big water. Ocean water," Trump said about the U.S. territory, adding later, "We've never seen a situation like this."

But while Puerto Rican officials have expressed appreciation for the White House's outreach, they have also made clear that what has been done so far has been insufficient to meet the needs of the island's 3.5 million U.S. citizens. In the same Fox News interview where Rossello praised Trump for his efforts thus far, he made clear that "we do need more aid" and that obtaining and distributing that aid remains a problem.

Roughly half of Puerto Ricans are still without running water, officials said Friday at a press conference in the island's capital, San Juan, and just 36 of its 69 hospitals are open and have power. Retirement homes "are becoming just human cages for people that are sick and unable to fend for themselves," Cruz said Friday morning.

The San Juan mayor said on CNN that it has been logistics, not the presence of supplies themselves, that has thus far presented the toughest hurdle to clear. She said Friday morning that a day earlier there had been thousands of shipping containers filled with supplies stuck at a port and unable to move. Only recently had those containers started to make their way out of the port, she said.

In San Juan, Cruz said her residents had received four pallets of water on Thursday — slightly more than 4,000 bottles for a population of roughly 350,000 people — in addition to four pallets of food and 12 pallets of baby food and supplies.

The situation is more dire in other parts of the island, she said, relaying her conversation with another mayor who said his people had no food, no medicine and were drinking from a creek that they also used to bathe and wash their clothes.

"This is a message for President Trump: Thank you for calling San Juan yesterday and listening for our mayday call. But sir, there's 77 other towns that are waiting. They're waiting anxiously and will be very grateful to you and to the American people if you continue to step up," Cruz said. "Again, Mr. Trump, we appreciate everything you are doing and we know it can be done faster. Help us save lives. We will be forever grateful."

Homeland Security Adviser Tom Bossert, in his own CNN interview on Friday morning that preceded Cruz's, disputed the suggestion that the White House's commitment to the island has been anything but absolute and that the logistical strategy employed by the federal government has been insufficient.

Because it is an island, Bossert said that recovery efforts in Puerto Rico present specific challenges, but he said criticism from "New Day" anchor Chris Cuomo and others on CNN "wasn't well placed."

"I don't accept that we're doing anything short of everything we can do. Yes, I accept that the people are going to see, at the very end, the last person in the most hardest-to-reach area is going to receive assistance in a way that's less acceptable than we'd like to," Bossert said.

"We'd like to give them a bottle of water and food immediately. But I do accept that there's going to be a difference between a full-throated, adequate response and the complete satisfaction of bringing that entire territory back to its full, functional state."

Duke, at a press conference Friday in San Juan, said the integration between Puerto Rican, U.S. military and other federal resources has been "really admirable" and will "set the standard for the future." And while she did not directly address her "good news" remark from the previous day, she stood behind her statement that she was pleased with the federal government's recovery efforts thus far.

"Yesterday, I was asked if I was happy and satisfied with the recovery. I am proud of the work that's being done. I am proud of Americans helping Americans, friends and strangers alike. I am proud of the work that DoD, FEMA, and the territory along with first responders are doing," Duke said. "Clearly the situation here in Puerto Rico after the devastating hurricane is not satisfactory. But together we are getting there, and the progress today is very, very strong. The president and I will not be fully satisfied, however, until every Puerto Rican is back home, the power is back on, clean water is freely available, schools and hospitals are fully open and the Puerto Rican economy is working."

In addition to routing supplies and manpower to Puerto Rico, the Trump administration has also sought this week to combat the notion that the island has not been top of mind for the president. Such criticism began last weekend when Trump launched a rhetorical tirade against the NFL and its players who kneel in protest during the national anthem, posting to Twitter several times on the issue while remaining silent on Puerto Rico, which was reeling from Maria's landfall last week.

Trump and his White House have insisted that Puerto Rico has remained a continuous point of focus in the days since the hurricane hit the island, and the president has mentioned the storm in his social media posts multiple times this week.

But the president also appeared to place some blame this week on Puerto Rico for its dire situation, noting the U.S. territory's "broken infrastructure & massive debt" in a tweet.

On Friday, he wrote that "big decisions will have to be made as to the cost of its rebuilding," a statement Bossert sought to clarify by explaining that Puerto Rico's lack of liquid financial assets — the island declared a form of bankruptcy last May — meant the federal government was paying for the entirety of recovery efforts.

"Once we stabilize, then let's talk about the debt," Cruz said on CNN in a second interview with the network. "You know what? There ain't going to be anybody to pay the debt. If we let them die, nobody's going to pay the debt."

Democrats demand hearing on Puerto Rico recovery efforts Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 09/28/2017 10:39 PM EDT

Democratic members of the House Natural Resources Committee are calling for an oversight hearing on the response to the "unprecedented disaster" caused by Hurricane Maria.

A letter from 19 Democratic lawmakers asks Natural Resources Committee Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) to hold a hearing examining the "sufficiency of [the Trump administration's] efforts to respond to the crises in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands."

"Recent reports have heralded the administration's decision to send additional resources to Puerto Rico to address the growing crisis," reads the letter shared with POLITICO. "We believe it would be instructive for the Natural Resources Committee to get specific details of the federal response to this unprecedented disaster impacting two of the most vulnerable members of our American family."

The Natural Resources Committee has broad jurisdiction for U.S. territories, and the letter was organized by panel member Rep. Norma Torres (D-Calif.), Hurricane Maria barreled through the Caribbean last week, causing severe damage. Almost half of the 3.5 million Americans in Puerto Rico are still without clean water and the island is expected to be without power for months -- fueling fears of a humanitarian crisis if basic needs are not met and hospitals and other critical infrastructure not repaired.

Many have been critical of the U.S. response, concerned that American citizens in the territories are being treated differently than those on the mainland who were impacted in Florida and Texas by Hurricanes Irma and Harvey.

More than 100 Democratic lawmakers this week sent a letter to the administration urging the Pentagon to boost its response efforts.

There are thousands of federal workers -- including about 600 employees from the Federal Emergency Management Agency -- in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands to help with relief efforts, including clearing roads and transporting supplies.

As of Wednesday, search and rescue teams have accessed 90 percent of the island, according to FEMA.

The Pentagon has also been scrambling in recent days to get more personnel to the area and deliver supplies. It earlier Thursday that it has been able to reach most of the island's hospitals to make assessments of the damage.

"In Puerto Rico, DoD continues ongoing relief operations and is leaning forward to rapidly deploy additional response capacity, expanding airfield and seaport throughput and positioning key leaders forward supporting FEMA priorities," the Pentagon said.

The Navy's hospital ship, the USNS Comfort, is also expected to arrive in Puerto Rico next week -- but some two weeks after the storm.

The Pentagon also announced Thursday that a three-star general has been tapped to lead hurricane recovery efforts in Puerto Rico. Lt. Gen. Jeff Buchanan will serve as the liaison between Defense Department and FEMA relief efforts.

Pentagon sends three-star general to oversee Puerto Rico recovery Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 09/28/2017 04:54 PM EDT

The Pentagon announced today that the top three-star Army officer at the U.S. Northern Command will lead hurricane recovery efforts in Puerto Rico.

Lt. Gen. Jeff Buchanan is scheduled to arrive in Puerto Rico today to serve as the liaison between Defense Department and FEMA relief efforts.

Brig. Gen. Richard Kim, a one star general officer, arrived in Puerto Rico on Wednesday to coordinate the federal response to the natural disaster. But 145 House Democrats sent a letter to the Pentagon following his deployment, urging that at least a three-star officer be in charge, comparable to the response to Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

Earlier, Buchanan had commanded the 10th Mountain Division, an infantry unit, and did four tours in Iraq and one in Afghanistan.

First GOP tax reform feud erupts over state, local tax break Back

By Aaron Lorenzo and Rachael Bade | 09/28/2017 08:53 PM EDT

Vulnerable Republicans from a handful of purple districts have declared war on a central pillar of the tax plan released Wednesday by President Donald Trump and GOP leaders in Congress: A provision that would eliminate state and local tax deductibility, which they say would hike taxes on their middle-class constituents.

In the first intraparty showdown to emerge after the plan's unveiling, Republicans from New Jersey, New York, California and Illinois are among those worried that voters in their districts will face higher taxes than they currently do. They've already started making their case to Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) — both advocates of ending the deduction — and are vowing to organize to restore their tax benefit.

"I'm going to fight this out and hopefully have success in getting this restored," said New Jersey Republican Tom MacArthur, a leader of the effort. "I am going to do what I can to rally states like New Jersey and New York, Pennsylvania, California, Illinois, Connecticut."

Their campaign throws a curveball into tax reform and is already having an effect: Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) went off script Thursday and said he'd like to maintain the tax deduction if possible. That undercuts the united front GOP leaders wanted to show on the matter — and potentially leaves them a $1 trillion hole in their list of pay-fors, potentially jeopardizing their entire plan.

"If we can keep it, I'd like to keep it," Hatch said, acknowledging that the position puts him at odds with the statement issued by the so-called Big Six negotiators, a group that includes Hatch.

He called the unified framework "just the beginning" for efforts to overhaul the tax code.

The tax break is important to taxpayers in states and cities with high property taxes and other levies, most of which vote blue though some are represented by GOP lawmakers like MacArthur. Realtors and others in the housing business also see the tax break as a boost for their industry, given its benefit to home buyers.

Republicans from those states worry about taxes increasing on constituents when they can no longer deduct local levies. Asked if he was a "no" on the tax framework, for instance, MacArthur responded: "I'm certainly a loud objector."

"It's not fair to give the entire country a tax break on the backs of the citizens of these six or seven states ... the highest-tax states in the country, who by the way get the least back as a percentage of what we pay" to the federal government, he said.

The tax benefit provided $338 billion in deductions in 2015, making it the most widely claimed itemized deduction that year, according to the most recently available IRS statistics. Fully repealing it would raise $1.4 trillion in revenue over a decade, according to an estimate by Alex Brill of the conservative-leaning American Enterprise Institute.

MacArthur has been pressing Ryan and Brady on the issue for weeks and also met with Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and White House economic adviser Gary Cohn, who are also insistent about ending the break, saying it mainly benefits upper-income taxpayers.

He's also coordinating with other GOP House members whose constituents face the same concerns, so they can make a concerted case. Some raised concerns about the provision during a half-day House GOP tax retreat on Wednesday as the plan was getting rolled out.

Ways and Means Republicans know the battle isn't over yet, regardless of whether they agree with Ryan and Brady's position that low-tax states shouldn't subsidize high-tax states, a feeling that reverberates even among some Republicans from places like New York.

"I say it's incumbent on our governor to reduce his budget from $160 billion to $100 billion," Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.) said of New York Governor Andrew Cuomo. "I think it's incumbent on our governor to stop jamming the county taxpayers with the Medicaid costs that equate to 90 percent of the Erie County tax bill."

But Cuomo told reporters on Long Island that the state's congressional delegation needs to oppose the emerging Republican tax plan.

"I'm saying to our congressional representatives: You do whatever you have to do to stop this," Cuomo said. "I don't care if you have to filibuster. I don't care if you have to lay across the Senate floor and force them to remove you, bodily, from the chamber. This cannot happen. It would be devastating to the people of the state of New York."

Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) heard the message loud and clear. During the open mic session at the House Republican tax retreat Wednesday, he warned his colleagues that he could face a backlash at the ballot box should they eliminate the deduction.

King's centrist Republican district voted for former President Barack Obama twice by 5 points, he told the room. And while Trump won his district last election, it's only about 35 percent Republican, he said in a brief interview.

"The average person in my district — or the average one who voted for Trump ... their only asset is their home, and they're paying $15,000 in property taxes on average. Probably another $10,000 in [others]," he said.

GOP leaders responded to King at the retreat by asking him to "keep an open mind." And so far, some are: One Republican leadership source noted that no lawmakers have drawn a line in the sand over the matter — at least not yet.

In the meantime, Republican tax-writers are hoping to convince concerned members that they shouldn't publicly bash the framework just because they want to save the deduction. They're also pointing to their plan to double the standard deduction, which they argue would offset any hit to high-tax state constituents.

"I'm listening, I want to understand better," said Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.), who acknowledged that although his state wouldn't feel as much impact as neighboring New York and New Jersey, there's uncertainty nonetheless. "I want to understand how the standard deduction being doubled will mitigate any changes potentially to the state and local property tax deduction."

But some GOP leaders are going on the offensive to try to discredit the state and local deduction. On Fox Business Thursday morning, for instance, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, who is from high-tax California himself, suggested the deduction actually serves as an incentive for states to ramp up taxes — because they know the federal government will "subsidize" hikes by allowing people to write them off their federal tax bills.

"Is it fair that other states subsidize states that have high state taxes?" he asked. "Look at California. California is one of the most mismanaged, highest-tax states in the nation. And they use an argument inside that [state] Capitol, 'Let's raise taxes, as you can write it off on your federal income tax.'"

It's unclear if such arguments will actually convince any opponents of ending the deduction, however. While Rep. Leonard Lance (R-N.J.), who also stood up to voice his objections during the House GOP retreat, wouldn't commit to voting "no," he said he's working in tandem with the others to keep pressing.

"This is a matter of grave importance to me," Lance said in an interview, labeling it a fairness issue since Garden Staters already pay more in federal taxes than they receive in federal tax benefits.

MacArthur has floated one alternative to create a single homeowner deduction that would let taxpayers pair their property taxes with interest they pay on their mortgages. New Jersey has higher property taxes than any other state.

Another option, from Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.), would turn the existing federal deduction for taxes paid at the state and local levels into a credit. Reed, who sits on Ways and Means, said he's making his voice heard but is also keeping an open mind.

Brady said Republican leaders "are going to continue to listen to Congressman MacArthur and others from the high-tax states. And secondly, it's crucial that we deliver tax relief for every American regardless of where they live, including those states that have high state and local taxes. So that's where we're going to focus."

But outside groups representing real estate interests, as well as state and municipal governments, aren't waiting. They're already taking up the fight under a single coalition called Americans Against Double Taxation.

The consequence of losing the benefit, they say, would not only hit housing, but also cut into spending on infrastructure, education, public safety and emergency services, and other civic amenities if states and cities are pressured to cut their own taxes as a result of the deduction's elimination.

"We better do more than just write letters," said Tom Cochran of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, one of the groups in the coalition. "Calls are being made right now and the pressure will come from the hinterlands across this nation."

After triumphal rollout for tax reform, GOP faces the reality of delivering Back

By Bernie Becker, Colin Wilhelm and Aaron Lorenzo | 09/28/2017 08:09 PM EDT

The GOP's tax-reform efforts got a jolt of momentum this week, but Republicans also are getting a fresh reminder of how hard it will be to write a bill that makes it to President Donald Trump's desk this year.

They will have a number of hurdles to grapple with in the coming months, including selling their new plan to the public, fleshing out the policy, wrangling the rank and file and dealing with the myriad competing interests that will deluge the Hill.

Then there's the Senate, the graveyard of Republicans' efforts to repeal and replace Obamacare. Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), asked about the biggest challenges in turning the plan GOP leaders released this week into legislation, deadpanned: "Fellow senators.

"It's mostly all complicated," Hatch added, later noting: "I want it to be the right kind of a bill. I don't want it to be some piece of crap, which we're so used to around here."

The first challenge: passing a budget. Republicans in both chambers are trying to line up votes on a budget next week, a crucial and difficult step for tax reform that they'll have to tackle as they start wading into member concerns about what tax breaks might be on the chopping block.

The Senate Budget Committee looks ready to consider a framework that makes room for $1.5 trillion in tax cuts, while the full House is expected to take up its budget after months of delay in searching for the votes. If and when both chambers pass a budget, the House and the Senate would then have to reconcile their differences over spending targets and other potential obstacles.

Even if the chambers clear the budget hurdle relatively fast, some GOP lawmakers are already voicing concerns about how to fill in the specifics of the plan, and interest groups are already mobilizing to protect or advocate for certain provisions.

Plus, Hatch and other members of the Big Six who helped draft the plan have had to defend their product, which Trump sells as focused on the middle class, against intense Democratic attacks that it's merely a gift to the rich.

Gary Cohn, the director of the National Economic Council and a Big Six member, deflected questions Thursday about whether a plan that repealed the alternative minimum tax — meant to ensure that upper-income Americans can't escape taxes altogether — and cut taxes on businesses that pay through the individual system would help Trump.

Americans are worried about "their own financial situation," Cohn said at a White House briefing, hours after saying on ABC's "Good Morning America" that "I can't guarantee" that some middle-class people wouldn't get a tax hike under the framework.

For his part, Trump has been promising a massive tax cut for everyone at various rallies around the country. But with Democrats accusing Republicans of not caring about deficits caused by tax cuts, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said several times Thursday that the GOP plan would eventually pay for itself — and maybe then some.

"We think there will be $2 trillion of growth," Mnuchin, another Big Six member, said on Fox Business. "So we think this tax plan will cut down the deficits by a trillion dollars."

Liberal groups also have been saying for days that it's laughable to think that the GOP plan, which also proposes cutting the corporate rate to 20 percent, cutting the top individual rate to 35 percent and repealing the estate tax, would be better for the middle class than for the wealthy.

Republicans are considering putting another income tax bracket on top of the 35 percent rate. But they've also drawn criticism from Democrats for proposing to raise the bottom tax rate for individuals from 10 percent to 12 percent, a charge that rank-and-file GOP lawmakers complained needed a better response during a half-day tax reform retreat on Wednesday.

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) called the criticism "nonsense" this week, insisting that taxpayers who currently pay 10 percent would pay nothing under the GOP plan. "The tax elevator goes down at every level," he said Wednesday.

He added in several speeches on Thursday that big-name Democrats like former Vice President Joe Biden, former Vice President Al Gore and former Secretary of State John Kerry all voted to take the lowest bracket to zero in the 1986 tax overhaul.

But perhaps the biggest challenge top Republicans will face on taxes is trying to get rid of tax breaks that have defenders on and off the Hill, and navigating all the various policy priorities pushed by groups around Washington.

"There's a constituency for every single one of them," Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) maintained, predicting that a GOP tax plan would need to kill around $4 trillion worth of tax incentives to break even.

The National Federation of Independent Business, a group that backs the "pass-through" businesses that pay through the individual tax system and has longstanding ties to the GOP, even had to be talked out of publicly criticizing the Republican framework, according to several people with knowledge of the discussions.

NFIB has long advocated for pass-through businesses to pay as close to the corporate rate as possible. The plan would set their rate at 25 percent, and the corporate rate at 20 percent.

"Our policy goals haven't changed, and we'll be working with Congress and the White House to secure them in the final bill," said Jack Mozloom, a spokesman for NFIB, adding that the group's statement on the GOP outline "made it clear that we wanted more details and that we will remain engaged."

The White House has suggested in closed-door meetings that it's open to taxing contributions to 401(k) savings plans up front and cutting the cap on the mortgage interest deduction in half. Some housing groups are already worried that the more robust standard deduction proposed by Republicans would amount to a backdoor repeal of the mortgage tax break.

The rush of lobbying on tax reform is to be expected, given how many potential losers there are when tax breaks go by the wayside. But outside groups face a risk if they're too aggressive in their efforts, warned Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform.

"If you sit on the side and throw rocks, you are at the back of the line," he said.

Still, Republican tax writers said those issues would all be worked through in time, even as senior administration officials and congressional leaders still say a tax overhaul can be signed into law this year.

"Look at the totality of the package," said Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.). "More of the blanks are going to get filled in the next week or so."

Republicans hope to bridge enthusiasm gap on tax reform Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/28/2017 07:16 PM EDT

Tax reform is the top priority for success-starved Republicans in Washington, but selling the greater public on the issue is another matter.

Independent polling hasn't come close to matching the intensity of President Donald Trump, Hill GOP leaders, and conservative activists and interest groups on tax reform. A POLITICO-Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health poll conducted in late August and early September found that only 20 percent of respondents considered tax reform an extremely important priority, and opinions as to whether it would improve the economy were relatively split.

About 9 in 10 voters have heard little or nothing about Republican efforts to craft a tax plan, according to the poll, which was conducted before Republican leaders rolled out their most detailed tax reform framework to date on Wednesday.

Reform advocates tout their own polls showing strong public support. The American Action Network, a group with ties to House Speaker Paul Ryan, released a poll Tuesday showing 73 percent of respondents agreeing that tax reform should be a "top" or "important" priority for Congress.

Democrats will try to capitalize on any enthusiasm gap between Washington-based groups and the general public — polling earlier in the summer commissioned by POLITICO also showed low trust on tax reform for Trump — and bill the tax plan as a giveaway to the rich and corporations.

Last month, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), an architect of the GOP plan, dismissed polls showing low public enthusiasm. He has been barnstorming for the plan outside Washington and inside, with appearances today at The Heritage Foundation and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Administration officials are fanning out, too. Vice President Mike Pence made stops in Michigan and Wisconsin on Thursday to pitch the Republican framework.

Pence rallied conservative groups on tax reform in a strategy meeting at the White House after the release. Republicans will attempt to overcome public complacency and Democratic messaging with a tandem effort of conservative grass-roots outreach and advertising, the foundation of which has already been laid.

Advocates argue it will be less of an uphill climb than GOP efforts to repeal and replace Obamacare.

"The tax bill is what will turn the economy around and remind people, 'Why did we vote for Trump and the Republicans? This is why!'" exclaimed Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a conservative tax activist group. "As much fun as it is to talk about kneeling [NFL players] and all that, this is going to be a much more fun conversation."

Tax reform supporters are making the argument that all of its elements will boost the economy, including a major corporate tax cut that voters are skeptical of. A POLITICO/Morning Consult poll, conducted Sept. 7-14, showed 65 percent of respondents believed corporations paid too little already.

But 60 percent said small businesses paid too much, and there is a tax cut that would help them in the GOP plan, too.

When Trump went to Indiana to tout the plan after its unveiling, he characterized business tax cuts as benefiting individuals, too.

"This is a revolutionary change," he said of the proposed corporate tax cut, "and the biggest winners will be the everyday American workers as jobs start pouring into our country, as companies start competing for American labor, and as wages start going up at levels that you haven't seen in many years."

Republicans will rely on the bully pulpit of the president, as well as a coalition of activists and business groups, to hammer home that and other pro-reform messages.

"I do think that [Trump]'s an effective messenger out in the states," said Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity.

"The sense of urgency is something that we and other organizations pushing tax reform have to convey," said Pete Sepp, president of the National Taxpayers Union, another group present at the White House gathering with Pence.

Staff to the congressional and administration leaders on the tax overhaul briefed various conservative and business association representatives in the spacious House Ways and Means Committee room on Wednesday afternoon, and the Senate Finance Committee has invited members of key business groups and tax coalitions to meet with Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) on Oct. 3.

The principals drafting the tax legislation are trying to manage expectations on individual and business tax rates, saying they could be changed from the goals outlined Wednesday due to budgetary constraints and the give-and-take of the legislative process.

Still, Republicans and their allies largely showed a united front when the plan was released and believe they can give tax reform the momentum it needs, with a goal of Trump signing the changes into law by the end of the year.

If not, the confidence will quickly turn into despair.

"Republicans recognize that if they don't do this, there's going to be a ton of political hurt put on them," said Andrew Roth, vice president of government affairs for the conservative Club for Growth. "And that's a good motivator."

Cohn: 'Our opening and final offer are on the table' on taxes Back

By Louis Nelson | 09/28/2017 04:45 PM EDT

The business tax rates outlined by Republicans in their proposed tax reform blueprint represent the GOP's "final offer," White House economic adviser Gary Cohn said this afternoon — unless Democrats are interested in cutting rates even further.

"Our opening offer and our final offer are on the table. We were happy to start at 25 and we're happy to go lower, and we're happy to start at 20 on corporate and go lower," Cohn told reporters at today's White House press briefing. "So there's our opening offer. If he wants to counter something lower, we're very negotiable."

The "he" referred to Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, who said in remarks on the Senate floor today that "Democrats understand that small businesses need a break. We will work with our colleagues to do it." Schumer has otherwise panned the Republican proposal, labeling it "wealth care" because of what he said are too many benefits for wealthy Americans.

Cohn has said the administration's proposed corporate tax rate of 20 percent, compared to the current 35 percent, allowed for "no room to negotiate." He also appeared to refer to a 25 percent proposed rate for so-called pass-through businesses, many of which are small.

While many of the GOP proposal's provisions are anathema to Democrats' priorities, Schumer has stopped just short in recent days of saying his party would not work with the Republicans if they were open to negotiating on the plan.

Democrats see Trump, health care as albatrosses for tax reform Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/28/2017 08:26 PM EDT

The Democrats' plan to fight the Republican tax reform plan? Tie it to President Donald Trump and health care.

A memo from the political wing of the liberal Center for American Progress, CAP Action Fund, circulated to congressional offices on Thursday, calls for Democrats to tie Republicans' ambitions to Trump, especially the ways in which he could benefit from the plan his White House helped draft.

The memo, which was provided to POLITICO, also advises that the cuts demanded by House conservatives in the budget resolution that will be used as the vehicle for tax reform could come from health programs. Democrats should tie those two topics together the same way they branded Republican attempts to repeal Obamacare as a tax cut for the wealthy, the memo argues.

"Given the fact that the emerging Republican tax plan would primarily benefit the wealthy, the inclusion of health care in the FY 2018 budget reconciliations would once again mean a debate over stripping people of their health care to fund tax cuts for the wealthy," the memo reads. "This messaging frame — that Republicans are taking away health care to fund tax cuts for the rich — presents the best line of attack against both tax reform and a revived ACA repeal, and should Republicans combine these two efforts, Democrats should be prepared to hammer it relentlessly."

Democrats were also advised to highlight that the most costly tax cut in the Republican plan will be to the corporate income tax rate, which currently stands at 35 percent but would be reduced to 20 percent under the unified White House-Hill GOP framework released Wednesday.

The memo also says that Trump would likely pay less in taxes if the Alternative Minimum Tax were repealed as planned. Trump paid most of his taxes due to that provision in 2005, according to partial copies of his tax returns that MSNBC host Rachel Maddow obtained. And Trump's children would benefit from the repeal of the estate tax, which the Republican plan also proposes.

A proposed lower rate for closely held companies and small businesses, referred to as "pass-throughs," would also theoretically benefit the Trump Organization.

"The plan is tailor made to personally benefit Donald Trump," CAP Action Fund's memo concludes.

Trump pledges 'giant, beautiful, massive' tax cut Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 09/29/2017 12:54 PM EDT

President Donald Trump extolled the broad strokes of his administration's tax plan on Friday, calling it "a giant, beautiful, massive — the biggest ever in our country — tax cut."

Trump unveiled the framework of his administration's plan for tax reform and tax cuts in Indiana earlier this week, and he traveled Friday to a Washington, D.C., hotel to continue touting the proposal in an address to the National Association of Manufacturers.

The president reiterated that his tax plan would slash taxes for everyday Americans, simplify the tax code, level the playing field for American workers and return trillions of dollars that are kept offshore to reinvest into the U.S.

Trump said the policy of Washington when it comes to manufacturing has for decades been best summarized by a single term: surrender.

"They surrendered," Trump said of past administrations. "Under my administration, the era of economic surrender is over, and the rebirth of American industry is beginning. America is winning again, and America is being respected again, and you see that happening all over."

He added that his administration is working daily "to lift the burdens on our companies and on our workers so that they can thrive, compete and grow."

"And at the very center of that plan," he said, "is a giant, beautiful, massive — the biggest ever in our country — tax cut."

The Senate Budget Committee released the text of a fiscal 2018 budget resolution that would allow Senate Republicans to overhaul the tax code on a party line vote. Republicans had unsuccessfully attempted to use the maneuver, called reconciliation, to repeal and replace Obamacare, though Trump maintains the chamber has the votes to pass repeal and will do so early next year.

GAO: Banks held $10.5T in potentially risky derivatives after rule change Back

By Victoria Guida | 09/29/2017 10:28 AM EDT

A rollback of the so-called swaps pushout rule allowed four large banks to retain $10.5 trillion in derivatives contracts in federally insured parts of their operations as of September 2016, a new report from the Government Accountability Office found.

The derivatives rule, part of the 2010 Dodd-Frank Act but amended in the 2015 fiscal spending bill, required banks to spin off derivatives trading businesses that are in federally insured divisions.

After the change, Bank of America, Citi, Goldman Sachs and JPMorgan Chase pushed out an estimated $265 billion of swaps in notional value, compared to $10.5 trillion that they kept in their insured divisions.

"Today's report largely confirms our own investigative findings: the 2014 repeal of this Dodd-Frank provision was a massive giveaway to a few big banks, letting them hold onto more than $10 trillion — that's trillion with a T — of risky assets," said Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), who requested the report in 2015. "And it leaves taxpayers potentially holding the bag if things go bad."

But the report also found that other provisions in Dodd-Frank will likely help mitigate the additional risk created by this change.

"If banks continue to hold financial resources and maintain adequate risk-management systems, as required by their regulators and certain Dodd-Frank Act reforms and regulations, losses stemming solely from the swap activity likely can be absorbed by the banks without causing them serious financial distress," it said.

"However ... it is important to note that derivatives can exacerbate a firm's financial distress caused by other losses as illustrated by Lehman's failure," it added.

American Bankers Association spokesman Jeff Sigmund said the report shows that banks "are well prepared to manage their derivative risks, and do so." He also pointed out that the notional value of derivatives overstate their actual risk.

The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, for example, found that the real exposure from these banks' derivatives holdings is "small and actually declining," he said. Specifically, it found that for the top five institutions, total value at risk is $273 million, down from $329 million at the end of 2014, when the swaps pushout change was made.

"Not trillion, not billion, but million," Sigmund said.

Banks told GAO that the unamended version of the rule would have likely reduced the efficiency of dealers and end users in managing counterparty credit risk.

Warren and Cummings underlined the importance of not further rolling back Dodd-Frank, in their statement.

"GAO's report is a warning to everyone that rolling back other Dodd-Frank provisions will increase financial risks," they said. "And these risks will be compounded if banks are allowed to return to the free-wheeling abuses they engaged in before we passed the Dodd-Frank Act."

Education Department awards charter school grants Back

By Caitlin Emma | 09/28/2017 05:16 PM EDT

The Education Department today awarded more than $250 million in federal funds to states and charter school management organizations for the creation and expansion of public charter schools.

Nine states will split more than $144 million in grants to support new and expanded charter schools. Seventeen nonprofit charter school management organizations will get a cut of more than $52 million to expand and replicate high-quality charters. And eight organizations will share more than $56 million to enhance the credit of charter schools so they can access private and non-federal funds to acquire, construct, and renovate charter school facilities.

"These grants will help supplement state-based efforts to give students access to more options for their education," Education Secretary Betsy DeVos said in a statement. "What started as a handful of schools in Minnesota has blossomed into nearly 7,000 charter schools across the country."

"Charter schools are now part of the fabric of American education, and I look forward to seeing how we can continue to work with states to help ensure more students can learn in an environment that works for them," she said.

Both House and Senate appropriators support increased federal funding for charter schools, but not the $500 million sought by President Donald Trump in his fiscal 2018 budget proposal earlier this year.

ACA navigators adjust to new reality Back

By Renuka Rayasam | 09/28/2017 03:35 PM EDT

AUSTIN, Texas — "Navigator" groups that help people sign up for Obamacare coverage are scrambling to adapt to a compressed open enrollment period and cutbacks by the Trump administration for outreach support. To adapt, they're forced to look for new funding, shift resources and reorganize scheduled events to maximize the use of staff.

The Obama administration relied on navigators to connect with communities with high uninsured rates and to draw younger, healthier people into Obamacare markets. They also educate consumers about their health insurance options and help them through the process of signing up for coverage.

By contrast, HHS this year slashed its advertising budget by 90 percent and funding for navigators by 40 percent. Earlier this week, the agency said it won't send federal or regional staffers to open enrollment events designed to boost the number of enrollees in ACA plans.

The shift is pushing navigators to pivot in their approach.

"We have to outsmart the situation as best we can," said Ken Goodgames CEO of the Community Council of Greater Dallas, which has seen its HHS funding cut from about $2.2 million to $1.8 million. "If this is the new steady state, we have to figure out how to go about evolving."

HHS' current stance is in sharp contrast to the role it's played in previous years. An August 2015 HHS presentation shared with POLITICO shows that the agency had detailed plans in place to collaborate with navigators well before the start of open enrollment. In the era of Obama, the agency conducted analyses of the previous year's open enrollment efforts, outlined communications themes for each week of open enrollment and detailed where to dispatch the HHS secretary and staff for maximum impact.

This year, HHS has sent a clear message that navigators are entirely on their own.

"Marketplace enrollment events are organized and implemented by outside groups with their own agendas, not HHS," said Caitlin Oakley, HHS press secretary. "These events may continue regardless of HHS participation."

Oakley added that the ACA was a "bad deal" and riddled with "failures."

With that attitude, the agency's involvement in open enrollment events could actually backfire, said Elizabeth Hagan, associate director of coverage initiatives at Families USA.

"If they were going to participate and make it political, it's almost a good thing they weren't participating," she said.

Still, navigator groups say the lack of support hampers their enrollment efforts. In addition to providing funding, HHS staff in the Obama administration would generate publicity for events and keep navigators informed of changes or specific issues to be aware of during open enrollment.

Jodi Ray, who oversees the Covering Florida Navigator Consortium, said in previous years, the health secretary would attend the group's kick-off enrollment event. This year, staffers from HHS have yet to contact her. Her group saw its funding cut from $5.8 million to $4.9 million.

"They were extremely engaged," Ray said about the health secretaries under the previous administration. "It was valuable to get the attention of the press to get the information out."

That loss of technical assistance and support could become even more pronounced when open enrollment hits and navigators run into problems helping people sign up for coverage.

Jill Ramirez at the Austin-based Latino HealthCare Forum said that in previous years, she would have a weekly call with her CMS program officer; two years ago she hosted former Labor Secretary Tom Perez, who helped the group garner media attention for enrollment efforts. But recently she was told that her "wonderful" CMS contact was stepping aside, and that her group's funding would be cut from about $250,000 to $13,000.

"It does feel like it was meant to destruct and discourage," said Ramirez, who has partially made up for funding cuts with money from the city and county.

"But we're continuing," Ramirez said, "despite what the administration has tried."

Fannie and Freddie make $5.1 billion payment to Treasury Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 09/29/2017 03:35 PM EDT

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac made their quarterly dividend payments to Treasury today, transferring more than $5.1 billion.

To date, the government-backed mortgage companies have paid nearly \$275.9 billion to taxpayers under an agreement with Treasury. That contract, known as the net worth sweep of company profits, requires the companies to eliminate all of their capital by the end of this year, raising the odds that they'll need to tap Treasury for cash, something they haven't done since 2012.

Combined, Fannie and Freddie have drawn about $187.5 billion in taxpayer aid since the housing collapse.

WHAT'S NEXT: There is growing political pressure to allow the companies to retain a capital buffer or make their dividend payments annually instead of quarterly.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Senators split despite massive backlog of appropriations action — Tax writers consider reducing mortgage deduction cap — Confirmations open infrastructure funding floodgates
Date: Friday, August 04, 2017 4:55:03 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes | 08/04/2017 04:52 PM EDT

SEE YA IN SEPTEMBER: For appropriations purposes, it might as well be Sept. 5, because lawmakers won't be lifting a legislative finger on their unfinished spending bills for more than four weeks. The August hiatus, albeit a congressional normality, seems especially painful this year for those anxious to get funding levels firmed up. After all, the Senate's spending panel hasn't even introduced or marked up six of its 12 measures, making no headway in the extra days the chamber was in session this week to muddle through more attempts to repeal Obamacare and confirm long-delayed nominees.

TAX

HOMEOWNERS WILL HOWL: One of the most popular tax breaks in America might shrink under the GOP's overhaul plans. Colin Wilhelm reports today that multiple sources tracking tax reform say the cap on writing off mortgage interest could be lowered, despite Trump's promises to protect the homeownership deduction.

Multi-billion-dollar pay-for: If those rumors become reality, the real estate industry will give 'em hell. But there would be gain for that pain: The Tax Foundation estimates that $308 billion could be saved over the 10-year budget window Republicans are working with, after factoring in negative economic consequences. And tax writers are in search of some solid pay-fors now that they've ditched the idea of a 20 percent business tax on imported goods and services.

INFRASTRUCTURE

CONFIRMATIONS OPEN FLOODGATES: While top offices at FERC have laid vacant for the first six months of the Trump presidency, a multibillion-dollar backlog of infrastructure projects has been building. Now, with Senate confirmation this week of droves of nominees, the agency's preparing to make it rain. As Eric Wolff and Darius Dixon report today, FERC must work through a backlog that has grown to at least $13 billion worth of projects expected to generate more than 23,000 construction jobs, according to a POLITICO analysis of late-stage applications waiting for approval.

Nick of time: FERC oversees interstate pipelines, liquefied natural gas exports and wholesale electricity markets. And confirmation of Pennsylvania regulator Rob Powelson and Republican Senate aide Neil Chatterjee could not come too soon. "I would not begin to minimize even the passage of another month," says former FERC Commissioner Colette Honorable, "because there are high stakes in the matters that come before FERC each and every day — vast amounts of capital at issue, vast amounts of consumer cost or savings at stake."

ENERGY

DON'T SAY THE FEDS DIDN'T TRY: The utility company that made headlines this week for abandoning an over-budget nuclear project in South Carolina had asked for up to $3 billion in federal help, Darius reports. An Energy Department official said the agency considered offering the company a loan guarantee, "which they ultimately chose not to pursue."

JOBS

MILLION MARK: Two months after saying the economy had added more than a million jobs under his leadership, President Donald Trump's claim has come true. The Labor Department reports today that 209,000 jobs were added in July. Marianne Levine explains that these latest numbers are a decrease from June, when the economy added 231,000 jobs. But unemployment ticked down to 4.3 percent, compared to June's 4.4 percent. Average hourly private-sector earnings were up 2.5 percent over the previous year, as they were in June.

Put in perspective: The pattern of growth in 2017 remains essentially the same as in 2016. According to the Labor Department, an average of 184,000 jobs per month have been created this year, compared to 187,000 in 2016. If you eliminate January, when President Barack Obama was still in office, the monthly average is a somewhat lower, at 179,000.

OBAMACARE

POST-ADJOURNMENT REALITY CHECK: Proving they were bluffing with the repeal-or-bust ultimatum, GOP leaders have closed the Senate for legislative business for the remainder of the month. Jennifer Haberkorn and Paul Demko explain the lay of the land: After seven years of unity on repealing Obamacare, Republicans are rudderless on how to talk about or address the defining domestic policy issue of nearly the past decade for their party, and they have no clear plans despite holding all the levers of power in Washington. Now, they face a month away from the Capitol, answering to their home-state voters about their lack of progress.

Trump administration weighs halving popular homeowner tax benefit Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 08/04/2017 05:03 AM EDT

A tax break popular with homeowners and the real estate industry could take a hit as Republicans look for ways to pay for their tax reform plan.

Despite promises from the Trump administration in April that it would "protect the homeownership ... deductions," multiple sources tracking tax reform said that the cap on the mortgage interest deduction — currently set at the interest on up to $1 million of mortgage debt — could be lowered in tax reform.

That would be a slap in the face to an industry that strongly supported President Donald Trump during his presidential bid: He overwhelmingly won a straw poll by the National Association of Realtors during its annual meeting last year.

The topic came up during a White House roundtable with real estate industry representatives on Monday. National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn, a key decision-maker on tax reform, and his lead deputy on tax reform, Shahira Knight, led the meeting. Cohn had previously told members of Congress that almost everything, including changes to the mortgage interest deduction, would be on the table.

"They're willing to ruffle some feathers," said one attendee of Monday's meeting. "Everything was on the table," including capping the deduction that the Trump administration has said it would preserve.

No final decision has been made yet, as Republicans work during Washington's sleepy days of August to craft a reform plan that will be politically palatable and meet the criteria for the budgetary maneuver they plan to use to bypass Democrats who could hold up a bill in the Senate. But lowering the cap on the mortgage interest deduction would help offset tax cuts for individuals and businesses.

"I've seen proposals that drop it to $500,000," said Rohit Kumar, lead on PricewaterhouseCoopers' Washington tax policy team and a former senior staffer to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, one of the six Congressional and administration leaders negotiating tax reform.

After tabling a 20 percent business tax on imported goods and services, known as border adjustability, Republicans need ways to pay for tax cuts so they can minimize the amount those cuts would add to the deficit. The Tax Foundation, a tax policy think tank, estimates that after factoring in negative economic consequences, $308 billion could be saved over the 10-year budget window Republicans are working with by lowering the mortgage deduction.

Like many issues in tax reform, the mortgage interest deduction divides more along parochial than ideological lines. Conservatives and progressives alike criticize the deduction as inefficient and more useful for wealthy taxpayers than the working class it's supposed to help put in homes. But its popularity with homeowners in more expensive areas and with the real estate industry have helped it weather past attempts to cut or eliminate it.

"There's not a lot of conservative support for the mortgage interest deduction," said Ryan Ellis, a conservative tax lobbyist.

One example: In February, Mark Calabria, then a financial regulatory expert with the libertarian CATO Institute and now Vice President Mike Pence's top economic adviser, and progressive housing activist Diane Yentel penned an op-ed in favor of reducing the mortgage deduction.

Conservative support for cutting the deduction, combined with smoke signals out of the White House that a reduction could be a part of a broader tax reform package, has the real estate and building industries concerned.

"[L]imiting the mortgage interest deduction amounts to a de facto tax increase on current or future homeowners while putting homeownership further out of reach for prospective buyers," said National Association of Realtors President William Brown in a statement. "We would have strong objections over any effort to further cap or limit the deductibility of mortgage interest."

Brown added that he hadn't seen a sure signal that capping mortgage interest would definitely be in a tax reform proposal, though a $500,000 cap was brought up as an option at the White House, according to those who attended the meeting.

Another part of the calculus for the Trump administration and congressional conservatives: Use of the deduction could dramatically drop if Republicans push through the doubling of the standard deduction that individuals can take instead of itemizing different tax write-offs.

Reducing the mortgage interest deduction "gets a little tricky because it depends on what else you're doing on the individual side," said Kumar, who added that it's only on the table if Republicans follow through on their goal of doubling the standard deduction.

By some estimates, doubling the standard deduction could lower by 90 percent the use of the mortgage interest deduction by middle-class Americans, eroding much of the argument for keeping it.

That's made the Republican proposal to double the standard deduction a proxy battle over the mortgage benefit. Even though the administration signaled it would keep the mortgage interest deduction in the tax code when Cohn and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin announced Trump's tax goals this past spring, the National Association of Realtors blasted the inclusion of doubling the standard deductions in those goals.

House Speaker Paul Ryan reiterated doubling of the standard deduction as a goal in tax reform during a meeting with conservative groups on July 28.

"By doubling the standard deduction and repealing the state and local tax deduction, [Trump's] plan would effectively nullify the current tax benefits of owning a home for the vast majority of tax filers," NAR said in a statement tied to the release of Trump's tax goals.

Still, the industry hopes for a near-literal Trump card in the form of the president and his family's deep ties to the real estate industry.

"I'm not so sure it's going to translate into legislative language," said one lobbyist tracking the issue, citing Trump's real estate business. The same lobbyist anticipated a "broad-based campaign" in opposition to any reduction in mortgage interest this fall if the proposal stays in the tax reform conversation.

FERC confirmations set to unleash a backlog of stalled infrastructure work Back

By Eric Wolff and Darius Dixon | 08/04/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Billions of dollars' worth of shovel-ready infrastructure projects have been held up by a bureaucratic morass that President Donald Trump helped to create.

Trump's promise of a trillion-dollar infrastructure bill has so far failed to materialize on Capitol Hill, but even the executive branch he oversees has a growing backlog of natural gas pipelines and a gas export terminal waiting for approval.

On Thursday, the Senate confirmed enough nominees at the FERC to let the agency get back to business — but now FERC must work through a backlog that has grown to at least $13 billion worth of projects expected to generate more than 23,000 construction jobs, according to a POLITICO analysis of late-stage applications waiting for approval. FERC oversees interstate pipelines, liquefied natural gas exports and wholesale electricity markets. The commission has been crippled by vacancies since February, after Trump demoted its former chairman, who promptly quit — leaving it unable to conduct any major business until the Senate confirms new commissioners.

The confirmation of Pennsylvania regulator Rob Powelson and Republican Senate aide Neil Chatterjee could not come too soon.

"I would not begin to minimize even the passage of another month," said former FERC Commissioner Colette Honorable, "because there are high stakes in the matters that come before FERC each and every day — vast amounts of capital at issue, vast amounts of consumer cost or savings at stake."

Many of the largest pipeline projects run right through Trump country, carrying gas out of shale plays in West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Ohio — all states Trump won last year and hopes to win again. One project alone, called Atlantic Coast, would bring 10,000 jobs to West Virginia, Virginia and North Carolina, and the $2 billion NEXUS line would put 3,300 people to work in Michigan and Pennsylvania, states Trump flipped to red for the first time in decades.

The holdup comes as FERC, which has a $350 million annual budget and 1,500 employees, has found its once-quiet regulatory responsibilities increasingly politicized as its work draws closer to the center of some of the most significant energy and climate policy debates facing the country. The small independent agency does not formally take direction from the White House, but it has ample power to shape Trump's agenda of U.S. "energy dominance." FERC is in charge of authorizing facilities to export natural gas; balancing the environmental risks and benefits of the fracking boom; setting rates for increasingly complicated energy markets; and deciding how far states can go in propping up nuclear power plants by paying more for their carbon-free energy.

Environmentalists, who besieged the agency's board meetings with protests last year, say FERC takes too narrow a view of its mandate to ensure affordable, reliable energy supplies and has ignored larger questions of climate change and environmental protection. Their protests have intensified in the wake of the fracking boom that led to higher demand for new pipelines and export terminals.

Industry supporters say any policy changes need to come from Congress and complain that their projects are falling victim to partisan infighting.

But virtually everyone who has a history with FERC agrees that the polarization around the agency did not begin this year. The agency's long state of paralysis is complex enough that Trump is not solely at fault.

"There are a number of things that had to go wrong to put FERC in this current position, and every single one of them went wrong," said Marc Spitzer, a former Republican FERC commissioner. "It's unfair to put all the blame on any one person."

FERC was set at the precipice of dysfunction by former President Barack Obama, when GOP Commissioner Phil Moeller resigned in October 2015 and fellow Republican Tony Clark followed him out the door 11 months later. Obama never nominated anyone to fill the two GOP-designated seats, in part because of Democrats' larger political feud with Senate Republicans after Majority Leader Mitch McConnell blocked Merrick Garland's nomination to the Supreme Court without any hearings or votes.

But it was Trump who pushed FERC off that cliff, when he stripped the chairmanship from Norman Bay and gave it to Cheryl LaFleur, another Democrat. Bay followed the lead of most chairs who lose the gavel and resigned, taking the agency's quorum with him. As of July 1, when Honorable resigned, LaFleur became the agency's sole member.

Democrats fault the White House for the pace of confirming new commissioners. The Senate has traditionally confirmed nominees to bipartisan commissions such as FERC by packaging picks from both parties together before bringing them to the floor for votes. But the White House only formally nominated Democratic aide Rich Glick on Wednesday, five weeks after announcing plans to do so.

Others blame the lack of trust in a polarized Washington.

"The Senate functions based on trust and unanimous consent. If everything in the Senate has to go the whole nine yards, then virtually nothing gets done," said one longtime industry official close to pending projects who asked not to be named in order to speak freely. The Senate can move swiftly, the source added, "but in order for that to happen, there needs to be some measure of trust."

Two of Trump's FERC picks, Republicans Chatterjee and Powelson, cleared the Senate energy committee in June, but without Glick's nomination, Senate Democrats were unlikely to allow a delay-free confirmation. Once Glick's papers came in, Democrats let them through on the last day before a monthlong recess.

But industry spent the intervening months watching the clock tick while projects stayed frozen.

"FERC's lack of a quorum since early February represents an unnecessary drag on the economy, sidelining billions of dollars in private capital otherwise poised to put thousands of Americans to work expanding and improving our nation's energy delivery system," said Adam Parker, a spokesman for the NEXUS pipeline project being built by Enbridge.

Enbridge will miss a year-end deadline to begin operating the $2 billion, 256-mile natural gas link between a Marcellus shale natural gas field in eastern Ohio and markets in Michigan and Canada. The project, which would put 3,365 people to work, finished its environmental review in November — the penultimate regulatory step before construction can begin — and has been waiting since for the commission to get staffed up.

NEXUS is one of 18 pipelines and gas projects that have completed environmental reviews since last fall but could not receive FERC's final OK while it lacked a quorum. Others include TransCanada's WB Xpress; the Mountain Valley Pipeline, which has six companies behind it; the Atlantic Coast Pipeline, being built by a partnership of Duke, Dominion, Piedmont Gas and Southern Company; and PennEast, whose backers include Southern Company and Spectra Energy. Each of these projects will carry natural gas out of the Marcellus shale to population centers in the East or Midwest.

An unusual deep-water LNG export terminal that Delfin LNG wants to build at Port Delfin in Louisiana has its Department of Energy approval, but it needs FERC to sign off on-shore parts of the project before construction can begin.

Together, the projects stand to employ more than 23,000 people in mostly temporary construction jobs and would inject more than $13 billion in investments into the economy, according to the companies behind them.

For many of these pipelines, the lack of a quorum may have cost them a year of work: Summer and fall are ideal times to build in much of the country. Foul weather stops construction in winter, and environmental considerations often make spring work untenable.

The delays provided a temporary win to the growing ranks of anti-pipeline protesters, who have been arrested at FERC meetings and sometimes even camped outside of commissioners' homes to protest approvals of the infrastructure necessary to move all the new natural gas unlocked by the fracking boom.

Some of those same activists were hoping Senate Democrats would do everything possible to keep the open seats from ever being filled. But that pressure was responsible for the delay, and no Senate Democrats have endorsed the blockade. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), whom activists cite as an ally, opposed the two nominated commissioners in committee, and he opposes a bipartisan energy bill that would speed up pipeline approvals.

Keeping FERC without a quorum slowed that process.

"As long as there's no quorum established, no pipelines are being approved. That helps us," said Karen Feridun, founder of Berks Gas Truth, an anti-fracking group out of Berks County, Penn., that is part of the umbrella FERC Vacancies Coalition.

Pipeline approvals are not the only backlog awaiting Trump's new FERC commissioners. They will also be thrust into the center of testy regional and state-level battles over programs designed to address climate change by subsidizing nuclear power plants, and potentially price carbon emissions.

"FERC, and what's subject to its jurisdiction, kind of got dragged into the climate debate," the industry official said, noting that the agency has found itself the target of ever-increasing interest on Capitol Hill from "those in Congress who wanted to stop the Clean Power Plan and were unable to do so."

Figuring out a way to bridge — or block — expansive state energy policies is among the biggest issues that FERC has struggled with over the past several years. Those policies are horrendously complex and tend not to break down along traditional partisan lines, but the task will nonetheless end up on Kevin McIntyre's desk if he's confirmed as chairman.

Those looming policy issues have largely focused on New York and Illinois, which both approved nuclear power incentive programs last year that could have a big impact on electricity markets overseen by FERC, as well as any other state-level policy tailored to specific energy sources.

The Electric Power Supply Association, which represents a range of independent generators, filed complaints in January hoping FERC might stop state programs subsidizing struggling nuclear plants in the New York and PJM Interconnection markets, by arguing those plans would artificially low power prices. EPSA had hoped for FERC action before plans in New York and Illinois took effect this spring. But without a quorum, FERC's hands are tied.

And an Illinois judge wasn't sympathetic when he knocked down the group's lawsuit to quash the program, saying "FERC's current paralysis does not change the structural limitations on judicial power."

Meanwhile, Ohio, New Jersey and Pennsylvania have started to mull their options for helping power plants in their states just as state regulators and a broad swath of the energy industry have increasingly looked to FERC for policy guidance. Many of the nonprofit organizations that operate regions of the electric grid are also trying to develop a market-based way to give states what they want, which may include a price on carbon.

"One of the greatest challenges that this new commission will face," Honorable said, "is how to support moving through the challenges associated with the implementation of state energy policy and the operation of wholesale energy and capacity markets."

Source: Utility asked DOE for $3B to prop up South Carolina nuclear project Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/04/2017 12:25 PM EDT

SCANA asked DOE for a grant for as much as $3 billion amid their efforts to rescue their V.C. Summer nuclear project, according to an agency official.

Earlier this week, top brass at the company told state regulators that they sought a grant from DOE valued at least $1 billion in order to help cover ballooning expenses for the project, which is expected to take another $7.1 billion to finish. The Summer project's owners announced their plans this week to abandon the effort.

SCANA CEO Kevin Marsh said he made a "very clear" plea for "direct support from the government in the form of a grant."

A DOE official said the agency considered offering SCANA a loan guarantee, "which they ultimately chose not to pursue."

Marsh also suggested that Southern Co., which is assessing the future of its own over-budget two-reactor project in Georgia, asked DOE for money.

"We made it known to everybody we talked to what we were looking for," Marsh said of SCANA's pursuit of a DOE grant, "and Southern Company asked for the same thing because their cost estimates, I suspect, will be in the same range of ours."

Southern Co. and SCANA didn't respond to a request for comment.

Axios reported on SCANA's request earlier today.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Vogtle project owners expect to file their recommendation on the future of the reactors with state regulators later this month. DOE has already extended an $8.3 billion loan guarantee to the Vogtle project.

Trump (finally!) reaches million-jobs mark Back

By Marianne LeVine | 08/04/2017 08:50 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's claim that he's created a million jobs finally came true — months after he first made it.

"We've added ... more than a million private sector jobs," Trump said on June 1, when the Labor Department's tally was about 600,000. On Monday White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said, "We've created over a million new jobs since [Trump] took office," when DOL's tally was 863,000.

With the Labor Department reporting Friday that the economy added 209,000 jobs in July, Trump can finally say, truthfully, that he's created more than a million jobs since entering office. Trump tweeted shortly after the report's release: "Excellent Jobs Numbers just released - and I have only just begun. Many job stifling regulations continue to fall. Movement back to USA!"

July's jobs number was a decrease from June, when the economy added 231,000 jobs. But unemployment ticked down to 4.3 percent, compared to June's 4.4 percent. Average hourly private-sector earnings were up 2.5 percent over the previous year, as they were in June.

The pattern of job growth in 2017 remains essentially the same as in 2016. According to the Labor Department, an average of 184,000 jobs per month have been created this year, compared to 187,000 in 2016. If you eliminate January, when President Barack Obama was still in office, the monthly average is a somewhat lower 179,000.

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) called the report "solid" and said, "Our economy is making steady progress with more people entering the labor force and continued job creation." But he cautioned that the report "also shows too many Americans are still having a hard time finding good-paying jobs, getting a raise, and providing for their families."

Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.), ranking member of the Joint Economic Committee, blamed Trump for weak wage growth.

"After nearly eight months on the job, President Trump has failed to come up with a cogent plan to create good-paying jobs and increase wages," Heinrich said in a written statement. "As a result, wages are barely exceeding inflation, and more than 100,000 workers have been laid off as companies continue to close American operations and ship jobs overseas."

Analysts reacted positively to Friday's jobs report.

"Kind of all-around strong headline number," Tony Bedikian, head of global markets for Citizens Bank, told CNBC. "More people are coming into the labor force and finding jobs. It's difficult to find anything really negative in the report."

Elise Gould, senior economist at the left-leaning Economic Policy Institute, said that "we are still steadily moving toward full employment," but estimated that "we need to add at least 223,000 jobs per month over the next year to lower the unemployment rate to 4 percent and bring another million workers back in from the sidelines."

Experts surveyed by Bloomberg had predicted the creation in July of about 178,000 jobs, an unemployment rate of 4.3 percent, and an over-the-year increase in hourly earnings of 2.5 percent. The payroll company ADP estimated Wednesday based on its own records that private-sector job growth in July was 178,000.

The jobs report followed news from the Commerce Department last week that Gross Domestic Product increased 2.6 percent in the second quarter of 2017, up from the first quarter's 1.2 percent. GDP grew 1.8 percent in the fourth quarter of 2016, 2.8 percent in the third quarter and 2.2 percent in the second quarter. Although the second quarter of 2017's 2.6 percent figure is an improvement over the first quarter, it still falls short of the Trump administration's goal of "sustained 3% economic growth."

Commerce's second cut at estimating second quarter growth is Aug. 30.

Labor force participation remained low at 62.9 percent, up from June's 62.8 percent, close to its lowest level since the 1970's. "I think there's some slack in the labor market," National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn said this morning on Bloomberg, "I think we can ... make it easier for small and medim-sized businesses to grow. ... We do think there is much more potential to bring people back into the labor force."

Republicans leave town with no clear path on Obamacare Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn and Paul Demko | 08/03/2017 06:27 PM EDT

Republicans are leaving Washington Thursday for a month of recess with no clear direction on what they'll do next on Obamacare.

Senate leaders want to just drop the issue altogether. Conservatives say they're still fighting for repeal. Moderates want to launch a bipartisan effort to fix the shaky Obamacare system.

The reality is that, after seven years of unity on repealing Obamacare, Republicans are rudderless on how to talk about or address the defining domestic policy issue of nearly the past decade for their party, and they have no clear plans despite holding all the levers of power in Washington. Now, they face a month away from the Capitol, answering to their home-state voters about their lack of progress.

"I still think something gets through, just because there's families that are not going to be able to afford their insurance, middle-income families," said Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.). "It's going to be a lot of effort."

Robert Laszewski, an insurance industry consultant, thinks Republicans may find their footing. "Things get done in Washington, D.C., when they have to get done," he said. "I don't think this is over. They're going to get yelled at when they got home for being incompetent, for embarrassing themselves."

The August recess will mark the first time lawmakers have been home for an extended period since the repeal effort collapsed in the Senate. After seven years of campaigning against the law, this break marks the first time in nearly a decade that the GOP hasn't aligned its talking points against the Affordable Care Act. Several Republican lawmakers, most House members, have planned town hall meetings, meaning they're unlikely to be able to avoid the subject.

"Our focus should be on honoring our promise to repeal Obamacare and to lower premiums," said Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas). "Under Obamacare the profits of the 10 largest insurance companies have doubled. The insurance companies are making out like bandits, yet Senate Democrats want to give them billions more in taxpayer money. We should be working for the American people, not for the giant health care companies."

President Donald Trump wants to keep the focus on repeal, too. He has continued to hammer Republicans for not following through on their promise to scrap the law, which will make it hard to move on to other priorities, particularly tax reform.

The looming open-enrollment season for Obamacare is also likely to keep health care on the front burner. Insurers must finalize rates in the next month, with many seeking premium increases in excess of 20 percent. Republicans routinely pilloried Democrats for such rate hikes in the past, and used lower premiums as justification for overhauling health care system.

Now, they're in the uncomfortable position of having to explain inaction as millions of Americans again get hit with sticker shock.

When Republicans return from recess they'll face a packed to-do list that will make it difficult to focus on health care exclusively. Congress will have to raise the debt limit and funding the government by the end of September, as well as reauthorizing the Children's Health Insurance Program.

The various Obamacare proposals could gain or lose momentum over recess. The Congressional Budget Office is expected to score key Obamacare proposals, including Cruz's amendment to allow states to waive certain Obamacare consumer protections; Ohio Sen. Rob Portman's proposal to help people who gained coverage under Obamacare's Medicaid expansion buy private insurance; and a plan from Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Cassidy that would keep many of Obamacare's taxes but allow states to decide how to spend the money. Even Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) says he is working on advancing his idea to allow small businesses to band together and offer employee coverage through the small group market.

Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash) are expected to start work on their health plan ahead of hearings planned for early September.

Looming over it all is the unpredictable Trump. He has repeatedly threatened to scrap crucial cost-sharing subsidies — estimated to be $7 billion this year — that insurers rely on to lower out-of-pocket costs for low-income Obamacare customers.

If that funding goes away, it could tip the insurance markets into chaos. Health plans would likely jack up premiums by around 20 percent or bolt the markets altogether.

There are already 19 counties at risk of having no insurer willing to sell ACA coverage for 2018. If those bare counties proliferate across the country, and tens of thousands of Americans have no access to coverage, it would intensify pressure for congressional action.

But if Trump unilaterally eliminates the subsidies, it would also enrage Democrats, who would view it as an act of sabotage. That would douse prospects for bipartisan work on health care for the foreseeable future.

Despite the tenuous situation, most lawmakers remain optimistic they'll reach agreement on repealing and replacing Obamacare.

"Whatever we get 50 votes for," said Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.), "we're going to be ready to vote on immediately."

Treasury gets reinforcements to confront sweeping agenda Back

By Victoria Guida | 08/04/2017 05:03 AM EDT

The Treasury Department is finally getting some fresh blood after operating for eight months with few senior staff members and a massive portfolio.

The Senate on Thursday confirmed five Treasury nominees. They include David Malpass to oversee the international affairs division and Chris Campbell as assistant secretary for financial institutions, an important position in the domestic finance division.

The two men will help provide political direction on multiple key fronts. Campbell is expected to have a broad portfolio beyond financial regulation such as helping with negotiations on tax reform — which he led for Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) for the past several years — and raising the debt ceiling.

The failure to fill crucial Treasury positions has set off alarms in the financial industry, which is eager to roll back some of the sweeping regulations enacted in the wake of the financial crisis. While Treasury is not a regulator, the department is spearheading a comprehensive review of financial rules, including a first report on banks, released by Secretary Steven Mnuchin in June.

"It's one thing to have the secretary in place, but he sets the big policies," said Wayne Abernathy, executive vice president at the American Bankers Association and a former Treasury assistant secretary. "You need people who get down to the details of those policies. The career guys, they can work out the details, but they can't make [intermediary] political decisions."

Still, the Treasury team is not yet fully staffed — and may not be.

Missing from the roster: a nominee for deputy secretary. President Donald Trump is expected to tap Fannie Mae general counsel Brian Brooks, but the announcement has not been officially made. The administration has also not tapped anyone to fill the role of undersecretary of domestic finance.

And one important Treasury nominee was left out of the package of nominees that moved this week: Heath Tarbert, assistant secretary for international markets and development.

Mnuchin has said there are a number of positions he does not intend to fill at the department. "We have virtually the entire team either picked or already in the process," he said in June on

CNBC.

Sources have said Treasury is unlikely to fill the position of deputy assistant secretary for business affairs and public liaison. Also in question: assistant secretary for financial stability, a position that was initially created to monitor the Troubled Asset Relief Program, which is winding down.

Why Trump's New Immigration Bill Makes Sense Back

By George J. Borjas | 08/04/2017 11:20 AM EDT

Since President Donald Trump on Wednesday endorsed the immigration bill proposed by Senators Tom Cotton and David Perdue, various politicians of all stripes have condemned it. They've accused the bill of being undemocratic, un-American, and economically unsound. Many have confidently asserted that more immigrants are always better than fewer.

This rush to judgment is way over the top, and largely uninformed. The current immigration system is desperately in need of reform, and a careful examination of the proposal shows that not only will it likely create substantial economic gains for the country in the long term, it also eliminates elements of our current policy that are hard to defend.

First, some background: Despite the dramatic economic changes that the United States experienced in recent decades, the regulation of legal immigration still operates under a system devised back in 1965. This system, which lets in about 1 million legal immigrants a year, favors foreign relatives of current residents—without regards to qualifications. Around two-thirds of all legal immigrants enter under these family preferences. Only around 15 percent enter under so-called employment preferences, typically granted to persons who are "priority workers" or embody other types of desirable skills. The exact rules that determine whether a worker qualifies to be one of this 15 percent are unclear to those uninitiated in the intricacies of immigration law.

This is where the Cotton-Perdue proposal, also known as the RAISE Act, comes in. They propose two major shifts in existing policy. One tries to address the question of how many immigrants should come into the country. The other answers the question of which applicants we should let in—through a complete rewrite of the rules for skill-based immigration.

The rule changes for skill-based immigration should not be controversial. If nothing else, the proposal introduces much needed transparency in identifying which types of workers we seek. The Cotton-Perdue bill would divvy up the 140,000 visas now assigned to the employment preferences by using a point system similar to those adopted and used for several decades in other countries, including Canada, Australia and New Zealand. In rough terms, those point systems essentially grade visa applicants on the basis of personal characteristics, such as education, occupation and age; add up the points; and grant an entry visa to those who "pass the test."

The Cotton-Perdue bill contains an extremely detailed formula for granting points. The bill gives more points to those who are young. More points to those who are proficient in English as measured by the score in an actual exam. More points to those with professional degrees or degrees in science and technology. And more points to those who have won prizes that signal exceptional ability in specific areas. An Olympic medal, for example, will get you 15 points; a Nobel Prize, 25.

In short, the bill provides a clear and transparent framework for determining which types of workers we believe to be most beneficial. And I suspect that most Americans would view the Cotton-Perdue approach as common sense. Do many of us really believe that America would benefit more by letting in a sociology professor in her 50s than by letting in a young woman with an advanced degree in computer science?

And why exactly is this type of merit-based visa allocation such a good thing from an economic perspective? Despite all the disagreement that economists have over the details of the economic impact of immigration, there is little, if any, disagreement about the fact that high-skill immigration benefits the United States far more than low-skill immigration.

High-skill immigrants are more complementary to America's existing productive infrastructure. High-skill immigrants pay more in taxes and receive fewer services. Exceptional high-skill immigrants will introduce knowledge and abilities that we will learn from, making us more productive, and expanding the frontier of what is economically possible in our country. And high skill immigration, unlike low-skill immigration, will reduce, rather than increase, income inequality. In fact, the people who will lose out the most from the Cotton-Perdue proposal are the high-skill workers in STEM fields, both native and foreign-born, who are here already. They will now have to compete with many more qualified workers for available jobs.

But there is no need to believe any of these arguments to see the pros of high-skill immigration. Whether we like it or not, there is already a global market for high-skill immigrants, with various countries adopting policies designed to convince the potential migrant to move there. Just look at the policies that other immigrant receiving countries pursue. Many already have point systems to filter the applicant pool, or they have put other policies into place that do the same thing, like the "blue card" in the European Union, giving preference to high-skill applicants. All these countries know something that the United States, to its detriment, has ignored for several decades: High-skill immigration is economically more profitable.

In fact, the Cotton-Perdue proposal is so pragmatic that it essentially predicts its own demise. Given the strong emotions that permeate and dominate the immigration debate, it is unlikely that anything as logical, rational and economically sensible could possibly become law.

The other part of the Cotton-Perdue proposal is bound to be much more controversial, as it involves a cut in the number of legal immigrants admitted through the family preference system. As it stands, the system entitles immigrants in the United States to bring in their relatives. This entitlement extends not only to relatives like spouses and minor children, but also to adult family members, such as the immigrant's parents and siblings.

Just think for a minute about what that means. A newly arrived immigrant can eventually bring in his or her sibling. That sibling will then be able to bring in his or her spouse. But the sibling's spouse will eventually be able to bring in the sibling's spouse's parents and siblings, and on and on.

It is this multiplier effect that the Cotton-Perdue proposal wants to eliminate by getting rid of the entitlement granted to immigrants to bring in their parents, adult children, and siblings. (Preference will still be given to minor children and spouses of immigrants.) But before dismissing the proposal outright, it is worth asking ourselves: Does it really make sense to have a policy that eventually guarantees an entry visa to the immigrant's brother's wife's father's sister?

Because of the ever-expanding number of potential immigrants created by the current policy, its repeal would have a large impact on the total number of immigrants admitted to the country. In about a decade, legal immigration would be cut by about half, bringing the level of immigration down to what we had back in the 1980s. (The Cotton-Perdue bill also discontinues the lottery that raffles out around 50,000 visas a year, but it is the repeal of the siblings and adult family preferences that would have the largest numerical impact).

Some critics, like Senator Lindsey Graham, have already objected to the cut by claiming that the country needs continued high levels of low-skill immigration. As the narrative goes, immigrants do jobs that natives don't want to do. But many news reports this summer provide anecdotal evidence that this claim is hogwash. Some of Trump's immigration initiatives have left employers scrambling to fill jobs with native workers. And how exactly are they addressing the labor shortage? By offering higher wages and working conditions. It's not that immigrants do jobs that natives don't want to do. It's that immigrants do jobs that natives don't want to do at the going wage.

Other critics of the Cotton-Perdue bill feel that selecting people on the basis of their economic potential is not what the United States is all about. And many also feel that immigration is always a good thing—so that more immigration is always better than less.

And, indeed, human beings are more than just economic animals. Detractors will surely cite the "give me your tired, your poor" lines from the Emma Lazarus poem as proof that immigration to the United States is not simply about how rich the country can get. And those critics have a point—a point I sympathize with. The United States has been historically exceptional in its generosity, welcoming many of the huddled masses with little economic potential. And there's something about this generosity that should make all of us proud to be Americans.

I have much less sympathy, however, with the rigid belief that more immigration must always be better than less immigration. Despite the thousands of published studies that examine the economic impact of immigration, not a single one provides a credible estimate of what the "optimal" number of immigrants should be, the magic number that maximizes our wealth.

If anyone—even someone claiming to be an economic expert—tells you that the science is settled and that economics implies that the correct number of immigrants is x , that so-called expert is flat-out lying. And even if we were able to come up with a magic number based purely on economics, it wouldn't take into account how that number might affect our schools, our neighborhoods, our culture, our safety and our politics. Let's try to be humble for a change. We simply do not know if 1 million legal immigrants per year is too few or too many.

I happen to believe that 1 million legal immigrants per year is probably—and I do mean probably, as I'm not really sure—larger than the magic number. But this belief has little to do with economic studies or expert opinion. It is the lesson I've learned from reading the news and following the political debate over immigration for three decades.

Think about it: Would we be arguing so much about immigration if every American had benefited greatly from it? I doubt it. Surely, immigration made some of us richer, but that additional wealth was not equally shared, and more than a few Americans were left behind.

I recall how back in the early 1980s, at the time I first began to work on immigration, few people cared about my work because few people cared about immigration. Unfortunately, immigration has now become an all-consuming political hot potato, doing its best to polarize us and divide us. The contentious and divisive debate suggests to me that more than a few Americans feel that immigration has made them worse off and that we should cut back a bit to improve the lives of those left behind in the maelstrom.

But there's no need to rely on what I've learned to get the point. Just look at how immigration has destabilized the political consensus in the United States and Europe. What does that tell you about the long-term political and social consequences of large-scale immigration?

Many of the people who will argue that the cuts in the Cotton-Perdue proposal make for bad policy subscribe to the notion that immigration is good for everyone, and that more immigration is obviously better. Unfortunately, they forget the old maxim that there's no free lunch, and that even immigration is not an exception to that rule. Low-skill immigration, which would likely suffer the largest cuts in the proposed bill, imposes costs on taxpayers and it imposes costs on low-skill workers already here.

It's not as if low-skill workers will stop coming under the Cotton Perdue bill. The proposal leaves unchanged the family preference system as it applies to spouses and minor children. That specific provision of current policy allowed the entry of millions of low-skill persons in the past 50 years, and would continue to do so in the future. The difference now is that the larger fraction of high-skill workers coming into the country will help defray the costs of continued low-skill immigration.

The forthcoming debate over the bill would be much more productive if instead of name-calling and accusations about motives we focused on a simple question. Is the "deal" implicit in the Cotton-Perdue bill really such a bad compromise with our historical legacy?

Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: The GOP's debt ceiling antidote? — Enzi: Obamacare repeal won't delay budget work — Senators await stage-setting CBO score
Date: Wednesday, May 10, 2017 3:23:27 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 05/10/2017 03:18 PM EDT

A FISCAL SWEETENER: The Senate's top budget writer is mulling a new strategy to get Republicans on board with raising the debt limit in September: Promise big cuts, little by little. Senate Budget Chairman Mike Enzi told reporters this afternoon that he'd be keen to look at legislation that lifts the federal borrowing limit for a decade while also imposing new annual limits on spending, though the size of those cuts is unclear.

'Quite possible to do': The idea of a 10-year debt limit increase came up in a spit-balling session late this morning with conservative economist and former Sen. Phil Gramm. "You're voting for a balanced budget, which makes the vote a lot easier," Gramm told a handful of committee members as he pitched the plan. Enzi called it a "great suggestion" and said he will certainly consider it. "I think it's innovative, and probably, quite possible to do," he said. (Enzi's other idea: Base the debt ceiling on a ratio of debt as a share of GDP, rather than on a dollar amount).

Nothing's new in budget world: This reminds us of a recurrent idea from Sen. Rob Portman, who wants to couple any debt ceiling vote with a plan to cut 1 percent from federal spending annually over a decade. That bill was last introduced in March.

GOOD WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON! We're big fans of this new site from the Treasury Department that breaks down all federal spending. Check it out and then reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — A letter from Sen. Shelley Moore Capito to OMB Director Mick Mulvaney protesting the proposed funding cuts to the White House's drug policy office. Capito leads the appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over that office's budget.

#DailyBudgetFact — About three-quarters of all federal spending goes to individuals, private contractors and local governments, according to USAspending.gov.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET

(ALMOST) NO HOLDUPS HERE: Enzi said today that the GOP's health care effort won't delay his committee's budget work, at least until the end. "We can do everything right up to the finalization of the conference without wiping out the reconciliation of the 2017 budget," he said. The one thing that will be pushed off is the official House and Senate conference to agree on a joint bill.

Yes, there will be reconciliation: Enzi says there will be something in reconciliation instructions for the fiscal 2018 budget resolution, but he's not tipping his hand. "I'm getting a lot of suggestions what reconciliation ought to be in the next budget," Enzi told reporters. Still, he hinted that the final package would be somewhat narrow, warning that "a whole bunch of different reconciliations" could prompt members to vote down the whole thing.

Two birds, two stones: Enzi pretty much shot down an idea from some conservatives, including Mulvaney, that Congress could raise the debt ceiling as part of reconciliation. While that would allow a GOP-only majority to lift the borrowing limit, Enzi said it would "probably not" happen because he doesn't think it fits with the rules. "Who has to save the money?" he said.

Weighing a 20-year tax window: The Senate Budget Committee has been asked to consider doubling its budget timeframe for tax reform from 10 years to 20 to help make the math work for a deficit-neutral bill, Enzi said. (The idea was first raised by Sen. Pat Toomey.) But the chairman isn't making any promises. "There's a lot of requests for budget neutrality," he said. "We'll certainly look at it. It's a difficult thing to reach."

OBAMACARE

THE SCORE THAT SETS THE STAGE: When it rains, it pours, in our world. Don't make any plans for the week of May 22, which has now been penciled in for both the release of the CBO score on the House-passed Obamacare repeal bill and the Trump administration's budget rollout.

Ready, set, wait: It's unusual, indeed, for a CBO release date to be forecast like this. But this score is extra special since senators' hands are tied until the budget office says how much money the House bill would save, setting the floor for savings in any reconciliation-ripe Senate version.

FRELINGHUYSEN'S TENSE TELE-TOWN HALL: In his back-home call-in this week, House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen told constituents he has "actually read" the health care bill and that it specifically stipulates that insurance companies aren't allowed to limit access for people with pre-existing conditions. But then came the yacht metaphors. "It's cost-prohibitive," one caller said. "I'm able to buy a yacht. It's there. But I cannot afford a yacht." Another caller asked "at what cost" coverage would be available. But Frelinghuysen didn't address the question of cost, and the caller appeared to be cut off while trying to ask a follow-up question, POLITICO New Jersey's Katie Jennings reports.

SAFETY NET

SNAP OUT OF IT: The GOP's plans for SNAP don't seem to jibe with popular opinion about the program that helps more than 40 million Americans buy groceries, Helena Bottemiller Evich explains today. Many Republicans want more work requirements for able-bodied adults, purchase limitations and overall program reductions. But a recent survey of more than 7,400 likely voters suggests Americans actually favor expanding the program. The numbers:

— 88 percent of respondents said they support raising the benefits for individuals after being told that a recipient living alone earning an average of $542 per month gets about $140 in SNAP benefits.

— 78 percent said they support raising benefits after being told a single mother with one child earning $760 per month gets about $253 in SNAP benefits.

— 76 percent said candy purchases shouldn't be permitted under SNAP.

— 73 percent said sweetened soda shouldn't be allowed.

Price tag: SNAP funding makes up about three-quarters of the farm bill. Taxpayers paid $74 billion for the program in 2015.

TAX

PORTMAN'S ELABORATE PLAN: Portman expects to "have something to show" on corporate tax reform by next month "or early summer." And David Rogers has all the details on what the senator has been working toward in months of behind-the-scenes discussions between the Senate Finance and Joint Taxation committees:

Step 1: Portman begins by ditching the "current law" budget baseline customarily used to score tax bills and substituting it with one that reflects "current policy." That's a looser standard since it assumes that expiring tax breaks over the next 10 years will simply be extended. By doing so, Portman gains $420 billion to $460 billion beyond what was available to former House Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp when he wrote a major tax reform bill in 2014 that never got off the ground.

Step 2: This windfall would then be reinvested in precisely the sort of business tax breaks that will yield higher economic growth scores from the Joint Tax panel. By doing so, Portman hopes to at least double their value, giving him $1 trillion-plus in money to smooth the edges of the Camp bill.

Step 3: Depending on the scores he gets back from Joint Tax, Portman would like to lower the corporate rate below the 25 percent target set by Camp. But he still anticipates a five-year phase-in to hold down costs.

TREASURY

WINDING DOWN THE BAILOUT: U.S. taxpayers have now earned $30 billion more than they paid to rescue banks during the financial crisis, as the Treasury Department sells off its largest remaining bailout investment for $231.9 million. What's left? Victoria Guida reports that Treasury still owns stakes in eight of the 707 banks that received TARP funding, which represent outstanding investments of $66.2 million.

INFRASTRUCTURE

CROWDED OUT: Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune says "it's going to be heard" to fit in passage of a major infrastructure investment package this year, Brianna Gurciullo reports. "We've gotta do the budget to do tax reform and finish health care first," he said. "And now the administration is saying they want to do infrastructure outside of tax reform. So it could, yeah, it could be something that gets pushed."

FLOOD INSURANCE

WHAT THE HOUSE GOP WANTS: The House Financial Services Committee is getting ready to release its lengthy wish list for reupping the National Flood Insurance Program, which is now about $23 billion in debt. Just ahead of next week's big hearing, Pro's Zachary Warmbrodt offers a sneak peak with this draft summary.

Tighter rules for highest-risk areas: 1. GOP lawmakers want to phase out coverage after four years for new buildings in the riskiest areas, as well as buildings with replacement costs of more than $1 million. 2. Coverage would also lapse for properties with payouts totaling more than twice their replacement value.

The rest: Lawmakers would also make it easier for a person's private flood insurance policy to satisfy mortgage requirements. The House bill would also put a 15 percent cap on annual rate increases, down from 18 percent.

DEFENSE

IRONY OF AN AFGHAN SURGE: President Donald Trump's top military advisers are readying a proposal to send as many as 5,000 more troops to Afghanistan. And if the commander in chief gives his signoff, the U.S. would be escalating a conflict Trump himself has long criticized, Bryan Bender and Eliana Johnson explain. By some estimates, the conflict has cost U.S. taxpayers more than $1 trillion. The United States currently has 8,400 troops there. And even with an additional 5,000, the U.S. military presence would pale in comparison to the nearly 100,000 American troops deployed in 2010 and 2011. It would also be just a fraction of the 30,000 additional troops former President Barack Obama authorized soon after he took office in 2009 in his own version of an Afghan surge.

CBO score of Obamacare repeal bill expected week of May 22 Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 05/10/2017 10:47 AM EDT

A Congressional Budget Office analysis of the House-passed Obamacare repeal bill is expected early in the week of May 22, according to Hill sources.

The Senate parliamentarian can't review the legislation and the GOP cannot really start writing its bill in the upper chamber until the CBO scoring is complete. That's because the Senate version has to save at least as much money as the House bill — otherwise the measure would violate the budget resolution and the GOP repeal effort would come to a swift end.

The CBO analysis would include revised projections of coverage losses over a decade.

The House's decision to vote on its repeal plan without the CBO score has come back to sting some members. Rep. Rod Blum (R-Iowa) faced questions about the decision during a heated town hall meeting with constituents in Dubuque, Iowa, conceding the process was rushed.

A CBO score of an earlier House repeal plan found it would leave 24 million more Americans uninsured over a decade. The forthcoming score would reflect an amendment by Rep. Tom MacArthur (R-N.J.) that was added before the House vote and would allow states to opt out of certain fundamental Obamacare provisions if they meet criteria such as lowering insurance premiums.

4 deal-breakers that could blow up a Senate repeal bill Back

By Adam Cancryn | 05/09/2017 06:56 PM EDT

The Senate's fresh attempt to dismantle Obamacare is already running into its first roadblock — the growing list of demands from GOP lawmakers eager to leave their own mark on the legislation.

Just days into the chamber's health care debate, centrists and self-styled mavericks are testing the party's razor-thin margin for victory and setting the stage for a series of high-profile negotiations. Those stare downs are likely to shape big parts of the legislation, since GOP leaders can only absorb two defections if Democrats and the chamber's two independents stand unified in opposition.

Here are the four potential deal breakers that could sink the GOP's Obamacare repeal bid by siphoning support from the political center:

Deep cuts to Medicaid

Who opposes it: Rob Portman, Lisa Murkowski, Shelley Moore Capito, John McCain

The House plan to drastically restructure Medicaid was a big winner for budget-obsessed Republicans intent on shrinking the health entitlement, but it's a pipe dream in the Senate.

The House-passed bill would do more than just roll back Obamacare's Medicaid expansion. It would cut more than $800 billion over 10 years from a program that covers nearly 1 in 5 poor Americans and cap its federal funding for the first time.

Already, as many as a dozen Senate Republicans have expressed reservations about slashing that much money from the nation's safety net. Some are also hesitant to sign off on an abrupt end to the Medicaid expansion, especially in states that have benefited significantly from the broader coverage.

"I continue to have concerns that this bill does not do enough to protect Ohio's Medicaid expansion population," Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio) said after the House passed its repeal bill.

Sens. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, Cory Gardner of Colorado and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska have also worried publicly about Medicaid's future, and John McCain told reporters this week the House's approach wouldn't work for him. Altogether, 20 Senate Republicans represent states that expanded Medicaid under Obamacare.

Since the GOP can only afford to lose two votes, Republican leaders are under pressure to embrace a more gradual phase-out of the expansion and far shallower cuts — or maybe even no cuts at all to Medicaid funding.

Fewer protections for people with pre-existing conditions

Who opposes it: Bill Cassidy, Susan Collins

The firestorm that put House Republicans on the defensive is already spreading to the Senate, where lawmakers are facing questions about how they'll take care of America's sickest patients. The response from outspoken Republicans like Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.) has been clear: He won't vote for a bill that could leave people with pre-existing conditions unable to afford health insurance.

"The worst possible argument that can be made is that coverage is not important," he said Monday, referencing President Donald Trump's vow to take care of everyone with a pre-existing condition. "We have to fulfill that contract that President Trump made."

But keeping that pledge while still tearing down Obamacare could be tricky. The law's most protective provisions — including requirements that insurers provide minimum benefits and cover everyone who applies — are among the pillars that Republicans have hammered for making coverage too expensive for healthier people. That could put GOP lawmakers in the uncomfortable position of deciding how far to go to protect the nation's most vulnerable — and how much more sick Americans should have to pay for the privilege.

Defunding Planned Parenthood

Who opposes it: Susan Collins, Lisa Murkowski

One of the GOP's longest-standing health care goals is also its most straightforward: cut off federal funding to Planned Parenthood over its abortion services.

But accomplishing that has not been easy, thanks in large part to the staunch opposition of Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Murkowski. The pair played an important role thwarting Republicans leaders' bid to eliminate the funding as part of last week's government spending bill, and they're sure to block a similar attempt in any Obamacare repeal legislation.

"It's not the only issue in this huge bill, but I certainly think that it's not fair and it is a mistake to defund Planned Parenthood," Collins said on ABC's "This Week."

The GOP could still plow ahead without their support, relying on Vice President Mike Pence to deliver a tie-breaking vote that pushes a repeal bill through the Senate. But that would mean keeping every other Republican senator on board, from moderates like Portman to conservatives like Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

Paul is already on record fretting that the current bill might not be radical enough, and is a prime candidate to balk if the Senate tries to bend the legislation toward the political center. On the other end of the spectrum, vulnerable centrist Republicans like Dean Heller (R-Nev.) are likely to feel the heat from women's health supporters to join Collins and Murkowski in standing against Planned Parenthood defunding.

The 'Age Tax'

Who opposes it: Susan Collins, John Thune

Even before Republicans opened the door to letting insurers go back to discriminating against those with pre-existing conditions, the repeal effort threatened to make losers out of one of the nation's neediest groups — poor Americans just shy of the Medicare eligibility age. The House legislation sharply reduces the tax credits meant to subsidize coverage for those in the individual market, capping them at $4,000 and awarding them based on age.

That change — combined with another provision allowing insurers to charge older Americans five times more than younger ones — would make premiums surge for people in that age cohort, potentially pricing out the market's sickest and poorest people.

The Senate isn't going to let that stand. John Thune (R-S.D.) is already working on beefing up the tax credits for lower-income Americans, and several senators have hinted at awarding subsidies based on financial need instead of age. Collins, meanwhile, has piled another recommendation on top of that, arguing that the tax credits should be adjusted for geographic-based cost variations as well — an approach that mirrors Obamacare's current subsidy system.

If the credits don't factor in geography, "that really hurts a state like Maine, where we have an older population living in largely more expensive rural areas," she said.

'This is how we're going to kill your wife' Back

By Kyle Cheney | 05/10/2017 10:51 AM EDT

MONETA, Va. — "This is how we're going to kill your wife."

That's the message Rep. Tom Garrett (R-Va.) said he received in a series of recent threats that targeted him, his family and even, at one point, his dog. And it's the reason, he said, that his town hall here in this sleepy Virginia community on Tuesday night was ringed by law enforcement.

When Garrett took the stage at Eastlake Community Church, the walls in the 300-seat room were lined with security — some uniformed and some in plainclothes. The presence was noticeable all night, as Garrett aides enforced rules to keep audience members from disrupting the event.

Though the town hall proceeded without significant incident -- one woman was removed by police for repeated disruptions -- security personnel made their presence felt, approaching hecklers throughout the evening and standing watch at all entrances and exits. The high security presence, Garrett said later, was the result of threats that Capitol Police, state police and intelligence officials "have deemed to be credible and real."

"It's nuts," Garrett said.

The freshman congressman, a member of the conservative House Freedom Caucus, said the threats have become so disturbing that he and his chief of staff engaged in some gallows humor over it.

"He read one of the more recent correspondences and called me the next day and goes, 'Dude, I'm glad you're alive,'" Garrett recalled.

"I served in the military. I reconciled myself with the reality that one day I'm not going to be here," Garrett continued.

"I don't want to die anytime soon. I got stuff left to do, I hope. But when you pull wives and children in, that's not cool."

Garrett's remarks are a window into an increasingly tense environment facing lawmakers as they head home to angry constituents whipped into a frenzy over the latest debate in Washington about repealing and replacing Obamacare. Lawmakers expressed concerns to GOP leadership in February, after a particularly angry round of town halls.

At the time, Rep. David Reichert (R-Wash.), a former sheriff, suggested lawmakers have a physical exit strategy at town halls should protests get out of hand. He urged that local police be on hand during town halls, and that lawmakers step up security at their local offices, from installing heavy doors and deadbolts to setting up intercoms to screen visitors.

Garrett said he'd rather be overly cautious than complacent.

"Here's the fear that I have and I said this to some of the police officers here -- that we have 40 police officers here and we do this 10 times and nothing ever happens, and we go 'oh no problem,'" he said. "And then there's five and then something does happen."

It's unclear whether the threats Garrett described were connected to his last-minute support for the American Health Care Act, the GOP plan to replace Obamacare that has stoked intense anger at town halls across the country. But he said he takes no issues with protesters who vehemently reject his position on the health care bill.

"I don't have any problem with anybody who reaches a different policy conclusion based on the information they amalgamate and process," he said. "That dissent is American — praise God, we need that. That's what made us who we are."

"But when it's, 'I'm going to kill you this way. Then, 'I'm going to kill your wife. This is what I'm going to do to your daughters' ... Then you get a circumstance where there's an awful lot of security."

Poll: Support for GOP health bill declines Back

By Steven Shepard | 05/10/2017 07:07 AM EDT

The popularity of the Republican health care bill declined over the past week even as its chances of becoming law improved after its passage by the House, underscoring the political peril President Donald Trump and the GOP face in their efforts to repeal and replace Obamacare.

Voters have low expectations — few believe the bill, if enacted, will make the U.S. health care system better, increase the number of Americans with health coverage, improve the quality of their own care or decrease the costs for them and their family.

And as the Senate prepares to take up the legislation, the POLITICO/Morning Consult also shows declines in voters' views of Trump's job performance and his party's standing in next year's congressional elections.

Only 38 percent of voters approve of the GOP-drafted health care bill, the new poll shows — down from 42 percent last week, prior to the House's party-line vote to advance the measure. Forty-four percent of voters disapprove of the bill, up significantly from 37 percent last month. Eighteen percent of voters say they don't know or have no opinion of the bill.

In fact, voters have a more positive opinion of the law the new legislation seeks to supplant: Half of voters now approve of the 2010 Affordable Care Act, while 42 percent disapprove.

Opposition to the Republican bill is more forceful than support for the measure — a gap driven by greater relative intensity among Democrats than Republicans.

"These latest polling numbers on the American Health Care Act could spell trouble for Republicans," said Kyle Dropp, Morning Consult's chief research officer and co-founder. "There is a notable enthusiasm gap: 29 percent strongly oppose the bill, but only 13 percent strongly support it. Moreover, we saw the number of Republican voters who strongly support the bill drop from 36 percent last week to 27 percent this week."

The poll was conducted May 4-6 — with interviews beginning following the House's 217-214 vote to advance the bill. All interviews were completed on Sunday, well before the announcement late Tuesday that Trump had fired FBI Director James Comey.

On health care, 45 percent of voters say they trust Democrats in Congress to handle the issue — greater than the 36 percent who trust Republicans more. Last week, Democrats held a 5-point lead on that question, 42 percent to 37 percent.

Voters also have little hope the new bill — if it becomes law — will improve the U.S. health care system or their own health care, the poll shows. Fewer believe the bill will make the health care system better (26 percent) than believe it will make it worse (41 percent). Only a quarter think it will make the quality of care better, while 36 percent think it will make it worse. Just 19 percent think the bill would increase the number of Americans with health insurance — far fewer than the 46 percent who think fewer Americans would have insurance.

A 42-percent plurality think the bill will increase health care costs for their family, compared to only 18 percent who believe it will decrease costs and 15 percent who don't think it will have an impact on their health care costs. A quarter of voters aren't sure how the bill would impact their health care costs.

While Trump and House Republicans celebrated passage of the health care bill in the White House Rose Garden last week, the POLITICO/Morning Consult bill suggests their efforts have weakened their political standing.

Trump's approval rating slid from 48 percent last week to 44 percent in the new survey. The percentage of voters who disapprove of the job Trump is doing as president ticked up from 46 percent last week to 49 percent in this week's poll.

Republicans remain supportive of Trump: 84 percent approve of the job he is doing, the poll shows. While that exceeds Trump's 80-percent disapproval rating among Democrats, Trump's rating among independents — 38 percent approve and 50 percent disapprove — tilts negative.

Trump's approval rating is net-negative for the first time since late March and early April, in the wake of the House's failure to advance an earlier version of the health care bill.

"We've seen Trump's approval dip this much only once before — right after the House failed to pass the first version of the AHCA," said Dropp, referencing a 10-point swing in Trump's net approval rating in late March.

There are other red flags for Republicans: Democrats have a 6-point lead on the 2018 generic congressional ballot, 42 percent to 36 percent. In last week's survey, the two parties were tied at 41 percent.

Only 24 percent of voters say they would be more likely to vote to reelect a member of Congress who voted for the bill — fewer than the 37 percent who say it would make them less likely to vote to reelect their member. Nineteen percent say it wouldn't change their mind either way, and another 19 percent say they don't know.

A 44-percent plurality of Republicans say they would be more likely to vote for a member who supported the bill. Among Democrats, a greater percentage, 61 percent, would be less likely to vote for a member who voted for the bill. And more independents, 34 percent, would be less likely to vote for a member who backed the legislation than would be more likely, 18 percent.

The poll surveyed 1,996 registered voters and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2 percentage points.

GOP pins health care hopes on an unlikely figure: Ted Cruz Back

By Burgess Everett | 05/09/2017 07:04 PM EDT

After four years of taunting and torturing fellow Republicans, Ted Cruz is shedding his just-say-no persona in the Senate for a new identity: Team player. And this is no idle tryout.

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell — a man Cruz once derided as a liar and an ally of Democrats — is counting on the Texan to help navigate an Obamacare repeal bill through the Senate with virtually no margin for error. As a trusted voice of the conservative wing of the GOP and conduit to the House Freedom Caucus, Cruz is fast emerging as a pivotal player in the Republican bid to do away with the landmark Democratic health care law.

It's a stunning transformation for a senator who was widely blamed for causing the 2013 government shutdown in an attempt to defund Obamacare. But after receiving so much blowback for that and many other episodes, there's nary a Cruz critic in the Senate Republican Conference nowadays.

"He's trying to get a result. And as smart as he is, he can be a real force in making that happen," said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who chairs a key Senate health care committee and is close to McConnell. "If we're able to come to a result in the Republican caucus, I'll be glad to give him a lot of the credit."

Cruz's work on health care has been uncharacteristically low profile so far. It began with a private dinner in mid-February at the upscale D.C. steakhouse Capital Grille with the more compromise-minded Alexander, who once chided Cruz for calling McConnell a liar on the Senate floor by noting that one thing "you learn in Kindergarten is to respect one another."

Alexander and Cruz agreed to assemble a group of GOP senators to prepare for the eventuality that the House would send them a health care bill riddled with flaws that could not pass the Senate as written.

McConnell formalized the group by adding chairmen and members of leadership. The group lacks any true moderates and suggests that McConnell believes the path to passage is through the conservative wing of his caucus.

The exclusion of the likes of Sens. Bill Cassidy (R-La.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) has privately irked some senators because of their months of work on an alternative plan and Collins' role chairing the Senate Aging Committee. And the 13-senator working group initially contained no women, an oversight that prompted a cascade of criticism from Democrats and liberal pundits.

But when it comes to passing a new health care law, Republicans believe the inclusion of Cruz and his close ally, Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah), could pay critical dividends by building support among conservative groups and the House Freedom Caucus. The gap between more centrist Senate Republicans and more conservative House GOP members is seen as one of the biggest obstacles to writing a new law.

"One of the challenges when the Obamacare bill was in the House, was that early on was that the different parts of the party were not talking to each other," Cruz said in an interview in his office. "We wanted to ensure that the process from the outset was collaborative and inclusive."

Collaborative and inclusive are not typically words associated with Cruz. Is he evolving into a more pragmatic brand of conservative?

In a word, yes. Now that President Barack Obama is out of office, Cruz said his mission in the Senate is no longer to be the "loyal opposition."

"Different circumstances call for different approaches," said Cruz, who is gearing up to run for a second term next year in a closely watched race. "Now our job is to deliver on the promises. And that's a markedly different role than trying to prevent harmful policies from an imperial president."

Cruz's leading role has shocked some of his colleagues. Many Republicans never could have imagined the bomb-throwing senator organizing and implementing a relatively ideologically diverse working group aimed at passing a bill, not stopping one.

"It was an ingenious stroke," said Sen. David Perdue (R-Ga.) said of the appointment.

The group that Cruz helped develop is, in some ways, a substitute for the traditional committee process. Republicans don't believe they can push an Obamacare repeal bill through the committees, particularly the health panel chaired by Alexander. Rather than take the chance that repeal gets tied up in a Senate committee, leaders prefer to work out the party's issues within a broad working group and then go directly to the floor.

"We have skin in the game," Cruz said. "The players across the board in the Senate want to get to yes. We recognize that we have an historic opportunity."

Still, there's concern among some more centrist senators that the end-product could appeal too much to Cruz and not enough to the dozen or so Republican senators who have grave concerns about slashing Medicaid and removing protections for preexisting conditions. The group does include more centrist Republicans like Rob Portman of Ohio, but the overall makeup is still an issue.

"That is a reasonable question to ask given the composition overall of the group," Collins said.

GOP leaders say there is no degree of exclusivity to the working group because it will report regularly to the entire caucus. But its makeup raises questions about who McConnell is willing to lose on the health care vote. Clearly he believes Lee and Cruz are crucial; but some GOP sources said there are deep doubts among senators that Collins or Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) will ever vote for anything the Senate GOP comes up with.

Collins and Paul insist they are in play.

"I've told them there is a compromise: I am for 100 percent repeal of Obamacare. But I will compromise on the percentage of repeal," Paul said. "80 percent repeal, I'd vote for that. But I'm not willing to vote to replace Obamacare with a new federal program."

Though GOP leaders believe by getting Cruz involved they are minimizing the possibility that Cruz will later demolish their repeal efforts, the Texas firebrand isn't on the same page about everything.

The Senate's repeal effort is subject to strict budgetary restraints that will disallow, in the view of most senators, attempts to make it a true repeal of Obamacare. Cruz wants to go as big as possible, and if Senate rules prohibit his idea, he believes Vice President Mike Pence should simply overrule the parliamentarian.

"The parliamentarian merely advises, the vice president decides," Cruz said. "Mike Pence is the ultimate decider."

That opinion is not popular among Republicans, according to senators and aides. They believe it would be tantamount to killing the filibuster's 60-vote threshold.

But on almost every other front, Republicans say, Cruz is being highly productive.

"He is playing well with others," Alexander said. "Presidential races ... are transforming events."

The SNAP divide: Congress and voters far apart on restrictions, benefit levels Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 05/10/2017 05:01 AM EDT

On the eve of the next farm bill cycle, the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program faces a rocky, uncertain political landscape as the right eyes potential reforms amid the Republican push to cut government spending.

But SNAP reform's unpredictable nature isn't solely a product of U.S. politics being mired in one of the country's most polarized periods — as a groundbreaking new survey highlighted recently. The survey of more than 7,400 likely voters, released by the University of Maryland late last month, suggests that Americans on both sides of the aisle broadly agree that SNAP regulations should induce recipients to make healthier choices, whether by banning soda or discounting fruits and vegetables. It also found strong bipartisan support for raising SNAP benefits.

"This survey shows that the American public supports two things about SNAP: having an adequate safety net so people don't go hungry, and, at the same time, making the program even healthier," said Parke Wilde, an economist at Tufts University's Friedman School, who writes the popular blog U.S. Food Policy.

There's just one catch: Congress isn't exactly on the same page.

SNAP — which helps more than 40 million Americans buy groceries, and makes up about three-quarters of the cost of the farm bill — has long been a big target on Capitol Hill for cuts and other reforms, but the pressure has ratcheted up in recent years as the Republican party has moved farther to the right at the same time the SNAP rolls have dramatically increased, largely in response to the Great Recession.

In 2007, some 37 million people received SNAP benefits. By 2013, that total had risen to 51 million, and it is only now starting to come down, though one in seven Americans still receives benefits. In 2015, the program cost taxpayers $74 billion.

Many Republicans would like to see SNAP reined in during the 2018 farm bill reauthorization, whether it be through more work requirements for able-bodied adults, limiting purchases, or by slimming down the program altogether. The House Agriculture Committee held no fewer than 16 hearings on SNAP between 2015 and 2016 and conducted a "top-to-bottom" review, but reached relatively mild conclusions. The committee highlighted SNAP as a crucial safety net program while hinting at the need to strengthen work requirements and bolster healthy-eating incentives.

House Agriculture Chairman Mike Conaway has suggested he's more interested in more moderate reforms and that block grants or drug testing mandates, while not off the table, are not his priority.

The politics in the broader House GOP caucus is where the wild cards are lurking. Though the program generally has bipartisan support, House Speaker Paul Ryan has long eyed block-granting SNAP as part of his broader plan to consolidate anti-poverty programs, while hardline members want dramatic cuts, one way or another.

On the other side, anti-hunger groups and a handful of Democrats — including Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.), perhaps the most vocal lawmaker on SNAP policy — have repeatedly called on Congress to increase benefits. But there is not likely to be any Republican appetite for doing so, as the majority party on the Hill focuses on cost-cutting while agricultural groups lobby for the farm bill to provide more support for farm programs, like stronger insurance programs for dairy and cotton.

And while anti-hunger advocates will no doubt use the survey's results to advocate for raising SNAP benefits, the findings on SNAP restrictions are much thornier for Democrats — but also present a challenge for Republicans, since lawmakers on both sides of the House Agriculture Committee have expressed opposition to the idea.

There's much more room for bipartisan agreement on experimenting with SNAP healthy-eating incentives — and the public seems to agree on this point. A full 88 percent of respondents indicated they favor discounting fruits and vegetables in SNAP, including 81 percent of Republicans and 93 percent of Democrats.

"I was just amazed at the level of consensus for the discounts on fruits and vegetables," said Steven Kull, director of Maryland's Program for Public Consultation, which conducted the study. "It's pretty robust."

What the public thinks about SNAP

The survey was notable for its breadth. It was fielded by Nielsen-Scarborough and Communications for Research, Inc., between November and January, and polled a diverse cross-section of likely voters across eight states on an unusually broad range of SNAP policy questions — from whether the savings limit should be raised for eligible recipients to whether ice cream should be allowed.

The survey — part of a larger polling project on anti-poverty programs that will be released in coming months — found broad, bipartisan support for increasing SNAP benefits, something that is politically infeasible on Capitol Hill. Eighty-one percent of respondents, including 66 percent of Republicans and 93 percent of Democrats, said they support raising the benefits for individuals after being told that a recipient living alone earning an average of $542 per month gets about $140 in SNAP benefits.

Slightly less — 78 percent — said they support raising benefits after being told a single mother with one child earning $760 per month gets about $253 in SNAP benefits.

Before answering questions about the program, respondents went through a brief "policymaking simulation," which presented them with pro and con arguments for each question — language that advocates and congressional staffers on all sides of the issue helped craft.

The argument for raising benefits did about 20 points better when respondents were asked which arguments they found convincing. The pro-side argued the current benefit of $140 is "simply not enough" and that people want to work but often can't find jobs. "Food is a basic human need and it is simply wrong to keep people on the edge of hunger with benefits so low," the argument stated.

On the flip side, the argument against raising benefits noted that SNAP costs taxpayers $74 billion each year. "We should not increase it," the argument said. "The economy is better now and there are more jobs out there. We need to encourage people to get out there and try harder in this improving labor market. We shouldn't make it easier for them not to make the effort."

The findings, similar to the results of a 2013 poll, suggest there's likely to be extensive public support for states that seek to ban sugary drinks or candy from SNAP at the state level, as Maine is trying to do.

Overall, 76 percent of respondents said candy purchases should not be permitted under SNAP, including 85 percent of Republicans and 68 percent of Democrats. Support was slightly lower for restrictions on "sweetened soda," with 73 percent of respondents indicating it should get bounced from the program. Republicans took a harder line against sugary drinks, with 82 percent saying it should be out of the program, compared with 67 percent of Democrats.

Last year Maine Gov. Paul LePage, a Republican, requested a waiver to bar state SNAP recipients from buying sugary drinks and candy, but was rebuffed by the Obama administration. "It's time for the federal government to wake up and smell the energy drinks," LePage wrote to then-USDA Secretary Tom Vilsack afterward, threatening to withdraw from the program.

"The Obama administration goes to great lengths to police the menus of K-12 cafeterias but looks the other way as billions of taxpayer dollars finance a steady diet of Mars bars and Mountain Dew," LePage added.

One of the biggest questions surrounding SNAP is whether President Donald Trump has a nose for energy drinks, as it were. The LePage administration is pressing the Trump administration to green-light its proposal, citing how Maine is New England's most obese state.

Last week Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue told the Associated Press he's already met with LePage, but wouldn't say how he would come down on the waiver request. Perdue did say the governor "has some very creative programs that we're exploring." Similar efforts to limit SNAP purchases have bubbled up in Tennessee, Alabama and several other states.

State restriction efforts are mostly Republican-led, but the issue spans the political spectrum, since public health groups, which generally lean left, have become increasingly vocal about the need to remove sugary drinks from the program. Earlier this year, the American Heart Association became the first major health group to call for a pilot program to test removing sugary drinks from SNAP, combined with adding incentives for fruit and vegetable purchases.

The slippery slope of restrictions

Support for purchasing restrictions starts to drop off somewhat when people are asked about whether SNAP recipients should be able to buy cookies, cakes and donuts (59 percent said no) as well as ice cream (43 percent) and chips and snack crackers (40 percent).

Craig Gunderson, professor of food and ag economics at the University of Illinois, sees this as a slippery slope. "Why stop with sugar sweetened beverages and candy?" he asked, somewhat incredulously, adding: "Other people could say, 'Look, it's bad to have orange juice, since it's heavy in sugar.'"

Gunderson said he also sees GOP support for restrictions as a thinly-veiled attempt to take pot shots at low-income people. "There's a group of Republicans who want to stigmatize poor people," he said, arguing that party leaders also know such restrictions could lead to fewer people participating in the program.

The survey, however, found that voters saw the argument for SNAP restrictions as much more compelling than the argument against such limits. The argument for including language like: "We should not encourage people to waste money on food that can damage their health. The rise in obesity and diabetes from eating fatty and sugary foods is a serious strain on America's healthcare system."

On the other side, respondents were presented with a statement that read, in part: "Just because people are poor does not mean the federal government should tell them what to eat. Individuals can make their own decisions about nutrition. Furthermore, administering such rules could be expensive." The statement also argues that Congress would have to battle "armies of food-industry lobbyists," who would try to keep their products in the program.

In all, 82 percent of respondents found the argument for SNAP restrictions very or somewhat convincing, while 42 percent believed the opposing argument convincing. Diving in deeper, 52 percent found the pro argument very convincing and just 19 percent found the anti-argument very convincing.

"That's an unusually low number," said Kull, of the University of Maryland. He said the numbers were surprising to him because, in these types of surveys, a majority of respondents usually find pro and con arguments convincing.

Of course, food industry leaders and anti-hunger groups do find the arguments against restricting SNAP purchases quite convincing. They argue that banning certain foods will increase stigma surrounding them, reduce participation and turn cashiers into food police. They also note that drawing lines around what's healthy and what's not — even sugary drinks, which may seem like a simple category — would be extremely complicated: Would Capri Sun be forbidden alongside Mountain Dew? What about Sunny Delight versus orange juice?

"Transforming SNAP from an efficient government assistance program to one that requires more regulation and more bureaucracy to run with no clear nutrition benefit is not in the best interest of SNAP participants, businesses or taxpayers," said Chris Gindlesperger, spokesman for the National Confectioners Association.

Gunderson also expressed disdain for the idea that SNAP purchases should be further limited (recipients already can't buy alcohol, hot prepared foods and household supplies) and questioned the survey's findings. "Most Americans really have no idea regarding this issue, in terms of the potential consequences," he said. "It'll drive up food prices because this is a major administrative burden."

"If this were to be implemented, it's patronizing toward low-income households in a way that we'd never do to others," he added. "It would lead to increases in hunger."

The GOP's responsible taxman Back

By David Rogers | 05/09/2017 03:35 PM EDT

As a former White House budget director, Sen. Rob Portman still cares about deficits. But as a pro-trade Ohio Republican, he's every bit as anxious to enact long-sought corporate tax reforms to spur industrial investment back home and lift worker wages.

Where to draw the line is the big question. And amid all the crosscurrents among Republicans these days on rewriting the tax code, Portman best captures the search for a path that gives tax writers flexibility without abandoning all deficit discipline.

Toward this end, Portman has worked for months behind the scenes with staff from the Senate Finance and Joint Taxation committees. He hopes to have something to show by June or early summer but cautions that his goal even then is to outline the potential for consensus — not to exclude competing options.

"We're not trying to do our own thing," he said in an interview. "It's not a Portman effort and I don't want it to be, because I want it to get done. I don't want it to be: 'Here's my great idea, everyone needs to come on board.' What I'm trying to do is build consensus on it."

From a deficit standpoint, the end product will surely be less strict than the baseline used by Congress in enacting the landmark 1986 tax reforms under President Ronald Reagan. But if that breaks the logjam in Congress, it's a risk worth taking, Portman argues. Moreover, the revised standards could yet become a bulwark against the potentially budget-busting tax cuts put forward by the Trump administration.

"They are creating this very pro-growth proposal which gets people excited," Portman said of the White House and Treasury. "Then we have to come in and backfill as I see it, and how you get as close to that as possible."

He added, "There's a way to take what I would consider to be a more traditional pro-growth approach which some would think sounds less exciting but it's about what's doable. That would be lowering the rates and broadening the base. You do have to slim down some of the existing preferences in the code and get the rate down. I believe it can be done in a neutral basis."

Portman begins by ditching the "current law" budget baseline customarily used to score tax bills and substituting it with one that reflects "current policy."

That's a looser standard since it assumes that expiring tax breaks over the next 10 years will simply be extended. By doing so, Portman gains $420 billion to $460 billion beyond what was available to former House Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp (R-Mich.) when he wrote a major tax reform bill in 2014 that never got off the ground.

Portman's next step is to reinvest this windfall in precisely the sort of business tax breaks that will yield higher economic growth scores from the Joint Tax panel. By doing so, he hopes to at least double their value, giving him $1 trillion-plus in money to smooth the edges of the Camp bill.

Likely targets are Camp's base broadening provisions that affected the amortization of research and development expenses, LIFO accounting methods for business inventory, and taxes affecting the insurance industry.

Portman, like most Republicans, is eager to deploy "dynamic scoring," in which potential economic growth is factored into official analyses of legislation, which can offset the cost of a proposal.

Depending on the scores he gets back from Joint Tax, Portman would like to lower the corporate rate below the 25 percent target set by Camp. But he still anticipates a five year phase-in to hold down costs. And in his comments, Portman shies away from the ambitious capital gains tax cuts and business write-offs championed by Camp's successors on the Ways and Means panel.

It's a two-step process — adopting a current policy baseline and making fuller use of dynamic scoring — which "provides more breathing room for tax reform," Portman said. But having drawn this line, he would go no further.

"I don't think we have to, to do pro- growth reform," he said, adding, "I do think the deficits are a serious issue."

That's very different from the White House which is pitching a proposal with massive tax cuts — including a 15 percent corporate tax rate. Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has said the administration's plan would "pay for itself" through faster economic growth, a claim scoffed at by many independent analysts.

Yet at the same time, Portman's critics would say his budget piety is so much hokum: that he is rationalizing more than being rational.

Deficit hawks argue that shifting to a current policy baseline only adds to the damage already done by the 2015 tax extenders bill which made permanent many tax breaks without finding revenue offsets to reduce the deficit impact. And when the Joint Tax panel used dynamic scoring on its estimates of the Camp bill, the range of results from different economic models was so wide that critics questioned the whole exercise.

Republicans counter that much more has been learned since then and that some macro-economic score from Joint Tax will surely figure in whatever tax bills emerge from the House and Senate.

Moreover, all of Portman's spadework, together with younger colleagues on Finance, is being done with the full knowledge of Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). And as a practical matter, Hatch stands to be helped by Portman's budget-writing credentials if the chairman is to convince the Senate to give his tax writers more leeway.

Indeed, after years of being cast as a policy wonk on the periphery, Portman has the opportunity now to make his presence felt in the Senate. He is secure in a second term, having handily won re-election by defeating a former Democratic governor and running well ahead of Donald Trump in Ohio. And beginning with his tax-writing days in the House, he's shown an appetite for policy and ability to work Democrats.

Next to Trump's brand of populism, Portman suffers from seeming an elite outlier: part of the Ivy League, globalist, corporate brand of Republicans. But the same 61-year-old lawmaker was early to recognize and speak out on the opioid crisis impacting many working class families at home. And Portman insists now that his support of corporate tax reform is more about worker wages than his allies in the board room.

"The conundrum we are in is where you have the economy growing slowly but wages growing even more slowly, and [therefore] a gap," he said. "I'm excited about tax reform because there is an opportunity here to help overcome one of our biggest challenges: not just the growth in the economy being relatively low ... but flat and even declining wages when you take into account inflation."

"This is not about the boardroom," Portman said. "The board room has done fine by the way. Inversions or being taken over by a foreign company doesn't hurt the CEO's. They all have nice golden parachutes or they stay on. It is about workers in my view and our ability to have more investment here rather than somewhere else. Not just by foreign companies but by U.S. companies."

In truth, there is an increased recognition among economists that the burden of corporate taxes falls on labor — not just capital as assumed in the past. The real argument has moved to the next step: how big is labor's share and how much will workers truly gain from the drive now to reduce rates?

Kevin Hassett, Trump's choice to chair the Council of Economic Advisers, is aggressive in arguing that labor will benefit significantly. And Portman takes heart from Hassett's appointment.

Nonetheless, other economists remain more skeptical. Scorekeepers at the Treasury and the Congressional Budget Office confine labor's share to closer to 20 to 25 percent for example, and that throws some cold water on Portman's argument.

But the bigger question mark going forward is how far Portman can go to somehow bridge the 2014 Camp tax reform bill with the newer 2016 House Republican blueprint shaped by Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and the current committee chairman, Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas) — himself a transplant from the Midwest.

At one level, many would argue that the Camp bill is as gone from Congress and the tax debate as the former chairman himself. On the other, there is a residue of respect for the fact that Camp alone put his ideas in legislative language and not simply a few pages of talking points.

"I was not necessarily crazy about the Camp proposal but Camp was a real tax person," said H. David Rosenbloom, director of the International Tax Program at the New York University of Law. "Camp knew what he was doing, and he comes up with a global approach to this, he comes up with a real serious proposal and what happens? [Former Speaker John] Boehner said it is blah, blah, blah. I think the shadow of Camp hangs over anything that happens now."

Ways and Means tax staff are working to translate the Ryan-Brady approach into legislative language as well. The stated goal is get the corporate rate down to 20 percent, a full five points lower than Camp. And the plan would allow companies to deduct the cost of a new machine, for example, in just one year — much faster than the current depreciation schedules.

It's more of a cash-flow approach, and in tandem with this change, the House blueprint proposes a new destination tax of sorts — one that will fall on products coming into the U.S. while favoring those going out. The revenues generated from this "border adjustment tax" or BAT would help pay for the reduced corporate rate. But Brady argues it is even more important from a policy standpoint: to level "the playing field" by taking taxes out of business location decision-making.

This is no small matter because well-intended reforms can also make the U.S. system more vulnerable to base erosion and profit-shifting. The shared goal is to move the U.S. more toward a "territorial" system in which income earned by American companies outside the U.S. is exempt from U.S. taxes. But that can create incentives to shift operations or profits overseas without some backstop being added.

Portman himself seems leery of a BAT, given the political fallout it has triggered as well as major policy concerns raised by tax pros like Rosenbloom. But in line with his consensus building he is careful not to dismiss it outright.

"The BAT is going to have a tough time getting the votes needed in the House and in the Senate," Portman said. "It's not that I don't have a preference, I do. But I am most interested in finally getting something done so I'm not trying to rule out their ideas."

"I'm just trying to figure out what's the consensus idea that meets the principle of making the code more competitive so we stop losing jobs and investment overseas and we can begin to see wage growth. Those would be my big issues."

Treasury reaches milestone, selling off last major TARP investment Back

By Victoria Guida | 05/10/2017 01:14 PM EDT

The Treasury Department is selling off its largest remaining investment in a bank made as part of the massive bailouts during the financial crisis.

Treasury today agreed to sell all 10.3 million shares it had left in First BanCorp for $57.7 million, bringing the total recouped from the government's stake in that bank to $231.9 million.

The Troubled Asset Relief Program, which set aside $700 billion to stabilize the financial industry, remains a toxic cloud over any discussion of financial regulation, with lawmakers — particularly Republicans — decrying any talk of future bailouts.

But taxpayers have earned $30 billion more than they paid for the rescues, Treasury said.

Treasury used $245.1 billion of the available TARP funding and has recouped $275.8 billion on sales of those investments, the department said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The department still owns stakes in eight of the 707 banks that received TARP funding, which represent outstanding investments of $66.2 million, it said.

Thune: 'It's going to be hard' to do an infrastructure package this year Back

By Brianna Gurciullo | 05/10/2017 01:49 PM EDT

Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune said today that lawmakers may not be able to squeeze in an infrastructure package this year with health care, a tax overhaul and other issues dominating their schedules.

Thune, the third-highest ranking Republican in the Senate, told reporters that the House's struggle to pass the American Health Care Act held up other GOP priorities.

"Well, I mean, I think the hiccups that the House had, the speed bumps along the way getting health care over here set us back a little bit," Thune said. Now, Thune said, "from a scheduling standpoint, yeah, it's going to be hard" to fit in infrastructure this year.

"We've gotta do the budget to do tax reform and finish health care first," he said. "And now the administration is saying they want to do infrastructure outside of tax reform, so it could, yeah, it could be something that gets pushed."

Thune added that, in theory, the White House could move up "an infrastructure discussion."

"Or I mean they could decide, if the administration wanted to, to try and wedge a, slot an infrastructure discussion before they take on the tax code," Thune said. "I don't know. That's probably a decision that will be made above my pay grade."

Here's what House Republicans want in their flood insurance bill Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 05/09/2017 06:04 PM EDT

House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling is preparing to move forward with a five-year reauthorization of the National Flood Insurance Program that would phase out coverage for certain structures and eliminate it for properties with excessive claims, according to a draft summary of the GOP bill obtained by POLITICO.

Hensarling is expected to host a meeting with committee members next Tuesday to discuss the legislation, a Republican familiar with the matter said.

The bill, which has been in development since the last session of Congress, would make several changes to the program, including:

- Four years after enactment, it would phase out NFIP coverage for residential structures where the replacement cost of the building exceeded $1 million, subject to the local availability of private sector flood insurance.
- Over the same period, NFIP would be prohibited from selling new coverage to structures being built in today's highest-risk areas.
- FEMA, which administers the program, would not be allowed to make available new or renewed coverage for any property where the aggregate amount in claims payments exceeded twice the amount of the replacement value of the property for flood damage that occurred 18 months after enactment.
- The bill would lower from 18 percent to 15 percent the cap on individual policyholders' annual rate increases.
- It would include the text of Rep. Dennis Ross's bill that would make it easier for homeowners to use private flood insurance to satisfy requirements of government-backed mortgages.
- Compensation for "Write-Your-Own" companies working with the program would be capped at 25 percent in an attempt to improve the NFIP's ability to pay claims from existing revenue.

WHAT'S NEXT: The NFIP expires at the end of September. The Senate Banking Committee has yet to release its own reauthorization bill.

Trump's campaign pledges face collision in Afghanistan Back

By Bryan Bender and Eliana Johnson | 05/09/2017 07:10 PM EDT

President Donald Trump faces a stark choice as his security advisers and military commanders push him to send thousands more troops to Afghanistan — a step that would escalate a conflict he spent years deriding and threaten to violate his "America first" campaign pledge.

It would also be a stark turnaround from Trump's past criticisms of the conflict's casualty toll and enormous expense, including his 2013 complaint on Twitter that the Afghan regime "has zero appreciation. Let's get out!"

Now the top brass is readying a proposal to send as many as 5,000 additional troops to help beat back the resurgent Taliban in a country where the U.S. is still waging its longest war. Trump will be presented the military options in the coming days, according to several administration officials.

Trump has said little about Afghanistan since taking office, aside from hailing the military's decision to drop one of its largest non-nuclear bombs on an Islamic State cave network there last month.

White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Tuesday that Trump wants to hear from his generals on what their overall strategy is — not just how many troops they need.

"One of the things he has asked his national security team to do is to actually think — rethink the strategy," Spicer told reporters. "What are we doing to achieve the goals you are asking about? How do we actually, how do we win, how do we eliminate the threat?"

National security adviser H.R. McMaster and most of Trump's top military advisers — including the top commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. John Nicholson — are advocating the military surge to aid Afghan security forces, which have suffered thousands of casualties since taking the lead in the fight over three years ago. The hope is that a more aggressive U.S. posture, and additional military advisers embedded with Afghan forces, would compel the Taliban back to the negotiating table to resolve the country's political divides.

Trump has already shown an increasing willingness to deploy military force, as in the missile strike he ordered against the Syrian government in retaliation for its alleged use of chemical weapons. But sending thousands more troops into harm's way would be an even graver step into the kinds of foreign entanglements he criticized as a private citizen.

In past years, he expressed special derision for the United States' post-Sept. 11 presence in Afghanistan.

"We have wasted an enormous amount of blood and treasure in Afghanistan," Trump wrote in the 2013 tweet, just one of many such broadsides. In an earlier interview with Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, Trump insisted that "money should be spent in our country, we should rebuild our country. ... Let's get with it, get out of Afghanistan."

Since 2001, when the U.S.-led military coalition invaded and toppled the Taliban from power, 2,396 American soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan. By some estimates, the conflict has cost U.S. taxpayers more than $1 trillion.

In its most recent report on the progress there, the Pentagon concluded that the Taliban "had control or influence over approximately 10 percent of the population and was contesting the Afghan Government for control of at least another 20 percent."

Against that backdrop, Trump faces his first major decision involving large numbers of U.S. troops — one that echoes those put to his predecessors.

The broad outlines of the surge plan are drawing praise from Republican lawmakers who long expressed frustration with what they considered former President Barack Obama's directionless approach to the Afghan conflict.

"President Obama's failure to set a policy or a strategy in Afghanistan squandered many of our hard-fought gains there, and it's been clear for a while we haven't had the forces on the ground to accomplish our mission," said Sen. Tom Cotton of Arkansas, a leading Republican hawk and Iraq War veteran. "A troop increase will help stop the Islamic State from growing its footprint in Afghanistan and prevent the Taliban from once again establishing safe havens for terrorists."

At the center of the debate is McMaster, a three-star Army general who is one of the intellectual architects of the counterinsurgency strategy employed in Afghanistan and Iraq.

He is a leading practitioner of counterinsurgency strategy, a troop-heavy approach that focuses as much on providing security for the population as on killing the enemy.

He applied it in Iraq, where he served from 2004 to 2006. McMaster's service with the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in Tal Afar, where he and his team cleared the onetime Al Qaeda stronghold of insurgents, has become a case study for students of counterinsurgency warfare. He has approached the situation in Afghanistan through the same framework, say those who have worked with him.

"Our position in Afghanistan has been deteriorating for some time and, in a sense, what McMaster is doing — because nobody knows counterinsurgency better than he does — is to undo the damage that Obama's micromanagement of the Pentagon did to our prospects in Afghanistan," said Eric Edelman, who served as defense undersecretary for policy in the George W. Bush administration.

When McMaster returned from Iraq, he helped Gen. David Petraeus revolutionize the Army's counterinsurgency doctrine, which was put to the test during the Iraq surge in late 2007.

McMaster's views were also deeply informed by his doctoral studies at the University of North Carolina, which focused on how and why the Vietnam War went awry. His answer, set forth in a bestselling book about the war: Military officers, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had "failed to confront the president with their objections" to a strategy they had reason to believe would fail.

Following reports that he has clashed with the president in recent weeks on a number of policy issues, it's clear that, to the extent his plan for Afghanistan runs counter to some of Trump's campaign promises or deeply held beliefs, McMaster considers it a part of the job.

"Part of it is his style, but part of it is, the guy keeps telling him things he doesn't want to hear," said a former Bush administration official.

Defense Secretary James Mattis also supports a military surge, several officials said. "We're up against a determined enemy," Mattis said Monday in Copenhagen.

The United States has 8,400 troops in Afghanistan. Even with an additional 5,000, the U.S.

military presence would pale in comparison to the nearly 100,000 American troops deployed there in 2010 and 2011.

It would also be just a fraction of the 30,000 additional troops that Obama authorized soon after he took office in 2009 in his own version of an Afghan surge.

Indeed, retired Army Col. Joseph Collin, a Pentagon strategist, calls the proposed Trump troop increase a "mini-surge," one that would not mark a dramatic change in the current strategy of advising and training the Afghans and supporting operations with special forces and air power.

But were the president to sign off on a plan that would mark a departure from his campaign rhetoric, it would be, in the words of one former Bush national security aide, "a big deal."

The president was initially briefed on the situation in Afghanistan on his first visit to U.S. Central Command in Tampa in early February, just weeks after taking office.

What he heard was inconsistent with his desire to reallocate American resources from the Middle East and focus attention on domestic priorities. "He heard the truth: We cannot let Afghanistan and Iraq totally implode. We can't walk away from them. As a matter of fact, we're going to have to put more resources in," said the former Bush aide, who has direct knowledge of the meeting. "What he wants to do is get out, but McMaster and Mattis are giving him the military view, which is, 'You can't get out, you have to do more.'"

But hard-core Trump supporters wary of international military commitments are not the only ones hoping he will stick to his stay-out-of-it promises.

"It's the definition of insanity," said Stephen Miles, director of Win Without War, which advocates a less muscular foreign policy that relies heavily on diplomacy. "Sixteen years on, there's nothing a few thousand more troops will do to tip the scales of a war that has no battlefield solution. Afghanistan's problems — endemic corruption, a non-representative political system, and nearly four decades of endless war — will not be solved with American bombs or boots on the ground."

Yet Trump, who seems to relish a challenge, is also feeling pressure from more than just his military advisers. The Taliban itself has been baiting him.

In an open letter days after his inauguration, the Taliban advised Trump to pull all U.S. forces out of the country, saying that "nothing has been achieved in 15 years of war except bloodshed and destruction."

In words that echoed some of Trump's own past rhetoric, it went on to say that the U.S. "had lost credibility after spending a trillion dollars on a fruitless entanglement." The militant group added that the responsibility to end the war "rests on your shoulders."

DeVos questions whether Congress should reauthorize the Higher Education Act Back

By Michael Stratford | 05/09/2017 05:47 PM EDT

Education Secretary Betsy DeVos today questioned whether Congress should reauthorize the main federal law governing higher education, saying lawmakers should instead "start afresh."

Speaking at an education technology conference in Salt Lake City, DeVos suggested that the current discussion in Congress surrounding reauthorization of the Higher Education Act is misguided.

"Why would we reauthorize an act that's, like, fifty or sixty years old and that has continued to be amended?" DeVos asked. "Why wouldn't we start afresh and talk about what we need in this century and beyond for educating and helping our young people learn?"

The Higher Education Act, which governs federal support for colleges and universities, was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon B. Johnson. Most significantly, the law controls roughly $150 billion that flows to students each year through the federal student loan and Pell grant programs.

"The world has changed," DeVos added. "We have many adults that are well into their careers who really do need and want to go back and get a different kind of education. We should be considering the needs of individuals and students, not a system so much."

Both Sen. Lamar Alexander and Rep. Virginia Foxx, Republican chairs of the Congressional education committees, have said that reauthorizing the Higher Education Act is a top priority for them during this Congress.

The Higher Education Act was last comprehensively reauthorized in 2008 during the George W. Bush administration. The authorization for many programs under the law expired at the end of September, 2014, and they have been renewed either through automatic extensions or other congressional actions.

DeVos also urged the audience at the education technology conference, which is sponsored by Arizona State University and GSV Advisers, to lobby members of Congress about the burden of federal regulations and requirements on their work.

Interest rates on federal student loans will increase this year Back

By Michael Stratford | 05/10/2017 01:18 PM EDT

The cost of borrowing money from the federal government to pay for college will increase in the coming academic year.

The interest rates on new federal student loans are set to jump by more than two-thirds of a percentage point following the U.S. Treasury Department's sale today of 10-year notes, which is the government security to which the rates are tied.

For new undergraduate student loans, the interest rate will increase to 4.45 percent, up from 3.76 percent.

The rate on direct loans for graduate students will rise to 6 percent from this year's 5.31 percent.

And the interest rates on federal PLUS loans — both for graduate students or parents paying for their children's education — will be 7 percent, up from the current 6.31 percent.

The new interest rates take effect on July 1 for the 2017-18 school year and are fixed for the lifetime of the loan. The changes today do not affect borrowers who already have federal student loans.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Trump administration opens shutdown-averting negotiations — Rule out Rokita — Blasting 'choose your own baseline'
Date: Wednesday, August 09, 2017 4:09:47 PM

THAT BORDER WALL, THO: Still hellbent on getting money to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, White House officials are already initiating hush-hush negotiations ahead of Sept. 30 (and the next deadline that will almost surely result from the seemingly inevitable stopgap in store).

Seung Min Kim, Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report this afternoon that Marc Short met with top Senate Appropriations staffers from both parties this month to make a hard sell for the proposal. What's the White House's director of legislative affairs offering in exchange? Bye-bye budget caps.

Sufficient leverage? The big question, of course, is whether Democrats will give in to the Trump administration's demands in exchange for lifting those spending limits. After all, folks from both sides of the aisle have for months predicted a bipartisan agreement would be struck to bust the caps.

Err, a 'double fence': Perhaps making Democrats more amenable to "border wall" funding is the fact that the White House is only begging this time for money for a "double fence" along some swaths of the border. "Look, there are places where the wall makes sense, and there are places where the wall doesn't make sense and there are better options," Jon Tester, the Senate's top Democrat in charge of homeland security funding, told us this month. "So I'll just take a look at it and see."

BUDGET

RULE OUT ROKITA: The second-most powerful Republican on the House Budget Committee has officially taken his name out of the running to become the panel's next chairman. Instead, Todd Rokita has formally entered the race to unseat Indiana Sen. Joe Donnelly, Kevin Robillard reported Tuesday night. Rokita, the committee's most senior member, had been seen as a possible shoe-in to replace Rep. Diane Black as she seeks the Tennessee governor's mansion.

Where's that back bench? The next two longest-serving members of the budget panel, Reps. Tom Cole and Mario Diaz-Balart, have already taken themselves out of consideration, their offices confirmed to us. But another junior member, Rep. Bill Johnson, has quietly started making his case to the House Steering Committee, The Hill reported last week. Johnson's office has yet to return our request for comment.

TAX

BASELINE BLUES: The Committee for a Responsible Budget has a message for Senate Budget Chairman Mike Enzi: You've been warned. The influential group of budget hawks sent a letter to Enzi today blasting the rumors that he's considering a "choose your own baseline" approach to tax reform, a move they say could balloon the federal deficit.

Into the weeds: The Senate's not-yet-released budget resolution will choose whether to assume a current policy baseline or current law baseline — and it could make a big difference. The House's budget has already said the tax package would be based on current law, which would not assume that temporary tax breaks (like those 2015 extenders) will live on eternally. Fiscal hawks consider this to be a more realistic approach, though it makes tax writers' jobs harder. Alas, we've been told that some on the Senate Finance Committee are pushing for a current policy baseline, assuming all tax cuts will be renewed. That would help their cause of deficit-neutral tax reform by way of lowered expectations, since assuming tax breaks become permanent would reduce projected revenues by about $460 billion over 10 years.

NO GUESSES: The White House's legislative liaison has boldly predicted that Congress would send tax reform to the finish line by November, but Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell isn't gonna play that game. "I'm not going to tell you when we are going to finish tax reform, but we'll finish it," McConnell told the Florence, Ky., Rotary Club this week, Toby Eckert reports.

ALWAYS A TRADE-OFF: Now about those pay-fors. We already know that Republicans in Congress are considering tightening the limit on the mortgage interest deductions to achieve that grand prize of a lower corporate tax rate. This week, we got some numbers to flesh out that vision. A new estimate by the Tax Foundation predicts that cutting that mortgage deduction cap in half could raise enough revenue to reduce the corporate tax rate by around 3 percentage points, Toby reports. The move would save about $319 billion over the next decade. (For context: The current cap is $1 million of mortgage debt, and the current corporate tax rate is 35 percent.)

HEALTH

TREATMENT IN TANDEM: In a special report out today on the future of health, The Agenda looks at successful models for truly integrated care and the savings to be had by bucking a disjointed approach. Joanne Silberner explains that bringing mental and physical health care under one roof has the estimated potential to shave $26 billion to $48 billion each year from the nation's health care costs. School districts that are beginning to provide comprehensive mental health services on campus aim to keep kids out of jail, Brianna Ehley reports. And a growing body of evidence supports the idea that a coordinated approach could help address obesity and depression — two of the largest drivers of health care cost increases, with obesity resulting in almost \$150 billion per year in direct costs to the country and major depressive disorder totalling more than $200 billion per year in direct costs.

AN OPIOID PLAN WITHOUT A PRICE TAG: The Trump administration has yet to put a dollar sign on the president's calls this week to beef up law enforcement and border security to fight the opioid crisis. Competing proposals, on the other hand, are steeped in detailed federal funding demands. As Morning Agriculture explains, the bipartisan plan Rep. Cheri Bustos and Sen. Joe Donnelly are pushing would allow rural communities to shift certain USDA resources toward substance-abuse treatment and other initiatives to curb the epidemic. The bills in that package — S. 1677 \(115\), S. 1678 \(115\) and H.R. 3566 \(115\) — would set aside 20 percent of USDA's telemedicine grant funding for substance abuse treatment, and prioritize loan and grant applications focused on substance abuse prevention, treatment and recovery services.

Disregarded guidance: You'll recall that the interim report from the presidential commission on opioid addiction urged a "national emergency" and the nixing a longstanding prohibition on using Medicaid funds to pay for residential substance abuse treatment (a change that could cost the federal government between $40 billion and $60 billion over a decade, according to previous CBO estimates).

AGRICULTURE

ON THE HERBICIDE'S SIDE: Like his predecessor, House Oversight Chairman Trey Gowdy has begun questioning the use of NIH funding for a report that determined that the herbicide glyphosate (a key ingredient in Monsanto's "Roundup Ready" products) is a probable carcinogen. More from Jenny Hopkinson.

ECONOMY

IN DEMS WE TRUST? POLITICO teamed up with Morning Consult to take voters' temps again on the issues they say matter most come election day. Still at the tippy top: economic issues. And for the first time this year, (slightly) more respondents said they trust congressional Democrats over GOP lawmakers to handle issues impacting the economy. But the majority of those questioned still said they trust Republicans more on jobs. Those surveyed placed more importance on reforming entitlement programs than overhauling the tax system or passing an infrastructure spending bill. Check out the toplines.

STATE DEPARTMENT

JUST A RESHUFFLE: The State Department's No. 2 official used a town-hall-style setting on this week to calm the nerves of anxious staffers who still fear the Trump administration will try to dismantle their department. Deputy Secretary of State John Sullivan assured staffers that the goal of the White House-led restructuring is not to scrap State or USAID, and that a redesign is not a synonym for layoffs, Nahal Toosi writes.

Light on details: Sources in the room said Sullivan offered almost no clarity about the department's big reorganization plan, which are formally due to OMB by mid-September.

DEFENSE

FACTCHECK: President Donald Trump today claimed to have made the U.S. nuclear arsenal "far stronger and more powerful than ever before" since he took office. Not exactly, as

Louis Nelson and Jacqueline Klimas explain. Trump did call for a review of the nation's nuclear posture, but that formal review only began in April. (Results aren't expected until late 2017.) And that modernization plan he boasted about? It was actually started under former President Barack Obama — something that takes decades, not months.

Price tag: The nuclear buildup that Trump touted, of course, won't come cheap. Obama's plan is expected to cost $400 billion over the next decade, according to a CBO report this February. That's an average cost of $40 billion a year.

MORE BUILDUP NEWS: The Navy is moving ahead with its nascent effort to acquire a new guided missile frigate, our Defense team reports. Officials have issued a request for information that says it is "looking to use an existing ship design that could be modified."

White House pitches deal for wall money — and no shutdown Back

By Seung Min Kim, Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan | 08/09/2017 01:38 PM EDT

The White House is pushing a deal on Capitol Hill to head off a government shutdown that would lift strict spending caps long opposed by Democrats in exchange for money for President Donald Trump's border wall with Mexico, multiple sources said.

Marc Short, the White House's director of legislative affairs, met with top staffers from both parties on the Senate Appropriations Committee last week to make a hard sell for the proposal, the sources said.

Short — who said the border funding would be used for a "double fence" — stressed that the White House is insisting on a down payment for construction this fall. Short also lobbied for a big budget increase for the Pentagon, another priority for Trump.

The government runs out of money after Sept. 30. Without a spending deal, federal agencies will be forced to close until an agreement is reached. Democrats have vowed to oppose funding for a border wall, making it probably the biggest threat to an early October closure.

The White House is offering Democrats more funding for their own pet projects in return for allowing construction to move ahead on a barrier along the U.S.-Mexico border — though perhaps not the "big, beautiful wall" with solar panels that Trump has long promised.

The border wall has also become a more valuable prize politically for Trump since the collapse of the Obamacare repeal effort. Trump and GOP leaders are aiming to pass tax reform legislation this fall but face big obstacles — making the border wall even more important for the White House.

Yet there still seems little chance of getting sign-off from Congress. Democrats show no sign of yielding on the issue. They have already blocked the project once: During negotiations over a government spending package last spring, the White House dropped similar demands for wall funding after Democrats balked.

Trump and Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney have since said they won't cave this time — even if it means shutting down the government. Indeed, lawmakers and aides in both parties are dreading the looming showdown, as a White House desperate for legislative wins makes a major push for a wall that Democrats hate.

"It's just the wrong message; we don't want to build a wall around the United States," said Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (D-N.H.), who sits on the Senate Appropriations Committee and called the border wall a "non-starter."

"It's difficult for me to see that proposal going anywhere," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) added. "A lot of people don't want the additional border wall."

The timing of Short's meeting with Senate Appropriations staffers — a full two months before the government would shut down — suggests the White House is aware of just how difficult it will be to secure border funding. White House officials appear to be trying to give themselves as much time as possible to strike a deal.

The White House did not return a request for comment. But GOP insiders on Capitol Hill expect negotiations could drag out well beyond Sept. 30. Senior GOP and Democratic aides believe a two- or three-month patch that continues spending at 2017 levels is likely, in order to buy more time.

Before leaving for August recess, House Republicans made the first move on a wall, passing a security funding bill that included Trump's $1.6 billion request for roughly 70 miles of new barriers on the southern border.

The House bill also increased the Defense Department budget by more than $70 billion above current spending caps set in law. All but five House Democrats opposed the measure.

Such a bill, however, is doomed in the Senate, where 60 votes — meaning eight Democrats — are needed to pass any spending agreement. Beyond their opposition to the wall funding, Democrats typically require any military spending boosts to be matched by domestic increases.

Republican and Democratic congressional aides have predicted for months that both sides will come together on a spending agreement to raise spending caps for the Pentagon as well as for nondefense domestic programs.

Congress passed such a framework several years ago under the lead of then-House Budget Committee Chairman Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.).

The question this time is whether Trump can get his wall money as part of any agreement.

Some Republicans are more optimistic than others. White House officials appear to believe it's a battle that's worth fighting. And congressional conservatives, including those in the House Freedom Caucus, strongly agree, even suggesting they would back a government shutdown to secure wall funding.

After being forced to drop his request for wall money last spring, Trump also tweeted that "our country needs a good 'shutdown' in September" to secure the campaign promises he ran on.

Hill GOP leaders, however, are eager to avoid a shutdown, fearful the public would blame Republicans and that the party could suffer heavy losses in the 2018 midterm elections. They already worry that Trump's slumping approval ratings will cost them at the polls next year.

Still, some Republicans are hopeful that if the White House can sell the border barrier as a "fence" instead of a wall, perhaps some Democrats will be more receptive. Technically, the House wall funding package would not finance a massive brick-and-mortar structure, as Trump promised on the campaign trail, but rather, double fencing and levies.

"Look, there are places where the wall makes sense, and there are places where the wall doesn't make sense and there are better options," said Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.), who represents a state that Trump carried by 20 points in the election. "So I'll just take a look at it and see."

But it's unlikely that the White House will find eight Democratic senators to go along, even if means more money for domestic programs.

"I do know for a fact that every [Democrat] considers wall funding to be a poison pill," said Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), who is up for reelection next year.

Murray, the Democrat who negotiated the 2013 budget pact, said she would oppose the terms that the White House is floating.

"He promised during the campaign he was going to build a wall paid for by Mexico," Murray said. "Until I see that promise, it's going nowhere."

Rokita enters Indiana Senate race Back

By Kevin Robillard | 08/08/2017 07:48 PM EDT

GOP Rep. Todd Rokita will announce Wednesday morning that he is running against vulnerable Democratic Sen. Joe Donnelly in Indiana, joining an already contentious Republican primary and casting his campaign as another step toward fixing Washington, along with the election of President Donald Trump.

"Indiana needs a conservative fighter who shares our values," the narrator says in Rokita's campaign launch video. "That's why Todd Rokita is running for United States Senate."

Republicans consider Donnelly to be one of the most vulnerable senators up for reelection in 2018, alongside Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill. Trump won Indiana by almost 20 points in 2016, and Rokita's video specifically calls out the election of Trump and Vice President Mike Pence, the state's former governor, as the beginning of a movement to repair Washington.

Meanwhile, the RNC and NRSC have repeatedly attacked Donnelly as "Mexico Joe" after the Associated Press reported his family's company had outsourced jobs to Mexico. Donnelly has since sold his stock in the company.

"Lobbyists, bureaucrats, politicians and the media — they've rigged the system. ... It's Sen. Joe Donnelly's rigged system too," the narrator in Rokita's video says. "On taxes, Obamacare, guns, life, even national security, Joe Donnelly is with them, not us."

But so far, Rokita has aimed most of his fire at fellow Republican Rep. Luke Messer, who announced his Senate run late last month. The pair have clashed over everything from Messer's wife's high-paid job in an Indianapolis suburb, to Rokita's use of a prop plane for campaign purposes, to edits to Messer's Wikipedia page. Each man's campaign has already called the opposing candidate "unhinged."

State Rep. Mike Braun also entered the contest on Tuesday.

Rokita, a former two-term Indiana secretary of state, won election to the House in 2010. He's built a war chest of $2.3 million, slightly more than the $2 million Messer has in his campaign account. Donnelly has nearly $3.7 million in the bank.

Messer and Rokita start as the front-runners in the Republican primary contest, but operatives said Braun — who has the personal wealth to self-fund a campaign — shouldn't be counted out.

"Our country needs more people who can tackle big issues from perspectives gained from running a business and not a career politician's perspective," Braun said in a statement announcing his run. "I've spent my life building a business and creating jobs. I am running for U.S. Senate because we need leaders who understand the real consequences of the failure of our federal government and are capable of delivering solutions for Hoosiers on issues like health care and tax reform."

McConnell won't put a timeline on tax reform Back

By Toby Eckert | 08/09/2017 01:55 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said he would not join the expectations game for when Congress will pass tax reform, departing from the aggressive timeline laid out by the White House.

"I'm not going to tell you when we are going to finish tax reform, but we'll finish it. That's the way we begin to change America," McConnell told the Florence, Ky., Rotary Club on Tuesday, according to the Northern Kentucky Tribune.

Last month, White House legislative director Marc Short said markups would begin in September, legislation would move through the House in October, and it would clear the Senate in November. That followed earlier predictions by Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin that tax reform would be done by August.

In his remarks to the Rotary Club, portions of which were posted by ABC News, McConnell said unrealistic deadlines were driving an impression that Congress hasn't accomplished much. Without specifically citing tax reform, he said: "Part of the reason, I think, that the storyline is we haven't done much is because, in part, the president and others have set these early timelines about things need to be done by a certain point.

"Now our new president, of course, has not been in this line of work before and I think had excessive expectations about how quickly things happen in the democratic process," McConnell said. "And so part of the reason I think people feel we're underperforming is because too many kind of artificial deadlines, unrelated to the reality of the complexity of legislating, may not have been fully understood."

Study sees 3 percentage point cut in corporate taxes from slashing mortgage interest deduction cap Back

Cutting the cap on the mortgage interest deduction by 50 percent could raise enough revenue to reduce the corporate tax rate by around 3 percentage points, the Tax Foundation estimates.

Republican congressional leaders and Trump administration officials trying to hammer out a tax reform plan are looking for new ways to pay for tax cuts after they abandoned one major pay-for, border adjustability. POLITICO reported last week that one idea they are considering is lowering the cap on the mortgage interest deduction, which is currently set at $1 million of mortgage debt.

The estimate by the non-partisan, conservative-leaning Tax Foundation assumes that the cap is lowered to $500,000, which it estimates would save about $319 billion over the next decade.

"This is enough revenue to reduce the corporate tax rate by about 3 percentage points," wrote Kyle Pomerleau, the Foundation's director of federal projects. "This estimate assumes that the cap would apply to all existing mortgages. Any phase-ins would reduce the amount this cap would raise over the next decade. For example, lawmakers could apply this limitation to mortgages received after enactment."

House Republicans have proposed cutting the corporate tax rate to 20 percent from 35 percent. President Donald Trump wants to cut the rate on all businesses to 15 percent.

The top 1 percent of income earners would see the largest tax increase if the interest deduction cap is reduced, with their after-tax income falling by 0.62, Pomerleau estimated.

"A small number of taxpayers in the middle quintiles would see a tax increase, but it would average less than one-tenth of 1 percent," he wrote.

The doctor will analyze you now Back

By Joanne Silberner | 08/09/2017 05:05 AM EDT

As a child growing up in rural Alaska, Vera Starbard was diagnosed with major depression. She'd been sexually abused by her uncle and was plagued by thoughts of suicide. By the age of 10, she'd already spent time as an inpatient in a psychiatric hospital. "It was a really dark time," she says. "And I didn't feel like it was ever going to get better."

But when she was 11, things changed. Her family moved to Anchorage, and they joined the Southcentral Foundation, a health care provider for native Alaskans. The foundation was launching a new approach to health care—one that wove mental health into the rest of its primary care.

For Vera, that meant every checkup included a mental health evaluation. Her primary care team included a psychologist or social worker who offered care on-site. There were a variety of group counseling programs to choose from. Every person she saw had her health record, there were no outside charges, and there was never a wait to make an appointment.

Perhaps most important, accessing mental health treatment was as easy as going to her regular doctor, and there was no stigma attached: Her mental health services were provided at the same time and in the same place as other medical care, just like heading down the hall for an X-ray or blood test.

In Anchorage, she still had a lot to work through, and difficult times ahead. But today, at age 35, she says that Southcentral's approach to mental health care saved her life. "There's a higher than not probability that I would have committed suicide without the resources at my disposal," she says.

It's a truism that the mind and the body are connected, but the U.S. health care system has long treated them as separate—with separate doctors, separate hospitals, separate payment systems.

That's a major reason people with acute mental illnesses don't get help. Ditto for chronic conditions like depression and anxiety. People may not seek help because of stigma. They may not find it because there are too few providers and they are too hard to locate. Or people don't have health insurance, or can't afford the co-pays, or lose interest when faced with a long wait.

The result is that many people who need mental health care aren't getting it. According to a recent article published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, nearly 18 percent of adults surveyed in 2015 reported having a mental, behavioral or emotional disorder. And 20 percent of respondents said either they or a family member had needed mental health care but didn't get it, either because they couldn't afford it, their insurance wouldn't cover it, they were afraid or embarrassed, or they had no idea where to go.

At the patient level, this means people with mental health issues suffer when they don't need to. And at the policy level, there are huge reasons to fix this, primarily the high long-term cost of untreated mental illness. Mental health plays a big role in chronic conditions like hypertension, obesity and diabetes. "You can go ahead and give all the insulin you want," says Donald Berwick, former head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, founder of the Institute for Healthcare Improvement and a big proponent of behavioral health integration. "If you're not addressing the attendant behavioral health issues, you're not just missing the chance to reduce suffering, you're reducing the chance to save a lot of money."

In part because of their Alaska Native heritage, which puts a high value on spiritual health, the leaders of Southcentral recognized decades ago that behavioral health is tightly linked with bodily health. So they became one of the early adopters of integrated care. They embedded treatment for mental and emotional ills in their primary care practices, and found that patient satisfaction rates skyrocketed and usage of medical care went down, saving millions of dollars while improving patient outcomes.

In the nearly 30 years since Southcentral hired its first psychologist, pretty much every study has shown that integrating mental health care into medical care results in better patient outcomes and lower costs. A few years ago, analysts at actuarial firm Milliman estimated that integrating medical and behavior health care could shave $26 billion to $48 billion each year from the nation's health care costs.

But adoption has been slow, in part because of the way much health insurance is structured. Mental health is often a separate benefit, if insurance pays anything at all. Doctors are paid more for procedures on sick people. They get less if they keep their patients healthy and out of the hospital.

Of all the structural problems in the U.S. health care system, the segregation of mental health care from the rest of medical care is arguably the most costly, both financially and in terms of patient health. With new pressure to find ways to bend the curve of health care costs, and the growing burden of chronic disease and worker disability, perhaps no policy could have as much bang for the buck as finally integrating mental and physical health care.

IN THE MIDDLE of the 20th century, mental illnesses weren't considered illnesses per se; fully debilitating illnesses were seen as "insanities" and their sufferers often confined against their will in special mental hospitals. Illnesses that were less debilitating—milder depressions, say, or anxiety or substance abuse—were viewed as weaknesses of will, often ignored by medical professionals. Payment followed suit; for mental health providers it was low, for primary care providers it was essentially nonexistent.

People had to either figure out a way to live with their conditions, or suffer as their illnesses got more acute. The arrival of more effective medications for mental illnesses opened things up a bit—doctors could write a prescription, and patients could feel better without months or years of talk therapy. Still, several studies in the 1980s showed that many patients didn't get treatment, with as many as one-half of patients saying no when their doctors suggested they get mental health care.

The search was on for something better. In the early 1990s, private foundations and the federal government, through the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, began funding clinical studies around the country. Could primary care providers be trained to recognize depression, and get their patients treated? Would that make a difference? The studies showed the answers were yes and yes. In 1996, the Institute of Medicine published a suggestion—integrate primary and behavioral health care so that patients would get diagnosed and treated by their doctors or via direct referral to a behavioral health specialist as part of their routine medical care. Big health care systems like Kaiser Permanente and the Veterans Administration began experimenting with integrating behavioral health care in some locations.

Southcentral Foundation was ahead of the trend, having started thinking about integrating its care in 1985. CEO Katherine Gottlieb, an Alaska Native who won a MacArthur "genius" grant award for her work at Southcentral, says there was a simple reason: "We did a survey of our community."

Southcentral asked community members to rank their health care priorities among choices like cancer care, diabetes, obesity and behavioral health. The top five priorities, says Gottlieb, were all related to behavioral health—child sexual abuse, child neglect, domestic violence, behavioral health counseling and addictions.

So Southcentral forged forward with its goal of making patients with behavioral health issues feel welcome. It built an airy new primary care center that looks as much like a mountain lodge as it does a place to get medical care. Huge windows frame the snowcapped peaks of the nearby Chugach Mountains, and the halls are filled with Alaska Native art—beadwork, blankets, dolls, carvings and paintings of totem animals such as ravens, orcas and eagles. There's an expansive lobby designed to host community gatherings. Foundation planners say the setting sends the message that the health of the community directly relates to the health of each of its members.

Today, a patient with a history of mental illness, like Vera, gets evaluated by her doctor whenever she comes in for a medical appointment. If Vera seems anxious or depressed, the doctor might talk to her about it, or call in the behavioral health consultant. But the same goes for patients without a history of behavioral problems. A diabetes patient who has stopped taking his pills, for instance, might find himself in a 20- or 30-minute discussion with his primary care doctor about ways to deal with anxiety or depression. The primary care doctor or the behaviorist on the team might suggest more formal counseling, or the request might come from the patient. When hospital care is needed, patients are sent by their care team, and they return to that care team when they get out.

The system puts mental illnesses into the realm of routine health care. "We know that for tons and tons of people, stigma is a really big deal in behavioral health," says Douglas Eby, vice president of medical services at Southcentral and one of the many staffers who've been there since the beginning. "But getting behavioral health during your visit with your primary care provider, or by the guy down the hall, at the same place and maybe during the same visit—then it's nothing different, and not likely to be stigmatized." Your employer won't find out, and your buddies won't see your truck parked outside a mental health office. Integrating behavioral health care into a medical setting normalizes it, he says.

Southcentral takes things a step further, with several innovative group therapy programs, some of them building on Native American culture—"learning circles" where people talk about how they dealt with internal conflict and about how to resolve their feelings. Vera attended an intensive one-week group therapy session where people shared memories of domestic violence, abuse and neglect. "That was the week I figured out I could be happy," she says. Family, faith and friends also helped, but what she learned at Southcentral was instrumental. "That was the start of not being a victim anymore, of seeing that there was light at the end of the tunnel and I wouldn't always be depressed."

Southcentral's administrators credit integration for lowering hospital admissions and visits to the emergency room by more than a third between 2000 and 2015. In a recent survey, 97 percent of patients said they were satisfied with the care. In 2011, the foundation was awarded a Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award for delivering top-quality care for less cost than the vast majority of U.S. providers.

THE BIGGEST CHALLENGE all along, says CEO Gottlieb, has been money.

Southcentral gets by on a combination of private insurers and government programs including Medicare, Medicaid and the Indian Health Service. But most of them don't pay much for mental health care, and they don't pay anything at all for some of the counseling and group sessions the foundation offers. So Southcentral subsidizes behavioral health care with savings from the medical side, and it gets grants as well.

Payment is a challenge across the country.

A landmark study of 113,452 patients in 102 group practices within the Intermountain Healthcare system in Utah and Idaho showed how much can be saved by integrating mental health care. Some practices included mental health care in a "medical home." In other practices, patients were referred to outside therapists. Annual medical costs were $515 higher per year for patients who did not get mental health services through their primary providers.

While the benefit to patients was clear, the study had a second conclusion—that providers lost money by integrating mental health. As physician Thomas Schwenk noted in an accompanying editorial, during the 2010-13 study period the integrated practices received $115 less per patient per year than the traditional practices, because payment was based on procedures and office visits. Since patients in the integrated practices needed less medical care, the doctors made less money.

Such payment practices are common, and Schwenk wrote that it's going to take "a profound change in the fundamental structure of the U.S. health care delivery system" to integrate behavioral health care into the primary care environment. That would take heavier reliance of payments going to groups of doctors caring for groups of patients, not piecemeal payments for individual services.

There's broad support for behavioral health integration within the health care community and in Congress; there are few critics on record, and no one is lobbying against it. The trade association for companies that provide health care services to people in insurance plans, the Association for Behavioral Health and Wellness, is a big booster. Patient groups love it for the access it gives, and for the destigmatization. Supporting health care reform that favors behavioral health care is a major legislative priority for the National Alliance for Mental Illness, which represents people with mental illnesses and their family members.

Andrew Sperling, a lobbyist for NAMI, echoes the conclusion that the chief challenge is money. According to a SAMHSA estimate, Medicare spent $29 billion on mental health care in 2016, and the Medicaid bill was $67 billion. Sperling would like to see more for various demonstration programs. And if funds for Medicaid are cut, "a lot of the innovation we've seen with primary behavioral health integration would be stifled," he says.

Still, some doctors and other providers are not totally on board. Many psychiatrists today don't accept Medicare or other insurance, making access still a problem. And primary care practitioners and behavioral health workers may need training in how to work in an integrated system. "People who become cardiologists and rheumatologists and all the other '-ologists' get minimal instruction in behavioral health," says Berwick.

Psychologists and social workers may also have to be retrained, says Berwick's IHI colleague Mara Laderman. Mental health consultants in integrated care systems work differently. "They're focused on action-oriented problem solving over one session or a couple of 20-minute sessions, as opposed to having a more longitudinal therapeutic relationship," she says. "You know, that 50-minute, hour appointment." Southcentral's Eby confirms that—he says they have to look long and hard for people willing to give care outside of those 50-minute boxes.

SOLVING THESE PROBLEMS will take more than money; it will require changing the culture of medicine. Many groups are moving in that direction; the American Medical Association, the American College of Physicians, the American Psychiatric Association, the American Psychological Association and other groups have policies promoting integrated care and offer information to their members on how to adopt it.

The federal government supports a multitude of initiatives designed to promote behavioral health care integration. The Affordable Care Act set aside money for model projects. Close to a billion dollars has been granted for programs that will promote behavioral health care, like setting up patient-centered medical homes within Medicaid. And starting last January, Medicare has been paying physicians for behavioral health care management and consultation. There are new billing codes that allow physicians to charge for helping their patients get behavioral health treatment, managing their patients' care, and working with psychiatrists.

Authors of an article in the New England Journal of Medicine say it's a "major step forward" and predict millions of beneficiaries will benefit and that there will be millions of dollars in savings. There could be a ripple effect: Medicare often serves as an example to other insurers.

Southcentral Foundation leaders are often invited to speak at conferences or to health care organizations in the Washington, D.C., area, and when they do, they usually stop by Capitol Hill or federal agencies to talk about the benefits of providing mental health care in a primary care setting. Douglas Eby's trips have led him to believe that there will be more support in the future for fully integrated systems.

"We are popular with the whole political spectrum," he says. "We cut costs like crazy and emphasize self, and family, so Republicans love us. Democrats love us because we're all about community and social factors and reforming the pillars of society so that everyone has improved access to care. When we walk into different political offices, we emphasize different parts of the system so that they can hear our story in their words and values, but it is all very true and the truth is the same truth."

Berwick, with plenty of experience on Capitol Hill when he was head of CMS, is concerned about protecting funding for some of the demonstration projects in the current chaos of health care funding. But in the long run, he says, integrating behavioral health into primary health care is inevitable. "Look, we've got to solve the health care cost problem," he says. In Anchorage, Vera Starbard is watching with interest. Until recently, she figured that all health systems offered mental health care right along with primary care. "That's literally what I had grown up knowing as health care."

But recently, she's seen several friends who are not part of Southcentral struggle to get mental health services. One friend, who, like Starbard, had been sexually abused, struggled for months to get approval from her health insurance company. Then her friend's intended counselor stopped taking new patients. "I'm only now seeing how good integrated care is," says Starbard. "We definitely took it for granted."

'I just started flowing. It was the only thing that helped' Back

By Brianna Ehley | 08/09/2017 05:10 AM EDT

When he was 16, DeMarrco Nicholson came home to find his mother unresponsive in the bathroom of their Washington, D.C., apartment, dead from sudden heart failure. In a matter of weeks, he was separated from his siblings, thrown into foster care and bounced from group home to group home in Anacostia, one of the poorest, high-crime neighborhoods in the nation's capital.

After struggling for a year, Nicholson's self-control cracked, and he violently lashed out, kicking and punching lockers, and threatening other students. It was the kind of episode that commonly ends in suspension or even arrest and puts teenagers — especially in neighborhoods like Nicholson's — into what's known as the "school-to-prison pipeline." Forced out of school for bad behavior, unsupervised kids can get into even more trouble, wind up in the juvenile justice system and enter a spiral that becomes difficult to escape.

His school took a different tack. Instead of being disciplined for his outburst, Nicholson was greeted by a school-based therapist, who spent the rest of the day talking to him and learning about the traumatic experiences that brought him to that breaking point.

He was assigned a social worker and a therapist he could conveniently visit between classes. They formed a relationship and learned about his passion for rap music. He was encouraged to write rap lyrics to express his emotions instead of acting out. His therapist even set up a makeshift recording studio in his office.

Today, Nicholson credits those sessions - the therapy and the rapping — with helping him cope with the trauma of his mother's death. "I started writing in my notebook. I'd tell him, I think I'm ready to record," Nicholson, now 19, said in an interview. "He'd set a time. I'd come in and I just started flowing. It was only thing that helped."

A growing number of school districts, like the District of Columbia school system, are beginning to provide comprehensive mental health services on campus, seeing it as not just a service to students, but a key way to keep lives on track, keep kids out of the justice system, and to treat problems before they get out of hand.

Nicholson gradually worked through the pain that he couldn't deal with alone. He graduated from Anacostia High School this year and is preparing to enroll at the University of the District of Columbia this fall. He wants to study music business. "I would be lost without it," he says of the therapy he received at school.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN mental health and bigger societal costs is becoming more important the more we learn about it - and one of the key links is between mental health and the justice system. Kids with unstable family lives or other traumas are often the ones who act up in school. By suspending them for bad behavior, schools make their problems even worse, by taking them out of a place with stable adults and other supports and leaving them out on the streets, unsupervised, where it's all too easy to get into more trouble - and all too hard to get out of it.

Health experts say for a large proportion of students who act out, the bad behavior is rooted in untreated mental health problems, conditions like depression or anxiety or more serious illnesses like bipolar disorder that often show their first symptoms in adolescence. Often, the illnesses are triggered by the kind of traumatic experiences that Nicholson went through. According to the National Center for Mental Health and Juvenile Justice, roughly 70 percent of students in the juvenile justice system have a mental health issue and most haven't had proper treatment. A severe shortage of child psychiatrists and psychologists, coupled with the difficulties of finding insurance coverage for mental health, are some of the largest barriers to treatment.

"Parents have limited abilities to deal with behavioral issues and so kids with these issues, some of whom are more prone to acts of aggression, end up being pushed over to the juvenile justice system," said Wayne Bear, executive director of the Pennsylvania-based Juvenile Detention Centers' Association.

And that's one of the worst places for kids experiencing a mental crisis, said Darcy Gruttadaro, director of advocacy at the National Alliance for Mental Illness. "It's loud and scary and there are a lot of structure and rules to follow, which is a major challenge for a person with a mental illness. Conditions often worsen and they're more likely to keep getting into trouble, lengthening their stay."

"And do they get effective interventions and evidenced-based treatment while they're in a juvenile treatment facility?" she added. "The answer is probably no."

That's where schools come in. School-based mental health services are viewed by experts as the best place for early intervention and detection programs because, as Olga Price, who founded D.C.'s school mental health program nearly two decades ago puts it: "It's where all of the kids are."

After trying out the idea for a few years in a handful of schools, the city went all in after a shooting in Anacostia in 2010 left three students dead and galvanized support for measures designed to reduce truancy and increase behavioral health services for youth. Children in D.C. public schools now have access to mental health care regardless of their family's income, or whether or not they have health insurance or have dependable transportation to get to a clinic. All kids have to do is get to school and the treatment they need is there.

"The goal is to bring mental health services to children in the setting where they spend the most time," said Tanya A. Royster, director of the D.C. Department of Behavioral Health. "You have access to parents, you have access to teachers, you also have a location it makes the services easier to access."

D.C.'s program, which now serves 60 of the city's 200 public and charter schools, includes at least one full-time therapist stationed at every school, who takes walk-in appointments, but also runs group therapy and class and schoolwide prevention programs. Students who need more intensive care are referred to a specialist in the community. The services are far more comprehensive than traditional school counselors, who often don't have the training or the bandwidth to handle serious behavioral health problems. The city plans to expand the program to every school in the district in the coming years.

The program is financed in part by federal and state grants and local city funding. Many of its services are reimbursed by Medicaid or private insurance. Other community mental health centers provide services in a handful of schools to supplement the program's costs. Still, funding remains a challenge and the city is struggling to find the funds for expansion.

As a result, Price said the program prioritizes schools with higher needs; officials look at attendance information, high-risk neighborhoods, the prevalence of students in need of special education. Anacostia High School, for example, is located in one of the poorest neighborhoods in D.C., with the highest rates of violence. The graduation rate in 2016 was just 42 percent.

D.C.'s PROGRAM IS part of a national trend toward approaching children's behavioral issues from a clinical standpoint as opposed to a disciplinary approach. Treating kids who act out in school, whether it's frequent outbursts or one act of aggression or violent behavior, as symptoms of underlying behavioral health conditions is seen as a more long-term solution that can help facilitate a more productive life down the road.

The growing consensus is that if children with mental health issues are spotted early and get support and treatment they need, they are more likely to finish school, attend college and hold a steady job. More traditional forms of discipline, particularly suspension, increase the likelihood of getting into more trouble, and potentially getting entangled in the juvenile justice system.

"There is a lot of blurring of the lines, especially for children, in terms of what is a behavioral health issue, what is a manifestation of experience in trauma and what is a disability. It's complicated," said Sharra Greer, policy director for the Children's Law Center that advocates for school-based mental health programs. "You have a child who is in school, who is throwing chairs in the classroom — it's important to focus on why is that happening, as opposed to this kid should be punished. It's important to get people to look at it from that lens."

Keeping troublesome kids in schools also keeps them closer to services that can help.

"They tend to want to come to school because they know that someone will want to come and talk to them," said Marisa Parrella, the manager of Mary's Center's School-Based Mental Health, one of the community providers that supplements D.C.'s school program.

According to an evaluation report of D.C.'s program, the top reasons children were referred to the school mental health provider were anger and aggression, disruptive behavior, family problems, grief and loss, and poor relations with other students.

D.C. health officials say the program has already helped reduce the number of behavioral problems at schools. The number of suspensions reported throughout D.C.'s schools has fallen by nearly 40 percent in the past couple of years from 11,078 in the 2013-14 school year to 6,695 in the 2015-16 school year, according to city figures. Though the mental health program isn't exclusively responsible for the decline, city officials say it has played a role.

New York City has also been building a school mental-health program. In New York, the program is administered by the Montefiore Medical Center, which operates in 80 public schools in the Bronx, making it the largest school-based health program in the country.

"Schools tend to bring us the children who get into fights or have some behavioral issues," said Gail Shafran, a nurse practitioner who works in one of the Montefiore school clinics. "We often get to know the kids really well, we know a lot of their social and medical history and whether they've experienced trauma. We're able to detect the high-risk kids." That close relationship with students and providers at school makes it easier to get kids help early.

But for school districts that don't have a major medical center willing to integrate their services into the schools, like Montefiore, or an existing federal or city funding stream like D.C., it can be difficult to replicate such a robust system.

Recent federal legislation, the Every Student Succeeds Act, provided new grants for states and districts across the country to develop more comprehensive mental health programs, including screening and early intervention. But challenges remain.

"We haven't seen enough communities with schools that take it to the next level," said NAMI's Gruttadaro. "Schools are recognizing they need to do more but it really depends on the school budget and the funding they have available."

Allen said another hurdle is finding school mental health providers. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, there are about 39,000 school social workers and 44,000 school psychologists in public schools across the country, but about 51 million public school students. Because there aren't enough providers to go around, some schools try to train teachers and other staff how to recognize and respond to mental health issues.

But experts say that's not enough, and are pushing for more comprehensive school-based services to avoid more kids with mental health issues from being sucked into the school-to-prison pipeline.

"You can ask any kindergarten teacher to pick out which one of their kids are most likely to get into trouble down the road, and they're almost always right," the Juvenile Detention Center's Bear said. "So we need to get better at identifying kids earlier so you can intervene before it gets to be a diagnosable problem."

Trump says he'll beat opioid epidemic with law-and-order approach Back

By Brianna Ehley | 08/08/2017 07:01 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Tuesday vowed his administration would beat the opioid epidemic by beefing up law enforcement and strengthening security on the southern border to stop illegal drugs from entering the country.

Trump, joined in Bedminster, New Jersey, by Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price and other administration officials, emphasized a tough law-and-order approach, rather than new treatment or social programs, as the White House's primary strategy for halting an epidemic that kills 142 Americans every day, according to federal statistics.

"Strong law enforcement is absolutely vital to having a drug-free society," Trump said. "I'm confident that by working with our health care and law enforcement experts we will fight this deadly epidemic and the United States will win." The remarks echoed similar comments made by Attorney General Jeff Sessions earlier this summer.

Trump as a candidate vowed to confront a public health crisis that has hit states he carried in the presidential campaign — like West Virginia and Kentucky — especially hard.

Trump on Tuesday stopped short of declaring the crisis a national emergency — a recommendation the White House's opioid commission, led by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, made last week.

Price later told reporters the administration is treating the opioid epidemic as an emergency, but that it does not need to make a formal declaration.

"We believe that, at this point, the resources that we need or the focus that we need to bring to bear to the opioid crisis, at this point, can be addressed without the declaration of an emergency. Although all things are on the table for the president," Price said.

He added that the Health and Human Services Department, along with the Justice Department and other agencies, will be working on a strategy to fight the crisis together. "We'll do that in short order," he said.

The Trump administration has consistently taken a law-and-order approach, despite concerns from experts who say treatment should be the priority.

The administration also backed the GOP's Obamacare repeal-and-replace proposal that the CBO estimated would slash Medicaid — the largest payer of behavioral health services — by $800 billion. Advocates have stressed that such a proposal would almost certainly result in less access to treatment for people with addiction.

About 1.2 million people with substance abuse disorders got insurance through the Affordable Care Act's Medicaid expansion, according to a study published in Health Affairs. It also has paid for 35 percent to 50 percent of all medication-assisted treatment administered to help fight opioid addiction, according to the National Council for Behavioral Health.

Tuesday's focus on opioids was quickly praised by GOP lawmakers including Sen. Rob Portman, who campaigned heavily on combating the opioid epidemic during his reelection bid last year and has made it one of his top legislative priorities.

"There is no doubt that this heroin and prescription drug epidemic is a national crisis, and I applaud the president for making this issue a priority," Portman said in a statement.

The White House's Commission on Combating Drug Addiction and the Opioid Crisis last week had recommended the emergency declaration, saying it would allow the federal government to more quickly free up federal funds to expand access to substance-abuse treatments — specifically medication-assisted treatment. Price expressed skepticism about the treatment earlier this year during an appearance in West Virginia. He later walked back his remarks.

During Tuesday's briefing, which included high-profile members of the administration such as counselor Kellyanne Conway and senior adviser Jared Kushner, Trump focused on border security and enforcing laws.

Price later insisted that the Trump administration is not interested in cutting Medicaid.

"The president's goal make certain we have a health care system that works for patients," Price said.

Tuesday's meeting came as new federal data shows drug overdose deaths are on the rise, despite federal and state efforts to curb the crisis. In the first nine months of 2016, the National Center for Health Statistics estimates overdose fatalities hit a record 19.9 per 100,000 people, up from 16.7 for the corresponding period in 2015.

House Oversight pushes NIH for details on glyphosate health study decisions Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 08/08/2017 02:26 PM EDT

House Oversight Chairman Trey Gowdy is pressuring the National Institutes of Health over its decision not to publish a study that examined exposure of thousands of American farmers to glyphosate and found no evidence that the weedkiller causes cancer.

In a letter to NIH Director Dr. Francis Collins on Tuesday, Gowdy argues the Agricultural Health Study's findings related to the health risks of the herbicide could have prevented the International Agency for Research on Cancer from classifying the chemical as a probable carcinogen.

The Agricultural Health Study's results were said to have been ready in 2013. IARC's decision on glyphosate came two years later. The reason why the Agricultural Health Study's results related to glyphosate were not published in time to be included in the IARC review is the subject of intense industry debate and related legal action.

"According to new media reports, AHS researchers published 'numerous studies' from the data collected," Gowdy wrote.

The South Carolina Republican wants to know why Dr. Aaron Blair, one of the senior researchers on the Agricultural Health Study — which was conducted by the U.S. National Cancer Institute — did not bring up the findings when he later led IARC's review of glyphosate.

"The committee is concerned about these new revelations, especially given Dr. Blair's apparent admission that the AHS study was 'powerful,' and would alter IARC's analysis of glyphosate," the letter said.

Glyphosate is the most commonly used herbicide in the world and a key ingredient in Monsanto's RoundUp Ready pesticide. The committee's reference to "new revelations" refers to statements reportedly made in court documents that are part of an ongoing U.S. court case against Monsanto over alleged health effects of glyphosate.

In March, Blair gave a sworn deposition in that case and said data from the Agricultural Health Study would have changed IARC's analysis and made it less likely that glyphosate would have satisfied the agency's standards for classification as "probably carcinogenic," Reuters reported in June.

IARC, which is part of the World Health Organization, only considers public research when assessing substances for carcinogenicity. Monsanto believes the Agricultural Health Study's glyphosate findings could have been published in time to allow it to be used in the IARC review. But Blair told Reuters that was not possible because there was too much data to be incorporated into a single scientific paper. The National Cancer Institute also said "space constraints" led to the decision, according to the Reuters story. The glyphosate results remain unpublished.

Gowdy set a deadline of Aug. 22 for Collins to turn over to the committee "all documents and communications referring or relating to the decision whether to publish the AHS findings on glyphosate," as well as "all documents and communications to or from Dr. Aaron Blair referring or relating to the AHS findings."

The letter was also signed by committee members Blake Farenthold (R-Texas), who chairs the Subcommittee on the Interior, Energy and Environment, and Steve Russell (R-Okla.).

State Department's No. 2 tries to buck up staff morale ahead of reorganization Back

By Nahal Toosi | 08/08/2017 04:44 PM EDT

The State Department's No. 2 official assured staffers Tuesday that plans to restructure the department would take their concerns into full account, comparing the process to U.S. military reforms following the Vietnam War.

At a town hall-style session, Deputy Secretary of State John Sullivan also urged diplomats and other employees to take media reports on the department's woes with a grain of salt.

The gathering was closed to reporters, but two State officials who watched it described it to POLITICO.

The session appeared aimed at bucking up sagging morale at the department, whose budget President Donald Trump wants to cut by a third. Unlike Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, who held a similar event in May, Sullivan took audience questions.

His reference to post-Vietnam reforms in the U.S. military suggests big shifts are afoot; the military saw major changes in organization, doctrine, personnel policy, equipment and training. But Sullivan offered few specifics and few guarantees about what changes may be coming to State, and State Department spokeswoman Heather Nauert said afterward that his reference to the military reforms was about the desire to include people at all levels in the process.

Sullivan described the various working groups involved in rethinking the department, but gave few clues about what bureaus or divisions could be shifted, cut or reorganized, possibly because such decisions are still far from being finalized. He insisted, however, that the goal of the restructuring is not to dismantle State or its partner, the U.S. Agency for International Development.

Despite reports that Tillerson wants to trim the workforce by at least 2,300 people, Sullivan stressed that the redesign is not a synonym for layoffs and that he would do his best to ensure that staff reductions are voluntary. But he also said a hold on lateral transfers for civil servants would stay in place until redesign plans were more concrete.

When asked how seriously the Trump administration is taking a proposal that the State Department's consular services be transferred to the Department of Homeland Security, Sullivan indicated that the leadership at State intends to keep the division under its umbrella. He acknowledged, however, that all options remain on the table.

The department is expected to submit its reorganization proposal to the Office of Management and Budget by mid-September.

The morale at State, whose ranks include civil service and foreign service employees, has sunk precipitously since Trump took office. Tillerson, who is traveling in Asia this week, is widely considered an aloof, isolated figure.

Sullivan is much more popular, and on Tuesday he was full of praise for the 75,000 people who work for the State Department in the U.S. and beyond. Some 450 of those employees attended Tuesday's town hall in person, while video options were available to others.

It's not clear how much power Sullivan wields, although Nauert, the department spokeswoman, described him as an indispensable member of the leadership team. Regardless, staffers were happy the town hall took place.

"The takeaway to me is they've recognized how terrible they've been at communicating with the building," said one of the State Department officials who described the gathering. "It was important that he did this. He was candid about not having all the answers, which always goes a long way."

Some of the staffers' questions Tuesday focused on who has decision-making powers at State, where a backlog of requests for decisions by Tillerson have deeply frustrated diplomats throughout the chain of command.

Sullivan disputed recent news reports that implied that Tillerson's office had taken away decision-making powers from him and all other top officials. The deputy secretary said so-called delegations of authority were being reviewed in hopes of making them more rational and organized.

Sullivan also insisted that the redesign plans were not about concentrating more power in the hands of the secretary of state.

The vast majority of leadership positions at State remain unfilled. Some staffers believe Tillerson is intentionally avoiding filling the positions until after the reorganization is implemented, which could be many months away.

But Sullivan said that candidates have been identified for roughly 60 percent of the positions, which include undersecretaries and assistant secretaries of state, and that they are in the vetting and nominating process.

The deputy secretary took a moment toward the end of the session to urge State staffers not to believe everything they read in the press about what is happening in the agency.

As an example, he pointed to a story that said the State Department was considering dropping democracy promotion from its mission statement. Sullivan insisted the story was unfair because it had looked at only draft statements.

The State Department is committed to the concept of democracy and always will be, Sullivan said.

Shortly afterward, Sullivan met with a group of reporters who cover the State Department, where he reiterated many of the same sentiments he'd shared during the town hall.

New Defense Program Watch added on Navy's frigate program Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 08/08/2017 03:47 PM EDT

POLITICO Pro has added a new entry to its Defense Program Watch on the Navy's nascent effort to acquire a new guided missile frigate.

A request for information on the project was issued in July.

"The government is looking to use an existing ship design that could be modified," states the new program overview. "Some options floated by analysts include Fincantieri's FREMM frigate used by the French and Italian navies and the U.S. Coast Guard's national security cutter built by Huntington Ingalls Industries."

The Defense Watch feature is designed to track some of the most politically dynamic defense programs and policy fights, highlighting legislative action, budget documents and key influencers in government and the private sector. Number of rent-burdened families nears record Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 08/09/2017 12:54 PM EDT

The number of poor families struggling to pay their rent rose to the second-highest level on record, according to a Housing and Urban Development report released today.

The report, which tracks low-income households that receive no housing aid or subsidies, found that 8.3 million families spent more than half their pay on rent or lived in "severely substandard" homes that might lack running water or heat.

That figure, based on 2015 data, is an increase from the 7.72 million rent-burdened households recorded in 2013. The record was set in 2011, when the report counted 8.48 million worst-case families.

HUD's Worst Case Housing Needs report to Congress is published every two years.

"Today's affordable rental housing crisis requires that we take a more business-like approach on how the public sector can reduce the regulatory barriers so the private markets can produce more housing for more families," HUD Secretary Ben Carson said in a written release.

The Trump administration also is seeking to unwind the federal government's role in the mortgage system "and ease the stress on rental markets," the release stated.

For the first time, the HUD report breaks out worst-case housing needs for the largest 15 metropolitan areas. Miami-Ft. Lauderdale had the highest share of rent-burdened households, at 61 percent. In Riverside, Calif., 215,000 households, or 57 percent, paid more than half of their incomes for housing.

The number of worst-case households has increased by 66 percent since 2001, affecting all racial and ethnic groups, HUD found. The rapidly growing population of renters is pushing rents up, particularly for more affordable apartments and houses, as construction lags.

WHAT'S NEXT: Housing advocates are seeking more federal funding for affordable rentals.

Study: Post-9/11 GI Bill boosted college enrollment among veterans Back

By Mel Leonor | 08/09/2017 01:00 PM EDT

The Post-9/11 GI Bill, which covers educational costs for veterans beyond tuition, boosted college enrollment among veterans by 3 percentage points, a new study found.

The study, conducted by New York University's Steinhardt School, found that after education benefits were expanded in 2009, college enrollment rates among veterans immediately spiked by 4 percent and then steadied at 3 percent over time, when compared to enrollment before the bill took effect.

The legislation paid out more than $70 billion for veterans and their families to attend college since it was rolled out.

The findings may signal a boost in college enrollment among veterans ahead. Last week, the Senate signed off on a sweeping expansion of GI Bill education benefits, sending the bipartisan legislation dubbed the "Forever GI Bill" to President Donald Trump's desk.

That bill would increase veterans' benefits by more than $3 billion over the next decade, and would remove, for new enlistees, the 15-year time limit on when recipients must use their GI Bill benefits.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations Brief: Womack leading pack to helm budget panel — No December debt ceiling vote — House resumes minibus debate
Date: Tuesday, September 12, 2017 4:25:44 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 09/12/2017 04:21 PM EDT

GAVEL GRAB: A weeks-long sleeper race to run the House Budget Committee has finally produced a front-runner. Steve Womack is expected to take over for Diane Black when she steps down as chairman in the next few weeks to pursue the Tennessee governor's mansion, four senior Republicans tell Rachael Bade.

Womack would leapfrog other senior members on the panel, just as Black did last year. Like former budget chiefs, the Arkansas Republican is close to leadership and already assists with the House GOP's whipping operations. He's also a prolific fundraiser and frequently pays more than his share of dues to the NRCC.

Tall order: The relatively low-profile lawmaker would suddenly become one of the GOP's most valuable players in this fall's big tax reform battle. Womack would likely be forced to play referee between the House's right-leaning budget members and their much more moderate counterparts in the Senate. Indeed, for months Black has been putting out fires to win over defense hawks, deficit-conscious conservatives and moderates. Budget members were so frustrated by the standoffs this year, in fact, that they privately demanded Black go over Speaker Paul Ryan to get their budget out of committee.

You had one job: The top budget spot has been hard to envy in recent years (though at least two other Republicans, Rob Woodall and Bill Johnson, are also eyeing the position). While the committee's main task is creating an annual fiscal blueprint, the House hasn't passed a budget since 2015.

Two promotions? Womack is one of only three Republicans who sit on both the budget and appropriations panels. And he's currently the only one who's not also a cardinal, though he's hoping that changes in 2018. Upon Charlie Dent's retirement next year, Womack is next in line to lead the MilCon-VA appropriations subcommittee, a post well-suited to a guy who spent 30 years in the Army National Guard.

Stay tuned: The House Republican Steering Committee has not yet announced when it'll formally select the next Budget chairman. And Black isn't ruling out an early end to her term in Congress, according to her hometown paper.

GOOD TUESDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc(s) of the day — A coalition of defense analysts sent a letter this week urging senators to support an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act (H.R. 2810 \(115\)) that would authorize a new round of military base realignments and closures. More from Gregory Hellman.

#DailyBudgetFact — More than 32,600 federal workers are involved in the national response to Hurricane Irma, from the Red Cross to the Army Corps of Engineers. That also includes more than 2,300 FEMA staff.

DEBT CEILING

OFFICIALLY OFF THE TABLE: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said this afternoon that Congress won't be voting in December to raise the debt ceiling — denying Democrats the political leverage they stood to gain if the threat of shutdown collided again with efforts to raise the nation's borrowing limit. "It does not eliminate the extraordinary measures that the Treasury secretary had always had," McConnell told reporters. "It doesn't mean that we won't address the debt ceiling in the future."

Saw it coming: While congressional Republicans and the Trump administration have not said how long they expect the latest patch to last, some economists have predicted the Treasury Department can make do until March with the tide-me-over Congress cleared Friday.

APPROPRIATIONS

SNAIL PACE: It's totally understandable if you've forgotten the House is still debating its minibus. After pausing Friday to pass a different spending package (that will actually fund the government beyond Sept. 30), the lower chamber is back at it this afternoon, picking up with day four of debate on its eight remaining funding bills for fiscal 2018.

Where we left off: The House will debate amendments to the Commerce-Justice-Science title this afternoon, and maybe some Labor-HHS-Education tweaks this evening. But no minibus-related roll calls are expected until Wednesday.

Last of all: The House could wrap up amendments to the Financial Services section Wednesday and vote on passage Thursday.

HITCHING A RIDE: The fast-moving fiscal package that wound up on President Donald Trump's desk last Friday had a little help from the READ Act, H.R. 601 \(115\). Because a version of that global education bill had already passed both chambers this year, the measure was able to bypass Senate procedural steps this month. The sponsors of that bill — Sens. Marco Rubio and Dick Durbin, as well as Reps. Nita Lowey and Dave Reichert — celebrated its enactment in a statement today. (Lowey and then-Sen. Hillary Clinton introduced the first version of the bill in 2004.)

DISASTER RELIEF

METEOROLOGICAL MISCALCULATIONS: The warnings were abundant: Hurricane Irma was supposed to be America's costliest storm on record. Financial forecasters like Georgia-based Enki Research had been predicting $200 billion in damage from Irma alone. Now, with the storm softening as it climbed up the East Coast, that same company's damage estimates have dropped to about \$49 billion.

Fears fading: Moody's now estimates that both hurricanes — Harvey and Irma — will cost between $150 billion and $200 billion together, Matt Dixon reports. That's on par with Katrina in 2005, but much less than initially expected for the more recent storms. "Damage may not be as severe as once feared," Risk Management Solutions hurricane-tracker Tom Sabbatelli wrote in a blog post Monday. The company had initially predicted damages of around $85 billion.

NOT GONNA GUESS: A FEMA spokesperson said it's "too early to speculate on the full impacts of Hurricanes Harvey and Irma."

Key word is 'cost-sharing': Over the last week, the White House has declared disaster zones in six states and U.S. territories, making those areas eligible for federal aid. But that doesn't mean the feds are picking up the full tab. For debris removal and hazard mitigation, the government covers only a limited share of those costs. For the Virgin Islands and the Seminole Tribe of Florida, that's between 75 and 90 percent. For Puerto Rico and Florida, FEMA hasn't yet said how much it'll reimburse.

Full funding: In places like Florida and the Virgin Islands, the federal government says it will cover 100 percent of funding for "emergency protective measures." Even still, Florida will only have 30 days to get Washington to fully pay those costs. And in Alabama, only 75 percent of that will be covered.

TAX

COURTING CONTINUES: President Donald Trump has invited three Democratic senators over for dinner tonight to chat about tax reform as he tries to get more members of the minority party in his corner, Burgess Everett reports. Democrats invited: Joe Manchin, Heidi Heitkamp and Joe Donnelly. GOP attendees: Pat Toomey, Orrin Hatch and John Thune.

Corporate rate in question: Although getting to a 15 percent corporate tax rate remains Trump's goal, Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin said this morning that he doesn't know if that's possible, Aaron Lorenzo reports. FWIW, new Heritage Foundation findings conclude that worker wages stand to benefit greatly from a corporate rate reduction.

Deets, please: Amid the ongoing strategizing, congressional Republicans are getting antsy for a concrete plan, Colin Wilhelm and Aaron explain.

IMMIGRATION

NO 'DREAMER'-LINKED BORDER WALL DEMAND: Trump is sending both public and private signals that he is ready to tackle "DREAMer" legislation and won't demand it be tied to funding for a border wall, Seung Min Kim and Andrew Restuccia report. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said today that Trump told her privately that he would sign the DREAM Act — a bill that would provide a path to permanent legal status for young, undocumented immigrants — and that he wants "some border security." Marc Short, the White House's director of legislative affairs, also said today that he doesn't want "to bind ourselves into a construct that makes reaching a conclusion on DACA impossible."

DEFENSE

FORCED TO HOLD OFF: Congress' latest appropriations punt is forcing the Pentagon to make big spending sacrifices. The Defense Department will need to cut back on almost all hiring and training, while also dealing with steeper acquisition prices, Gregory Hellman writes.

CHUGGING ALONG: The Senate on Monday night advanced its annual defense bill, NDAA, Connor O'Brien reports. Lawmakers are still aiming for final passage this week, though votes could be complicated by Rand Paul's stand against the bill. Next up: as many as 400 amendment votes on issues like transgender troops and forcing Pentagon base closures.

EDUCATION

VOUCHER PLAN LOSES STEAM: The Trump administration's effort to expand school choice seems to be going nowhere right now. Republicans appear unlikely to add a controversial tax credit for private schooling to the overhaul plan they'll already struggle to pass, the White House has been mum on the issue for months, "school choice" is a nonstarter among House and Senate appropriators and experts don't see a school tax credit passing as a standalone bill, Caitlin Emma explains.

ECONOMY

INCOME STILL FLAT: The U.S. Census reported a 3.2 percent increase today in U.S. median household income between 2015 and 2016, Timothy Noah explains. But after factoring in inflation, average income is essentially unchanged. Again, we're reminded that income levels and wages are the most stubborn economic indicators in the post-recovery phase of the recession. As the Economic Policy Institute notes, that's down 1.6 percent since 2007 and is 2.3 percent lower than 2000.

TREASURY

THE INSTAGRAM POST THAT WON'T DIE: Now comes the sequel to the cyber quarrel that broke out last month about Louise Linton's #Valentino- and #hermesscarf-tagged Instagram pic. A watchdog group is suing the Treasury Department for documents related to Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin's use of a government plane to fly to Kentucky with his wife in August, Victoria Guida reports.

FLOOD INSURANCE

INVESTOR PAYOUT: The two hurricanes that slammed the U.S. this month are testing the National Flood Insurance Program's new reinsurance strategy. For just the second time in its history, the debt-laden program is relying on a group of 25 outside investors to help bail out waterlogged homeowners. In January, those reinsurers bought coverage for about $150 million. Now, they could be paying up to $1 billion to help cover the severe Gulf Coast flooding, as Zachary Warmbrodt reports. It's the biggest payout yet for the program, and it's got officials optimistic about the next reinsurance placement planned for January.

ENERGY

ELECTRIC GRID GRANTS: The Energy Department announced $50 million in grants today to improve security and resilience of the electric grid, Eric Geller reports.

ELECTIONS

DREAMING BIG: Democratic senators in charge of 2018 election planning are holding out hope (at least publicly) that they could take back the upper chamber. Kevin Robillard and Gabriel Debenedetti explain that reelecting red-state incumbents is still the top priority for Senate Democratic strategists. But they have also begun investigating opportunities to play offense on GOP turf.

OPIOIDS

CHRISTE DEFENDS TRUMP'S DELAY: New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie says he knows Trump's "heart" on addressing the opioid crisis, trying to explain away the fact that the president has yet to declare the epidemic a national emergency, Katie Jennings reports.

WE'RE COUNTING: 87 days until federal funding runs out and the National Flood Insurance Program expires (Dec. 8, 2017), 18 days until the Children's Health Insurance Program is up for renewal (Sept. 30, 2017). 383 days until farm bill authorization is up (Sept. 30, 2018). [Who knows how many] days until the nation will default if the debt limit isn't raised.

Republicans jockey for looming Budget chairman vacancy Back

By Rachael Bade | 09/11/2017 06:22 PM EDT

A handful of Republicans are lining up to replace outgoing House Budget Chairman Diane Black, quietly jockeying for a gavel that will play a starring role in the upcoming tax reform fight.

Budget panel Republicans Steve Womack, Rob Woodall and Bill Johnson are all eyeing the position, the lawmakers confirmed in interviews. Womack and Johnson have already alerted Speaker Paul Ryan of their interest and started buttonholing members of the House panel that elects its chair — though Black, who is running for Tennessee governor, will likely retain her position until the House passes its 2018 blueprint, which is expected around the end of the month.

Four senior Republicans said Womack is currently front-runner. While not the most senior member on the panel, the Arkansas Republican has a good reputation with leadership and conservatives alike. He also organized the National Republican Congressional Committee's March dinner with President Donald Trump, which brought in $30 million for the campaign arm.

"There's an expectation that Black will step down having announced for governor of Tennessee, creating a vacancy in the chair, and I'm interested in taking the chairmanship," Womack said. "These are very important times for our majority... and I think the Budget Committee will be very critical in establishing the right framework whereby a sustainable fiscal policy can be crafted that can reach many of the outcomes that a majority of our majority would like to see."

The next chairman would take the gavel at a critical time for Republicans. The party has failed to repeal Obamacare, fund Trump's border wall with Mexico or otherwise secure a single major legislative victory. Tax reform therefore looms large, with many in the GOP seeing it as a must-have to avoid a blood bath in 2018.

But to unlock the fast-tracking procedural tool enabling Republicans to circumvent the Senate's 60-vote threshold and pass a partisan tax package, GOP lawmakers have to pass an identical budget through the House and Senate.

That's where the new budget chairman will be critical. Even if the House clears Black's fiscal blueprint in the coming weeks, Senate budget writers are expected to write a much different plan, jump-starting a series of high-level bicameral negotiations between budget chairmen about what a deal might look like.

There will be plenty of drama. Several senior Republican sources said the final deal might be a "shell" budget that simply includes instructions for tax reform but makes no major cuts to mandatory spending programs, as the House's current draft proposes. That would meet with stiff resistance from conservatives, who were promised by GOP leaders that they would not have to vote on text that includes no serious reforms.

The next budget chairman will have to strike a tricky balance between conservatives eager for spending cuts and House GOP leaders dealing with the more moderate-minded Senate.

Many thought Rep. Todd Rokita (R-Ind.) — Budget Committee vice chairman — would replace Black. But the budget wonk decided to run for Senate in Indiana instead and is locking horns with Rep. Luke Messer (R-Ind.) in the hotly contested primary.

The next two most-senior members, Reps. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) and Mario Diaz Balart (R-Fla.), are both senior members of the Appropriations panel and don't want to give up their subcommittee gavels on the powerful spending committee.

Rep. Tom McClintock (R-Calif.) and Woodall come next, and sources say both are interested, though McClintock's office did not respond to request for comment.

Woodall, a Georgia Republican, said his goal would be "getting [the committee] out of the messaging business and translating that into action," along with tackling budget process reform.

"In the minority you think of a messaging document. In the majority, it is a framework for how to get things done," he said. "So what are those things we could get done together? My goal would be to find those items."

Womack is considered the front-runner because of his leadership experience. He sits on the deputy whip team and often exceeds dues to the NRCC — something the House Republican Steering Committee takes into account when choosing chairmen.

The former mayor, who spent 30 years in the Army National Guard, would want to retain his post on the Appropriations Committee, where he is next in line for a subcommittee gavel. A spot is opening up with Rep. Charlie Dent, an Appropriations subcommittee chief, retiring next year.

Like many Budget Republicans, Womack has admired Black's work on the current budget plan, which includes $200 billion worth of mandatory spending cuts that's garnered applause from conservatives. Womack says he'd like to continue in that vein, arguing that reducing the national debt "cannot be satisfied by cutting discretionary spending alone."

"With the deficits we're talking about, it is absolutely important to have the conversation about what's going on on the mandatory side," he said.

Womack also argued that the budget is critical for tax reform. "It's important for Republicans to keep their eye on the collective prize, and right now if it's not health care, it has to be tax reform," he said. "This isn't an area [where] we can stumble, so we need to be all hands on deck on the vehicle that will give us tax reform."

Johnson of Ohio, an early Trump defender in the House, is also considering a bid for the chairmanship. Elected in 2010, the former Air Force lieutenant colonel has always kept a lower profile on the Hill but also has a good reputation with leadership. He currently serves as an NRCC vice chair.

"I have dealt with budgets my entire life, whether it was on the mule farm or in my Air Force career or as a corporate executive," Johnson said, in making his pitch. "Passing a budget is foundational to our constitutional mandate. There's not much that's more important in fact in the big scheme of things than passing a budget, balancing a budget and managing our nation's financial and fiscal health."

Coalition of defense analysts urges support for McCain-Reed BRAC amendment Back

By Gregory Hellman | 09/12/2017 11:18 AM EDT

A coalition of defense analysts from think tanks and interest groups is urging senators to support an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act (H.R. 2810 \(115\)) that would authorize a new round of military base realignments and closures.

In a letter, organized by Defense Priorities, the experts seek to rally support for an amendment expected to be offered this week on the Senate floor by Armed Services Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) and ranking Democrat Jack Reed of Rhode Island that would establish a new Base Realignment and Closure commission to review all installations in 2021.

Defense Priorities argues the proposal would improve the link between basing and strategy, improve cost controls and strengthen congressional oversight compared to previous BRAC rounds.

"The McCain-Reed amendment is carefully tailored to maximize the benefits for U.S. taxpayers and our military," the experts say in their letter.

They also cite the support for a new BRAC round offered by Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and the new assistant secretary of Defense for energy, installations and the environment, Lucian Niemeyer, last week at the Heritage Foundation.

Among those signing the letter were analysts from the Project on Government Oversight, Heritage Action for America, Concerned Veterans for America, FreedomWorks, the Atlantic Council, National Taxpayers Union, the London Center for Policy Research, the Hoover Institution and Peace Action.

McConnell: No December debt ceiling vote Back

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 09/12/2017 02:47 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said this afternoon that Congress won't vote again this year to raise the debt ceiling.

"It does not eliminate the extraordinary measures that the Treasury secretary had always had," McConnell told reporters. "It doesn't mean that we won't address the debt ceiling in the future."

But the vote "will not be in December," he explained.

While Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has not officially predicted how much time Congress has until the nation will reach its borrowing limit, some economists have predicted lawmakers might be able to hold out until March before risking default.

After President Donald Trump struck a deal with Democrats last week to temporarily raise the debt ceiling along with stopgap spending and disaster aid, GOP lawmakers began insisting the White House come up with a plan for cutting spending in the next effort to lift the limit.

POLITICO Pro Florida: Moody's: Irma could cost $92B in economic damages Back

By Matt Dixon | 09/12/2017 11:34 AM EDT

The economic cost of Hurricane Irma could be between $64 billion and $92 billion, according to estimates released today by Moody's Analytics.

Collectively, the firm said the impacts of Hurricanes Irma and Harvey, which decimated southeast Texas and Houston, could cost between $150 billion and $200 billion in total damages. That includes damage to "homes and furnishing, vehicles, commercial real estate, and public infrastructure.

"This is comparable to the property loss resulting from Hurricane Katrina," read the estimate.

The firm noted that the estimates are likely to change as additional damage is discovered, but did say that mainstays of both state's economies should bounce back by the end of the month.

"We expect the Texas energy industry and Florida tourism to be operating at close to the normal by the end of September," wrote Mark Zandi, Moody's Analytics chief economist.

He predicted that Congress will appropriate money beyond the $15 billion approved last week for storm damages in Florida and Texas. The federal dollars, coupled with insurance money, should help offset damages.

"As with most natural disasters in recent years, we anticipate that the combination of insurance money and government aid will roughly cover the full cost of the property damage and the lost economic output," Zandi wrote.

He anticipated that the storms' aftermath will boost GDP by the fourth quarter, but there are some caveats.

"The timing and magnitude of the rebuilding bump to growth will depend on labor availability," he wrote. "There were already mounting labor shortages in both Texas and Florida before the storms, and they will surely be much more acute in their wake."

Mexico no longer offering Harvey aid after deadly quake Back

By Louis Nelson | 09/12/2017 07:14 AM EDT

The Mexican government will no longer offer aid to Texas and Louisiana to help with recovery efforts in the wake of Hurricane Harvey, Mexico's foreign ministry announced Monday, instead redirecting that aid to portions of its own nation damaged by a powerful earthquake and Hurricane Katia.

The 8.2 magnitude earthquake struck central Mexico last week near the city of Oaxaca, killing 95 people and injuring hundreds more, the Mexican foreign ministry said. Separately, Hurricane Katia's landfall inflicted "significant damage" on the Mexican state of Veracruz, the foreign ministry said.

"Given this situation, the Mexican government will channel all available logistical support to the families and communities that have been affected in Mexico and has informed the Texas and U.S. governments that, unfortunately, on this occasion, it won't be possible to provide the assistance originally offered," Mexico's foreign ministry said. "This decision is due to the fact that conditions in both countries have changed and that Texas's need for assistance has fortunately diminished."

The Mexican government had offered to send food, personnel, boats and other supplies as part of the Harvey recovery effort. Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray said last month during a visit to Washington that "We are neighbors, we are friends. That's what friends do."

But while homeland security adviser Tom Bossert said President Donald Trump was "deeply touched" by a phone call from his Mexican counterpart offering aid and assistance, the federal government did not officially accept Mexico's aid. The Mexican government noted in its statement that its offer had been accepted by the state of Texas, which said it could use the logistical support offered by Mexico.

Trump, who has not publicly offered condolences to Mexico in the wake of its earthquake and hurricane landfall, has made getting tough with America's southern neighbor a key part of his political agenda, pledging to either renegotiate or tear up NAFTA and to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border that Mexico will pay for.

The Mexican government, along with Canada, has agreed to renegotiations of NAFTA but has insisted at every turn that it will not pay for Trump's long-promised wall.

Late Monday night, the State Department released a readout of a phone call between Secretary of State Rex Tillerson and Videgaray in which Tillerson "offered his condolences for the loss of life and the devastation caused by the earthquake in Mexico and from Hurricane Katia" and informed him that "the U.S. government stands ready to assist our neighbors in Mexico during this difficult time."

Hurricane Irma's path through Florida likely to expose crop insurance gaps Back

By Sabrina Rodriguez and Catherine Boudreau | 09/11/2017 06:18 PM EDT

As Hurricane Irma ravaged Caribbean islands late last week and churned northward, Florida organic fruit grower Jonathan Gambino predicted his farm could be decimated.

If most of his trees are destroyed, he told POLITICO, there would be no insurance check to replace them. "We'll be at square one," said Gambino, owner of Three Sisters Farm, in Homestead. "We do not have insurance, since we can't afford it. We're just trying to come out alive and rebuild."

As Florida farmers assess damage from Irma, the storm's statewide path of destruction is likely to reveal gaps in the federal crop insurance program and put pressure on lawmakers to find a solution as they debate the next farm bill. The high cost of covering specialty crops — fruits, vegetables and tree nuts — has led many growers to forgo insurance, leaving them at risk of being wiped out by the disaster.

The four-decade-old crop insurance program, overseen by USDA's Risk Management Agency and administered by private companies, subsidizes an average of 60 percent of farmers' premiums to help them buy protection against natural disasters. But historically it has primarily covered commodities like corn, soybeans and wheat.

The program has expanded in recent years to cover more fresh produce and organic crops. Yet because specialty crops are grown on a much smaller scale than commodities, it has been challenging to keep premium prices affordable. The smaller scale also makes it difficult to forecast market prices and develop and administer the policies. And the large number of varieties within the specialty crop classification makes insuring them even more complex.

In recent decades USDA has expanded the crop-insurance program to cover about 73 percent of fruit and tree nut acreage and 32 percent of vegetable crops nationwide, while major commodities are about 85 percent covered, according to RMA data. The specialty crop industry accounts for just 8 percent of premiums, while commodity crops account for much of the rest.

The lack of insurance for specialty crops could hit Florida especially hard. With the exception of sugarcane, the majority of the state's biggest fall and winter crops are considered specialty crops, including oranges, grapefruit, sweet corn, green beans, strawberries, tomatoes and squash.

Florida farmers are insured for an estimated $2.7 billion in losses. But while most of the state's sugarcane (98 percent), cotton (91 percent) and citrus (87 percent) are insured, only 59 percent of fresh tomatoes, 57 percent of sweet corn and 44 percent of bell peppers are covered, according to a 2015 RMA report on specialty crops. None of the 29,200 acres of fresh beans are covered.

"It's become very cost-prohibitive for folks in specialty crops to engage in it," said John Walt Boatright, national affairs coordinator for the Florida Farm Bureau, the state's largest agricultural organization, of the crop insurance program. "There are really only a few options that our specialty crop producers can turn to."

The state also produces most of the domestic supply of fresh vegetables during the winter and spring, and Irma-related damage may prevent farmers from planting soon.

"Those crops have just been planted or are about to be, so the silver lining is it's coming early in the season," said Lisa Lochridge, director of public affairs at Florida Fruit and Vegetable Association. "If the crops on the field are flooded or damaged, farmers will have to make the decision of whether or not to replant."

Lochridge said Irma is particularly worrisome for citrus growers as their trees are now full of fruit. Navel oranges and grapefruit, for example, are in season beginning in November. Gambino, the Homestead grower, said his concern was largely for the lime industry, which he said was practically erased from South Florida after Hurricane Andrew in 1992 but has been making a comeback in the region.

The damage in Florida is likely to add urgency to the debate in Congress over how to improve crop insurance in the next farm bill. The legislation — which covers everything from agricultural subsidies and nutrition programs to conservation and trade policy — is due for reauthorization at the end of September 2018.

Many lawmakers, including Senate Agriculture ranking member Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), support expanding crop insurance for specialty crop growers. That would mean increasing the cost of the program — something that's continually criticized by taxpayer watchdog groups and some members of Congress who call for cuts that would make wealthy farmers ineligible for premium subsidies, among other reforms. The 2018 farm bill is on track to be a budget balancing act, as the GOP pushes forward on its agenda to reduce the federal deficit.

Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue said he is waiting to see how the crop insurance program addresses farmers' losses caused by Harvey and Irma, as well as from wildfires blazing in the Northwest. Perdue told reporters on Friday that the farm safety net should be structured so it meets producers' needs, including after natural disasters, instead of leaving farmers and ranchers relying on Congress to enact supplemental disaster assistance measures. Perdue on several occasions also has said that the crop insurance program should not promise farmers profitability.

Perdue, before departing on a multi-state tour this summer to listen to concerns from members of the U.S. agricultural industry, said he plans to be "intimately" involved in the 2018 farm bill. Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) has voiced plans to get a draft of the legislation done by the end of the year. His counterpart on the House Agriculture Committee, Mike Conaway (R-Texas), is aiming for a similar timeline, and both are staunch defenders of the program.

On Monday, Florida agricultural leaders and farmers were beginning to assess the damage as Irma, which was downgraded to a tropical storm, moved into Georgia, Alabama and the Carolinas. Florida Agriculture Commissioner Adam Putnam said in a statement that state leaders were working to contact farmers and take stock of the destruction.

"At this time, it is too soon to tell just how much Hurricane Irma has devastated the agriculture industry," Putnam said.

Even with insurance, farmers say, losses could be devastating.

Paul Allen, co-owner of R.C. Hatton Inc. in Pahokee, Fla., said it will take weeks for him to determine his losses. He said that while he has some fresh vegetables — sweet corn, green beans and tomatoes — in the ground, he's most worried about his more than 4,000 acres of sugarcane.

"We have our sugarcane insured, but there's, regardless, too much at stake," said Allen, who also has a farm in south Georgia. "It won't cover all the loss, and when you look at it, the economic impact is high. That's the trial of farming."

USDA eases SNAP rules for areas affected by Hurricane Irma Back

By Sabrina Rodriguez | 09/12/2017 01:38 PM EDT

The USDA's Food and Nutrition Service has approved a waiver that eases Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program regulations in Florida, Georgia and the Virgin Islands in an effort to aid victims of Hurricane Irma.

"Working with our state and private-sector partners, we are actively taking measures to ensure that people in these areas get the food they need," Agriculture Department Secretary Sonny Perdue said today.

SNAP recipients will be able to buy hot and ready-to-eat foods with their benefits through the end of September. Recipients of the Nutrition Assistance Program in Puerto Rico will have access to the same benefits.

The USDA also already has issued all of its September benefits to recipients in the affected areas to ensure they have access to food in the aftermath of the hurricane.

FNS has not made decided whether to offer the Disaster Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (D-SNAP) to the affected states, but is in talks with state and territory officials in case that's necessary. On Monday, USDA and Texas state health officials announced they would offer the food assistance program for Hurricane Harvey victims who qualify, but who are normally ineligible for food stamp benefits.

Continuing to court Democrats, Trump will host dinner on tax reform Back

By Burgess Everett | 09/11/2017 11:05 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will host a dinner on Tuesday with moderate Democrats and Republican senators focused on tax reform as he continues to court Democrats after cutting a debt ceiling deal last week.

Trump and Vice President Mike Pence will host the dinner on Tuesday evening, the White House said. Democratic Sens. Joe Manchin of West Virginia, Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota and Joe Donnelly of Indiana have been invited and are expected to attend, aides said. GOP Sens. Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, Orrin Hatch of Utah and John Thune of South Dakota are among the Republican attendees.

The dinner is expected to center on tax reform, the aides said, now Trump's top priority.

The three moderate Democrats are all up for reelection next year in states Trump won handily in 2016. They have also been closer to the president than other congressional Democrats. Each declined to join a letter with party leaders outlining conditions on tax reform and all three supported Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch earlier this year.

Trump appeared onstage with Heitkamp last week at a tax reform event in North Dakota, and the president called her a "good woman" and said he hoped to have her support. Trump's friendly movements toward Democrats have annoyed some Republicans, who are hoping to oust them next year to pad their majority.

But Trump is trying a bipartisan approach of late after a partisan Obamacare repeal effort failed earlier this year. He agreed to a fiscal deal with Chuck Schumer and Nancy Pelosi last week and has angled for some Democratic votes on tax reform.

Republicans are planning to pursue reform in the Senate via a majority vote threshold, though any Democratic votes could be key due to the GOP's narrow 52-seat majority and internal divisions.

Mnuchin acknowledges 15 percent corporate rate not likely Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 09/12/2017 10:05 AM EDT

Cutting the corporate tax rate to 15 percent might not be possible, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said Tuesday morning.

That remains President Donald Trump's goal, but the cost of getting that low could stand in the way, Mnuchin said at an event hosted by CNBC.

"I don't know if we'll be able to achieve that, given the budget issues, but we're going to get this down to a very competitive level," he said.

A rate between 20 percent and 25 percent has been described as more feasible, and Mnuchin said the exact number is less important than accomplishing tax reform.

Mnuchin and White House top economic adviser Gary Cohn are scheduled to meet with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and the Republicans on the Budget Committee Tuesday to talk about passing a budget, which will determine the scope of a tax reform bill that lawmakers can pass without Democratic votes.

Trump is hosting a bipartisan dinner to talk about tax reform Tuesday night that will include three Senate Democrats. But Mnuchin also said Trump's recent agreement with Democratic leaders in Congress on hurricane disaster aid and the debt limit doesn't signal bipartisan tax reform is being pursued. Administration officials and GOP leaders in Congress are prepared to use reconciliation, the Republican-only pathway to passing legislation by preventing Senate Democrats from blocking bills.

Mnuchin reiterated plans to eliminate the federal deduction for state and local taxes, and added that he hoped state taxes wouldn't rise in places like California and New York.

Trump, Mnuchin and congressional Republicans are also negotiating to reduce taxes for businesses that file their taxes through their owners' individual returns, but they will limit which firms qualify for lower rates.

Workers would gain most under corporate tax cut, Heritage study says Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 09/11/2017 04:44 PM EDT

Workers stand to benefit greatly from a corporate tax rate reduction, according to new research findings from the conservative Heritage Foundation that dovetail with frequent comments by Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin.

The reason: the existing corporate income tax suppresses worker wages, said Heritage's Adam Michel.

"Most empirical estimates conclude that labor bears between 75 percent and 100 percent of the tax burden, with results in the literature ranging from 45 percent to 420 percent," he wrote in the paper.

"The average American household will share the benefits of a corporate rate cut through higher wages," Michel wrote.

That contrasts with other economists' findings that corporate taxes fall on the owners of capital, notably shareholders.

"While it is hard to say what most economists think about anything, a fair reading of the literature suggests that while workers do bear some of the burden of the corporate tax, they don't bear much. Thus, they would not benefit much from a corporate tax cut," the centrist Tax Policy Center's Howard Gleckman recently posted online.

Michel concluded such assessments are dated. In today's open world economy in which capital can move easily across borders, the tax burden has shifted from owners of capital to labor, he wrote.

Mnuchin has often said that 70 percent of taxes on businesses gets passed on to workers. He and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn are negotiating with GOP leaders in Congress to reduce the 35 percent corporate tax rate as low as possible; President Donald Trump is pushing for 15 percent.

WHAT'S NEXT: Mnuchin and Cohn are heading to Capitol Hill on Tuesday to discuss the budget and tax reform with Senate leaders.

GOP lawmakers jittery over lack of tax reform details Back

By Colin Wilhelm and Aaron Lorenzo | 09/12/2017 05:06 AM EDT

Congressional Republicans came back to Washington ready and eager to work on tax reform, but they're still missing one thing: a plan.

That's triggered frustration among rank-and-file lawmakers who feel pressure from President Donald Trump to pass a tax reform bill but have seen no plans and worry they'll be backed into a corner on legislation they haven't even seen, much like they were with the failed Obamacare repeal earlier this summer.

"This time around there is no room for error. This has got to be a home run," Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.) said, recalling the GOP's Obamacare fiasco. "I would hope everyone wants to know what's in it before you vote on it. That's the old [Nancy] Pelosi joke on health care, it turned into a colossal joke. 'You'll find out what's in it after we pass it.'"

A member of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, speaking on condition of anonymity to speak freely said, "It is frustrating and concerning that we don't have the details and yet we're going to be asked in 60 days to vote on something,"

The member suggested that congressional and administration leaders negotiating a plan are holding back information either to avoid leaks or because they haven't found enough common ground yet to share anything.

There are still disagreements among negotiators in closed-door meetings over crucial issues, including:

- The corporate tax rate, with President Donald Trump pushing for a 15 percent rate that others see as unrealistic because of its cost.
- The lack of a clear path forward on the 2018 budget, which will be used as a vehicle for tax reform.
- Allowing businesses to immediately write off the costs of equipment and other big investments.

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and top Trump economic adviser Gary Cohn are set to meet with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Senate Budget Committee members Tuesday to strategize on the budget. Mnuchin, Cohn and McConnell belong to the "Big Six" group of tax reform negotiators, along with House Speaker Paul Ryan, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch.

Republican leaders have set a goal of releasing more details this month, but not before GOP members of Ways and Means get a look and give them the OK. But with each day that passes without a plan, the rank and file seem to get more on edge.

"We want a lot more clarity on tax reform," said Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), chairman of the staunchly conservative House Freedom Caucus.

Trump's proposal for a 15 percent tax rate for corporations and other businesses remains a major sticking point, sources familiar with the talks said. The rate is now 35 percent.

But Mnuchin signaled Tuesday the administration's position may be softening.

"I don't know if we'll be able to achieve that, given the budget issues, but we're going to get this down to a very competitive level," he said at an event hosted by CNBC.

The exact number is less important than getting tax reform done, he said.

Republican congressional leaders have mildly, but publicly, broken with Trump on the rate, which they'd initially hoped was a White House negotiating position rather than a concrete goal due to its cost.

"The president's been out there talking about a 15 percent rate, the House has talked about 20, but to get it down from 35 to 20 it's about $100 billion per point," said Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), the third ranking Senate Republican.

Ryan, in a public interview hosted by The New York Times last week, said it was more realistic to meet or beat the average corporate rate of industrialized countries, 22.5 percent.

"Those numbers are really hard to make work," Ryan said when asked about a 15 percent rate, though he added that he'd let tax writers do the "exact math" on what works for budgetary purposes.

As one conservative tax activist put it, "There's still a little more separation than we originally thought," indicating that Trump's 15 percent push set an unrealistic bar. The more he pledges it, as he did at a campaign-style rally last week in North Dakota, the harder it would be for him to shift, the activist said.

The House, Senate and White House also remain divided over the budget, which Republicans plan to use as the vehicle for tax reform to get around Democratic opposition in the Senate. The budget would include "reconciliation" instructions designed to avert a filibuster.

"A budget resolution only has to do with one thing and that's tax reform," Brat said. "So if you're going to vote on tax reform, OK what's it look like? And we don't know yet. So it's very hard to vote on a budget resolution, which has as its sole objective doing tax reform, when you don't know what tax reform looks like. And so that's our objection."

In addition, the negotiators continue to wrestle over full, immediate expensing of capital investments for businesses. They are at odds over whether the provision is necessary to juice the economy or too expensive when combined with tax cuts.

Two meetings last week of the Big Six — one on Tuesday with Trump and a follow-up on Thursday — yielded little in the way of movement, at least publicly.

Mnuchin, who is one of the negotiators, told POLITICO as he left the second meeting "we are very close" to finalizing a tax reform agreement, but offered no specifics. Mnuchin also said the administration and congressional leaders were "absolutely" close to releasing a plan, a week after claiming on television that "a very detailed plan" was being shared with members of Congress.

That was news to lawmakers.

"I would think I would be in a position to see that but I haven't," said Meadows, who is one of the members of Congress closest to the administration.

Ways and Means members say they know little more at this point.

"There's nothing concrete yet," said Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla.), though he added that he thought a framework would be set soon.

Rep. Jackie Walorski (R-Ind.), another Ways and Means member, said, "The president has some final decisions to make and I think when that happens then we roll."

Though congressional Republicans remain cautiously optimistic they will be able to deliver on their promise to overhaul the tax code, they know they have a limited opportunity and fear further delay will only allow interest groups to fully mobilize to fight any changes that might curb or eliminate tax provisions important to them.

Thune said basic questions have to be answered about how to measure the costs and benefits of tax cuts, as well as to what extent they are paid for by ending existing tax breaks.

"And that, obviously, is where you start getting into the controversy," Thune said. "Because every time you kill a deduction or preference or some exemption in the code there's some constituency for that."

Trump unlikely to demand border wall for Dreamers bill Back

By Seung Min Kim and Andrew Restuccia | 09/12/2017 10:54 AM EDT

President Donald Trump is sending public and private signals that he is ready to deal on legislation protecting young undocumented immigrants and won't demand funding for a border wall.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said Tuesday that Trump told her in private that he would sign the Dream Act — a bill that would provide a path to permanent legal status for so-called Dreamers — and that he wants "some border security." Meanwhile, a top White House aide indicated Tuesday that the Trump administration would not insist that legislation codifying protections for Dreamers be tied to border wall funding.

"We've been very clear: There is no wall in our DACA future. It's just not going to happen," Pelosi said in a small roundtable with reporters, recounting her conversations with Trump. "I think it's immoral, I think it's expensive and ineffective. And so we're not going to that place."

Pelosi said she and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) pressed Trump on protection for Dreamers during the Oval Office meeting last week, with the two Democrats saying "we will not rest until it is passed as soon as possible."

"It was important to us, so we wanted some assurances that the president would sign the bill and that we would have some cooperation in passing such a bill," the California Democrat added. "That's been a major piece of that meeting."

Marc Short, the White House's director of legislative affairs, also said Tuesday that the administration is "most interested in getting border security" and that Trump believes a barrier such as a wall "is important to that equation of border security."

"Whether or not that is part of a DACA equation or whether or not that's another legislative vehicle — I don't want us to bind ourselves into a construct that makes reaching a conclusion on DACA impossible," Short said during a breakfast hosted by the Christian Science Monitor.

Those comments underscore Trump's desire to see Congress approve legislation that essentially would turn the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program — an Obama-era executive action that Trump said this month he would end — into law. The president has given Congress six months to come up with a legislative fix, and several Republicans interested in immigration policy have urged the administration to make clear publicly what it is seeking in any deal.

Though the administration seems to be conceding on the wall for now, it isn't for lack of trying. After a New York-New Jersey delegation meeting at the White House to discuss a local transportation project last week, Trump privately pressed Schumer on giving the administration resources for a wall in exchange for signing a Dreamer plan into law, according to one person familiar with the exchange.

Schumer stressed to Trump in the one-on-one conversation that Democrats absolutely would not support that proposal, reiterating that point again to the president when he asked Schumer a similar question about 10 minutes later, according to the source.

Democrats have repeatedly drawn a hard line against construction of a 2,000-mile barrier along the southern border with Mexico, either in government spending negotiations or in talks over how to codify DACA into law. Key Democrats have, however, indicated they will have to accept some modest border security measures to pick up support from congressional Republicans on a DACA fix.

"'You pass it, I'll sign it, I want some border stuff.' That's what he said," Pelosi recounted. "We always want border stuff, so that's not a problem. Especially with all the technologies."

Pelosi didn't indicate what type of specific border security provisions would be palatable to most Democrats, saying her party was focused on a "clean" Dream Act and pressuring GOP lawmakers, particularly moderates, to get on board.

House Democrats will launch a discharge petition effort later this month to try to force the issue to the floor, and Pelosi said they will focus on persuading the roughly two dozen House Republicans who have endorsed a more conservative version of the Dream Act sponsored by Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla.). That legislation, Pelosi said in the reporters' roundtable, was "not good enough."

Apart from the border wall, a host of other controversial policies are likely to arise as potential tradeoffs for legislation concerning DACA.

GOP Sens. Tom Cotton of Arkansas and David Perdue of Georgia have said they would like to see their bill that enacts deep cuts to legal immigration levels — legislation endorsed by the White House — attached to any DACA bill. Some Senate Republicans have looked at tougher enforcement measures, such as a broader E-Verify system to prevent businesses from hiring workers without legal status. Conservative Republicans may also continue to insist on a wall.

Meanwhile, Democrats have furiously strategized behind the scenes about how to push the Dreamer issue, especially with must-pass legislation facing Congress throughout the rest of the year.

Some Democrats privately mulled trying to attach legislation that would grant legal status to DACA recipients serving in the military as part of the National Defense Authorization Act, which the Senate is taking up this week, according to multiple sources.

But Democrats determined that they didn't want to risk angering Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) — for whom the defense bill is a top priority — particularly because McCain is a longtime champion of comprehensive immigration reform and would be a critical GOP ally in a legislative battle over Dreamers, the sources said.

The Pentagon said last week that about 900 people currently in the military, or who have enlisted, have the temporary DACA protections, according to the Associated Press.

Established by President Barack Obama in 2012, the DACA program currently grants temporary work permits and protections from deportation to about 690,000 undocumented immigrants who entered the country as minors. Though he moved to end the program, Trump has publicly voiced concern about the fate of the hundreds of thousands of young people who are protected by it. He wrote on Twitter last week that he would "revisit the issue" if Congress fails to act.

White House aides have long considered trying to get Democrats to support funding a border wall — a key pledge of Trump's during the 2016 campaign — in exchange for moving forward with a Dreamers bill. But, amid a massive public backlash over Trump's decision to end DACA, the president has grown increasingly eager for a legislative solution to that issue.

Short added later at the breakfast that the president remains committed to building the border wall.

Meanwhile, Pelosi hinted that Obama, who last week condemned Trump's decision to unilaterally end DACA, would soon become more vocal in other political battles, particularly the midterm elections.

"He has made clear his priority was to speak out first and foremost on the Dreamers because this was really wrong," Pelosi said Tuesday. "At some point, I'm hopeful that he will be helpful to our House and Senate efforts, and I think he will."

Pentagon details negative impacts of a CR Back

By Gregory Hellman | 09/11/2017 07:12 PM EDT

The Defense Department will need to cancel scheduled training, curtail hiring and suffer reduced readiness and increased acquisition costs under a continuing spending resolution, the Pentagon tells the Senate Armed Services Committee.

On Friday, Congress approved a massive spending package with a continuing resolution through Dec. 8. And Defense Secretary Jim Mattis spells out specific effects of it in a letter obtained by POLITICO.

Specifically, the Pentagon will have to reduce training. For example, a lack of funds for the Air Force to stand up two F-16 squadrons under the CR will prevent the service from training enough pilots to begin its readiness recovery, Mattis says.

Additionally, Mattis says, the Navy will have to delay the induction of 11 ships, disrupting maintenance schedules and reducing flying hours and steaming days.

Acquisition costs will also increase under the CR, Mattis says. In addition to the inability to start new programs, costs grow when the Pentagon is forced to enter short-term contracts.

On the personnel side, the Pentagon will need to curtail most hiring, including pilots, maintainers, cyber experts and nuclear trained personnel, Mattis adds.

Despite the detrimental effects, a CR does, however, avoid a government shutdown and provides Congress an opportunity to strike a deal lifting the defense budget caps, Mattis writes.

"Long term CRs impact the readiness of our forces and their equipment at a time when security threats are extraordinarily high," he says.

Senate Armed Services Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) and ranking Democrat Jack Reed of Rhode Island had requested the Pentagon outline the consequences of a CR.

Senate votes to advance NDAA Back

By Connor O'Brien | 09/11/2017 06:15 PM EDT

The Senate today easily cleared its first procedural hurdle to considering the National Defense Authorization Act.

Senators voted 89 to 3 to move forward with the annual defense policy measure H.R. 2810 \(115\). Sixty votes were needed to proceed.

The legislation hit the Senate floor after several delays. It's not yet clear if the Senate will finish debate in just one week, but Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said on the Senate floor that "members from both sides will have opportunities" to propose amendments.

"Ultimately, we'll keep working to find consensus so that we can pass this critical defense legislation without further delay," McConnell said.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) said he hoped Senate Armed Services Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) and ranking Democrat Jack Reed of Rhode Island could "build a strong manager's package that will be acceptable to both sides."

"We Democrats want to work in a constructive and productive manner to process as many of these amendments as possible and work through even the most difficult of issues," Schumer said

So far, more than 400 amendments have been filed for floor consideration.

Trump promise on expanded school choice falls flat Back

By Caitlin Emma | 09/12/2017 05:05 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's campaign pledge to expand school choice for millions of working class families isn't happening — at least not in the foreseeable future.

For months, the Trump administration has eyed a first-of-its-kind federal tax credit to help families pay for private school. If it were tucked into a larger tax bill, proponents argued, it could pass with just 51 Senate votes. But Republicans have been unable to pull off any significant legislative wins this year and appear unlikely to add a contentious provision to a tax bill that could complicate its already fraught politics.

And the White House has said nothing about the issue for months.

"Republicans are desperate for a victory and they're desperate to get tax reform done," said Michael Petrilli, president of a conservative education think tank, the Thomas B. Fordham Institute. "Anything that looks like a voucher will lose them votes."

Critics say a federal tax credit would be a "back door voucher," diverting funds from struggling public schools. But 18 states have passed their own programs, allowing individuals and corporations to receive a state tax credit in exchange for donations to scholarship-granting entities, which then award funds to help disadvantaged families pay for private school.

A short-term debt ceiling and spending deal reached by Trump and Democrats last week opens a window for Congress to tackle a tax overhaul. But there are still no details of that plan, and Republicans must agree on a fiscal 2018 budget resolution that includes instructions for tax changes if they want to pass them with a simple majority in the Senate.

Still, fiscal hawks are already worried that a school tax credit will add to the final cost of a tax bill, a congressional aide recently told POLITICO. And those working on the tax overhaul fear school choice will complicate the overarching goal: streamlining and simplifying the tax code.

"This is something that would run counter to that effort," said Lindsey Burke, director of the Center for Education Policy at the conservative Heritage Foundation. Heritage hasn't supported a federal tax credit scholarship program out of concern that it would increase regulations over private schools, among other things.

Expanding school choice is a nonstarter with House and Senate appropriators. So far, they've rejected more than $1 billion proposed in Trump's budget to allow greater school choice, aside from extra support for charter schools.

Experts can't see a school tax credit passing as a standalone bill, since efforts to broadly expand school choice have died in Congress with strong opposition from Democrats and moderate Republicans. The politics only get more complicated as Republicans may fight next year to maintain their majority during the congressional midterms.

A White House spokesman said the president is still "committed to pursuing a robust school choice proposal." But in recent remarks, Trump has said, "we must make the tax code as simple as possible."

Julia Lawless, a spokeswoman for Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), said the details of a tax package will be worked out in the coming months. Hatch is "focused on developing a tax reform package that will provide more relief to the middle class, increase wages and job growth here at home, and ensure American businesses can compete in global markets," she said.

Emily Schillinger, spokeswoman for the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, would not say whether a school tax credit was on the table, but said "members are working to simplify our broken, complex tax code and specifically streamline the education benefits to be more effective and efficient."

Failure to pass a federal tax credit scholarship program would most certainly be a big disappointment for Education Secretary Betsy DeVos, a longtime advocate for such an investment. DeVos' spokeswoman didn't respond to a request for comment.

In June, POLITICO reported that the Trump administration invited school choice advocates to the White House to discuss action on school choice, particularly a federal tax credit scholarship program. DeVos and top White House adviser Kellyanne Conway were in attendance.

But since then, the White House has been radio silent on the topic, according to sources familiar with the meeting. And to school choice advocates, that's not a good sign.

"The president spent a lot of time talking about this on the campaign trail," said one advocate close to the discussions. "We knew from the beginning that the administration was going to have to insist on it. ... That's the one big unknown at this point."

Advocates who support the notion of a federal program say it's too early to write the obituary. They're looking for another vehicle to pass it or to budget reconciliation down the line. And they insist it remains a passion of Trump, DeVos and Vice President Mike Pence, who oversaw a dramatic expansion of school choice in Indiana while he was governor.

"I think given the current environment, while it's a possibility, it's a much longer shot than it used to be," said another advocate. "But I remain cautiously hopeful."

States will likely continue to be the most fertile ground for school choice expansion. Advocates clinging to optimism point to the largely blue state of Illinois, which recently enacted its own state tax credit scholarship program after a fierce legislative fight. If it can get done there, it can happen in Congress, advocates say. But school choice measures in the red state of Texas have continually failed amid reservations from Republican state lawmakers concerned about stripping resources from rural public schools.

Some education experts believe narrower ideas backed by Heritage, like expanding school choice for military families or Native American children, could happen in some form down the line. But without strong support from a White House that can successfully convince Republicans to get on board, Trump's campaign pledge is "effectively dead," Petrilli said.

"If we were talking about a president who had some real political muscle and popularity and made it clear this was something he cared about, then maybe," he said. "But we don't have that president."

Census reports 3.2 percent hike in median household income for 2016 Back

By Timothy Noah | 09/12/2017 10:56 AM EDT

U.S. median household income rose in 2016 to $59,039, a 3.2 percent increase over 2015, the Census Bureau reported.

But median earnings for men and women who worked full-time over the entire year were essentially unchanged after inflation, with men earning $51,640 and women earning $44,544.

The total number of people working full-time over the entire year rose by 2.2 million in 2016, and the total number reporting earnings of any kind rose 1.2 million. This, the Census Bureau observed, suggested "a shift from part-year, part-time work status to full-time, year-round work."

Among men with earnings of any kind, 74.8 percent worked full-time through 2016, an increase over 73.9 percent in 2015. The corresponding proportion for women was 62.2 percent, an increase over 61.3 percent in 2015.

Income inequality, as measured by the Gini index, was essentially unchanged in 2016, the Census report said, even when adjusted for household size. The poverty rate was 12.7 percent, down from 13.5 percent in 2015 and 14.8 percent in 2014 and just a whisker higher than where it stood in 2007 on the eve of the Great Recession.

CREW sues Treasury for details on Mnuchin's flight to Kentucky with wife Back

By Victoria Guida | 09/11/2017 02:35 PM EDT

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, an ethics watchdog, today sued the Treasury Department for documents related to Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin's use of a government plane to fly to Kentucky with his wife.

CREW requested that Treasury expedite its request under the Freedom of Information Act, but the department has not responded, according to the group.

Mnuchin and his wife, Louise Linton, flew to Lexington, Ky., on Aug. 21, on the day of the solar eclipse.

"We filed an expedited FOIA request because Americans deserve more information to determine whether there has been misuse of government resources," CREW Executive Director Noah Bookbinder said in the release. "We're suing because the government has so far failed even to respond."

The trip garnered particular attention after Linton posted an image of her exiting the plane in designer clothing.

A Treasury spokesperson said the department does not comment on litigation.

Can the markets rescue the federal flood insurance program? Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 09/12/2017 05:05 AM EDT

Hurricanes Harvey and Irma are putting to the test a novel approach to how the federal government and taxpayers share the costs of natural disasters with the private sector.

Catastrophic flooding along the Gulf Coast is expected to trigger a payout of up to $1 billion from a group of reinsurers to the National Flood Insurance Program, which acquired the coverage in January for about $150 million.

Funds that the program receives from the reinsurers will help pay claims to homeowners that rely on the government for protection against the financial risks of flooding — a critical service that has left the NFIP $25 billion in debt after an earlier series of devastating storms.

The reinsurance transaction was the biggest yet for the program, and it has left some policymakers and investors eager for more.

As Congress has considered ways to overhaul the insurance program over the last several months, House and Senate lawmakers have drafted proposals that would encourage it to do more to share flood risks through reinsurance and securities.

That has sparked a debate about the extent to which it makes sense for the government to rely on the financial markets to help manage economic perils. Critics say that turning to the markets could end up being a worse deal for taxpayers compared to relatively cheap government funding. Advocates argue that it's an important step in keeping the program from sinking further into the red.

"If they had done it over the last 15-20 years, we wouldn't have the debt we have right now," said Rep. Blaine Luetkemeyer (R-Mo.), one of the most outspoken advocates for using private capital to help offset the program's growing obligations to the Treasury.

Further integrating the financial markets into the program is just one of many proposals on the table for lawmakers who are struggling to agree on ways to shore up an insurance program.

FEMA has had the authority to tap into the markets to offset its flood risks for years but has only recently started making deals. It tested the waters with a small reinsurance acquisition in 2016, then followed up in January with agreements involving 25 reinsurers covering $1.04 billion in flood risk. The reinsurance could be triggered when losses hit $4 billion.

A potential payout from the reinsurance could be key to determining how quickly the flood insurance program will need to seek an increase in its borrowing authority, which was last raised to around $30 billion after Hurricane Sandy. FEMA has said it had $1.7 billion available to pay claims from Harvey plus $5.8 billion in remaining borrowing authority.

A FEMA spokeswoman declined to speculate on the impact of Harvey but said the agency viewed this year's reinsurance acquisition as a success that officials planned to build upon for another reinsurance placement in January 2018.

In a blog post earlier this year, FEMA's deputy associate administrator for insurance and mitigation, Roy Wright, said securing reinsurance was a "key step toward achieving the NFIP's long-term vision of building a stronger financial framework." He has called the reinsurance transaction a "cornerstone reinsurance placement."

In a 2015 report to Congress assembled with help from Guy Carpenter, which later became the flood program's reinsurance broker, FEMA said reinsurance would be a more expensive alternative to Treasury debt. But it added that a significant reinsurance program would help stabilize the NFIP's finances and reduce the probability of borrowing after large flood events.

"If Harvey ends up hitting this program, they're going to see that reinsurers are going to respond pretty quickly to them and put needed cash in their hand when they need it most," said Guy Carpenter managing director Jake Clark. "We want to see more of it."

Dennis Burke, vice president of the Reinsurance Association of America, said it was a long-term play by reinsurers who would not likely be deterred by one sizable loss out of the gate.

"Our members write flood insurance around the world," he said. "The opportunity to participate in the flood insurance market in the U.S. is something they've been interested in for a while. They wrote this one contract for the first time and it got hit. ... The contract was underwritten and priced as though this was not a common, everyday experience. We anticipate the underwriters will continue to look at it based upon the probabilities and risks."

The $600 billion reinsurance market is not necessarily the only game in town.

FEMA hasn't yet started to tap the broader capital markets, but House and Senate bills would try to make clear that the agency could look beyond traditional reinsurance. Bills under consideration include explicit references to tools including catastrophe bonds and insurance-linked securities.

"There's probably $35 trillion in global pension fund assets out there," said Daniel Stander, global managing director at risk modeling company RMS. "There is appetite amongst investors to take some of that capital and invest it in asset classes that are not correlated to the global economy. Whether the wind blows or not has nothing to do with the price of oil, the price of property or the price of equities."

Luetkemeyer's bill and another, S. 1313 \(115\), from Sens. Bill Cassidy (R-La.) and Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) would require FEMA to annually cede part of the flood insurance program's risk to private reinsurance or the capital markets.

Luetkemeyer said in an interview that private-sector coverage would "protect the program financially and protect the taxpayers from having to be the backstop." The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the provision in his bill requiring FEMA to shift risk to the markets would have no significant effect on the amount of reinsurance coverage that it buys or on NFIP spending because the agency intended to continue purchasing reinsurance.

But the proposal has run into resistance from other lawmakers who argue that forcing FEMA to go to the market might not result in the best deal for the flood insurance program.

When the House Financial Services Committee considered Luetkemeyer's bill, H.R. 2246 \(115\), in June, the panel's top Democrat, Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), said the proposal made "no sense" because the 2012 flood insurance law that she co-authored clarified FEMA's authority to purchase reinsurance.

She said the bill would legislate "complicated and burdensome" metrics that FEMA would have to follow, potentially giving reinsurers leverage to demand higher premiums.

Rep. Carolyn Maloney (D-N.Y.) said at the same committee meeting that the requirement would be a "worse deal for taxpayers."

"From a financial perspective it only makes sense for FEMA to use a private reinsurer if the annual premiums that FEMA would pay on the reinsurance are less than the annual interest payments that FEMA pays to the Treasury right now," she said. "Why in the world do we want to require them to pay more?"

DOE awards grid security grants to improve bug patching and incident response Back

By Eric Geller | 09/12/2017 10:57 AM EDT

The Department of Energy today announced $50 million in grants to improve the security and resiliency of the electric grid.

Seven of the DOE grants will go to resiliency, while 20 will go to cybersecurity.

The cyber grants will fund projects covering vulnerability mitigation, incident response efforts and secure grid management communications.

Nine national laboratories will administer the grants, in partnership with a wide range of military, academic and corporate partners.

Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Oak Ridge, Tenn., and its partners will develop "a tool to verify the integrity of firmware used in energy delivery system devices, without taking the equipment offline."

Pacific Northwest National Laboratory in Richland, Wash., will oversee an effort to "develop a secure and flexible data exchange approach for communication between control centers."

"A resilient, reliable, and secure power grid is essential to the Nation's security, economy, and the vital services that Americans depend on every day," Energy Secretary Rick Perry said in a statement.

"By leveraging the world-class innovation of the National Laboratories and their partners," he added, "this investment will keep us moving forward to create yet more real-world capabilities that the energy sector can put into practice to continue improving the resilience and security of the country's critical energy infrastructure."

Senate Democrats hold onto majority hopes Back

By Kevin Robillard and Gabriel Debenedetti | 09/12/2017 05:04 AM EDT

Senate Democrats are already three seats short of a majority and must play defense in 10 Trump states next year. But the top Democratic senators in charge of planning for the 2018 elections are refusing to publicly give up hope of taking back the chamber, in an improbable but audacious nod to the friendly political environment developing ahead of the midterms.

Reelecting red-state Democratic incumbents is still the top priority for Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and DSCC Chairman Chris Van Hollen. But they have also begun investigating opportunities to play offense on GOP turf, polling and investigating potential candidates in states like Texas, Tennessee and Alabama with the Republican Party facing a tough national environment.

The Democratic effort began well before a recent burst of bad news for Senate Republicans.

But with former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon plotting primary challenges against incumbents, Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker mulling retirement, and Republicans fighting a bitter and expensive primary in Alabama's special Senate election, Democrats have begun looking even more closely at picking off a surprise Senate seat — and maybe the majority — next year.

"Our priority is to make sure that we win all our incumbent races," Van Hollen said in an August interview. Then, "we have great pickup opportunities in Nevada and Arizona," he continued. "And we have good candidates in other states, and we're going to have more. We're going to work to maximize our opportunities."

Much of the insistence is for donors' benefit, said a handful of top party operatives: Closing the door on flipping a chamber will make it much harder to raise cash in 2018, especially with House Democrats smelling opportunity to win back the majority there.

But the assertion also reflects a new kind of why-not-try confidence among Senate Democrats, who think the pieces have fallen in place for a potential wave and want to be ready.

Winning back the Senate would essentially require Democrats to draw a straight flush, followed by four-of-a-kind. All 10 Democratic senators from Trump states would need to secure reelection, and the party is particularly worried about defending its incumbents in Indiana, Missouri and Florida. Then, Democrats would need to defeat not just Nevada Sen. Dean Heller and Arizona Sen. Jeff Flake, but also find a third seat from six deep-red, Republican-held states.

This wouldn't be the first time Democrats prepped for a wave that never came. In 2016, they got top-tier recruits in Arkansas and Kentucky in the form of former Arkansas U.S. Attorney Conner Eldridge and Lexington, Ky., Mayor Jim Gray. Both men lost by double-digits, despite outrunning Hillary Clinton.

Republicans, for their part, don't find Schumer's plotting plausible.

"Chuck Schumer has said for years that Democrats will win the Senate, and that claim is no longer funny, but just plain sad," NRSC spokeswoman Katie Martin said. "There are 25 Democrats up for reelect, with 10 of those in states President [Donald] Trump won. Either Schumer has trouble with math or he has trouble living in reality."

The most immediate opportunity for Democrats may come in Alabama. Some Republican operatives privately fear former Supreme Court Justice Roy Moore could lose the general election if he defeats incumbent GOP Sen. Luther Strange in the primary. Democrats are wary of turning a race in such a tough state into a national referendum, and they worry that it might be impossible to boost former U.S. Attorney Doug Jones over the hump. But the opportunity to boost Jones, a civil rights attorney who won fame prosecuting members of the KKK, against the ultra-conservative Moore may be too tempting to pass up.

National Democrats still have no immediate plans to get involved in Alabama, and the candidate says he's ready to run either way.

"It doesn't really matter whether I've got help or not," Jones said in an interview. "I'm running as a Democrat. The other side is going to try to tag me however they're going to tag me."

The next opportunity comes in Texas, where Rep. Beto O'Rourke has already announced a challenge to incumbent Sen. Ted Cruz. Democrats are pleasantly surprised by O'Rourke's strong online fundraising, and he has impressed national operatives with constant campaigning throughout the state.

Still, O'Rourke's refusal to accept PAC money frustrates strategists who think he'll need every penny possible to compete in an ultra-expensive state. Democratic outside groups have recently shied away from spending heavily in big states, with the DSCC and Senate Majority PAC pulling out of Florida last fall.

But Van Hollen said the committee would be ready to back up O'Rourke if he can make the race competitive.

"If Texas becomes clearly competitive, we'll be able to find the resources," he said.

But the state Democrats are most openly excited about is Tennessee. In conversations with other senators — in which he refuses to rule out winning back the Senate — Schumer often brings up Corker's seat, which Senate operatives regard as the white whale of 2018.

As DSCC chair in 2006, Schumer saw Corker win his seat by just 3 points. Fellow senators and campaign pros have taken to wondering whether former Gov. Phil Bredesen might be interested in running. (The 73-year-old has shown no intention of jumping in.)

Even if Bredesen stays out, Democrats seem content with an announced candidate against Corker: James Mackler, a 44-year-old lawyer who joined the military after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, flew Black Hawk helicopters and fought in the Iraq War, and then joined the JAG Corps and prosecuted sexual assault cases. Mackler made the rounds at the DSCC donor retreat in Martha's Vineyard, making a favorable impression on donors and lending his candidacy extra legitimacy, some said.

In an interview, Mackler said he thought Tennesseans and national Democrats both were ready to get behind a candidate with his "proven track record of service and sacrifice." Mackler attacked Corker as overly partisan, and said the Tennessean's criticisms of Trump weren't backed up by actions.

"He'll vote for whatever his party puts in front of him," he said, referencing a quote where Corker dismissed the substance of an Obamacare repeal bill. "I'm an outsider. I'm not the Democratic Party."

While Corker's occasional critiques of the president haven't satisfied Mackler, they have prompted some Republicans to muse about a primary challenge. On Monday, Corker said he wasn't committed to running for reelection.

"I think everyone in the Volunteer State knows, as they did in 2012, that running for reelection has never been an automatic for me," Corker said in a statement. "While we are in a strong position, I am still contemplating the future and will make a decision at the appropriate time."

That Democrats are even considering offensive tactics, rather than preparing to hemorrhage losses in red states, is a reflection of how strongly they feel about their 2018 chances despite the Republican tilt of the Senate map.

The DSCC believes Democrats have a clear upper hand on health care and that fewer top-tier candidates than expected are challenging Democratic incumbents. They have eagerly watched Trump's spat with Heller and war with Flake and wondered if such intra-GOP conflict could spread.

"We have a tough political map," Van Hollen said. "This is a year where anything can happen."

POLITICO Pro New Jersey: Christie defends Trump's delay in declaring opioid epidemic a national emergency Back

By Katie Jennings | 09/12/2017 11:33 AM EDT

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie on Monday defended President Donald Trump for not yet declaring the nation's opioid epidemic a national emergency, saying he was at the White House last week to discuss the issue with the president's senior staff.

It has been more than a month since Trump said he intended to declare the opioid crisis a national emergency based on the recommendation of a presidential commission chaired by Christie. The president, however, has yet to make a formal declaration.

"I was just at the White House last week to discuss this with the president's senior staff. I know they are focused on putting a number of the recommendations that the commission has made in their interim report into place," Christie told "PBS NewsHour" host Judy Woodruff. "I know the president and I know his heart on this, and I know he's ready to do what needs to be done to get this done the right way."

Pressed to explain the unusual delay between Trump's statement and the formal declaration, Christie said the president was busy dealing with the two hurricanes that have ravaged the southern United States in recent weeks.

"We've had two major national emergencies intervene since August, with Hurricane Harvey and now Hurricane Irma. The administration is focused on making sure that's dealt with, and they're also on a parallel track working on making sure that we efficiently and effectively implement the recommendations in the interim report of the commission," Christie said. "I am committed to urging the president to move as quickly as possible, and he's told me that's exactly what he's instructed his staff to do."

DOL to evaluate apprenticeship grants Back

By Ian Kullgren | 09/12/2017 11:35 AM EDT

The Labor Department said today it will conduct a formal evaluation of one of its core apprenticeship initiatives.

In a notice to be published in the Federal Register Wednesday, DOL will announce plans to evaluate the American Apprenticeship Initiative, a fund created by President Barack Obama. The $175 million in one-time funds awarded to 46 companies came from participation fees for H-1B visas for high-tech foreign workers.

DOL said it will evaluate how grants were developed, the outcomes for workers, return on investments for companies and recruitment processes.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Appropriators prepare for fourth punt — Hatch retirement opens plum post — Republicans weigh second round of reconciliation
Date: Tuesday, January 02, 2018 4:22:12 PM

A DAUNTING TO-DO LIST: Welcome to 2018, the year of the dog ... err, deadlines.

In January alone, lawmakers have vowed to tackle spending caps, immigration, Obamacare, a massive disaster aid package, flood insurance and spying powers. And not long after, they'll be under pressure to deliver on a fix for the Children's Health Insurance Program, the debt ceiling, faltering pension plans and tax extenders.

Another punt? Some appropriators are already talking about a fourth stopgap funding bill for fiscal 2018. Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) told us today that another short-term bill could kick the Jan. 19 deadline until President's Day. "Until we have an agreement, I don't think you have a choice but to think about another CR," he said about the still-unsettled issue of overall budget caps. "Both sides need to get back to running the government."

Getting to it: The work starts Wednesday. Republican and Democratic congressional leaders will meet on Capitol Hill with White House Budget Director Mick Mulvaney and legislative liaison Marc Short. President Donald Trump, who has already chatted twice about this with the "big four" since September, won't be present. Neither will White House chief of staff John Kelly, who has initially slated to head up the talks, Kyle Cheney reports.

Up first: Budget caps will be the focus of the talks, according to both White House and congressional aides. (Appropriators have made clear that they need those numbers ASAP to start work on an omnibus.) But the sit-down could turn into a faceoff over immigration, especially after Trump tweeted last week that he would reject any DACA deal without money for a border wall and a series of other immigration changes, Louis Nelson explains. POTUS doubled down on Tuesday, accusing Democrats of "doing nothing for DACA," as Nolan McCaskill notes.

Doc of the day — DOT has "several serious concerns" with New York and New Jersey's latest plan for financing their Hudson River underground tunnel project, according to a letter the Federal Transit Administration sent last week. More from Brianna Gurciullo.

#DailyBudgetFact — Every state began 2018 with a shortage of teachers. In recent years, several states have sought to lower the barriers of entry for new educators, including reducing licensure rules. More from Stateline.

ENTITLEMENT PROGRAMS

HATCH SAYS 'SEE YA': Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) announced today that he will not run for reelection in 2018, opening up a plum assignment as top Republican on the panel that oversees entitlement programs, health care and taxes, Jennifer Haberkorn reports.

BUDGET

AGENDA-SETTING: Congressional Republicans will face a raft of difficult policy choices when they head to West Virginia later this month for their annual GOP retreat, including whether to attempt another round of budget reconciliation despite exceedingly long odds in the Senate.

Don't rock the boat: You'll recall that House Republicans, led by Speaker Paul Ryan, have set their sights on entitlement overhaul. But Senate GOP leaders, including Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, have publicly downplayed the chances of any changes to Medicare, Medicaid and welfare programs in an election year. The clash between Ryan and McConnell hints at exactly why 2018 will be so tough, as Seung Min Kim and Rachael Bade explain. GOP leaders must unite both chambers around a legislative agenda that appeases the party's conservative base without creating major risks at the polls.

A CHAIRMAN RACE! House Budget Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) quietly announced last week that she'll be giving up her gavel as soon as a replacement is picked, as Sarah reported. Black, who GOP leaders recruited for the budget position, was never expected to stay on through a second year. The Tennessee gubernatorial candidate did clench her gavel longer than expected, however, to help muscle through the GOP's tax overhaul, H.R. 1 \(115\).

WHITE HOUSE

SCRAMBLING FOR A STRATEGY: Toasting to tax reform as 2017 ended, White House aides now look warily at an uncertain agenda for the year ahead. As Eliana Johnson, Annie Karni and Andrew Restuccia explain, Republicans are now split over which legislative initiative to tackle next. Behind the scenes, White House aides and Trump's outside advisers are engaged in a fierce debate over whether to appeal to traditional conservative voters by tackling welfare reform or instead push forward on the president's long-promised infrastructure plan, which could attract Democratic support and win over a broader slice of the electorate.

DISASTER RELIEF

A $30 MILLION HOUSING FIX: Puerto Rico has an unconventional proposal to help its 48,000 illegal squatters in the wake of Hurricane Maria: Give them property rights. Gov. Ricardo Rosselló is asking for U.S. aid to bring generations of illegal settlers into the mainstream, as Lorraine Woellert writes in a deep dive from San Juan.

GREEN GRID REBUILD: Puerto Rico's dilapidated electric grid has created an opening for renewable energy proponents — if they can get around the red tape. The island's energy regulator is charging ahead with an ambitious high-tech plan to upgrade its decades-old grid, but regulatory and legal obstacles are already getting in the way, as Eric Wolff reports.

Power update: Meanwhile, more than 660,000 power customers across Puerto Rico still lack electricity, more than three months after Hurricane Maria made landfall, the Associated Press

AGRICULTURE

EARLY TEST OF TENSIONS: It's finally the year of the farm bill. And if the drama over the latest disaster aid package is any indication, the 2018 edition of the ag bible is going to be a tough one to write, as Helena Bottemiller Evich and Catherine Boudreau explain. Still languishing within that $81 billion disaster bill (H.R. 4667 \(115\)) the Senate is now sitting on: Farm bill provisions that have drawn bipartisan fire, including language that would make cotton growers eligible for the Price Loss Coverage program and give dairy farmers more insurance options. While congressional aides say the cotton move is budget neutral, it's unclear how much the dairy fixes would cost taxpayers.

Trump: 'Democrats are doing nothing for DACA' Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 01/02/2018 10:58 AM EDT

Accusing Democrats of playing politics with undocumented immigrants who came into the country as children, President Donald Trump today predicted that so-called DREAMers will fall "in love" with the GOP.

"Democrats are doing nothing for DACA - just interested in politics," Trump complained via Twitter. "DACA activists and Hispanics will go hard against Dems, will start 'falling in love' with Republicans and their President! We are about RESULTS."

Congressional leaders will meet with top White House officials on Wednesday to discuss a deal to avert a government shutdown and make headway on an immigration impasse.

Trump tweeted last week that "there can be no" immigration deal without his long-promised border wall and an end to chain migration and the U.S. visa lottery system. A spokesman for

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said Democrats won't "negotiate through the press" but "look forward to a serious negotiation at Wednesday's meeting when we come back."

Trump in September announced the rescission of the Obama-era program that offers protections to thousands of young undocumented immigrants but provided a six-month delay, giving Congress until March to find a legislative solution. FTA slams plan for financing Hudson River tunnel project Back

By Brianna Gurciullo | 12/29/2017 07:19 PM EDT

DOT has "several serious concerns" with New York and New Jersey's latest plan for financing their Hudson River underground tunnel project, according to a letter sent by a Federal Transit Administration official Friday.

Jane Williams, FTA's deputy administrator, wrote that the project's backers are seeking at least $11.1 billion from the Trump administration. Money from the FTA's Capital Investment Grant program would provide half the funding; three Railroad Rehabilitation and Improvement Financing loans would cover the other half.

That proposal, Williams wrote, "is a move towards even greater federal dependency."

"We understand and appreciate how important this project is to you, and we remain very much open to paths that would enable it," her letter reads. "Also, Congress is poised to begin discussing infrastructure legislation in the coming weeks."

Williams denied that DOT has agreed to shoulder half of the project's costs. The project's supporters have tried to hold DOT to a promise made during the Obama administration, to do so.

"We consider it unhelpful to reference a non-existent 'agreement' rather than directly address the responsibility for funding a local project where 9 out of 10 passengers are local transit riders," Williams wrote.

In addition, Williams wrote that the states' request for at least $5 billion in Capital Investment Grant funding "could exhaust the CIG program entirely."

Williams also took issue with the cost estimate for the project.

"We understand this new plan does not address the rehabilitation of the [Hudson River's] existing tunnels, and now only addresses the building of two new tunnels," she wrote. "Given the age of the existing tunnels was the impetus for the project, we question the decision to ignore any funding commitment to that critical component, and to omit billions in other costs previously acknowledged to be part of the overall project cost."

Beyond the tunnel project, Williams added that FTA is "deeply concerned that New York is seriously behind in its State Safety Oversight Agency (SSOA) certification process."

"Also, serious deficiencies in oversight and management of safety have been apparent in three consecutive FTA safety audits for New York," she wrote.

Hatch's retirement will open coveted Finance Committee post Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 01/02/2018 03:00 PM EDT

Orrin Hatch's retirement will open up a plum assignment as the top Republican on the Senate committee that oversees health care, taxes and entitlement programs.

Hatch announced today that he would not run for reelection in 2018, meaning the Senate Finance Committee job would open up in early 2019.

If Republicans retain control of the Senate in the midterm elections, they would have to select a new chairman to help the Trump administration enact legislation ahead of the 2020 presidential race. If Democrats take control, it would be a GOP ranking member post to play defense.

Sen. Chuck Grassley, who previously served as chairman and ranking member of the panel, still has two years of chairmanship eligibility remaining. In order to lead Finance, he would have to forgo his similarly high-profile gavel at the Senate Judiciary Committee.

It is unclear whether the Iowa Republican would want to give up confirming President Donald Trump's judicial nominees in favor of running Finance again, assuming the GOP maintains control of the Senate.

Next in line of seniority after Grassley would be Sen. Mike Crapo of Idaho. He would have to give up the Senate Banking Committee chairmanship.

It's Ryan vs. McConnell on entitlement reform Back

By Seung Min Kim and Rachael Bade | 12/27/2017 05:06 AM EDT

Speaker Paul Ryan's dream of overhauling the nation's entitlement programs in 2018 will soon run into a harsh reality: His own party isn't on board.

The Wisconsin Republican has detailed an ambitious effort to dramatically reshape Medicare, Medicaid and welfare programs that the GOP has long targeted as ripe for reforms. But bring it up with key Senate Republicans and House GOP moderates and they blanch — seeing a legislative battle that may not be winnable and that may not be worth it in an election year where control of Congress is up for grabs.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has all but ruled out the idea, saying publicly that he doesn't expect to see welfare and entitlement changes on the agenda next year, particularly if it's done in a party-line manner.

"The sensitivity of entitlements is such that you almost have to have a bipartisan agreement in order to achieve a result," McConnell told reporters at a news conference last week.

Other key Republicans are clearly loath to turn to such a sharply partisan pursuit after grueling fights over Obamacare and taxes. Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), a swing vote during the Obamacare repeal fight this summer, quickly changed the subject when asked about Ryan's entitlement reform push.

"Well, I'd like to see us pivot to infrastructure. We've talked it all year, the president talked about it," Capito said. "I think it could be a bipartisan exercise. I would certainly hope so."

The clash illustrates the dilemma that congressional GOP leaders face early next year: How to sketch out an election-year agenda that unifies House and Senate Republicans and satisfies the conservative base without further risking their already-imperiled majorities.

With Democratic opposition to welfare and entitlement changes all but certain, Republicans would have to use powerful reconciliation procedures that can evade a Senate filibuster. But that would require nearly complete unity among Republicans on a joint House-Senate budget and on what controversial policy modifications to make.

Republicans in both chambers will discuss their 2018 legislative strategy at their annual GOP retreat at The Greenbrier resort in White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, in late January. But Senate GOP leaders are already casting doubt on using reconciliation to target the programs.

"All you have to do is the math," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said. "Unless it's bipartisan, then you're talking about reconciliation which means you have to pass a budget, you have to get reconciliation instructions and you have to get 51 Republicans all to vote for it."

The No. 2 Senate Republican added: "That's a pretty steep hill to climb."

McConnell's narrow majority has already been burned trying to tackle entitlements. GOP Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska helped tank the Obamacare repeal effort because it included massive cuts to Medicaid.

And on the cusp of the midterm campaign, other key GOP figures are in a much more bipartisan mood.

"We're going to have a narrow majority next year," said Colorado Sen. Cory Gardner, chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, about an entitlements fight. "We're going to have our hands full with nominations and an infrastructure bill and a bipartisan agenda."

Still, those sentiments are running headfirst into the hopes of House conservatives, not to mention those of the powerful speaker, whose years-long pitch to privatize Medicare has endeared him to the right.

Ryan's conference bellowed when Congress temporarily raised the debt ceiling in September without any corresponding spending cuts. And conservatives have been pressing Ryan ever since to call up legislation to reduce the biggest drivers of the national debt.

In order to win votes for a budget in late October that paved the way for the tax overhaul, Ryan promised leaders of the conservative Republican Study Committee to vote sometime next year on deficit reduction legislation. Republicans have since then discussed enacting work requirements for food stamps and other programs for the poor, as well as Medicare changes to curb spending.

"We have to address entitlements, otherwise we can't really get a handle on our future debt," Ryan said on CBS "This Morning" last week. He also specifically singled out programs for low-income people: "We, right now, are trapping people in poverty. And it's basically trapping people on welfare programs, which prevents them from hitting their potential and getting them in the workforce."

But even some of Ryan's rank-and-file are wary of tackling entitlements. Hillary Clinton carried about two dozen GOP-held swing districts in 2016. And with evidence of a Democratic wave already building, centrist Republicans fear cuts to programs that support the most vulnerable could cost them their seats.

Those same centrists balked last summer when House Budget Committee Chairwoman Diane Black (R-Tenn.) proposed axing $200 billion from such programs in her fiscal blueprint. Centrists wrote to Ryan opposing those cuts, and the speaker is bound to run into the same resistance next year.

In an interview off the House floor, New Jersey Rep. Leonard Lance urged GOP leaders to be "cautious" when proceeding to entitlements. He would rather focus on a bipartisan issue like infrastructure that is well received by his constituents.

"There is a safety net that I support," said the moderate Republican, adding, "I think infrastructure would be a good thing to tackle in the New Year."

Longtime centrist leader Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.), who's retiring at the end of 2018, was more blunt. He said a House vote on entitlement reform would put vulnerable swing-state lawmakers in an even shakier position in the midterm elections. And all for nothing, since it will never pass the Senate, he added.

"The longer I'm here, the more I'm convinced that we don't do things to help members in swing-state districts. We do things to help people in the really red districts to keep the base pacified," he said. "That's not how you hold the majority."

When asked about entitlement reform, several other House GOP moderates responded that they'd prefer to tackle infrastructure, as did Collins in the Senate.

And yet Ryan might still press ahead. The votes are likely there in the House to pass cuts or changes to food stamps, disability insurance, and even Medicare and Social Security, two programs President Donald Trump vowed to leave intact on the campaign trail. And Ryan could try to move entitlement reform through the House to exert pressure on the Senate to take up the issue.

Ryan could also draw on a powerful ally in the White House. While Trump has steered clear of suggesting Congress curb Medicare, he's spoken in recent weeks about reforming welfare programs.

And there are GOP senators who are fine — or even excited — about taking up an overhaul of entitlement or welfare programs. One is Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which oversees much of the federal safety net.

"I'd love it," added Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). "That's a heavy lift, particularly after the tax bill ... but we know we've got to rein in these programs in order to make them sustainable."

Republicans could also choose to use their reconciliation powers for other purposes.

Sen. Thom Tillis (R-N.C.) noted that Republicans may want to use reconciliation to make technical corrections to the GOP's sweeping tax overhaul that passed just last week; fixes are expected to be required for the tax plan, and reconciliation would avert the need to get buy-in from Democrats on a bill they uniformly opposed.

Another option would be yet another push to dismantle Obamacare. While McConnell has thrown cold water on the idea, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said he wants to take another crack at Obamacare and will not vote for a budget that doesn't include reconciliation instructions for health care.

Still, even Graham acknowledged that "getting the Senate to make any substantial changes to Medicare in a partisan fashion is gonna be a bridge too far."

Others, simply, aren't saying much about whether they want to take up a fight on entitlements.

"I have no idea," said Nevada Sen. Dean Heller, the most vulnerable GOP senator up for reelection next fall, as he breezed into the Senate chamber for the final vote of the year. "Merry Christmas."

Black to hand off budget gavel, remain in Congress Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/27/2017 08:28 AM EDT

House Budget Chairman Diane Black announced Wednesday that she plans to hand over her gavel in early 2018 but will not give up her seat as she revs up her campaign for governor of Tennessee.

Black plans to step down "once a successor is chosen in the new year," according to her spokeswoman Sarah Corley. The Tennessee Republican will not vacate her seat, ending months of speculation that she would resign shortly after the GOP's tax plan became law.

Steve Womack (R-Ark.) is the early front-runner for the seat, according to several GOP lawmakers. Rob Woodall (R-Ga.) is also eyeing the position.

Black — whose hard-fought budget blueprint jump-started the GOP's tax push this summer — also served on the conference committee that shaped the final version of the legislation.

"It has been an honor to serve as Chairman of the House Budget Committee," Black wrote in a statement. "I am very proud of the hard work of our members and all we accomplished, especially offering real reforms for mandatory programs and unlocking pro-growth tax reform."

The first woman to lead the budget panel, Black is also one of few women at the helm of a House committee this year.

White House aides already anxious about 2018 Back

By Eliana Johnson, Annie Karni and Andrew Restuccia | 01/01/2018 06:01 PM EDT

President Donald Trump returned to Washington from his sunny holiday break in Florida in an upbeat mood, relaxed and rested — but many of his top aides are dreading what's to come in 2018.

After ending their first year on a high, signing a sweeping tax reform bill into law, Trump's advisers are divided about how to capitalize on that victory and maintain momentum going forward with Hill Republicans again at odds over their legislative agenda.

They're facing a brain drain on a White House that already had trouble recruiting top talent. Many senior West Wing aides are expected to depart in the coming year, with no replacements lined up. White House chief of staff John Kelly — who has already fired several presidential aides — wants to push out more but has struggled to find suitable alternatives.

And they're still working under the shadow of special counsel Robert Mueller's Russia investigation, despite repeated assurances from the White House legal team that the inquiry is wrapping up.

The grim reality of 2018 has generated a sense of foreboding among White House aides, according to more than a dozen current and former officials and outside advisers. West Wing aides, who worked furiously to push through legislation and executive actions during Trump's first year in office, expect limited prospects for getting things done in Washington this year heading into a contentious midterm election.

"They absolutely should worry about 2018," said Ari Fleischer, a former press secretary to President George W. Bush. "I do fear a wave election. Democrats are highly motivated to vote against Trump and all Republicans. Trump has got to grow beyond the base, and he has got to make himself less hated among a group in the middle."

While Republicans were unified in their desire to reform the tax code, they are now split over which legislative initiative to tackle next — a dispute the Trump White House, which has sometimes delegated the nuts and bolts of legislating to congressional leaders, has done little to settle.

And with a diminished margin in the Senate — after Roy Moore's loss in Alabama, Republicans now hold just a 51-seat majority — White House aides and Republicans in Congress say they have little hope that much if any meaningful legislation will reach the president's desk before the midterms.

Behind the scenes, White House aides and Trump's outside advisers are engaged in a fierce debate over the shape of this year's agenda. At issue: whether to appeal to traditional conservative voters by tackling welfare reform or instead push forward on the president's long-promised infrastructure plan, which could attract Democratic support and win over a broader slice of the electorate.

Several Trump advisers have urged the president to strike a more bipartisan tone this year, encouraging him to facilitate a deal with Democrats on the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program for young undocumented immigrants and then quickly move to an infrastructure package — a sequence that would significantly delay welfare legislation.

The advisers have told the president that passing infrastructure legislation could help Republicans hold the House, pointing to polling that shows the issue is popular with the public.

Trump met before Christmas in the Oval Office with his former campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski; his former director of digital media, Brad Parscale; presidential counselor Kellyanne Conway and others about the merits of each option, according to people familiar with the discussion.

The president has privately told top aides at various points that he is eager to pursue both infrastructure and welfare reform. But Trump's top policy adviser on the subject, Paul Winfree, recently left the White House to return to the Heritage Foundation, and the president has more recently signaled that he believes infrastructure has the best chance of winning bipartisan support and buoying Republicans in the fall.

Some of the president's outside advisers say that's the right approach. "Infrastructure first," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a longtime Trump ally. "I wouldn't touch entitlements. There's zero reason to pick a fight on any of those in an election year."

But House Speaker Paul Ryan has repeatedly said he is determined to reform welfare. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, however, has publicly dismissed the idea, telling National Public Radio that he is "not interested" in taking on the issue on a party-line basis — and Democrats are in no mood to cooperate ahead of the midterms.

Trump, McConnell and Ryan are expected to settle their differences in a meeting at Camp David the first week in January, though one administration official said he nonetheless expects "lot of infighting."

The president stormed into office with a series of executive orders, but questions also linger about what the president will be able to accomplish at the executive level in the coming year. Aides expect a renewed push on trade, including the possibility that Trump will slap China and other economic competitors with tariffs in the coming weeks.

The issue was largely put on the back burner in recent months so it wouldn't distract from tax reform, according to one White House aide, but the administration is weighing trade measures on everything from steel to solar imports, stoking deep concern among Trump's free-market advisers that the president could spark a trade war.

Administration officials have been working quietly for months to curb the influence of Trump's protectionist advisers. Though the White House's leading China critic, trade adviser Peter Navarro, has been sidelined, the president's free-market aides fear their efforts have had little effect on Trump's thinking.

Compounding this challenging legislative terrain is the departure of senior aides, including deputy national security adviser Dina Powell; Jeremy Katz, deputy director of the National Economic Council; and Winfree, who was deputy director of the Domestic Policy Council.

Few expect Gary Cohn — the director of the National Economic Council, which has emerged as the White House's central policymaking hub — to stay in the administration until the end of 2018. Cohn, the former Goldman Sachs president who was integral in the passage of tax reform, is likely to depart either at the end of January or in August, at the close of the legislative session, according to a senior White House aide. Cohn has assembled a team of policy aides on the NEC — including Katz, who departs in late January — and many of his staffers are expected to follow him if he leaves.

People familiar with plans for staff changes said Johnny DeStefano, already head of the White House personnel office and interim head of the Office of Public Liaison, will also oversee the White House's political affairs and intergovernmental affairs offices — a combined portfolio bigger than any ever held by previous West Wing staff, including Valerie Jarrett under President Barack Obama or Karl Rove under President George W. Bush, one former White House official noted.

The decision to elevate DeStefano — who struggled running the personnel office last year and was slow to fill positions — rather than bringing in outsiders is another sign that the White House is having trouble recruiting new staff. Two people familiar with the hiring process said Trump's White House has had difficulty attracting outside talent as a result of the Russia probe, the complicated government vetting process and the cap on federal employees' salaries.

"My advice to them is find younger people," Gingrich said of a president who favors generals, billionaires and CEOs that he views as peers. "There are lots of ambitious people who can do the jobs. He can lean on Kelly, while Kelly hires young people."

Amid the churn, there is expected to be at least one constant for Trump: the presence, in the West Wing, of family members Jared Kushner and Ivanka Trump, whom insiders say now plan to stay in Washington at least through the 2018 school year.

After a rocky first year — when even the president questioned whether having family members serving in senior White House posts was a good idea after all — the marginalized power couple plan to start off 2018 with lower profiles and smaller, more defined portfolios than those they pursued in Trump's first year in office, according to a White House official.

Ivanka Trump will continue to serve as a surrogate selling tax reform, promoting STEM and female entrepreneurs. Behind the scenes, she is expected to continue what the official called "quiet talks" around paid family leave. Kushner, meanwhile, will be working on Middle East peace, while also working on criminal justice reform, North American Free Trade Agreement negotiations and a potential infrastructure bill.

Kushner, for his part, is still widely viewed as the White House official with the most exposure in Mueller's probe, having reportedly instructed former national security adviser Michael Flynn during the presidential transition to reach out to United Nations Security Council member countries, including Russia, to encourage them to oppose a resolution on Israeli settlements.

While the White House's lawyers, led by Beltway powerhouse Ty Cobb, have been assuring Trump that Mueller's probe into Russian meddling in the election is likely to conclude in the coming weeks, most of the president's senior aides not only dismiss that as fantasy, but also expect the special counsel's investigation to ramp up in the coming year.

For Trump's closest aides, that means weeks, and potentially months, of the president's dark moods — which his lawyers have sought to alleviate in part by assuring him the investigation was nearing its conclusion, first by Thanksgiving and then by year's end. It's a strategy that one White House aide predicted the president is likely to pick up on.

"I'm among those who can't conceive of it ending in a matter of a few weeks," said a prominent Washington attorney advising one member of the administration. "I can't imagine they actually believed it when they said it, though it's hard to imagine lawyers deliberately misleading their client like that."

'We have a big problem': Puerto Rico seeks aid for tens of thousands of squatters Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 12/31/2017 07:50 AM EDT

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — When Hurricane Maria ripped across Puerto Rico, it revealed the damage wrought by years of government neglect. It also exposed an open secret generations in the making: Tens of thousands of island residents are, in fact, squatters, living illegally on abandoned or government land.

For years, squatters were ignored or used as political pawns as the bankrupt central government swung from crisis to crisis. That changed with Maria, which tore through these low-lying barrios with particular ferocity. Now, with no legal claim to their homes or the land they're built on, squatters find themselves unmoored from federal aid — and high on the government's list of priorities.

Gov. Ricardo Rosselló, who took office in January, wants to fix his squatter problem by embracing it. He's proposed giving 48,000 illegal settlers legal title to their land, a plan that could cost up to $30 million. He needs federal disaster aid to make the project work.

"Before the emergency, it was something we needed to do; now it's a more ambitious project," said Puerto Rico Housing Secretary Fernando Gil. "It would be helping out 48,000 people who thought that they couldn't get any help."

Rosselló, a Democrat, has had limited success squeezing disaster aid out of the Republican administration and Congress in the aftermath of the storm. But the issue of land ownership could be a test case for Housing and Urban Development Secretary Ben Carson, who has promised to break through entrenched government policies to put people on the path to self-sufficiency.

In meetings this month with Carson and HUD Deputy Secretary Pam Patenaude, the Rosselló administration asked for flexibility to spend disaster aid on land surveys and other work needed to transfer property ownership to squatters. HUD didn't respond to questions for this story, but on a visit to San Juan this month, Carson acknowledged Puerto Rico's challenges.

"We do recognize that the situation is different here than it is in Texas or Florida or many places," Carson said. "We want to look at the goals, not the rules."

Housing has been a chronic problem since long before Maria. More than half of Puerto Rico's houses are "informal," a euphemism for illegally constructed. As many as one in five are built on private or government land. Many have been passed down for generations, giving rise to vibrant communities spread across the island's coastal plains.

Socially, these neighborhoods are firmly anchored to the island's bedrock, home to extended families and back-door businesses. Legally and economically, they exist on the fringe. Some residents survive on rainwater and stolen electricity. They pay no property taxes and can't buy insurance. Many lack mailboxes and formal addresses.

Squatters began planting roots after Operation Bootstrap, a 1947 campaign to modernize the island's economy. Urban growth exploded but couldn't keep pace with the rural exodus from failing farms and sugar plantations.

The economic upheaval left thousands without housing. Open land, however, was abundant. Seeking affordable shelter, people built homes on abandoned plantations or empty swamps. The settlers call themselves rescatadores — rescuers of the land — and claim a moral, not legal, right to their homes. Seen through a different lens, they're invasores — invaders.

HUD officials have seen the situation firsthand. In mid-December, Patenaude visited Carmen Chévere Ortiz in the Villa Calma neighborhood of Toa Baja, west of San Juan. Ortiz, 41, organized an evacuation when floodwaters started rising in her village. Now she is running a food pantry from her house, logging her neighbors' whereabouts and tracking who has food, water and shelter.

Ortiz's parents moved to the neighborhood in 1971 but never obtained legal title to the home she now shares with her mother and six children. Patenaude told her there was nothing HUD could do to help her.

Hurricane Georges forced residents to flee Villa Calma in 1998, but even after that there was little incentive to relocate. City leaders ran electricity into the community and built a school, in effect granting people permission to stay. About a decade ago, one mayor went further, offering property deeds to political allies.

Ortiz calls herself a rescatador and makes no apologies. "It's no time to point fingers, not even at ourselves for staying," she said. "This is an unprecedented event."

Toa Baja Mayor Bernardo Márquez García, who took office in January, is left to sort out the mess caused by decades of government ineptitude compounded by a catastrophic natural disaster. Of the city's 26,000 homes, he estimates that nearly 9,000 are illegal.

"We have a big problem," Márquez said. "Before Hurricane Maria hit, we didn't know we had so much informal construction."

He wants $150 million to channel the canal. Without federal dollars, it's a pipe dream — Toa Baja's debt is 15 times its $30 million annual budget. Damage from Maria is an estimated $300 million.

But after two disastrous hurricanes, should the Villa Calma squatters be moved? That's a question for the Toa Baja community as a whole, not him, Márquez said.

"Most of the areas that were flooded were squatters, but they've been there for 40 or 60 years, for generations," Márquez said. "They were given facilities, utilities. They've built a community, they have a social fabric.

"We can't move in one, two or three years what has been there for decades," he said, but Maria has been a wake-up call. "We're seeing what it means for people to live in flood-prone areas."

In fact, Toa Baja made headlines the last time it tried to uproot a squatter barrio. In 1998, the Federal Emergency Management Agency declared the neighborhood of Villas del Sol a flood zone and encouraged the central government to relocate the community. Puerto Rico spent $18 million, nearly all of it federal funds, to move 223 families.

A handful of people stayed behind. Soon, others joined them, cleaning up trash and fixing up properties. In 2004, the mayor, seeking reelection, allowed settlers to connect to municipal water and electricity. But in 2009, bulldozers and police in riot gear stormed the neighborhood to force people out, according to a 2010 complaint filed with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

In 2011, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division cited the Villas del Sol incident in a report condemning the Puerto Rico Police Department for use of excessive force.

Four years later, the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General found that about half of the $180 million spent to provide housing outside of flood zones, including Villas del Sol, had been misspent. It blamed the errors on the island's political bureaucracy.

Puerto Rico's political structure is indeed part of the problem. Power to enforce building codes, for example, lies with the central government. The Puerto Rico Permits Management Office has only 40 inspectors to oversee the island's 78 municipalities, according to FEMA.

Doling out titles is a "scattershot" tactic that does nothing to fix the island's deep-rooted problems, said Deepak Lamba-Nieves, a research director at the Center for a New Economy.

"It's not just about giving out titles — the underlying structural problems need to be addressed. If Maria has brought us anything, it's the ability to start rethinking," he said. "This is the moment to rethink things from the ground up and not just patch things up."

Just east of San Juan, near the city of Canóvanas, lies San Isidro. Set in a basin surrounded by hills, the community hugs a canal that once fed a farming operation. Many of the houses are spare wooden shacks, but others are snug and brightly painted, built of concrete and tile, with carports and fenced yards. San Isidro is a squatter community, but in no way is it a temporary one.

When Maria swept through, the canal became a raging river, pushing water 5 feet deep through the streets. Wind sheared wooden additions from the rooftops. Three months after the storm, there is no power or water.

Angel Luis Cruz and his wife live on the western edge of San Isidro in a house they bought legally for $18,000 in 1989. Back then, cows grazed steps from their front porch.

Squatters started arriving after Georges, filling the field with houses and stringing makeshift power lines to the nearest electrical poles.

"I bought the house because the view was so pretty. Never would I have imagined this would happen," said Cruz, 72. "They started squatting. They don't pay for water or electricity."

Rosita Colon Benier lives across the street from Cruz in a house she and her husband bought for $20,000, money they received from FEMA when Georges forced them from their old home. When the water rose, Colon's neighbors threw a rope and dragged her family to safety across the street. She watched the flood sweep away her chickens and the makeshift beauty salon she ran from behind the house.

Colon said she owns the property, but, when pressed, acknowledges that she doesn't have legal title. FEMA gave her $1,000 to cover two months' rent for her husband and their six children but sent her away when she asked for money for repairs.

The whole community — legal and illegal alike — is without power in part because workers are reluctant to mess with the rigged wires that connect Colon and her neighbors to the grid. When asked why she's stealing electricity, Colon blames the government.

"It's not my fault," she said. "It's the mayor who has done nothing."

Puerto Rico's municipal leaders, at best, have taken an ad hoc approach to the rescatadores. The question now is what to do with them.

"It's something that is the fault not only of the person doing the construction and the person who needs a place to live, but also the mayors and senators and even ex-governors, that they allowed it to happen," Gil said. "There are years and generations of people in these communities."

Meanwhile, squatters are falling through the cracks of post-disaster housing aid. Because they're neither renters nor owners, they're cut off from programs that finance rebuilding or major repairs.

That reality is dawning on the residents of El Negro near the city of Yabucoa, where Maria tore concrete homes down to the rebar and ripped appliances from their plumbing.

Nabal Guzman Solis, 75, was one of the first in line at FEMA after Maria hit. Mildew is growing on the ceiling of the concrete house he inherited from his father. Water comes through when it rains. The propane tank he used for cooking was stolen, and he's heating food on a wood fire in his backyard. What has he heard from FEMA? "Nada."

Still, "I'm happy," Guzman said. "I'm alive."

Regulatory and legal obstacles cloud visions of Puerto Rico's grid rebuild Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/28/2017 09:11 AM EDT

Puerto Rico's hurricane-devastated power system opens an opportunity to upgrade its dilapidated electric grid with cutting-edge technology, but would-be visionaries face obstacles ranging from a decades-old federal law to the island's massive debt and stubborn utility.

The U.S. territory's government and federal agencies are still working to end the blackout that has kept much of the island in the dark since Hurricanes Irma and Maria struck in September. But Puerto Rico's energy regulator is developing a long-term plan to transform its grid, add renewables, and develop microgrids that would provide their own generation in the event of another disaster.

While the technology exists to create an advanced grid, regulation and legal hurdles must be overcome first. Making matters more complicated, PREPA has a long reputation among solar installers and analysts for hindering the island's shift to renewables in an effort to protect its centralized generation business model.

"As creative as we want to be on the technology side of things, we will need to be equally creative on the regulatory and financial side of things as well," said Katherine Gensler, director of government affairs for the Solar Energy Industries Association.

Hurricanes Irma and Maria, which hit Sept. 7 and 20, struck the island with such fury as to wipe out much of the distribution grid, knock out generation, and take out the critical transmission lines that link the power plants on the south side of the island with the population centers on the north. Many of the power plants survived the storms, but the storms exposed aging and decrepit power infrastructure that has proven difficult to repair without replacing. And while 65 percent of generation capacity has been restored, the Army Corps of Engineers estimates that outlying customers won't have power back until May.

Congress has approved $52 billion in disaster relief funding this year, for states and territories affected by the hurricanes as well events such as the wildfires out West; another $81 billion bill passed the House last week and is awaiting action in the Senate when lawmakers return from break.

FEMA, which oversees disaster relief efforts, says its immediate focus is to restore power to the island. Over the long term, the agency will work with the Army Corps of Engineers, Department of Energy and others "on options for permanent work, to include resilience as FEMA programs allow." In statement, FEMA pointed to DOE's work to improve the grid, "including relocating substations to less flood-prone areas, using simulations to identify better locations for wind and solar generation, integrating distributed energy resources, and hardening towers and other energy infrastructure on the island."

However, proponents of renewable energy, batteries and related technologies say some of those efforts may be hampered by bureaucratic red tape. The Stafford Act, which governs disaster spending, directs states and territories to rebuild damaged infrastructure based on how it operated before a disaster struck. That makes it difficult to use FEMA dollars to replace Puerto Rico's badly outdated electric grid with the latest technology.

It's a problem that members of Congress from both parties say they want to fix.

"It makes little sense to require, as under current law, that buildings and infrastructure be rebuilt in the ways that made them so vulnerable to Hurricanes Irma and Maria," House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) wrote in a November op-ed in The Washington Post. "Instead, we ought to work across the aisle to give these communities the chance to come back stronger. Making those investments now will save taxpayer dollars in the long run. Both of us are committed to advancing this issue and working to bring our colleagues on board in this effort."

The Puerto Rico Energy Commission saw an opportunity to rebuild a system better able to withstand future storms and avoid the high fuel costs that make the Energy Information Administration says costs 55 percent more than the US average. The island has some coal, gas and wind power, but most of its generation is supplied by oil-fired generating plants.

"The main issue in Puerto Rico is too little generation and too many lines to get around," said Alejandro Uriarte, CEO of Puerto Rico solar installer New Energy, which has 2,500 solar customers on the island. "You need to have smaller ecosystems, make sure that generation comes closer to the areas that are more densely populated."

The commission heard dozens of proposals. PREPA and the Puerto Rico Energy Commission joined with the New York Power Authority, ConEd, Edison International, Long Island Power Authority, the Department of Energy, the Electric Power Research Institute, two national labs, and collaborated to write a report proposing a $17 billion capital expenditure to build far stronger power poles, hardened substations, smart-grid technology and the use of microgrids to support critical infrastructure.

Another, from power company AES, proposes a mesh of seven regional microgrids, each of which could supply its own power and come back quickly in the event of another hurricane. It doesn't provide a cost estimate, but it says the operating costs of solar-plus-battery installations would be a third lower than the current oil plants, and that solar generation alone could be two-thirds cheaper than current generation. In addition, the microgrids would be designed to separate themselves from the main grid when one area goes down, providing resiliency in a major storm.

Chris Shelton, chief technology officer for AES, emphasized that all of this technology is well tested, if not on this scale.

"What we're talking about is not new," he said. "It's not R&D, it's been running for years."

Tesla CEO Elon Musk has offered his company's solar and battery technology as a solution to the island's energy woes, and Puerto Rico's governor announced that six systems had been installed as of earlier this month.

But the island needs to revamp its utility, or give it stricter oversight before any of these can come to pass. PREPA has a longstanding reputation of dragging its heels in setting up interconnections for solar, solar installers like Uriarte say. Texas-based solar company Sunnova Solar Energy is the largest solar installer on the island, says that it has struggled with PREPA's "unique recalcitrance" for years, and now, as it tries to bring solar to the islands many residents.

"The inaction and lack of cooperation on PREPA's part has made it difficult," Sunnova CEO John Berger said in a statement. "The utility has continued to obstruct our ability to connect customers' solar systems to the grid."

PREPA did not respond to a request for comment.

Puerto Rico's demolished grid has relieved some installers from the need to interconnect as battery systems become more popular. Uriarte says he's been able to work faster because he's mostly been building battery-solar hybrids that are independent from the grid. He's gone from selling 10 battery systems a year to 350 since the hurricane. All the systems are built to last decades and could easily become part of a future microgrid set up.

"The main challenge getting it done is to have the proper regulation implemented in Puerto Rico that would allow the installations to interact with the grid effectively," Uriarte told POLITICO. Microgrids need to connect their generation and storage resources over utility-owned distribution lines in order to function.

Microgrids were illegal in Puerto Rico until last year, and installers like Uriarte are waiting for PREPA and the commission to develop the necessary framework and standards to allow interconnection. Uriarte hopes the commission can finish the regulatory work by next spring.

PREPA is also loathe to give up control of any of its distribution, transmission, or generation control, because all of those assets can be used to put up bonds. But the utility, which is owned by the commonwealth government, may no longer have a choice. Congress created a federal oversight board through the PROMESA Act in 2016, and in October that board installed a former Air Force officer to oversee PREPA and the power grid's recovery.

The commonwealth's $70 billion of debt, including the $9 billion held by the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, will make it hard to find creditors willing to lend money to rebuild.

Thanks to the storms and the creation of the oversight board, Commonwealth government has been able to be more aggressive in dealing with its creditors. FEMA has waived key cost-sharing requirements, and in September the government rejected an offer from PREPA creditors of a bridge loan and a reduction in debt.

Some critics would like to see the utility privatized and possibly bought out.

"You could wash out all of PREPA's debt and let the new private company get a clean start," said Shayle Kann, a senior adviser to GreenTech Media. "And in privatizing have it get bought by a larger company with a balance sheet that is creditworthy."

Sunnova's Berger would like to see the federal government allow use of the Investment Tax Credit as a grant program for Puerto Rico projects, similar to a program used as part of the 2009 stimulus law. As SEIA's Gensler points out, PREPA's long history of management problems and deep debts make it unattractive to lenders, which could make the grant system the best way to generate upfront capital costs.

However it gets rebuilt, the island's disaster may offer a major learning opportunity for other islands.

"This is a travesty, the worst disaster in a long time," Kann said. "But the silver lining is some innovative thinking. This problem that Puerto Rico is facing is a combination of a hurricane and something that is common to all island grids, so a lot of that stuff could apply to all other islands. I find that really exciting, despite the fact that it's coming out of a real crisis."

Farm bill in 2018 begins with early test on cotton, dairy spending Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich and Catherine Boudreau | 01/02/2018 05:02 AM EDT

When agriculture lawmakers return to Capitol Hill this month to begin work in a farm bill reauthorization year, they will face an early test of their ability to strike deals for farmers and ranchers before formal negotiations on the legislation kick off.

Shortly before the House skipped town for the holidays, lawmakers passed a sweeping $81 billion disaster aid package that included provisions to bolster farm bill programs for cotton and dairy farmers, in addition to providing assistance to communities from California to Puerto Rico that are attempting to rebound from hurricane, flood and wildfire damage.

But the emergency spending package's momentum was halted in the Senate, where lawmakers on both sides of the aisle voiced displeasure. The upper chamber is not expected to move on disaster funding until later this month, leaving the fate of the farm bill fixes up in the air.

Like the larger disaster aid measure, the farm bill provisions also drew bipartisan fire, providing a stark reminder of the deep political fault lines that have made the farm bill a heavier lift with each cycle. The episode also underscores the potential for unforeseen political developments to stymie progress as House and Senate Agriculture Committee leaders prepare to unveil their respective versions of the legislation this year.

If lawmakers are to pass the first on-time farm bill since 1990, they will have to solve myriad problems of policy and politics — and the cotton and dairy fixes in the disaster aid bill are first in line when Congress returns.

The provisions would make cotton growers eligible for the Price Loss Coverage program, something they've long lobbied for, and also give dairy farmers more insurance options by lifting the $20 million annual cap on policies for livestock. The cotton move is budget neutral, a congressional aide told POLITICO, but it was not clear how much the dairy fixes would cost taxpayers.

The attempt to slip farm bill policy into an unrelated disaster aid bill came under fire almost immediately from the right and the left, even though the legislation picked up support from 69 House Democrats — many from Texas, Florida and California — en route to easy passage by a vote of 251 to 169.

Using the must-pass disaster package to change cotton and dairy policy was seen as a shrewd political move aimed at giving struggling producers relief much faster than through a reauthorized farm bill, as well as an attempt to make the often-unruly process go more smoothly once lawmakers get down to brass tacks later this year.

"This is about making the farm bill easier," said Rob Larew, senior vice president of public policy and communications for the National Farmers Union. "It's all about the money. We have limited resources in the next farm bill. Anything that can be done in advance to build the baseline for dairy and cotton farmers, who are struggling, will be helpful in getting the farm bill completed [this] year."

Larew added that it's encouraging that lawmakers like House Agriculture Chairman Mike Conaway (R-Texas) and Senate Agriculture ranking member Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) are trying to clear farm bill hurdles now, before the drafts are released.

Stabenow said the provisions to help dairy farmers in the House bill didn't go far enough, and advocated for broader changes to the Margin Protection Program that would send greater indemnities to producers and reduce premium costs. MPP makes payments when the difference between the price of milk and the cost of feed drops below certain thresholds.

Taxpayers for Common Sense called the cotton provision "a huge giveaway," accusing lawmakers of "exploiting the hurricane recovery process to harvest cash for cotton-growing businesses" in a way that "will fleece taxpayers for years."

Heritage Action, the lobbying arm of The Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, urged lawmakers to vote against the disaster aid package, calling the cotton provision "an unacceptable expansion of already excessive handouts to the cotton industry." The move fails the test of what should be considered emergency funding, because helping cotton growers isn't urgent, Heritage argued.

Last year brought an especially punishing spate of hurricanes and wildfires — Congress will have spent a record total of $133 billion on 2017 natural disasters if the aid package is ultimately approved — but it also showed that early spending compromises on farm bill policy are possible.

In July, amid negotiations over fiscal 2018 spending, Senate Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and ranking member Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) struck a deal on cotton and dairy provisions. Stabenow also gave her blessing. But Congress still has not enacted spending bills for fiscal 2018 — the latest continuing resolution will run through Jan. 19 — a reality that created the impetus for an attempt to use what would have been the third emergency spending measure of 2017 to assist cotton and dairy farmers.

The controversial SNAP add-on

The House-passed disaster aid bill also contained a little-known provision that sparked outrage on the left and complicates efforts to change farm bill programs.

Near the end of the text, there is language to create a "National Accuracy Clearinghouse," which would help states ensure that beneficiaries of the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program — a central driver of farm bill spending — are not collecting benefits in multiple states.

Prior to the holiday break, no one on Capitol Hill seemed able to furnish an official estimate of how much the clearinghouse would save, but multiple sources told POLITICO the savings are projected to top $550 million.

Lawmakers were told that USDA was planning to launch the clearinghouse in 2018, so using the policy as an offset seemed like a freebie to some, but Democrats and anti-hunger advocates didn't see it that way.

"Pitting one part of the farm bill against another is the wrong way to get things done," Stabenow said in a statement released shortly after the disaster aid package was unveiled.

Ellen Vollinger, a farm bill veteran and director of government relations for the Food Research & Action Center, said she views the dustup as an early test of the broader farm bill coalition — the longtime alliance between SNAP supporters and backers of the farm safety net. The fact that the National Farmers Union and farm policy leaders from other quarters called out the proposed SNAP offset was encouraging, she said, and showed "the degree to which the farm bill stakeholders are united."

Whether the coalition can stick together this year amid political pressure to make significant changes to the SNAP program and draw down spending is a key dynamic to watch this farm bill cycle, particularly with the prospect of the Trump administration and congressional Republicans taking up welfare reform. (Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said in December that he doesn't expect welfare reform to be on the agenda in 2018, however.)

The House Agriculture Committee, which has already written the better part of its farm bill and plans to release it early this year, has kept a tight lid on its draft. Conaway has repeatedly hinted there will be a focus in the bill on using work requirements to thin the ranks of SNAP recipients.

"We hope to make some appropriate changes to work requirements," Conaway told POLITICO in a recent interview. "We've worked hard the past three years to not talk about money. We want to look at policy."

"How do we make sure folks don't get trapped in the system and make sure it's more meaningful to work than live off the government dole?" he added.

Anti-hunger advocates give a lot of credit to the committee for being thorough and not ideological in its review of the SNAP program over the past three years — it has held more than a dozen hearings on the subject — but they remain anxious as they wait to see how Conaway will approach work requirements.

"It's one thing to have these concepts and words, but it's sometimes more complicated than lawmakers think," Vollinger said.

Influential Democrats, including Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.), have been clear that they will oppose any proposed cuts or structural changes to SNAP. More than 82 Democrats are co-sponsoring a bill, H.R. 1276 \(115\), from Rep. Alma Adams (D-N.C.), that would not only increase SNAP benefits, but also protect some jobless adult recipients from being cut off from the program by requiring states to first offer employment and training opportunities.

What the pension fight that could disrupt budget talks is all about Back

By Andrew Hanna | 12/28/2017 09:01 AM EDT

The next budget fight could be over multiemployer pensions.

Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Rep. Richard Neal (D-Mass.) have introduced a bill, S. 2147 \(115\), to prop up faltering union-negotiated pensions funded by multiple employers, including the Teamsters' Central States Pension Fund and the United Mine Workers' Health and Retirement Funds. Democratic congressional leaders made a multiemployer pension fix a top priority in budget negotiations that were postponed to January, alongside other items such as the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program and the Children's Health Insurance Program.

What congressional Democrats are less quick to point out is that in 2014, amid lamentations of looming insolvency no less urgent than those heard now, they negotiated an ambitious bipartisan solution for insolvent multiemployer pension funds that required benefits to be suspended or trimmed. The bill was signed into law by President Barack Obama — whose Treasury Department subsequently declined, in 2016, to approve cuts to Central States, prompting accusations that it knuckled under election-year pressure.

This time, the Democrats' rallying cry is — as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi told Teamsters and miners on Capitol Hill in mid-December — "No cuts. No cuts!"

Multiemployer pensions are union-negotiated plans maintained by multiple companies, often within a single industry, to share risk. At one time these pensions were thought unusually secure because their solvency didn't depend on the fortunes of any one company. But the 2008 recession, Rust Belt decline and poor returns on investment put some multiemployer plans in financial peril. Today, some 3.5 million Americans pay into "red-zone" multiemployer pension plans that are expected to run out of money in the next 20 years.

The largest of the threatened plans is Central States, whose 400,000 members account for nearly 50 percent of all multiemployer unfunded liabilities. Central States is expected to become insolvent within the next nine years, according to the Treasury Department.

"Many of these retirees will be forced onto food stamps," said Teamsters International Vice President John Murphy. "They may not be able to afford their prescription drug plans. The ramifications are just absolutely tremendous."

In theory, Central States and the UMW's pension fund are insured by the Pension Benefit

Guaranty Corporation. But the PBGC is itself underfunded, and it's expected to become insolvent by 2025, according to the insurer's own estimate. If Central States were to fail, the PBGC would not have sufficient funds to rescue it. And the longer Congress takes to find a multiemployer solution, the more expensive any rescue will become.

The Teamsters-backed Brown-Neal bill would create a new federal agency within the Treasury Department called the Pensions Rehabilitation Administration that could authorize 30-year loans to troubled pension plans, backed by Treasury bonds. Those loans would be repaid on an interest-only basis for 29 years, with a final payment, including interest and full principal, in the 30th year. The bill would restrict use of the money that Treasury lent to annuities or low-risk investments whose returns would, at least in theory, cover the pensions' unfunded liabilities.

The Democrats cite in support of their proposal an analysis by Cheiron, an actuarial consulting firm that advises many of the country's largest public and multiemployer pensions. Cheiron CEO Gene Kalwarski told POLITICO that the bill's restrictions on what the loans may be used for is key. They "cannot just be put back into the plan and put into risky assets," he said.

Kalwarski conceded, however, that the proposal's likelihood of repaying the 30-year debt was "not 100 percent." Meanwhile, Central States' own actuary, Segan Consulting, maintains that the federal loan program "would not be sufficient" to allow Central States repay its debt, according to a letter that Central States Executive Director Thomas Nyhan wrote Brown and Neal.

"Financial assistance from PBGC would be required to make the program work for the fund," Nyhan concluded.

Congress thought it had the multiemployer problem licked three year ago when then-House Education and the Workforce Chairman Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) and then-Ranking Member George Miller (D-Calif.) pushed through the Multiemployer Pension Reform Act. The deal was attached to that year's so-called cromnibus spending bill (so named because it combined a continuing resolution with an omnibus spending bill).

The Kline-Miller bill allowed pension trustees to petition the Treasury Department to suspend benefits if they could demonstrate that the cuts would restore the pensions to solvency. Any Treasury-approved cuts would then require approval from members. Obama administration officials persuaded then-Majority Leader Harry Reid to allow Treasury to overrule that vote if the pension's collapse would bankrupt the PBGC.

The law was designed with Central States very much in mind, and there were signs initially that the Teamsters would extend it tacit, if reluctant, approval. But Teamsters President James P. Hoffa, facing a tough reelection challenge from insurgent Fred Zuckerman, condemned the final bill's mechanism for benefit cuts, and in 2016 Treasury found a way to reject Central States' application. At the time, Miller told POLITICO that it "was a calculated response to sort of stop the discussion in this political year. ... I just don't understand how you can arrive at another conclusion."

"They very much had in their minds it was an election year," said Joshua Gotbaum, director of the PBGC from 2010 to 2014, now at the Brookings Institute. "Treasury chickened out." Both Miller and Kline have since retired from Congress.

Brown and Neal can claim consistency on multiemployer pensions because they opposed passage of the 2014 pension-reform law. Their bill would require plans approved for cuts by Treasury under the 2014 framework to reapply under the new loan program and to reinstate suspended benefits, effectively sabotaging the Kline-Miller deal. Plans that failed after 2014 would still be eligible for loans if they have not yet terminated.

"These retirees held up their end of the bargain by working hard for their companies for decades," Brown said in a written statement. "They didn't create this problem, and forcing them to shoulder drastic cuts is not only immoral, it's bad for our economy."

Alicia Munnell, director of the Center for Retirement Research at Boston College, sees the Brown-Neal bill as a good starting point for discussion on how to fix multiemployer pensions. "This will solve about 80 percent of the problem," she said. "It's important that we get an 80 percent proposal on the table, because I think that will bring all the other participants to a conversation."

UPS and the National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Pensions, whose own pension proposals include cut benefits, have thanked Brown and Neal for their "leadership" on the issue. "UPS hopes that other lawmakers will follow your lead and work in earnest to address this important issue before the end of the year," UPS President of Global Public Affairs Laura Lane wrote to the lawmakers, although she stopped short of endorsing the bill.

Matt House, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, confirmed that Democratic leaders are "still pushing to get it included in the omnibus," but noted that a deal to lift domestic spending caps must come first. Democrats will have to wait until the new year for formal negotiations to begin, and may not be able to extract more than a pledge to deal with the pensions issue separately from the budget talks.

But a bipartisan working group on pensions has been meeting behind the scenes for months. Republicans and Democrats in the group — Reps. David McKinley (R-W.Va.), Don Young (R-Alaska), Debbie Dingell (D-Mich.), Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio) and Rick Nolan (D-Minn.) — signed a letter to Speaker Paul Ryan urging him to support their efforts "in the coming months."

McKinley's office says it's "taking a look" at the Brown-Neal proposal but has not yet come out in favor of it. "The pensions caucus is hoping to take action in coming months," said McKinley spokesperson Alec Thomas. "Hopefully, in the first legislative quarter."

Republicans have yet to release a formal counter to Brown's proposal, but they will almost certainly oppose anything they regard as a pension bailout. The price tag needed to make the plans solvent, tens of billions of dollars, is enough to make fiscal conservatives balk.

"The problem," said Rachel Greszler from The Heritage Foundation, "is the Mineworkers and Teamsters alone — that's almost as expensive as just bailing out the PBGC itself."

But some Republicans, particularly in states that have many multiemployer pension dependents, are at least listening to what Brown has to say. The Teamsters' Murphy said he has heard encouraging signs from Republicans in states like Michigan, Minnesota and Ohio. Brown's fellow Ohio senator, Republican Rob Portman, is a prime pickup target for Democrats. "We are touch with Sen. Brown and all of the stakeholders in this debate, and will continue those discussions as work on this issue moves forward," said a spokesperson for Portman.

Murphy said he's optimistic the bill will pass, pointing to it as the most "realistic" option.

"Three years ago, if you had asked me that question I would have said the opposite," Murphy said. "Most members of Congress ... know there is a severe human problem coming."

And so far, there are no other legislative proposals on the table. The other major proposals — advanced by the NCCMP and UPS — have yet to be introduced in legislative form. Both feature benefit cuts.

Does the White Working Class Really Vote Against Its Own Interests? Back

By Joshua Zeitz | 12/31/2017 08:06 AM EDT

As his first year in the White House draws to a close, Donald J. Trump remains in almost every respect a singular character. He exists well outside the boundaries of what most observers previously judged possible, let alone respectable, in American politics. To catalogue the norms he has violated, the traditions he has traduced or trampled, and the rules—written and unwritten—that he has either cunningly sidestepped or audaciously blown to smithereens would require volumes. Love him or loath him, Trump operates apart from history.

Yet if Trump defies history, paradoxically, he has also resurfaced questions that historians have long debated, including some that many considered settled for many years. In this sense, Trump hasn't just defied history; he has changed it—and he has changed the way that we think about it, forcing us to look back on our past with a new lens.

This Politico Magazine series, to be published in three installments over the next few weeks, will look at three historical debates that simmered on low heat for years, until the historic presidential election of November 2016 brought them back to a boil. These debates are foundational. They concern race and identity. National character. The dark side of populism. They drive at the core meaning of American citizenship.

The first in this series, perhaps the most fundamental, centers around the white working class. Are working-class white voters shooting themselves in the foot by making common cause with a political movement that is fundamentally inimical to their economic self-interest? In exchange for policies like the new tax bill, which several nonpartisan analyses conclude will lower taxes on the wealthy and raise them for the working class, did they really just settle for a wall that will likely never be built, a rebel yell for Confederate monuments most of them will never visit, and the hollow validation of a disappearing world in which white was up and brown and black were down?

If they did accept that bargain, why? Or are we missing something? Might working-class whites in fact derive some tangible advantage from their bargain with Trump? Is it really so irrational to care more about, say, illegal immigration than marginal income tax rates?

These are good questions. They're also not new ones. The historian W.E.B. Du Bois asked them more than 80 years ago in his seminal work on Reconstruction, when he posited that working-class Southern whites were complicit, or at least passive instruments, in their own political and economic disenfranchisement. They forfeited real power and material well-being, he argued, in return for the "psychological" wages associated with being white.

Since then, the issue has inspired a vibrant debate among historians. Until last year, most agreed with Du Bois that the answer to the question was not so simple as "yes" or "no"—that whiteness sometimes conferred benefits both imaginary and real.

In the age of Trump, we're once again pressure-testing Du Bois' framework. As one might expect, it's complicated. White identity pays dividends you can easily bank, and some that you can't.

In 1935 Du Bois published his most influential treatise, Black Reconstruction, a reconsideration of the period immediately following the Civil War. One of the historical quandaries that Du Bois addressed was the successful effort of white plantation owners in the 1870s and 1880s in building a political coalition with poor, often landless, white men to overthrow biracial Reconstruction governments throughout the South.

"The theory of laboring class unity rests upon the assumption that laborers, despite internal jealousies, will unite because of their opposition to the exploitation of the capitalists," wrote Du Bois, who trained at both the University of Berlin and Harvard, and whose grounding in Marxist political economy taught him to view politics through the lens of different but fixed stages in capitalist development. "This would throw white and black labor into one class," he continued, "and precipitate a united fight for higher wages and better working conditions."

That, of course, is not what happened. In most Southern states, poor whites and wealthy whites forged a coalition that overthrew biracial Reconstruction governments and passed a raft of laws that greatly benefited plantation and emerging industrial elites at the expense of small landowners, tenant farmers and factory workers. "It failed to work because the theory of race was supplemented by a carefully planned and slowly evolved method," Du Bois wrote, "which drove such a wedge between white and black workers that there probably are not today in the world two groups of workers with practically identical interests who hate and fear each other so deeply and persistently and who are kept so far apart that neither sees anything of common interest."

Du Bois famously posited that "the white group of laborers, while they received a low wage, were compensated in part by a sort of public and psychological wage. They were given public deference and titles of courtesy because they were white."

Decades before so many white working-class citizens of Pennsylvania, Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin—to say nothing of Alabama, West Virginia and Mississippi—cast their lot with a party that endeavors to raise their taxes and gut their health care, Du Bois identified the problem: Some wages aren't denominated in hard currency. They carry a psychological payoff—even a spiritual one.

The most obvious time and place to pressure-test Du Bois' theory is the Jim Crow South. In the 60-odd years between the collapse of Reconstruction and World War II, the South—still reeling from the Civil War, in which it lost the present-day equivalent of approximately $5.5 trillion in real property and wealth—slipped into a semi-permanent state of economic crisis.

In 1938, President Franklin Roosevelt declared the region "the Nation's No. 1 economic problem." It was, as historian Gavin Wright famously observed, a "low-wage region in a high-wage country," one where two-thirds of the population lived in small towns of fewer than 2,500 people, derived meager incomes from agriculture, mining or manufacturing, and even in the midst of a national depression, stood out for poor health, want of education and lack of opportunities for upward mobility.

The vast majority of farmers, black and white, were tenants or sharecroppers, and repressive poll taxes disenfranchised not just black men and women, but also poor white people. Designed by wealthy plantation owners and industrialists, the poll tax was expressly a class measure, meant to preserve the region's prevailing low-tax, low-wage, low-service economy. It was more ingenious and insidious than many people today realize. In Mississippi and Virginia, it was cumulative for two years; if a tenant farmer or textile worker couldn't pay in any given year, not only did he miss an election cycle, he had to pay a full two years' tax to restore his voting rights. In Georgia, the poll tax was cumulative from the time a voter turned 21 years old—meaning, if one missed 10 years, he or she would have to pay a decade's worth of back taxes before regaining the right to vote. In Texas, the tax was due on February 1, in the winter off-season, when farmers were habitually strapped for cash. It was, as one Southern liberal observed at the time, "like buying a ticket to a show nine months ahead of time, and before you know who's playing, or really what the thing is all about."

Little wonder that in 1936, three of four voting-age adults outside the South participated in the presidential election, but in the South, just one in four cast ballots. The system kept men like Eugene Cox, a conservative Democrat who held the powerful post of House Rules Committee chairman, in power. In 1938, Cox won re-election with 5,137 votes, though his district in southwest Georgia had a total population of 263,606 residents.

Yet when working-class Southern whites could participate in the political process, they often jettisoned their natural class interests in favor of racial solidarity. Historians have focused special attention on the rise and fall of the Readjuster movement, a biracial coalition that controlled the legislature, governor's office and most federal posts in Virginia between 1879 and 1883. Forged in opposition to a conservative Democratic establishment that had shuttered schools, imposed regressive taxes, and favored creditors over debtors, the alliance passed a raft of measures that presaged much of the Populist movement's agenda in coming years. For a time, it held. But in 1883 Democrats campaigned with intense focus on the issue of inter-marriage and miscegenation—a rare phenomenon that nevertheless struck a raw nerve with white workers and farmers. They warned that Readjuster rule would result in "mixed schools now and mixed marriages for the future." It worked. Conservative "Bourbon" Democrats regained control of state government and reintroduced regressive, one-party rule that benefited a small minority of Virginians.

To reduce Jim Crow politics to a single trajectory is to oversimplify a complicated story. But the problem of white working-class Southerners bedeviled generations of liberal activists and the historians who studied them. When the union federation Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) launched Operation Dixie, a massive effort to unionize Southern workers in the mid-1940s, organizers ran into the same wall: Conservative politicians and their wealthy patrons successfully used race as a cudgel to turn white workers away from collective bargaining agreements that would have raised their wages. Even those Southern populists who ostensibly opposed Bourbon rule—from Georgia's Tom Watson in the early 20th century to Mississippi's Theodore Bilbo in the 1930s—more often flipped the playbook and used race as a blunt instrument against their elite opponents.

Southern liberals in the 1930s and 1940s applied a sharp class focus and concluded that wealthy Democrats wanted, in historian Gavin Wright's words, to keep labor "cheap and divided." The white liberal writer Lillian E. Smith famously captured this thinking in her short story, "Two Men and a Bargain," which began: "Once upon a time, down South, a rich white man made a bargain with a poor white ... 'You boss the nigger, and I'll boss the money.'"

Critically, Du Bois never insisted that the psychological wages of whiteness were wholly devoid of tangible value. What they forfeited in material benefits, working-class whites also recouped in limited power and privilege. "They were admitted freely with all classes of white people to public functions, public parks, and the best schools," he wrote. "The police were drawn from their ranks. ... The newspapers specialized on news that flattered the poor whites and utterly ignored the Negro except in crime and ridicule. On the other hand, the Negro was subject to insult; was afraid of mobs; was liable to the jibes of children and the unreasoning fears of white women; and was compelled almost continuously to submit to various badges of inferiority." You couldn't necessarily buy groceries with these benefits, but they were palpably meaningful.

David Roediger, a historian of class and race who writes with a Marxian lens, emphasized exactly this point in his classic volume, The Wages of Whiteness, published in 1991 (the title was a direct tribute to Du Bois). He encouraged a generation of scholars to consider that working-class whites may not have been unwitting dupes in their own economic subjugation; instead, they knowingly harvested certain real advantages of whiteness. While this pattern was most visible in the South, it also deeply influenced political culture in the North and West, where whiteness was no less central to popular conceptions of American citizenship. And Roediger's focus was on Northern workers in antebellum cities—workers undergoing the jarring transition from pre-industrial forms of work and leisure to a more regimented existence as wage laborers.

The workers whom Roediger describes, and whom dozens more scholars would similarly study, understood that American citizenship was predicated on race and independence; Congress, after all, had opened citizenship to all "free white persons" in 1790. That law remained on the books into the 20th century. But what did it mean to be "white?" Congress never made that point clear. Indeed, there was no immediate consensus that certain new immigrants met the qualification. And what did it mean to be "free?" Their new status as wage earners—economically dependent on other men to earn a living—seemingly made many working men and women something less than free. Many non-black workers keenly understood that they might be left outside the boundaries of citizenship. They also resented new forms of industrial discipline that their employers foisted onto them. Many addressed these anxieties by drawing a sharp dichotomy between white and black—citizen and slave—and placing themselves on one side of that divide.

They became avid purveyors of blackface minstrelsy—a popular form of entertainment in which working-class whites reveled in watching other working-class whites apply burnt cork to their faces and act out what the historian George Rawick (writing more generally about early American racism) described as a "pornography of [their] former [lives]." The black characters they portrayed on stage were shiftless, sexually promiscuous and rowdy; they reveled in pre-industrial activities like hunting. They were coarse. In short, they deflected on black people, both slave and free, the very same social demerits that wealthier whites—who were trying to impose new discipline on the urban working class—scribed to them.

Playbills commonly "paired pictures of the performers in blackface and without makeup—rough and respectable," Roediger observed. The former were labeled, "Plantation Darkeys." The latter, "Citizens." By culturally differentiating themselves from black people, actors and audience members alike established themselves as "free white persons."

While it's easy to imagine that working-class whites embraced the new racial dichotomy in order to enjoy leverage in the new urban job market, in many cases, black and white workers weren't even in competition with each other. Many of the most popular blackface actors were former artisans and mechanics—coach makers, typesetters and wood craftsmen who were now increasingly likely to fall into "wage slavery." They were unlikely to vie for employment with free black men, who were normally consigned to unskilled jobs as dockworkers, day laborers, and (until Irish women displaced them) domestic servants.

One group that did sometimes compete for unskilled jobs with African Americans were Irish immigrants. Regarded as racially suspect—depicted in political cartoons as dark and ape-like, and patently unqualified for citizenship—Irish immigrants became some of the most avid and violent practitioners of white identity politics. Even when they weren't in direct competition with black men for jobs—as when a group of Irish handloom weavers was displaced by white Protestant weavers in Philadelphia in 1844—they donned blackface and mobbed their black neighbors. The point wasn't to get their jobs back.

Indeed, more was at stake than cash wages. To achieve standing as free white persons—and to enjoy the many benefits of citizenship that accrued from that definition—working-class men in the antebellum era consciously asserted their white identity and set it apart from blackness through language, performance, politics and violence. To imagine that they didn't understand the full impact of their decisions is to deny them any modicum of intelligence or agency.

If working-class whites historically derived both psychological and citizenship wages by privileging race over class, is it possible that they sometimes enjoyed real wages as well? Beginning 25 years ago, a rising generation of political historians including Thomas Sugrue, Kevin Kruse, Matthew Lassiter, Robert Self and Craig Steven Wilder concluded that they did. Giving special focus to labor and housing markets, they found that many working-class white families benefited directly from government policies that placed African Americans at a disadvantage.

Take housing. Beginning in the 1930s, most mortgages were underwritten by the Federal Housing Administration (FHA), a federal agency that insured banks against losses from homeowners who defaulted on their loans. The FHA insured these mortgages in return for securing the banks' pledge to provide home loans at low interest rates and to spread interest payments over at least 15 and as many as 30 years to pay back their loans. At minimal expense to the federal government and with only the pledge of default insurance, the FHA freed up unprecedented levels of capital and helped create a postwar social order in which 60 percent of American households owned and accumulated wealth in their own homes.

In deciding whether or not to insure mortgages, the FHA rated every census tract in the country. Assuming that houses lost value in neighborhoods that were racially mixed or primarily populated by African Americans and Latinos, the FHA assigned such areas lower scores or "redlined" them altogether, refusing to insure mortgages in these neighborhoods or insuring them on unfavorable terms. This meant that most black Americans could not secure mortgages, as their mere presence in a neighborhood would choke off affordable credit.

In a perverse twist, black residents in many Northern cities had little recourse but to rent cramped, sub-divided apartments in buildings whose white landlords often neglected repairs and upkeep, but the physical decay of their homes fed the white Americans' suspicions that black residents chose to live in squalor.

It was not just a matter of housing. A powerful combination of private-sector discrimination and nepotism within trade unions had long excluded black workers from well-paid, blue-collar industries. As George Meany, the president of the AFL-CIO crassly admitted, "When I was a plumber, it never [occurred] to me to have niggers in the union!" Even in liberal bastions like New York City, African Americans in the 1950s and 1960s comprised less than 5 percent of all dock workers, skilled machinists, electricians or unionized carpenters—the types of jobs that afforded non-college educated white men access to middle-class comfort and economic security in the post-war period. The black unemployment rate was double that of the city's overall unemployment rate. And New York was better than most places. In Chicago, 17 percent of black adults in the early 1960s were unemployed. In Cleveland, 20 percent. In Detroit, 39 percent.

By the time federal and state officials got serious about enforcing fair employment laws in the 1970s, America's manufacturing and extractive industries had already fallen into steady decline. In effect, two post-war forces most responsible for lifting millions of working-class families into middle-class comfort and privilege—the suburban housing boom and unionized blue-collar jobs—only became available en masse to black Americans just as the post-war boom drew to a close.

This wasn't a simple case of discrimination or inequality. Working-class white families affirmatively enjoyed what the historian George Lipsitz termed a "possessive investment in whiteness." They availed themselves of the G.I. Bill's housing and education benefits, paid for in part by black people's taxes, at a time when black veterans faced sharp limitations on where (or whether) they could draw the same benefits. They accumulated equity in their suburban homes and used it to send their children to college or to save for their retirement. They enjoyed access to public services—from public schools and public trash collection, to clean water and sewage—that were deficient in majority-minority neighborhoods. These advantages conferred second-order benefits, including better health and a higher average life expectancy.

In other words, whiteness did pay real wages. It delivered an inter-generational advantage to those who were in a position to claim it. And white working-class Americans seemed on some level to understand it. When in 1966 Lyndon Johnson attempted to ram through Congress a law banning racial discrimination in the sale and rental of housing, white working-class voters revolted both in the streets and at the polls. (Ronald Reagan, a washed up former actor, unseated the otherwise popular incumbent governor of California, Pat Brown, largely by touting his opposition to the state's open housing law.) That summer, when Martin Luther King Jr. led protests throughout the "bungalow belt" in Chicago's working-class white neighborhoods and the nearby blue-collar suburb of Cicero, Polish, Italian, and Irish residents who had once been staunch Democratic voters now erupted in fury. They pelted protesters with rocks and beat them with clubs amid cries of "White Power!"; "Burn them like Jews"; "We want Martin Luther Coon!"; "Roses are red, violets are black, King would look good with a knife in his back."

Just a few years later, when the federal government began requiring that government contractors and industrial unions that did business with them begin making affirmative efforts to integrate their workforces, white voters gravitated to backlash politicians who promised to preserve their privilege in the job sector. Even as late as 1990, conservative Republican Senator Jesse Helms was able to make openly racist appeals on such grounds and pay no price. On the contrary, it was a winning formula.

The same dynamic that Du Bois grappled with is on display today. In breaking for Donald Trump and the GOP, working-class white voters are manifestly undercutting their economic self-interest. To be sure, Trump didn't campaign like an archetypal GOP plutocrat. He railed against free trade and immigration, policies that many white working-class citizens believe, with some justification, have hurt their communities. He promised to bring back manufacturing and coal mining jobs, eliminate generous tax loopholes for wealthy families like his own, and—like Andrew Jackson, after whom he has patterned his presidency—privilege the many over the few.

But Democrats and Never Trump Republicans shouted at the top of their lungs that Trump's campaign promises either weren't possible or that they wouldn't help working-class voters as much as he pledged. And they appear to have been right. The president recently signed into law a tax bill whose benefits, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center and the Congressional Budget Office, accrue principally to corporations and super-rich individuals; many middle-class and working-class families will ultimately face a tax hike. The administration and its congressional supporters have also taken steps to make health care less affordable or altogether inaccessible, destabilize retirement security for working-class families, and allow industrial polluters to despoil the air they breathe and the water they drink. Despite what Trump said on the campaign trail, his agenda does little to help and much to hurt struggling white families.

Of course, whiteness still delivers other dividends—as it always has. It makes one less likely to be killed by a police officer during a traffic stop. It enables white men to carry assault weapons (including long guns) in places of public accommodation, while a black man might be shot and killed by law enforcement officials merely for picking up a BB gun displayed on a sales rack at Walmart. It affords working-class white families the peace of mind that the government won't invade homes or hospitals in pursuit of undocumented children or grandparents. Whiteness, in other words, continues to pay tangible benefits, and for right or wrong, it makes some sense that its primary beneficiaries are loathe to support candidates who expressly promise to disrupt this privileged status.

Yet Trump has also, arguably more than any other candidate for president in the last hundred years (excepting third-party outliers like Strom Thurmond and George Wallace), played to the purely psychological benefits of being white. From his racially-laden exhortations about black crime in Chicago and Latino gangs seemingly everywhere, to his attacks on an American-born federal judge of Mexican parentage and Muslim gold star parents, he has paid the white majority with redemption and revanchism. Trump might be increasing economic inequality, but at least the working-class whites feel like they belong in Trump's America. He urged them to privilege race over class when they entered their polling stations.

And it didn't just stop there. As Ta-Nehisi Coates argues, Trump swept almost every white demographic group, forging a "broad white coalition that ran the gamut from Joe the Dishwasher to Joe the Plumber to Joe the Banker." It's not just blue-collar white people who seem blithely willing to sacrifice economic rationality for racial solidarity. After all, it arguably took a special kind of stupid for upper-middle class suburbanites in high-tax states to support a party that just raised their taxes. (No, this wasn't a bait-and-switch. The GOP leadership has talked openly about eliminating deductions for state and local taxes since 2014.) Unless, that is, you account for the wages of whiteness.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Democrats agree to a redo on spending talks — GOP leaders considered stripping Frelinghuysen's chairmanship — Defense hawks float 'cromnibus'
Date: Monday, December 04, 2017 4:31:12 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/04/2017 04:27 PM EDT

FILLING THE EMPTY CHAIRS: Barring more incendiary tweets, Democratic leaders say they're now willing to show their faces at the White House for spending talks on Thursday.

That bicameral chat will probably focus mostly on overall budget caps and not so much on policy deals that could sweeten — or threaten — the looming vote to prevent a shutdown come Friday.

No smoke yet: As we report this afternoon, GOP leaders in the House hope to have enough Republican votes to pass their two-week continuing resolution without having to rely on Democrats. Even in the Senate, no ultimatums from the minority party are spelling certain failure for the bill at this point. And as John Bresnahan notes, a DREAMers deadlock raises the specter of shutdown — although not necessarily on the first patch this month.

What crisis? Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell says there's "no emergency" right now for those young immigrants who benefit from DACA and that it wouldn't be wise for Democrats "to shut down the government over a non-emergency," Kevin Robillard reports.

Like rain on your wedding day: Apparently retired from his days as chief shutdown agitator, OMB Director Mick Mulvaney spoke out this weekend against the injustice of a "broken" spending system in which "any little group can sort of hold the government hostage."

Buying time: Appropriators unveiled the stopgap text this weekend, including language that would temporarily help states that are running out of money under the Children's Health Insurance Program, we reported Saturday. In rolling out the plan, House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) acknowledged that the bill is just a tide-me-over while leaders negotiate those ever-essential topline numbers for defense and non-defense spending. Once they've got those totals, appropriations will "rapidly go to work with the Senate" on an omnibus, Frelinghuysen says.

#DailyBudgetFact — Some 199 years ago, Illinois entered the Union as the 21st state, Andrew Glass notes in our This Day in Politics series. Now, the Prairie State has the eleventh largest budget in the U.S., with general fund spending totaling about $20 billion per year and total state spending amounting to about $36 billion annually.

APPROPRIATIONS

GIVE ME THAT GAVEL: No "no" vote goes unpunished — at least when you're chairman of one of Congress' most powerful committees. Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report this afternoon that House Speaker Paul Ryan and his leadership team discussed replacing Frelinghuysen as chairman after he bucked the party and voted against the GOP tax bill. "If there's no perceived blowback against Frelinghuysen, Ryan's hand is weakened," says one House Republican source familiar with the discussion to oust the chairman. "It's almost a political necessity. There has to be real or perceived blowback."

DEFENSE

RETURN OF THE CROMNIBUS? Loathsome of any continuing resolution lasting through New Year's, some House Republicans are pushing to include a full year's worth of Pentagon funding on one of the stopgap bills this month. House Armed Services member Mike Gallagher (R-Wis.) says that strategy would allow the House GOP to take a "bigger stand," as Connor O'Brien reports. "I don't think there's an appetite among ... defense hawks in Congress for a long-term CR going into the next year," Gallagher said at the Reagan National Defense Forum this Saturday. But don't expect Senate Democrats to swallow this easily.

'Finish the paperwork': Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) told Connor this weekend he'd be open to the GOP's "double CR" plan, but only if it's backed up by a budget deal. "If there is an agreement and they need ... another week to finish the paperwork, that's one thing," Thornberry said. "But as far as, let's just pass a two-week CR and then a three-week CR and we'll see where we are then — and then another month CR ... I'm not gonna do that."

TRUMP'S MILITARY MIRAGE: President Donald Trump campaigned on a historic invigoration of the U.S. military. But nearly a year into office, his administration has taken few tangible steps to make that happen, Connor and Bryan Bender report. Most evident? The lack of a caps deal. "Congress has to vote to change the Budget Control Act," notes Rep. Adam Smith of Washington, the Armed Services Committee's top Democrat. "And if we were so hell-bent to do that — if it was such a priority — why are we sitting here in December and we still haven't done it?"

TAX

LET THE RECONCILING BEGIN: Both chambers will formally agree this week to enter a conference committee on the GOP's tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\) — the final step before ultimately voting to send the compromised plan off to POTUS. House and Senate Republicans are in sync on key elements of the plan, like its emphasis on cutting corporate taxes. But there are glaring gaps in policy, including Obamacare's individual mandate, the mortgage interest deduction, the alternative minimum tax and so-called pass-throughs, as Brian Faler explains.

To recap: GOP defends Friday's frantic push | How McConnell finally won | Red-state Democrats vote no | "Booze, women or movies" |

Policy deep dive: Reconsidering the corporate rate | Health care ripple effect | More generous medical expense deduction | Protecting a conservative college | How farmers fared | ANWR drilling hardly a public priority | A boost for homeschooling

PAYGO

DOESN'T MAKE IT SO: Outside budget experts are scoffing at Republicans' nonchalant dismissal of PAYGO concerns after McConnell and Ryan released a joint statement Friday assuring that Congress won't actually allow the $150 billion per year in cuts to take place upon enactment of tax reform.

Double standard: Among the burning questions of fiscal gurus: Why are GOP leaders willing to stave off a PAYGO sequester without replacing it with alternative savings, even while they aren't cool with doing the same with Budget Control Act cuts.

HEALTH

ADDICTION RESHAPES MEDICAID DEBATE: A crackdown on Medicaid work requirements is sweeping red states — and critics say it could put recovering addicts at risk. Kentucky, New Hampshire, Maine and Indiana are among the GOP-led states attempting a reduce the rolls of the swelling entitlement program, with big questions about how they would make sure people with chronic drug problems or mental illness wouldn't stand to lose their benefits, Rachana Pradhan and Brianna Ehley explain.

Another punt: Acting HHS Secretary Eric Hargan made clear today that Trump will let Congress decide whether to dole out more cash to fight the opioid crisis. "We're looking forward to hearing from Congress about how they intend to address this," Hargan told reporters, Brianna reports.

Court of public opinion: More than half of adults believe the opioid epidemic is a "major problem" but not a national emergency, according to a new POLITICO/Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health poll. The same survey showed that Republican voters still believe Obamacare repeal should be Congress' top priority, even above cutting taxes.

CHEATING CHIP: Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) says GOP leaders' latest CHIP assist is "a patchwork, slapdash scheme that will do nothing to ease the stress of families and state budgets." Through the stopgap spending bill House appropriators released over the weekend, states running out of money under the Children's Health Insurance Program would be eligible for tide-me-over funding until month's end. But Wyden says Congress should "step up and end the uncertainty ... after two months of needless delay" by enacting a bipartisan, five-year CHIP extension.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said Monday they will meet with President Donald Trump to resume high-stakes negotiations to avoid a government shutdown at week's end.

The Thursday sit-down at the White House with Trump and GOP leaders would amount to a do-over of the meeting Democrats ditched last week over a fiery Trump tweet that slammed the Democrats and cast doubt on the prospect of reaching a deal. The boycott caused a political spectacle and temporarily halted talks on a broader spending deal congressional leaders have been negotiating behind the scenes.

"We hope the President will go into this meeting with an open mind, rather than deciding that an agreement can't be reached beforehand," the Democratic leaders wrote in a joint statement.

Government funding runs out Friday at midnight, though Republican leaders believe they have the votes to push back that deadline until just before Christmas. Both parties hope to have reached a bipartisan, two-year agreement on overall spending levels for defense and non-defense programs by the time funding runs out again on Dec. 22.

That year-end deal is also likely to include other long-stalled legislative priorities, including addressing funding lapses for the Children's Health Insurance Program and the National Flood Insurance Program.

Democratic leaders reiterated on Monday that they are seeking a compromise to extend protections for the hundreds of thousands of undocumented immigrants who came to the country as children and are protected by an Obama-era program that Trump is ending in March.

House GOP leaders plan to pass a two-week stopgap on Wednesday to buy more time for striking a broader spending deal. The Senate is expected to pass that bill and send it on for Trump's signature by Friday, with the help of Democrats.

"We'll be able to put that pressure, get an agreement, not just for this year but next year as well, and we'll get out of this mess," House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy said on Saturday at the Reagan National Defense Forum.

Enacting the temporary patch would likely allow GOP leaders to postpone Democratic demands on prickly political issues like a deal for young immigrants and funding for the children's health care program.

The two-week stopgap does include language, however, that would make more funding available until month's end to states that are running out of money for administering the children's health program.

House GOP leaders believe they can secure enough votes from Republicans alone to clear this week's stopgap bill without making concessions to Democrats. But some conservatives have scoffed at the idea of punting until Dec. 22, which they fear will lead to a rash of spending before Christmas.

For now, key conservative groups like the House Freedom Caucus and the Republican Study Committee are holding their fire.

"It's still up in the air," one House GOP staffer said about whether Republicans will back the two-week continuing resolution. "It's like a Kabuki dance in slow motion."

Defense hawks have also balked at the idea of a stopgap bill through the end of January, warning of budgetary uncertainty for the Pentagon.

With that in mind, some House Republicans are pushing a strategy that would include a full year's worth of funding for the Defense Department on one of the stopgap bills this month.

Rep. Mike Gallagher (R-Wis.) said that strategy would allow the House GOP to take a "bigger stand."

"I don't think there's an appetite among... defense hawks in Congress for a long-term CR going into the next year," Gallagher, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said at the Reagan National Defense Forum on Saturday.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said Sunday he was confident Congress could pass a short-term funding bill. "There's not going to be a government shutdown," he said on ABC's "This Week." "It's just not going to happen."

McConnell contends that there is no justification for Democratic demands for tying a so-called Dreamers deal to legislation intended to prevent a government shutdown.

"That's a ridiculous position. There is no crisis," McConnell said. "There's no emergency. The president has given us until March to address it. I don't think the Democrats would be very smart to say they want to shut down the government over a non-emergency."

White House budget director Mick Mulvaney noted over the weekend that Democrats who are hell-bent on getting a Dreamers deal aren't the only ones threatening to withhold votes on government funding. Some House "right-wingers" have threatened opposition, he noted, as well as lawmakers from hurricane-hit states who want more disaster aid.

"This just sheds light on the fact that the spending system is broken when any little group can sort of hold the government hostage," Mulvaney said on CBS' "Face the Nation" on Sunday. "We need to get beyond that. I think that we will. I don't think you'll see a government shutdown."

Congress faces frantic week with possible shutdown, taxes, Russia Back

By John Bresnahan | 12/03/2017 04:03 PM EDT

Congress faces another frantic week as GOP leaders and President Donald Trump wrestle with a possible government shutdown; immigration, tax and gun policies; multiple allegations of sexual harassment against lawmakers; and the probe into Russia's meddling in the 2016 election.

Funding for federal agencies is set to run out on Friday, but lawmakers don't really think there will be a shutdown — at least not yet. Still, a pile-up of contentious policy fights coupled with frequent distractions as Trump's frustration grows with the Russia investigation has many Republicans anxious about the next few weeks.

House GOP leaders have proposed a two-week "continuing resolution" to keep the government open until Dec. 22, arguing they need the funding extension to make progress in bipartisan talks to boost both defense and non-defense spending. They expect they'll need a second two-week funding bill in late December to get past the holidays, though the odds of a shutdown would drastically increase during that time if a budget deal isn't close.

Right now, Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) is short of the GOP votes he needs to pass a CR, though top Republicans believe they will get there by week's end. But Senate Democrats, who can block any funding bill, could be key to keeping the government open.

Both House and Senate Democrats are demanding that Trump, Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) reach an agreement to protect hundreds of thousands of young undocumented people known as Dreamers who will lose work permits and deportation protections starting early next year unless an Obama-era program that gave them some security is revived in some form. So far, Trump and Republican leaders don't want to tie a legislative fix for the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program to a budget deal. This deadlock raises the possibility of a potential shutdown, although the likelihood is low that it happens on Friday, according to multiple House and Senate sources.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) refused to meet with Trump last week after the president said on Twitter they "want illegal immigrants flooding into our Country unchecked, are weak on Crime and want to substantially RAISE Taxes." Trump added: "I don't see a deal!"

Following that high-profile debacle, Schumer and McConnell spoke privately on the Senate floor in a bid to get the budget discussions moving again. The White House has also been working to try to reschedule a meeting between Trump and the "Big Four," as the top congressional leaders from both parties are nicknamed. Such a meeting could happen in the coming days, according to GOP and Democratic aides.

There have been discussions between Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) on a possible DACA deal. Senate insiders said there "other lines of discussion" on DACA as well.

In the House, Ryan and his leadership team have vowed for weeks to keep DACA and year-end spending negotiations separate — at least publicly. Ryan, however, now is getting squeezed by both ends of his conference, with a group of more than two dozen moderate Republicans from swing districts siding with Democrats and pushing Ryan to fix DACA by 2018.

McConnell lashed out at Democrats on Sunday for tying Dreamers to the funding bill. McConnell noted that Trump has until March to make any decision on deportations for Dreamers, and he clearly wants to decouple the issue from the budget negotiations.

"That's a ridiculous idea. There is no crisis," McConnell said on ABC's "This Week." "The president has given us until March to address the issue of undocumented children who came into the country ... and are in a kind of difficult spot. But there's no emergency."

McConnell added: "I don't think the Democrats would be very smart to say they want to shut down the government over a non-emergency that we can address anytime between now and March. That's a very untenable position."

Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney also downplayed the possibility of a shutdown, but he noted that certain blocs of lawmakers could derail a short-term CR.

"You know, it's funny to see now that the Republicans are in charge, I think there's a group of right-wingers in the House who say they want to shut the government down," Mulvaney said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation." "There's a group of Democrats who want to shut the government down over DACA. And there's a group of lawmakers from some of the hurricane states who want to shut the government down until they get what they want."

When he was in the House, Mulvaney supported the 2013 government shutdown, which Republicans forced in hopes of getting Congress to defund Obamacare, and he played a key role in a 2011 crisis in which some conservatives balked at raising the federal debt ceiling.

Matt House, Schumer's communications director, said the burden of keeping the government open is on the Republicans, as they control the White House, House and Senate.

"Everyone knows the Republicans are in charge. If the government shuts down, it will be squarely on their back," House said.

Even as they wrestle with a potential shutdown, Ryan and McConnell will try to quickly reach a deal on a tax package following the Senate's passage of a $1.5 trillion tax bill on a party line vote late Friday night.

Discussions have already begun between House and Senate tax writers, and GOP aides said a potential agreement could emerge as early as this week. The two chambers have passed bills that diverge on key issues, including amending the popular mortgage-interest deduction, taxing small businesses and keeping the alternative minimum tax, which Republicans have long promised to kill.

Ryan and McConnell will formally name conferees for the House-Senate tax talks this week.

Russia will also be on the agenda as FBI Director Christopher Wray testifies before the House Judiciary Committee on Thursday.

Trump launched a broad Twitter attack Sunday on the FBI. "After years of Comey, with the phony and dishonest Clinton investigation (and more), running the FBI, its reputation is in Tatters — worst in History!" Trump wrote on Twitter. "But fear not, we will bring it back to greatness."

Trump added: "Tainted (no, very dishonest?) FBI 'agent's role in Clinton probe under review.' Led Clinton Email probe. @foxandfriends Clinton money going to wife of another FBI agent in charge." Trump was referring to media reports that a lead agent on the FBI's probe of Hillary Clinton's private email server sent text messages to another agent critical of the president.

Michael Flynn, Trump's former national security adviser, pleaded guilty last week to lying to the FBI, a huge blow to the president and a major step for special counsel Robert Mueller's criminal probe. Flynn's plea deal is a sign Mueller's investigation is intensifying, with a focus on coordination between Flynn and other Trump aides and their interactions with Russian officials during and after the presidential campaign.

The furor over sexual harassment will continue to roil Capitol Hill as well. Longtime Democratic Rep. John Conyers of Michigan is supposed to announce his plans following allegations from three women that he harassed them when they worked in his office. Pelosi and other top Democrats have called for Conyers to resign, but so far he has not done so.

Reps. Ruben Kihuen (D-Nev.) and Blake Farenthold (R-Texas) also have come under fire for harassment allegations, while Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) faces an ethics probe over claims that he improperly touched six women. The House Administration Committee will hold a hearing on the issue Thursday. The heads of the House Employment Counsel and Office of Compliance — who have been involved in secret settlements with harassment victims — will testify at that session.

As if that's not enough, the House will also take up a controversial bill to expand the use of "concealed carry" permits. The "Concealed Carry Reciprocity Act," authored by Rep. Richard Hudson (R-N.C.), allows concealed carry permit holders to take their weapons into other states that allow such permits. The bill is a top priority for the powerful National Rifle Association, but it is vehemently opposed by gun-control groups and some law-enforcement associations.

The Hudson bill will be paired with a proposal to "fix" the National Instant Criminal Background Check System after it was revealed that a mass shooter in Texas was able to purchase a gun despite a domestic violence charge.

A third piece of the GOP gun package includes language seeking guidance from Attorney General Jeff Sessions on whether there can be criminal penalties imposed for using a "bump stock" during a crime. Those devices dramatically increase the fire for semi-automatic rifles and were used by the shooter in the Oct. 1 tragedy in Las Vegas, the deadliest mass shooting in U.S. history. There have been calls to ban bump stocks, but so far Republicans in Congress have waited to see whether the Trump administration can handle the issue through new regulations.

McConnell: 'There's not going to be a government shutdown' Back

By Kevin Robillard | 12/03/2017 10:34 AM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said today he was confident there wouldn't be a government shutdown when funding runs out at the end of the week.

"There's not going to be a government shutdown," he said on ABC's "This Week" when asked if the Republican-controlled Congress could keep the government running. "It's just not going to happen."

Democrats have threatened to withhold their votes for government funding unless Congress acts to provide legal relief to tens of thousands of children of undocumented immigrants who are protected by an Obama-era program that is set to end in March.

McConnell argued there was no "crisis" that would justify tying saving the so-called DREAMers to government funding.

"That's a ridiculous position. There is no crisis," McConnell said. "There's no emergency. The president has given us until March to address it. I don't think the Democrats would be very smart to say they want to shut down the government over a non-emergency."

Government funding is expected to run out on Dec. 8.

Highlights from this week's Sunday shows Back

12/03/2017 11:45 PM EDT

-- GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS speaks to SENATE MAJORITY LEADER MITCH MCCONNELL on ABC'S "THIS WEEK": STEPHANOPOULOS: "Republicans have a majority in the House and the Senate. Can ... you keep the government open on your own?" MCCONNELL: "Look there's not going to be a government shutdown. It's just not going to happen."

-- JAKE TAPPER talks with SEN. MARK WARNER (D-VA.) on CNN'S "STATE OF THE UNION": TAPPER: "President Trump says he never asked Comey to stop investigating Flynn. As you know better than I, Comey testified under oath before your committee in June that President Trump did ask him to drop the investigation. Whom do you believe?" WARNER: "I believe FBI Director Comey. I think he was very credible in his testimony and his private meetings with us. And it's not just Comey. You had -- clearly, you had an attorney general who has had to recuse himself because of untold contacts with Russians. You had the president of the United States trying to intervene, as has been reported, with other national intelligence leaders, who he appointed, saying, could you back off?"

-- TAPPER with SEN. TIM SCOTT (R-S.C.): TAPPER: "Your fellow senator from South Carolina, Lindsey Graham, told CNN that he would urge President Trump to pledge to not pardon Michael Flynn. Do you agree with that?" SCOTT: "I do. At the end of the day, here's what we know. We have to have a way to restore confidence of the American people in their elected officials and the leaders of this country. One way that you do that is by holding those folks who are, A, lying to the FBI, you hold those folks accountable, and, B, you have a process that is clear and transparent. When the Intel ... Committee is finished, we will have the facts."

-- CHRIS WALLACE talks to H.R. MCMASTER on "FOX NEWS SUNDAY": WALLACE: "Let me ask you about another personnel issue which bubbled up this week. White House officials are talking openly about a plan to replace Secretary of State Tillerson by January of the first anniversary of President Trump being sworn into office. The president and Secretary Tillerson pushed back on that hard. But, can you flatly deny that there is any plan in place to replace Secretary Tillerson over the next couple of months?" MCMASTER: "Yeah, I'm not aware of any plan at all. What I'm aware of is that the secretary of state is traveling today to advance and protect our interests, as is our secretary of defense."

-- JOHN DICKERSON talks with OMB DIRECTOR MICK MULVANEY on CBS'S "FACE THE NATION": DICKERSON: "[L]et me ask you about the shutdown which might be coming. Government's [going to] run out of money. Democrats wouldn't meet with the president. What's the status of things?" MULVANEY: "You know, it's funny to see now that the Republicans are in charge I think there's a group of right-wingers in the House who say they want to shut the government down. There's a group of Democrats who want to shut the government down over DACA. And there's a group of lawmakers from some of the hurricane states who want to shut the government down until they get what they want. This just sheds light on the fact that the spending system is broken when any little group can sort of hold the government hostage. We need to get beyond that. I think that we will. I don't think you'll see a government shutdown."

DICKERSON: "People used to say that about you. You were in one of those little groups when you wanted to shut the government down for reasons. You've changed your stripes."

MULVANEY: "Well, all the more reason the system should be fixed. We don't spend money properly in Washington, D.C. We jump these massive bills to massive bills. The government shut down I think, John, 17 times in 20 years between '80 and '94 or something like that."

House GOP leaders plot to avert shutdown, but may need Democrats Back

House GOP leaders are forging ahead with a spending strategy that has drawn flak from far-right members, making it increasingly likely they will need help from Democrats to avert a shutdown.

Less than one week before federal funding expires, the chamber's spending panel released a two-week patch Saturday. A House passage vote is expected midweek, with Senate action to follow.

House Speaker Paul Ryan confirmed to members Friday in a Republican Conference meeting that the House will vote on two separate short-term spending measures, with this first one extending through Dec. 22 and another through January.

Under the newly released bill, certain spending constraints would be temporarily lifted to help states that are running low on money from the Children's Health Insurance Program after Congress failed to extend funding for the program in September. States could more easily receive leftover cash from the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services as a tide-me-over until the program-specific funding is renewed.

Ahead of the legislation's unveiling, the Office of Management and Budget held a call Friday warning federal agencies to put contingency plans in place in case Congress fails to extend funding by the deadline, noting that such guidance is routine and doesn't indicate a greater likelihood of shutdown.

"There is no reason why a lapse in funding needs to occur," OMB Press Secretary Meghan Burris said in a written statement. "Prudent management requires that agencies be prepared for the possibility of a lapse."

Enactment of the two-week patch is far from a sure bet, however.

The two-part plan is intended to drum up pressure on Democrats to strike a much-needed budget deal by the time government funding runs out on Dec. 8, GOP aides say. But the unconventional tactic has been met with skepticism from conservatives, who fear leaders will abandon their priorities in a last-minute deal before the holidays.

Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.), a member of the House Freedom Caucus, warned of an "end-of-year Christmas party of spending with Democrats."

"The budgeting never goes good when everybody loads up the Christmas tree," Brat said. "You got to give me one heck of a good argument for a two-week [continuing resolution]. I haven't heard it yet."

If more than two dozen Republicans oppose the strategy, Ryan would need to lean on Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to deliver Democratic votes. That tradeoff would almost certainly require the GOP to make painful concessions in the spending deal, like bigger boosts for domestic programs.

House GOP leaders explicitly warned during the closed-door meeting Friday that they would need to seek help from Democrats if their own members voted against keeping the government open.

"They said, basically ... 'Hey, if we've got the votes, then we do it. If we don't got the votes, then you got to go do things to get votes from elsewhere outside the conference,'" Rep. Mark Amodei (R-Nev.) told reporters.

Democrats are so far refusing to commit to helping Republicans pass a spending bill, ticking off a list of long-simmering political issues like protections for Dreamers, or young undocumented immigrants, and funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program.

"We have no resolve on CHIP, we have no resolve on the Dreamers, so without any of that resolved, why, why would I vote for an extension?" Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) told POLITICO. "I'm going to wait and see what we've got."

Pelosi stressed her commitment to higher domestic spending levels, as well as a "Dreamers" deal, in a news conference Thursday. But she also underscored her intention to avoid a public showdown. "We want to keep government open. That's what we are about," the minority leader told reporters.

By Friday, many Republicans said they remained undecided. The biggest question: What will GOP leaders concede to Democrats in spending talks over the next week?

Both parties say they hope to have a basic funding deal in hand before the deadline — laying out fiscal 2018 limits for the Pentagon and domestic programs. Members said that agreement will likely be the biggest deciding factor in who votes for the bill.

"I think it's 50-50 right now," said Rep. Mark Walker (R-N.C.), who leads the influential Republican Study Committee, adding that he and many of his members will remain undecided until they learn the spending levels.

In the Senate, support from Democrats is key to reaching the 60-vote threshold for advancing the spending plan. And conservatives say they're worried about the changes that could come in the upper chamber, where GOP leaders have privately floated the idea of attaching an Obamacare stabilization provision to help win votes for its tax package.

"I think there's some double-bank shots involved with the Senate tax piece. I think there's a couple tricky deals here," Brat said.

Passage of the bill to fund the government beyond Dec. 8 would still require Congress to pass a second stopgap measure on Dec. 22, which would buy time to actually craft an omnibus with updated levels through the end of the fiscal year. That spending process has been on hold for months as GOP leadership slow-walked negotiations during a hectic push for a tax bill.

Republican appropriators dubbed the "double CR" as a last-ditch plan to force leadership of both parties into a long-awaited spending accord.

"This gives us a chance to get that number before a shutdown looms Christmas Eve," Rep. Hal Rogers (R-Ky.), a former Appropriations chairman, told POLITICO.

"We have no choice," he said. "[Leadership] has been preoccupied, rightly so, with the tax bill, but now this shutdown is looming upon us, and that's the urgent thing that we've got to address."

Rogers acknowledged that Democrats would likely be needed in next week's vote, though House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) disputed the idea.

"Let's give the leadership some opportunity to talk to some of the members," he said.

Once leaders have settled on topline spending caps, appropriators are expected to need at least a month to arrive at more minute funding levels dictating cash for each federal agency for the rest of fiscal 2018.

"This CR will allow for additional time for a deal to be reached on top-line spending levels for this fiscal year," Frelinghuysen said in a written statement upon releasing the two-week patch Saturday. "Once this agreement is made, my committee will rapidly go to work with the Senate to complete the final legislation."

In the Senate, the last of the 12 annual spending bills were only recently reported out of committee and none have received a floor vote — more than two months into the fiscal year in question.

For their part, House Republicans passed a comprehensive spending package, H.R. 601 \(115\), in September. That bill — which advanced with only Republican votes — is both politically unrealistic in the more-moderate Senate and was written without the still-unsettled spending caps as guideposts.

McCain and Moran push VA health care reform bill Back

By Gregory Hellman | 12/04/2017 11:48 AM EDT

Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Jerry Moran of Kansas introduced legislation today aimed at reforming the Veterans Administration health care system.

The bill would require the VA to use objective data on health care demand to set standards for access and quality and to bridge gaps in veterans' care, the chairmen of the Senate Armed Services Committee and the Senate Appropriations Military Construction, Veterans Affairs and Related Agencies Subcommittee said in a written statement.

Additionally, the bill would require the VA to promptly pay community providers, open access to walk-in clinics, offer telemedicine, increase graduate medical education and residency positions for employees and improve its collaboration with community providers and other federal agencies, the senators said.

The American Legion, AMVETS and Concerned Veterans for America support the measure, the senators added.

Illinois becomes 21st state, Dec. 3, 1818 Back

By Andrew Glass | 12/03/2017 06:34 AM EDT

On this day in 1818, Illinois entered the Union as the 21st state. At the time, there were about 35,000 persons living there. The seemingly endless and treeless prairie — so different from the adjacent verdant forests of Kentucky and Tennessee — remained largely unsettled.

Most early Illinois settlers lived in the southern part of the state, where they built homes and farms near trees that grew along creek and river bottoms. Eventually, a few farmers took on the task of plowing the prairie; they discovered that the soil proved richer than expected.

The development of heavier prairie plows and improved access to wood and other supplies, accessible through newly opened shipping routes, encouraged more farmers to head upstate. By 1840, the center of population in Illinois had shifted to the north. Chicago, once a remote hamlet, emerged as a bustling city.

The 1820 census counted 55,211 Illinois residents, a gain of 16.2 percent from 1810. Since then, Illinois has gained population in every decennial census, although the rate of growth has slowed. Currently, it is approaching 13 million.

Slavery was nominally banned by the Northwest Ordinance, although the ban was rarely enforced. When Illinois became a state and the ordinance no longer applied, there were about 900 slaves living there.

The southern part of the state, known as "Little Egypt," was mainly settled by migrants from the South, who had traveled there via the Ohio River. The region remained hostile to free blacks. Local leaders permitted the settlers to bring their slaves with them.

Pro-slavery forces sought to call a convention to legalize slavery. But they were blocked by Gov. Edward Coles, who mobilized the anti-slavery forces, warning that rich slave owners would buy up all the good farmland. An 1823 referendum revealed that three-fifths of the voters opposed slavery.

In 1839, the Mormons (whose formal name is the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints), created a settlement called Nauvoo on a bend along the Mississippi River. It quickly grew to 12,000 inhabitants and was for a time a rival for the title of being largest city in Illinois.

In the 1840s, the Mormons built a stone temple in Nauvoo, one of the largest buildings in Illinois at the time. In 1844, Joseph Smith, the founder of the Latter-day Saints movement, was killed in nearby Carthage, Illinois, while he was ostensibly under the protection of the Illinois judicial system, with assurances of his safety from then-Gov. Thomas Ford, a Democrat. In 1846, the Latter-day Saints under Brigham Young left Illinois for what would become Utah.

In the second half of the 19th century, the need for workers in mills, railyards and slaughterhouses made Chicago a common destination for European immigrants and newly freed blacks. By 1857, Chicago was the state's dominant metropolis. During Prohibition, Chicago became synonymous with bootleg liquor and such gangsters as Al Capone.

Ryan weighed stripping Frelinghuysen of chairmanship Back

By Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan | 12/04/2017 03:13 PM EDT

Speaker Paul Ryan and his leadership team recently discussed replacing House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen after he bucked the party and voted against the GOP tax bill, multiple sources told POLITICO.

Ryan, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) over the Thanksgiving recess considered calling up the GOP steering committee charged with selecting chairmen to force a roll call on whether Frelinghuysen should maintain his position. Scalise, three sources said, pushed hard for the move and was furious that the New Jersey Republican opposed the legislation that leaders believe is vital to maintaining their majority.

"Committee chairmen are expected to support the team," said one senior GOP leadership aide said. "How does he expect to win support for his own bills when he's unwilling to support the President and Speaker's number one priority?"

Spokespeople for Ryan's office and the Appropriations Committee declined to comment.

News about the talks comes after Ryan last week pulled out of a fundraiser for Rep. Lee Zeldin of New York, another centrist Republican who voted against the tax bill. Both Zeldin and Frelinghuysen share concerns about what repealing the state and local tax deduction would mean for their high-tax districts, where constituents use that benefit to lower their federal tax bill.

But Republican lawmakers are even more angry about Frelinghuysen, who's one of the most powerful chairmen in the conference. Chairmen are expected to support GOP leaders on tough votes or major pieces of legislation. And Frelinghuysen, who hails from a more moderate-minded swing district, was not given a green light to vote against the tax bill.

The chairman's "no" vote is particularly sensitive because Ryan, McCarthy and Scalise often have to strong-arm other Republicans to vote for government funding bills that come out of Frelinghuysen's committee. There's a fear that if the chairman is not punished, other lawmakers will balk when GOP leaders need them most on spending bills.

"If there's no perceived blowback against Frelinghuysen, Ryan's hand is weakened," said a second House Republican source familiar with the back-and-forth. "It's almost a political necessity. There has to be real or perceived blowback."

At the same time, many conservative Republicans grew angry when former Speaker John Boehner removed lawmakers from prized committees for voting against leadership on critical bills. Boehner punished former Rep. Tim Huelskamp by kicking him off the Agriculture Committee — which helped lead to his primary defeat just over a year later.

"I disagree with the chairman's vote, but he, like all of us, should vote according to the principles on which he was elected—as long as within bounds of the Constitution," said Rep. Justin Amash (R-Mich.) on Twitter. "Leaders would be wise to surround themselves with more people, not fewer, who hold alternative viewpoints."

It's not the first time Frelinghuysen has gone against leadership. Ryan and his top lieutenants had to work hard to flip him from "no" to "yes" on the Obamacare repeal bill earlier this year. The New Jersey Republican did not want to vote for the health bill and worried it would undercut his re-election effort, multiple sources told POLITICO at the time.

Frelinghuysen was also one of only two Republicans to vote in early October against a GOP bill to restrict abortions after 20 weeks except in instances of rape or where the mother's life is in danger.

Beyond floor votes, Frelinghuysen clashed with Ryan over a new, controversial Authorization for the Use of Military Force. Frelinghuysen, eager to embrace "regular order," allowed his panel in June to adopt a bipartisan amendment to a spending bill that would phase out the post-9/11 authority for military action overseas and call for new war guidelines.

Ryan called it a "mistake" at the time — and instructed the House Rules Committee to strip the language from the bill before it even hit the floor.

Then, again to the chagrin of GOP leaders, Frelinghuysen took the unusual step in July of allowing controversial immigration language to be adopted by voice vote during a committee markup. Using the same tactic as with the AUMF provision, GOP leaders again overrode the chairman's call by plucking the immigration language before it reached the floor.

The discussion about Frelinghuysen's fate comes as Congress barrels toward a potential shutdown at week's end. House Republicans are expected to pass a two-week spending stopgap without Democratic support on Wednesday, a painful vote for conservatives and appropriators who see "continuing resolutions" as bad policy.

Even if a shutdown is averted, conservatives are likely to be forced in the coming weeks to accept an increase in non-defense spending in order to win a Pentagon budget boost — then back a massive omnibus in January that could include additional spending for other programs that is not offset with cuts elsewhere.

Jennifer Scholtes contributed to this report.

Defense budget headed for "disaster" with CR, Rep. Smith predicts Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/02/2017 01:50 PM EDT

Simi Valley, Calif. — The top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee today poured cold water on the optimistic appraisals of the prospects for major sustained increases in defense spending, warning instead of an impending fiscal "disaster."

Speaking at the Reagan National Defense Forum, Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.) predicted more stopgap spending measures and immense difficulty increasing defense spending as sought by defense hawks.

"On the budget side, we are going to walk into probably a three, four-week, two, three-month utter disaster starting on Friday," Smith said. "Anyone who thinks we're close to a deal on the appropriations bills is not paying attention."

Republican leaders are proposing a two-week continuing spending resolution to prevent a government shutdown when current funding runs out on Dec. 8, with the aim of striking a deal to increase strict budget caps on defense and domestic programs in that time frame.

On the same panel, Armed Service member Mike Gallagher (R-Wisc.) said Republicans were mulling separating defense from remaining appropriations bills.

"There's talk of a two-week CR setting up a bigger stand and whether we dis-aggregate the defense [appropriations] from the rest of spending is the discussion right now," Gallagher said. "I don't think there's an appetite among...defense hawks in Congress for a long-term CR going into the next year."

Trump's military buildup still a mirage Back

By Connor O'Brien and Bryan Bender | 12/03/2017 03:40 PM EDT

SIMI VALLEY, Calif. — President Donald Trump came into office pledging the largest defense spending spree since the administration of Ronald Reagan — assuring the troops that they would see "beautiful new planes and beautiful new equipment."

But that vision remains little more than a mirage, top Pentagon officials, lawmakers and defense industry executives lamented during a gathering this weekend at Reagan's presidential library — undermined by congressional gridlock on spending priorities and a tax overhaul expected to add more than a trillion dollars to the national debt.

"Nobody wants to pay more taxes, everyone wants to have the programs they like protected and everybody wants defense ... and they want the deficit to go away," Gen. Robert Neller, the commandant of the Marine Corps, said in an interview, echoing the sentiments of several leading advocates for a more robustly funded military. "The math just isn't there."

During his insurgent presidential campaign, Trump promised to expand the Army from 476,000 active-duty troops to 540,000. He embraced the traditional Republican gospel that the Navy needs to be much larger, pledging to boost the number of warships from 275 to 350. More missile defense systems, an upgraded nuclear arsenal and hundreds of additional fighter aircraft were also on his wish list.

"You've been lacking equipment," Trump told troops at MacDill Air Force Base in Florida in February. "We're going to load it up."

But lawmakers and the administration have taken few concrete steps to lock in any sustained increase in defense spending close to the 3 percent to 5 percent a year that Defense Secretary James Mattis says is needed to make the vision a reality.

Even a down payment on the proposed buildup is being held hostage on Capitol Hill: Republicans are aiming to pass a stopgap spending measure to prevent a government shutdown when funding runs out on Friday — but that would just keep agencies funded at last year's levels.

And despite widespread agreement that the military is under significant strain, Congress has failed to eliminate the strict caps on spending that it instituted in 2011, which limit defense money that is not directly related to overseas military operations.

While lawmakers have increased the caps several times since 2013, Republicans and Democrats have clashed over whether increases to the defense budget should be matched by equal increases to domestic spending. As Friday's funding deadline nears, Republicans are again pushing for a deal that would increase defense spending by tens of billions of dollars, while Democrats are aiming to extract even more money for domestic agencies.

The 2011 budget law allows only $549 billion for national defense this year, far below the $626 billion base budget that both the House and Senate endorsed in their annual defense policy legislation in November.

"There is this assumption that there is this broad support for an increase in the defense budget, and everyone sort of feels good about that," Rep. Adam Smith of Washington, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, admonished attendees at the annual Reagan National Defense Forum, which was sponsored by nearly two dozen leading Pentagon contractors. "I don't see it happening, OK? When you look at what's going on with our appropriations discussion, we are no closer to an appropriations agreement today than we were last February, because as much as people want to spend more money on defense, they also want tax cuts. They also want a balanced budget.

"Congress has to vote to change the Budget Control Act," he added. "And if we were so hellbent to do that, if it was such a priority, why are we sitting here in December and we still haven't done it?"

Trump's national security adviser, Lt. Gen. H.R. McMaster, defended the president's efforts, telling the forum that "what the president has done has dramatically increased defense spending to address the most egregious gaps." (Trump has gotten some extra defense spending approved through a supplemental budget request, and has praised the passage of a defense authorization bill that recommends — but doesn't actually provide — additional dollars for the military.)

"This is the beginning of a recovery in military capabilities and military capacity," McMaster added.

But he also derided the lack of action in the Republican-controlled Congress to back up the push for a bigger military with the funding to make it happen.

"We need an end to the defense sequester," McMaster said of the spending limits that still drive budget levels, adding that "each of our services aren't big enough."

The Pentagon's second-ranking official also bemoaned the hurdles — immediate and long term — that are hobbling Trump's proposed defense buildup.

"Artificial constraints still hold our national security hostage," Deputy Defense Secretary Patrick Shanahan told the gathering, in his first major public appearance.

Shanahan blamed the prospect of even more stopgap funding measures as a substitute for annual appropriations bills and "disagreements in Congress that affect timely decision-making."

Defense hawks on Capitol Hill, however, point to broad consensus for more defense spending, most recently exhibited by bipartisan support for the National Defense Authorization Act, which sets Pentagon policy and recommends funding levels well above the budget law.

"You're not going to rebuild in one year, so we'll need to continue rebuilding," House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) said in an interview.

"As far as changing the trajectory, now is the critical time," he added. "Again, look at what Congress has done. Look at what the president's said. This is the time to turn it around. Now."

But defense experts also gave Trump his share of the blame for a lack of leadership on the issue.

"What defense buildup?" remarked Katherine Blakeley, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a nonpartisan Washington think tank. "You have a professed goal of having a buildup, but I haven't seen any kind of real engagement by the administration on ... putting in the legislative groundwork to make that happen."

"To go back to a Reagan-era tagline," she added, "where's the beef?"

Others asserted that the president's own domestic agenda is likely to crowd out the spending his promises would require.

"If all Trump wanted was a big defense increase, he could have had it," said Loren Thompson, a longtime consultant to major defense companies. "But he also wanted tax cuts, entitlement reform and infrastructure investment. Something had to give, and usually in peacetime what gives is military spending — especially military spending for new weapons."

That tension was on display at one of the sessions this weekend when Michael Strianese, chairman and CEO of the major Pentagon contractor L3 Technologies, said that "I would rather work on an increased defense budget than a tax cut."

One of the most senior defense-minded Democrats also bemoaned the impact that other priorities of Trump and Republicans in Congress are having on the Pentagon getting the funds it needs to rebuild.

Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, told POLITICO that the tax cut the Senate passed early Saturday morning is likely to deprive other needs — including those of the military.

"That is $1.5 trillion that we cannot devote to defense," he said, citing estimates of how tax cuts will enlarge the deficit during the coming decade. "This is just arithmetic."

Even as the Trump administration requested more military spending for this year, Pentagon officials were managing expectations — telling Congress that that the buildup would not kick in until the administration's upcoming budget for the 2019 fiscal year, which starts next October.

Navy Secretary Richard Spencer said he hopes Congress will still reach an agreement that lets the administration put at least some of Trump's pledges into motion.

"We are going to try in [2019] and [2020] to go for growth," he told POLITICO, expressing confidence that Congress can at least come up with a plan for the next two years to fund the government that also accommodates an increase in defense spending.

But he acknowledged doubts that Congress can do that, even if it lifts the budget caps.

"At the end of the day, this is all about math," he said. "You don't want to raise taxes. You don't want to cut benefits, and we want to grow the military. It is literally impossible. The math says you can't do it."

Until the path is clear, military leaders like Neller say they will have to do the best they can.

"Just pass the budget, give us some certainty," the Marine commandant pleaded to Congress in the interview, "and we will give you the best military - the best Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, Coast Guard that we can afford based on the money you appropriate."

Another continuing resolution that keeps spending at current levels "is not an effective way for us to manage the money and to do the things we need to do to regain our readiness and prepare."

What's next on tax reform Back

By Brian Faler | 12/02/2017 11:45 AM EDT

Republicans are confident they can quickly overcome the differences between the House and Senate tax bills and send President Donald Trump a plan he can sign into law by year's end.

In their efforts to enact the biggest changes to the tax code since the historic 1986 Reagan-era reforms, the two chambers have passed bills that diverge on key issues like amending the popular mortgage-interest deduction, taxing small businesses and keeping the hated alternative minimum tax, which Republicans have long promised to kill. But don't expect a drawn-out fight over the details.

After the Senate approved its sweeping $1.5 trillion legislation early Saturday, Speaker Paul Ryan said he would appoint official negotiators on Monday to a conference committee that will meld the measure with the one the House passed in November. Though some Senate Republicans would like the House to simply pass their plan without any changes, a spokesman for Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said he will name his own conferees next week.

The two sides agree on many key elements of an overhaul, including its overall size and emphasis on cutting corporate taxes. And none of the issues where the two plans diverge have drawn such strong opposition that they can't be finessed, congressional leaders say. Too much is at stake.

"I think everybody in our conference believes this is an imperative for the economy and also the politics, I think, would not be good were we to fail," said Sen. John Cornyn, the chamber's deputy leader.

Congress is under pressure to act quickly, with Republican leaders racing to complete action before the winner of Alabama's special Senate election can be seated later this month. Lawmakers fear that both Republican Roy Moore and Democrat Doug Jones will oppose their plans.

The agreement on many of the big-ticket items is largely due to the work of the so-called Big 6, a group of Republican leaders who worked this fall to get the two sides on the same page. Both chambers want to slash the corporate tax rate to 20 percent, from the current 35 percent, while expanding a popular child tax credit and capping a long-standing deduction for corporate interest expenses. Republicans also agreed not to cut taxes by more than $1.5 trillion.

Still, the conference committee will have to work hard. They'll have to find agreement amid fierce lobbying from special interest groups determined to squeeze in last-minute changes. And the Senate's close 51-49 vote on Saturday morning underscores Republicans' thin margin for error.

And there are some significant differences to resolve. The House, for example, wants to slash the mortgage interest deduction in half, and eliminate it entirely for second homes. The Senate would only end it for home equity loans.

In a surprise move, Senate Republicans decided at the last-minute to abandon plans to repeal the AMT — a key part of GOP promises to radically simplify the code — and that's sure to be unpopular with House Republicans.

The House wants to cut some $65 billion out of education-related tax breaks, which the Senate leaves them mostly untouched. The Senate wants to double one break, for teachers' expenses, that the House would kill altogether. Senate Republicans have seven individual income tax brackets in their plan; the House has four. House Republicans want to end the estate tax while the Senate would only temporarily ease it.

While Republicans largely support repealing the Affordable Care Act's mandate to have health insurance — included in the Senate draft — some in the House want to use the $318 billion that's projected to raise to finance other changes in the health law.

On the business side of the code, the bills have radically different approaches towards taxing so-called pass-throughs, a hot-button issue that roiled the Senate this week. "Pass-throughs" are unincorporated businesses.

While both sides want to pare a break for corporate interest expenses, the Senate would take nearly twice as much — $300 billion over the next decade — out of that break as the House.

And the two chambers have different visions for taxing multinational corporations — though that's barely been publicly debated by lawmakers.

"It's always tough to work with the Senate, no matter what the topic is," said Rep. Pat Tiberi (R-Ohio), who sits on the tax-writing Ways and Means committee. "What's the old saying? Democrats are the other party, but the enemy is the Senate."

Still, Senate Republicans moved closer to their House colleagues in some areas during this week's deliberations.

Most notably, after House Republicans warned a Senate bid to end a long-standing deduction for state and local taxes was a nonstarter with their colleagues, the Senate adopted a House plan to limit the break to $10,000 in property taxes.

Likewise, the Senate largely adopted Friday the House position on imposing a one-time tax on corporations' overseas earnings.

Veterans of past tax-policy fights are stunned by the speed with which this Congress has been able to act. The final Senate vote came less than a month after the proposal was introduced; the House completed formal consideration of its plan, from start to finish, in exactly two weeks.

And, after their embarrassing Obamacare-repeal debacle, Republicans acknowledge they are ready to compromise.

"Had we had a list of success, I would say it would be a difficult process," said Rep. Mark Walker (R-N.C.), who leads the Republican Study Committee, a group of often balky conservatives. "But because there is a sense of urgency both in the House and the Senate and within the administration, I think people are going to say: 'You know what? We're going to have to fix things, but we've got to get this done.'"

Scott defends rushed process to finish tax bill Back

By Kevin Robillard | 12/03/2017 11:03 AM EDT

South Carolina Sen. Tim Scott defended the rushed process for Senate Republicans to pass a wave of tax cuts on CNN's "State of the Union" today, but admitted he didn't read the entire bill before voting on it.

Democrats attacked the process, which saw the final bill text released Friday just hours before the vote, and with hand-written changes in the margins, as well as crossed-out text. A Democratic proposal to delay the vote until Monday to give senators time to read the legislation was rejected.

"I went through the entire bill. I'm not going to say I read every single letter on every single page," Scott told CNN's Jake Tapper.

"I did not read 470 pages. But have I read every aspect of that bill before it was fused together? The answer is yes. We have had the chance over the last three years, since I have been on the committee, to work on every aspect of the bill."

Scott argued Republicans, particularly on the Senate Finance Committee, had long debated and understood what was in the legislation. The bill passed 51-49 early Saturday morning.

"The last hearing that we had was a 23-hour hearing. We had 63 Democrat amendments that were offered. The suggestion that this was not done in the light of day and the last-minute changes, as they talk about them, were last-minute changes that had been envisioned for weeks," Scott said, adding later: "The suggestion that we had so little time to take a look at 500 pages is inconsistent with the truth."

How McConnell got a win on taxes Back

By Seung Min Kim | 12/02/2017 03:16 AM EDT

On a recent phone call to discuss the GOP's tax push, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell suggested President Donald Trump focus his personal lobbying efforts on one senator in particular: Ron Johnson.

For weeks, the Wisconsin Republican had made it clear he would seek more generous tax treatment of certain small businesses — and that he was willing to use his vote as leverage. But after several phone calls from Trump and one final negotiating session inside Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn's ornate Capitol office, Johnson said early Friday he would finally support the bill. That announcement made passage seem all but inevitable just one night after the bill nearly collapsed in spectacular fashion on the Senate floor.

McConnell and his leadership team ultimately secured passage of the tax code rewrite in the early hours of Saturday morning after weeks of methodically working each wavering vote, and by trying to learn the lessons of their Obamacare repeal failure.

It worked. By moving the tax bill through the committee process and letting more GOP senators give more input as they drafted the bill, the Kentucky Republican delivered a sorely-needed legislative achievement to his party in a year marked by turbulence on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

"It's been quite a year for Senate Republicans," McConnell said in an interview with POLITICO as the chamber prepared to pass the bill. "We've changed the Supreme Court for a generation and done the first comprehensive tax reform in 31 years. Big year for us."

McConnell also pointed to one other reason why the GOP succeeded on taxes but not health care: comprehensive tax reform has been a longstanding goal for Republicans, while there was little consensus on how to replace Obamacare despite their years-long pledge to dismantle it.

Senate Republicans still have to reconcile their differences with the House-passed tax bill, but McConnell said Republicans are "well on the path" to completing the tax overhaul by Christmas. That's been a key party goal, and a timetable, he insisted, that was unrelated to the Dec. 12 special election in Alabama, in which Republican Roy Moore is in a close race against Democrat Doug Jones.

The political fight over taxes won't end when the bill gets to Trump's desk, however. While the GOP views the measure as a political imperative in advance of next year's midterm elections, it has consistently polled poorly with voters. Democrats have savaged the bill, which cuts the corporate rate to 20 percent from 35 percent, as a giveaway to big business and the wealthy.

Still, McConnell dismissed the public perception of the tax bill, expressing confidence it will change.

"Can you think of any major legislation passed in the last 10 years that was popular? Remember how unpopular Obamacare was," the Kentucky Republican said. "If [tax reform], in conjunction with regulatory relief, gets the country growing more rapidly and creates more jobs and opportunity, I think that will answer the skeptics."

The tax victory, which came shortly before 2 a.m. Saturday, was never guaranteed. Facing unified Democratic opposition, McConnell could only lose two GOP votes before the entire effort sank, and leaders had to navigate a litany of competing demands.

There was the influential bloc of fiscal hawks led by Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), making noise about the tax bill's red ink and going so far as to seek automatic tax increases to pay down some of the deficit. There was Johnson, who had teamed with Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) to demand a costly change for so-called "pass-through" businesses, which pay taxes through the individual code.

And there was Susan Collins (R-Maine), a perennial swing vote, who had a detailed list of wishes that became more complicated as Republicans threw in a repeal of Obamacare's individual mandate into the bill.

The furor over the deficit boiled over to the point that on Thursday, Corker and a coalition of tax holdouts contemplated voting with Democrats on a procedural vote that could have derailed the entire effort — prompting extended drama in the chamber that momentarily threatened the bill's future.

Just before the vote, the non-partisan Joint Committee on Taxation had released their long-awaited report on the plan, and found that it would still balloon the deficit by $1 trillion even with the economic growth the legislation would generate.

GOP leaders were deeply worried about what kind of impact the report would have on Corker's thinking and tried to persuade the undecided senators not to vote for the Democrats' measure, which would force senators to return with a deficit-neutral tax bill. But for more than an hour on the floor, Corker, Johnson and Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) stubbornly held off, trying to use their leverage to force changes to the tax measure.

"Sen. Corker called me and said, 'Why shouldn't we vote for that one?'" Johnson recalled. "There's always parliamentary maneuvers, right?"

Elizabeth MacDonough, the Senate parliamentarian, was summoned to the gaggle. Senators were told that a proposed "trigger" — which would kick in with tax hikes if the projected economic growth never materialized—would run afoul of budget rules and would have to be axed. At one point, a furious-looking Cornyn loudly told Sen. Angus King (I-Maine), who had felt Democrats were close to pulling the trio of Republicans to their side, that the maneuver would "kill the bill."

"I thought we already had worked everything out," sighed Cornyn after the theatrics.

That floor battle ended up being the last moment when the Senate tax bill looked truly in doubt — about a year after the Republican effort to overhaul the tax code began in earnest.

Not long after the 2016 election, McConnell and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) quietly tapped four Senate Republicans — Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, Rob Portman of Ohio, Tim Scott of South Carolina and John Thune of South Dakota — to be the GOP conference's point people on the tax battle. The group immediately began meeting in December to lay the groundwork for the legislative push.

And after the failure of Obamacare repeal, Republicans were determined to do things differently.

"They're listening carefully to all of the concerns," Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) said of leadership. "They've gone out of their way to make sure regular order has been observed, as demanded and expected by many of the members."

Democrats called suggestions of "regular order" outrageous as Republicans rushed the bill to passage. But McConnell was sure to hold a committee markup of the measure, which he did not do with health care, and which was a main reason Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) voted that bill down.

One controversial idea that became surprisingly easy: Repealing Obamacare's individual mandate in the tax measure, which McConnell noted "certainly takes a big chunk" out of the 2010 health care law.

Despite having just failed to repeal and replace the law, various Senate Republicans had pushed for including the mandate repeal in the tax bill. And when senators realized doing so would net nearly $350 billion to plow into more tax cuts, it gained steam. As far back as May, Daines was seeking data from the Internal Revenue Service that would break down the impact of the mandate penalty by state and income, giving GOP senators handy statistics for talking points once those numbers materialized.

Collins expressed discomfort with the mandate repeal, but negotiated other wins, including to allow people to deduct $10,000 on state and local property taxes, mirroring a House provision. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who also helped sink the GOP's Obamacare repeal bill, said she ultimately had no problem with removing the mandate. And she claimed a big victory in getting language to drill in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Though the House bill doesn't include the health care provision, Senate Republicans are cautiously optimistic that it'll be included in the final product; Daines noted, "If you don't, tell me where you're going to find $350 billion?"

Resolving some of the final issues happened inside Cornyn's office shortly before 7 p.m. Thursday, when the No. 2 Republican met with Johnson, Daines and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) to lay out how the leadership would ultimately meet their demands: Boosting a one-time tax on multinational companies' overseas earnings in order to pay for better treatment of "pass-through" businesses.

Cornyn later called Johnson around 10 p.m. to confirm that the Wisconsin senator would get mostly what he wanted.

"I just really appreciated working with us in good faith," said Johnson, who fielded at least three phone calls from Trump since he declared his opposition to the first version of the tax bill. "When it came down to crunch time, I wanted more. But I'm a reasonable human being."

Meanwhile, Corker and Toomey — who had brokered a budget deal earlier this year that helped provide a framework for the tax measure — worked quietly into the night with the parliamentarian to see if some other trigger could suffice and Corker could be a "yes."

In the final day of the tax fight, the typically-harried legislative process became even messier. Republicans tacked on sweeping last-minute changes. Aides scribbled handwritten revisions to the bill just before senators would vote on the final package, which Democrats relentlessly mocked on Twitter.

Inside the last GOP conference meeting in the Capitol, Corker thanked Toomey for working hard with him to try to reach a final deal on the deficit trigger, even though they fell short. He detailed his concerns that the bill was a huge budget-buster, but it was clear to people inside the room that Corker knew he wouldn't win.

Ultimately Corker stood alone, being the sole Republican to reject the tax bill, along with all Democrats. The dwindling bloc of deficit hawks would keep getting lonelier.

"I know I'm kind of a dinosaur on the fiscal issues," said Corker as he held a cup of coffee, just outside the Senate chamber Friday. "And I'm really not that old. By Senate standards, I'm a teenager. But I do feel like a dinosaur."

McConnell could do the math, and he could leave Corker behind.

Red-state Democrats stay away from GOP tax bill Back

By Kevin Robillard | 12/04/2017 05:01 AM EDT

When Republicans began their push for tax reform earlier this year, they had hopes of wooing multiple Senate Democrats to back their plan: 10 of them faced reelection in states President Donald Trump won, five in states he won by more than 20 points.

But those dreams were dashed by the bill's unpopularity in public polling and the inclusion of measures no Democrat was willing to vote for. None of the Democrats voted for the plan.

But the GOP still thinks it can make them pay in 2018.

"Red state Democrats who voted against the Senate tax relief bill have made a fateful mistake," NRSC Communications Director Katie Martin said. "When American taxpayers are able to keep more of their hard-earned cash next year, they'll remember who sided with Washington's liberal elitists and voted against middle-class families."

The bill passed early Saturday morning is unpopular in public opinion polling. A mid-November Quinnipiac University poll found 52 percent of Americans opposed the plan, while 25 percent supported it. Fifty-nine percent said the plan favored the rich at the expense of the middle class, while just 33 percent disagreed.

"Republicans could have written a bill that benefited the middle class and put Democrats in a jam," said Jesse Ferguson, a Democratic strategist working with groups opposed to the plan. "That's not what they did. With only 25 percent support in public polling, there's no pressure on Democrats to support this."

A sign of the bill's unpopularity can be seen in television ad targeting. While early ads from both GOP groups like Americans for Prosperity and 45Committee, and Democratic groups like Not One Penny focused on red state Democrats like Missouri's Claire McCaskill and Indiana's Joe Donnelly, later ads focused on wavering Republicans like Oklahoma's James Lankford or Arizona's Jeff Flake.

"Oklahoma is counting on James Lankford to vote yes on President Trump's tax cut," the narrator says in an ad from 45Committee ad released on Wednesday. "This is your chance to cut taxes, Senator Lankford. Don't let us down."

According to a Democrat tracking media buys, Republican groups have spent about $6 million on ads promoting the plan, double the $3 million Democrats have spent attacking it.

The state with the most action was Wisconsin. There, the Koch Bros.-backed Freedom Partners Action Fund spent $1.6 million blasting Democratic Sen. Tammy Baldwin for supporting tax increases in the past and not supporting tax reform. Senate Majority PAC responded with its own six-figure buy to defend the Wisconsinite.

"If Tammy Baldwin opposes tax reform, it's proof that she opposes jobs," the owner of a construction company says in one of Freedom Partners' ads. "She opposes higher wages. I know of nothing that she's done to help working people like us."

Republicans argue the bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), will become more popular once voters' take-home pay increases in 2018. Only 16 percent of Americans believe the tax bill will lower their taxes. And, they say, voters will reject the red-state Democrats for not siding with Trump, who made visits to Missouri, Indiana and North Dakota to woo those state's senators. Bipartisanship, in particular, is a key part of Donnelly's brand.

"Opposing tax cuts for Hoosier families is about the dumbest thing Mexico Joe has done since he outsourced jobs to Guadalajara," said GOP strategist John Ashbrook, a former top aide to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. "It's like he doesn't want to win."

Donnelly, however, said the bill was just too partisan for him to swallow.

"I've tried to work with everyone I can during our current national conversation about our tax code. During the last few months, I've even spoken with the President multiple times about ideas that both parties agree would move us forward," he wrote in a fundraising email that went out on Saturday. "But Mitch McConnell and his special interest allies crafted this tax bill in a partisan process and rushed it to the floor with little debate. It's a handout to the richest Americans who don't need more help and the biggest corporations, many of which have shipped their money and jobs to other countries."

Grassley derides those who spend all their money 'on booze or women or movies' Back

By Brent D. Griffiths | 12/03/2017 09:31 PM EDT

Sen. Chuck Grassley defended his party's tax plan this weekend by saying that plans to reduce or eliminate the estate tax mean that people will use their money more wisely.

"I think not having the estate tax recognizes the people that are investing," Grassley (R-Iowa) told the Des Moines Register, "as opposed to those that are just spending every darn penny they have, whether it's on booze or women or movies."

Grassley chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee and is a previous chairman of the and current member of the Senate Finance Committee, an influential panel that played a major role in writing the chamber's plan. The seven-term senator was being interviewed for a Des Moines Register report on the impact of the estate tax.

Republicans have long attacked the estate tax, often referring to it as the "death tax," and their various tax plans would greatly scale it back or eliminate it. The tax is based on the transfer of property when someone dies, if an estate exceeds a certain amount. The Des Moines Register report determined that few family farmers or small business owners end up having to pay the estate tax and those who do pay are rarely forced to sell their land or quit farming.

The Senate's plan, which passed early Saturday morning, expands the individual exemption to $11 million per person, while the House plan would expand the exemption by the same amount but also eliminate the tax entirely in 2024. That is one difference in the bills that would have to be reconciled as the legislation moves forward.

The Iowa senator's comments were widely shared on social media and were criticized by a number of Democratic strategists for their harsh portrayal of how people spend money.

"Darn straight, Sen. Grassley. if we gave that money in middle class tax cuts, they'd just waste it on hookers and blow, right?," Jesse Ferguson, a former spokesman for Hillary Clinton, wrote on Twitter.

He later released a statement clarifying his position.

"My point regarding the estate tax, which has been taken out of context, is that the government shouldn't seize the fruits of someone's lifetime of labor after they die. The question is one of basic fairness, and working to create a tax code that doesn't penalize frugality, saving and investment," he said in a statement. "That's as true for family farmers who have to break up their operations to pay the IRS following the death of a loved one as it is for parents saving for their children's college education or working families investing and saving for their retirement."

Trump appears to back off 'red line' on 20 percent corporate tax Back

By Toby Eckert | 12/02/2017 10:00 PM EDT

President Donald Trump today indicated that he may be open to a 22 percent corporate tax rate, after he and other administration officials had called a 20 percent rate a "red line" in tax reform.

Speaking to reporters a day after the Senate passed legislation that included a 20 percent rate, Trump said: "Business tax all the way down from 35 to 20. It could be 22 when it comes out but it could also be 20. We'll see what ultimately comes out."

That appeared to be a step back from his earlier position. He called the 20 percent corporate rate "very much a red line" in September, and last Wednesday a White House spokesman repeated that the administration would "not support" raising the rate to fund an expansion of the child care tax credit, as Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Mike Lee (R-Utah) have proposed.

Most conservative Republicans would oppose going above 20 percent.

Before passing its bill, the Senate rejected the Rubio-Lee proposal. Ivanka Trump has been a prominent supporter of a child credit expansion.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) has also been open to the idea of a 22 percent corporate rate, saying executives she has talked to would accept it.

The tax plan the House passed last month also includes a 20 percent corporate rate. But setting the rate at 22 percent instead of 20 percent would give Republicans more breathing room to add provisions to their tax reform plans without blowing up the deficit.

Tax bill would trigger a major ripple effect through health care Back

By Adam Cancryn | 12/04/2017 02:46 PM EDT

The Republican effort to overhaul the tax code could send shudders through the health care system, potentially reshaping Obamacare while altering critical financial incentives affecting everyone from medical students to corporations and retirees with chronic illnesses.

The effort, if successful, would represent the GOP's most significant legislative changes to health care in years. But House and Senate Republicans must first navigate the tricky task of reconciling their competing tax bills without losing votes. The GOP can absorb only 22 defections in the House, and just two in the Senate, where Vice President Mike Pence could cast a tie-breaking vote.

Here are the major health care provisions in play as the GOP hits the home stretch on its tax efforts:

Elimination of the individual mandate

The Senate tax proposal would do what Republicans tried and failed to accomplish all year through a slew of health care bills: dismantle a key pillar of Obamacare. A provision included in the bill would effectively eliminate the health law's mandate that most Americans purchase insurance, by zeroing out the penalty on those who don't comply.

The CBO projects that doing so will drive up premiums an additional 10 percent and leave 13 million more people uninsured over the next decade. But the skittishness Senate Republicans showed earlier this year over changing health coverage hasn't materialized during the tax debate, with lawmakers instead expressing widespread support for killing what's long been considered one of the most unpopular parts of Obamacare.

While the law's supporters contend that removing the requirement could further destabilize the Obamacare markets, Republicans have largely dismissed the provision's importance and argued that individuals should be able to choose whether to purchase insurance.

"I have always supported the freedom to choose," wrote Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who helped kill the GOP's earlier repeal efforts, in an op-ed backing individual mandate repeal. "I believe that the federal government should not force anyone to buy something they do not wish to buy in order to avoid being taxed."

House Republicans didn't touch the mandate in their version of the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), concerned it would inject volatile health care politics into the tax effort. But now that it's cleared the Senate, the GOP is likely to include rollback of the mandate in the final bill.

Medical expense deductions

Among the big questions the Senate GOP created during its late-night rewrite of the tax bill is the fate of the medical expense deduction, a popular provision that lets people deduct the cost of huge medical bills. The House tax plan would eliminate this deduction, which retiree groups and advocates for the elderly have decried as an attack on seriously ill seniors.

"Nearly three-quarters of tax filers who claimed the medical expense deduction are age 50 or older and live with a chronic condition or illness, and seventy percent of filers who claimed this deduction have income below $75,000," the AARP wrote in a November letter to senators.

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) has defended eliminating the deduction in order to simplify the tax code and benefit a wider swath of the population, pointing to the way the plan would double the standard tax deduction.

Still, Senate Republicans opted not only to retain the medical expense deduction, but to temporarily expand it. The Senate version would lower the threshold to qualify for the deduction to 7.5 percent of medical expenses for tax years 2017 and 2018, down from its current 10 percent.

The change was driven by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), a key swing vote who pushed for a series of late amendments to the bill before declaring her support. With Republicans nursing a slim voting margin in the Senate, that could make the deduction a big bargaining chip during the House-Senate conference.

Drug industry incentives

Yet another health-related provision hanging in the balance is the orphan drug tax credit, which aims to incentivize research into treatments for rare diseases. The House tax plan would eliminate the credit entirely, in what would be a blow to drugmakers.

The Senate aims to scale back the provision that currently subsidizes half of qualifying clinical trial expenses for rare disease drugs, so that it subsidizes roughly 27.5 percent of those costs.

Both bills, meanwhile, would impose a 20 percent tax on payments from U.S.-based companies to their overseas affiliates — a provision that could hurt pharmaceutical companies in Puerto Rico. Officials on the island have raised concerns that the commonwealth could be treated as a foreign entity under the bill, putting additional financial stress on drugmakers already dealing with disruptions in the aftermath of Hurricane Maria.

And the drug industry broadly has sounded alarms about the Senate's decision to keep the corporate alternative minimum tax, a move that companies fear could prevent them from claiming a research and development tax credit. House Republicans scrapped the corporate AMT altogether in their bill.

But there is at least one big win for drug companies at the center of both tax plans. House and Senate Republicans want to lower the corporate tax rate, and give U.S.-based multinational companies a one-time reduction on profits they earn and keep abroad. Pharmaceutical manufacturers rank among those corporations storing the most money abroad, where they can take advantage of lower tax rates.

Medical education

The GOP's tax overhaul has major implications for higher education, in the way it could hike the taxes that medical schools — and their students — may have to pay. One provision yet to be reconciled between the House and Senate is a 1.4 percent excise tax on the investment income of private colleges and universities with large endowments.

The House version would affect as many as 70 schools with endowments worth at least $250,000 per student. The Senate version is less sweeping: Just 25 to 30 colleges and universities with endowments of $500,000 per student or higher would be subject to the tax. But either way, it means wealthy Ivy League schools like Harvard and Yale are in line to pay more.

House Republicans are also targeting a pair of provisions that could leave graduate students with significantly higher tax bills, proposing the elimination of a deduction for student loan interest and taxing as income the tuition waivers that allow some grad students to go to school tuition-free. However, the Senate didn't include either of those changes in the final bill.

The GOP's personhood play

The House bill would expand eligibility for 529 savings plans to allow them to be opened on behalf of a fetus — language aimed at fulfilling longtime efforts by the anti-abortion movement to grant legal rights to unborn children.

The provision — which drew immediate criticism from abortion-rights groups — didn't make it into the Senate bill because of strict rules tied to the GOP's bid to pass its legislation via expedited budget rules with only a simple majority. That restriction is likely to keep the provision out of the GOP's final tax bill as well.

Hospital bond restrictions

Hospitals are keeping a close eye on a complicated concept that could mean less money for their development plans: the inclusion of new limits on tax-exempt municipal bond financing by not-for-profit organizations.

Both the House and Senate propose banning the advance refunding of prior tax-exempt bond issues, which makes up a substantial part of the municipal bond market. The House bill would go even further, eliminating the tax exemption for interest income on new bonds.

Disability tax credit

The House bill also proposes eliminating a tax credit incentivizing small businesses to make improvements to their facilities comply with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Looming Medicare cuts

If House and Senate Republicans can resolve their differences and pass a final sweeping tax bill, they'll immediately confront one more big dilemma: what to do about the deep cuts to Medicare and other programs that could be triggered as a result. Congress' "pay-as-you-go" rule requires offsetting spending cuts to certain federal programs whenever lawmakers pass a bill that adds to the deficit, meaning the government could be on the hook for as much as $1.5 trillion in reductions over the next decade. They would hit Medicare hard, taking a roughly $25 billion bite out of the program's payments to hospitals and doctors next year.

Obamacare's Prevention and Public Health Fund would be wiped out completely, while the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund would lose $715 million from its budget. Other federal programs touching pillars of the U.S. economy like agriculture and education would also face elimination.

Republicans have vowed to sidestep the cuts by negotiating a waiver of the rule. In a joint statement last week, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and House Speaker Paul Ryan said that it "will not happen." But it will take 60 votes in the Senate to waive the requirement, meaning the GOP will need Democrats' help just days after jamming a partisan tax bill through Congress. Democrats have remained mum on whether they'll go along with a waiver, or what they might demand in return.

Senate bill to expand medical expense deduction Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/01/2017 04:38 PM EDT

The Senate tax bill would lower the threshold for medical expense deductions from 10 percent to 7.5 percent for two years, according to Sen. Susan Collins, who authored the change to the bill.

Collins (R-Maine) said the medical expense deduction was one of several reasons she would support the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\).

The new changes would convert the deduction back to pre-Obamacare levels. The health care law bumped the threshold to 10 percent.

The House tax bill would eliminate the medical expense deduction.

Democrats defeat GOP bid to shield conservative college from endowment tax Back

By Michael Stratford | 12/01/2017 09:35 PM EDT

Four Senate Republicans joined with Democrats to strip from the GOP tax bill a last-minute provision that would have shielded Hillsdale College, a prominent conservative school, from a new tax on university endowments.

An amendment offered by Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.) — and incorporated into a package of changes Republicans unveiled Friday evening to their tax plan, H.R. 1 (115) — would have exempted all colleges that don't accept federal student aid from the endowment tax.

But Democrats immediately cried foul over the plan because it appeared to benefit only a single college, Hillsdale College, whose president, Larry Arnn, is influential in conservative intellectual circles.

Arnn, who was floated last year as a potential pick to be President Donald Trump's Education secretary, has served as a Heritage Foundation trustee since 2002. The school also has close ties to the family of Education Secretary Betsy DeVos.

Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine, Deb Fischer of Nebraska, John Kennedy of Louisiana, and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska joined with Democrats early Saturday morning to pass an amendment by Sen. Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.) that stripped the provision from the tax bill.

Democrats had blasted the move as a giveaway to a school with ties to powerful conservative donors.

"This is a very limited provision written for a very special person," Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) said on the Senate floor, noting the school's connections to the DeVoses. Betsy DeVos' brother, Erik Prince, is a Hillsdale graduate, according to the college website.

According to the Hillsdale Collegian newspaper, DeVos' father-in-law, Richard DeVos, co-founded Amway with Jay Van Andel. Van Andel's son, Steve, is a Hillsdale graduate and Amway leader, and the Hillsdale graduate school of statesmanship was named in his honor after he made contributions to graduate school operations and scholarships, the newspaper said.

Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) questioned why the school was receiving a "special exemption" that was "airdropped at the last minute" into the bill. "I can't find anybody else in America who benefits from this particular provision," he said.

Of the colleges that report data to the federal government, only Hillsdale College would be affected by the provision, according to an analysis of Education Department data provided by a Democratic aide.

Toomey defended his provision, saying it was "perfectly reasonable" to exempt colleges that turn down federal money from the endowment tax because those schools impose less burden on federal taxpayers.

He also accused Democrats of mischaracterizing the exemption, saying it would apply to Hillsdale as well as other colleges that choose to forgo federal funding. Toomey declined to answer Democrats' inquiries on the floor about which other schools would benefit.

The proposed tax on private university endowments is part of both the Senate and House tax bills. The House-passed version applies the tax to colleges with assets of at least $250,000 per student. Senate Republicans on Friday raised that threshold to $500,000 per student in their bill, further narrowing the number of colleges that would be hit by the tax.

Hillsdale, a private Christian liberal arts school in southern Michigan, enrolls about 1,400 students and has an endowment of about $528 million. The college proudly rejects federal funding and the regulations and requirements that come along with it.

The amendment that would have exempted colleges that reject federal funding from the endowment tax was co-sponsored by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and supported by conservative Heritage Action.

Spokesmen for Toomey and Cruz did not immediately respond to a request for comment; neither did a representative from Hillsdale College.

College and university presidents have lobbied heavily over the past several weeks to stop the new tax on university endowments. They argue it will take away money that schools use to help students afford college and invest in their campuses.

What's in and what's out for farms and ag businesses in the Senate tax bill Back

By Kaitlyn Burton and Catherine Boudreau | 12/03/2017 09:13 AM EDT

The Senate's sweeping rewrite of the tax code, which passed early Saturday after Republicans hastily rewrote sections of the legislation, will likely have far reaching implications for farmers and agribusinesses.

The legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), would provide more tax relief for operations structured as pass-throughs and expand bonus depreciation. But it would eliminate a main deduction for agricultural co-ops that benefit their farmer members.

The Congressional Budget Office on Saturday estimated the Senate bill would add $1.4 trillion to the federal deficit over a decade. Although the upper chamber and the House still have to reconcile differences in its respective versions, the Senate's 51-49 mostly party-line vote is a major step forward for the GOP that aims to close the deal before Christmas.

Here are several of the Senate provisions that would affect farmers, ranchers and the agricultural industry:

— Increase deductions for pass-throughs. Most farmers organize their operations under a class of businesses known as pass-throughs, such as partnerships, sole proprietorships and limited liability companies, or LLCs.

Republican Sens. Ron Johnson (Wis.) and Steve Daines (Mont.) were successful in their bid to increase the deduction for these entities after threatening to vote against the tax bill if the change wasn't included. Pass-through entities would see a deduction rise from 20 percent to 23 percent, a boost financed by increasing a proposed one-time tax on multinational corporations' offshore earnings.

The Senate also added a provision to the tax bill that would allow "specified agricultural or horticultural cooperatives" to take the deduction for pass-through businesses, a provision sponsored by Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.). This means that co-ops would be treated the same as other farming businesses.

— Eliminate the broad deduction for co-ops. Despite pleas by the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives and nearly 200 other farm groups to maintain what is known as the Section 199 deduction, the Senate bill would repeal it. Many agricultural co-ops use the benefit and then pass along the money to their farmer members. The trade council estimates this provision sends about $2 billion each year to directly to growers, who can then deduct their share from their taxes. Sen. John Hoeven (R-N.D.) had authored an amendment to reinstate the deduction, but it wasn't considered.

— Raise the estate tax exemption. The bill would increase the estate tax exemption from $5.49 million to $11 million for individuals, and double for couples, meaning only people inheriting estates valued above those levels get hit with the levy.

Groups like the American Farm Bureau Federation and the National Cattlemen's Beef Association have pressed for full repeal of the tax, as the House version would eventually do. Such groups say a farm operation's value is typically tied up in assets like land and equipment, so those hit by the tax would have to sell those assets off to pay for it, threatening the ability to pass farms on to the next generation. But the USDA estimates that under the current rates and with special exemptions for farms, less than 1 percent would have to pay the tax.

— Expand the Section 179 deduction and bonus depreciation. The legislation would raise the maximum amount an individual can deduct for new asset purchases, like a tractor or combine, to $1 million (compared with $500,000 under current law) and boost the phase-out threshold to $2.5 million. The bill also would allow 100 percent expensing.

After five years, that benefit would phase out by 20 percentage points every year. Under an earlier version of the Senate bill, full expensing would have completely expired after five years.

— Restrict the business interest deduction. The bill as passed would limit the business interest deduction. Small businesses making less than $15 million would be exempt. Farming operations could opt out of being subject to that limit, however, although would have to use the alternative depreciation system to recover the cost of any property used in the farming business over a period of 10 years or more.

— Retain the property tax deduction. The original version eliminated the deduction for state and local taxes, also known as SALT, but Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) demanded a provision to allow for up to a $10,000 deduction for property taxes.

— Keep the Alternative Minimum Tax. Senate Republicans initially proposed eliminating the individual and corporate alternative minimum tax, but switched course by making it apply to fewer people. For individuals, the minimum threshold would increase from $50,600 to $70,600. For couples filing jointly, the threshold rises from $78,750 to $109,400. The AMT is intended to prevent those with high incomes from using loopholes to avoid paying taxes.

— Limit operating loss deduction, "carryback" provisions. The legislation would strike "carryback" provisions for net operating losses, but make an exception for farming. The deduction would be limited to 80 percent of taxable income and applicable to the previous two years. But carryforwards would be permitted indefinitely for all taxpayers, including farmers. However, the provisions wouldn't be effective until 2023.

Under current law, if farmers have a bad year they can carry net operating losses back to the previous five years to offset any profit, and thus reduce their tax liability.

— Provide relief for citrus growers. The Senate plan, which mirrors a bill, S. 71 \(115\), introduced by Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), would let citrus growers immediately deduct their replanting expenses even if they raise capital from investors to help cover the costs. This would help growers who need to replant diseased trees, such as those hit with citrus greening disease that is ravaging Florida's industry.

— Reduce excise taxes on beer. The bill would significantly lower the excise tax to $3.50 a barrel on the first 60,000 barrels for smaller craft brewers producing less than 2 million barrels each year. It would also decrease the excise tax to $16 a barrel on the first 6 million barrels that are either brewed domestically or imported, which would benefit large companies like MillerCoors and AB InBev. This provision would expire after 2019.

Poll: Two-thirds don't see opening ANWR for drilling as priority Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/04/2017 07:34 AM EDT

Two-thirds of people surveyed don't believe Congress should make a priority of drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, according to a new poll conducted by Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health and POLITICO.

That poll contrasts with the strong push Republicans are giving the issue in the tax bill. President Donald Trump and Alaska's Republican lawmakers, including Sen. Lisa Murkowski, have said opening ANWR up for drilling would contribute to the U.S. to establishing "energy dominance."

Republicans included language in the tax bill that the Senate passed Friday that would open up a 1.5-million-acre parcel of ANWR to drilling. The USGS estimated more than a decade ago the area could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil.

Forty-three percent of Republican respondents and 82 percent of Democrats said passing legislation to allow more drilling in ANWR "should not be a priority" in Congress. Thirty-five percent of Republicans and 10 percent of Democrats said such legislation would be very important or extremely important.

Independents hewed closer to Democrats on the issue, with 69 percent saying it should not be a priority and 19 percent saying it should be very important or extremely important.

The poll was conducted between Nov. 15-19 and included 485 U.S. adults, with a margin of error of 5.3 percentage points.

Senate expands college savings accounts to K-12, home schools Back

By Jane Norman | 12/02/2017 03:14 PM EDT

The Senate tax bill passed early Saturday would allow families to use tax-advantaged, section 529 college saving accounts to pay for children to attend public, private and religious K-12 schools, as well as to cover the costs of home schooling.

The amendment, a major victory for conservative education advocates, was sponsored by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and adopted on a 51-50 vote after Vice President Mike Pence broke a tie.

Cruz said on the floor that his amendment on K-12 schools "ensures that each child receives an education that meets their individual needs, instead of being forced into a one-size-fits-all approach to education, or limited to their ZIP code."

The amendment is similar to language in the House version of the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\). Both bills would expand section 529 college savings accounts to cover K-12 expenses of up to $10,000 per year. The House bill, however, does not mention home-schooled students.

The Senate provision says tax-free savings could be used for tuition, books, online educational materials, tutoring outside the home, dual enrollment in an institution of higher education and educational therapies for students with disabilities.

The idea of expanding section 529 college savings to cover K-12 school expenses has long been backed by conservative groups like The Heritage Foundation and the American Legislative Exchange Council.

Public school advocates and teachers' unions say that's misguided because it would allow even the wealthiest Americans to use tax-free accounts for K-12 private school tuition, since there are no income restrictions on the use of 529s.

However, the Senate did not vote on adopting language that would allow "unborn children" to qualify as college savers, similar to what is in the House bill. The language was removed before the vote-a-rama.

The Senate's failure to adopt similar language makes it less likely it will be agreed upon by the House-Senate conference committee that will take up the House and Senate tax bills, expected to launch next week. Groups on both sides of the abortion debate already have squared off over the language in the House bill portraying it as a new front in the battle to grant legal rights to fetuses.

GOP leaders: PAYGO cuts 'will not happen' Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/01/2017 04:32 PM EDT

Republican leaders are seeking to downplay the possibility that the GOP tax bill would trigger massive spending cuts under an obscure Senate rule known as PAYGO.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and House Speaker Paul Ryan released a joint statement this afternoon assuring that Congress wouldn't actually allow the across-the-board cuts to take place.

"This will not happen," McConnell and Ryan wrote, arguing that lawmakers have "readily available methods to waive this law, which has never been enforced since its enactment."

If the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), is signed into law, both chambers would need to agree to waive the decades-old Pay-As-You-Go rule to prevent the triggering of $150 billion per year in cuts to a slew of federal programs, including Medicare and student loans.

GOP leaders have long been confident that they can strike a quick deal with Democrats to waive the federally mandated slashing.

"There is no reason to believe that Congress would not act again to prevent a sequester, and we will work to ensure these spending cuts are prevented," McConnell and Ryan wrote today.

But at least eight Democrats would need to support that vote in the Senate. And minority party lawmakers aren't making any promises they'll agree to bail out Republicans amid the frantic push to clear the tax bill.

A PAYGO waiver is likely to be included in a government funding bill this month, according to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who said she received a personal assurance from McConnell this week that the cuts would be stifled.

GOP Medicaid work rules imperil care for opioid abusers Back

By Rachana Pradhan and Brianna Ehley | 12/03/2017 07:17 AM EDT

Red states ravaged by the opioid crisis are pushing for Medicaid work requirements that could push people out of treatment as they try to get off drugs.

Kentucky, New Hampshire, Maine and Indiana are among at least eight GOP-led states seeking federal approval to require Medicaid enrollees to work as a precondition of their health coverage. All four states have been hard hit by drug addiction, which claims 140 lives a day nationally.

Governors say they would exempt people with chronic drug problems or severe mental illness from the Medicaid work requirements, but who would qualify and under what circumstances hasn't been spelled out. Critics fear that many addicts could lose benefits, particularly if they go in and out of treatment, or have relapsed — a not uncommon occurrence. Employers' resistance to hiring people who have failed drug tests or have criminal records could also put health benefits at risk.

Backers of Medicaid work requirements say they're needed to reduce government dependency as the program has grown to cover more than 70 million Americans — nearly 12 million of whom obtained coverage under Obamacare.

The Trump administration is sympathetic, signaling it will sign off on the state waiver requests, even as it made combating the opioid epidemic a priority.

But even some Republican state lawmakers say they fear those with addiction issues would fall through the cracks.

"I'm all for designing programs in a way that encourages and rewards work," said Indiana state Rep. Ed Clere, a Republican who has previously bucked party leaders. "But we have to be careful not to let that objective undermine the primary purpose of health care, which is improved outcomes and wellness. I wouldn't want to see a work requirement get in the way of positive behavior modification and the individual's ability to take responsibility for his or her own health."

Indiana, which expanded Medicaid coverage to 400,000 people under then-Gov. Mike Pence in 2015, is one of the states asking for federal waivers to impose Medicaid work requirements that are primarily targeted at working-age, able-bodied adults. Officials generally are seeking to mandate 20 hours per week of work, or participation in a job-related activity, including volunteering or training.

Low-income adults in treatment for substance abuse would be exempt from the requirement, yet state data show that only slightly more than a quarter of enrollees with diagnosed problems are getting treated. Death rates stemming from drug abuse in 2015 stood at 19.5 per 100,000 residents, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

"There's a lot of people who don't seek treatment who have challenges," said Matt Brooks, president of the Indiana Council of Community Mental Health Centers and chairman of the state's Medicaid Advisory Board. "There are folks who might need services that miss out."

Spending on substance abuse and mental health treatment grew substantially after states expanded Medicaid coverage to low-income adults, with Medicaid spending over \$7 billion on substance use disorder services in the first year of Obamacare's expansion, in 2014, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation. The program's spending on mental health care that year was approximately $46.5 billion.

Kentucky — whose request to impose work rules on able-bodied adults was not acted upon by the Obama administration — is expected to be the first state to receive the Trump administration's blessing. Officials estimate that roughly 95,000 people over a five-year period would lose Medicaid benefits under Gov. Matt Bevin's proposal, which also includes increased premiums and other restrictions.

Still, Bevin says the idea of mandating someone with addiction problems to work "doesn't make sense." Kentucky had the third highest rate of death due to drug overdoses in 2015, clocking in at 29.9 per 100,000 people.

"This isn't intended to be just a one size fits all, black and white, you do it this way or you don't get it," he told POLITICO during a recent Republican Governors Association conference in Austin, Texas. "That's foolish. A person like that is a true detriment to themselves, to their families and society as a whole in their addicted state. We need to get them to point where they are not in [an] addicted state so they can become an asset to themselves and their family and society."

The state intends to exempt Medicaid enrollees from employment rules and other conservative changes if they are deemed "medically frail," a catch-all term for people with serious conditions. Indiana includes a similar exemption.

Yet many of the details in the plans are hazy. In Kentucky, some of the qualifying conditions to be deemed "medically frail" are automatic, such as being diagnosed with HIV/AIDS, being eligible for Social Security Disability Insurance or receiving hospice care. Others — such as having a chronic substance use disorder or disabling mental health issue — would meet the definition only if they satisfy yet-to-be-determined criteria.

People with addiction issues face a number of hurdles to obtain employment, including employers that drug test their prospective employees. More than half of all employers require job candidates to take drug tests, according to a study by the Society for Human Resource Management. Relapse is also common. Nationally, the National Institute on Drug Abuse estimates that relapse rates for addiction range from 40 percent to 60 percent.

"People cannot get a job because they can't pass a drug test," Brooks said. "So now, not only can you not get a job because of a substance use disorder, but you're not going to have access to health care ... and then where does that leave you?"

Criminal records for drug offenses can also make it harder to find employment. Though companies are legally prohibited from having blanket policies against hiring ex-offenders, it can be more difficult for those with a criminal history to find work.

Beyond finding work, people struggling with opioid abuse have trouble maintaining the sort of stability that enables them to hold down a job.

"This is a disease that hijacks a person's brain," said Mark O'Brien, vice president of state and local affairs for the Addiction Policy Forum. He added that for those in treatment programs, getting care can be time-consuming. "For some people, getting treatment is a full-time job," he said.

New Hampshire's waiver proposal would exempt anyone with a mental or physical illness or disability if their doctor fills out a form to verify their eligibility. People participating in the state's drug court program are also exempt from work requirements. However, it's unclear whether doctors would need to fill out the form only once for their patients or would routinely be required to certify that a Medicaid-eligible person still qualifies for the exemption.

"We're not trying to leave anybody out," said New Hampshire state Senate Majority Leader Jeb Bradley.

Renuka Rayasam contributed to this report.

Acting HHS secretary: It's up to Congress to address opioid funding Back

By Brianna Ehley | 12/04/2017 12:32 PM EDT

Acting HHS Secretary Eric Hargan signaled today that President Donald Trump will let Congress decide whether to appropriate new funding to address the opioid crisis.

"We're looking forward to hearing from Congress about how they intend to address this," Hargan said during a press conference at the CDC's headquarters in Atlanta.

Trump declared the crisis a public health emergency in October but did not request additional resources, though public health experts say states need billions of new dollars to fight the epidemic. There's been no indication that Congress is preparing a funding package after Trump's emergency declaration.

Hargan said he was encouraged by earlier proposals in the House and Senate to include new money for the opioid response, referring to Obamacare repeal legislation defeated earlier this year. Republican lawmakers had included that funding to help offset the impact of major coverage losses from repeal.

Separately, appropriations bills in the House and Senate keep funding for opioids relatively flat.

POLITICO-Harvard poll: Democrats and Republicans still fixated on health care Back

By Joanne Kenen | 12/04/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Congress may have moved on from health care. The public has not.

With taxes and spending, debt and defense piled up on Congress' extremely full plate this month, a new poll by POLITICO and the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health shows that Americans remain sharply focused on health care — but Republicans and Democrats aren't looking at the same things.

Republicans say their top priority is making another attempt at getting the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, repealed and replaced.

Democrats say theirs is getting the Children's Health Insurance Program funded. Congress missed a Sept. 30 deadline to renew federal funding, and now coverage for 9 million low-income kids is enmeshed with all the other year-end spending fights.

Given a list of 15 policy issues pending in Congress, Republicans put Obamacare repeal on top. Forty percent called repeal an "extremely important priority" and 33 percent said "fixing the current problems" in the health care law was a top concern. Obamacare beat out other top priorities for Republicans, which included halting unauthorized immigration (38 percent), cutting taxes (35 percent), and boosting national defense spending (34 percent).

The unrelenting emphasis on Obamacare — when so many other issues float on and off the public's radar — suggests it's truly a defining, gut issue for the GOP.

"Among Republicans, I think it's a Hatfield and McCoy issue," said Harvard's Robert Blendon, an expert on health care and politics, referring to the legendary 19th century family feud.

The fact that Republicans are "checking both boxes" — repeal the health law or fix it — suggests "they want to feel they got something different out of this debate ... although I don't think we can get them to agree on what that is," added Blendon, who co-designed the poll with POLITICO.

Barely on the radar for Republicans is renewing the protections for DREAMers — the undocumented immigrants brought to the United States as children (5 percent) — and investigating Russia's role in the 2016 elections (4 percent). Trade, a hot issue over the past year for Trump voters, has also dropped off.

Democrats' emphasis on the children's health program may come as a surprise because CHIP hasn't received a lot of attention from politicians or the media. That's partly because states and the Trump administration have so far been able to cobble together short-term solutions to stave off a crisis, although it's getting harder each week. And most people in Washington still think Congress will fix the popular program somehow.

"If you watch the news it's not about children's health, so the priority there is quite extraordinary," Blendon said.

After CHIP, which 48 percent of Democrats identified as a top priority, they also listed stricter gun laws (47 percent), giving more hurricane recovery help to Puerto Rico (43 percent), lowering prescription drug prices (39 percent), and investigating Russia's role in the election (35 percent). The lowest priorities for Democrats were Obamacare repeal, boosting defense spending and allowing more drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, all of which were ranked a top priority by just 5 percent of respondents.

The poll did not ask whether people who support Obamacare repeal would be satisfied by killing the law's individual mandate in the GOP tax bill, which currently seems likely. But scrapping that highly unpopular provision will give Republican lawmakers an anti-Obamacare achievement to take home to their voters.

On taxes, just under half of Republicans (49 percent) backed Congress' tax overhaul, H.R. 1 \(115\). A similar proportion thought they themselves would benefit — 1 in 4 thought it would help them "a lot" and another quarter thought they'd get "a little" help. A paltry 4 percent of Democrats gave it their blessing.

On health, about half of Republicans and Democrats expect their insurance premiums to go up, and just under half expect them to stay the same. Of those expecting a spike, 37 percent of Republicans blamed insurers (versus 23 percent of Democrats) and 13 percent blamed doctors and hospitals (versus 8 percent of Democrats).

Not surprisingly, 45 percent of Democrats said higher premiums would be the fault of President Donald Trump and the Republicans — and just over a third of the Republicans blamed the Democrats.

The poll also looked at how Americans view the opioid crisis, which Trump declared a national public health emergency in October without requesting more resources for the problem. More than half of those surveyed considered it a major problem but not a "national emergency."

Indeed, many of those polled regarded opioids as a state and local problem — not one for Washington to solve. That means that despite the clamor in Washington and in the public health world about Trump not requesting more funds, the public isn't really looking to Trump for solutions, Blendon said.

The public also split on whether the government should mandate health plans to treat opioid abuse — with 48 percent supporting the requirement and 49 percent opposing it. Democrats were far more likely to favor it.

The survey was conducted by SSRS, an independent research company, for POLITICO and Harvard from Nov. 15-19. It used cellphones and landlines among a nationally representative sample of 1,009 U.S. adults.

Brianna Ehley and Jason Millman contributed to this report.

Space Corps 'will be implemented' in next few years, Rep. Rogers predicts Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/02/2017 04:11 PM EDT

Simi Valley, Calif. — A controversial proposal to create a Space Corps under the Air Force will be enacted within the next several years, Rep. Mike Rogers predicted today.

Rogers, a top backer of the proposal who chairs the House Armed Services Strategic Forces Subcommittee, made the comments at the Reagan National Defense Forum during a panel on national security space with, among others, Air Force Secretary Heather Wilson and Strategic Command chief Gen. John Hyten.

Asked separately about rapid acquisition for space, the Alabama Republican said the Space Corps "will be implemented, if not in the next couple years, in three or four years, five years."

While the final National Defense Authorization Act H.R. 2810 \(115\) doesn't create a separate space cadre, it does require an independent research agency to develop a roadmap for a new space service.

During the session, Rogers and Wilson sparred over the Air Force's management of national security space issues. The Alabama Republican has slammed the service for not taking space seriously enough, and specifically criticized the Air Force for promoting only one space professional from colonel to brigadier general in the past year.

"If anybody really believes that you're gonna see dramatic change in the way national security space meets its challenges without dramatic organizational change, you're fooling yourself," Rogers said.

"I have to take issue with that because I think we have exceptional airmen," Wilson replied.

"We are the Air Force. We're responsible for this and we own it," Wilson said. "And I'm really proud of our airmen who are part of the space world."

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Frelinghuysen: Any December stopgap would be 'very, very short' — Puerto Rican officials shirk congressional testimony — Lobbyists seek tax tweaks before it's too late
Date: Tuesday, November 07, 2017 4:18:59 PM

FIGHTING ANOTHER CR: On Oct. 1, the federal government embarked on another continuing resolution — for the ninth year in a row. Now, chatter of another kick-the-can extension (one that could last into February) is growing louder once again. When asked this afternoon about the chance of finishing up by Dec. 8, veteran appropriator Mario Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.) laughed. "Since we're on the record, I'm not going to answer," he told us. "We have to keep shooting to get it done by December."

Plan B: At this point, appropriators say a stopgap is just a backup. "A CR is damaging, not only to the military but to the private sector as well," House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) told us today. "It promotes instability and unpredictability. So, hopefully, if we consider one, it will be very, very short." Postponing a fiscal crisis could be useful for a time-pressed (and tax-obsessed) GOP, but only with the support of House Republicans, who passed 12 spending bills on time for the first time in a decade this summer. And they're not ready to forget that accomplishment.

No time for quitting: With almost exactly a month left until the Dec. 8 deadline, top appropriators say it's too early to throw in the towel. "I don't think we even need to be thinking about a CR," says Hal Rogers (R-Ky.), who endured tough spending negotiations many times in his six years of chairing the House Appropriations panel.

"At the end of the day, we've got plenty of time to do this," Tom Graves (R-Ga.) says.

DISASTER RELIEF

BAILING AT THE LAST MINUTE: The House Natural Resources Committee missed out on a chance this morning to grill the person responsible for that controversial Whitefish Energy contract. Ricardo Ramos, the embattled head of the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, canceled plans late Monday to appear before the panel.

Like a note from mom: The chairman of the power authority's board asked Congress in a letter on Monday to excuse Ramos' absence because of his "challenging" work on the island. Rep. Rob Bishop (R-Utah), chairman of the panel, said he was "very disappointed" and told reporters after the hearing that he's still hoping other Puerto Rico power authority officials turn up to testify next week. Carmen Cruz Soto, the mayor of San Juan, also declined to appear.

SITTING TIGHT: Key lawmakers say they're still waiting to hear how much money the White House will seek in its next disaster package — and when. "Goodness knows," Frelinghuysen told us today when asked about the total price tag. "Just stay put." He said he has only heard "rumors" about when the White House request may come. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell did offer a small clue about that package's contents, saying today that the next supplemental would definitely include money for Florida, Texas and Puerto Rico.

TAX

'THE DECISIVE DAY': As House Republicans prepare to pass their tax bill (H.R. 1 \(115\)) on the floor next week, outside groups are going gangbusters in an effort to secure tweaks before it's too late, Theodoric Meyer reports. "We're treating every day like it could be the decisive day," says Bob Chlopak, a lobbyist representing Americans Against Double Taxation, a coalition fighting to preserve deductions for state and local taxes.

Already amending: House GOP lawmakers released a series of changes to their tax plan Monday night, including tweaks to the treatment of private university endowments, carried interest, stock options, dependent care assistance programs, musical works, the Earned Income Tax Credit and international tax avoidance, Brian Faler reports.

Ever-confident leadership: House Speaker Paul Ryan affirmed today that the House GOP's tax bill would indeed comply with the $1.5 trillion budget cap, as mandated by the Senate's reconciliation rules. "We believe we're going to be fine on that," Ryan told reporters. "We believe that when you look at other analyses, whether it's Treasury or the rest, we're going to be right there in the sweet spot with economic growth that gives us more revenue." For his part, McConnell said he expects the upper chamber's still-unreleased plan "in the end to be revenue neutral for the government, if not a revenue gainer."

House Republicans released their long-awaited bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), to overhaul the nation's tax system on Nov. 2. Overall, the legislation would cut taxes by nearly $1.5 trillion over a decade.

Tax cuts for all types and sizes of companies, as well as other business benefits, are central to the economic promises GOP leaders say their plan will deliver. They expect the bill to expand the economy for years to come with provisions including a 20 percent corporate tax rate and a 25 percent top rate on other kinds of businesses, plus other perks such as immediate write-offs for some capital investments and the ability to deduct interest for a wide swath of smaller companies.

The proposal also contains far-reaching changes that would affect virtually every household. It includes new tax brackets, new and expanded deductions and the loss of some longtime benefits. Tax lobbyists sprint to win changes to House bill Back

By Theodoric Meyer | 11/06/2017 07:13 PM EDT

House Republicans kept their tax bill under wraps for as long as possible to hold back a deluge of lobbyists. After trade groups spent the weekend poring over the details, the flood is on.

The release of Republicans' long-awaited tax bill has sent trade groups representing everything from architects to universities scrambling to secure changes to legislation they fear would harm their industries.

With the House Ways and Means Committee marking up the bill this week and Republicans determined to move it through the House by Thanksgiving, lobbyists are rushing to make their cases before it's too late.

"We're treating every day like it could be the decisive day," said Bob Chlopak, a lobbyist representing Americans Against Double Taxation, a coalition fighting to preserve deductions for state and local taxes.

Since the bill's details were unveiled on Thursday, lobbyists have dug into the text, as their corporate clients plugged the numbers into economic models to figure out how it will affect them. Trade associations in Washington have sent emails to their members across the country and held conferences calls to try to figure out the best way to convince the Ways and Means Committee to spare deductions and tax credits they view as essential to their industries.

Now, many of the groups are settling on strategies for spurring their members to act or identifying members of Congress they will pressure to amend the proposal. Lobbyists see this week as crucial to influencing the House — even as they try to anticipate the course of the tax bill in the Senate, which is set to unveil its own legislation this week.

"You basically have this week" to sway the House, said Jerry Howard, the chief executive of the National Association of Home Builders.

"Realistically, the timeframe in the House is narrow, which is why we're beginning in earnest on the Senate side," Howard added.

House Republicans' proposed tax changes range from the well-known to the relatively obscure. The National Association of Realtors and the National Association of Home Builders, for instance, have spent months pressing lawmakers not to reduce the home mortgage-interest deduction. The home builders endorsed an initial draft of House Republicans' proposal last month, only to pull their support after House Speaker Paul Ryan nixed a tentative deal the home builders had struck Ways and Means Committee Chairman Kevin Brady.

The House bill unveiled last week would limit the deduction on new home purchases to mortgages of $500,000, instead of $1 million under current law, and eliminate it for new purchases of second homes.

The details of the House bill came as the Realtors — one of the top lobbying spenders in Washington — gathered at a national conference in Chicago this weekend, giving the group a chance to galvanize members.

"They're all prepared to go back to their states and their communities and make sure their members of Congress know where we stand," said Jamie Gregory, a top lobbyist for the National Association of Realtors.

Realtors across the country have sent more than 114,000 emails to their members of Congress, Gregory said, and they'll decide "within the next two days" where to deploy staff. The group is eyeing sending people to congressional districts with high rates of homeownership that also have high property taxes, making the suburbs of cities like New York, Philadelphia and Chicago likely targets.

The American Institute of Architects, meanwhile, is homing in on ways to save tax credits that have gotten much less attention.

The group sent out an email blast to its members on Thursday identifying three threats in the bill: a change to the tax rate paid by so-called "pass-through" entities that would reduce taxes for many businesses but not architecture firms, and cuts to tax credits for historic preservation and energy efficiency. The architects are appealing to two Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee — Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.), who has supported the historic preservation credit in the past, and Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), who has backed the energy efficiency one — for help.

"We'll be leaning on those folks to really bring the concerns up in the committee," said Ian McTiernan, a lobbyist for the American Institute of Architects.

Other trade groups unhappy with the bill include the American Wind Energy Association and the American Association of Universities.

The Ways and Means Committee began marking up the bill on Monday but did not make speedy progress. Republicans unveiled an amendment on Monday evening that would narrow a proposal to begin taxing private universities' endowments, which had infuriated colleges, and made several other changes.

Trade associations and coalitions also are running online ads and waging campaigns on social media, trying to rouse support to preserve favored tax breaks.

"Our advice to clients for the past several months was to make sure you had a contingency campaign plan in place and a message that can be boiled down to 140 characters," said Ken Spain, a founding partner of CGCN's strategic communications practice and a former House GOP staffer.

Brady has been preparing to tackle a tax overhaul for years, and he's ready for the onslaught of lobbyists looking to preserve their clients' favored provisions, said Lori Harju, a former senior adviser to Brady who's now a lobbyist at Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck.

"Brady always said every industry must give something" in order to bring down the overall corporate tax rate, Harju said. "But you don't want to crush an industry, either."

Lobbyists looking to make their case this week should show up with an alternative proposal, Harju said. "Is there a way you think it can be fixed to make it less painful for you?" she said she counsels clients.

"Don't underestimate Kevin Brady," she added. "He is not going to let this die."

House Republicans release tax bill changes Back

By Brian Faler | 11/06/2017 06:22 PM EDT

House Republicans this evening released a series of changes to their plan to rewrite the tax code.

Their amendment to the Ways and Means Committee chairman's "mark" would narrow a proposal to begin taxing private universities' endowments.

It would make a number of other changes to H.R. 1 \(115\), including ones to so-called carried interest, the Earned Income Tax Credit as well as their plans to fight international tax avoidance. It also would affect provisions regarding stock options, dependent care assistance programs and musical works.

Democrats were infuriated by the proposal, saying Republicans had blindsided them with the plan though the committee had been meeting today since noon, and say they did not have time to study the proposals.

"This is an utter disgrace," said Rep. Sander Levin (D-Mich.). "You make a mockery out of this committee," he told Chairman Kevin Brady.

Red-state Democrats to discuss tax plan with top Trump aide Back

By Elana Schor | 11/06/2017 06:55 PM EDT

At least a half-dozen red-state Democratic senators are set to talk taxes on Tuesday with a senior aide to President Donald Trump, a sign that some of the party's politically vulnerable members have not ruled out backing a bill that the GOP sees as a must to keep hold of its congressional majority.

Sens. Joe Donnelly (D-Ind.), Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), Jon Tester (D-Mont.) and Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) are expected to sit down with Marc Short, the White House's director of legislative affairs, sources said late

Monday. Their attendance at the meeting, organized by Manchin, comes as Democratic leaders project confidence in their unity heading into a pivotal six-week stretch of legislating on tax cuts, with Republicans aiming to get a bill through the House by Thanksgiving and to Trump's desk by Christmas.

Half of the six Democratic senators attending Tuesday's meeting — all of whom face reelection next year and are among the GOP's top targets — endorsed an August letter from 45 Democratic senators who vowed to withhold their votes from any tax-cut legislation that increases the deficit or cuts taxes for the top 1 percent of earners. The House GOP's tax bill, released last week to criticism from Senate Democrats on the left and right wings of the caucus, is projected by the Joint Committee on Taxation to add about $1.5 trillion to the deficit.

Manchin, Heitkamp and Donnelly notably declined to sign the August letter, but Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) has said that the trio shares the caucus' broader goals of a deficit-neutral tax bill that avoids breaks for the ultra-wealthy.

All six Democrats set to meet with Short have already faced intense pressure on taxes from the White House, with Heitkamp and Donnelly both joining Trump on visits to their home states that were designed to nudge them into supporting the GOP legislation. Trump went to Missouri in August to urge voters to defeat McCaskill if she didn't support Republican tax cuts, while Vice President Mike Pence traveled to Manchin's home state.

When Democrats on the tax-writing Finance Committee visited the White House last month, Brown gave Trump copies of two bills he's authored: one that would offer companies a tax credit to keep jobs in the U.S. and another that would expand the value of the child tax credit and earned income tax credit.

Pence to huddle with senior House Republicans Tuesday amid tax push Back

By Matthew Nussbaum | 11/06/2017 05:09 PM EDT

Vice President Mike Pence will meet separately with House Majority Whip Steve Scalise and House Republican Conference Chair Cathy McMorris Rodgers on Tuesday as Republicans' tax reform push kicks into high gear.

Pence will also attend the weekly Senate Republican policy luncheon on Tuesday, something of a weekly tradition for him. The Senate is expected to unveil its own tax reform plan on Thursday, the same day House leaders hope to clear the tax bill through the Ways and Means Committee — the first hurdle to getting the bill to President Donald Trump's desk.

The vice president's visit comes as White House officials huddled separately with both House and Senate tax-writers at the Capitol today, according to a senior administration official.

The push to overhaul the tax code, with massive cuts for corporations and the wealthiest households, has become a do-or-die proposition for Republicans, especially after their failure to repeal the Affordable Care Act. The week's activity will unfold as Trump is on the other side of the planet, spending nearly two weeks in Asia meeting with regional leaders.

The presidential absence could allow for more focus on the tax push, without daily Twitter broadsides derailing the message.

Club for Growth says House tax plan 'doesn't cut it' Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 11/07/2017 09:13 AM EDT

The Republican-aligned Club for Growth harshly criticized the House GOP tax plan on Tuesday for falling short of several conservative goals, saying it "doesn't cut it."

The group's statement, obtained by POLITICO, takes aim at provisions affecting high-income earners and the estate tax, and also amplifies complaints about a provision affecting unincorporated businesses that has become a major sticking point for Republicans. The statement follows the group's tepid response to the plan when it was released last week.

"As the House Ways and Means Committee continues marking up the recently introduced 'Tax Cuts and Jobs' bill, Club for Growth is taking the opportunity to refocus the discussion to a tax reform proposal that will really grow the economy," the group wrote. "Spoiler alert: The House bill introduced last week doesn't cut it."

The changes the group demanded include lowering the tax rate on millionaires; eliminating the so-called bubble tax of 45.6 percent on certain high-earners with incomes above $1 million; a full, immediate repeal of the estate tax; and changes to the proposed rules on closely held businesses.

"House Republicans are engaging in class warfare the likes of which would make Democrats green with envy," the group said in the statement.

Objecting to rules written in the bill to prevent abuse of a new, lower tax rate for so-called pass-through businesses, which can range in size from single-owner small businesses to the Trump Organization, the Club for Growth also demanded that GOP tax writers ditch those rules and further cut rates for those businesses.

"The blended, real effective marginal rate is at least 35% and can even be higher," for high-income small business owners, the group argued. "That means no tax cut at all for most small business and family-owned companies."

The statement comes as the House Ways and Means Committee begins a second day of work on the legislation. Chairman Kevin Brady has indicated that more changes to the bill will be coming, after making a few relatively minor adjustments on Monday.

Ivanka Trump, Mnuchin pitch tax reform as middle class relief Back

By Henry C. Jackson | 11/06/2017 10:12 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's daughter and his treasury secretary pressed the case Monday that GOP-led tax legislation is about bringing relief to the middle class, not offering cuts to wealthy Americans.

In interviews with Fox News, Ivanka Trump and Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin made similar pitches about the legislation, focusing on what they said were benefits to the middle class.

Critics have argued that the legislation would end up benefiting wealthy Americans far more.

"This is not about tax cuts for rich people," Mnuchin said. "It's about tax cuts for the middle class."

Mnuchin addressed one criticism of the legislation — its cuts to corporate tax rates — arguing that trimming what big companies pay ends up benefiting workers most.

Mnuchin said: "70 percent of the burden of corporate taxes are borne by the worker."

In a separate interview, also on Fox News, Ivanka Trump pointed to the legislation maintaining child and dependent care credits and doubling the standard income tax deduction as elements that will benefit the middle class.

"Really it's the central theme, middle-income Americans and supporting them," she said. "We spend less than any country in the developed world on children between the ages of zero and 5. It's just a fact. We don't invest enough resources."

The House unveiled its tax legislation last week. Senate Republicans have not yet rolled out their blueprint, although there are likely to be differences between the two bills.

Trump said she was confident that Republicans could bridge any differences and was not worried the Senate would make significant changes.

"I'm optimistic that the Senate ... takes what's been created and actually enhances it," she said.

More colleges exempted from new endowment tax under Brady amendment Back

By Michael Stratford | 11/06/2017 06:37 PM EDT

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady today introduced an amendment to the House

GOP tax bill that would exempt more private colleges and universities from a new tax on their endowment earnings.

The amendment to the bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), would more than double the threshold at which private colleges become subject to a 1.4 percent excise tax on their net investment income.

Under the proposal, the tax would apply only to private colleges whose assets are valued at $250,000 per full-time student. The original GOP plan released last week, would have set the threshold at $100,000 per full-time student.

The new endowment tax, which is opposed heavily by higher education groups, would apply only to private, not public, schools with at least 500 students.

Brady (R-Texas) said today that the new tax would put private university endowments on "equal footing" with private foundations.

The American Council on Education had previously estimated that roughly 160 colleges and universities would be subject to the tax. It was not immediately clear how many would now be exempt under Brady's amendment.

How big-time college sports takes a hit in the House GOP tax bill Back

By Benjamin Wermund | 11/06/2017 05:59 PM EDT

The House GOP's tax plan — which would hit higher education hard — could also land a blow to some major college sports programs by targeting season ticket holders, top-dollar coaches and stadiums.

First, the legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), would do away with a deduction tied to season tickets. Many college booster clubs require a donation for the "right" to buy season tickets for football, basketball and other games. Donors now can write off 80 percent of that gift.

As the News & Observer points out, it's a big deal to many booster clubs. Boosters at the University of North Carolina — the reigning national basketball champion — require a donation of at least $6,000 for the right to buy two season tickets. That jumps to $25,000 for four tickets.

The House bill could also create a tax on high-paid coaches.

Under a provision in the plan, employers would be taxed on their top five paid employees. The charge would apply to employees making more than $1 million and would be 20 percent of the amount over $1 million that employee is paid.

Many universities with powerhouse athletics programs pay coaches millions and they are almost certainly among those schools' top-paid employees.

At Clemson University, which pays football coach Dabo Swinney an average of $6.75 million a year, for example, that would translate to a more than $1 million tax. The University of Alabama, which pays Nick Saban more than $11 million a year, would be taxed $2 million.

The House GOP plan could also make it more expensive for colleges to build athletics facilities by taxing interest on private activity bonds, which many colleges use to build the facilities. The National Association of College and University Business Officers says the change "will increase borrowing costs and will likely result in diminished investments in infrastructure."

Mortgage bankers throw weight behind homeownership tax credit Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 11/06/2017 05:20 PM EDT

The Mortgage Bankers Association urged tax writers to reconsider a homeownership tax credit to replace the mortgage-interest deduction, an idea that House Speaker Paul Ryan has rejected.

The position is a critical shift for the trade group, which for decades has joined its industry allies to defend the mortgage-interest deduction from cuts. The policy statement also throws new weight behind an idea being pushed by the National Association of Home Builders.

"We believe Congress should take this historic opportunity to think creatively about new homeownership incentives targeted more efficiently to low- to moderate-income borrowers," such as a 12 percent tax credit for mortgage interest and property taxes, MBA President David Stevens wrote in a letter to House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady and ranking member Richard Neal.

Stevens said the tax reform plan as written has the potential to harm the housing market and the economy as a whole.

Ryan rejected the concept of a homeownership tax credit just days before the GOP unveiled its draft plan, telling lobbyists that the concept hadn't been sold to lawmakers. But on Friday, Brady said he wanted to continue talking about the idea, which would combine benefits for mortgage payments and property taxes into a single credit.

"I think it has great merit and would love to see that considered in this process," Brady told POLITICO.

The industry's long-standing loyalty to the mortgage interest deduction is crumbling as the prospects for tax reform become real and as economists and housing advocates get more vocal about the system's flaws, including its disproportionate benefits to wealthier homeowners.

The current GOP tax plan cuts in half, from $1 million to $500,000, the size of the mortgages on which homeowners are allowed to deduct interest from federal taxes. It also limits the deductibility of state and local taxes to $10,000. Those provisions would have an effect on fewer than 6 percent of U.S. homeowners, but would be felt hardest in high-cost states such as California and New York.

Of the big three homeownership lobbying groups, the National Association of Realtors alone remains wedded to preserving the mortgage interest deduction, or MID, as is, with its current cap of $1 million.

"Maybe the MID doesn't belong in a blank-slate tax code. But through history, through the democratic process, it is embedded," NAR chief economist Lawrence Yun said on Friday. "We are opposed to anything that harms the attractiveness of homebuying and homeownership."

School choice group says House tax bill doesn't go far enough Back

By Caitlin Emma | 11/06/2017 05:00 PM EDT

The Center for Education Reform, an advocacy organization that supports the expansion of school choice, said today that the House GOP's tax plan is a "laudable step, but it leaves too many Americans out of the equation."

In a statement, the group's founder and CEO Jeanne Allen said the proposed expansion of 529 college savings programs to include apprenticeship costs and K-12 expenses like private school tuition "does not account for the importance of providing meaningful opportunities to Americans — opportunities our education, training and workforce programs have failed to provide — and underscores this stark reality."

Some organizations that support the expansion of school choice for many working class Americans have said the proposal put forward by House Republicans would only help wealthy families afford private school.

The bill would end Coverdell Education Savings Accounts — tax-free accounts that have allowed families to set aside up to $2,000 to cover K-12 costs — and expand 529 college savings accounts to cover up to $10,000 per year in expenses for public, private and religious schools. Coverdell accounts are income-restricted, applying to families in lower tax brackets, while 529s are open to everyone, no matter how wealthy.

Republicans thrown on defensive after study shows tax hike Back

Republicans are on the defensive after a new analysis shows some middle-income people would see tax increases under their plan to rewrite the tax code.

While most taxpayers — 61 percent — would see their taxes fall in the next two years, 20 percent would pay higher taxes by 2027, the Joint Committee on Taxation said Tuesday. Forty-six percent that year would get a tax cut while 34 percent would see only minimal changes in their tax bills, with breaks of less than $100.

It promises to be an explosive issue, especially given President Donald Trump and other Republicans' promises to make the middle class the focus of their tax plans.

That has some Republicans in the Senate pushing for significant changes, such as an even larger — and pricier — expansion of the child tax credit, a popular middle-income break, than the one House Republicans are contemplating.

That would require major revisions to the House plan, H.R. 1 \(115\). Some conservatives want to finance it at least in part by repealing the Affordable Care Act's mandate to buy health insurance.

"The House and Senate — I think we need to do even more to provide a tax cut, not just tax reform, but a tax cut for every American," said Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas).

Democratic critics of the plan are seizing on the findings while moderate Democrats who Republicans want to work with are expressing caution.

"I have some concerns," said Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.V.), who was scheduled to meet with administration officials on Tuesday. "The bottom line is the president told me specifically that this is not a tax cut for the rich — it's a tax cut for the hard-working middle class, so I'm looking at everything we're seeing."

House tax writers emphasize that people in every income group would see their tax bills fall under the plan, estimating the average family would receive a $1,182 tax cut. The JCT said that only 8 percent of taxpayers would pay more in 2019 under the plan.

What's more, Republicans said the legislation will be massaged as it makes its way through Congress.

"There's definitely going to be changes," said Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), who sits on the House's tax-writing committee. "We've got somewhat of a final product, but it's quite awhile before we have a final, final product."

"It's a nine-inning game, we're in the third," he said.

Part of the reason some could see their taxes climb is House Republicans want to replace personal exemptions, which adjust tax burdens for family size, with new family credits. But those provisions would not be big enough to make up the difference for many families.

They also want to index provisions of the tax code for a slower measure of inflation, which means people would be pushed into higher tax brackets over time as wages climb.

Republicans also want to dump a number of tax breaks used by middle-income people, such as a deduction for interest on student loans and a write off for those with large medical expenses.

Though their plan is a net $1.5 trillion tax cut, they are simultaneously both raising and lowering taxes. They are cutting taxes by more than $5.5 trillion, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation, while raising taxes by more than $3.8 trillion.

The report found widely varying outcomes within individual income groups. By 2027, for example, about 23 percent of those earning between $50,000 and $75,000 would see a tax increase. At the same time, 42 percent of people in that same group would see a tax cut of at least $500.

Among those earning more than $1 million that year, the report said, two-thirds would see a tax cut of more than $500 while one third would see a tax increase of at least $500.

Brady: Adoption tax credit up for discussion Back

By Toby Eckert | 11/07/2017 12:34 PM EDT

The adoption tax credit, targeted for elimination under the House GOP tax plan, is back on the table for discussion, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said today, after social conservatives and adoption advocates complained about the proposal.

"We're having, absolutely we're having these discussions," Brady (R-Texas) told conservative talk show host Hugh Hewitt. "For me as a pro-life dad and my wife as a pro-life mom, we understand, look, we understand the joys of adoption, because we have a family where none existed before."

Brady and his wife have two adopted sons. Despite that, the House Republican plan, H.R. 1 \(115\), would eliminate the $13,570-per-child credit as part of a push to clear the tax code of credits and exemptions used by relatively few Americans, while doubling the standard deduction households could take. The plan would also boost the child tax credit.

Getting rid of the adoption credit would raise little revenue, less than $50 million over 10 years, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation. Adoption advocates say its elimination would make their jobs harder.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Ways and Means Committee is debating the tax legislation this week, and Brady is expected to make further changes to the plan.

ACA mandate repeal not included in latest House tax bill amendment Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 11/06/2017 06:36 PM EDT

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady released an amendment to the GOP tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), and he has not added a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate.

Republicans are awaiting an updated CBO score on repealing the mandate as part of tax reform. Some rank-and-file members — and President Donald Trump — want to ax the mandate as part of the tax bill but GOP leaders are skeptical such a bill can get through the Senate.

CMS administrator makes case for sweeping Medicaid changes Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 11/07/2017 12:30 PM EDT

CMS Administrator Seema Verma on Tuesday outlined the Trump administration's case for requiring some people to work in order to get Medicaid, a contrast to what she called the Obama administration's "low expectations" for low-income people.

She called that a "tragic example of the soft bigotry of low expectations" that reinforced dependency.

Verma in a speech to the country's Medicaid directors painted a very different philosophy about Medicaid than the one advanced under former President Barack Obama. She said the ACA expansion of Medicaid to millions of low-income adults without children "does not make sense" and it jeopardizes care for more vulnerable enrollees, such as pregnant women and disabled people, by stretching the safety net.

"For this population, for able-bodied adults, we should celebrate helping people move up, move on, and move out," Verma said in a rare public speech to the National Association of Medicaid Directors. "We have a moral responsibility to do more than just give them a [Medicaid] card. We have a responsibility to give them care."

Her views comport with those of other Trump administration officials including Vice President Mike Pence, and reflect some of the positions she took on behalf of red states like Indiana as a health-care consultant specializing in Medicaid.

Democrats and left-leaning consumer advocate groups have fiercely protested tying Medicaid benefits to employment, arguing that it would set back the goal of providing health coverage to low-income Americans. They are expected to file litigation once CMS grants its first state request.

Verma did not specify when CMS would approve the first state waiver with a work requirement. Kentucky and at least six other GOP-led states have sought permission to impose work requirements, a major shift in Medicaid's 52-year history.

She said CMS will approve state waiver proposals with "community engagement," such as requiring some enrollees to work or participate in related activities such as job training or volunteering. She also promised greater accountability and a streamlined waivers approval process. Both Democratic and Republican state officials have complained the approval system is cumbersome.

As a consultant, Verma negotiated Medicaid waivers, including the Indiana plan under which then-Gov. Pence adopted Obamacare's expansion. The Obama administration granted Indiana some leeway to add conservative features, but rejected a proposal to institute work requirements.

But under the Trump administration, several states are seeking permission to enforce employment-related conditions, including Kentucky, Arkansas, Indiana, Maine and Wisconsin. CMS has yet to approve a plan despite its clearly stated support for such policies.

Medicaid, which now covers roughly one in five Americans, has grown since 2014 to cover millions of additional low-income adults, most without children. About 11 million people who did not previously qualify have gained coverage under the Medicaid expansion in the Affordable Care Act.

"The Medicaid program is a promise to help individuals live up to their highest potential, leading healthier more fulfilling and more independent lives," Verma said Tuesday. She said work requirements are in the spirit of an idea from President Lyndon Johnson — who established Medicaid in 1965 — that the government should not only relieve symptoms of poverty but also prevent it altogether.

CMS on Monday released policy guidance to streamline approvals of Medicaid waivers and state plan amendments. The agency has revised its website on 1115 waivers to encourage state submissions with different objectives than those promoted by the Obama administration, including strategies to ensure Medicaid's long-term fiscal sustainability and promoting beneficiary independence.

Puerto Rico bondholders offer $1.5B loan to commonwealth Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 11/07/2017 05:00 AM EDT

Investors in the senior class of Puerto Rican bonds known by their Spanish acronym, COFINA, have offered a zero-interest, $1.5 billion loan to the territory's oversight board and commonwealth government that may have been influenced by President Donald Trump.

Though the creditors have an obvious gain from Puerto Rico's recovery from devastating hurricanes — they're more likely to be repaid the quicker Puerto Rico can get back on its feet — a source familiar with their strategy also indicated that they were concerned over remarks Trump made around his trip to San Juan in October after Hurricane Maria.

According to the source, creditors read Trump's comments as stating the U.S. government would attempt to be repaid before creditors for post-petition claims, like the low-interest loan authorized in a recent emergency package by Congress. The commonwealth government said it needed that loan to maintain essential functions through the end of the year after Maria hit.

Though the administration has had to walk back some of Trump's prior remarks — most notably his comment about 'wiping out' Puerto Rico's debt — creditors believed Trump knew what he meant in his remarks due to his personal experience with bankruptcy in business, the source said.

In addition to speeding the island's recovery, creditors hope that if the loan is accepted by Puerto Rico's oversight board, they will be able to maintain their place in the order of repayment of debt — unless a loan were granted at a negative interest rate, in which case the COFINA creditors would maintain debtor-in-possession primacy.

"This would be an extra level of protection," the source familiar with creditor thinking said.

The loan, the largest of its kind offered to Puerto Rico by bondholders following Hurricanes Irma and Maria, would consist of $800 million in sales tax revenue currently held by Bank of New York-Mellon and an additional $700 million from creditors to Puerto Rico, to be distributed over the course of 12 months.

The $800 million is sales tax revenue that backs the COFINA bonds. A judge has frozen the account until court proceedings around Puerto Rico's debt crisis can be completed, a process that could take months, if not years. Meanwhile, creditors and the commonwealth have fought over the funds. In a U.S. district court filing last night, bondholders argued that the commonwealth government "rejected this offer as 'inconsistent with its litigation strategy.'"

Though the commonwealth has rejected the loan, COFINA creditors maintain hope that the the territory's oversight board will use its power as trustee for the commonwealth and accept the offer.

The oversight board's executive director, Natalie Jaresko, testifies before the House Natural Resources Committee this morning about Puerto Rico's recovery efforts.

Waters, Richmond rally opposition to flood insurance bill Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 11/07/2017 02:09 PM EDT

House Financial Services ranking member Maxine Waters (D-Calif.) and Rep. Cedric Richmond (D-La.) are urging lawmakers to oppose a bill that would reauthorize and overhaul the National Flood Insurance Program.

In a "dear colleague" letter, the two lawmakers said the bill that the House is taking up this week would "make flood insurance more expensive, less available and less fair for millions of Americans."

"Although we have pushed for a long-term reauthorization bill that ensures the continued availability and affordability of flood insurance, this bill does neither," they wrote. "H.R. 2874 is a step in the wrong direction for families and businesses across the country."

In addition to the opposition from Democrats, it was unclear today how much support House Republicans looking to pass the bill would have from their own party. Since the committee approved the bill this summer, several Republicans from coastal districts have pushed back.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House Rules Committee will hold a hearing on the bill at 3 p.m.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: GOP braces for even-tougher second stopgap — Conservative groups suggest OCO as solution to caps disputes — Trump declares disaster relief for California wildfires
Date: Friday, December 08, 2017 2:34:58 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/08/2017 02:30 PM EDT

DRAMA'S OVER (FOR NOW): Government employees (and congressional reporters) rejoice today after both chambers cleared a short-term funding bill with more than 24 hours to spare. And President Donald Trump officially signed off this afternoon.

So what's next? Two more weeks of waiting — and then another drag-it-out continuing resolution.

Still stuck: Unlike with many stopgap bills of old, appropriators didn't beg to buy time to finish up an omnibus. This time, lawmakers are simply trying to pressure leaders to finally settle on spending caps. Until then, the entire funding process remains at a standstill. Even if topline numbers were announced today, a bill with updated spending levels probably wouldn't be ready until mid-January.

No deal: The much-touted "Big Four" meeting at the White House on Thursday did not produce the kind of grand bargain that some appropriators had been hoping. Asked if negotiators had zeroed in on a compromise, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell replied, "I wouldn't say that." Spending levels did dominate the talks, but the two parties didn't come to a consensus, we reported Thursday evening. Democrats are still demanding parity for any defense and non-defense spending boost, while Republicans want to see the Pentagon get the bulk of any increase.

Putting the 'CRomnibus' to bed: House conservatives say Speaker Paul Ryan has given a firm commitment to push for a full year of defense funding on the next stopgap. But Freedom Caucus members say they're not delusional in thinking Senate Democrats would actually swallow that plan. "I don't know that it would be intellectually honest to suggest there's a high degree of confidence that that will happen," Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said Thursday with a coy smile.

GOOD FRIDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — Agriculture financing group Rabobank warns in its November report that farmers who grow row crops like soybeans and corn will continue to face low growth and low profit margins over the next five years. More subsidies, anyone?

#DailyBudgetFact — During past government shutdowns, lawmakers have consistently provided back pay for affected employees, according to the Congressional Research Service. During the 2013 shutdown, a total of 850,000 executive branch employees were furloughed — about 40 percent of the workforce.

BUDGET

HOW TO DITCH THE DEMOCRATS: Conservative groups have come up with a plan

they believe would allow Trump and GOP leaders to scrap all deal-making on spending caps without doing damage to the Pentagon. Their argument: Republicans don't need a new proposal that balances increases in defense and domestic money. The GOP can simply go around the caps with the Overseas Contingency Operations fund.

'Last resort': In a 180-degree flip, Heritage Action told Republican lawmakers this week that they should consider that dreaded "OCO" tactic to make sure defense spending isn't sequestered this year. "This would allow the Trump administration to deliver on its promise to increase defense spending without requiring additional discretionary spending," the group wrote in a memo to Republican offices. "To be clear, OCO is a massive budgetary gimmick and should be used only as a last resort."

Double-dog dare: As one tipster speculated, the plan would dare Democrats to vote no instead of negotiating a caps deal with Republicans — "Mick Mulvaney's strategy all along."

DISASTER AID

FEDERAL FIRE SPRINKLER: Trump has given the go-ahead to rain more federal funds and resources upon California as firefighters there struggle to beat back the blaze that has now consumed more than 500 structures and sent more than 120,000 people fleeing, Nolan McCaskill reports. The declaration allows the Federal Emergency Management Agency to swoop in with help and provides 75 percent federal funding for emergency protective measures.

Hell of a year: This latest emergency order comes as the federal government continues to make payouts for other catastrophic wildfires this year. FEMA has delivered more than $13 million in individual assistance since Trump handed down a major disaster declaration in October for California wildfires. Following on lesser declarations, federal fire management assistance has also been given this year to Utah, Nevada and Kansas.

TAX

NOT NEXT WEEK: House and Senate tax negotiators plan to work through the weekend on their overhaul plan, H.R. 1 \(115\). But House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy says a vote won't happen in the House next week, Brian Faler and Colin Wilhelm report.

WILL MITCH RENEGE? Sen. Susan Collins' support for the GOP tax bill may be wavering, Adam Cancryn reports today. The Maine senator had agreed to back the measure after McConnell promised to fund Obamacare cost-sharing subsidies. "I remain confident, despite your skepticism, that we will eventually get that," Collins told reporters on Thursday, per Adam. But behind the scenes, Ryan has told conservatives that the next spending bill won't include any Obamacare provisions, as we reported Thursday.

A reshuffle: Without Collins, the bill could still pass since only one other Republican, deficit hawk Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), is on the record in opposition. But if the Mainer drops her support, each GOP vote becomes far more valuable, likely spurring additional Republican demands during conference negotiations.

All the rest: 22 percent corporate rate is on the table | But Brady sticks with 20 percent | The HIT could take a hit | Byrd rule kills Newman's Own carve-out

ENERGY

GREAT EXPECTATIONS: The GOP's plan to help pay for tax reform by expanding Arctic drilling may be just a pipedream. With low oil prices and high costs of new development, energy companies aren't so ecstatic about starting from scratch in Alaska right now, Ben Lefevre and Anthony Adragna report.

Undershooting the target: You'll remember that the latest report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated ANWR revenues would fall short by about $366 million.

ADMINISTRATION

HOVERING QUESTIONS: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke spent more than $14,000 on government helicopters this summer to accommodate his packed schedule, newly FOIA-ed documents reveal. One of those rides was requested so Zinke could fly back from Yorktown, Va., in time for a 4 p.m. horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, Ben Lefevre reports. That round-trip flight cost $6,250.

INFRASTRUCTURE

JANUARY ROLLOUT? That long-awaited infrastructure plan is just a month away, the White House tells Lauren Gardner. POTUS intends to send Congress "a detailed infrastructure principles document" outlining his dreams for spurring $1 trillion in investment.

State-centric: The plan is expected to give incentives to encourage state and local governments to foot a greater share of the bill for infrastructure projects, whether with their own money or through private-sector financing. The $200 billion federal share of the package would be split into four buckets: Funding for states and localities that promise to take on more of the financial burden, block grants for rural areas, existing federal loan programs, and money for "transformational" projects "that will truly change the face of our country," the White House spokeswoman said.

'Devolution' in motion: House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.) says he hopes to meet with Trump next week to go over the specifics, Brianna Gurciullo reports. "Some of it sounds a little bit like devolution," he said. "And I've not talked to a single governor that wants the federal government not to have a role. It's a national transportation system." The chairman also said he chatted with Ryan this week about the legislative path. "I told him I think it has to be a bipartisan bill," Shuster said. "There's realities in the Senate."

Broadband bellyaching: A top staffer for Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) said today that Democrats were previously "hopeful" the Trump infrastructure plan would include direct dollars for broadband deployment, John Hendel reports. "Streamlining, permitting and even tax incentives are helpful to some extent, but you've got to have direct funding to reach broadband, particularly in rural areas," Nelson communications counsel John Branscome said at a conference, following news this week that the White House doesn't plan to set aside funding specifically for broadband development.

TELECOM

JUDGMENT DAY FOR FIRSTNET: States now have less than three weeks to decide whether to opt out of FirstNet — the $7 billion broadband network the feds are building out to help first responders communicate. And a bunch of biggies — like California and Florida — are still on the fence, John Hendel explains. At the state level, skeptics wonder about alternatives that could be cheaper for emergency communications and better for broadband coverage. And competitors like Verizon are already giving the federal government a run for its money in courting clients for alternative networks, potentially complicating the cash flow equation.

DEFENSE

'60-YEAR-OLD TANKERS': When Rep. Don Bacon (R-Neb.) first entered the Air Force in the 1980s, he said there was "zero doubt" the U.S. military was best in show. Some 30 years later, Air Force pilots are still flying the same aircraft he did, and he's less sure about that world-class status. "We've got 60-year-old B-52s, 60-year-old tankers," Bacon told Connor O'Brien during a recent sit-down. "Just so much evidence that we have declined in our training, in our readiness and the modernization upkeep."

Enough's enough: Bacon calls himself both a budget hawk and a military hawk but warns that he's getting restless with Congress' propensity for stopgap funding bills. "I don't think our military can keep being passed over with these CRs," Bacon said. "We can't keep kicking the can down the road."

ECONOMY

86 IN A ROW: The U.S. economy added 228,000 jobs in November, a dip from the 244,000 created in October, Ian Kullgren reports. The U.S. economy has now added jobs for 86 months in a row, though job growth has slowed since 2014.

FEMA

NFIP GETS TWO MORE WEEKS: Lost in all the hubbub about funding the government, the National Flood Insurance Program also got a two-week extension under the stopgap (H.J. Res. 123 \(115\)) this week, Zachary Warmbrodt reports. No fix, though, for keeping the program from falling further into debt after the $16 billion bailout in September.

CONGRESS

SEXUAL HARASSMENT PROBE: The House Ethics Committee is opening a new investigation into sexual harassment allegations that resulted in an $84,000 taxpayer-funded settlement for one of Rep. Blake Farenthold's former staffers, Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report.

Senate clears spending bill for Trump and averts shutdown Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 12/07/2017 06:18 PM EDT

The Senate tonight backed a two-week funding bill, staving off a government shutdown a full day ahead of the deadline.

Senators approved the bill, H.J. Res. 123 \(115\), on an 81-14 vote, punting a series of nasty political battles until just before Christmas. President Donald Trump has already endorsed the spending patch and is expected to sign it soon.

Government funding was going to expire Friday night but now would be extended to Dec. 22, when lawmakers have acknowledged they'll need yet another short-term bill to buy time for broader negotiations.

The Senate's vote came after the House earlier this evening passed the legislation with almost entirely Republican votes. House Democrats protested the vote because GOP leaders left them out of negotiations.

Trump approves emergency declaration for California to help combat wildfires Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 12/08/2017 11:55 AM EDT

President Donald Trump today approved an emergency declaration in California, where wildfires have blazed for much of the week.

Trump's declaration orders federal assistance — from DHS and FEMA — to aid state and local response efforts.

"This action will help alleviate the hardship and suffering that the emergency may inflict on the local population, and provide appropriate assistance for required emergency measures ... to save lives and to protect property and public health and safety, and to lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe in the counties of Los Angeles, Riverside, San Diego, Santa Barbara, and Ventura," the White House said in a statement. "Specifically, FEMA is authorized to identify, mobilize, and provide, at its discretion, equipment and resources necessary to alleviate the impacts of the emergency. Emergency protective measures, limited to direct Federal assistance, will be provided at 75 percent Federal funding."

The California wildfires are in in their fifth day. Fires have burned across the southern region, displacing people from their homes and tearing through buildings. Authorities issued evacuation orders for more than 100,000 people.

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders told reporters Thursday that White House and FEMA officials were "speaking regularly to state and local authorities and making sure that we're ready and able to help when needed and when requested by those authorities."

Final tax bill vote in House won't come next week, GOP leader says Back

By Brian Faler and Colin Wilhelm | 12/08/2017 11:49 AM EDT

The House will not vote next week on a final agreement to rewrite the tax code, though House and Senate negotiators are expected to work through the weekend.

"It will not come up next week, but if it could, I would bring it up as soon as we come out of conference, because I do believe the American people are waiting for a Tax Cuts and Jobs Act," House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy told colleagues late Thursday in remarks on the House floor.

His comments come as lawmakers work behind closed doors on a compromise tax plan that they can send to President Donald Trump to sign into law. Lawmakers have provided little guidance as to when they might wrap up their work, beyond saying they want to finish this year.

Dec. 22 has been widely seen as the unofficial deadline in recent days, as that's the date federal funding will run out under a stopgap spending measure and lawmakers are expected to turn their attention to spending again.

Gary Cohn, the chairman of the National Economic Council, told CNBC Friday that "a lot of progress is being made."

"This is going to be a big weekend for the conference committee; they're spending the weekend working on taxes, and I think we'll see an enormous amount of progress over the weekend," he said.

McCarthy also announced the House would be in session the week of Dec. 18, when the congressional calendar had both chambers on recess.

Collins' Obamacare deal faces moment of truth Back

By Adam Cancryn | 12/07/2017 07:33 PM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins is barreling toward yet another health care showdown with her own party. But this time, she might not have the leverage to get what she wants.

Republicans who watched Collins lead the rebellion over the GOP's Obamacare repeal effort just three months ago are playing tough on yet another high-stakes bill, wagering they can do without the Maine moderate's swing vote and still claim a narrow year-end legislative win on tax reform.

Collins went along with the tax bill H.R. 1 \(115\) that repeals Obamacare's individual mandate after Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell pledged to pass a pair of bills propping up Obamacare's shaky insurance markets, including a bipartisan deal resuming payments on key subsidies that President Donald Trump halted in October.

But Speaker Paul Ryan has made clear he's not bound by the deal, and there's little urgency among House Republicans to do much of anything on health care before the end of the year. On Thursday, Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker said conservatives received assurances that talks on a spending package to keep the government open won't address Obamacare.

"The three things we were told are not gonna happen as part of our agreement: no CSRs, no DACA, no debt limit," he said, referring to efforts to fund Obamacare's cost-sharing subsidies.

That could cost Collins' support after she signaled that her vote on the final bill may hinge on the fate of the health care measures.

One bill, known as Alexander-Murray, would temporarily restore subsidies to insurers. The second would fund a two-year reinsurance program helping health plans cover particularly expensive patients.

Senate Republicans can only afford two defections and still pass the tax bill using a fast-track procedure that requires a simple majority, with Vice President Mike Pence ready to cast the tie-breaking vote. The margin would become razor thin if Collins holds out, and Sen. Bob Corker maintains his opposition over concerns about the bill's impact on the deficit.

Yet House Republicans still chafing over the Senate's failure to repeal Obamacare insist they won't bend to Collins' demands. And while Senate Republicans are trying to keep Collins in the fold, there's little apparent worry so far that her opposition would sink the tax effort.

"I think you guys have to find something else to be concerned about," said Sen. Tim Scott, one of the 17 GOP lawmakers assigned to merge the House and Senate versions of the tax plan.

Sen. Lamar Alexander, who coauthored Alexander-Murray and has championed its inclusion in a year-end agreement, also waved off the need to pressure House Republicans on the issue.

"The House knows our position," he said. "When they see that they can lower premiums 18 percent ... reduce the debt, reduce the amount of money going to Obamacare subsidies, I think it'll be a Christmas present they'll want to give to their constituents."

One of the few moderates in a Republican conference that narrowly controls the Senate, Collins has regularly used her voice and vote to extract concessions from GOP leaders and ensure she's a central figure in negotiations.

During the health care debate, she urged the GOP to protect Medicaid and preserve more subsidies for people to buy insurance. When they stuck with their blueprint, Collins joined fellow Republicans Lisa Murkowski and John McCain in a dramatic vote that killed the months-long repeal bid.

And in the run-up to the Senate's late-night tax vote, she secured three late changes to the bill, including the expansion of a provision allowing people to deduct hefty medical bills that House Republicans had voted to eliminate entirely.

That was on top of McConnell's "ironclad commitment" to tackle the two health care bills at year's end — measures that Collins claims will help offset premium increases stemming from the bill's repeal of Obamacare's mandate that most Americans be insured.

Collins said Thursday she considers House passage of those Obamacare bills part of that commitment, even though McConnell has only publicly agreed to "supporting passage" of them and can't singlehandedly force the House to take up legislation.

Ryan hasn't officially ruled out the possibility, but declined to commit to rolling either of the bills into upcoming spending agreements. Conservatives have loudly opposed any aid for Obamacare, and even moderates who support stabilizing the health law have shrugged at the exact timing.

"What the vehicle is to get it through the system, in the House and the Senate to the president's desk, I'll leave that to our leadership," said Rep. Tom Reed, who co-chairs the bipartisan Problem Solvers Caucus.

Collins insists she's taking the long view, claiming progress Thursday on trying to win over House Republicans during rounds of private negotiations.

"I remain confident, despite your skepticism, that we will eventually get that," she said.

And as the GOP learned during the repeal debate, the whip count could shift suddenly. Sens. Jeff Flake and Ron Johnson remain wild cards, and either could conceivably join Corker and Collins in torpedoing the tax bill if they dislike the final version.

For now though, Republican leaders are signaling once again that Collins may not get everything she wants on health care — and gambling it won't cost them a second time.

"I think that these are separate issues," said Sen. David Perdue. "I'm hopeful that that won't derail this [tax bill]. We've got to get it this done and get it on the president's desk."

Collins: Deal on tax bill includes House passage of Obamacare measures Back

By Adam Cancryn | 12/07/2017 02:11 PM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins said today she believes the House must pass stopgap health legislation under the deal she struck with Senate GOP leaders to support the tax bill.

The Maine Republican voted for the Senate's tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\), after Majority Leader Mitch McConnell committed to back measures aimed at stabilizing Obamacare's insurance marketplaces. In his pledge last Friday, McConnell only agreed to "support passage" of two health bills, but Collins told reporters she believes the agreement also requires the House to pass the health legislation.

House Speaker Paul Ryan has made clear that he was not part of the deal between Collins and McConnell, and House Republicans have broadly panned the idea of doing anything to prop up Obamacare. That potentially could put in doubt Collins' support for any final tax bill negotiated between the two chambers, and Republicans have little margin for error in the Senate.

One health bill negotiated by Sens. Lamar Alexander and Patty Murray would restore key subsidy funding to insurers on the Obamacare exchanges and offer states more flexibility to customize their marketplaces. The second would fund a two-year reinsurance program helping insurers cover particularly expensive patients.

Collins said she's still negotiating, and she believes the House will eventually get on board.

"I remain confident, despite your skepticism, that we will eventually get that," she said.

Walker says cost-sharing subsidies won't be part of spending talks Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/07/2017 03:46 PM EDT

GOP leaders have promised conservatives that this month's spending negotiations will not include Obamacare cost-sharing subsidies, DREAMers or the debt ceiling, Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker told reporters today.

"The three things we were told are not gonna happen as part of our agreement: no CSRs, no DACA, no debt limit," Walker (R-N.C.) said, referring to the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals law.

The cost-sharing subsidies have become a major point of contention in talks dealing with short-term spending beyond the Dec. 22 expiration set in a continuing resolution to be voted on later today, H.J. Res. 123 \(115\).

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said last week that she was promised by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell that the Obamacare funding would be included in a spending bill. Without it, she has threatened to oppose the GOP's tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), which could come up for a final passage vote as soon as next week.

Walker was among several conservatives who huddled with House Speaker Paul Ryan and Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy on Tuesday to discuss spending issues. That promise was among several, spending-related commitments made during the Tuesday meeting, Walker said.

Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows, who also attended the meeting, said separately today that some conservatives are skeptical about GOP leaders' spending promises.

"There are a number of us questioning how rock-solid those commitments are," Meadows (R-N.C.) said, referring to a range of leadership comments on spending levels and policy items.

Corporate tax rate of 22 percent gains traction in tax reform discussions Back

By Aaron Lorenzo and Colin Wilhelm | 12/07/2017 12:51 PM EDT

The possibility of setting the corporate tax rate at 22 percent instead of 20 percent surfaced more strongly in the tax reform debate Thursday, with officials at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue indicating it's under serious consideration.

"There's a lot of conversation about corporate rates, we're trying to keep it at 20 percent," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) told POLITICO. "The president would like it lower than that and so would I, but the 22 percent keeps cropping up so it's a viable thing."

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders didn't rule out the administration supporting 22 percent, which has come into play in recent days after President Donald Trump unexpectedly threw the number on the table.

"Look, our focus has been on getting the lowest corporate rate possible," Sanders told reporters. "Fifteen is better than 20. Twenty is better than 22. And 22 is better than what we have. Again, we're going to continue to push [for the lowest rate], but we're not going to negotiate that from the podium, and we're committed to getting the lowest corporate rate we can."

Later in the day, White House legislative affairs director Marc Short appeared to do some damage control, telling Reuters, "We believe that 20 percent is the right number ... 20 percent is about as high as we feel comfortable going."

Raising the corporate rate could seriously disrupt the work that has been done to date as lawmakers rush to get a tax bill to Trump before the end of the year.

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said Thursday, "I'm focused on 20 — I really think that's our competitive rate, so we're going to go into conference with that."

"My theory is a very simple one: We should leave well enough alone," said Sen. Tim Scott (R-S.C.), a member of the Finance Committee who was appointed to the conference committee trying to settle differences between the House and Senate bills.

The extra 2 percentage points would open the floodgates to more requests to add tax preferences back into the bill, he said.

"We'll have multiple people spending the same amount of money in multiple ways because everybody's in a different corner," Scott said.

Brady (R-Texas), who is chairing the negotiations, indicated the issue is far from settled.

"All this — we'll deal with in conference," he told reporters.

Trump suggested last weekend that the sweeping tax overhaul legislation being negotiated in Congress could set a 22 percent corporate rate, after saying earlier that 20 percent was a "red line" for him. Getting the corporate rate down from its current 35 percent is one of Republicans' main objectives.

But they are also looking for ways to cover the cost of provisions that members want to add or subtract from the bill, including making a state and local tax deduction more generous and abolishing the corporate Alternative Minimum Tax, or AMT.

Trump's comments Saturday threw a sudden, and confusing, new dynamic into the discussions.

"[T]his wasn't a big issue two or three weeks ago," Hatch said, then added, "It was a big issue but it wasn't so much argued."

"It's cropped up in every meeting we've had, but it's also been knocked down in every meeting we've had too," he said.

But Short told Reuters he thought Trump "was just reflecting what conversations he had heard from them [senators], but that ... wasn't intended to signal: this is an endorsement of raising the corporate rate."

Earlier in the day, Trump's top economic adviser, Kevin Hassett, said Trump "has spoken for himself on these things, and he's acutely aware of how important marginal tax rates are, and also he's acutely aware that in conference that sometimes things move around."

Hassett, the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, made those remarks at an event hosted by the American Council for Capital Formation.

House Speaker Paul Ryan refused to play ball when asked Thursday about the corporate rate.

"Do you think I'm going to get in to speculating what's in the conference committee?" Ryan told reporters. "What I'm not going to do is start speculating what is or isn't, what I want or don't want."

The House bill would drop the corporate rate to 20 percent next year, whereas the Senate bill would make that cut starting in 2019. The Senate bill would also preserve the AMT, which would raise about $40 billion over a decade according to an official estimate. House Republicans want to strip it out in talks that have started to blend the two bills into one to send to Trump.

Brady sticking to 20 percent for corporate tax Back

By Brian Faler | 12/07/2017 06:01 PM EDT

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady is pushing back against suggestions that Republicans might settle for a corporate tax rate north of 20 percent.

Asked this evening if he was open to bumping that up, Brady said: "I'm focused on 20 — I really think that's our competitive rate, so we're going to go into conference with that."

Brady (R-Texas), who is chairing negotiations aimed at hashing out a compromise tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\), between the House and Senate, also indicated the issue is far from settled.

"All this — we'll deal with in conference," he told reporters this evening.

His comments come as some Republican senators debate possibly cutting the rate to 22 percent, instead of their long-promised 20 percent, an idea first broached Saturday by President Donald Trump.

Brady also said their compromise plan will include more so-called transition rules to give people time to adjust to the changes, especially with "some of the more complex areas like international" corporate tax changes.

Most of the Republican plans take effect Jan. 1, leading to complaints that lawmakers are not giving the public adequate notice to prepare for the changes.

House tax writers weigh plan to suspend Obamacare insurer tax Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/07/2017 03:16 PM EDT

House Republican tax writers are considering delaying Obamacare's health insurance tax for only limited markets next year, leaving out small businesses and possibly private Medicaid plans, according to sources on and off Capitol Hill. They would suspend it for all markets in 2019.

Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee are worried that it will be difficult for the small businesses to send prospective savings from delaying the tax back to consumers. Industry sources, however, say it is possible.

Excluding small business could pose a political problem: Insurance plans covering large companies, individuals in the Obamacare markets and Medicare Advantage plans would see a tax break, but insurers covering small business would not.

The fate of the health insurance tax is being decided in negotiations over a year-end bill. Also in the mix is a two-year delay of Obamacare's medical device tax, loosening the restrictions on health savings accounts, and delay of the Cadillac tax.

Negotiations are in the early stages, according to several sources, citing the threat of a government shutdown and the conference on the GOP's tax bill.

"Members are working to deliver as much relief as possible from the health insurance tax — as soon as possible," a Ways and Means Committee spokesperson said.

On the Senate side, the tax bill has pushed the Obamacare tax delays to the back burner. Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said the panel hasn't considered delay legislation yet.

"But we'll have to get into it, there's no question," he said.

Newman's Own faces mammoth tax bill after lawmakers fail to spare the foundation

By Brian Faler | 12/07/2017 06:42 PM EDT

A decision by the Senate's parliamentarian could force the sale of the late actor Paul Newman's food company, and dismantle his charity.

During the Senate's consideration of Republicans' plans to rewrite the tax code, Parliamentarian Elizabeth MacDonough struck a provision that would have spared Newman's Own from an unusual 200 percent tax it's facing.

It had been seeking the provision for eight years, and appeared to be finally on the cusp of victory. Both House and Senate Republicans had included the exemption in their tax plan drafts, with little controversy or debate.

But MacDonough deemed the provision — along with more than a dozen others — to be violations of the Senate's rules, so they were deleted before the legislation was passed last week.

"It came as a total bolt out of the blue," said Bob Forrester, head of the foundation that owns the food company. He says he was unfamiliar with the rule.

"It was a stunning, devastating, brutal even, notification when I had heard this had happened."

"We're still stunned," he said.

The IRS has given the foundation until November 2018 before the tax ax will fall. But given the time it takes to sell a company, Forrester says he needs a fix by the end of the first quarter of next year or it will have to begin divesting from the business, which sells salad dressing, dog food, salsa, wine and popcorn, among other things.

When Newman, one of the biggest movie stars of the 20th century, died in 2008, he left the company to his foundation, which gives away its profits to charity.

The problem is a 1969 tax law that bars foundations from owning more than a small stake in private businesses. It was written with an eye toward preventing wealthy people from using foundations as tax shelters, and it imposes a deliberately confiscatory 200 percent tax on those that don't unload their businesses after a certain period of time.

Forrester had won support from lawmakers in both parties for the exemption, including Sens. John Thune (R-S.D.) and Bob Menendez (D-N.J.).

But the parliamentarian, responsible for interpreting the Senate's rules, called it a violation of the so-called Byrd rule. Named after the late Sen. Robert Byrd, the rule puts strict limitations on what sort of provisions can be included in "reconciliation" measures like the one Republicans are now using to muscle their tax plans through the Senate.

MacDonough also killed a bid by a handful of Senate Republicans to include a trigger mechanism that would have forced future tax increases if the GOP plan didn't help the economy as much as lawmakers hope — which briefly brought negotiations over the tax legislation to a standstill.

She deleted more than a dozen other provisions as well, including one allowing education savings accounts for unborn children, tax breaks for people hit by flooding in the Mississippi Delta and one for tax-preparation programs for poor people.

That has frustrated those who had been pushing the provisions, and say they have little recourse to challenge the parliamentarian's decisions.

She could be overruled by lawmakers, though that would be highly unusual.

Ironically, Forrester said lawmakers had advised him to wait to make another run at the foundation provision until lawmakers took up a broad tax-code rewrite, saying that would be his best opportunity to get it approved.

Forrester says he's still looking for ways to get the provision passed, though he may have missed his best opportunity. He acknowledges time is running short.

"I continue to hope there is some other option," he said. "I just can't believe there isn't."

"If there is no option legislatively, then there is no option for Newman's Own other than to break itself up."

Poor Alaska lease sale sows confusion on ANWR drilling plan Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Anthony Adragna | 12/07/2017 05:47 PM EDT

The weak results from the lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska are giving Democrats ammunition in their fight to stop Republicans from opening the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge under the tax bill.

Democrats are making hay out of the fact only two companies bid in what Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke had hailed as an "unprecedented" offering of acreage in the NPR-A, and they say the lease sale, which generated only $1.2 million, undercuts Republican claims that allowing drilling in a portion of ANWR would generate $1 billion over 10 years. The latest report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated ANWR revenues would fall short by about $366 million.

House Natural Resources ranking member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and two other committee members sent a letter to CBO Director Keith Hall asking for a re-do on ANWR drilling revenue estimates in light of the poor NPR-A showing.

But Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), the driving force behind putting the refuge in the budget package, said the lease sale had little bearing on prospects for ANWR, however. The refuge is believed to hold as much as 10 times the billion barrels of oil estimated to lie buried in the petroleum reserve, Murkowski said.

"Different fields, different prospectivity," Murkowski told reporters.

Meanwhile, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) said negotiations over ANWR and how much money it might bring to federal coffers is ongoing.

"I'm going to see all sorts of numbers being thrown out at the last few minutes," Bishop told POLITICO. "We'll look at them. We'll still negotiate this process."

WHAT'S NEXT: Republicans will meet in conference to reconcile the House and Senate versions of the tax bill.

GOP tweaks Arctic drilling language to bump up revenue Back

By Sarah Ferris | 11/30/2017 11:51 AM EDT

Senate Republicans have reworked language on Arctic drilling in their tax bill to further boost revenue, hoping to resolve a procedural hiccup before the impending passage vote.

Senate Budget Committee leaders have tweaked provisions that would authorize drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, altering the language in a way they believe will comply with so-called Byrd rule requirements, a GOP committee aide confirmed today.

The budget panel had expected to raise $1 billion over a decade by opening up ANWR for drilling. But a report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated it would fall short by about $366 million, according to a Senate Democratic aide.

The GOP's revised drilling language would propose selling more oil from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, potentially producing hundreds of millions of dollars in additional revenue, the aide said.

If approved by the Senate parliamentarian today, the new language will be formally added before the high-stakes Senate floor vote on the tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\).

The fate of the provision — championed by swing vote Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) — was called into question Wednesday after a warning from the parliamentarian.

Each part of the GOP's tax plan must comply with a complex set of budget reconciliation rules that allow the legislation to avoid a Democratic filibuster.

Zinke booked government helicopters to attend D.C. events Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/07/2017 06:31 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke spent more than $14,000 on government helicopters this summer to take himself and staff to and from official events near Washington, D.C., in order to accommodate his attendance at a swearing-in ceremony for his replacement in Congress and a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, according to previously undisclosed official travel documents.

The travel logs, released to POLITICO via a Freedom of Information Act request, show Zinke using taxpayer-funded vehicles from the U.S. Park Police to help accommodate his political events schedule.

In a case detailed in the new documents, Zinke ordered a U.S. Park Police helicopter to take him and his chief of staff, Scott Hommel, to an emergency management exercise in Shepherdstown, W.Va., on June 21.

Zinke's staff justified the $8,000 flight by saying official business would prevent him leaving Washington before 2 p.m., too late to make the two-hour drive to the exercise, according to the documents.

The event that prevented Zinke from leaving before 2 p.m. was the swearing-in ceremony for

Rep. Greg Gianforte (R-Mont.), according to Zinke's official Interior calendar. Gianforte, who won a special election for Zinke's old seat in May after assaulting a reporter, contributed along with his wife $15,800 to Zinke's two congressional campaigns.

"Secretary Zinke's last engagement in Washington D.C. is at 2 p.m.," an Interior staffer wrote as justification for using the helicopter. "Driving to [the West Virginia event] would not enable him to be on time and fully participate as scheduled."

Interior defended the trips.

"The swearing in of the Congressman is absolutely an official event, as is emergency management training," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Thursday. "Shame on you for not respecting the office of a Member of Congress."

Zinke also ordered a Park Police helicopter to fly him and another Interior official to and from Yorktown, Va., on July 7 in order to be back in Washington in time for a 4 p.m. horseback ride with Pence. The trip cost about $6,250, according to the documents.

The horseback ride through Rock Creek Park also included Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and CMS Administrator Seema Verma, according to a post on Pence's Facebook page.

While in Yorktown, Zinke completed a walking tour of the local Revolutionary War battlefield and attended a boating industry roundtable discussion, according to the documents. The day before the trip, an Interior trip planner added to the schedule a 30-minute flyover of an area where Dominion Energy is building high-voltage electric transmission lines to run across the James River.

Interior officials originally estimated that driving to Yorktown would take about three hours, although one noted that "there is a major construction project on I-64, which will slow things down."

In an email to Interior travel scheduler Tim Nigborowicz, an Interior employee justified Zinke's using the helicopter instead of less expensive method by saying "the Secretary will be able to familiarize himself with the in-flight capabilities of an aircraft he is in charge of" and that the Park Police staff on board would "provide an added measure of security to the Secretary during his travel."

Interior officials certified ahead of the flight that Zinke's use of the helicopter would not compromise law enforcement obligations.

The Park Police helicopter, Eagle One, is deployed for medevac and emergency response situations around Washington, a part of its mission Zinke praised later that month.

"U.S. Park Service helicopter pilot and crew provided a life-saving medevac flight during the attack on members of Congress during baseball practice," Zinke said in the July 25 video celebrating American Heroes Week.

The former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL is already being investigated by the Interior Department's Inspector General and the independent Office of Special Counsel for his mixing of official travel and political events. Interior earlier this year released records documenting Zinke's use of charter and military aircraft, including a $12,000 flight from Las Vegas to Montana that allowed him to give a speech for a hockey team owned by a major campaign donor.

White House to send infrastructure principles to Congress in January Back

By Lauren Gardner | 12/07/2017 04:34 PM EDT

President Donald Trump intends to send Congress next month "a detailed infrastructure principles document" outlining his much-anticipated $1 trillion plan, a White House spokeswoman confirmed today.

Bloomberg first reported the plan's expected January release, though administration officials have for some time signaled that the principles document is expected early next year.

The plan is expected to incentivize state and local governments to take on a greater share of the costs of funding infrastructure projects, whether with their own money or through private-sector financing.

The $200 billion federal share of the package would be split into four buckets: funding for states and localities that promise to take on more of the financial burden of infrastructure building and upkeep; block grants for rural areas; existing federal loan programs; and money for "transformational" projects "that will truly change the face of our country," the spokeswoman said.

Shuster: Some Trump infrastructure ideas sound like 'devolution' Back

By Brianna Gurciullo | 12/07/2017 06:05 PM EDT

Rep. Bill Shuster said today that he hopes to meet with President Donald Trump next week to go over the specifics of a 2018 infrastructure package.

The White House plans to send lawmakers "a detailed infrastructure principles document" next month. Trump's plan is likely to include a program to give states and local governments incentives for picking up at least some of the tab for infrastructure projects.

"Well, I gotta see exactly what they mean by it," Shuster said, when asked about the Trump administration's anticipated approach. "Some of it sounds a little bit like devolution. And I've not talked to a single governor that wants the federal government not to have a role. It's a national transportation system."

Shuster met with House Speaker Paul Ryan earlier this week, and he said they had a "broad conversation about how we have to do" an infrastructure package.

"I told him I think it has to be a bipartisan bill," Shuster said. "There's realities in the Senate."

Some Republicans in the House also may end up opposing the bill over certain provisions, he added.

Shuster said he wants both chambers and the Trump administration to be "on the same page" in terms of principles. But Trump is going to have to lead the charge.

"We're going to write our own bill, but we need the presidential leadership," Shuster said.

Nelson staffer says infrastructure package should include direct funding for broadband

By John Hendel | 12/08/2017 11:33 AM EDT

A top staff member for Senate Commerce top Democrat Bill Nelson of Florida pushed back against the Trump administration's announcement Thursday that its infrastructure proposal will likely lack funding dedicated to broadband deployment.

"Streamlining, permitting and even tax incentives are helpful to some extent, but you've got to have direct funding to reach broadband, particularly in rural areas," Nelson communications counsel John Branscome said today at a Practising Law Institute conference. "We were hopeful this would be an area where there would be some direct funding."

David Goldman, a lawyer for House Energy and Commerce top Democrat Frank Pallone of New Jersey, invoked a House proposal slating $40 billion for broadband within the Commerce Department, H.R. 2479 \(115\).

The administration told POLITICO communities could decide on what funding goes to broadband. Congress ultimately must advance whatever is proposed.

Crystal Tully, policy director for Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune (R-S.D.), said funding may be secondary to infrastructure streamlining efforts, which the administration could factor into a bill. She said if there is funding, "I think it makes sense to house it under the FCC" or coordinate with the commission if housed under the Agriculture Department.

Lawmakers' broadband infrastructure legislation should become "more concrete" next year given the effort, House E&C GOP counsel Robin Colwell said, citing broadband as "top priority" next year and noting the Senate's 5G discussion draft. Branscome cited objections from multiple municipality groups to that draft and said pre-empting localities "should not be approached lightly." Thune hopes to introduce that bill by year's end.

Governors face decision time on AT&T-run nationwide public safety broadband network Back

Pressure is rising for the federal government and AT&T as they try to beat back heightening noise and doubts from competing providers and state officials as they try to fulfill a mandate to create a nationwide, interoperable public safety broadband communications network.

Such a network would let first responders easily communicate across state lines, the final unfulfilled 9/11 Commission recommendation that advanced into law in 2012 along with $7 billion to plan and implement it.

The endeavor, known as FirstNet, faced early scrutiny for potential conflicts of interest and other problematic operational issues from lawmakers and the GAO. But it eventually got its act together. The federal government put out a bid in January for a 25-year contract, won last spring by AT&T. The country's largest wireless carrier is now positioned to also leverage wireless spectrum allocated for FirstNet's public-safety purposes for commercial gain.

Without this network, first responders such as firefighters and police officers cannot always use their communications equipment to talk across state lines, which observers say could be a catastrophic limitation in a national disaster.

FirstNet, still yet to be built, now nears a critical milestone that will test its viability and the trust of the country's governors. It also tests AT&T's efficacy before the Trump administration, all while the company is suing the Justice Department over a merger with Time Warner. The game-time decisions for a score of governors approach as the wireless carrier and its government partners battle accusations from competing interests, such as Rivada Networks and Verizon, of strong-arming states into signing up through an opaque process. AT&T and government officials insist they remain open.

So far, 33 states and two territories pledged to join — more than half the country. New Hampshire just became the first state to reject the national network, a blow to FirstNet's efforts.

The rest face a Dec. 28 deadline to decide. If governors opt out, they must take control of spectrum allocated for the network and build an alternative that still lets that state's first responders communicate with others using the national network. A governor's failure to choose results in automatic opt-in to FirstNet. AT&T gave governors draft plans in June, months earlier than statutorily required.

Several big states, including California and Florida, remain uncommitted. Skeptics wonder about alternatives that could be cheaper for emergency communications and better for broadband coverage. New Hampshire Gov. Chris Sununu on Thursday announced his decision to opt out, choosing instead to work with Rivada. He earlier urged states to "pause" and said this week that opting out would give his state "a level of control" it wouldn't have if it opted in.

"If we have one, two, three states that opt out, I don't view it as making the national system necessarily weaker for everyone else," said Chris Sambar, AT&T's senior vice president overseeing FirstNet, in an interview.

Opting out will "make it weaker for those states," he said. "They're going to be behind by a couple years. They're going to be hoping that the bet they're making on different providers is going to work out."

Rivada Networks, a 13-year-old public safety communications provider, is actively lobbying governors to ditch FirstNet. It was eliminated from bidding on FirstNet's contract but now wants states to consider alternatives, joining with U.S. Cellular, the country's fifth-largest wireless carrier, in preparing plans. Macquarie Capital backs Rivada.

"New Hampshire ran the longest and most thorough opt-out review process in the country," Rivada CEO Declan Ganley said in a statement, anticipating other states joining New Hampshire by the Dec. 28 deadline.

AT&T offered caution and warned of "substantial risks" in New Hampshire choosing "an unproven vendor."

Sambar told POLITICO on Thursday that New Hampshire could still change its mind. He criticized Rivada as "scary" and pointed to Rivada's setbacks in court and abroad when trying to make its case.

"Absolutely, some states are going to opt out," Rivada Senior Vice President Brian Carney said before New Hampshire's announcement. "Once you get one, you could actually get to 10 pretty fast. There really is a subterranean revolt brewing here."

Capitol Hill lawmakers have come to generally back FirstNet. Last month, Rep. Mike Doyle (D-Pa.) questioned New Hampshire's interest in contracting with Rivada given that the company is not operating a live radio access network anywhere.

Others object to the nature of the choice being put to states.

FirstNet gave states opt-out terms in October that were "a surprise" to everyone, said Verizon Vice President Don Brittingham, whose company didn't bid on FirstNet's contract. In August, the carrier announced plans to build a separate network core — a hub for call routing and network access — for first responders.

Brittingham cautions the opt-out terms would force states "to do business with AT&T" and limit "the state to use AT&T's public safety services for 25 years."

FirstNet and AT&T dispute that characterization. Although the law requires opt-out states to connect to FirstNet's network, it doesn't restrict who can provide end-user services to public safety agencies, FirstNet spokeswoman Chrissie Coon said.

State activity is ramping up, with frenzied debate among state officials as they try to sort fact from fiction. Smaller states tended to be the ones opting in early, although Texas, home to AT&T, joined in September.

Decisions continue trickling in, with Ohio and Vermont joining FirstNet last week despite Vermont lawmakers writing with first responder concerns. A Florida panel recently recommended opt-in.

Last month, California issued a request for alternatives, raising prospects of FirstNet rejection. Brittingham suspects "strong interest" in California opt-out, while AT&T's Sambar remains optimistic, saying larger states "like us to go on a roadshow around the state" first.

Not making governors' decisions easier is an information war among industry players over basic facts.

Rivada wants to convince governors to opt out to buy another six months to assess alternatives. Rivada board member Martin O'Malley, a former Maryland governor, recently ripped FirstNet for "third-world thuggery."

"None of that stuff is reality," countered Sambar, urging governors to ignore company chatter. He touted facts FirstNet issued to battle "noise in the market," denying opt-out grants states an "extra 180 days."

POLITICO Pro Q&A: Rep. Don Bacon Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/08/2017 09:44 AM EDT

After nearly three decades in the Air Force, Rep. Don Bacon is eager to boost military funding, modernize the nation's nuclear arsenal and improve electronic warfare capabilities as a new member of the House Armed Services Committee.

A freshman Republican from Nebraska, Bacon is a retired Air Force brigadier general. His home state hosts Offutt Air Force Base, the headquarters of the U.S. Strategic Command. And, not surprisingly, he's an advocate of maintaining and modernizing each leg of the nuclear triad.

"It's good to have the survivability, the dependability and the versatility that the triad gives you, and if we lose any of those three I think we're a weaker country," Bacon says.

Lawmakers are "ducking our responsibility," he says, by refusing to vote on a new military authorization to govern the Pentagon's sprawling worldwide counterterrorism operations. So, along with three other military veterans from both parties, Bacon introduced a new five-year Authorization for the Use of Military Force against Al Qaeda, the Taliban and the Islamic State that would repeal the 2001 and 2002 war authorizations.

A former electronic warfare officer, Bacon was also named a co-chair of the Electronic Warfare Working Group, where he says he'll advocate for an improved doctrine and replacing old weapons platforms.

POLITICO sat down with the congressman in his Capitol Hill office to discuss the defense budget, nuclear modernization, electronic warfare and his other priorities.

This transcript has been edited for length and clarity.

You probably have a unique perspective coming to Congress as a one-star general.

My peers treat me well because of it, and I'm grateful to them. ... Even the chairman will call me General. "OK, General, it's your turn."

So almost a year into your first term, how has your time been in the House and why did you choose House Armed Services?

Well, I wanted to use my 30, nearly 30 years' experience to advocate for readiness, modernization of our military.

In the '80s and '90s when I came in, there was zero — zero — doubt that we had the best military. We had the best training. Our equipment was really new. The F-15s, F-16s were at that point five to eight years old, you know, when I came in. Today, those same aircraft are flying. They're 25 to 30 years old.

We've got 60-year-old B-52s, 60-year-old tankers. And we're flying one-third of the hours, the captains are today, than what I flew as a captain. ... Just so much evidence that we have declined in our training, in our readiness and the modernization upkeep.

I just feel like I bring a level of experience that's helpful for the HASC and the House. ... I've commanded five times. I've led people in combat. I've been to people's houses talking about the loss of a loved one. ... That's not a bad experience, either. I don't think we should use our military too flippantly. And I think because there's a cost whenever we lose someone. So I think I bring that perspective as well.

An increasing number of Armed Services members have said there can't be another continuing resolution to fund defense, and I believe you were one of them.

I voted with the chairman on that. I think he's right.

So, do you think more Republicans who are concerned about defense are going to vote against another short-term funding measure?

I think it's gonna grow. ... We've done 31 CRs the last 10 years. ... So, I voted against that bill. I wanted to support disaster relief. I thought that was a good bill. But when you attach it to a CR, it doesn't make sense. ...

... There's a tug of war in the Republican conference. You have the budget hawks and the military hawks. I like to think I'm both because I think they're both important. But I don't think our military can keep being passed over with these CRs. ... We can't keep kicking the can down the road.

You're a co-sponsor of a new AUMF with veterans from both parties. Why do you think now is the time to debate and pass a new authorization, given everything else that's on Congress' plate?

It may need to happen after tax reform, I got that, but I think Article I responsibilities are clear. ... My gut tells me that Congress doesn't want to deal with a hard vote on it. And I think some people would rather not say yes or no to what we're doing in Syria or in Africa right now.

I just think Congress has a role in giving our ... general consent to the executive to do these operations. I support them, frankly, but one-fourth of our Congress was there on 9/11. ... And I think we're ducking our responsibility to not do it. So, that's what motivated me.

It's too much of a blank check. ... I hear a lot of folks that don't want to take that vote because I think if things go bad, they say, "I didn't vote for it," or if things go great, "I'm for it." ... People have to show some responsibility to this thing, our elected members, anyway, in Congress.

What do you think about potential limits on a new AUMF for time or geography?

I support that there should be a time limit, and if it comes up then ... we vote again. ... I think, too, we should be able to say where force should be used. I think it's constitutional.

Now, having said that, I support [Defense] Secretary [Jim] Mattis and what he wants to use the force for, and I would be inclined to give him that authorization. ... But I think Congress should lay out the boundaries, and the executive branch should say what they want to do, and we should be able to give them authorization or not. To do otherwise, we're skirting our responsibility.

The Congressional Budget Office recently estimated that modernizing the nuclear triad would cost more than $1 trillion over the next 30 years. Does that cost make you concerned about the effort to completely overhaul our nuclear weapons?

I am concerned about the cost, but this is what happens when you take a holiday from modernization. Since we've been in the Middle East, we've put so much ... in our operations there that we've short-changed modernization. Now we have this huge bill, but I think our deterrence is critically important.

I know there were some debates during the NDAA process last cycle, someone from the other side of the aisle wanted to ... take away one of the legs of the triad. ... And I oppose it. I think our ICBMs are an important part. ... It's the most dependable part of our deterrence.

They're always on alert and once you get them in they're the cheapest to maintain. But, yes, it costs a little money to put new ones in, and that's where we're at with the Minuteman III; [it's] become obsolete. But I think our bombers give us the most versatility and our submarines give us the most survivability.

It's good to have the survivability, the dependability and the versatility that the triad gives you. And if we lose any of those three, I think we're a weaker country.

What do you want to see from of the nuclear posture and missile defense reviews the Pentagon is conducting?

Well, I'd like to see how we can stretch the modernization for ICBMs and still get it done. I think the subs, we're going to have to spend it at a certain rate. You can't stretch it out. And I think you could say the same thing with our B-2 bomber.

The ICBMs, I think we can keep investing in those Minuteman IIIs. But at some point, they've got to be replaced as well. So, how do we stretch that out and be able to maintain a triad? ...

That would be how I would view it.

In the end, we've got to make sure we've got a survivable nuclear deterrent. ... We have to verify through this review that we're able to sustain that.

There's a part that we're missing. It's the nuclear command and control. ... I used to fly in a Looking Glass mission, which is [a] Navy plane now. ... There's the Navy E-6. They're on alert at all times, and we have a one-star or a general officer always on alert. If things got bad with Russia or China, whomever, we'd take off in five minutes and you can launch all the nuclear weapons from the plane if STRATCOM can't communicate.

The nuclear command and control is antiquated. That bothers me. So that's got to be part of our modernization. ... You want to ensure you have that command and control for the president, that four-star down to the forces.

You were also just named a co-chair of the Electronic Warfare Caucus. What will the key issues be for you there, and how will you be an advocate on the issue in Congress?

In the '90s, we had the premiere EW capability. We had a great doctrine, strategy. We had great weapons systems. And we let it atrophy. ... Our doctrine's wrong. ... For example, the electromagnetic spectrum's a physical spectrum. It's an actual domain, just like air is and space, ground and sea.

I think we're starting to get the people right. We've got a one-star now that's in DoD that's in charge of EW, what used to be a colonel. When I was a captain, it was a two-star that used to run EW programs. So, I think we're starting to get the manning emphasis correct.

But the weapons systems are old. EC-130s are a 1973 aircraft. Original engines, old wings. ... We need our Compass Call replacement, and I'm going to support it. The Navy's gone to the EF-18. ... That's gonna give us some time there. But I'm going to support EW investments is what it comes down to, so that's the main thing that I can help out with.

Right now, I'd say we're getting a C in a lot of those things. I don't think we're at the A level. ... Maybe five years ago I would've gave us a D or a D-minus. So, I think we're getting it better.

Are there any other priorities you'd like to discuss?

You know, our military Gold Star spouses, if they remarry, they lose access to base. They don't get access to the [exchange] or commissary, even if they have dependent children from the spouse who got killed in action.

My bill [which passed the House] gives Gold Star spouses lifetime access to the base. And while they have dependent children, they can have access to the BX and commissary.

It's a small step forward, but I think it's right. I've talked to so many Gold Star spouses and they feel disenfranchised after their spouse gets killed. ... So, I want to fix that.

And this bill doesn't fix this next thing, but I think the follow-on bill [will]. A lot of our Gold Star spouses get about $1,000 a month. ... But if they remarry, they lose it. ... That's gonna be my follow-on push. I think we put our spouses under a lot of pressure. They want to do the right thing. They met somebody they want to marry, but they're afraid of the impact on their kids. ... They shouldn't have to feel that way.

Afghanistan. ... I think the president's taking us on the right path with that, the right balance. I don't think we can withdraw, but I don't think we can be doing this big nation-building either. So, I think we've got the right amount of forces to prevent Taliban from taking over Kabul. But if we pulled out, I think Taliban take over Afghanistan in two years and we'll be back to a 9/11 situation.

I generally agree with where they're going with the world hot spots right now. I had troubles with the Iran agreement. ... My concern is in 10 years, they're going to be a recognized nuclear state, and I think that's unacceptable.

North Korea. We don't want a war. ... We've got a lot of work we can do with China. ... In fact, I think we've got to compel them to do more. I think there's ways to do it. But also Japan. I think we can use Japan, in a good way, by helping them arm themselves. ...

... I think the president's sort of doing those things. That's what I'm seeing. So, I think that, despite the Twitter and ... all the hubbub you see, I think the actual execution, I feel comfortable with.

Jobs growth stays strong with 228,000 rise Back

By Ian Kullgren | 12/08/2017 08:48 AM EDT

Job creation stayed strong in November, the government reported Friday, eliminating any lingering worries about September's net job losses due to hurricanes in Texas and Florida.

The Labor Department reported 228,000 new jobs in November, down from October's 244,000 but notably higher than job growth during the months preceding September. October's gains, the largest of Trump's presidency, were, economists cautioned, inflated by the previous month's weather disruptions.

Friday's report demonstrated that the economy is still expanding at a steady clip in the ninth year of recovery. White House Press Secretary Sarah Sanders said it showed that "President Trump's bold economic vision continues to pay off," and Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta said it reflected "optimism about the pro-growth, pro-jobs policies being advanced by President Trump's Administration."

"The job market and the economy are strong," said Mark Zandi, the chief economist for Moody's Analytics. "It would be pretty hard to derail."

The November unemployment was 4.1 percent, the jobs report showed, unchanged from October. Average hourly private-sector earnings rose 2.5 percent in October over the previous year. In October, they were up 2.3 percent.

The release comes as Trump and congressional Republicans put final touches on a tax bill that will slash the corporate tax rate and redraw tax brackets for individuals.

"The labor market is in great shape. Tax cuts should be used when the economy needs tax cuts and it doesn't need tax cuts right now," Joel Naroff, the chief economist at Naroff Economic Advisors, told Reuters.

Experts expect the tax break to give the economy a short-term boost that will likely level off by 2020.

"This may help the Rs for the 2018 election, but it will really complicate the election in 2020," Zandi said.

Labor force participation was unchanged from October's 62.7 percent and still close to its lowest level since the 1970s.

Congress passes flood insurance extension Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/07/2017 06:20 PM EDT

The House and Senate today passed a temporary government funding bill that would keep the National Flood Insurance Program fully operational until Dec. 22.

It was the latest stopgap extension for the program as senators struggled to finalize plans for a long-term reauthorization and overhaul.

WHAT'S NEXT: The fate of the NFIP is expected to stay coupled with government funding extensions as negotiations continue.

Ethics Committee launches investigation into Farenthold sexual harassment allegations

By Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan | 12/07/2017 04:13 PM EDT

The House Ethics Committee launched an investigation into Rep. Blake Farenthold over allegations that he sexually harassed a former aide and then retaliated against her when she complained about it.

The committee said new evidence in the matter, which was first reviewed in 2015, warranted an investigation. Earlier Thursday, the panel said it was seeking an interview with Lauren Greene, the former aide who says she was sexually harassed by the Texas Republican.

Greene received an $84,000, taxpayer-funded settlement after she sued Farenthold in December 2014 over allegations of gender discrimination, sexual harassment and creating a hostile work environment.

Even though the Office of Congressional Ethics cleared Farenthold, the Ethics Committee has continued to look into the matter.

"The Committee on Ethics does not appear to be letting it lie with the Office of Congressional Ethics' recommendation not to pursue further," said Greene's attorney, Les Alderman of Alderman, Devorsetz & Hora PLLC.

Alderman said Ethics Committee staff has called him twice in the past two days seeking to schedule Greene to appear before the panel. "They are actively seeking Lauren's cooperation with their ongoing investigation."

Alderman said they are considering the request but did not know whether Greene would testify.

The ethics panel had reached out to interview Greene more than a year ago. But Greene, who has tried to move on with her life since leaving Farenthold's office, declined to participate, hoping to put the matter behind her.

However, after Greene spoke with POLITICO and CNN this week about being blackballed following her allegations, the Ethics Committee reached out again.

Alderman said Greene cooperated with OCE during its review and told them everything she had alleged in her court filing. Alderman did not know why OCE dismissed the case.

Farenthold's spokeswoman said he has voluntarily testified before Ethics and OCE.

"Congressman Farenthold has testified before both the Office of Congressional Ethics and the Ethics Committee of the House," said Stacey Daniels, Farenthold's spokeswoman. "He has done so voluntarily, answering all of their questions."

OCE's decision not to ask for a full investigation into Greene's allegations might be all that's protecting Farenthold from the same fate as Democratic Sen. Al Franken of Minnesota and Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, both of whom resigned this week in the growing sexual-harassment scandal.

Farenthold, Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and other GOP leaders have referenced the OCE decision repeatedly whenever Democrats raise the Texas Republican's case.

Farenthold and Greene were interviewed by OCE when during its investigation. OCE declined to comment on the Farenthold case.

In her lawsuit, Greene claimed another Farenthold aide told her the lawmaker said he had "sexual fantasies" and "wet dreams" about Greene. She also said Farenthold "regularly drank to excess" and told her in February 2014 that he was "estranged from his wife and had not had sex with her in years."

When she complained about comments Farenthold and a male staffer made to her, Greene said the congressman improperly fired her. She filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia, but the case was later dropped after both parties reached their settlement, which was not revealed until last week.

Pentagon pleads for a full appropriations bill on eve of CR expiration Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 12/07/2017 02:11 PM EDT

As Congress considers a new two-week continuing spending resolution, H.J. Res. 123 \(115\), Pentagon officials pleaded today for a fiscal 2018 appropriations bill that can give the department budget certainty.

The federal government is currently operating on a continuing resolution that expires Friday, forcing a government shutdown unless lawmakers approve a new one, now being set for Dec. 22.

But even that would affect the military's ability to perform maintenance and buy more equipment, said Pentagon Comptroller David Norquist.

"A CR by its very nature is disruptive," he explained. "Every time you add to it, it creates more challenges."

The Pentagon has operated under a CR for 1,081 days over the past nine years, Pentagon spokeswoman Dana White said.

One of the biggest priorities for the Defense Department is increasing its supply of munitions — something that can't happen under a continuing resolution, Norquist said.

The impact would be even more severe if the government shuts down. Members of the military would still have to report to work, but wouldn't be paid until the shutdown ends.

That includes troops serving overseas or in combat. Civilians with essential jobs would also have to report to work, while those with nonessential jobs would stay home. Non-critical maintenance also would grind to a halt, putting future work behind schedule.

"I cannot emphasize enough how destructive a shutdown is," Norquist said.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: GOP gleeful over Trump's tribute to earmarks — Appropriators ponder four-week stopgap — Womack for the win
Date: Wednesday, January 10, 2018 5:23:32 PM

HELP FROM ON HIGH: Congressional Republicans are giving President Donald Trump a big thumbs-up for his unabashed endorsement of earmarks.

Appropriators are hoping Trump's two-minute tangent on Tuesday will lend support as the broader GOP conference considers whether to bring back the practice. Longtime defenders of those special projects are even pushing a new Trump-inspired argument — that reviving the era of earmarks, under strict guidelines, would actually clean up "the swamp" by holding people accountable, as Sarah explains today.

Why so taboo? The president's unexpected tribute was unusual for many reasons. Not only is he violating years of party orthodoxy, but he's also backing a move that would probably weaken the power of his own agencies. "Usually the administration doesn't promote that," Rep. Robert Aderholt (R-Ala.) said. And as self-described budget guru Stan Collender told us today: "This is an agenda that would make a Democrat blush."

Push for productivity: When the House Rules Committee holds its hearing on the issue a week from today, members won't be plotting a return to Congress' old habits. Instead, lawmakers of both parties will argue that it could grease the skids for government projects now choked off by bureaucratic red tape. House Speaker Paul Ryan specifically cited efforts of the Army Corps of Engineers, which he said has "not been up to snuff about getting its job done."

Freedom Caucus backer: Even some Republicans who supported the 2011 earmarks ban are on board. Rep. Louie Gohmert (R-Texas) told Fox News that the system was "badly abused" back then, but he now sees a chance to restore Congress' power of the purse. "We're the ones that should be putting the specific line-items in that appropriations bill as to where that money goes," Gohmert argues.

GOOD WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON! Yes, it's only hump day. Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

PROGRAMMING NOTE: Budget & Appropriations Brief will not publish on Monday, Jan. 15. Our next Budget & Appropriations Brief newsletter will publish on Tuesday, Jan. 16. Please continue to follow Pro Budget issues here.

Doc of the day — In an open letter today, more than two dozen conservative groups warned lawmakers against bringing back earmarks.

#DailyBudgetFact — The federal government spent $807.8 billion on Social Security alone in 2013, up from $55 billion in 1974, according to CBO. Medicare spending ballooned to $585.3 billion per year, from $10.7 billion, over the same timeframe.

APPROPRIATIONS

PRE-PRESIDENT'S-DAY PRESENT? Less than 10 days away from the next shutdown deadline, lawmakers have started to kick around end dates for yet another stopgap. Most rumored: Feb. 16. That would give legislators exactly four weeks to pull together an omnibus after the next patch expires on Jan. 19. And although 28 days seems like plenty of time now, that window could appear pretty skimpy if leaders don't soon strike a deal on budget caps.

Not set in stone: We floated the Feb. 16 idea to House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen today, but the spending chief didn't bite. "I don't think any decision's been made," he said. The New Jersey Republican did say, however, that he suspects a deal on funding the Children's Health Insurance Program "will have to be" included in the Jan. 19 bill to garner enough support for kicking the can past next week.

BUDGET

FRONT RUNNER FOR THE WIN: No surprise, Rep. Steve Womack (R-Ark.) has sealed the deal on the gavel long assumed to be his. After each of the three candidates delivered 30-minute presentations before the Republican Steering Committee, the panel endorsed the Arkansas Republican for Budget Committee chairman, as we reported Tuesday night. Now, the full House GOP Conference must give its blessing. The victor's statement: "I'm excited for the chance to lead such an important committee in pursuit of a budget resolution that will address our nation's priorities while putting America on a sustainable fiscal path."

WORK-AROUND FOR WORK REQUIREMENTS: The odds of a fiscal 2018 budget reconciliation bill are looking slim, which isn't great news for the GOP's welfare reform push. But the White House appears to be moving ahead on a separate track. The Trump administration is expected to issue guidance to state officials as soon as this week on the first-ever work requirements for Medicaid, Rachana Pradhan reports. At least 10 states are already seeking federal approval to tie benefits to employment or other job-related activities.

NEW YEAR, NEW ROSTER: For prominent display in your cubicle, our DataPoint team has created an updated cheat sheet of the faces of the Senate Budget Committee, with the smiling mug of newly assigned Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.). Check it out. Want to add DataPoint to your Pro account? Learn more.

APPROPRIATIONS

STILL AT THE DRAWING BOARD: Our colleague Seung Min Kim pretty much summed up the DACA state of play in this tweet: "We're still working!!! — Senate immigration group."

Try to keep up: After a freewheeling chat at the White House on Tuesday, lawmakers are back almost exactly where they started. It's up to the four party deputies — Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn and House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, plus Senate Democratic Whip Dick Durbin and House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer — to finalize an immigration deal in the next nine days. And they now have to factor in a surprise legal decision that temporarily keeps Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program in place, as Seung Min explains.

I hear you: Senate Democrats used a closed-door meeting with Defense Secretary Jim Mattis this week to push their case for budget parity. And while he may not agree, lawmakers said at least he understands. "We get this position, and he gets ours," Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) told

Connor O'Brien.

TAX

THE COST OF CHANGE: The IRS will need an extra $495 million in funding for fiscal 2018 and 2019 to implement the new tax law, H.R. 1 \(115\), the agency's in-house watchdog said in her annual report to Congress today, per Bernie Becker. In the so-called "Purple Book," National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson also offered 50 new recommendations to lawmakers seeking to reorganize the agency's operations.

Special requests: Adding pressure, the IRS is being encouraged to take as little as possible out of paychecks so people will see big increases in their take-home pay ahead of this year's midterm elections, Brian Faler reports. And lawmakers are asking the agency to let taxpayers deduct all their prepaid 2018 property taxes from their filings this year, no matter whether they've received their 2018 property tax bills or not, Aaron Lorenzo explains.

HEALTH CARE

BACK AGAIN: The Obamacare stabilization bill is rising from last year's legislative graveyard. After renewed talks this week, Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) are aiming for a bill that can wind up in the next omnibus, Adam Cancryn reports today. The package would likely combine the existing Alexander-Murray measure with another bipartisan agreement from Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) on reinsurance.

HOSTAGE SEASON: In a familiar refrain, top GOP senators now say children's health funding shouldn't be held "hostage" to a caps deal, Rachana reports. "Nothing should prevent enactment of a five-year KIDS Act reauthorization before Jan. 19 — regardless of a budgetary caps agreement," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said.

DEFENSE

ADDING UP THE AUDIT: Keeping tabs on spending is expensive. As Connor reports, Comptroller David Norquist estimated today that the Pentagon's first-ever audit will cost about $367 million to carry out and another $551 million to fix identified issues. Of that, $181 million will go to contract costs for independent accounting firms and $186 million for related infrastructure. The cost is small, Norquist said, compared to the overall budget and is better than the alternative of "operating in ignorance of the problem."

USE IT OR LOSE IT: At this point, it will be well into the second quarter of the fiscal year (at least) before federal agencies get updated funding levels. And House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) is particularly concerned the Pentagon won't be able to effectively spend extra money as we get closer to Sept. 30, Connor reports. So he's proposing that Congress consider allowing the Defense Department to spend some money beyond the end of the fiscal year, to make sure money doesn't "just sit there" or get spent "foolishly."

LITERALLY, A CRASH COURSE: The Navy needs more ships or fewer responsibilities to prevent the kind of crashes that happened over the last year, the head of surface forces says. Vice Adm. Thomas Rowden said this week that the fleet is "stretched" and that sailors say they need more time to maintain gear, brush up on skills and "unwind," Jacqueline Klimas

reports.

TREASURY

A TAD SMALLER PAYOUT: The steady climb of U.S. interest rates has resulted in a slight decline in profits to the Treasury, Victoria Guida explains. The Federal Reserve has sent roughly $80.2 billion back, marking a decline of $11.7 billion last year.

INFRASTRUCTURE

DON'T HOLD YOUR BREATH: This was supposed to be the month for debuting the White House's infrastructure plan. But the Trump administration doesn't seem so wedded to a January delivery these days, Brianna Gurciullo and Lauren Gardner explain.

Pre-plan plan: In the meantime, lawmakers aren't holding back on offering their own ideas. The bipartisan Problem Solvers Caucus releases its infrastructure plan today, hoping to "shape the conversation" ahead of the White House blueprint, Tanya Snyder reports. The caucus' report recommends increasing the gas tax and indexing it to inflation, as well as subjecting highway projects over $20 million to the same life cycle assessments as transit projects.

Picking up momentum? Although raising the gas tax has long been seen as a dead idea in Washington, the concept has been getting a lot of love lately. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue reiterated support today for the revenue-raiser, Brianna reports. And the Chamber chief also talked a little about the growth of entitlement programs, per Victoria.

Trump thrills some Republicans with endorsement of earmarks Back

When Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart found out that President Donald Trump had endorsed earmarks on national television, the 15-year House veteran fist-pumped into the air.

"Am I smiling when I'm not supposed to?" the Florida Republican told reporters, chuckling.

In a week consumed by infighting over immigration, it was Trump's unexpected affirmation of pork-barrel spending that had Washington spinning.

Trump's improvised tribute to earmarks Tuesday lasted just two minutes after an unrelated White House meeting, but the political effects could be far-reaching as Congress mulls whether to allow a revival.

Trump reminisced in seeming familiarity with Congress that in the old days, lawmakers of both parties "went out to dinner at night, and they all got along, and they passed bills" — a vastly different portrait from today's gridlock. Earmarks, he suggested, could "get this country really rolling again."

The chances of ending the 2011 ban are dim in a midterm election year with the GOP's congressional majorities at stake. But some lawmakers have hope now that a key GOP committee is planning its first set of hearings on the issue in years. And House GOP leaders recently moved to restart a debate on earmarks that has been put on hold since fall 2016 in the wake of Trump's "drain the swamp" electoral victory.

Trump's latest taboo-busting position pits him against years of GOP orthodoxy, vexing powerful conservatives who helped propel him to the presidency. Heritage Action called it "nearly unthinkable."

"If Republicans bring back earmarks, then it virtually guarantees that they will lose the House," Club for Growth President David McIntosh said in a statement Tuesday.

But the president also gave voice to a nostalgia that's shared by many long-serving members of Congress, even if they don't often say it out loud.

"Maybe they'll breathe life into the whole idea. I'm all for earmarks," said House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.), whose panel would be ground zero for a revival of pet projects. Frelinghuysen has long argued that it's better for lawmakers to submit requests through his committee, rather than air-dropping them into spending bills through eleventh-hour amendments.

Rep. Robert Aderholt, who has served since 1997, was happily surprised to hear Trump's support, especially since it would empower Congress over executive agencies. "Usually the administration doesn't promote that," he said.

A longtime member of the Appropriations Committee, Aderholt said he could back a return to earmarks "as long as it's done on a fair and transparent basis." He said it's better for elected representatives to dole out government cash, rather than "a group of bureaucrats a thousand miles away."

"The misnomer about that is that it is a 'swamp' issue," the Alabama Republican said. "You could make the argument that this is more getting rid of the swamp, holding people accountable."

Republicans insist it wouldn't be a return to Congress' old habits. Instead, they argue, it could grease the skids for government projects now choked off by bureaucratic red tape. Speaker Paul Ryan specifically cited the Army Corps of Engineers, which he said has "not been up to snuff about getting its job done."

"I want our members to have conversations," he told reporters Tuesday.

Meanwhile, Democrats reeled at Trump's comments.

"He's supposed to be a conservative, he's a GOP president, and he's talking openly about, 'Let's get them back,'" said Stan Collender, a longtime observer of the budget process and former Democratic budget staffer. "No Democrat would get away with this."

Democrats are unlikely to back any push to bring back earmarks in an election year, though plenty of members, particularly appropriators, support it.

"I'm for earmarks, I've made that pretty clear publicly," Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the second-highest-ranking House Democrat, told reporters Wednesday. He then rattled off a list of spending rules that have been tightened over the last decade.

"I believe it is the responsibility of the Congress of the United States to appropriate money for objects that it believes are in the best interests of their communities and their country," Hoyer said, adding that he plans to testify at next week's House Rules Committee hearing.

Line-item expenditures — also known as earmarks — were banned after a series of spending scandals that even led to jail time for one member.

Former GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham was sentenced in 2006 to eight years in prison for accepting millions of dollars in bribes from defense contractors.

Two years later, lawmakers came under fire for the so-called Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska. The $200 million expenditure exploded onto the national stage with the help of the 2008 GOP presidential ticket, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and then-Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin.

Democrats launched reforms when they won control of both chambers in 2006, attempting to rein in funding for what were known as lawmakers' "pet projects." Then-Speaker Nancy Pelosi instituted a one-year moratorium in 2007.

But the drastic action came in 2011, when Republicans decisively won back their House majority. (The push was led by then-Speaker John Boehner, who proudly refused earmarks throughout his 21-year span in Washington.)

Weeks after the election, GOP leaders vowed to ban earmarks entirely — one-upping their Democratic counterparts who had sought to ban earmarks only for projects that benefited private companies. Public and nonprofit-driven projects would still be allowed.

Both parties helped increase scrutiny of the appropriations process in the late 1990s and early 2000s, at the same time that Congress was financing more special projects through spending bills.

In 1994, there were fewer than 2,000 earmarks. By 2005, there were about 14,000, according to PolitiFact.

Congressional leaders doled out the spending perks to members for any number of reasons: to reward party loyalty, to secure support for unrelated bills or to simply keep the government open.

Members of the powerful House spending panel — who have witnessed the decline of "regular order" in appropriations over the last decade — are particularly keen to restore the practice.

With a perpetual shortage of votes for spending legislation, both Democrats and Republicans acknowledge that lawmakers once had a vested interest in those bills. Some have likened the 2011 ban to the Prohibition era, predicting that leadership will ultimately feel pressured to reverse course.

Now Trump has lent his support.

"Our system lends itself to not getting things done, and I hear so much about earmarks — the old earmark system — how there was a great friendliness when you had earmarks," he said.

Womack clinches endorsement for House Budget chairmanship Back

By Rachael Bade, Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 01/09/2018 08:29 PM EDT

Rep. Steve Womack won initial backing to chair the House Budget Committee, securing an endorsement from the Republican Steering Committee.

House Speaker Paul Ryan announced the decision in a statement late this evening.

Now the full House GOP Conference will vote on the pick to replace Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.), as she steps down to focus on her gubernatorial bid.

Womack said in a statement that he welcomed the "huge challenge" of taking the helm. "I'm excited for the chance to lead such an important committee in pursuit of a budget resolution that will address our nation's priorities while putting America on a sustainable fiscal path," he said.

The Arkansas Republican, who had been seen as a shoo-in for the post, beat out Rob Woodall of Georgia and Bill Johnson of Ohio for the recommendation.

If officially chosen, Womack is expected to focus on cutting mandatory spending, to the delight of the committee's most fiscally conservative members.

Womack could give up the gavel as soon as next year since he's in line for a subcommittee chairmanship on the House Appropriations Committee. His two competitors argued during the run-up to the Steering Committee decision that they would be "stable" choices likely to stick around to run the Budget Committee, which has had three chairmen during the past year.

Dreamer talks still jumbled after Trump's freewheeling summit Back

By Seung Min Kim, Heather Caygle, Ted Hesson and Rachael Bade | 01/09/2018 08:03 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's freewheeling, televised — and, at times, incoherent — immigration meeting with lawmakers Tuesday accomplished one thing at least, according to attendees: They agreed on what they would try to agree on.

Yet even that tentative outline is prompting pushback from other members who want to tug a final deal on Dreamers to the right or left — further complicating prospects for an agreement that can be signed into law before the young undocumented immigrants begin losing legal protections en masse in March.

Numerous attendees of the highly anticipated White House meeting left assured that a deal to address the fate of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program would include four main parts: legal status for Dreamers, more robust border security, an overhaul of family-based immigration laws and a change to a controversial visa lottery program. That only those elements were included was a clear signal to conservatives, who are demanding more expansive enforcement provisions in any fix to the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program Trump is killing.

"Kevin McCarthy was the one who said, 'All right, it's down to four things, right? DACA and the other three things?'" said Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois, the top negotiator for Senate Democrats, referring to the Republican House majority leader. "And we all agreed."

Added Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.): "Those are the outlines of what a potential deal could be. Now, what in fact takes place as it relates to each of those elements is incredibly important."

The White House concurred, with press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders saying the group "reached an agreement to negotiate legislation that accomplishes critically needed reforms in four high-priority areas: border security, chain migration, the visa lottery and the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals policy."

But some House Democrats say they won't accept those parameters. They argue Democrats are agreeing only to legalize the Dreamers now, and that debates over "chain migration" and the diversity visa lottery need to happen later.

"The statement issued by the White House is inaccurate," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Meanwhile, there's also a restive faction of House Republicans pushing their leadership to take a hard line early in the immigration fight, worried that the more moderate Senate will ultimately jam their chamber with a Dreamer deal they can't accept.

The fact that a mere deal to discuss a deal is stoking such consternation on Capitol Hill illustrates the difficult predicament that lawmakers — not to mention the Dreamers themselves — face in coming up with a solution. And yet it's not all that surprising that the talks have narrowed after the White House immigration meeting, as a bipartisan group of senators had already been focusing on those four core areas.

The group primarily includes Durbin and Sens. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), Cory Gardner (R-Colo.), Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.); the senators have yet to reach an agreement, although they have been working feverishly for weeks discussing proposals.

For example, the senators have debated whether to effectively dump the visa lottery — which doles out about 50,000 green cards annually to people from countries with traditionally low rates of immigration — by reallocating those visas to immigrants who have benefited from Temporary Protected Status programs that the Trump administration is terminating. Separately, there appears to be a more notable struggle over chain migration, with senators disagreeing on whether restrictions on sponsoring relatives should apply just to the Dreamers or to a larger immigrant population.

It's still unclear whether the senators will be able to reach an agreement they can successfully sell to Democrats and Republicans in the Senate, not to mention a more conservative House. But defining the mere outlines of a deal was at least a step closer to a final fix, senators said.

"We did make some progress on it today," Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.) said. "The main thing was, let's define out the basis of scope. Let's break down who's going to do what, and let's start the process, because the hard negotiation is obviously going to be in smaller groups."

Other Senate Republicans were encouraged that Trump said his long-coveted border wall with Mexico doesn't have to cover the entire, 2,000-mile boundary. "We've been begging him to say this kind of stuff before," Flake said. "It's only about [700] or 800 miles total. Some of that is replacement. And more importantly, the wall is really a fence."

But later Tuesday, discussion of the bipartisan summit only fueled more dissension among the Democratic ranks.

Democrats spilled out of a more than hourlong meeting in the office of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) Tuesday afternoon differing over what had been decided at the White House as well as what they would entertain in upcoming negotiations.

Durbin and Hoyer left the meeting to huddle one-on-one in a separate room, only to emerge with contradictory talking points.

Hoyer maintained that McCarthy suggested those four areas as the basis for a bipartisan deal during the White House meeting, but that Democrats never agreed to those terms and still haven't. Durbin, meanwhile, didn't dispute his earlier comments that those four issues were on the table, telling reporters the "devil is in the details."

"There are ways to do things that are painless and ways that are fatal," Durbin said. "So you try to find painless alternatives."

Other Democrats also left the meeting with different stances: Sen. Tammy Duckworth of Illinois suggested they were open to discussing changes to family-based immigration and the visa lottery, while Sen. Kamala Harris and Rep. Linda Sanchez of California said those discussions should be part of broader immigration reform and not attached to a DACA deal.

"I don't think a whole lot of folks in that room really even understand, and I mean no disrespect to them, it's not their areas of expertise, really what [chain migration] means. ... The current law allows for family reunification," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-N.M.), chairwoman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, who successfully crashed the White House meeting after not receiving an invite. "And the same thing with diversity visas. When you really think about who's getting those diversity visas, it has absolutely nothing to do with the issue we're trying to address with DACA recipients, and we're making that case."

When told some House Democrats were disputing even the parameters of an agreement, a frustrated Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.) responded: "There is no misunderstanding."

"There were four issues that were agreed to be part of the DACA deal. ... That was what the whole thing was about!" said Diaz-Balart, who also attended the White House meeting. "We have a real opportunity to get this done as long as folks don't start backtracking from what was talked about today."

But even if House Democrats ultimately get on board, there's trouble brewing among the House GOP.

Senior House Republicans used a closed-door conference meeting earlier Tuesday to begin pressuring Speaker Paul Ryan and his top lieutenants to take a harder line on immigration. In particular, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte of Virginia urged leaders to put a conservative DACA bill he will introduce Wednesday on the floor for a vote. It addresses some of the provisions being discussed in the immigration talks, but goes further by changing policies governing unaccompanied child migrants and asylum seekers.

House GOP leaders aren't sure the bill can pass and worry about upending the bipartisan discussions going on in the Senate. But that's unlikely to quell demands from rank-and-file Republicans that they pass a conservative solution instead of waiting on a bipartisan Senate deal.

"There's not a commitment [to a vote] yet, but this is the only bill that can unify the people," insisted Rep. Raúl Labrador (R-Idaho), who helped Goodlatte write the bill, which would surely be rejected by the Senate. "We can get to 218."

DACA reinstatement throws lawmakers for a loop Back

By Seung Min Kim | 01/10/2018 12:54 PM EDT

Lawmakers from both parties insisted Wednesday that they're still racing to reach a deal on Dreamers — despite a court ruling the night before temporarily reinstating the immigration program that President Donald Trump is trying to shut down.

A federal judge on Tuesday blocked Trump's effort to completely shut down the Obama-era initiative known Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals — a ruling that, in theory, will allow people who have already obtained DACA permits in the past to renew them. The program allows undocumented immigrants who were brought to the country as children to obtain work permits and remain in the country.

Democrats and immigration advocates worry the Trump administration will quickly appeal the decision and prevail. Meanwhile, Republicans dispute the findings of the judge, San Francisco-based U.S. District Court judge William Alsup, and believe the White House will win an appeal.

"It doesn't change the need for us to act," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas). "I don't think it relieves the anxiety of the DACA recipients that something is gonna happen. It really just adds additional uncertainty, I think, into the mix. So we're plowing ahead like we discussed yesterday at the White House."

Cornyn is one of four top lawmakers — the others include Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) — who are trying to meet with administration officials later Wednesday to sketch out next steps on an immigration deal in Congress.

Key Senate Democrats also stressed that Congress still needs to press for a Dreamers deal.

"Let me be very clear: The ruling last night in no way diminishes the urgency of resolving the DACA issue," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) said Wednesday morning. "The only way to guarantee the legal status for Dreamers is to pass DACA protections into law and do it now."

Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) sounded less confident that the ruling wouldn't ease pressure on Congress, which often needs a deadline to act.

"I hope it doesn't" lessen the urgency on Congress, Flake said of the ruling. "But I am worried."

The substance of the judge's ruling — which included Alsup's assessment that Trump's move to wind down DACA was meant to improve the White House's bargaining position on immigration — could embolden Democrats to take a harder line against accepting various conservative demands as part of an immigration deal.

Democrats have already started to raise alarms about the mere contours of an agreement, which would include not only a permanent protection for Dreamers but border security provisions and changes to family-based immigration laws and the diversity visa lottery.

In an interview with POLITICO late Tuesday, California Attorney General Xavier Becerra, a former House Democratic leader, contended: "Why would anyone want to negotiate a bad deal to get DACA now that it's become clear the court is saying the Trump administration may have tried to repeal the program in an unlawful way?"

"I hope it can be a moderating influence on the other side, the Republican side, upon some of their demands," Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) said. "But at the end of the day, I think that in order to make a deal, a deal implies there's negotiations by both sides."

Spokespeople for the Justice Department and the White House said they disagreed with the ruling, though neither said directly whether the administration would appeal Alsup's decision.

But White House legislative director Marc Short said Wednesday on NPR that the ruling doesn't relieve the urgency for Congress to reach an immigration deal.

"If we let this drag out, the risk would be that the Supreme Court would say yeah we're overturning the decision and immediately DACA ends," Short said on NPR. "And so it's better to give us some opportunity to find a legislative fix as opposed to risking status for all those individuals."

Democrats push fiscal parity at Mattis lunch on Capitol Hill Back

Democratic senators emphasized their argument to increase domestic spending in tandem with defense during a closed-door meeting today with Defense Secretary Jim Mattis, several Democrats said.

Mattis visited both the Democratic and Republican weekly party lunches in the Senate, underscoring the Pentagon's call for full-year funding.

"We greatly respect him. Everyone in our caucus knows defense is important," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer told reporters at the Capitol. "We made the argument so are some non-defense things. Help us get those."

Congressional leaders from both parties have been in talks to raise the strict caps on spending for the military and domestic agencies for two years, which would pave the way for full-year spending legislation. While Republicans are urging a prioritization of defense spending, Democrats have emphasized "parity" between defense and domestic spending.

Government funding again runs dry on Jan. 19. So, lawmakers need to pass another Continuing Resolution or hammer out a full-year funding deal before then.

Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.), a Senate Armed Services member, added that Mattis understood Democrats' calls for budget parity.

"We get this position, and he gets ours," Kaine said.

The federal government has been funded through stopgap, continuing spending resolutions since October. And Mattis and other top Pentagon officials contend CRs place the military in a tough spot by preventing it from executing new programs or ramping up current ones.

IRS estimates it will need an extra $495M to stand up tax law Back

By Bernie Becker | 01/10/2018 10:21 AM EDT

The IRS has initially estimated that implementing the new tax law will require an extra $495 million in funding for 2018 and 2019, the agency's in-house watchdog said in her annual report to Congress on Wednesday.

Implementing the new GOP tax cut, H.R. 1 \(115\), will be a major challenge for the IRS, but the agency shouldn't be too quick to blame funding problems if it struggles with that task, National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson said.

The report ranged widely, touching on issues including the collection of tax debts by private companies and taxpayer services.

Years of funding cuts have already eroded the IRS' ability to help taxpayers, Olson said, but the agency too frequently points to its budget when it runs into problems.

"I cede to no one in my advocacy for increased IRS funding," Olson wrote. "At the same time, limited resources cannot be used as an all-purpose excuse for mediocrity."

Still, there's little doubt that implementing the tax law will challenge the agency, and Republicans have not committed to giving the IRS more funding. Lawmakers are in the midst of trying to negotiate a new federal spending measure, with current funding set to expire Jan. 19.

The 1986 tax overhaul, Olson noted, led to changing or creating 210 IRS forms and to 13 new publications, and the agency brought in 1,300 new staff members to handle all the changes. The IRS has said it thinks the new tax law will force it to modify 131 filing season systems.

Future challenges for the agency could include schemes from states like California, New Jersey and New York to effectively bypass the new law's cap on the state and local tax deduction, including proposals to essentially allow taxpayers to make charitable donations to governments instead of directly paying taxes.

Olson added that the agency currently doesn't know when a homeowner closes on a mortgage, even as the tax law made changes to the mortgage interest deduction that went into effect Dec. 15. She also pointed to the frenzy and confusion that occurred late last year when taxpayers tried to prepay their 2018 property taxes to get a 2017 tax benefit.

Experts also say that some of the more complicated provisions in the new law, including a deduction for pass-through businesses and international rules for multinational corporations, could take months to even years to fully flesh out.

In addition, the IRS' work on new withholding tables to reflect the new tax cuts is being closely watched as taxes are expected to play a role in this year's midterms.

"The IRS will have a lot of issues to work through, and taxpayers will have a lot of questions," Olson said. "But with more funding, strong leadership, and a closer working relationship with Congress, I am convinced the IRS can do the job well."

The taxpayer advocate included its implementation findings in a comprehensive report that also examined a number of other key issues for the agency.

Olson included a new "Purple Book" of 50 recommendations for IRS restructuring, in the hopes that could be an area of bipartisan agreement. One of her primary suggestions was that Congress should enact the Taxpayer Bill of Rights that the IRS currently has adopted on its own.

The taxpayer advocate also knocked the IRS' private debt collection program, which the agency started in April after being forced to by Congress. The IRS itself has said the program brought in $6.7 million from taxpayers in fiscal 2017, but at a cost of some $20 million.

Not only that, but Olson says in her report the program largely goes after low earners — more than a quarter of the people who paid up after being reached by a private debt collector made less than $20,000 a year.

Olson also found that the IRS is not fully reckoning with taxpayers' preference to contact the agency by phone as it tries to shift to more online accounts. And she raised concerns about how the agency is implementing another provision passed by Congress that allows the federal government to revoke a person's passport if they have a serious tax debt.

IRS watchdog says agency needs updating to meet new challenges Back

By Bernie Becker | 01/10/2018 11:35 AM EDT

The IRS's in-house watchdog today offered lawmakers 50 new recommendations as they consider whether to reorganize the agency's operations.

Nina Olson, the nation's taxpayer advocate, noted in her inaugural "Purple Book" that it's now been close to two decades since Congress passed an IRS restructuring act. The 1998 IRS restructuring has held up well, Olson said, before noting the agency could use some updates to deal with new challenges that have arisen over the last 20 years.

"Tax administration has changed in many ways, partly due to the increasing use of automation by the IRS and the increasing use of the internet and other digital services by taxpayers," she said.

Congressional Republicans have shown some interest in revamping how the IRS operates, though House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) has only said he wants to deal with the issue this year. Lawmakers have also faced questions about whether it makes sense to restructure the IRS at the same time the agency is implementing the new GOP tax law.

The suggestions in the Purple Book — including to codify a Taxpayer Bill of Rights the IRS has adopted on its own — are typically bipartisan and often already included in existing legislation, she added.

Other suggestions include allowing the agency to require minimum competency standards for tax preparers; giving taxpayers more time to sue for damages if they're unfairly targeted for collection; requiring that each state has a permanent IRS appeals officer; and forcing the IRS to give taxpayers a receipt detailing how their tax dollars are being spent.

Olson modeled the Purple Book after Treasury's Green Book, an annual release of revenue proposals.

Fatter paychecks promised by Republicans put IRS in tough spot Back

By Brian Faler | 01/10/2018 05:02 AM EDT

The IRS is facing its first big challenge implementing the new tax law: deciding how much in taxes to withhold from millions of Americans' paychecks.

The agency is under pressure to take as little as possible so people will see big increases in their take-home pay ahead of this year's midterm elections.

But that would come at a cost: smaller or even nonexistent refunds next year, though millions rely on them to plug holes in their family budgets. Democrats are already accusing the Trump administration of plotting "phantom windfalls" ahead of the November contest that will come back to haunt taxpayers next tax season.

"We oppose any attempts by the administration to systematically underwithhold income taxes during the 2018 tax year, knowing that in 2019 taxpayers may find they owe taxes when they were expecting a refund," Sen. Ron Wyden and Rep. Richard Neal, the top Democrats on congressional tax committees, wrote to acting IRS Commissioner David Kautter.

How the IRS — which is supposed to be apolitical — decides to implement withholding could go a long way toward shaping public opinion on the controversial law.

Workers could see changes in their paychecks as soon as next month, the agency said, and for many it will be the first time they see what exactly the Tax Cuts and Jobs Act means to them.

Even before President Donald Trump signed the bill into law last month, Republicans were promising Americans they wouldn't have to wait long to see the benefits.

"You're going to start seeing a lot more money in your paycheck," Trump said Monday during a speech to the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Asked about Democrats' warnings of politically motivated withholding changes, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) said, "There's never been any question about the IRS' timely, accurate withholding tables, nor should there be today."

Democrats will "do and say just about anything to cast doubt" on the Republican tax program, Brady said.

The IRS did not respond to a request for comment.

There is a history of politicians trying to manipulate withholding, through obscure tables issued by the IRS, with an eye toward providing a short-term boost to the economy. President George H.W. Bush tried it ahead of the 1992 election, and the 1986 tax overhaul attempted, unsuccessfully, to quash refunds altogether.

Most of the new tax law took effect Jan. 1 because Republicans want it to boost growth before voters head to the polls this fall.

As Wyden and Neal pointed out, bigger paychecks now could mean a nasty surprise in 2019. Some accustomed to receiving annual refunds could potentially find themselves suddenly in arrears to the IRS.

"This is not something you want to fool the American taxpayer about — you don't want to have them feeling good because they're getting a big bump in take-home pay only to be surprised next year," said Larry Gibbs, a former IRS commissioner.

"People ought to be able to understand what is being withheld from their paycheck and what that means — not just in terms of a bump in take-home pay, but also whether they're still going to get a refund," he said.

How much is withheld is a product of two things: The allowances claimed on the "W-4" form filed with employers, and the tables the IRS produces telling payroll administrators how much to withhold at given income levels, taking into account the allowances employees claimed.

The IRS is now working on new withholding tables to reflect the new tax law. In a statement late last month, the agency suggested it will not be issuing new W-4s.

"This information will be designed to work with existing Forms W-4 that employees have already filed, and no further action by taxpayers is needed at this time," the IRS said.

About 80 percent of taxpayers will get a tax cut averaging $2,100 thanks to the new law, according to the independent Tax Policy Center. About 5 percent will face tax increases averaging $2,800 while the remainder will see essentially no change in their tax bills.

Taxpayers have long prized their tax refunds. The share receiving money back from the IRS at tax time has been firmly lodged at 70 percent or more since the 1960s, despite complaints from experts that it amounts to giving the government an interest-free loan.

In 2016, Kautter, then working at a consulting firm, bemoaned the number of people receiving refunds each year, while acknowledging taxpayers like being essentially forced to save.

"It drives me nuts," Kautter told POLITICO that April. "You don't lend money to other people interest free."

For millions, it is the single largest payment they receive all year.

The IRS generally likes people getting refunds as well, because it means fewer people it must chase down who owe taxes.

So the withholding sweet spot might be for people to get bigger paychecks this year, but not so large that it erases their refunds next year.

That will be technically difficult, experts say, because the Republican plan dumped the concept of personal exemptions, which are key to figuring out how much to withhold from someone's paycheck, and it's not clear how the agency will make up for that.

What's more, about 8.5 million taxpayers will see tax increases, according to TPC, which not only threatens their refunds. It could also potentially put them at risk of incurring underpayment penalties the IRS imposes on those who pay less than 90 percent of their taxes during the calendar year.

The IRS has provided little guidance thus far on how exactly it intends to proceed, leaving payroll administrators scratching their heads.

"There's definitely some unanswered questions," said Mike Trabold, director of compliance risk at Paychex, a payroll administration firm.

He wonders if the IRS will make any withholding changes retroactive to the beginning of this year. Others wonder if and when the agency will have to develop new W-4 forms, and whether it will waive those underpayment penalties.

Lawmakers have tried to increase people's paychecks before, by unilaterally changing withholding, and faced a backlash from the public.

The 1986 overhaul ordered the Treasury Department to devise a more accurate withholding system that would slash the number of people getting refunds each year. "You can kiss your tax refund goodbye, and with it the summer vacations, new refrigerators and fall wardrobes it has paid for," The Washington Post reported in April 1987.

But the revised W-4 form the agency produced was so complicated that it became hugely unpopular and was dropped.

A few years later, Bush, then running for reelection, ordered the government to withhold less from paychecks in hopes of boosting the economy.

But many people didn't want the extra money if it meant losing their refunds, and within a few years, refunds had returns to previous levels.

Bernie Becker contributed to this report.

IRS urged to allow deductions for all 2018 property tax prepayments Back

The IRS should let taxpayers deduct all their prepaid 2018 property taxes from their filings this year, no matter whether they've received their 2018 property tax bills or not, Rep. Leonard Lance (R-N.J.) told Acting IRS Commissioner David Kautter today.

The revenue agency previously ruled that prepayments could only be deducted by taxpayers who'd received their 2018 assessments and made their prepayments before the end of 2017.

But the IRS didn't issue that guidance until Dec. 27, five days after President Donald Trump signed the new tax law H.R. 1 \(115\) that included a $10,000 federal limit on the state and local tax (SALT) deduction, which took effect Jan. 1. The law said taxpayers couldn't prepay future state and local income taxes, but wasn't specific on precluding property tax prepayments, Lance reminded Kautter in a letter today.

In the interim, thousands of taxpayers in New Jersey, New York, California and other high-tax states prepaid 2018 property taxes. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie issued an executive order the day before the IRS advisory, triggering many more Garden State residents to prepay their 2018 property taxes than otherwise would have, Lance said.

"The IRS and state governments should work in comity on these matters," Lance wrote. "Therefore, I believe it is appropriate for the IRS to revisit this Advisory and allow full deduction of all 2018 property tax prepayments, regardless of the date of assessment."

Separately, other Congress members have introduced legislation to fully restore the SALT deduction, while state legislators are pushing other ideas like charitable contributions to state funds and shifting the tax burden to payroll taxes.

Alexander, Murray revive talks on Obamacare stabilization Back

By Adam Cancryn | 01/10/2018 01:34 PM EDT

Sens. Lamar Alexander and Patty Murray have resumed negotiations on a bipartisan bill aimed at stabilizing the Obamacare markets, they said today.

The chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate health committee met this week, Alexander told reporters, and are hoping to craft a bill in the next few weeks that could be folded into a longterm omnibus spending agreement.

That stabilization package would likely combine Alexander and Murray's original bill restoring cost-sharing payments to insurers and expanding state flexibility with separate legislation from Sens. Susan Collins and Bill Nelson funding a reinsurance program for Obamacare plans.

"It's fundamentally what was agreed to," Alexander said. "It's what we recommended, plus the Collins-Nelson risk pool."

But Alexander and Murray have yet to work out all the details that stalled their initial agreement late last year. House conservatives in December pressed GOP leaders not to take any steps that would prop up Obamacare, and protested the bill's lack of restrictions on using the money for abortions.

Murray has said that adding abortion restrictions is a non-starter. And Alexander, who has also spoken recently with the White House and House Republicans about a prospective stabilization deal, said only that it'd be part of the discussion over the next few weeks.

He also waved off concerns about getting a vote on a deal, saying the more immediate goal is to "try to begin to lower rates in the individual market. And then let the leaders work out the way forward."

CHIP extension faces headwinds despite lowered price tag Back

Lawmakers scrambling to fund the popular Children's Health Insurance Program got an easy out after the CBO dramatically lowered its estimate of how much the program would cost. But even that may not produce a deal since the program's fate is tangled up in the thorny politics of immigration and a government spending bill.

That's a problem because the short-term patch that Congress passed just a few weeks ago is expected to dry up as soon as this month and next in several states — running the risk that children could lose coverage before a March 31 expiration date, according to state officials and others who talk to CHIP directors.

Several lawmakers say the new CBO estimate shows there's no reason to delay sending states a more permanent source of funding.

"It changes the dynamic entirely," said Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), who argued that CHIP's funding should be considered separately due to the lower price tag.

"I view that as an opportunity," he said.

Both Republicans and Democrats have pledged to renew money for the program, which provides health coverage to roughly 9 million low-income children, but have yet to finalize how to do it. Their job got a lot easier on Friday when CBO significantly lowered its projection of the costs for a five-year funding bill, estimating that a Senate bill would increase the deficit by $800 million over the next decade — about a tenth of its earlier $8.2 billion price tag.

Congress' decision to repeal Obamacare's individual mandate lowered the cost of CHIP partly because covering individuals through the law's exchanges is projected to become far more expensive with the mandate's elimination. In a separate estimate, the nonpartisan budget scorekeeper now projects that a 10-year extension would save $6 billion over a decade, according to a copy of the estimate obtained by POLITICO.

A spending bill that Congress must pass by Jan. 19 to avoid a government shutdown is seen as the next vehicle to pass a long-term CHIP extension. But Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), whose committee cleared a bipartisan CHIP extension in October, S. 1827 \(115\), following the updated CBO score said it was time to "stop holding CHIP hostage to a caps deal."

"Nothing should prevent enactment of a five-year KIDS Act reauthorization before Jan. 19 — regardless of a budgetary caps agreement," he said in a statement to POLITICO.

Democrats still blame the funding delay on Republicans for prioritizing Obamacare repeal, H.R. 1628 \(115\), and a massive overhaul of the tax code, H.R. 1 \(115\), over CHIP, whose federal funds expired on Sept. 30 before Congress passed a short-term funding patch last month.

"Those multinational corporations got $1 trillion worth of tax relief," said Ron Wyden of Oregon, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance panel that shepherded the chamber's CHIP legislation. "And vulnerable kids on CHIP got something that was temporary. I think that says it all."

Lawmakers have precious few days to act before states could again be in dire straits.

"Basically this entire process has been [flying by] the seat of our pants," said Andrew Tuozzolo, chief of staff to the Health secretary in Louisiana, where officials are planning to send coverage termination notices next month if Congress doesn't enact new funds.

As a result of the delays, some states began informing enrollees in November and December that their coverage could end within weeks.

The December patch, H.R. 1370 \(115\), provided temporary relief, but it won't last long, said Maureen Hensley-Quinn of the National Academy for State Health Policy. At least 10 states are set to run out of funds as early as this month and February; another six are set to run out in March, according to a survey of state officials, she said.

Hensley-Quinn said states are also still trying to figure out how much leftover CHIP funding they can get from CMS, which originally had approximately $3 billion on hand but has sent out at least $1.2 billion to states on the verge of shuttering their programs.

"What is less sure is how much, if any, redistribution funds remain available for states," she said.

The House in November passed a five-year CHIP extension, H.R. 3922 \(115\), mostly on party lines. Democrats protested that the bill was paid for in part by gutting the Obamacare Prevention and Public Health Fund and raising premiums for wealthy seniors enrolled in Medicare.

Action has stalled in the Senate, where the Senate Finance Committee continues to negotiate how to pay for its five-year CHIP bill, as well as several Medicare extenders, according to aides in both parties. Funding for other programs, such as community health centers and other public health programs, has also languished in the chamber.

Pentagon audit to cost $367M, plus $551M in fixes, comptroller says Back

By Connor O'Brien | 01/10/2018 11:42 AM EDT

The first-ever Pentagon audit will cost about $367 million to carry out and another $551 million to fix identified issues, Comptroller David Norquist estimated today.

Testifying at a House Armed Services hearing on the audit, which kicked off last month, Norquist said the Pentagon plans to spend $367 million this fiscal year, including $181 million in contract costs for independent accounting firms and $186 million for related infrastructure.

The $181 million in audit fees, Norquist estimated, is about one-thirtieth of 1 percent of the Pentagon budget.

The cost is small, he said, compared to the overall budget and is better than the alternative of "operating in ignorance of the problem."

"Any number that is in millions is a large number, but on the scale of the enterprise, that type of money for accountability is money well spent," Norquist said.

The audit was met with bipartisan approval among committee members, who had repeatedly requested an audit with little success.

"The up-front cost is going to be enormous. But long term, the benefits are exactly as you describe," ranking Democrat Adam Smith of Washington state said. "And if we've got to sort of suck it up for a couple years and absorb some costs ... it's going to make significant improvements."

Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) said "it is not by accident that the committee will start our year on this topic."

"It is likely that the result of the first audit will not be pretty, but those results will help direct us all," Thornberry said.

Thornberry urges flexibility in year-end military spending Back

By Connor O'Brien | 01/10/2018 01:46 PM EDT

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry said today Congress should consider allowing the Pentagon to spend some money beyond the current fiscal year if a full-year defense appropriation is finally passed.

Speaking to reporters after a hearing on the Pentagon audit, the Texas Republican said he's concerned the Defense Department won't be able to effectively spend additional funding with limited time left in this fiscal year, particularly on maintenance.

"They will receive a large percentage of their funding without much time left," Thornberry said. "You either got the choice of spending a lot of stuff fast, or not spending it. And I'm concerned that our maintenance and other readiness problems are so severe that we can't afford to let money just sit there, or to spend it foolishly.

"Is there a responsible way to allow them more flexibility to spend FY18 money on Oct. 2?" Thornberry wondered.

Republicans have advocated boosting defense spending to roughly $700 billion for this fiscal year. But the Pentagon and other federal agencies have been funded since October through several continuing spending resolutions, which adhere to the previous year's spending levels.

The latest CR runs out Jan. 19. So to avoid a government shutdown, Congress must pass a new CR, or strike a full-year spending deal.

Thornberry also expressed his concerns during the hearing to Pentagon Comptroller David Norquist.

"I think my staff has reached out to yours to work together to see about some greater flexibility in spending money after the end of the fiscal year," Thornberry told Norquist.

Surface fleet leader: Navy needs more ships or fewer responsibilities Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 01/09/2018 03:39 PM EDT

The head of the Navy's surface forces said today that the Navy needs more ships or fewer responsibilities to avoid the collisions that plagued the community over the summer.

Vice Adm. Thomas Rowden said at the Surface Navy Association annual conference that a string of accidents in the Pacific Fleet over the summer showed that the fleet is "stretched" too thin, with more time being devoted to missions than to training and readiness.

He said that sailors in the Pacific told him that "they need help and, by help, they mean time: time to maintain their gear, time to refresh their basic individual and team skills and time to unwind."

"Time will only come from one of two things, or a combination of them: more ships and fewer obligations," he said. "It's hard to see it any other way."

The Navy has said it needs 355 ships to meet current demands, but it's unclear how the Pentagon might pay to add 75 ships to the fleet.

Absent growing the size of the fleet, Rowden said the Navy is working to implement several recommendations made by recent investigations, including honestly explaining to senior leaders the level of risk that will come from doing what is being asked of them.

Fed sent $80B in profits to Treasury for 2017 Back

By Victoria Guida | 01/10/2018 11:25 AM EDT

The Federal Reserve today announced that its reserve banks sent roughly $80.2 billion in profits to the U.S. Treasury for 2017.

Its total estimated net income for the year, $80.7 billion, was down $11.7 billion from 2016, thanks to higher interest paid to banks on excess reserves — the central bank's primary tool for raising short-term interest rates. Its interest expenses increased $13.8 billion, but it also received $2.5 billion more in interest income on its securities holdings.

WHAT'S NEXT: The central bank's audited annual financial statements are scheduled to be published in March, it said.

Release of Trump infrastructure plan may slip past January Back

By Brianna Gurciullo and Lauren Gardner | 01/09/2018 06:02 PM EDT

The White House may be pushing back the release of its long-awaited infrastructure package yet again, just a month after saying it would come out by the end of January.

A White House official said Tuesday that there have been "no decisions yet on timing" for the release. Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.) separately told POLITICO — after a meeting with Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao and other officials — that administration officials are still deciding whether to publish legislative principles for the plan before or after the president's State of the Union address Jan. 30.

A White House spokeswoman did not immediately comment Tuesday.

It's unclear whether this represents a major snag for the infrastructure plan, which Trump's aides have talked up as a big priority for 2018. The plan — aimed at creating as much as $1 trillion in federal, state and private spending — could also be another big win for Trump on the heels of December's tax overhaul, the president's supporters hope.

Trump's advisers have told him that pursuing an infrastructure bill will give Republicans the best chance of holding onto the House because the prospect of building new roads and bridges has broad appeal with the electorate.

But congressional Democrats have expressed skepticism about Trump's approach, especially given the administration's signals that it will come with relatively little new federal spending and will attempt to unroll a host of regulatory requirements for transportation projects. And Trump himself has expressed misgivings about the package's expected incentives for government partnerships with private investors — most recently during a huddle last weekend with congressional leaders at Camp David, The Washington Post reported Sunday.

Trump has been raising similar concerns for weeks in private conversations with lawmakers and his advisers, according to people familiar with the conversations.

D.J. Gribbin, the president's special assistant for infrastructure policy, refused to give specifics on the timing of the plan's release when reporters pressed him Tuesday, following the meeting with Cardin and other lawmakers. Besides Chao, the meeting also included members of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

A White House official had told POLITICO in early December that Trump intended to send "a detailed infrastructure principles document" to Congress sometime in January. Even that was later than what Chao had predicted last spring, when she told Fox News that "the legislative proposal will probably be tackled by the Congress in the third quarter" of 2017.

More recently, the White House has decided to focus largely on infrastructure in the coming months, administration officials have said — setting aside for now a bid to make sweeping changes to the country's welfare programs, a top priority for House Speaker Paul Ryan. That decision came after weeks of internal debate about the administration's legislative priorities.

Sen. Tom Carper of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee, said Tuesday's meeting was less about specifics of the infrastructure plan and more about face time about the plan with the administration, which he called "helpful."

"I don't know that I learned a lot," Carper said. "I just think there's value in sitting down and talking."

The plan is expected to call for as much as $200 billion in federal spending over the next decade, with the rest coming from private investment, state or local funding and cuts to other federal programs. An administration official has told POLITICO that a wide variety of projects would have to compete for federal assistance, ranging from roads, railroads, bridges and tunnels to rural broadband or veterans' hospitals — and that communities hoping for money from Washington will have to be prepared to put up their own cash.

At the same time, the White House has proposed budget cuts for some existing federal transportation programs. And the Department of Transportation told New York and New Jersey late last month not to expect the federal government to pay half of the $13 billion cost of building a new tunnel under the Hudson River — despite earlier promises to that effect from the Obama administration.

Both developments have increased Democrats' consternation about Trump's infrastructure plan.

Cardin said the administration officials went over their proposal Tuesday but left many of the details unfilled.

"I think we have an understanding [of] the framework they're working under," Cardin said. "What we don't have is specifics. What we don't have is how it adds up. And I think the plea that we're making is let's have a real, open process, but recognize you've got to have the money."

Andrew Restuccia contributed to this report.

Bipartisan House caucus calls for gas tax increase Back

By Tanya Snyder | 01/09/2018 02:15 PM EDT

The bipartisan Problem Solvers Caucus will release its infrastructure plan Wednesday, hoping to "shape the conversation" ahead of a White House blueprint expected sometime this month.

The House caucus, which has an equal number of Republicans and Democrats, will release a report recommending increasing the gas tax and indexing it to inflation, as well as other options for raising revenue. President Donald Trump's proposal is not expected to include a specific funding mechanism. Key congressional aides say that starting off with proposals that have already had demonstrable bipartisan backing might help accelerate the debate over funding mechanisms, which has stymied infrastructure efforts many times before.

The report also suggests that highway projects over $20 million should have to undergo the same life cycle assessments that transit projects already do, in order to ensure that assets exist to maintain and operate the infrastructure for at least 20 years.

Rather than shoot for a large but temporary injection of funding, the report focuses on sustainable funding ideas, such as devoting the entire Harbor Maintenance Tax to its intended purpose, expanding loan programs like TIFIA and WIFIA and plussing up the Highway Trust Fund, among others.

Staffers suggested Democrats in the caucus are eager to cooperate with the Trump administration on a plan despite some hesitation in the party about handing the president a "win" ahead of the 2018 midterms.

Caucus members and staff met with White House infrastructure adviser DJ Gribbin this morning and said there were substantial similarities between the White House plan and their own.

Chamber reiterates gas tax support, plans additional options for infrastructure bill Back

By Brianna Gurciullo | 01/10/2018 12:25 PM EDT

The head of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce told reporters today that he has long backed a gas tax hike and that his organization will pitch additional ways to pay for a potential infrastructure package this month.

"I don't think the Congress of the United States is prepared, ready or able to put up trillions of dollars, or a trillion dollars over an ensuing period of time, for infrastructure having just done the things on tax relief and ... they are having to face all these entitlement costs, which are growing in leaps and bounds," Thomas Donohue, the Chamber's president and CEO, told reporters after a speech today.

He also linked infrastructure investment to immigration and the U.S. workforce. "If we do a trillion-dollar-plus, 10-year infrastructure plan, we can't do it with the workers we have now," Donohue said.

During his speech, Donohue said 2018 should "be the year of major infrastructure investment," adding that the Chamber of Commerce and the Trump administration have discussed "what a forward-looking infrastructure package should achieve."

"We have the political will, the bipartisan support and we certainly have the need," Donohue said. "So now is the time for action." Donohue called for focusing on "projects of national significance that maximize long-term growth" and generate jobs.

He mentioned port, airport, broadband, water and energy infrastructure, as well as upgrading bridges and roads for self-driving vehicles. "But the big question: How do we pay for it?" he said. "That's the problem that has dogged, troubled this debate for many years."

He said the Chamber of Commerce plans to release "very constructive ideas and proposals" on that issue on Jan. 18.

"We're going to help jump start the conversation between public and private sector leaders," Donohue said. "We're already talking to the White House and others in town, and people around the world as well, and people with money."

Donohue calls for infrastructure spending, more access to capital to boost growth Back

By Victoria Guida | 01/10/2018 11:30 AM EDT

U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Tom Donohue Wednesday called for sustained economic growth that is more widely shared, boosted by initiatives like infrastructure investment and increased access to capital.

"This must be a concern of ours, to return our nation to equality and opportunity for all," Donohue said in his annual "State of Business" speech. "Two quarters of 3 percent growth — great. But we must make it last for a decade. It must be sustained."

He said he expected stronger growth to continue, "barring unforeseen circumstances," pointing to low unemployment and "a bit" of wage growth, as well as a surging stock market. He credited "better policies" at the federal level and in some states for these gains.

"We don't need everything to turn out just right for us to prosper this year," Donohue said. "Our economy's underlying strength is deep and wide, so we can overcome some adversity."

But the risks include the threat of withdrawal from NAFTA or defaulting on federal debt, as well as continued turmoil in the Middle East and the potential for terrorist or cyberattacks.

To help boost growth, 2018 "can and must be the year of major infrastructure investment," he said.

"We have the political will, the bipartisan support — and we certainly have the need," he said. "Now it's time for action."

Donohue acknowledged it was a "problem" to figure out how such investment should be paid for and said the group would put forward ideas at a Jan. 18 event. In a press conference after his speech, he declined to elaborate on those ideas, though he noted he's "a long-term supporter of a gas tax increase."

"I don't think the Congress of the United States is prepared, ready or able to put up trillions of dollars, or a trillion dollars ... having just done the things on tax relief," he said. He also cited the costs of entitlement programs, "which are growing with leaps and bounds."

"You're not going to pay for these all with government money," he said of fixing roads, bridges and other infrastructure.

In his speech, Donohue also expressed alarm about the "growing disincentive" for companies to go public, citing the role of proxy advisory firms and "activist investors" pushing politically motivated investments.

"Short-termism is forcing leaders to make decisions to satisfy quarterly goals instead of to meet long-term growth objectives," he said.

"This is a serious problem," he added. "Public companies are major contributors to job growth in this country."

A year later, Trump still able to woo farmers Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 01/09/2018 07:20 PM EDT

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Donald Trump won the presidency in large part by appealing to rural voters. If the sentiment at this week's American Farm Bureau Federation's annual convention is any indication, he is still their guy.

Trump is the first president in years who seems to be listening to the needs of the agriculture industry, farmers and ranchers say, and so they stick with him despite their anxiety over his trade and immigration policies.

"I've been back on our family farm since 1992, and this is the first time we've had a president pay so much attention to agriculture," said Renea Jones-Rogers, who grows 600 acres of fresh market tomatoes in eastern Tennessee, and was recently appointed to the Agriculture Department's state farm committee. "He really wants to hear what farmers have to say and make things better."

Trump, a born and bred New Yorker more comfortable in business suits than dungarees, may seem like an unlikely champion of farmers. But he has been able to touch on the issues they care about, such as commitment to rolling back federal regulations and the patriotism he invokes during campaign-style speeches like the one he delivered here Monday.

The president took the stage as the country song "God Bless the U.S.A." blasted through the Gaylord Opryland Resort & Convention Center, and he received many standing ovations during a rare speech that stuck mostly to script.

He boasted of his administration's efforts to roll back regulations and the Republican tax overhaul, H.R. 1 \(115\). (Trump overstated the size of the tax cuts, claiming they totaled $5.5 trillion, when they are estimated to total $1.5 trillion over a decade.)

He also played to the crowd when he said he would support an on-time farm bill that includes crop insurance — a popular program among farmers but obscure to the general public — "unless you don't want me to."

Some of the loudest applause was in response to Trump's statement, "We want our national anthem respected," which prompted chants of "U-S-A, U-S-A," along with the mention of rolling back EPA's controversial Waters of the United States rule and raising the estate tax exemption to $11 million for an individual, and double that for couples.

Missing from his speech, however, were any reassurances that the U.S. would not withdraw from NAFTA, which would be disastrous for many grain and livestock farmers' bottom lines. Nor did he promise to improve a visa system for migrant agricultural workers to ease long-term labor shortages as he pursues a crackdown on illegal immigration.

For Kevin Paap, the president of the Minnesota Farm Bureau who grows corn and soybeans, the question he is most often asked by farmers is, "Where does the president stand on trade?"

While producers are supportive of deregulatory efforts and tax cuts, the significance of such moves is diminished if farm income shrinks, he said. Commodity prices have steadily dropped over the last four years because of global oversupply. For years, they have remained low, taking U.S. farm income down with them.

The USDA estimated that after three consecutive years of decline, net farm income will have increased in 2017 to about $63 billion.

"We're appreciative of the tax bill, but quite frankly, with the financial stress in agriculture, farmers aren't looking for tax write-offs," Paap said. "If I don't have income, I don't have to worry about income tax deductions."

The best way to increase farm income is to increase prices, Paap said, and expanding export markets could go a long way. He was hoping that Trump during his speech would commit not only to completing NAFTA, but also to pursuing trade deals with other countries, like Japan, Vietnam and others involved in the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

Trump pulled out of TPP during his first few days in office, and now the 11 other countries involved are moving forward without the United States.

But Trump only briefly talked about NAFTA, stating that he's working to get a "better deal" for the country, including farmers and manufacturers. He did stop short of making his oft-repeated threat to pull out of the trade deal if Canada and Mexico can't meet U.S. demands.

Another critical issue for many farmers is an overhaul of the H-2A temporary guest-worker program so it is easier to hire more immigrants to harvest crops and work on dairy farms that demand year-round labor.

Jon Hegeman, who owns an ornamental plant operation in White Plains, Ala., is a staunch Trump supporter who uses the H-2A program. During last year's Farm Bureau convention, he told POLITICO that if the United States doesn't fix the migrant worker program to address labor shortages on farms, the country would have to start relying on food imports.

One year later, the visa system is still burdensome, he says, but it at least it hasn't gotten worse.

"This process needs to be modernized, but it takes time," he said, noting that the Trump family uses H-2A and other visa programs to hire foreign workers at its vineyard in Charlottesville, Va., and properties across the country. "He understands labor."

Hegeman said he was supportive of Trump's push to build a border wall, or another type of barrier, to secure the southern border as long as it was proposed as part of comprehensive immigration reform.

As the White House and Congress are trying to hammer out a deal on the legal status of about 700,000 undocumented immigrants who were brought to the U.S. as children, funding for the wall has become a bargaining chip. Trump met with 25 lawmakers Tuesday to discuss how to move forward on the future of the DACA program, border security and the possibility of an immigration overhaul.

Farmers are also dealing with the rising cost of health care, which many cited as one of their top concerns and an issue Republicans and Democrats should work together on.

Paap said he purchases a policy for him and his wife on the individual market that costs $2,300 a month, and from the only insurance provider available where he lives in southern Minnesota.

"This is not just about the insurance market, but the cost of providing health care," Paap said, echoing remarks by Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), who hosted a workshop Sunday during the Farm Bureau convention.

The Kansas Republican — who opposed an initial attempt by the Senate to repeal the ACA last year, but ultimately voted for the version that John McCain (R-Ariz.) and others dramatically tanked — said that Congress should spend more time trying to find ways to reduce the cost of providing health care, and less time debating who pays for it.

"There is something more important than who pays," Moran said. "Let's find out why prescription drugs cost so much. Congress is missing out on this."

Despite the uncertainty on health care — as well as immigration reform and trade — the farm belt is still firmly Trump country. It could sway further in his favor if the White House helps deliver an on-time farm bill, which expires Sept. 30, and completes a NAFTA 2.0 that preserves gains in agricultural exports.

"He knows there is a need to support farmers," said Yvonne Dutschmann, who grows wheat and hay and raises cattle in Gatesville, Texas. She appreciated Trump's directive to EPA to review, and either revise or rescind, the WOTUS rule, and said she voted for Trump because at the time, "he was the lesser of two evils."

How the GOP's war on the IRS could backfire Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 01/10/2018 12:10 PM EDT

Republicans buoyed by their victory on a historic tax bill are turning their focus on the agency they might hate more than any other: the IRS.

But while conservatives have long wanted to deconstruct the tax collection bureaucracy, right now might be the worst possible time to continue to slash funding and roll back IRS powers. In the wake of the biggest rewrite of the tax code in three decades there will be a huge need to implement, explain and enforce hundreds of pages of new tax provisions in the coming years.

"Restructuring the IRS right now would be the worst thing for our country," said Steve Mankowski, president of the National Conference of CPA Practitioners. "It's just a recipe for disaster."

National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson, the agency's in-house watchdog, said Wednesday the IRS has tentatively estimated it needs an extra $495 million in funding for 2018 and 2019 to implement the tax law.

That's not stopping House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas). Since 2016 he's threatened to "bust up" the IRS, a vague plan he later refined to turning the IRS into a service-oriented agency for individual and business taxpayer needs, with dispute resolution handled through a small claims court-type of process.

"You're going to see action this year on this issue," Brady said Monday, adding that the Ways and Means Oversight Subcommittee that has already mined the issue would continue its work. "We'll have some announcements shortly on some of the new process that they'll be taking going forward, soliciting ideas from lawmakers and organizations as well."

The oversight subpanel, which Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.) chaired before switching to the Tax Policy Subcommittee in a change announced Wednesday, last year held five hearings on IRS customer service, improving taxpayer experiences, tax fraud, appeals and the agency's antiquated computer systems.

Buchanan has said repeatedly that he wants to release an IRS restructuring bill early this year. But Brady said no timetable has been set on introducing legislation.

"I want to visit with the chairman about when the bill will be drafted and completed and ready for movement," Brady said.

On Wednesday, Olson offered lawmakers 50 new recommendations as they consider a possible reorganization. The proposals are more administrative than structural, such as giving taxpayers more time to sue for damages if they're unfairly targeted for collection and requiring that each state has a permanent IRS appeals officer.

Republicans seem in no hurry to give the agency more money, though Buchanan has said it's being discussed. Both the House and Senate bills that fund the IRS include more cuts.

If Brady, Buchanan and other Republicans get their way in changing IRS powers while also cutting agency funding, as they've done every year since 2010, it could undermine the new tax law President Donald Trump and Republicans on Capitol Hill are boasting about.

First, it would further limit IRS call centers and other contact points for taxpayer inquiries, which have struggled to maintain service amid the budget cutbacks. Personnel numbers have declined, fewer questions are fielded year over year and only basic tax law answers have been given since the 2014 filing season, Olson has testified before Congress.

Shifting the IRS focus from implementation would also distract from developing new forms and tables that are needed to determine how much taxpayers owe. It would also hinder examinations and enforcement, which have suffered as appropriations have dwindled, as shown by reduced audit rates.

On top of that, it would make it harder to understand new international tax laws for U.S. companies that make money abroad or foreign firms that operate here; noncorporate businesses like partnerships and others known as pass-throughs also need clarity on new boundaries governing how their income will be taxed.

Even worse, some critics say, it would hamstring the federal government's collection capability. Simultaneously withholding money from the IRS and restructuring its organization would surely distract from the agency's revenue operations and leave money on the table that should be collected, Mankowski said.

Instead, agency veterans and others say Republicans who control Congress should sufficiently fund the IRS to ensure it has adequate resources to implement the new law and brace for taxpayer uncertainty.

"I do think that the service needs some additional funds in this instance," said former IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson.

It's in Republicans' interest to work with the IRS during the implementation phase while continuing to hold the agency accountable, he added.

Extra money could be earmarked for specific purposes, similar to the nearly $300 million boost Congress provided the IRS in 2016, specifically for taxpayer services and combating identity theft, Mankowski said.

Ample appropriations would go a long way toward increasing the number of IRS employees who interact with taxpayers and professionals and ensuring staff is trained on the new law. Better funding would also help address challenges on the enforcement side of the agency, its outdated computer systems and its regulatory functions.

Those issues are more paramount than beginning what are certain to be slow changes for a major bureaucracy, said Everson, who headed the IRS from 2003 until 2007 and is now vice chairman at alliantgroup LP.

"I would operate carefully," he said.

Others agreed.

"That could be a problem to institute massive reforms right now," said former Rep. Charles Boustany (R-La.), now a lobbyist at Capitol Counsel LLC and previously in the oversight role now held by Buchanan.

For his part, Buchanan has said talks are under way to raise the IRS funding level, possibly by as much as $500 million. As it stands now the agency's budget is on track to decline to about $11.1 billion without anything extra, down from about $12.5 billion in 2010 when not adjusted for inflation.

"This is to help the transition," Buchanan said last month, just after a ceremony marking the bill's passage. "For payroll companies and everybody else, a lot of this has to get in place quickly, and the IRS is going to need additional funds to do that."

Brady was less certain than Buchanan about increasing IRS funding for implementation.

"I don't know that," Brady said. "The first question is, what do they need to implement this? And what of their current resources should be prioritized to that end?"

Other agency critics in Congress are even more outspoken. Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), a member of the tax-writing Finance Committee, isn't keen to supplement IRS funding because his anger hasn't subsided over the agency's political targeting scandal, which came to light in 2013.

"Only if they show us that they're going to impartially enforce the IRS code, and they proved that they couldn't enforce it, the way that they treated nonprofit organizations back in '11 and '12," Grassley said, adding that he's content to continue holding the agency's feet to the fire over the issue.

Congressional Republicans have for a while been trying to direct funding to specific IRS services and functions, Boustany said. But they ought to dial down their combative rhetoric in the meantime, he added.

"I hope that they do conduct a number of hearings that aren't overtly political to really get down to what the needs are because I think this could be pretty disruptive going forward for a lot of American families, small businesses and of course on the corporate international side as well," Boustany said.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: GOP keeps eyes on the prize: Avoid shutdown, skip town — Speculation grows that Cochran will give up gavel — McConnell crushes dreams of welfare reform
Date: Thursday, December 21, 2017 5:52:00 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 12/21/2017 05:49 PM EDT

ONE DOWN: You can probably ditch that "Congress ruins Christmas" quip. As of now, it looks like a shutdown will be averted after all — with maybe even a day to spare.

The House passed the four-week spending bill this afternoon, garnering GOP votes to send the measure off to the Senate, as Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan explain.

Turning it around: After House Republicans briefed GOP lawmakers last night on the new stopgap plan, members of the minority party were all "bah humbug" about an abysmal whip count. But, oh, how the holidays can spur legislative miracles.

Brief bout of panic: In the upper chamber, Sen. Rand Paul plans to steal the show with a PAYGO amendment. But with the help of their friends in the minority party, Senate Republicans are expected to breeze through that vote, Sarah reports. The Kentucky Republican is mad that the stopgap spending bill (H.R. 1370 \(115\)) includes a PAYGO waiver to prevent the tax bill (H.R. 1 \(115\)) from triggering $150 billion a year in cuts to Medicare and other federal programs. So he's proposing to keep that hammer coming.

Without objection: Even with that PAYGO pit stop, the Senate could clear the funding bill for President Donald Trump's signature tonight, unless somebody insists on the full spate of debate (and that against-the-grain senator can withstand the burning glares of his or her antsy peers).

What's in it? After so many strategy shifts, it's understandable to be confused about what's in this latest version of the bill. The biggies:

- A "clean" extension of funding for both defense and nondefense programs through Jan. 19.
- $2.85 billion to keep the Children's Health Insurance Program funded through March 31.
- Authority for CMS to help states deal with CHIP-related funding shortfalls.
- A four-week extension of spy powers under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Program.
- Money for community health centers and other health programs (made possible by $750 million in cuts to an Obamacare fund).
- That PAYGO waiver.
- A bevy of extra money for some defense programs.

Docs of the day — In a dear colleague letter, Rep. Tim Walz (D-Minn.) called on lawmakers to oppose a continuing resolution "that does not include funding to improve the Department of Veterans Affairs' capacity to directly deliver quality and timely health care to veterans." More from Connor O'Brien.

— More than three dozen House lawmakers sent a letter today asking appropriators to continue funding for TSA staffing at airport exit lanes and for reimbursing airports that hire local law enforcement. More from Stephanie Beasley.

#DailyBudgetFact — USDA has again lowered its forecast for Florida's hurricane-battered citrus industry, predicting the lowest production level since 1945. Florida is expected to produce 46 million 90-pound boxes of oranges this season, about 33 percent less than last season's crop.

APPROPRIATIONS

GIVING UP THE GAVEL? Sen. Thad Cochran's health issues have been stifling work on the Appropriations Committee, and there is growing speculation that he'll step aside in January, John reports today. For months, Cochran has had a minimal presence at hearings, has stopped meeting about substantive committee business and has said little about federal spending, beyond official statements from his office. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), the No. 2 Republican on the panel, is now effectively serving as chairman. But Cochran's office maintains that the chairman has "not made any statements about relinquishing his chairmanship."

High stakes: Cochran's next step could help determine whether the GOP keeps control of the Senate next year, as Jeff Greenfield writes for POLITICO Magazine. An open seat in Mississippi could trigger an intra-party fight that Republicans already fear could be a flashback to Alabama's race this month. The last time Cochran was on the ballot in 2014, he barely survived a primary challenge from state Sen. Chris McDaniel, who's already planning to run again.

BUDGET

PAGING HOUSE REPUBLICANS: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has killed the House GOP's dreams of welfare reform before 2018 even got started. "I think the Democrats are not going to be interested in entitlement reform, so I would not expect to see that on the agenda," McConnell declared today at an event hosted by Axios. He did acknowledge that Republicans can pass bills without Democrats in "rare exceptions" (Read: Reconciliation.) but made no mention of trying that budgetary maneuver again next year.

Sidenote: A Republican-led Congress hasn't adopted a budget in an election year since 2000. (H/t Jonathan Nicholson)

So, what does have a shot? McConnell said he sees "a lot of interest" in infrastructure next year: "I think it's pretty popular with Democrats and Republicans both." (Another fan of the idea? McConnell's better half, Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao).

DEFENSE

TAX TROUBLES: The nation's biggest military proponents were already anxious about yet another stopgap spending bill to close out 2017. Now, they fear the GOP's soon-to-be tax law could wipe out the Trump administration's big promise of heftier Pentagon budgets, Connor reports. After all, that $1.5 trillion tax bill could lead to the same high deficits that forced Washington into much-maligned budget caps in 2011.

SKIPPING A YEAR: Brace yourself for the Mona Lisa of defense budgets. Deputy Defense Secretary Pat Shanahan said today that the White House's fiscal 2019 budget request will call for another increase, but the fiscal 2020 plan will be "the masterpiece." As Jacqueline Klimas reports, Shanahan told reporters today that he expects the Pentagon to release its National Defense Strategy in January, followed by the much-anticipated Nuclear Posture Review and Ballistic Missile Defense Review in February.

TAX

EXTENDING THE FUN! Senate GOP tax-writers delivered even more holiday goodies for U.S. businesses (and lobbyists) this week. The Senate Finance Committee released its long-awaited "tax extenders" bill late Wednesday, giving new hope to tax breaks for owning race horses and building auto-racing tracks, Aaron Lorenzo reports. One festive way to look at the plan, per Morning Energy: "Santa gathered up all the wish lists and compiled them into this bill."

Reality check: The measure's fate is murky, at best, in the House. In the words of Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady: "You're talking to the chairman who doesn't want to do extenders."

Missing one thing: Still no word on that other "extenders" package K Street is so keen on: Medicare provisions Congress must reapprove. This year, the deadline was Sept. 30. Lawmakers had hoped the Medicare extenders could hitch a ride with CHIP funding in this week's stopgap bill. But so far, no dice.

TREASURY

A PIGGY BANK FOR FANNIE AND FREDDIE: Sorry, taxpayers — Fannie and Freddie get to keep some of their cash. After sending tens of billions to the Treasury each quarter as a condition of their bailout, the mortgage giants will finally be allowed to build up a $3 billion capital reserve rather than forking over every penny, Lorraine Woellert explains today. The rainy-day fund isn't expected to be enough, though, to keep Fannie and Freddie from seeking another taxpayer handout because of new rules under the tax bill cleared this week.

HEALTH CARE

NICK OF TIME: A federal ruling is expected to come down by year's end on halting a Medicare rule that will slash $1.6 billion in payments to the 340B drug program, David Pittman reports. Hospitals are seeking to block the rule that would cut payments next year for certain drugs by nearly 30 percent. And the Obama-appointed district court judge presiding over the case hinted today that he may bypass the hospitals' request for a preliminary injunction and rule immediately, noting that his decision will likely face an appeal.

CONGRESS

SCRUTINIZING THE SEXUAL HARASSMENT FUND: The congressional office that handles sexual harassment complaints has refused to spill the details of taxpayer dollars spent to settle claims. And pressure is mounting, Elana Schor explains.

INFRASTRUCTURE

HOW DO YOU PROPOSE TO PAY FOR THAT? Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune says he's got his head around the basic tenets of Trump's infrastructure vision, except for one minor detail. "I think the big question for us was: 'How do you fund it?'" Thune said about his recent sitdown with administration officials. Our Brianna Gurciullo chatted at length with the chairman about what he expects — and what he wants to see — in the White House proposal expected to hit the Hill in January. Check out the full Q&A.

HUD

BURNING THE RULE BOOK: HUD is ditching five proposed rules, including a flood standard designed to protect houses backed by taxpayer funds, Lorraine reports. The action is part of the agency's effort to conform to an executive order Trump issued just days after his inauguration.

Rand Paul threatens 'PAYGO' vote on spending bill Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/21/2017 01:26 PM EDT

Sen. Rand Paul has thrown a hurdle into Congress' last-minute sprint to fund the government before Friday night's shutdown deadline.

The Kentucky Republican said he will demand a vote on scrapping the GOP's attempt to waive $150 billion each year in federally mandated cuts that are set to go into effect following passage this week of the Republican tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\).

Paul vowed on Twitter this afternoon to "force a Senate vote to keep the caps in place," threatening to drag out the federal funding fight in the last days before Christmas.

The Senate will likely take a separate vote on Paul's amendment to keep PAYGO cuts in place, before voting on passage of this week's stopgap funding bill, H.R. 1370 \(115\).

At least eight Democrats will need to back the vote. And Democratic sources in the Senate say the support will likely materialize, even after the minority party has for weeks been pounding the GOP's tax bill for triggering those cuts.

The spending cuts are a result of Congress' "Pay-As-You-Go" budget rule. Whenever bills aren't fully paid for — like the $1.5 trillion tax bill — the federal government must automatically slash mandatory programs the following year.

The House has included a PAYGO waiver for the tax bill in the stopgap spending measure the lower chamber is expected to pass this evening.

Revised CR includes emergency funding for missile defense, ship repairs Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/21/2017 10:37 AM EDT

Stopgap spending legislation set for a vote today in the House includes an extra several billion dollars for missile defense programs and repairs to two badly damaged Navy destroyers.

The extra emergency spending — which totals just over $4.6 billion — is likely aimed at attracting the support of defense hawks for the continuing spending resolution after House Republican leaders abandoned plans to include a full-year Pentagon funding bill in the CR.

Lawmakers must pass funding legislation by Friday to avert a government shutdown. The stopgap, H.R. 1370 \(115\), would keep all federal agencies funded through Jan. 19.

The measure includes a total of approximately $2.4 billion for missile defense procurement. It would allocate $1.3 billion for missile defense research and development across the military services as well as $43 million for missile defense operations and maintenance for missile defense.

The CR also includes $200 million for the construction of a missile interceptor field in Alaska.

The legislation also allocates $674 million to repair the Navy destroyers USS Fitzgerald and USS John McCain. The ships were badly damaged in separate collisions in the Pacific that killed a combined 17 sailors.

President Donald Trump requested additional funding for missile defense to counter North Korea's nuclear and missile threat as well as repairs to the two destroyers last month.

The measure also would delay mandatory across-the-board cuts to defense and domestic spending slated to take place in January.

Text of the updated CR is here and a summary of the bill provisions is here.

Citing VA funding mismatch, Walz opposes CR Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/21/2017 02:06 PM EDT

The top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee is opposing a stopgap government funding bill over the inclusion of extra money for the private Veterans Choice Program that isn't accompanied by additional funds for the Department of Veterans Affairs itself.

In a dear colleague letter, Rep. Tim Walz (D-Minn.) called on lawmakers to oppose a continuing resolution "that does not include funding to improve the Department of Veterans Affairs' capacity to directly deliver quality and timely health care to veterans."

The stopgap legislation, H.R. 1370 \(115\), would keep the government funded through Jan. 19. It includes $2.1 billion to replenish the Choice Program, which subsidizes non-VA medical care for individuals who face long waits or distances for VA appointments. The program is expected to run out of money within the next month.

But Walz said funding should also be dedicated toward VA itself to hire more doctors and nurses and address infrastructure needs. Veterans' groups have typically called for increases in the non-VA care funding to be paired with funding for VA programs.

Walz called more Choice funding "critical" but said the added dollars "serve only as a funding stop-gap measure" while House and Senate Veterans' Affairs hammer out legislation to overhaul VA's so-called care in the community programs, including Choice.

House Democrats killed legislation in July to replenish the Choice Program using offsets from within the VA budget, which prominent veterans service organizations also opposed.

Bipartisan House duo push appropriators to protect TSA airport funding Back

By Stephanie Beasley | 12/21/2017 03:17 PM EDT

Democratic Rep. Val Demings and Republican Rep. Dan Donovan are pressing appropriators to retain language in a final fiscal 2018 spending bill that would continue funding TSA programs for staffing airport exit lanes and reimbursing airports that hire local law enforcement.

President Donald Trump has proposed eliminating both programs. But they have, so far, been maintained in both House and Senate spending bills. Demings and Donovan say appropriators should ensure that the final bill fully funds the two programs to avoid shifting up to $122 million in "funding burden" to local airports.

POLITICO obtained a copy of a letter the duo sent, along with 40 other House lawmakers, to appropriators today. In addition to Demings and Donovan, the letter is signed by several Homeland Security members, including Bennie Thompson and John Katko.

"Ensuring that trained and specialized law enforcement personnel are securing our transportation infrastructure is basic, necessary, and affordable, and I'm glad that a strong group of bipartisan members of Congress joined me to agree that funding it is a clear priority," Demings said in a statement to POLITICO.

The push comes as the House prepares to vote on a "bare bones" stopgap spending bill today that would fund federal agencies through Jan. 19.

Cochran's future in the Senate in doubt Back

By John Bresnahan | 12/21/2017 04:55 AM EDT

Sen. Thad Cochran, chairman of the powerful Appropriations Committee, hasn't presided over a hearing since early September. The Mississippi Republican has not given a speech on the Senate floor all year, and he's introduced only two bills during that time, both of them minor.

To the extent that Cochran weighs in on any issue, it's in the form of an official statement from his office or the appropriations panel. He has stopped meeting with anyone about substantive committee business, including other senators or House members, according to several sources familiar with his activities. Cochran's aides deny this is the case.

The 80-year-old's feeble performance has fueled expectations — among senators and aides who've witnessed his physical and mental decline firsthand — that Cochran will step down from the Appropriations chairmanship early next year, or resign from the Senate altogether.

"The understanding is that he will leave after Jan. 1," said a Republican senator who serves on the Appropriations Committee. "That's what most of us believe will happen."

A spokesman for the Mississippi Republican said Cochran hasn't divulged his plans.

"Sen. Cochran has not made any statements regarding leaving office. He continues to do his work for Mississippi and the nation," Chris Gallegos, said.

Some sources in contact with Cochran's office believe that he might stay until a major government spending bill is completed, which might happen in January or February.

The concerns about Cochran come at a sensitive time for Senate Republicans. Sen. John McCain, chairman of the Armed Services Committee and former GOP presidential nominee, is undergoing treatment for brain cancer and has returned to Arizona to spend the holidays with his family. Democrat Doug Jones, who scored a stunning upset in the Alabama Senate special election this month, will soon cut the GOP majority to 51-49.

And with President Donald Trump sliding in the polls, what had looked like a chance for Republicans to pick up Senate seats in 2018 has now turned into a battle to simply retain control of the chamber. If Cochran resigns or retires, Mississippi would have two Senate elections in November; incumbent GOP Sen. Roger Wicker is also up for reelection. Republicans would be heavily favored to hold both seats in the conservative state.

Gallegos also said there is no new information on whether Cochran will continue as chairman of the appropriations panel. He used the same formulation in his response that the senator's staffers employed for months in fending off questions about their boss' health.

"He has not made any statements about relinquishing his chairmanship," Gallegos said.

When asked about why Cochran has stopped meeting with senators or members about committee business, Gallegos said, "Sen. Cochran continues to meet with constituents, advocates and administration officials, including those related to his work on the committee. Many of these meetings have been related to defense appropriations."

Gallegos pointed to Cochran's Twitter account as proof of this statement. The account includes pictures of Cochran shaking hands with Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and King Abdullah II of Jordan in recent weeks, among others.

Cochran was absent from the Senate for several weeks during September and October due to a urinary tract infection. His wife, Kay Bowen Webber, makes $165,000 as an executive assistant in his office, according to Senate disbursement records.

If Cochran steps down in 2018, Gov. Phil Bryant (R) would appoint a replacement for him, with a special election to fill the rest Cochran's term taking place in November, the same day as the regularly scheduled election for the seat held by Wicker. If Cochran leaves office before the end of this year, the special election would take place within 100 days, according to Mississippi law.

GOP sources said they've been hoping Cochran doesn't resign or retire before next year to avoid a quick special election.

Potential appointees to replace Cochran, according to Mississippi political insiders and news reports, include Rep. Gregg Harper, Lt. Gov. Tate Reeves and Mississippi Secretary of State Delbert Hosemann, among others.

Chris McDaniel, a state senator who lost to Cochran in a bitter 2014 primary, is considered a leading candidate for the seat as well. McDaniel, however, might challenge Wicker or run for lieutenant governor, he said in an interview.

"My hope is that he's healthy and happy, I just want to see him back to his normal self," McDaniel said of Cochran, adding that he didn't want to speculate on whether a Senate seat would come open soon. "There's just no way to know for sure what will happen."

"Whatever he does, I still have to prepare for a race," McDaniel added. "If I run against Wicker, the race is in June. If there is an open seat, the race is in November. If I run for lieutenant governor, that race is in 2019."

The Senate Appropriations Committee has limped ahead in Cochran's absence. The panel approved two continuing resolutions to keep the government funded, as well as two disaster aid packages.

A Cochran aide noted that any subcommittee chairman can call for hearings, adding that the panel's work typically slows in the fall. There have been two subcommittee hearings on opioids in recent months.

However, Sen. Richard Shelby (Ala.), the No. 2 Republican on the panel, is effectively serving as chairman, according to numerous senators and GOP staffers. Shelby is expected to take over if Cochran steps aside.

Shelby declined to discuss Cochran or his own role on the panel.

Both the House and Senate have been forced to replace aging or sick committee chairmen in the past, an extraordinarily delicate undertaking. Few of these senior lawmakers easily give up their powerful posts: The decision affects not only them but their home states and districts, as well the network of lobbyists and consultants who rely on their patronage.

The late Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) voluntarily gave up his gavel at the Senate Appropriations Committee in November 2008. Byrd was 91 and faced questions about his health and ability to manage the panel.

The late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) stepped down as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in 1997, when he was 95 years old. And former Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), at age 82, was ousted as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee by the now-retired Democratic Rep. Henry Waxman.

Republican Control of the Senate Hangs by a Thread Back

By Jeff Greenfield | 12/21/2017 04:56 AM EDT

Only one Republican senator ultimately didn't vote for the tax bill—and it wasn't because of concerns about the debt, or the tilt of the bill toward the wealthiest Americans. It was because John McCain was back home in Arizona, battling life-threatening brain cancer.

Mississippi's Thad Cochran did make the vote, after missing votes throughout the fall, due to a persistent urinary tract infection. The health of the 80-year old Cochran has raised questions about whether he will be able to serve out his term, which has three more years to run.

Should the health of these two senators force them to step down, the political consequences could be hugely consequential. Arizona would have two Senate seats in play in 2018. Democrats have already targeted the seat of retiring Republican Jeff Flake, finding encouragement in the narrow results of Arizona's presidential contest (Donald Trump won with a 3.5 percent plurality, contrasted with Mitt Romney's 9-point win in 2012). Capturing both seats could be enough to put Democrats in control of the Senate (assuming they hold all of the seats they're defending next year—10 of them in states Trump won).

While Mississippi is deep red, Cochran barely survived a 2014 primary challenge from state Senator Chris McDaniel. The Tea Party favorite actually ran slightly ahead of Cochran in the first primary, then lost the runoff by only 7,500 votes. An open seat in Mississippi could trigger an intense fight that could wind up with a fringe candidate sufficiently unappealing to put that safe GOP seat in play. Just ask Alabama.

This speculation might seem morbid, but there's a point that has to be kept in mind as the 2018 midterms loom. Beyond the traditional measurements—generic ballots, the president's approval rating, the state of the economy—there are matters of fate that can and have played decisive roles in who takes the reins of power. And in a Senate so narrowly divided, those matters loom especially large; everything from a Supreme Court nomination to the future of health care to the scope of financial and environmental regulation may hang on a single vote.

Back in 2002, Democrats held a one-vote margin in the Senate, thanks to the defection a year earlier by Vermont Republican Jim Jeffords. (His decision to become an independent and caucus with Democrats shifted the balance of power.) But just 11 days before the midterm election, Minnesota Senator Paul Wellstone died in a plane crash. His stand-in, former vice president Walter Mondale, lost to Norm Coleman, and Coleman became the 51st GOP senator. Had Wellstone been reelected, the Senate would have been evenly split.

One can go back further in time. When the 83rd Congress convened in 1953, Republicans held a 48-47 margin (Oregon's Wayne Morse had left the GOP to become an independent, but chose not to caucus with either party). Over the next two years, nine senators died. In two of those cases, the deceased senator was replaced by a member of the opposing party. When Ohio's Robert Taft died in July, his Democratic replacement gave that party a one-vote advantage. The following June, when Wyoming Democrat Lester Hunt committed suicide, his Republican replacement restored a Republican one-vote margin.

The most critical lesson from history is what did not happen. As Senate historian Betty Koed notes, "When the second session began in January 1954, the Democrats actually had a one-member advantage in the body, but the Senate did not reorganize under the Democrats. Or, perhaps I should say, the Democrats did not insist on reorganizing." This led to an unprecedented situation, best summarized in an exchange between the respective party leaders. When Republican William Knowland said, "I have the responsibility of being majority leader in this body without a majority," Democratic leader Lyndon Johnson replied: "If anybody has more problems than a majority leader with a minority, it is a minority leader with a majority." It's hard to imagine Democrats making a similar decision today. Back then, both parties were highly diverse, with very conservative Democrats and very liberal Republicans. The party designations were far less reliable predictors of how any given senator would vote.

Not anymore. In recent decades, major votes have broken down consistently across party lines. Not one Democrat voted to repeal Obamacare, or for this week's tax cuts. Not one Republican voted for Obamacare, or for Bill Clinton's 1993 budget. Given such near-total partisanship, the loss of one or two senators would shift not just the numerical balance of power, but the balance on issues ranging from judicial confirmations to the funding of the government.

At the risk of taking yet another step into the morbid, here's another thing to consider: If a senator steps down, how is that senator replaced? While some states require special elections—we just saw that in Alabama—36 states give the governor the power of appointment. And in only four states—Hawaii, North Carolina, Utah and Wyoming—is the governor required to choose a replacement from the same party as the departing senator. Right now, there are 23 Democratic senators from states with Republican governors. (I'm excluding New Jersey from this count because there will be a Democratic governor in a couple of weeks.) Only seven Republican senators come from states with Democratic governors and two of them are from North Carolina, where the governor must choose a Republican successor.

No one but the most fanatical partisan looks at the political horizon in hopes that illness, injury or death removes an opponent from the battle. But neither does it serve a clear-eyed view of politics to ignore how the arrival of the unexpected can radically alter expectations. There have been too many times when a "black swan" has appeared to ignore the possibility—and the consequences— of a sudden twist of fate.

Will the tax cuts sink Trump's military buildup? Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/20/2017 04:18 PM EDT

The Republican tax cut plan may be on a collision course with another major legislative priority for President Donald Trump and the GOP: rebuilding the military.

With warnings that the tax measure could add at least a trillion dollars to the budget deficit over the next decade, leading congressional Democrats on military policy, Obama-era Defense secretaries and federal budget experts predict that the red ink will probably crowd out the sustained increases in Pentagon spending that Trump has pledged. They note that the military has often borne the brunt of the belt-tightening that ballooning deficits have demanded in the past.

"If history is any judge, when we pass these tax cuts, we will see further decline as defense spending is squeezed by an already acknowledged increased deficit and by the difficulty to cut other programs," Jack Reed of Rhode Island, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, argued in a recent floor speech on the tax plan.

"It doesn't even begin to add up," added Rep. Adam Smith of Washington state, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, in an interview. "So, it'll be a big problem for the Department of Defense down the line."

GOP hawks reject the notion that the tax cuts will make a military expansion unaffordable in the coming years. They are pushing to enact $700 billion in defense spending for the current fiscal year — up from Trump's $668 billion request — as a down payment on their long sought-after buildup.

They also dispute that the cuts will create a fiscal crunch similar to the high deficits that led to Congress and the Obama administration to agree to strict budget caps for defense and domestic agencies in 2011.

In contrast, separate analyses of the House and Senate versions of the tax bill by the Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that both measures would increase the deficit by roughly $1 trillion, even after accounting for economic growth. A committee analysis for the final bill estimates it would add $1.4 trillion to the deficit before any economic growth is factored in. The House cleared a final tax bill for Trump's signature Wednesday.

"It will increase the debt dramatically, and that is definitely going to squeeze on many other priorities," said Maya MacGuineas, president of the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget. "Defense certainly will be a big one of those."

Defense hawks on Capitol Hill have so far downplayed the threat.

Rep. Mike Turner (R-Ohio), a leading member of the House Armed Services Committee, expressed his belief that the military's needs are just too great to cut defense again.

"The deficits are a great concern, but everybody realizes that over the past five, seven years, defense has been the payer for other spending or to effect deficit reduction," Turner said. "It can't be anymore. We can't cut anymore."

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) said he is counting on economic growth spurred by the tax cut to raise government revenues enough to also cover the Pentagon budget increases. But the Joint Committee on Taxation's predictions of upward of a trillion dollar price tag cast doubt on how much economic growth will eat into the anticipated deficit.

"It depends on the growth assumption that you build in," Thornberry said. "And so some of these negative projections that have been made build in very pessimistic growth assumptions."

But other prominent voices in the defense world predict that defense spending will again come under assault.

Three former Obama administration Defense secretaries — Leon Panetta, Chuck Hagel and Ash Carter — have also warned that the military will feel the effects of tax legislation that Congress doesn't pay for.

They cautioned in a letter last month to congressional leaders that increased debt would "force even deeper reductions in our national security capabilities."

"A wise fiscal policy that is necessary to support the U.S. defense community and its mission must address these long-term fiscal challenges," wrote the trio, two Democrats and one Republican. "Unfortunately, the tax bill being considered by Congress appears to be moving in the opposite direction."

The federal budget deficit's impact on defense spending has been hanging over the Pentagon for years.

Defense spending, along with funding for domestic agencies, was capped through fiscal 2021 by the 2011 Budget Control Act. And while Congress has modestly increased the caps for defense every year since 2013, advocates for a more robust Pentagon budget blame the law for degrading readiness and a shrinking force.

Trump campaigned on eliminating the so-called defense sequester and building up the military, including expanding the Army to 540,000 troops and the Navy to more than 350 ships. Congressional leaders are mulling a two-year budget deal to increase caps for both defense and domestic spending.

But even if Congress had scrapped both the tax cuts and the defense increase altogether, the deficit was already projected to reach $1 trillion beginning in 2022.

"We already have a structural deficit problem that gets worse and worse throughout the '20s, '30s and '40s ... and then you add to that lower revenues from tax cuts, now you've widened it," said budget analyst Todd Harrison of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "You've made the problem worse. And then you throw in more defense spending and that also widens."

While it makes up more than half of voluntary — or so-called discretionary — spending, defense accounts for only about 15 percent of the federal total budget. For many Republicans, the answer is to overhaul the so-called mandatory government entitlements programs like Medicare and Social Security that are considered the true drivers of long-term federal spending — though that would be a difficult task at best in an election year.

"To get out of debt, you've got to do entitlement reform," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.). "The long-term debt problems are not associated with the discretionary spending, they're not associated with the tax code. They're associated with entitlements."

On top of tax cuts and additional defense spending this year, lawmakers plan to allocate $81 billion in disaster aid for nearly a dozen states and territories ravaged by hurricanes and wildfires as part of their year-end to-do list, which also includes keeping the government funded past Friday.

The deluge of new spending and the lack of guarantees that the tax cut will substantially grow the economy will undoubtedly force unpleasant decisions down the line, the budget specialists say.

"When the BCA was enacted in 2011, the projected deficit for 2011 was over $1 trillion and that was a big part of what was driving it," Harrison said. "So it's perfectly conceivable that we'll get to fiscal year '22 and something similar will happen."

"Our budgeting for the past years has been incredibly shortsighted and had prioritized political ease of borrowing over putting together sensible budgets that reflect national priorities and sustainable economic policies," added MacGuineas. "And that means we're headed for some real challenging times."

Thornberry says he is more worried about the state of the military than about what how the tax cut might affect the Pentagon's priorities years from now.

Asked if he is worried that anticipated deficits will squeeze defense, he replied: "I am more concerned about fixing ships and planes and readiness today, with the problems we face today, than I am anything else."

Shanahan predicts FY 2020 budget will be 'masterpiece' in buildup plan Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 12/21/2017 11:56 AM EDT

Deputy Defense Secretary Pat Shanahan today said the Trump administration's fiscal 2019 budget request due in February will seek another increase in defense spending but predicted the fiscal 2020 request is likely to be "the masterpiece ... the next biggest step we can take."

In a briefing to reporters the Pentagon's second ranking official also said he plans to focus his energies in the coming year on implementing a new National Defense Strategy while managing modernization programs like Lockheed Martin's F-35 joint strike fighter and Huntington Ingalls' work on the next generation aircraft carriers — both of which have faced criticism for ballooning costs.

Shanahan said he expects the Pentagon to release its National Defense Strategy in January, followed by much-anticipated Nuclear Posture Review and Ballistic Missile Defense Review in February.

Next year will also see the department begin to implement some of the reforms mandated in the fiscal 2018 National Defense Authorization Act, including delegating the role of principal space adviser to someone other than the secretary of the Air Force.

He said it's "possible" Mike Griffin, a former NASA administrator who was nominated in October to be the under secretary of defense for research and engineering, could fill that role.

GOP senators revive tax extender legislation, again Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/20/2017 08:40 PM EDT

Senate Republicans introduced legislation Wednesday to breathe new life into a host of lapsed tax benefits, the same day they also passed a wider-reaching tax overhaul that they previously touted as the end of temporary tax policy.

The so-called extenders bill, introduced by Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), would give another two years of life to nearly three dozen tax provisions that expired at the end of 2016.

They include benefits related to owning race horses, building auto-racing tracks and ongoing railroad maintenance. The bill also would let homeowners continue to itemize their mortgage insurance premiums and would extend and alter energy credits, including the Investment Tax Credit, the nuclear production tax credit and the credit for carbon dioxide sequestration.

No cost for Hatch's bill was provided, but supporters of the broader tax legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), already claimed a fiscal benefit.

They declared about $500 billion in savings from the cost of extending the numerous tax provisions, using what's known as a current policy baseline, which assumes the provisions would stay on the books since they have been routinely extended. By contrast, using a current law baseline would recognize the scheduled expiration of the benefits, meaning proposals to extend them would cost money.

Hatch's House counterpart, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), declined to comment on the accounting method.

"You're talking to the chairman who doesn't want to do extenders," Brady said.

The extenders included in the new package were last renewed at the end of 2015 under the Protecting Americans from Tax Hikes, or PATH, Act. It made a number of extenders permanent and gave two- and five-year extensions to others.

The strategy to advance this new bloc of extenders hasn't been determined, Brady said.

"We'll turn to that after we get back" from the holiday break, he said. "That's my anticipation."

A spokesperson for Hatch, Katie Niederee, offered no more specifics on timing, though pressure has been mounting from influence groups to attach extenders to any end-of-year legislation still moving through Congress.

"Extending these provisions would help families, individuals and small businesses in Utah and across the country, and the chairman is committed to working with members to address the expiring extenders in short order," Niederee said in an email.

A letter to Hatch, Brady and other congressional leaders from about 60 trade associations representing energy, housing, transportation, agriculture and other interests called on Congress to preserve all the benefits dear to their member companies.

"Allowing these tax provisions to remain lapsed creates confusion in the marketplace, and effectively increases taxes on entities that create jobs and economic growth," said the letter. "Accordingly, we respectfully ask that Congress add a multi-year extension, beginning January, 2017, of these important tax provisions to any end-of-year legislative vehicle."

But conservative groups have weighed in with opposition.

Extenders represent tax code carve-outs to special interests and continuing them would be wrong, said Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity. The group, funded by the conservative, billionaire Koch brothers, worked closely with Brady, Hatch and other congressional Republicans to get the broader tax overhaul legislation to President Donald Trump.

"We have not made any deals to look the other way on extenders," said Phillips, insisting that he wouldn't back down from opposing the effort to yet again revive temporary tax policy.

Fannie and Freddie will keep $3B as Treasury, Watt make deal Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 12/21/2017 09:20 AM EDT

The Treasury Department and the Federal Housing Finance Agency will reinstate a $3 billion capital reserve for Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, FHFA Director Mel Watt announced.

The capital agreement will buffer the mortgage giants from market fluctuations after an earlier bailout contract between Treasury and the FHFA required the companies to send their profits to taxpayers and eliminate their reserves in exchange for a $258 billion taxpayer lifeline.

The $3 billion won't be enough to prevent Fannie and Freddie from seeking taxpayer aid as a result of tax reform, Watt said in a statement.

A February analysis by Fitch Ratings calculated that the mortgage giants would need to write down a combined $23.1 billion in tax assets under a 20 percent tax rate. As a result, the companies are likely to require another infusion of taxpayer cash early next year.

"While it is apparent that a draw will be necessary for each Enterprise if tax legislation results in a reduction to the corporate tax rate, FHFA considers the $3 billion capital reserve sufficient to cover other fluctuations in income in the normal course of each Enterprise's business," Watt wrote. "We, therefore, contemplate that going forward Enterprise dividends will be declared and paid beyond the $3 billion capital reserve in the absence of exigent circumstances."

To compensate taxpayers for the $6 billion buffer, the debt Fannie and Freddie owe to Treasury will increase from $187 billion to $193 billion on Dec. 31.

"Treasury's first duty is to ensure that taxpayers are being protected," Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said in a written statement. "This agreement balances the concerns of the FHFA with compensation for taxpayers."

The mortgage giants are scheduled to send $7.7 billion in earnings to taxpayers at the end of this month.

Judge to act quickly in hospital lawsuit opposing 340B cuts Back

By David Pittman | 12/21/2017 01:08 PM EDT

A federal judge said today he intends to rule on a dispute over hefty drug discounts to hospitals by the end of the year, when a $1.6 billion cut to the 340B program ordered by the Trump administration is scheduled to hit.

The American Hospital Association and other hospitals are seeking to block a Medicare rule that will slash payment of certain drugs by nearly 30 percent to providers serving predominately low-income patients. That would put the hospitals' reimbursement more in line with their cost of buying the drugs.

U.S. District Court Judge Rudolph Contreras, an Obama appointee, hinted at the opening of today's nearly 90-minute hearing that he may bypass the hospitals' request for a preliminary injunction in the case and rule immediately. He noted that his decision is likely to face an appeal.

"My goal is decide soon and let the circuit court decide it," Contreras told attorneys.

The hospitals' attorney, Carlos Angulo, argued Congress never gave HHS the authority to cut payments for certain drugs in 340B so dramatically,

"What HHS has done here is dismiss the [funding] formula altogether," Angulo said.

DOJ attorney Joel McElvain argued that HHS has broad authority to set payment policy. The legal precedent for arguing agency action flouts congressional intent is "a very narrow" standard, he said. "We're nowhere close to that here."

Hospitals said if the cuts take effect, facilities may lay off staff and limit or cut services.

POLITICO Pro Q&A: Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune Back

By Brianna Gurciullo | 12/21/2017 05:24 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's plan for giving U.S. infrastructure a $1 trillion overhaul is expected to be in the hands of lawmakers in January, with Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune (R-S.D.) likely to be involved. We sat down with Thune and talked rural issues, drones, driverless cars and more.

This transcript has been edited for length and clarity.

Infrastructure will be a major issue in 2018. What do you think about the Trump administration's approach — especially when it comes to rural areas?

Well, I think structurally they allocate [dedicated funds] to the rural. I assume that means funding that resembles in some ways the way we've done traditional infrastructure funding in the country — through formulas that ensure that parts of the country that are not gonna be able to benefit from a [public-private partnership], for example, where there's a return on investment, also can participate in whatever the big infrastructure plan is. ... We had them up here, the administration's team, a few weeks ago, and they kind of laid out that same format and I don't think anybody had big problems with it. I think the big question for us was: 'How do you fund it?' ... But I think at least in terms of the structure of it, it probably makes sense.

What are your thoughts on the proposed program for states and localities?

I think there are some states where you could, and there are some states probably who could do more. I mean our state really has stepped up. Our governor just in the last few years raised the fuel tax in South Dakota significantly. And there have been a couple of other states that have done that. But I think if states want to become bigger partners, there should be a benefit to that. I mean, I think states that are willing to assume a bigger share or match, in terms of the funding for these types of projects, that at least in theory makes sense to me. Obviously, the devil's in the details and we'll see what they send up. We're supposed to get something early next year, we're told.

In the House, Transportation Committee Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.) has said "everything's on the table" with respect to paying for it. Is there any pay-for that you would rule out?

Well, I think it's important that we keep an open mind about funding sources. I think it's important if we're gonna fund infrastructure through the Highway Trust Fund, that we pay for it. ... We've done several bills now, highway bills, where we have basically borrowed the money, put it on the debt. And I just think that's a bad way to do it. As a conservative, I think you ought to be offended by the fact that we borrow money to pay for infrastructure. If we're going to build things in this country, we need to figure out a way to pay for it. So I think at this point in the conversation, [we want to] try and not take options off the table, and I think we have to be willing to entertain and listen to people's ideas about how we do that.

And I think it's gonna be important, frankly, at some point for the administration to put something out there. ... I talked to Shuster about this [recently]. But I think the administration kind of wants to let Congress take the lead on finding the funding source. But I think the president, if he really wants to do this, is gonna have to help with selling whatever that is and perhaps identify a funding source that they like and get out and advocate for it. But, again, when we see what they put forward we'll have a better idea, I think, on that question as well.

Moving on to the FAA reauthorization, S. 1405 \(115\). What's your plan for dealing with your provision regarding co-pilot training in 2018?

We've moved the ball on that issue. [Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao] now recognizes that pilot supply, pilot shortage, is an issue — not only now but in the future, both for commercial aviation as well as for military. There are some things I think that they and the FAA can do that will advance that cause. So we'll look forward to working with them on that. Obviously, I'd love to keep the provision in the bill. But I realize there is some controversy there. But it's an issue that's very real, and I think people need to acknowledge that and help look for ways to address what is gonna become I think even more of an issue in the future.

So, are you willing to take that provision out?

We'll see. I understand that to move the bill —and I think we need to move the bill — but I think we have elevated the issue to a point where there is a recognition within the DOT, the FAA ... but also I think in the broader conversation about this, that it's something that needs to be addressed. So is there a way we can do that short of having it included in the FAA legislation? There may be.

But what other options are there? The FAA has said they aren't going to make changes without a directive from Congress.

That's what they've said so far, yeah.

Well, FAA Administrator Michael Huerta is leaving soon. Is this something you'd want to bring up with the next administrator?

Yeah. These are issues that we're continuing to explore with the administration. And we've made some headway with them, I believe. And I hope that we continue to make even more headway. So having it in the bill has served, I think, an important purpose. And if we end up having to yank it out to pass the bill sometime next year, I'm hoping there will be other ways in which we can see some movement on the issue that I think gets us closer to some solutions. It's been a good conversation so far.

Mr. Huerta's term expires next month. What is your take on his time at the FAA — his accomplishments and what will be left to the next administrator?

We've worked with him well. He's, I think, been very responsive when it comes to the concerns that we have as we've raised them. We got through the last FAA bill. I think there were a number of issues in there that the administration was involved in helping us as we negotiated that. Unfortunately, that was a short-term bill. We're going to have to do this again. ... The drone issue is one that I think is gonna continue to percolate into the future. And we're gonna need some guidance and some clarity, some direction, not only from DOT and FAA, but I think Congress again is gonna have to provide some rules of the road, so to speak, on that issue. And there's some things that we still have to do that we do in this bill — the consumer protection issues, aircraft certification — there's a whole range of things in this FAA bill that are sort of left undone.

But I think he's been a very responsive administrator who I think has tried to move the ball down the field on a range of issues. ... We dealt with him of course with the last highway bill, too, on [Airport Improvement Program] funding and a number of things that have been good for rural airports. He gets that. ... So I don't know what I would say is his singular legacy. But I can just say generally speaking that, with the exception of the 1,500-hour rule — but I don't blame him for that. I mean that's kind of been a long-held position — he's been a good administrator.

You mentioned drones, and another emerging technology is self-driving cars. What are some of the lessons learned from doing a self-driving car bill, S. 1885 \(115\), this year, since I assume it won't be the last one Congress does?

Probably not. I think that we did resolve a couple of key issues when we moved the bill through here. And some of it had to do with the question of liability and the question of state versus federal control. This is an issue which historically has been kind of jointly regulated. The states have done the behavioral side. They deal with the driver. And the feds regulate the car. And the question is [about what] if you don't have a driver? So that kind of changes the discussion about that. And with driverless vehicles, the question is liability. So if there's an accident, who's liable? You get insurance issues. [There's] a whole range of things, I think, that are gonna continue to have to be addressed and re-addressed in the future.

But I think the [legislation] provides a good framework and provides some testing and some requirements that have to be met by folks who are developing these new vehicles. ... I think it's just a really transformative technology that we need to make sure there are some clear guidelines around, some sort of safeguards, if you will, but not the kind of heavy-handed government that really prevents that technology from advancing. So it's a fine line. It's a balance we have to try and strike. I think our bill did that. And I'm hoping that we can get the holds cleared on it in the Senate and maybe get it passed out of here this year.

Is there anything from the process of doing the bill that you would have done differently in hindsight?

Not really. There were a couple things that happened late in the process that we had to react to. We had trucks included in the early drafts and then all of a sudden the Teamsters realized that that was in there. And so the Democrats were scrambling, then, to get trucks out. And, frankly, I think long-term you're gonna have to deal with the truck side of this, too. I've said this before, but it seems to me that to have two separate standards for trucks and automobiles [that are] using the same roadways doesn't make sense to me. But in order to keep the bill bipartisan, we had to pull that out. So would I like to have it in there? Yeah. And if we could do it over again and we could write the bill the way we want to write it, we would have trucks in there.

Then at the end, after that came up, then the trial lawyers reacted to what we were doing in terms of state versus federal from a legal standpoint, and we negotiated, which I think was, again, a very delicate compromise. So our bill, while not perfect, I think represents something that could — that ought to have broad bipartisan support. And I think with the exception of a couple of folks who have expressed [concerns] or at least have placed holds on it on the floor, I think it would pass with a huge majority. So I think we did it the right way. We worked closely with the Democrats on the committee throughout the process. We had to negotiate some compromises that probably we wouldn't have, but in the end it's a bill that I think will be pretty durable because I think it'll be a big bipartisan winner when the time comes for a vote.

With self-driving trucks, even though you wanted to have them in the Senate's bill, they were taken out to get a bipartisan result. But with the FAA bill, you continued to push for the language on pilot training, which splits Democrats and Republicans. So how do you decide when you want to fight something or don't?

As much as we can, like you said, we try to achieve consensus. There's some issues where just that's not gonna happen or you're not gonna have a bill that's reported out by voice or by [unanimous consent], even though we do a ton to narrow the differences. On the FAA bill that we passed last year, I think we took on, what, 60-some amendments in the committee and then processed another 30-some on the floor. And they were kind of evenly divided between Republican and Democrat. So we do everything we can to fix people's issues prior to markup. But sometimes you just can't get there.

To me, the 1,500-hour rule is an important issue for the people that I represent — smaller communities, smaller airports, with limited access to commercial air service. And that's not just South Dakota. That's an issue that applies to most rural areas of the country, and we have a lot members on the committee who care about that. So I think sometimes it has to do with sort of the urgency of the issue, how intensely people feel about it and whether or not there's a solution in sight. And like I said, having the 1,500-hour rule on the FAA bill, although it kept us from getting a completely bipartisan vote coming out of the committee, has had a desired effect. I mean it has elevated the issue in a way that it hasn't before. And if we end up stripping it in order to pass the bill next year, there was a purpose and I think the discussion about it's been impactful.

Do you think you'll need to strip it for the bill to pass?

I think it's going to be hard to get a lot of the Democrats on board. I think there are Democrats who understand what we're trying to do here and who are impacted in ways. I mean we've got rural Democrats for sure in the Senate, and some on the committee, although we had more rural Democrats in the last session of Congress than we do now. But I think people across party lines understand it. But I also think it'd be very difficult, probably, to get 60 votes for the bill with that provision included. So at some point we'll have a discussion about the path forward — and I want to move a bill.

But right now we're kind of in this holding pattern anyway because we've been waiting for the House to determine whether or not they have the votes to pass their version of it, which included the ATC reforms. At this point, we're in a good place, but early next year, we'll have to make a decision if we want to move forward with the Commerce Committee-passed bill. And if we feel like the House isn't getting sufficient traction to move their bill, I'm not going to sit around forever, and then we'll have to make a decision about that provision.

HUD abandons flood and public housing rules Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 12/21/2017 01:45 PM EDT

HUD will abandon five proposed rules, including a flood-resiliency standard designed to protect houses backed by taxpayer funds.

In a notice, the agency said it won't advance a flood-protection standard generated under President Barack Obama that requires properties backed by HUD funds, including those with Federal Housing Administration mortgages, to be built at a higher elevation when they're in flood-prone areas.

The action is part of the agency's effort to conform to an executive order issued by President Donald Trump just days after his inauguration. The order requires agencies to identify two rules for elimination for each new regulation.

It comes as the country begins the difficult and costly effort of rebuilding after three destructive hurricanes. Since Hurricane Sandy, the agency has applied the flood-resiliency standard to disaster recovery funds. It's not clear if that practice will continue.

HUD will also abandon rules making it more difficult to demolish public housing and a regulation that sought to streamline the administration of public housing funds.

WHAT'S NEXT: The notice will be published Dec. 22.

The $500 million question: Does IRS need more money for tax overhaul? Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/21/2017 03:10 PM EDT

The chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee and one of his lieutenants differed today over the best approach to making sure the cash-strapped IRS is ready to implement the massive tax overhaul bill Congress passed Wednesday.

Rep. Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), chairman of the Ways and Means Oversight Subcommittee, said lawmakers are discussing an infusion of around $500 million to the IRS early next year to cover some implementation costs. But full committee Chairman Kevin Brady took a wait-and-see approach.

The revenue collection agency needs to revise or develop forms, rules and guidance — quite soon in some cases — as the law H.R. 1 \(115\) takes effect Jan. 1.

"This is to help the transition," Buchanan said. "For payroll companies and everybody else, a lot of this has to get in place quickly, and the IRS is going to need additional funds to do that."

As oversight chairman, Buchanan deals regularly with the IRS and is working on legislation to remake the revenue collection agency's operations.

But separately, Brady seemed more uncertain about boosting IRS funding for implementation.

"I don't know that," Brady said. "The first question is, what do they need to implement this? And what of their current resources should be prioritized to that end?"

Congressional Republicans for years have stunted the IRS budget; it would decline to about $11.1 billion under fiscal year 2018 spending legislation, H.R. 3354 \(115\), that already has passed the House. A Senate appropriations bill would set a similar spending level, and critics have said the steady funding drop since 2010 has eroded the IRS' ability to enforce and administer tax laws.

Buchanan said the extra $500 million could get delivered next month to the IRS, but added that the timing remains fluid.

Brady, however, said the IRS, which is being run by acting Commissioner David Kautter, would have to demonstrate a need for any additional appropriations.

"Under a new acting commissioner, if they can make that case in conjunction with Treasury, we'll listen to it," Brady said. "I'll listen to it. But the assumption is not we're opening up the pocketbook. The assumption is we need to know what it takes to implement this effectively and efficiently, and if you don't already have those resources in your agency."

Congress is on the verge of passing another temporary spending patch to extend federal government funding until Jan. 19, since the current stopgap funding runs out Friday. The bill, H.R. 1370 \(115\), would also waive so-called Pay-As-You-Go rules set to impose billions of dollars in cuts next year to programs like Medicare, since the tax overhaul legislation would add to the deficit.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: House leaders look to their own for stopgap passage — PAYGO worries grow with each tax reform vote — Appropriators put finishing touches on disaster aid bill
Date: Friday, December 01, 2017 4:32:09 PM

PUSHING AHEAD WITHOUT PELOSI? House Speaker Paul Ryan and his deputies are confident they can avoid a shutdown next Friday. The question is whether they can do it without Democrats.

GOP leaders are forging ahead with that contentious "double CR" strategy — requiring two separate continuing resolutions to keep the lights on through January. And despite the long odds, they're working hard to get enough Republicans onboard, as Sarah explains. "We want to do it with our own votes," Freedom Caucus member Dave Brat (R-Va.) said today.

Talking a big game? Plenty of GOP lawmakers love the idea of voting for a funding bill without goodies for Democrats — but they're still loathe to punt big spending decisions to the night before Christmas Eve. "I think it's 50-50 right now," Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker (R-N.C.) said this morning. Corraling 218 Republican "yeas" would be an enormous victory for a party that so often turns to Democrats to keep the government funded.

Make-or-break moment: Many conservatives say they're waiting to take a stand until they see the results of the "Big Four" budget talks over the next week. Congressional leaders are aiming to have new overall spending levels in hand by next Friday. "The point of doing a CR is it enables and allows decisions to be made on the caps," Rules Chairman Pete Sessions (R-Texas) said today.

Holding the cards close: Democrats are taking a similar tactic, refusing to commit to the bill until more decisions are made. "We have no resolve on CHIP, we have no resolve on the DREAMers. So without any of that resolved, why, why would I vote for an extension?" Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) told POLITICO. "I'm going to wait and see what we've got."

GOOD FRIDAY AFTERNOON! Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

Doc of the day — The Senate Homeland Security Committee's top Democrat, Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), sent a letter to FEMA this week asking why the agency awarded $30 million in contracts to a newly formed Florida company that was unable to complete work on the hurricane-ravaged island.

#DailyBudgetFact — The federal government spent $32.9 billion on HIV in fiscal 2017, mostly paying for health care and treatment covered by Medicaid and Medicare. The smallest chunk of federal spending on HIV was for prevention, at about $700 million.

PAYGO

ONE STEP CLOSER TO AUTOMATIC CUTS: As Republicans near victory on a tax overhaul, anxiety grows over how to handle the $150 billion per year in spending cuts set to come down under PAYGO if the reform bill gets enacted. But with all the legislative attention focused on the tax plan itself, leaders haven't spent much time trying to drum up support for avoiding those reductions, Adam Cancryn and Sarah explain.

DISASTER RELIEF

JUST IN TIME FOR CHRISTMAS: House Republicans are tentatively planning to package the next installment of disaster aid with the Dec. 22 stopgap funding bill, according to a senior lawmaker. "There's working agreement to that model," Texas' Sessions said today. "I think some of these things all collide together."

Plugging away: After a spate of hearings this week, House appropriators are working quickly to craft a disaster aid package that could survive both chambers. That supplemental bill could be ready next week. But it's more likely to emerge after the Dec. 8 spending deadline, according to a senior GOP aide. Still no word on how much bigger that package will be compared to the White House's $44 billion request.

TAX

STILL IN THE RED: The Joint Committee on Taxation has weighed in with an updated analysis of the Senate's tax plan (H.R. 1 \(115\)), predicting now that the bill would still increase the deficit by about $1 trillion, even when accounting for extra economic growth, Brian Faler reports. Democrats are obviously gloating. "The score ends the fantasy of magical growth, about unicorns and growth fairies," says Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), the Finance Committee's ranking member.

Too bad, 'trigger' lovers: Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) says it doesn't look like the "trigger" plan is going to work after talks with the parliamentarian. But he added that other ideas are being vetted for scrounging up revenue if the tax bill doesn't deliver on the economic growth that has been estimated.

WHIP IT GOOD: Emerging from a GOP caucus meeting today on the last round of changes to the Senate tax bill, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) declared that "we have the votes," Seung Min Kim, Colin Wilhelm and Brian report.

ANOTHER SEXUAL HARASSMENT SETTLEMENT: House Administration Chairman Gregg Harper (R-Miss.) gave his GOP colleagues a rundown this morning of sexual harassment payouts made over the last five years on behalf of member offices. Of the six claims settled through the congressional fund during the last half-decade, one $84,000 payment piqued lawmakers' interest. The alleged perpetrator? HIGHER ED REWRITE: House Republicans released their plan today for rewriting the main law governing higher education, proposing to overhaul the federal student aid program by creating "one loan, one work-study and one grant," Michael Stratford reports. The main association representing colleges and universities in Washington said today that it's "deeply concerned" about the proposal, claiming the plan would "immediately lead to higher interest charges every year for some six million student borrowers and eliminate 1.5 million financial aid grants."

DACA FIX MOMENTUM: At least 29 House Republicans have now signed onto a letter urging the speaker to codify protections for DREAMers before year's end, according to a House GOP staffer. But the missive doesn't mention pairing the deal to one of the stopgap spending plans Congress plans to move this month. "It is imperative that Republicans and Democrats come together to solve this problem now and not wait until next year," says the letter, which has not yet been delivered and was organized by Reps. Scott Taylor and Dan Newhouse.

AGRICULTURE

TALK ABOUT A CASH COW: New USDA data shows that the nation's most profitable farms are taking home a growing share of agriculture subsidies, Catherine Boudreau reports. Farms that rake in at least $1 million in net cash income received 34 percent of commodity subsidies in 2015, up from 11 percent in 1991.

What's the deal? These federal payments are shifting to larger operations mostly because they're tied to output. Big farms nearly doubled their share of production between 1991 and 2015.

House GOP leaders plot to avert shutdown, but may need Democrats Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/01/2017 01:46 PM EDT

House GOP leaders are forging ahead with a spending strategy that has drawn flak from far-right members, making it increasingly likely that they will need help from Democrats to avert a shutdown.

One week before a key funding deadline, Speaker Paul Ryan confirmed to members Friday in a conference meeting that the House will vote on two separate short-term spending bills — one through Dec. 22 and another through January.

The two-part vote is intended to drum up pressure on Democrats to strike a much-needed budget deal by the time government funding runs out on Dec. 8, GOP aides say. But the unconventional tactic has been met with skepticism from conservatives, who fear they'll get rolled in a last-minute deal before the holidays.

Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.), a member of the House Freedom Caucus, warned of an "end-of-year Christmas party of spending with Democrats."

"The budgeting never goes good when everybody loads up the Christmas tree," Brat said. "You got to give me one heck of a good argument for a two-week [continuing resolution]. I haven't heard it yet."

If more than two dozen of the House GOP's far-right flank oppose the strategy, Ryan would need to lean on Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi for votes. That trade-off would almost certainly require the GOP to make painful concessions in a spending deal, like bigger boosts for domestic programs.

GOP leaders explicitly warned during the closed-door meeting that they would need to seek help from Democrats if their own members voted against keeping the government open.

"They said, basically ... 'Hey, if we've got the votes, then we do it. If we don't got the votes, then you got to go do things to get votes from elsewhere outside the conference,'" Rep. Mark Amodei (R-Nev.) told reporters.

Democrats are so far refusing to commit to helping Republicans pass a spending bill, ticking off a list of long-simmering political issues like protections for DREAMers, or young undocumented immigrants, and funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program.

"We have no resolve on CHIP, we have no resolve on the DREAMers, so without any of that resolved, why, why would I vote for an extension?" Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) told POLITICO. "I'm going to wait and see what we've got."

Pelosi stressed her commitment to bigger domestic spending levels, as well as a DREAMers deal, in a press conference Thursday. But she also underscored her intention to avoid a public showdown. "We want to keep government open. That's what we are about," Pelosi told reporters.

House Republicans began whipping the votes Friday morning, with a vote tentatively planned for Wednesday — two days before the Dec. 8 deadline.

Emerging from the meeting, many Republicans said they remained undecided. The biggest question: What will GOP leaders concede to Democrats in spending talks over the next week?

Both parties say they hope to have a spending deal in hand before the deadline — laying out the fiscal 2018 budget for the Pentagon and domestic programs. Members said that agreement will likely be the biggest deciding factor in who votes for the bill.

"I think it's 50-50 right now," said Rep. Mark Walker (R-N.C.), who leads the influential Republican Study Committee, adding that he and many of his members remain undecided until they learn the spending levels.

A deal next week would still require Congress to pass a second stopgap bill on Dec. 22, which would buy time to actually craft an omnibus. That spending process has been on hold for months as GOP leadership slow-walked negotiations during a hectic push for a tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\).

Republican appropriators dubbed the "double CR" as a last-ditch plan to force leadership of both parties into a long-awaited spending accord.

"This gives us a chance to get that number before a shutdown looms Christmas Eve," Rep. Hal Rogers (R-Ky.), a former Appropriations chairman, told POLITICO.

"We have no choice," he said. "[Leadership] has been preoccupied, rightly so, with the tax bill, but now this shutdown is looming upon us, and that's the urgent thing that we've got to address."

Rogers acknowledged that Democrats would likely be needed in next week's vote, though House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) disputed the idea.

"Let's give the leadership some opportunity to talk to some of the members," he said.

Multiple GOP sources say next week's short-term funding bill won't touch immigration or health care, and would simply be a "clean" CR.

But conservatives say they're worried about that Dec. 8 stopgap bill in the Senate, where GOP leaders have privately floated the idea of attaching an Obamacare stabilization provision to help win votes for its tax package.

"I think there's some double-bank shots involved with the Senate tax piece. I think there's a couple tricky deals here," Brat said.

Tax bill could trigger historic spending cuts Back

By Adam Cancryn and Sarah Ferris | 11/30/2017 08:28 PM EDT

Republicans are on the verge of a massive tax overhaul that would hand President Donald Trump his first major legislative victory. But the $1.5 trillion tax package could trigger eye-popping cuts to a slew of federal programs, including Medicare.

Unless Congress acts swiftly to stop it, as much as $150 billion per year would be cut from initiatives ranging from farm subsidies to student loans to support services for crime victims. Medicare alone could see cuts of $25 billion a year. And the specter of those cuts has thrust Congress into a high-stakes game of political chicken.

With so much attention focused on the tax bill itself, neither lawmakers nor many of the advocacy groups had paid as much attention to the depth and breadth of the cuts that will ensue unless the House and Senate come up with a bipartisan deal to stop them. Some groups had run Medicare ads, but they were largely overshadowed by the tax debate itself.

The tax bill hit snags in the Senate late Thursday, as Republicans worked on ways to ease the concerns of deficit hawks. Leaders were still scrambling for votes.

But within the GOP, leaders are confident that once the tax bill is passed, they can strike a quick deal to waive the federally mandated cuts. But Democrats deeply opposed to the tax bill aren't making any promises they'll agree to bail out their rivals — raising the risk of a historic gutting of government programs.

"This would be unprecedented," said William Hoagland, a senior vice president at the Bipartisan Policy Center and a former GOP Senate staffer with expertise on the budget. "The law never envisioned that we'd eliminate programs."

GOP leaders are asking moderates like Susan Collins (R-Maine) to back the tax package with the mere promise that lawmakers can find a bipartisan solution during an already divisive year-end crunch that could lead to a government shutdown.

One senior House GOP source was confident a deal on spending would go through. "A statutory PAYGO sequester has never happened, and we will prevent one from being triggered," the source said, adding that Congress has until the end of the year to work it out.

The far reach of the Republican tax plan is the consequence of limitations placed on Congress under the "pay-as-you-go" rule. The decades-old law, revamped during the Obama presidency, requires Congress to offset the cost of each piece of legislation or risk spending cuts painful to both parties.

Lawmakers have repeatedly voted to waive this rule, a total of 16 times, for major bills like the Obama-era stimulus and multiple tax cut packages under George W. Bush.

The GOP's $1.5 trillion tax plan would trigger $150 billion in cuts to domestic programs every year for a decade if Congress doesn't step in, according to the CBO. That would include $25 billion from the money Medicare pays health care providers.

"You're likely to have doctors who will see less patients; you're likely to have hospitals and other health care facilities cut back on certain services," said David Certner, legislative counsel for the AARP, which has loudly opposed cutting Medicare. "It really affects the program."

The fallout for numerous smaller federal programs would be even more drastic, effectively zeroing out their budgets. And while conservatives want smaller government, they don't necessarily want programs lopped off across the board.

The largest chunk would come from health and domestic programs like the Social Services Block Grant, which stands to lose $1.7 billion, and the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund, which would lose $715 million. Obamacare's Public Health and Prevention Fund — long a target for Republicans — would be wiped out.

Agriculture is usually a spending priority for conservatives, but the tax bill could put $20 billion of farm aid on the chopping block. Nearly all federal programs for farmers would see funding evaporate.

"Basically, Mr. Perdue would only have the food stamp program to work with," Hoagland said, referring to the Trump administration's Agriculture secretary.

Those cuts would also kick in for the Department of Education's student loan repayment services, U.S. Customs and Border Protection and the unemployment trust fund.

Republican leaders rushing to pass the tax package have so far dismissed that doomsday scenario as far-fetched — although they were still making last-minute changes on Thursday to address fiscal concerns and stay within Senate budget rules.

Collins, a key moderate holdout on the tax bill, said she received a personal assurance from Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on Wednesday that the cuts would be waived — one day after she threatened to oppose the bill over the severe reductions. She said House Speaker Paul Ryan had made the same promise.

"I am confident that neither side of the aisle wants that to occur," Collins said Thursday morning at an event hosted by the Christian Science Monitor, adding that GOP leaders will likely strike a year-end deal to waive the pay-as-you-go requirement.

But the price tag could raise some thorny questions for Republican leaders desperate for a legislative win in the waning weeks of the year — a year in which they controlled the House, Senate and White House and have little to show for it.

Some deficit hawks have already objected to ballooning the national debt, pushing instead for required tax hikes if the bill fails to pay for itself — as many economic analysts predict, including Congress' own Joint Committee on Taxation. Raising taxes would effectively have the same overall impact on the deficit as allowing the spending cuts to take place.

"A vote to block that sequester becomes an awkward vote for some Republicans who said we should be cutting spending," said Ed Lorenzen, a senior adviser at the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget. "It is ironic that congressional leadership is simultaneously telling members that they're going to block the sequester at the same time they're negotiating a trigger that's supposed to have tax increases."

The looming threat of the cuts, known as sequestration, has been a political gift for Democrats as they've attempted to kill the GOP's tax bill.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer has repeatedly railed against the GOP's tax bill for "gutting Medicare." A series of ads targeting vulnerable House Republicans last month warned that the GOP bill "forces a $25 billion cut in Medicare."

Publicly, at least, some Democrats have suggested that they could play hardball — withholding their votes to waive the cuts and forcing Republicans to take the fall.

But privately, longtime Capitol Hill veterans say Democrats would never allow spending cuts, even if they could avoid the blame.

"Medicare is underfunded as it is. If we have to change the PAYGO rules, we'll just change 'em," said Rep. Phil Roe (R-Tenn.). "At the end of the day, we — Republicans and Democrats — have to go home and face our constituents. I wouldn't want to go home and face my constituents if I'd cut Medicare."

Senate tax plan won't cover full cost, study says Back

By Brian Faler | 11/30/2017 04:26 PM EDT

Senate Republicans' tax-rewrite plan would fall well short of covering its $1.5 trillion cost through additional economic growth as many lawmakers have promised, a new official analysis shows.

In an eagerly awaited report, the nonpartisan Joint Committee on Taxation said the plan H.R. 1 \(115\) would boost the economy, but not by nearly as much as Republicans predict. It sees the plan boosting growth by 0.8 percent over the next decade, which it said would throw off $407 billion in additional revenue.

That would reduce the cost of the GOP plan to about $1 trillion, although lawmakers are only using the analysis for informational purposes, not as a way of making their tax math work.

The JCT estimate is particularly important to Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), a key swing vote in the Senate, because he's said he won't vote for any plan that increases the deficit, once the economic effects and some accounting adjustments are taken into consideration.

Republicans have argued their plan will end up not costing anything, despite its official $1.5 trillion cost, because of additional growth. Some Republicans, including Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, have argued it would go beyond paying for itself and actually reduce the deficit.

Democrats seized on the report.

"The score ends the fantasy of magical growth, about unicorns and growth fairies," said Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), the ranking member of the Finance committee. "The facts are now in — the Republican plan loses a trillion dollars."

Republicans said JCT was low-balling the benefits of their plan, but emphasized the report found it helping the economy.

"The score demonstrates that there is economic growth generated by tax cuts and, really, what we're just talking about is how much," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas).

Though Republicans have changed Congress' budgeting rules to incorporate so-called dynamic scoring, which takes account of economic growth, they've run into procedural hurdles that have kept them from actually using it in the Senate, so the new analysis is only being used for illustrative purposes. They can't tap that $407 billion JCT says their plan would generate.

In a workaround, Republicans agreed last month to cut taxes by $1.5 trillion because they said that's how much they believed dynamic scoring would generate in extra cash were they able to use it.

House Republicans approved their draft of the tax plan before an analysis of its economic effects was ready.

Senate GOP: We have the votes on taxes Back

By Seung Min Kim, Brian Faler and Colin Wilhelm | 12/01/2017 10:44 AM EDT

Senate Republicans said Friday they have enough votes to pass their massive tax overhaul, even as they frantically rewrote the multi-trillion dollar legislation behind closed doors.

"We have the votes," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell declared as Republicans emerged from a caucus meeting on the latest round of changes to the legislation.

Details began trickling out Friday afternoon, with Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) saying lawmakers are dropping plans to repeal the alternative minimum tax. Killing the AMT, a complicated batch of rules designed to prevent people from dodging taxes, had been a key part of Republican plans to radically simplify the code. But Rounds said they needed the money to finance other last-minute changes to the bill.

"It is not a repeal anymore," he said.

Lawmakers said they've also increased a deduction for so-called pass-through businesses, which they will pay for in part by dunning multinational corporations. They also dropped a "tax trigger" proposal sought by deficit hawks that was entangled by Senate rules, as well as a backup plan to instead pencil in a future increase in the corporate tax rate.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who announced Friday she will vote for the legislation, said she won a provision to preserve a property tax writeoff. And Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Arizona) said he had secured language phasing down write-offs for business investments that had been slated to abruptly expire at the end of 2022.

Flake added that Republican leaders were still searching for revenue to make the numbers behind their plan work.

In a win for leadership, GOP Sens. Ron Johnson of Wisconsin, Steve Daines of Montana as well as Flake all declared on Friday they will both support the bill. A sweeping manager's amendment to be unveiled later Friday will likely incorporate significant changes from the version that cleared the Senate Finance Committee just over two weeks ago.

Johnson in particular is a major boost for Senate GOP leaders, who have struggled all week to corral at least 50 votes for the tax measure. Republicans are using powerful budget procedures to evade a Democratic filibuster on the bill, so Majority Leader Mitch McConnell can lose only two GOP votes and pass the bill.

President Donald Trump is calling GOP senators to back the bill, and White House director of legislative affairs Marc Short was cautiously optimistic coming out of a meeting in Cornyn's office.

"I think they've got a plan," Short said, before adding, "I'm sure there's plenty of drama ahead today." Asked if he was comfortable with narrow passage of the tax reform package by 50 votes plus a tie-breaking vote from Vice President Pence, Short replied: "What do they call a person that finishes last in medical school? A doctor."

Johnson said Republicans have agreed to his demands to increase a deduction for pass-through businesses, which pay taxes on the individual side of the tax code, to as much as 23 percent, from 20 percent. It would be financed, he told reporters, by upping a one-time tax on multinational companies' overseas earnings.

Senate Republicans are adopting a House proposal to charge 14 percent on those multinationals' liquid assets and 7 percent on illiquid ones such as facilities, up from the 10 percent and 5 percent they had been considering.

"We're going to have to reconcile that anyway, and might as well reconcile up front here to take care of our issue," Johnson told reporters.

Johnson and Daines had complained pass-throughs would be put at a competitive disadvantage under the legislation compared to corporations.

Though Johnson's vote was likely never truly in doubt, he could have held out for more changes, which would have further handcuffed leaders as they try to satisfy a duo of stubborn fiscal hawks alarmed that the measure will blow up federal budget deficits. A Joint Committee on Taxation report said Thursday that even with economic growth from the plan, the bill would add $1 trillion to the deficit over the next decade.

Daines and Johnson had demanded more generous treatment of "pass-through" companies — businesses that file their taxes on the individual code — in the measure. Daines' office said the "pass-through" companies will now be able to deduct up to 23 percent of their income, a boost from the rates in previous versions of the tax bill.

In a statement Friday, Daines said: "After weeks of fighting for Main Street businesses including Montana's farmers and ranchers, I've decided to support the Senate tax cut bill which provides significant tax relief for Main Street businesses" Daines said in a statement Friday.

Lawmakers said they've also dropped plans to include a trigger mechanism sought by Corker and Flake that would have forced automatic tax increases if the bill didn't jog the economy as much as Republicans hope.

The Senate parliamentarian has found that such a mechanism would run afoul of complicated procedural rules. That sent Republicans scrambling and unable to vote on the bill Thursday night, as leaders had hoped.

Republicans have also ditched plans to swap in future tax increases for the abandoned trigger - a proposed hike in the corporate rate - that deficit hawks had proposed as a backup plan but which many of their colleagues opposed.

Flake also said he had a "firm commitment" by party leaders to "work with me" on "fair and permanent protections" for undocumented immigrants threatened with deportation by President Trump's decision to end the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program.

Collins, another undecided vote, has secured commitments from both the White House and Senate Republican leaders to include a deduction for up to $10,000 in property taxes. That parallels a House provision written to appease Republicans from high-tax areas who fumed over GOP leadership's decision to ax a prized deduction for state and local taxes.

Lawmakers are keeping the AMT in order to accommodate those changes, said Rounds.

"That's one of the pay-fors for the pass-throughs, and also for the $10,000 property-tax exemption," he said. "I think most members felt very strongly that we wanted a property tax exemption for individuals" and so "the trade-off is there."

Meanwhile, Sens. Marco Rubio of Florida and Mike Lee of Utah are still seeking to make a $2,000 child tax credit refundable by raising the corporate rate level from 20 to 22 percent.

Democrats blasted Republicans on both the substance and process of the tax push.

"In the waning hours, this bill is tilting further towards businesses and away from families. Every time the choice is between corporations and families, the Republicans choose corporations," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) said.

"And still, no one knows what the final bill will look like," he added on the Senate floor. "Why on earth wouldn't you want to spend more than a few hours looking at a bill of this magnitude?"

Colin Wilhelm and Aaron Lorenzo contributed to this report.

Flake: Republican leaders pledged to work on DACA fix Back

By Ted Hesson | 12/01/2017 01:54 PM EDT

Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) will support the Senate Republican tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\) — and said today he received assurances in return that leadership will work on a solution for enrollees in the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program.

Flake said in a written statement that he entered tax negotiations with a pair of objectives. One was to obtain a commitment from the Trump administration and Senate leadership to work with him to "enact fair and permanent protections for DACA recipients." The other was to cut an $85 billion "budget gimmick" that he didn't describe in further detail.

"Having secured both of those objectives, I am pleased to announce I will vote in support of the tax reform bill," Flake said.

Will GOP finally take down Obamacare with a tax bill? Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 11/30/2017 07:04 PM EDT

After spending nearly a year on a failed effort to repeal Obamacare, Republicans on Capitol Hill are on the verge of repealing the law's individual mandate as a footnote to their rewrite of the American tax system.

At least two of the three Senate Republicans who blocked the repeal effort over the summer have no problem undoing the requirement that nearly all Americans carry insurance — a provision Democrats say is vital to keeping the Affordable Care Act afloat.

John McCain of Arizona and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska said they support the tax bill, which includes repeal of the individual mandate. Susan Collins of Maine has partially pegged her support to assurances from President Donald Trump and Senate Finance Committee leaders that lawmakers will fund a separate Obamacare program that Republicans say will offset the negative effects of repealing the mandate on premium costs. She has not yet said how she will vote on the tax bill.

But those assurances would require House Republicans to fund the program, called cost-sharing reduction payments, which they deride as a "bailout" of insurance companies. House conservatives have opposed the program, although some suggest that if tax reform passage depends on that, they might hold their noses and support it.

"If it was on the precipice of succeeding or failing based on that one issue, there may be people taking a big gulp and moving forward," said Rep. Mark Walker (R-S.C.), who leads the conservative Republican Study Committee. "But I hope we don't get to that point."

Senate leaders on Thursday were reluctant to commit to how the cost-sharing bill, a deal crafted by Republican Sen. Lamar Alexander and Democratic Sen. Patty Murray, might be enacted as lawmakers consider short-term measures to fund the government.

"I would expect to see it before the end of the year," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said.

Alexander said Thursday that the bill, which was written to reduce premiums in 2018 and 2019, may be pushed back one year. Collins also wants to enact legislation she wrote with Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) that would fund a separate program that would help insurance companies that take on the most expensive patients.

The key GOP motivation for unwinding the mandate — the fine would convert to zero dollars, effectively making it moot — is money. Repeal raises $338 billion to plow into tax reform, according to the Congressional Budget Office. The agency has warned that it is considering revising its estimates downward in the future, making it a depreciating asset the GOP is eager to cash in on now.

The politics of repealing the most unpopular part of the health care law is an added bonus. Initially, Republican leaders were skeptical of combining the tax reform bill with the toxic Obamacare debate. But it quickly became clear that Senate Republicans were on board as long as other parts of the law remained intact.

There is an added sense of schadenfreude for Republicans. In 2012, when a challenge to the mandate went before the Supreme Court in a high-stakes case the GOP hoped would bring down the whole law, Chief Justice John Roberts ruled the mandate was a tax and, therefore, constitutional.

"Justice Roberts told us it was a tax so it belongs in a tax bill," quipped Rep. Michael Burgess (R-Texas).

The support for repealing the mandate contrasts with the debate over the summer as the Senate took up an Obamacare repeal bill that would have gutted Medicaid. At the time, Murkowski and Collins cited significant worries about reducing access to health care in their states.

But repealing the mandate, Murkowski argued in an opinion piece in the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner earlier this month, wouldn't hurt access.

"It is important to emphasize that eliminating this tax penalty does not take care away from anyone," she wrote. "Instead, it provides important relief to those who have been penalized for choosing not to buy unaffordable insurance."

Insurance companies and many health law supporters strongly disagree. Murray calls the tax bill a "sabotage" of American families' health care.

The mandate is needed, they say, to make sure that people don't buy insurance only when they get sick. It was designed to counter the health care law's requirement that insurance companies accept everyone. Without a mandate, consumers could theoretically buy insurance in the ambulance on their way to the hospital.

For that reason, insurers and health care providers have come out strongly against repealing the mandate.

Still, the impact of the mandate hasn't been as substantial as the law's drafters anticipated. The fine isn't big enough needed to persuade people to buy coverage, some economists say.

"It hasn't been very effective and doesn't amount to much. It sounds like more than it is," said Alexander, chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. "Plus, it is the most unpopular part of the Affordable Care Act. So repealing it may not make as much of a difference as people once thought."

Some House Republicans urge senators to drop endowment tax Back

By Mel Leonor | 12/01/2017 10:31 AM EDT

More than 40 House members, including 19 Republicans, have written a letter to Senate leaders strongly opposing the proposed tax on private university endowment earnings in the Senate GOP tax plan.

The group includes GOP members who voted in favor of the House tax bill, which has the same provision.

The letter, dated Thursday, was led by Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), and signed by Reps. Ted Poe (R-Texas), Rod Blum (R-Iowa), John J. Faso (R-N.Y.) and Pete King (R-N.Y.), among others. Smith, Poe and Blum voted in favor of the House tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\). Faso and King opposed the bill.

The House members wrote to senators that the endowment tax is "bad policy" and a "serious threat" to institutions.

Among the group's concerns is the toll the tax would take on financial assistance to students.

"Taxing endowments would reduce funds available for financial aid, drive up tuition costs and jeopardize the future of private colleges and universities," they wrote. "How do the American people benefit from that?"

Proposed is a 1.4 percent excise tax on the investment income of private institutions with at least 500 students and assets valued at at least $250,000 per student. The House passed its tax bill last month; the Senate continues debate on its plan today.

Lawmakers said in the letter they fear that the future expansion of the tax to cover more institutions, including public institutions, is "inevitable."

Senate Republicans today are rewriting the bill in advance of an anticipated floor vote, though there is no sign the endowment tax has been dropped.

Cardin's bid to get repatriation for infrastructure in tax bill fails Back

By Tanya Snyder | 12/01/2017 01:24 PM EDT

The Senate today rejected, 43-57, Sen. Ben Cardin's motion to amend the tax bill currently barreling its way through the Senate that would use deemed repatriation revenue for infrastructure.

The motion would have sent the tax bill, S. 1 \(115\), back to the Senate Finance Committee and order the committee to report back in three days with a plan that would "designate the revenue raised by the deemed repatriation provisions of the bill for infrastructure improvements." The motion's goal was "to fix and enhance our country's infrastructure, help create jobs, and responsibly use one-time revenue for one-time spending."

Democrats have long eyed repatriated corporate profit as a possible source of revenue for infrastructure, but the tax bill would use them to lower tax rates.

The GOP Tax Bill Will Hurt U.S. Universities Back

By Douglas A. Warner | 12/01/2017 01:24 PM EDT

It seems odd that a tax bill purporting to boost economic growth would take resources away from the institutions most vital to promoting it. But that's just what the Tax Cut and Jobs Act, which has passed the House and is heading to a vote in the Senate, does.

The legislation takes the unprecedented step of taxing the income of certain private universities—specifically, it imposes a 1.4 percent tax on net endowment income for universities with endowments larger than $250,000 per full-time student. Some commenters have applauded the tax, as if it would rectify everything they consider amiss with higher education in America. But few of those supporters have examined the measure's dire consequences—repercussions that would frustrate everything from access to college in America to the top-notch university research that creates U.S. jobs.

As a former investment banker with 33 years of experience doing commercial and investment banking, I know a good investment when I see one. I know that the way out of the jobs dilemma in America is education and research. America's global competitiveness depends on both. That's why I welcomed the chance to become a trustee of Yale University, where I have served since 2008. I am also the chair of the Investment Committee, which oversees the management of the Yale endowment. I have taken part in investment decisions and have shaped policies to achieve maximum benefits for current faculty, students and staff while leaving enough resources on the table to ensure that the next generation of faculty, students and staff is able to enjoy comparable levels of support. That's the central idea of an endowment—to provide a permanent source of support that sustains its purchasing power indefinitely.

As a trustee, I have participated in numerous decisions that the endowment made possible, such as adopting broader interpretations of students' "financial need" and committing, as Yale has for decades, to meet every penny of that need. Or building two new residential colleges to expand enrollment in Yale College by 15 percent because the university was denying admission to too many highly talented students. Or investing in new academic resources, such as the Center for Teaching and Learning, that encourage fresh approaches to teaching across the university.

And yet Congress would reduce the capacity of colleges and universities to do this essential work—build the human and intellectual capital the country requires to thrive as a global leader.

The 70 or so institutions targeted by the proposed tax are among the most generous providers of financial aid from their own resources, drawn substantially from their endowments. At many of these schools, spending on grant aid is 20 times the total amount that students receive from federal programs, such as Pell Grants. At Yale and several other schools, parents who make the median family income or less are not expected to make any payment toward their children's education. It is hard to see how students would be better off if Congress taxed the funds to be spent on financial aid.

University endowments also contribute significantly to advances in medicine and high-tech innovation. As anyone who has seen a modern lab knows, research is expensive. Federal grants contribute to this research, but they fall far short of covering the full cost. Universities make up the rest out of private gifts and their own funds. Yale, for example, funds 40 percent of the total cost of all research conducted on campus. This academic research drives commercial innovation and America's job growth—two-thirds of the scientific articles cited in U.S. patent applications were published by university faculty and their graduate students. It is difficult to see how the country would gain from taxing funds that would otherwise be spent on research that spurs innovation and job creation.

Furthermore, many of the colleges and universities facing an endowment income tax are the economic anchors of local economies. Yale, for example, makes voluntary payments to New Haven and other towns; it funds scholarships for any New Haven public high school graduate with a B average or higher to attend any public or private university in Connecticut; the Yale Homebuyer program has dispensed millions to employees who buy (and occupy) a home in New Haven. (Yes, the participating employees pay taxes on the benefit.) I doubt that the federal government will step in to sustain these efforts if universities are taxed.

It's simple: Taxing the resources that support student aid, teaching, research and community investments does not make sense—and it represents a fundamental change in tax policy toward charities. For decades, government has refrained from taxing public charities in recognition of their contribution to social welfare. The Tax Cut and Jobs Act reflects a new maxim: "If we can tax it, we will." That policy does not bode well for any charity, whether they are colleges with smaller endowments, museums or hospitals. But, more important, it does not bode well for the future of our country.

House office secretly settled $84K harassment claim Back

By Rachael Bade and Jennifer Scholtes | 12/01/2017 10:49 AM EDT

House Administration Committee Chairman Gregg Harper told his colleagues in a private meeting Friday that one House office paid $84,000 to settle a sexual harassment claim.

The Mississippi Republican announced the settlement in a closed-door conference, when members peppered leaders for more information about the use of taxpayer money for such complaints.

It is unclear which office was involved, or whether the settlement was for a complaint against a member or a staffer.

Harper also said more than $360,000 in tax dollars had gone toward workplace dispute settlements involving members of Congress or their staff. That's a small piece of the $17 million that has been used to settle employment disagreements on Capitol Hill. That figure, however, also includes disputes involving the U.S. Capitol Police and Architect of the Capitol.

"Most of the discussion in there has been about getting this perception turned around that there's $17 million in sexual harassment claims for members of Congress," Rep. Mark Amodei (R-Nev.) said as he left the meeting.

Harper only shared data for the past five years, but Rep. Barbara Comstock (R-Va.) said lawmakers expected more information by day's end. Over the past half-decade, a total of six payouts have been made on behalf of member offices.

Only the $84,000 settlement was for a sexual harassment complaint, however. Others were for complaints such as sexual discrimination, Comstock said.

Still, lawmakers pushed Harper to identify the individual involved in the $84,000 settlement, so people would stop suspecting the rest of them, sources in the room said.

Lawmaker behind secret $84K sexual harassment settlement unmasked Back

By Rachael Bade | 12/01/2017 12:24 PM EDT

Rep. Blake Farenthold used taxpayer money to settle a sexual harassment claim brought by his former spokesman — the only known sitting member of Congress to have used a little-known congressional account to pay an accuser, people familiar with the matter told POLITICO.

Lauren Greene, the Texas Republican's former communications director, sued her boss in December 2014 over allegations of gender discrimination, sexual harassment and creating a hostile work environment.

Greene said another Farenthold aide told her the lawmaker said he had "sexual fantasies" and "wet dreams" about Greene. She also claimed that Farenthold "regularly drank to excess" and told her in February 2014 that he was "estranged from his wife and had not had sex with her in years."

When she complained about comments Farenthold and a male staffer made to her, Greene said the congressman improperly fired her. She filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia, but the case was later dropped after both parties reached a private settlement.

No information was ever released on that agreement.

House Administration Committee Chairman Gregg Harper (R-Miss.) told GOP lawmakers in a closed-door Friday morning meeting that only one House office in the past five years had used an Office of Compliance account to settle a sexual harassment complaint. Harper said in that one instance, the settlement totaled $84,000.

In a statement for this story, Farenthold would neither confirm or deny that his office was responsible for that $84,000 payout.

"While I 100% support more transparency with respect to claims against members of Congress, I can neither confirm nor deny that settlement involved my office as the Congressional Accountability Act prohibits me from answering that question," Farenthold said in a statement.

Greene's lawyer, Les Alderman of Alderman, Devorsetz & Hora PLLC, also would not say whether Greene was the woman who received the $84,000 Harper referred to.

But in a joint statement both Greene and Farenthold prepared at the time of the settlement but never released — a copy of which was shared with POLITICO by Alderman on Friday — the two confirmed they reached a deal in part to save taxpayer dollars.

"[A]fter it became clear that further litigating this case would come at great expense to all involved — including the taxpayers — the parties engaged in mediation with a court-appointed mediator," the statement read. "After extensive discussion and consideration, the parties jointly agreed to accept the solution proposed by the mediator."

The statement added: "The parties believe that the mediator's solution saves the parties, and the taxpayers, significant sums that would be expended in further discovery and/or trial."

The statement also states that Farenthold "disagrees strongly" with his client's allegations and "adamantly denies that he engaged in any wrongdoing." It says the settlement included a confidentiality agreement that precludes Greene and Farenthold from discussing the case and "expressly provides that both parties deny all liability."

The Office of Congressional Ethics also investigated Greene's allegations. In a letter to the House Ethics Committee the watchdog said "there is not substantial reason to believe that Representative Farenthold sexually harassed or discriminated against [ex-staffer Lauren Greene], or engaged in an effort to intimidate, take reprisal against, or discriminate against [Greene] for opposing such treatment, in violation of House rules and federal law."

It was unclear Friday afternoon whether the discovery would have political ramifications for Farenthold, who rode the Tea Party wave to Congress in 2010. The 55-year-old hails from the the southeast corner of Texas, a safe area for Republicans.

However, a federal panel ruled over the summer that the district was drawn primarily based on race and violated the Constitution and the Voting Rights Act. Farenthold has said he would seek reelection, despite the fact that the make-up of his district may soon change and include more Democratic areas.

The filing deadline for someone to challenge Farenthold is Dec. 11.

Even if he isn't challenged, Farenthold is likely to face repercussions from fellow House Republicans for using taxpayer money to settle a harassment claim. Recent reports, including in POLITICO, revealed that $17 million has been paid out quietly to settle workplace disputes.

Harper said Friday that only $360,000 of that total involved a House office.

That, however, won't stem demands from conservatives that members who have been part of such settlements use their own personal money to reimburse the treasury.

Farenthold has a minimum net worth of $2.4 million, according to his most recent financial disclosure form.

Farenthold, a graduate of St. Mary's University School of Law, practice law for several years after college. He also worked as a radio disc jockey while in school. He later founded a web design and consulting firm before running for Congress.

Greene came to Capitol Hill as an intern in 2009, and was later promoted to full time in the office of ex-Rep. John Sullivan (R-Oak.). In early 2013, she moved to Farenthold's office, where she stayed for 18 months before her July 2014 firing.

According to Greene's complaint in court, Farenthold and his top aide, Bob Haueter, sexually harassed her, allegations that both men vehemently denied.

"Farenthold regularly drank to excess, and because of his tendency to flirt, the staffers who accompanied him to Capitol Hill functions would joke that they had to be on 'red head patrol to keep him out of trouble,'" Greene's complaint alleged. "On one occasion, prior to February 2014, during a staff meeting at which [Greene] was in attendance, Farenthold disclosed that a female lobbyist had propositioned him for a 'threesome.'"

The complaint added: "On June 10, 2014, in response to Haueter's complaint about [Greene's] shirt ... which Haueter claimed was transparent and showed [Greene's] nipples, Farenthold told [another woman staffer] that [Greene] could show her nipples whenever she wanted to," Greene's complaint asserted.

Greene said Farenthold avoided meeting one-on-one with her, and she also felt awkward about meeting with Farenthold.

When Greene complained to Farenthold directly in June 2014 about her problems with Haueter, she was "marginalized and undermined" by the Texas Republican, and then fired several weeks later, Greene asserted.

Greene took the matter to the Office of Compliance, which handles workplace disputes. She went through a month of mandatory counseling and mediation before filing suit.

John Bresnahan contributed to this report.

Lawmakers have carte blanche to cut secret harassment settlements Back

By Elana Schor and Heather Caygle | 12/01/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The revelation that Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) secretly settled a sexual harassment claim using his office funds obscured a disturbing fact: The House appears to have no clear rules on whether Conyers' colleagues can do the same thing.

Conyers in 2015 made a severance payment of roughly $27,000 to a former aide who accused him of harassment using his taxpayer-funded office account. But even though the House ethics manual says that employees should be paid for having "regularly performed official duties" — in other words, showing up and doing work, a guideline that the severance payment to Conyers' former aide didn't meet — the settlement deal was still allowed to go forward.

Now Rep. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.), a vocal advocate for reform of Capitol Hill's secretive system for handling workplace harassment, is calling out the lack of policing of the secret one-off settlements. She wants the House ethics committee to state definitively whether the chamber will allow more Conyers-style settlements.

The ethics panel "currently has no clear position on whether these payments are indeed impermissible," Speier told the committee's leaders in a Thursday letter, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO.

Allowing lawmakers use of their office's budgets "to avoid public disclosure of wrongdoing only serves to enable the evasion of accountability," Speier wrote, adding that she knows of one member who used a maneuver similar to Conyers' to settle a misconduct case earlier this year.

"The American people deserve to know whether their tax dollars are being used in this manner."

The question of whether House members can settle harassment claims with their budgets — also known as members' representational allowances, or MRAs — is at the heart of an ongoing ethics committee review of severance payments Rep. Mark Meadows (R-S.C.) made to a former chief of staff who was accused of sexual harassment by several female aides in the office.

One senior Democratic aide familiar with the issue said that before the Meadows probe, the ethics committee "was much clearer about the use of the MRA for this purpose."

But the ethics panel's "advice has been inconsistent and unhelpful" in the 15 months since, the aide added. "I don't think that they expected this level of scrutiny around these particular settlements."

Another Democratic aide sounded a similar note: "The lack of standardized guidance on this is problematic."

Conyers himself is also the subject of another ethics panel review on the severance question stemming from his payments to a former chief of staff after she left his office following a guilty plea to a misdemeanor.

The House Administration Committee is holding a hearing Thursday on workplace misconduct settlements in Congress. Some of those are paid using a taxpayer-funded account maintained by the congressional Office of Compliance, while others come out of members' budgets. Rep. Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) settled a hostile work environment claim unrelated to sexual harassment in 2015 using operating funds from the House Natural Resources Committee, on which he is the top Democrat.

If the compliance office's fund is used to pay a harassment claim, the administration panel's GOP chairman and top Democrat have to sign off on it.

But the top Democrat on that committee, Pennsylvania Rep. Bob Brady, said Thursday that no such approval requirement exists for harassment settlements paid from lawmakers' office budgets. If that happened, Brady said in an interview, "we'd probably never know about it."

Former Rep. Candice Miller (R-Mich.), who chaired the administration panel from 2012 until 2016, said in an interview that "I don't remember" being involved in any talks about resolving misconduct claims using lawmakers' office budgets.

"I'm astonished to see that a member would use the MRA to pay off a sexual harassment case," Miller said in an interview. "I don't believe that's why the money was appropriated."

Grijalva said he worked with the House employment counsel's office, which represents the interests of members in misconduct disputes, on the settlement agreement with his former aide. That employee reportedly cited Grijalva's alleged alcohol use as creating a hostile work environment, charges that he denies.

"In this instance I felt that I was taking advice from House counsel, and that that advice was the best advice I could get," Grijalva said in an interview. "And I relied on it."

Speier, in an interview, slammed the employment counsel's office as "biased and member-centered and victim-blaming. That whole function needs to change dramatically."

The employment counsel's office referred questions on the issue to the administration committee. The ethics committee declined to comment for this story.

That committee's handbook for members allows lump sum payments to House employees, but specifies that recipients of the payments must "perform official duties commensurate with the compensation received" in compliance with chamber rules.

The chamber's ethics manual uses similar phrasing, stating: "The underlying standard for the receipt of compensation by an employee of the House is that the employee has regularly performed official duties commensurate with the compensation received."

A spokeswoman for the administration committee, asked whether the panel has ever taken a closer look at the propriety of using office budgets to pay harassment settlements, said that any "misuse of official resources" would fall under the ethics panel's purview. But the broader issue of settlements is part of the committee's ongoing review of congressional workplace culture, the spokeswoman said.

Rep. Barbara Comstock (R-Va.), an administration committee member working with Speier on broader harassment reforms, said that lawmakers are trying to make their own internal misconduct system more transparent. But they want to avoid getting embroiled in specific "ongoing disputes with members and candidates, because then everybody kind of goes to their corners and you lose that watershed moment."

Brady predicted that part of the House's internal housecleaning on harassment would involve coming up with clearer guidance on the method Conyers and Grijalva used to secretly settle their claims. The administration committee is looking at adding language to its handbook and other guidance clarifying the issue, Brady said.

And asked why the ethics committee has not issued formal guidance, he quipped: "I think they're going to now."

Pelosi convenes sexual harassment reform meeting Back

By Elana Schor and Rachael Bade | 11/30/2017 07:00 PM EDT

House Democrats on Thursday held the first in a planned series of meetings about strategies to use the national reckoning with sexual harassment as a springboard for reform of Capitol Hill's workplace policies.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) convened the meeting as she and other caucus members began calling for the resignation of Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) following multiple allegations of sexual harassment against him. As Democrats grapple with the political quandary of trying to seize the high ground on harassment while some of their own members fall prey to misconduct scandals, Pelosi kept the spotlight on potential policy remedies.

"We are at a watershed moment in the nationwide fight against sexual harassment, discrimination and retaliation," Pelosi said in a statement. "Members of Congress have a moral duty to the brave women and men coming forward to seize this moment and demonstrate real, effective leadership to foster a climate of respect and dignity in the workplace. We will help transform this moment of truth into an opportunity for action."

Among the outside attendees at Thursday's meeting were victims' advocates and specialists in survivor compensation, according to a Democratic aide, who added that future meetings will touch on handling of harassment claims in local government as well as the private sector.

A source familiar with the meeting said that the American Association of Justice Trial Lawyers and the National Women's Law Center were among the groups represented. Lawmakers in attendance were Reps. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.), Brenda Lawrence (D-Mich.), Bob Brady (D-Pa.), Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.), Jamie Raskin (D-Md.), James Clyburn (D-S.C.), Ann McLane Kuster (D-N.H.), Carolyn Maloney (D-N.Y.), Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.), and Lois Frankel (D-Fla.), the source added.

Pelosi also hailed Speier for serving as a chief author of broader legislation overhauling the Hill's harassment system and for helping secure passage of a resolution this week that requires all House members and aides to take anti-harassment training. Among the topics discussed Thursday, Pelosi said, was "possible additions" to Speier's bill.

Why the 'fix' to Congress's sexual harassment policies could backfire Back

By Les Alderman | 11/30/2017 06:33 PM EDT

As allegations of sexual harassment have reached the halls of Capitol Hill, Congress is turning its attention to its own sexual harassment policies, which let lawmakers use government funds to settle harassment complaints in secret. Though the accusations against Rep. John Conyers have made the biggest headlines, Congress' Office of Compliance has paid out $17 million over the past 20 years in 264 settlements for various infractions, including sexual harassment. House Republicans have introduced a bill to publicize the names of lawmakers who reach any such settlements and to prohibit settlements from using taxpayer money.

The change is pitched as a reform to bring transparency and accountability to a secretive process that lets perpetrators get away with bad behavior. But as a civil rights lawyer whose firm has represented numerous victims of discrimination and harassment, including victims employed by members of Congress, I can assure you that this proposal is dangerous. Whether intentional or not, the bill punishes victims of harassment who would come forward in the future and who have come forward in the past and would make it less likely that victims would come forward to make claims in the future.

The legislation makes two major changes. First, the proposal would retroactively eliminate the confidential nature of settlements that have been made in years past, an effort to expose lawmakers who have acted inappropriately. But this change would hurt the victims as much or more than the lawmakers. The victims often desire that confidentiality because it protects them from the media frenzy that follows when members of Congress are the subject of discrimination and harassment lawsuits. Confidentiality also helps those victims get their next jobs after (hopefully) extricating themselves from the discriminatory harassing environment. The Constitution frowns on retroactive laws such as this because they overrule the expectations and settled legal rights of both parties. My clients expected that these settlements would stay private; in some cases, they wouldn't have agreed to the settlement if they knew it would eventually become public. It is a breach of trust for Congress to change the rules around the settlement now and force these victims into the public sphere.

Second, and more important, the proposal prohibits taxpayer money from being used to pay settlements or verdicts against members of Congress who discriminate or harass their employees. While that may satisfy a knee-jerk need to hold lawmakers personally responsible for discrimination and harassment, it likely deprives victims of the chance to ever recover the damages to which they are entitled.

Members of Congress rarely have the hundreds of thousands of dollars that are typically paid out in meritorious discrimination and harassment claims. If enacted, the law would effectively require victims to chase lawmakers to their home district to attempt to have local federal or state courts recognize the lawmakers' liability and then go through byzantine debt collection proceedings, such as attempting to freeze assets and bank accounts and garnish the lawmakers' wages in order to collect. In many cases the proposed law would leave the victim with an empty and unenforceable judgment or settlement because the Congressperson simply does not—and never will—have the financial means to pay.

Even on a theoretical level, this proposal doesn't make sense. In law, the concept of respondeat superior holds that the employer is responsible for the actions of its employee when the employee causes harm to others. The concept has been a part of our legal system since its inception, and it can be traced in early Roman and Germanic Law and the English Common Law. We do not sue the fast food cook for the nail in our hamburger, nor do we sue the delivery driver for running us over in the crosswalk. And we certainly do not sue the pilot of the plane that crashes for our lost loved ones. This makes sense on two levels: First the delivery driver, or the airline pilot, or the fast food cook would not be in the position to hurt us unless the employer hired them, trained them (or failed to train them) and gave them the tools or authority that they used to hurt us. Second, the employee is rarely in a position to make the victims whole by paying them damages and otherwise compensating them for the harm done.

In the context of Congress, the American people are responsible for placing lawmakers in the position to discriminate against and harass their victims. A lawmaker would not be harassing his or her staff if we had not elected that person in the first place. Every lawmaker is our employee. Under respondeat superior, we—the public—are responsible for paying any penalties for a lawmaker's inappropriate behavior. If we do not want to have to pay the damages, then—just as we expect employers to hire and train their employees responsibly—we should do a better job choosing and training the lawmakers we elect.

If Congress wants to force lawmakers to personally pay any harassment settlements, lawmakers could be required to repay the Treasury for any damages and settlements that are funded by taxpayer dollars. In fact, such a policy could be an additional deterrent to discrimination and harassment while making the public (not the victim) the debt collector against the offending lawmaker. Most importantly, this reform would still ensure that the victims receive the justice they deserve.

House GOP higher education overhaul released Back

By Michael Stratford | 12/01/2017 10:47 AM EDT

Rep. Virginia Foxx, the chairwoman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, today made public House Republicans' plan to rewrite the main federal law governing higher education.

The committee released the full text of a sweeping bill to reauthorize the Higher Education Act, which was last comprehensively updated nearly a decade ago during the George W. Bush administration.

The bill — titled Promoting Real Opportunity, Success and Prosperity Through Education Reform, or PROSPER, Act — most significantly overhauls the federal government's student aid programs.

It would streamline existing programs to create "one loan, one work-study and one grant" as well as a single income-based repayment plan.

In addition, the bill eases some federal requirements on colleges, particularly for-profit schools, while revamping how the Education Department holds all colleges accountable for their use of federal aid dollars.

Higher ed group 'deeply concerned' about House GOP student aid overhaul Back

By Michael Stratford | 12/01/2017 01:58 PM EDT

The American Council on Education, the main association representing colleges and universities in Washington, said today it is "deeply concerned" about House Republicans' plans to overhaul federal financial aid.

Rep. Virginia Foxx (R-N.C.), chairwoman of the House Education and Workforce Committee, today released text of a sweeping bill to rewrite the Higher Education Act. The legislation, among other things, would simplify and streamline the federal student loan and grant programs.

Ted Mitchell, president of the American Council on Education, praised the bill for easing many federal requirements and regulations on colleges and universities but said he's worried about its proposed changes to student aid.

Mitchell, who previously served as President Barack Obama's undersecretary of Education, said in a statement that the group was "deeply concerned that the proposal would undermine decades of federal policy aimed at helping students at the undergraduate and graduate levels afford a high-quality higher education."

He said that the bill would "immediately lead to higher interest charges every year for some six million student borrowers and eliminate 1.5 million financial aid grants."

The legislation calls for the elimination of need-based interest subsidies on student loans as well as the federal Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant program, which serves low-income students.

"This week's action is just one step in what has been and will continue to be a long and winding process toward reauthorization of the Higher Education Act," Mitchell added. "We look forward to working with the House and the Senate to achieve a final measure that expands access to educational opportunity, fosters innovation and cutting-edge research, and grows the next generation workforce this country needs to compete in a global economy."

Trump administration reveals principles for higher education rewrite Back

By Michael Stratford | 12/01/2017 01:10 PM EDT

The White House Friday plans to outline its goals for overhauling the main federal law governing higher education and student financial aid.

The Trump administration will urge lawmakers to restructure the federal student loan program so that it better "protects taxpayers," according to a document obtained by POLITICO. The administration also wants to ease federal regulations on colleges and promote campus free speech.

The document, titled "Higher Education Act Reauthorization Principles," is a two-page summary of recommendations for rewriting the law, which was last comprehensively updated nearly a decade ago.

Rep. Virginia Foxx, (R-N.C.), chairwoman of the House education committee, earlier Friday released the House GOP bill that would rewrite the Higher Education Act.

"Chairwoman Foxx is pleased to see the White House turn its attention to higher education reforms, and welcomes the views of the administration as the legislative process moves forward," a committee aide told POLITICO.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) is similarly working on legislation to rewrite the law, and he said that will be a top priority next year.

Education Secretary Betsy DeVos has called for Congress to "start from a blank page" when it comes to updating the Higher Education Act, but hasn't yet offered specific policy recommendations.

The White House document to be made public Friday outlines five broad goals and eight policy recommendations for reauthorizing the law.

"The current student loan system burdens students with debt and taxpayers with uncertainty," the document says. "Congress should therefore consider reforming, limiting, or consolidating certain existing student loan programs to better serve students and protect taxpayer investment."

The White House also wants to see colleges "share a portion of the financial risk associated with student loans" that were used to attend their institution. Colleges should be held financially responsible for federal student loans based on how well their former students repay them, the document says.

The Trump administration also wants to expand Pell Grants for students who enroll in "high-quality short-term, summer and certificate programs."

And the document reiterates several proposals to revamp student loan repayment options, including eliminating Public Service Loan Forgiveness, that were contained in Trump's budget earlier this year.

The White House also wants Higher Education Act provisions on free speech on college campuses. Congress should "require institutions of higher education receiving Federal funds to provide prospective and current students with a free speech policy disclosure," the document says.

ERS: Big farms get growing share of subsidies as production consolidates Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 11/30/2017 05:39 PM EDT

Large farms with at least $1 million in annual gross cash income received 34 percent of commodity subsidies in 2015, up from 11 percent in 1991, according to a USDA Economic Research Service report published today.

The report, which analyzes the shift in distribution of commodity, conservation and crop insurance payments over the years, also found that large farms received one-third of crop insurance indemnities in 2015, up from 12 percent in 1997 — the earliest year for which USDA has reliable data, ERS said.

The data highlights how as agricultural production has shifted to larger operations, so too have commodity and insurance payments, primarily because they are tied to output. Large farms increased their share of agricultural production from 23 percent in 1991 to 41 percent in 2015, the report noted.

However, reforms to the crop insurance program, including increases in premium subsidies that disproportionately benefited larger operations, also may have affected the shift of indemnities.

Meanwhile, small operations — or those with less than $350,000 in annual gross cash income — are receiving a declining amount of commodity subsidies and crop insurance indemnities, as they account for a smaller percentage of overall agricultural production. In 2015, they received about 30 percent of commodity subsidies, down from 61 percent in 1991. Small farms accounted for 22 percent of crop insurance indemnities in 2015, down from 48 percent in 1997.

Why FEMA is making a big mistake in Puerto Rico Back

By Vivian Graubard and Emma Coleman | 12/01/2017 05:21 AM EDT

In the weeks after Hurricane Maria left much of Puerto Rico without electricity in the worst power outage in U.S. history, island officials made a hasty decision to award a $300 million contract to Montana-based Whitefish Energy Holdings, a company with only two full-time employees. The swift backlash over the contract led to calls for an investigation and Puerto Rico eventually revoked the deal—but not before precious time was wasted as millions of Puerto Ricans languished without power.

Now, just a few weeks after the Whitefish debacle, a different government agency is making a similar mistake. Last week, the Federal Emergency Management Agency announced that it will be unable to meet the needs of the Puerto Rican rebuild, and asked for public comment on a proposal to hire a single vendor to handle all of the shipping, transportation, logistics, and delivery of disaster relief aid to Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands for the next 12 months. The contract could be worth more than $100 million and will have an immense impact on the speed of the island's recovery. FEMA released the notice the afternoon before Thanksgiving—and gave the public just six days to comment on it.

Behind this rushed and opaque process is an idea just as flawed: hiring a single vendor to take on such a monolithic task. The idea could prove disastrous because one company rarely possesses all the skills necessary to complete every aspect of the rebuild, especially the cultural and contextual understanding to get locals what they need. It also represents a missed opportunity to use the rebuilding process to help the Puerto Rican economy. In the post-disaster rebuild, the federal government has a rare opportunity to do things differently, and to turn the recovery into an economic opportunity in itself, by bringing in a diverse group of Puerto Rican companies to do the work.

Evidence from recent natural disasters shows the risks of a highly centralized rebuilding model. After Hurricane Katrina, although FEMA said it wanted to prioritize small, local, and minority-owned businesses for contracts, most of the money was awarded in giant chunks, some more than $500 million, to massive companies like Halliburton and Bechtel. These megacontracts usually do not provide decent paying jobs to locals and instead bring in cheap labor from outside the disaster zone, as happened after Katrina. They also often fail to provide functioning public services, because they lack the relevant experience needed. When the Katrina bills had to be paid, the few remaining public services still operating were gutted to fund the contracts. The firms who took home big paychecks were the same ones whose poor planning and lack of oversight led to stalled recovery times in the Gulf.

The dangers of issuing a big contract to a single vendor are already evident in Puerto Rico. Earlier this week, The Associated Press reported that an unproven, Florida-based company had been awarded $30 million in contracts from FEMA to deliver tarps and critically needed supplies for repairs to damaged homes. But the contract was terminated after the awardee, Bronze Star LLC, failed to deliver any of the supplies to the island. This, as thousands of Puerto Ricans struggle to find housing, clean water not from hazardous waste sites, and primary care centers that still function.

The truth is that the challenge of rebuilding after a disaster is too great for the federal government—or a single company—to handle alone. Local knowledge has been shown to be critical for rebuilding efforts. What we've learned from other hurricane rebuild efforts is hard to miss—that local input isn't a "nice to have," but a "need to have." After Hurricane Sandy, the New Jersey recovery was spearheaded by 30 local businesses with federal contracts. Similarly, in post-Katrina New Orleans, repopulation picked up steam when federal and local efforts came together to share information about individual neighborhood blocks and collectively address the challenges to rebuilding them.

Some of the most effective efforts in Puerto Rico over the past two months have been led by Puerto Rican innovators and activists, such as Chef José Andrés, who has served over 3 million free meals, and Lin Manuel Miranda, who has created a \$2.5 million hurricane relief fund and has been vocal about empowering the community to help themselves. These local contributions have been leading the recovery fight and picking up the slack where the federal government and contractors have failed.

Of course, local collaborations can work with or without federal leadership—but here's an opportunity for FEMA to lead. Unfortunately, based on the FEMA notice released last week, the agency intends to go the opposite direction. The notice is just the first step toward signing a contract, asking the public for comments on its requirements and goals. But the initial proposal wouldn't require that the chosen vendor possess any expertise on the needs of the island, and it doesn't incorporate local input. With no incentive to solicit local knowledge or labor, a single-vendor contract could mean an army of mainland workers will descend for the large payouts.

There's a better way for FEMA to award this federal money. After FEMA quietly issued its request for comment, a group of former Obama administration officials, including one of the authors of this op-ed, launched a new initiative to persuade FEMA to use its contract to empower 100 local businesses across Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands to serve their own communities. The Rebuild Puerto Rico RFI initiative asks the agency in awarding a contract to favor companies that: hire locally; engage with the community and communicate with local business, government, and non-governmental organizations; and work with the public participation to set quality standards and review overall performance. In addition, the initiative requests to make data on money spent and activities completed public, without which it can be difficult to align rebuild efforts from disparate sources, and add additional transparency measures.

Distributing millions of dollars through dozens of contracts with small local businesses would require a more intense management strategy than FEMA has previously employed for disasters. But by breaking apart the immense task of rebuilding Puerto Rico into smaller, more manageable chunks, it will be significantly easier to tackle each individual piece and track the progress of the rebuild inch by inch. As small businesses report on their progress, FEMA will gain a more honest, on-the-ground view of the recovery from the members of the community themselves.

The fundamental question of this rebuild is surprisingly simple: Why not have a trucking and warehouse company in Rincón serve the people of Rincón? And, since unemployment rises in the wake of disasters, why not give this money back to Puerto Ricans for a much-needed economic boost? Local businesses and NGOs can—and should—play a central role in the delivery of services and the rebuilding of their own community. It's the only way for Puerto Rico to truly recover.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: House Republicans set spending ping pong in motion — Lawmakers from disaster-struck states fret timeline for aid — Ryan vows 'entitlement reforms' in fiscal 2019 reconciliation process
Date: Thursday, December 14, 2017 3:30:56 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/14/2017 03:28 PM EDT

COLLISION COURSE: It's official. On the brink of another fiscal cliff, House Republicans will vote next week on a spending combo platter that stands zero chance in the Senate.

House appropriators unveiled a stopgap funding bill (H.J. Res. 124 \(115\)) late Wednesday that would deliver a hefty boost to the Pentagon while keeping budgets for domestic programs in limbo, as Sarah reported for Pros. That approach emerged victorious from the House GOP's closed-door meeting Wednesday afternoon, even as most members acknowledge the measure's ill fate across the Capitol.

Tossing the boomerang: All but four Senate Democrats already put their opposition in writing, more than enough to tank the bill. So the final version that lands on the House's doorstep after Senate tweaks next week will look mighty different than what the lower chamber's working with now. "The Senate will strip out the defense piece, predictably, and send it back to us," Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) told reporters.

WHAT'S IN:

- Full-year funding for the Pentagon, busting sequester-era caps
- A short-term extension of domestic spending, through Jan. 19
- Five years of money for CHIP, but with partisan pay-fors

WHAT'S NOT:

- Emergency aid for disaster-stricken states
- Renewal of controversial online surveillance powers, now threatening to trip up the whole bill
- A Medicare telemedicine expansion

Holding off, on purpose: Theoretically, GOP leaders could hold this vote as early as Monday or Tuesday, leaving plenty of time to avert last-minute "Cliffmas" drama. The text is out, and the whip team has been vote tallying today. But when we asked House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy this morning about timing, he replied: "I expect us to do tax before we do anything." With that once-in-a-generation overhaul on the line, GOP leaders aren't willing to take any unnecessary risks — like spurring backlash from striking a $200 billion deal with Democrats on spending caps. "If you're mad over the ultimate CR or the ultimate numbers, then we don't want you retaliating by voting no on tax," Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) told us. "People have a funny way of linking issues sometimes."

Reminder: This is Congress' third continuing resolution since fiscal 2018 began.

Doc of the day — Lawmakers from Texas and Florida sent a letter this week urging appropriators to help farmers and ranchers in the next disaster relief package, saying any aid bill would be "insufficient" without that assistance. More from Catherine Boudreau.

#DailyBudgetFact — A Republican-led Congress hasn't adopted a budget in an election year since 2000.

DISASTER AID

IMPATIENTLY WAITING: It's been exactly four weeks since the Trump administration sent lawmakers its third request for disaster aid. And still, no bill. Appropriators and lawmakers from hurricane-hit states continue to haggle now over the final details of a plan expected to exceed $60 billion, far surpassing the White House's wish for $44 billion. As Sarah explains, Texans and Floridians on Capitol Hill are starting to worry the effort will get brushed aside amid the year-end push to fund the government and overhaul the tax code.

In his words: "I don't understand why it's not ready," Rep. Tom Rooney (R-Fla.) said today. "Hurricane Irma hit us Sept. 10 and 11."

At least a week: House GOP leaders warned Republican lawmakers on Wednesday that the aid package might not be done before both chambers gavel out for Christmas. And that timing could complicate passage of the stopgap spending bill Congress needs to clear before Dec. 22 to avert government shutdown. That is, if a bunch of lawmakers from ailing regions lock arms in opposing that broader funding bill without disaster aid attached.

BUDGET

WORKING ON WORK REQUIREMENTS: House Speaker Paul Ryan made his clearest promise yet that the GOP would spend its precious budgetary powers next year on welfare reform. The ex-budget chairman said Congress will turn its attention to "very important entitlement reforms" during the fiscal 2019 reconciliation process, as Jen Haberkorn reports. We still don't know which programs will be targeted, though Ryan criticized the government's current system for "actually trapping people in poverty, disincentivizing work."

Back to it: Ryan explained that the House actually had three reconciliation packages ready to go in 2017. The first two, of course, were health care and tax reform — and now the speaker says the House will "go back" to welfare reform.

INFRASTRUCTURE

SUPER MINORITY: Since President Donald Trump was first elected, Senate Democrats have suggested a bipartisan deal on infrastructure investment could be doable. But now that the details are firming up — and rollout's imminent — the minority party doesn't seem at all interested in what's on the table. As Lauren Gardner reports, the White House is preparing to unveil its $1 trillion plan soon after Trump signs the GOP tax overhaul. The administration's approach is already drawing resistance from Democrats, though, who have said they won't support a plan stuffed with budget cuts and environmental rule rollbacks. Who cares? Senate Republicans, who will soon need to woo nine of their colleagues from across the aisle to get most things moving through the upper chamber.

TELECOM

FCC RESHUFFLES CASH: The FCC voted this morning to funnel more money into its broadband health program this year and to review that funding level down the road, David Pittman reports. The Rural Health Care Program provides $400 million each year for rural doctors, hospitals and nursing homes to adopt and pay for broadband internet. But the program has reached its cap the last two years as the use of telemedicine grew and nursing homes became eligible for the subsidies.

TAX

BAPTISM BY BYRD BATH: While a tax agreement has been reached, the text has yet to be released. And that means we have to wait for the Senate parliamentarian to do a final vetting of whether the plan is compliant with budget rules. It won't be a cold start, though. GOP negotiators say they've been sending proposals to the parliamentarian to head off any potential problems with the Byrd rule, as Bernie Becker explains in Morning Tax today.

BORDER SECURITY

OMB'S EARLY GUIDANCE: Congress hasn't even funded the government for fiscal 2018 and we're already talking about fiscal 2019. Democratic staff on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee released two reports this week detailing OMB's initial wish list for DHS. As Ted Hesson reports, those documents say the White House is again calling for $1.6 billion for building a border wall, while seeking $175 million less than the department has requested for technology and equipment. Stephanie Beasley notes that the reports claim OMB is instructing DHS to shave $88 million from its fiscal 2019 request for Customs and Border Protection.

NO FORTUNE TELLER: Newly seated DHS Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen said this week that she wishes she "had a crystal ball" for pinpointing a start date for construction on a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, Ted reports. "We hope soon," Nielsen said, calling the process of seizing land "complicated."

DEFENSE

NOT UP FOR DEBATE: House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry is loyally defending the "defense-only" spending plan House Republicans have crafted, arguing that lawmakers all agree that more money is needed to address the military's "readiness crisis," Connor O'Brien reports. "To continue to use defense funding as a political football in the face of these undisputed consequences is irresponsible," the Texas Republican said today. "We know what needs to be done to begin to repair our military. Congress should approve these resources now."

CONGRESS

RYAN RUNS FOR THE EXITS: In talks with his closest confidants, Ryan has made it known that he plans to retire after the 2018 midterm elections. And amid speculation that the speaker's departure could come even sooner, his two most likely successors — Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and Majority Whip Steve Scalise — have been strategizing ahead of the potential shakeup. Tim Alberta and Rachael Bade tell the whole story.

POTUS' position: The White House says Trump told Ryan he would be "very unhappy" if the Wisconsin Republican retired after the 2018 elections, Nolan McCaskill reports.

House Republicans unveil 'defense-only' spending bill Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/13/2017 07:29 PM EDT

House GOP leaders are forging ahead with a controversial spending strategy that would jam the Senate with a politically untenable product before the Dec. 22 government funding cliff.

The House Appropriations Committee released a bill this evening that would fund the Pentagon for a full year while covering five weeks of domestic spending — legislation Senate Democrats have already panned.

Under the House GOP measure, H.J. Res. 124, domestic funding would run out again on Jan. 21.

The stopgap strategy was the focus of a closed-door House Republican conference meeting this afternoon. During the hour-long session, Republicans mostly agreed to go ahead with the bill, even as some members openly predicted it would be rejected in the Senate.

The vast majority of Senate Democrats have said they would oppose any spending bill that doesn't increase budgets for the Pentagon and all other domestic departments by equal amounts.

GOP leaders, however, have so far rejected the Democratic demands for "parity," which has led to a weeks-long standstill on a deal for overall spending caps.

Congressional leaders must agree to raise spending levels in the next few weeks to avoid the triggering of automatic cuts to both domestic and defense programs. The House GOP's bill would permanently waive that automatic sequester, which was created under the 2011 Budget Control Act, but only for defense programs.

The bill would also extend funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program for five years.

House panel includes CHIP funding in spending bill — but with partisan pay-fors Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/13/2017 07:30 PM EDT

House appropriators tonight introduced a bill to fund the government through Jan. 19 that includes funding for the CHIP program and community health centers.

The bill includes the CHIP language approved by the House Energy and Commerce Committee and the full House to fund the children's health program for five years and the health centers for two.

Many Democrats rejected the CHIP stand-alone bill, H.R. 3922 \(115\), when it came up for a vote because it paid for CHIP with controversial cuts, such as to the ACA Prevention and Public Health Fund. Without changes, it stands little chance of getting through a filibuster by Senate Democrats.

Contested surveillance renewal threatens spending bill Back

By Martin Matishak and Sarah Ferris | 12/13/2017 07:14 PM EDT

Controversial online surveillance programs that expire at the end of the year have suddenly become a political hot potato that is threatening to derail must-pass spending bills.

For weeks, lawmakers and observers expected a renewal bill for the powerful tools, which collect the digital chatter of foreign targets, would be attached to a spending bill Congress must pass before before a Dec. 22 deadline.

But several Republican lawmakers involved in the negotiations said on Wednesday that the hotly contested surveillance legislation, which would reauthorize Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, is now threatening to blow up the whole process.

"If there's something that could provide a hiccup in the next two weeks, it's going to be 702 reauthorization," said Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), the chairman of the libertarian House Freedom Caucus.

It is "extremely problematic," he added, to tie the debate over the 702 statute to a continuing resolution spending bill.

The topic was one of the "unresolved issues" discussed Wednesday during a meeting of the House Republican Conference, conceded Rep. Tom Rooney (R-Fla.), who chairs the House Intelligence Committee's NSA and Cybersecurity subpanel.

Shortly after the conference meeting, the House Appropriations Committee released text of a stopgap spending bill through January that did not address the 702 issue.

The issue highlights yet another faction within the Republican party.

Libertarian-leaning Republicans do not support renewing the 702 statute without significant civil liberties-focused changes, such as adding certain warrant requirements for officials wishing to read the contents of Americans' communications that are incidentally swept up via 702 spying programs. But the GOP's national security hawks believe such changes would hinder the government's ability to fight crime and terrorism.

The spying renewal bill (H.R. 4478 \(115\)) slated for attachment to the continuing resolution favors the hawks. But attaching it could cause the Republican's libertarian caucus to withhold their roughly three dozen votes from the broader spending measure, meaning House Republicans might not have enough support to pass the stopgap bill without Democratic assistance.

"If you throw FISA in there, I think it blows it up, at least in the current form," said Rep. Scott Perry (R-Pa.)

"I think most of our conference is for reauthorization, but there's enough of our conference that can bring it down," Rooney agreed.

But with just over two weeks before an end-of-the-year deadline, lawmakers are running out of time to re-up the 702 statute, which national security officials insist is vital to combating foreign spies, terrorist threats and cyber crooks.

One possible path being discussed is tacking the 702 bill onto a supplemental spending bill lawmakers are preparing to compensate for the unexpected costs of dealing with major hurricanes that hit Houston, Puerto Rico and southern Florida.

Democrats are more likely to join Republicans to move the disaster relief proposal.

But Rooney warned that such a strategy might also fail.

"I just don't want to bring down the whole [continuing resolution], the disaster supplemental, and everything else, just because I can tell you most of the people in there that were talking that objected to what we were trying to do were objecting because of FISA," Rooney said after the House Republican Conference.

Yet another option is kicking the can down the road on 702 so it can be debated free of the end-of-year rush on spending legislation.

That move, Rooney said, would involve a simple, "clean" renewal, with no changes, putting off the final 702 decision for a few months.

"I think that that probably makes the most sense," Rooney said, calling it a "good escape valve for those of us that just want the rest of it done."

Indeed, the procedural tactics needed get a 702 bill through Congress aren't the only point of disagreement on the warrantless surveillance programs. After months of debate, lawmakers are still tussling over what revisions — if any — should be made to the online surveillance tools.

House Judiciary Committee leaders are still stumping for a reauthorization bill (H.R. 3989 \(115\)) they approved with bipartisan support last month. Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) even grilled Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein over the issue at a hearing Wednesday.

That measure would require FBI officials to obtain a warrant before reading the content of Americans' digital communications collected under 702. The warrant mandate would apply only to criminal investigations, however, not national security-related probes.

"It sounds like FISA really needs to be ... hashed out in the open with the full Congress," Rooney said. "I don't know if you can do that with something like FISA, but let people add amendments so that they can get to 'yes.'"

Rooney also pushed back against a recent report that intelligence community officials believe they have the authority to keep the snooping efforts operating until next April, despite the end-of-year sunset date.

While the programs could continue to operate, "no new intel can come in," he said. "You don't want to say we don't want to look at anybody new."

Funding measure drops expected telemedicine expansion Back

By David Pittman | 12/13/2017 08:19 PM EDT

A bill that would fund the government through Jan. 19 does not include a measure that would make it easier for private Medicare plans to offer telemedicine as a standard benefit. The House Appropriations Committee released the bill's text tonight.

Industry advocates were hopeful to get some legislation expanding Medicare coverage of the technology in a year-end bill. But the only mention of telemedicine is a line that extends HHS grant programs to community health centers.

The House Ways and Means Committee last month released a bipartisan agreement that included a bill, H.R. 3727 \(115\), that would allow Medicare Advantage plans to account for telemedicine in their annual bids from Medicare. Health plans must either cover the cost of the service with government rebates or require beneficiaries to pay higher premiums. The measure is projected to save Medicare $80 million over a decade.

But the policy, along with the rest of the "Medicare extenders" package, was excluded from the release tonight. Health groups objected to the way the rest of the extenders package was paid for.

Tonight's bill would also extend funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program for five years and community health center funding for two. Democrats have before rejected the way House Republicans want to pay for the CHIP funding, by cutting the Obamacare Prevention and Public Health Fund.

Under the House GOP measure, H.J. Res. 124 \(113\), domestic funding would run out again on Jan. 21.

Texas, Florida lawmakers say next disaster-aid package must help farmers Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 12/14/2017 11:48 AM EDT

Florida and Texas lawmakers are urging appropriators to help farmers and ranchers in the next multibillion-dollar disaster-relief package, which Congress was expected to pass as part of a year-end government spending deal.

"A supplemental crafted to help our states recover from historic hurricane damage would be insufficient if it fails to address the needs of our farm and ranch families," the Florida and Texas delegations wrote in a letter Wednesday to House and Senate appropriations leaders. "Many farm and ranch families are trying to secure financing right now and should be planting within a month's time. For these families, waiting longer for help is not an option."

Specifically, the lawmakers are requesting that the disaster-relief package address backlogs in USDA recovery programs, including in the Emergency Conservation Program, as well as ease certain requirements under the Livestock Indemnity Program and the Emergency Assistance for Livestock, Honey Bees and Farm-raised Fish program.

The lawmakers also requested "targeted" financial assistance for farmers, particularly those who grow commodities like vegetables that aren't widely covered by crop insurance.

A top USDA official recently told Congress that the department needs nearly $1 billion in disaster-relief funding following this year's devastating hurricanes and wildfires.

But with little more than a week to go until the Dec. 22 deadline when government funding expires, lawmakers are still negotiating details of the next round of disaster aid, stirring anxiety that the package could be punted another month.

The letter was signed by 54 members of Congress, all of whom represent Florida or Texas except for House Agriculture Committee members David Scott (D-Ga.), Austin Scott (R-Ga.) and Del. Stacey Plaskett (D-V.I.).

Aid for disaster-stricken states could be punted into January Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/13/2017 04:41 PM EDT

Lawmakers from Texas and Florida are exceedingly anxious that hurricane recovery aid will be sidelined in next week's government funding scramble amid internal disputes over who should get how much cash.

Congress was widely expected to approve its next multibillion-dollar disaster request as part of the year-end spending bill. But with just days to go until the Dec. 22 deadline when government funding expires, lawmakers are still haggling over the fine points of the next round of disaster aid.

House GOP leaders are now preparing to take up a stopgap spending bill next week that would not include any money for hurricane relief, potentially causing problems for passage if members from affected states rebel.

In a closed-door meeting Wednesday afternoon, GOP leaders cautioned lawmakers that the disaster package may not be ready by next week, according to members who were in the room.

The biggest holdup is over how much money should be spent on rebuilding in the Lone Star state, according to lawmakers briefed on the talks. Appropriators are still sifting through a massive binder of requests, worth over $61 billion, from Texans alone.

The delay is rattling lawmakers from both Texas and Florida. Rep. Tom Rooney, (R-Fla.), a vocal advocate for his state's ailing citrus industry, stood up during Wednesday's meeting, warning that a majority of Texas and Florida lawmakers would oppose a spending bill if they don't secure help for stricken states by Christmas.

Even the No. 2 Republican in the Senate now fears disaster assistance could be punted another month.

"We've been told time and time again by the speaker and the House leadership that the supplemental is going to be coming, but it never seems to come," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) told reporters Tuesday. "The can always seems to be kicked down the road."

"Now I'm worried that it may end up moving us into January. So I'm very concerned," Cornyn added.

House GOP appropriators say they're closing in on a final agreement for the disaster package and hope to release the text by next week. Lawmakers involved in the negotiations are expecting the package to exceed $60 billion, far more than the White House's $44 billion request.

Still, those members say they've received no assurance that the package would be included in the Dec. 22 continuing resolution — the last must-pass bill Congress is slated to consider this month.

"It's a possibility, but no guarantees," Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla) told POLITICO after the meeting.

That could be problematic for House GOP leaders as they look to round up votes to avert a government shutdown when funding expires.

Several lawmakers from the storm-battered states, including Rooney and Curbelo, say they refuse to leave for Christmas without approving the money. They fear that a month-long delay would lessen the political urgency needed to pass a multi-billion-dollar package.

At least some of those members have vowed to take a hard line on the issue. A bipartisan coalition of more than 60 lawmakers from Texas and Florida said in early December that they would block any year-end spending bill that doesn't include disaster funding.

That includes Texas Republicans with powerful perches, like House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) and Homeland Security Chairman Michael McCaul (R-Texas).

Since then, Texas and Florida lawmakers have been meeting regularly and have largely agreed to vote as a bloc to increase their leverage on disaster aid.

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) told POLITICO on Tuesday that she won't back a spending bill if it doesn't include "adequate" recovery dollars for Florida or Texas. "This is how our delegations feel about this," said Wasserman Schultz, whose district spans parts of Miami Beach, which was eroded by Hurricane Irma.

If they make good on their threat, those Texas and Florida lawmakers — representing two of Congress' largest state delegations — would have enough votes to tank the final spending bill.

With a government shutdown on the line, however, that's a big "if."

Rep. John Carter, who is both a Texan and chairman of the spending subcommittee that funds federal disaster assistance, said he won't threaten to oppose a funding bill before the final details are worked out, with or without disaster funding.

"I'm born and raised in Houston. I want disaster aid," Carter said. "I'm not going to say how I'll vote until I see what the plan is. We got to get the disaster aid right now, not six months from now. I'm not a one-issue voter. I vote for the big picture."

Rep. Mike Conaway (R-Texas), who also has not drawn an ultimatum on the disaster aid, said he has repeatedly voiced his demands for funding to House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy.

"I've indicated to anybody who will listen that we need to get that supplemental done before we leave for Christmas," Conaway told POLITICO, adding that McCarthy and Speaker Paul Ryan "understand how important I think it is."

If the package isn't included on the next spending bill, Conaway said GOP leaders could simply put the disaster measure on the floor for a standalone vote — as long as it's done before Dec. 22.

Another appropriator, Calvert, also said that scenario is possible. And some Republicans even speculated Wednesday that a supplemental package could be attached to a controversial bill to reauthorize online surveillance powers, which would also require Democratic votes.

Under the House GOP's plan, the next spending deadline would be Jan. 21 — about 20 weeks after Hurricane Harvey wrecked hundreds of thousands of homes in Houston.

Texans, in particular, fear this package will be their last shot at securing aid for Hurricane Harvey victims. The White House has said more money is coming for Puerto Rico but has not promised to revisit funding needs in Texas.

At this point, many of the unmet demands come down to "a guarantee" about where money will be spent, according to Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Texas), a leadership ally.

Faced with a barrage of funding requests from cash-strapped local officials, Sessions said GOP leaders have asked every state to narrow down its top priorities and "to understand what it's going to get."

Among the lawmakers lobbying for more funding: dozens of California lawmakers who have seen deadly wildfires burn large swaths of their state.

That includes senior members like McCarthy and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. A group of California members, led by McCarthy, met with Vice President Mike Pence on Tuesday to discuss the federal response to the wildfires.

Votes for next week's spending bill may also be scarce among the many New York Democrats with close ties to Puerto Rico. Members like Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) have taken a hard line demanding Puerto Rico funding.

The White House formally asked Congress for a $44 billion disaster package on Nov. 17, but members quickly panned that request, which they called paltry, and appropriators began writing their own version. The final bill is expected to far exceed the White House's request, in Congress' latest rebuke of the White House's budget office.

Congress has already approved $52 billion for this year's unexpectedly catastrophic storm season — a small fraction of what local officials say is needed to rebuild. Puerto Rico alone requested $96 billion. Texas and Florida asked for $61 billion and $27 billion, respectively.

The next funding package will be largely focused on Texas and Florida, where residents began rebuilding before Hurricane Maria slammed into Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands in late September.

Still, aides acknowledge there could be additional pressure to make more funding available for Puerto Rico after a blistering New York Times investigation found that as many as 1,000 people may have died from Hurricane Maria. The official death toll is 64 people.

Ryan commits to entitlement reform in reconciliation Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/14/2017 12:07 PM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan said today that the next reconciliation bill Congress takes up will go "back to very important entitlement reforms" and pledged to also return to Obamacare in 2018.

"Obamacare is collapsing and failing," Ryan said at a press conference in the Capitol. "We won't be able to ignore that problem, so we're going to have to revisit the problem of a health care marketplace that is collapsing."

He did not explicitly say the health care law would be addressed through reconciliation and provided no other details.

But Ryan committed to pursuing entitlement reform in an election year through the fast-track legislative process that doesn't allow for a filibuster in the Senate.

Next year will be "the year where we work on people," he said, adding there are not enough members of the workforce to make up for the aging Baby Boomer population.

"One of the important entitlement reforms we see that is necessary is get us out of this poverty trap where we're actually trapping people in poverty, dis-incentivizing work," Ryan said.

Senate Democrats flip the script on infrastructure plan Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 01/24/2017 03:08 PM EDT

Senate Democrats are already jockeying for the upper hand in the debate over infrastructure investment, getting out ahead of President Donald Trump's anticipated proposal with their own Tuesday rollout.

Just two work days into the new administration, Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) and several of his Democratic counterparts laid out what they call "A Blueprint to Rebuild America's Infrastructure and Create 15 Million Jobs," with a $1 trillion top line that mimics the investment Trump has promised.

But instead of waiting for Trump to detail his plan, Senate Democrats have stepped into the vacuum with their own proposal — a calculated political move that will help them command credit for a bold proposal, which they can also use to hammer their GOP colleagues for any opposition or delays.

"There have been some bills to do this long before Donald Trump was campaigning for the presidency. ... We've been stymied by our Republican colleagues," Schumer told reporters Tuesday afternoon, in a preview of what's sure to be messaging points to come. "We're challenging him to join us, even if his Republican colleagues in the House and Senate aren't for it."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has said he supports the idea of additional infrastructure investment. But he, along with other Republicans, have cautioned against reliving the perceived failures of the 2009 economic stimulus.

House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said on Tuesday that "we will have to carve out the fiscal space necessary for the infrastructure package" as part of the budget — and until that happens, a top-line figure simply won't exist.

But Schumer accused both leaders of being disinterested in any kind of infrastructure investment.

"Let's see his plan," Schumer said about Ryan. "Sounds to me like he doesn't [have one]. Sounds to me like he has a million caveats."

Schumer had a similar assessment of McConnell's stance.

"McConnell's position hasn't changed," Schumer said. "He has been in the past — and nothing has changed — very negative."

Schumer said he has talked to Trump about collaborating on an infrastructure package and said he warned him that lawmakers in the president's own party will be resistant to that effort.

"He seems open to a bill that's this large," Schumer said about Trump. "And I told him, repeatedly, 'If you want to do a bill like this, you're going to have to tell a lot of your Republicans, particularly on the right wing, that they're not going to get their way.' And he acknowledged that. So we'll see what happens."

Later Tuesday, McConnell responded to the Democrats' plan by saying "I don't think we ought to borrow almost a trillion dollars and plus up a bunch of federal accounts, accumulate a lot of debt, and don't build any projects to speak of." And he said he looked forward to Trump's team putting together a proposal that's "paid for" and won't include racking up a "trillion-dollar debt."

Missing from the Democrats' plan is how they propose to pay for it — a crucial component that Rep. John Delaney (D-Md.), who has his own plan, was quick to point out in a press release.

Schumer acknowledged that some Democrats favor using funds generated by closing tax loopholes and repatriating money from corporate overseas earnings. But he argued that repatriation cash is "not going to be close to enough to fund what we need, even if it were included."

"As for how we pay for it, we will discuss that with [President] Trump. But many of us believe that it should just be used to create jobs, not to take money away," Schumer said. "We don't believe we should cut middle-class or other programs."

Trump has suggested his plan will be deficit neutral. And what little details have been released so far seem to mostly focus on incentivizing private sector capital, including through tax breaks to those willing to bankroll infrastructure projects.

Schumer said that approach won't fly with congressional Democrats.

"We think the tax incentives and private-public partnerships hardly build anything that's really needed. They would go to places that could be built right now with municipal bonds and other things," Schumer said. "You have to pay for tax incentives, too — giving people big tax breaks. So it's not a pay-for, it's a method of financing. We don't like that method of financing."

With the blueprint they debuted on Tuesday, Senate Democrats are calling for "wide-sweeping" infrastructure investment and claim their proposed investments would create more than 15 million new jobs over the next decade.

Under their plan, the largest sum of money — $210 billion— would go to repairing roads and bridges, an investment the Democratic lawmakers claim would save the average American family more than $1,700 a year. The plan also states that an infrastructure package also should ensure the "long-term solvency of the Federal Highway Trust Fund," including transit, and pledges a $10 billion TIGER grant program.

Their plan proposes $200 billion for a so-called "Vital Infrastructure Projects" program they say would "direct major federal investments to the most critical national projects;" $180 billion to replace and expand rail and bus systems, including Amtrak and Positive Train Control; and $110 billion for a grant-focused water and sewer program.

It also would kick $100 billion to energy infrastructure; $75 billion to rebuild schools; and $70 billion for ports, airports and waterways, including a "major increase in appropriations" for the FAA's facilities and equipment budget, the Airport Improvement Program, and for accelerating NextGen.

Sums of $20 billion would go to both expanding broadband access and infrastructure projects on public lands and Indian reservations. And the plan calls for an infrastructure bank capitalized with $10 billion.

The Democratic proposal would include "Buy America" provisions, Davis Bacon prevailing wage requirements, language intended to increase the involvement of minority and women-owned businesses, and environmental mandates.

Other Democrats who joined Schumer in unveiling the proposal include Sens. Tom Carper, Sherrod Brown, Bernie Sanders, Bill Nelson, Maria Cantwell, Ron Wyden and Patrick Leahy.

Tanya Snyder contributed to this report.

FCC expands rural health broadband program Back

By David Pittman | 12/14/2017 12:02 PM EDT

The FCC will shuffle additional funds into its rural health broadband subsidy program this year and review the program's funding levels for future years, the commission voted this morning.

The Rural Health Care Program provides $400 million annually for rural doctors, hospitals and nursing homes to adopt and pay for broadband internet. But the program has reached its cap the last two years as the use of telemedicine grew and nursing homes became eligible for the subsidies.

Recognizing complaints about the program, the FCC voted to redistribute unused money from 2015 and earlier to ensure all eligible applicants in 2017 receive money. The commissioner will also seek public comment on how to make the program more efficient in future years.

"Every dollar in this program needs to be stretched as far as possible to help those in need in places like southeast Kansas," FCC Chair Ajit Pai said today.

GOP Commissioner Michael O'Rielly opposed the motion, saying FCC should require reduced spending in other areas of its Universal Serving Fund, the $11 billion pot of money for uses like education and health care.

Brendan Carr, another Republican commissioner, also voiced concern about the longterm trajectory of the program but supported today's order to provide relief for rural health care providers.

Rubio a 'no' on tax reform unless child tax credit expanded Back

By Colin Wilhelm and Brian Faler | 12/14/2017 02:33 PM EDT

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) will withhold his vote from the final Republican tax plan unless it includes an expanded child tax credit, he said Thursday.

"I can't in good conscience support it unless we are able to increase the refundable portion of it, and there's way to do it, and we'll be very reasonable," Rubio told reporters.

Refundability allows people to get a tax refund even if the amount of the credit exceeds what they owe in taxes.

He said he's received no assurances his concerns will be addressed, though he said President Donald Trump alluded to them Wednesday in a speech.

Asked of the likelihood of Republican leaders making changes to address his concerns, Rubio said, "We're about to find out."

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said, "We're going to continue working with the senator."

SALT coalition blasts deal in tax reform agreement Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/14/2017 01:03 PM EDT

Taxes will rise for homeowners in many states and their property values will go down thanks to congressional Republicans' tax deal, the advocacy group Americans Against Double Taxation predicted today.

The coalition of state and local government and education groups is urging lawmakers to vote against the final agreement on the House and Senate tax legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), because it doesn't preserve the full federal deduction for all state and local taxes.

The package poised for passage in Congress next week will limit taxpayers' deductions to their property taxes plus either their income or sales taxes, up to $10,000. That will hurt real estate and threaten funding for infrastructure and public services, Americans Against Double Taxation said in a statement.

"The 11th hour deal by conferees to impose this $10,000 limit on a combination of state and local taxes that could be deducted does virtually nothing to alleviate the severe cost imposed on middle-class families caused by the partial elimination of SALT," the statement said.

Twelve of the 13 GOP lawmakers who voted against initial House passage of the tax bill came from three high-tax states — New York, New Jersey and California — when the legislation only allowed property tax deductions up to $10,000. The option to let taxpayers deduct up to $10,000 of state and local income taxes is meant to ensure few if any other California Republicans vote against the final bill next week.

"It should take care of a lot of those concerns," Rep. Doug LaMalfa (R-Calif.), who voted for the bill, told POLITICO today.

WHAT'S NEXT: Republicans plan to release the details of the agreement by the end of this week.

Pence delays Israel trip to stay for possible Senate tiebreaker Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Seung Min Kim | 12/14/2017 11:05 AM EDT

Vice President Mike Pence is delaying a planned trip to the Middle East in order to stay in town for the Senate vote on major tax cut legislation planned for early next week, his office announced on Thursday.

"Yesterday the White House informed Senate Leadership that due to the historic nature of the vote in the Senate on tax cuts for millions of Americans, the VP would stay to preside over the vote," said Pence spokeswoman Alyssa Farah.

While the vice president's office framed the change of plans as a desire to be present for a vote they described as "historic," there is a more pressing reason for the last-minute rescheduling: Pence could be needed to break a tie in the Senate to get the legislation through at all.

The initial tax bill barely squeaked through the senate, getting approved 51-49, with all Democrats and Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) voting against it.

Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Thad Cochran of Mississippi, both of whom supported the Senate version of the tax measure, have missed votes all this week due to medical reasons.

Cochran, whom a spokesman said is recovering from a procedure to deal with a non-melanoma lesion on his nose, can return to the Senate for votes "as needed," according to his office. McCain is at Walter Reed Medical Center for treatment related to his brain cancer, which he was diagnosed with earlier this year. His office hasn't said when he would return to the Capitol.

If both McCain and Cochran are absent and no senator switches his or her vote, then Pence would have to break a 49-49 tie.

Adding to the uncertainty, some Republicans, including Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, have yet to take a position on the House-Senate compromise, which is slated to be unveiled on Friday.

"We are so close to passing pro-growth pro-jobs tax reform for hard-working families," Pence's office said in a statement Thursday.

The vice president will then travel to Egypt and Israel where he'll reaffirm the United States' commitment to its allies in the Middle East and to working cooperatively to defeat radicalism."

The delay comes as the trip is already shrouded in controversy, coming on the heels of President Donald Trump's decision to formally recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, a move that upends decades of U.S. policy related to the Middle East peace process.

Some major Arab leaders, including Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and leaders of the Egypt Coptic Church, have backed out of meetings with Pence. And Pence's planned speech to Israel's legislature, the Knesset, is being boycotted by a group of Arab-Israeli members.

Pence is also slated to travel to Egypt, where he will meet with Egyptian President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi.

Republicans drop plan to tax graduate student tuition waivers Back

By Michael Stratford | 12/13/2017 07:31 PM EDT

Republicans have abandoned plans to increase taxes on graduate students as part of their sweeping tax overhaul, under the deal reached today between House and Senate negotiators.

The conference committee has agreed to drop from the final tax bill a provision that would have taxed as income the tuition waivers that graduate students receive in exchange for working as teaching or research assistants, according to a GOP aide.

The provision, which was part of the House-passed GOP tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), immediately provoked a backlash from colleges and universities, which argued that the tax increase would devastate graduate education.

Students and higher education groups lobbied heavily against the proposal in recent weeks.

The Senate bill never included the graduate student tax, and even some House Republicans began backing away from it in recent weeks. A group of 31 House Republicans, led by Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Texas), last week asked congressional leaders to drop the provision from the final tax bill.

Health deductions survive in tax bill Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 12/13/2017 08:45 PM EDT

The tax deal in Congress preserves the deductions for medical bills, which the House wanted to scrap but the Senate pushed to keep.

Sources familiar with the agreement said it reflects the approach from Sen. Susan Collins — it preserves the deduction for expenses above 10 percent of adjusted gross income but lowers it to 7.5 percent for two years.

Most Americans don't take that deduction — but for those who do, such as families caring for someone with a disability or paying for long-term care, it helps with the large, ongoing expenses.

With tax victory in reach, Trump plays salesman-in-chief Back

By Nancy Cook | 12/13/2017 06:11 PM EDT

President Donald Trump got to play his favorite White House role Wednesday: salesman-in-chief.

As the White House tries to fend off criticism that the Republican tax bill overwhelmingly benefits wealthy individuals and businesses, the president invited five American families into the West Wing to highlight the way the legislation would help them.

Many of the families, with children in tow, personally thanked the president for their tax savings.

Trump, fresh from a shock Republican defeat in Alabama, glowed.

In his freewheeling, upbeat, roughly 20-minute speech, he promised to give "the American people a giant tax cut for Christmas. And when I say giant, I mean giant," he said with his trademark hyperbole.

As he spoke, negotiators across town were finalizing a deal, finally putting a major legislative victory within reach for Trump.

In recent days, with the bill nearing completion, the president has been inserting himself directly into the tax negotiations - as equal parts dealmaker, cheerleader, and troublemaker - even as Congress determined the policy specifics largely on its own, according to interviews with congressional aides, senior administration officials, and sources close to the administration.

Trump has personally reached out to congressional leaders by phone several times a week to check in on the status of the negotiations, or simply for an update, according to congressional aides and sources close to the White House.

He speaks to House Speaker Paul Ryan as often as three to four times a day and spoke to House Ways & Means Chairman Kevin Brady every other day this week.

On Monday, as soon as Ryan returned to Washington, Trump interrupted one of the speaker's staff meetings with a cell phone call, according to one congressional aide - so eager was Trump to hear about the latest machinations on the tax bill.

Trump's involvement hasn't always been helpful. He upended part of the tax negotiations last week by suggesting off-the-cuff, less than 24 hours after the Senate narrowly passed its tax bill, that the corporate tax rate could rise to 22 percent after months of insisting it land, first at 15, and then 20 percent. The comment caught some top White House aides off guard, said one person close to the administration.

The tentative tax deal agreed to Wednesday cuts the corporate rate to 21 percent and temporarily slashes individual tax rates across the board, bringing the top individual rate down to 37 percent, while dramatically re-shaping the international tax landscape for businesses to a degree that tax experts and top lobbyists are still trying to comprehend.

To detractors of the bill who argue it primarily helps the rich and companies, Trump said on Wednesday that those "cynical voices" had no idea because they had not yet seen the final bill.

The president's speech, first planned late last week, was a way for him to seize the role of salesman - even as he put the onus for the passing the bill squarely on his Republican Hill counterparts.

Trump promised in his speech that families of four earning $75,000 would see their tax bills slashed in half and that the bill would expand the child tax credit to a greater degree than anticipated. He also said it would cut tax rates on businesses, a move he called "expected." And he added that the IRS would be in position to ensure that Americans will see tax cuts show up in their paychecks as of February.

"As a country we're being respected again," the president said. "I'm here today to tell you that we will never let bad things happen, with respect to the economy of our country."

The White House sought to use Trump's speech as a way for the president to make his "closing argument on tax reform," according to senior administration officials. The House and Senate are trying to pass the tax legislation early next week.

Lately, the White House has been signaling that a victory on a tax overhaul will be folded into a broader message heading into 2018 about the way Trump's presidency has boosted the economy - even if independent economists give part of that credit to foundations laid by former President Obama.

"We are nearing a historic moment to decide the economic future of our nation, and we have it in our power to reject the cynicism to say two percent growth is the new normal," said one senior administration official about the tax bill. "It's important for the president to put it in the context of the larger vision."

And in Trump's telling on Wednesday, the tax bill took on a larger-than-life role becoming a panacea for many of America's trouble by breaking down what he called government barriers, helping to unleash innovation, and restoring the hope of the middle class, Trump said, adding: "Millions of middle-class families will win under our plan."

Yellen: Fed expects tax bill to boost GDP Back

By Victoria Guida | 12/13/2017 04:05 PM EDT

Federal Reserve Chair Janet Yellen today said the tax package going through Congress is one of the factors that led Fed officials to increase their projections for GDP growth next year to 2.5 percent from 2.1 percent.

"The type of tax changes that are likely to be enacted ... are one of the reasons for the uptick in estimated growth and decline in unemployment rate," Yellen said in her final press conference as head of the central bank.

But she noted that Fed officials had been incorporating some potential fiscal stimulus into their projections all year, "so changes since September should not be viewed as an estimate of the impact of the tax package."

Yellen did not say whether the bill might lead the central bank to raise rates more quickly, though she noted that Fed officials did not really change their projections for the future path of the Fed's main borrowing rate.

Still, she repeatedly emphasized the uncertainty around what the ultimate effects of the legislation would be.

The outgoing Fed chief said the bill would seem to stimulate spending but also has "some potential" to boost productivity. For example, increased investment as a result of the corporate tax cut and immediate expensing could boost capital formation. "Exactly how large those effects might be remain uncertain," she added.

WHAT'S NEXT: Yellen's term as chair ends at the beginning of February.

McConnell: ANWR drilling included in final tax bill Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/13/2017 03:23 PM EDT

Language opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge will be included Republican compromise tax package, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said in prepared remarks today.

"Our legislation will also provide for our nation's energy future," McConnell said. "By further developing Alaska's oil and gas potential, this bill will help create jobs, support energy independence and promote our national security."

The provision's inclusion is not surprising given the presence of two powerful Alaskans, Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and former House Natural Resources Chairman Don Young, on the conference committee.

Current House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop confirmed opening the ANWR area to oil and gas drilling would included in Title II of the legislation. "I'm very proud of that particular section and I appreciate all those who worked so hard on that," he said at the tax conference open meeting.

Democrats remained staunchly against the move, arguing it posed a threat to the wildlife refuge and would not generate the revenues that have been forecast.

"This should be taken out," Rep. Raúl Grijalva said. "It's wildly optimistic that because of what's going to happen in the Arctic refuge that somehow that is going to offset part of the huge deficit that's being created by this legislation. We don't need the oil."

WHAT'S NEXT: Republicans have apparently reached an agreement on the bill but final text has not yet been released.

Tax bill will resolve 'base erosion' problem for renewables Back

By Eric Wolff and Anthony Adragna | 12/14/2017 01:57 PM EDT

Congressional conferees have resolved a tax issue that put financing for renewable projects in jeopardy, two Republicans on the conference committee said today.

Under measures in the tax proposal aimed at keeping companies from sending their profits to lower tax countries, the Senate tax bill had created disincentives for financial institutions to fund renewable projects through the tax equity markets developers use to raise capital. Clean energy proponents said the base erosion and anti-abuse tax provision would have eroded the value of incentives like the production and investment tax credits in those markets.

But now tax writers seem to have found a way around the problem, though details remained scarce and the situation is fluid. Republicans are aiming to release the conference report on the tax bill by Friday and hope to have it to President Donald Trump's desk before the end of next week.

"Well, that's where we kind of try to find a middle ground to land on, and I think we've sort of — it'll be a combination of things. It's not entirely one provision," Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said Thune was taking the lead on fixing the BEAT issue, and she agreed it had been addressed. Both senators are on the conference committee.

The fix may entail allowing financiers to take the full value of the research and development tax credit until 2025, and 80 percent of other credits, like the ITC and PTC, according to Keith Martin, an attorney who is co-head of U.S. projects for Norton Rose Fulbright. Martin said he hadn't seen actual text of the legislation, so he wasn't sure if that's what would end up in the final bill.

WHAT'S NEXT: Bill text is expected Friday.

Report: White House pushed for border wall funding in DHS proposal Back

By Ted Hesson | 12/13/2017 05:18 PM EDT

The White House budget office pushed for more border wall funding in a Homeland Security Department spending proposal, according to a pair of reports released today by Democratic staff in the Senate Homeland Security Committee.

The reports, on border security priorities and personnel, summarize a budget document that outlines President Donald Trump's priorities in a fiscal year 2019 spending bill.

The White House called for a total of $1.6 billion "to continue construction of the border wall in the Rio Grande Valley Sector," according to the report on border priorities.

The proposal amounts to $700 million more than requested by DHS — a 78 percent increase, the report reads.

At the same time, OMB sought to shrink the DHS funding request for technology and equipment by roughly $175 million, according to the report.

Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs ranking member Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) asked her staff to analyze the OMB document, which her office said was provided by a whistleblower.

White House advising DHS to cut Customs funding in fiscal 2019 request Back

By Stephanie Beasley | 12/13/2017 06:25 PM EDT

The White House budget office has advised DHS to cut funding for the office overseeing Customs agents, according to a document obtained by Democrats on the Senate Homeland Security Committee.

A minority staff report outlining a document the committee received from a whistleblower shows the White House instructed DHS to shave $88 million from its fiscal 2019 budget request for the Customs and Border Protection field operations office that oversees both Customs and Border Security agents.

The budget office further advised the department to add more border security officers but was mum on Customs hires for ports of entry, suggesting the White House has no plans to fill Customs vacancies, per the report.

"The lack of funding for additional CBP officers is especially troubling given the fact that staffing is currently too low by over 3,600 positions based on its internal workload staffing model," the report reads.

As POLITICO previously reported, groups like the American Association of Port Authorities have warned that there could be dire consequences to diverting resources away from Customs to the border, including a possible slow down in commerce and widening maritime security gaps.

Minority committee staff released a separate report on the White House's recommendation for border security priorities.

Nielsen on border wall timeline: 'I wish I had a crystal ball' Back

By Ted Hesson | 12/13/2017 05:17 PM EDT

Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen said today that she couldn't pinpoint when construction could begin on a wall across the U.S.-Mexico border.

"I wish I had a crystal ball and could answer that," she said. "We hope soon."

The secretary spoke about the wall during a press conference in front of a stretch of border fence in Hidalgo, Texas.

She said the department would evaluate security needs and then "take the solicitation further."

U.S. Customs and Border Protection continues to test wall prototypes that it completed in October, but Democrats in Congress oppose funding for a broader structure.

Nielsen also addressed the possibility that the federal government would need to seize private lands to build a wall.

She called the process "complicated," but said the department would seek to partner with landowners, as well as local and state authorities.

"The wall is all user- and requirement-driven," she said. "So where we need a wall, we'll have a wall."

Thornberry: The need for more defense spending is 'settled' Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/14/2017 01:49 PM EDT

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry today staunchly defended the Republican effort to attach a full-year defense spending bill to a new stopgap government funding measure, arguing the need for an immediate boost for the Pentagon has been "settled."

On Wednesday, the House Appropriations Committee unveiled a new spending measure that would fund the Pentagon for the full fiscal year while only funding domestic programs through Jan. 19.

But the legislation is likely dead in its current form in the Senate, where spending legislation requires the support of Democrats to reach the 60-vote threshold to avert a filibuster.

"No one is arguing that we are appropriating too much money for the military, or that the needs of our men and women in uniform aren't urgent, or that we aren't running out of time to turn the readiness crisis around in the face of serious threats," the Texas Republican said in a statement. "Those issues are settled."

Defense spending is too important to hold up until a government-wide funding deal is struck, he said, citing readiness gaps and growing threats abroad.

"To continue to use defense funding as a political football in the face of these undisputed consequences is irresponsible," Thornberry said. "We know what needs to be done to begin to repair our military. Congress should approve these resources now."

The House GOP bill also would suspend across-the-board spending due in January if spending exceeds budget caps set for defense and domestic agencies. Congressional leaders are also discussing a potential deal to increase those caps.

Paul Ryan Sees His Wild Washington Journey Coming to An End Back

By Tim Alberta and Rachael Bade | 12/14/2017 12:26 PM EDT

Spirits were high inside the House chamber on Thursday, November 16, when, in the early afternoon, the gavel fell and a measure to rewrite the American tax code passed on a partisan tally of 227 to 205. As the deciding votes were cast—recorded in green on the black digital scoreboard suspended above the floor—the speaker of the House, Paul Ryan, threw his head back and slammed his hands together. Soon he was engulfed in a sea of dark suits, every Republican lawmaker wanting to slap him on the shoulder and be a part of his moment.

Ryan was the man of the hour. Having spent a quarter-century in Washington—as an intern, waiter, junior think-tanker, Hill staffer and, since 1999, as a member of Congress—he had never wavered in his obsession with fixing what he viewed as the nation's two fundamental weaknesses: its Byzantine tax system and ballooning entitlement state. Now, with House Republicans celebrating the once-in-a-generation achievement of a tax overhaul, Ryan was feeling both jubilant and relieved—and a little bit greedy. Reveling in the afterglow, Ryan remarked to several colleagues how this day had proven they could accomplish difficult things—and that next year, they should set their sights on an even tougher challenge: entitlement reform. The speaker has since gone public with this aspiration, suggesting that 2018 should be the year Washington finally tackles what he sees as the systemic problems with Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Tinkering with the social safety net is a bold undertaking, particularly in an election year. But Ryan has good reason for throwing caution to the wind: His time in Congress is running short.

Despite several landmark legislative wins this year, and a better-than-expected relationship with President Donald Trump, Ryan has made it known to some of his closest confidants that this will be his final term as speaker. He consults a small crew of family, friends and staff for career advice, and is always cautious not to telegraph his political maneuvers. But the expectation of his impending departure has escaped the hushed confines of Ryan's inner circle and permeated the upper-most echelons of the GOP. In recent interviews with three dozen people who know the speaker—fellow lawmakers, congressional and administration aides, conservative intellectuals and Republican lobbyists—not a single person believed Ryan will stay in Congress past 2018.

Ryan was tiring of D.C. even before reluctantly accepting the speakership. He told his predecessor, John Boehner, that it would be his last job in politics—and that it wasn't a long-term proposition. In the months following Trump's victory, he began contemplating the scenarios of his departure. More recently, over closely held conversations with his kitchen cabinet, Ryan's preference has become clear: He would like to serve through Election Day 2018 and retire ahead of the next Congress. This would give Ryan a final legislative year to chase his second white whale, entitlement reform, while using his unrivaled fundraising prowess to help protect the House majority—all with the benefit of averting an ugly internecine power struggle during election season. Ryan has never loved the job; he oozes aggravation when discussing intraparty debates over "micro-tactics," and friends say he feels like he's running a daycare center. On a personal level, going home at the end of next year would allow Ryan, who turns 48 next month, to keep promises to family; his three children are in or entering their teenage years, and Ryan, whose father died at 55, wants desperately to live at home with them full time before they begin flying the nest. The best part of this scenario, people close to the speaker emphasize: He wouldn't have to share the ballot with Trump again in 2020.

And yet speculation is building that, Ryan, even fresh off his tax-reform triumph, might not be able to leave on his own terms. He now faces a massive pileup of cannot-fail bills in January and February. It's an outrageous legislative lift: Congress must, in the coming weeks, fund the government, raise the debt ceiling, modify spending caps, address the continuation of health care subsidies, shell out additional funds for disaster relief and deal with the millions of undocumented young immigrants whose protected status has been thrown into limbo. It represents the most menacing stretch of Ryan's speakership—one that will almost certainly require him to break promises made to his conference and give significant concessions to Democrats in exchange for their votes. To meet key deadlines, he'll have to approve sizable spending increases and legal status for minors who came to the U.S. illegally—two things that could raise the ire of the GOP base and embolden his conservative rivals on Capitol Hill. There is no great outcome available, Ryan has conceded to some trusted associates—only survival. "Win the day. Win the next day. And then win the week," Ryan has been preaching to his leadership team.

The speaker can't afford to admit he's a lame duck—his fundraising capacity and deal-making leverage would be vastly diminished, making the House all the more difficult to govern. When asked at the end of a Thursday morning press conference if he was leaving soon, Ryan shot a quick "no" over his shoulder as he walked out of the room.

Ryan is backed by the vast majority of the GOP Conference, but even a small group of dissenters can make the speaker's life miserable—and he knows it. When Ryan succeeded Boehner in the fall of 2015, the new speaker sought to eliminate—or at least weaken—the parliamentary tactic that had been used against his predecessor. By filing a "motion to vacate the chair," Rep. Mark Meadows of North Carolina had found a way to force a vote on the speakership at any time—a potential humiliation that Boehner avoided by retiring. Ryan, working with Boehner's team during the transition, was unsuccessful in banning this practice. But he made it clear to Boehner at the time, and to his own allies upon assuming the speakership, that he would not serve at the whims of Meadows and the House Freedom Caucus, a group of some 35 conservative hard-liners. In an interview this fall with POLITICO Magazine, Ryan said the motion to vacate doesn't loom large as a constant threat to his job security. "No, because it's not a job I ever wanted in the first place," Ryan said. "If I was dying to be speaker, I guess it probably would be a dagger over my head. But I don't think like that."

Members of the Freedom Caucus don't necessarily believe this rhetoric from Ryan, but they respect the strategic advantage it gives him. After all, when Boehner left town, Ryan was the only consensus replacement—and even then, members had to beg him to assume the most powerful office on Capitol Hill. Given that history, any conservative who attempts to overthrow Ryan would make the Freedom Caucus—and its two leaders, Meadows and Ohio Rep. Jim Jordan—look like nihilists who collect speakers' scalps for sport. This is especially true without any obvious, universally acceptable successor waiting in the wings. "There are no more golden boys left," Meadows said in an interview, discussing the possibility of Ryan's departure.

Ryan's problems are not limited to the Freedom Caucus; there is, without question, wider discontent in the conference than the speaker appreciates, with legislators across the ideological and experiential spectrums grumbling about a hypercentralized process that gives them a vote on the floor but little else. That said, it requires a special brand of gumption to go after the speaker's gavel—and the usual suspects can be found in and on the periphery of the Freedom Caucus. These members, who have been eerily quiet for much of 2017, have begun making noise about a mutiny. The expectation of a major betrayal on Ryan's part—either on spending levels, immigration or a combination of the two—has prompted incessant chatter in recent weeks of someone filing a motion to vacate the chair, perhaps as soon as next month. This could be gamesmanship, a bluff to make Ryan feel pressured to step aside. But with a sudden, pervasive sense that Ryan might be ready to leave anyway, a motion to vacate would make sense as a test of his desire to stay on the job.

Either way, the convergence of these realizations—Ryan wanting to retire after 2018, and a possible threat to his speakership even sooner—has sparked a flurry of activity in the offices of Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and Majority Whip Steve Scalise, the two most likely successors to Ryan. Both believed Ryan would leave late next year and were therefore planning their next steps at an appropriately deliberate pace. This has abruptly changed: According to multiple GOP sources, both McCarthy and Scalise have taken recent meetings with members loyal to them who have been eager to strategize about life after Ryan. There is little chance Scalise runs against McCarthy, but the whip—knowing McCarthy lacked the votes to become speaker in 2015, prompting Ryan to accept the job—is taking careful stock of the conference, preparing to launch his own candidacy should McCarthy stumble a second time.

The one person who can keep these dominoes from falling, at least in the near term, is Trump. The president and the speaker have been a better pairing than anyone could have imagined a year ago, considering Ryan abandoned the GOP nominee during the homestretch of the 2016 campaign. The speaker has kept shoulder to shoulder with the White House at moments of vulnerability, knowing Trump can shield him—and his members—from the fury of the right. If the president endorses whatever grotesque legislative meatball comes out of the House in the coming weeks—publicly and unambiguously—it's impossible to see Ryan facing any real threat. If the president distances himself from the speaker, however, the floodgates could open—and quickly. Conservatives, having whispered in the president's ear about Ryan not sharing his interests, will be watching carefully for cues. So too will Steve Bannon, who has been conspicuous this year in holding his fire on Ryan, an old nemesis, while laying waste to Senate GOP leader Mitch McConnell. Bannon and Meadows, a pair of disruptive forces, have spent the past year keeping Ryan's blood out of the water—but in the unlikely scenario that Trump suddenly sours on the House speaker, they will be inviting the sharks to dinner.

Underscoring all of this palace intrigue are some strange realities—such as the fact that Ryan's survival as speaker might require cover from the very president who once believed that Ryan was trying to sabotage his presidential campaign. Or the notion that Ryan, should he secure his final year in office, will use it to pursue the type of dramatic, politically risky entitlement reforms that Trump explicitly ruled out while running for president. Perhaps no piece of irony is more striking, or effective in capturing this volatile period of Republican history, than the juxtaposition between Ryan celebrating his dream of rewriting the tax code—while hearing of renewed threats to his speakership.

Ryan nearly walked away from Congress once before. It was November 2012, after Mitt Romney's loss to Barack Obama, and the would-be vice president found himself despondent and homesick. Ryan told his wife, Janna, that he was considering retirement. That's when Boehner called. The speaker, concerned about the stability of his conference, could not afford to lose Ryan; he promised the influential Budget Committee chairman a waiver so he could lead the panel for another two years. Ryan agreed, and as the sting of 2012 receded, he began to map out his political future—and his exit strategy from Congress. Having run and lost a national campaign, Ryan rejected pleas to consider his own presidential prospects; instead, he set his sights on the Ways and Means Committee. The chairmanship, which he had long viewed as a dream job, would open after 2014, and Ryan saw it as the perfect perch from which to both pursue his long-standing policy goals and influence the direction of the national party in 2016. Ryan had it all figured out, according to interviews at the time with his friends, family and staff: He would chair the committee, help a newly elected Republican president write a sweeping overhaul of the tax code, and then ride off into the sunset.

But it wasn't meant to be. Less than a year into Ryan's Ways and Means tenure, Boehner decided to call it quits. He had asked his protege several times over the previous year—since the primary defeat of Majority Leader Eric Cantor—to succeed him as the speaker. "I gave him the Heisman every time," Ryan told POLITICO. The Ways and Means chairman was content to support his friend McCarthy. But the Freedom Caucus wasn't. Jordan and Meadows, concerned that McCarthy, a pragmatic Californian, would lead no differently than Boehner, made him a series of offers—their support in exchange for something from him. One of the proposals called for process reforms, including a drastic restructuring of the Steering Committee, which decides committee assignments and chairmanships. Another, more politically explicit offer, promised McCarthy the group's votes if he could make either Jordan or Meadows the majority leader. When McCarthy bristled, suggesting he couldn't possibly deliver what they wanted, the group told him he wouldn't have enough votes on the House floor to become speaker—even if he had already scored an overwhelming majority in the closed-door conference election.

Hours before that private vote was set to occur, McCarthy called Ryan to say he didn't want the job—and that really, Ryan should take it. He still wasn't interested. Only after several days of around-the-clock phone calls from prominent Republicans did Ryan open himself to the possibility. He began thinking about his conditions for accepting the job. One was family time on the weekends, which was non-negotiable; another was support from the Freedom Caucus. Ryan had watched Boehner struggle to contain the rebellion after the tea party wave of 2010; he would not assume the speakership over the objections of the same rambunctious members who had helped drive Boehner from office. By securing their support up front, Ryan hoped to inoculate himself against the inevitable future grumblings from House conservatives.

Some Freedom Caucus members had reservations about Ryan, but others were ecstatic at his willingness to take the job. Unlike with Boehner, they saw the Wisconsinite—an Ayn Rand devotee and fierce critic of the welfare state—as one of their own. He was equally appealing to other factions of the conference—a sober-minded, well-spoken, telegenic leader with policy experience and people skills. After five years of civil war, there was no other figure who could unite the fractured House Republican Conference. Ryan's colleagues teasingly called him "The Chosen One," and in late October 2015, he assumed the speakership.

The cease-fire was short lived. Conservatives say Ryan failed a critical first test just weeks after taking the gavel, when he refused to leverage government funding to impose new restrictions on the nation's refugee settlement program in the wake of the mass shooting in San Bernardino, California. Jordan pleaded with the new speaker to hold out for increased vetting, telling him that it would show Obama and Democratic Senate leader Harry Reid that "there's a new sheriff in town." Ryan refused—an original sin that chafes Jordan to this day. As he struggled to adjust to his complex new role—"like Einstein learning to write poetry," is how one of Ryan's admirers described it—he committed another strategic error that would prove costly with some of his members: dismissing the reality TV star running for his party's nomination. In private conversations, Ryan called Trump "a joke" whose penchant for identity politics was dividing the country and dooming the Republican Party's future. He wasn't much gentler in public: For most of the campaign, Ryan made it seem he felt honor-bound to denounce the candidate's latest incendiary remark or antic, as though the two were personally engaged in a tug-of-war for the GOP's soul.

This annoyed some of Ryan's members—both pro-Trumpers and others who disliked him but respected the anger he was tapping into. When the speaker initially withheld his support after Trump became the presumptive nominee—then continued to poke at him even after issuing a grudging endorsement—some of Ryan's colleagues wondered if he was attempting to sabotage the GOP ticket. Ryan made a point, for instance, never to be photographed with Trump—fearful of how it would be used to tarnish his brand, according to multiple sources. But the speaker came to agree that the icy relationship between them was unhelpful to the national party. Under mounting pressure from his members, as well as his longtime friend, Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus, Ryan offered an olive branch, inviting the GOP nominee to his hometown of Janesville, Wisconsin, for a Saturday afternoon campaign rally.

All hell broke loose on the evening before the event, when the Washington Post published a decade-old recording of Trump boasting about his sexual exploits—and his ability to grope women because of his celebrity status. It seemed to be the nail in his campaign's coffin. Ryan immediately disinvited Trump from Janesville, railing to Priebus and other GOP officials about the man he had never trusted or respected in the first place. Feeling validated, and certain that his members were equally outraged, Ryan wanted to take decisive action—even entertaining the idea of withdrawing his endorsement of Trump. On an emergency leadership conference call the weekend of the "Access Hollywood" tape, Ryan floated this idea as House GOP leaders debated how far to distance themselves from Trump. He would cripple their majority, the speaker said; cutting him off might be their best hope of saving the House. It was ultimately McCarthy—who has become Trump's favored member of the GOP leadership—who talked Ryan down. Withdrawing their support, he said, according to multiple sources familiar with the call, might backfire by hurting their own members. He suggested they cool off and not act on impulse.

Ryan agreed, yet somehow still crossed the line with many House Republicans when he declared—on another conference call the following Monday morning, this time with all Republican members—that he would no longer defend or campaign for Trump. That call, leaked to reporters in real time, lit a fire in the grass roots. Congressional phone lines exploded thereafter, with irate GOP constituents calling for Ryan's head. Some members began questioning the sustainability of his speakership; in late October 2016, after leaders scheduled Ryan's speakership nomination, a number of pro-Trump House members urged Ryan to postpone it so they had more time to consider if he should lead the conference. One of those was Rep. Jim Renacci, an establishment-friendly Republican who had long served with Ryan on the Ways and Means Committee. The Ohio Republican started garnering signatures on a secret letter arguing that "the conference is divided" and "there is no reason to hastily hold elections."

Freedom Caucus members sensed an opportunity. At a secret meeting at Meadows' downtown D.C. apartment, days before the election, Freedom Caucus board members devised a plan to deny Ryan the 218 votes needed to retain his speakership. The strategy called for Jordan to serve as the "sacrificial lamb," running against Ryan—not to win, but to keep the speaker from having the votes needed for reelection. The idea was that Ryan, who talked frequently (and annoyingly, to some members) about how he had never wanted the job in the first place, would step aside to avoid the spectacle. Conservatives had already begun searching for a new speaker from outside their narrow ranks—someone who would command the respect of the conference. Rep. Mike Pompeo—then a little-known, dry-witted defense hawk who'd later make friends in high places and become Trump's CIA director—became their top choice.

As Republicans schemed against their speaker, the underlying assumption was that Trump would lose and the conservative base would be out for blood—that, or Trump would win and kick Ryan to the curb. Either way, he would be finished.

Less than an hour before the polls closed on November 8, 2016, Ryan made the phone call he'd been dreading. With a handful of staffers and family members lingering nearby, Ryan was patched through to senior officials at the RNC in Washington. They had been analyzing voting patterns and running turnout models throughout the day, and were prepared to share their projections with the speaker: Trump was going to go down in flames, earning just 220 electoral votes. Republicans would lose nearly 20 House seats. Democrats would retake control of the United States Senate. Exactly the debacle Ryan had feared.

Stewing inside his team's war room at the Holiday Inn in Janesville—the site of his own election night party—Ryan could not stomach the thought of working with President Hillary Clinton. That said, he wasn't exactly thrilled about working with Trump, whose campaign—fueled by anger, resentment and nativism—was, in his view, a rejection of conservatism's highest ideals. As disappointed as he was about Clinton's apparent victory, the speaker saw a silver lining: He would seize the occasion of Trump's defeat—beginning that night—to speak about a return to an inclusive, aspirational, Jack Kemp-inspired "happy warrior" conservatism, and a rejection of Trumpism.

But Ryan never got the chance. His own race had been called early, and attendees waited patiently in the ballroom for his victory speech. But the speaker was paralyzed in the war room, watching in disbelief as Trump surged past Clinton in the pivotal battlegrounds of Florida and North Carolina. The RNC's numbers, his advisers told him, were garbage: The GOP's Senate majority appeared safe, only a handful of House Republicans were losing, and if the current trends held, Trump was going to win the biggest upset in presidential history. Just before 10 p.m. Eastern, Ryan finally took the stage and spoke for three minutes. "I've just been sitting there watching the polls," Ryan said, the shock written all over his face. "By some accounts, this could be a really good night for America. This could be a good night for us. Fingers crossed."

Ryan would seize the occasion of Trump's defeat to speak about a return to an inclusive, aspirational, Jack Kemp-inspired "happy warrior" conservatism, and a rejection of Trumpism. He never got the chance.

Ryan faced a legacy-shaping decision that night: Stay true to himself and step down as speaker, or muzzle himself and serve alongside Trump in a unified GOP government. It was a no-brainer: This was Ryan's chance to actually achieve the things he had only fantasized about. Even if that meant getting in bed with the likes of Trump and Bannon. And even if that meant accommodating behavior from a Republican president that he would never tolerate from a Democrat. It was a trade-off Ryan could not refuse. It was, in the refrain of the speaker's allies, "Paul's deal with the devil," one that he would make all over again. Chasing his legislative dreams would require keeping his criticisms of Trump to himself. "You can't create a sideshow, even if there's cause for a sideshow, because it's going to get in the way of getting the big things done," Boehner told POLITICO Magazine of Ryan's approach to Trump. "Paul has got his head on straight. He's very comfortable with who he is and what he's got to do."

As some conservatives watched eagerly for a smoke signal from the president-elect—hoping he would remember the speaker's disloyalty and recommend a replacement—Ryan moved quickly to secure his standing. He spoke with both Trump and his longtime friend, Vice President-elect Mike Pence, in the hours before Trump's victory speech, and made swift plans Wednesday morning to meet with them in Washington the next day. Before their meeting,

Ryan shared with several friends that he planned to start his talk with Trump by mentioning their bad blood during the campaign, and explaining why he had said and done certain things. They cut him off: That was a terrible idea. Don't remind Trump of how much he despised you in the past, they said. Focus on the future. Ryan listened. And the advice was sound: To this day, despite Trump's famously long memory, sources in both camps say the president and speaker have never once revisited their old feud.

Indeed, a surprising subplot of the unified GOP government's first year has been the unlikely alliance between Trump and Ryan. The healing process that began in D.C. two days after the election culminated in Pence delivering the message to House Republicans, just minutes before the speakership election, that Trump supported Ryan. (Only one Republican, Thomas Massie of Kentucky, voted against him.) The relationship since has been strangely drama free: Trump and Ryan talk often throughout the week, chewing on questions of policy and process and politics. Never once has there been a blowup, either in person or over the phone. Sources close to both men say they occasionally vent about the other—Trump telling aides that the speaker can't count votes; Ryan complaining to leadership comrades about the president saying things unbecoming of his office—and yet these feuds are, somewhat miraculously, kept in the family.

Ryan's allies paint this as part of a broader picture—his stronger-than-expected partnership with the president; his landmark victories in passing tax reform, as well as a repeal and replacement of the Affordable Care Act, on the House floor; his prolific, historic fundraising on behalf of the embattled GOP majority—to argue that his Faustian bargain has proven worthwhile. And they cite these same examples to dismiss the sanity of threats against his speakership: What more could House Republicans possibly want from him?

"Paul Ryan is by far and away the best possible person we have to lead this group of people in the right direction," said one such ally, Rep. Tom Rooney of Florida. "I just think that any talk of him leaving, I hope that's not true. It would be a major setback for our cause."

Every speaker deals with varying degrees of discontent in their conference. In Ryan's case, it owes less to ideology than process. Specifically, members who felt marginalized under Boehner—who ran a top-down operation that cut out committee chairs and left little room for lawmakers to shape legislation—feel the House is even more centralized under Ryan. This was evident in the speaker's first, botched attempt at repealing Obamacare: He wrote the bill on his own, then framed it as a "binary choice" for members to either back his proposal or be viewed as supporters of Obamacare. The stunt rubbed Ryan's colleagues the wrong way, particularly Freedom Caucus members who had extracted promises from him in 2015 about opening up the House and restoring regular order.

Conservatives aren't the only ones annoyed with Ryan's approach, and it isn't just back-bench members voicing displeasure. Sources close to House Budget Chairwoman Diane Black, a longtime Ryan ally, said she was deeply upset over the summer about Ryan's treatment of her budget process—though she, like many other senior members friendly with the speaker, would never voice these criticisms publicly. Ryan trampled on Black's budget in order to expedite the push for tax reform. But when the time came to draft the legislation, members of the Ways and Means Committee—who had worked alongside Ryan for years—grew upset at what they saw as the speaker's dictatorial approach. Tax writers vented to the White House that he wielded an iron grip on the process and that they had little imprint on the final product; members grumbled about Ryan big-footing Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady. Members of his committee said they didn't see the final bill until just days before they voted on it. It's no coincidence that more than half a dozen members on Ways and Means—one of the most powerful and desired positions in Congress—are walking away from the House in 2018. Renacci, in an interview, specifically cited Ryan's top-down style as a reason he was leaving the House to run for governor of Ohio.

"You've got to be willing to let everyone bring one pebble of sand to the beach, so they at least feel they helped build the beach," Renacci said. "And that's regular order. If you don't get that, you're never going to be a leader here in the conference."

Similar complaints dogged the previous speaker. But unlike Boehner, who bunkered down and lost touch with many of his newer members, Ryan has made a sustained effort to engage the full spectrum of his colleagues on a regular basis, with both group and individual meetings. This has given rank-and-file lawmakers greater access to the speaker—though not a greater role in the legislative process.

He's more controlling than Boehner ... and I voted against John Boehner and worked with Mark Meadows to vacate the chair," said Rep. Walter Jones. "I've been here 22 years and this is the most closed shop I've ever seen."

At the end of the day, the real threat to Ryan exists in the same place it did during Boehner's speakership: on the right flank of the conference. Early this fall, as the tax-reform battle was heating up, Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina—a constant thorn in Boehner's side—joked to fellow conservatives that he wanted to issue a formal apology to the former speaker. Having experienced Ryan's tight grip on the House, Jones said, he now viewed Boehner as a legend—a remark that elicited laughs but also murmurs of agreement in the room. Since then, the idea of conservatives writing an apology letter to Boehner has become a running joke on the right. "He's more controlling than Boehner ... and I voted against John Boehner and worked with Mark Meadows to vacate the chair," Jones said. "I'm very dissatisfied. I've been here 22 years and this is the most closed shop I've ever seen."

Even so, there is no comparing the two speakers at this point. Whereas Boehner had lost all goodwill with conservatives by the time of his exit, Ryan today has strong allies on the right—even if there are an equal number of detractors. "I think Ryan has done a good job," said Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker. "He to this day has my full, 100 percent support. ... He has to herd all these different factions and people on a daily basis, and I respect that."

Ryan and his team have operated under the assumption that if Republicans enact the first tax overhaul in 30 years, much of the frustration will wane — and partywide euphoria at the realization of their first major legislative victory will make the year-end, bipartisan deals easier to swallow. But rank-and-file members aren't so sure. And they worry that Ryan's tunnel vision on tax reform has weakened the GOP's negotiating hand against the Democrats. During a recent meeting with elders of the RSC, Rep. Tom Graves, a senior member on the Appropriations Committee, argued that a "mystic, hypnotic fog of tax reform" had crippled the conference over the past two months, "paralyzing" Republicans from creating an effective spending strategy to advance other Trump priorities.

That concern has echoed throughout the conference in recent weeks. Many House Republicans fear they will be forced to back a massive spending package that drives up the deficit—and an immigration compromise antithetical to the beliefs of the party base. During a meeting in Ryan's office in early November, Rep. Warren Davidson, the Ohio Republican who replaced Boehner and promptly joined the Freedom Caucus, held up the speaker's "Better Way" pamphlet from 2016 and told him: "There is no 'DACA amnesty play' in the playbook."

Hoping to assuage these concerns, Ryan last week summoned representatives from the conference's various factions to meet and come up with a unifying plan ahead of the December 22 deadline to fund the government. The resulting strategy, one that Ryan pledged to execute, has House Republicans sending a funding bill to the Senate next week that includes GOP priorities, such as increased Pentagon funding, but nothing for Democrats—and then leaving town and daring Senate Democrats to vote no. (It's a difficult promise to keep, since McConnell needs at least eight Democratic votes to approve any deal—not to mention that the Senate is accustomed to jamming the House, not the other way around.)

Ryan can see the storm clouds gathering. But people close to him insist he would never quit mid-Congress, even if passing tax reform into law provides the perfect opportunity to walk away—and even if recent accounts of sexual misconduct among House members have made the job even more stressful. (Two friends say Ryan was visibly shaken after demanding that Arizona Rep. Trent Franks resign his seat, telling them, "I didn't realize slitting throats was part of my job.")

Two friends say Ryan was visibly shaken after demanding that Arizona Rep. Trent Franks resign his seat, telling them, "I didn't realize slitting throats was part of my job."

Even though few members believe Ryan's job is truly in jeopardy, the whispers of his not-far-off retirement have sent various constituencies scrambling to prepare for a shake up. Members loyal to Scalise have urged him to have a candid discussion with McCarthy about his inability to unify the conference, while McCarthy's allies have urged him to line up the president's support so it's ready at a moment's notice. Some neutral parties think Scalise has the inside track—that Trump's backing won't be enough to put him over the top, and that Scalise's already-high stock has skyrocketed since he survived an assassination attempt in June. But the Freedom Caucus will be focused less on personalities than process: As in 2015, conservative members are drafting various demands in exchange for the next speaker to win their votes.

This will cause eyes to roll in some quarters of the conference. But the reality is that while Ryan would surely win a hypothetical near-term battle over his speakership, the Freedom Caucus is already winning the war. This is simple math: Because of its size and willingness to vote as a bloc, the Freedom Caucus will almost certainly provide the margin to crown the next speaker. And assuming Republicans lose seats next year—with swing-district moderates the first to fall—the conservatives will have even more leverage over GOP leadership in the coming Congress.

In a period of particular tension a few months back, one conservative member presented Meadows with a fake draft of a motion to vacate the chair. It was meant to make light of what conservatives viewed as their sorry situation in that moment: nine months into a unified Republican government, and still without a single legislative victory. Meadows told the member the prank was "not funny." But to some members, the prospect of taking out Ryan clearly isn't a joke. It only takes one of them, eager to antagonize the leadership and win lots of headlines, to file the motion and plunge the House into temporary chaos.

The question at that point becomes how hard Ryan is willing to fight to retain his speakership—and how forcefully other Republicans come to his defense. When Meadows made his attempt on Boehner, dozens of allies rushed to the former speaker's office to strategize, demanding an immediate vote to show their strength. Ryan, who keeps a small circle of close friends, does not have any comparable apparatus of longtime loyalists determined to protect him—nor does he view his legacy in Congress as inextricably tied to the position of speaker of the House.

"You've got to remember, I'm the only guy in the modern era who didn't want this job," Ryan told POLITICO Magazine this fall. "I did this because I had to do it. And I'm happy and I'm grateful for the job and it's a great honor. And I feel like I was made for this moment. So I'm good with it. But I'm not a person who covets it. And I never was. So I always feel liberated by that."

Whenever Ryan exits, familiar questions will resurface about whether the Republican Party is governable—and whether, in Congress, there will ever be a leader capable of uniting its tribes. Congress runs on relationships: Boehner was personally popular among members, even those who voted against his initiatives, and the same can largely be said for Ryan. But this is no longer seems sufficient. Dissension in the House Republican ranks is explained not by incompatible personalities, but rather by a fundamental disconnect between the leadership and the rank and file over questions of legislative involvement and procedural transparency. Whoever wishes to succeed Ryan would do well to realize it. During a conference meeting last week, Raúl Labrador of Idaho, a founding member of the Freedom Caucus, ripped into the leadership. "It's not that we don't like you," he said to McCarthy, who stood at the podium. "It's that we don't trust you."

White House: Trump would be 'very unhappy' if Speaker Ryan left Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 12/14/2017 02:35 PM EDT

President Donald Trump told House Speaker Paul Ryan he would be "very unhappy" if the Wisconsin Republican retired after the 2018 elections, the White House said Thursday.

POLITICO reported earlier Thursday that Ryan has told his closest confidants that his current term as House speaker will be his last. POLITICO also noted that in three dozen interviews with lawmakers, aides, conservative intellectuals and lobbyists, not one believed Ryan would stay in Congress past 2018.

White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders told reporters that Trump had spoken to Ryan ahead of Thursday's press briefing, within hours of POLITICO's report being published.

"The president did speak to the speaker not too long ago and made sure that the speaker knew very clearly — and in no uncertain terms — that if that news was true, he was very unhappy with it," Sanders said. "The speaker assured the president that those were not accurate reports and that they look forward to working together for a long time to come."

Ryan spokeswoman AshLee Strong dismissed POLITICO's reporting as "pure speculation."

"As the speaker himself said today, he's not going anywhere anytime soon," she said.

Asked whether the president was caught off guard by reports of Ryan eyeing the exits, Sanders suggested that Trump and Ryan were both surprised "because I don't think it was very accurate reporting."

"And so it sounds like they're both committed to and looking forward to spending a lot more time together over the next, you know, hopefully seven, eight years," Sanders said.

Navy secretary Spencer: We have to learn to say no Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 12/14/2017 12:00 PM EDT

The Navy needs to be more judicious about using its assets, Navy Secretary Richard Spencer said in outlining the results of a review found that the fleet has been stretched too thin for too long.

"If in fact we don't have the assets, we do not have the assets," Spencer told reporters ahead of the release today of the results of a Strategic Readiness Review he ordered earlier this year after the 7th Fleet suffered a series of deadly mishaps. "If in fact national security is threatened, get us the assets."

The review found that over time the Navy has relaxed training and failed to fulfill all its readiness requirements in order to meet growing operational demands.

Spencer likened this to the "overdrawing" a bank account. To prevent further damage, the Navy will need to offer only the resources it has to meet mission requirements around the world, which might mean it can't always go everywhere it is needed, Spencer said.

In all, the readiness review makes 23 recommendations ranging from reviewing the Navy's administrative chain of command to ensuring surface warfare officers focus their careers on Navy skills.

To that end, Spencer said he'll work with Congress on reforms such as reducing the number of joint billets that rising officers need to hold in order advance in their career as a way to reduce their time away from their main warfare specialty.

Spencer said he shared the results of the review with the Army and Air Force.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Lawmakers return to stopgap certainty — Mulvaney shows up for CFPB showdown — White House visitor logs go public
Date: Monday, November 27, 2017 2:54:30 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 11/27/2017 02:50 PM EDT

BACK TO WORK: The last 24 hours of headlines say it all: Congress ... "stares down shutdown amid December deluge," "prepares for year-end legislative sprint," "confronts jam-packed December with shutdown deadline looming," "returns to nightmare ..."

Resuming work this week after an 11-day recess reset, lawmakers know that any legislative missteps over the next three weeks could threaten to dig into their holiday break (and reinforce that "do nothing" adage). The dreaded Dec. 8 spending deadline is now a dozen days away. And appropriators charged with drafting a massive omnibus are still waiting to learn how much they can actually spend. Washington is no longer wondering if Congress will need to lean on another stopgap spending bill — the question is: For how long?

A high-stakes gathering: The first sign of progress could come Tuesday afternoon, when President Donald Trump hosts the so-called Big Four at the White House. Congressional leaders are hoping to hammer out a year-end agreement that includes spending levels, plus a strategy for handling the pile-up of other hot-button political issues with looming deadlines, Seung Min Kim explains.

On Santa's sleigh: That year-end to-do list includes disaster funding, CHIP renewal, a flood insurance extension and reauthorizing NSA surveillance powers. Lawmakers could also confront two other contentious items: the nation's debt ceiling and a DACA deal, since both issues are set to hit a boiling point early next year.

Doc of the day — A recent Chamber of Commerce report predicts the 12 states that would be hit hardest if the U.S. withdraws from NAFTA. All 12 states — including Michigan, Nebraska and Arizona — favored Trump in the 2016 presidential election.

#DailyBudgetFact — If Congress nixes the tax deduction for charitable giving, the federal government could save $229 billion through 2026, according to CBO. That's more than double the potential savings from increasing the corporate tax rate by 1 percentage point.

WHITE HOUSE

DUELING DIRECTORS: Nothing says "welcome back to Washington" like a Monday morning power struggle at the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. White House budget chief Mick Mulvaney arrived bright and early to step in as Trump's temporary pick to lead the bureau (even bringing Dunkin' for the staff). But he wasn't the only one eyeing a new office chair. Leandra English, the hand-picked replacement of Obama-era director Richard Cordray, also showed up to work today, signing notes to staff as "acting director." Lorraine Woellert details the confusion and chaos that has engulfed the consumer agency.

War of words: The political polar opposites are now locked in a legal fight for control of the embattled bureau. The White House argues that it has the power to appoint an acting head, even after ex-director Cordray had already chosen his own replacement. English filed suit against the White House late Sunday, arguing that the 2010 Dodd-Frank act stipulates that she should be in charge — drawing a rebuke from the White House.

— "The law is clear: Ms. English is acting director of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau until the Senate confirms a new director," English's lawyer, Deepak Gupta, said Sunday.

— "The law is clear: Director Mulvaney is the Acting Director of the CFPB," White House press secretary Sarah Sanders wrote in a statement shortly after.

OMB

A DOSE OF SUNLIGHT: Since the start of the Trump administration, reporters have begged for visitor logs from an unusually tight-lipped White House. Now, a lengthy lawsuit from a D.C. watchdog has produced a trove of information about who's been coming around, including those dropping in on Mulvaney.

Meetings with Mick: Those prominent visitors include Newt Gingrich, Koch Industries lobbyists, multiple pharmaceutical and Wall Street CEOs, and leaders of conservative think tanks like the Heritage Foundation and American Enterprise Institute.

APPROPRIATIONS

HEARINGS GALORE: Appropriations aficionados rejoice — the House spending panel has a stacked calendar this week, with seven hearings planned over two days. On Wednesday, the subcommittees will delve into the USDA's role in disaster recovery, as well as oversight of the Forest Service, the Army Corps of Engineers, the Small Business Administration and the General Services Administration. Then Thursday, the subcommittees will geek out on FEMA's supplemental aid request, disaster relief for the Federal Highway Administration and oversight

of the Interior Department.

INFRASTRUCTURE

'MIXED SIGNALS': Nearly a year into his first term, Trump has yet to flesh out details of his $1 trillion infrastructure promise. And that uncertainty has started to weigh on Transportation Department officials. As Tanya Snyder reports, the former head of the Build America Bureau says the administration's infrastructure package "appears to be stalled, and the future is uncertain" — a factor that apparently influenced his resignation last month from the agency that helps finance transportation projects.

TAX

IT'S SHOW TIME: Senate Republicans are under pressure to push through their tax bill lickety-split, Seung Min and Bernie Becker explain. After this week, the legislative effort could easily get sidelined amid a year-end spending fight, or threatened altogether by the Dec. 12 special election that could change the chamber's party breakdown. In a rush to get to work, the Senate Budget Committee plans to mark up the fiscal 2018 reconciliation legislation Tuesday afternoon.

UNCOMFORTABLE ASSUMPTIONS: On paper, much of the Senate GOP's tax plan will only last a decade. White House and GOP leaders are telling a different story, however, arguing that popular breaks will last indefinitely because Congress will never vote to end them. The idea of "sunsetting" expensive tax breaks is a work-around for those pesky budget rules, but it's stoking anxiety in a growing number of GOP deficit hawks, including Sens. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), Todd Young (R-Ind.) and James Lankford (R-Okla.), as Seung Min reports.

TOO SPEEDY FOR A SCORE: JCT and CBO admitted in a report Sunday that it's "not practicable" to do a full economic analysis on the Senate tax plan "within the very short time available." The budget experts haven't totally skimmed on their estimates, though, predicting that the upper chamber's plan would increase the deficit by $1.4 billion over the next ten years but wouldn't increase on-budget deficits by more than $5 billion in any of the four decades following 2028.

CONGRESS

TAXPAYER CASH? GOTTA UNMASK: Congressional leaders are feeling the pressure to release the names of lawmakers who have secretly settled sexual harassment claims at taxpayer expense, Rachael Bade and Elana Schor explain.

FEMA

BEYOND ZIP CODES: A legal victory by NPR could shed some light on the biggest beneficiaries of the nation's costly flood mitigation efforts. A federal judge ruled last week that FEMA must disclose the exact location and sales prices of properties sold through the Hazard Mitigation Grant Program, Josh Gerstein reports. The new disclosure requirement would produce much more granular detail than the current ZIP-code-level data the agency provides.

Congress stares down shutdown amid December deluge Back

By Seung Min Kim | 11/26/2017 03:23 PM EDT

December is shaping up to be the cruelest month for Republicans who control Capitol Hill.

Under enormous pressure for a legislative achievement, GOP senators will attempt to follow their House counterparts this week by passing a massive tax overhaul they can send to President Donald Trump by the end of the year.

At the same time, they're dealing with Democrats to avert a Christmastime government shutdown. And that battle is complicated even further by an emotional fight over the fate of hundreds of thousands of young undocumented immigrants.

"I'm not prepared to go home for the holidays until we get our work done," Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Sunday on CNN's "State of the Union."

The to-do list, which Trump will discuss with top congressional leaders at a White House meeting on Tuesday, doesn't end there. Lawmakers are butting heads over a third tranche of emergency aid for hurricane-ravaged areas. Key surveillance powers used by the National Security Agency need to be renewed. Funding for a health insurance program benefiting 9 million lower-income children is already long expired, with several states close to running out of cash.

And it all comes against a continuous backdrop of sexual harassment bombshells that are ensnaring a growing number of lawmakers — not to mention a dramatic Senate special election in Alabama that could immediately prompt ethics proceedings, a rarity in the chamber.

First up is the tax overhaul. The House passed its plan just before the Thanksgiving break with surprising ease — putting pressure on the Senate to cobble together 50 Republican votes, the same task that stymied GOP senators in the Obamacare battle this summer.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is reckoning with multiple dueling factions, all with competing concerns about the tax bill. A bloc of deficit hawks, including Sens. Bob Corker of Tennessee and Jeff Flake of Arizona, is worried the measure would balloon the deficit. Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) is opposed, at least for now, because of the way the bill treats small businesses.

Other Republicans, including moderate Sen. Susan Collins of Maine and conservative Sen. Jerry Moran of Kansas, aren't pleased that a health care fight is being injected into the tax mix. The Senate legislation would repeal Obamacare's requirement that everyone carry insurance, yielding hundreds of billions in savings but potentially destabilizing health care markets.

If Senate Republicans can pull it off, they'll immediately begin trying to reconcile their bill with the very different House plan.

Then there's the matter of keeping the government open. As Republicans try to jam through their partisan tax bill, they'll be in talks with Democrats on a sweeping year-end spending package to fund the government through September. That task always needs bipartisan buy-in, but the immigration dimension makes the challenge vastly more complicated than in past years.

A short-term funding patch delaying the current Dec. 8 deadline at least a couple of weeks is inevitable, since top Hill leaders haven't even agreed on spending numbers for federal agencies. The appropriations committees would need at least three to four weeks to write funding legislation.

Because it involves a must-pass bill, the spending fight gives House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) maximum leverage to demand a top priority for Democrats by year's end: codifying Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals into law.

While not explicitly threatening to withhold votes without a DACA measure, both Pelosi and Schumer have vowed to save the Obama-era immigration program legislatively before lawmakers leave Washington for the year. Moderate Republicans have also urged their leadership to find a fix.

But doing so could prompt a rebellion among conservatives who don't want to be steamrolled by Democrats on such a contentious issue. The White House is also insisting on funding for President Donald Trump's border wall with Mexico.

In addition to a huge omnibus spending package, Congress has another pricey funding measure to deal with — aid for hurricane-wrecked states and territories — that many on Capitol Hill say doesn't go far enough.

The White House has suggested a $44 billion emergency measure distributed to Texas, Florida, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands for ongoing hurricane relief, as well as money for combating wildfires in the West. Democrats and some powerful Republicans — including Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas, the No. 2 GOP leader — have said the package is far too small, though they will have to contend with fiscal conservatives who are getting weary of continued spending on aid, particularly if it's not paid for with other cuts.

Other prime government programs could be temporarily shuttered if Congress fails to act.

One is Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which empowers the NSA to monitor communications without a warrant. That authority expires at the end of the year, and there is bipartisan opposition to a "clean" renewal of the spying powers. There are varying proposals that would extend the programs, but with key reforms.

The National Flood Insurance Program, which has become financially strapped after the spate of powerful hurricanes this year, also needs to be reauthorized by Dec. 8. The House and Senate have dueling proposals to renew the program.

On the health care front, the expiration of funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program is already causing problems as more states have turned to temporary cash infusions from the federal government to keep the programs running.

House Republicans passed a largely partisan CHIP funding measure earlier this month. Still, CHIP could be a relatively simple fix: One option would be to let funding ride along with a short-term continuing resolution that will need to clear Congress by Dec. 8.

Lawmakers will also face pressure to act on legislation that would stabilize the Obamacare markets after Trump's decision last month to stop paying so-called cost-sharing reduction subsidies to insurers.

All of this activity could be overshadowed by ballooning sexual harassment scandals on Capitol Hill.

Multiple women have come forward with allegations against Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), who have faced calls for ethics investigations or to step aside from powerful leadership posts. On Sunday, Conyers announced that "in light of the attention drawn by recent allegations made against me," he is stepping down from his post as the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. At least one House Democrat said Conyers should resign from Congress.

On the GOP side, Senate Republicans have scoured through essentially every option to try and knock Alabama Senate candidate Roy Moore out of the race, after at least nine women accused him of varying degrees of sexual misbehavior, including when one woman was 14 years old.

Democrat Doug Jones has a shot at an upset in the Dec. 12 election, which would be a political stunner in the conservative state. But if Moore wins, he will immediately face calls for expulsion from some of his own colleagues, and McConnell has promised that ethics proceedings for Moore would begin promptly. That could lead to his eventual expulsion, though doing so would be unprecedented.

To top it off, Rep. Al Green (D-Texas) has promised to force a vote to impeach Trump by Christmas. Green backed away from his first attempt to push the issue to the House floor earlier this fall after private pressure from Democratic leaders.

"Whatever others will do is their choice," Green said in a speech laying out his impeachment vow. "My conscience dictates that I will vote to impeach. Let others do what they may. History will judge us all."

Confusion and chaos engulf consumer agency Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 11/27/2017 10:47 AM EDT

Two acting directors of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau showed up for work Monday, trading memos and warnings as a political showdown threw the embattled agency into confusion.

White House budget director Mick Mulvaney, President Donald Trump's choice to temporarily lead the bureau, arrived at about 7:30 a.m. and settled into the CFPB director's office, where he read briefing books.

His challenger for the job, CFPB Deputy Director Leandra English, was also in the building. English, former Director Richard Cordray's hand-picked replacement, sent the staff an emailed greeting shortly before 8 a.m. and signed it with the bureau's top title, acting director.

Mulvaney quickly fired back with a memo instructing staff to ignore any instructions from English. "I apologize for this being the very first thing you hear from me," he wrote, and invited employees to the bureau's fourth floor for doughnuts.

The jousting was part of a legal morass engulfing the agency after Cordray, its first director, abruptly resigned on Friday and handed the reins to English. While consumer advocates and Democrats fight to preserve Cordray's legacy and the fledgling bureau's independence, business lobbyists are using the mess to push for a reboot of the agency. Regardless of who prevails in the current fight, Trump is expected to name a permanent director in the coming weeks or months, making arguments over the acting director moot.

Cordray, who was appointed by former President Barack Obama, named English as acting director as of his resignation at midnight Friday. Before the handoff could occur, Trump designated Mulvaney, who heads the Office of Management and Budget, to lead the bureau until a permanent director could be nominated and confirmed.

On Sunday, English sued the administration in U.S. District Court in Washington, asking for a temporary restraining order to prevent Mulvaney from being recognized, even as the CFPB's own lawyer sided with the Trump administration on the legality of Mulvaney's designation. The case, English v. Trump, was assigned to Judge Timothy Kelly, a Trump appointee and former counsel to Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa). Congress confirmed Kelly to the bench on a 94-2 vote in September.

In a memorandum first obtained by POLITICO, CFPB general counsel Mary McLeod aligned with a Justice Department opinion issued over the weekend.

"It is my legal opinion that the president possesses the authority to designate an acting director for the bureau," McLeod wrote in the Saturday memo to the CFPB leadership team. "I advise all bureau personnel to act consistently with the understanding that Director Mulvaney is the acting director of the CFPB."

That prompted the White House to claim victory on Sunday night.

"Now that the CFPB's own general counsel — who was hired under Richard Cordray — has notified the bureau's leadership that she agrees with the Administration's and DOJ's reading of the law, there should be no question that Director Mulvaney is the acting director," White House spokeswoman Sarah Sanders said. "It is unfortunate that Mr. Cordray decided to put his political ambition above the interests of consumers with this stunt."

But things remain far from settled. In her lawsuit, English named Trump and Mulvaney defendants and asked the court to establish her authority as acting director.

"Ms. English has a clear entitlement to the position of acting director of the CFPB," the filing claims. "The president's purported or intended appointment of defendant Mulvaney as acting director of the CFPB is unlawful."

English, who was made the bureau's deputy director as of Friday, is being represented in court by Deepak Gupta, a former senior counsel at the bureau. She filed the lawsuit in her capacity as deputy director and acting director of the CFPB. Gupta did not respond to requests for comment. CFPB spokeswoman Jennifer Howard did not immediately respond to questions.

The consumer bureau's staff gathered at bureau headquarters on Sunday, but English did not attend, according to a person with knowledge of the meeting. Another staff meeting was scheduled for Monday morning.

Shortly after Mulvaney arrived for work on Monday, English sent a Thanksgiving email to staff, offering her "gratitude" for the the bureau's service. "It is an honor to work with all of you," she said, signing the email as acting director.

The 2010 Dodd-Frank Act, H.R. 4173 (111), which created the CFPB, states that the consumer bureau's deputy director shall "serve as acting director in the absence or unavailability of the director." Until Friday, the bureau had been operating with an acting deputy director for years. English was named to the slot just as Cordray left, replacing acting deputy David Silberman.

The Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel on Saturday acknowledged the Dodd-Frank provision, but found that Cordray's resignation amounted to an "absence," giving Trump authority to fill the slot.

The bureau's unusual structure, which vests power in a single director with a five-year term, has been a lightning rod since its creation. Businesses have accused the agency and Cordray of regulating by fiat and litigation and argued for more transparency. They've also challenged the CFPB's constitutionality in court, in a lawsuit that could be decided within weeks or months.

Yet numerous polls have shown that consumer advocates remain strong champions of the agency's work. The bureau says it has delivered $12 billion in relief, including canceled debt and compensation, to customers wronged by banks, credit unions, payday lenders and credit card companies.

The White House has been interviewing candidates to replace Cordray, including George Mason University's Todd Zywicki, a critic of the agency.

Trump taps Mulvaney to head CFPB, sparking confusion over agency's leadership Back

By Victoria Guida | 11/24/2017 04:19 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Friday named White House Budget Director Mick Mulvaney acting director of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, setting up a legal clash over who is in charge of the controversial agency.

The announcement came just hours after outgoing CFPB Director Richard Cordray appointed the agency's chief of staff, Leandra English, as deputy director, establishing her as his successor as he steps down today.

The two moves plunged the agency into confusion over the leadership of the bureau, which was established in the wake of the financial crisis and has become a lightning rod for attacks by Republicans and business executives for its aggressive enforcement.

"The President looks forward to seeing Director Mulvaney take a common sense approach to leading the CFPB's dedicated staff, an approach that will empower consumers to make their own financial decisions and facilitate investment in our communities," the White House said in a statement Friday night.

"Director Mulvaney will serve as Acting Director until a permanent director is nominated and confirmed," the statement said.

The 2010 Dodd-Frank Act, which created the CFPB, explicitly says the consumer bureau's deputy director shall "serve as acting Director in the absence or unavailability of the Director," giving the edge to English.

Yet the Federal Vacancies Act allows the president to install a temporary acting head of any executive agency who has already been confirmed by the Senate to another position, like Mulvaney has as leader of the Office of Management and Budget.

Still, the Vacancies Act says that an opening may also be filled if another law "expressly ... designates an officer or employee to perform the functions and duties of a specified office temporarily in an acting capacity."

It doesn't say whether one approach supersedes the other, something the courts will likely have to sort out.

Today's actions were the latest drama engulfing an agency that Republicans have targeted since its inception. GOP lawmakers and bankers say the consumer bureau regulates through enforcement rather than rulemaking and that its single director has unconstitutional power.

Mulvaney himself, while in Congress, savagely attacked the bureau, calling it in 2014 "a wonderful example of how a bureaucracy will function if it has no accountability to anybody." He added that the CFPB has been a "sick, sad" joke.

Cordray fired the first shot earlier today when he abruptly announced that he would leave at the end of the day, speeding up his original timetable of departing at the end of the month, which he disclosed on Nov. 15.

"Upon my departure, [English] will become the acting Director pursuant to section 1011(b)(5) of the Dodd-Frank Act," Cordray said in a note to staff.

"In considering how to ensure an orderly succession for this independent agency, I determined that it would be best to avoid leaving this key position filled only in an acting capacity," he added. "In consultation over the past few days, I have also come to recognize that appointing the current chief of staff to the deputy director position would minimize operational disruption and provide for a smooth transition given her operational expertise."

In his resignation letter, he called serving as the CFPB's first director "one of the great joys of my life," saying the agency has returned nearly $12 billion to more than 30 million consumers.

Cordray has been rumored to be considering a run for governor of Ohio but has given no indication of his future plans.

"[I]n departing I now look forward to finding further ways to continue to advocate for those who are facing economic anxiety and uncertainty in their lives," he said.

English would officially take the role that has been filled on an acting basis since 2015, most recently by David Silberman, who will continue to serve as CFPB's associate director of research, markets and regulations.

She has held several leadership positions at the CFPB, including deputy chief operating officer, acting chief of staff, and deputy chief of staff.

"Leandra is a seasoned professional who has spent her career of public service focused on promoting smooth and efficient operations," Cordray said in his statement. "As deputy director, we will continue to benefit from Leandra's in-depth knowledge of the operational needs of this agency and its staff."

English has also previously held senior positions at the Office of Management and Budget and the Office of Personnel Management.

Financial companies, which have long criticized Cordray as overly aggressive, decried the move.

"Today's actions by former CFPB Director Richard Cordray in appointing his own Acting Director to lead the bureau reinforces the problematic nature of having a single and completely unaccountable leader," said Chris Stinebert, head of the American Financial Services Association, which represents installment lenders, in a statement.

"The decision to choose who should lead the country's consumer protection agency, and confusion that's been caused by Cordray's own 'succession plan,' should not be made by one individual and for this reason AFSA has long advocated the need for a bipartisan commission," he added.

White House says Trump has right to name CFPB head, setting up clash Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 11/25/2017 01:03 PM EDT

The White House on Saturday said President Donald Trump has the authority to put budget director Mick Mulvaney at the helm of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, setting the stage for what could be a protracted legal battle.

A senior administration official said the decision to appoint Mulvaney was informed by communication with the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, which will issue a formal opinion soon. Mulvaney, director of the Office of Management and Budget, will start his second job at the CFPB Monday morning, replacing Richard Cordray, who resigned Friday.

"It seems like a pretty clear-cut legal question," the official told reporters. "We consulted with the OLC, they have signed off on it."

Yet Mulvaney's appointment came just hours after Cordray abruptly resigned and named the agency's chief of staff, Leandra English, as deputy director, establishing her as his successor as he steps down.

The competing moves plunged the agency into confusion over the leadership of the bureau, which was established in the wake of the financial crisis and has become a target for relentless attacks by Republicans and business executives for its aggressive enforcement.

The legal counsel's opinion is still being drafted, the official said. The Justice Department did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

Mulvaney "will go into the office Monday and start working," another senior administration official said.

Trump later Saturday tweeted: "The Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, or CFPB, has been a total disaster as run by the previous Administrations pick. Financial Institutions have been devastated and unable to properly serve the public. We will bring it back to life!"

He followed up quickly with another tweet: "Check out the recent Editorial in the Wall Street Journal @WSJ about what a complete disaster the @CFPB has been under its leader from previous Administration, who just quit!"

Trump and Cordray, long at odds over the direction and future of the agency, are headed for a showdown in court that could take months or more to unravel.

On Trump's side is the Federal Vacancies Reform Act of 1998, which allows the president to designate a Senate-confirmed official to perform the functions of a vacant position until a nominee can be confirmed to the office.

In Cordray's corner is the Dodd-Frank Act, the landmark 2010 law that created the CFPB and sets up its own line of succession, stating that the bureau's deputy shall serve as acting director in the "absence or unavailability of the Director."

Cordray pitched the bureau into that legal chasm just after 2 p.m. Friday, when he elevated English to deputy director. Minutes later, Cordray said he would resign at the end of the day. On Nov. 15, he had said he would step down at the end of the month.

"Appointing the current chief of staff to the deputy director position would minimize operational disruption and provide for a smooth transition given her operational expertise," Cordray wrote in his resignation letter to staff.

Just after 7:30 p.m. Friday, the White House designated Mulvaney as acting director of the watchdog agency until a permanent leader can be nominated and confirmed.

"Cordray is saying, and the consumer advocates are saying, that a resignation by Cordray constitutes absence or unavailability, whereas the White House is saying no it doesn't," said Ballard Spahr lawyer Alan Kaplinsky, a leader of the firm's consumer financial services group.

"I think Trump will ultimately prevail here, but it's going to end up in litigation regardless of the opinion the White House is seeking from the Office of Legal Counsel," Kaplinsky said. "The issue could ultimately end up in the U.S. Supreme Court, but in the meantime who's running the agency? It will be very unclear who has authority to govern the agency."

At other agencies, including Office of Management and Budget, the Small Business Administration and the Federal Aviation Administration, Congress expressly provided for a deputy to take over a vacant leadership post, Kaplinsky said.

Barney Frank, the former chairman of the House Financial Services Committee and an architect of the Dodd-Frank Act, said the 2010 law was deliberately written to prevent the president from naming an interim director.

"It was part of an overall suite of arrangements to give the CFPB as much insulation as you could give a federal agency," Frank told POLITICO. "The procedure that Rich Cordray followed was very specifically put into the law to preserve the independence of the CFPB."

Democrats under President Barack Obama faced a similar situation when they wanted to replace Edward DeMarco as acting head of the Federal Housing Finance Agency, an independent regulator with a structure similar to the CFPB. The only way to replace DeMarco was with a confirmed nominee or, barring that, by elevating an FHFA deputy already in place, Frank said.

"He could only be replaced by one of his named deputies; that was the restriction," Frank said. "Nobody claimed the Vacancy Act preempted the FHFA then."

An ongoing lawsuit could add to the confusion of the bureau's leadership -- or settle it. The U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington is weighing whether the bureau's structure is constitutional, given the vast power vested in its sole director. An opinion in that case could come at any time.

English joined the agency during its earliest days under Elizabeth Warren, who fought to create the bureau and set it up before being elected to the Senate.

Until English's appointment Friday, the deputy director position had been vacant for nearly two years, with David Silberman, the bureau's associate director of research, markets, and regulations, serving in an acting capacity during that time. The CFPB press office did not respond to requests for comment.

"This is almost laughable what's going on," said Richard Hunt, president of the Consumer Bankers Association and a longtime critic of the agency. "No one should be surprised Richard Cordray did this. I just hope Leandra English is not a pawn."

Graham, Durbin disagree on new CFPB director Back

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 11/26/2017 12:30 PM EDT

Two senators from different parties squabbled on Sunday over just who should take the reins as interim director of the federal Consumer Financial Protection Bureau — placing themselves in the middle of a spat now personally involving President Donald Trump.

Bureau Director Richard Cordray announced on Friday he was resigning and appointed the agency's chief of staff, Leandra English, as his interim successor. But the White House on Friday appointed its own leader, budget director Mick Mulvaney — promptly setting the stage for a legal clash.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said on CNN's "State of the Union" he believed it was English who is rightly in control, citing the 2010 Dodd-Frank Act, which created the agency.

"I've read the provision. It says that when the director steps aside, the deputy director shall be in charge of the agency," the Senate minority whip said. "Not may — shall — be in charge."

But Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said on the same program that he backed the White House decision to appoint Mulvaney — a move the White House says is supported by the Vacancies Reform Act, which gives the president the authority to temporarily fill positions.

"I think the president's on good ground here to appoint somebody under the vacancy statute," Graham said.

Both senators agreed, though, that the president needs to appoint a new permanent director — a process subject to confirmation in the Senate. Still, they made markedly different references to the accomplishments of the agency.

"Remember, this was the agency that fined Wells Fargo $100 million for defrauding the people who were creating phony accounts," Durbin said. "It's a watchdog agency. Wall Street hates it like the devil hates holy water."

Graham, however, called the agency the "most out-of-control, unaccountable federal agency" in Washington.

"Really no oversight at all," he said. "They can get into everybody's business. I don't think they added much at all to the consumer protection. They sure add a lot to increasing costs for midsize banks throughout the country that had nothing to do with the financial collapse."

"I hope it's Mick Mulvaney," Graham added.

For his part, the president on Saturday called the agency "a total disaster as run by the previous Administrations [sic] pick."

"Financial Institutions have been devastated and unable to properly serve the public," Trump tweeted. "We will bring it back to life!"

CFPB lawsuit assigned to Trump-appointed judge Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 11/27/2017 01:05 PM EDT

A lawsuit over leadership of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau has been assigned to a judge appointed by President Donald Trump.

The case, English v. Trump, will be heard by Judge Timothy Kelly of the U.S. District Court in Washington. Kelly was confirmed by Congress to the post in September on a 94-2 vote.

Leandra English, deputy director of the CFPB, sued Trump and OMB Director Mick Mulvaney on Sunday after the White House named Mulvaney acting director of the consumer bureau. Mulvaney was designated to the temporary job just hours after departing CFPB Director Richard Cordray had named English his successor.

WHAT'S NEXT? Mulvaney is at the CFPB today and English is meeting with Senate Democrats this afternoon.

Build America Bureau chief left over 'mixed signals' on Trump's infrastructure plan Back

By Tanya Snyder | 11/27/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Frustration over the Trump administration's mixed messages on infrastructure and an ever-slipping timetable for its promised $1 trillion infrastructure initiative led the first director of DOT's Build America Bureau to resign last month.

"If there were a significant infrastructure initiative that had moved forward, and it had an enhanced role for the Build America Bureau, that would have been a reason to stay and try to implement that," Marty Klepper told POLITICO in an interview two weeks after he left his post.

But the infrastructure package "appears to be stalled and the future is uncertain," he said. "We're getting many mixed signals; the most recent one was the House tax reform bill, which eliminated private activity bonds."

The administration said in a statement of principles on infrastructure released in May that they want to lift the cap on private activity bonds. Several of the proposals in that document would have raised the profile of the finance programs the Build America Bureau runs. But after the principles were released, momentum seemed to fizzle.

"There was never a commitment as to what was going to happen to those proposals, and I realized in the fall that the timeline would be further extended," Klepper said.

Although Klepper was hired to helm the brand-new bureau by the Obama administration in its waning days, he said he was excited about Trump's talk about a trillion-dollar infrastructure plan. But the timeline has been a moving target, which Klepper cited as a source of frustration. "The administration initially indicated they'd be announcing it in the spring, then in the fall, then not until after tax reform," Klepper said.

He predicted it would take most of 2018 for Congress to reach an agreement on an infrastructure package, and then the better part of another year to set up a selection process for project applicants, meaning it would be "late fall of 2019 before there was any new funding from any federal initiative, before there are actual dollars flowing."

He also cited his unease over comments Trump made in September about public-private partnerships — the centerpiece of his infrastructure plan and the bread and butter of the Build America Bureau.

"I was shocked," he said. "This seemed totally inconsistent with everything I thought the administration wanted."

Still, Klepper said he's proud of his work at the nascent Build America Bureau.

"We accomplished a lot," he said. "We closed $3.5 billion in loans, which supported $10 billion in project costs. We implemented best lending practices in a number of areas. We developed a culture of customer-focused client service, normally a private sector goal. We [sped] up the timing and transparency of some of our processes, which was important to our stakeholders."

But without an infrastructure initiative, Klepper said, "the trajectory of accomplishments was probably going to be slowing down."

He did note that although the administration has been lagging on its funding and financing initiatives, officials have been working more aggressively on project permitting and regulatory reform, which he said is also important.

Klepper is still "very committed to helping solve [the] infrastructure deficit," he said, and he sees himself continuing to work with developers, investment banks, financial institutions and state governments to develop public-private partnerships for infrastructure as he has for the last 35 years, "not as lawyer but as businessman, strategic adviser and consultant."

Tax reform hangs in balance in critical week for GOP Back

By Seung Min Kim and Bernie Becker | 11/27/2017 05:01 AM EDT

It's do-or-die time for Senate Republicans on tax reform.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) doesn't appear to have locked down 50 votes for his party's tax overhaul, with at least half a dozen GOP senators showing varying levels of concern about the legislation released earlier this month.

Yet the GOP leadership has a narrow window to push through its tax bill in the Senate before lawmakers become consumed with spending fights that could trigger a shutdown, not to mention a special election in Alabama that could flip a reliable Republican vote to a not-so-reliable one — or even a Democrat.

"I think in the end, we'll get the votes. But it's a process," South Dakota Sen. John Thune, the third-ranking Senate Republican, said on "Fox News Sunday."

The leadership is juggling objections from multiple pockets of the Senate Republican Conference and is running short of time to convince the holdouts as Republicans try to close out a frustrating year for their policy agenda with a major legislative accomplishment.

An influential and independent-minded bloc of deficit hawks, including Sens. Bob Corker of Tennessee and Jeff Flake of Arizona, have aired deep concerns about the tax bill's red ink, even accounting for any economic growth that a tax overhaul might generate. Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Jerry Moran of Kansas have voiced concerns about including in the tax proposal language that would repeal Obamacare's individual mandate.

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), so far the only declared "no" on the tax legislation, has argued that the overhaul unfairly disadvantages small businesses. To fix the bill to his liking, the changes would likely cost hundreds of billions of dollars. Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) has expressed similar concerns on so-called pass-throughs, according to Republicans.

GOP aides expect changes this week to the version of the tax plan that passed the Senate Finance Committee. Those adjustments could come before the legislation hits the floor or through amendments as the bill is considered.

Senate Republicans are discussing an increase in a tax deduction for pass-through businesses in an effort to win over Johnson and Daines, according to a person familiar with the talks. Allowing taxpayers to deduct up to $10,000 in property taxes, as proposed in the House bill, is also under consideration, as is barring corporations from writing off their state and local taxes. The proposed changes were first reported by The Washington Post.

Finding the money to pay for those changes could be an issue, too. Republicans can cut taxes by no more than $1.5 trillion over a decade — meaning that, as of right now, they have well under $100 billion to play with in the Senate bill.

Thune stressed that some Senate Republicans have raised "legitimate concerns," and he said senators will have "plenty of opportunities" to change the bill when it comes to the floor later this week.

But Republicans also believe that the need for a big legislative accomplishment ahead of next year's midterm elections will help sway any holdouts.

"For every Republican senator, the fate of the party is in our hands, as well as that of the economy," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said on CNN's "State of the Union."

There is private optimism about the legislation's prospects for now, but the GOP tax bill's fate will become much clearer once senators return to Washington on Monday. President Donald Trump is scheduled to attend Senate Republicans' weekly policy lunch on Tuesday, though GOP senators have been far less susceptible to personal arm-twisting from the president than members of the House.

Republicans could face their first policy hurdle on Tuesday, when the Senate Budget Committee meets to merge the tax bill with a separate measure that raises revenue by allowing drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The ANWR provisions were a major win for Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), often a swing vote on controversial bills.

The Budget Committee action should, in theory, be mostly a procedural move. But both Johnson and Corker sit on the committee — where Republicans hold just a one-seat majority — and the senators could use that leverage to force changes.

The Senate could vote to advance the tax bill as early as Tuesday, and that would set up a so-called vote-a-rama, in which senators could offer a litany of changes before final passage sometime Thursday, although the timetable could change.

Even if the Senate is successful in passing a tax bill, Republicans would still need to settle the differences between that measure and the legislation that already passed the House.

The two bills call for permanently lowering the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 20 percent and almost doubling the standard deduction for individual taxpayers, though the House increases the deduction by slightly more. But there are big differences, including in how the House and Senate measures treat pass-through businesses. The Senate will also be under pressure from the House to keep its compromise on state and local taxes.

Critics have also knocked both bills for phasing out tax relief for individuals, which would force millions of taxpayers to pay more in future years. Republicans say they expect future Congresses to vote to extend that tax relief, which has raised concerns among the deficit hawks because it would cause the bill to pile on even more debt.

Moran, in particular, has emerged as a tax reform wild card. The Kansas senator, who also raised objections to his party's plans to repeal Obamacare, told constituents in town halls over the Thanksgiving recess that he does not want the individual health insurance mandate repeal mixed in with tax policy.

He has also raised concerns about potential red ink of any tax overhaul.

"The easiest way to say this is, I am for some tax bill. Can we find taxes to cut that grow the economy?" Moran said at a town hall in Clay Center, according to the Topeka Capitol Journal. "We don't want to increase the debt and deficit as a result of tax cuts. My goal is to find out which taxes you cut can actually help create more jobs, better jobs, higher-paying jobs."

Sen. James Lankford of Oklahoma, another GOP lawmaker worried about the tax bill's impact on the federal debt, still wants to see how the bill could be amended to address those concerns, an aide said.

Republicans will likely have to push through their tax overhaul with solely GOP votes, although a handful of moderate Democrats are keeping their options open. A spokesman for Sen. Joe Manchin said Sunday that the West Virginia Democrat was still considering the measure. Sens. Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota and Joe Donnelly of Indiana have also been targeted by Republicans as possible "yes" votes.

The inclusion of the Obamacare mandate repeal makes it more unlikely, however, that Republicans can attract Democratic votes. Donnelly said in a Sunday statement that he's been willing from the start to team up with Republicans on tax reform.

"This should not include making health care more expensive for or taking it away from millions of Americans," Donnelly added.

GOP deficit hawks fear tax plan is secret budget-buster Back

By Seung Min Kim | 11/24/2017 07:42 AM EDT

The GOP has yet to resolve an internal clash over whether expiring tax cuts will really expire, potentially threatening the party's push for a desperately-needed legislative achievement.

On one side are the White House and top congressional Republicans, who argue that ultimately all the tax cuts in their plan will be extended, even the ones slated to lapse. But that's exactly what the party's small, but mighty, bloc of deficit hawks is afraid of.

And as the Senate steams toward a vote next week on its massive tax overhaul, the fight over the bill's true sticker price may be the deciding factor for the bill.

It was bad enough, in the deficit hawks' view, that key provisions in the House bill expire in five years and that lawmakers already assume they'll get extended. But their concerns multiplied after the revised Senate GOP tax plan proposed winding down a host of popular tax cuts for individuals after 2025. The tax cuts were made temporary to trim the official cost of the bill, but deficit hawks fear Congress will simply extend them — further adding to the government's red ink.

"The savings, the score, it just isn't valid because you know that they're not going to follow through," Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), an avowed fiscal conservative, said in a recent interview. "You can't assume that we'll grow a backbone later. If we can't do it now, then it's tough to do it later."

The collision between what most Republicans see as simple political reality — keeping popular tax cuts for voters — and deep deficit worries from influential GOP senators could derail the tax reform efforts, particularly if and when the chambers try to meld their tax proposals in the coming weeks.

The deficit hawks decry what they see as gimmicks in the plan, particularly writing in an expiration date for tax breaks with no intention of letting them die. While the official price tag for the Senate tax plan may be $1.4 trillion, extending all the expiring provisions would bump up that cost by another half a trillion dollars, according to the fiscal watchdog group Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget.

Republicans leading the tax charge have said that the tax cuts expire merely to fit within the parameters set up by complicated Senate rules. And they brush off attacks from Democrats who note that the cuts are permanent for corporations but temporary for regular people. Republicans say Democrats should help them make those cuts permanent, which would require 60 votes on the floor — something Democrats are unlikely to do.

Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) has publicly blamed the Senate rules as the reason some provisions in the House bill, like a family tax credit, expire after five years. He recently told reporters he thinks future Congresses will extend them.

That's the White House line, too.

"Of course, the hope for everybody is that when the time comes for these things to expire, that they get extended," Kevin Hassett, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, said last week.

Flake and Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker, another independent-minded Republican not running for reelection next year, have been among the most outspoken with their deficit concerns. So too, has Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a major wildcard for GOP leadership in the tax fight.

But other Republicans have gradually become more vocal about their own deficit worries, with Sens. Todd Young of Indiana and James Lankford of Oklahoma among them. GOP leaders can only lose two votes before the tax bill tanks.

"My concern is, if you slow down to actually implement it, that's one thing," Lankford said. "But when you assume a sunset on something that you may or may not actually sunset, you may set up other tax fights that you have in the future, or set up additional deficit."

Other GOP senators have raised different objections to the tax bill; Sen. Ron Johnson of Wisconsin doesn't like the way the plan treats small businesses and Sen. Susan Collins of Maine takes issue with repealing Obamacare's individual mandate in the plan, among other concerns.

Democrats have seized on the bill's contradictions, and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York has been particularly eager to exploit the Republican divide.

"I say to my colleagues, particularly the deficit hawks, you can't have it both ways," Schumer said in a recent floor speech. "You cannot say we're going to protect the middle class after 2025 and we're going to reduce the deficit. This bill is a deficit budget buster. We all know what will happen."

Indeed, Congress has a good track record of keeping expiring tax cuts around.

Lawmakers faced a "fiscal cliff" at the end of 2012 composed mainly of the expiring Bush tax cuts. Congress, backed by the Obama administration, ultimately voted to make the vast majority of tax cuts permanent. Capitol Hill also routinely voted to maintain temporary tax "extenders" year after year, before passing legislation in December 2015 that made most of them permanent.

The Senate tax measure includes dozens of provisions that are set to expire yet would likely be politically untenable to actually kill; chief among them are their plans to boost the child tax credit, cut individual tax rates and increase the standard deduction.

Corker has been one of the loudest critics of ballooning the deficit. But he's been careful not to openly disparage the tax plans moving through Congress, and Senate tax-writers, as well as leadership, are aware of his concerns. The Tennessee Republican said he has been discussing ways to resolve deficit worries with other senators — Flake among them — but declined to elaborate further.

Whether Senate Republicans can ultimately win over the GOP skeptics is unclear.

When asked about the cost of extending expiring provisions, McCain stressed: "I'm always worried about the deficit."

Brian Faler contributed to this report.

Paul says he will vote for Senate tax bill Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 11/27/2017 11:27 AM EDT

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said today that he plans to vote for the Senate tax reform bill, writing that he "fought for and received major changes for the better ..."

Paul, who announced his decision in an opinion piece on FoxNews.com, wasn't a firm "yes" until now, giving Republican leaders some breathing room as they try to nail down enough votes for the bill, which could come up for a floor vote this week.

Paul said he's satisfied that it includes a $1.5 trillion tax cut over a decade and includes language to repeal the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate, though he also said he'd prefer the bill keep some deductions for state and local taxes and include more permanence for individual tax cuts.

But Paul said there would be more bites at the apple if voters pressure lawmakers for additional tax changes.

"Some of that is still achievable. Some of it is due to the peculiarities of the budget and Senate rules and will have to wait for another day," he wrote. "The good news is — we can do this every year."

Senate Republicans can only afford to lose two votes and still pass their bill without Democratic support, but other GOP senators remain question marks, including Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) over state and local deductions, Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) on taxes on unincorporated "pass-through businesses" and Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) about the individual mandate, among others.

Paul challenged them to support the bill, calling it "a true test for" his colleagues and urging them to vote for this bill as it is even if they don't get everything they want.

"I urge you, their constituents, to make sure they hear from you," Paul wrote.

WHAT'S NEXT: Finance Committee members including Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) are meeting with President Donald Trump today.

Thune predicts tax-cut bill will change on the Senate floor, but pass Back

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 11/26/2017 10:55 AM EDT

The Senate's No. 3 Republican said Sunday there'll be "plenty of opportunities" to change the tax-cut bill once it moves to the Senate floor, likely as early as this week.

"We're going to have an open process on the floor of the United States Senate, where people can offer amendments," Sen. John Thune of South Dakota said on "Fox News Sunday."
"Those amendments can get debated and voted upon. So, there [will] be plenty of opportunities to change the bill in the direction that some of our senators want to see."

To pass the Senate, the legislation requires a just simple majority of 51 — a tricky process considering Republicans hold only 52 seats and Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) has already said he's opposed.

"We have members, [who] are expressing what are legitimate concerns, who have ideas about how to make the bill stronger and better, and we're certainly open to those," Thune said.

Still, the chairman of the Senate Republican Conference predicted the bill will ultimately pass the Senate.

"I think, in the end, we'll get the votes," he said. "But it's a process. ... It takes time to move across the finish line."

The senator also addressed concerns Democrats have about adding to the national debt. Republicans, Thune said, believe that with a reasonable amount of economic growth, the national debt will be eased.

"We should not settle for 2 percent growth in this economy," Thune said. "But even if we get to 2.2 percent or 2.3 percent, we cover the cost of this bill."

President Donald Trump intends to meet with senators this week ahead of the tax-cut vote to ramp up support for one of his top congressional priorities.

"We need to get this accomplishment," Thune said. "This is a goal that we've had for a long time."

Republicans fret over White House sales job on taxes Back

By Annie Karni and Eliana Johnson | 11/26/2017 07:11 AM EDT

When photos of Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and his wife, Louise Linton, posing with freshly printed sheets of money ricocheted across the internet earlier this month, Democrats fighting the GOP tax bill saw an opportunity to whack it.

Mnuchin, one of the White House's lead pitchmen for a tax reform bill Republicans are trying to present as a cut for the middle class, is a Yale-educated, second-generation Goldman Sachs banker — and here he was grinning as he presented his black-leather-gloved wife with hot-off-the-press cash.

"If you asked us to put together a photo shoot to show this is a taxpayer-funded giveaway to millionaires and billionaires, I don't think we could do a better job of this," said Tim Hogan, a spokesman for the anti-tax reform activist group Not One Penny. The group made a Facebook ad featuring the photograph that it says led to thousands of calls to lawmakers from constituents, telling members to vote "no" on the tax bill.

Mnuchin's money shot underscored the awkwardness for the White House of selecting multimillionaires as the principal salesmen for a tax bill it claims will boost workers' wages and cut taxes for the average middle-class family. Mnuchin and fellow Goldman Sachs alum Gary Cohn have consistently fumbled that pitch, in part due to their own backgrounds, said Democrats and Republicans watching the effort.

While the House passed its version of the bill earlier this month, Republicans who see final passage as a make-or-break moment for the party are worried about potential turbulence in the Senate, which is expected to vote on its version this week.

Six Senate Republicans are still withholding their support for the tax cut package — enough to tank it — and others in the party said they don't want the difference-maker to be a lack of good messengers from the White House. And so far, the pitches don't appear to be helping. A recent Quinnipiac University poll found that 52 percent of voters oppose the GOP tax plans, and only 25 percent support them.

"If this thing does fall all apart on the shoals," said one former top Hill aide, "maybe the difference is the lack of good messengers. On a nail-biter, you don't want any margin of error."

And critics in both parties said Mnuchin and Cohn may have helped create one.

In September, Cohn told reporters that with the $1,000 that he said the average American family is likely to save from the proposed tax plan, they "can renovate their kitchen, they can buy a new car." The offhand comment delivered to reporters in the White House briefing room seemed to underscore how out of touch the Hamptons-summering millionaire was with the expenses facing everyday Americans.

"The most excited group out there are big CEOs, about our tax plan," Cohn, the former president of Goldman Sachs, said in an interview with CNBC earlier this month. The Senate version of the tax bill would reduce the corporate tax rate to 20 percent from 35 percent starting in 2019.

A few weeks later, speaking in front of an audience of chief executives gathered in Washington, Cohn expressed shock that their hands stayed in their laps when they were asked whether they planned to increase investment under the new tax plan. "Why aren't the other hands up?" Cohn wondered out loud.

The bumbled pitches for a must-win bill have left Republicans exasperated at a time when the global and domestic economies are rallying — and Republican lawmakers are eager to have a legislative accomplishment to point to on the campaign trail during next year's midterm elections. "All kinds of stuff is breaking their way, and they can't get out of their own way," said one prominent Republican close to the Trump administration.

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill have started to distance themselves. House Speaker Paul Ryan earlier this month asked the White House not to send Mnuchin to the Hill to talk with Republican lawmakers about the bill, according to two people familiar with the discussions — though Ryan has praised the Treasury secretary's ability to improve the legislation itself.

"There were some testy conversations" between Ryan and Mnuchin, according to a White House official — in particular, over Mnuchin's attempts at bringing lawmakers on board. He approaches them, the official said, "with a certain arrogance."

Ryan's spokesman Doug Andres denied that the speaker's office made that request. "That is definitely not anything the speaker or our office has ever said," Andres said. But the general view of Mnuchin from the Hill, according to another former top operative on the Senate side, is that Mnuchin "doesn't have a deft touch on the working-man arguments."

Several Republicans say the political pressure for congressional Republicans to pass a bill is so great that any self-inflicted wounds from the Goldman duo are unlikely to matter much.

"The strongest force behind this bill, the one that will make the biggest difference in the end, is the political imperative for Republicans to pass it," said Brian McGuire, a former chief of staff to Sen. Mitch McConnell.

The White House said its sales pitch doesn't depend solely on Mnuchin and Cohn — and that the lead cheerleader for the bill is the president himself.

"The president's entire team, led by Secretary Mnuchin and Gary Cohn, have been sweeping the country talking to Americans about how tax reform will give them a pay raise and make our economy great again," said deputy press secretary Lindsay Walters.

Despite his 12-day trip to Asia during a main negotiating phase of the bill, President Donald Trump has delivered at least eight tax reform-related speeches across the country, including his event in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, with truckers in October, a second White House official said.

There, Trump promised that the average American household would see its wages rise by $4,000 under the tax plan, because of a provision encouraging American companies to bring home profits from overseas. But he provided no evidence to back up the claim. That didn't matter from a sales perspective.

"'Saturday Night Live' opened that weekend with our truckers event," the second White House official said. "That's a win. Mnuchin and Cohn do not drive a news cycle like a presidential event." In the "SNL" skit, however, Alec Baldwin, as Trump, engaged in an extended riff about how the president couldn't steer away from provocative social issues and jokes about retiring Tennessee Republican Sen. Bob Corker long enough to actually pitch the tax bill.

The official also said that the administration's internal polls show that the president's message has been effective. "We took nuggets of the things the president was saying [about tax reform] and polled it, asking, do you agree with this statement," the official said. "I think nine of those nuggets polled at 80 percent or higher among likely voters. We're very confident of the message we've been selling."

The White House also highlighted other surrogates outside the Goldman class, including budget director Mick Mulvaney, a Southerner with a middle-class, entrepreneurial background who has been making the media rounds.

And the president's daughter Ivanka Trump has been pairing local events across the country with interviews on friendly Fox News programs like "Hannity," "Fox & Friends" and "Tucker Carlson Tonight," where she has been given a platform to talk specifically about the child tax credit, long her pet issue.

Veterans Affairs Secretary David Shulkin, counselor Kellyanne Conway, Small Business Administrator Linda McMahon, Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue and Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta have also been participating in local events to pitch tax reform.

But it's Cohn and Mnuchin who have emerged as the dominant faces of the White House sales pitch — and who have Democrats disbelieving their good fortune that the Wall Streeters are allowed to continue to be out front, selling the bill.

"These guys are the ultimate Wall Street insiders," said Brian Fallon, who served as press secretary for Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign. "Any savvy public relations person would say that they should be a mile away from the salesmanship for the bill. But they're out front. It's just a clue that there is no one senior in the White House to say to them, you're benched."

Democratic ads pressure Murkowski, Capito on tax reform Back

By Kevin Robillard | 11/27/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Not One Penny, a coalition of Democratic groups fighting the GOP plan for tax reform, is out with new television ads pressuring Sens. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska to vote against the plan.

"The congressional Republican tax plan raises taxes on every day West Virginians to pay for tax breaks on the wealthiest," a narrator says in the ad targeting Capito. "50,000 West Virginians will get a tax hike. And it cuts access to affordable health care, including coverage for opioid addiction treatment." The ad asks viewers to call Capito and tell her to "oppose the Trump Republican tax plan."

Watch the ad here.

The ad targeting Murkowski strikes similar themes. "In Alaska, we work hard and know that nothing's free but the scenery," the narrator says. "But the congressional Republican tax plan delivers tax breaks to billionaires, millionaires and wealthy corporations. ... Call Lisa Murkowski and tell her we're not paying for their tax break."

The ads are part of a seven-figure national ad buy, which also targets Nevada Sen. Dean Heller and Maine Sen. Susan Collins. A separate group, Businesses for Responsible Tax Reform, is airing ads targeting Oklahoma Sen. James Lankford and Tennessee Sen. Bob Bob Corker

Controversial inflation gauge makes comeback in GOP tax bills Back

By Bernie Becker | 11/27/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Chained CPI is back.

Both the House, H.R. 1 \(115\), and Senate tax bills feature the alternative measure of inflation, which would make their plans cheaper. But according to the Joint Committee on Taxation, it would also be partly responsible for raising taxes on millions of middle-income Americans in the plans' out years.

Republicans' decision to rely on chained CPI has so far flown under the radar. But the slower-growing gauge of inflation is nonetheless key to the GOP's plans, giving Republicans revenue they desperately need for their central goal of cutting the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 20 percent and for navigating complex congressional budget rules.

Chained CPI's re-emergence in the tax bills is also sparking concerns from the left that it could soon be used to measure inflation for a host of other programs, which could lead to seniors getting smaller Social Security checks and reduced benefits from other key anti-poverty programs.

"If the majority is successful in trying this alternative and controversial measure of inflation in the tax code, then I believe the next step the majority might take is to apply that same rule to Social Security and veterans' pensions," said Rep. Joe Crowley of New York, a House tax writer and member of Democratic leadership, noting that some top Republicans have said they want to tackle entitlements after the tax code.

Chained CPI is perhaps best known as a bargaining chip in former President Barack Obama's efforts to strike a broad fiscal deal with congressional Republicans several years back. Supporters of the formally titled "Chained Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers" say it improves how the government currently judges inflation for taxes and other purposes.

The Labor Department currently tracks inflation by examining the prices of a broad range of goods and services. But unlike the inflation measure currently used in the tax code, chained CPI tries to account for how people's buying habits might change if the price of one particular good fluctuates — for example, by substituting apples for oranges or chicken for steak.

"It is the most accurate way to judge inflation that we have," said Marc Goldwein of the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, a group that advocates reducing the federal debt.

Chained CPI grows about 0.25 percent slower per year than the standard version, which would lead to what critics call a hidden tax increase. Tax brackets and items like the standard deduction and the Earned Income Tax Credit would increase by a smaller amount each year than they would under the current inflation measure, handing out less in benefits to taxpayers and pushing millions into paying higher marginal rates.

The new inflation measure has become an increasingly important part of both the House and Senate tax plans. House Republicans now propose to immediately put into place chained CPI, which they had first sought to implement in 2024.

In a more drastic move, Senate Republicans are now seeking to phase out virtually all the individual tax provisions in their tax overhaul, except chained CPI and the repeal of Obamacare's individual mandate. Both the House and the Senate propose permanently cutting the corporate rate to 20 percent.

Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said that keeping chained CPI and scrapping most everything else on the individual side "creates more permanence in our tax system so that American job creators can invest in the long term, grow their business and create new jobs."

The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that chained CPI would raise in the neighborhood of $130 billion over a decade for both the House and Senate bills. But Republicans would also get a more long-term benefit from that change, in large part because chained CPI's effects snowball over time.

The Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center estimates that the slower inflation measure would raise close to a half-trillion dollars in the second decade for a GOP tax overhaul — desperately needed revenue, considering that Senate budget rules that Republicans plan to use to short-circuit Democratic opposition mandate that the tax bills cannot add to deficits outside the 10-year budget window.

For liberal groups, the most inexcusable part might be how Republicans are using chained CPI.

Seth Hanlon of the Center for American Progress said it wouldn't be too hard to use chained CPI in a large, more progressive package that revamped taxes and entitlement programs. But by making chained CPI one of the few permanent proposals on the individual side of the tax code, Hanlon said Senate Republicans were proposing "the tax code we have now, but worse."

"This is a pure tax increase on essentially everyone paying positive income taxes or receiving tax benefits," said Hanlon, a former economic aide to Obama.

Republicans have said that they expect Democrats would join with them later to extend expiring individual tax benefits, if the GOP succeeds in muscling them into law.

But there are other questions about whether, as Democrats fear, linking taxes to chained CPI would lead directly to a slower rate of inflation for Social Security.

Goldwein said that implementing chained CPI for both taxes and spending at the same time was a natural trade, and that Republicans might have complicated matters by moving first to slow the inflation rate for taxes.

Either way, Goldwein added that chained CPI shouldn't get the blame from those opposed to the GOP tax proposals.

"I don't like the bill because it adds $1.5 trillion to the debt and probably more in the long run," said Goldwein, before touting the benefits of a new inflation measure. "It's reasonable to fight about how we want to spend that money."

Graham: Tax-cut failure 'not an option' Back

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 11/26/2017 10:55 AM EDT

Sen. Lindsey Graham said today that "failure is not an option" when it comes to cutting taxes.

Appearing on CNN's "State of the Union," the South Carolina Republican said the fate of the Republican Party is in senators' hands, as a vote on a massive tax bill looms this week in the Senate, perhaps as early as Thursday.

"The economy needs a tax cut, and the Republican Party needs to deliver," Graham said. "So, I think we'll get there."

The House already has passed its own tax bill, and the issue is now facing tough sledding in the Senate.

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), for one, is already against the bill, leaving a small Republican margin for passage, since Democrats are strongly opposed.

President Donald Trump plans to meet with senators this week ahead of the tax vote to ramp up support, as well as separately with top Republican and Democratic congressional leaders to discuss spending and other measures still pending in the Congress.

GOP tax plan rattles higher education, renews charges of elitism Back

By Benjamin Wermund | 11/27/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Congressional Republicans' plans to slap unprecedented new taxes on higher education have left college leaders shocked and scrambling — the latest salvo in what some observers say is a growing culture war on a higher education system seen as elitist and out of touch.

While most college leaders said they don't believe they were targeted directly in tax reform legislation — and are rather collateral damage — they say the hit was startling, as higher education has long enjoyed bipartisan support. Higher education also is a powerful lobbying force on the Hill.

"I don't think anybody expected this," Tulane President Mike Fitts said. "I don't think a month-and-a-half ago anybody expected this many and this level of changes in the support for higher education in the United States."

In interviews with POLITICO, college presidents contended the tax proposals (H.R. 1 \(115\)) would be a devastating blow that would make college — especially graduate school — more expensive, and further out of reach of low- and middle-income families. That argument, however, may not go far, as polling shows many Americans are increasingly wary of colleges and universities, and are generally supportive of tax cuts.

"Very few Americans care" about the plight of colleges and especially about the problems of graduate students, said Jason Delisle at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "Very few of them are privileged enough to get a graduate degree from an elite institution. I think they're like, 'Complain all you want.' It's just not going to resonate with Main Street America."

Indeed, recent data shows the nation's most elite schools have long catered mostly to the wealthy, serving relatively few low- and middle-income Americans. Dozens of colleges enroll more students from the top 1 percent of earners than the bottom 60 percent, according to data from the Equality of Opportunity Project.

College presidents argue that's a trend they're working to combat — and that the proposed taxes would curtail those efforts. "I think it's unprecedented," Vanderbilt President Nicholas Zeppos said of the tax legislation. "It's troubling."

But there are signs public support for colleges is waning, especially among Republicans. A recent poll from Pew found 58 percent of Republicans view colleges negatively, while 72 percent of Democrats view them positively.

The tax bills, experts say, may well be part of that sentiment. Both the House and Senate levy new taxes on the largest private college endowments. The House would end deductions for student loan interest and tax tuition waivers for graduate students.

"I think it's part of a culture war ... no question," said Philip Altbach, a research professor and founding director of the Center for International Higher Education at Boston College. "It is part of an anti-higher education general feeling about what the role of higher education is in society and so on. I do think they should see it as a warning."

Congress is moving rapidly as colleges work to be heard. The House passed its sweeping rewrite of the tax code earlier this month. The Senate could vote on its version as soon as this week.

Higher education lobbying groups have been writing letters to leaders of both chambers and college leaders have been making calls and writing to their members of Congress. Graduate students, especially, are writing letters and making calls as well. With the House bill passed, the focus is on the Senate.

College leaders fear the tax plan is the latest sign they are losing the battle over public perception. The proposal comes after years of rising tuition prices have led many Americans to believe college is too expensive. It also follows a year of intense scrutiny over cultural issues on campuses, including conflicts over free speech that have crystallized the view among some Republicans that colleges are pushing a liberal agenda.

"We're being challenged on all of these fronts, and we see that reflected for example in the tax legislation," Rice University President David Leebron said. "We're being out-demagogued by folks who just want to talk about how wealthy we are rather than what we use those dollars for."

Colleges and universities need to do a better job of communicating the good they do for their communities, college leaders say — citing how they advance research in medicine and other fields and, in many cases, act as major job creators. They also need to be clearer about how they use their wealth, including endowments that in some cases top $1 billion.

College leaders argue the endowments are crucial for the longevity of their institutions — but also that they are key to funding scholarships.

The leaders said they are most worried about parts of the tax proposals they argue directly affect students or make college more expensive.

At the top of the list is the House GOP's plan to tax as income tuition that schools now waive for graduate students working as teaching or research assistants. At some schools — where the tuition breaks run upwards of $40,000 — that could more than triple students' taxable income, causing some to spend huge portions of their stipends, which are generally just around $25,000 to $30,000 a year, on massive tax bills.

College leaders argue the change will make graduate education unaffordable — at a time when the U.S. needs more students earning advanced degrees in science, technology, engineering and math fields to remain competitive globally.

"You're just going to have fewer graduate students. You're going to strangle the educational enterprise," Zeppos said. "Why would you tax people — particularly when you're falling behind in STEM areas — to get advanced training? I'm still waiting for someone to tell me that's really going to save the budget and it's really good public policy. That's one I'm still scratching my head on."

A spokeswoman for the House Ways and Means Committee said "graduate students, like all Americans, will be taxed at lower, simpler rates based on the compensation they receive — not based on the maze of costly deductions and exclusions Americans must navigate today."

College leaders also decry the House's plan to eliminate a student loan interest deduction, which Republicans argue is minimal compared to the larger break graduates would get from the changes in standard deduction.

House Republicans say the typical single person making $30,000 right out of college would receive more than $800 in tax relief, which they say is more than they would receive from the ability to deduct their student loan interest today.

Republicans also argue that, broadly, their plan will boost the economy and create more jobs to graduates.

The Ways and Means spokeswoman said the tax plan is aimed at making the tax code "simpler and fairer for all Americans and lowers rates at every income level."

The plan, she said, "provides hope to millions of young Americans who are going to find better job opportunities, get bigger paychecks, and keep more of the money they earn for what matters most to them. This is especially important for young Americans who are just starting out on their own."

But college leaders say they don't buy that type of argument.

"They're going to get a better job? Well, prove it. Right now all they're seeing is their deductibility on the interest on their loans is going to be added to their student indebtedness," Louisiana State University President F. King Alexander said.

"They're willing to throw higher education and our students under the bus to get a win on tax reform," Alexander said.

But perhaps the most in-your-face item aimed at higher education — especially elite colleges and universities — is a plan in both the House and Senate versions that would tax private university endowment earnings. The tax would only apply to private universities with at least 500 students and endowment assets of at least $250,000 per student — between 60 and 70 schools.

"It's a very discriminatory, ill-thought-out proposal, which actually creates distinctions that don't make any sense at all," said Leebron, the president of Rice, whose endowment would be taxed. "The proposal literally makes no sense, as a coherent addition to the tax code, and represents a federal intrusion into universities that I think will only have adverse consequences."

Other college leaders who would be hit by the tax say they spend millions from their endowments each year to offer financial aid, especially to low-income students.

Vanderbilt, for instance, spends about $250 million a year on financial aid, $90 million of which comes from its endowment, Zeppos said. Seventy percent of undergraduates at Vanderbilt receive financial aid from the school, and the university has a policy that no undergraduates have to take on debt to attend. Vanderbilt's endowment totals about $4 billion.

The endowment tax, Zeppos argued, will diminish those efforts.

"Now in effect, I've sent 200 scholarships to the federal government," he said.

Those concerns, however, have so far not swayed House Republicans, who passed the tax plan with ease. A spokesman for the House education committee said the chairwoman, Virginia Foxx (R-N.C.), supports the tax plan "because pro-growth tax reform will help workers and families see a raise in their wages and more money coming into their households.

"As a result, the Republican tax reform plan will provide more Americans with more opportunities of their choosing, including continuing education," the spokesman said.

Trump to meet with Senate Republicans next week ahead of tax vote Back

By Seung Min Kim | 11/24/2017 11:15 AM EDT

President Donald Trump will head to Capitol Hill next week to huddle with Senate Republicans as they prepare to pass their own tax overhaul when lawmakers return from the Thanksgiving break.

Wyoming Sen. John Barrasso, who chairs the Senate Republican Policy Committee, made the announcement Friday. Trump made a similar visit to the House Republican Conference shortly before that chamber passed its tax legislation last week.

"We look forward to welcoming President Trump to the Senate again next Tuesday," Barrasso, the fourth-ranking Senate GOP official, said in a statement Friday. "This is a historic opportunity for our conference and the president to build on our momentum to give Americans the tax relief they've been waiting for."

Trump is also scheduled to meet separately with the top four congressional leaders - Speaker Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York - later that day.

U.S. expats may be out of luck in tax reform Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 11/24/2017 08:00 AM EDT

U.S. citizens who live abroad are still pushing for their voices to be heard in tax reform, though their window of opportunity looks to be in the future.

Legislation moving quickly through Congress would end U.S. taxes on American companies' foreign profits, under a system known as territorial taxation, but it wouldn't alter the equation for their American employees stationed overseas, nor would it address other expatriates living outside the U.S. for other reasons.

Instead, they would continue to face citizen-based taxation rather than residence-based taxation, or RBT, a change they're fighting for in tax reform.

In citizen-based taxation, expatriates are subject to U.S. taxes on their foreign- and U.S.-source earnings; they get credits and allowance for taxes they pay abroad, though there can still be double taxation. Under RBT, their earnings from foreign sources would not be subject to U.S. taxes.

But the House passed legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), without such a provision. The Senate bill scheduled for a floor vote next week also excludes RBT language.

"I'm disappointed this wasn't in the House or Senate packages," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform.

At this point, the best chance to make the change is probably down the road, said one of the issue's chief champions on Capitol Hill, Rep. George Holding (R-N.C.). He plans to introduce a bill as a separate follow-up to the sweeping legislation that GOP lawmakers hope to get to President Donald Trump by the end of this year.

A provision in the broader tax legislation that would allow companies to benefit from a territorial tax system should also extend to U.S. expatriates "to ensure that American citizens have a level playing field around the globe as well," said Holding, who sits on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

It's a matter of fairness, Norquist said, to give equal treatment to U.S. multinational companies and U.S. citizens abroad. If the fix for individuals doesn't ride with switching to territorial taxes for companies, it will be addressed soon, most likely in entitlement overhaul legislation he expects to come up in April.

"The current system disadvantages Americans working overseas just as it disadvantages American multinationals overseas," Norquist said.

An estimated 8 to 9 million Americans live and work abroad, and about two-thirds of them consider themselves long-term or permanent overseas residents. Most are well-educated, white collar workers, Holding said.

All of them benefit to some degree from credits and exclusions that account for taxes they pay where they live, but they nonetheless must deal with compliance that involves extensive paperwork to report to U.S. authorities. An exclusion for foreign earned income totaled $102,100 per person this year, and expatriates can claim a credit for foreign taxes that are imposed by a foreign country or U.S. possession.

According to Holding, the citizen-based taxation system they continue to face is outdated, complicated and costly. Expatriates pay $4,000 on average to file their taxes annually, a factor, along with burdensome bank reporting requirements in the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act, in prompting some to renounce their U.S. citizenship, he said.

"That's a base erosion of human capital," Holding said.

In addition, switching to an RBT system would harmonize the U.S. with much of the rest of the world, and it wouldn't overly burden the IRS with new rules since it already applies RBT to nonresident aliens in the U.S.

But Holding hasn't decided on exact language for a bill, which according to some estimates could result in $20 billion in lost revenue over a decade, Norquist said.

Among options Holding is considering would be legislation to allow full RBT, or instead changes to the foreign earned income exclusion.

One group representing U.S. expatriates, American Citizens Abroad, is pushing a bill that wouldn't reduce federal revenue by changing to RBT. The current citizen-based taxation only raises about $5 billion to $8 billion annually.

The group's plan would include a number of requirements meant to guard against abuse, such as compelling U.S. citizens to prove they've established residence in a foreign country with an individual income tax greater than a token amount.

It would also require expatriates to prove that they resided in their adopted country for a five-year period prior to getting into the RBT system and that they filed all required U.S. income tax returns over that period. It also proposes a departure tax if the expatriate's assets exceed $3 million, part of preventing someone from opting into the RBT system for tax evasion purposes, and they'd have to pay a $2,350 fee to choose RBT.

But these anti-gaming provisions could be waived to grandfather in expats who can prove they've established overseas residences long ago.

At the very least, proving this bill language can be revenue neutral establishes a useful baseline for advancing the cause, said the executive director of American Citizens Abroad, Marylouise Serrato.

In the more immediate term, the group is pressing for a Senate floor amendment to get RBT included into the Senate bill next week, though Serrato declined to identify members who might introduce such amendments. Whether RBT gets added to the Senate tax bill or tacked onto entitlement legislation, Norquist said American expats deserve to be next in line.

"We're talking to interested parties on the Senate side and we're making our case," Serrato said.

Newman's Own tax break Back

By Danny Vinik | 11/24/2017 07:44 AM EDT

It sells pasta sauce, lemonade, and 31 kinds of salad dressing with Paul Newman's face splashed prominently on the label. Its profits go entirely to charity. And, if the GOP tax bill passes, it will more or less have a section of the U.S. tax code all to itself.

The Newman's Own Foundation isn't mentioned in the Senate or House tax bills by name, but appears to be the target of a specific carveout—among the many highly targeted breaks and exemptions in the new GOP tax plans.

The unusual structure of the Newman's Own Foundation, a nonprofit charity that wholly owns a for-profit food company, leaves it vulnerable to a punitive 200 percent tax that would break up the arrangement, and for the past nine years it has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars lobbying Congress to change U.S. law so it can be exempt.

In this fall's tax overhaul, it looks like Congress is complying. Both the House and Senate tax bills contain a small provision with an almost impenetrable title—an "exception to the private foundation excess business holdings rules for philanthropic business holdings"—that would let the foundation keep owning the company without the tax penalty. The carveout, sponsored by Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) and Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), could spare another 20 to 30 foundations that would face a similar fate in the future.

For Newman's Own, based in Westport, Conn., the problem appears to have originated with Paul Newman himself. The legendary actor founded the food company Newman's Own in 1993 with a mission to give all the company's profits to charity. When he died, in 2008, he left the company to his private foundation so that his philanthropic legacy could survive. The company is still healthy; Newman's Own doesn't provide information on revenue or profits, but the foundation has recently donated $26 to $30 million a year to charity, including $29 million last year to organizations working on issues such as nutrition and support for veterans. (Newman served in the Navy in World War II.)

But that structure has been a problem since the inception. Thanks to laws passed almost 50 years ago to prevent company owners from creating bogus tax shelters—and to ensure for-profit companies remain focused on making money—a private foundation isn't allowed to own more than 35 percent of a for-profit company for more than five years. If the Newman's Own Foundation didn't reduce its ownership of the food company within that period, it would be hit with a stiff penalty—a 200 percent tax on the value of the food company above the foundation's permitted ownership stake, intended to force the foundation to divest most of the company. In 2013, when the five-year deadline hit, the foundation got a five-year extension from the Internal Revenue Service. That expires next November, when the tax would kick in.

"We have absolutely run out of time. There is no way that anybody can give us more time," said Bob Forrester, the CEO of the Newman's Own Foundation. "There was only that one extension allowed. For us, it's really existential."

The exemption for private foundations that wholly-own for-profit companies is minor in the broader GOP tax overhaul; congressional scorekeepers estimate it would raise a few million dollars a year. But it offers a vivid illustration of just why tax reform is so hard—and why the tax code is so long and complicated. By all accounts, no one opposes the exemption, and previous standalone legislation to create such an exemption has attracted bipartisan support. But qualifying for the exemption requires foundations to meet a complicated, three-part test, written into the tax code, to ensure the company-nonprofit relationship isn't a tax dodge—which is only going to add pages to the tax code and provide more business for tax lawyers.

Though Newman's Own has been the chief driver of the changes, supporters say that the exemption matters far beyond just one foundation, and could give momentum to a new wave of innovative companies with philanthropic missions. Michael Pirron, the founder of the technology consulting company Impact Makers, has run into the same problem with his own firm. He founded Impact Makers with the intention of donating all its profits to charity—easy enough with him at the helm, but hard to guarantee when leadership passed to future executives. If he gifted full ownership of the company to a private foundation, that foundation would face a huge tax bill in just five years.

Pirron found something of a workaround, donating ownership of the company to two public foundations. (Congress allowed public foundations to own for-profit companies because it believed they had stronger accountability protocols in place.) But this strategy forced Pirron to relinquish some control over the foundation, something that he wouldn't have had to do if the exemption passed. "If the law existed, we would have done something very differently," he said.

Many critics see the law as a long-outdated expression of the concerns of five decades ago. Though it might seem strange that Congress would set tough limits on a philanthropic structure, it made sense amid the growth of nonprofits in the postwar years. In the 1950's, Congress worried that the rich would shift not just their assets but entire companies into private foundations as way to avoid certain taxes. Beyond such tax strategies, they also had concerns about economic competitiveness, worried that for-profit companies owned by private foundations would become distracted from their money-making missions and that would hurt the broader economy. "Congress in the '50s thought the non-profit sector was going to gobble up the whole world," said Alex Reid, a tax lawyer who has consulted with congressional staff on past versions of the exemption.

So lawmakers crafted strict rules to limit private foundation's ownership stake to 20 percent of a for-profit company, rising to 35 percent in certain, rare circumstances.

"Frankly, looking back almost 50 years later, they took a very big hammer to close a very small hole that has precluded the growth of a new form of doing business," said Paul Godfrey, a tax lawyer who has conducted research in support of the proposed exemption. He estimates the change would cost the U.S. treasury about $30 million in lost taxes over a decade, but would generate $50 billion in economic benefits for the U.S. economy.

In crafting the new exemption, lawmakers and their aides remained concerned that it could be used as a tax haven for the rich, so they included a strict three-part test: the private foundation must own 100 percent of the for-profit company; all of the net profits from the company must go to the foundation; and there must be a certain level of independence between the foundation and the company.

Tax experts consulted for this story were confident that the three-part test would work, though they suggested that some enterprising lawyer would try to game them anyway.

For Forrester, the larger point of this exemption is to spur new kinds of philanthropy in the future. The company declined to provide revenue or volumes for competitive reasons, but noted that many business analysts doubted that Newman's business model of giving all profits to charity could be successful. Thirty-five years later, the company has donated more than $500 million to charity, and the food company has continued to expand into new products, including five new organic versions of its classic salad dressings, like Caesar and ranch, and new organic pasta sauces that "make spaghetti sing," proving that the Newman model can work, and potentially encouraging a new generation of founders to follow a similar mission. But Forrester worries that unless the law is changed, young entrepreneurs will be discouraged from considering this path.

"This is two of the best aspects of American character: One side is small business entrepreneurship and the other side is philanthropic generosity," he said. "I don't have a personal stake in this. I've been trying to retire for 10 years. It's such a great American thing we have. How can we not encourage that?"

Pressure mounts to unmask Hill harassers Back

By Rachael Bade and Elana Schor | 11/22/2017 04:46 PM EDT

Pressure is mounting on congressional leaders to release the names of lawmakers who have secretly settled sexual harassment claims at taxpayer expense — a move that some members of Congress are loath to make.

President Donald Trump told reporters this week that he believes Congress should disclose the settlements. A handful of House members from both parties are calling on Republican leadership to do the same.

And Rep. Ron DeSantis (R-Fla.) proposed legislation Wednesday that would mandate public disclosure of sexual harassment settlements — and ban Congress from footing the bill for such deals in the future. Within a few hours of introducing his bill, DeSantis had been contacted by several Republican and Democratic lawmakers asking to sign on.

"It's taxpayer dollars at issue; taxpayers have a right to know how their money is being spent," DeSantis said in an interview, adding that he doesn't understand "why the taxpayer should ever be on the hook for private misconduct of a member. ... That should not be something the taxpayers are funding."

The effort by DeSantis and other lawmakers has sparked an uncomfortable debate inside an institution known for protecting its own. As a national controversy over sexual misconduct by powerful men swirls, some lawmakers worry that the push for disclosure could unfairly unmask members of Congress who insist they've been wrongly accused.

Speaker Paul Ryan's (R-Wis.) office and the House Administration Committee have not ruled out potential changes to the settlement reporting process as part of an ongoing review of the chamber's harassment policy. But there's strong, albeit quiet, resistance on Capitol Hill to disclosing the names of members who've reached settlements in the past.

Some lawmakers and aides worry that several sitting members of Congress are among those who've paid their accusers in recent years. Some of them say that settling a claim doesn't necessarily mean the member was guilty. There are times when it is preferable to settle than to engage in a prolonged legal battle, these people surmise.

Rep. Jerry Nadler (D-N.Y.) made that point on CNN on Tuesday night, arguing that settlements "should be [made] public going forward" — but not retroactively.

"You may very well have people who ... were innocent but who thought [they] better get a settlement than go through protracted litigation," Nadler said.

But others argue that the taxpayer money involved trumps the case for keeping settlements private.

"They've used our tax dollars to settle cases where they're being accused, at least, of violating laws they're enacting and expect others to live under," said Jenny Beth Martin of the Tea Party Patriots. Martin's group is one of several calling for disclosure of lawmaker names.

It's not just fiscal hawks calling for more transparency. Rep. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.), a longtime sponsor of anti-sexual harassment legislation, has also urged leaders to release the names of lawmakers who've settled sexual harassment claims. Sen. Mazie Hirono (D-Hawaii) agreed, telling MSNBC on Tuesday that "any settlements should be made public."

Rep. Scott Taylor (R-Va.) told POLITICO on Wednesday that he's drafting a bill that would bar Congress from using taxpayer money for harassment settlements.

"There is no way that the taxpayer should be subsidizing predatory behavior. Period," said the freshman lawmaker, who sits on a House subcommittee that oversees lawmakers' office budgets.

The back-and-forth comes two days after BuzzFeed reported that Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the longest-serving House member, had used his office funds to settle a sexual harassment claim against him. In recent weeks, several publications including POLITICO have reported that current House rules enable the Office of Compliance, which handles employment disputes, to tap Treasury resources to pay settlements for disputes brought to them.

Aides to Ryan and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) have noted that the leaders don't currently have the names of the members who've settled such complaints, even if they wanted to release them.

But congressional leaders could likely get them if they asked. That's because the chairman and ranking member of the House Administration Committee, who have to approve any settlement payments issued by the Office of Compliance, would be expected to comply with any shift in policy agreed to by Ryan and Pelosi.

Since 1997, the compliance office has paid out $17 million in workplace dispute settlements, a total that covers discrimination, workplace safety, and pay claims, as well as harassment cases.

There's another potential wrinkle to releasing names and details of all harassment settlements: The compliance office does not necessarily keep records of harassment settlements that are paid out of members' office budgets, sources familiar with the process told POLITICO. That approach, which was used by Conyers, ostensibly allows members to avoid getting House Administration Committee approval.

"Based on my experience, that ends up being the approach that is most feasible," said a source familiar with the compliance office's confidential process, and who asked not to be named in order to speak candidly. But, the source added, members who use internal budgets to settle claims risk looking like they are "getting around" a requirement to pay claims from the compliance office's fund.

DeSantis said that using office budgets to pay for settlements may be one loophole that allows lawmakers to hide harassment claims even now. He wasn't sure if it is possible to force members to "self-disclose" whether they used their member office budgets to settle with accusers — though he encouraged reporters to try to identify any lawmakers who have done so.

DeSantis' bill would require all compliance office settlements to be made public as well as the details of the allegations. Victims' names would be kept secret, but DeSantis believes they should have a right to come forward to tell their stories.

His legislation, like the bill Taylor is working on, would also prohibit taxpayer money from being used to settle sexual harassment claims against lawmakers in the future. It would force any members involved in such payouts in the past to reimburse the Treasury for the payment, a requirement that's also included in broader legislation authored by Speier and Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.).

Though Taylor's legislation wouldn't require accused lawmakers involved in settlements to be named, the Republican said he would back DeSantis' measure, which does have that provision.

If Republican leaders don't lean on the House Administration Committee to disclose settlements, they may have to deal with external pressure from outside conservative groups that are ramping up the pressure on Congress to disclose more information.

Judicial Watch, a conservative legal group that has used the Freedom of Information Act to uncover details of Hillary Clinton's emails, wants Congress to allow FOIA to apply to internal information such as the now-secret workplace misconduct settlements.

Currently FOIA does not apply to Congress, which for years has been shielded from document requests because lawmakers argue it would disrupt legislative deliberations.

"The fact is, we don't know what's going on on Capitol Hill because members of Congress want it that way," Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton said of the harassment settlements in a Tuesday video that the group posted on Twitter. "And the only way that's going to change is if the American people react."

Trump doesn't know what's next after taxes Back

By Eliana Johnson, Andrew Restuccia and Ben White | 11/27/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The White House and Capitol Hill are singularly focused on passing a tax reform bill — but almost no one in Washington seems to know what the Trump administration will bear down on next.

White House policy initiatives are typically planned months in advance, with congruent strategies for communications and a view toward working them through Congress. But there is little agreement between White House officials and Republican leaders on the Hill about what should follow tax reform.

Over the course of conversations with nearly a dozen senior aides in the White House and on Capitol Hill, a range of possibilities surfaced, from welfare reform to the infrastructure program President Donald Trump touted on the campaign trail to revisiting Obamacare repeal — an effort that has twice frustrated the Trump administration.

The looming vacuum in the Republican agenda underscores how the relative chaos and disorganization of the Trump White House can affect policymaking across Washington. Former administration officials say the situation is virtually unprecedented, and that it is threatening the president's ability to score legislative victories for the GOP heading into next year's midterm elections. It may also cost Trump personally once the 2020 reelection campaign begins in earnest about a year from now.

"There is very little in the pipeline, and no obvious next item on the agenda after tax reform except maybe a return to health care," said Yuval Levin, the editor of National Affairs, a leading conservative policy journal, who works closely with Republicans on Capitol Hill. "Combine that with a president who doesn't think in terms of policy, and you've got no clear next step."

There are some things the administration needs to do no matter what. White House officials will have to work with Congress to get a budget passed in December. And, thanks to the president's executive order rolling back President Barack Obama's work-permit program for young undocumented immigrants, there will have to be a politically explosive debate between now and March about passing a Republican version — which will likely include a showdown over Trump's long-promised wall between Mexico and the United States.

The administration's disorganization is in part a reflection of the president's own indifference toward many policy issues — but the structure of Trump's White House staff has in many ways inhibited the sort of long-term policy planning characteristic of previous administrations.

Trump has never appointed a deputy chief of staff for policy solely responsible for developing a legislative strategy and coordinating the messaging around it, for example. Many White House aides have moonlighted in the position while attending to their formal duties. The president's former chief strategist, Steve Bannon, laid out early policy targets and was frequently photographed in front of a whiteboard in his office where he kept a handwritten "to do" list of priorities.

Former White House chief of staff Reince Priebus leaned on staff secretary Rob Porter, asking him at various points to take on a policy coordination role in addition to his full-time job — but Priebus himself never laid out a vision for what the policy process should look like.

Several other White House aides have also played a key role in policy development, including domestic policy chief Stephen Miller and deputy chiefs of staff Kirstjen Nielsen and Rick Dearborn, but none is fully responsible for charting administration policy over the long term.

Chief of staff John Kelly, who replaced Priebus in July, has brought some order to the White House, but the retired Marine general doesn't have a deep background in policymaking — and where domestic policy initiatives are concerned, domestic policy aides say they have felt fettered and complained of order without purpose, according to three people close to the president.

The White House's relatively weak domestic policy team has been overshadowed by Gary Cohn and his National Economic Council. Cohn, a government neophyte, has built out a staff capable of rivaling the Domestic Policy Council, which typically charts domestic policy, introducing a source of internal rivalry and instability — a key reason Cohn has taken the lead on tax reform, for example, while domestic policy aides have taken a back seat.

"The NEC team is much larger than in previous White Houses, and the DPC team leaves something to be desired," said a senior White House aide. "In that void, I think Gary's team has proven much stronger than the DPC team."

The general disorganization may exact costs on the administration beyond depriving it of legislative victories. It may also make it harder for the White House to retain staff or to attract replacements as administration officials begin to leave next year.

Domestic policy aides who eagerly joined the administration in January to roll back Obamacare and reform the tax code in the first year of the Trump presidency are less clear what staying on for another year might entail. And while health care and tax reform were legislative causes with which conservative policy wonks have long engaged — and even those lukewarm on Trump's candidacy felt they could contribute to the administration in a policy role — they feel differently about the coming year.

The absence of clear goals for the year ahead has several White House staffers eyeing the exits, according to three people familiar with their plans. The director of the Domestic Policy Council, Andrew Bremberg, who worked on health care before joining the administration, has told associates that he plans to leave the administration in January. Jeremy Katz, a deputy assistant to the president who has served as Cohn's right hand on economic initiatives, as well as others on the free-trade side of the administration's debates on economic policy, have told colleagues they are uncertain whether they will stick around beyond tax reform.

Cohn is expected to remain in his job next year if the tax reform push is successful, but he could wind up leaving if Trump embraces anti-free-trade positions, such as a unilateral pullout from NAFTA.

There are signs that both the White House and Congress are preparing to turn to welfare reform in the new year. House Speaker Paul Ryan told donors assembled at a Koch brothers conference in Wichita, Kansas, late last month that Republican lawmakers would tackle welfare after tax reform passes the Congress, according to two people familiar with the remarks — an idea the president mentioned last week, telling reporters that "people are taking advantage of the system."

Ryan's 2016 "Better Way" agenda laid out a blueprint for welfare reform, but there is no indication that the White House is prepared to sign on to his approach, and, on the staff level, little work has been done at the White House to indicate to lawmakers what the president wants a bill to look like.

Meanwhile, when the tax package moved from the House to the Senate, Cohn said publicly that "we'll put infrastructure into the House" — a sequence at odds with Ryan's message to GOP donors.

Senior White House officials did not dispute characterizations of the general confusion surrounding the sequencing of these legislative initiatives, and they said the administration is likely to push welfare reform as well as infrastructure and a health care bill — something that resembles the Graham-Cassidy legislation that stalled in the Senate in September — over the next year.

"It will be all three of them in an order that depends on what the congressional calendar looks like," said a senior White House aide.

"The president ran on and has pushed a bold, aggressive agenda that is ending business as usual in Washington and putting Americans first," said deputy press secretary Hogan Gidley. "President Trump has delivered on many of his agenda items in record time — and no arbitrary amount of unnecessary bureaucratic layers will prevent continued successes on behalf of the American people in the new year."

The dynamic inside Trump's White House differs from that of previous administrations, where the sequencing of domestic initiatives was carefully planned by White House officials working closely with party leaders on Capitol Hill.

In the George W. Bush administration, the role of deputy chief of staff for policy was held both by Josh Bolten, who went on to become the president's chief of staff, and by Karl Rove, who served as the mastermind behind the timing and rollout of policy initiatives throughout his time in the White House.

During Bolten's tenure, Bush administration officials recall, weekly meetings in his West Wing office focused on a calendar he had pinned on his wall that folded out from the current month to reveal the next four months.

"We thought about this stuff very carefully; we had detailed discussions about it," said a former Bush administration official who participated in the conversations. "The timing of this stuff was carefully thought through, as was the messaging."

Bush officials say they made mistakes — but not for lack of planning. Rove has said publicly on many occasions that one of the biggest mistakes of the Bush presidency, a plan he fought for at the time, was pushing for changes to Social Security after Bush's 2004 reelection before tackling immigration reform. Both efforts ultimately failed, a reality that underscores the importance of the sequencing of domestic policy initiatives given the political mood in the country and in the Congress.

"I believe that running the Social Security idea right after the '04 elections was a mistake," Bush said in his final news conference. "I should have — should have argued for immigration reform."

Obama administration officials tell a similar story of balancing the president's priorities with attention to the hard deadlines in Congress and the political mood of the country. "We had clear priority areas that we went into every year and that we refreshed at the six-month point," said Cecilia Muñoz, who served as director of the Domestic Policy Council for five years during the Obama administration.

With the exception of immigration, Trump didn't campaign on a detailed policy platform. In office, he has relied on Congress to hammer out the details of legislation and, at times, the order of policy pushes. It was Ryan's idea, for example, to tackle health care before tax reform, and as the health bill crumbled, the president told associates he regretted agreeing to put Obamacare repeal first.

A more traditional White House, however, would be guiding Congress rather than vice versa. "It's not unusual for people in Congress to have different perspectives about what's important and what comes next," said Muñoz.

But over the Thanksgiving weekend, Trump gave hints that he's still preoccupied with the victory that eluded him in his first months: a health care overhaul. "Even though Dems want to Obstruct," he tweeted on Thanksgiving Day, "we will Repeal & Replace right after Tax Cuts!"

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Lingering policy issues haunt spending negotiators — Democrats jockey for sweeter disaster deal in January — McConnell pours more cold water on entitlement reform
Date: Friday, December 22, 2017 4:02:21 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/22/2017 03:59 PM EDT

THE DO-IT-LATER LIST: Government funding is now set to expire on Jan. 19, leaving little time for lawmakers to cull consensus around passing another stopgap — let alone an omnibus built from those still-elusive budget caps. What's more, Congress has only handled a few of the prickliest policy issues that now threaten to vex spending negotiators as they deal with demands for more contentious "riders," as Sarah explains today.

Here's what got done in this week's spending deal (H.R. 1370 \(115\)) and what still lingers:

Out of the picture (for now):

- PAYGO: Waived
- VA Choice: Funded through fall 2018
- Extra emergency cash for missile defense and ship repairs
- Children's Health Insurance Program: Funded through March 31
- Community health centers: Funded through March

Still an issue:

- FISA authority: Extended through Jan. 19
- DACA deal
- Miners' pensions
- Disaster aid
- Flood insurance: Extended through Jan. 19

Tighter timeline: The House and Senate were only expected to be in session for 11 days before the next funding deadline hit. And just today, leaders in the lower chamber announced they would be further abridging that timeline, opting to cancel legislative work during the first week of January. That means that, while the Senate is still planning to work for 11 days before the next doomsday, the House is now down to just eight.

GOOD FRIDAY AFTERNOON! Hibernation time. Reach out: jscholtes@politico.com (@jascholtes) and sferris@politico.com (@sarahnferris).

PROGRAMMING NOTE: Budget & Appropriations Brief will not publish from Dec. 25-Jan. 1. Our next Budget & Appropriations Brief will publish on Tues. Jan. 2. Please continue to follow Pro Budget & Appropriations issues here.

Doc of the day — A bipartisan group of lawmakers is urging House Speaker Paul Ryan to address the looming pension crisis that would hit unions like the United Mine Workers. Several lawmakers had pushed for a pension funding fix in this week's spending bill, to no avail.

#DailyBudgetFact — On this day in 1825, the Library of Congress — then located on the west side of the U.S. Capitol — caught fire, Andrew Glass recalls in the latest in our This Day in Politics series. These days, the library's budget exceeds $630 million, and its structures are well-fortified against major blaze.

DISASTER AID

BETTER BARGAINING POSITION: Everything seemed to be coming together this week for states waiting on billions of dollars in disaster aid. Despite early whip worries, the House more than easily passed the $81 billion bill (H.R. 4667 \(115\)) Thursday after making tweaks to appease those from disaster-struck regions. But then in the Senate, it was: Gavel down, leave town — with that legislation lying cold on the clerk's desk.

The upper chamber's inaction this year could ultimately be a boon, though, for those hoping for a sweeter deal, as Sarah explains for Pros.

Holding out: Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer has already publicly detailed the demands Democrats will be making in January exchange for their essential votes. "I think we can work it out in a bipartisan way. I certainly do," Schumer said Thursday, while both blaming Republicans for neglecting action on the aid bill and suggesting the upper chamber hold off on taking it up until after the holidays.

What Schumer says Senate Democrats will be seeking:

— "Fair" treatment for California, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

— Nixing of a new business tax that "treats Puerto Rico as if it's a foreign country."

— Cost-sharing lenience, more Medicaid funding and extension of the earned income tax credit for Puerto Rico.

Greater expectations: Even Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló said Thursday that he's OK with the Senate waiting until next month. "We're expecting a better bill," he told Fox News. And Texas Gov. Greg Abbott released a statement saying he hopes to work with the Senate to "improve the disaster funding to ensure it addresses the acute needs of Texans."

Vote breakdown: No matter what anybody says about the unpopularity of any given disaster aid bill, it's still politically risky to oppose such a measure. And that reality was reflected in the House's passage tally Thursday. Among Republicans, 182 voted in support and 51 in opposition. Among Democrats, 69 voted in support and 118 in opposition. Check out the full roster of "yeas" and "nays."

ENTITLEMENT REFORM

MORE COLD WATER: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell took another jab today at his House Republican colleagues' aspirations to overhaul entitlement and welfare programs,

Seung Min Kim reports this afternoon. "I've been here a while, and the only time we've been able to do that is on a bipartisan basis," McConnell said during his year-end news conference. "It was Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill raised the age of Social Security. And that was before I got here. So it's been a while." The majority leader added that "the sensitivity of entitlements is such that you almost have to have a bipartisan agreement in order to achieve a result."

What's doable? The Kentucky Republican said he hopes leaders can reach an agreement on budget caps in the New Year, saying "there's an urgency" around raising defense levels, especially.

APPROPRIATIONS

SPENDING SOLSTICE: It was the shortest day of the year, but both chambers somehow cleared the stopgap spending bill (H.R. 1370 \(115\)) in no time flat Thursday. As expected, the House passed the continuing resolution with largely GOP votes (plus a few dozen Democrats who joined in after Republicans crossed the 217 threshold on their own). The Senate's evening vote sailed to passage with 66 supporters. And President Donald Trump signed the bill today before heading to his Mar-a-Lago resort.

Sausage making: For several minutes on the Senate floor, we saw Democrats huddling around the clerk's desk, essentially pulling straws to decide who got to cast "no" votes in protest, and who had to take one for the team and vote "aye" to keep the government running. In the end, 29 Democrats ultimately voted in opposition.

Not all cheers and champagne: Thursday's continuing resolution is the third stopgap bill since Sept. 30, prolonging the pattern of fiscal dysfunction on Capitol Hill. "Having to avoid a shutdown is a sign of failure and shouldn't be celebrated. It's like saying you avoided getting an F with a D-," long-time budget guru Stan Collender notes today.

HOMELAND SECURITY

A CANINE CRISIS: There are few line items appropriators love more than cash for bomb-sniffing dogs. And the Transportation Security Administration has been reaping the benefits of that affinity for several years. But the agency isn't just dependent on money to build up those canine teams — it needs a good source of specially bred super pups, too. And as Stephanie Beasley explains today, fierce global competition for those animals has raised concern that TSA won't have enough pooches to meet demands at airports and other hubs. So to build its canine cadre, the agency says it's ramping up contracting and increasingly looking to rely on U.S.-bred dogs.

Plusing up the pups: TSA has about 1,000 bomb-sniffing canines and buys them at a rate of about 400 per year. For fiscal 2018, appropriators have proposed funding for maintaining a force of about 1,050 mutts and have called on TSA to lay out plans for expanding the program, as well as further increasing training capacity at its center in San Antonio. For fiscal 2019, appropriators have asked TSA to specifically request funding for a third-party program for certifying dogs that check air cargo.

Also check out Steph's Q&A with TSA canine handler Doug Timberlake.

WHITE HOUSE

CONFIRMATION SPREE: In a last legislative sweep before adjourning for the year, the Senate confirmed more than two-dozen Trump administration nominees late Thursday night, including chief financial officers for the departments of Energy, Education, Housing and Urban Development, and Veterans Affairs. We've got the full list.

Not so lucky: At the same time, about 100 of Trump's nominees were kicked back to the White House, prolonging an unusually high number of vacancies across his administration and escalating the Senate's long-running nomination wars, Andrew Restuccia and Seung Min Kim report. About 150 more nominees were held over for Senate consideration next year.

OBAMACARE

READY TO MOVE ON: Congressional Republicans have been whispering it for months: No more Obamacare repeal bills. But on Thursday, McConnell made it official. "I think we'll probably move on to other issues," he told NPR.

'We own it now': For GOP election watchers, it's the obvious choice to avoid getting pummeled next November. But for some conservatives, abandoning Obamacare is seen as abandoning their party's base. That includes Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), an author of one of the big 2017 repeal efforts, as Cristiano Lima and Jennifer Haberkorn report. "We should do everything we can to replace it, as much as [Democrats] did to pass it," Graham told reporters. "We own it now."

Boomerang bill: The Senate's bipartisan Alexander-Murray deal nearly caused a shutdown-sized showdown among House conservatives this week. The authors, Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.), say they're committed to getting the bill done in January, with maybe even some added provisions, Jennifer Haberkorn reports.

CONGRESS

MISCONDUCT MONEY: Congress' compliance office has finally divulged the total cost of workplace misconduct claims in the Senate. As Elana Schor reports, at least $600,000 in public money has been spent over the past 20 years to settle 13 claims against senators' offices, according to data released late Thursday.

Still deliberating: A bipartisan group of House negotiators was supposed to release a plan to overhaul Capitol Hill's workplace harassment policy but delayed the release of that proposal Thursday, Elana explains.

Farenthold faces more allegations: All the while, the House Ethics Committee continues to plug away in its investigation of harassment allegations against Rep. Blake Farenthold (R-Texas), now expending that probe to include claims that he improperly used official resources for campaign activities and lied to ethics investigators, John Bresnahan reports.

HEALTH CARE

LONE STAR STATE LUCKS OUT: The Trump administration approved a $25 billion, five-year extension this week of a Medicaid waiver that has funneled nearly $37 billion to Texas hospitals since 2011. Renuka Rayasam explains that the $3.1 billion pool of money state hospitals use to fund charity care will remain level for the first two years of the waiver, according to a letter HHS sent to the state health commission. Starting in October 2019, the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services plans to "resize" that pool to more accurately reflect hospital charity care costs.

340B TENSIONS: As Congress considers a bill that would make major changes to the federal drug discount program, David Pittman explains how the dynamic among various branches of one Detroit hospital chain perfectly illustrates the pressure points in the debate over the 340B program. At stake? Billions of dollars in savings for hospitals vs. billions in costs to taxpayers and the pharmaceutical industry.

The do-it-later list in the stopgap spending bill Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/22/2017 02:11 PM EDT

Congress' lengthy "to-do" list on money matters turned in to a "do-it-later" list with the holidays at hand.

Lawmakers Thursday night approved their third short-term spending bill in three months, ending this month's high-drama funding fight on an anticlimactic note. The legislation fends off a government shutdown, but just for four weeks.

So much for Congress' self-imposed "Cliffmas" deadline: On nearly every decisive issue, any real decisions have been punted until Jan. 19.

Even though lawmakers stripped out every contentious add-on from the spending bill, GOP leaders scrambled for days to clear it. The stopgap, H.R. 1370 \(115\), is so far from a traditional spending bill that President Donald Trump referred to it as a "much needed 4 billion dollar missile defense bill" on Twitter on Friday.

Just how bad will January be? Besides keeping the government open, lawmakers completed only one item from their 2017 spending to-do list: averting massive cuts to social programs under the obscure PAYGO budget rule. Everything else will boomerang back in 2018.

Here's what Congress (sort of) got done in this week's spending bill:

— The Children's Health Insurance Program receives a spending patch through March 31, but the fate of the long-bipartisan program remains in flux.

— The controversial snooping programs authorized under Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act are extended through Jan. 19. But deep divisions within the GOP and across the two chambers make it hard to see a path forward for a long-term bill.

— The cash-drained National Flood Insurance Program can keep making payouts through at least Jan. 19. Republicans in the House and Senate remain far from an agreement about how to keep the program solvent long-term.

— The Pentagon's budget now has an extra $4.6 billion for missile defense programs and repairs to two badly damaged Navy destroyers. Congressional leaders still haven't agreed how much to spend on overall defense spending (or nondefense) for fiscal year 2018.

— The Veterans Choice Program, which allows some veterans to see private doctors and use private hospitals, was given another extra $2.1 billion (the same amount it received in August) to last into fall 2018.

— Both chambers easily agreed to waive federally mandated PAYGO cuts that would have been triggered by the GOP's $1.5 trillion tax law, H.R. 1 \(115\), next year. This is the only item on Congress' checklist that won't need a fix at all in 2018.

And here's what Congress completely ignored in the bill:

— Roughly $81 billion in disaster aid was pulled out of the spending bill at the last minute after facing resistance among some House conservatives and Democrats who demanded more funding for Puerto Rico. A separate bill, H.R. 4667 \(115\), which already cleared the House, will now be considered by the Senate in January.

— Democrats ultimately backed down on their threats to hold up the spending bill until they secured a fix for so-called DREAMers, undocumented immigrants who came to the country as minors. A bipartisan coalition of lawmakers has worked toward a compromise bill that could reach a vote in January.

— Funding for looming pension shortfalls was again left out of the spending bill, despite pushes from a bipartisan coalition of lawmakers. Congress has been asked to chip in for pension plans for miners, Teamster truck drivers and food service workers to avert insolvency in the next few years.

Revised CR includes emergency funding for missile defense, ship repairs Back

By Connor O'Brien | 12/21/2017 10:37 AM EDT

Stopgap spending legislation set for a vote today in the House includes an extra several billion dollars for missile defense programs and repairs to two badly damaged Navy destroyers.

The extra emergency spending — which totals just over $4.6 billion — is likely aimed at attracting the support of defense hawks for the continuing spending resolution after House Republican leaders abandoned plans to include a full-year Pentagon funding bill in the CR.

Lawmakers must pass funding legislation by Friday to avert a government shutdown. The stopgap, H.R. 1370 \(115\), would keep all federal agencies funded through Jan. 19.

The measure includes a total of approximately $2.4 billion for missile defense procurement. It would allocate $1.3 billion for missile defense research and development across the military services as well as $43 million for missile defense operations and maintenance for missile defense.

The CR also includes $200 million for the construction of a missile interceptor field in Alaska.

The legislation also allocates $674 million to repair the Navy destroyers USS Fitzgerald and USS John McCain. The ships were badly damaged in separate collisions in the Pacific that killed a combined 17 sailors.

President Donald Trump requested additional funding for missile defense to counter North Korea's nuclear and missile threat as well as repairs to the two destroyers last month.

The measure also would delay mandatory across-the-board cuts to defense and domestic spending slated to take place in January.

Short-term funding deal leaves community health centers in limbo Back

By Paul Demko | 12/22/2017 12:46 PM EDT

Community health centers, who saw a bulk of their long-term funding expire at the end of September, said the stopgap spending bill Congress passed Thursday before leaving town did little to resolve their financial worries.

Under the continuing resolution, H.R. 1370 \(115\), the health centers receive about $550 million, which HHS says is enough to keep them funded through March. But beyond that there is still uncertainty about future funding.

"There are so many different ways in which this crazy month-to-month insanity is really making it difficult for health centers to operate on a normal basis," said Dan Hawkins, policy director for the National Association of Community Health Centers. "It's the biggest reason why we're so severely disappointed they couldn't get this job done."

The $3.6 billion annual appropriation to health centers, representing about 70 percent of their federal funding, expired at the end of September — the same time long-term funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program ran out. Though the health centers and CHIP have bipartisan support, efforts to reauthorize their funding were sidelined by the tax debate in Congress.

The timeline for funding contracts varies, but for some groups they're slated to expire at the end of this year.

The biggest difficulty created by the funding uncertainty is trepidation around signing long-term contracts. Many community health centers rely partly on contract medical workers to deliver care and often lease their facilities.

Last month, Westside Family Healthcare shuttered a facility in Middletown, Del., that served 2,800 patients because its lease was expiring and it was worried about committing to a new contract with the fate of federal funding unknown.

Mary Zelazny, CEO of Finger Lakes Community Health, said the center started notifying contractors two weeks ago about uncertainty over whether they'll have the money to continue paying them. The center is also considering putting off breaking ground on two new facilities, potentially jeopardizing grant commitments that they've received for the projects.

"We're down to the wire here trying to figure out what we're going to do," Zelazny said.

The funding limbo has also made hiring and retaining staff more difficult. Jamie Berrens, CEO of Cincinnati's Crossroad Health Center, said the company halted plans for hiring and delayed pay raises slated to take effect Jan. 1.

"Staff is very jittery about it," Berrens said. "Nobody wants to come to a place where they could be laid off in two months."

Congress will try again to come up with a longer-term funding bill when the current measure runs out in mid-January.

But there's little realistically that some health centers can do to prepare for the possibility that the funding could be disrupted. Project Renewal, which works with homeless residents of New York City, relies on the federal funding for half of its annual budget. The group had just received a three-year contract renewal, which was slated to begin in January.

"Our ability to hedge against something like this is extremely limited," said Aaron Felder, Project Renewal's director of health care operations and planning. "We would have to radically alter the scale and scope our practice."

House lawmakers approve short-term surveillance extension Back

By Martin Matishak | 12/21/2017 05:04 PM EDT

The House today passed a stopgap spending measure that extends the life of powerful electronic spying tools for another month.

Members voted, 231-188, to approve a continuing resolution that funds the government until Jan. 19 and retains the surveillance programs allowed under Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The measure now goes to the Senate for final approval, where it is expected to pass, before heading to President Donald Trump's desk for a final signing.

Lawmakers were forced to attach a short-term 702 reauthorization to the broader bill after they failed to get enough votes to pass a more long-range extension that would have also revised the snooping efforts to some degree.

Earlier this week House Intelligence Committee members predicted their 702 bill, H.R. 4478 \(115\), would receive a standalone vote on the floor. Others had pressed for the lower chamber to vote separately on a competing 702 measure approved by the Judiciary Committee, H.R. 3989 \(115\), which included more alterations to the spying programs.

But those plans were scuttled when another iteration — based largely on the Intelligence panel's bill — was posted to the House Rules Committee on Tuesday night. That strategy, in turn, was scrapped in the face of bipartisan resistance in both chambers.

Hours before the vote, Attorney General Jeff Sessions, FBI Director Christopher Wray and other leaders of the intelligence community issued a strongly-worded joint statement urging lawmakers to not let the programs expire.

"Let us be clear: if Congress fails to act, vital intelligence collection on international terrorists and other foreign adversaries will be lost," they said. "The country will be less secure."

Latino Democrats to Schumer: Don't forget 'DREAMers' Back

By Ted Hesson | 12/21/2017 06:21 PM EDT

A group of Latino Democrats marched to Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer's office Thursday to urge him to keep immigration at the top of the party's agenda as Congress moves to pass a spending bill.

Eighteen members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus met with Schumer to insist that he prioritize in spending negotiations a fix for so-called DREAMers brought to the United States as children, according to meeting attendees.

House Republicans passed a short-term spending bill, H.R. 1370 \(115\), late Thursday afternoon that would fund the government until Jan. 19, but that bill didn't address immigration or other Democratic concerns, such as long-term funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program. The Senate is expected to vote on its spending bill Thursday night.

The Latino lawmakers pressed Schumer to take a stand on DREAMers when the bill heads to the Senate floor. "Leader Schumer promised he'd urge the majority of senators to vote 'no' — as many as possible," Rep. Darren Michael Soto (D-Fla.) said after the meeting. "And if we can't get it done now, we will lay it all on the line on [Jan.] 19 when we come back."

Congress must pass the spending bill before midnight Friday to avoid a government shutdown, and some Democrats view it as their best shot to pass the DREAM Act, S. 1615 \(115\), which would provide a path to lawful permanent status to an estimated 1.7 million undocumented immigrants.

"We understand the anxiety of the Hispanic caucus and share their anguish on this issue," Schumer said in a statement. "We're going to do everything we can to get the Dream Act done."

Rep. Raúl M. Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said a "significant" number of his Senate counterparts would likely oppose the bill, but that he wasn't sure that would be enough to tank it. "I don't know," he said, "and neither did Schumer."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell prefers to deal with immigration next year, and said Wednesday that he would allow a floor vote on a DACA bill by the end of January if a bipartisan group of senators and the White House reached an agreement.

Earlier in the day, Democrats tried to add the DREAM Act, H.R. 3440 \(115\), to the House spending bill as it moved through the Rules Committee, but Republicans blocked the maneuver.

CHC Chairwoman Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-N.M.) joined House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi at the committee hearing to petition for inclusion of the bill. Lujan Grisham echoed her support for the measure after meeting with Schumer.

"We need more senators voting with us," Lujan Grisham said.

Several Democratic senators have vowed to oppose a spending bill that doesn't deal with DREAMers, including Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Rep. Luis V. Gutiérrez (D-Ill.) said he felt he did his job when he told Schumer to prioritize the issue. "We were very clear," Gutiérrez said. "Don't throw our DREAMers under the bus."

Congress extends flood insurance program Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/22/2017 11:35 AM EDT

Congress has agreed to renew the National Flood Insurance Program to Jan. 19 as part of legislation passed last night to keep the government open.

The program, which protects homeowners from the financial perils of flooding, was set to expire today without action.

WHAT'S NEXT: Short flood insurance extensions have been riding on government funding bills as lawmakers negotiate a long-term agreement to reauthorize and overhaul the NFIP. The focus of activity is in the Senate, after the House passed a reauthorization bill last month.

Library of Congress catches fire, Dec. 22, 1825 Back

By Andrew Glass | 12/22/2017 12:00 AM EDT

On this day in 1825, the Library of Congress, then located on the west side of the U.S. Capitol, caught fire.

As he left a Capitol Hill dinner party that evening, Rep. Edward Everett of Massachusetts noticed a light glowing in a window near the library. Everett told a Capitol police officer what he had seen, but the officer, who lacked a key to the library door, dismissed Everett's concern.

Other officers, however, saw the glow rise in intensity and summoned the librarian of Congress, George Watterston, to the Capitol. Watterston and the police then discovered a fire on the upper level of the library. Reps. Daniel Webster of Massachusetts and Sam Houston of Tennessee arrived on the scene, along with Everett, to help fight the fire.

Firefighters managed to extinguish the blaze before it could spread to the ceiling and other parts of the Capitol. After the smoke settled, they determined that an unattended candle had caused the fire.

The damage proved less extensive than the inferno of Aug. 1814, which occurred when an invading British force torched the Capitol and many other sites in the city, as well.

Among the items lost in the 1825 fire were duplicate copies of books and a classy rug. The library fire prompted Congress to ask Charles Bulfinch, the architect of the Capitol, to introduce flame-retardant materials within the Capitol.

On Dec. 24, 1851, the largest fire in the library's history destroyed 35,000 books, about two-thirds of its 55,000-volume collection. That loss included about two-thirds of the 6,487 books that Congress had bought from Thomas Jefferson for $23,950 in 1815 to replace and augment the 3,000 volumes that had been burned by the British.

With the completion of the Thomas Jefferson Building on First Street SE in 1897, the Library of Congress moved out of the Capitol. The library's facilities now extend to the John Adams Building, which was completed in 1939, and the James Madison Memorial Building, which opened in 1980. It also maintains the Packard Campus in Culpeper, Virginia, which houses the National Audio-Visual Conservation Center.

The collection currently encompasses more than 38 million books and other printed materials, 3.6 million recordings, 14 million photographs, 5.5 million maps, 8.1 million pieces of sheet music and 70 million manuscripts, 5,711 artifacts and 122,810,430 items in nonclassified special collections.

In 1783, James Madison, who went on to serve as the nation's fourth president, came up with the idea of creating a congressional library. It was established April 24, 1800, when President John Adams signed an act of Congress providing for the transfer of the seat of government from Philadelphia to the newly built capital city of Washington.

Jefferson signed a bill in 1802 that called on presidents to nominate librarians of Congress. It also set up a Joint Congressional Committee on the library that oversees the facility.

McConnell forecasts bipartisanship in new year Back

By Seung Min Kim | 12/22/2017 01:35 PM EDT

After a rough-and-tumble year of partisan battles, Mitch McConnell says he's ready to try something new: bipartisanship.

The Senate majority leader's two marquee accomplishments in 2017 — a massive tax overhaul and confirmation of Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court — were done with little or no Democratic support. His bid to repeal Obamacare collapsed, but that was never meant to pick up Democratic votes anyway.

But now McConnell is adopting a bipartisan tone as Republicans head into a difficult election year in which control of the Capitol is at stake.

"I think one thing you can say about this year, it was pretty partisan," McConnell said Friday during his traditional year-end news conference on Capitol Hill. "We're gonna be looking for areas of bipartisan agreement because that's the way the Senate is. There's only a few narrow exceptions, as all of you know, to those principles in the Senate."

Laying out his preliminary agenda for 2018, McConnell said he is "almost certain" that he will tee up legislation that curbs part of the Dodd-Frank law that overhauled the financial industry after the 2008 crisis. That bill can likely overcome any filibuster threat, as it has nearly a dozen Democratic co-sponsors, including some who are the GOP's biggest political targets in the November midterms.

McConnell also stressed that he has committed to bringing up legislation to address the future of hundreds of thousands of young undocumented immigrants in the United States as long as a bipartisan group of senators can strike an agreement. The Kentucky Republican has also mentioned overhauling the nation's infrastructure as a potential policy target for next year.

McConnell also signaled he has little interest in pursuing some sharply partisan measures next year. Of Senate Republicans who are itching to take up Obamacare repeal again, he said simply, "I wish them well." And McConnell again threw cold water on the prospect of Speaker Paul Ryan's desire to overhaul entitlement and welfare programs.

"I've been here a while and the only time we've been able to do that is on a bipartisan basis," McConnell said of changing entitlement programs. "It was Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill, raised the age of Social Security and that was before I got here, so it's been a while."

McConnell added: "The sensitivity of entitlements is such that you almost have to have a bipartisan agreement in order to achieve a result."

President Donald Trump will meet with Ryan and McConnell in early January to begin hashing out the party's 2018 agenda, the majority leader told reporters.

On Trump, McConnell said the two men have "established a really good working relationship" — despite deep disputes between them earlier this year over the failure of Obamacare repeal and political campaign strategy.

"You can sense this tax exercise kind of brought everybody together, because we knew we weren't going to have any support from the other side," McConnell said. "We worked together seamlessly. I think we go into the new year with a high level of confidence in our ability to work together with the administration."

McConnell is even coming around to one of Trump's practices he once criticized: "With regard to the president's tweeting habits, I haven't been a fan until this week. I'm warming up to the tweets, actually."

He also urged Sens. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) and Mark Warner (D-Va.), the leaders of the Senate Intelligence Committee, to complete a bipartisan report on Russian meddling into the 2016 campaign because "if it's purely partisan, I don't think anybody will give it any credibility."

Still, McConnell acknowledged some looming political clashes are on the horizon.

While he said he hoped he could reach an agreement with Democrats on lifting strict spending caps for defense and domestic programs, the majority leader said the Pentagon has been hit harder, budgetwise, and that "there's an urgency there" with relieving the across-the-board cuts enacted under a 2011 deficit reduction law.

Democrats have demanded equal increases in spending for both domestic and defense programs.

And on immigration, McConnell declined to answer whether he personally supports a pathway to citizenship for Dreamers. While the bipartisan Senate group is discussing ways to provide a permanent status for the young undocumented immigrants, a GOP plan McConnell has endorsed only provides temporary protections to current beneficiaries of the Deferred Actions for Childhood Arrivals program for three years.

McConnell also said Congress must address "chain migration," which refers to naturalized U.S. citizens or permanent residents sponsoring immediate relatives for green cards, a frequent target of Trump and the right.

"I think you all are familiar with the fact that I'm pretty supportive of legal immigration," McConnell said, invoking his wife Elaine Chao, the current Transportation secretary who immigrated to the United States from Taiwan when she was 8 years old. On Dreamers, "we want to have a signature, we don't just want to spin our wheels here and have nothing to show for it."

Trump signs spending bill, averting shutdown Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 12/22/2017 12:02 PM EDT

President Donald Trump signed a four-week stopgap spending bill this morning, ahead of a midnight shutdown deadline.

The measure (H.R. 1370 \(115\)) extends federal funding at current levels through Jan. 19, at which point lawmakers will either have to clear another temporary patch or settle on a package that provides updated spending levels through the end of fiscal 2018.

Trump and congressional leaders have yet to reach a compromise, though, on the overall defense and nondefense budget caps that would guide that broader deal.

The continuing resolution signed into law today is the third such tide-me-over bill Congress has cleared since the current fiscal year began on Oct. 1.

This latest measure keeps the Children's Health Insurance Program running through March 31, extends authority under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act until Jan. 19, provides extra emergency money for some defense programs and waives so-called PAYGO cuts that would have slashed billions from programs like Medicare as a result of the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), also signed into law this morning by Trump.

Both chambers passed the spending bill with ease Thursday evening, after GOP leaders struggled this week to settle on a plan that could garner enough Republican support in the House and sufficient Democratic votes in the Senate.

TSA looks to boost domestic canine stocks as demand increases Back

By Stephanie Beasley | 12/22/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Amid fierce global competition for bomb-sniffing dogs, TSA says it's ramping up contracting and increasingly looking to rely on U.S.-bred dogs, hoping to allay fears that it won't have enough canines to meet demand at airports and other hubs.

Concerns about a canine shortage have been brewing for the past decade and have reached a fever pitch in recent years as demand for the dogs has increased in the United States and other countries like China, said Cynthia Otto, who directs the University of Pennsylvania's working dog center.

"If you've got one source and everybody goes there and you need more then there's going to be pressure," said Otto, who previously served as an adviser to TSA's now defunct breeding program, which was shuttered in 2012 after deciding to rely on dogs purchased through contractors. She said TSA and other federal agencies have to compete with many interests for working dogs that are primarily bred in Eastern Europe.

An estimated 80 percent to 90 percent of TSA's bomb-sniffing dogs are foreign-bred, according to the American Kennel Club. Otto noted that is often very difficult to trace the origins of foreign dogs and verify their medical histories and ages. She has urged Congress to support the establishment of a domestic dog breeding program that could provide canines to TSA and other federal agencies.

The tight supply and origins of TSA's stock of canines has drawn concern from lawmakers. In October the House Homeland Security Committee held a hearing to examine whether TSA is facing a shortage of bomb-sniffing dogs.

"As Americans we should be concerned that an ever-growing percentage of the dogs that serve on the front lines of protecting the public, our public institutions and our national security are obtained from foreign, rather than domestic sources," Sheila Goffe, the American Kennel Club's vice president of government relations, said at the hearing.

But Christopher Shelton, who manages TSA's Canine Training Center in San Antonio, downplayed those concerns. He said TSA has stopped making overseas trips to buy explosives-sniffing dogs and has turned more to domestic vendors over the past year. The agency has signed contracts with more than a dozen U.S. based vendors within the past six months and the next contracting round in 2018 will introduce even more domestic vendors to the program, he said.

Shelton also said TSA is not facing a dog shortage. TSA currently has approximately 1,000 canine units, including airport passenger screening and general bomb-sniffing dogs. That's sufficient, he said.

"We're finding the dogs that we need to fill our mission," Shelton said.

TSA plans to solicit contract applications from dog sellers early next year. They will be available exclusively to domestic dog vendors who have for years complained that TSA isn't transparent enough in what it's looking for from the dogs, making it difficult for vendors to select dogs that can pass the agency's preliminary testing.

But Rep. John Katko (R-N.Y.) said TSA doesn't have a minute to spare when it comes to bulking up its canine program, which he supports. Katko chairs the Homeland Security Committee's transportation security subpanel.

"My sense is that they don't have enough dogs, if they really want to beef up the mission," he told POLITICO. "They're more cost effective than machines, much more cost effective. And they last longer, quite frankly, if they're properly trained and properly taken care of."

However, Katko said domestic vendors have complained that TSA "moves the goal post" on required behavioral standards and that results in many dogs failing the rigorous tests necessary to be accepted into TSA's training program.

Katko and Rep. Bonnie Watson Coleman (N.J.), the top Democrat on the transportation subpanel, have said a recent Islamic State-inspired bombing in the New York City subway is an example of how transportation hubs need more canine units. Had there been more dogs at the station, the suspect might have been identified much sooner, Coleman has said. She recently introduced legislation (H.R. 4474 \(115\)) that would direct TSA to add 200 canine teams for surface transportation.

The full committee has approved legislation (H.R. 4577 \(115\)) that would set up a working group for homeland security officials, vendors and universities to develop those standards. The group also would be tasked with brainstorming options for establishing a domestic breeding program. The bill's sponsor, Alabama Republican Mike Rogers, said that DHS must work with domestic vendors to expand the supply of bomb-sniffing dogs that "have been stretched to their limit" as soft target attacks increase.

TSA said its officials have traveled across the country to meet with dog vendors and invited vendors to visit TSA's training center to get a better sense of the qualities the agency seeks.

Among TSA's testing requirements is that the dogs be older than 18 months. They also should have a clean medical record and be physically capable of climbing up and down stairs and walking on slick floors like those found at most airports and train stations. Dogs entering the airport passenger screening program also must remain calm in large crowds and around moving luggage.

Shelton said TSA accepts about 35 percent of the dogs it tests and buys approximately 400 per year. Commonly selected breeds are: Labrador Retrievers, German Shepherds, German Short-Haired Pointers and Belgian Malinois.

"We've really tried hard to educate these vendors on the canines that we will accept," Shelton said. "Some of the information that's in the pipeline is that we are being too selective and that our standards are too high, but the easy answer to that is: TSA's mission is too critical to accept dogs that don't meet our standards."

Still, Otto said a domestic breeding program could be federal agencies' best opportunity to set clear standards. And the program is urgently needed because most U.S. breeders have stopped breeding work dogs because the demand for pets is overwhelmingly greater, she said.

Increasing domestic dogs stocks would also reduce the chances of TSA unintentionally continuing to purchase foreign dogs, said Sheila Goffe, vice president of government relations for the American Kennel Club.

"We would expect that even though TSA is not making those overseas trips right now, that the vendors from whom they buy dogs may very well still be purchasing those dogs overseas and importing them to the United States," she said.

Though AKC is not a vendor, it has worked with the government to register working and military dogs since World War II. The organization sees itself as both a pedigree library and a facilitator of the purchasing process, Goffe said.

Groups like AKC just want to ensure that vendors know what government agencies are looking for as this is an issue that goes beyond TSA, she said.

POLITICO Pro Q&A: TSA canine handler Doug Timberlake Back

By Stephanie Beasley | 12/22/2017 05:02 AM EDT

With holiday travel season in full swing, POLITICO sat down with Doug Timberlake, one of TSA's canine handlers at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport, to chat about his job, his pup Rriverso, and why you should resist the urge to pet him.

This transcript has been edited for length and clarity.

Can you describe your job?

Our main priorities here are both utilization and training to maintain the dog's skill and develop the dog's skill further. So, we have our utilization requirements that are based on passenger loads and when it's going to be busy. And so we schedule around those times. When we aren't needed for utilization, then we do training. A big part of our job, probably 50 percent, is the maintenance training of these dogs — to maintain their skills and further develop their skills. A typical week, I'm going to spend two or three days of utilization and two or three days of training. And some of those days are even half and half, like some days I get a lot of utilization in the morning but I have a little bit of time in the afternoon to do some training.

To make sure I understand, "utilization" is basically going out and doing your job? You go sniff out bags or whatever needs to be done.

Right.

Tell me about your dog.

So my dog, Rriverso, is a product of our puppy program, back when we used to have one. [Ed. note: It was discontinued in 2012.] Those dogs, unlike the ones that we purchase from vendors, we got to name. The dogs that we purchase from vendors, they come already named. So we got to name those dogs and we named all of them after victims of 9/11. Each litter of puppies was assigned a letter, so we could track them. So all the pups from his litter are named with "R." And we actually used a double "R" to distinguish them in this puppy program.

He's named after Joseph Rivero, who was from White Plains, New York. He was a financial guy. He worked at the World Trade Center, and he was killed. So Rivero was named after him. A few years ago, with his prior handler, he got to go to New York and meet the Rivero family. And the one thing that they asked is that we tell as many people as possible that he's out here keeping them safe.

What kind of dog is he?

He's a yellow lab. And he is 8-and-a-half. We've been together for three or four years.

And now let's talk about canine expedited screening. What is it?

The bottom line is if you see a dog in the checkpoint and you get sniffed, then you're likely going to get expedited screening similar to PreCheck. You leave your shoes on, leave your laptop in your bag. Because the things that we're looking for when we take shoes off, take laptops out, all that kind of stuff — are things the dog would find easily. And so we're able to speed the whole line up by getting everybody in, in that manner, right, and get everybody through faster. Because my priority is getting people on to the safe side of the airport while still clearing them and making sure they don't have things that they're not supposed to have.

So we can get these people through the checkpoint faster, and what that equals really is getting them on to the safe side of the airport, right? Because we need to get them inside security for them to be safer. If they're on the public side, they're a target out there. And so we want to get 'em in. And we're able to do it faster, more efficiently.

You told me earlier that you have four of these dogs at Reagan National, total. Is that typical for an airport of this size?

It's pretty typical, yeah. Four is kind of the standard. Some of the bigger airports have more. And that's specifically passenger screening programs. So, if you look at dogs at the airport, we have what we call the legacy teams. Because how the program started was TSA provided dogs and training to the local [police department]. Here's it's [Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority]. They have dogs that are provided by TSA. The dog is provided. The training is provided. There's a stipend for their budget to handle these teams.

So the police are using their own dogs, not the four TSA dogs.

They have their dogs that are TSA assets [assigned] to their department. We have four TSA teams and we're getting a fifth assigned to this airport. Some of your bigger airports will have maybe six. They'll have more. But these are just the passenger screening dogs.

What are the police dogs doing in comparison to yours?

Their dogs are trained in the way that explosive detection dogs have been trained forever. They're searching inanimate objects. They're searching trash cans, cars, luggage, the seating areas, parking garages, all these things. They handle the majority of unattended bag calls. If somebody calls with an unattended bag they come and assist them with that.

Our dogs have an additional skill. The passenger screening canines have been exposed to and trained how to follow moving odor, if it were on a person or on a cart. That completely changes the game because when you have stationary odor all you have to worry about is the air currents in that area and which direction the wind is going to push the smell. When that smell is moving, now you have to worry about all kinds of different air currents, where it's going, people that cross its trail, all of that kind of stuff. So it's a little bit of a cross between explosives detection and trailing.

In regard to the "maintenance" aspect, do the dogs have to go back and get retrained often?

If I don't ever train then his performance will drop, right? Hopefully, in my entire career I never find a bomb. That's my hope. That's my wife's hope. If my dog never has practice though, he would never find it. It's not like a narcotics dog, who's finding stuff every day. These dogs, they hopefully don't find the real thing every day. And so, if they don't have an opportunity to practice, those skills drop off. They will get bored. Even when I'm running [canine expedited screening] and my dog is sniffing all these people, I'm going to have a decoy on standby because I'll see out there that job is so easy for the dogs. It's literally about as hard as if I asked you stand there and point out everybody wearing a red shirt. My biggest enemy out there is complacency.

Has the increase in air travel this year helped to keep the dogs alert and on their toes?

It does. It's excellent. I like a crowd because that gets my dog engaged. And, honestly, if there is not a crowd, I'm not going to work him out there because I don't want him to be bored. And I've got other stuff I've got to do. I've got training that I have to do. I'm constantly challenging him to develop his skills and sharpen that blade. That's a huge priority. If I'm not heavily needed, I'm focused on that.

People see dogs and they want to pet the dog. They want to play with the dog. How do you deal with that?

That is definitely one of my biggest challenges. I have signs up in the checkpoint that ask you to please not pet the dogs. I have signs all over my dog. I have patches all over him, "do not pet." And a lot of people assume that it's because the dog is aggressive. That's not the case. It's just the fact that I have to keep this dog focused on his job. He's not here to socialize. If I'm letting your kids run up and kiss on him and pet him, he would love nothing more. But I need him to be at work.

Democrats block dozens of Trump nominees Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Seung Min Kim | 12/22/2017 11:37 AM EDT

About 100 of President Donald Trump's nominees have been kicked back to the White House, prolonging an unusually high number of vacancies across his administration and escalating the Senate's long-running nomination wars.

While the Senate agreed to keep roughly 150 of Trump's picks for consideration next year, it refused to do so on roughly 100 others, according to Majority Leader Mitch McConnell's office. That means the White House will have to renominate them if Trump wants them installed.

Among the high-profile picks tossed back to the White House: Alex Azar, chosen as the new head of the Department of Health and Human Services; Thomas Farr, a district court nominee whose record on voting rights has infuriated Democrats; and K.T. McFarland, the former deputy national security adviser chosen as U.S. ambassador to Singapore who is now facing questions about her communications with ex-national security adviser Michael Flynn.

That will trigger a requirement that nominees' paperwork be up to date — a gargantuan task for some nominees who've been languishing in the Senate for months, especially if their net worth changed dramatically because of the surging stock market.

That has some lawyers worried that nominees could throw in the towel, frustrated by the already laborious process of winning Senate approval.

"For some nominees, their paperwork will be obsolete," said one lawyer who represents several nominees and was not authorized to speak on the record. "The stock market has gone up, so the numbers are going to be materially different."

Many nominees hire lawyers to walk them through the confirmation process, spending tens of thousands of dollars — or much more for wealthy people with complicated financial situations — for assistance in filling out ethics and financial disclosure forms. The process requires nominees to review and document nearly every major financial decision in their adult lives, and the finished paperwork has been known to run more than 60 or 70 pages, lawyers said.

Generally, nominees will have to update their paperwork only if there's been a material change, but each Senate committee has slightly different rules governing the issue.

In a less divisive political atmosphere, lawmakers would have approved a unanimous consent agreement allowing the nominees to carry over into next year. Such agreements have rarely been controversial.

Any one senator can object to allowing a nominee to be carried over. Though it's likely Democrats are responsible for most of the rejections, Republicans also could have triggered some, too.

During the first year of the Obama administration, only eight nominees were not carried over into the next session, according to Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.), who has been researching the issue. President George W. Bush had just two picks returned to the White House.

"It definitely violates precedent," Lankford said of sending back so many nominees. "That's just a sign of the times that people are looking for a rule to be able to slow the Senate down even more. ... That's making a bad situation worse."

But Democrats said the caliber of Trump's nominees warranted a break from tradition.

In an interview earlier this week, Sen. Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.) said he would look for obstacles to oppose nominees with "egregious conflicts of interest," an "appalling lack of knowledge about the job," or "who are inclined to destroy the very agencies that they're assigned to support the mission of."

Merkley and Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) targeted Kathleen Hartnett-White, Trump's pick to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

"Unqualified or controversial nominees will not simply be rubber-stamped by the Senate," Carper said in a statement. "Let's start the new year off with a clean slate and allow President Trump the opportunity to nominate a leader for the Council on Environmental Quality who takes environmental laws and public health protections seriously."

White has come under fire from Democrats for rejecting the scientific consensus on the human causes of climate change.

McConnell: 'We'll probably move on' from Obamacare repeal in 2018 Back

By Cristiano Lima and Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/21/2017 03:33 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on Thursday said he wants the Senate to move past Obamacare repeal in 2018 in favor of stabilizing insurance markets and to other issues, prompting a backlash from one of the Senate's most prominent advocates of repeal and an ally of President Trump.

The Kentucky Republican told NPR that the passage of the GOP's tax overhaul, which also repealed the individual mandate, effectively "takes the heart out of Obamacare." He gave a nod to a new attempt at Obamacare repeal - which the Senate tried unsuccessfully several times over the summer.

"Well, we obviously were unable to completely repeal and replace with a 52-48 Senate," McConnell said referring to the partisan split in the chamber. "We'll have to take a look at what that looks like with a 51-49 Senate [once Alabama Democratic Sen.-elect Doug Jones is seated]. But I think we'll probably move on to other issues."

McConnell's comment drew a sharp rebuke from Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who is hoping to revive a bill next year repealing Obamacare in favor of block grants to states. He and Sen. Bill Cassidy - who authored the last GOP attempt to repeal the health care law in 2017 - met this week to strategize about how to bring back the effort in the new year.

"I think that's a huge mistake," Graham told reporters. "We should do everything we can to replace it, as much as [Democrats] did to pass it. We own it now."

McConnell wouldn't be the first GOP leader to try to move his party past Obamacare.

After former President Barack Obama was reelected in 2012, then-House Speaker John Boehner declared Obamacare the "law of the land." Current Speaker Paul Ryan made the exact same declaration after the House GOP repeal effort failed in March.

McConnell on Thursday touted the idea of shoring up the health care markets, where premiums are higher in 2018. Despite the price hikes, 8.8 million people signed up for insurance through HealthCare.gov, according to numbers released by the Trump administration. Millions more signed up through state exchanges that have not yet reported final tallies.

"We want to steady the insurance markets if we can," McConnell said, "and I think we'll probably be addressing that part of health care sometime next year." Graham, like several other Republicans in the House and Senate, argues that repealing the mandate means the GOP "owns" the health care law and the potential fallout, which experts say will result in higher premiums.

He dismissed the idea of negotiating bipartisan fixes to the law, saying it plainly "won't work." The Senate GOP tried to attach small bipartisan repairs to a spending bill this week but the House forced them to drop the effort when it became clear the legislation wouldn't pass.

Graham is not the only Republican eager to turn back to the health care law.

"I think it is very important we turn to Obamacare and finish the job," said Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas). Repealing the mandate was a "critical first step but we're not done and I intend to continue working to try to bring together 50 Republicans to honor our promise to the voter."

McConnell, in the interview, also stressed the importance of selling his party's tax overhaul to voters ahead of the 2018 midterm elections.

A POLITICO/Morning Consult poll showed voters largely split on the GOP's tax bill, with 42 percent of respondents supporting it and 39 percent opposing it. But other polls painted grimmer sentiment. A CNN poll released Tuesday found that 33 percent of participants supported the bill in December, with 55 percent opposed. The poll also showed that a majority of voters believed the bill would be more beneficial to the wealthy than the middle class.

McConnell cast the negative perception as a product of the press coverage.

"I do think the coverage has been overwhelmingly negative, and it certainly has an impact on it," McConnell said. "You take a family of four making $73,000 a year, will save about $2,000. Now, to lot of people inside the Beltway that doesn't sound like a lot of money, but to that family that's a 58 percent reduction in their tax bill."

He also expressed optimism that the chamber would be able to reach a bipartisan compromise on entitlement reform.

"I think entitlement changes, to be sustained, almost always have to be bipartisan," McConnell said. "The House may have a different agenda. If our Democratic friends in the Senate want to join us to tackle any kind of entitlement reform, I'd be happy to take a look at it."

Alexander and Murray say they'll keep talking; ACA bill could expand Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/21/2017 08:04 PM EDT

Sens. Lamar Alexander and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) said in separate interviews Thursday that they want to resume their talks on a bipartisan Obamacare package and that the legislation may expand.

President Donald Trump called Alexander on Thursday morning to "reaffirm his interest in a bipartisan health care bill and [to] get it done in January," the Tennessee Republican told POLITICO.

Alexander said the support of Trump — as well as a call House Speaker Paul Ryan made to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) in support of "invisible risk pools" — makes him confident a deal could come together. Trump's backing could prove pivotal to getting the support of deeply skeptical House Republicans. The president previously backed the idea of a bipartisan package but didn't sell it to House Republicans as part of a government spending bill.

Alexander suggested a modified version of Alexander-Murray could be more expansive but warned that he wants to keep expectations under control.

"I think it's an opportunity to take a fresh look at the individual market and do as much as we can there to give people lower rates for a longer period of time," he said. "So I think we'll start with Alexander-Murray and Collins-Nelson and then see what ideas the House may have or other senators may have or the administration may have. I mean, the more we can do, the better."

Murray, for her part, said she wants to resume talks in January but said that any deal would have to reflect the realities of the new insurance market, with the individual mandate repeal effective January 2019.

"The goal line keeps shifting and the playing field has shifted dramatically," Murray told POLITICO. "I want to do everything we can to stabilize the marketplace. But the bill has to reflect the marketplace now as of what the Republicans have done."

House Republicans are still deeply skeptical of anything that would be viewed as propping up Obamacare. And at the very least, they want to add abortion restrictions that Murray has said would be a non-starter for her and many other Democrats.

At least $600,000 in public money spent settling Senate misconduct claims since 1997

By Elana Schor | 12/21/2017 08:56 PM EDT

At least $600,000 in public money has been spent over the past 20 years to settle 13 workplace misconduct claims against senators' offices, including $14,260 for a single settlement alleging sex discrimination, according to data released late Thursday.

The information on workplace harassment payouts from a fund maintained by Capitol Hill's Office of Compliance, divulged by the Senate Rules and Appropriations Committees, does not include any details on which offices the payments correspond to. Its release came as the Rules panel, led by Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), faced pressure from both sides of the aisle to join the House in opening the Senate's taxpayer-funded settlement books amid a national outcry over sexual harassment.

The Senate's single claim of sex discrimination in the data released late Thursday included no data on whether sexual harassment was involved — the two have generally not been distinguished in congressional misconduct record keeping. Senators' offices paid $21,420 to settle two claims involving racial discrimination, $89,800 to settle three claims involving disability discrimination, and $286,786 to settle eight claims that involved age discrimination, according to the data.

One of those age-related claims was a single $102,904 settlement that also involved discrimination based on national origin and reprisal, the largest single settlement paid out since 1997 from a senator's office. Congressional office misconduct claims filed with the compliance office can touch on multiple categories of harassment.

The two committees' representatives said in a statement accompanying the information that aides had met with the Senate Legal Counsel's office to verify that the data could be released to the public without compromising the identity of harassment victims who participated in a confidential settlement process.

"While the Rules Committee has been eager to provide this information in a transparent manner, it has been our priority to protect the victims involved in these settlements from further harm," Shelby said.

The House released its own harassment settlement data for the past five years earlier this month, including an $84,000 sexual harassment settlement that POLITICO later linked to Rep. Blake Farenthold (R-Texas). After Sen. Tim Kaine's (D-Va.) attempt to obtain similar Senate information was rejected earlier this week, however, the House released further data on past harassment settlements and Shelby escalated consultations with colleagues on releasing the upper chamber's figures.

"This is the first step toward a more transparent reporting system for harassment in Congress to hold people accountable for their actions," Kaine said in a statement on the Rules and Appropriations committees' release of the data.

The data released Thursday also includes workplace settlement figures for other Senate offices not led by a member. Over the past 20 years, those offices have paid out $853,225 to resolve 10 settlements, including $56,000 to resolve three claims involving sex discrimination.

The statistics for both the Senate and House include only claims paid from the compliance office's fund set aside for handling workplace misconduct and do not encompass settlements that may have been paid from lawmakers' taxpayer-funded office budgets. Former Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), for example, used his office budget to pay $27,000 in 2015 to settle a sexual harassment claim brought by a former aide.

A senior Republican member of the Rules panel who's closely involved in negotiations on reforming Hill harassment policy, West Virginia Sen. Shelley Moore Capito said earlier Thursday that she supports the release of the Senate harassment settlement data because "transparency is the best way to figure out how to handle situations, and the American people want to know."

"We could mirror the way the House has done it, without full disclosure, but even then I think people are going to keep asking the question" of which members may be tied to settlements, Capito added. "I would."

Release of plan to change Congress' harassment rules is delayed Back

By Elana Schor | 12/21/2017 06:43 PM EDT

Bipartisan House negotiators on Thursday delayed the release of a plan to overhaul Capitol Hill's workplace harassment policy, but the move appeared to signal momentum for action when Congress returns to Washington in 2018.

As five House Republicans and Democrats who have worked on a consensus deal to modernize congressional office misconduct policy described themselves as "very close to finalizing" their proposal, a key Senate Republican involved in talks on Hill harassment policy sent another positive signal about action as soon as next month.

"I would look for it more into January," said Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), who is playing a central role in the upper chamber's working group tasked with crafting legislation that would shake up Congress' oft-criticized harassment policy.

"I would like to get it done" as early as possible next year, Capito added in an interview. Members of the Rules Committee who sit on the working group, she said, are on the same page about forthcoming harassment legislation.

Congress passed a short-term spending bill that sets up a lengthy to-do list in January, including reauthorizing a health insurance program that helps cover millions of children, raising the nation's debt limit and keeping the government funded for the rest of the fiscal year. Should the bipartisan House and Senate talks remain on track, harassment reform would be a strong candidate to pass Congress as part of that potentially massive legislative deal in 2018.

House Administration Committee Chairman Gregg Harper (R-Miss.) and top the panel's top Democrat, Bob Brady of Pennsylvania, bolstered hopes for an agreement on Thursday even as they announced the delay of harassment legislation they had planned to release this week.

Working alongside Reps. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.), Barbara Comstock (R-Va.) and Bradley Byrne (R-Ala.), Harper and Brady said they were "making significant progress" on an agreement that all four lawmakers could support. The committee expects to mark up the forthcoming legislation "as soon as Congress returns," the five House members said in a statement.

Comstock said in an interview this week that House harassment negotiators were "pretty much in agreement across the board on some pretty major reforms," including key elements of legislation spearheaded by Speier in the House and Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) in the Senate.

Among the key priorities the House talks are centering on, Comstock said, is streamlining the reporting process for victims of harassment on Capitol Hill, who currently must undergo mandatory counseling and mediation that can stretch on for months. House negotiators are also moving toward designating a position to advocate for the victim throughout the harassment complaint process, in the interest of creating "a level playing field," Comstock said.

One major unanswered question is how lawmakers working on harassment legislation will ultimately treat the transparency of settlements paid using taxpayer money to resolve previous congressional workplace misconduct claims.

Rep. Ron DeSantis (R-Fla.) has attracted 92 co-sponsors in both parties for legislation that would retroactively disclose harassment settlement payments, but it's unclear whether his proposal would be incorporated in any final bipartisan House deal. The House has already released broad harassment settlement data for the past 10 years, and the Senate followed suit late Thursday after a delay.

Ethics committee expands Rep. Farenthold probe Back

By John Bresnahan | 12/21/2017 06:39 PM EDT

The House Ethics Committee announced late Thursday that it was expanding its investigation into GOP Rep. Blake Farenthold to include allegations he improperly used official resources for campaign activities, as well as lying to the panel.

Farenthold is already under investigation over claims that he sexually harassed at least one former staffer.

Thursday's announcement, however, means the stakes have gone up dramatically for the Texas Republican, as misuse of official resources is a potential violation of both House rules and federal law.

Farenthold has already announced he will retire due to the scandal surrounding the harassment allegations. A former aide, Lauren Greene, received an $84,000 in taxpayer funds as part of a secret settlement after she sued Farenthold in December 2014 for gender discrimination, sexual harassment and creating a hostile work environment. The Ethics Committee has sought to interview Greene, although it is unclear if that meeting has taken place yet.

Farenthold's office did not respond to a request for comment.

The Ethics panel also announced that it was formally appointing an investigative subcommittee to look into sexual-harassment allegations against Democratic Rep. Ruben Kihuen of Nevada.

A former campaign aide and a Nevada-based lobbyist have claimed Kihuen repeatedly harassed them and made unwanted sexual advances. Kihuen — who has also announced that he will not seek reelection — has denied the charges and hired a Washington, D.C., attorney to represent him.

"As I've said before, I will fully participate and cooperate with the Ethics Committee investigation," Kihuen said in a statement. "This process is an important part of making sure everyone has their voice heard."

CMS approves five-year extension of Texas' Medicaid waiver Back

By Renuka Rayasam | 12/21/2017 04:38 PM EDT

The Trump administration today approved a $25 billion, five-year extension of a Medicaid waiver that's funneled nearly $37 billion to Texas hospitals since 2011.

The $3.1 billion pool of money that state hospitals use to fund charity care will remain level for the first two years of the waiver, according to a letter from HHS to the state health commission. Starting in October 2019, CMS said it will "resize" that pool to more accurately reflect the hospitals' charity care costs.

CMS is also winding down a program that's helped hospitals fund primary care, mental health and other initiatives intended to help lower costly emergency room usage in the state. It will provide level funding for two years, decreased funding for the following two years and then no funding in 2022.

An extension of the 1115 waiver, negotiated last year, was set to expire Dec. 31.

The waiver, which the state first struck with the Obama administration, was intended to provide an infusion of short-term funding while Texas adjusted to the Affordable Care Act's coverage expansion and other changes.

But after a 2012 Supreme Court ruling made Medicaid expansion optional, the state changed course, opting to use the money to fund tests for new health delivery programs and help hospitals cover the cost of caring for the state's 4.5 million uninsured residents.

The state's rural hospital association has said that about half the hospitals in the state would close without the waiver dollars. In Texas, local hospital districts raise the state-based revenue required to receive the federal government's 60-percent funding match.

"The new 1115 Waiver ensures that funding will remain available for hospitals to treat and serve people across our state who are in need of top-quality health care," said Gov. Greg Abbott in a statement.

Detroit hospital chain shows tensions around drug discount program Back

By David Pittman | 12/22/2017 10:18 AM EDT

Most patients at Henry Ford Hospital in downtown Detroit are undeniably poor.

With almost four in 10 people living in poverty, Detroit is the poorest city in the country. Henry Ford qualifies for a federal program that forces drug companies to offer steep discounts to hospitals that serve disproportionately large numbers of low-income patients.

A large clinic that Henry Ford operates 18 miles to the north, in the unmistakably middle-class suburb of Troy, receives the same discount on its drugs. Only there, about 6 percent of residents are impoverished and the average family makes just under $90,000 a year, according to the Census bureau.

Depending on who you ask, the six-hospital system is either operating within the guidelines of a federal program known as 340B or fattening its wallet by taking advantage of the law created by Congress in 1992 to help safety-net hospitals.

And drug companies are crying foul. They contend hospitals aren't held accountable for how they apply the savings, which totaled $6 billion last year, have spent less on charity care in recent years and extended their reach to take advantage of the discount at more clinics that don't necessarily see a lot of low-income patients. Supporters of the status quo counter the facilities are following the government's requirements.

The dispute has become the subject of an intense lobbying fight between hospitals and drug companies as Congress vows to take a closer look at the 340B program.

A new bill in Congress would ban new hospitals and off-campus sites, like those in Troy, Mich., from joining 340B for two years while lawmakers evaluate the drug program, which has ballooned from $2.65 billion in 2004 to $16 billion last year.

Meanwhile, hospital trade groups and facilities including Henry Ford sued to block the Trump administration from cutting program payments for certain drugs by almost 30 percent. The reductions will put payments for drugs more in line with what hospitals ordinarily pay, HHS says. The looming cuts will slash nearly $1.6 billion in hospital revenues, and "quite literally, be fatal" to some, state hospital associations told a federal court this month.

A federal judge who heard arguments in the case on Thursday said he'll issue a ruling before the reductions take effect Jan. 1. Lawmakers have left town without acting on a bill that would forestall the cuts. That legislation, H.R. 4392 \(115\), has 160 co-sponsors in the House.

Lawmakers promised to update 340B in light of the attention it has received this year.

"The legislation, which is rather old now, has enough vagaries in it that allows [hospitals] to get away with what they're doing," said Stephen Rapundalo, president and CEO of MichBio, a group that represents Michigan drug companies.

Some of Henry Ford's more than 80 clinics and hospitals that receive 340B discounts operate in well-heeled Detroit suburbs like Troy, West Bloomfield — where the average household income tops $100,000 a year — and Plymouth, where roughly 5 percent of people live in poverty. Henry Ford has opened four new sites for patients to receive discounted drugs this year alone, although they are located in more working-class towns around southeast Michigan such as Brooklyn and Clinton Township.

Henry Ford's West Bloomfield hospital opened in 2006 and is run by a former Ritz-Carlton executive. The hospital was featured in a 2014 New York Times "Is this a hospital or hotel?" quiz for its lavish cafeteria and shopping options.

Hospital chains' smaller clinics are covered under 340B as long as their main hospital provides enough care to low-income patients. And a 2010 change in the program allowed hospitals to contract with private, off-site pharmacies to qualify for 340B. Now, nearly 52,000 pharmacies nationwide dispense discounted drugs.

Henry Ford, which would lose about $9.3 million next year under the Trump administration's cut, says savings from drugs it collects in upper-middle class suburbs help poor patients all across southeast Michigan, including inner-city Detroit.

"The savings don't go toward people with super insurance and don't have to worry about co-pays," said Bob Chapman, head of Henry Ford's hematology and oncology work. "The savings are going to go where they're needed within the system where we are caring for the underserved."

The purpose of 340B, as Chapman explained it, was to help hospitals stretch limited resources to help the underserved. "While it doesn't cover all of the costs, it at least takes a bite out of that cost and allows us to do much more than we would have otherwise," he said.

With the money Henry Ford saves in lower drug costs, the hospital is able to provide care and drugs for patients who can't pay regular prices. The Detroit hospital also operates 11 school-based clinics and two mobile medical units that serve the city.

Chapman notes that 36 percent of the country's hospitals participate in 340B and combined provide 60 percent of uncompensated care. "It's obvious these savings are being directed towards the institutions that are addressing that need," he added.

All 340B hospitals have reasons not to add outpatient clinics in wealthy communities since it could jeopardize their eligibility for discounted medicines.

To qualify for 340B, Medicaid or poor Medicare patients must account for at least 11.75 percent of hospital stays. Clinics in wealthy communities could push more insured patients toward hospital stays, jeopardizing their 340B status.

According to the Health Resources and Services Administration, 43 hospitals did not re-qualify for the program this year. While some were acquired by chains that aren't eligible for 340B or that just closed, the majority did not meet HHS's 11.75 percent standard, according to 340B Health, a group of covered hospitals.

"There is sort of a check and balance here," said Bill von Oehsen, an attorney who helped found 340B Health. Also, outpatient clinics have to be run almost like another hospital department, a high bar to clear, he said.

That isn't enough for drug companies and government watchdogs.

Drug companies note hospitals' total charity care spending has flatlined over the last decade while the volume of discounted drugs has risen and is on pace to surpass total Medicare Part B drug spending early next decade.

Henry Ford's community benefit spending has dropped from 13.5 percent in 2011 to 9.2 percent in 2014, the most recent year for which IRS data is available. In fact, most public and nonprofit hospitals' charity care spending has dropped since passage of the 2010 Affordable Care Act because more patients carry health insurance.

Hospitals counter that uncompensated care isn't the key criteria. Henry Ford serves almost a quarter of the region's Medicaid patients. Residents in poorer Pontiac, Mich., seek care at the hospital in neighboring West Bloomfield.

The 340B program is "extremely convoluted by design," said one health care consultant who follows both health systems and pharmacists closely. "From the hospital standpoint, I'll bet that few, if any, actually know how much profit they're making on outpatient drugs. They just don't do their accounting that way."

The drug discount program has become "the bedrock of profitability for many institutions," said Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health. "This has become a very substantial portion of the profitability of many hospitals in this country," straying from its original intent of helping safety-net hospitals make ends meet.

Outside watchdog groups have called on Congress and HHS to make changes. The HHS inspector general recommended this summer that lawmakers and the agency more clearly define which patients and hospitals are eligible for the discounted drugs. The GAO made a similar call.

The Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, which makes policy recommendations to Congress, last year suggested Medicare reduce its payment for 340B drugs by 10 percent and give that money — roughly $300 million — to cover hospitals' uncompensated care.

The American Hospital Association's top lobbyist told Congress last week he was willing to have discussions about making it more transparent how hospitals use the nearly $6 billion in savings.

Trump predicts GOP will work with Dems 'for the good of the country' Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/22/2017 08:55 AM EDT

President Donald Trump suggested Friday that Republicans and Democrats who have been at odds over nearly every major policy issue this year might soon come together on an infrastructure plan "for the good of the country."

"At some point, and for the good of the country, I predict we will start working with the Democrats in a Bipartisan fashion," the president tweeted Friday morning. "Infrastructure would be a perfect place to start. After having foolishly spent $7 trillion in the Middle East, it is time to start rebuilding our country!"

A massive infrastructure package has been on Trump's to-do list since last year's presidential campaign and is the policy goal on which he is most likely to find cooperation from Democrats, at least in theory. But Trump has spent much of the year bashing members of the opposing party over his efforts to repeal and replace Obamacare and pass a package of tax cuts, as well as over the ongoing Russia investigation, which he has described as a hoax created by Democrats to excuse Hillary Clinton's loss in last year's election.

While the White House has yet to come forward with its plan — Trump administration officials have said they plan to release a list of principles sometime before the president's state of the union address next month — early indications point to a wide gap between what the White House is expected to propose, $200 billion in federal spending paired with state and local money as well as private investment, and the $1 trillion in new infrastructure that Democrats have suggested.

Unlike the tax bill that Republicans passed through Congress this week, any infrastructure package would need 60 votes to clear the Senate, meaning the White House will need Democratic support if Trump is to tick off another item from his list of policy goals.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Republicans fling ornaments off stopgap 'Christmas tree' — State officials accuse Congress of ignoring CHIP reality — Tax bill survives last Byrd rule bite
Date: Wednesday, December 20, 2017 5:33:13 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/20/2017 05:30 PM EDT

SPRINT TO THE FINISH: Obamacare subsidies are officially off the table, but the Pentagon's budget is still holding up spending talks, with less than 72 hours before the shutdown deadline.

In the awkward Obamacare faceoff between the House and Senate, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) has blinked first, deciding today to punt her subsidies fight until January — a move that dissolves one of the spending bill's huge hang-ups. But not everything on Congress' 2017 to-do list can be so easily postponed. GOP leaders haven't yet revealed how they'll tackle many remaining issues, including children's health insurance funding and expiring surveillance powers, as Sarah and Heather Caygle report today. "We're now at about plan C," the ever-blunt Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) said today.

One by one: The House could vote on its stopgap funding bill as soon as Thursday. But the measure looks vastly different from the so-called cromnibus we've been talking about. The initial "defense-only" plan was dropped late Tuesday after the GOP whip team came up short. Instead, House Republicans plan to vote on a mostly bare bones funding bill through Jan. 19. The House is also expected to vote separately on the $81 billion disaster aid package and renewal of surveillance powers.

What to do about defense? House GOP leaders have been twisting arms, privately meeting with members of the House Armed Services Committee to get defense hawks on board with yet another kick-the-can plan. Part of the bargain: Small bumps for certain programs, like missile defense and military personnel. Those so-called anomalies, as well as some possible reprogramming authority, could help Republicans swallow this week's stopgap. But the strategy is already deterring Senate Democrats, who see it as a violation of their "parity" demand for equal increases in defense and nondefense spending. "We will not accept that, one way or the other," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said Wednesday about caps-busting defense tweaks. "We have said all along there's got to be parity. Defense goes up, spending for average families goes up."

Always whipping: On the continuing resolution, GOP leaders are still scrambling to nail down enough support. On the disaster aid bill, H.R. 4667 \(115\), Democrats are still withholding support publicly as they try to make tweaks to help Puerto Rico.

HEALTH CARE

CRIS FOR CHIP FUNDING: Just as House Republicans return to the drawing board on the stopgap — likely casting aside CHIP funding — state officials are warning that nearly 2 million kids could get dropped from coverage next month without congressional action in the meantime, Rachana Pradhan reports this afternoon. In Virginia, the chief deputy director of the state's Department of Medical Assistance Services said officials are "scrambling" and that lawmakers "totally ignore the fact" that large health care programs must be managed. "You don't just wait until the day before the last dollar is spent," Linda Nablo said. In Alabama, CHIP Director Cathy Caldwell said it's getting "very, very stressful."

PAYGO

DELAY, DELAY, DELAY: The White House may be able to punt on the tax bill's PAYGO problem. National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn suggested today that President Donald Trump could delay signing the tax overhaul if Congress doesn't tack a waiver onto this week's stopgap to prevent the automatic cuts, Colin Wilhelm reports. "If we can get PAYGO waived in the [funding legislation], we will sign the tax bill this year," Cohn said at an event hosted by Axios. "We'll see what happens. There's a few technical issues in here that have to be dealt with."

TAX

BYRD RULE'S LAST BITE: Channeling Bill Murray, à la "Groundhog's Day," the House voted again today on the GOP's tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\), following the Byrd-rule-induced changes yesterday. But this time it's actually off to POTUS.

Democrats get blamed: Even though the Senate parliamentarian made the call that doomed several education provisions, some are saying it's Democrats' fault that language got scrapped that would have allowed home schooling families to use tax-advantaged funds for their expenses, Kimberly Hefling reports.

BUDGET

ZOMBIE REPEAL: Obamacare repeal could be back on the docket in 2018, throwing a wrench in the GOP's longstanding plans for welfare reform. Architects of the latest repeal-and-replace bill, Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Bill Cassidy (R-La.), held a closed-door meeting Tuesday to talk about reviving that bill in 2018, Jen Haberkorn scoops.

Competing plans: Graham and Cassidy will almost certainly need to lean on budget reconciliation next year, competing against the GOP leaders who have eyed that vehicle for their own "welfare-to-work" agenda. House Speaker Paul Ryan reiterated those plans just this morning, telling ABC News that Republicans will be focused on "getting people from welfare to work" and "getting states more flexibility in Medicaid" — but won't be touching Medicare beneficiaries. "Those are things we think we can bring more savings to the budget," he said.

FOREIGN POLICY

DON'T VOTE YOUR CONSCIENCE: Trump said today that the U.S. will cut off aid to countries that dis his administration through U.N. votes, Louis Nelson reports. "For all of these nations that take our money and then they vote against us ... well, we're watching those votes," he said during a Cabinet meeting. "Let them vote against us. We'll save a lot. We don't care. But this isn't like it used to be where they could vote against you and then you pay them hundreds of millions of dollars and nobody knows what they're doing."

INTERIOR

SMALL SUM, GRAND GESTURE: Taxpayers have been reimbursed for Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's side trip to a political fundraiser during an official jaunt last spring, Ben Lefebvre reports. According to recent federal campaign finance filings, the Virgin Islands Republican Party repaid the Interior Department $275 in October for expenses related to Zinke's appearance. That gesture may be enough to protect Zinke from accusations that his Virgin Islands appearance violated the Hatch Act.

Coincidence? The payment came the same day POLITICO first reported that Zinke was the featured guest at a spring fundraiser where donors shelled out up to $5,000 to get a pic with the secretary.

OBAMACARE

NO BROKEN PROMISES? A senior White House official said this afternoon that the president is all-in on passing Obamacare stabilization bills in January, Matthew Nussbaum reports. "The president is grateful for the opportunity to work with Sen. Collins on this, and he is committed to following through on our agreement," the official said after Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) backed off their demands today for GOP leaders to include those efforts in the stopgap.

TELECOM

MAPPING BROADBAND GAPS: The FCC is gearing up now to hand out as much as $2 billion for boosting broadband in rural areas over the next decade. As Margaret Harding McGill explains, the agency published a map this week of areas eligible to receive cash generated from a reverse auction.

AGRICULTURE

CONTRACTOR LEEWAY: The Agriculture Department is easing up on rules barring states from using contractors for SNAP certification, Helena Bottemiller Evich reports this afternoon.

SUPP FALLS SHORT: Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) now says the farm bill fix proposed in the House disaster bill doesn't go far enough, Helena reports. "While I'm encouraged that the House has recognized the need to support both dairy and cotton, this bill misses an important opportunity to repair the broken dairy safety net," Stabenow, ranking Democrat on the Senate Agriculture Committee, said in a statement.

Can't win: At the same time, the Heritage Foundation is deriding the steps the package does take to make cotton growers eligible for a loss coverage program. "It's just another way to funnel even more taxpayer money to cotton special interests that already get excessive farm handouts and even had a special program created exclusively for them in the last farm bill," says Daren Bakst, an agriculture policy expert at Heritage. "To use the cover of a disaster bill to help special interests at the expense of taxpayers is precisely the type of action that makes Americans think so poorly of Congress."

Obamacare stabilization bill dropped from year-end package Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/20/2017 01:19 PM EDT

A Senate effort to stabilize Obamacare's insurance markets will not be part of a year-end spending bill — a win for House Republicans who don't want to do anything to prop up the health care law.

Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in a joint statement Wednesday they won't ask GOP leaders to include the stabilization plan, known as Alexander-Murray, in a continuing resolution this week amid growing opposition.

"It has become clear that Congress will only be able to pass another short-term extension to prevent a government shutdown and to continue a few essential programs," Collins and Alexander said. "We have asked Senator McConnell not to offer this week our legislation."

Instead, they will ask leaders to consider it in an omnibus spending bill in January, they said, adding that they don't expect new funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program to materialize until then, either.

"There is every reason to believe that these important provisions can and will be delivered as part of a bipartisan agreement," the lawmakers said. "And Majority Leader [Mitch] McConnell has told us that he will uphold his commitment to schedule and support the legislation."

President Donald Trump wants the stabilization effort passed next year and will sign it into law, the White House said Wednesday, which could provide much-needed support to get the legislation through the House.

"We believe that we will work with the House to get those passed," a senior White House official said. "We think that we will be in a more comfortable place in January to get that passed."

Alexander said it was "hard to add our bills to a year-end package that does not yet exist" referring to a government spending bill that needs to be passed before the government runs out of money on Friday.

Collins, a key vote on the tax bill, said earlier this month that McConnell had pledged to support Alexander-Murray by the end of the year in exchange for her support on the tax reform bill. Senior Senate Republicans, including John Thune and John Cornyn, said as recently as Tuesday that McConnell was keen to keep his promise to Collins.

Collins — and many other Senate Republicans — said the plan was needed to help counteract the effects of repealing Obamacare's individual mandate as part of the Republican tax overhaul package. But Democratic critics say even Alexander-Murray wouldn't make up for the harm of repealing the mandate.

The plan, crafted originally between Alexander and Democratic Sen. Patty Murray, would have funded key Obamacare insurance subsidies that President Donald Trump halted in October. But it faced long odds for passage.

House Republicans not only opposed propping up Obamacare but insisted that restrictions be added to ensure the money isn't used to fund abortions. Anti-abortion groups pledged to oppose the bill unless restrictions were added.

But adding restrictions would trigger opposition from Senate Democrats, whose support is essential to getting the government spending bill approved.

The result will be that the Obamacare mandate will be repealed — a move that alone will drive up premiums by 10 percent according to the CBO. Not funding the cost-sharing payments would result in premiums rising by 20 percent next year and 25 percent in 2020, the CBO said in August.

Alexander said he plans to approach Murray about resuming their work on stabilization, adding that the legislation may change.

"It needs to be bipartisan in the Senate," he said. "I want it to be."

The two initially struck a deal temporarily funding the cost-sharing payments in exchange for greater state flexibility. But since then, Murray has accused the GOP of hijacking their agreement and using it to justify gutting Obamacare's individual mandate.

Senate GOP leaders said earlier Wednesday they were deferring to Collins and Alexander to determine if the stabilization bill could be included in the spending package, according to Cornyn, the chamber's second-ranking Republican.

Whether it ends up in the CR is "really a call for Sen. Collins and Sen. Alexander," Cornyn said Wednesday morning. "The CR is a little bit up in the air."

Collins said House Speaker Paul Ryan called her Wednesday to say the House is committed to passing legislation similar to her bill with Sen. Bill Nelson that would provide reinsurance programs to the states under Obamacare.

House Republicans ditch partisan spending plan ahead of shutdown Back

By John Bresnahan and Rachael Bade | 12/19/2017 10:32 PM EDT

Facing opposition within their own ranks — and a potential government shutdown — House Republicans are once again changing their strategy on a funding bill.

Gone is the plan for a bill funding the Pentagon for the rest of the fiscal year and other government agencies until mid-January. Now House Republicans will extend funding only until Jan. 19 for the whole government, hoping the new strategy will produce enough support to stave off a funding lapse come midnight Friday.

A massive $81 billion disaster aid bill will be broken out and have a separate vote. There is surprisingly strong opposition to that package, which was unveiled by the House Appropriations Committee only on Monday.

It is still unclear whether GOP leaders will include funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program as part of the new funding bill. And while some defense programs are expected to get a boost under the plan, those details are still under wraps.

A proposal to reauthorize so-called Section 702 spying powers under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act will go as a standalone bill as well.

A Senate plan to add bipartisan Obamacare stabilization funds to the funding bill — known as a continuing resolution — looks dead on arrival in the House. That is likely to spur a tense legislative back-and-forth in the final hours before funding is set to expire this week.

The change in direction shows once again how difficult it is for House Speaker Paul Ryan to get anything through the House, especially if he is relying on GOP votes alone.

Republican House leaders had planned to hold a vote Wednesday on the initial funding bill, seen as a way to placate the party's most conservative members. But after deciding to tack on billions of dollars in disaster aid — with all that money set to add directly to the deficit — those same members ultimately reneged on commitments of support.

Now, House GOP leaders hope to vote on all these bills on Thursday, and then adjourn, leaving the Senate to finish up consideration of the measures. Top Republicans believe Senate Democrats will accept the plan and avoid a government shutdown, or having to return to Washington next week.

For their part, Democrats are already jumping at the opportunity to note the GOP's miscalculation.

"Republican leadership is so preoccupied with their tax giveaway to corporations and contributors that they managed to get surprised by this — the most predictable train wreck in history," said Matt Dennis, Democratic communications director for the House Appropriations Committee.

Not just EpiPen: OIG finds drug misclassifications cost Medicaid billions Back

By Sarah Karlin-Smith | 12/20/2017 12:17 PM EDT

Medicaid misclassified at least 885 drugs in 2016, likely costing the government billions of dollars in unpaid rebates, an HHS inspector general's report found.

Drug companies may have owed Medicaid an additional $1.3 billion in rebates from 2012 to 2016 for the 10 potentially-misclassified drugs with the highest total 2016 reimbursements. These companies paid only $199 million in rebates over this time period.

Congress asked OIG to look into drug misclassifications and Medicaid following the outcry over the rising prices of the EpiPen allergy antidote that Mylan had been classifying as a generic for Medicaid rebate purposes since 1997.

Most of the potentially misclassified drugs OIG looked at were classified as generic products in the Medicaid file, but as branded drugs by the FDA. Classifying a product as a generic for Medicaid purposes meant the companies were responsible for a lower base rebate and not subject to penalties when they raise prices for the drugs above the rate of inflation.

Fifty-four manufacturers potentially misclassified their drugs, but four companies were responsible for 54 percent of the potential misclassifications, OIG found.

Overall, 95 percent of drugs in the Medicaid program were appropriately classified and 3 percent appeared to be misclassified. OIG was unable to determine the status of the other 2 percent.

OIG raised concerns that CMS does not have the authority to compel drug companies to correct inaccurate classifications. CMS also doesn't maintain a database of potential errors. OIG suggested CMS seek legislative authority to let it compel drug companies to change their rebate classifications or determine whether on its own it could suspend companies from Medicaid until misclassifications are addressed.

State officials panicked over CHIP: 'We're in a terrible situation right now' Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 12/20/2017 01:45 PM EDT

Families are becoming increasingly panicked about children losing health insurance without new funding from Congress, state officials warned Wednesday as a new report showed nearly 2 million kids could be dropped from coverage next month.

Roughly 1.9 million children across the country could lose insurance in January if Congress fails to renew Children's Health Insurance Program funding, according to a new report from the Georgetown University Center for Children and Families. Another 1 million could lose coverage by the end of February if the congressional stalemate drags on.

"We're in a terrible situation right now," Linda Nablo, the chief deputy director of the Virginia Department of Medical Assistance Services, said on a call with reporters. More than 68,000 children and 1,100 pregnant women in Virginia could lose CHIP coverage without a funding extension.

Federal funds for CHIP, which covers roughly 9 million low-income children and pregnant women, expired on Sept. 30. Despite the program's longstanding popularity, a funding measure in Congress has been delayed by partisan bickering. As of Wednesday afternoon, it appeared a resolution on CHIP funding could be pushed into mid-January.

Several states, including Colorado, Utah, Connecticut and Virginia, have already notified enrollees that their coverage could be terminated at the end of January unless Congress acts in the coming days. Nablo, the Virginia health official, warned that her state may have less money than originally thought and may not be able to provide coverage through the end of January.

"We are scrambling here," she said.

Alabama said it is planning to freeze enrollment Jan. 1, a month before the state will completely shut down its program covering roughly 84,000 children.

"We definitely are facing some really difficult decisions in our state right now," Alabama CHIP Director Cathy Caldwell said Wednesday. "It's just very, very stressful here."

Congress had been hoping to address CHIP funding in a year-end government spending bill. But Republican lawmakers are now weighing a short-term spending deal that would keep the government funded through Jan. 19, giving them more time to hash out contentious items like CHIP funding.

The House and Senate, in principle, have both agreed on extending the CHIP program for five years and temporarily maintaining a funding boost originally provided by Obamacare. But Democrats have rejected GOP plans to pay for the CHIP extension by cutting other health programs.

Even though federal funds for CHIP expired nearly three months ago, states have relied on supplemental funding from the federal government and other measures to maintain enrollment.

CMS has sent states at least $1.2 billion in unspent CHIP funds from prior years to help keep their programs open.

Nablo blasted Congress for being "naive" by thinking that it could wait until the last minute to provide new funds.

"They totally ignore the fact that these are large health care programs and they must be managed," she said. "You don't just wait until the day before the last dollar is spent."

Trump may not sign tax bill without waiver averting Medicare cuts Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 12/20/2017 11:57 AM EDT

The director of President Donald Trump's National Economic Council suggested today that Trump could delay signing the Republican tax overhaul bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), until Congress separately waives a budget rule that would trigger cuts to Medicare and other programs due to the deficit increase caused by tax cuts.

Gary Cohn said that waiver could be a part of a legislative package to keep the government funded until mid-January, though that would require Democrats to support the waiver and a short-term funding package. The threshold to waive the mandatory cuts is 60 votes in the Senate. It's still unclear whether the continuing resolution to keep the government open past Friday will include a so-called PAYGO waiver.

"If we can get PAYGO waived in the [funding legislation] we will sign the tax bill this year," said Cohn at an event hosted by Axios. "We'll see what happens. There's a few technical issues in here that have to be dealt with."

Though the Constitution requires that the president sign or veto a law within 10 days, Congress could delay delivery of the bill after the anticipated final passage today.

Home-schoolers axed as Section 529 savers in tax bill Back

By Kimberly Hefling | 12/19/2017 06:25 PM EDT

A home schooling lobbyist on Tuesday blamed Senate Democrats for the removal of a provision from the Senate tax bill that would have allowed home schooling families to use tax-advantaged Section 529 funds for their expenses.

William Estrada, the director for federal relations for the Home School Legal Defense

Association, said Democrats targeted home schooling families by complaining about the provision, and he charged that they were prompted by the National Education Association, a teachers union.

He said that led to the decision by the Senate parliamentarian to rule that the home schooling provision violates the Byrd rule, which severely restricts what sort of provisions may be included in reconciliation measures such as the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\).

"We still see that one party is still the party that doesn't trust parents, particularly when it comes to home schooling," Estrada told POLITICO.

He said the move feels like an act of animosity against home schooling families.

Historically, 529 accounts have been used to help families save for college. But the GOP tax bill would allow families to use them to save for private school K-12 tuition, and an amendment by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) had allowed home schooling expenses to be included, too.

Mary Kusler, the senior director of NEA's Center for Advocacy, said NEA has opposed the 529 expansion but did not single out the home schooling provision. She said such an expansion would only benefit families that can already afford private schools, at the expense of public schools.

"NEA has been advocating on this issue since the introduction of the tax bill, and never once have we focused solely on the home schooling provisions," Kusler said.

"We really are concerned that this going to be the issue that really does hamper equity and opportunity for all," Kusler said. "It wasn't just the home schooling provisions we were objecting to."

Sens. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), the ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee, and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), the ranking Democrat on the Finance Committee, issued a statement praising the decisions to remove the home schooling provision, among others.

When asked about what led to the move, a spokeswoman for Wyden referred back to the statement. A spokesman for Sanders did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

"Instead of providing tax breaks to the wealthiest people and most profitable corporations, we need to rebuild the disappearing middle class," the statement said.

Because of the changes, the House is expected to have to vote again Wednesday and the Senate later Tuesday night after removing the provisions.

Graham-Cassidy backers eye reviving repeal plan next year Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/19/2017 05:25 PM EDT

The senators behind the Graham-Cassidy Obamacare repeal bill met today to come up with a strategy for reviving the legislation in 2018, according to attendees.

"I think we're all going to say that we ripped the heart out of Obamacare with the individual mandate," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), referring to the tax overhaul bill expected to pass this week, H.R. 1 \(115\). "It's pretty hard to rip the heart out of it and not replace it."

The meeting today covered how to redo the bill's spending formulas — at the very least they'll have to be adjusted by one year — as well as how to build additional political support.

Graham-Cassidy was the fourth Obamacare repeal bill to fail since the summer began and would have replaced the health care law's funding for Medicaid expansion and private insurance subsidies with block grants.

Graham and co-sponsor Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) argue that the GOP will own more of Obamacare once the GOP repeals the mandate with its tax vote.

"You can argue it was a Democratic health care issue before repeal of the individual mandate," Graham said. "Once you've repealed individual mandate, politically, you own this thing."

Trump hints at cutting foreign aid over U.N. vote on Jerusalem Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/20/2017 12:54 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Wednesday suggested that the U.S. could pull foreign aid from nations that vote against it at the United Nations, a warning delivered ahead of a General Assembly vote expected to criticize the Trump administration's decision to recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

"For all of these nations that take our money and then they vote against us at the Security Council or they vote against us, potentially, at the Assembly, they take hundreds of millions of dollars and even billions of dollars and then they vote against us," Trump said at a Cabinet meeting on Wednesday.

"Well, we're watching those votes," he continued. "Let them vote against us. We'll save a lot. We don't care. But this isn't like it used to be where they could vote against you and then you pay them hundreds of millions of dollars and nobody knows what they're doing."

Included in Trump's warning was praise for the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Nikki Haley, who wrote in a letter to other member states that Trump and the U.S. government would take those votes "personally."

"As you know, the General Assembly is considering a resolution about President Trump's recent decision on Jerusalem," Haley wrote in letter to member states that was provided to

POLITICO by a U.N. source. "As you consider your vote, I want you to know that the President and U.S. take this vote personally. The President will be watching this vote carefully and has requested I report back on those countries who voted against us. We will take note of each and every vote on this issue."

Trump said at his cabinet meeting on Wednesday that "I like the message that Nikki sent yesterday at the United Nations." He said he had received "a lot of good comment on it" and promised that "we're not going to be taken advantage of any longer."

The sentiment in Haley's letter echoed one she put out on Twitter Tuesday, where she wrote that "At the UN we're always asked to do more & give more. So, when we make a decision, at the will of the American ppl, abt where to locate OUR embassy, we don't expect those we've helped to target us. On Thurs there'll be a vote criticizing our choice. The US will be taking names."

The resolution before the General Assembly is expected to mirror one that the U.S. vetoed in the Security Council earlier this week. That resolution, which each Security Council member except for the U.S. voted in favor of, declared that decisions made on the status of Jerusalem were "null and void and must be rescinded," and called on member states to "refrain from the establishment of diplomatic missions in the holy city."

Trump's decision earlier this month to recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital and begin the process of moving the U.S. Embassy there from Tel Aviv has proved controversial, sparking violence and protests in the Middle East, as well as condemnation and criticism from U.S. allies and partners. Jerusalem's status remains a contested point in peace negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians, with each side seeking to claim the city as its capital in any two-state solution.

In making his announcement, the president pointedly did not rule out the possibility of a divided Jerusalem serving as the capital for both Israel and Palestine in a two-state solution, nor did he take a position on any other contested boundaries or issues. Trump's announcement also did not shift the U.S. position on control of Muslim and Jewish holy sites in Jerusalem.

The president and others in his administration have said the move amounted to little more than an acknowledgement of the reality that Jerusalem is Israel's capital. Haley repeated that position in her letter to United Nations member states.

"The U.S. announcement is an acknowledgement that peace is best advanced, not set back, when all parties are honest with each other about the basic facts," she wrote. "Jerusalem has been the capital of Israel since the country's founding nearly seventy years ago. The President's honest assessment of this reality does not foreclose any of the options considered by Israelis and Palestinians for decades. I know that many in the General Assembly are also committed to the cause of peace, and I ask that you consider whether a GA resolution contributes to that cause or fuels the heated rhetoric and violence."

Interior reimbursed for Zinke Virgin Island fundraiser, but contributions unaccounted for Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/19/2017 06:57 PM EDT

Taxpayers have been reimbursed for Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's participation in a political fundraiser last spring in the Virgin Islands — but questions remain about the donations he helped solicit, according to campaign finance records and interviews.

The Virgin Islands Republican Party repaid on Oct. 5 the Interior Department $275 for expenses related to Zinke's appearance, according to recent federal campaign finance filings. Despite its small sum, the reimbursement carries significant legal implications. And it came on the same day POLITICO first reported that Zinke was the featured guest at the March 30 fundraiser, where records indicate that donors paid as much as $5,000 per couple for a chance to pose for a photo with the secretary.

The Virgin Islands Republican Party — a political action committee nominally based in the islands but run by a Washington-area GOP consultant — did not list any donations matching those amounts in its Federal Election Commission reports for March and April. That makes it impossible to know who may have paid thousands of dollars for access to a member of President Donald Trump's Cabinet, whose office has refused to provide advanced schedules of his travels and appearances.

Still, the reimbursement may be enough to protect Zinke from accusations that his Virgin Islands appearance violated the Hatch Act, which prohibits government officials from using taxpayer resources to advance partisan causes. Zinke is facing multiple investigations for his pattern of mixing politics and official business during taxpayer-funded travels.

The Caribbean fundraiser, which occurred during a three-day official trip by Zinke to the island chain, is his only political event so far for which the Interior Department has received reimbursement.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the department invoiced the VIGOP PAC for the amount. Swift did not reply to questions as to the timing of Interior's request for reimbursement.

"The invoice was calculated to cover the political activities portion of the secretary's travel to the USVI in accordance with Hatch Act regulations," Swift said. "There is a formula used to determine what percentage of a given trip the political event makes up, and how much to reimburse."

Swift said Interior had not sought reimbursement related to Zinke's stop at a fundraiser for Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska) at an Anchorage steakhouse, or his attendance at a ski resort weekend organized by the leadership PAC of Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.), which POLITICO previously reported. The amount of time Zinke spent at the Young fundraiser did not meet the minimum required to merit repayment under Hatch Act regulations, and Interior did not require reimbursement for the fundraiser in Montana because Zinke was on his personal time, Swift said.

Zinke also attended a July fundraiser for Republican Rep. Greg Walden in Oregon, which was reported in a local media account from the time. Swift said Interior has issued an invoice to Walden's campaign for that trip. The campaign's most recent FEC disclosures, which run through Sept. 30, do not show any payments to Interior.

The independent Office of Special Counsel, which investigates possible Hatch Act violations, has said in previous cases that timely reimbursement of the government's expenses is sufficient to avoid violating federal regulations that prohibit taxpayer dollars from paying for political activity. OSC, which declined to comment, is one of several agencies investigating Zinke's political activities.

Federal employees can face reprimands or even lose their jobs for violating the Hatch Act, but it is up to the president to decide how to punish violations by presidential appointees. OSC found that two members of former President Barack Obama's Cabinet had violated the Hatch Act, but neither faced major penalties.

Interior "should not be paying for any of Zinke's political travel," said Brendan Fischer, director of the bipartisan watchdog group Campaign Legal Center's federal and FEC reform program. "That being said, there is certainly a pattern of Zinke and other administration officials mixing official and political business, which the inspector general is looking into. Public resources are supposed to be used to advance the public interest, not to coddle political donors."

Besides reimbursing Interior for Zinke's appearance, VIGOP also paid $875 for catering for a "VIGOP event" on March 30, according to FEC documents. That suggested the federal PAC was the one raising contributions at the event, Fischer said. But it does not appear to have disclosed at least some contributions associated with the appearance, something Fischer said could be a violation of campaign finance laws.

VIGOP has a murky relationship with the U.S. territory's official Republican Party organization, which has been riven by its own internal conflicts in recent years. The FEC classifies VIGOP as a nonparty PAC and lists its treasurer as Scott B. Mackenzie, a D.C.-area political operative who declined to comment when reached by POLITICO.

Zinke has for years worked with the VIGOP, attending at least two of its meetings on the island while he was a Montana congressman. Zinke's own fundraising organizations spent millions of dollars on a group of political operatives tied to the PAC, including direct mailing company Forthright Strategies, whom Republicans have accused of preying on small donors. POLITICO first reported a week before the reimbursement on Zinke's use of a charter flight to travel to the islands on official business.

The chairman of the territorial Republican Party, John Canegata, said the fundraiser had been the work of the territorial party, not the PAC, and would be listed in reports filed with the Virgin Islands' election committee.

"All our donations, we will put that together in a form they provide and give that to them at the end of the year," Canegata told POLITICO.

Campaign finance reports for groups registered with the islands' government are due in June and December of each year, a spokeswoman for Election Services of the Virgin Islands said. Money raised at a March fundraiser would have had to have been reported on the June disclosure report, the spokeswoman said.

VIGOP is not officially part of the Virgin Island Republican Party structure and is not registered with the Elections System of the Virgin Islands as a fundraising organization, said Genevieve Whitaker, deputy supervisor of elections for the agency's St. Croix district.

Other Republicans in the Virgin Islands Republican territorial committee have complained about Canegata's relationship with Mackenzie's VIGOP, saying very little, if any, of the money Mackenzie's organization raises gets distributed to the party or candidates.

The committee also complained that Canegata signed a contract in 2013, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO, identifying VIGOP as a client of Base Connect, a direct mail fundraising company that other Republicans have accused of exploiting small donors. Political committees linked to Zinke have long done business with many of the same political consultants as VIGOP.

An invitation for the March 30 event in St. Croix solicited donations of up to $5,000 per couple to be event "patrons" or $1,500 to be part of its "host committee." According to Zinke's schedule, he participated in a photo line with donors in those categories. But no donations in VIGOP's federal campaign finance reports match the names of 10 other individuals listed as guests of honor on the invitation, which was obtained by POLITICO.

VIGOP reported 88 donations in March and April, mostly between $100 and $500 apiece. Three donations of $1,000 were the largest received in those months.

However, VIGOP's decision to reimburse Interior may insulate Zinke from some potential sanctions associated with his political behavior, judging by previous cases.

The Office of Special Counsel in 2012 determined that then-Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius had violated the Hatch Act by endorsing Obama's reelection and a local gubernatorial candidate during a speech in North Carolina at a gala for the Human Rights Campaign, where she was appearing on official business.

After HHS began receiving media inquiries about the speech, it reclassified the event as political and sought reimbursement from Obama's campaign and the Democratic National Committee. While the OSC said her remarks themselves violated the Hatch Act, it determined that HHS had satisfied requirements that the government be reimbursed for costs associated with political appearances.

In 2016, OSC determined that then-Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro had violated the law when he endorsed Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign in an interview with Yahoo News anchor Katie Couric.

Since joining Trump's Cabinet in March, Zinke has appeared at more than a dozen events with former campaign donors or conservative activists while traveling on official business, including at least four fundraisers for politicians or PACs, according to a POLITICO review of his schedule, event invitations, Interior Department emails and other documents.

The sort of mixing of official business with political activity that Zinke has engaged in could lead to an ethical breach even if it is legal, said Virginia Canter, executive branch ethics counsel for good-governance watchdog group Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington.

"What you become very concerned about is if you see the political activity driving the official activity," Canter said. "They may be in technical compliance with the law, but from appearance's perspective there could be abuse."

Zinke is under investigation by OSC and the Interior Department's inspector general. The FEC has separately raised questions about VIGOP's spending and is looking into Zinke's former leadership PAC, which relied on many of the same political consultants as the VIGOP.

Trump's Interior chief 'hopping around from campaign event to campaign event' Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/05/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little BS."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips he has taken outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then- Interior Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity. Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations; that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana, where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the-vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to a joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Obamacare stabilization bill dropped from year-end package Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/20/2017 01:19 PM EDT

A Senate effort to stabilize Obamacare's insurance markets will not be part of a year-end spending bill — a win for House Republicans who don't want to do anything to prop up the health care law.

Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in a joint statement Wednesday they won't ask GOP leaders to include the stabilization plan, known as Alexander-Murray, in a continuing resolution this week amid growing opposition.

"It has become clear that Congress will only be able to pass another short-term extension to prevent a government shutdown and to continue a few essential programs," Collins and Alexander said. "We have asked Senator McConnell not to offer this week our legislation."

Instead, they will ask leaders to consider it in an omnibus spending bill in January, they said, adding that they don't expect new funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program to materialize until then, either.

"There is every reason to believe that these important provisions can and will be delivered as part of a bipartisan agreement," the lawmakers said. "And Majority Leader [Mitch] McConnell has told us that he will uphold his commitment to schedule and support the legislation."

President Donald Trump wants the stabilization effort passed next year and will sign it into law, the White House said Wednesday, which could provide much-needed support to get the legislation through the House.

"We believe that we will work with the House to get those passed," a senior White House official said. "We think that we will be in a more comfortable place in January to get that passed."

Alexander said it was "hard to add our bills to a year-end package that does not yet exist" referring to a government spending bill that needs to be passed before the government runs out of money on Friday.

Collins, a key vote on the tax bill, said earlier this month that McConnell had pledged to support Alexander-Murray by the end of the year in exchange for her support on the tax reform bill. Senior Senate Republicans, including John Thune and John Cornyn, said as recently as Tuesday that McConnell was keen to keep his promise to Collins.

Collins — and many other Senate Republicans — said the plan was needed to help counteract the effects of repealing Obamacare's individual mandate as part of the Republican tax overhaul package. But Democratic critics say even Alexander-Murray wouldn't make up for the harm of repealing the mandate.

The plan, crafted originally between Alexander and Democratic Sen. Patty Murray, would have funded key Obamacare insurance subsidies that President Donald Trump halted in October. But it faced long odds for passage.

House Republicans not only opposed propping up Obamacare but insisted that restrictions be added to ensure the money isn't used to fund abortions. Anti-abortion groups pledged to oppose the bill unless restrictions were added.

But adding restrictions would trigger opposition from Senate Democrats, whose support is essential to getting the government spending bill approved.

The result will be that the Obamacare mandate will be repealed — a move that alone will drive up premiums by 10 percent according to the CBO. Not funding the cost-sharing payments would result in premiums rising by 20 percent next year and 25 percent in 2020, the CBO said in August.

Alexander said he plans to approach Murray about resuming their work on stabilization, adding that the legislation may change.

"It needs to be bipartisan in the Senate," he said. "I want it to be."

The two initially struck a deal temporarily funding the cost-sharing payments in exchange for greater state flexibility. But since then, Murray has accused the GOP of hijacking their agreement and using it to justify gutting Obamacare's individual mandate.

Senate GOP leaders said earlier Wednesday they were deferring to Collins and Alexander to determine if the stabilization bill could be included in the spending package, according to Cornyn, the chamber's second-ranking Republican.

Whether it ends up in the CR is "really a call for Sen. Collins and Sen. Alexander," Cornyn said Wednesday morning. "The CR is a little bit up in the air."

Collins said House Speaker Paul Ryan called her Wednesday to say the House is committed to passing legislation similar to her bill with Sen. Bill Nelson that would provide reinsurance programs to the states under Obamacare.

FCC identifies areas eligible for $2B broadband funding program Back

By Margaret Harding McGill | 12/19/2017 03:21 PM EDT

The FCC today outlined areas in 48 states eligible to receive some of as much as $2 billion in funding meant to boost broadband deployment over the next decade.

The agency under Chairman Ajit Pai is gearing up to divvy up money next year via a reverse auction through the Connect America Fund that aims to subsidize broadband build-out in unserved rural areas.

The commission released a map of nearly one million homes and small businesses, largely in rural areas, that are unserved by high-speed broadband. Companies will compete to provide service at the lowest cost rather than bidding up the price as in a traditional auction.

"Closing the digital divide is my number one priority, and through this innovative Connect America Fund auction, we are poised to take the next big step in reaching that goal," Pai said in a statement. "In rural America, broadband opens the doors of opportunity by connecting remote communities to global markets, jobs, education, health care and information."

USDA to allow private contractors to provide more help to states on SNAP Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 12/20/2017 01:12 PM EDT

The Department of Agriculture issued guidance today aimed at allowing states to use contractors more in the process of SNAP certification.

Federal law requires that state civil servants certify whether SNAP beneficiaries meet the eligibility requirements, and the guidance does not change that, the USDA said. But the agency's Food and Nutrition Service is expanding "the possible use of contracted private-sector staff to provide basic case-specific information." In the past, guidance has restricted contractors to "a much more limited set of activities," the department said.

The guidance comes after the USDA approved related requests from Michigan and Louisiana.

"I encourage all states with an interest in this new flexibility to consider this change in policy, especially states looking for better ways to align their operations across multiple programs," Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue said in a statement.

The USDA argues that the policy change will enable states to "eliminate silos and align service delivery across programs, improve the use of technology, and spur innovation."

The Secretaries' Innovation Group — a group of largely conservative state officials who administer welfare programs — lauded the decision, noting that its members had asked for this type of flexibility during the Obama administration. For instance, some states have wanted to use contractors to help collect information, like birth certificates, while still having state employees certify the SNAP recipients as required by federal rules, said Jason Turner, executive director of SIG.

"Collecting information to make an eligibility determination can be time-consuming and is a major cost of administering the SNAP program," said Turner. "As states have moved to collect eligibility information at various locations this is a needed change."

Stabenow says farm bill fixes in House disaster bill don't go far enough Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 12/19/2017 03:02 PM EDT

Senate Agriculture ranking member Debbie Stabenow is unimpressed with the farm bill fix provisions proposed in the House disaster bill.

The House's $81 billion package released late Monday includes language that makes cotton growers eligible for the Price Loss Coverage program, a change they've long lobbied for. It also contains language that would remove the current cap on livestock insurance policies, a move aimed at helping dairy producers get more access to insurance. There's a $20 million annual cap, but it's not yet clear how much the change would cost.

The Michigan Democrat made it clear today she did not think the changes go far enough.

"While I'm encouraged that the House has recognized the need to support both dairy and cotton, this bill misses an important opportunity to repair the broken dairy safety net," Stabenow said in a statement.

"Expanding insurance options for dairy farmers is a good first step - but there's more we can do to help our producers recover from tough economic times and lay the groundwork for further progress in the 2018 Farm Bill," she said. "As the Senate completes its work on the disaster package, I will continue to support the Margin Protection Program improvements that Senators Cochran and Leahy made in the Senate Agriculture Appropriations Bill."

The Margin Protection Program was created in the 2014 farm bill to replace a previous price support system. It protects farmers based on the margin between the cost of milk and the cost of feed. But the program has been widely criticized for being ineffective: With feed costs being low, it has done little to help producers cope with depressed prices for milk.

Stabenow took further issue with a little-noticed provision in the disaster bill, H.R. 4667 \(115\), that would set up a "National Accuracy Clearinghouse," a system aimed at making sure SNAP recipients are getting benefits in multiple states. It's not yet clear how much such savings such a system would generate, but the idea that the money would help shore up the farm safety net is not likely to go over well with Democrats or anti-hunger advocates.

"It is also unacceptable that the House decided to target our food safety net for families in exchange for much-needed improvements in the farm safety net," Stabenow said. "Pitting one part of the Farm Bill against another is the wrong way to get things done."

The National Farmers Union was also quick to react to the farm bill language in the supplemental.

"While NFU supports the cotton and dairy changes included in the bill, much more must be done," said Roger Johnson, president of NFU. "It is very disappointing that House appropriators provide significantly lower levels of assistance for dairy producers, who are struggling tremendously with low milk prices, market uncertainty, and a deeply flawed safety net program. We urge the Senate and House negotiators to find ways to provide more real, meaningful help."

Johnson also chided the provisions for apparently trying to use savings from tweaks to the way the SNAP program is administered for farm programs.

"We should also avoid cuts to nutrition program infrastructure outside of the farm bill reform debate," Johnson said. "Broad coalitions, over the course of the last year, have repeatedly stated that one farm bill program should not be an offset from the other. We stand by that sentiment."

Heritage slams House moves on cotton, dairy Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 12/19/2017 03:15 PM EDT

The farm bill fixes written into the House disaster bill are quickly attracting criticism. Daren Bakst, the agriculture policy expert at the Heritage Foundation, issued a blistering rebuke of provisions today, calling the approach "shameful."

Bakst took particular issue with language buried toward the end of the 184-page bill that was released late Monday night that makes cotton growers eligible for the Price Loss Coverage program.

"Apparently, some legislators in the House don't mind protecting the swamp," Bakst said. "In fact, they are so wedded to the Washington swamp that they are attempting to shamelessly help out their cronies by attaching non-disaster language to a disaster aid bill."

Bakst, a longtime critic of federal farm policy, called it "an expansion of farm handouts to cotton growers."

"This subsidy has absolutely nothing to do with disasters and is a sad, thinly veiled attempt to primarily help large farm businesses meet their financial bottom lines," Bakst said. "It's just another way to funnel even more taxpayer money to cotton special interests that already get excessive farm handouts and even had a special program created exclusively for them in the last farm bill."

"To use the cover of a disaster bill to help special interests at the expense of taxpayers is precisely the type of action that makes Americans think so poorly of Congress," he added. "This provision should be removed immediately. It is shocking that it existed in the first place."

Tech's challenge: How to spend its tax windfall Back

By Steven Overly | 12/20/2017 05:07 AM EDT

The Republican tax bill will bring a windfall to the tech industry's biggest players — along with a heaping dose of pressure from President Donald Trump to invest the savings in jobs and factories at home.

The bill will allow companies like Apple and Microsoft to bring their huge piles of overseas cash back to the U.S. at a dramatically reduced tax rate. The decline — to 15.5 percent for cash from as much as 35 percent — is a boon for the tech giants that lead all U.S. corporations in stashing profits abroad, including a whopping $250 billion stockpile for Apple alone.

Trump and key GOP lawmakers are making clear, though, that they expect the industry to return the favor by putting "America First."

"One of the most important outcomes of this tax bill is an investment into our future," House Majority Leader Rep. Kevin McCarthy, a California Republican, said in a statement. "And by lowering rates for businesses of all sizes we can expect employees to see higher wages and more opportunities for career advancement. That helps the American worker, their families, and communities."

Trump boasted last week that Apple and other "great" companies will be able to bring back "trillions" of dollars as a result of the tax bill, promising they "will be spending that money right here, and it will be jobs and lots of other good things."

But skeptics fear that companies could use the money, once it's repatriated, to bolster their stock prices and increase executive compensation, rather than add jobs.

"Companies could just give it out in dividends. They could use it for stock buybacks. I don't think that's the best use of that funding," said Democratic Rep. Ro Khanna, whose district includes Apple's Cupertino, Calif., headquarters. "I would rather it have at least been linked to an investment in public education or infrastructure. There's no such linkage there."

Apple didn't respond to a request for comment on the tax bill or its plans once Trump signs the measure. CEO Tim Cook, who spent time this year at the White House and Capitol Hill talking about taxes, told NBC News last month he expects Apple will add more jobs as a result of tax reform but did not elaborate.

The current repatriation rate is "not good for investment in the U.S., so this needs to be fixed," Cook said at the time. "In my view it should have been fixed years ago, but let's get it done now."

Now that the tax bill is on the brink of passage, however, Apple and other tech giants that store the most cash abroad — Microsoft, Cisco, Google parent Alphabet and Oracle, according to data compiled by Bloomberg — will be closely watched for their U.S. activity. Those companies either declined or did not respond to requests for comment on this story.

"This is a tax stimulus in many ways for the tech sector at a time when it isn't necessarily needed, so it will be interesting to me what the tech sector does with all of this newfound cash," said Channing Flynn, Ernst & Young's global technology tax leader. "I bet they do wind up doing things that don't necessarily stimulate the economy but wind up providing value to shareholders."

A 2004 tax holiday that allowed companies to bring back foreign earnings at a reduced tax rate required them to first outline plans for using the funds on investments in jobs and infrastructure, though Flynn said much of the money was still used to enrich shareholders. No such requirements are in place this time.

Trump told The Wall Street Journal in July that Cook had promised him Apple would build "three big plants, beautiful plants" in the U.S., a claim Trump reiterated to reporters at a White House meeting in October. Apple has declined to comment on those remarks, and Trump did not provide further details.

Since Trump's election, Apple has made some domestic moves. The company in May unveiled a $1 billion fund to invest in U.S. advanced manufacturing. So far, the fund has shelled out $200 million to a Corning factory in Kentucky and $390 million to a Finisar facility in Texas. Both companies manufacture parts for Apple products.

Apple also announced plans in August to build an Iowa data center after receiving a series of state and local tax breaks, though data centers typically employ a small number of workers following the construction phase.

Looming over all this is Trump's track record of expressing his Twitter-fueled discontent with companies that manufacture overseas. Since his campaign, Trump has made a habit of publicly bashing companies that build American products abroad while praising those that declare plans to add jobs or plants in the U.S. — even if the plans actually predated his presidency.

The repatriation rate is just one aspect of the tax package that benefits the tech industry, which deployed hundreds of lobbyists in Washington to secure favorable provisions.

Like most corporations, tech companies will benefit from the corporate tax rate dropping from 35 percent to 21 percent starting next year. The U.S. will also move to a "territorial" tax system in which future corporate income made abroad is only taxed in the country where it is earned — not taxed a second time in the U.S. — a provision sought by tech and other multinational firms.

The bill also preserves an existing research and development tax credit valued by Silicon Valley and lowers the tax rate on profits earned abroad on intellectual property held in the United States.

At the same time, the plan includes a minimum tax on offshore profits that could create a new tax burden on companies meant to discourage them from moving future money or operations overseas. That could pinch tech firms that have spent years optimizing their overseas operations to pay as little tax as possible.

Still, the legislation has garnered wide support from a tech industry that has been calling for years for tax cuts.

"Our industry will continue to work with stakeholders to refine the tax policies as they take shape in real-life practice," said Dean Garfield, president of the Information Technology Industry Council, "and do everything we can to ensure they boost the ability of businesses of all sizes to continue to harness the power of the internet, enter new markets, and create tech jobs in the United States and around the world."

Tax victory may be fleeting for Ryan and McConnell Back

By Rachael Bade and Seung Min Kim | 12/20/2017 02:36 PM EDT

A beaming Speaker Paul Ryan high-fived and hugged his lieutenants after the House first passed the GOP tax bill Tuesday. As the Senate prepared to follow suit hours later, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell was elated.

"Couldn't be better," he said in an interview with POLITICO.

Capitol Hill Republicans have every reason to feel euphoric. Ryan and McConnell have ushered the biggest tax overhaul in a generation through Congress and delivered President Donald Trump his first major legislative victory since Inauguration Day.

But on the periphery is palpable angst, particularly in the House. Just hours before the Tuesday vote, some House Republicans fretted privately about the prospect of getting railroaded into propping up Obamacare by the end of the week. And conservatives have been stewing quietly over a looming legislative package coming in early January that most believe will increase spending and codify an Obama-era immigration program they believe is illegal.

"It's kinda like leaving a hospital finding out you're cancer free and getting run over by a Mack truck," said Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker. On the one hand, the North Carolina Republican cheered passage of the tax plan. But he was also aghast that a unified Republican government was even discussing the possibility of enacting Obamacare subsidy payments they campaigned against for years.

Ryan and McConnell scored an undeniable win this week when Congress passed a sweeping tax overhaul. For the speaker, it was a chance to check his No. 1 policy goal off his bucket list. For the majority leader, it was an opportunity to regroup with a once-in-a-generation success, particularly after the Senate failed to repeal Obamacare this summer.

But the victory lap for both men may be short-lived.

By Friday Republicans will have to figure out how to fund the government, and there are no good options. House Republicans hoped to increase defense spending without giving Democrats any funding boost for their own priorities — an idea GOP leaders retracted after realizing it would go nowhere in the Senate. McConnell, for his part, recently backed the idea of adding Obamacare stabilization payments to the short-term spending bill — something House Republicans have flat-out rejected.

That's to say nothing of January, when Congress is expected to raise strict spending caps without equivalent cuts and potentially offer deportation relief to Dreamers. Both could repel the conservative base even more.

Republicans throughout Washington have begun calling the January legislative agenda the "shit sandwich."

"It's going to take a lot of the win away and a lot of the momentum away if we go back on our principles, and to me that's why the [Obamacare] payments are toxic," said Rep. Warren

Davidson (R-Ohio), a Freedom Caucus member who enjoys a strong relationship with Ryan and even sat with him on the floor in the moments before the House vote Tuesday. On Wednesday afternoon, Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) said they would not push for an Obamacare stabilization measure to hitch a ride on this week's stopgap spending bill and would instead seek passage early next year.

Ryan may have sensed that other policy matters were about to infringe on the tax triumph: Just three hours before the House first passed the bill Tuesday, the Wisconsin Republican told his colleagues in a closed-door conference meeting to treasure the moment they passed the tax overhaul and remember it as Republicans tackle a series of thorny year-end issues. Be proud, Ryan said — and don't get bogged down in the drama.

Some heeded his advice; others did not. As Republicans streamed out of the room, several balked at Ryan's suggestion that McConnell might tack Obamacare subsidies onto the government-funding bill at week's end. Minutes later, when the gavel fell on tax reform in the House, some conservatives declined to join the party's standing ovation on the floor, frustrated over leadership's handling of the year-end to-do list.

Republicans' mixed emotions will again be on full display Wednesday: Around 3 p.m., GOP lawmakers will head to the White House for a celebration, where most will laugh and pat each other on the backs like one big happy family. But right after, House leaders expect to call a private conference meeting to discuss how to avert a shutdown — a discussion that's likely to displease conservatives, appropriators and defense hawks alike.

The Senate, a more bipartisan body comprised of more centrist Republicans, is having less heartburn for now. McConnell is determined that his hard-fought legislative victory on taxes — in which he kept together his fractious conference — not be swiftly overshadowed by a shutdown battle that could bruise Republicans.

"I think there's a bipartisan desire to wrap up our business here in a fairly non-contentious way, and I think you'll see that develop at the end of the week," McConnell told POLITICO. "This is not a place we haven't been before."

His top deputy, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), was also adamant that the looming battles wouldn't detract from the tax win: "I don't know anybody that believes we're going to shut down."

A shutdown just two days before Christmas would tar the victory that GOP leaders on both ends of the Capitol have spent months working toward. Democrats have criticized the messy legislative process and accused the GOP of rushing through the tax bill with little public scrutiny, charges Republicans dismiss.

"I think it's a real tribute to our majority leader that he's been able to get this up and hopefully out," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said.

Winning over Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee, the lone GOP senator to reject the Senate's version of the tax bill, was also a feat for McConnell.

At a party lunch on Tuesday, Corker spoke to his fellow Republican senators about how he came around on the tax measure despite initially opposing it out of concerns it would blow through the deficit. He didn't mention, according to one senator, the controversy that exploded around him in the final days of the tax fight after a report suggested he flipped his vote only after securing provisions in the tax bill that would profit him personally.

McConnell came to Corker's defense in the interview with POLITICO, calling such suggestions about the Tennessee senator "absolutely outrageous."

The majority leader was unconcerned with the perception that some lawmakers could benefit financially from the tax overhaul. McConnell noted that his own accountant ran through how the Kentucky Republican would fare under the tax bill, and "I come out almost exactly where I am now."

"Every taxpayer in America has got a different set of facts," McConnell said. "Not a single member [was] casting a vote on this bill based upon their own personal tax situation."

In the House, there was never really a question about whether tax reform could pass. Ryan was able to muscle through an Obamacare repeal bill earlier in the year, and his conference was so sick of losing that they were willing to swallow almost any tax bill if it meant a legislative victory.

"It's a feather in his cap," said Rep. Bill Posey of Florida of Ryan. "He said this was one of his goals since the day he was on staff. And that says a lot, that it's been important to him — but also very important to the president and the country."

Even if GOP leaders iron out their government funding differences in the next three days with little drama, January is sure to be harder. While Republicans could pass tax and health care bills by themselves, negotiations on spending and immigration will require Democratic votes.

And Democrats, most lawmakers and aides on the Hill agree, have the upper-hand in those talks. That means it's only a matter of time before Republicans cut loose their right flank. But perhaps when that happens, and the intra-party bickering reaches a new crescendo, they'll look back to the day tax reform passed with fond memories.

"The nice thing about doing a big package that has been in the making and overdue for 31 years is this is going to have lasting impacts," said Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), who hopes Republicans will keep talking about tax reform well beyond the shutdown drama. "I don't think any of us are going to lose any of our enthusiasm or gonna stop talking about it."

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: Republicans speed toward uncertain 'PAYGO' fate — Trump previews work on infrastructure, welfare reform and health care — White House estimates increased economic toll from opioid crisis
Date: Monday, November 20, 2017 3:29:47 PM

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 11/20/2017 03:26 PM EDT

MAKE 'EM SWEAT: There's a sequester tucked into the GOP's tax bill — and only Democrats can stop it.

As CBO warned last week, $150 billion in automatic pilfering could come as part of the arcane "PAYGO" rules created in the '90s. And while GOP leaders will surely try to waive the requirement to prevent that "Pay As You Go" slashing, they'll need votes from their colleagues across the aisle. So far, though, the minority party is playing hardball, as Sarah reports for Pros today. "I think if that were the ultimate outcome, that we wouldn't get blamed for it," John Yarmuth of Kentucky, the top Democrat on the House budget panel, told POLITICO. "I think right now they get blamed for anything that happens."

At stake: The Republican tax plan would force massive cuts to mandatory programs, to the tune of $150 billion per year, if the legislation lives up to its $1.5 trillion deficit-digging potential. Medicare would be slashed $25 billion. Programs like crop subsidies, the Census Bureau, the hospital trust fund, wetlands conservation and parts of U.S. Customs and Border Protection would all feel the squeeze over a decade.

December gamble: If Republicans successfully wrap up their tax bill by Christmas, lawmakers would need to act swiftly to waive PAYGO. That could give Democrats extra leverage in the year-end government funding fight — unless Republicans take a similar tact and attach a PAYGO waiver to that must-pass package.

WHITE HOUSE

NEXT UP AFTER TAX: President Donald Trump said this afternoon that his administration will be "submitting plans on health care, plans on infrastructure, and plans on welfare reform — which is desperately needed in our country — soon after taxes," Lauren Gardner reports.

OPIOID CRISIS

ECONOMIC EFFECT: The White House is out with a new economic analysis concluding that the cost of the opioid crisis was $504 billion in 2015. Dan Diamond explains that the estimate translates to nearly 3 percent of GDP and is significantly higher than previous projections, which ranged from $11.5 billion to $79.9 billion in 2015 dollars. Those assessments "greatly understate" the public health problem, the Council of Economic Advisers argues.

BUDGET

OFFSETS, PLEASE? The Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget is making a last-ditch plea for a spending deal that doesn't add to the deficit. "At minimum, lawmakers should follow the model of past sequester-relief agreements and pay for new spending with real cuts, not higher debt," the group's president said in a statement today, adding that the offsets must be "real" — not just gimmicks. The statement from Maya MacGuineas comes days after rumors that GOP and Democratic leaders were nearing a $180 billion, two-year deal that would be only partially offset. Democrats rejected that offer.

INTERIOR

'UGH'-INSPIRING: An Interior Department spokeswoman tells POLITICO that the federal government "incurred no expense" by helping the secretary's wife tag along on official government trips. But the department's email archives suggest that Lola Zinke's inclusion has been both a headache and a time suck for the federal employees who have to coordinate that travel. As Ben Lefebvre explains, Secretary Ryan Zinke sent his staff scrambling to make last-minute arrangements after his wife decided to stay longer than planned on an official trip to Norway, Greenland and Alaska. "UGH! We have all kinds of planes, trains and automobiles manifests to now scramble with," Director of Scheduling and Advance Russell Roddy said in an email to other Interior colleagues.

Ongoing investigation: That email is among the spoils of a FOIA lawsuit filed by the Western Values Project, a liberal watchdog group. The trove — which was shared first with POLITICO — coincides with an inspector general investigation into the secretary's travel expenses and appearances at political events while on official trips.

DISASTER AID

INSULT TO INJURY: The ag industry isn't too pleased with the Trump administration's latest disaster aid request, both because of what it doesn't fund — and what it proposes to cut. As Jenny Hopkinson explains, the $44 billion request the White House sent to Congress on Friday does not include relief for Florida citrus growers, despite repeated requests from state and federal lawmakers to help farmers whose groves were destroyed by Hurricane Irma.

Bipartisan blasting: Florida lawmakers from both parties have been quick to deride the proposal, Sergio Bustos reports. Republican Sen. Marco Rubio said it is "unacceptable" that the plan "does not include sufficient and targeted resources for Florida's farmers." Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson said the request "doesn't come close to providing what is needed." And Republican Rep. Dennis Ross said, "Floridians have been kicked to the curb."

Offset backlash: Making farmers even angrier, the White House's plan calls for Congress to cut $3 billion in USDA funding to help pay for the aid package. Jenny notes that the administration is also going after $212 million from the Agricultural Research Service's building and facilities account, $800 million from WIC and $204 million in emergency conservation funds.

SPINELESS: As Esther Whieldon reports, the latest request does not include $12 billion Texas Gov. Greg Abbott sought for a barrier project along his state's coastal spine.

TAX

STATES FEEL THE HEAT: Democratic leaders in New York, New Jersey and California are increasingly anxious about their states' bottom lines as the GOP's tax plan inches closer to enactment. The sweeping bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), that cleared the House last week would largely cut off taxpayers' ability to deduct state and local taxes, instantly raising the financial burden to live in those places. Deductions of up to $10,000 on property taxes still would be allowed. "I'm just saying that what's happening in Washington is concerning the hell out of me," New Jersey Senate President Steve Sweeney said last week, as Laura Nahmias, Katherine Landergan and Carla Marinucci report.

Rate reckoning: These high-tax states could be forced into an awkward debate: Should they lower taxes, even if it means cutting vital services? Or should they keep taxes as they are, hoping wealthy residents choose to stay?

STAY OR GO? OMB Director Mick Mulvaney acknowledged Sunday that repealing the Obamacare mandate might ultimately hamper the GOP's tax push, so the White House won't demand its inclusion. "If it becomes an impediment to getting the best tax bill we can, then we're OK with taking it out," Mulvaney told CNN's "State of the Union." That's the scenario Sen. Susan Collins said she's hoping for, Nolan McCaskill explains.

More: No subsidy ultimatum from Murkowski | Ads focus on health care cuts | Governors fear 'chaos' without Obamacare mandate | Independent power companies cry foul at carve-out

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

TISK TISK, TILLERSON: In a recent sit-down with POLITICO's Susan Glasser, Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.) weighed in on whether Rex Tillerson is doing a good job, criticizing the secretary of State for not fighting back against Trump's budget proposal and for retaining a hiring freeze among his ranks despite OMB's decision to nix the overall moratorium on bringing in new workers. "He hasn't been the advocate for the Department of State the way he should have been," Cardin said. Check out the full transcript.

'A repudiation': Cardin also said he expects the fiscal 2018 spending plan that ultimately passes the Senate to be a "repudiation" of the Republican president's budget for the State Department, Susan notes.

HEALTH

REJIGGERING MEDICARE PREMIUMS: CMS has announced that it's keeping monthly premiums steady for most Medicare Part B recipients next year. But about a quarter of beneficiaries will pay slightly less than the $134 standard monthly premium because of "hold harmless" provisions tied to Social Security benefits. And higher earners will pay more, with a top rate of $429 per month, Paul Demko explains.

OBAMACARE

DEATH BLOW? Axing Obamacare's individual mandate may not undermine the health care law as much as previously thought. Once considered a key pillar of the system, many health care experts now say the requirement actually has a minimal effect, Jennifer Haberkorn and Paul Demko report today. That's because the penalty was never as big as Democrats wanted it to be, and many would-be customers have chosen to simply pay the fine instead of buying coverage.

IT'S BACK: There's also fresh momentum for a deal on Obamacare subsidies. Senate Republicans recently arranged a meeting to get Trump to support a bipartisan deal to shore up the already shaky insurance markets, Jen and John Bresnahan report.

Democrats weigh post-tax 'PAYGO' wrath Back

By Sarah Ferris | 11/20/2017 05:00 AM EDT

The "PAYGO" blame game has begun.

If GOP leaders succeed in enacting tax reform, they'll need the help of their disgruntled counterparts to stop the bill from triggering deep cuts to programs like Medicare and student loans. But Democrats are making no promises they'll approve the bailout, prompting both parties to assign fault for the still-hypothetical doomsday scenario.

"I think if that were the ultimate outcome, we wouldn't get blamed for it," Rep. John Yarmuth, the top Democrat on the House budget panel, told POLITICO.

Because Republicans have allowed themselves to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit through tax reform, their overhaul plan is set to cue $150 billion in mandatory spending cuts under the decades-old "pay-as-you-go" rule, as detailed in an explosive CBO report last week.

At least for now, Democrats are content watching their GOP colleagues squirm over the prospect of those painful cuts actually occurring. After all, Yarmuth argues, Republicans would clearly be at fault for inadvertently slashing at funding that pays grandma's medical bills.

"I think right now they get blamed for anything that happens," the Kentucky Democrat said, noting that GOP lawmakers are currently assuming the opposite — that Democrats would field flak for opposing any effort to waive the PAYGO rule.

Republicans say they would dare Democrats to vote "no" on staving off the spending cuts.

"They would have to stand up and say, 'Yes, I want these cuts to happen,'" said Don Stewart, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. "They won't, of course, and never have — whether it's tax cuts they support or tax cuts they don't."

Those automatic cuts would kick in every year for a decade, potentially stinging assistance programs for crop subsidies, the Census Bureau, the hospital insurance trust fund, wetlands conservation, and Customs and Border Protection.

Medicare would be chopped $25 billion per year, CBO estimates.

Even so, the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget predicts the tax plan would still run a $36 billion deficit if the automatic cuts occur. With Social Security and many low-income programs protected from PAYGO's reach, reductions to other programs aren't expected to be enough to cover lost revenue from the tax tweaks the GOP plans.

Most Republicans are dismissing the looming sequester as purely hypothetical, arguing that lawmakers would simply have to vote, as they have done in the past, to avert the blow. But because that vote would be politically linked to the GOP's tax bill, Democrats could be tempted to play hardball.

"Why would Democrats possibly vote to waive this when they want Republicans to feel the heat?" one lobbyist familiar with the PAYGO process said.

The procedural rule at the heart of the problem can be waived with 60 votes in the Senate. Lawmakers have done this repeatedly for pricey legislation in recent years, including Obama-era economic stimulus packages.

This year could play out differently, however, given the GOP's determination to jam a partisan tax bill through Congress as Democrats look on with little legislative effect on the process.

Both chambers would need to take separate votes on waiving PAYGO. And the Senate would require bipartisan support, unlike the fast-tracked tax bill that requires only 51 votes.

The gamble is a tough one for Democrats, particularly heading into the 2018 midterms.

Many in the minority party see the prospect of Medicare cuts as a political gift — one more way to rally voters against the GOP's tax bill. But House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has not yet spoken to rank-and-file members about how she plans to handle the issue, lawmakers said.

Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer won't settle on a strategy until they are sure Republicans can actually enact tax reform, several Democratic aides said.

Rep. Richard Neal (D-Mass.) said he has long opposed Congress' use of PAYGO or sequestration in any context "because you never know what the outcome's going to be."

While he's personally concerned about the cuts going into effect, Neal said he doesn't know yet what strategy Democrats will choose.

"I think we'll just have to digest all of it and then make a determination," said Neal, the House Ways and Means Committee's top Democrat.

At the same time, Democrats are reminding Republican fiscal hawks that the budget-busting tax plan and subsequent PAYGO cuts are fundamentally contrary to their cause.

In a letter this month, Sen. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) asked House Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) whether he intends to support a PAYGO waiver "in the event that Congress passes tax cuts that increase the deficit."

To complicate each party's calculations, the fight could coincide with several other end-of-year legislative battles.

GOP leaders aim to pass their tax bill by Christmas, which would require lawmakers to act swiftly on PAYGO, since the cuts would take place 15 days after Congress adjourns for the year.

If Democrats agree to vote with Republicans on waiving the rule, minority party leaders could win leverage on other key legislative efforts, including ongoing negotiations on government funding levels, reauthorizing the Children's Health Insurance Program and helping young immigrants who now stand to lose protected status.

But Republicans could also work the situation to their advantage, potentially attaching a PAYGO waiver to must-pass legislation like a government funding package, forcing Democrats to lift the rule or vote to both slash mandatory programs and shut down the government.

Civil rights groups target anti-busing rider in appropriations bills Back

By Kimberly Hefling | 11/20/2017 12:41 PM EDT

Several civil rights groups are calling on Congress to remove riders to fiscal 2018 appropriations bills that would prohibit the use of federal funds for transportation costs for school desegregation.

The "anti-busing" language has been in appropriations legislation since at least 1974, according to letters dated Friday and sent to House and Senate leaders. The letters were spearheaded by the National Coalition on School Diversity, which is a network of civil rights groups advocating for greater diversity in education.

"It is alarming that such legislative language would still be present in 2017, in an era when racial re-segregation of our public schools has surged, where a majority of members of the Supreme Court have declared school diversity to be a 'compelling government interest,' and where so many districts are working voluntarily to promote racial and economic integration for the benefit of their children and communities," the letters said.

The language would "effectively abrogate" some programs governed by the Every Student Succeeds Act, the sweeping 2015 law that states are implementing.

That includes the Magnet Schools Assistance Program, which provides grant funding for districts under a court order or a federally approved voluntary desegregation plan to support magnet schools. The groups say the language could affect the ability to use the funds for transportation, as ESSA allows.

The rider also limits the range of school improvement strategies available when it comes to using Title I funds, which go to support low-income schools, as well as grant funding under the Education Innovation and Research program that is designed to help districts address persistent problems in education, they say.

Trump: Infrastructure, 'welfare reform' coming after tax bill Back

By Lauren Gardner | 11/20/2017 01:41 PM EDT

President Donald Trump vowed today that infrastructure — plus his new priority of overhauling the nation's welfare system — would be next in line for attention from the administration once Congress finishes work on revamping the tax code.

"We'll be working on health care, infrastructure and welfare reform. We're looking very strongly at welfare reform, and that will all take place right after taxes — very soon, very shortly after taxes," Trump said before a Cabinet meeting. "So we'll be submitting plans on health care, plans on infrastructure, and plans on welfare reform — which is desperately needed in our country — soon after taxes."

The addition of "welfare reform" to Trump's list of post-tax overhaul policy priorities is recent. White House advisers have said they expect to release an expanded document of "principles" for infrastructure intended to guide lawmakers when drafting legislation once Congress completes debate on a tax bill.

White House: Cost of opioid crisis topped $500B in 2015 Back

By Dan Diamond | 11/19/2017 07:03 PM EDT

A new White House economic analysis concludes the cost of the opioid crisis was $504 billion in 2015 — an estimate that translates to nearly 3 percent of GDP and is significantly higher than previous projections.

Previous estimates of the annual cost of the opioid crisis — which ranged from $11.5 billion to $79.9 billion in 2015 dollars — "greatly understate" the public health problem, according to the Council of Economic Advisers.

"[T]he crisis has worsened, especially in terms of overdose deaths which have doubled in the past ten years," the CEA report concludes.

CEA says its model incorporates recent research "finding significant underreporting of opioid-involved overdose deaths." It also accounts for the effects of illegal opioids like heroin, which previous studies didn't include, and "fully" accounts for the value of lives lost because of the crisis in ways that previous reports did not. For instance, the White House says it diverged from previous estimates by quantifying the "value of a statistical life" rather than just projecting the lost earnings from a premature death.

The White House also says it will offer follow-up analysis of recent actions intended to help solve the crisis, such as evaluating how interventions to raise the cost of legally supplying opioids may have negative, unintended consequences. "This is the first but not the last publication CEA plans to issue on the opioid crisis," the report reads.

'UGH!': Zinke's wife's travel caused some headaches for Interior staff Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/20/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife caused some frustration for Interior staffers when traveling with him on official business, according to new records that a liberal watchdog group says uncover the potential misuse of government resources.

The records document Lola Zinke's last-minute requests to join high-level dinners and additions to the guest list for a conservative group's event near their home in Southern California earlier this year. The Western Values Project filed a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit last month to force Interior to release more than 100 pages of documents related to Lola Zinke's trips with her husband and interactions with Interior staff. Shared first with POLITICO, the documents shed new light on the outsize profile Lola Zinke has established compared with the typical Cabinet secretary's spouse, including her dictating people to invite to a town hall hosted by the conservative Young America's Foundation for her husband.

New emails also reveal a celebratory dinner the Zinkes attended that was organized in part by a major GOP donor who gave heavily to Ryan Zinke's congressional campaigns. And they show Interior staffers had to accommodate a last-minute request for her to join the secretary at an official dinner with Alaska's governor. The records cover two trips Lola Zinke joined in the first three months of her husband's tenure as well as some other interactions with Interior staff, such as coordinating her attendance at a White House briefing for Cabinet members' spouses.

While the department says Lola Zinke paid her own way, the records show Interior used staff time to coordinate some of her activities while traveling with her husband. And the trips gave her access to high-level politicians and GOP activists and donors who could benefit her as a political operator in her own right.

"These emails show that the leadership at the Department of Interior treats basic ethical standards like an inconvenience," Western Values Project Executive Director Chris Saeger said. "If Secretary Zinke is willing to be so sloppy with something as elementary as this, then god only knows how they're handling big decisions about energy and public lands behind closed doors."

Interior says Lola Zinke pays her own way when she accompanies her husband and that travel is cleared by ethics officials in advance.

"DOI incurred no expenses due to Mrs. Zinke's presence" with the secretary, Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Friday.

Interior's inspector general and the independent Office of Special Counsel are investigating the former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL's travel expenses and appearance at political events while on official trips, including those where he was accompanied by his wife. Last week, the IG's office said it could not conduct a thorough investigation because Interior had kept inadequate records. Among other problems, the watchdog said it had "not been able to determine the full extent to which Lolita Zinke, the Secretary's wife, accompanied the Secretary on official travel." Interior officials blamed the shortcomings on inadequate procedures left in place by the Obama administration.

The new records show the secretary's wife helped decide the guest list for a Young America's Foundation town hall forum with Ryan Zinke on April 17 at its Reagan Ranch in Santa Barbara, Calif., part of a weeklong official trip in the state. Lola Zinke joined her husband for national parks tours and meetings with government officials throughout the week, as well as for a private tour of the Reagan Ranch galleries led by Andrew Coffin, YAF's vice president.

Lola Zinke sent a "list of people I have invited to the event" to two Interior staffers, according to a series of April 7 emails. Caroline Boulton, a special assistant to the secretary, forwarded the list on to an official at YAF, with a warning that more could be added. Interior redacted the names of Zinke's guests before releasing the email.

"She's expecting some of them to bring plus ones and also her list is not yet final," Boulton wrote. "She's said that she doesn't have emails for them all since many of them have been personally told about the event, but I wanted you to have the list!"

YAF is a key pillar of the conservative movement with alumni ranging from White House officials to prominent journalists. The group's donors have reportedly included the Koch brothers, among others.

Lola Zinke is active in conservative politics. The Santa Barbara native was a member of President Donald Trump's Hispanic outreach team during the 2016 campaign, and in September she became chairwoman for the Senate campaign of Troy Downing, a Montana businessman hoping to unseat Sen. Jon Tester next year.

Lola had previously faced criticism for accompanying her husband on the California trip. She posted a photograph on Twitter from Gov. Jerry Brown's office and accompanied her husband to meetings with DOI regional staff in Sacramento and trips to Fresno and the national parks at Yosemite, Sequoia and Kings Canyon, the trip manifests show.

The trip also included five days in Santa Barbara and then four days in Zinke's hometown in Whitefish, Mont., an upscale part of the state where the couple owns a home and other real estate.

The secretary bringing his wife along on official trips isn't illegal as long as the government doesn't pay for her expenses. But it can be an ethically gray area, depending on the circumstances, said Craig Holman, government affairs lobbyist with good-governance watchdog Public Citizen.

"Spousal travel, especially when paid for by the spouse, suggests that the trip may have less to do with official duties and more resembles a family vacation partially paid for by taxpayers," Holman said.

When Lola Zinke joined an official trip to Norway, Greenland and Alaska, she appears to have caused some headaches by deciding to stay longer than expected. Ryan Zinke sent his staff scrambling to make last-minute arrangements so she could accompany him to dinner with the governor of Alaska and other dignitaries in Anchorage, according to new emails.

Interior staffers apparently found out about the change in plans second-hand from an aide to Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who also was on the trip, along with other senators and their spouses, according to a May 27 email from Director of Scheduling and Advance Russell Roddy to other colleagues at Interior — one day before Lola Zinke had been scheduled to return to Washington.

"I have heard that Mrs. Zinke was now maybe not going to fly out from Fairbanks Sunday morning ... so, I asked Annie if she happened to talk to Mrs. Zinke about her plans. She said Mrs. Zinke said she was now going to head to Byers Lake and Anchorage with RKZ and fly out of Anchorage on Tuesday," Roddy wrote. "UGH! We have all kinds of planes, trains and automobiles manifests to now scramble with."

It is unclear what led to the change in plans. Before the trip, Lola Zinke had apparently been trying to secure a seat on a military plane back to Washington, but the Senate staffer coordinating the trip told Interior that it would be a "safer bet" for her to fly commercial because Ryan Zinke would not be with her. The military typically does not like when members of Congress try to get their spouses on military planes without the member being present, according to an email from Boulton relaying guidance she had received. "There's a lot of ifs in that, so let me know if you want me to keep pushing on the" military return flight, Boulton wrote to Lola Zinke on May 18.

Lola Zinke joined her husband at a May 29 dinner in Anchorage with Alaska Gov. Bill Walker and other state officials.

"The Secretary personally paid the State of Alaska for Mrs. Zinke's meal," Swift said. Lola Zinke flew home on a commercial flight from Anchorage the following day.

Lola Zinke also accompanied her husband to an April 10 dinner in Washington that was organized with the help of one of his past campaign donors, Burt Sugarman, who has donated heavily to Republicans.

"We are very excited that Sec Zinke accepted the event," wrote Phil Anderson, president of lobbying firm Navigators Global who helped organize the April 10 dinner sponsored by the National Geographic Society, in a March 24 email to Boulton. "As you know, Burt Sugarman first discussed the dinner with Sec Zinke."

Sugarman and his wife, the former Entertainment Tonight anchor Mary Hart, are members of the National Geographic Society's board of directors.

The Sugarmans gave a combined $10,800 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign, out of more than $180,000 they gave to GOP candidates and committees in the last election cycle, according to FEC documents.

On April 27, Lola Zinke was invited to an ethics briefing at the White House for Cabinet spouses. "They stressed the importance of attending since important ethics rules will [be] discussed and questions can be answered by White House counsel," Boulton wrote in an email to Lola Zinke.

"Thank you!" she replied. "It's a good thing I'll be in town then."

Florida citrus left out of disaster package, again Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 11/17/2017 05:14 PM EDT

The $44 billion disaster relief package unveiled by the White House today does not include relief for Florida citrus growers, despite repeated calls from state and federal lawmakers to help farmers whose groves were destroyed by Hurricane Irma.

"Floridians have been kicked to the curb in this proposed disaster supplemental, which lacks relief for Florida's citrus growers who suffered immensely from this storm," said Rep. Dennis Ross in a statement this afternoon criticizing the White House's decision. "The Florida delegation specifically requested this relief because there isn't a citrus grove that wasn't affected, with some experiencing 100 percent losses — worse than anything the industry has experienced in over 20 years."

Florida's signature crop is heavily concentrated in the southwest corner of the state and was pummeled when Irma, a category 5 storm, hit the mainland. The Florida Department of Agriculture has estimated the sector saw $760 million in losses, and USDA is expecting the 2017-2018 harvest to be 27 percent smaller than the year before.

Ross said he would not support the package, and urged other members of the Florida delegation to do the same.

"I believe we have a duty to fight to ensure our citrus growers get the relief they need," the Florida Republican said.

POLITICO Florida: Rubio, Nelson pan White House disaster relief plan Back

By Sergio Bustos | 11/20/2017 10:10 AM EDT

MIAMI — Sens. Marco Rubio and Bill Nelson blasted the Trump administration's proposed $44 billion disaster relief package, saying it fails to include enough money to help Florida's farmers recover from Hurricane Irma.

"It is unacceptable that this proposed disaster supplemental does not include sufficient and targeted resources for Florida's farmers, particularly the citrus growers who were virtually wiped out by the storm," said Rubio, a Republican, in a statement after the White House announced its aid recovery plan in the wake of this summer's deadly trio of hurricanes.

"Florida citrus is a key part of the state's heritage and many Americans' daily lives," Rubio said. "I will continue to do everything in my power to ensure our state's growers get the relief they need to survive the devastation caused by Hurricane Irma."

Florida officials estimate that more than \$2.5 billion in damage was caused by Hurricane Irma, which slammed into Florida on Sept. 10 and engulfed the entire state. Of that amount, citrus — Florida's signature crop — was the hardest hit, with losses estimated to be upwards of $760 million. The USDA is expecting the 2017-2018 harvest to be 27 percent smaller than the year before.

The latest administration request for storm relief includes $1 billion for nationwide emergency agricultural assistance.

Nelson, a Democrat, said that "this request by the administration doesn't come close to providing what is needed. People are hurting and they desperately need our help, yet this request has no money to provide housing for evacuees and barely any money for Florida's citrus growers. That's unacceptable. Congress needs to pass a more robust disaster bill that actually provides the funding needed to help people recover."

Joining Rubio and Nelson in bashing the administration's proposal was Rep. Dennis Ross, R-Fla.

"Floridians have been kicked to the curb in this proposed disaster supplemental, which lacks relief for Florida's citrus growers who suffered immensely from this storm," said Ross in a statement Friday afternoon. "The Florida delegation specifically requested this relief because there isn't a citrus grove that wasn't affected, with some experiencing 100 percent losses — worse than anything the industry has experienced in over 20 years."

Ross said he would not support the package, and urged other members of the Florida delegation to do the same.

"I believe we have a duty to fight to ensure our citrus growers get the relief they need," the Florida Republican said.

Last month, Congress approved a $36.5 billion hurricane relief package that did not include money for Florida's agriculture businesses. The promise from Trump administration officials, along with House and Senate leaders, was that the money would be made available in the next disaster relief package.

Unlike its previous two aid requests, the White House asked lawmakers on Friday to partially offset any future funding packages, including the new $44 billion request. The administration wants Congress to cut as much as $59.23 billion from domestic programs to help pay for its growing tab of disaster assistance.

If the $44 billion funding package is approved, Congress will have kicked in nearly $100 billion in extra money this year to help storm-ravaged communities in places like Texas, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Florida.

The request calls for $25.2 billion for disaster programs run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Small Business Administration, as well as $4.6 billion to rehab damaged federal facilities and other agency recovery efforts. About $1.2 billion would be used for an education recovery fund and $12 billion would be spent on a new flood mitigation program run by the Community Development Block Grant.

John Bresnahan, Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris contributed to this report.

White House targets USDA funding in push for disaster-relief offsets Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 11/17/2017 03:49 PM EDT

The White House wants Congress to target $3 billion in USDA funding as part of its push for more than $59 billion in cuts to domestic spending to help defray the costs of recent disaster relief efforts.

The administration released a list of proposed offsets today that included $1.4 billion in unobligated balances for mandatory conservation programs, which includes money set aside for future agreements under the Regional Conservation Partnership Program.

The White House is also going after $212 million from the Agricultural Research Service's building and facilities account and $800 million from the Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants and Children, which the administration sees as ripe for the taking because it stems from lower than expected enrollment. The administration also points to $204 million in emergency conservation funds, which it says are no longer needed.

The White House's plan also targets prior-year leftover funding in Rural Economic Development Grants and for the Rural Business Program, the Rural Electrification and Telecommunications Program, the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service and Watershed and Flood Prevention Operations.

The administration today sent Congress its third emergency funding request to aid recovery from hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico and wildfires in the West. It is seeking $44 billion this time around.

In its two prior aid requests, the White House did not ask for spending offsets, though OMB Director Mick Mulvaney and conservatives previously said they would seek such cuts.

"The administration believes it is prudent to offset new spending," Mulvaney wrote in a letter today that proposed the offsets.

Democrats and several GOP appropriators have said the plan is a non-starter, POLITICO reported earlier today, noting that the request could upend a host of other funding negotiations on Capitol Hill next month.

Texas coastal spine left out of Trump disaster recovery request Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/17/2017 05:39 PM EDT

The White House's latest request for congressional disaster recovery funding does not include a $12 billion Houston area coastal barrier project sought by Texas Gov. Greg Abbott, handing a win to green groups that want the federal government to finish an environmental review on the project before it moves forward.

The White House on Friday asked lawmakers to approve $44 billion in additional funding to aid storm-ravaged areas in Texas, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Florida, including $12 billion for a flood mitigation program run by the Community Development Block Grant.

But the coastal barrier project that was part of Abbott's $61 billion storm recovery funding request in late October would not qualify for that program under the rules set by the White House because it would not address the damage caused by Hurricane Harvey in August. Instead the state's so-called coastal spine project aims to protect communities and infrastructure from the kind of storm surges last seen during Hurricane Ike in 2008 that caused about $30 billion in damages.

One of a few possible designs for the proposed coastal spine would extend a 10-mile seawall at Galveston Bay by another 50 miles and include massive floodgates that could be closed ahead of a storm to block the surges of water from pummeling the coastline.

Environmental advocates say they are not opposed to the project that's designed to protect coastal communities, critical marine and avian habitat, the Port of Houston, the Houston Ship Channel and oil refining and processing plants that are all vital to the state's economy and could create an environmental disaster if damaged.

But they say its not yet clear how a new barrier would affect the flow of water, and whether it could hurt marine and other ecosystems.

"We don't know what that would do to the ecology of the bay or to the shoreline there," said Amanda Fuller, National Wildlife Federation deputy director of Gulf of Mexico Restoration. "It's just a bunch of unknowns at this point."

The Army Corps of Engineers is performing a five-year study it expects to complete in 2021 on design options for the coastal spine that would avoid harming the marine and avian ecosystem of the Galveston Bay area that serves as a nursery for marine creatures before they mature and move into the Gulf of Mexico.

Bob Stokes, president of the Galveston Bay Foundation, which focuses on wetland preservation and restoration, said the project could be funded in the future through federal appropriations and he continues to "firmly believe that [the study] process is necessary before we fund the coastal spine."

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas — who has placed a hold on President Donald Trump's nomination of Russell Vought to be deputy director of OMB until the Texas funding comes though — has called the president's latest recovery request "wholly inadequate."

Abbott's office did not respond to requests for comment.

In Democrat-led state capitals, GOP tax reform push could scramble fiscal plans Back

By Laura Nahmias, Katherine Landergan and Carla Marinucci | 11/19/2017 06:47 AM EDT

The Republican tax reform push in Washington is setting off budgetary alarm bells in high-tax states like New York, California and New Jersey, in the latest political skirmish to pit national Republicans against Democratic state and big-city leaders.

With Republicans intent on shrinking or repealing the state and local tax deduction, California officials are worried that the House-passed tax bill, and the emerging Senate measure, would force local governments to reduce taxes and make big cuts to schools and social services. In New York, where New York City and state revenues are heavily reliant on just a handful of wealthy tax filers, budget watchdogs fear federal tax changes could trigger the flight of those residents. And in New Jersey, plans for a new millionaire's tax, one of incoming Gov. Phil Murphy's biggest campaign promises, are already being reined in as the Democratic-led New Jersey Senate waits on the outcome of any federal tax plan.

"We're going to have to re-evaluate everything" if a federal bill repealing the state and local tax deduction becomes law, New Jersey Senate President Steve Sweeney said Wednesday in Atlantic City. Just days before, Sweeney had said he would make passage of a millionaires tax his chief priority in the new administration. "I'm just saying that what's happening in Washington is concerning the hell out of me," he added.

Some national Republicans are reveling in the discomfort their plans are causing in Democratic-led states — and say that those governors and state assemblies should just lower their states' taxes.

After New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo said last week that GOP plans could lead wealthy New Yorkers to leave the state, Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney responded: "Whose fault is that? ... Is it the federal government's fault that New York taxes are so high that they're driving people out of the state?" Mulvaney said. "I don't think it's up to the federal government to save New York from its bad decisions."

In Illinois, another high-tax state, Republican Gov. Bruce Rauner has been relatively quiet on the possible repeal of the state and local deduction, despite pressure from the state's Democratic senators.

Concerns were heightened this past week after the House approved a sweeping $1.5 trillion tax plan that would all but eliminate the deductibility of state and local income taxes. For leaders in high-tax states, that would mean a rising federal tax burden on many of their highest-earning residents. The tax bill emerging from the Senate would go even further. And while plenty of roadblocks remain, congressional Republican leaders want to secure the long-sought legislative win before the end of the year.

In solidly blue California, Democratic legislators were livid about the impact of the emerging Republican tax bills. Southern California Rep. Ted Lieu fumed that "California will be the biggest loser" from the House bill, since "under this plan, Californians will shoulder the largest net tax increase, at $12.1 billion in 2027."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein charged that "Californians will be hit especially hard by the elimination of the state and local tax deduction, or what we call SALT. The 6 million California households that claim the deduction could either see their tax bill go up or see cuts to vital services like schools and roads."

The outrage is backed by data: California residents, by far, are the nation's biggest beneficiaries of the SALT deductions. In 2014 alone, the SALT deductions slashed Californians' taxable income by a total of $101 billion — more than twice that of second-place New York, according to the nonpartisan Tax Foundation.

The repeal of SALT could force an uncomfortable tax discussion for high-tax states: Should they consider lowering tax rates, to alleviate the additional tax burden that the elimination of the deductions creates? Or keep taxes as they are — and run the risk of losing wealthy residents who might move elsewhere to soften their tax burden? And for politicians who've called for the politically popular idea of raising taxes on the wealthy, would the SALT repeal force them to backtrack?

Forcing the debate

Officials in California now predict that the GOP tax bill could transfer tax dollars paid by millions of Californians to other states — making it tougher for both the state government and local entities to find the revenue for needed services in the future. That's especially worrisome for California at a time when the Trump administration and the Republican Congress have already proposed to slash spending on other programs, cuts that would further stress the state's finances.

By approving a plan to take those deductions away from California taxpayers, "it's going to make it harder for state and local government over time. In the end, people's appetites for paying taxes aren't endless — and if you raise their taxes by taking away their deductions, their willingness to be taxed again to fund cut services is going to be harder," said Chris Hoene, executive director of the nonpartisan California Budget and Policy Center, which last week issued an analysis of SALT impacts on state finances.

The impact could be particularly large on education, Hoene said. "Certainly, it will have a significant impact on funding education in the future, because the taxes people are paying that are already supporting education will go up," which means "it's going to make it harder to make a case to pay more for education in the future."

In New York, some city and state officials are privately saying that an elimination of SALT deductions might not lead to new state-level tax cuts but would almost certainly make any plan to raise taxes on wealthier New Yorkers more difficult. State leaders voted last year on a two-year extension of an already-existing "millionaire's tax," and New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio has called for another one to help pay for repairs to the city's crumbling mass-transit system.

"I think it could increase pressure [to lower taxes], but what it certainly will do, I think, is make it a tougher challenge if the city or the state wanted to raise their taxes," said George Sweeting, deputy director of the city's nonpartisan Independent Budget Office.

The House and Senate tax bills would hit high-income New Yorkers in different ways, Sweeting said.

"There are certainly some New Yorkers who will do well, even with state and local deductibility reduced," Sweeting said. "Even within the very high income group, there would be winners and losers. The winners tend to be people involved with private equity, real estate development. The people who earn most of their income from salaries and wages — someone who's paid a million dollars or more for actually being the CEO of a firm that's getting a very high wage income, they may not lose, but they definitely don't do as well as those who rely more on investment income."

Leaders in the New York State Legislature, who have repeatedly reauthorized extensions of the millionaire's tax but have never been too keen on the idea of de Blasio's millionaire's tax for subway repairs, remained unenthusiastic about the idea on Thursday.

"We'll see what the Senate does," said Michael Whyland, a spokesman for Democratic Assembly Speaker Carl Heastie, when asked whether the federal tax plan's passage would magnify concerns he's already expressed about de Blasio's millionaire's tax idea — or halt plans to raise new taxes altogether.

"This is horrible policy for all New Yorkers. As the speaker has noted, there will be devastating ripple effects throughout the state that will negatively impact all taxpayers," Whyland said.

De Blasio's proposed millionaire's tax for the subway, which would impact about 32,000 New York City residents, would increase the city's highest income tax rate by about half a percentage point, to 4.4 percent from about 3.9 percent, for married couples whose incomes are above $1 million and for individuals who make more than $500,000.

A spokeswoman for the mayor's office wouldn't say whether the mayor would rethink his call for the tax hike but also argued that the federal government's plan is tantamount to "double taxation."

"The federal government is now threatening double taxation and asking for even more at the risk of reducing the local services that people have come to rely on. Our tax dollars should stay in NYC, where they actually work for those paying them," said de Blasio spokeswoman Freddi Goldstein.

Flight risks

In private, some city budget watchdogs said they worry that the elimination of SALT, especially when combined with potential federal budget cuts to social services programs, could increase pressure on the city government to make up the difference with the city's own funds. It could also shrink the growth of the city's tax base, drawing fewer high-earners over time, several officials, speaking on background, told POLITICO.

Cuomo, a Democrat who is up for reelection in 2018 and is positioning himself for a possible 2020 presidential bid, said earlier this month that eliminating deductions for state income taxes, as the new federal plan would do, would cause wealthy New Yorkers to flee the state.

In response, the state and local governments would be forced to raise taxes on the New Yorkers who remain, Cuomo said.

"Even if your federal taxes were to go down ... your state tax and property tax will have to go up, because it will hurt the state," Cuomo told reporters on Nov. 6, on a joint conference call with Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer. "It will hurt our overall revenues, which are already in trouble. It will make this state less competitive for businesses."

Fiscal watchdogs say the departure of even a relatively small number of high-income New Yorkers could have a massive impact on the state's tax revenue.

For instance, New Yorkers who make more than $100,000 a year pay 83 percent of personal income tax revenues for the state, while people who earn more than $1 million make up more than 40 percent of personal income tax revenue. And while New York City residents who earn more than $1 million a year make up less than 1 percent of all city taxpayers, those residents together bring in more than $4.2 billion in income tax revenue, or 43.6 percent of all the income tax revenue the city receives.

E.J. McMahon, research director at the nonpartisan Empire Center for Public Policy, said the increase in New Yorkers' effective tax rate could be the straw that breaks the camel's back for a slice of wealthy people weighing whether to spend their golden years in New York or elsewhere.

In 2015, roughly 2,500 people in the state had adjusted gross income of more than $10 million, he said. If just one-tenth of them, or 250 people, decided to leave, it would cost the state $700 million.

"These people pay such a huge proportion of the state's taxes that you don't need an exodus, you just need a few hundred more people to decide that they're gonna go to Jackson Hole, Charleston, Boca Raton, to make a huge difference," he said. "You've given them all the reason in the world to think harder about that."

Mulvaney: White House 'OK' pulling individual mandate repeal from tax bill Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 11/19/2017 11:30 AM EDT

White House budget director Mick Mulvaney said Sunday that the administration wants to repeal part of Obamacare in Congress' tax bill but is "OK with taking it out" if "it becomes an impediment."

President Donald Trump has called for Congress to include a repeal of the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate in its tax bill. The Congressional Budget Office has projected that doing so would save the government $338 billion over a decade but result in 13 million more Americans being uninsured by 2027.

"I don't think anybody doubts where the White House is on repealing and replacing Obamacare. We absolutely want to do it," Mulvaney told host Jake Tapper on CNN's "State of the Union."

"If we can repeal part of Obamacare as part of a tax bill, and have a tax bill that is still a good tax bill that can pass, that's great," Mulvaney continued. "If it becomes an impediment to getting the best tax bill we can, then we're OK with taking it out. So, I think it's up to the Senate and the House to sort of hammer out those details."

The House bill cleared the chamber last week, but Republican leaders did not add a provision to repeal the individual mandate. That provision, however, is currently in the Senate version.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) told ABC's "This Week" on Sunday that she wants "to see changes in the" Senate bill. "The biggest mistake," she said, "was putting in a provision from the Affordable Care Act into the Senate bill that is not in the House bill. And I hope that will be dropped."

Asked whether the individual mandate repeal currently in the bill is an impediment to passage, Mulvaney said he didn't think so.

"If they do get rid of this penalty, the folks who benefit from that are predominantly folks who make less than $50,000 or $100,000 a year," he said. "There's actually a benefit if the repeal goes away, but it's up to the House and Senate to hammer through those details."

Tapper cited a nonpartisan analysis that said the Senate GOP tax plan would effectively raise taxes, an argument Mulvaney rejected.

"The bottom line is that the White House, the president, is not going to sign a bill that raises taxes on the middle class, period," he said.

Asked how Trump, who broke precedent by refusing to release his tax returns, may benefit from the GOP tax plan, Mulvaney told NBC's "Meet the Press," "I can't speak to the president's taxes."

"I think that was sort of litigated by the American public during the election," he said. "I will say this: Listen, the president's going to pay much higher taxes on a lot of his properties, excuse me, because he has properties in high-tax states."

Collins: Senate tax bill 'needs work' Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 11/19/2017 11:05 AM EDT

The Senate's legislation to cut taxes "needs work," Sen. Susan Collins said Sunday, hinting that she may not support the bill without significant changes.

"I want to see changes in that bill. And I think there will be changes," Collins (R-Maine) told host George Stephanopoulos on ABC's "This Week." "There are some provisions of the House bill that I like better."

Collins highlighted that the top rate of 39.6 percent for people who make at least $1 million would stay the same in the House bill that cleared the chamber last week.

"That's a change that I would like to see be made in the Senate bill so that we can skew more of the relief to middle-income taxpayers," she said. "There are provisions of both bills that I like. But I think the bill needs work."

Asked whether she would support the bill in its current form, Collins said she hasn't "reached that conclusion yet because I think there are going to be further changes."

"But the biggest mistake was putting in a provision from the Affordable Care Act into the Senate bill that is not in the House bill. And I hope that will be dropped, or that bills that have been introduced by Sens. [Lamar] Alexander and [Patty] Murray and Bill Nelson and myself will be adopted to mitigate the impact of those provisions."

President Donald Trump called on Congress last week to include a repeal of Obamacare's individual mandate in a tax bill, in addition to slashing the top tax rate to 35 percent. Collins cited the individual mandate repeal as "a problem" that needs to be mitigated.

"I'm worried about the impact on premiums," she added. "And that's why we're going to need to pass legislation. And I would like to see that done before we go to the tax bill."

Collins also lamented a provision in the Senate bill that makes corporate tax cuts permanent but individual cuts temporary.

"Again, that's not a provision that I like," she said. "The House made both of them permanent. I think that is a far better way to go."

Murkowski says Obamacare cost-sharing not a precondition for tax bill vote Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn | 11/17/2017 06:00 PM EDT

Sen. Lisa Murkowski said late today that passage of a bipartisan deal to fund Obamacare's cost-sharing program is not a precondition to her support for the GOP's tax reform package.

"I have consistently said that passing Alexander-Murray is important to stabilizing the individual market and it may be particularly so if the individual mandate is repealed as included in the draft reported by the Senate Finance Committee last night," Murkowski, a key vote on tax reform, said in a statement to POLITICO, referring to the deal struck by Sens. Lamar Alexander and Patty Murray. "However, one should not assume this is a precondition for my support for the tax bill."

The Alaska Republican said she was planning to review the Finance Committee tax reform bill over the Thanksgiving holiday and will review "the entire package before coming to any conclusion on the legislation."

Roll Call reported this morning that Murkowski had suggested the cost-sharing reduction payment bill was a condition of her support for tax reform.

Priorities polling urges Democrats to focus on health cuts in tax bill Back

By Kevin Robillard | 11/17/2017 03:17 PM EDT

One of Democrats' leading super PACs is urging the party to focus attacks about the GOP tax reform plan on its cuts to health care programs.

In a new memo based on polling from Garin-Hart-Yang Research Group and Global Strategy

Group, Priorities USA argues Democrats can make the case Republicans are more focused on appealing donors than helping regular people. The three most potent lines of attack for Democrats: noting the proposal would force cuts to Medicare and Medicaid, eliminate medical expense deductions and create new incentives for companies to ship jobs overseas. All three lines of attacks make at least 73 percent of likely presidential-year voters feel less favorably about the plan, and at least 60 percent of voters much less favorable.

Those attacks have an impact on the generic ballot: Before hearing about the plan, Democrats have a 45 percent to 34 percent advantage on the generic congressional ballot. After hearing about the plan, that advantage moves to 50 percent to 33 percent. Only 18 percent of voters think the congressional GOP is "looking out for the interests of regular people," while 62 percent "think they are mainly looking out for the interests of wealthy people and big corporations."

"Republicans have already done significant damage to their standing on the economy through their attacks on the Affordable Care Act and this tax plan will build on that damage," the memo reads. "It gives Democratic candidates a highly effective economic message heading into the midterm elections at a time when the President is historically unpopular, the generic ballot shows a huge disadvantage for Republicans, and Democrats enjoy a sizeable enthusiasm advantage."

The damage also spreads to President Donald Trump, who has enthusiastically backed the tax reform plans. The percentage of voters who think Trump's economic policies would help people like them is down to 29 percent. Asked whether Trump "primarily looks out for regular people or the wealthy and corporations, 59 percent of voters feel he looks out for the wealthy, up from 49 percent in March," the pollsters write. Just a quarter of voters think Trump is looking out mainly for regular people.

The cuts to Medicaid and Medicare, in particular, aren't central to the tax reform debate on Capitol Hill, but the memo argues they could be potent in election-season television ads.

The most effective message with swing voters, according to the memo, is to argue congressional GOP plans give "millions of dollars in tax breaks to wealthy Washington politicians like themselves and their special interest donors, while millions of middle class families will see their taxes go up." This raises major doubts about the plan with 70 percent of swing voters.

Global Strategy Group and Garin-Hart-Yang Research Group conducted the survey of 1,003 presidential-year voters from Nov. 9 to 14. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Independent power sector worried by tax carve-out for regulated utilities Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/17/2017 05:23 PM EDT

A tax carve-out for regulated power utilities included in both the House and Senate tax bills doesn't apply to merchant power companies, which fear the provision could put them at a competitive disadvantage.

Both the Senate bill that advanced out of committee and the bill passed by the House Thursday would cap interest deductions for businesses at 30 percent of their adjusted income. That would serve to offset "bonus depreciation" that the two bills include that allow businesses to deduct the full cost of capital investments from their taxes.

But regulated utilities convinced congressional tax writers to insert an exemption in the bills for them — but didn't provide the same exemption for the merchant power companies or subsidiaries of regulated companies that sell power into the competitive wholesale markets.

"Since we compete with [regulated utilities], the tax provisions likely raise competitive issues which we will need to raise on the Hill," John Schelk, CEO of the Electric Power Supply Association, a trade association which represents the owners of merchant plants. "Needless to say, our argument will be we should get equal treatment."

Winning the exception to the interest deduction has been a high priority for all power providers, since building power plants requires huge capital expenditures, and the debt required to finance them extends for decades. Regulated utilities' expenses are covered by payments from ratepayers, and they prefer using straight-line depreciation that stretches over years for their assets rather than the bonus depreciation. That bonus depreciation can threaten their rate base, since state regulators often view the quicker depreciation as a tax benefit that must be returned to ratepayers.

But independent power producers, which include market-only power plant owners as well as divisions of companies like Dynegy, NRG Energy and FirstEnergy that run competitive power plants don't get that benefit — and they want it. Companies that own merchant power plants tend to have a lot of debt from past investments, but they aren't building many new plants.

"For them, expensing the capital is not a big deal right now, so it doesn't help them," said Toby Shea, an analyst with Moody's. "But the interest expense, which they have a lot of, would help them a lot."

And while regulated utilities and unregulated utilities do not generally compete inside markets like PJM or Texas, there are exceptions. For example, Schelk points out that power plants run by regulated utilities in South Carolina and North Carolina that sometimes sell power into PJM's market would be able to offer lower prices thanks to their exemption.

"Good example is right here in Virginia," Schelk said. "Virginia is in the PJM regional market, but Dominion has rate-based generation while there are also merchant generation IPP plants in [the state]. They compete to be dispatched in PJM and also compete for procurement of new projects."

Other analysts were skeptical that the bill as written would create a big problem for independent power providers. Christi Tezak, managing director for ClearView Energy Partners, said that if competitive arms of holding companies are treated the same as independent power producers, then it's hard to see how either has an advantage in markets.

But, utilities could win a change to the bill in conference or on the Senate floor that would expand the carve out to their competitive divisions.

"If [utility holding companies] get it and IPPs don't then there would be a competitive issue vis-à-vis the two different owners.," she said.

Ben Cardin: The Full Transcript Back

By Susan B. Glasser | 11/20/2017 05:11 AM EDT

Subscribe to The Global POLITICO on Apple Podcasts here. / Subscribe via Stitcher here.

Glasser: This is Susan Glasser, and welcome back this week to The Global POLITICO. I'm delighted to have as our guest Senator Ben Cardin of Maryland. He's the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, which means he's right in the middle of everything that we want to talk about at The Global POLITICO.

Senator Cardin, so I guess the inescapable subject in many ways, of course, is Russia these days, when it comes to foreign policy, and especially the Trump administration. First of all, what is going on with these sanctions? Congress passed them overwhelmingly, over the opposition of President Trump. Is there a genuine delay, do you believe, on the part of the administration in implementing them?

Cardin: Well, it's a little bit early to tell whether they're on track to impose them in a timely way. The first mandatory sanctions are supposed to be applied in January, but there is a process you have to go through. And the administration's been late in meeting the deadlines on that process. So, we're watching very carefully to make sure they, in fact, impose the mandatory sanctions on the due dates, but we do know there is a reluctance on the behalf of the Trump administration.

Just recently, President Trump said that he believes that Mr. Putin, when he said he didn't know about interfering in our elections—or he thought he was sincere. Quite frankly, Russia intentionally interfered in our election, and Mr. Putin was behind that. And these sanctions need to be imposed.

Glasser: It is a concern of ours that Mr. Trump continues to believe Mr. Putin when he says that he did not interfere in our elections, when, in fact, we know Mr. Putin did. So, we are concerned as to whether President Trump will enforce the sanctions as passed by Congress, and we'll be watching that very carefully.

Glasser: You know, somebody joked to me that Donald Trump has succeeded in doing what many presidents before him has not, which is creating a bipartisan foreign policy, at least on Russia sanctions, as a result of what he said publicly about Putin. Do you think that Republicans will continue to stick together with Democrats on the issue of holding Russia accountable, or do you see the politics changing?

Cardin: Well, the numbers were overwhelmingly in support of taking a tough stand against Russia. If Russia's conduct continues—that is, if it continues to interfere in Ukraine, if it continues to be counter to what is right in Syria, if they continue to interfere in elections in Europe and the United States—I think Congress will remain united in demanding that action be taken against Russia.

Glasser: How serious do you believe the initial charges are from the Mueller investigation, and to what extent do they, do you think this portends an even worse relationship with Russia?

Cardin: So, what we do know—this is what we do know. We do know from our intelligence community that Russia had a design to discredit the U.S. elections, and took sides in favor of Mr. Trump over Hillary Clinton. We do now that they engaged individuals and entities to do cyber-attacks to get as much information as they possibly could, and of course, also used WikiLeaks to accumulate information, and released it in a strategic way that could affect our election, and certainly the credibility of our election.

That's what we do know. We also know that there were contacts made between representatives of the Trump campaign and Russia. We know of several contacts that were made, and we also know contacts that were made by WikiLeaks to Donald Trump, Jr., and shortly thereafter, the candidate Donald Trump tweeted out information about WikiLeaks, which was known to be an entity against U.S. national security interests.

So, there are a lot of dots, and they're starting to be connected, that show that Russia intentionally engaged Americans, and American's cooperated, and we'll see exactly where that leads.

Glasser: Well, what it does suggest is that there's not going to be any reset with Russia any time soon. I spoke with an administration person recently who said things really might not have even hit bottom yet. Is that your assessment, as well?

Cardin: The relationship with Russia is an important relationship. We know that they interfered in our elections. We know that they've done things that are very much against our interests. They've done things that require us to take punitive action against Russia. That does not mean we can't work with Russia where we have a common agenda. Russia is a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council; we certainly need their help in isolating North Korea and their nuclear weapons violations.

So, we still need to work with Russia. But clearly, Russia's done things that are contrary to our national security interest, and the United States must respond to those types of activities.

Glasser: So, tell us a little bit—this is really a chance on The Global POLITICO to reflect on what it's like in the room in making foreign policy. What is it like these days on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee? You have this extraordinary situation, obviously, with the Republican chairman in open conflict with the President. He has said that other Republican senators privately agree with him, but that they're not at liberty really to do so, since many of them are still running for reelection, and Senator Corker's decided not to.

What do you make of all that? Do you think that the other senators do agree with Senator Corker? How has the conflict with Trump changed what you all are doing on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee?

Cardin: Well, I believe on foreign policy that there is little difference between the Democrats and Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. We believe that the best course for containing North Korea's nuclear program is through diplomacy, and we disagree with the language the President has used, and the fact that he's made it more difficult for diplomacy to work.

We believe that in regard to the Iran nuclear agreement, that we have to enforce the agreement rigorously, but we don't want the United States unilaterally withdrawing from that agreement. I think that's what most Democrats and Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee believe, and certainly in regard to Russia.

We believe that the initial actions taken by President Trump in embracing Mr. Putin was the wrong signal, and I think both Democrats and Republicans agreed on that, and the legislation we passed, I think verifies that.

Glasser: So, do you think Senator Corker is still in a position with his colleagues to get stuff done over the course of the next year and a half? I mean, are you feeling the impasse that he has with the President?

Cardin: I think Senator Corker is widely respected among both Democrats and Republicans in regards to all issues, but particularly foreign policy. So, yes, I think he will be a very important force for congressional activities related to foreign policy. I also believe that he is interested in America succeeding, so he would like to see as much unity as possible between the Trump administration and the Congress. At times that's difficult. We understand that.

But I do think that Senator Corker will work with representatives of the Trump administration to try to give a united front with the Senate.

Glasser: Well, right. As we've learned, it's a complicated thing, right? You know, there's different factions in the Trump administration, and then of course there's the president himself. So, tell us what is your view of how to think about who's running foreign policy right now. What is your assessment of Secretary of State Tillerson, who's obviously been publicly undercut by the President? Do you believe as his oversight committee that he's doing a good job, or does he have the clout necessary to do the job?

Cardin: I think Secretary Tillerson has made several major mistakes. He hasn't been the advocate for the Department of State the way he should have been. The president came in with a budget that cut his agency dramatically. Secretary Tillerson didn't stand up against that cut. Diplomacy is a critical part of our national security. We haven't seen that type of passion come from the Secretary of State.

And quite frankly, American values are represented by our diplomats, and I haven't seen Mr. Tillerson put the highest priorities on American values. So, I think he has not been as helpful, and I think as a result, that we've seen a morale problem in the State Department.

Having said that, I think there have been times that Secretary Tillerson has been very much right on in regards to foreign policy issues, such as negotiation with North Korea, where President Trump has undercut his own Secretary of State.

So, there are times that I think Secretary Tillerson has been on the right track, and there are other times where he's been on the right track, where the President has undercut his abilities.

Glasser: Well, it seems like one of your main critiques and that of a lot of people does have to do with how he's actually running the State Department itself. You talked about the morale problem. In many ways it's a meltdown. You had a very strong statement earlier this week—I think you'd talked about basically this is "a high-level decapitation of leadership" with losses of very senior Foreign Service officials and the like.

Tell us what you think is going on inside the State Department, and will Congress have a say in changing or blocking any of those plans?

Cardin: Well, there's a role that Congress could play. Obviously, we hope that the budget we pass will be a repudiation of the Trump budget as it relates to the State Department. We also will make it clear about protecting particular priorities within the State Department that have not had that type of leadership at the State Department. We could do that.

What we can't do is run the agency; that's an executive function. And clearly, we've seen an exodus of some of the top career talent at the State Department. And there's still a freeze at the State Department, despite the fact that the Office of Management and Budget has released an overall hiring freeze. So, we do need leaders at the State Department that will make it clear that diplomacy is a priority and support the mission. Congress will do everything we can to support that leadership, but at the present time, we haven't seen it.

Glasser: What happens, like when you call up to try to get something done, or to complain about some of these things? Are they responsive to you? Do you feel like there's a channel open? Do you get a sense that this is ideological?

Cardin: Well, I think there is clearly people at the State Department who very much agree. We try to put a spotlight on that. I think Ambassador Green at the USAID has made a real contribution to the mission of our foreign assistance. We are hoping there'll be more leaders that will emerge that will do that.

But, it really does start with the President of the United States, and when you see the President of the United States diminish the importance by the budget he submits, and then you see the Secretary of State not standing up for the career diplomats, it is disheartening.

Glasser: So, they've made no effort with you, as the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee? Do you feel like you have a personal relationship with Tillerson?

Cardin: Yes, I have a personal relationship, and we've expressed ourselves, and I think we've made some progress, and I can point to particular functions that are stronger today, I think, as a result of Secretary Tillerson listening to not only me, but other members of the United States Senate, that have concerns about the direction we see the department going.

So, I think we've had some input; I don't mean to say we haven't. I think Secretary Tillerson has sought our advice. But overall, I think what is missing is a passion for our career Foreign Service personnel, and standing up for giving them the resources they need to carry out their mission.

Glasser: Yeah, well, it's hard to argue with that, right? That's almost uncontested. So, do you think he is on the way out? Would they be able to confirm, do you think, another Secretary of State in this political environment?

Cardin: Well, clearly there's been speculation as to how long Secretary Tillerson will be able to remain in office. There have been moments that have been uncomfortable between the Secretary and the President of the United States. He's not the only cabinet-level person who's had these types of issues with the President of the United States.

So, I'm not going to speculate as to whether he will remain Secretary of State or not. Clearly, he—if a vacancy occurs, there would be I think a pretty detailed confirmation process as to the next secretary. If there is a vacancy in the Secretary of State, the United States Senate will go through a pretty thorough confirmation process, whomever the President nominates, so it's not going to be an automatic. We're going to have a lot of questions to ask, considering what has happened during the first year of the Trump presidency.

Glasser: Well, that's right. You raised some of the concerns on substance: North Korea; the Iran deal. What is happening behind the scenes right now with the Iran deal? I mean, basically, where last we left it, essentially President Trump kind of kicked the ball to Congress. So, what is your view of what Congress is going to end up doing?

Cardin: Congress has a limited role in regards to the nuclear agreement with Iran. We do have a review statute that was enacted into law where we review Iran's compliance with the agreement, and we have certain requirements on the President to keep us informed. What we have seen so far is that Iran is in compliance with the nuclear part of the agreement, but certainly has violated non-nuclear issues.

So, I think Congress could play a role. We've already done that; we passed a bill this year imposing new sanctions on Iran for their non-nuclear violations. We can work with our European partners to impose sanctions against Iran for non-nuclear violations.

In regards to the nuclear agreement, we are controlled by the JCPOA, the nuclear agreement, and there, working with our European partners, we can certainly demand strict enforcement and that's—I don't know how much Congress can do in that regard, but certainly, we can support the administration.

Glasser: So, you don't expect anything imminently to come before you?

Cardin: I think Congress will try to be cooperative with the President, but, quite frankly, within the nuclear agreement, we have to work with our partners. That's why we said it's very important to work with our European partners.

Glasser: So, a lot of this discussion around foreign policy is that, in a way because of the uncertainty surrounding President Trump, you hear a lot more about Congress, and especially about the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, than you have in a while. You guys had a pretty interesting hearing last week. I think it was the first time in 40 years a discussion—an open discussion—about the role of the president in being able to order a nuclear first strike. Is this Congress getting its voice back on foreign policy?

Cardin: Clearly, Congress has taken on a stronger role. You see that with the sanctions bill we passed with Russia—and, by the way, also with North Korea and Iran—that discretion that is normally given to the president has been taken over by Congress in our role as the policy arm of government.

So, we have been more prescriptive on the responsibilities of the president on foreign policy, and that's Congress's prerogative, and we've done that under President Trump. So, yes, we are taking a more active role.

And the nuclear command structure, which was developed during the Cold War for two nuclear superpowers with the concept of mutual destruction if either party decided to use it—that premise is no longer valid, because the chances of a nuclear conflict are more with a North Korea-type country than it is with a Russia or China-type country.

So, we could now have a more deliberative process under the presidential command for the use of nuclear weapons, and I think Congress is looking for a way to assert itself in that regard.

Glasser: Well, really, it is quite striking in that regard. What do you hear from foreign officials? I assume that many of them are coming to you with certain high levels of concern about what's going on.

Cardin: You're absolutely correct. I've had numerous discussions with foreign leaders who were trying to get as much insight as possible as to how America will respond to certain of our international challenges. They recognize that President Trump is not predictable, and that has been a subject we have talked about.

But, I think they are somewhat reassured when Congress interjects itself. We did that, quite frankly, on the Transatlantic Partnership and NATO where there was some doubt initially about the President's commitment. Congress, in a nonpartisan manner, reinforced that Transatlantic Partnership and the NATO alliance. That, I think, was helpful.

So, there have been times where I've met with foreign leaders where I explained where our country's commitments are solid, I think helps, and will continue to do that. But the President's unpredictable—make no mistake about it—and that has its concerns with our traditional partners, whether they be in Europe, whether they be in the Pacific, in Asia, or whether they be in our own hemisphere.

Glasser: What is your advice, then, when they say, "How do I know what to pay attention to and what not to?" Do you tell them to read the tweets, or not? What's your guide?

Cardin: Well, I usually tell people who are concerned about President Trump, whether they be Americans or foreigners, stay focused on the issues of concern. If you are talking in regards to the Iran nuclear agreement, let's stay focused as to how we can keep Iran in compliance with the agreement and keep all parties in the agreement. This is a strategy we have to focus on.

If it is dealing with America's commitment to maritime security in the China seas, then let's develop a strategy working with Congress that will give you greater assurances. So, we try to find a path forward to make it clear that America will live up to its traditional commitments.

Glasser: Well, it's interesting. You were just on a congressional trip over the last week to Bonn when the subject was the Global Climate Accord—and in a way, that was sort of the message, right, that you and other Americans there were sending, which is basically, "Well, there's Trump's policy, but there's also America's policy." Right?

Cardin: You're exactly right. Our message was very clearly, we are still in. We are in the Paris Climate Accords; we are in the international effort to deal with our climate commitments. America will meet its Paris targets, and we're on target to do that. And that the President does not speak for this country. We have governors who are taking action; we have mayors who are taking action; Congress has taken actions. We had five senators speak in regards to that. We have private companies that are doing things; we have NGOs, and universities.

So, yes, exactly. We reassured the international community that the United States would, in fact, live up to its commitments, despite the fact what the President did was, I think, extremely dangerous to the international effort.

Glasser: Do you think people were reassured? What did you hear from the non-U.S. delegates when you were there?

Cardin: Our colleagues globally were extremely pleased to hear the message that we brought. They were very encouraged by that message. But make no mistake about it—there is only one U.S. There is only one President. And they know that the President can take action, or delay action, to make our efforts more difficult and to cede space to other countries that may not be as committed to the global priorities as America is.

Glasser: Well, that's right. I mean, what if it was during the Obama administration, and it was a Republican senator going with the opposite message? There's a certain risk, right? Historically, our politics stopped at the water's edge. Would you have been mad at the Republican you for doing that?

Cardin: Well, yeah, it's a very good point. We want to have a united policy. We think it's President Trump who's the outlier, not the business leaders, the governors, the mayors, the senators that were there. I think we are expressing the mainstream American message here. It's not that we have a different view. President Trump says he wants to negotiate a better deal.

Well, under the Paris Accords, we can change our commitments—but quite frankly, we're going to meet our commitments. So, I don't think the President's message is inconsistent with the responsibility we have to express America's commitment to global climate change. He is hurting the international effort, but he won't stop the American effort.

Glasser: Well, it must have been a very interesting trip for you, for sure. But I imagine, you also heard a lot about Russia, and I do want to come back to that, because people might not realize you played a key role, in some ways you could argue, in triggering some of Vladimir Putin's fury at the United States by being the lead author, and helping to get past the original Magnitsky Act of sanctions on Russia.

How did you get into this? People might not know how you met my old friend Bill Browder, who I knew from Moscow way back when he—before he was a Putin opponent.

Cardin: Well, since my election to Congress, I've always been interested in human rights. I really do believe that's America's strength. Yes, we have a strong military; yes, we have a strong economy. But what really makes America the unique nation it is, is that we speak up about human rights, and anti-corruption, and good governance, and democratic institutions. That's what America is known for. That's what inspires people around the world with U.S. leadership.

So, I've been very active in the OSCE—the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe—the U.S. Helsinki Commission—have been the chairman at times of that commission, and have brought to the attention of the American public, but also the international community, Russia's violations of basic international human rights standards that they agreed to in the Helsinki Final Act. So, I've done that traditionally.

And during that period of time, it came to my attention that a young lawyer, Sergei Magnitsky, representing an American company, had done what any lawyer should do, and that is if you discover corruption, report it to the appropriate authorities. He did that, and that was his responsibility. As a result, he was arrested, tortured, and killed, leaving a young family behind.

You know, we talk about human rights violations, and we talk about the numbers, but when you put a face on it, you can get people to respond. And Sergei Magnitsky became a rallying call about Mr. Putin and the direction he was leading Russia, a direction to take away the rights of its citizens to internationally-recognized protection.

So, as a result of the tragedy with Sergei Magnitsky, I was able—working with Senator McCain and others—to pass the Sergei Magnitsky Accountability Act, which imposed sanctions against those individuals in Russia that were responsible for his death, denying them the right to visit America or to use our banking system.

That message went beyond just the United States. Other countries followed suit, and it became a rallying point. And just in the last Congress, we were able to extend the Russia-specific statute to a Global Magnitsky Act, going against human rights violators in other countries where their own country does not hold them accountable.

I was very pleased to see that Canada has passed a similar law just recently, and other countries have followed suit, so it has become a real effort to say we are going to stand up against human rights abusers.

Glasser: Well, it's interesting. It was just, I believe, the eighth anniversary just this week of Sergei Magnitsky's death. But what people may also not realize is that the passage of those Magnitsky sanctions is what caused Russia to retaliate by banning adoptions by Americans, which was the ostensible subject of the Natalia Veselnitskaya meeting in Trump Tower, so it all kind of comes full circle—

Cardin: Yes. It does go around into a circle, but it's interesting. Because we were holding human rights violators accountable and not giving him the benefit of our country, Russia decided to take it out on its orphans. It's just amazing what the attempt was made. It's so absurd how Russia responds. It's not Russia; it's Mr. Putin. I should make that clear. The Russian people are good people, and they should have basic rights. It's the Putin government that is denying them the rights.

Glasser: One of the things that's happened as a result of this political intervention in the U.S. election has been a pretty dramatic switch in the partisan view toward Russia in a way that it's got to be a little disturbing, right? I mean, you now see that basically Democrats and Republicans have almost flipflopped in their views about Russia, right? And you have Democrats who are much more hawkish these days, and many Republicans now—a majority, if you look at the Pew Research findings—believe that we should have a reset with Russia, or a more conciliatory policy, as President Trump has suggested.

Does that worry you at all, that we have sort of a partisan view now of Russia policies?

Cardin: I'm not so sure. I mean, it's probably right as far as voting public is concerned, but in regards to the activities in Congress, I have not seen that division. You know, my closest ally in my campaign to hold Russia accountable is Senator John McCain; he's been a true, true hero on this issue. And there are many other Republicans who have helped, including Bob Corker, including Roger Wicker, including so many others who have been very much engaged in the campaign to hold human rights violators accountable in Russia and globally. So, I have not seen that translate—of course we got a 98 to 2 vote on the Russia sanctions bill in the United States Senate earlier this year.

So, I think there is a general understanding about Russia's nefarious activities by Mr. Putin, and that that needs to be acted upon by both Democrats and Republicans. But, obviously, Mr. Trump has his supporters, and Mr. Trump has certainly not been in the camp of holding Mr. Putin publicly to account for what he has done.

Glasser: Well, you mentioned Senator McCain. Of course, he has been a very strong public advocate on his views about Russia over the years; he's also been—along with Senator Corker—probably the most public in his disagreements with President Trump and his foreign policy.

Do you think—have you talked with either of them about the toll that that takes, or whether that's an effective strategy? Democrats have their own worries about how publicly to oppose Trump, or whether to call for his impeachment. Where do you come down from that?

Cardin: Well, I talk to my colleagues all the time about this, but I don't have to encourage them. John McCain is a champion for human rights, and he is going to speak out as loudly as he possibly can. He's obviously fighting his health right now, but he is not going to be deterred in his beliefs. And the same thing is true of my other colleagues. They are going to speak their minds. And, yes, they may get some negative response from some of their colleagues, but I think most admire their honesty and integrity on this issue.

Glasser: Well, Tom Steyer says that Democrats should all advocate for President Trump's impeachment and removal from office. Do you agree?

Cardin: You know, I'd be a little careful here, because under the Constitution it's the House of Representatives who brings impeachment, and then the United States Senate must act as a juror, to judge whether it's appropriate or not. So I may be called upon to act in that as a member of the United States Senate.

So, I'm not sure it's appropriate for members of the Senate to express a view in regards to impeachment.

Glasser: Well, that's a good point, if you think about whether a process would ever be opened up. Obviously, we're a long way from that, no matter what. Senator Cardin, I know you have to go, but this has been a fascinating conversation. And yet, I notice how we tend to cluster around a few specific crises. What, as you look at the work of the Foreign Relations Committee—what are some of the issues that keep you up at night? Are you really worried about a nuclear war with North Korea? Are you worried that Turkey is going to go south and leave NATO? What keeps you up at night?

Cardin: Well, if I had to do the most consistent nightmares I have, it's probably Russia, because they're so global in their efforts to bring down democratic systems. But, I'm also worried about what could end our civilization if we started a nuclear confrontation—North Korea is clearly in our sights as an immediate major concern. But quite frankly, every day there's a new story, and this past week, when you see what's happened with these Saudi Arabia's purge of members of the royal family, and then of holding the prime minister of Lebanon basically in their country, causing instability in Lebanon that could trigger conflicts with Hezbollah—you know, there's a lot of things in this world that could mushroom into a much larger conflict.

So, yes, I think we could contain each of the immediate problems, but if they spin out of control, the world is in a very unstable position that could cause a major problem.

Glasser: Well, I'm afraid I have to say there's not a lot of cheery conversations we tend to have these days when it comes to the state of the world. But I have to say, Senator Cardin, it's been really terrific to talk with you, and I hope to come back and visit with you in a few months and we'll see what happened to any of these running crises.

Cardin: Well, unfortunately, I think many will still remain, but we're going to do everything we can to try to ease the tension in North Korea and establish a way in which Russia does not interfere with our democratic system. But it's going to be a challenge, and of course, America has a lot of allies and we'll be working to do what's in our best national security interests.

Glasser: Senator Cardin, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and this week's guest on The Global POLITICO, thank you very much for joining us.

And of course, thank you to all of our listeners on iTunes, or whatever is your favorite podcast platform. And you can email me any time at sglasser@politico.com.
Senator, thank you.

Cardin: Thank you, Susan.

How Trump Is Driving Democrats and Republicans Together Back

President Trump has notched at least one big foreign policy success: uniting senators of both parties against him on Capitol Hill.

That at least is the argument of Senator Ben Cardin, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who is now working in close partnership with the panel's Republican chairman, Bob Corker, as the retiring Tennessee senator feuds openly with Trump, chides the president's appointees, and holds hearings to criticize his policies. Call it a rare outpost of bipartisanship in an increasingly polarized moment — or at least an example of a surprising and unintended side effect of Trump's disruptive approach to the world.

"I believe on foreign policy that there is little difference between the Democrats and Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee," Cardin said in an interview for The Global Politico, our weekly podcast on world affairs. He ticked off a list of issues on which he said the committee now agrees across party lines—and over which it appears to be more or less in open conflict with the Trump administration. Among them are imposing mandatory new sanctions on Russia, which ultimately passed the Senate 98-2 over the White House's objections, keeping the Iran nuclear deal in place and pursuing a peaceful solution to the nuclear standoff with North Korea.

It's a striking list. In more than two decades of observing Capitol Hill, I can't remember a comparable moment when the generally staid Foreign Relations panel has been so assertive toward the president, especially given that Congress and the White House are controlled by the same party. To do so, you'd probably have to reach all the way back to the Vietnam era, and the skeptical hearings about the war held by the late, legendary Chairman William Fulbright.

"Clearly, Congress has taken on a stronger role. You see that with the sanctions bill we passed with Russia—and, by the way, also with North Korea and Iran—that discretion that is normally given to the president has been taken over by Congress in our role as the policy arm of government," Cardin told me. "We have been more prescriptive on the responsibilities of the president on foreign policy, and that's Congress' prerogative, and we've done that under President Trump. Yes, we are taking a more active role."

Corker offered a highly symbolic—or at least seriously trollish—signal of how far he's willing to take his feud with Trump last week when he held a hearing on the president's authority to order a nuclear strike—the first time in 40 years that such an issue has been discussed on Capitol Hill. The session was widely—and correctly, Cardin said—interpreted as a senatorial rebuke of the president's loose and inflammatory rhetoric about the "fire and fury" he might unleash against North Korea. "Congress is looking for a way to assert itself in that regard," Cardin said.

Some skepticism is certainly in order here. Congress isn't about to wrest control of nukes—or any other major levers of international power—away from the commander-in-chief anytime soon. Despite post-Vietnam efforts to rein in the imperial presidency, the executive branch retains nearly all the control over American foreign policy. And many members of Congress are just as happy to punt when it comes to taking responsibility for decisions of war and peace that might prove unpopular with voters, a fact painfully underscored when President Barack Obama decided to seek authorization for a retaliatory strike on Syria after a chemical weapons attack on its own citizens—and members of Congress all but hid under their desks.

So no one's suggesting Congress has suddenly grown a spine under Trump.

But the bipartisan talk of constraining and at times openly contradicting the president is something genuinely different about Trump's Washington, and it already extends to a wide range of issues on the foreign policy front—a contrast to the fractured politics of such domestic issues as health care and taxes, where consensus is as elusive as the election results would suggest.

While those policy debates play out along more predictable Republican vs. Democrat lines, Cardin made the case for a Senate Foreign Relations Committee that will hang together against Trump on most of the pressing foreign policy issues of the day. He did not spell out exactly which Republicans he believes to be aligned with Democrats on these issues, though the panel does include, in addition to Corker, several other Republicans whose foreign policy views differ from Trump's, such as his primary rival Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), and another outspoken critic in Arizona Senator Jeff Flake, who like Corker is not running for reelection.

"We believe that the best course for containing North Korea's nuclear program is through diplomacy, and we disagree with the language the president has used, and the fact that he's made it more difficult for diplomacy to work. We believe that in regard to the Iran nuclear agreement, that we have to enforce the agreement rigorously, but we don't want the United States unilaterally withdrawing from that agreement," Cardin said. "I think that's what most Democrats and Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee believe, and certainly in regard to Russia," where Trump's public "embracing Mr. Putin was the wrong signal," and triggered the overwhelming Senate vote to overrule him on sanctions.

Both Cardin and Corker have also been increasingly critical of Trump's Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, warning of the department's plummeting morale, "decapitation of leadership," and ill-considered reorganization plans - foolish own-goals, for Cardin, at a time when the president has publicly undercut his top diplomat and devalued the role of diplomacy in America's foreign policy.

Tillerson "has made several major mistakes," Cardin told me. "He hasn't been the advocate for the Department of State he should have been." When Trump proposed a more than 30 percent cut to the department's budget, in fact, it was not Tillerson who objected—but Corker, who called it a "nonstarter" and refused even to take it seriously as a basis for negotiations. In our interview, Cardin said he expects the budget that will ultimately pass the Republican-controlled Senate to be a "repudiation" of the Republican president's State budget.

A new confrontation could soon be brewing over Russia on the Hill, as the Trump administration faces a January deadline for imposing a first round of additional sanctions. The State Department missed the initial deadline to produce names of entities to be sanctioned, leading many in Congress to wonder whether this was the Trump team slow-walking a policy to which the president remains opposed.

Administration sources have told me it's not that, but a bureaucratic failure to meet the initial deadline, reflecting the lack of staffing and disorganization that remains persistent inside the State Department under its budget-cutting secretary—another black mark against Tillerson.

Cardin is not so sure but either way, he said, Congress will remain adamant about pushing Trump to get it done. "We're watching very carefully to make sure they, in fact, impose the mandatory sanctions on the due dates," Cardin said, "but we do know there is a reluctance on the behalf of the Trump administration."

Unlike some of his Democratic colleagues, Cardin is no newcomer to the ranks of Russia hawks. In fact, you could even say he helped trigger Vladimir Putin's decision to intervene in the 2016 U.S. presidential election.

A longtime human rights activist who co-chaired the Helsinki Commission, Cardin teamed up with Republican Senator John McCain to pass the Magnitsky Act—over the objections of the Obama administration. Cardin and his staff worked closely on the bill to sanction corrupt Russian government officials with Bill Browder, a Western investor in Russia whose lawyer, Sergei Magnitsky, was unjustly imprisoned in Moscow after uncovering a massive fraud that implicated government officials, and later died in jail. In retaliation for the Magnitsky sanctions, Putin ordered an end to American adoptions of Russian children.

And that was precisely the issue about which Russian lawyer Natalia Veselnitskaya came to meet with Trump's son, son-in-law and campaign chief in Trump Tower during last year's campaign—a meeting now part of the investigation into Putin's election meddling.

Special counsel Robert Mueller has just issued the first indictments to flow from that investigation, and Cardin said when I asked about the probe that he believes "there's lots of dots, and they're starting to be connected" as far as Russia's interference and ties to the Trump team.

But beyond that, he wouldn't comment about the investigation and whether it could, or should, lead to Trump's impeachment, as some Democrats are already beginning to say. After all, he noted, the Senate would have to sit in judgment in any trial of the president after an impeachment. That makes Cardin a potential juror. "I may," as he put it, "be called upon to act."

Medicare premiums, deductibles will largely remain flat for 2018 Back

By Paul Demko | 11/17/2017 05:02 PM EDT

The standard monthly premium for Medicare Part B, which covers doctor visits and outpatient hospital services, will be $134 next year, unchanged from 2017, CMS announced today.

But about one in four Part B beneficiaries will pay slightly less than the standard premium because of a "hold harmless" provision tied to Social Security benefits. In addition, individuals who earn more than $85,000 and couples with incomes above $170,000 — about 5 percent of Medicare beneficiaries — will pay higher Part B premiums, with a top rate of $429 per month in 2018.

The annual deductible for Part B beneficiaries will be $183 next year, the same as for 2017.

There is no premium for Part A, which covers hospital stays, for almost all Medicare beneficiaries.

The annual deductible for Part A next year will be $1,340, an increase of $24 from 2017. Beneficiaries will also see slight increases in co-insurance payments for extended hospital stays and placements at skilled nursing facilities.

Obamacare mandate repeal may not deliver predicted blow Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn and Paul Demko | 11/20/2017 05:08 AM EDT

Repealing Obamacare's individual mandate might not be the devastating blow to health insurance markets that supporters of the law fear.

Because the tax penalty for not having insurance is far less costly than what many Americans would have to pay for coverage, many have chosen to take the fine. Eliminating it, therefore, might not radically change behavior — or fulfill the dire predictions of spiking premiums and vast increases in uninsured people that economists, health providers and politicians once predicted.

Even the Congressional Budget Office says it's rethinking its estimates of the consequences.

"We've always said the mandate is ineffective; it's such a weak mandate," said Deep Banerjee, an analyst at Standard & Poor's who has closely tracked the Obamacare markets. "We don't think many people would lose insurance if the mandate goes away." The ratings service projects repeal would increase the number of uninsured by 3 million to 5 million by 2027, and save the federal government $60 billion to $80 billion.

Using tax reform to repeal the requirement to purchase health insurance is not without irony. When Chief Justice John Roberts saved Obamacare in 2012 by ruling that the individual mandate was a tax, conservatives were outraged. But now, with full control of Congress, Republicans can turn the tables: if it's a tax, they'll repeal it in a tax bill.

Axing the mandate, as Senate Republicans are proposing in their tax bill, would give the GOP an estimated $338 billion more to spend on tax cuts. That's because removing a cudgel to persuade otherwise healthy people to enroll in Obamacare would lower how much the federal government pays to subsidize the coverage. Striking a prominent — and much reviled — feature of Obamacare is a secondary political benefit. House Republicans did not repeal the mandate in their tax bill, but GOP sources expect them to approve adding repeal when the legislation goes to a conference.

Insurers warn that scrapping the individual mandate could capsize the already wobbly markets, which have been buffeted by skyrocketing premiums and dwindling competition. On Tuesday, many of the largest health care industry groups, including America's Health Insurance Plans, the American Hospital Association, and the American Medical Association, sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell warning against eliminating the penalty for failing to obtain coverage.

Their argument echoes fears voiced by the CBO: Scrapping the mandate would cause premiums to jump even higher and fewer Americans to enroll in coverage. The scorekeeping agency projects that premiums would be 10 percent higher if the mandate goes away and that there would be 13 million more uninsured Americans in a decade.

"Eliminating the mandate is pulling the plug on the individual market," said John Baackes, CEO of L.A. Care Health Plan. "I think this is a cowardly way of doing it."

But it's also widely acknowledged by health care finance experts that the tax penalty has proved a weak enforcement tool. That's because the fine maxes out at $695, or 2.5 percent of income, whichever is higher. That's still far less than what many Americans would pay in premiums, meaning its effect on consumer behavior may be overstated.

Republicans have long scoffed at the CBO's projections about what would happen if the tax penalty were eliminated. In its most recent analysis, the CBO indicated that it's considering "major methodological changes" in how it scores repeal of the mandate.

Most observers expect the agency will eventually reduce the projected effect of eliminating the penalty. That could also result in lower estimated savings — the very thing the GOP is relying on to pay for its tax package.

The GOP's move to repeal now amounts to "cashing in a declining asset," said Tom Miller, a health care economist at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "If we could just wait a couple of years, we would find out it really didn't amount to much. But it takes awhile for CBO to retreat from its past errors."

Republicans are framing mandate repeal as a "middle-class tax cut" because the vast majority of people who paid the fine are low- or middle-income. According to the IRS, nearly 80 percent of Americans who paid the penalty in 2015 made under $50,000.

Republicans say the mandate's true effect on coverage is not clear.

"No one really knows," the impact of the mandate, said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), chairman of the Senate HELP Committee. "The Congressional Budget Office has revised its estimate downward of the effect [the mandate] has, and many professionals who look at it say the penalty is too low to make much difference, so I don't think we know."

The GOP maintains at least some of the possible effects of repealing the mandate would be blunted by passing the bipartisan deal Alexander struck with the HELP panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, to fund Obamacare's cost-sharing reduction program, which helps low-income people pay their out-of-pocket health costs. The bill would provide two years of funding for the program, which President Donald Trump cut off last month. That would bring down premiums in 2019 and trigger rebates for consumers in 2018, according to Republicans.

"It would be a very bad idea to repeal the individual mandate and not pass Alexander-Murray," Alexander said.

But Democrats, who strongly support Alexander-Murray, warned they can't be counted on for support if Republicans undermine the Obamacare markets by repealing the mandate.

"Republicans who think they'll be able to jam through a partisan bill that spikes health care premiums and then make it all better by pointing to our bipartisan bill to reduce health costs are either fooling themselves or trying to fool their constituents," Murray said. "Democrats will hold Republicans accountable for the damage they're doing every step of the way."

GOP senators lobby Trump on Obamacare mandate, markets Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn and John Bresnahan | 11/17/2017 03:02 PM EDT

Senate Republicans on Thursday personally lobbied President Donald Trump to support a bill to shore up Obamacare markets while repealing the law's individual mandate as part of tax reform, according to GOP sources.

There is growing concern among Senate Republicans that repealing the requirement that most Americans have insurance without funding a separate Obamacare cost-sharing program would cause too much havoc in already shaky insurance markets. But they need to repeal the mandate in order to have enough money to cover new tax cuts.

Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, Susan Collins of Maine and Bill Cassidy of Louisiana attended the White House meeting, which was arranged by Graham, according to GOP sources.

Senate Republicans want Trump to get behind a bipartisan deal Alexander crafted with Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) to fund Obamacare's cost-sharing program. They argue that enacting Alexander-Murray as part of a year-end spending deal would make up for some of the anticipated damage done to the insurance markets by repealing the mandate. But House Republicans are skeptical of Alexander-Murray, dubbing it a "bailout" of insurance companies.

"There is a growing recognition if we repeal the individual mandate, then Republicans have some responsibility to fix health care — not Obamacare," an aide said.

Repealing the mandate would raise $338 billion but also cause insurance premiums to spike 10 percent, resulting in 13 million more people uninsured in a decade, according to the CBO. Many Republicans and some outside experts doubt the impact would be that big.

A White House spokesman said Trump and the senators "discussed the ongoing efforts to pass historic tax reform and other legislative objectives."

"The president is pleased with the momentum that has gathered behind finding solutions to these important issues and looks forward to continued cooperation with Congress in order to enact them as soon as possible," the spokesman said.

Alexander and Sen. Lisa Murkowski of Alaska — a key vote on tax reform — have separately cited concern about repealing the mandate without funding the cost-sharing program.

"It would be a very bad idea to repeal the individual mandate and not pass Alexander-Murray," Alexander said this week.

"If the Congress is going to move forward with repeal of the individual mandate, we absolutely must have the Alexander-Murray piece that is passed into law," Murkowski told the Roll Call newspaper.

Collins has gone even further, saying she's concerned about the very idea of repealing the individual mandate as part of tax reform.

"I think it greatly complicates our efforts to combine tax reform and changes in the ACA," she told reporters earlier this week.

Graham said in a statement that he had a "great meeting" with Trump and Vice President Mike Pence, but his office refused to share additional details.

"They remain fully committed to passing meaningful tax reform and repealing and replacing Obamacare. President Trump and Vice President Pence were focused like a laser on success in the Senate," Graham said. "I appreciate the President and Vice President for being generous with their time and looking for ways to close the deal on these important issues for the American people."

After Alexander and Murray announced a deal on their bill last month, many Republicans and Democrats speculated it would be included in a year-end spending deal. But Senate Democrats this week warned that they may no longer support Alexander-Murray if Republicans repeal the mandate.

Democrats and supporters of the Affordable Care Act say Alexander-Murray would not make up for the damage caused by repealing the mandate, with Murray likening it to trying to douse a fire with penicillin.

Perdue touts investments in rural health care services in 41 states Back

By John Lauinger | 11/17/2017 04:43 PM EDT

USDA made more than $1 billion in investments in fiscal 2017 to fund health care projects and initiatives that enhanced services for some 2.5 million people in rural areas across 41 states, Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue said in a release this afternoon.

"USDA invests in a wide range of health care facilities — such as hospitals, clinics and treatment centers — to help ensure that rural residents have access to the same state-of-the-art care available in urban and metropolitan areas," Perdue said in a statement.

The investments helped fund 97 rural health care projects through the Community Facilities Direct Loan Program. The loans can be used to build or expand hospitals, medical clinics or other places where care is delivered, such as assisted-living facilities. The loans can also be used to purchase medical equipment.

To qualify for the program, a public or nonprofit entity or federally recognized tribe must be located in a town with a population that does not exceed 20,000 people.

USDA's release highlighted a few of the projects, including a loan of $91.4 million to Avita Health System in Ohio. In the town of Ontario, the loan was used to build a hospital in a vacant portion of a shopping mall. The facility provides a host of vital health services to some 124,000 rural residents in two counties. It also provides substance-abuse disorder treatment and mental health services to help combat the opioid epidemic.

Trump calls for border wall after agent's death Back

By Ted Hesson | 11/20/2017 02:00 PM EDT

President Donald Trump reiterated his demand for a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border following an incident Sunday that left one Border Patrol agent dead and another badly injured.

"As you heard, we lost a Border Patrol officer, just yesterday, and another one was brutally beaten and badly, badly hurt. Looks like he'll make it, but very, very badly hurt," Trump told reporters after a Cabinet meeting today.

"And we talk about the wall, we're going to have the wall," he continued. "It's part of what we're doing. We need it. It's rough territory. That's where the drugs are coming in. A lot of things are happening along the border."

Border Patrol agent Rogelio Martinez died Sunday morning "as a result of injuries sustained while on patrol," U.S. Customs and Border Protection said in a written statement.

Martinez and his partner had been monitoring an area in South Texas known as the Big Bend sector.

Since his presidential campaign, Trump has called for a border wall to halt the flow of people and drugs across the southern border.

Congress faces a Dec. 8 deadline to pass a spending bill, which could present an opportunity to push for border wall funding.

Subject: Budget & Appropriations: U.S. territories forced to wait for long-term disaster aid — No dice on spending caps deal — Senate Republicans worry about tax reform price tag
Date: Friday, November 17, 2017 4:18:42 PM

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 11/17/2017 04:17 PM EDT

MONEY FOR THE MAINLAND: The White House has unveiled its third major disaster funding request in less than three months, acknowledging that little of that cash would go to long-term rebuilding in Puerto Rico or the U.S. Virgin Islands.

OMB Director Mick Mulvaney is seeking $44 billion to fund storm-recovery efforts like Army Corps of Engineers projects and loans to mom-and-pop stores, as we report this afternoon. But with conditions still so rough in the Caribbean, the budget director says it's too early for a complete damage assessment for either territory. "This supplemental request does not represent the final request for their needs," he wrote.

Tough timing: Congressional leaders will likely include that $44 billion in a broad funding package in December. But Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands won't get all they've asked for under that bill ($96 billion and nearly $7 billion, respectively). And that means local officials could be forced to wait until January or later for reconstruction funds — four months after Hurricane Maria made landfall.

'Downright insulting': Even though they've already skipped town, many lawmakers were quick to blast the request today. "This is wholly inadequate and downright insulting, especially for the people of Puerto Rico," Senate Appropriations Committee top Democrat Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) said, noting that he has fielded more than $180 billion in hurricane funding requests.

The exception: The White House's proposal doesn't seem all bad for Puerto Rico, though. For the first time, the Trump administration is proposing to waive a part of the Stafford Act to let the U.S. territory improve its infrastructure rather than restore it to "pre-disaster" condition, potentially enabling Puerto Rico to upgrade its devastated energy grid.

The total request includes:

- $25.2 billion for FEMA and the Small Business Administration
- $12 billion for a new flood mitigation program run by the Community Development Block Grant program
- $1 billion for emergency agricultural assistance
- $1.2 billion for an education recovery fund
- $4.6 billion for rehabbing federal buildings

MENU OF OFFSETS: Just as Mulvaney warned congressional leaders last month, the White House wants this latest tranche of disaster aid to be paid for, stating today that "the administration believes it is prudent to offset new spending." OMB has delivered a list of suggested savings, totaling some $59 billion and including more than $44 billion from two more years of mandatory sequestration, Sarah reports for Pros.

Doc of the day: In a letter to FCC Chairman Ajit Pai today, Sen. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) led 10 of his colleagues in requesting the agency protect Wi-Fi funding within the E-Rate program, which helps connect schools and libraries to broadband. More from John Hendel.

#DailyBudgetFact — In 2014, the FCC voted to modernize the E-Rate program, approving a $1.5 billion boost in funding and setting new standards in an effort to expand access.

APPROPRIATIONS

NO DICE: Rumbblings of a potential deal on spending caps piqued the interest of budget watchers Thursday evening. But sources from both parties swiftly quieted the chatter. Democrats did confirm that they swatted down a GOP offer to raise spending caps by roughly $180 billion over two years, as we reported. The rumored offer would have raised the nondefense budget cap by $37 billion and boosted the Pentagon's spending cap by $54 billion, matching President Donald Trump's $603 billion request for fiscal 2018.

Forced belt-tightening: Don't forget that the 2011 budget law would impose a $549 billion limit for defense spending and $516 billion for non-defense funding, down from the current level of $551 billion for defense accounts and $519 billion for domestic programs.

ARMED SERVICES SIREN: Add Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) to the list of lawmakers who are increasingly anxious to see a final spending deal. The defense chairmen penned a joint statement today urging congressional leaders to settle on a plan that matches the budget boost called for in the just-passed NDAA bill, H.R. 2810 \(115\). More from Connor O'Brien.

TAX

'MORE FISCALLY PALATABLE': Several Senate Republicans are starting to worry that their chamber's tax reform bill could blow right past that $1.4 billion threshold. Brian Faler explains that some GOP legislators are worried Congress will ultimately extend a host of ostensibly temporary tax cuts, driving up the overall cost. "There are several of us that are trying to figure out a way to make sure this doesn't hurt us relative to deficits," says Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "We're looking globally at the whole thing and trying to do what we can to make it more fiscally palatable."

Marathon markup: The Senate reported its tax plan out of the Finance Committee late Thursday. Brian explains that chamber leaders aim to take up the bill after Thanksgiving.

TRANSPORTATION

PVT. PILOT: The Department of Transportation plans to spend an estimated $2.5 million over three years on a new program to funnel military veterans into commercial pilot jobs, Lauren Gardner reports. The money would come from the department's research account.

OBAMACARE

NOT A GAME-CHANGER: Repealing the individual mandate might not be a death blow to Obamacare after all. White House seeks $44 billion in third disaster request Back

By John Bresnahan, Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 11/16/2017 07:09 PM EDT

The White House sent its third disaster request to Congress on Friday, asking for $44 billion to aid recovery from this summer's deadly trio of hurricanes.

If the funding package is approved, Congress will have kicked in nearly $100 billion in extra money this year to help storm-ravaged communities in places like Texas, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Florida.

Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) welcomed the administration's move, adding in a statement, "The House will review the request and work with the administration and members from affected states to help the victims get the resources they need to recover and rebuild."

Other lawmakers, however, voiced strong complaints that the package fell short of expectations.

The request calls for $25.2 billion for disaster programs run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Small Business Administration, as well as $4.6 billion to rehab damaged federal facilities and other agency recovery efforts.

Another $1 billion would go toward emergency agricultural assistance, $1.2 billion would be used for an education recovery fund and $12 billion would be spent on a new flood mitigation program run by the Community Development Block Grant.

The Trump administration — still sizing up damage and rebuilding costs in some areas — is expected to ask for even more disaster cash in the months to come.

Indeed, Hurricane Maria made landfall in Puerto Rico less than 60 days ago — the usual threshold for determining long-term recovery needs.

While overall estimates are largely settled for damage wrought by hurricanes Harvey and Irma, the latest request falls short of what local officials had sought for their recovery. Texas had asked for $61 billion, Puerto Rico wanted $96 billion and the U.S. Virgin Islands requested nearly $7 billion.

Texas Republican Sen. John Cornyn, one of the most vocal advocates for funding in the wake of Hurricane Harvey, said late Thursday that the White House's request was "wholly inadequate."

Rep. Nita Lowey, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said in a statement that the request "does not come close to what local officials say is needed."

Unlike the $52 billion Congress already approved in two installments this year, the administration has asked that at least some of the additional funding be offset by spending cuts.

OMB Director Mick Mulvaney urged congressional leaders in a letter last month to avoid appropriating more "emergency" dollars that don't count toward Congress' spending limits.

"As we move toward the longer-term issue of rebuilding the impacted areas of our Nation," Mulvaney wrote, "we believe it would be appropriate that the Congress consider reducing spending elsewhere."

The White House proposed Friday that Congress find $59 billion in offsets to dozens of federal programs like rural business grants and conservation efforts.

Congressional fiscal hawks have so far been divided on the question of whether to demand offsets for disaster aid. While Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker (R-N.C.) has pushed leaders to find ways to pay for the extra spending, Freedom Caucus chief Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said last month that "emergency funding and having an offset with that is not a sustainable position."

Both the House and Senate are expected to take up the new aid request next month, possibly as part of a year-end spending deal. One GOP aide said Friday lawmakers could approve the disaster package separately, before a December agreement to fund the government.

Seung Min Kim contributed to this report.

White House pushes $59B in cuts to offset disaster aid Back

By Sarah Ferris | 11/17/2017 01:20 PM EDT

The Trump Administration is urging Congress to cut as much as $59.23 billion from domestic programs to help pay for its growing tab of disaster assistance.

Unlike its previous two aid requests, the White House asked lawmakers today to partially offset any future funding packages, including the new \$44 billion request.

"The administration believes it is prudent to offset new spending," Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney wrote in a letter today, proposing nearly two dozen programs for the chopping block

Most of the programs were already floated for cuts in the Trump administration's fiscal 2018 budget proposal, like the State Department's Human Rights and Democracy Fund and the EPA's tribal assistance grants.

OMB is also targeting flood prevention programs, federal highway aid, rural business loans and upgrades to federal research facilities.

Mulvaney, as well as some key House conservatives, previously said they would seek offsets for post-storm rebuilding. But the budget director's latest push — after initially seeking only $5 billion in offsets — could upend a series of other funding negotiations on Capitol Hill next month.

Democrats, as well as several GOP appropriators, have firmly ruled out the plan.

Rep. Nita Lowey (D-N.Y.) blasted the administration's call today for offsets as "galling" at the same time Republicans have pushed budget-busting tax plans.

"Holding vital recovery funding hostage to unrelated and often divisive spending debates is wrong, and only delays fulfillment of our obligation to help disaster victims," the House Appropriations Committee's ranking member wrote in a statement.

Democrats decry Trump funding request for Puerto Rico relief Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 11/17/2017 01:16 PM EDT

Democrats hammered the Trump administration's emergency funding request as insufficient for storm-stricken Puerto Rico.

"Once again the Trump Administration has proven it lacks the will to help Puerto Rico in a comprehensive manner," Reps. Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.) and Luis Gutiérrez (D-Ill.) said today in a statement. "This supplemental request fails to provide sufficient funding to help Puerto Rico address immediate needs and set itself on the road to recovery. We also understand that it fails to provide a solution to the potentially devastating Medicaid cliff that is currently facing Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands."

The administration's request to Congress, sent today, calls for $44 billion in emergency government funding, as well as a request that Congress amend the law governing the federal emergency response so that funds can be used to improve, not just repair, the U.S. territory's delicate electrical grid.

Velázquez and Gutiérrez said that's not enough. Puerto Rico's Gov. Ricardo Rosselló formally requested $94 billion in federal help on Monday.

"Puerto Rico is facing a serious humanitarian and economic crisis, and now more than ever the American citizens on the island need our help," the Democrats said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The two lawmakers said they will push in Congress for more funding for the supplemental.

White House proposal would use Pell Grant surplus funds to offset disaster relief Back

By Kimberly Hefling | 11/17/2017 02:03 PM EDT

A White House proposal to help hurricane-ravaged communities would provide $1.2 billion for an education recovery fund but would use money from the Pell Grant surplus to help pay for it.

The details were spelled out in a third disaster request the administration sent to Congress today that seeks $44 billion in aid for Texas, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Florida.

Maximum Pell Grant awards for 2018 would not be affected by the proposal, and "unobligated balances in the Student Financial Assistance account would support Pell Grant program costs in future award years," according to an administration document.

Congressional budget hawks have been divided thus far on whether they will demand offsets to pay for the disaster aid.

But the administration said it wants Congress to use $3.9 billion from the Pell surplus as one of several dozen proposed offsets to federal programs worth $59 billion to fund the effort. The request does not specify how the education recovery fund would work.

The $3.9 billion request from the Pell Grant surplus matches what the administration wanted to cut in its budget blueprint earlier this year. Instead, the House spending bill proposed cutting $3.3 billion from the Pell surplus, while the Senate bill proposed cutting $2.6 billion.

Earlier this year, the CBO estimated the Pell Grant surplus was $8.5 billion. Despite the amount in the fund, Democrats and advocates for student aid have long decried "raiding" the Pell surplus because they argue it should not be diverted from the student aid programs.

White House targets USDA funding in push for disaster-relief offsets Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 11/17/2017 03:49 PM EDT

The White House wants Congress to target $3 billion in USDA funding as part of its push for more than $59 billion in cuts to domestic spending to help defray the costs of recent disaster relief efforts.

The administration released a list of proposed offsets today that included $1.4 billion in unobligated balances for mandatory conservation programs, which includes money set aside for future agreements under the Regional Conservation Partnership Program.

The White House is also going after $212 million from the Agricultural Research Service's building and facilities account and $800 million from the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, which the administration sees as ripe for the taking because it stems from lower than expected enrollment. The administration also points to $204 million in emergency conservation funds, which it says are no longer needed.

The White House's plan also targets prior-year leftover funding in Rural Economic Development Grants and for the Rural Business Program, the Rural Electrification and Telecommunications Program, the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service and Watershed and Flood Prevention Operations.

The administration today sent Congress its third emergency funding request to aid recovery from hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico and wildfires in the West. It is seeking $44 billion this time around.

In its two prior aid requests, the White House did not ask for spending offsets, though OMB Director Mick Mulvaney and conservatives previously said they would seek such cuts.

"The administration believes it is prudent to offset new spending," Mulvaney wrote in a letter today that proposed the offsets.

Democrats and several GOP appropriators have said the plan is a non-starter, POLITICO reported earlier today, noting that the request could upend a host of other funding negotiations on Capitol Hill next month.

Senate Democrats ask FCC to hold off making changes to funding for E-Rate Wi-Fi Back

By John Hendel | 11/17/2017 01:43 PM EDT

Sen. Ed Markey today led 10 of his colleagues in requesting the FCC protect the Wi-Fi funding within the E-Rate program, which provides for school and library connectivity.

"We urge the Commission to not prematurely make modifications to this important source of funding, which helps ensure all Americans — whether urban or rural, rich or poor — remain connected and competitive in this global economy," the Senate Democrats wrote in a letter to FCC Chairman Ajit Pai.

The commission in 2014 expanded E-Rate to include funding for Wi-Fi networks within schools and libraries and had anticipated an evaluation of this funding by the start of the 2019 program year. The agency's Wireline Bureau this fall issued a notice on the adequacy of the funding, collecting comments through early November. The American Library Association rallied support for such funding during this comment cycle. E-Rate had already included wired internet.

It is "impossible to fully evaluate the program's effectiveness at this time," the lawmakers wrote, lauding the FCC's "eagerness" but encouraging against action just yet.

Markey helped write the legislation that led to the E-Rate program's creation.

Democrats spurn GOP's opening bid on spending caps Back

By Sarah Ferris and Rachael Bade | 11/16/2017 05:22 PM EDT

Democratic leaders have rejected an offer from their Republican counterparts to substantially boost funding for the Pentagon with a minimal bump for domestic programs, several sources say.

After nearly a month of talks, GOP leaders proposed a deal this week that would raise spending caps by roughly $180 billion over two years, according to multiple sources.

Democrats rebuffed the GOP's opening bid, arguing that it violates their demand for "parity" between defense and domestic budget increases.

Congressional leaders must strike a deal this year to prevent the effects of a 2011 budget law, which would impose a $549 billion limit for defense spending and $516 billion for non-defense funding.

Without a compromise, lawmakers could trigger across-the-board cuts.

Government funding runs out Dec. 8, though members of both parties have signaled the need for a stopgap funding bill for at least two weeks.

More than a month into fiscal 2018, the government is still operating at fiscal 2017 levels: $519 billion for domestic programs and $551 billion for defense accounts.

McCain and Thornberry pressure budget negotiators for more defense spending Back

By Connor O'Brien | 11/17/2017 12:31 PM EDT

The chairmen of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees today urged lawmakers negotiating a year-end budget deal to make sure that substantial increases in defense authorized by both chambers are accommodated.

"Through the National Defense Authorization Act, we believe that Congress has done its due diligence to authorize the appropriate level of funding based on threats, requirements, and missions," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Mac Thornberry (R-Texas) said in a statement. "We expect that any budget agreement will reflect the hard work that Congress has just completed and the reality of today's dangerous world."

The statement comes as congressional leaders mull a two-year, roughly \$180 billion deal to increase defense spending limits by $54 billion each year. If enacted, the limit on national defense spending for fiscal year 2018 would increase from $549 billion to $603 billion.

Unlike previous years, where the NDAA was delayed and rewritten to match a budget deal, Thornberry and McCain forged ahead with legislation that busts through defense caps set by the Budget Control Act in a gambit to force lawmakers to agree to more defense spending.

The proposed budget deal is less than the $634 billion base national defense topline endorsed by the NDAA H.R. 2810 \(115\) for the current 2018 fiscal year. And it also wouldn't achieve the hefty growth in fiscal 2019 defense spending McCain and Thornberry are seeking to pursue a major military buildup.

"We must not only set the conditions to pass an appropriations bill at the FY18 NDAA level, we must also ensure the necessary growth in FY19.," the chairmen said. "Without that, President Trump's promise to rebuild our military will be impossible."

Senate deficit hawks blanch at true cost of 'temporary' tax cuts Back

By Brian Faler | 11/16/2017 03:45 PM EDT

Some Senate Republicans think their party's plans to rewrite the tax code may prove far costlier than it appears, posing another challenge to getting the legislation through the chamber.

They're worried Congress will ultimately extend a host of ostensibly temporary tax cuts, driving the proposal's cost far higher than its official sticker price, now pegged at $1.4 trillion.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) said he is working with several colleagues to address the issue, though he declined to provide specifics.

"There are several of us that are trying to figure out a way to make sure this doesn't hurt us relative to deficits," he said Thursday. "We're looking globally at the whole thing and trying to do what we can to make it more fiscally palatable."

Added Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.): "It's a concern — it's one thing I'm working on."

That's a new threat to Republicans' tax plans, one that comes after Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) announced Wednesday he would not support the plan because of how it treats small businesses.

Addressing the temporary provisions could be difficult, requiring major changes to the plan, just as Republican leaders are trying to quickly shuttle it through Congress. Extending all of the provisions would balloon the cost of the plan to $1.9 trillion, according to the nonpartisan Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget. Republicans can afford to only lose two votes in the Senate.

The debate comes as budget forecasters say the government will begin routinely running trillion-dollar deficits in the next five years.

The GOP tax plan is pocked with more than 35 provisions that would turn off — and some that would turn on — over the next decade, which critics call budget gimmicks designed to artificially reduce the plan's cost.

The largest are Republicans' headline tax cuts for individuals, including plans to cut tax rates, expand the standard deduction and beef up the child tax credit.

But there are many others, for both individuals and businesses, including lower rates for so-called pass-throughs that pay taxes through their owners' individual returns, special investment writeoffs for companies known as "expensing" and a new break for employers that offer workers family and medical leave. Most would expire after 2025.

At the same time, there are looming tax increases on multinational companies, Silicon Valley technology companies and others slated to kick in beginning in 2026.

Republicans added the provisions this week in order to comply with arcane Senate rules barring "reconciliation" measures -- which would allow the GOP to pass the legislation with a simple majority in the Senate -- from adding to the debt over the long term.

While Republicans may cut taxes by $1.5 trillion over the next decade, they cannot add a dime to the deficit beyond that. If they do, Democrats can strike the provisions on the Senate floor.

That's why tax cuts abruptly end, but history shows Congress rarely allows temporary tax cuts to expire as scheduled. The vast majority of former President George W. Bush's tax cuts were ultimately made permanent. And for many years, lawmakers continually rolled over a badge of supposedly temporary tax breaks known as the "extenders," before voting in December 2015, as part of a $600 billion tax cut package, to make most of them permanent.

Democrats are blasting the new round of temporary provisions, saying they contravene one of the basic purposes of tax reform: making the code predictable.

"What we now have is the opposite of tax reform — we have a crazy quilt of provisions, some of them are permanent, some of them are temporary," said Sen. Ron Wyden, the Finance Committee's top Democrat.

Republicans say Democrats could make the individual provisions permanent by voting with them to waive those anti-deficit rules when the bill reaches the Senate floor. "There will be an amendment on the floor to make the individual side permanent," predicted Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio).

A major challenge for Republicans concerned about the temporary provisions is the cost of addressing them.

"If you made expensing permanent, instead of a five-year phase out [as under the Republican plan] — if you paid for it by moving the corporate rate up, you'd have to go from 20 to 25" percent," said Flake, referring to a plan to let businesses immediately write off big investments. "It's a big hit."

Senate Finance Committee approves GOP tax reform plan Back

By Brian Faler | 11/16/2017 10:37 PM EDT

The Senate's tax-writing committee this evening approved Republicans' sweeping plan to overhaul the tax code.

The Finance Committee voted along party lines, 14-12, to forward the proposal on to the full Senate. Approval came after four days of sometimes testy consideration, during which Republicans substantially revised the measure while voting down dozens of Democratic amendments.

Senate leaders aim to take up the bill — which would cut both business and individual taxes while killing Obamacare's individual mandate requiring health insurance — after Thanksgiving.

The Finance panel's vote came hours after the House approved its own competing tax plan. Lawmakers aim to get compromise legislation to President Donald Trump's desk by the end of the year.

Tax reform roadblocks emerge in Senate Back

By Brian Faler | 11/17/2017 02:08 PM EDT

Republicans were able to muscle their tax-rewrite plan, through the House exactly two weeks after it was unveiled, but they are already facing far tougher sledding in the Senate.

GOP leadership is confronting mushrooming demands from individual senators with much more power to bollix up the tax plans, thanks to the party's super-thin majority.

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) has already said he won't vote for his colleagues' proposal because of how it treats small businesses, leaving Republicans with just one vote to spare when the plan hits the Senate floor after Thanksgiving.

Deficit hawks like Sens. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) are worried the plan will cost far more than advertised thanks to its liberal use of "temporary" tax provisions that will likely be eventually extended, and say they are working on changes to bring down the cost.

Moderate Susan Collins (R-Maine) has her own concerns, including with plans to repeal the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate to have health insurance as part of tax reform.

Others like Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) have been wildcards, avoiding taking a public position on the proposal.

Murkowski told Roll Call on Thursday that if lawmakers are going to repeal the individual mandate as part of the tax plan, they "absolutely" must pass separate health legislation aimed at stabilizing health care markets and controlling costs.

"If that tax cut is offset by higher premiums, you haven't delivered [a] benefit," she told the newspaper.

McCain praised the Finance Committee, which approved a draft of the plan last night, for "taking another step forward in providing much-needed tax relief," while also serving notice that he wants plenty of time to offer amendments when the plan reaches the Senate floor.

House Republicans have their own red lines, warning a Senate proposal to end a long-standing deduction for state and local taxes is a nonstarter with their colleagues.

Democrats, meanwhile, have been teeing off on the plan, especially after the official Joint Committee on Taxation said Thursday that while everyone's taxes would initially go down under the plan, some middle-income people would eventually see tax increases.

Senate leaders acknowledge they have their work cut out for them, with Majority Whip John Cornyn singling out the small business issue as "particularly challenging."

"We still have quite a bit of work to do there," he said Thursday night, as the Finance panel wrapped up its consideration of the plan. "This is still just the beginning of the legislative process."

The result is there could still be substantial changes to the proposal in the Senate in the coming weeks. That risks dragging lawmakers further away from the "Big Six" framework that was designed to keep the House and Senate on the same page, and avoid a repeat of the Obamacare repeal debacle, when the House approved a plan only to watch the whole effort collapse in the Senate.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said he will bring the plan before the entire Senate when lawmakers return from a week-long Thanksgiving recess. Their plan cleared the Finance committee last night on a party-line vote after four days of often testy debate, during which Republicans made major changes to the plan while killing dozens of Democratic amendments.

The House cleared a competing draft Thursday on a 227-205 vote. Republicans aim to get a compromise plan to President Donald Trump's desk by the end of the year.

Corker said Thursday that he and other lawmakers are working on changes aimed at bringing down the cost of the Senate, now pegged at $1.4 trillion.

They're worried the bill includes more than 35 temporary provisions that Congress has no intention of actually allowing to ever expire, ballooning the cost far beyond its supposed sticker price. He declined to discuss specifics.

"There are several of us that are trying to figure out a way to make sure this doesn't hurt us relative to deficits," he said Thursday. "We're looking globally at the whole thing and trying to do what we can to make it more fiscally palatable."

That will be difficult to address, with the nonpartisan Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget estimating the Senate plan includes a whopping $515 billion in budget gimmicks aimed at artificially reducing its cost.

Another vexing issue will be dealing with small businesses and other so-called pass throughs, whose owners pay taxes on their business's earnings through the individual side of the tax code. To the consternation of Johnson and others, those companies would pay higher taxes than corporations under the Senate plan. Republicans have been struggling for months to come up with a plan to allow pass-throughs to tap their lower proposed business tax rate without creating a loophole for the wealthy to avoid paying taxes.

"I know that there are members that have concerns about that," said Sen. John Thune, the chamber's No. 3 Republican.

Pence pledges individual mandate repeal as tax reform enters "make-or-break moment"

By Colin Wilhelm | 11/16/2017 09:02 PM EDT

Vice President Mike Pence called the next few weeks "a make-or-break moment" for tax reform following House passage of a tax overhaul bill today.

"The next few weeks are going to be vitally important," said Pence, who was the keynote speaker at the annual Tax Foundation dinner. Pence doubled down on Trump administration commitments on tax reform, including a late addition: full repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate.

"Repealing the individual mandate tax that is a part of Obamacare is a tax cut for millions of hard-working Americans," said Pence. The House bill passed today that Pence praised during his speech does not include a repeal of that mandate, though the Senate tax overhaul bill does.

The vice president also reiterated promises of new business tax rates — 20 percent for large corporations and 25 percent for all other businesses — "and not a penny more" — that may be hard for Republicans to hit. The Senate tax reform bill currently under consideration by the Finance Committee does not cut taxes for non-c-corporation businesses to 25 percent.

"Before this year is out we're going to pass the largest tax cut in American history," Pence said, calling it "the one policy that's more important than anything else" for economic growth. The Trump administration's assertion of the size of the proposed tax cut compared to others in U.S. history has been disputed.

Trump faults Democrats for not being involved in tax reform bill Back

By Louis Nelson | 11/17/2017 06:56 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Friday accused Democrats of refusing to cooperate with Republicans on an overhaul of the tax code, suggesting that the minority party might like the legislation better if it were to work with the GOP to include some of its own ideas in the bill.

"If Democrats were not such obstructionists and understood the power of lower taxes, we would be able to get many of their ideas into Bill!" Trump wrote on Twitter Friday morning.

Republicans passed their package of tax cuts and reforms relatively easily on Thursday through the House of Representatives, but did so without a single Democratic vote. The legislation's path in the Senate, where the GOP has majority by just two seats, is expected to be more difficult. Republicans have said they hope to have the tax legislation passed and on the president's desk by the end of the year.

Trump has regularly predicted that at least a handful of Democrats will end up voting in favor of his tax legislation, and the White House has at times courted red-state Democratic senators who are up for reelection in 2018. But other Democrats have complained about being left out of the bill-writing process, accusing Republicans of crafting the legislation behind closed doors.

"Democrats should join us and make it bipartisan and permanent, not just criticize," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas wrote on Twitter earlier this month in response to a criticism of the GOP's then-unreleased tax plan. Linking back to Cornyn's post, Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.) replied "I accept!! Tell me where the secret room is where you are writing the bill and I WILL BE THERE!"

Pence goes to 'tax prom,' says 'help is on the way' after House tax bill passes Back

By Akela Lacy | 11/16/2017 09:56 PM EDT

After a day of victory on the Hill for the Trump administration's attempt to pass tax reform, Vice President Mike Pence went to "tax prom."

That's what he called the 80th Annual Dinner for the Tax Foundation, where he delivered the keynote address Thursday evening.

"Help is on the way. You have a champion in the White House," Pence told the audience.

Pence said that the tax effort represented Trump's commitment to middle class families and noted the new legislation would double the standard deduction.

"Starting with that vote today in the House of Representatives, before this year is out, we're going to pass the largest tax cut in American history," Pence said to rumbling applause and whoops from the crowd.

The bill will deliver what the president likes to call "a middle class miracle," Pence said.

Pence said Trump has cut "more red tape than any other president in American history," and credited him for having "undone," several of which were Obama-era executive orders.

"Under President Donald Trump, the era of over-regulation is over," he said.

He added: "One policy after another was suffocating America's free enterprise economy," Pence said. "The opportunity to pass meaningful tax relief for the American people, to get this stubborn city to give up its claim on the income of working families and businesses" is tough, but "we'll get it done."

Pro-Obamacare group targets swing Republicans on taxes Back

By Elana Schor | 11/17/2017 01:00 PM EDT

A pro-Obamacare coalition that spent big during this year's health care battle is going back on the airwaves, urging the three GOP senators who tanked their party's Obamacare repeal plan to vote against the massive Republican tax bill.

The left-leaning Save My Care group is focusing on Sens. Susan Collins of Maine, John McCain of Arizona and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska now that Senate GOP leaders have added a repeal of Obamacare's individual health insurance mandate to their tax bill. Next week's six-figure ad buy from Save My Care comes as liberal activists nationwide seize on the tax bill's Obamacare attack to mobilize their grass roots against the legislation.

The McCain-focused ad praises the Arizona Republican for having "been a hero for Arizona and the country" by opposing the GOP's Obamacare repeal bill in July, according to an advance copy shared with POLITICO, and the Alaska ad uses similar language to address Murkowski. The ad running in Collins' home state takes more direct aim at the GOP tax bill for using repeal of Obamacare's insurance mandate to help pay for tax cuts for individuals and corporations.

"President Trump and Republicans in Congress are ignoring bipartisan opposition and trying to sneak health care into their tax plan," the ad states. "Why? To pay for more tax breaks for billionaires and big corporations."

Senate Republican leaders have portrayed the mandate repeal as a de facto tax cut for lower-income individuals who would otherwise have to buy health insurance or pay a fine. The Senate is expected to consider the tax bill on the floor when lawmakers return to the Hill the week after Thanksgiving.

Save My Care was a major presence on the airwaves during this year's Obamacare repeal fight, spending seven figures in a single April TV ad buy against House Republicans. The coalition opened its pocketbooks again Friday after Senate Republicans added the mandate repeal to their tax plan.

DOT rolls out program to help vets get pilot training Back

By Lauren Gardner | 11/16/2017 04:53 PM EDT

Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao Thursday announced a government effort to funnel interested military veterans into commercial pilot jobs, an initiative she said is geared toward addressing a growing pilot shortage.

The three-year demonstration program will gauge interest among non-pilot veterans in becoming airline pilots, and will help them get the necessary training, Chao said. DOT's Volpe Center will offer interested veterans financial support, which includes beginner courses through certain flight instructor certifications.

"With certification, participants in the Forces to Flyers program will be able to earn a living while they accrue the flight hours necessary for certification as commercial airline pilots," Chao said at DOT headquarters.

DOT aims to have nailed down arrangements with flight schools — with veterans enrolled in programs — by mid-2018, Chao said.

A department official said the program is expected to cost $2.5 million over three years, with the money coming from DOT's research account. DOT anticipates funneling no more than 40 students through the program, the official said, though he noted that details are still being finalized.

The DOT initiative is a "first step" in addressing both rural community air access and "the growing shortage of pilots," plus aiding veterans in finding civilian jobs, Chao said.

The new program doesn't address existing pilot training regulations, proposed changes to which have stalled the Senate's long-term FAA bill, S. 1405 \(115\). The bill would change the way pilots can earn credit toward the 1,500-hour requirement for first officers, with proponents arguing that a dwindling pool of qualified pilots combined with reductions to rural air service are an unintended consequence of the 1,500-hour mandate, which was finalized in 2013.

Rep. Sam Graves (R-Mo.), himself a pilot, said lawmakers are "very interested" in seeing the results of the program and applying them "to pilot training standards and any changes that may need to be made moving forward."

"What the secretary is talking about today goes beyond that," Graves said after the event, noting the challenge and expense associated with pilot training.

The Air Line Pilots Association has disputed the notion that there's any shortage of qualified pilots. Rather, ALPA argues that there's a shortage of pilots who want to work for the low wages being paid by regional airlines, which often serve as a stepping stone to bigger carriers.

The Regional Airline Association has lobbied for lawmakers to allow participation in airline-backed training programs count toward the 1,500-hour requirement. Federal regulations make an exception for military pilots, who may get their restricted Air Transport Pilot certificates if they've flown at least 750 hours. Pilots with certain academic backgrounds also get some credit toward the mandate for their coursework.

Faye Malarkey Black, RAA's president, lauded the program and called it a "critical first step" to getting more pilots into the pipeline. "As we pursue a range of complementary policy solutions, initiatives like this can help support future pilots and ensure Americans from communities large and small retain access to the safe and reliable commercial air service that links them to the global economy," she said in a statement.

Obamacare mandate repeal may not deliver predicted blow Back

By Jennifer Haberkorn and Paul Demko | 11/16/2017 04:50 PM EDT

Repealing Obamacare's individual mandate might not be the devastating blow to health insurance markets that supporters of the law fear.

Because the tax penalty for not having insurance is far less costly than what many Americans would have to pay for coverage, many have chosen to take the fine. Eliminating it, therefore, might not radically change behavior — or fulfill the dire predictions of spiking premiums and vast increases in uninsured people that economists, health providers and politicians once predicted.

Even the CBO says it's rethinking its estimates of the consequences.

"We've always said the mandate is ineffective; it's such a weak mandate," said Deep Banerjee, an analyst at Standard & Poor's who has closely tracked the Obamacare markets. "We don't think many people would lose insurance if the mandate goes away." The ratings service projects repeal will increase the number of uninsured by 3 million to 5 million by 2027, and save the federal government $60 billion to $80 billion.

Using tax reform to repeal the requirement to purchase health insurance is not without irony. When Chief Justice John Roberts saved Obamacare in 2012 by ruling that the individual mandate was a tax, conservatives were outraged. But now, with full control of Congress, Republicans can turn the tables: if it's a tax, they'll repeal it in a tax bill.

Axing the mandate, as Senate Republicans are proposing in their tax bill, would give the GOP an estimated $338 billion more to spend on tax cuts. That's because removing a cudgel to persuade otherwise healthy people to enroll in Obamacare would lower how much the federal government pays to subsidize the coverage. Striking a prominent — and much reviled — feature of Obamacare is a secondary political benefit. House Republicans did not repeal the mandate in their tax bill, but GOP sources expect them to approve adding repeal when the legislation goes to a conference.

Insurers warn that scrapping the individual mandate could capsize the already wobbly markets, which have been buffeted by skyrocketing premiums and dwindling competition. On Tuesday, many of the largest health care industry groups, including America's Health Insurance Plans, the American Hospital Association, and the American Medical Association, sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell warning against eliminating the penalty for failing to obtain coverage.

Their argument echoes fears voiced by the CBO: Scrapping the mandate will cause premiums to jump even higher and fewer Americans to enroll in coverage. The scorekeeping agency projects that premiums would be 10 percent higher if the mandate goes away and that there would be 13 million more uninsured Americans in a decade.

"Eliminating the mandate is pulling the plug on the individual market," said John Baackes, CEO of L.A. Care Health Plan. "I think this is a cowardly way of doing it."

But it's also widely acknowledged by health care finance experts that the tax penalty has proven a weak enforcement tool. That's because the fine maxes out at $695, or 2.5 percent of income, whichever is higher. That's still far less than what many Americans would pay in premiums, meaning its effect on consumer behavior may be overstated.

Republicans have long scoffed at the CBO's projections about what would happen if the tax penalty is eliminated. In its most recent analysis, the CBO indicated that it's considering "major methodological changes" in how it scores repeal of the mandate.

Most observers expect the agency will eventually reduce the projected effect of eliminating the penalty. That could also result in lower estimated savings — the very thing the GOP is relying on to pay for its tax package.

The GOP's move to repeal now amounts to "cashing in a declining asset," said Tom Miller, a health care economist at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "If we could just wait a couple of years we would find out it really didn't amount to much. But it takes awhile for CBO to retreat from its past errors."

Republicans are framing mandate repeal as a "middle-class tax cut" because the vast majority of people who paid the fine are low- or middle-income. According to the IRS, nearly 80 percent of Americans who paid the penalty in 2015 made under $50,000.

Republicans say the mandate's true effect on coverage is not clear.

"No one really knows," the impact of the mandate, said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), the chairman of the Senate HELP Committee. "The Congressional Budget Office has revised its estimate downward of the effect [the mandate] has and many professionals who look at it say the penalty is too low to make much difference, so I don't think we know."

The GOP maintains at least some of the possible effects of repealing the mandate would be blunted by passing the bipartisan deal Alexander struck with the HELP panel's ranking Democrat Patty Murray to fund Obamacare's cost-sharing reduction program, which helps low-income people pay for their out-of-pocket health costs. The bill would provide two years of funding for the program, which Trump cut off last month. That would bring down premiums in 2019 and trigger rebates for consumers in 2018, according to Republicans.

"It would be a very bad idea to repeal the individual mandate and not pass Alexander Murray," Alexander said.

But Democrats, who strongly support Alexander-Murray, warned they can't be counted on for support if Republicans undermine the Obamacare markets by repealing the mandate.

"Republicans who think they'll be able jam through a partisan bill that spikes health care premiums and then make it all better by pointing to our bipartisan bill to reduce health costs are either fooling themselves or trying to fool their constituents," Murray said. "Democrats will hold Republicans accountable for the damage they're doing every step of the way."

Civil rights office at Education Department hit hard by buyout offers Back

By Kimberly Hefling | 11/16/2017 03:29 PM EDT

The Education Department's Office for Civil Rights could lose 45 employees because of early separation offers — the most of any division within the agency, according to a document obtained by POLITICO from a congressional office.

Of the 255 voluntary offers made Nov. 1 to employees to separate or retire early, 45 people work in the civil rights office, the document says. That could mean a hit for the civil rights branch, which in fiscal 2017 was funded to employ 569 staff members, according to the department's budget request from earlier this year. That request proposed decreasing the size of the office by 46 employees.

The Office for Civil Rights is charged with enforcing federal civil rights laws that prohibit discrimination in K-12 and higher education programs that receive funds from the Education Department. Discrimination is banned against individuals on the basis of race, color, national origin, sex, disability or age.

Many advocates have long argued that the civil rights office is understaffed. It receives 10,000 complaints annually, but has half of the staff it had in 1980, when it received fewer than 3,500 complaints, according to Education Department figures.

Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.), the ranking member of the HELP Committee, said in a statement Thursday she was "appalled" that Secretary Betsy DeVos "would use a lack of staffing and resources as an excuse to roll back civil rights investigations and protections, and then turn around and attempt to shrink these critical offices."

"I will continue to work to give the Department the resources it needs to better aid students and families, and I strongly urge Secretary DeVos to stop putting her ideological agenda above students and work with us," Murray said.

The document shows that the other departments most affected by the buyouts include the Financial Student Aid office and the Institute of Education Sciences, which is the department's statistics, research and evaluation arm. Thirty-six FSA employees were made the offers and 29 offers were made in IES. Another 25 employees in the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services received offers.

Read the full list here.

Department employees were extended up to $25,000 each to leave, but officials haven't made public how many are taking advantage of the offers.

An Education Department spokeswoman noted in a statement that the offers are voluntary and approved by the federal Office of Personnel Management.

"Keep in mind, these positions can be backfilled as the workload demands," said the spokeswoman, Liz Hill.

While the Trump administration has taken steps to streamline government agencies, such employee incentives aren't unique. The department said the offers were made to "facilitate reshaping its workforce to align with the reform and restructuring direction," according to the document.

The Office for Civil Rights has gained attention in recent months. In June, a directive from acting Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights Candice Jackson told the department's investigators to narrow their focus to the merits of a particular claim, rather than probing systemic issues, as they had done during the Obama administration.

Jackson gave regional civil rights offices more autonomy to close cases without approval from Washington. Two months later, the department had closed more than 1,500 civil rights complaints at the nation's schools — including dismissing more than 900 outright. Department officials have said they're working more efficiently.

Blumenauer seeks to cut farm subsidies and overhaul conservation in alternative farm bill Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 11/16/2017 05:48 PM EDT

Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.) on Thursday formally introduced his alternative farm bill, titled the Food and Farm Act, intended to overhaul existing farm subsidy and conservation programs. The bill also would establish two new titles devoted to tackling food waste and promoting animal welfare.

"I've been working on farm bill issues since I was first elected, and we've had some mixed success, in part because I made a mistake dealing with little bits and pieces while established farm interests have a plan they're supporting," Blumenauer said during a press conference. "This [bill] is an attempt to try and turn that around."

Blumenauer's legislation has drawn support from a broad range of interests including: author and advocate Michael Pollan; Ryan Alexander, president of Taxpayers for Common; Wayne

Pacelle, president and CEO of the Humane Society of the U.S.; and a handful of House Democrats like Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), Tim Ryan (Ohio) and Chellie Pingree (Maine) — all of whom spoke during a press conference or panel discussion on Capitol Hill about improving the food system for farmers and consumers.

The bill would eliminate commodity support programs and make producers earning above $500,000 a year ineligible for any type of farm subsidies, while expanding a crop insurance policy for diversified operations. Also, conservation resources would be geared toward improving the environment through cover cropping, reducing soil erosion and other sustainable farming practices.

On the nutrition front, the minimum SNAP benefit would be increased from $16 to $25, and more money would be invested in local food systems as well as increasing produce consumption and nutrition education in schools and low-income areas. The bill also would increase assistance for new and beginning farmers and provide more funding for agricultural research.

Blumenauer, who announced in August his intention of proposing the bill, said he spent several years talking with people involved in agriculture in shaping his legislation.

"They're not looking for a pipeline into the federal Treasury," Blumenauer said. "Some of them are extraordinarily fiscally conservative. They know it's wrong, but that's the system, so they take advantage of it."

Many farmers would rather have the help with research, innovation, conservation and new markets, rather than federal subsidies, he added.

Though the bill has a slim chance of becoming law, the Oregon Democrat said changes are taking place on farms and in kitchens and communities because people are much more aware of issues surrounding food.

"The problem is we haven't done a good job of assembling the coalition, and we have not had a comprehensive piece of legislation that talks about what a farm bill would look like if it was written for Americans who care about issues like nutrition and fiscal discipline," Blumenauer said.

As POLITICO reported, a coalition of unlikely allies during the 2018 farm bill cycle is organizing around eliminating subsidies for wealthy farmers, which is part of a long-term strategy to overhaul the sweeping legislation. Blumenauer is part of the loose-knit group and hopes that some of the changes he proposes will wind up in the next farm bill, which needs to be authorized by Sept. 30, 2018.

Watchdog slams Zinke for failing to document travel Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/16/2017 04:16 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke failed to properly document his travel, the agency's watchdog said Thursday, preventing it from determining whether he had violated government rules.

Zinke has come under scrutiny for mixing taxpayer-funded travel with political activities, as well as taking military or private planes rather than flying commercial, and the investigation by Interior's Office of Inspector General seeks to clarify whether all procedures were correctly followed.

"Our investigation is delayed by absent or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips and a review process that failed to include proper documentation and accountability," Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall said in a letter obtained by POLITICO and first reported by The Washington Post.

Zinke's travels have drawn scrutiny after Interior revealed he had taken non-commercial flights at taxpayer expense, POLITICO and other news outlets have reported. POLITICO has also reported that the former congressman from Montana has mixed taxpayer-paid trips with political work, such as when he participated in a fundraiser on behalf of the Virgin Islands GOP.

The IG criticized Zinke for failing to complete documentation for his travel in the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, and said that the process established by Interior's Ethics Office and Office of the Solicitor "does not include sufficient documentation of the legal and ethical analysis conducted to distinguish between personal, political, and official travel, or consistent cost analysis to justify use of non-commercial travel."

The IG asked for documentation of all of Zinke's travel, as well as for the documentation of travel by his wife, Lola Zinke, with documentation for how and when the travel was paid.

Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt, the agency's second-ranking official, blamed the lack on documentation on the Obama administration for leaving behind "an organizational and operational mess."

In his response letter, Bernhardt emphasized that Interior employees would continue to cooperate with the IG, and said he would provide documentation as requested.

But he also went on to note that former Interior Secretary Sally Jewell hadn't completed her documentation for 12 trips taken last year and in January of this year, and he said some trips may have never been entered in the system.

"When I arrived at the Department in August 2017 it was clear to me that the Secretary and I had inherited an organizational and operational mess," he wrote. "From my perspective, regarding IOS travel procedures, it appears that the exact same procedures and processes utilized by the previous Administration remain in place and continue to be dysfunctional."

Zinke joins a cast of Trump administration officials, including Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and now-departed Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price, who are accused of misuse of taxpayer funds for travel.

Santa Clara says it never received grants at center of 'sanctuary' fight Back

By Ted Hesson | 11/16/2017 04:05 PM EDT

Officials in California's Santa Clara County said today they never received federal grant money at the center of a battle over so-called sanctuary policies.

The Justice Department sent letters to 29 jurisdictions Wednesday warning that federal law enforcement funding could be threatened over sanctuary policies. The letters specifically cited funds from the Edward Byrne Memorial Justice Assistance Grant Program.

Santa Clara County was among the jurisdictions sent letters, but county officials said today that they never received Byrne JAG funds in fiscal year 2016, the year in question.

County Board of Supervisors President Dave Cortese called the letter another "swing and a miss" from the Trump administration. "Apparently, the federal government can't keep track of who received taxpayer money," he said in a written statement.

The Justice Department did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

In April, a federal judge in San Francisco partially blocked the implementation of an executive order that sought to withhold grant money from sanctuary cities.

Santa Clara County brought one of the lawsuits in that case, which the Justice Department appealed to the 9th Circuit.

Tucker Doherty contributed to this report.

- Chairman McCain, Ranking Member Reed, Members of the Committee...I'd like to introduce my friend, an American patriot
- Captain Cully Stimson is President Donald Trump's nominee for General Counsel of the United States Navy.

PROFESSIONAL EXPERIENCE (Most Qualified for the Job)

- Important for Navy to have the most-qualified individuals in positions of leadership—Capt. Stimson fits the bill.
- We served together in the Navy, he has 20+ years experience as a lawyer, first served in Navy JAG Corps in 1990s.
- I worked with him and Congressman DeStefano on a bill to ensure victims of sexual assault in the military receive the legal services they deserve.
- Captain Stimson's story is a lifetime of commitment to both community and country.
 - His start as a leader: Captain of the Men's Varsity Soccer Team at Kenyon College
- Graduated George Mason University School of Law

1992, joined Navy JAG Corps – 5 years active duty

- Called back to active duty 2001, to support Joint Special Ops Task Force JAG for SEAL Group Two.

- Served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs under Pres. George W. Bush

- Advised Secretaries of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Robert Gates about Pentagon detention operations.

- Has been with Heritage Foundation as a Senior Legal Fellow & Manager of their Nat'l Security Law Program since 2007

- Served our nation 2+ decades in Navy, recently as Dep. Chief Judge of Navy-Marine Corps Trial Judiciary & adjunct law prof./instructor at Naval Justice School in reserve capacity.

PERSONAL LIFE (High-Character Human Being, Fit to Serve)

- Teaching high school/coaching & mentoring young Americans—devoted countless hours to cultivating next generation.

- Chairman of the Board, U.S. Soccer Foundation

(charitable arm of U.S. Soccer): offers assistance to 35,000+ underserved and minority children.

- Captain Stimson has been married since 1995. He and his wife adopted four orphans.
- Epitome of a military officer: always first one to help others
 - Dozens of rec. letters for his students
 - Quietly paid tuition for two of his mentees who could not afford to take the Law School Admission Test.
 - Founded the Bryon J. Horn Memorial Scholarship Fund in honor of a fallen fraternity brother.

BIPARTISAN LEADER (comfortable working across party lines)

- Worked with Jeh Johnson, then-General Counsel of the Dept of Defense, on a number of issues to keep our nation safe.
 - Eventually led to Capt. Stimson extending, and Johnson accepting, invitation to speak to the Heritage Foundation.
 - In that speech, Sec. Johnson remarked: “The office of General Counsel of the Defense Dept., particularly in the post-9/11 world, is in the middle of many difficult, front page issues.”
 - As General Counsel of the Navy, Capt. Stimson will confront a host of these difficult issues as well. I have full confidence in his ability to tackle them.

- Friend & brother-in-arms Capt. Stimson: Navy gaining an eminently qualified attorney, an honorable military officer, and an individual with vast experience/fidelity to law & our country.
- Long career of exemplary service in law & defense, excellent fit for the position to which he was nominated. No doubt he will be a wonderful General Counsel of the Navy.

Subject: Charlottesville police made another controversial arrest -- House passes disaster debt relief, but not for Puerto Rico
Date: Thursday, October 12, 2017 10:26:37 PM

In June, before Charlottesville was in the national spotlight, the city was in the last stretch of a campaign for commonwealth attorney, the top prosecutor in town. One of the candidates was running on a platform of reining in the police and rolling back mass incarceration. He was not the police department's favorite candidate.

Less than two weeks before the election, five officers showed up in the middle of the night and arrested him. For essentially nothing. We sent Alex Emmons to Charlottesville to report this story out, after a tip from a reader of this email (!) that we should look into it. I also had him on TYT live today to talk about his reporting. His story is here and excerpted below.

The House today passed a disaster relief bill that includes $16 billion in loan forgiveness. But not for Puerto Rico -- it's for the flood insurance program, so people can keep rebuilding big houses in flood zones.

Most people have moved on from the Joe Arpaio pardon, but the legal fight over it goes on. Maryam Saleh writes on the efforts to appeal the judge's ruling that accepted parts of it.

And a really cool story about how Catalonians pulled off their banned referendum, using all manner of trickery to evade the riot police, including pretending that polling places were actually just pizza shops.

Before Charlottesville Was in the National Spotlight, Police Arrested Their Most Prominent Critic

JEFF FOGEL woke to the sound of someone furiously banging on his door. He quickly threw on a T-shirt and pajama bottoms while the banging continued, and stole a glance at his alarm clock before running downstairs. It was 12:30 a.m. in Charlottesville, Virginia.

When Fogel opened the door, he couldn't believe what he saw. He was face-to-face with five police officers on his front porch and behind them, five police cars lit up the neighboring houses red and blue with their flashing lights.

As one of the city's leading defense attorneys, Fogel was on a first-name basis with a lot of Charlottesville's top cops, but he was confused about why they would seek him out so late. As a joke, Fogel put out his hands, wrists pressed together in a handcuff position. "Haha. You're all here to arrest me, right?"

It wasn't a joke. "You've gotta be kidding me," he half-shouted.

The commotion woke up Fogel's wife and houseguest, who both made their way downstairs. Fogel turned around and shouted, "Hey everybody, come down and see the brave men of the Charlottesville police department, coming to arrest a 72-year-old man!”

The officers wouldn't allow Fogel to get his keys or get dressed. Minutes later, as he sat in the back seat of a police car, Fogel realized that throughout his 48-year career as a civil rights attorney, he never understood how much it hurt to be handcuffed. He also realized the arrest would have reverberations. It was early June, and in less than two weeks, voters in Charlottesville would go to the polls to decide on the city's next district attorney, with one of the candidates vowing to rein in police abuse and roll back mass incarceration.

That candidate was now bound for the police station.

Interior Secretary Zinke traveled on charter, military planes
By BEN LEFEBVRE

09/28/2017 07:54 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides have taken several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, according to documents and a department spokeswoman.

Zinke is at least the fourth senior member of the Trump administration to have used non-commercial planes at taxpayer expense, along with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and HHS Secretary Tom Price. President Donald Trump has fumed at Price's pricey travel, and Democrats say the revelations demonstrate a cavalier attitude by Cabinet members toward excessive spending.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said Zinke's charter or military plane trips were booked only after officials were unable to find commercial flights that would accommodate Zinke's schedule, and that all were "pre-cleared by career officials in the ethics office." Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as Price plans to do for some of the $400,000 tab he racked up on charter flights.

On June 26, a Beechcraft King Air 200 carried Zinke and several staffers from Las Vegas to Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Mont., about a 20-minute drive from Zinke's home in Whitefish, according to his official schedule. The flight cost $12,375, Swift said.

Zinke left after speaking at an event for the city's new professional hockey team, the "Vegas Golden Knights Development Camp Dinner," according to his schedule. Earlier in the day, he had been in Pahrump, Nev., for an announcement related to public lands.

Zinke's flight left Las Vegas at 8:30 p.m. PST and landed around 1:30 a.m. MST in Kalispell. The secretary stayed overnight at his residence, Interior documents show.

Las Vegas is one of the main connecting airports for commercial flights to Glacier International. Commercial flights between the two cities are available for several hundred dollars a ticket, according to travel planning websites.

In Whitefish, Zinke attended the Western Governors' Association's annual meeting, where he spoke for about 20 minutes without taking questions. He then had a private lunch with association members. In the afternoon Zinke was the subject of a photo shoot with GQ magazine at Lake McDonald and fished while being interviewed by Outside Magazine, the records show.

Zinke and staffers flew commercial back to Washington, D.C., the next day, according to the records.

The trip was not the first in which Interior booked a private jet for Zinke. On March 31, Interior chartered two flights to take Zinke and staff from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. Another two flights were chartered to return to St. Croix later that night.

Swift said she did not know how much the flights cost but that no other arrangements were available.

Commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars, according to travel booking websites.

In May, Zinke and his wife, Lolita, used a military aircraft to travel to Norway. From there, they flew on a military plane to Alaska for events organized by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The trip included charter planes to travel within Alaska, a common occurrence in the large, remote state. The Zinkes paid for Lolita's share of the trip, the full cost of which was not immediately available, Swift said.

Zinke also took a military helicopter from Fort Bliss to review the Organ Mountains monument in New Mexico in June, and he used a Bureau of Land Management helicopter to review the Basin and Range National Monument on July 30. "It is difficult to survey a half-million-acre piece of land with few roads by foot or car in an hour and a half," Swift said.

Along with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke took a military plane to Ravalli County, Mont., to check on wildfires in the area in August. "The military plane was used because of a very tight travel window, with no viable commercial airline options to transport two secretaries, security details, and associated USDA, Forest Service and Interior staff to Missoula in the time required," said USDA spokesman Tim Murtaugh. The cost of the flight was not immediately available, but the two agencies plan to reimburse the Air Force, Murtaugh said.

Records, watchdogs raise questions about Zinke's ethics deal

Corbin Hiar, E&E News reporter
Published: Thursday, May 25, 2017

When Montana Republican Rep. Ryan Zinke was nominated to lead the Interior Department, he signed an ethics agreement promising to resign "upon confirmation" from leadership posts in three organizations with financial ties to him and his family.

But as of Friday — more than 2 ½ months after he was sworn in as Interior secretary — Zinke still held top positions in those groups, according to the Montana secretary of state's office, which maintains records on companies and charities registered in the state.

Montana records also show the secretary's wife, Lolita Zinke, continues to be listed as a managing member of Continental Divide International LLC (CDI), one of the three organizations with which Zinke has vowed to cut ties. That's potentially problematic, watchdogs say, because in the agreement with the U.S. Office of Government Ethics that he signed Jan. 10, the then-congressman said he understood "that the interests of" his spouse would be legally attributed to him.

"There are a lot of people currently concerned about enforcement — not only within the agencies but also in the White House — and this is a perfect case of it's one thing to have an ethics agreement, but it's another thing to abide by its terms and conditions," said Scott Amey, the general counsel of the nonprofit Project on Government Oversight.

"If Secretary Zinke hasn't resigned his positions in the companies that he used to work for, he's in violation of his ethics agreement," he added. "We need to remedy this blatant breach."

In addition to CDI, Zinke promised the Office of Government Ethics that he "will resign from my position with" Double Tap LLC and the Great Northern Veterans Peace Park Foundation Inc., as soon as the Senate approved his nomination to lead Interior.

CDI, which has collected tens of thousands of dollars in consulting fees from a political group Zinke created, and Double Tap were both founded as hospitality industry ventures.

But both are now "family held residential rental property LLCs," Zinke said in a statement to the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which vetted his nomination.

The mission of the foundation, meanwhile, "is to maintain a children's sledding park and community open space" in Zinke's hometown, Whitefish, Mont., he told the committee.

The Interior Department argues that the secretary has, in fact, complied with the ethics deal.

"The claims made by E&E are patently false," press secretary Heather Swift said in a statement. "The Secretary worked with the career veteran ethics officials at the Department every step of the way. He currently has no management role in any of the organizations identified."

Shortly after being confirmed by the Senate on March 1, "Secretary Zinke resigned as a managing member from the family's two small businesses and a nonprofit organization, which he founded to build the Veterans Peace Park," she said.

Swift provided three brief letters addressed to "To Whom It May Concern" in which Zinke said he had resigned from the respective groups "effective immediately."

"The documents were mailed to the attorney of the boards, who confirmed receipt, fulfilling the Secretary's requirement," she said.

Those resignation letters, however, never made it to the Montana secretary of state's office.

"The problem that exists here is, there seems to be a pattern of activities where his secretary has been less than transparent," said Meredith McGehee, the chief of policy, programs and strategy at Issue One, an ethics advocacy group. "It doesn't seem like he has bent over backwards to ensure that the i's are dotted and the t's are crossed."

McGehee argued that the ethics questions surrounding Zinke and other members of the Trump administration are due to a lack of leadership at the top.

"In past administrations, Republican and Democratic alike, this is where the White House counsel — particularly for these Cabinet-level officials — would step in and say, 'Hey, guys, get your act together,'" she said. "That's what has been sorely missing in this administration."

She pointed to a compliance form that the ethics office unveiled earlier this month for Senate-confirmed officials.

"There seems to be a growing concern that compliance is not happening within the normal expected time frame within the administration," she said.

Zinke will have to complete the form by June 5, the beginning of his fourth month in office. It includes the following statement: "I completed all of the resignations indicated in my ethics agreement before I assumed the duties of my current government position."

But the letters signed by the secretary and provided to E&E News are dated March 6, five days after he was sworn into office (E&E Daily, March 2).

Heather Swift

Double Tap, CDI

Montana state records also raise questions about money Zinke earned in 2016 from Double Tap, one of the companies from which he promised to resign.

Zinke told the ethics office in a financial disclosure report that Double Tap, established in June 2011, was worth more than $100,000 and provided him with an income of between $5,000 and $15,000 last year.

But in 2013, it had been shut down by Montana's secretary of state after failing to submit the necessary annual report and fees.

"Since the Annual Report was not successfully filed, Montana law requires the Secretary of State to dissolve your business," the notice said. "Dissolution proceedings against the Corporation or Limited Liability Company have been completed. The Corporation or Limited Liability Company has involuntarily given up its right to transact business in the State of Montana."

State and federal records, on the other hand, show that CDI has been the focus of ethical complaints in the past.

Zinke established CDI, the company in which Lolita Zinke is a managing member, under the initial name Continental Divide Inns LLC in March 2005, a few years before he retired from the Navy. The principal place of business listed for the company was a property Zinke owned in Whitefish.

The following year, CDI was involuntarily dissolved by the state of Montana after its members failed to file legally required annual reports and fees. In January 2007, a year before Zinke would be honorably discharged from military service, he and his wife submitted reports for 2006 and 2007, after which the company was reinstated.

In 2008, Zinke won a seat in the Montana Senate. A few months before going to Helena for the legislative session the next year, Zinke officially changed the name of CDI to Continental Divide International LLC.

Halfway through his first term in the state Senate, Zinke ran unsuccessfully for lieutenant governor in 2012. That same year, he also launched Special Operations For America (SOFA), a military-focused super political action committee, a type of independent group that is allowed by the Federal Election Commission to raise and spend unlimited sums of money to advocate for or against political candidates.

Less than a month after Zinke announced he was stepping down from his volunteer position as chairman of SOFA, he entered the race for Montana's lone congressional seat on Oct. 21, 2013.

SOFA supported Zinke's bid for Congress, prompting concerns from watchdog groups about the potential illegal coordination between his campaign and the supposedly independent super PAC, which was registered to another property Zinke owns via Double Tap in Whitefish. In March 2014, the Campaign Legal Center and Democracy 21 filed a complaint with the FEC, asking it to investigate the ties between the super PAC and Zinke's campaign. A spokesman for the center said the agency never responded to the groups' request.

SOFA spent $175,000 in support of Zinke during the 2014 election cycle, FEC data show. At the same time, the super PAC told the election commission that it paid CDI over $11,600 for "consulting" and travel reimbursements.

Altogether, the company that Zinke now describes as a "rental property" business made almost $45,000 from SOFA from July 2012 until 14 months later, when he announced on Facebook that he was leaving the super PAC.

Zinke's adult daughter, Jennifer Detlefsen, was also directly paid $2,500 by SOFA for "digital consulting" and "social media," FEC records indicate. Along with Zinke's two sons, she is a managing member of CDI, as well.

"It's a bunch of self-dealing transactions," said McGehee of Issue One. "It would probably be impermissible in a reasonable world. But this is an unreasonable world."

She added, "Part of the problem here is, what is legal is pretty much the scandal. If you put it to a smell test, the smell test stinks."

Secretary Ryan Zinke Appoints Veteran Interior Official Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior

Tribal Leaders, Congressional Officials, Others Praise Selection

WASHINGTON – U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced the appointment of former Interior Department official and former Chief of Staff to Rep. Steve Pearce (NM) Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior. In this role, Willens will work closely with yet-to-be-confirmed Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt. Willens brings with him more than 20 years of public policy and governmental affairs experience, with proven successes on behalf of prior Administrations, Members of Congress, national associations, and the private sector. He possesses a deep knowledge and understanding of the Department’s many complex policies, ranging from land to energy, wildlife, and water management.

"In addition to being a westerner, Todd brings a strong combination of public and private sector experience to the Interior Department," Secretary Ryan Zinke said. "Most of Interior's holdings and responsibilities are in the West, and Todd's intimate understanding of the West, from growing up in rural California to his previous time at Interior to his tenure with Congressman Pearce, will be a major asset to the people we serve. I look forward to Todd helping us advance Interior's mission and the work of the Administration on behalf of local communities."

"It is an honor and privilege to be appointed as Interior's Assistant Deputy Secretary," Willens said. "I thank Secretary Zinke for his confidence in my abilities to serve the Department and the Administration. I look forward to getting to work contributing to the implementation of the President's priorities for the Department and our Agencies, making America great again."

Willens served as Chief of Staff to Congressman Steve Pearce (R-NM) from 2010 to 2017. During his tenure as Chief of Staff, Willens provided strategic advice and operational oversight to meet the needs of the constituents of the 2nd Congressional District of New Mexico. He worked closely with various stakeholders in this capacity, including local government officials, Congress, and the previous Administration to ramp up operations at defense bases, prevent job-killing regulatory action, and increase federal accountability significantly for the people of New Mexico.

"Todd's dedication to New Mexico and the West made him a most effective manager of people and policies," Congressman Pearce said. "More than anything though, my wife Cynthia and I consider him a close friend. He has run my congressional operations for nearly seven years and been my top adviser on numerous items, delivering countless successes on my behalf. I congratulate Todd and the Administration on his appointment to this important position."

"The selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary deepens the bench at Interior," Jackie Johnson Pata, Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians, said. "In his prior work as Chief of Staff for Congressman Stevan Pearce, Todd handled a wide range of Native issues. In that role, he earned the great respect of many in Indian Country. As the Administration and Tribal Nations partner to advance economic development and self-sufficiency for Native communities, Todd's expertise and experience will be a valuable asset."

"I have worked with Todd for several years. He has an exceptional understanding of western issues in general, and Native issues in particular," Chairman Paul Torres of the All Pueblo Council of Governors said. "Todd is exactly the kind of leadership that can advance Interior's trust responsibility to tribes, while supporting tribal sovereignty and self-determination. This is an exceptional selection by the Administration."

"The Tehama Colusa Canal Authority couldn't be more pleased with the selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary at the Department of the Interior," Jeff Sutton, General Manager of the Tehama Colusa Canal Authority, said. "A native of Northern California, Todd has a great deal of experience in Western water issues and, as a sportsman-conservationist, he has a long track record of delivering mutually beneficial policy outcomes for the benefit of fish, wildlife and water users throughout the Western United States. We look forward to working with Todd in his new capacity."

"The Civil War Trust strongly supports the appointment of Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior," James Lighthizer, President of the Civil War Trust, said. "In his previous service on Capitol Hill and in the Department of the Interior, Todd has been a champion of our national parks and historic battlefield sites. We are excited about the opportunity to partner with him to preserve America's battlefield parks as places of remembrance as well as heritage tourism destinations."

"The Boone and Crockett Club proudly supports Todd Willens' appointment," said Paul

Phillips, co-chair of the Boone and Crocket Club’s Policy Committee. “Mr. Willens is a conservationist who hunts. He has this personal passion and understands the ecological and economic benefits that follow for the public. His experience in the complexities of policy at the Department of the Interior will serve the country and conservation community all very well.”

Prior to working on Capitol Hill, Willens served as Deputy Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks at the Department of the Interior from 2006 to 2008. While at the Department, he worked on the National Parks Centennial, and the historic recovery of the Bald Eagle. In addition, Willens also served as Senior Policy Advisor for United States House of Representatives Committee on Natural Resources from 2003 to 2006. In this capacity, he worked closely with the Chairman to develop key legislation, including the 2005 Endangered Species Act Reauthorization and the 2005 Energy Bill. A California native, Willens is a 1994 graduate of the University of California, Los Angeles. He currently lives in Washington, D.C. with his wife and four children.

UTAH – FULL STORY

1. Op-ed: What Bears Ears is really like

The Salt Lake Tribune, May 4 | Brian K. Jones

There are lots of articles about Bears Ears National Monument but very few describe what it's actually like to be there.

I've been exploring this area for well over 20 years. This is a national issue and few people in the country have any concept of what is actually there. Here is a description of a day. (None of the archaeological sites described here appears on published maps. BLM archeologists have asked me not to mention specific locations.)

The two-track winds through the junipers and pinion pines toward the unmarked trailhead. I park the truck, throw on a pack and walk down the trail into the canyon. There's no one here.

At the bottom of the canyon I turn east, following a faint trail. There's a cave. Ancient steps carved in the sandstone lead up to the floor of a cliff dwelling. There are walls, petroglyphs and handprints.

I cross the creek and beat my way through the brush. On a cliff face there is a long petroglyph panel with many carvings; spirals, zigzags, star-shapes, human forms and goats. A line of moqui steps ascends up through the sandstone.

I follow a trail into a dark alcove. The cottonwoods are thick and the air is cool. Above is a broad overhang and a large rectangular dwelling is perfectly preserved. It is inaccessible from below, inaccessible to looters. As I approach I hear the screeches of birds. An adult great horned owl is fighting with a raven on a long bent limb of a cottonwood. The fight continues for several minutes until the raven retreats and the owl settles into a window in the cliff dwelling. This is her home. Perhaps there are fledglings inside.

I take pictures and set out my digital recorder to capture the sounds. The canyon wrens make their musical descending calls. The spotted towhees twitter in the scrub oak. I pack my gear and move up the arroyo to another alcove.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The remains of a small dwelling are perched on a ledge. A petroglyph shows a human form. Above the figure, small chips have been cut in the rock in an oval shape, like the balloon in a cartoon. The petroglyph figure is trying to tell me something. I am listening.

I rest in the deep shade of a cliff. The water from my pack is warm but refreshing. I press on up the canyon. Around every corner there is something new.

The sun sets on the canyon. I am tired and dusty. There is a creek back at camp with a swimming hole. It beckons. I have seen 20 ancestral puebloan sites in one canyon. A thousand years ago this was a paradise. I can imagine the corn growing in the arroyo, hear it blowing in the breeze and the sounds of the people working the soil. The odor of their fires still lingers in the timbers of the dwellings. The great drought began around 1300 AD. They could no longer grow enough food, so they built castles on ledges as defense from marauders. Then they were gone.

There are over 100,000 documented archaeological sites in Bears Ears National Monument. Each one tells a story. I've been exploring for over 20 years. Maybe I've seen a thousand. I'm just scratching the surface.

People will debate the designation of this place as a National Monument. I know nothing about that. I only know what it feels like to walk up these canyons and explore the world of The Ancient Ones.

2. County appeal over northern corridor dismissed by board

St George News, May 4 | Julie Applegate

ST. GEORGE – The U.S. Department of the Interior’s Board of Land Appeals has dismissed an appeal over recent Bureau of Land Management resource plans.

Washington County, St. George City and the Washington County Water Conservancy District filed the appeal Feb. 23 over what officials feel is the lack of a satisfactory route for a northern corridor and inadequate utility development protocols in the resource plans.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The appeal was dismissed April 28 in an order signed by administrative judges James Roberts and Amy Sosin.

“These appeals are dismissed because we do not have jurisdiction to consider challenges to land designations,” the dismissal states. Legal challenges to BLM’s land designation in resource management plans are not within the board’s authority, the judges said.

“When and if BLM makes specific decisions implementing the RMPs’ (resource management plans’) designations of right-of-way exclusion and avoidance areas, adversely affected parties will have the opportunity to challenge those decisions, e.g., right-of-way grant application denials, before the board.”

County officials will continue pursuing their options, Deputy Washington County Attorney Celeste Maloy said.

“We aren’t going to stop working to make sure that we can bring utilities to the residents of the county, provide necessary water and plan for foreseeable future transportation needs,” Malloy said.

We are still regularly communicating with BLM about our concerns. If they can’t solve the problems administratively, then we will focus our time and energy on the legislative and legal avenues.”

The decision was not entirely unexpected and does not signal the end of the county’s appeal process, Washington County Commissioner Dean Cox said.

“Instead, Washington County has embraced a comprehensive plan to pursue all useful avenues of redress including administrative, legislative, and the courts, if necessary,” Cox said.

Opposition

Four conservation groups including the Conserve Southwest Utah, which is based in St. George, oppose any loosening of the management plans and filed motions to intervene in the appeal.

Conserve Southwest Utah President Tom Butine said the group suspects the next move on the county’s part will be federal court, but they would prefer to pursue other options.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

“Rather than proceed down judicial or even legislative paths, we would much rather work with the county commissioners to understand and perhaps mitigate their concerns,” Butine said.

“We think there are practical solutions to the county’s three main issues, and we’re hoping to be able to work with them on those solutions.”

History

The county, city and water district are opposing resource management plans for the Red Cliffs and Beaver Dam Wash national conservation areas in Washington County. The Bureau of Land Management recently completed the plans that affect more than 100,000 acres.

Local officials believe the plans do not reflect what was promised by the Omnibus Public Land Management Act of 2009, a collaborative effort between the county, municipalities, state and federal governments, and conservation groups that was intended to resolve land use conflicts in the county.

Language in the Act specified that a northern corridor through the Red Cliffs National Conservation Area be designated; however, the bill’s language is vague and has been interpreted differently by the interested parties.

The appeal specifically contested the designation of large exclusion areas in the national conservation areas. Exclusion areas are not available for roads, power lines or pipelines, under any conditions and would prevent the construction of the proposed northern corridor.

Donald Trump recently signed an executive order that tasks the Interior Department with investigating 24 of the 57 national monuments designated since 1996. Some worry that this order is the first step in allowing presidents to reverse national monument designations.

But the order addresses a deeper issue — whether a century-old law has been abused by presidents in the last 20 years. While the Antiquities Act may have been important for preserving some Native American artifacts, recent monument designations have allowed presidents to affect the access to and use of millions of acres of land without regard to local effects.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Since 1906, the Antiquities Act has allowed presidents to change the use of land with the stroke of a pen — land that they have frequently never seen. The Antiquities Act was designed to allow presidents to protect lands that are in immediate danger of being damaged.

The Antiquities Act specifies that designated areas must cover “the smallest area compatible with proper care and management of the objects to be protected.” The first monument created under the Antiquities Act, Devil’s Tower National Monument in Wyoming, covers 1,347 acres, less than 3 square miles. The monument covers the Devil’s Tower itself — nothing more.

Bears Ears National Monument, an area in southern Utah designated at the end of 2016, covers far more than the buttes it’s named for. The monument spans 1.35 million acres (roughly 2,100 square miles) and includes neighboring canyons, gulches and even an existing wilderness area.

When national monument designations are made over vast swaths of land, the results can be devastating to locals. In 1996, President Bill Clinton designated Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument, an area in southern Utah that covers 1.9 million acres. Clinton announced the designation from the South Rim of the Grand Canyon in Arizona, more than 100 miles from the monument itself. When he announced the monument, locals and Utah officials were blindsided. While some Utahans were concerned about mining in the area, there was no local movement to manage and protect the land with a federal designation. It seems that Clinton might have designated the area purely in a political ploy, not in the interest of protecting the land.

In 2016, near the end of his time in office, President Barack Obama designated Bears Ears National Monument. Prior to the designation, Utah Rep. Rob Bishop, a Republican, proposed the Public Lands Initiative, an alternative to the national monument that would have created 11 national conservation areas and added to or created 41 wilderness areas. In addition, the bill would have opened up some of Utah’s lands to energy development.

While there may have been national support for the monument’s designation, many Utahans and those closest to the area did not want it. The designation restricts grazing and prohibits the collection of wood in the area. Since many locals depend on wood to heat their homes and cook their food, the national monument could hurt local people.

It's easy to agree that the American landscape should be managed in such a way that our great-great-grandchildren will be able to enjoy its beauty. In that respect, the intentions of the Antiquities Act are noble. But designations like Grand Staircase-Escalante and Bears Ears that cover millions of acres and ignore local impacts suggest the law has been abused.

With so much evidence of federal overreach, we shouldn't be afraid to examine recent national monument designations. When laws intended to protect some of our most valued landscapes are instead abused to win political battles, both current and future generations of Americans lose.

5. With National Monuments Under Review, Bears Ears Is Focus Of Fierce Debate

NPR, May 5 / Kirk Siegler

A lot of the anger over federal public land in rural Utah today can be traced back to a windy, gray day in Arizona in September 1996. At the Grand Canyon, President Bill Clinton formally designated the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument in Utah, more than 100 miles away.

"On this remarkable site, God's handiwork is everywhere in the natural beauty of the Escalante Canyons," he said.

Clinton didn't set foot in Utah. The planning for the monument was largely done in secret and state leaders had little warning it was coming.

Now, nearly 21 years later, mistrust toward the federal government persists, in the tightknit, mostly Mormon town of Blanding, Utah. Folks can't help but draw a parallel to how President Barack Obama's sweeping Bears Ears National Monument ended up in their backyard.

"I don't understand how it would protect the land when you're inviting thousands of footprints in," says Laura O'Donnell.

O'Donnell, who works at Blanding's modest visitor center, says she's uncomfortable with her town suddenly being the flashpoint in the heated debate over the future of federal public lands.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke is keeping a promise to travel into rural Utah beginning this weekend to hear from locals who live around the new 1.35-million acre Bears Ears monument, and the established 1.8-million acre Grand Staircase National Monument to the west. The Trump administration has launched a controversial 45-day review over whether large national monuments like these that protect federal land should be rescinded or shrunk.

In Blanding, Zinke's visit is highly anticipated. Here, opposition to the monument runs deeper than the usual anxieties in sagebrush country about adding more protections to public land that would restrict future mining and other development.

"Monuments should be an honor to an area, and we feel like this one is nothing but a punishment," says Jami Bayles, who founded a group called the Stewards of San Juan County.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

From her office at a small college, you can see the twin "Bears Ears" buttes framing the distant horizon out on the vast Cedar Mesa west of town. While not as visually dramatic as the famous national parks nearby, the area is dense with cliff dwellings and ancient artifacts.

Bayles and many of her neighbors felt offended when the federal government announced additional protections under a new monument because they felt it sent a message that the land was being threatened.

"We keep that place pristine, we keep it clean, we check on it all the time," Bayles says. "I guess my argument is, OK, yeah, it belongs to everybody, but not everybody has been taking care of it."

Bayles says the monument is being pushed by extreme, out-of-state, environmentalists and her side has struggled to be heard.

There are deep pockets behind the campaign to protect Bears Ears.

But San Juan County is about 50 percent Native American. A short drive down the road, on the Navajo Nation Reservation, tribal leaders say it's a lie for people in Blanding to argue that the monument is being pushed on them from the outside.

"For them to be here for 130 years, they should at least understand the Native Americans now," says Kenneth Maryboy, a chapter president.

Native Americans from around the Four Corners region that back the new monument are open about the fact that they're getting outside help and money because they didn't have a voice before, according to interviews with tribal leaders. Many tribes in the region have officially come out in support of the monument, though not all.

Maryboy was involved with the first talks with Utah's congressional delegation almost a decade ago about protecting Bears Ears as a National Conservation Area. They broke down last year, then came President Obama's executive order.

"Our gripe and our fight is to preserve what's there, the Native American artifacts, the antiquities, and all the shrines and the ruins," Maryboy says.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The sacred burial grounds of the famous Navajo leader Manuelito are included in the new monument, among other things. Maryboy sees the monument as crucial to protecting these antiquities from vandalism and looting, an historical problem in San Juan County.

"The San Juan County good ol' boys don't want to see this happen," says Maryboy. "They adamantly, openly said, 'This is our land. The damn Navajos need to go back to the reservation.'"

It's not an overstatement to say that Secretary Zinke will see deep tension and polarization when he arrives at Bears Ears late this weekend for a two-day tour.

Tribes here point to a history of broken promises with the U.S. government. If the Trump administration moves to abolish Bears Ears, it's not hard to imagine a Standing Rock-inspired protest here. On the other hand, if the monument stays intact, some wonder whether the militias that support Cliven Bundy and his sons would arrive in San Juan County.

Back in Blanding, some locals like Ferd Johnson are floating a compromise. Why not just shrink the monument, and protect the cliff dwellings and other antiquities themselves, they say.

"All these environmentalists, these Navajos, Hopis and the other Indians didn't even know where the Bears Ears was," Johnson says. "Why is it so sacred if they don't even know where it is?"

The tribes dispute this. Some have already signaled they'll sue if, after Zinke's Utah trip, the Trump administration moves to rescind Bears Ears.

6. Record-setting southern Utah tourism highlights stakes of national monument debate

KSL News, May 5 | Dave Cawley

SALT LAKE CITY — U.S. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's plan to visit southern Utah next week will place him, and by extension the Trump Administration, in the middle of two bitter fights over public lands in the state.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

One, a white-hot battle over the 1.3-million-acre Bears Ears National Monument in San Juan County, erupted last December when then-President Barack Obama created the monument at the request of tribal representatives and against the wishes of county and state leaders.

The other fight has simmered for two decades. It deals with an older and even larger monument, blamed by many in southern Utah for slowly strangling the life out of their communities. Yet the disagreement over Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument is coming back to a boil even as tourism in the region sets new records year after year.

A review of economic indicators by KSL, including employment data, visitation statistics, tourism-related tax revenues and county building permit records obtained through an open records request, reveals both the struggles and opportunities facing places like Cannonville, Kanab, Boulder and Big Water.

The simmering dispute

An irritated Rep. Mike Noel, R-Kanab, was sick of hearing about the values of southern Utah's tourism economy. During a meeting of the state's House Natural Resource, Agriculture and Environment Committee in late February, the lawmaker unloaded on his colleagues from Salt Lake City.

"People tell me there's all kinds of jobs down there; everything's going great," Noel said. "I really kind of get a gutful of it up here, I really do. It bothers me because it sends a false premise."

Noel represents House District 73, a giant swath of territory covering all of Kane, Garfield, San Juan, Wayne and Piute Counties, as well as pieces of Beaver and Sevier Counties. He chastised urban lawmakers for suggesting federal management of Utah lands has had a positive influence by driving visitors, and by extension their tax dollars, into the rural region he represents.

"I've lived there for 41 years. I've seen what's happened down there and my ancestors have lived there for over 100 years and it's not in a good condition as far as you say, as far as economically and what's happening to families," Noel said.

In recent years Noel has helped lead the charge in several high-profile efforts to take control of federal lands. Key among those lands is the monument at the heart of his district — Grand Staircase-Escalante.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The maligned monument

As designated by President Bill Clinton in 1996, Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument covered roughly 1.9 million acres. It's bounded on the east by Capitol Reef National Park and Glen Canyon National Recreation Area, and on the west by Bryce Canyon National Park. The monument's northern edge abuts the Dixie National Forest, while its southern extremity touches the Arizona border.

Wrapped within it sits a maze of twisted river canyons, eroded sandstone pinnacles and arches, relics of pioneer history and fossilized dinosaur bones.

Rep. Noel's cry to turn over those lands to state management, or to at least prioritize cattle grazing, ATV use and mineral extraction, have support from people like Garfield County Commissioner Leland Pollock.

"200,000 acres would be a stretch, to say that there's antiquities, things of value that meet the Antiquities Act criteria," Pollock said. "What is it? It's BLM range. It's brush land. It's sage brush."

The Bureau of Land Management administers the monument, unlike most other Utah monuments which are instead operated by the National Park Service.

Prior to the designation two decades ago, a bitter fight had raged between the mining company Andalex Resources, Inc. and environmental groups over the company's plans to extract large amounts of coal from the region. Andalex held federal mineral leases around the Kaiparowitz Plateau.

The wording of President Clinton's declaration made clear those existing leases were to be honored. However, the company made the decision not to develop the resources and ultimately gave up the leases in exchange for $14 million from the Department of the Interior.

Miners were not the only ones with claims to the land. Ranchers also held leases that allowed them to graze their cattle over much of what is now in the monument. Those uses were largely respected and allowed to continue by the Bureau of Land Management, though some parcels were withdrawn from use.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Monument critics believe the coal reserves could still be developed, to the economic benefit of the region, were the federal land managers not standing in the way.

Recreation opportunities on the monument are expansive, though not without difficulty.

Unlike many national parks, where trails are paved and shuttle buses run on tight schedules, Grand Staircase-Escalante is almost entirely primitive. It holds just three established campgrounds: Calf Creek along state Route 12 between Boulder and Escalante, Deer Creek on the Burr Trail Road and White House on the Paria River. Roads to most popular destinations are unpaved and at times impassable due to weather or damage.

“They did not want tourism,” Pollock said. “The monument itself, they would tell me when I was first sworn in as a commissioner, ‘this wasn’t created for tourism. It was created to study science.’”

The popularity explosion

Want them or not, tourists are coming to Grand Staircase-Escalante in record numbers.

Visitation statistics maintained by the National Park Service show Zion led the pack of Utah parks in 2016, taking in 4.3 million people. Bryce Canyon, the state’s second-most-visited park, welcomed almost 2.4 million. Both figures are nearly double the visitation recorded in 1996, when Grand Staircase-Escalante was born.

BLM records show the monument has also almost doubled its annual visitation during the same period. It set a high-water mark of 923,236 visitors last year, placing it above even Canyonlands and about on par with Capitol Reef National Park.

The rate of visitation growth for Zion, Bryce and Arches accelerated sharply in 2013. Kem C. Gardner Policy Institute Director Natalie Gochnour noted that in recent years, the Utah Office of Tourism has heavily advertised the parks with the Mighty Five campaign.

“There’s a lot of money that goes into promoting our state and it’s proven to be very well invested ... but you have to be really careful that you also invest in the quality of that experience,” Gochnour said. “Whether it’s roads or campgrounds or bridges or water treatment plants, amenities, you need to invest in the tourism infrastructure business to get a payback from it.”

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

In Washington County, home to St. George and the Zion gateway community of Springdale, taxes on short-term lodging and restaurant sales have followed a similar curve as the park's visitation. Grand County, too, has shown strong tourism-related tax growth, boosted by visitors to Arches who also stay and spend in Moab.

The visitation spike has helped accelerate recovery in Washington and Grand Counties following the recession of the late 2000s.

"The tax revenues related to tourism and travel are going up, have been for the last five years," Jennifer Leaver said. She works as a research analyst at Gardner Institute and has spent a good deal of time examining the economics of southern Utah. "Jobs have been either remaining flat or going up. Wages have been going up."

But while Garfield County is home to Bryce Canyon, it has not seen quite the same boost.

Challenges of the tourism economy

The tiny town of Boulder is made up of little more than a few buildings and farms snuggled into the valley where state Route 12 and the Burr Trail meet on the southern slopes of Boulder Mountain. As of the 2010 Census, Boulder claimed a population of 226.

Yet it's exactly where Blake Spalding and her partner chose to start their business, Hell's Backbone Grill, shortly after Grand Staircase-Escalante's creation.

"We really just built it up. This is our 18th season. We have about 45 employees that work with us year after year," Spalding said.

Hell's Backbone Grill, which is located on the grounds of the Boulder Mountain Lodge, has received numerous accolades from both local and national press over the years. It draws clientele with its menu and its reputation, but finding qualified help has proved to be one of the restaurant's biggest challenges.

"There's not a business from a construction company to the school to the towns themselves, certainly my restaurant, that isn't hiring right now. We have jobs aplenty," Spalding said. "What we don't have is residents to fill them."

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Making a life in a place like Boulder can be incredibly difficult, especially for someone accustomed to urban living. Cell phone service is spotty. Cultural options are limited, though outdoor recreation is in abundant supply. Grocery runs can require long drives to bigger towns. And while there are jobs available, many are not the kind capable of providing a steady living.

Lecia Langston, a regional economist with the Utah Department of Workforce Services, said tourism jobs tend to come and go.

“For Garfield County particularly they see a huge amount of seasonality so that during the summer they basically have to import a lot of their labor because they need it, but they don’t need it in the winter,” Langston said.

People who can’t afford to stay the winter on what they earned are forced to leave in search of other opportunities, as work in other more stable fields can prove tough to find.

“Garfield County has the highest percentage of leisure and hospitality services jobs in the state. They run about 43 percent of their total non-farm employment,” Langston said.

The result is a yo-yoing effect. In March, the most recent month for which numbers are available, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in Garfield County was 7.1 percent. That was the lowest it’s been since the end of the recession but it was still well above the statewide average of 3.1 percent.

“If you were to look at the raw rate in July for Garfield County it would be very, very, very low,” Langston said. Conversely, it would be much, much higher in December. “Kane County (in March) actually looks fairly low, given the fact that they do have a lot of seasonality. Their unemployment rate right now is 3.2 percent, which is comparable to the state average.”

Kanab on the cusp

Kane and Garfield Counties have much in common, making that difference in their unemployment rate very conspicuous.

“What’s interesting about Kane County is they do have a couple of unusual employers that make their employment numbers look a little bit different,” Langston said. “Kane County’s largest employer is actually Best Friends Animal Sanctuary. They show up in what we call ‘other services’ so they have a really high percentage of employment in that sector. The other thing

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

that's important to know about Kane County is they do have some manufacturing. Stampin' Up was a homegrown company that started in Kane County and still has a sizable employment presence."

That little bit of diversity helps make Kane's economy more resilient. Kane County Office of Tourism Executive Director Camille Johnson said the addition of steady jobs has allowed for more stability and, as a result, investment in the visitor experience.

"We had Comfort Suites and Hampton Inn open up in the last year and we've got a La Quinta on line to open in 2018. Then I just learned of one of our local partners that's doing an expansion," Johnson said. "We've had a lot of new restaurants open up."

The city also has geography to its advantage. Kanab sits within striking distance of Zion, Bryce Canyon, the Grand Canyon, Lake Powell and the Wave. The county is promoting Kanab as a place to base camp while visiting the whole variety of southern Utah destinations. The goal is to keep visitors in town long enough to help the local economy, rather than having them simply pass through on their way to another place.

Johnson said overcrowding in the banner locations like Zion also has Kane County pointing increasingly more visitors toward scenic spots outside of the Mighty Five and within Grand Staircase-Escalante.

"Because tourism is such a hot industry for us right now, we're having a little bit of a labor force crisis and a housing crisis," Johnson said. "With the two new hotels opening up and several restaurants, it spread our already thin labor force even thinner."

Up in Garfield County though, the hospitality industry has grown more slowly since the creation of Grand Staircase-Escalante.

Commercial building permit papers obtained by KSL through an open records request reveal much of the new lodging construction over the last 20 years has focused Ruby's Inn or the Bryce Canyon gateway communities. Recently, more rustic rental options like cabins, yurts or RV parks have started to open around Escalante and Tropic.

Back in Kanab, some fear the rapid growth could dilute the history and western character of the region.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

“Locals will say to me ‘we don’t want to be like Moab, we don’t want to be like Springdale, please don’t let that happen’,” Johnson said. “They’re afraid that we’ll lose the spirit of our community and our heritage and then it won’t be appealing for locals to stay here and then they uproot and then we lose that heritage.”

The tale of two Utahs

The loss of locals is already happening and not just in Kanab. It’s evident from the average age in many rural Utah counties.

“There are two different economic realities in our state. We call it ‘the tale of two Utahs’,” Natalie Gochnour said. “They basically have children who left the counties, presumably for employment opportunities, schooling and they don’t come back. And so these counties get older and older and older.”

Why don’t they come back? Experts agree it’s a lack of high-paying skilled work in rural communities.

“It’s kind of a catch-22 because there aren’t necessarily the kinds of jobs young people want, or that pay the kind of wages that they’d really like to have, so they leave and you don’t get the population growth that you need to spur the economic growth,” Lecia Langston, the Workforce Services regional economist, said.

Garfield County even declared a state of emergency in 2015 due to declining enrollment at Escalante High School.

“In 1996 you had about 144 children enrolled at Escalante school, seventh through 12th grade,” Commissioner Leland Pollock said. “When we declared that state of emergency it was down to 51.”

Pollock points to Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument as the primary reason for the drop. Others though see the problem in more nuanced terms.

“I think it’s really a time to think very purposefully about rural Utah, particularly rural Utah that’s hurting, and figure out how do we connect and unify and help,” Gochnour said.

She suggested that could mean having policymakers lean on urban Utah's strength, investing the fruits of Wasatch Front productivity into rural counties through infrastructure improvements like better roads or broadband access. At the same time, battles over public lands could be quieted by some good-faith deal-making.

“I think a really productive place for state decision makers to focus is on land exchanges and making all of these state institutional trust lands that are locked up inside federal lands, not accessible, getting them closer to the cities, closer to the towns and letting those towns grow,” Gochnour said.

The Wasatch Front could in turn benefit in the form of reduced air pollution and traffic congestion, as more people disperse into areas outside of the urban core. Gochnour suggested outdoor gear companies already operating in the state could lead the charge, choosing to locate their manufacturing facilities in areas like Kanab.

“Maybe it's time for the state and the federal government, locals, recreationists to all come together and say ‘there is a path forward that can address our needs’.”

7. Op-ed: Why Bears Ears is worth monument status

The Spectrum, May 5 | Mike Small, Iron County Democrats

On Dec. 28, 2016, President Obama proclaimed the Bears Ears National Monument by using his authority under the Antiquities Act of 1906. He did this primarily to protect the many cultural resources from vandalism. There are an estimated 100,000 cultural sites in the area and protection of these sites is critically important to Native American people and others.

The truth is that vandalism of Native American cultural sites on Bureau of Land Management-administered lands, while illegal, is relatively common. Vandalism includes organized ongoing looting, grave robbing and destruction of structures. Estimates vary, but some 70 percent of the known sites on BLM-administered land in Southern Utah and Northern Arizona have likely already been vandalized.

The BLM has tried for years to protect the cultural sites but its resources are spread too thin over this large area.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Reaction to President Obama's proclamation has been split. In general, Native Americans and environmentalists, including the Mormon Environmental Stewardship Alliance, support the designation and believe it will result in greater protection for the cultural and other resources in the subject area.

It is also important to note that 99 percent of the Bears Ears National Monument was existing federal public land administered by either the BLM or U.S. Forest Service. The monument designation merely raises the level of resource protection. This designation did not expand federal government land holdings.

However, nearly all elected Republican officials in Utah — including Gov. Gary Herbert, congressional delegation, county commissioners, and others — strongly oppose the designation. The reason for their opposition is probably political, but local culture may also be key.

Most of the elected officials are white and grew up where arrowhead collecting and buried pot hunting were accepted activities. Unfortunately, thus far the governor's opposition to Bears Ears has only resulted in the Outdoor Retailer Show, which had generated some $45 million in annual spending, announcing its exit from Utah.

Nationally, President Trump has directed Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke to review all the national monuments designated in the last 20 years by Presidents Clinton, Bush and Obama and which are more than 100,000 acres, starting with Bears Ears.

Such a review is completely reasonable, especially by a new president. Nonetheless, the legal process by which a president can modify monument designations by previous presidents is unclear.

Hopefully, Zinke will fully involve the tribes, as well as the environmental community and tourism industry, in his review of the Bears Ears. The future of the national monument will depend upon an objective and just review.

Remember, too, that a number of former national monuments have eventually become national parks that contribute greatly to the local and regional economies — for example, Grand Canyon, Zion, Bryce, Acadia, and Grand Teton.

In closing, and to illustrate how Native Americans may not have been fully considered, on the front page of The Spectrum & Daily News on April 27, Utah House Speaker Greg Hughes was quoted that he wanted to ensure "... antiquities are preserved, while keeping the lands accessible to the Native Americans and citizens."

It should be pointed out to Hughes that Native Americans are citizens.

8. Patagonia to Zinke: 'Conserve Our Shared Public Lands for Future Generations'

EcoWatch, May 5 / Yvon Chouinard and Rose Marcario

Dear Secretary Zinke,

As Secretary of the Interior, you hold the solemn responsibility to steward America's public lands and waters on behalf of the American people who own them. Our public lands, including the national monuments you are now reviewing, represent a vital part of our nation's heritage—a legacy that belongs not just to us, but to all future generations of Americans. It is an important part of your job to safeguard this legacy by making careful and informed decisions about what federal lands can be used for development and what special or vulnerable areas should be preserved for the future.

That is why the arbitrary 120-day deadline for you to review whether to shrink or rescind dozens of national monuments is absurd. As you know, the process to establish a national monument often takes years, if not decades. It involves significant study of the area of the proposed monument—including its ecological, cultural, archeological, economic and recreation value—and robust consultation with local communities and their elected representatives at every level. Given the unique and complex histories of each monument, there is simply no way to meaningfully review dozens of individual monuments in such a short period.

You justify this review on the false premise that the American people have not yet been heard on the designation of these national monuments. But the communities near the national monuments under your review have already made their voices heard during public input and stakeholder engagement periods prior to designation. For example, notwithstanding the rhetoric of Utah Governor Gary Herbert and members of the Utah Congressional delegation, the designation of

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Bears Ears National Monument involved years of public input gathered by the Obama administration. This process included a series of public meetings in Southeastern Utah in 2016, including several sessions attended by former Interior Secretary Sally Jewell. It also included significant engagement with the Bears Ears Inter-Tribal Coalition, which represents tribal nations for whom the land is sacred and contains archeological artifacts with immense cultural value. Additionally, in a recent poll, 68 percent of voters in seven Western states said they prioritize the protection of land, water and wildlife for recreation on public land, compared with 22 percent who prioritized increased production of fossil fuels. Your review must account for this extensive record of consultation as you purport to seek public input.

As you undertake this review, we urge you to consider the enormous economic benefits of protected public lands for nearby communities, including many rural areas. A recent study showed that areas in the West with protected lands consistently enjoy better rates of employment and income growth compared to those with no protected lands. In the 22 years since the Grand Staircase-Escalante in Utah was declared a national monument, jobs grew by 38 percent in two neighboring counties. The designation of 17 national monuments—including nine monuments covered under your review—led to significant increases in per capita income in regions adjacent to the newly-protected areas.

Rescinding or shrinking the national monuments under review also threatens the fast-growing outdoor recreation economy, which relies significantly on recreation access to protected public lands. These lands are not "locked up," as the Trump administration has said repeatedly declared—they are extremely productive. As you know, since you participated in the outdoor industry's announcement of a new economic study last week, the recreation economy drives $887 billion in consumer spending every year and supports more jobs (7.6 million) than oil, natural gas and mining combined. Rescinding or shrinking the national monuments under review would significantly impact the strength of the outdoor recreation economy and limit our ability to create and sustain jobs.

Patagonia has been outfitting outdoors people and protecting public lands for more than 30 years. The debate over land and water conservation is always complex and sometimes divisive. But we have never witnessed the legacy of America's federal lands encountering greater risk than we see right now. As you visit these protected places and report back to the president, I urge you to follow in the tradition of President Teddy Roosevelt and conserve our shared public lands for future generations.

E&E/NATIONAL NEWS – FULL STORY

1. BLM suspends Resource Advisory Council meetings as part of national review of committees

The Denver Post, May 4 | Jason Blevins

The Bureau of Land Management has suspended Colorado’s four Resource Advisory Councils until September as part of a national review of the agency’s advisory boards and committees.

BLM public affairs specialists emailed members of the state’s four Resource Advisory Councils this week, informing them the upcoming June and August meetings were suspended.

The councils — typically 15 citizen-nominated members who meet four times a year — are made up of public land management stakeholders like conservationists, ranchers, outdoor recreation users, energy industry representatives and local leaders. According to a national statement from the BLM, the agency is reviewing more than 200 boards, committees and other advisory councils. The review “necessitates the postponement of all advisory committee meetings” until September, according to the statement.

Greg Zimmerman, deputy director of the Center of Western Priorities conservation group, said the canceled meetings are “a significant development” because they fall while the Interior Department searches for potential violations of the Antiquities Act in the presidential creation of national monuments since 1996.

“Resource Advisory Councils are one of the primary venues for BLM to receive direct feedback from stakeholders ... designed to ensure that the diverse set of stakeholders that care about public lands have a direct say in how lands are managed,” Zimmerman said. “This announcement runs absolutely counter to the Trump Administration’s commitment to listen to rural communities. At the very time they’re discussing major land management changes—eliminating monuments and increasing the pace of development—they’re also choosing to shutout stakeholders.”

2. Op-ed: Environment suffers as union diverts funds to clean deserted mine sites

The Hill, May 5 | Arthur Wardle and Randy Simmons

The Abandoned Mine Land fund (AML) is America's source of funding for reclaiming abandoned coal mines, especially those causing environmental damage. Financed through a tax on coal production, the AML was set up by Congress to serve that goal alone.

Since its 1977 passage, however, numerous interest groups have managed to jockey for a piece of the fund. In its deliberations over an omnibus spending package, Congress is again being given the chance to review one of largest diversions from the AML: United Mine Workers of America (UMWA) benefits packages.

To ensure the future of abandoned coal mine reclamation, Congress should put an end to AML fund misuse by discontinuing transfers to the UMWA. Instead, Congress appears ready to make the misuse permanent.

The AML was established by Congress in the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 to reclaim coal mines that had been abandoned, often by long-gone companies. Just under $6 billion has been spent to date to restore nearly 800,000 acres of land and water in the United States. There's still plenty of reclamation work to be done — the Bureau of Land Management estimates that at least 92,000 sites in need of restoration remain on BLM property in California, Nevada and Utah alone.

The AML's implementation has generally been beneficial, but any large pile of government money attracts vultures, and the AML is no exception. Although misuse takes many forms, UMWA transfers are the most obvious aberration in AML spending. The diversion began in 1992 after Congress first allowed the UMWA to draw upon AML resources for their combined benefit fund (which came with a $70 million cap).

That cap was later removed. These transfers to the UMWA have been made with woefully inadequate oversight. A recent report from the Office of the Inspector General found that the government failed to verify beneficiary eligibility for fund recipients, provide documentation to support administrative expenses, or reconcile key information, among other abuses.

Protecting the health and pension benefits of retired mine workers is a noble goal, but it is not the intended goal of the AML. Its goal is environmental reclamation, and when funds are diverted to support other priorities, that can only come at the expense of the environment.

Some might be tempted to say that the AML is a good source of funds for anything the coal industry is collectively responsible for, not necessarily just environmental reclamation. By this argument, using AML dollars to fund benefits for workers who may have been physically harmed from working in the coal industry might initially appear to make sense.

This logic would not, however, justify holding the entire coal industry to account for UMWA benefits packages when, in 2015, only a meager 9 percent of domestic coal was produced by UMWA producers.

Coal miners have understandably attracted sympathy from across the political aisle, as many promised retirement and health benefits never materialized. But even if Congress unanimously agrees that UMWA benefits are a worthwhile use of government funds, there is no reason that money should come at the expense of reclamation.

The AML serves an important role in cleaning up abandoned sites left unaddressed by modern regulation. Protecting the financial security of the AML, even from nobly intentioned diversions, is critical to ensure the fund exists for future cleanup efforts. Today, that means standing against attempts to divert AML funds away from reclamation and toward politically-connected unions.

3. Sage-grouse Population Increases When Interloping Western Juniper is Pushed Back

Cattlenetwork, May 5 | Chris Branam, Oregon State University

Greater sage-grouse, a bird that has been the subject of intense conservation efforts in recent decades, do better in areas where juniper trees have been removed, new research suggests.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The four-year study is the first to link sage-grouse demographics with tree reduction and supports the idea of conserving sage-grouse by controlling conifer expansion into the bird's habitat. In the last half of the 20th century, the proliferation of the western juniper in Oregon and pinyon pine in Nevada and Utah degraded the sagebrush ecosystem by forming dense stands that suck up rainwater and push sagebrush out.

The findings are published in the journal PLOS ONE.

“We are tremendously excited,” said Christian Hagen, an avian ecologist at Oregon State University and a co-author of the study. “The arrow is pointing in the right direction. The grouse are finding these areas where the juniper was taken out much more quickly than we anticipated.”

This study focused on the encroachment of western juniper in southeast Oregon and just over the border in California and Nevada. Wildlife biologists in Oregon, Idaho and Montana, estimated a 25 percent increase in the sage-grouse population growth rate in an area where western juniper was being removed, either by cutting or burning, where juniper continued to spread slowly and the sage-grouse population did not increase.

The researchers collected data on 219 female sage-grouse and 225 nests from 2010 to 2014 in an area in southeast Oregon where western juniper was being removed and an area with no removal in southeast Oregon, northeast California and northwest Nevada. Both areas involved both public and private lands.

The annual survival of females from one breeding season to the next, and the survival of their nests over a month-long incubation period, both led to population growth over time, Hagen said. In the area where juniper was removed, female sage-grouse annual survival increased 6.6 percent each year, and the nest survival rate increased by 18.8 percent each year.

Encroaching juniper degrades sage-grouse habitat in two ways: by outcompeting the sagebrush and by introducing trees that the birds consider threatening, said Hagen, a senior researcher in the College of Agricultural Sciences.

“Dense tree stands become perches and hiding cover for predators, so sage-grouse avoid them,” Hagen said.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The trees that were removed were less than a hundred years old, Hagen said. Most of the juniper was cut down by hand-cutting and chainsaws and generally occurred from late fall to early spring, to both maximize shrub retention and minimize negative effects to grouse breeding activities.

The study was led by John Severson, who conducted the research for his dissertation at the University of Idaho. The research was funded by the U.S. Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Department of Agriculture Natural Resources Conservation Service, through its Conservation Effects Assessment Project and Sage Grouse Initiative.

4. INTERIOR: Agency suspends advisory panels even as decisions loom

E & E News, May 5 | Scott Streater

The Interior Department is formally reviewing the "charter and charge" of more than 200 advisory panels that assist federal agencies managing hundreds of millions of acres of public lands at a time when the Trump administration is considering significant changes to land-use designations and management practices.

The Bureau of Land Management has told members of its 30 resource advisory councils (RACs) to postpone scheduled meetings through at least September as part of the new national review of Interior's advisory panels, both internal and external.

That includes canceling meetings of six other BLM advisory committees affiliated with specific sites within the agency's National Conservation Lands system, as well as two other high-profile panels: the National Wild Horse and Burro Advisory Board and the North Slope Science Initiative Science Technical Advisory Panel in Alaska.

It also affects other panels, such as the National Park System Advisory Board, which advises the NPS director and Interior secretary "on matters relating to the National Park Service, the National Park System, and programs administered by the National Park Service," including the Antiquities Act, which has been targeted by GOP congressional leaders.

The timing means some land management recommendations — including a high-profile review of national monuments — will be completed without the advisory panels' input.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Heather Swift, an Interior spokeswoman, told E&E News in an email today that the review is part of an ongoing effort by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke aimed at "restoring trust in the Department's decision-making."

Swift said the review of "the charter and charge of each Board/Advisory Committee" is designed to "maximize feedback from these boards and ensure their compliance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act," the 1972 law that ensures that advice by various advisory committees is objective and accessible to the public.

"This review process necessitates the temporary postponement of advisory committee meetings," Swift said.

But Swift said the review is also designed to ensure compliance with "the President's recent executive orders."

President Trump in the last month has signed a number of executive orders, including one requiring the review of all policies that may "potentially burden" energy production activity on federal lands.

Trump last week also signed one requiring Interior to review the boundaries of dozens of national monuments designated within the last two decades and to decide whether they should be altered or eliminated (Greenwire, April 26).

That executive order is targeted at more than 30 national monuments designated since 1996 that comprise at least 100,000 acres. It will initially focus on the fate of the recently designated 1.35-million-acre Bears Ears National Monument but will ultimately include sites like the 1.9-million-acre Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument, both in Utah.

That executive order requires Zinke to submit a report with his recommendations on the national monuments to the president within 120 days, before the Interior review of the advisory committees and boards is completed and the postponement of the meetings lifted.

That means the Utah resource advisory council that provides recommendations to BLM on management of the 22.9 million acres of federal public lands in the state will not weigh in on the national monument issue; neither, presumably, will the members of the agency's Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument advisory committee.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

That concerns Greg Zimmerman, deputy director of the Center for Western Priorities.

"The Trump administration and Interior Secretary Zinke talk a big game about including Western communities in decisionmaking on public lands, but this action proves it's nothing more than talk," Zimmerman said. "They are shutting out input from communities just as the administration takes unprecedented steps toward wiping national monuments from the map."

It's a particular concern for BLM, critics say.

Canceling the BLM RAC meetings "sends a clear signal that Secretary Zinke intends to make decisions behind closed doors and not through an open and transparent public process," Zimmerman said.

The agency's 30 RACs, whose members are appointed by the Interior secretary, are designed to help guide BLM administrators on a wide variety of issues involving major projects such as multistate transmission lines and energy projects.

The advisory panels typically have 10 to 15 members, who are supposed to represent a cross-section of local residents, state government agencies, industry and conservation leaders. They evaluate and submit recommendations on "land use planning, fire management, off-highway vehicle use, recreation, oil and gas exploration, noxious weed management, grazing issues, wild horse and burro herd management issues," and other topics, according to BLM.

Recommendations from the RACs, established by Interior in 1995 during the Clinton administration, are supposed to carry significant weight with BLM leaders.

But there have been some high-profile examples in the past two years where BLM ignored the recommendations of its RACs.

BLM in January approved the final two segments of the Gateway West Transmission Line Project in Idaho over the objections of an eight-member subcommittee of the BLM Boise District's RAC that concluded the route would unnecessarily affect communities, natural resource values and private landowners (Greenwire, Jan. 20).

And last year, BLM formally approved the 287-megawatt Soda Mountain Solar Project in the Southern California desert, despite the recommendation of BLM California's Desert District RAC against the project and its impacts on wildlife, groundwater quality and other natural resources (E&E News PM, April 5, 2016).

5. Q&A: Bishop serves up politics, plays and Dr Pepper

E & E News, May 5 | Kellie Lunney

Utah Republican Rep. Rob Bishop knows that timing is everything in theater, music and politics.

The seven-term congressman, a former thespian and sometime piano player, is poised to capitalize on the White House's current focus on reviewing the 111-year-old law that gives presidents broad authority to designate national monuments without congressional approval, as well as a major push to upgrade the country's failing infrastructure.

As a Westerner and the chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, Bishop, 66, is an influential voice in the debate over the "damn" Antiquities Act, as he's called it. The law became an even greater source of angst for him after President Obama protected 1.35 million acres of land late last year in southeastern Utah as Bears Ears National Monument.

Bishop, known on Capitol Hill for his tart humor and three-piece suits, chatted with E&E News this week about the politics of public lands, why he prefers the House to the Senate, and his favorite drink, Dr Pepper.

Do you think President Trump is interested in, or knowledgeable about, natural resources issues?

No president is. To expect a president to know the details of the stuff that I know? Because when you're in Congress, you specialize. This is my area, this is my state. I know the details of it, more than senators do, so when Obama designated [Bears Ears], I have no qualms in my mind that he had no idea where it was. I don't know if he could find it on a map. The people who surrounded him on the White House staff, they should have known. For them, I have a lot less generosity than I do for President Obama.

Where do you disagree with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, with whom you served in Congress?

I don't really see much potential disagreement, to be honest with you. If you listen to what he's talking about, he gets the problem, he understands the dysfunction that the Interior Department has. He understands the department has made people livid. He talks about how he wants to change the culture. We're right on board with that.

Do you think he's going to have free rein in his job?

Based on nothing more than my gut feeling right now, I think he will actually have greater latitude with this White House once he has his team in place. I often thought [Obama administration Interior Secretary] Sally Jewell brought an element to the department that was sadly lacking before with her business background. I ultimately was disenchanted with her performance, because I think a lot of the positive things she could have done [in] reorganizing the place was frustrated, as she had to do what the White House was telling her to do. Left to her own devices, she would have been a much more effective secretary of Interior. I don't think that same interface will happen between Trump and Zinke, but I could be totally wrong.

When do you plan to introduce another Public Lands Initiative bill [his legislative alternative to the Bears Ears designation]?

Most of the leg work has been done, but I'm not going to give myself a timeline; I am going to take some time to do it. The big three issues in front of Congress right now, as everyone knows, are health care, taxes and infrastructure. That's sucking all the air out right now. The stuff I want to do is still kind of on the back burner. That's why I'd like to hurry and get those things done, so we can bring some of these things up.

Are you going to run for the Senate if [Republican Sen. Orrin] Hatch retires?

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

[Laughs] I think you'd have to ask yourself, would I rather be a chairman of a full committee in the House, or sit on the back row of the Senate? Then you'd have to ask yourself, why would anyone want to be a senator?

Why not?

Have you seen that chamber? Seen the color of the marble and the carpet?

You used to be a teacher. What did you teach?

Well, allegedly. At the end, I was doing all Advanced Placement government and history classes. But I also taught English, debate and speech, and German for a while.

You were also a thespian, is that right?

Kind of. I did a lot of community theater plays. I met my wife doing a musical, "Once Upon a Mattress." She was the princess, and I was the prince. That's really corny. When I taught, I always directed a few plays for the drama department every year. And I accompanied a couple of them [on piano], as well.

I see you're drinking Dr Pepper. Is that your drink of choice?

As a matter of fact, it is. This is my Dr Pepper story, and it deals with George W. Bush. I had two trips to the White House: The first one, there was a waiter with some shrimp. I love shrimp. So I put a shrimp in my mouth and turned around, and there was George Bush with his hand extended. And all I could do was [makes mouth-full-of-food noises]. [Bush] said, "I caught you with your mouth full, huh, big boy?" Which offended me.

The next year, I was invited back, went over to the bar, and as a good Mormon, I ordered a Diet Pepsi [because they didn't have Dr Pepper]. I turned around, I had just taken a swallow, and there was George W. Bush again. The guy has to have a bell on him. I had the chance of talking to the president of the United States and asking anything I wanted to, and the first question that came to my mind was, "Why don't you have Dr Pepper in the White House?" He was very personable and kind, which I appreciated.

I thought Mormons weren't supposed to have caffeine.

The prohibition is on smoking, alcohol, coffee and tea.

You have nice suits. Has that always been your signature?

Thank you, no. I have to have vests now because it's become the -ism. When I first came here, I was a little bit overweight. I was fat. I dropped about 75 pounds. I started wearing vests because I needed the extra material, and it became a standard. So now I wear a vest. I'm not really a very formal person. If I am not in vests, my choice is to be in shorts and flips. I don't do business casual.

Have you ever worn flip-flops on the Capitol grounds here?

Actually, yes. I used to do that a lot, especially when I was taking people through the Capitol, because it really drove the guards crazy, especially on the Senate side.

6. INTERIOR: Industry, enviros to feds — take your time on valuation regs

E & E News, May 5 / Pamela King

Supporters and opponents of federal regulations to determine royalty rates for oil, gas and coal produced on public lands have a message for the Interior Department: Revising these rules may take a long time.

Last month, Interior's Office of Natural Resources Revenue (ONRR) called for comments on whether and how to revise its regulations on federally produced fossil fuels. Separately, the agency asked for feedback on a proposal to repeal ONRR's "2017 Valuation Rule," the most recent set of reforms to those regulations (Energywire, April 4).

The review and advance notice of proposed rulemaking (ANPR) followed a request by Interior to stay litigation related to the ONRR rule. The move garnered praise from oil and gas industry groups, including the American Petroleum Institute (Energywire, March 27).

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

In comments filed April 17, API requested more time to analyze the nuanced changes Interior has proposed to the ONRR rule.

"This topic is very complex and requires members to review and consider both the 2017 Valuation Rule as well as the regulations that existed prior to the 2017 Valuation Rule," wrote Emily Hague, API's senior policy adviser for industry and upstream operations. "Any regulatory changes — whether to the 2017 Valuation Rule or to preexisting rules — could significantly impact American energy development."

API asked to extend the comment period, which closed yesterday, an additional 60 days to July 3. The group also asked that ONRR consider presenting the rule revision and all public comments to its newly established Royalty Policy Committee.

Chartered in 2010 by former Interior Secretary Ken Salazar, the committee's formation had been on hold until an April 3 call for nominations appeared in the Federal Register. ONRR this week extended the due date for nominations from May 3 to June 2.

The panel will also include as ex-officio members several Interior officials who have yet to be appointed, such as the directors of the bureaus of Land Management and Safety and Environmental Enforcement.

An ONRR spokeswoman said the agency is tentatively scheduled to announce the committee's appointments in the fall.

The Western Energy Alliance said it supports immediate and complete repeal of the 2017 Valuation Rule.

"The rule if left to stand would do to small independent oil and natural gas producers operating on federal lands what Dodd-Frank did to community banks and what the Affordable Care Act did to independent hospitals: render the federal regulatory environment so complex that small businesses cannot possibly comply," the trade group's president, Kathleen Sgamma, wrote in comments filed yesterday.

Industry has been explaining the faults of the ONRR rule since the proposed regulation came out in 2015, Sgamma wrote in an email to E&E News.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

"We already know the problems with it," she said. "It's time to get on with the repeal and then deal with any targeted regulatory changes in the future."

The Independent Petroleum Association of America, a trade group representing small producers, also supported repeal of the 2017 rule but requested additional time to review options for the existing regulation.

"The ANPR which seeks to offer greater simplicity, certainty, clarity, and consistency is welcomed by our member companies," wrote Daniel Naatz, the group's senior vice president of government relations and political affairs. "However, we feel the short time frame for comments is not adequate given the complex subject matter."

A 'massive waste'

Conservation advocates also called for more time on the ONRR rule — but they ultimately urged caution on scrapping the 2017 reform.

ONRR's rulemaking is premature and muddled, the Western Organization of Resource Councils (WORC), a grass-roots environmental group, wrote in its remarks.

"By simultaneously seeking comment on whether or not to repeal the Valuation Rule and seeking comment on what to replace the rule with, commenters and other members of the public — including WORC — are left to provide substantive comments on hypothetical or imaginary alternative scenarios, never defined by your department," WORC wrote.

The group requested a 60-day extension to the comment period but urged ONRR to altogether halt the ANPR until the agency definitively decides whether to repeal the 2017 Valuation Rule.

The Wilderness Society, a conservation group, called Interior's revisit of the ONRR rule a "massive waste of federal resources" inconsistent with President Trump's goal of reducing regulatory costs.

"The purpose of the current ANPR is to essentially repeat what had already been accomplished with the Final Valuation Rule," wrote Bruce Pendery, energy and climate specialist for the Wilderness Society's BLM Action Center.

Repeal of the 2017 Valuation Rule appears to be a knee-jerk reaction to a pair of industry challenges to the regulation last year, he added (Greenwire, Jan. 9).

"But we would note that these legal challenges only contest 'certain provisions of the Final Valuation Rule,'" Pendery wrote. "If the whole rule is not being challenged, there certainly is no need to dispose of the whole rule just to react to these lawsuits."

House Natural Resources ranking member Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) yesterday echoed the call for additional time in his own letter to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke. He questioned the legality of Interior's postponement of the 2017 Valuation Rule as the agency decided its next steps.

The postponement last week prompted a lawsuit from the states of California and New Mexico (Greenwire, April 27).

7. PUBLIC LANDS: Mont. business group pressures Zinke on national monuments

E & E News, May 5 | Scott Streater

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke should "stand on the right side of history" and oppose any move to decrease the size of or eliminate already designated national monuments, according to a business coalition from the fifth-generation Montanan's home state.

In a brief letter to Zinke, Business for Montana's Outdoors writes that it is very concerned with President Trump's executive order last week requiring the Interior Department to review the boundaries of dozens of national monuments designated within the last two decades and to decide whether they should be altered or eliminated (Greenwire, April 26).

The review will ultimately recommend whether the president should rescind, resize or modify the management of about 30 monuments. A final report is due within 120 days.

"The Antiquities Act has a history of preserving natural treasures for the benefit of all Americans, enacted and first used by the 26th President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt," according to the letter from the group, which comprises more than 130 businesses including outdoor equipment retailers and manufacturers.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Zinke, a former Republican congressman from Montana, has often compared his views on public lands and conservation to those of Teddy Roosevelt.

"In Montana, our national monuments not only have a track record of protecting public lands for hunting and fishing but also helping to grow local economies," the letter says.

The group references a 2014 study by Montana-based nonpartisan research group Headwaters Economics that found local economies "grew after the 2001 designation of the Upper Missouri River Breaks National Monument."

"Protected public lands and waters are the backbone of this economy," the letter says. "Creating uncertainty over the future of national monuments will hurt those gateway communities and businesses that rely on these crucial public lands."

It's not clear yet what Interior's evaluation of existing national monuments designated since 1996 and larger than 100,000 acres will recommend.

Zinke has given mixed signals.

During a signing ceremony of Trump's executive order, Zinke said the order would not eliminate any monument designations or weaken environmental protections, even as he criticized unspecified monument designations for placing lands "off-limits to public access for grazing, fishing, mining, multiple use and even outdoor recreation."

But he also emphasized that the monuments should conform to the "smallest area" possible, suggesting the final review could aim to slash the size of numerous sites.

Business for Montana's Outdoors' letter says that would be a bad idea.

"We need not remind you that revoking Teddy Roosevelt's conservation legacy is a highly controversial proposal. No previous administration has ever attempted to revoke a predecessor's monument designation, even where some initial public disagreement over the designation existed," the letter says. "In fact, Administrative action to remove protections for sites protected under the Antiquities Act are widely considered illegal. You are uniquely suited to stand up for a long and bipartisan tradition of protecting national monuments — to stand on the right side of history."

"Given your experience as a fifth-generation Montanan, we encourage you to remember the Montana way of leaving this place better than we found it for all who come after us," the letter concludes.

8. INTERIOR: More offshore revenue would help morale, backlog — Zinke

E & E News, May 5 | Corbin Hiar

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke suggested today at a "Doggy Days" press event that additional offshore oil and gas drilling royalties could offset potential budget cuts at the department.

"I have an MBA in finance, and I open up both sides of the budget," Zinke said when asked whether more dog-friendly policies at the department could compensate for employee dissatisfaction about the White House's proposed cuts (Greenwire, March 20).

"If you go back to 2008, we made $15.5 billion more in a year than what we made in the last year," he added. "That's just in offshore."

By comparison, Zinke noted that the department's National Park Service has a backlog of overdue repairs that will cost around $12.5 billion to fix.

"But $15.5 billion would cover the entirety of our backlog for our parks — the entirety of it and have $3 billion more to deliver to go ahead and build in recapitalization on things," he said.

Interior is set to receive $12.3 billion for the rest of the current fiscal year, an increase of $42 million from its current spending level (Greenwire, May 1).

That budget boost was included in an omnibus negotiated by lawmakers and sent to President Trump yesterday (E&E News PM, May 4).

The White House has asked Congress to slash Interior's budget 12 percent for fiscal 2018, a drop of $1.5 billion.

The secretary also acknowledged that morale at the department is not good, something that the "Doggy Days" pilot program seeks to improve on (Greenwire, March 23).

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Interior came in 11th out of 18 large agencies in the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service's most recent governmentwide survey of employee satisfaction. Only about 61 percent of Interior staffers were happy with the department (Greenwire, Dec. 15, 2016).

"A lot of the reasons why we're not last is because Interior has the holdings that are our greatest national treasures," Zinke told reporters, while his dog Ragnar scurried around his wood-paneled office. "We need to take care of them more. And I think our folks — we have good people — they care about public property, too. I've got to give them the tools to do that."

That's why "I do talk a lot about revenue," Zinke added. "And I think that helps morale, too — that they know that I'm paying attention to infrastructure. As I should. We all love clean bathrooms."

Dozens of employees and their dogs streamed into the secretary's office for a chance to shake hands and get a photo with Zinke and Ragnar during the half-hour event. Several employees who came to the meet-and-greet without dogs were turned away.

The department plans to do an "after action" report examining how the first Doggy Day went at Interior's main and south buildings in D.C., the secretary said. One issue that's likely to come up is the difficulty many employees had getting to work without public transportation, which doesn't allow dogs.

The second day of the pilot program at Interior headquarters is scheduled for Sept. 1. But Zinke said the department is also encouraging other Interior offices to consider allowing dogs.

Other departments are also considering following Interior's lead on dogs, he added. The pilot program came up yesterday during a meeting with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke said. He declined to provide further details on their discussion.

1. Op-ed: An open letter to Robert Redford

The Deseret News, May 10 / Don Peay

Robert Redford has done an incredible job building and managing a “wilderness” recreation experience at his Sundance Ski Resort, a part of which is leased land from the U.S. Forest Service.

To sustain the “management” of the place, ski and zip line tickets are sold, restaurants charge for food, cabin lots are sold.

Timber has been clear-cut to make ski runs, lifts and cables have been installed to access the tops of the mountains, the river has been dammed to make a reflection pond, and structures have been built for enjoyment of guests. To help “manage” nature, snow-making machines have been installed. Sundance has multiple uses, generates revenues, creates jobs and invests money each year to keep it a wonderful place!

If a president came in and declared that Sundance was so special — which it is — and that it needed to be preserved and past activities be banned, or limited, I would fight against that presidential action, even if the president was of my own party.

So, the exact parallels exist with the monuments — Bears Ears and Grand Staircase. Like Sundance, these areas are wonderful places. For the past 100-plus years, these lands have been managed as multiple-use. Revenues and jobs are created; money is required to have active management of habitats, water and wildlife. Like Sundance, these areas have been kept pristine and natural systems even augmented.

So here is the problem now with the presidential monuments: All of a sudden, someone comes in and wants to put incredible restrictions on past use and, over time, federal agencies demand more and more “natural systems” and no “management.” The parallel at Sundance would be to turn off the snow-making machines and stop skiing, mountain biking and zip line activity because these activities are not “natural.” And people in large cities far away would begin to demonize Redford for making money and pillaging the land. Without consulting, or respecting Redford’s lifetime of work and investment, they would make edicts from afar about how to manage his resort.

Now, Sundance is mostly privately owned. But there are exact parallels in whether you can have certain “management” activities of land, water and wildlife, and if certain functions, such as hunting, grazing and limited mineral development, can take place — and if these traditional uses can continue to be allowed.

If the shoe were on the other foot, Redford would be adamantly opposed to federal mandates from afar. I would join him in his defense.

It would be nice for once for those on the left to say, “Yes, let's protect and preserve these magnificent places. Let's protect historical uses. Let's continue to allow certain renewable activities that generate revenue. And let's not demonize capitalism. And, just like at Sundance, let's recognize that through cooperation and collaboration, on federal lands we can have a multiple-use, 'wilderness' experience.”

St George News, May 10 | Julie Applegate

ST. GEORGE – As part of a campaign to keep Washington County’s public lands beautiful, the county and its partners are sponsoring a cleanup project in the Bloomington area of St. George Saturday morning.

The area near the Bearclaw Poppy Trailhead west of Navajo Drive is heavily used for recreational shooting, all-terrain vehicles, mountain bikers and others and is often littered with trash and debris.

Dozens of Washington County residents cleaned up the area April 1, gathering 30 cubic yards of trash from public lands in the area and significantly improving a recreation area that was once an eyesore, officials said in a written statement. But more help is needed to beautify the area, and the county is asking the public’s help with trash removal.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Washington County recently launched a new countywide campaign to raise residents' awareness and participation in keeping public lands clean.

Unveiled in November by the Washington County Commission, the "Give Your Land a Hand" campaign encourages residents to clean up after themselves and pick up any garbage they come across while recreating on public lands.

"This is one of those opportunities that everybody from both sides of the political spectrum can get behind and work together on," Public Lands Clean Up Committee Chairman Rev. Jimi Kestin said.

"Because we all believe that our public lands are worthy of being kept clean ... I'm always looking for reasons to unify people."

Kestin is senior pastor at the Solomon's Porch Foursquare Fellowship in St. George and is known for his service in the county's business and faith communities.

For Saturday's event, trash bags and dumpsters will be provided. Participants are asked to supply their own gloves, water and snacks for the event and to wear protective clothing such as boots, hats, long-sleeve shirts and long pants.

The cleanup will run from 8:30 a.m. to noon; however, volunteers are welcome at any point during this time. Event coordinators will be on hand to direct volunteers, Kestin said.

Volunteers are asked to visit the welcome station located at the Bear Claw Poppy trailhead at the west end of Navajo Drive in Bloomington. At the station, they will receive directions to cleanup sites and dumpsters, sign volunteer release waivers and will be given the opportunity to join the Give Your Land a Hand mailing list to obtain notices of future events.

For more information see the county's Give Your Land a Hand webpage or email info@giveyourlandahand.com.

Partners supporting the event include Washington County, Red Cliffs Desert Reserve, the Bureau of Land Management St. George Field Office and Arizona Strip District, Republic Services, Washington County's Interfaith Council, Utah Public Lands Alliance, the State of Utah, Trust Lands Administration, the City of St. George, Walmart, Target and Costco.

3. Imagine developments in a privatized Logan Canyon

The Herald Journal News, May 10 | Thad Box

I don't think I'm old, but some of my gray-bearded ex-students do. I celebrated my 88th birthday. Jenny and I will soon fly to Texas to see our first great-grandson. The last time we flew, a hostess our granddaughter's age stamped "pre-board" on our tickets without our asking. And — I can't remember what I wanted to write.

I clearly remember Cache Valley 58 years ago. Jenny, our 8-month-old son and I arrived in Logan in late June 1959. All of our earthly possessions were in a trailer I built from a wrecked Ford van. We checked into a motel and called my USU department head, Laurie Stoddart. He loaded us in his car and took us up Logan Canyon.

Tired as we were, we knew he was introducing us to precious gifts — fishing holes, picnic spots, hiking trails, nice places to pitch a tent. It was hard for Texans to believe we owned part of that land. And that we could use it and share it with other owners.

Next day we moved into a house we had rented on the phone from a professor on sabbatical. We had no contract. I had paid no deposit. No one was there. A neighbor gave us the house key and made us part of the neighborhood before we unloaded our son's potty chair. Cool, clear water ran down an irrigation ditch that watered the yard and a garden the owner planted for us.

On July 3 I was forced into a crash course on public land. Professor Wayne Cook had a family emergency in Kansas. I had to assume his duties. With Wayne's notes, help from my colleagues and an Independence Day weekend, I prepared to teach at Summer Camp the following Monday. Because I had a wife with a crawling baby in a new town, I chose to commute.

At daybreak each day I turned east on Canyon Road, the main highway to Bear Lake. Herm's sign said it was the last chance. As I passed First Dam and the electrical generating plant, I entered public land. The road narrowed and snaked around three beautiful reservoirs behind dams that diverted irrigation water. No rushes or choking vegetation invaded the mirror-like pools. Well-designed campgrounds built by the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) welcomed travelers.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

There was a scattering of private inholdings and businesses along the road. Zanavoo consisted of a thriving restaurant, a gift shop and a motel. There was a dance hall near Right Hand Fork where forestry students went for (probably illegal) beer. Sumer cabins were scattered along the river. New ones were under construction in recently opened areas. Most cabins were on long-term leases, an enticement for people to use the public lands.

Land all around me was struggling to recover from a century of exploitation. Each day taught me something about restoring health to damaged land. Decaying stumps, invading weeds and erosion scars on beautiful landscapes told a story of greed, misunderstanding, or both. Each day I tried to relate what I was seeing with what was expected of me in my new job.

To improve the abused environment and service Wayne's research projects, I had to put theory into practice. I borrowed horses, located research plots, collected data and coordinated our college's activities with land users and Forest Service employees. I learned eating supper with ranch families, having coffee with sheepherders who barely spoke English, sharing my water with hikers, jump-starting a fisherman's car and telling hunters where I had seen a four-point buck. Some folks complained about government rules, but I don't remember anyone wanting to put the land in private ownership.

Today most land of Logan Canyon away from roads or rivers is in much better condition than it was 70 years ago. But lands near rivers suffer. The Logan River road was widened and straightened, taking its toll on bottom lands. Reservoirs behind dams are filled with silt and invading plants. Some campgrounds have been abandoned. Private in-holdings are fenced, entrance gates to leased cabin areas are locked and no trespassing signs decorate landscapes.

People in high places, including many Utah elected officials, want the public lands in private ownership. The Kim Gardner Policy Institute at the University of Utah recently predicted Utah population will nearly double by 2065. We'll need houses for twice as many people in a decade less time than I've been in Utah.

Think of the fortunes that could be made if Logan Canyon land could be bought and "developed." Imagine a four lane highway from Logan to Garden City. Think about macmansions, tennis courts and swimming pools where leased cabins stand, on campgrounds and level spots near that highway. Imagine huge hotels and golf courses for members only.

Pull up Google Earth and look at new housing developments on private land around Bear Lake. Follow the road back to Logan and note places where houses, private clubs, and luxury hotels could turn millionaires into billionaires while local taxpayers pay for infrastructure and services. Then follow the road from Avon to Eden and observe new development in that valley. With a fast growing population, privately owned land and the art of a deal, Logan Canyon development could be huge.

I don't feel old. I feel like I'm only one of a whole bunch of frogs sitting in a pot of calm, warming water.

E&E/NATIONAL NEWS – FULL STORY

1. Op-Ed: Endangered species should face same Trump test as national monuments

E & E News, May 9 | Emily Yehle

This week, Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke is touring two national monuments as part of President Trump's April 26 executive order to review the last 20 years of national monument designations. The order gave Zinke 45 days to review monuments and determine whether any should be "rescinded, resized or modified in order to better benefit our public lands." The tour includes Bears Ears — 1.35 million acres established by President Obama in 2016 — and Grand Staircase-Escalante — 1.9 million acres established by President Clinton in 1996. These are only two of 27 that Zinke has singled out for review.

Zinke sees the review as an opportunity to "give state and local communities a meaningful voice in the process." Doing so could be the environmental legacy of the Trump administration.

Under the Antiquities Act of 1906, presidents can establish monuments without any input or approval from Congress or state and local officials. Hence, Bears Ears is seen as a "massive land grab." That land grab is even bigger considering that Obama created 26 new monuments and expanded 8 more, for a total of 553 million acres, bigger than Alaska, more than any previous president.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The effect of this executive power abuse on state and local governments is illustrated by Clinton's creation of Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument. In it, he included 176,000 acres of state lands used to generate revenues for Utah's K-12 public education system. The House Committee on Natural Resources recently cited Utah Geological Survey data that found restrictions for commodity production such as grazing and mineral development caused the value of the state lands to drop by $8 billion immediately after the designation. Bears Ears locked up another 109,000 acres of state land.

"Families that have lived for generations in affected communities find their families torn apart due to lack of employment opportunities for the next generation," Kathleen Clarke, former head of the U.S. Bureau of Land Management under President Bush, said of the monument. "Populations are declining. In the twenty years since the creation of the Grand Staircase, school enrollment in Escalante has gone from 150 to 57 students."

Obama's designation of Katahdin Woods and Waters National Monument in Maine caused similar concerns. At a recent hearing of the House Natural Resources Subcommittee on Federal Lands, Maine Gov. Paul LePage (R) identified economic losses to the forestry industry and public access barriers such as the loss of connectivity for ATV trails. "Not long after the President designated the Monument, Maine residents started to feel the negative effects of having the federal government as their new master," he testified.

The monument review order follows President Trump's Feb. 28 revocation of Obama's "Waters of the United States" rule. That rule gave the Environmental Protection Agency authority to regulate virtually every drop of water from the Mississippi River to a backyard puddle. He has instructed the EPA to unwind Obama's war on coal and signed a congressional resolution overturning the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's (FWS) seizure of Alaska's authority to manage wildlife on federal refuges.

The president should continue this trajectory by instructing Secretary Zinke to review the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's overreach. For example, in 2014, the FWS added four sub-species of the Mazama pocket gopher in Thurston County, Washington, to its list of threatened animals.

To develop property suitable for gophers, owners must go through a long, costly permitting process. Requiring a permit is not based on the number of gophers, but on the property's suitability as gopher habitat. Landowners with suitable habitat may be required to develop a Habitat

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Conservation Plan approved by FWS, a plan that could cost $42,000 in habitat offset fees. In one case, a local developer spent over $3 million to accommodate the furry digger on 77 acres of its land.

Just as Secretary Zinke is seeking local input on national monument designations, he should require FWS to do so with endangered species regulations. When it worked with a nearby military base, they were able to develop a plan whereby gophers thrive along with military training exercises. The same could be done with private landowners.

President Trump's executive orders have signaled that he thinks state and local policymakers can be better caretakers of the environment than Washington bureaucrats. The Trump environmental agenda seems to be following the advice of David Brower, founder of Friends of the Earth — "Think globally, act locally." State and local citizens are better positioned to solve most environmental problems than are bureaucrats in Washington.

2. REGULATIONS: Interior vows action on methane rule after Senate vote fails

E & E News, May 10 | Corbin Hiar and Kellie Lunney

The Interior Department this afternoon signaled its intent to overhaul an Obama-era rule on methane waste from oil and gas operations after the Republican-controlled Senate failed today to scuttle the regulation.

"As part of President Trump's America-First Energy Strategy and executive order, the Department has reviewed and flagged the Waste Prevention rule as one we will suspend, revise or rescind given its significant regulatory burden that encumbers American energy production, economic growth and job creation," Kate MacGregor, Interior's acting assistant secretary for land and minerals, said in a statement.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

"The vote today in the Senate doesn't impact the Administration's commitment to spurring investment in responsible energy development and ensuring smart regulatory protections," she added.

The Bureau of Land Management rule was designed to limit emissions of planet-warming methane from the oil and gas sector, the largest industrial emitter. It requires producers operating on public and tribal lands to incrementally reduce the amount of natural gas vented or flared from wells by capturing more of it over time.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke previously indicated in a letter to Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio) that the department would "engage in a robust assessment" of all venting and flaring requirements to ensure industries aren't wasting natural resources or taxpayer money.

He also told Portman, who was wavering on whether to support striking down the regulation, that Interior would revise existing BLM restrictions on the flaring of unmarketable methane, as well as expedite certain permitting processes and eliminate any BLM policies that duplicate flaring restrictions in several Western states, including the one in Colorado, which the Obama administration modeled its rule on.

Those commitments convinced the Ohio moderate to vote for the rule repeal, which fell short by one vote of moving forward this morning (Greenwire, May 10). Three Republicans — Sens. Susan Collins of Maine, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona — sided with Democrats who voted against moving ahead with the measure.

It's unclear if Zinke will follow the plan he outlined to Portman or devise a new one in light of the failed repeal attempt. Environmentalists have questioned whether such actions would have the effect of reducing methane emissions (Energywire, May 10).

Industry groups were disappointed by the Senate vote but welcomed the news that Interior doesn't plan to let the methane regulations stand as is.

Nevertheless, oil and gas companies will have to start complying with the many provisions of the regulation in January, according to Robert Dillon, spokesman for the American Council for Capital Formation, which opposes BLM's venting and flaring rule. As a result, companies must review their budgets this summer and decide whether it makes more economic sense to comply or shut down production.

"The big thing is uncertainty for companies who don't have time to wait for Interior to unwind the rule," Dillon said.

Supporters of the rule, meanwhile, were critical of MacGregor's announcement. The promise to revise or rescind the rule amounts to the Trump administration "saving the day for the oil and gas special interests who weren't able to muster even a Senate majority to kill the rule," said Amit Narang, regulatory policy advocate at Public Citizen's Congress Watch.

Other rules on the chopping block

MacGregor's comments represent the second firm commitment the department has made to alter or eliminate any of the four oil and gas industry-related rules that Trump's March 28 directive said could "unduly burden the development of domestic energy resources."

Interior previously announced that it was rescinding BLM's high-profile and much-litigated hydraulic fracturing rule, which set new requirements for well construction, wastewater management and chemical disclosure for fracked wells on tribal and public lands (Energywire, March 17).

The department hasn't publicly weighed in on two less controversial rules governing drilling in national wildlife refuges and parks that were also targeted by the executive order (Greenwire, April 25).

Zinke was due to receive a report from his deputy secretary advising him on how to comply with Trump's energy directive, but the secretary is currently out in Utah reviewing national monuments, as called for in a separate executive order (Greenwire, May 10).

Interior didn't immediately respond to a request for more information on how it plans to proceed on the methane, refuges or parks rules.

3. METHANE: Can Zinke follow through on his post-CRA promises?

E & E News, May 10 | Pamela King

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

In correspondence persuading Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio) to back repeal of a federal rule to curb natural gas emissions from oil production on public land, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke laid out a plan for how his agency would address methane waste without the Obama-era regulation.

Those promises ring hollow in light of the Congressional Review Act's prohibition of a rule that is "substantially the same" as a regulation tossed under the statute, legal experts and environmental groups said yesterday.

"Secretary Zinke claims that if Congress nullifies the protections that BLM has put in place to reduce wasteful methane venting and flaring on our public lands, he will issue new guidance or rules that will achieve the same end. This is an empty promise," said David Hayes, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress and former deputy secretary of the Interior during the Clinton and Obama administrations.

"Industry lawyers are standing by to argue that because of congressional action, the department has no authority to protect taxpayers and the public from the continued waste of valuable public resources," Hayes said.

In his Thursday letter to Ohio's junior senator, Zinke pledged to assess all of Interior's venting and flaring requirements, bolster incentives for methane capture, and expedite approvals for infrastructure to carry excess gas to market.

Interior could also update its Notice to Lessees 4A (NTL-4A) to "take concrete action to reduce methane waste," Zinke wrote.

The secretary's promises convinced Portman — who had previously been publicly undecided on the issue — to back a CRA resolution doing away with BLM's methane rule (E&E Daily, May 9).

"I believe that the Interior Department should do more to prevent methane venting and flaring on federal lands," Portman wrote in a Monday statement. "The Secretary of the Interior has made clear in a letter to me that the Department is committed to acting on this important issue going forward, and he has outlined specific actions it would take to do that."

But Zinke's plan to address methane through the NTL-4A could be legally fraught, dozens of law professors wrote to Senate leadership this week (Energywire, May 9).

"[T]here is a serious legal question whether the Interior Secretary can impose new requirements on lessees by simply revising the existing Notice to Lessees," their letter said. "The CRA clearly provides that, if the

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Waste Prevention Rule is overturned by CRA resolution, the Interior Department becomes legally prohibited from adopting new rules that are 'substantially the same' as the regulations overturned, unless Congress specifically provides the Department with such authority in new legislation.

"The meaning of that limitation is unknown as no court has yet interpreted it."

John Ruple, associate law professor at the University of Utah and one of the letter's signatories, said the legal implications of Zinke's proposal are murky.

"The over-energetic use of the CRA by Congress is potentially dangerous, since the agency that promulgated the rule at issue is prohibited from putting forward a 'substantially similar' replacement — and no one really knows what that means. Facing budget scrutiny and uncertainty regarding their legal footing, it is hard to imagine agencies acting quickly to fill the void created by use of the CRA — especially when agencies are supposed to eliminate two regulations for each new rule they issue," he said in a statement yesterday. "I am concerned that the Department of the Interior may not be able to deliver on the promise of a meaningful replacement."

Methane authority

Industry groups have asked Interior to stay out of methane control altogether.

"There are efforts already underway by the EPA to regulate methane emissions and ensure a fair and equitable return to the American taxpayers," said Dan Naatz, senior vice president of government relations and political affairs at the Independent Petroleum Association of America. "Using the Mineral Leasing Act to regulate air emissions is a non-starter."

Because most of Zinke's strategies would not require a new rulemaking, his promises stand on solid ground, said Kathleen Sgamma, president of the Western Energy Alliance. Updating the NTL-4A is still within BLM's authority, even if the methane rule disappears, she said.

"Apparently the only threat of litigation to subsequent actions by Secretary Zinke to keep these promises to Senator Portman would come from these same environmental groups, a truly twisted result from what they claim to want," Sgamma said.

The item on Zinke's list that would offer the most effective change is to approve pipeline rights of way — which could be done in a matter of days, she said.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The Environmental Defense Fund (EDF) questioned whether Zinke's proposals would have the effect of reducing methane emissions.

Two of the strategies — assess venting and flaring requirements and eliminate duplicative federal flaring restrictions — would have zero impact on curbing escaped gas, the group wrote in its own letter to Portman.

"Overall, the letter does not identify a single specific 'concrete action' that the Secretary might take to reduce waste," EDF wrote. "The Secretary asks you to accept a page of vague and unfounded assurances in lieu of an 80-page technical rule, enforceable by law."

EDF asked Portman to reconsider his support of the resolution.

A long-delayed Senate vote is expected today.

4. PUBLIC LANDS: 4 states take aim at Trump's coal leasing revival effort

E & E News, May 10 | Ellen M. Gilmer

Four states are taking the Trump administration to court over plans to restart coal leasing on public lands.

California, New Mexico, New York and Washington filed suit yesterday, challenging Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's decision to lift a leasing moratorium that had been in place for more than a year.

The Obama administration froze federal coal leasing in January 2016 to conduct a broad analysis focused on leasing's environmental impacts and royalty calculations. Zinke announced in March that he was tossing the review and restarting the leasing program. The announcement came after President Trump's "energy independence" executive order aimed at boosting domestic energy production.

Yesterday's lawsuit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Montana, says Zinke's decision violated the National Environmental Policy Act. The four states argue that restarting the leasing program amounts to a major federal action that requires fresh environmental review.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Interior and its Bureau of Land Management oversee coal resources on public lands across the country, with federal leases producing nearly .4 billion tons of coal in 2015. Most of it comes from the Powder River Basin in Wyoming and Montana.

"Without the benefit of the hard look at the current environmental impacts of the coal leasing program that a lawful, up-to-date environmental impact review would provide, Defendants' decision to restart the coal leasing program does not even acknowledge, let alone address, the harms to Plaintiffs from the leasing program," the lawsuit says.

The states are asking the district court to freeze the leasing program until Interior conducts additional environmental review. The agency does not comment on pending litigation.

The lawsuit also argues that ending the moratorium "without evaluating whether the program is in the public interest or ensuring that it will provide fair market value to the public" is a violation of the Mineral Leasing Act and the Federal Land Policy and Management Act — federal laws that govern leasing on public lands.

The states note that they have "long been leaders" in working to cut greenhouse gas emissions and are actively facing effects of climate change, including more frequent and intense storms, reduced snowpack, more frequent wildfires and sea-level rise.

"Plaintiffs have an interest in the responsible use, management, and conservation of our nation's public resources," the suit says. "That interest is particularly strong where, as here, the use of such resources causes adverse environmental impacts that the States are working diligently to address."

Washington Attorney General Bob Ferguson (D) — who noted that his state also faces impacts from coal-train traffic, with as many as 70 trains per day passing through some Washington rail segments — argued that the Trump administration's approach has ignored concerns about environmental impacts and whether taxpayers are getting a fair return on the federal leases.

"Taxpayers deserve to have their natural resources managed responsibly," he said in a statement. "Responsible stewardship requires an understanding of the costs and benefits of extraction, which just months ago these same agencies admitted they simply don't have. That's unacceptable."

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Joining Ferguson in the suit are New Mexico Attorney General Hector Balderas, California Attorney General Xavier Becerra and New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman, all Democrats.

Related litigation

The Northern Cheyenne Tribe and a coalition of environmental groups filed their own lawsuit in March challenging the reversal of the leasing moratorium. They make similar NEPA claims, and Northern Cheyenne argues that Interior also failed to meet its tribal consultation obligations before making the decision (Greenwire, March 30).

Northern Cheyenne President L. Jace Killsback said he was glad to see the four states joining the opposition to the Trump administration's move.

"They are allies to us, and we are an ally to them," he said, noting that their NEPA and consultation claims are complementary.

The environmental groups in that case are the Center for Biological Diversity, ecoCheyenne, Citizens for Clean Energy, Defenders of Wildlife, the Montana Environmental Information Center, the Sierra Club and WildEarth Guardians, represented by Earthjustice.

In a separate lawsuit filed yesterday, the Grand Canyon Trust is accusing Interior of violating the Freedom of Information Act by withholding documents related to the Obama administration's review process for the leasing program. The group first filed its request last summer.

"The federal coal leasing program is failing taxpayers, polluting air and water, and lining the pockets of coal company executives," Energy Program Director Amber Reimondo said in a statement. "The American public deserves to know why our government is turning a blind eye to clear science and the real economics of dirty coal mining."

The group filed its suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Separately, the Center for Biological Diversity has requested records of communication

5. WILDLIFE: Federal grassland program benefits sage grouse — study

E & E News, May 10 | Nicholas Geranios, AP

A new study of sage grouse in Eastern Washington found a surprisingly large benefit from a federal program that subsidizes farmers to plant year-round grasses and native shrubs instead of crops.

The study concluded that is probably the reason that sage grouse still live in portions of Washington's Columbia River Basin.

“Without these lands, our models predict that we would lose about two thirds of the species’ habitat, and that the sage grouse would go extinct in two of three sub-populations,” said Andrew Shirk of the University of Washington’s Climate Impacts Group.

The study was conducted by the UW, plus state and federal researchers, and will appear in an upcoming issue of the Journal of Wildlife Management.

Sage grouse are ground-dwelling, chicken-sized birds found in 11 Western states, from North Dakota to California. As few as 200,000 remain in the U.S., down from a peak population of about 16 million. The males are known for their strutting courtship ritual on breeding grounds, and they produce a bubble-type sound from a pair of inflated air sacks on their necks.

Federal officials in 2015 opted not to list sage grouse under the Endangered Species Act but announced federal land-use restrictions. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service will review the bird’s listing status within five years.

The Conservation Reserve Program, established in 1985, is voluntary and pays farmers to plant agricultural land with environmentally beneficial vegetation on 10- to 15-year contracts.

Of the roughly 24 million acres planted through the program in the U.S., about 1.4 million acres are in Eastern Washington.

“From the outset, it was envisioned that the CRP program would be good for wildlife,” Shirk said. “But I don’t think anyone expected that it would be this valuable.”

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Will McDow, who works to protect sage grouse for the Environmental Defense Fund, said the report was good news.

“It’s a great example of public-private partnerships,” McDow said Tuesday. “It’s something to celebrate.”

In Eastern Washington, the sage grouse population has stabilized at about 1,000 birds. They live in three main places: the Yakima Training Center, Moses Coulee, and Crab Creek area.

The Yakima Training Center is a U.S. Army facility where the native sagebrush habitat is mostly intact. But the other two areas are heavily agricultural, with irrigated farmland and dryland wheat fields. The birds would likely not have survived there without the CRP program, the study found.

Sage grouse in other Western states are threatened mostly by oil and gas exploration and other types of development.

Previously, studies of sage grouse across their range in the United States suggested Eastern Washington agricultural areas would not be hospitable for the birds. Washington’s habitat is a relatively small island separated from the broader sagebrush seas in Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Oregon and Nevada, the study said.

“The other studies generally predicted that Eastern Washington was a place that shouldn’t support sage grouse because most of the habitat was converted to agricultural lands,” Shirk said. “And yet they’re still here.”

The authors’ results show that without the federally-subsidized CRP lands dominated by native grass and big sagebrush, sage grouse in Eastern Washington would only have about one-third the amount of usable habitat, and the two subpopulations in agricultural areas would become so small that they would likely go extinct.

A harsh winter, for example, could decimate a small population, Shirk said.

The study found that if Washington’s CRP lands were extended to be near existing sage grouse populations, the birds’ habitat could be increased by as much as 63 percent.

“We have seen CRP help grassland birds across the country,” McDow said.

6. EPA: Dems to Pruitt — don't close regional offices

E & E News, May 10 | Kevin Bogardus

Democrats are urging U.S. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt not to close any of the agency's regional offices.

All 10 senators who caucus with Democrats and serve on the Environment and Public Works Committee last week sent a letter, obtained by E&E News, to the agency chief. Led by Sens. Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.) and Tom Carper (D-Del.), the panel's ranking member, they requested that Pruitt commit to not shuttering any of EPA's regional and program offices.

"We ask you to reaffirm your commitment to the agency you are tasked with leading and to the families you took an oath to protect by ruling out the possibility that any regional or program EPA office will be closed or consolidated," they said in the letter.

They added that if Pruitt dismisses EPA's regional staff, "the agency would lose irreplaceable institutional knowledge and a deeper understanding of highly technical and regionally specific environmental issues."

In their letter to Pruitt, the senators said they were "deeply troubled" by an internal EPA budget document that hinted at potential closures and consolidation for some of the agency's regional offices.

"Funding levels incorporate rent cost avoidance from several regional and headquarters offices (Potomac Yards North, Region 1, Region 5, and Region 9), the decommissioning of part of the Las Vegas laboratory, and the release of the headquarters warehouse in Washington D.C.," said the document.

Further, the Office of Management and Budget has reportedly told EPA it must close two regional offices as it prepares the budget for the next fiscal year.

Much of the speculation regarding which office could be closed has centered on EPA's Region 5 branch, based in Chicago. It is the agency's largest regional office, with more than 1,000 employees on its payroll.

Lawmakers have pushed back on that possible closure, with both Democratic and Republican House members from Michigan writing a letter to Pruitt last month urging him to keep Region 5 open.

EPA officials in Chicago and at headquarters in Washington have denied reports that the agency plans to close the Region 5 branch, calling them false and just rumors (Greenwire, April 18).

Pruitt has repeated those denials himself. In an interview with the Tulsa World last week, the EPA administrator said rumors that EPA will close the Chicago office are "pure legend" and that the move "has not been discussed."

7. POLITICS: Effort to shield documents sparks transparency debate

E & E News, May 10 | Geof Koss

Are House Republicans conspiring with the Trump administration to evade a key federal open-records law? Or is Congress simply reasserting a long-standing legal prerogative it says is essential to conducting oversight of the executive branch?

It depends on whom you ask.

Since January, congressional staffers say they've begun to notice distinct signatures on emails sent to federal agencies from House addresses, which in effect state that the contents of the messages are not considered "agency records" for purposes of compliance with the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA).

"This email and any related documents, notes, draft legislation, recommendations, reports, or other materials generated or received by the members or staff of the Committee on Financial Services are congressional records and remain subject to the Committee's control, and are entrusted to your agency only for use in handling this matter," says one such signature flagged to E&E News recently by a House aide.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Similar language has been appended to emails from other committees, aides say.

While Congress has long been exempt from FOIA, federal agencies are not, and congressional correspondence to the executive branch is routinely released to media outlets and other requesters under the law.

Those records can shed light on the internal operations on both the executive and legislative branches.

In recent years, documents obtained by E&E News under FOIA have shown a burgeoning investigation into an EPA administrator's email practices, EPA's denial of using controversial "stingray" surveillance technology and even lobbying by agencies to rework legislation to strengthen the public records law.

But the disclaimers could prevent the release of similar documents in the future. A House Democratic aide said recently that senior EPA political staff had discussed ways to evade FOIA with staff from both parties. EPA did not respond to a request for comment.

Rick Blum, the director of News Media for Open Government, said that the email signatures are worrisome and unnecessary, given existing exemptions in the law for Congress.

"Clearly, FOIA allows confidential congressional investigations," he said last month after reviewing one such signature. "FOIA is not an impediment to Congress getting the information it needs and keeping its information gathering confidential to protect investigations, to protect sources."

Furthermore, journalists rely on state and federal open-records laws as part of their reporting.

"Preserving emails and looking at correspondence between agencies and between parts of government should be expected and is part of the newsgathering process more and more," he said. "And it's more a part of the public consciousness."

Gray matter

While Congress is exempt from FOIA, its interactions with other entities that are covered by the statute are somewhat of a gray area.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

The leading case on the subject is a 2004 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, United We Stand America Inc. v. Internal Revenue Service, in which the judges ruled that the Joint Committee of Taxation could reserve control over the confidentiality of correspondence it sent to the IRS.

Daniel Metcalfe, the founder and former director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, who now teaches secrecy law at American University's Washington College of Law, says that decision may support efforts by congressional staff to send something to an executive branch agency and say, "We hereby reserve control over this letter" and perhaps even an attached document.

But he said there's no judicial precedent that supports ongoing congressional efforts to broadly shield all correspondence with an agency from FOIA requests.

The 2004 decision held that "what came into an agency can be deemed a congressional record, and even part of what went back to Congress could be, but only insofar as it reflects the substance or confidential existence of the congressional communication that came in," said Metcalfe, who likened it almost to attorney-client privilege.

While the Financial Services Committee email signature would likely protect the message itself from release under FOIA, Metcalfe said the inclusion of the phrase "any related documents" seemed overly broad, while efforts to reserve control over all documents "received by" the committee from the executive branch "goes way too far."

"It's unprecedented overreaching in the congressional context, very likely impracticable, as well," he said.

Moreover, he added, even where a congressional record can be shielded from release under FOIA, the inclusion of the email disclaimer does not in any way obviate a federal agency's obligation to identify the document, so a requester has the opportunity to challenge its claimed status administratively and in court.

"Otherwise, the agency would be unilaterally removing it from any possibility of disclosure just by saying nothing about it," Metcalfe said.

'Subject to congressional control'

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

Further stoking the debate were the recent revelations by BuzzFeed that House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) last month had sent letters to multiple federal agencies under the panel's jurisdiction arguing that communications between the panel and agencies are not "agency records" under FOIA and "remain subject to congressional control even when in the physical possession of the agency."

Hensarling's letter to Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin further states that documents "created or compiled by your agency in connection with any responses to the Committee are also records of the Committee and remain subject to the Committee's control."

In a statement, House General Counsel Thomas Hungar said he had provided legal advice to Hensarling's panel and said that position represented "well-established legal principles and practices" that reflect congressional sentiment dating back four decades.

But in a letter sent Tuesday, 21 open-government groups urged Hensarling to "reconsider and rescind" his requests to federal agencies, some of which have already signaled they will comply with the request.

"These assertions improperly restrict the ability of the public to use FOIA to access those documents," wrote the Project on Government Oversight, the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Press Club and others, noting that federal law already includes "narrow and specific" FOIA exemptions. "Your letter purports to create a new category of exemption through a unilateral action by a single Member of Congress, a troubling precedent."

Metcalf said there was no precedent for documents that were later generated from initial congressional correspondence being completely screened out of FOIA.

"The only time something so generic and across-the-board has been attempted was when the White House tried it very specifically for Clinton health care task force records in 1993," Metcalfe said, while disclosing that he was the person who advised the Clinton White House on that position. "And with the demise of Hillary Clinton's efforts back then, that was never tested in litigation."

Not everyone sees nefarious motives in the recent push to protect congressional documents from being swept up in routine FOIA requests.

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT

DAILY NEWS REPORT - UTAH

One House Democratic staffer said recently that the email signatures are the result of a 2016 ruling by the D.C. Circuit, American Civil Liberties Union v. CIA, that has sparked concerns that Congress needs to express clear intent of its desire to exempt a document from FOIA.

In fact, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency earlier this month cited that case in its response to Hensarling, in which it said it would decline to produce congressional records in response to FOIA requests.

But Elizabeth Hempowicz, POGO's policy counsel, disputed the relevance of that case to the current debate, saying it related to the interrogation report prepared by the Senate Intelligence Committee and set no applicable precedent.

In a letter to Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), the ranking member on Financial Services, Hensarling this week emphasized that he is not seeking a blanket exemption from FOIA for committee documents.

"[T]he letters that were sent to executive agencies do not mean that the Committee will advocate for the withholding of all records," Hensarling wrote. "We will as we always do, evaluate each situation on a case-by-case basis with an eye toward disclosure to the maximum extent feasible. All the Committee has done by issuing these letters is protect its legal rights."

Subject: Dear Heather, American Eagle Day & eagle Challenger visit followup
Date: Monday, June 05, 2017 7:45:22 AM

Dear Heather

Once again, it was a pleasure meeting you and the Secretary of Interior - and his wife and staff - with the bald eagle Challenger present.

Per my conversation with the Secretary regarding the establishment of "American Eagle Day" on June 20th, the American Eagle Foundation would very much appreciate his and your help in getting this very special day proclaimed by President Trump before June 20th, 2017.

During our visit with the Interior Secretary, we provided him with a copy of the wording for such a proclamation which has been used by 49 Governors (Proclamations) and the US Senate and House (Resolutions) during the past decade.

We can provide this Proclamation again by email if necessary.

The Secretary, a true Patriot, appeared to be very sincerely interested in helping us get a Proclamation or Executive Order (preferred) signed by President Trump this year ...making it a permanent annual day to celebrate our National Bird and what has symbolized to all Americans for over 230 years, since the Second Continental Congress in 1782.

Again, we would very much appreciate your kind assistance in helping us arrange for such a Proclamation to be issued by our President....joining Governors in 48 states who have made past proclamations - and the Senate and House resolutions going back to 2007.

Vice President Mike Pence has already proclaimed American Eagle Day for the past 3 years as Governor of Indiana.

Should the President want to invite the eagle Challenger for a formal media announcement of American Eagle Day on or before June 20, then we could make ourselves available for such a special occasion.

President Trump has met Challenger twice in the past...once in George Steinbrenner's suite at Yankee Stadium during a World Series game right after 9-11, and also at Muhammad Ali's Celebrity Fight Night fundraising event for fighting Parkinson's Disease in Phoenix, Arizona.

Thank you so very much for your kind assistance in helping to Make America Great Again.

Respectfully,

Al Cecere

AMERICAN EAGLE DAY

A special national day on June 20 to Celebrate Bald Eagle, the USA's National Bird, their dramatic comeback from brink of extinction, their American symbolism, and their importance to the American people throughout the U.S.

This notable day was first established by the non-profit American Eagle Foundation (AEF) in 1995. It has been proclaimed by Governors from 49 states, and has been recognized by U.S. Congressional resolutions for over a decade.

What the AEF and U.S citizens want now is to make American Eagle Day a permanent Patriotic and National Observance where it is automatically proclaimed annually by the US President on June 20th. The American eagle was selected as the central image of Great Seal of the United States on June 20, 1782 by the Second Continental Congress.

Our hope is that President Trump would invite the eagle Challenger to the White House by June 20 to be the first US President to proclaim American Eagle Day.

The IG is investigating Zinke's travel. In the process of that, they IDed an area where the paperwork process (done by career officials the same way it was for previous admins) is a bit troublesome. Attached is the letter the IG sent to Dep Sec and the letter Dep Sec sent back.

The IG letter was sent to the Hill so we expect Dems to make hay over it.

Secretary Zinke Names Former Louisiana State Official Scott A. Angelle Director of the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today named former Louisiana state official Scott A. Angelle as the Director of the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement (BSEE), which fosters safe and responsible energy production on the U.S. Outer Continental Shelf through regulatory oversight of oil and gas operations. Angelle, who most recently served as Vice Chairman of the Louisiana Public Service Commission, will assume his new position on May ##.

“Scott Angelle brings a wealth of experience to BSEE, having spent many years working for the safe and efficient energy production of both Louisiana’s and our country’s offshore resources,” Secretary Zinke said. “As we set our path towards energy dominance, I am confident that Scott has the expertise, vision, and the leadership necessary to effectively enhance our program, and to promote the safe and environmentally responsible exploration, development, and production of our country’s offshore oil and gas resources.”

Angelle, who will serve as the fourth director in BSEE’s history, has held numerous positions in Louisiana State and Parish governments, including Interim Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Natural Resources, and St. Martin Parish President. In the aftermath of the BP oil spill, Angelle served at the request of then Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal as liaison to the federal government, and negotiated an early end of the previous administration’s drilling moratorium.

“I welcome the opportunity to serve President Trump and Secretary Zinke, and work with BSEE staff to meet the critical goal of energy dominance for our country,” said Angelle. “It is an exciting and challenging time for BSEE; I look forward to leading our efforts to empower the offshore oil and gas industry while ensuring safe and environmentally responsible operations.”

Angelle served for eight years as Louisiana's Secretary of the Department of Natural Resources. Under his leadership, the state's coastal permitting system was reformed, providing for efficient permitting while increasing drilling rig counts in Louisiana by more than 150 percent during his tenure. Angelle has also served as Chairman of the Louisiana State Mineral Board, and as a member of the Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors, Southern States Energy Board, and the Louisiana Coastal Port Advisory Authority.

Angelle is a native of Breaux Bridge, Louisiana, and a cum laude graduate of the University of Louisiana at Lafayette with a Bachelor of Science degree in Petroleum Land Management. He and his wife Dianne are the proud parents of five children and four grandchildren.

Established in 2011, BSEE fosters secure and reliable energy production through a program of efficient permitting, appropriate regulations, compliance monitoring and enforcement, technical assessments, inspections, and incident investigations. The position of BSEE Director is not Senate-confirmed.

More information on BSEE can be found at: <http://www.bsee.gov>

INTERIOR DAILY COMMUNICATIONS REPORT

NEWS TO SHARE:

Fresno Bee: Empire Fire in Yosemite shows that not all wildfires are bad. It is ‘a good fire’

“U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke on Sept. 12 released a memo directing staff to ‘take a serious turn from the past’ by working to prevent forest fires ‘through aggressive and scientific fuels reduction management.’ Zinke’s memo was welcome direction for Shive. ‘We feel encouraged by it because we’ve been doing what amounts to very active fire management for a long time,’ Shive says. ‘And I think that memo is correct, but this has not been widespread practice. There’s a handful of places in the Western U.S that have been doing this for a very long time. Most places have not.’”

E&E News: Trump's energy focus raises hopes in Alaska

“Alaska Gov. Bill Walker (I) first grasped the dramatic changes in store for his state under the Trump administration when he attended an inaugural event early this year. As Walker and his wife began to leave a late-night reception, they bumped into Ryan Zinke, whom President Trump had already selected to head the Interior Department. As Walker recalled at a recent business forum, ‘We were introduced, and [Zinke] said, ‘You’re the governor of Alaska?’ And I said, ‘Yes I am.’ He grabbed my hand and said, ‘You’re going to love me.’”

The Daily Republic: Fishing for a Problem

“Fortunately for all anglers/hunters/recreational shooters, President Donald Trump appointed Ryan Zinke as the new Secretary of the Interior. On March 2, 2017, Zinke reversed Order 219. Zinke said, and I will quote, ‘After reviewing the order and the process by which it was promulgated, I have determined that the order is not mandated by any existing statutory or regulatory requirement and was issued without significant communication, consultation or coordination with affected stakeholders.’ Zinke, of Montana, has asked federal agencies to promote outdoor recreation, and regarding this he has said, ‘It worries me to think about hunting and fishing becoming activities for the land-owning elite.’ Let’s hope that he continues to think along these lines.”

Flathead Beacon: Don’t Let Fake Narrative Block Monuments Review

“Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has made an admirable attempt to solicit input from Montanans about how national monuments have affected our state. It’s unfortunate that effort has been drowned out by fake advertisements aimed at misleading Montanans and funded by out-of-state environmental groups. Opposition to the monuments review centers on the ridiculous claim that it will result in the federal government selling federal land to private entities. Not only is that the direct opposite of Secretary Zinke's stated objective, it's illegal for the federal government to sell public land."

Correcting the Record:

L.A. Times: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke calls his staff disloyal in speech to oil industry

"Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke walked into a big gathering of the National Petroleum Council on Monday already facing at least two government probes for his management of the department's workforce of 70,000 — but that didn't stop him from bashing his employees. Zinke told the gathering that he figured upon taking his post that nearly a third of the people at the department were disloyal. The comment may have shed light on the secretary's reasons for directing department officials to reassign approximately 50 top managers in June, as soon as the move may have been legally permissible."

TALKING POINTS

- The media reports were incomplete and mischaracterized the Secretary's analogy.
- The Secretary is a Navy man and used the analogy of seizing a ship in battle and changing policies and procedures.
- The "flag" was not a literal comparison to the flag of the U.S. or even the Administration. In the military structure, to which the Secretary was alluding, the flag represents the command of an organization and the policies and procedures it seeks to implement
- The Secretary led with the fact that Interior is full of "really good people" but that a small minority are hesitant to changing policy and reforms. This includes the bad actors who are frequently the subject of IG reports who resist any change because they know it will lead to accountability.

Washington Post: No, we can't -- and shouldn't -- stop forest fires

"The American West is burning, Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) tells us in his recent Post op-ed. He and officials in the Trump administration have described Western forest fires as catastrophes, promoting congressional action ostensibly to save our National Forests from fire by allowing widespread commercial logging on public lands. This, they claim, will reduce forest density and the fuel for wildfires. But this position is out of step with current science and is based on several myths promoted by commercial interests."

TALKING POINTS

- Dead and dying timber from previous fires, and disease infestation, plague our forests and make them more prone to catastrophic fires. By thinning these fuels, fires do not gain in intensity and grow as quickly. This makes them safer and more manageable to battle.

- The Trump Administration is taking aggressive and preemptive measures to prevent wildfires and combat their spread through active fuels management versus the previous administration's (and these authors') more "naturalist" approach. The naturalist approach allows fuels to build up and forests to thicken, making them more prone to wildfires that are more difficult and dangerous to suppress.
- The Secretary's forest management Secretarial Order does not allow commercial timber harvests in National Parks. It does, however, order preemptive fuels management, like what already happens in parks like Yosemite and Sequoia Kings Canyon National Parks. Secretary Zinke recently visited Montana with Secretary Sonny Perdue of the Department of Agriculture to view the wildfires in the West.

Washington Post: The National Park Service showed that its bottled water ban worked — then lifted it

“Long before the Trump administration rescinded a ban on the sale of disposable water bottles in select national parks, the Interior Department was aware of a report from the National Park Service that the program worked. The report was quietly made public at the end of the day Friday after organizations submitted Freedom of Information Act requests for its release. In 2011, the parks initiated a water bottle sales elimination program to reduce pollution and the costs of recycling plastic. It resulted in yearly savings of up to two million water bottles, according to an estimate in the report, and ‘demonstrates the commitment of the [National Park Service] to environmental stewardship.’”

TALKING POINTS

- The policy was discontinued to expand healthy hydration options for recreationalists, hikers, and other visitors to national parks. The ban removed the healthiest beverage choice at a variety of parks while still allowing sales of bottled sweetened drinks.
- The Department's changes will improve the visitor experience.
- We will continue to encourage the use of free water bottle filling stations as appropriate, but ultimately it should be up to our visitors to decide how best to keep themselves and their families hydrated during a visit to a national park, particularly during hot summer visitation periods.
- The change in policy came after an NPS internal review of the policy's aims and impact in close consultation with Department of the Interior leadership.

U.S. News and World Report: Congress Debates Oil Drilling in Largest US Wildlife Refuge

“A showdown is looming in the nation's capital over whether to open America's largest wildlife refuge to oil drilling. A budget measure approved by the Republican-controlled Congress allows lawmakers to pursue legislation that would allow drilling on the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The refuge takes up an area nearly the size of South Carolina in Alaska's northeast corner. Nearly 200,000 caribou in the Porcupine Caribou Herd migrate from Canada to the coastal plain most years.”

Independent Journal Review: Int Sec Ryan Zinke Spent the Day in Moccasins and a Fashion Staple That Would Make George H.W. Bush Proud

“On Wednesday, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke marked Native American Heritage Month by participating in #RockYourMocs. Zinke ditched the traditional dress shoe usually seen around the Capitol for a pair of moccasins. While former President George H.W. Bush may be well known for his incredible sock game, what the interior secretary sported underneath his moccasins proved Bush isn't alone in his love for fashionable feet accessories...Zinke also offered a statement of remembrance of Native American Veteran Michael Bell and was given a quilt his family made as a gift. Teen Vogue reported that some people took umbrage at Zinke's decision to wear moccasins, but the Bureau of Indian Affairs thanked the secretary on Twitter for celebrating with them. The tweet added they were “honored” to gather around the quilt with him as he remembered Bell.”

The Daily Sentinel \(CO\): U.S. Lands Open for Biz

“More than 250 people applauded a high-ranking official who came to Grand Junction on Thursday night with news that the federal government is dedicated to making federal lands welcome to energy development. Kate MacGregor, who oversees the Bureau of Land Management, outlined President Donald Trump's and U.S. Department of the Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's plans to remove roadblocks to mining and drilling. Many attendees walked past roughly 40 sign-waving protesters at Two Rivers Convention Center. Grand Junction's Petroleum and Mining Club hosted MacGregor, who delivered the speech, “The Department of the Interior's Role in Energy Dominance.”...MacGregor said the Department of Interior aims to streamline planning and permitting of leases, reduce the regulatory burdens, support and improve pipeline development and improve trust with local, state and tribal partners.”

CORRECTING THE RECORD:

New York Times: Trump Administration to Lift Ban on ‘Trophy’ Elephant Imports

“The Trump administration will begin allowing hunters to bring into the United States “trophy” elephants killed in Zimbabwe, reversing a 2014 ban on a practice that has received intense scrutiny in recent years. Though African elephants are protected under the Endangered Species Act, the law allows the United States Fish and Wildlife Service to authorize imports of trophies if the agency finds that the hunts in which the animals were killed contribute to the survival of the species. The United States banned such imports from Zimbabwe in 2014 because of a lack of data on conservation efforts there. Now the United States agency says it is satisfied with Zimbabwe’s actions and believes such hunts can be beneficial for the species by bringing money to local communities and providing incentives to conserve elephants. “Since our 2014 and 2015 findings, there are strong indications that the efforts of private landowners and consortiums to manage elephants within their areas of control have received greater support,” the federal agency said in a notice to be published in the Federal Register on Friday.”

- USFWS Statement: “Legal, well-regulated sport hunting as part of a sound management program can benefit certain species by providing incentives to local communities to conserve those species and by putting much-needed revenue back into conservation. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has determined that the hunting and management programs for African elephants in Zimbabwe and Zambia will enhance the survival of the species in the wild. These enhancement findings are required prior to allowing import of these trophies under Endangered Species Act regulations. The finding applies to elephants hunted in Zimbabwe on or after January 21, 2016, and on or before December 31, 2018, and to elephants hunted in Zambia during calendar years 2016, 2017 and 2018, for applications that meet all other applicable permitting requirements.”

Washington Post: Watchdog says Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke failed to properly document travel

“Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has failed to keep complete records — and in some cases, kept none at all — of his travel since taking office, the agency’s watchdog told department officials this week, saying that management of Zinke’s travel was “deficient” and lacked oversight. A rare alert Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall sent to the secretary’s office Wednesday, obtained by The Washington Post, said her investigation into allegations of improper travel practices by Zinke has been stymied by “absent or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips.” Interior lawyers and ethics officials also have not shown evidence to investigators that they have been able to “distinguish between personal, political and official travel” or cost-analysis documents to justify his choice of military or charter flights, Kendall wrote. The memo reveals that the inspector general is also scrutinizing the travel of Zinke’s wife, Lolita, who often accompanied him on official trips. Kendall wrote that the department's documentation was so lacking that investigators cannot determine "the full extent" of her travel and how it was paid for."

U.S. News and World Report: Justice Department Won't Release National Monument Documents

"Federal officials say they don't have to provide an Idaho environmental law firm with documents possibly outlining legal justifications for President Donald Trump to shrink national monuments because they're protected communications. The U.S. Department of Justice on Wednesday asked a federal judge to dismiss the lawsuit from Advocates for the West. The environmental law firm filed a public records request for documents on the national monuments earlier this year, and the Justice Department released more than 60 pages in May. The agency withheld 12 pages, however, contending that they are protected under attorney-client privilege and intra-agency communication rules."

NBC News: Drones are fighting wildfires in some very surprising ways

"Wildfires in the U.S. were brutal last summer, scorching more than 8.8 million acres and cloaking the Pacific Northwest in smoke and ash. In California alone, more than 40 people died and 8,400 buildings were destroyed in the deadliest wildfires in the state's history. Things may only get worse in years to come... But aerial drones may help save the day. From tiny quadcopters to big fixed-wing aircraft, drones are showing that they can detect, contain and even extinguish fires faster and with greater safety. They give firefighters a bird's-eye view of the terrain and help them determine where a fire will spread — so they can make swift decisions about where fire crews should go and which residents need to be evacuated."

Bloomberg: Trump, First Lady Welcome Ghosts, Goblins on Halloween Eve

“President Donald Trump dressed up as himself, complete with his trademark red tie, for his first Halloween in the White House. Trump and first lady Melania Trump greeted some of the 6,000 children and adults who were invited for trick-or-treating at the White House on Halloween eve. Children from more than 20 schools in the District of Columbia, Maryland and Virginia attended the festivities on the South Lawn, along with military families and members of unspecified community organizations. Spooky music played over loudspeakers. Machines cranked out fog. Pumpkins carved with the likenesses of past presidents decorated the south entrance of the White House. Black spiders hung from webs spun between the portico's columns. A sign over an awning proclaimed "Halloween at the White House 2017.”

CORRECTING THE RECORD:

Augusta Free Press \(VA\): Kaine, colleagues urge Trump to rescind proposed national park fee increase

“U.S. Senator Tim Kaine (D-VA) joined Senator Maria Cantwell (D-WA) and nine other colleagues in a letter to Secretary of Interior Ryan Zinke requesting he withdraw his proposal to dramatically increase national park entrance fees at 17 national parks pending further review.

According to the proposal, Shenandoah National Park visitor fees would increase dramatically from $25 to $70 per vehicle during peak season.”

- DOI Statement: "Entrance fees have long been an important source of revenue used to improve the visitor experience and recreation opportunities in national parks. In fact entrance fees to parks predate the establishment of the National Park Service in 1916. For example, Mount Rainier National Park started charging an entrance fee in 1908. Factoring in inflation, the $5 entrance fee the park charged in 1914 would be the equivalent of a $123 entrance fee today. The proposed peak-season entrance fees at 17 parks were determined by analyzing historical NPS entrance fee and visitation data along with entrance fees at other park systems and family attractions. The proposed seasonal pricing structure is intended to balance the need to generate badly needed revenue for improvements to the aging national park infrastructure like roads, bridges, campgrounds, waterlines, and bathrooms while still providing good value to our visitors and maintaining existing prices or free entrance in the vast majority of national park sites. Only 118 of our 417 national park sites charge entrance fees -- the other 299 national parks do not charge an entrance fee. This proposal is just one potential tool in the toolbox. We are looking at a variety of options specifically intended to address the national park maintenance backlog and to improve the visitor experience at parks."

TALKING POINTS

- Secretary Zinke has spoken at length about addressing the deferred maintenance problem at our National Parks, and this will require a new approach.
- Our parks face an $11 billion maintenance backlog and need serious improvements to infrastructure if they are to accommodate visitors.
- The higher fees would go directly into funding these infrastructure improvements; in lieu of indiscriminately imposing a tax on the American people, the fee increase represents a free market solution that relies on the citizenry's voluntary use of the parks to fund the sites' future.
- 80% of funds raised, from the fee increase, will go directly back to the specific park at which the permit was bought. The remaining 20% will be dispersed to parks that did not incur a fee increase.
- By Comparison: A ticket at Walt Disney World is $119 per person, peak season. A family of four will pay $476 for one day. Yellowstone, Yosemite or the other premier national parks propose to raise the fee to $70 per car for a 7-day permit - $10 a day, $2.50 a person for a family of four.

Politico: Watchdog urges probe of whether Zinke campaign benefited friend, family

"Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's congressional campaign committee bought an RV from his wife then sold it to a friend a year later at a steep discount, a watchdog group said in a Federal Election Commission complaint that alleges an illegal scheme to convert political donations into personal cash. The June RV sale is one of several transactions the Campaign Legal Center says may have provided illegal benefits to Zinke's family or friends. The group also cites hotel stays in the Virgin Islands and New York that Zinke's campaign paid for after the Montana Republican was tapped to join then-President-elect Donald Trump's Cabinet, as well as catering expenses the campaign incurred after Zinke was confirmed. CLC also says in the complaint that Zinke may have relied on a joint fundraising committee to allow donors to give money to his campaign above federal contribution limits."

Wall Street Journal: FBI Is Probing Puerto Rico Power Contract

"The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating a decision by Puerto Rico's power authority to award a $300 million contract to a tiny Montana energy firm to rebuild electrical infrastructure damaged in Hurricane Maria, according to people familiar with the matter. Agents from the FBI's San Juan field office are looking into circumstances surrounding the deal that the public power monopoly known as Prepa signed with Whitefish Energy Holdings LLC, according to the people familiar with the matter. Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló canceled the contract Sunday, saying it had become a distraction from the U.S. territory's efforts to restore the devastated grid. Only 30% of the island's power customers have had electricity restored."

Bloomberg: Arctic Refuge Oil Bonanza More Likely to Be Bust for GOP Budget

"Congressional Republicans counting on a $1 billion windfall from selling oil-drilling rights in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to help pay for tax cuts may be in for a disappointment. Data from previous Arctic oil lease sales suggest the U.S. is likely to collect less than a fifth of that billion-dollar goal over the next decade-- about $145.5 million -- from auctioning off territory in the sprawling northeast Alaska refuge where caribou calve and polar bears roam. Oil companies may be scared away by the controversies and costs of drilling in that remote and fragile terrain. Even if they aren't, crude prices would have to be some $15 more per barrel than they are today to make the effort pay off at all."

Palm Beach Post: Gov. Scott proposes additional $50 million for Lake O dike

"Gov. Rick Scott is proposing an additional $50 million to expedite repairs to the Herbert Hoover Dike that surrounds Lake Okeechobee. The announcement this morning comes as the lake once again tops 17 feet above sea level, a depth that causes concerns about the integrity of the aging structure. Scott said the $50 million is part of his 2018-2019 recommended budget and is on top of the $50 million approved in the current year's budget to kick-start repairs. Florida Senate President Joe Negron, R-Stuart, and House Speaker Richard Corcoran, R-Land O'Lakes, lauded the announcement."

SUPPORT FOR DAVID BERNHARDT, DEPUTY SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR NOMINEE

On April 28, 2017, President Donald Trump nominated David Bernhardt to serve as the Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Given his notable and extensive prior experience at the Department of the Interior and in the Commonwealth of Virginia, he has received broad support from his former colleagues, the sporting and conservation community, and Indian Country, including notable mentions such as the following:

- “We believe Mr. Bernhardt is well positioned to help lead the Department of the Interior in a manner that respects and upholds the federal government’s trust and treaty responsibilities to Indian tribes and empowers tribal communities to exercise greater self-determination.” – National Congress of American Indians (5/25/2017).
- “I have known and worked with David Bernhardt for more than 10 years and could not be more pleased with his nomination for Deputy Secretary of the Interior...He is a man with personal and professional integrity that is beyond reproach and has always advocated for the proper implementation of the law.” – Dale Hall, CEO, Ducks Unlimited, and former Director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service (4/28/2017).
- “Mr. Bernhardt is a dedicated hunter-conservationist, and he is committed to facilitating the economic and conservation benefits that result from hunting. He has extensive knowledge and experience in crafting solutions to complex problems of restoring wildlife habitat and developing economic incentives and markets for conservation actions.” – Boone and Crockett Club (5/11/2017).
- “Dave Bernhardt is an excellent choice to be Deputy Secretary. After I became Secretary of the Interior, Dave was unanimously confirmed by the Senate to be the Solicitor, Interior's highest ranking legal officer. Dave provided wide counsel based on thoroughly understanding issues being decided. He is thoughtful and fair. The Solicitor's Office, Interior political and career staff and the Department's diverse stakeholders respected Dave's intellect, leadership and management skill. I commend President Trump and Secretary Zinke for selecting Dave to help manage a Department that has operations in all 50 states and many parts of the world.” – Former Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne (4/28/2017).
- “Given Mr. Bernhardt’s familiarity with our Tribe’s story and his stellar qualifications, we believe that Mr. Bernhardt is well-positioned to help lead the Department of the Interior in a manner that respects the federal responsibility to Indian tribes and empowers tribal communities to exercise greater self-determination.” – Southern Ute Indian Tribe (5/17/2017).
- “During his tenure at DOI, David was responsible for drafting a ten year plan to implement President George W. Bush’s Executive Order 13443, which expanded hunting opportunities on federal lands, as well as the management of game species and their habitats. He clearly understands the vital role hunters play in conserving our natural resources.” – National Rifle Association of America (5/17/2017).
- “Mr. Bernhardt’s extensive experience with the diverse responsibilities and mandates of the Department and its agencies will allow him to move quickly into a leadership role and ensure a smooth transition...Mr. Bernhardt’s significant experience will ensure that issues are assessed and addressed quickly.” – Delta Waterfowl (5/5/2017).

Other support includes the Archery Trade Association; Association of Fish and Wildlife Agencies; Camp Fire Club of America; Colorado Water Congress; Colorado Water District; Congressional Sportsmen’s Foundation; Conservation Force; Dallas Safari Club; Family Farm Alliance; Gila River Indian Community; Houston Safari Club; Masters of Foxhounds Association & Foundation; Mule Deer Foundation; National Cattlemen’s Beef Association; National Shooting Sports Foundation; National Wild Turkey Federation; Oneida Indian Nation; Orion – The Hunter’s Institute; Outdoor Recreation Industry Roundtable; Penobscot Nation; Pheasants Forever; Professional Outfitters and Guides of America; Public Lands Council; Quail Forever; Quality Deer Management Association; Quapaw Tribe; Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation; Safari Club International; Seneca Nation of Indians; Shikar-Safari Club; Sportsmen’s Alliance; Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership; Wild Sheep Foundation; Wildlife Forever; Wildlife Management Institute; and Wildlife Mississippi.

NATIONAL CONGRESS OF AMERICAN INDIANS

May 25, 2017

Honorable Lisa Murkowski, Chair
Committee on Energy & Natural Resources
United States Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Re: Support for David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Department of Interior

Dear Chairman Murkowski,

On behalf of the National Congress of American Indians, I am writing to express our support for David Bernhardt's nomination to serve as Deputy Secretary for the Department of Interior. The National Congress of American Indians advocates for policies that promote tribal sovereignty and a strong government-to-government relationship between Tribal Nations and the United States, and we believe that Mr. Bernhardt possesses the perspective, knowledge, and skills to serve as an able proponent of such policies.

As you know, Mr. Bernhardt worked for the Administration under President Bush and gained extensive experience with tribal government issues during that time. We believe he understands the complex challenges for economic development, law enforcement, education and transportation on tribal lands, and the need to support tribal solutions to address those challenges. Mr. Bernhardt also has experience working on tribal water rights, an issue that is vital to our future.

In his earlier work, Mr. Bernhardt placed considerable focus on trust mismanagement litigation. Most of that litigation has since been settled, and NCAI is encouraging a new focus on collaboration with tribal governments in implementing the Indian Trust Asset Management Reform Act of 2016. Together with Tribal Nations and Congress, we are starting a new path towards self-determination and economic development in tribal land management, and we urge continuing the restoration of the tribal land base to address the land loss and fractionation that are the legacy of failed policy eras of the past.

We believe Mr. Bernhardt is well positioned to help lead the Department of the Interior in a manner that respects and upholds the federal government's trust and treaty responsibilities to Indian tribes and empowers tribal communities to exercise greater self-determination. We urge the approval of Mr. Bernhardt's nomination by the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Thank you for your leadership on this important matter.

Sincerely,

DU applauds nomination of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Interior

Read release online »

WASHINGTON, D.C. – April 28, 2017 – Ducks Unlimited (DU), a leader in wetlands and waterfowl conservation, looks forward to working with David L. Bernhardt, who was nominated by President Trump today to serve as the new Deputy Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior (DOI), the department in charge of managing and conserving public land and natural resources in the United States. Bernhardt will serve under recently appointed Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke.

"I have known and worked with David Bernhardt for more than 10 years and could not be more pleased with his nomination for Deputy Secretary of the Interior," said Ducks Unlimited CEO Dale Hall. "He is a man with personal and professional integrity that is beyond reproach and has always advocated for the proper implementation of the law. We urge the Senate to quickly confirm Mr. Bernhardt for this extremely important position to the Department's expansive conservation responsibilities."

In 2006, Bernhardt was unanimously confirmed by the Senate to serve as the solicitor of the DOI. As solicitor, Bernhardt was the chief legal officer and third ranking official for the DOI.

Prior to serving as solicitor, he held several high-level positions with the DOI including Deputy Solicitor, Deputy Chief of Staff, Counselor to the Secretary of the Interior and Director of the Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs.

In 2007, in addition to his DOI duties, Bernhardt was appointed by President George W. Bush to lead the International Boundary Commission between the United States and Canada where Bernhardt was responsible, along with his Canadian counterpart, for maintaining the 5,525-mile international boundary between these two nations.

Ducks Unlimited Inc. is the world's largest nonprofit organization dedicated to conserving North America's continually disappearing waterfowl habitats. Established in 1937, Ducks Unlimited has conserved more than 14 million acres thanks to contributions from more than a million supporters across the continent. Guided by science and dedicated to program efficiency, DU works toward the vision of wetlands sufficient to fill the skies with waterfowl today, tomorrow and forever. Secretary Zinke Applauds Nomination of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Interior

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

4/28/2017

Last edited 4/28/2017

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump today announced the nomination of Department of the Interior veteran David Bernhardt as the Interior's Deputy Secretary.

"I am excited to announce the President and I have selected Dave Bernhardt to help me lead the Interior Department," said Secretary Zinke. "Bernhardt's extensive experience servicing under former Interior Secretaries Norton and Kempthorne and his esteemed legal career is exactly what is needed to help streamline government and make the Interior and our public lands work for the American economy."

"Dave Bernhardt is an excellent choice to be Deputy Secretary. After I became Secretary of the Interior, Dave was unanimously confirmed by the Senate to be the Solicitor, Interior's highest ranking legal officer. Dave provided wide counsel based on thoroughly understanding issues being decided. He is thoughtful and fair. The Solicitor's Office, Interior political and career staff and the Department's diverse stakeholders respected Dave's intellect, leadership and management skill. I commend President Trump and Secretary Zinke for selecting Dave to help manage a Department that has operations in all 50 states and many parts of the world," said former Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne.

Bernhardt is an avid hunter and fisherman and recently served on the Board of Game and Inland Fisheries for the Commonwealth of Virginia. He has previously served as the United States Commissioner to the International Boundary Commission, U.S. and Canada.

From 2001 and 2009, he held several positions within the Department of the Interior, including serving as Solicitor. Previously he served then-Secretary Norton as a deputy solicitor, deputy chief of staff and counselor to the Secretary, and as director of congressional and legislative affairs and counselor to the Secretary. Currently, Bernhardt chairs the natural resource law practice at Brownstein, Hyatt Farber and Schreck, LLP.

A native of Rifle, Colorado, Bernhardt earned a B.A. from the University of Northern Colorado. He graduated with honors from the George Washington University National Law Center and is admitted to various state and federal court bars. He is married to Gena Bernhardt. They have two children, and reside in Arlington, Virginia.

The position of Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior is the Chief Operating Officer of the Department and Bernhardt's nomination is subject to confirmation by the United States Senate.

Re: Support for David Bernhardt to be Deputy Secretary for the Department of Interior

Dear Senator Gardner,

On behalf of the Southern Ute Indian Tribe, I am writing to express our support for David Bernhardt's nomination to serve as Deputy Secretary for the Department of Interior. Our Tribe advocates for policies that promote Indian energy development, tribal sovereignty, Indian self-determination, and a positive government-to-government relationship between Indian tribes and the United States. As you know, Indian country faces many challenges, including reconsolidating fractionated lands, tribal economic development, and providing quality programs and services to tribal members.

After decades of disciplined governance and energy resource development, our Tribe has built an economy that is balanced, mature, and diversified. It is no exaggeration to say that our economy is the engine of growth and household incomes in southwest Colorado. As a result, our Tribe has long been involved in helping the Congress and federal agencies shape a rational, pro-development energy policy.

As a native of Colorado, Mr. Bernhardt is aware of our Tribe's unique history, particularly the role that meaningful self-determination coupled with prudent energy development has played in achieving economic prosperity for our Tribe, our tribal members, and surrounding communities. Given Mr. Bernhardt's familiarity with our Tribe's story and his stellar qualifications, we believe that Mr. Bernhardt is well-positioned to help lead the Department of the Interior in a manner that respects the federal trust responsibility to Indian tribes and empowers tribal communities to exercise greater self-determination. We urge swift approval of Mr. Bernhardt's nomination by the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Thank you for your leadership on this important matter.

Sincerely,

Clement J. Frost

Dear Majority Leader McConnell and Minority Leader Schumer:

I am writing to express the National Rifle Association's support for David Bernhardt's nomination as Deputy Secretary, U.S. Department of the Interior (DOI).

Originally from Rifle, Colorado, David is an avid hunter, shooter, and fisherman. His commitment to preserving America's wildlife resources is rooted in his own experience as an outdoorsman.

David has extensive knowledge of DOI's operations, having served the Department in multiple capacities throughout his career. In 2006 he was unanimously confirmed by the U.S. Senate for the position of Solicitor, DOI's third-ranking official and chief legal officer. In that role, he provided a wide range of advice and counsel to various DOI agencies on legal and policy matters.

In addition, David served on the Board of Game and Inland Fisheries for the Commonwealth of Virginia, where he currently lives with his wife and children. This experience has provided him with an understanding of the importance of federal-state partnerships in managing America's fish and wildlife populations.

During his tenure at DOI, David was responsible for drafting a ten year plan to implement President George W. Bush's Executive Order 13443, which expanded hunting opportunities on federal lands, as well as the management of game species and their habitats. He clearly understands the vital role hunters play in conserving our natural resources.

For these reasons, the NRA asks that the Senate quickly confirm David Bernhardt for the position of Deputy Secretary at DOI.

Sincerely,

Chris W. Cox

Dear Chairman Murkowski and Ranking Member Cantwell:

Delta Waterfowl is writing today in support of the nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Department of Interior. As an organization committed to the future of ducks and duck hunting, we believe Mr. Bernhardt has the experience, expertise and values necessary to conserve our vast and diverse natural resources while serving hunters, anglers and conservationists in this critically important role.

Mr. Bernhardt developed an early appreciation for hunting, fishing and public lands while growing up in Colorado, and these experiences have had a significant impact on his world view and professional life. We believe it is critically important that the Department of the Interior share these core values as one of the primary constituencies of Department are the millions of hunters and anglers who cherish the open spaces and access provided by our nation's public lands.

Mr. Bernhardt's extensive experience with the diverse responsibilities and mandates of the Department and its agencies will allow him to quickly move into a leadership role and ensure a smooth transition. There are a number of pressing priorities within the Department and Mr. Bernhardt's significant experience will ensure that issues are assessed and addressed quickly.

In closing, we request your support of Mr. Bernhardt's nomination as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. We believe he will be an effective member of the Department's leadership team and a key advocate for hunters, anglers, and conservationists. We appreciate your consideration of our perspective and thank you for your continued support for America's sportsmen-conservationists.

Dear Chairman Murkowski and Ranking Member Cantwell:

On behalf of the millions of hunters, anglers, shooters and outdoor enthusiasts that our organizations represent, we are writing to express our strong support for the confirmation of David Bernhardt as the next Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior.

Through his public service on Capitol Hill and in the Department of the Interior (DOI), Mr. Bernhardt has demonstrated an unyielding commitment to conserving and protecting our nation's natural, historic and cultural resources for the benefit of current and future generations.

David has a deeply held passion for conservation and historic preservation that is guided by his unwavering moral compass. David also has a strong track record of collaborating with diverse cross-sections of stakeholders to ensure that their best interests, not partisan politics, inform policy decisions that may affect them.

An avid hunter, angler and shooter, David recently volunteered his time to serve on the Commonwealth of Virginia's Board of Game and Inland Fisheries, Mr. Bernhardt understands the value of state and federal partnerships on issues such as ensuring that states retain primary jurisdiction over fish and wildlife within their borders, and interagency collaboration to enhance and expand the public's access to the lands that the public owns.

In 2006, Mr. Bernhardt was unanimously confirmed by the Senate to serve as the Solicitor of the Department of Interior. As solicitor, David was the chief legal officer and third ranking official for the Department. Prior to serving as Solicitor, David held several other positions at DOI including Deputy Solicitor, Deputy Chief of Staff, Counselor to the Secretary of the Interior and Director of the Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs.

During his time at DOI, Mr. Bernhardt demonstrated his interest and ability in finding solutions to complex problems like restoring wildlife habitat and navigating the complexities of the Endangered Species Act. He served as an integral part of the administration that:

- Worked with Congress and administratively to create 15 new National Wildlife Refuges and emphasized recovery goals under the Endangered Species Act.
- Took efforts to conserve the populations of both the bald eagle and the Yellowstone grizzly bear that led to the recovery and removal of the bald eagle from the Endangered Species List; and the proposed delisting of the Greater Yellowstone grizzly bear population.
- Drafted 10-year plan to implement the Executive Order (E.O. 13443) to facilitate the expansion and enhancement of hunting opportunities and the management of game species and their habitat.

We urge you to approve the confirmation of Mr. Bernhardt, so that the Senate may act to quickly confirm Mr. Bernhardt for this critical position at the Department of the Interior.

Dear Chairman Murkowski:

The Outdoor Recreation Industry Roundtable (ORIR) supports the President’s nomination of David Longly Bernhardt to serve as Deputy Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior, an appointment of great importance to the outdoor recreation industry. As the steward of more than 25% of the nation’s land-base – including prime recreation sites on public lands and waters drawing more than a billion visits annually – the Department is of vital importance to our industry and its customers.

Many of us have known David Bernhardt for years through his prior public service at the Department. We have found him responsive, intelligent and committed to cooperation among government agencies at all levels and the recreation community’s private sector. He understands that we manufacture, sell and service equipment ranging from RVs to boats, skis to fishing equipment and much more that make being outdoors fun. He understands that our industry has designed, built and now operates ski areas and lodging, campgrounds and marinas on public lands, and provides outfitter and guide services – again, helping Americans enjoy and benefit from the shared legacy of our national parks, national forests, national wildlife refuges, vast BLM-managed assets, the waters overseen by the Bureau of Reclamation and more.

David grew up with an appreciation of the outdoors in and around Rifle, Colorado, and those experiences have shaped his priorities and outlook. We worked with him in his role as Interior’s Director of Congressional Affairs on numerous issues, including the crafting of the Federal Lands Recreation Enhancement Act, and later during his service as the department’s Deputy Chief of Staff and Solicitor.

The Department needs leadership from those aware of the complexities of balancing recreation, conservation and commodity purposes – and a person who understands that there are usually solutions to even very difficult matters if time is invested in understanding the full range of alternatives and then gaining broad buy-in by the range of interests involved in Interior topics.

Those leading the Department of the Interior will play a central role in determining whether the outdoor recreation industry, now estimated to generate $887 billion in annual spending and supporting some 7.6 million jobs, will continue to grow and generate economic and health benefits and support long term community sustainability in areas with major public lands. We are convinced that Mr. Bernhardt will respond to these challenges and assist Secretary Zinke in very positive ways. We respectfully request that this letter and its message of support be included in the record of the May 18, 2017, confirmation hearing by your committee on this nomination.

The Outdoor Recreation Industry Roundtable is comprised of America's leading outdoor recreation trade associations, representing thousands of U.S. businesses that produce and provide equipment, gear, apparel, vehicles and services for some 150 million Americans who enjoy our nation's public lands, waterways, and byways. Spanning outdoor recreational activities such as boating, fishing, hunting, camping, snow sports and powersports, and including recreational vehicles, outdoor equipment and clothing used to pursue these activities, the Outdoor Recreation Industry Roundtable is dedicated to growing diverse outdoor participation, expanding recreational access for Americans and promoting conservation. More information on ORIR is attached.

We look forward to working with Mr. Bernhardt and the team at the Department of Interior to advance the outdoor recreation sector, grow jobs in the U.S., and ensure robust public access and treasured experiences in the outdoors that also boost our nation's physical and mental well-being.

Dear Senator Gardner:

On behalf of the Colorado River Water Conservation District, I write to endorse and urge your support for confirmation of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary for the Department of the Interior.

The Colorado River District has enjoyed working with David in a variety of capacities in the past. We have worked with David Bernhardt on both legislative and regulatory issues. He has always been advocate for western water and a problem-solver.

Mr. Bernhardt is highly qualified for this position. He spent his youth in Rifle, Colorado and learned water policy and water law from such exemplary mentors as Russell George and Scott McInnis. More recently, his service as the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior and his other D.C. experience will serve him and Interior extremely well in this new position. As a longtime advocate for western water, coupled with his understanding of both the legislative and regulatory process make him highly qualified to serve in this position.

The Department and the nation would be well served to have someone with David's qualifications and personal integrity in this position. The Colorado River District encourages your support and that of the US Senate for the prompt confirmation of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary, Department of the Interior.

Sincerely,

The Honorable Cory Gardner
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Senator Gardner,

On behalf of the Colorado Water Congress, we are writing to express our support for David Bernhardt to serve as Deputy Secretary for the Department of the Interior.

The Colorado Water Congress is the principal voice of Colorado's water community, and our Federal Affairs Committee fully supports Mr. Bernhardt's nomination. We have worked with David on issues affecting our water supplies; storage; delivery and conservation, as well as some regulatory issues, while he worked on Capitol Hill and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. Bernhardt is highly qualified to serve in this position. From his roots in Western Colorado to his prior service as the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior and in many other capacities, David has been a strong advocate for western water. Further, his thorough understanding of both the legislative process and natural resources law make him highly qualified to serve in this position.

David has been a public servant committed to the meaning of the term. He believes in and practices straight talk; is inclusive in consideration of issues brought before; explores all available options on the path to finding workable solutions in the real world where government actions impact real people. He has earned the trust of many because of his ability to communicate effectively and decide fairly.

The Department would be well served to have someone with David's qualifications and personal integrity in this position. Colorado Water Congress encourages the United States Senate to promptly confirm David Bernhardt's nomination so that the important work of the Department of the Interior can move forward.

Dear Chairman Murkowski, Ranking Member Cantwell and Members of the Committee:

On behalf of the Family Farm Alliance (Alliance), we appreciate the opportunity to strongly endorse Mr. David Bernhardt as the next Deputy Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior (Interior).

The Alliance is a grassroots organization of family farmers, ranchers, irrigation districts and allied industries in 16 Western states. The Alliance is focused on one mission: To ensure the availability of reliable, affordable irrigation water supplies to Western farmers and ranchers. We are also committed to the fundamental proposition that Western irrigated agriculture must be preserved and protected for a host of economic, sociological, environmental and national security reasons – many of which are often overlooked in the context of other national policy decisions.

Our organization works constructively with many federal departments and agencies, but the relationship we have with the Department of the Interior – and particularly, with the Bureau of Reclamation – is our closest.

We believe Mr. Bernhardt is a strong leader; a person with vision, common sense and high ethical standards. We have worked with Mr. Bernhardt in the past on several Western water issues and, as a Westerner himself, believe he understands the unique challenges faced by rural ag producers living in states where the federal government is the majority landowner and plays a significant role in the management of land and water that can impact our members.

Mr. Bernhardt has extensive federal policy-level experience gained from his public service both as the Department of the Interior's chief legal counsel and as a policymaker who led efforts related to species conservation, conventional and alternative energy development, natural resources planning, environmental compliance, climate change and Indian affairs at the Department. He has a proven track record at Interior, where he was unanimously confirmed in 2006 by the United States Senate to serve as the Department Solicitor. Prior to serving as Solicitor, he held several other high-level positions in the George W. Bush Administration including: Deputy Solicitor, Deputy Chief of Staff, Counselor to the Secretary of the Interior, and Director of the Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs.

As Solicitor, Mr. Bernhardt served with distinction as the Chief Legal Officer and third ranking official at Interior. He provided advice and counsel on a wide range of legal and policy matters to each of the agencies that make up the Department of the Interior, while leading a team of nearly 500 attorneys and staff.

It is our hope and expectation that Mr. Bernhardt will bring a level of practical experience, empathy for rural producers, and intelligence into this position that will serve not only the interests of the Trump Administration, but also farmers and ranchers throughout the Western United States.

The Family Farm Alliance respectfully requests your support of David Bernhardt's nomination as the next Deputy Secretary of Interior. We know he will serve our Nation well in this important position.

On behalf of our nearly 13,000 member companies nationwide, we write to express our strong support for the nomination of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior.

Having grown up hunting and fishing in rural western Colorado on public lands outside the town of Rifle, Mr. Bernhardt remains an active sportsman and recreational shooter.

In his previous capacity as the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior under then-Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, Mr. Bernhardt, who was unanimously confirmed to serve, proved himself to be a champion for sportsmen, shooters and wildlife. We can expect no different if he is afforded the opportunity to serve as Deputy Secretary.

NSSF is proud to offer its strong support of David Bernhardt and we ask for your support for his confirmation.

Dear Chairwoman Murkowski:

Re: Support for David Bernhardt, Department of the Interior Deputy Secretary Nominee

Shekóli. I write on behalf the Oneida Indian Nation in support of the confirmation of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Mr. Bernhardt's experience working for two Interior Secretaries during the Bush Administration convinces us that his knowledge of the Department and experience in dealing with the complex issues under its jurisdiction make him singularly well qualified for the Deputy Secretary position.

As Interior Solicitor, Mr. Bernhardt and his staff were involved in myriad thorny legal issues many of which involved Indian Country in some way, directly or indirectly. During his tenure as Solicitor, he was widely regarded as a thoughtful legal advisor to the Secretary and he was willing to defend final agency decisions in favor Indian tribes. Indeed, the United States Senate recognized his hard work and dedication when confirming him to serve as Interior Solicitor.

Further, as Mr. Bernhardt explained in his confirmation testimony of May 18, 2017, he has been recognized by tribal leaders for his work to resolve major Indian water rights disputes in Colorado, Arizona and Oklahoma. More importantly, we believe that Mr. Bernhardt understands the significance of tribal sovereignty, the real potential for tribal governments and non-tribal governments to resolve disputes by agreement where possible, and the constructive role that the federal government can play to support the negotiations and the resultant agreement.

While Mr. Bernhardt knows and respects the prerogatives of the Secretary, we think it significant that he knows and respects equally the obligation of full and meaningful government-to-government consultation before the United States takes actions that will impact Indian tribes.

RE: Support for Nomination of David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Interior Department

Dear Chair Murkowski and Ranking Member Cantwell,

On behalf of the Penobscot Nation, I write to express support for the nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt to serve as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Although Mr. Bernhardt previously served at the Department during the Presidency of George W. Bush, the Penobscot Nation did not have any direct interaction with him. We are, however, aware of his interactions with other tribal nations during that time, who informed us that Mr. Bernhardt placed a priority on having honest and transparent interactions and utilizing processes that developed a record which would then provide guidance on the outcome of any decision-making. The Penobscot Nation supports these core principles for decision-making at the Department. For this reason, and those described below, we offer our support for Mr. Bernhardt's nomination.

As described during the hearing on Mr. Bernhardt's nomination, his previous experience at the Interior Department makes him well-qualified to serve in the capacity of Deputy Secretary. Although, he did not interact with the Penobscot Nation during that time, we support the statements made by him during the recent hearing and believe that those views will provide a good foundation for interactions between the Department and tribal nations.

Mr. Bernhardt confirmed that consultation with tribal nations is a necessity and that it must be both meaningful and full. He provided assurances to Senator Martin Heinrich that funding for Indian programs are not suspect and there is a solid legal basis for such funding. He also assured Senator Jeff Flake that the Department will continue to play a constructive and appropriate role in the resolution of water disputes and tribal water issues. The Penobscot Nation agrees with these viewpoints and believes that the Department has a vital role in helping to protect the rights and trust assets of tribal nations.

Murkowski and Cantwell

Dear Chairman Murkowski:

The Public Lands Council (PLC) and the National Cattlemen's Beef Association (NCBA) would like to take this opportunity to express our support for the confirmation of David Bernhardt to be the Deputy Secretary of the Interior. PLC is the only national organization dedicated solely to representing the roughly 22,000 ranchers who hold federal grazing permits and operate on federal lands. NCBA is the beef industry's largest and oldest national marketing and trade association, representing American cattlemen and women who provide much of the nation's supply of food and own or manage a large portion of America's private property.

Mr. Bernhardt has a wealth of experience at the Department of the Interior, having previously served as the Department's Deputy Solicitor, deputy chief of staff and counselor to the Secretary, and as director of congressional and legislative affairs and counselor to the Secretary under former Interior Secretary Norton. He then went on to serve as the Solicitor under former Secretary Dirk Kempthorne. He is respected and widely regarded as a leader both inside and outside the Department. In his current capacity, Mr. Bernhardt leads the natural resource law practice at Brownstein Hyatt Farber and Schreck, LLP and has his finger on the pulse of everything that is happening in the natural resource world. Finally, as a native of Colorado Mr. Bernhardt understands western issues and the unique challenges that our members face while operating on public lands in the west.

Western ranchers own approximately 120 million acres of the most productive private land in the west and manage nearly 250 million acres of public land. Ranchers who hold grazing permits on public land do vital work that benefits public land including the improvement of water sources, improvement of wildlife habitat, and maintaining the open space that Americans enjoy. Having leadership at the Department of Interior who understands public lands, and who values true cooperation with stakeholders is in the best interest of all Americans.

PLC and NCBA appreciate the opportunity to provide our input on behalf of our members – the nation's food and fiber producers. We urge the Senate to confirm Mr. Bernhardt without delay.

Support for David L. Bernhardt to be Deputy Secretary – U.S. Department of the Interior

Dear Chairman Murkowski and Ranking Member Cantwell:

As veteran Senators from large western states, you know of the complexity of the issues affecting western communities. Management of federal and public lands, water, energy and natural resources and Indian affairs are but a handful of issues the U.S. Department of the Interior deals with on a daily basis.

In March 2017 the Senate --- rightly in my view --- voted overwhelmingly to confirm Ryan Zinke to be the Secretary of the Interior. His pro-active, upbeat, can-do attitude is the proper one to tackle the difficult issues facing Interior. Likewise, I believe David L. Bernhardt would be an excellent deputy to Secretary Zinke for the reasons mentioned below.

Mr. Bernhardt is a westerner by birth and orientation. In addition to an accomplished career in the private sector, he has experience working on Capitol Hill and spent 8 years in the Department of the Interior during the presidency of George W. Bush. Mr. Bernhardt wore many hats in his service to Secretary Gale Norton and Secretary Dirk Kempthorne in that 8-year period: Director of Congressional and Legislative Affairs, Counselor to the Secretary, Deputy Chief of Staff, Deputy Solicitor, and Solicitor.

As you can imagine, these roles afforded Mr. Bernhardt the widest possible exposure to the most compelling issues of the day including species conservation, energy and natural resource development and management, environmental protection and compliance, and Indian affairs.

I have known and worked with Mr. Bernhardt for many years and know him to be of the highest integrity and professional competence. I therefore commend him to the Committee without hesitation and urge his swift confirmation by the United States Senate.

RE: Support for Nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior

Dear Chairman Murkowski and Ranking Member Cantwell,

I write on behalf of the Seneca Nation to support the nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt to serve as the Deputy Secretary for the Department of the Interior. Our support is based on our previous interactions with Mr. Bernhardt when he served as the Solicitor for the Department during the Presidency of George W. Bush.

In his previous capacity as Solicitor, Mr. Bernhardt was asked to opine on the regulatory framework involving the interplay between the federal Indian Gaming Regulatory Act and the Part 292 regulations regarding restricted fee lands. This was a complex matter that related to the Seneca Nation's ability to use funds from the Seneca Nation Settlement Act to purchase lands in restricted fee status and how those lands would be treated under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act. We found Mr. Bernhardt to be diligent, to consult with all stakeholders, to recognize the unique federal responsibility of the Department to tribal nations, and to form a record that carefully analyzed the relevant statutory and regulatory framework. More importantly, we appreciated Mr. Bernhardt not rushing the decision, but acting in a patient and deliberate manner to ensure that whatever the decision would ultimately be it was supported by an adequate record and analysis.

Given our prior interactions with Mr. Bernhardt, we believe that he will be a capable and competent Deputy Secretary who fully understands the relationship between the federal government and tribal nations and the appropriate role the Department of the Interior has to protect the trust assets of tribal nations but also support our self-determination.

For these reasons, we support the nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt to serve as Deputy Secretary of the Interior Department.

RE: Support for Nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior

Dear Chairwoman Murkowski,

I write on behalf of the Gila River Indian Community in support of the nomination of Mr. David Bernhardt to serve as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Our support stems from our experience working with Mr. Bernhardt during his previous tenure as a senior official at the Department of Interior.

In particular, we negotiated extensively with Mr. Bernhardt on our water settlement—the Gila River Indian Community Water Rights Settlement that was enacted into law in 2004 as part of the Arizona Water Settlements Act. Mr. Bernhardt was a tough negotiator for the Department but also understood that the Community had legitimate rights to water. He was able to balance his role as an advocate for the Department with the understanding that the Department had a trust responsibility to the Community. Once a final settlement was reached, the Community found Mr. Bernhardt helpful in navigating the legislative process to ensure that Congress understood that the settlement benefited both the Community and the Federal government. As a result, the Community's water settlement was enacted into law and brought critical water resources to the Community and our members.

Based on our experience in negotiating and working on complex issues with Mr. Bernhardt we support his position as Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior. We believe he has an understanding of tribal sovereignty and the United States' trust responsibility to tribal nations, including the Gila River Indian Community.

Sincerely,

Dear Chairwoman Murkowski and Ranking Member Cantwell,

The Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership (TRCP) supports the nomination of David Bernhardt to become the Deputy Secretary of the Department of the Interior.

The Department of the Interior has 10 major bureaus, 70,000 employees and manages more than 500 million acres of public land. The mission of the Department of Interior, to protect America's great outdoors and natural resources is of absolutely critical importance to our nation's $887 billion outdoor recreation economy, which includes America's hunters and anglers.

The importance of the Department of Interior, the chief steward of our national public lands, requires a Deputy Secretary who understands how the department functions and understands the complexities associated with balancing the resource needs of our country, both now, and most importantly, for future generations of Americans. David Bernhardt will provide much needed departmental experience to the Interior leadership team at a time when important natural resource decisions with wide impact are being considered.

The Senate does have a responsibility to examine the potential conflicts of interest brought on by Mr. Bernhardt's private legal career, where he represented various parties with financial stakes in Department of the Interior decisions, and the TRCP supports this examination. In our experience, we have found Mr. Bernhardt to be fair, curious, thoughtful and committed to ensuring the Department of the Interior lives up to its responsibility to conserve the nation's lands and resources for future generations.

Mr. Bernhardt also boasts a first-hand appreciation for public lands, a critical component of his qualifications to help lead the Department. Growing up in Rifle, Colorado, Mr. Bernhardt enjoyed hunting and fishing on national public lands. These same lands were also heavily used for oil and gas production, giving him an early perspective about the necessity of balancing the many uses of our national landscapes. Mr. Bernhardt also understands the close partnership that must exist between the federal government and the states and our neighbors to the north and south. He served on the Board of Game and Inland Fisheries for the Commonwealth of Virginia and was the United States Commissioner to the International Boundary Commission.

In summary, we believe that David Bernhardt has the experience, temperament and judgment to make an excellent Deputy Secretary for the Department of the Interior, and we support his nomination.

Sincerely,

Interior Announces “Share the Experience” 2016 Photo Contest Winners Citizen Photographers Compete for Photo Placement on National Public Lands and Waters Pass

WASHINGTON – The U.S. Department of the Interior today, along with the National Park Foundation and other participating federal recreation land agencies, announced the winners of the 2016 “Share the Experience” photography contest on CBS This Morning and Interior's popular Instagram account and launched the 2017 contest.

This annual contest invites amateur photographers to submit their favorite views, moments, and adventures from America’s national parks and public lands. The winning picture, captured by Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas, will be featured on the annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass.

“These incredible photos represent some of America's best recreation, wilderness and wildlife, and I'm happy to have the opportunity to share them with the nation,” said U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke. “Expanding access for hunting, fishing, motorized recreation, hiking and more is a cornerstone of my agenda for America's public lands. From riders kicking-up dirt at the White Ridge Trail System in New Mexico to the amazing sunset behind Lake Mead and the Hoover Dam, the photos showcase that these places are truly for ‘the benefit and enjoyment of the people.’ Hopefully they inspire some young people to get outside and enjoy it.”

More than 16,500 photos were submitted with more than 710,000 photo views over the course of the contest, which ran from April 28, 2016, through Dec. 31, 2016. The contest saw a 50 percent increase in new users and almost a 10 percent increase in overall photo submissions from the previous contest year.

“Photos have the power to inspire curiosity about our national parks and public lands,” said Will Shafroth, president of the National Park Foundation. “This contest motivates people to get out, find their park, and enjoy these treasured places.”

Dabbling in wildlife photography since the early 1970s, grand prize winner Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas and his wife make weekly visits to Aransas National Wildlife Refuge during the summer months.

“I like photographing the frogs because they’re artistic – little reptiles and amphibians are gorgeous to me. I’ve been studying them for 60 years now – patterns, designs, and their behavior all fascinate me,” said McIntyre. “Public lands are very important to me, especially places like Big Bend National Park, Aransas National Wildlife Refuge, and South Padre Island National Seashore. These places and the habitat need to be protected.”

Second place went to Gary Hamer of Robins, Iowa, for the serene shot of his friends paddling off on a morning adventure surrounded by calm water and rising fog in Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, part of Superior National Forest, in northeastern Minnesota.

Third place went to Christopher Regala of Mililani, Hawaii, for the photo he snapped of his son experiencing The Narrows at Zion National Park in Utah.

The grand prize for the winning image is $10,000, followed by $5,000 and $3,000 for second and third place. Winners also receive outdoor gear provided by Celestron and Osprey Packs, hotel packages courtesy of Historic Hotels of America® and an annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass. Prizes are awarded for fan favorites and the following six category winners:

- Adventure and Outdoor Recreation
- Historical and Cultural
- Scenic, Seasons, and Landscapes
- Family, Friends, and Fun
- Wildlife
- Night Skies

The 2017 Share the Experience photo contest, sponsored by the National Park Foundation in partnership with the National Park Service, the Bureau of Land Management, the Bureau of Reclamation, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the U.S. Forest Service, and Recreation.gov, is now accepting entries through December 31. All entries have the chance to be featured on the Interior Department’s popular Twitter, Instagram and Facebook accounts.

Share the Experience is the official photo contest of America’s national parks and federal recreational lands, showcasing the more than 500 million acres of federal lands and drawing entries from all across the United States. For a full listing of prizes and rules, or to submit a photo, please visit www.sharetheexperience.org.

Share the Experience is a great example of the countless ways there are to #FindYourPark/#EncuentraTuParque — a public awareness and education movement to inspire people from all backgrounds to connect with, celebrate, and support America’s national parks and community-based programs. #FindYourPark invites people to discover and share their own unique connections to our nation's natural landscapes, vibrant culture, and rich history.

Honorable Secretary Zinke

1. Please tell us about your hunting background and how you got started.

I grew up in Whitefish, Montana, which at the time was a small timber and railroad town just outside Glacier National Park. Now it's transitioning into a tourism town. I grew up hunting and fishing on America's public lands with my dad and granddad. We would head out at 0400 with bologna sandwiches in our pockets and the hope of getting a big bull elk. We'd hike across miles of forests and plains and river valleys learning the land and wildlife. Then, after Lola and I had our own kids I'd take them out and teach them the tradition. We still like to hunt and fish together.

2. How old were you when you went on your first hunt; who took you and what did you hunt?

3. What kind of firearms did you have early on?

4. What kind did you buy when you were old enough to acquire your first firearm on your own?

5. What's your favorite hunt?

6. How often do you get to hunt now when you're back home in season?

7. Is there a particular species, or a specific place, you've wanted to hunt but haven't had a chance to yet? Perhaps, for example, duck hunting in Arkansas, pheasant hunting in South Dakota or hog hunting in Georgia.

8. What firearms do you own now?

9. Do your wife and children hunt if we may ask?

10. Favorite hunting memory?

11. Largest animal taken? Most exotic?

12. Do you anticipate any weekend excursions from DC this fall during hunting seasons?

13. What weapons did you use while a SEAL? How did they perform for you?

14. Did you have favorite weapon during your service in the Navy?

15. Your first day of work as Secretary...How did it feel to ride up to the headquarters of the Department of Interior on a horse?

16. Please tell us the ways that hunting supports conservation.

Thank you, Secretary Zinke, for your service to the United States of America. And all hunters appreciate your support of hunting in America.

Enviros file suit seeking info for Zinke's wife

A green group filed a lawsuit seeking information about the travels of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife, Lolita Zinke. C-SPAN

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife has now been drawn deeper into the Trump administration's travel swirl, with an environmental group suing today in an effort to uncover more details about her activities.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia follows up on a Freedom of Information Act request submitted earlier this year by the Montana-based Western Values Project.

"There should be transparency and accountability for everyone who influences Interior's decisions," Chris Saeger, the environmental group's executive director, said in a statement. "If Lolita Zinke is playing a role at Interior, taxpayers deserve to know if she is playing by the same rules as everyone else who works there."

The Interior secretary, who has been the focus until now, has said his travel has been both appropriate and approved.

"I believe taxpayers absolutely have the right to know official travel costs: It's common sense, and at the department we make those documents and my travel schedule available to everyone," Zinke said Friday. "Using tax dollars wisely and ethically is a great responsibility and is at the good heart of good government."

A group called American Oversight filed the seven-page lawsuit on behalf of the Western Values Project, which is a frequent critic of Zinke. A number of American Oversight staffers formerly worked for Democratic staffers or campaigns.

In early June, the environmentalists filed an Interior Department FOIA request, seeking documents concerning Lolita Zinke's participation in internal meetings, presence on official trips and emails sent to her in relation to government business, among other matters.

So far, the lawsuit states, the department "has failed" to produce any documents or make any determination concerning the request.

An Interior spokesperson could not be reached late this afternoon for comment.

The FOIA request was one of many bombarding officials. Last year, the Interior Department reported receiving 6,428 FOIA requests. The average response time for a request deemed to be "complex" was 42 days, although responses varied widely.

The lawsuit filed today in support of the underlying FOIA request escalates a campaign occurring on other fronts, as well (Greenwire, Oct. 4).

Two top Democrats on the House Natural Resources Committee on Monday urged Interior's Office of Inspector General to include an examination of Lolita Zinke's travel as part of an ongoing inquiry into the Cabinet secretary's travel.

In early September, Zinke's wife was named campaign chairwoman for Republican businessman and Air Force veteran Troy Downing, who is challenging Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.) (E&E Daily, Sept. 7).

"Because the secretary's spouse is leading a Senate campaign in Montana, tax-payer funded travel for Mrs. Zinke, especially to or from Montana, deserves heightened scrutiny," Reps. Raúl Grijalva of Arizona and Donald McEachin of Virginia wrote.

Earlier this week, Lolita Zinke praised Downing on Twitter, writing that "he fought for our country and now for us," and she retweeted a commentator who blasted the "Leftist Media" for the coverage of former Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price, who resigned following reports of his travel.

Hey all,

Below please find the long (273 words) and short (30 words) bios, as requested by the White House. It is attached and below.

Long bio

Ryan K. Zinke is the 52nd United States Secretary of the Interior. Secretary Zinke served 23 years in the Navy SEALs from 1986 through 2008, retiring with the rank of Commander. Prior to accepting a position in President Donald Trump's cabinet, Secretary Zinke represented Montana as a Congressman from the state's at-large district, holding office from 2015 to 2017 and earning the unique distinction of being the first-ever Navy SEAL to be elected to the U.S. Congress. He also served in the Montana State Senate, representing the 2nd district.

A member of the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, the Secretary is a Montana native, having grown up in Whitefish, MT. Some of his earliest childhood memories are the times he spent at Glacier National Park. He is an avid hunter. Secretary Zinke attended college at the University of Oregon, where he played Division I football and graduated with a degree in Geology. He has also obtained an M.B.A. and an M.S. degree from National University and the University of San Diego, respectively.

Given the prevalence of Native American tribes in Montana, the Secretary possesses a deep understanding of tribal issues. In the U.S. House of Representatives, Secretary Zinke served on the Natural Resources Committee and the Armed Services Committee, championing legislation that would honor our military and veterans, reform forest management, and protect the rights of Native Americans. Secretary Zinke is an admirer of President Theodore Roosevelt, and he believes in the importance of a multiple-use philosophy for our public lands. He is a proponent of American energy dominance.

Secretary Zinke is married to Lola Zinke. They have three children: Jennifer, Wolfgang, and Konrad.

Short bio

Ryan Zinke is the U.S. Secretary of the Interior. A Montana native, the Secretary is a former Navy SEAL Commander. He represented Montana's at-large district in the U.S. Congress.

She first met with Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his family. Trudeau teased with his children Ella-Grace and Xavier while awaiting Mrs. Trump's arrival.

"Important job stuff," he said, while moving the children into position and giving them a laugh. Mrs. Trump greeted Trudeau and his wife, Sophie Gregoire Trudeau, warmly by giving every member of the family a kiss on the cheek.

"It's good to see you. I saw you a few days ago," Mrs. Trump said to Mrs. Trudeau.

She then leaned down to greet their daughter Ella-Grace. "How are you? Beautiful!" Mrs. Trump said. She similarly greeted their son Xavier.

"I'm so glad you joined us," she said to the children.

She added, "I heard you have a little three-year-old at home?"

The Prime Minister said "It's bedtime for him."

"Of course," said Mrs. Trump.

Mrs. Trudeau kept the conversation going.

"We told Xavier that Barron is playing soccer," she said.

They then chatted about soccer a bit before your pool was ushered out. (Barron is not on the trip with his mother.)

Mrs. Trump will view the opening ceremonies from a VIP suite halfway across the arena from your pooler.

First Lady Melania Trump arrived at the Joint Base Andrews Youth Center at about 2:48 pm on Friday. It is a before and after school facility for children whose parents work and live on the base including military personnel, contractors and civilians.

Trump departed her motorcade and walked into a room with a sign on the door designating it as a "PLAY ZONE." Inside, about eight children sat at three tables. One group was playing with Legos while the other two made art. Trump was accompanied by Dawn Goldfein, the wife of the Air Force Chief of Staff. The pair was greeted by the director of the base's youth programs and Dr. Teichert, the wife of the commander of the 11th wing and Joint Base Andrews. After saying hello to the children at each table and almost sitting at one of the art tables, Trump got up and made her way to the Lego group.

"Oh my god. Amazing. Wow. I love Legos," Trump said as the children showed off their work.

Trump greeted the boy next to her, who had his head in his hand.

"Hi big boy," she said.

The boy kept his hand firmly planted on his forehead.

"He's shy," one of the adults in the room explained.

"What are you building?" Trump asked.

The boy's answer wasn't audible to your pooler.

"I love your house," Trump responded.

Trump asked a girl at the table her name and the child didn't seem to respond.

"Is she shy normally?" Trump asked one of the staffers.

"No, not normally, just today," the man said. "She was so excited to see you. Now you're here."

Trump complimented the girl's hair accessory.

"I love your red bow," Trump said.

The First Lady turned to another girl and asked about the slogan on her t-shirt.

"What is that? Eagle Pride?" Trump inquired.

"This is their school," a staffer explained.

"Beautiful," said Trump.

A young girl made a comment about the president out of your pooler's earshot.

"Do you know him? Do you know who he is?" Trump asked.

One of the children responded that they'd seen the president on television.

"He was dancing," the boy said.

"Oh, he was dancing? Oh I need to see that," said Trump. "Was he funny."

"It's on On Demand," the boy replied.

"OK, let me check it out," Trump said.

Trump next made her way to one of the art tables.

"So beautiful," she said before handing out White House coloring books.

"Which color is your favorite?" she asked one of the girls at the table.

The girl said she prefers pink.

"We have a pink room at the White House," Trump said before pointing to the girl's book. "Will you make a pink room."

Trump also gave the children crayons.

Your pooler was ushered out of the "PLAY ZONE" before Trump departed. We were brought to her next destination, a gymnasium where about 15 children stood at three different stations. There was a group playing with circuit boards, a flight simulator, and a paper plane kit.

Trump arrived soon after and greeted the children with the circuitry and simulator. Your pooler could not make out their conversations. She then went over to the children making paper planes and asked them to demonstrate their work.

"Very good!" Trump declared as one of the planes flew through the air.

Another plane didn't fare so well.

"That one crashed," Trump said.

A third plane turned around mid flight and went behind the group.

"It's like a boomerang," said Trump.

Trump then tried throwing three of the planes herself with mixed results. Her last attempt went a good distance.

"Nice," she said.

Trump then asked the children to demonstrate making a plane.

"Can you show me how you do it?" she asked.

After checking out the planes, Trump began to leave. As she departed, Trump shook hands with the kids at each table. She gave a high five to one of the children on the flight simulator. Trump waved goodbye and left the gymnasium at about 3:19 pm.

NPS will be sending out this release at the Region-level tomorrow, Jan. 11, regarding the new superintendent of Fort Sumter National Monument. Thanks.

National Park Service names Tracy Stakely as Fort Sumter National Monument superintendent

ATLANTA — Today, National Park Service (NPS) Southeast Regional Director Stan Austin announced the selection of J. Tracy Stakely as superintendent of Fort Sumter National Monument, Fort Moultrie and Charles Pinckney National Historic Site in South Carolina. This role also includes administrative oversight of Reconstruction Era National Monument. Stakely is currently Congaree National Park superintendent and South Carolina State Coordinator for the NPS Southeast Region Leadership Council, working to ensure cooperation between the NPS sites in South Carolina, South Carolina State Parks, and various other state partners. Stakely assumes his new role January 22, 2018.

“Tracy has extensive experience working to preserve complex natural and cultural resources,” said Regional Director Austin. “He has proven himself to be an accomplished leader intently focused on helping the American people find deeper meaning and connections with their national parks. Tracy is sure to add tremendous value as superintendent of these parks and to the South Carolina lowcountry.”

“It is truly an honor to be selected as the superintendent of sites that preserve resources and stories from some of the most significant periods of our nation’s history,” Stakely said. “I am excited to join park staff, volunteers, partners, and local communities in their efforts to protect these special places. I look forward to helping continue the important work of telling all the relevant stories associated with these sites and increasing public engagement and support for these national treasures.”

For the past five years, Stakely has served as superintendent of Congaree National Park in the South Carolina midlands. Under Stakely’s leadership, the park made significant progress in advancing key strategic goals, including highlighting the park’s natural and cultural resources, expanding educational programming and recreational opportunities, advocating for park wilderness, establishing fiscal sustainability, and improving employee engagement and satisfaction.

During his nineteen years with the National Park Service Stakely has worked effectively with NPS staff, community partners, and contractors in the areas of resource preservation and park management. He spent several years in the NPS Southeast Regional Office in Atlanta as program lead for the region's Cultural Landscape Program. In that role, Stakely led program staff and contractors in documenting park landscape resources and providing park managers with technical assistance to aid in cultural and natural resource management and preservation. Stakely gained additional park management experience during time spent as Acting Superintendent and Chief of Resource Management at Kentucky's Mammoth Cave National Park and Acting Superintendent at Kennesaw Mountain National Battlefield Park in Georgia. Prior to his tenure in the southeast region, Stakely was a landscape architect at the Olmsted Center for Landscape Preservation, a NPS technical service center based in Boston, Massachusetts. There he authored cultural landscape reports and related planning documents and provided technical expertise on cultural landscape preservation to park managers and community partners.

Additionally, Stakely has served on national workgroups within the NPS to revise Director's Order #61: National Cemetery Operations, Director's Order #100: Resource Stewardship for the 21st Century, and the nationwide agreement for compliance with Section 106 of the National Historic Preservation Act.

Stakely earned a master's degree in landscape architecture from Louisiana State University and a graduate certificate in Leadership for Public Lands and Cultural Heritage through the Academic Consortium, a learning and development program cosponsored by the NPS, the Eppley Institute for Park Management, and six partner universities.

Both Stakely and his wife Cheri are originally from Chattanooga, Tennessee. They are the parents of two active teenagers, Bryson and Bella.

Subject: FOR AWARENESS: Steven Mietz named Redwood National & State Parks Superintendent
Date: Wednesday, September 13, 2017 12:12:04 PM

All-

Below is a release for your awareness regarding the naming of the new superintendent at Redwood. The position has been fully vetted and approved. Let me know if there's any issues. The Region would like to put it out as soon as it's approved.

-Paul

Steven Mietz named Redwood National & State Parks Superintendent

SAN FRANCISCO - The National Park Service has named Steven Mietz superintendent of Redwood National & State Parks. He is currently the superintendent of Great Basin National Park in Nevada. Mietz replaces Steven Prokop who retired earlier in the year.

“Steve is an exceptional leader who is passionate about building positive relationships to preserve our parks,” said Laura E. Joss, regional director for the National Park Service’s Pacific West Region. “He has a proven track record of collaborating with partners. Along with his strong science background, this makes him an excellent fit for Redwood.”

Mietz has more than 18 years with the federal government, including time with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and U.S. Geological Survey. He joined the National Park Service in 2003.

“I am humbled by the opportunity to be a partner in the stewardship of the ecosystem that supports the tallest trees in the world,” Mietz said. “I am very excited about working with the staff and our partners to preserve this awe-inspiring place for the enjoyment and appreciation of all. ”

Under Mietz’s watch, Great Basin National Park was designated an International Dark Sky Park. The park and its nonprofit partners raised $800,000 to construct the Great Basin Observatory. It will take advantage of some of the best night sky viewing in the nation. He has overseen the completion of several large-scale campsite rehabilitations and ecological restoration projects.

Throughout his National Park Service career, Mietz has served in a variety positions, including as the Midwest Region’s acting associate regional director for natural resources, the superintendent of Missouri National Recreational River, and the deputy chief of science and resource management at Grand Canyon National Park. Prior to working at Grand Canyon, he worked with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service’s Grizzly Bear Recovery Program, the University of Montana’s Flathead Lake Biological Station, and the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes of the Flathead Nation.

Mietz is currently on temporary assignment as the superintendent of Point Reyes National Seashore in the San Francisco Bay Area. He will return to Great Basin National Park before taking the reins at Redwood, which is expected to be sometime in late fall.

Mietz earned his Bachelor of Science degree from Cornell University and his masters from the University of Montana. His personal interests include hiking, camping, and cross-country skiing with his wife, Stephanie, and sons, Jack and Ben.

Most people know Redwood as home to the tallest trees on Earth. The parks also protect vast prairies, oak woodlands, wild riverways, and nearly 40 miles of rugged coastline. For thousands of years people have lived in this verdant landscape. Together, the National Park Service and California State Parks manage the lands for the inspiration, enjoyment, and education of all.

Subject: FOR FINAL REVIEW: Press Release Todd
Date: Wednesday, July 12, 2017 11:32:51 AM

Below is the press release for Todd we'd like to send out this afternoon. Please send me edits by 1:00 PM.

EE is on deadline and is writing about Todd's appointment for NOON publication. I shared the release below, minus Sec quote because it hasn't been approved yet.

Secretary Ryan Zinke Appoints Veteran Interior Official Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior

Tribal Leaders, Congressional Officials, Others Praise Selection

(WASHINGTON) U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced the appointment of former Interior Department official and former Chief of Staff to Rep. Steve Pearce (NM) Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior. In this role, Willens will work closely with yet-to-be-confirmed Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt. Willens brings with him more than 20 years of public policy and governmental affairs experience, with proven successes on behalf of prior Administrations, Members of Congress, national associations, and the private sector. He possesses a deep knowledge and understanding of the Department's many complex policies, ranging from land to energy, wildlife, and water management.

In addition to being a westerner, Todd brings a strong combination of public and private sector experience to the Interior Department," Secretary Ryan Zinke said. "Most of Interior's holdings and responsibilities are in the west, and Todd's intimate understanding of the West, from growing up in rural California to his previous time at Interior to his tenure with Congressman Pearce, will be a major asset to the people we serve. I look forward to Todd helping us advance Interior's mission and the work of the Administration on behalf of local communities."

"It is an honor and privilege to be appointed as Interior's Assistant Deputy Secretary," Willens said. "I thank Secretary Zinke for his confidence in my abilities to serve the Department and the Administration. I look forward to getting to work contributing to the implementation of the President's priorities for the Department and our Agencies, making America great again."

Willens served as Chief of Staff to Congressman Steve Pearce (R-NM) from 2010 to 2017. During his tenure as Chief of Staff, Willens provided strategic advice and operational oversight to meet the needs of the constituents of the 2nd Congressional District of New Mexico. He worked closely with various stakeholders in this capacity, including local government officials, Congress, and the previous Administration to ramp up operations at defense bases, prevent job-killing regulatory action, and increase federal accountability significantly for the people of New Mexico.

"Todd's dedication to New Mexico and the West made him a most effective manager of people and policies," Congressman Pearce said. "More than anything though, my wife Cynthia and I consider him a close friend. He has run my congressional operations for nearly seven years and been my top adviser on numerous items, delivering countless successes on my behalf. I congratulate Todd and the Administration on his appointment to this important position."

"The selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary deepens the bench at Interior," Jackie Johnson Pata, Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians, said. "In his prior work as Chief of Staff for Congressman Stevan Pearce, Todd handled a wide range of Native issues. In that role, he earned the great respect of many in Indian Country. As the Administration and Tribal Nations partner to advance economic development and self-sufficiency for Native communities, Todd's expertise and experience will be a valuable asset."

"I have worked with Todd for several years. He has an exceptional understanding of western issues in general, and Native issues in particular," Chairman Paul Torres of the All Pueblo Council of Governors said. "Todd is exactly the kind of leadership that can advance Interior's trust responsibility to tribes, while supporting tribal sovereignty and self-determination. This is an exceptional selection by the Administration."

"The Tehama Colusa Canal Authority couldn't be more pleased with the selection of Todd Willens to serve as Assistant Deputy Secretary at the Department of the Interior," Jeff Sutton, General Manager of the Tehama Colusa Canal Authority, said. "A native of Northern California, Todd has a great deal of experience in Western water issues and, as a sportsman-conservationist, he has a long track record of delivering mutually beneficial policy outcomes for the benefit of fish, wildlife and water users throughout the Western United States. We look forward to working with Todd in his new capacity."

"The Civil War Trust strongly supports the appointment of Todd Willens as Assistant Deputy Secretary of the Interior," James Lighthizer, President of the Civil War Trust, said. "In his previous service on Capitol Hill and in the Department of the Interior, Todd has been a champion of our national parks and historic battlefield sites. We are excited about the opportunity to partner with him to preserve America's battlefield parks as places of remembrance as well as heritage tourism destinations."

"The Boone and Crockett Club proudly supports Todd Willens' appointment," said Paul Phillips, co-chair of the Boone and Crockett Club's Policy Committee. "Mr.

Willens is a conservationist who hunts. He has this personal passion and understands the ecological and economic benefits that follow for the public. His experience in the complexities of policy at the Department of the Interior will serve the country and conservation community all very well.”

Prior to working on Capitol Hill, Willens served as Deputy Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks at the Department of the Interior from 2006 to 2008. While at the Department, he worked on the National Parks Centennial, and the historic recovery of the Bald Eagle. In addition, Willens also served as Senior Policy Advisor for United States House of Representatives Committee on Natural Resources from 2003 to 2006. In this capacity, he worked closely with the Chairman to develop key legislation, including the 2005 Endangered Species Act Reauthorization and the 2005 Energy Bill. A California native, Willens is a 1994 graduate of the University of California, Los Angeles. He currently lives in Washington, D.C. with his wife and four children.

Subject: FOR REVIEW: Cully statement
Date: Tuesday, July 11, 2017 12:42:36 PM
Attachments: Remarks_Cully_v1.docx

Micah/Aaron - can you please review the remarks for Cully's hearing?

Chairman McCain, Ranking Member Reed, and members of the Committee: it is an honor to be here today to tell you about an American patriot, a mentor, and a good friend, Captain Cully Stimson.

Captain Stimson is President Donald Trump's nominee for General Counsel of the United States Navy. I can think of no one more qualified for this job.

As a retired Navy SEAL Commander, I know just how important it is for the Navy to have the most-qualified individuals in positions of leadership, and the man I am introducing today fits the bill.

Captain Stimson and I served together in the Navy; he brings over two decades of experience as a lawyer, having first served in the Navy's Judge Advocate General's Corps, also known as the JAG Corps, in the 1990s.

In addition to our time together in the Navy, I also had the pleasure of working with him and Congressman DeStefano on a bill to ensure victims of sexual assault in the military receive the legal services they deserve.

To tell Captain Stimson's story is to tell of his lifetime of commitment to both his community and his country. He has been a leader from very early on, serving as Captain of the Men's Varsity Soccer Team at Kenyon College.

He went on to graduate from The George Mason University School of Law, and he joined the Navy as a young lawyer in 1992. For five years, he was on active duty, serving in both San Diego, California and London, England.

Captain Stimson was called back to active duty in 2001, to support the Joint Special Operations Task Force JAG for SEAL Group Two.

In President George W. Bush's administration, Captain Stimson was a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs, providing advice and counsel to Secretaries of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Robert Gates about the Pentagon's detention operations.

Since leaving public service, he has been with the Heritage Foundation as a Senior Legal Fellow and Manager of their National Security Law Program.

Captain Stimson has served our nation for over two decades in the Navy, more recently serving as Deputy Chief Judge of the Navy-Marine Corps Trial Judiciary and an adjunct law professor and instructor at the Naval Justice School in a reserve capacity.

A bulleted list of Captain Stimson's professional achievements, however, does not paint the full picture of how this man has demonstrated himself to be the kind of high-character human being fit for service.

From teaching high school to coaching and mentoring hundreds, if not thousands, of young Americans, Captain Stimson has devoted countless hours to cultivating the next generation. He is Chairman of the Board of the U.S. Soccer Foundation, the charitable arm of U.S. Soccer, which offers assistance to more than 35,000 underserved and minority children.

A devoted family man, Captain Stimson has been married since 1995. He and his lovely wife adopted four orphans.

Captain Stimson is the epitome of a military officer, representing honor, integrity and service. He has always been the first one willing to help others, whether that has meant writing dozens of letters of recommendations for colleges, graduate schools, judicial clerkships, and jobs, or quietly paying the tuition of two of his mentees who could not afford to take the Law School Admission Test. He also founded the Bryon J. Horn Memorial Scholarship Fund, in honor of a fallen fraternity brother.

Captain Stimson is the type of public servant who is comfortable working across party lines. When President Obama's Department of Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson was General Counsel of the Department of Defense, he and Stimson worked together on a number of tough issues aimed to keep our great nation safe.

This bipartisan partnership eventually led to Captain Stimson extending, and Johnson accepting, an invitation to speak to the Heritage Foundation.

In that speech, Secretary Johnson spoke about his job, and one line from his remarks stands out in particular. "The office of General Counsel of the Defense Department," he said. "Particularly in the post-9/11 world, is in the middle of many difficult, front page issues."

In his job as General Counsel of the Navy, Captain Stimson will confront a host of these difficult issues as well. I would not be here today if I did not have full confidence in his ability to tackle them.

Captain Stimson's partnership with Secretary Johnson was not an isolated event, either; he also developed partnerships with Stephen Preston, who served as General Counsel of both the Department of Defense and the CIA under President Obama. Preston recently spoke on a panel that Captain Stimson hosted at Heritage.

In my friend and brother-in-arms Captain Stimson, the Navy is gaining an imminently qualified attorney, an honorable military officer, and an individual with vast experience, and fidelity to the law and our country.

He has a long career of exemplary service in law and defense, and is an excellent fit for the position to which he was nominated.

I have no doubt he will be a wonderful General Counsel of the Navy.

Subject: FOR REVIEW: National Park Service announces leadership changes at Mammoth Cave National Park
Date: Wednesday, June 21, 2017 11:03:00 AM

Laura/Heather-

NPS Southeast Region is looking to put out this release regarding a new deputy regional director as well as a new superintendent for Mammoth Cave National Park. I've been told this cleared ASFWP. No specific target date, just as soon as we can clear. Release looks fine to me. Thanks.

-Paul

National Park Service announces leadership changes at Mammoth Cave National Park

ATLANTA — Today, National Park Service (NPS) Southeast Regional Director Stan Austin announced the selection of Mammoth Cave National Park Superintendent Sarah Craighead as deputy regional director, based in Atlanta. With this selection, Austin has also tapped Southeast Regional Chief of Staff Barclay Trimble as Mammoth Cave's next superintendent. Both appointments are effective July 23.

"Sarah and Barclay have distinguished themselves as exceptional leaders within the National Park Service," Austin said. "Sarah has a remarkable ability to tackle tough issues with clear vision, while fostering a strong sense of connection and purpose. I have relied on Barclay extensively for his business acumen and invaluable contributions to regional strategy and operations. I am confident both will continue serving the National Park Service and the American people well in their new roles."

Sarah Craighead, Deputy Regional Director, Southeast Region

Sarah Craighead, who began her NPS career as a cave guide and campground ranger at Mammoth Cave in 1978, has led the central-Kentucky park as superintendent since 2012. Park visitation increased by 10 percent during her 5-year tenure. She fortified partnerships with tourism constituents, volunteers, user groups, and the Friends of Mammoth Cave. Craighead opened the park's renovated visitor center and Big Hollow mountain-bike trail, and supported the removal of 100-year-old Lock & Dam 6 from Green River, returning many miles of surface and cave rivers to natural flow. As the Kentucky NPS coordinator, Craighead led her fellow superintendents to bring widespread recognition to the state's five NPS sites during the agency's Centennial year. Craighead also initiated night-sky programming and the park will complete its International Dark Sky nomination this year.

Prior to joining Mammoth Cave, Craighead spent three years as superintendent of California's Death Valley National Park, the largest national park in the continental U.S. and the lowest place in North America at 282 feet below sea level. She also served as superintendent of Saguaro National Park in Arizona and Washita Battlefield National Historic Site in Oklahoma. In her 38-year career, Craighead has also worked at Acadia

National Park, Carlsbad Caverns National Park, Grand Canyon National Park, Manassas National Battlefield Park, Independence National Historical Park, and Mesa Verde National Park. While at Mammoth Cave, Craighead completed temporary assignments to the NPS Southeast Regional Office as acting deputy regional director and also as a special assistant to the regional director.

“Whatever I have been able to accomplish at Mammoth Cave was possible because of the park staff’s dedication to excellence in all they do,” said Craighead. “I am particularly pleased with the progress we made in providing concessions services for visitors and that several strategic plans are underway, which will guide Mammoth Cave for years to come. I am honored to begin my new assignment with the Southeast Regional Office, bringing the same enthusiasm and commitment to bear for the region’s 70 national park units.”

Craighead is a native of Cave City, Ky. She is married to Rick Shireman, a National Park Service retiree.

Barclay Trimble, Superintendent, Mammoth Cave National Park

Barclay Trimble has served as the NPS deputy regional director in Atlanta since 2014, assuming the added duties of regional chief of staff last year. He manages 30 superintendents at national parks in Florida, Kentucky, North Carolina, Puerto Rico, South Carolina, Tennessee and the U.S. Virgin Islands. He also oversees regional planning and compliance, land resources, ranger activities, and commercial services.

Prior to joining the NPS Southeast Regional Office, Trimble served as cluster superintendent of Cape Hatteras National Seashore, Wright Brothers National Memorial and Fort Raleigh National Historic Site in North Carolina; deputy superintendent and acting superintendent at Grand Canyon National Park in Arizona; recreation fee manager for the NPS Intermountain Region in Colorado; acting chief for the Business Management Office at Glen Canyon National Recreation Area in Utah/Arizona and chief of finance for the NPS Concessions Program Center in Colorado. In addition to these tenured assignments, Trimble has also provided administrative and management support during temporary assignments at, both, Denali National Park and Preserve in Alaska and the National Transportation Safety Board in Washington, DC.

“Mammoth Cave National Park boasts amazing resources with equally impressive employees, volunteers and community partners,” Trimble said. “I look forward to joining the park this summer and immersing myself in the majesty of Mammoth Cave.”

A Texas native, Trimble graduated from the University of Texas at San Antonio with a degree in Business Administration. In his spare time, Trimble takes every opportunity to enjoy the parks and outdoors with his two children and wife, Lana.

Mammoth Cave National Park is two parks in one. Below the surface, it preserves the extensive Mammoth Cave system and above ground, scenic river valleys and the extreme hills and hollows typical of a karst landscape. Heather-

Below is a release for your review regarding the annual Share The Experience contest. I believe Rebecca already mentioned this to you. Release is scheduled for Thursday. But we will want to give to some reporters on Wednesday under embargo. All of the other land management agencies and Park Foundation will be putting out their own version of the release. The plan is to work with USA Today on a photo gallery as well as CBS This Morning for announcing the winners. But if there is any other media you'd like to offer an embargo to, let us know.

Laura-

I've cc'd you for awareness. The annual contest, which we partner with the National Park Foundation and other federal land management agencies on, highlights amateur photographers and their work showcasing our public lands. The winning photo is then featured on the America The Beautiful Federal Land Pass.

Interior Announces “Share the Experience” 2016 Photo Contest Winners

Public Lands and Waters Pass*

WASHINGTON – The U.S. Department of the Interior today, along with the National Park Foundation and other participating federal recreation land agencies, announced the winners of the 2016 “Share the Experience” photography contest on CBS This Morning and Interior's popular Instagram account, while launching the 2017 contest.

This annual contest invites amateur photographers to submit their favorite views, moments, and adventures from America's national parks and public lands. The winning picture, captured by Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas, will be featured on the annual America the Beautiful federal lands pass.

“These photos encapsulate exactly what public lands mean to the American people,” said U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke. “From riders kicking-up dirt at the White Ridge Trail System in New Mexico or a young boy hiking the Narrows of Zion National Park to the beautiful landscape of the Oregon Islands National Wildlife Refuge or an amazing sunset behind Lake Mead and the Hoover Dam; they showcase that these places are truly for ‘the benefit and enjoyment of the people.’”

More than 16,500 photos were submitted with more than 710,000 photo views over the course of the contest, which ran from April 28, 2016, through Dec. 31, 2016. The contest saw a 50 percent increase in new users and almost a 10 percent increase in overall photo submissions from the previous contest year.

Dabbling in wildlife photography since the early 1970s, grand prize winner Craig McIntyre of Rockport, Texas, and his wife make weekly visits to Aransas National Wildlife Refuge during the summer months.

“I like photographing the frogs because they’re artistic – little reptiles and amphibians are gorgeous to me. I’ve been studying them for 60 years now – patterns, designs, and their behavior all fascinate me,” said McIntyre. “Public lands are very important to me, especially places like Big Bend National Park, Aransas National Wildlife Refuge, and South Padre Island National Seashore. These places and the habitat need to be protected.”

Second place went to Gary Hamer of Robins, Iowa, for the serene shot of his friends paddling off on a morning adventure surrounded by calm water and rising fog in Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, part of Superior National Forest, in northeastern Minnesota.

Third place went to Christopher Regala of Mililani, Hawaii, for the photo he snapped of his son experiencing The Narrows at Zion National Park in Utah.

The grand prize for the winning image is $10,000, followed by $5,000 and $3,000 for second and third place. Winners also receive outdoor gear provided by Celestron and Osprey Packs, hotel packages courtesy of Historic Hotels of America and an annual National Parks and Federal Recreational Lands Pass. Prizes are awarded for fan favorites and the following six category winners:

- Adventure and Outdoor Recreation
- Historical and Cultural
- Scenic, Seasons, and Landscapes

- Family, Friends, and Fun
- Wildlife
- Night Skies

The 2017 Share the Experience photo contest, sponsored by the National Park Foundations in partnership with the National Park Service, the Bureau of Land Management, the Bureau of Reclamation, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the U.S. Forest Service, and Recreation.gov, is now accepting entries through December 31. All entries have the chance to be featured on the Interior Department's popular Twitter, Instagram and Facebook accounts.

Share the Experience is the official photo contest of America's national parks and federal recreational lands, showcasing the more than 500 million acres of federal lands and drawing entries from all across the United States. For a full listing of prizes and rules, or to submit a photo, please visit www.sharetheexperience.org.

Share the Experience is a great example of the countless ways there are to #FindYourPark—a public awareness and education movement to inspire people from all backgrounds to connect with, celebrate, and support America's national parks and community-based programs. #FindYourPark invites people to discover and share their own unique connections to our nation's natural landscapes, vibrant culture, and rich history.

Subject: Foreign Pool Report - Bilateral Meeting between US President and Thailand Prime Minister

Subject: [EXTERNAL] Foreign Pool Report - Bilateral Meeting between US President and Thailand Prime Minister

This is the very first Thailand Prime Minister official visit to the White House since 2005. It's a significant one, too, especially after the 2014 coup, the US and Thailand relationship went sour since then.

Your foreign pooler came to the South Lawn at 12:08 PM to wait for Prime Minister Prayut Chan-o-cha's arrival. Thai Prime Minister's motorcade arrived in the South Portico at 12:25 PM. President Trump and the First Lady greeted the Prime Minister and his wife over there.

Both Thai PM and his wife wear all black. The PM wears black suit and tie, and his wife wears black skirt suit with white pearl necklace.

Your foreign pooler was ushered to the Oval Office at 12:32 PM. In the Oval Office, the Prime Minister first expressed his condolence to the loss of family and children in Las Vegas last night, and said he is "taking solidarity with American people." Also, he expressed his condolences to the loss of Puerto Rico people.

For the bilateral meeting, he said the security cooperation and regional issues of concern will be the topic of discussion. After the Prime Minister's short remark, President Trump added that the bilateral trade is becoming more and more important, the US would like "to sell a little bit more" to Thailand.

In reality, the U.S. has an $18.9 billion annual trade deficit with Thailand. And between their discussion, arms sales and DPRK (which Thailand has certain tie with) are also expected.

Last but not least, here is the additional info that our colleague, Jessica Stone, obtained from Thailand Embassy:

The Prime Minister of Thailand will express his condolences and solidarity on behalf of the people of Thailand to President of the United States and the American people regarding the tragic incident in Las Vegas last night. The Prime Minister will also extend the solidarity of the Thai people to the American people for the ongoing relief efforts in Puerto Rico.

The Prime Minister of Thailand looks forward to discussing with the President on a wide range of issues of common interest, both bilateral ties and regional issues.

The Thai delegation consists of a number of Cabinet ministers and senior officials.

Subject: [EXTERNAL] Foreign Pool Report - Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau

Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his wife Sophie Grégoire were welcomed on the South lawn by POTUS and FLOTUS.

As they went in as much as when they walked through the Colonnade, Mrs Grégoire and Mrs Trump first, followed by the two leaders, had lively (though inaudible) conversations.

After a short comment, the President invited the Prime minister to talk:

“It’s great to be back here in the Oval Office. As the President said, a lot of things to discuss. We have an incredibly close relationship. Two countries that are interwoven in our economies, our cultures and our people. But we have a good partnership and there’s always ways to improve it. All these issues we need to talk about, that’s why to have an on-going constructive relationship between the President and the Prime minister is always important, And that’s why I’m happy to be here today.”

In French, your pooler asked, if the atmosphere was good between the two of them.
PM Trudeau answered, in French: “Always! It’s always to good meet allies and friends.”

After the President answered ‘yes, he would see that’, to a question on whether he can see a deal with each individual country, if NAFTA doesn’t work out, your pooler asked PM Trudeau, in French, if he would be ready to sign an agreement only with the US. He simply answered in French, ‘we’re negotiating at the moment’.

Contrary to the President who started his comments by stating that “We’re here with a man who’s become a friend of mine.”, the Prime minister didn’t evoke their friendship. Mr Trudeau kept over all a straight face when the President talked about the possibility of not reaching an agreement on NAFTA.

Besides the two leaders and their wives, the only other people that your pooler could see in the room were John Kelly, WH Chief of Staff, and Roy Norton, Canada’s Chief of Protocol.

According to the PM media staff, four advisers will accompany him in the Cabinet Room:

- Chrystia Freeland, Minister of Foreign Affairs
- David MacNaughton, Canadian Ambassador to the US
- Katie Telford, Chief of Staff
- Gerry Butts, Senior Political Adviser

It's the 3rd visit for Justin Trudeau to the WH as Prime Minister.

He was first received by President Obama for a State visit -- the first by a Canadian leader in almost 20 years -- on March 10-11, 2016

Then, President Trump welcomed him on February 13, 2017.

Justin Trudeau also came to the WH in the 1980s as a child when his father, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, was Prime Minister.

Haskell Graduates

Congratulations to Randa M. Deluna, Community Health Science; Amos P. Wright, Community Health Science, and Alisha J. Numan, Liberal Arts.

The PLHS Alumni received their Associates Degrees on November 30, 2017 from the Haskell Indian Nations University at Lawrence, Kansas.

Flora Greene, 100 years young, was selected to be the first to receive the new tribal enrollment card on December 15.

Tribal jobs program becomes permanent

The Indian Employment, Training and Related Services Consolidation Act, (H.R. 228) was signed into law recently although there was no statement or release from the White House.

The new law will strengthen and improve the 477 program that will combine employment, education and training-related grants into a single plan, with a single budget and a single reporting system.

“The 477 program is a proven example of promoting tribal self-determination as it provides flexibility in deciding how tribes want to spend the federal funds,” according to the Native American Financial Officers Association. “It allows tribes to combine formula-funded federal grants that come from varied sources related to economic development, employment and job training, higher education, skill development for youth and adults to succeed in the workforce, and welfare-to-work.”

Currently, tribes can draw on funds from Johnson-O’Malley, Tribal Temporary Assistance to Needy Families and other key programs at the Department of the Interior, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Labor. H.R.228 expands 477 to include nearly every other federal agency, including the Department of Education, the Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Department of Justice.

“This historic passage occurred after eight years of tribal advocacy,” President Richard Peterson of the Central Council of Tlingit and Haida Indian Tribes of Alaska noted in a press release as the bill was presented to Trump for his signature earlier this month.

Peterson’s tribe was the first to take advantage of the 477 program after it became law in 1992. Funds are used to help tribal citizens in southeast Alaska find jobs and improve their skills and education levels.

Since 1992, 43 tribes have joined the program. Though that’s a small percentage of the 567 recognized Indian nations, supporters hope H.R.228 will draw in more participants because the new law makes 477 permanent, offering more stability in an era of dwindling or stagnant federal funds.

There were no hearings in the House or the Senate on H.R.228 this year but lawmakers had been working on the bill for the past few sessions. The bill was an easy sell in the 115th Congress as a result—it cleared both chambers with unanimous support.

Since there were no hearings, the Trump administration didn’t get an opportunity to state its views on jobs and employment, issue otherwise high on the president’s agenda.

But in his first Native American Heritage

Month proclamation, Trump promised to adopt policies to “enhance economic well-being of Native American communities” and he said that he would “always come to the aid of Native American people in times of crisis.”

A handful of other Indian bills are coming closer to passage through Capitol Hill so Trump will likely have more signing opportunities during the 115th Congress, which is wrapping up its first half this month. The second part runs from January through December of 2018.

Dejalyne's Trip to D.C.

Hello, my name is Dejalyne Rae Gopher. I am the daughter of Amanda Davis, the granddaughter of Alfred Davis, Jolyne Sander, and Clark Abel. This summer I was given the opportunity to travel to Washington, DC for the Jr. National Young Leadership Conference. I was able to visit the Capital and Harper's Ferry. My favorite place was the Vietnam Memorial. It was a very quiet place and there were thousands of names on the wall. We did a lot of activities and my favorite was when we pretended to work for the President of the United States. We also learned about leadership values and what makes a good leader, which will help me be a better leader in the future.

I want to thank my community and Tribe for all the support.

Thank you, Dejalyne Rae Gopher

Greetings! I would just like to take this time to thank everyone who helped support my daughter Dejalyne on her "DC or Bust" fundraising efforts. Whether you bought raffle tickets, baked goods, dinner plates, breakfast burritos, donated items, or gave words of encouragement—it was all appreciated. Without the support of our family, friends, community, Tribe, and members of the Tribal Council her trip would not have been possible. Thank you very much, from the bottom of our Hearts.

Editor's note: This story was inadvertently left out of the last issue. My sincere apologies.

"The fact that indigenous people seek recognition and not revenge should tell you exactly which culture is the 'civilized' one".

Pyramid Lake Museum and Visitor Center News and Activities

How time flies!! We're already coming into the winter season and the year went by so fast!

The Museum has been extremely busy with professional development training that began in September. Billie Jean attended the American Indian Tourism Conference in Green Bay, Wisconsin; the Nevada Museums Association Conference in Elko; and the International Conference of Indigenous Archives, Libraries, and Museums in Santa Ana, New Mexico.

There is always something new to learn, and the training provided the opportunity to meet many museum professionals from throughout the country and from overseas. Important subjects covered at the various conferences included: the mission of the museum drives the exhibits; museums are world-class destinations; the many unique and comical challenges within the museum world; connection to the collections must be passionate and knowledgeable about the subject, and sharing that commitment to the public. It takes a lot of work to get collections known, and exhibits are situational hands-on and should allow the public to get an authentic experience.

At the International Conference in Santa Ana, many workshops were attended and tours of local museums. Some of the workshops included: IMLS Native American Museum Services Grantee meeting; Tips for Successful Exhibit Planning and Development; Lessons Learned; Community Centered Digital Strategies; Collecting Oral Histories of Native American Veterans; Digitizing Crow Oral History; Developing an Oral History Center on a Shoestring Budget; Honoring Ancestral Women and Their Stories; Protecting Traditional Knowledge; and Hard Truths: Examining How Museums Present Traumatic Histories. Tours were made available at the Sky City Cultural Center and Museum, IAIA Museum of Contemporary Native Art, and the Indian Pueblo Cultural Center.

We are a variety of visitors this last quarter that included the Pyramid Lake Jr. High School, Reno Home School, College of Atlantis, French Bloggers, I Can Do Anything Charter School, Alice Maxwell Elementary, Northern Nevada International Center, Kate Smith Elementary, US Fish and Wildlife Service, Van Gorder Elementary, National Indian Health Board, Nevada Museum of Art, UC Berkeley students, and Russian Rural Physicians. From September to November we had over 2,000 visitors at the museum. So far this year, we've had 7,420 visitors that surpass the number of visitors we had in 2016.

Our new IMLS 2-year grant started October 1, 2017. The goals of the grant are to sustain the tribal heritage, culture, and knowledge through strengthened activities with exhibits, educational services, and programming. Specifically, the museum staff will collect oral history from tribal "Wisdom-Keepers" and develop cultural information into digital stories. The grant project is called "Ki Nasoomookwatu Learning Project." Watch for flyers announcing upcoming public meetings.

John Redhouse donated part of his book collection of 51 books to the Museum. All of the books are on the activist movement defending Native civil rights. Neal Cobb donated 20 books entitled "Divorce Seekers," a book about the Dude Ranches at Pyramid Lake and others near the reservation. Extra books are on sale in the Gift Shop. Anthony Shafton donated a book he wrote called "The Nevada They Knew."

On November 15th we held our annual "Rock Your Mocs" event. This is the 7th year of the event that is part of a worldwide Native American and Indigenous Peoples movement held during National Native American Heritage Month in November. We showed the Las Vegas PBS film, "Common Ground," had door prize drawings, presented the Pyramid Lake High School Dancers, and Round Dancing. Many people wore their favorite pair of moccasins to show their Native Pride. The Pyramid Lake Health Clinic provided lunch for all participants and we are very grateful for their support. We had a number of prize winners: Angey Dunn, Jacob Stump, Betsy Thomas, Debra Harry, Virginia Left Hand, Kierra, Janet Davis, Koomea Blindman, Loretta Garcia, Konch Blindman, Joe Mendes, Estella Pancho, Debbie Barlese, Don L, Nuba Cantsee, Carron Nugent, Darrin Padilla, Teresa Wright, Charlotte Harry, Betty Aleck, Pam Spotted Wolf, Charlene Dressler, Lydia, Boppy Blindman, Rissa, Alex O'Daye, Tsotigh Phillips, Jodessa Kochamp, and Carla Eben. Congratulations to all of the winners and thank you for celebrating Native Heritage at the Museum! A special thanks to our elders who came to participate in the day's activities. The presence of our local community members is a wonderful blessing in the sharing of our culture.

The Numu Book Club began reading "As Long As the River Shall Run" by Martha C. Knack and Omer C. Stewart. It is an ethnohistory of the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation. Meetings are held every other week and the next meeting on December 12th. The members have a great time, sharing their favorite part, Golden Lines and Summaries. Darren Hicks, the Numu Book Club Leader, started an online forum for participating members. The Book Club is an educational way to learn about our Paiute history so feel free to join in person or on-line. Meetings are held at the Pyramid Lake Museum and participating members receive a book discount for the chosen book. The member book cost is $25.00.

On December 9th the museum hosted a Tule Duck Decoy making class taught by Sandra Eagle. It was a small group and each participant made their own special tule duck. It was a fun day with lots of laughter and visiting. We are grateful to learn one of our traditional survival arts from our very patient and knowledgeable teacher, Sandra. We plan to learn how to make more tule items, such as the Duck Egg Baskets and small boats.

We are looking forward to hosting another Basket Weaving class in February during the Presidents Day holiday weekend. It's time to gather your materials for making the Tsokono'o, cradleboard hood. You will need at least 100 scraped willow rods and willow weaving thread. A Basket Weaving gathering will be held in Lovelock during the Martin Luther King holiday weekend in January for making the boat basket, a newborn's first cradle.

Arrangements are still being planned for a class about Native Plants in our area but it might be moved up to allow for actual harvesting.

Stop by and visit the Museum Gift Shop. We have 2018 calendars for sale featuring beautiful photos from our area. Find your special and unique gifts for everyone on your list!!

Happy New Year!! May your year be filled with Happiness, Good Health, and Prosperity!!

Saa a' Mu Poonedooa!

Transportation Department News

The end of the year is nearly here and we are steadily working on closing out some work for the year and gearing up for next years projects.

The Transportation Planning Department is working with FEMA (Federal Emergency Management Administration) and ERFO (Emergency Road Funding Opportunities) to complete work on Surprise Valley Road at the north end of the lake.

Surprise Valley Road near the Willows after the flood.

In addition repair for the Sutcliffe Drive route is still in the process of being designed to certain specifications in order begin work in this area. This has been a long process and somewhat challenging however, the department continues to move forward in finding a resolution to this area's flood issues.

It has been decided that qualified areas of the Surprise Valley Road the Federal Government/ERFO team will be doing the repairs scheduled for this coming spring. This decision was made to keep the cost of repairs and engineering at a minimum to the tribe. The other areas of this road considered ineligible for reimbursement or maintenance repairs are being address by the Roads Department.

The Sutcliffe Drive repair at the Hardscrabble Creek next to Crosby's Lodge is almost shovel-ready. The question of whether this is a bridge repair or a culvert upgrade is still to be determined. The Department hopes to complete work in this area at the beginning of 2018, weather permitting. The flood damage is challenging but work continues to bring road back to normal. In the meantime, the road remains closed until further notice.

The Wadsworth Community Center has been an ongoing project for the Department that will be responsible for the expansion of the parking lot when built. Seeking funds for the project continues while plans for the building and parking area continues and the design is 60 percent completed. This project has great potential and will be an exceptional benefit to the Wadsworth community as well as to the Tribe. It will be a great place to gather for the families and children of the three Pyramid Lake communities.

The Transportation Planning Department has been using the Tribes Strategic Transportation Safety Plan to address the transportation safety needs of our communities. The needs are great but planning and prioritizing area needs will help us move forward on improvements needed to make travel safe and effective for all community members as well as our visitors. Over the past year several changes have been made in this effort to implement the elements listed in the plan.

A Law and Order Committee's recommendation of two safety laws was approved by the Tribal Council and went into effect this year. The Child Passenger Safety Seat Law was adopted as a primary law and families can be stopped if a Tribal Police Officer suspects a child isn't secured in a safety seat. The Safety Belt law as also adopted as a primary law this year and it requires the use of seat belts for all passengers in a vehicle. These two measures are listed in the Strategic Transportation Safety Plan and are to encourage tribal members to buckle up and secure their children in safety seats to make their travels as safe as possible.

The Transportation Safety Coordinator, Sherry Ely Mendes, has secured additional funding for the Child Safety Seat program that issues safety seats to families in need for no cost. New child safety seats as well as technical assistance on how to install them is given to each qualified family. There are currently 10 Certified Child Safety Seat Technicians on the reservation to assist with the installation and replacement of child safety seats. There will be holding CPS Checkpoints in the coming year to offer this safety service to the public and appointments are available. Call the office at (775) 574-1000 ext. 1107.

During the calendar year 2017 the Department took a survey on the roads currently listed in their inventory including the state routes SR445, SR446, and SR447 that cross the reservation. With the assistance of the State's Department of Transportation Traffic Safety team, a Road Safety Assessment (RSA) was conducted to determine the safety of these routes and the areas of improvement. This was a great exercise and in line with the Tribes Transportation Safety Plan. It revealed the need to focus on prioritizing areas of improvement and once that is completed, locating the necessary funding will be the next step in the process.

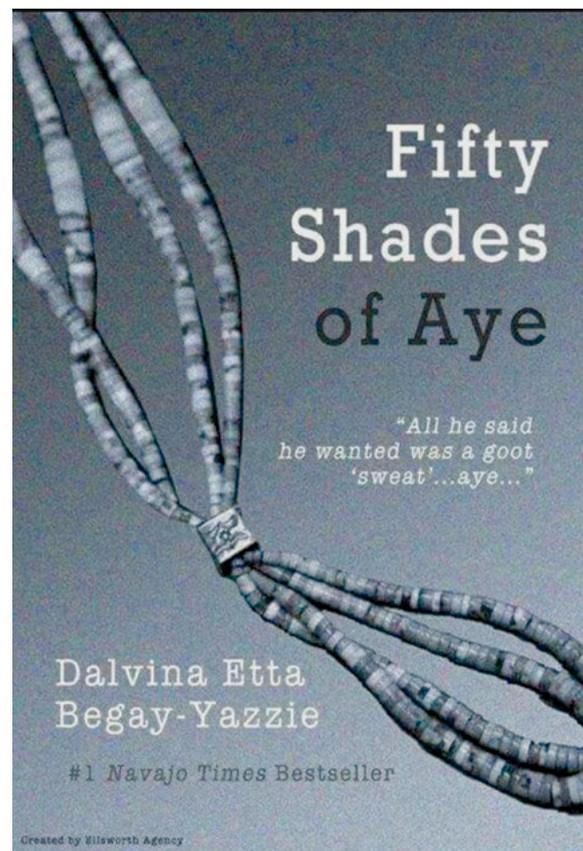

With the information gathered

from the RSA on SR447 the Department will focus on the downtown corridor of the Wadsworth community and specifically the stretch of road from the junction to Brady Hill Road. This area has experienced a steady increase in traffic volume from trucks, recreational vehicles and the exceedingly high traffic use during the Burning Man Festival. Special notices is given to the Natchez School Zone that is situated directly on this route, as well as the New Community Center, the Head Start and Day Care centers.

The Transportation Safety Coordinator and the State of Nevada Department of Transportation has recently submitted a grant request to the Federal Highways Tribal Transportation Safety Program to place sidewalks and bike lanes in the Wadsworth area, improving the drainage issues in the area, and upgrading the school zone signs and crosswalks. Also proposed is to add lighting to the road approaches to improve night and day visibility. If the grant is approved plans for this project will begin immediately and construction will start in early 2019. The Department is looking forward to upgrading this area that is a long overdue improvement for a safe route for children and families who regularly attend school and community events.

Environmental Update

Since January 1, 2017 Pyramid Lake has received 1.50 million acre-feet of water. The lake has increased in elevation by 10 feet, given the evaporation over the summer. All of the work involved with the Department contributes to the fishery habitat restoration. Each component of the Department focuses on the benefits to the fishery and to the lake and river habitats.

The task of removing the non-native invasive plants: perennial pepperweed (tall white top); tamarisk; Russian Olive; Russian thistle; purple loosestrife; diffuse knapweed, and curly dock remains an important issue with control and eradication. The treatment areas include the Truckee River corridor, the lakeshores, certain range units, and certain easements and rights of way (road ways).

The effort to inform tribal land users of the treatment and control measures will contribute to controlling the infestation in many areas on the reservation. The Department will publish informational pamphlets in the future and will distribute to the tribal membership.

The Department continues to discover open dumps throughout the reservation. It is important that when these open dumps or satellite dumps are discovered, they are reported to the Environmental Department. These sites will be assessed by mapping the location, identifying any addresses of the garbage owner(s), reported to the Pyramid Lake Police Department (PLPD), and cleaned up. Please contact the Environmental Department if open or satellite dumps are discovered or you can call the PLPD at (775) 574-0444.

The Department has initiated the Range Inventory and Assessment grant program. This purpose is to inventory the vegetation within the range units on the reservation, conduct an assessment to determine the health and condition of the range units, and begin to update and develop a range management plan.

It is the intent that the program will work with the Pyramid Lake Cooperative Cattlemen's Association. The 2018 wildland fires caused extensive damage to the range areas on the reservation. The damage was so severe that the BIA is planning to modify the 10-year grazing permit. The Range Inventory program will be important to assist and serve the purposes for determining the condition of the range.

Our cultural resources exist in many forms. It is our responsibility to assure the protection of our sacred places and our sacred resources. It requires stewardship and the ability to report and provide information to the proper authorities. It may lead to the conviction of those that are guilty of vandalism, looting, and destroying these resources. We must be vigilant with identifying suspicious activity and report it to the PLPD. Please contact the PLPD at (775) 574-0444.

Lastly, the Tribal Response Program (Brownfields) continues to inventory unused and abandoned buildings in each of the Tribal communities. The inventory is the first step and next step is to conduct a hazardous materials assessment. If there are hazardous materials present (lead, asbestos, etc.) and a clean up may be initiated once funding is secure to cover the cleanup costs. If and when the cleanup is finished, the Tribe will decide the fate of the building for reuse, renovation, or redevelopment of the site. The Program is completing this process for the Urrutia property in Wadsworth.

If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me at (775) 574-0101 x17.

Thank you.

Mervin Wright Jr., Environmental Manager

BURN SEASON

October 1, 2017 through May 31, 2018

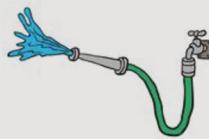

Residential permits for open burning are required for the burning of weeds, old lumber, and yard waste at all residences within the reservation.

You can get your Burn Permit Application at the Natural Resources Building or online at <http://plpt.nsn.us/pud/forms/PUDburnpermit.pdf>.

Keep Your Burn Pile From Starting A Wildfire!

Clear vegetation for 10 feet around your burn pile. Keep your burn pile small and controllable.

Be prepared just in case. Have a source of water and a shovel nearby

You must stay with your fire until it is dead out, even at night. Never leave it unattended.

Notice:

You must notify the Pyramid Lake Emergency Response, Pyramid Lake Dispatch, the Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe Police, or the Pyramid Lake Ranger Station, in case of emergencies during the burn. Emergency Response can supervise burns for your safety.

If you have any questions feel free to call Amanda Davis at the Natural Resource Building at (775)-574-0101 ex: 16.

Enrollment Update

Flora Greene was selected to be the first tribal member to receive the new Tribal Identification Card from Chairman Hawley on December 15, 2017.

The new Tribal ID Cards with an Expiration Date are now available for members 18 years and over. Nevada Senate Bill 399 passed this year allows for any businesses that accepts the Nevada driver's license to accept our new Tribal ID card, this includes air travel.

The new card has a six-year expiration period and has a regular photo of the tribal member plus a security photo on the card. It has a custom laminate featuring the Stone Mother and the Tribal Seal for extra security.

The older ID cards are valid until December 2018. If you are 18 and over and do not wish to have a new ID card please replace your TM (no photo) card with a new laminated TM card.

For those ages 17 and under ID cards with or without photo are not be affected, as they are only temporary cards.

Information on the 18 and over ID cards and card request forms are available on the Tribal website and Facebook plus the Tribal offices.

The new ID card has been an ongoing project for as long as I have been in enrollment and perhaps longer. To the many people involved (past and present) in this team effort from the beginning to the final approved ID cards we give our heartfelt gratitude and thanks for helping the Tribe achieve this historical goal!

We welcome the following new members to the Tribe.

October: Lei'na'ala Athena Borbon Brown, Shaniya Marae Centeno, Lennox D'Andria, Adonis Zane Hernandez, Hayzley Elaine Hicks, Belle Rain O'Neil, Leesa Theresa Perez, Caleb Anthony David Woolley.

November: Jolie Makenzie Reynolds, Dewey Alley Scott, Anthony Isaiah Sienze-Madera, David Edward Tomlin, John Edward Tomlin.

December: Gilbert Gary Davis, Zylah Kane Duncan, Rhonda Celeste Myers Knight, Rylee Ann Rolando.

Enrollment Services forms now available at the Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe website:

- Under 18 Card Replacement Request Form
- Expiration Date ID Card 18 and Over Request Form—New!
- Document Request Form
- Enrolled Member Address Update Form

From the Business Office

One of the most exciting developments taking place for our Tribe is to see the actual formation and operationalization of Numu, Inc., our business corporation. This article will give some of the history and background about the corporation, and what it can do in the economic development realm.

Numu, Inc. is a type of structure commonly referred to as a Section 17 corporation. That is because it is a federally-chartered corporation. Section 17 of the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a Federal Corporate Charter to an Indian Tribe under Section 17 thereof (25 U.S.C. § 477, as amended) for the purpose of providing Indian Tribes with the statutory means to charter Tribal businesses that preserve Tribal tax immunities, sovereignty and assets.

The Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe began the initial efforts to create a Section 17 corporation several years ago, with the intent that such a corporation will ultimately benefit its members. The Numu Inc. Charter was approved by the Pyramid Lake Tribal Council on April 17, 2015, pursuant to Resolution No. PL 24-15, and in accordance with Tribal law and submitted to the Interior Secretary for approval. The federal approval of the Charter was given on June 15, 2016. Finally, the Tribal Council ratified the Charter and installed a board of directors on October 20, 2017.

There are many benefits associated with Section 17 corporations. As a federally chartered entity, it enables the tribal business entity to waive sovereign immunity to facilitate business transactions without waiving immunity of the tribe itself. This is an important protection for the tribe, as limits the liability of the tribe to only the assets it allocates to the corporation. It shares the same privileges and immunities as the tribe does, including immunity from suit. Typically, Section 17 corporations can be used to operate construction companies, manufacturing, gaming, agricultural enterprises, and government contracting. They can also be utilized as a holding company for tribal subsidiaries.

Finally, the Numu, Inc. is wholly owned by the tribe and operated for the benefit of Tribal members. The Numu, Inc. carries a tremendous responsibility on behalf of the Tribe, and it will be exciting to see economic development strategies come to fruition in our communities.

About Numu, Inc.

It is an exciting time for Native American tribes for embarking on economic development initiatives. We have seen some great successes from the business ventures of various Nevada tribes. Possibly the most visible example is the Fox Peak convenience stores, located in Fernley and Fallon, and the Fox Peak Cinema in Fallon. These enterprises were created by the Fallon Tribal Development Corporation (FTDC), which is a separate and distinct business entity chartered under federal law, to engage in business and economic development activities on behalf of its owner, the Fallon Paiute-Shoshone Tribe.

Perhaps one of the best tribal success stories comes from the Las Vegas Paiute Tribe of only 56 members living on 10 acres of tribal land in downtown Las Vegas. They were recognized as a sovereign nation when their Tribal Constitution was approved in July 1970. In 1983 they obtained additional land after convincing Congress to add about 4000 acres adjacent to Mount Charleston. They opened a smoke shop in 1978 and they claim it is now the largest single retailer of cigarettes in the United States. They have three golf courses and a clubhouse at the Las Vegas Paiute Resort. In keeping with their growth philosophy, they just opened NuWu Cannabis Marketplace, the "Largest marijuana store on the planet" in Las Vegas. This type of success the Las Vegas Paiute Tribe has achieved is very rare and highly attributable to having a great location for business operations.

The Pyramid Tribal Council has decided to utilize some of the economic development money from the TROA settlement. To make the most efficient use of the money and keep politics out of the business, the Tribal Council decided to use the same type of approach that has worked for the Fallon Paiute-Shoshone Tribe and has created their own separate and distinct business entity, Numu, Inc.

Numu, Inc. is owned by the Tribe for the benefit of its members. The Tribe sought out applicants for the Board of Directors and the Board is composed of seven directors, one who is an ex officio member of the Tribal Council, and one is the Chairperson. To obtain the expertise needed for effective management of the Corporation, the Board may consist of up to three non-tribal members. The initial board selected includes the following individuals:

Virginia Cline, a tribal member and a logistics professional for J.C. Penny in Reno. She has been a Supervisor, Transportation Rates Supervisor, Service/Projects Manager, Transportation Project Specialist, and a former board member of the Urban Indians in Reno.

Jenell Fellows, a tribal member and currently is the Diabetes Program Coordinator. She has over 11 years of experience in nurse assisting and 4 years in Project and Grants Management. Jenell was elected to be the Vice Chairperson for the Board of Directors.

Brandon Cerocke, a tribal member and Vice President of sales and marketing for IQ Technology Solutions, a Native American owned firm. He has experience with strategic consulting and managed non-profit IT makeover campaigns to deliver products and services to non-profit businesses. He also has experience with strategic planning for 35 local businesses and performed quarterly business reviews for both non-profit and for-profit firms. His education includes degrees in Business Management and Computer Science. Brandon was elected to be the Treasurer of the Board of Directors.

Gary Shaw, a tribal member and is currently a Program/Project Manager for the Renewable Generations department at NV Energy. He has been a Plant Outage Manager, Outage Project Manager, a maintenance Supervisor, Staff Environmental Engineer, and Power Plant Engineer. Tribal experience includes serving on the Tribal Council, the Water Resources Committee, the Law and Order Committee and the Wadsworth Community Development Center Volunteer Committee. Gary was elected to be the Chairperson of the Board of Directors.

Cassandra Darrough, a tribal member and currently on the Tribal Council and will be serving as the ex officio member for the Board. Cassandra is currently employed with the Tribe's Fire Rescue Emergency Medical Services.

Shannon Keller O'Loughlin, is a citizen of the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma and a lawyer. She is qualified to practice in several jurisdictions and has provided legal counsel to the Tribe in the past. She has experience with Federal Indian law and policy and has led economic development projects. She has expertise in providing counsel for developing legal infrastructure in support of Indian Nation governance, and has performed commercial negotiations and transactions on behalf of Indian governments. Shannon was elected to be the Secretary of the Board of Directors.

Kip Ritchie, a member of the Forest County Potawatomi Tribe and is currently employed with Greenfire Management Services and oversees their construction management firm. He also has experience with the Potawatomi Business Development Corporation of the Forest County Potawatomi Community. He has experience in strategic planning, operations, growth, and business development with the Corporation that he now brings to the table for Numu, Inc.

The first meeting of Numu, Inc. was on December 1, at the Tribal headquarters in Nixon that lasted for a full day. All board members including Vinton Hawley, Tribal Chairman; Deborah Harry, Business Officer, and Bob Klimko, Business Consultant attended the meeting. They had a very aggressive schedule, and immediately went to work. The meeting began with brief introductions, and immediately began drafting a Mission and Vision Statement. Everyone was a very active participant, so they were quickly able to move to strategic planning that began with an analysis of the Strengths, Weaknesses, Opportunities and Threats (SWOT) of the Tribe's business possibilities. They reviewed the seven categories of business opportunities were spelled out in the Tribe's Economic Development Plan. These included Recreation and Fishing, Good Governance and Education, Tribal Enterprises, Industrial and Commercial Development, Tribal Entrepreneurship, Agriculture and Ranching, and Energy. They took each of those categories and had an exercise to imagine all possibilities for the types of business opportunities that may exist for that category.

They then performed an Affinity Analysis to further categorize each opportunity and voted on which sub-categories to concentrate on. At a future meeting they will perform a Business Canvass on each sub-category, which will be described in a future article. In the afternoon, Brian Bonenfant from the Center for Regional Studies at UNR gave a presentation entitled "Regional Economic Climate: Opportunities and Challenges."

The items planned for discussion at the next full meeting include: Finalizing the Mission and Vision Statements; Commenting on, and adopting the proposed Bylaws; Perform a Business Canvass Model on the selected business opportunities; and developing a schedule and plan for the most desirable business options forward.

The board is also planning on holding community outreach sessions in each of the three communities to answer questions and inform the public about Numu, Inc.

Tribal Response Program: Brief Updates

Community members can now access the Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe's Tribal Response Program website at plptbrownfields.org.

On this website, you can:

- Find important information regarding brownfield and hazardous sites that are located on the Pyramid Lake Paiute Reservation;
- Download the PLPT Brownfield/Hazardous Site Notification Form to report a brownfield or hazardous site that is located on the Pyramid Lake Paiute Reservation;
- Contact the Tribal Response Program directly with any brownfield and hazardous site-related questions or concerns;
- Provide input into the prioritization of brownfield sites (typically, this occurs annually);
- Find information related to hazardous waste and substances.

Please be advised that any of the content on the Tribal Response Program website is subject to change at any time.

As a side note, the Tribal Reponse Program and the Wetland Program had a successful set of public meetings in late July. Many thanks to Emily Gibson, Neil Bertrando, and Jeremiah Sampson for their collaboration and every community member who attended.

Please be on the lookout for any future meetings.

Coeur d'Alene native announces bid for Idaho Governor

Paulette Jordan, 38, a member of the Coeur d'Alene Tribe, has announced her intention to run for governor of Idaho rather than seek a third term in the Idaho House of Representatives.

She is serving her second term in the House of Representatives representing District 5. She previously served on the Coeur d'Alene Tribal Council from 2009 to 2012.

"Service is an inherent value in my family, from my ancestors on down to my sons, and they will carry that tradition forward in their lives. I'm proud to be part of Idaho's family," Jordan said.

"When you are raised by Idaho, it's a matter of giving back. Taking on the governorship would be the best way for me to impact people's lives ... to serve and give back," she said.

Rep. Jordan is a member of the State Affairs Committee; the Idaho House Resources and Conservation Committee; the Energy, Environment & Technology Committee and serves as an appointed Idaho Representative to the Energy and Environment Committee of the Council of State Governments for the Western Region.

Fellow democratic governor contender A.J. Balukoff, recently issued a statement welcoming her to the race as well as giving her a birthday wish.

"Voters deserve a robust primary where issues affecting all hard-working Idahoans get discussed and debated. Idaho needs a positive vision to jump-start prosperity in our state after years of falling behind in education, living in a low-wage economy and losing the ability to compete with the rest of the region. I look forward to hearing Representative Jordan's ideas, and I wish her a Happy Birthday."

She attended the University of Washington, and received specialized certificates from the University of Idaho and the Harvard John F. Kennedy school of government.

"When I asked myself how I could serve Idaho even better, the governor's office was my answer," said Jordan. "Idaho is a state I fall in love with over and over. This is the place that fostered me and this is the place I was raised to serve."

She will be the first native woman to run for governor of any state.

Recreation News: Keeping the Kids Fit

Holiday Greetings and a Happy New Year Wish from the Tribal Recreation Program! We look forward to another great year in 2018.

The months of November and December have been very busy at our Recreation Department. We participated in the NB3Fit activity, had classes on beading and skirt making, held Youth Coaches Meetings, started our Youth basketball practices, provided adult Volleyball games, and assisted with the Numaga Thanksgiving Dinner, the Tribal Food Bank and Mobile Pantry.

NB3Fit at Natchez Elementary School

In the week of November 5-11, more than 10,000 young people from 110 different tribes participated in a group exercise program for an hour during the week. It was sponsored by the Notah Begay Foundation. The NB3Fit program aims to reverse the epidemic of type 2 Diabetes among Indian children throughout Indian Country plus approximately 50 percent of Native youth are facing a lifetime of obesity and struggling with health problems. Creating NB3Fit Week during Native American Heritage Month is one of many steps in changing these statistics.

The Recreation Program organized a one-mile run/walk for all of the students at Natchez Elementary School. Nearly 185 kids went outside to run with their classmates and cheer on their friends. It was a great day to be out exercising. Thanks to Markie Wilder, Community in School, and Raving Consultants for their help.

According to the Notah Begay Foundation: 91 Native communities participated in NB3Fit Week, 20 states across the country were represented, and over 100 events were scheduled.

Notah Begay III is a professional golfer and scored an impossible 65 during a tournament game. He was a roommate of Tiger Woods during the time they attended Stanford University in California.

Youth Basketball

Happy to report we had 11 coaches volunteering their time to coach our Youth basketball teams. A coaches meeting was held in early November to schedule time at the gym and go over rules in taking care of the gym during practice times. Teams were encouraged share practice times per age group to get more practice time in. If you stopped by any time in the evening during the week you would find kids practicing basketball, coaches encouraging and coaching their players. Many parents came by to watch or help out with incidental chores as much as they can. Basketball is always a fun time here at Pyramid Lake!

Skirt Making

It was nice to see everyone making skirts with ribbons to commemorate Native American Heritage Month in November. We plan on doing this activity again perhaps in February. Watch for dates and times, we have plenty of material and ribbons.

Wishing you and yours a Happy and Prosperous New Year!
