Marine 1 touched down at 1013 on the ship's 1092 ft long runway full of helicopters and other aircraft next to Atlantic and docked naval ships. Trump was greeted by sec Mattis, acting naval sec sean stackley, and calf Richard McCormack. Priebus, miller, and mnuchin and wife exited back.

Trump saluted and chatted briefly beside the ship's 10--story superstructure that includes all air traffic and control functions. He then walked over a small red carpet surrounded by "rainbow sideboys" -- men dressed in green, red, purple, and blue that designate their functions on the ship. The monochrome suits and h omega look a bit like the tv show "Wiggles."

He then walked to a large gray platform that served as a giant elevator to take him down to the hangar base, a giant auditorium below.

He wan still wearing suit and red tie.

DAILY COMMUNICATIONS REPORT

TO: White House Cabinet Affairs Communications

FROM: Department of the Interior Communications Team

SUBJECT: Communications Update

Press Inquiries:

- Small inquiries and logistical inquiries.
- E&E News: (Maxine Joselow) --REQUEST—As I'm the regulations reporter for E&E News. I'm in charge of helping with our Q&A section, and I was wondering if you'd be able to set up a short phone interview with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife Lola Zinke for a Q&A. I understand Ms. Zinke is very busy, so the conversation could be as short as 15 minutes, and it could occur anytime in the next month or so. I'm just hoping to ask her about leading Sen. John Tester's campaign, traveling with her husband, and other matters related to her daily life and activities.--RESPONSE-- The Department does not facilitate Mrs. Zinke's schedule.
- Reuters: (Susan Heavey)—REQUEST-- Does the Interior Dept or the secretary have any comment on this (FEMA statement on Whitefish Energy contact)? Also, can you tell us what is on the agenda for the secretary's meeting with the president later today? —RESPONSE— Today, U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke issued the following statement in response to false reports alleging any ties to Whitefish Energy, a company which was contracted by PREPA and the Puerto Rican government. "I had absolutely nothing to do with Whitefish Energy receiving a contract in Puerto Rico. Any attempts by the dishonest media or political operatives to tie me to awarding or influencing any contract involving Whitefish are completely baseless. Only in elitist Washington, D.C., would being from a small town be considered a crime. “Neither myself nor anyone in my office has advocated for this company in anyway. After the initial contract was awarded, I was contacted by the company, on which I took no action. All records, which are being made available to appropriate officials, will prove no involvement. “I welcome any and all investigations into these allegations, and encourage the Interior Department’s Inspector General to investigate this matter fully.”

DAILY COMMUNICATIONS REPORT

TO: White House Cabinet Affairs Communications

FROM: Department of the Interior Communications Team

SUBJECT: Communications Update

Press Inquiries:

- Small inquiries and logistical inquiries.
- *Multiple Inquires (NBC-Gabe Gutierrez, NYT- Deborah Acosta, Reuters- Emily Flitter)—REQUEST-- Would someone from Secretary Zinke's office call me to discuss Whitefish Energy. Here are my questions: 1) Did Sec. Zinke play any role in securing the contract for Whitefish Energy to work in Puerto Rico? 2) Does Sec. Zinke know the company's chief executive, Andy Techmanski? 3) The Washington Post reported that one of Sec. Zinke's sons once worked a summer job at one of the company's construction sites. Is that correct? Also, confirming this statement provided to the Post: "The Secretary always politely listens when citizens and the small business community approach him with concerns and ideas. Neither the Secretary nor anyone in his office have taken any meetings or action on behalf of this company."—RESPONSE-- On background, Neither the Secretary nor anyone in his office have taken any meetings or action on behalf of this company. The Zinkes and the Techmanskis know each other because they both live in a small town (population 6,000) where everyone knows everyone and his son joined a friend who worked a summer job at one of their construction sites.

- CNN: (Rene Marsh)—REQUEST 1-- CNN is looking for information/clarity on Secretary Zinke and his familiarity with Andrew Techmanski, the CEO of Whitefish Energy. Have the two worked together before? In what capacity? How Does the Secretary know Techmanski? Has Techmanski or any of his business partners worked with Zinke on any projects either as Secretary or when Zinke was a member of congress? Did Zinke recommend Whitefish Energy for the contract to help restore Puerto Rico? Did Zinke have any influence or involvement either directly or indirectly with Whitefish securing the contract in Puerto Rico? Has this company or any of its leadership, including the CEO, had any political connections to Zinke or his wife during their political careers. Donations directly or indirectly? What was/is the Secretary's involvement in the overall recovery process for Puerto Rico?—RESPONSE 1-- On background, Neither the Secretary nor anyone in his office have taken any meetings or action on behalf of this company. The Zinkes and the Techmanskis know each other because they both live in a small town (population 6,000) where everyone knows everyone and his son joined a friend who worked a summer job at one of their construction sites. REQUEST 2— Did the Secretary work with or communicate with Techmanskis in the aftermath of the hurricane? Were they in communication after the hurricane discussing any aspect of the recovery effort or anything else?—RESPONSE 2-- Background: No. The gentleman sent an email but there was not action taken on it (no reply, forward, discussion, etc). Not for a statement, just for your context - The secretary's phone number and email address have been published multiple times over the years so he gets a lot of emails/cold calls/letters.—REQUEST 3-- One additional question beyond the content of the email sent from Techmanski to Zinke. I understand in 2016, then-Congressman Rep. Zinke's office reached out to local officials in Montana about a Whitefish Energy project. Can you the Secretary provide you with insight on why he intervened? What sort of assistance did Zinke's office provide to Whitefish? —RESPONSE 3-- On background: That is not accurate. No intervention was taken by Zinke or his office. I'm understand a local field representative in the Congressional office was contacted by an employee of the business, the field rep listened politely took no action and referred him to the Senators' offices.
- E&E News: (Pamela King)—REQUEST-- I was wondering if Interior has any initial thoughts to share on the HOARD Act introduced today by Rep. Lowenthal: https://www.eenews.net/assets/2017/10/24/document_gw_03.pdf. The bill would require annual reports to Congress on APD data.—RESPONSE-- The Department has not taken an official position on the bill at this time. FYI - So far this year the BLM has decreased their processing time for APDs by an average of 46 days.
- E&E News: (Kellie Lunney)—REQUEST-- Politico ran this item today. Is this accurate? Will the secretary be on the Hill today to meet with members of the Natural Resources Cmte? Why the secrecy? ZINKE'S SUPER SECRET HILL HUDDLE - Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke will meet this afternoon with House Natural Resources Committee members in a room typically reserved for issues involving a high-security clearance. Zinke will meet separately with committee Democrats and Republicans. Copies of invitations obtained by Huddle say he will be "raising a confidential matter" and only members and staff with top-secret level clearance may attend. Democratic Rep. Ruben Gallego told Huddle there's "nothing normal" about meeting with Zinke in such secure spot given his department has very little oversight over clandestine issues and said it's likely a way to limit participation since very few staffers on the panel have a security clearance.—RESPONSE-- I'm not at liberty to discuss conversations that may or may not be held in a secure location.

Bloomberg: U.S. to Exit Global Anti-Corruption Effort Aimed at Oil Cash

“The Trump administration said it will exit a global anti-corruption effort that compels oil, gas and mining companies to disclose the payments they give governments worldwide. The decision, announced in a letter Thursday to the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative, may undercut the effort that aims to give citizens and watchdogs in poor but mineral-rich nations details on how much their government leaders get in taxes, royalties and lease payments. With that information, they can ensure the money is spent on roads and schools, not squirreled away in foreign bank accounts.”

“Deputy Interior Secretary David Bernhardt today defended a plan to charge $70 for a peak-season entry fee at 17 of the busiest national parks next year, saying it's roughly the same cost as taking his family to a 3-D movie. "It costs me about $68 and 90 cents for the two kids and my wife and I to go see a movie," Bernhardt said on NPR's 1A, a daily program and podcast produced by NPR member station WAMU. Bernhardt said park fees have not kept pace with inflation. And he said that higher fees would not keep most low-income Americans from visiting the parks, adding that a bigger problem for them is the cost of transportation and lodging associated with traveling to the parks.”

CORRECTING THE RECORD:

THE HILL: Senators spar over proposal to drill in Alaska wildlife refuge

“Lawmakers on Thursday fought over the possibility of drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), the opening act of a legislative push to allow oil production in the Alaskan Arctic. Republicans from Alaska and on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee cast drilling in the refuge as an operation that can be done safely and one that would help the economies in both the state and the nation. But Democrats vowed to fight drilling there, saying the area is too ecologically important to allow industrial production.”

- The Alaska 1002 area is a 1.5 million acre coastal plain in Alaska specifically set aside because of its natural resource potential. This set-aside was done by President Jimmy Carter. To develop energy there, however, Congress must give an authorization.

- The Department of the Interior wants two lease sales in the Alaska 1002 area over the next 10 years. Lease sales are estimated to generate $3.5 billion in bonus bids; with a 51-49 split between the U.S. Treasury and the State of Alaska, the Treasury would bring in $1.8 billion projected.
- Development in the Alaska 1002 area would follow all appropriate environmental laws and procedures.
 - Energy production occurs in the Kenai Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, as well as the NPRA (National Petroleum Reserve Alaska). The latter is also located on Alaska's North Slope on the coastal plain.
- Secretary Zinke visited the North Slope last spring with Chairman Murkowski and a bipartisan Senate delegation; there, he signed a Secretarial Order requiring the U.S. Geological Survey to update resource assessments for the Alaska 1002 area.
 - This effort is in line with President Trump's Executive Order 13783 on American energy independence.
- A 2009 report by the U.S. Geological Survey estimates that there are 10.35 billion barrels of oil available within the Alaska 1002 area, with 80-90% of that being economically recoverable at $43/barrel.

"The Department of the Interior is outlining steps aimed at increasing energy production on federal lands. It's another pro-industry headline for a secretary touting himself as not only an avid outdoorsman, but a follower of the conservation ideals of the 26th President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt. If the manager of most of our federal lands is going find inspiration from someone, it would be hard to find a more appropriate muse."

Trump has said intends to shrink two monuments in Utah — Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante."

“A showdown is looming in the nation's capital over whether to open America's largest wildlife refuge to oil drilling. A budget measure approved by the Republican-controlled Congress allows lawmakers to pursue legislation that would allow drilling on the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Independent Journal Review: Int Sec Ryan Zinke Spent the Day in Moccasins and a Fashion Staple That Would Make George H.W. Bush Proud

“On Wednesday, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke marked Native American Heritage Month by participating in #RockYourMocs. Zinke ditched the traditional dress shoe usually seen around the Capitol for a pair of moccasins. While former President George H.W. Bush may be well known for his incredible sock game, what the interior secretary sported underneath his moccasins proved Bush isn't alone in his love for fashionable feet accessories...Zinke also offered a statement of remembrance of Native American Veteran Michael Bell and was given a quilt his family made as a gift. Teen Vogue reported that some people took umbrage at Zinke's decision to wear moccasins, but the Bureau of Indian Affairs thanked the secretary on Twitter for celebrating with them. The tweet added they were “honored” to gather around the quilt with him as he remembered Bell.”

Many attendees walked past roughly 40 sign-waving protesters at Two Rivers Convention Center. Grand Junction's Petroleum and Mining Club hosted MacGregor, who delivered the speech, “The Department of the Interior's Role in Energy Dominance.”...MacGregor said the Department of Interior aims to streamline planning and permitting of leases, reduce the regulatory burdens, support and improve pipeline development and improve trust with local, state and tribal partners.”

New York Times: Trump Administration to Lift Ban on ‘Trophy’ Elephant Imports

“The Trump administration will begin allowing hunters to bring into the United States “trophy” elephants killed in Zimbabwe, reversing a 2014 ban on a practice that has received intense scrutiny in recent years. Though African elephants are protected under the Endangered Species Act, the law allows the United States Fish and Wildlife Service to authorize imports of trophies if the agency finds that the hunts in which the animals were killed contribute to the survival of the species. The United States banned such imports from Zimbabwe in 2014 because of a lack of data on conservation efforts there. Now the United States agency says it is satisfied with Zimbabwe’s actions and believes such hunts can be beneficial for the species by bringing money to local communities and providing incentives to conserve elephants. “Since our 2014 and 2015 findings, there are strong indications that the efforts of private landowners and consortiums to manage elephants within their areas of control have received greater support,” the federal agency said in a notice to be published in the Federal Register on Friday.”

- USFWS Statement: “Legal, well-regulated sport hunting as part of a sound management program can benefit certain species by providing incentives to local communities to conserve those species and by putting much-needed revenue back into conservation. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has determined that the hunting and management programs for African elephants in Zimbabwe and Zambia will enhance the survival of the species in the wild. These enhancement findings are required prior to allowing import of these trophies under Endangered Species Act regulations. The finding applies to elephants hunted in Zimbabwe on or after January 21, 2016, and on or before December 31, 2018, and to elephants hunted in Zambia during calendar years 2016, 2017 and 2018, for applications that meet all other applicable permitting requirements.”

“Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has failed to keep complete records — and in some cases, kept none at all — of his travel since taking office, the agency’s watchdog told department officials this week, saying that management of Zinke’s travel was “deficient” and lacked oversight. A rare alert Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall sent to the secretary’s office Wednesday, obtained by The Washington Post, said her investigation into allegations of improper travel practices by Zinke has been stymied by “absent or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips.” Interior lawyers and ethics officials also have not shown evidence to investigators that they have been able to “distinguish between personal, political and official travel” or cost-analysis documents to justify his choice of military or charter flights, Kendall wrote. The memo reveals that the inspector general is also scrutinizing the travel of Zinke’s wife, Lolita, who often accompanied him on official trips. Kendall wrote that the department's documentation was so lacking that investigators cannot determine "the full extent" of her travel and how it was paid for."

"Federal officials say they don't have to provide an Idaho environmental law firm with documents possibly outlining legal justifications for President Donald Trump to shrink national monuments because they're protected communications. The U.S. Department of Justice on Wednesday asked a federal judge to dismiss the lawsuit from Advocates for the West. The environmental law firm filed a public records request for documents on the national monuments earlier this year, and the Justice Department released more than 60 pages in May. The agency withheld 12 pages, however, contending that they are protected under attorney-client privilege and intra-agency communication rules."

"Wildfires in the U.S. were brutal last summer, scorching more than 8.8 million acres and cloaking the Pacific Northwest in smoke and ash. In California alone, more than 40 people died and 8,400 buildings were destroyed in the deadliest wildfires in the state's history. Things may only get worse in years to come... But aerial drones may help save the day. From tiny quadcopters to big fixed-wing aircraft, drones are showing that they can detect, contain and even extinguish fires faster and with greater safety. They give firefighters a bird's-eye view of the terrain and help them determine where a fire will spread — so they can make swift decisions about where fire crews should go and which residents need to be evacuated."

Children from more than 20 schools in the District of Columbia, Maryland and Virginia attended the festivities on the South Lawn, along with military families and members of unspecified community organizations. Spooky music played over loudspeakers. Machines cranked out fog. Pumpkins carved with the likenesses of past presidents decorated the south entrance of the White House. Augusta Free Press \(VA\): Kaine, colleagues urge Trump to rescind proposed national park fee increase

“U.S. Senator Tim Kaine (D-VA) joined Senator Maria Cantwell (D-WA) and nine other colleagues in a letter to Secretary of Interior Ryan Zinke requesting he withdraw his proposal to dramatically increase national park entrance fees at 17 national parks pending further review. According to the proposal, Shenandoah National Park visitor fees would increase dramatically from $25 to $70 per vehicle during peak season.”

TALKING POINTS

- Secretary Zinke has spoken at length about addressing the deferred maintenance problem at our National Parks, and this will require a new approach.
- Our parks face an $11 billion maintenance backlog and need serious improvements to infrastructure if they are to accommodate visitors.
- The higher fees would go directly into funding these infrastructure improvements; in lieu of indiscriminately imposing a tax on the American people, the fee increase represents a free market solution that relies on the citizenry's voluntary use of the parks to fund the sites' future.

Politico: Watchdog urges probe of whether Zinke campaign benefited friend, family

“Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke’s congressional campaign committee bought an RV from his wife then sold it to a friend a year later at a steep discount, a watchdog group said in a Federal Election Commission complaint that alleges an illegal scheme to convert political donations into personal cash. The June RV sale is one of several transactions the Campaign Legal Center says may have provided illegal benefits to Zinke’s family or friends. The group also cites hotel stays in the Virgin Islands and New York that Zinke’s campaign paid for after the Montana Republican was tapped to join then-President-elect Donald Trump’s Cabinet, as well as catering expenses the campaign incurred after Zinke was confirmed. CLC also says in the complaint that Zinke may have relied on a joint fundraising committee to allow donors to give money to his campaign above federal contribution limits.”

Wall Street Journal: FBI Is Probing Puerto Rico Power Contract

“The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating a decision by Puerto Rico’s power authority to award a $300 million contract to a tiny Montana energy firm to rebuild electrical infrastructure damaged in Hurricane Maria, according to people familiar with the matter. Agents from the FBI’s San Juan field office are looking into circumstances surrounding the deal that the public power monopoly known as Prepa signed with Whitefish Energy Holdings LLC, according to the people familiar with the matter. Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló canceled the contract Sunday, saying it had become a distraction from the U.S. territory’s efforts to restore the devastated grid. Only 30% of the island’s power customers have had electricity restored.”

Bloomberg: Arctic Refuge Oil Bonanza More Likely to Be Bust for GOP Budget

“Congressional Republicans counting on a $1 billion windfall from selling oil-drilling rights in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to help pay for tax cuts may be in for a disappointment. Data from previous Arctic oil lease sales suggest the U.S. is likely to collect less than a fifth of that billion-dollar goal over the next decade-- about $145.5 million -- from auctioning off territory in the sprawling northeast Alaska refuge where caribou calve and polar bears roam. Oil companies may be scared away by the controversies and costs of drilling in that remote and fragile terrain. Even if they aren’t, crude prices would have to be some $15 more per barrel than they are today to make the effort pay off at all.”

Palm Beach Post: Gov. Scott proposes additional $50 million for Lake O dike

“Gov. Rick Scott is proposing an additional $50 million to expedite repairs to the Herbert Hoover Dike that surrounds Lake Okeechobee. The announcement this morning comes as the lake once again tops 17 feet above sea level, a depth that causes concerns about the integrity of the aging structure. Scott said the $50 million is part of his 2018-2019 recommended budget and is on top of the $50 million approved in the current year’s budget to kick-start repairs. Florida Senate President Joe Negron, R-Stuart, and House Speaker Richard Corcoran, R-Land O’Lakes, lauded the announcement.”

Anxious to remake the federal government, the Trump administration is cracking down on employees who break the rules, taking action in some instances in disciplinary cases that had languished under former president Barack Obama.

The White House in April instructed agencies to “remove poor performers” as they construct plans to shrink the workforce as part of a federal downsizing. Trump vowed during the campaign to shake up a government awash in “waste, fraud and abuse” — and the new administration has been vocal about its strategy.

Budget director Mick Mulvaney laid out detailed mandates to ensure that poor conduct be handled swiftly and poor performers monitored closely or given “appropriate discipline.”

After years criticizing the Obama administration for going easy on cases involving problem employees, Republicans are taking a hard line against misconduct at several troubled agencies.

[Trump’s hard-line plan for government workers]Veterans Affairs, still recovering from criticism in 2014 that employee misconduct led to manipulated patient waiting lists at its medical centers, in July began publishing disciplinary actions online, including 525 firings since Trump took office. With 350,000 employees, VA in June became the model for a broader job protections shake-up sought by conservatives when Trump signed a bill creating a quick path for VA Secretary David Shulkin to fire employees who fail to meet conduct or performance standards.

At Homeland Security, the inspector general is conducting an agencywide review of misconduct actions. Employees were asked in a July survey whether the sprawling department created after the 9/11 attacks has “sufficient processes and procedures to address conduct issues.”

Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross is asking career officials at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to explain how they have handled improper time and attendance reporting, an agency official familiar with the inquiry said. Investigators and congressional Republicans say the problems related to time and attendance tracking have gone unaddressed for years.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has vowed zero tolerance for sexual harassers. This month the Yellowstone National Park superintendent went public with disciplinary actions he is taking against a dozen employees involved in a harassment case.

[Congress clears Trump-backed bill to fast-track firing of VA workers]

But in its efforts to fulfill the president’s campaign promise to “drain the swamp” of entrenched federal workers, the new political leadership in Washington is meeting resistance from powerful federal employee unions and finding that maneuvering around long-guaranteed civil service protections is not easy.

This month an administrative board ordered a stay of the firing of the former director of the VA Medical Center in Washington, who had been removed from his post to an administrative job in April. An inspector general's probe found that patient health was endangered by managerial dysfunction. Brian Hawkins was fired for a "failure to provide effective leadership," VA officials said. He claimed wrongful termination and is back at work while his case is independently reviewed. In a test of the new law, which offers fewer protections for employees, Shulkin plans to remove Hawkins again based on another inspector general's investigation, VA officials said. That inquiry found that he violated agency rules by sharing sensitive information about employees with his wife on their personal email accounts. Hawkins did not respond to a request for comment.

Even cases that Trump officials inherited from the Obama administration have been challenging. The Census Bureau took over litigation that sprang from an inspector general's findings two years ago that employees in its hiring office gamed the system to improperly collect $1.1 million in salaries. It is still unresolved, an agency spokesman said.

A case now playing out at the Patent and Trademark Office shows the complexities of carrying out Trump's mandate.

After a three-year investigation, the office has moved recently to fire or suspend 18 of about two dozen employees in a clerical support unit that docket trademark applications, according to current and former agency staff and other government officials familiar with the case. One worker has been fired.

Agency officials conducted an internal inquiry whose findings were shared with The Washington Post, showing that the employees improperly charged the government hundreds of thousands of dollars over several years. In the most egregious cases, officials found that some employees worked two hours a day but billed taxpayers for eight, plus two more overtime hours.

A union official denied any impropriety, saying his members "were available to work" but often finished their tasks quickly and awaited more assignments, a practice that went on for as long as a decade.

"My employees are not in the wrong," said Harold Ross, president of Local 243 of the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents the unit. "They produce fast. They're available for the whole time. All of a sudden, management wants to come against them."

Patent office spokesman Paul Rosenthal said in an email the agency does not comment on specific personnel cases.

"More broadly, the USPTO has always taken its time and attendance policies seriously," he wrote. "Employees must accurately record their time worked. And the overwhelming majority of our employees do just that. But employees who falsify their work records or work hours . . . will continue to be held accountable."

In another sign of the Trump administration's efforts to more forcefully address employee misconduct, Rosenthal cited an agreement — signed by the union representing patent examiners — to allow supervisors to monitor staff work habits with tracking software that indicates whether employees are at their computers. Labor had resisted these changes, which the union signed the day before Trump took office.

Timecard abuse has been documented over several years in reports by the inspector general at the Commerce Department, the patent office's parent agency. The office has been praised for its flexible work hours and telework policies.

[Patent office workers costs taxpayers millions by playing hooky, watchdog finds]

The Post reported in 2014 that an internal investigation found patent examiners repeatedly misrepresented their hours and received unsubstantiated overtime pay and bonuses. Top agency officials removed the most damaging revelations from material turned over to the inspector general, documents provided to The Post showed. Commerce officials said the material was in draft form.

At the time, Obama officials pledged to hold employees accountable. But critics said few patent examiners were punished or paid restitution.

Commerce's then-acting inspector general, Dave Smith, opened an investigation into the trademark employees, according to government sources. But top patent officials prevailed after asking that they be allowed to conduct their own inquiry.

Last fall, Smith released a computer analysis showing discrepancies between the time claimed by patent examiners and hours worked. But privacy laws prevented the agency from acting against 415 employees identified as the worst offenders. Under a new law, management is allowed to pursue administrative or criminal enforcement in such cases. It is unclear if the patent office plans to act.

Republicans' frustration with patent officials and the unions boiled over at a House hearing in December after Trump's election. Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee's panel on government operations, dressed down the agency's No. 2 Obama appointee, Russell Slifer, and the head of the patent examiners' union for tolerating abuses.

The agency had long suspected timecard abuses in the trademark division, where jobs have been outpaced by automation. But managers could not document it until 2013, when they installed tracking software.

"We had never seen anything like it," recalled Bill House, who retired in 2015 from the employee relations office, which investigates misconduct. The number of cases, the money allegedly bilked and the hours the employees spent not working "was so bad they pulled other [employee relations] specialists to work on it," House recalled.

The treasury employees union is fighting the proposed discipline, said union and management officials who requested anonymity to discuss the subject. An arbitrator is scheduled in October to hear the first case, of the sole employee who has been fired.

Tim Hannapel, the NTEU's national counsel, said the tracking software detects only part of the work employees are asked to do — tasks that include emails, phone calls, and monitoring rules and regulations.

The union has turned down management's offers to allow employees to resign with clean records if they reimburse taxpayers for unearned compensation, according to union officials and others familiar with the discussions. The employees, who are paid $59,693 annually on average, remain on the payroll.

The NTEU also is alleging disparate racial treatment because almost all of the employees are black. The union says relatively few higher-paid white patent examiners have been disciplined for similar misconduct claims. The agency did not comment on the settlement negotiations or the discrimination claim.

“They turned a blind eye to the other employees,” Ross, the local union president, said of patent examiners.

Slifer, now an intellectual-property attorney in Boise, Idaho, said that when he and the unions worked together to respond to Congress's accountability requests, it was clear that the relationship with the Trump administration would be different.

“The recognition that having a GOP majority in Congress and in the White House certainly put the unions on notice that they don't necessarily enjoy the same support from Republicans as they have from Democrats,” he said.

He said employee accountability is more complicated than saying “if someone isn't putting in their 80 hours [every two weeks] they need to be canned. It is important that you provide all employees due process and make sure they understand their responsibilities.”

Conservationists slammed Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke today for traveling overseas ahead of the deadline for his review of dozens of national monuments, noting that the Trump administration official has visited less than a third of the sites under evaluation.

The Center for Western Priorities pointed to a photograph published today by Zinke's wife, Lola Zinke, on her Twitter account, which shows the couple at sunrise along Turkey's Bosphorus.

Several hours later, Lola Zinke published another photo of herself with the tags "Happiness #Mykonos," possibly referring to the Greek island in the Aegean Sea.

The Interior Department did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Zinke's whereabouts, although a spokeswoman stated last week that the secretary could not be reached at that time as he celebrated his 25th wedding anniversary.

Zinke is scheduled to submit his final recommendations for potential reductions or even elimination of dozens of national monuments to President Trump next week.

The president ordered an assessment in late April of all national monuments created since 1996 that encompass more than 100,000 acres of land or sea.

"Our national monuments are full of beautiful places to take a summer trip. Secretary Zinke promised a rigorous analysis of national monuments, but what the American public got was a sham review and a foreign vacation," Center for Western Priorities Deputy Director Greg Zimmerman said.

He added, "If he bothered to listen, Secretary Zinke would have found that national monuments are cornerstones of Western economies, that they protect exceptional and unique lands, and, most of all, that virtually no Americans support eliminating national monuments. I worry, instead, he's moving to permanently shut down national monuments."

While Zinke has granted reprieves to six monuments to date — announcing yesterday that California's Sand to Snow National Monument would remain unchanged — and called for significant reductions to Utah's Bears Ears National Monument, he has yet to comment on the other 20 monuments under review (E&E News PM, Aug. 16).

Although the secretary has traveled across the country during the 3½ month review, he has visited eight of the 27 monuments included in his assessment. His stops have included Utah's Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante, Nevada's Gold Butte and Basin and Range, New Mexico's Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks, Maine's Katahdin Woods and Waters, Oregon's Cascade-Siskiyou, and the Atlantic Ocean's Northeast Canyons and Seamounts Marine national monuments.

Notably, he has not made official visits to any of the sites he has excused from the review to date, although his staff notes that he was familiar with the Upper Missouri River Breaks National Monument in Montana as a native and a former House lawmaker of the state.

Green Beret John Wayne Walding lost his leg while searching for insurgents in Afghanistan's Shok Valley in 2008 and faced something he never thought he could—the word “can’t”—he said during a speech at the Department of Interior on Thursday.

It was a bitter pill for the twenty-something Texan who believed he could do anything he put his mind to.

Walding spoke of “that sadness [that] would creep into your mind” from not having the ability to walk. “If I can’t even do that, how am I going to be a man and raise my wife and kids?” he wondered. “April 6, 2008, was the day I learned ‘can’t.’”

It was not until he was invited on a ten-day grizzly bear-hunting trip in Alaska that he was reintroduced to the word “can” — and it changed his life, he said.

“Thank God that I had the courage to say ‘yes,’” he said. “It was the most, just absolute catalyst into my recovery, right? Once that happened, it got the hamster back on the wheel.”

He would go on to run the Army Ten Miler and other races and become the first prosthetic-limbed soldier to graduate the Special Forces Sniper Court.

Walding was one of the veterans at the Interior Department on Thursday for a gathering of veterans, hunting, and wildlife groups meeting to discuss how to improve access for hunting and fishing for veterans, particularly wounded warriors and those with PTSD.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke — himself a retired Navy SEAL veteran, the father of a Navy diver, and father-in-law to a Navy SEAL — hosted the gathering to kickstart the initiative, one of his big priorities at the department.

Speaking to the group of several dozen, he noted that today's veterans spend their entire careers at war, noting that his son-in-law has deployed more than ten times.

“Our veterans are spending more time overseas than they are at home. And it has an effect on the VA. It has an effect on communities because normal has become over there, rather than over here, so I'm concerned about the experience when they come home that our public lands are once again returned to the people,” he said.

But throughout the years, Zinke said there has been a rollback of access to the nation's wilderness for hunters and fishers, which he aims to reverse.

“Hunting and fishing is part of our legacy. And a lot of veterans are part of our hunting and fishing experience, and I am concerned that we've seen a lack of access, roads being closed, the wilderness, even,” he said.

“Some wildernesses have become more restrictive. Access is becoming harder and harder to find,” he said. “So we’ve done a pivot within Interior. My priority is to return the public lands to the public and make sure we have access and make sure that hunting and fishing is a part of our legacy.”

The Interior Department manages one-fifth of land in the United States, including national parks, recreation areas, wildlife refuges, and other public lands used for hunting, fishing, and recreation.

“We’re introducing a great concept called Pinchot,” he said, named after conservationist Gifford Pinchot, who believed in using “best science and best practices for the greatest good for the longest term.”

“That is the American conservation ethic that I grew up with, and that is the American conservation ethic Interior is now prescribing to,” he said. “Veterans play an enormous role in that.”

Zinke also noted the Interior Department’s roots in the military, noting that the department came out of the Department of War in 1849, which is why the Interior secretary has a flag.

“That is tradition, and that is honoring tradition of those who came before me,” he said. Zinke said he looked at things within his secretarial power that he could do.

Don Peay, founder of Sportsman for Fish and Wildlife, also addressed the group, talking about helping veterans find peace after coming home in the outdoors.

He spoke about Marine Lance Corporal Chance Russell Phelps, who was killed on April 9, 2004, and about whom the movie Taking Chance is based. Peay said Phelps loved to hunt, and his father told him that restrictive Interior policies have destroyed what they loved.

Peay also thanked veterans for their service: “If you’re not willing to stand for our flag, get the hell out of America. Without all of you, we have no freedom.”

Mark “Oz” Geist, a Marine veteran and member of the security team that fought the Battle of Benghazi, also spoke to the group about his own experience growing up hunting in eastern Colorado.

“Hunting, open spaces...we know how much that means to us and our veterans,” he said. “It’s those open spaces that are so important.”

Rick Cicero, a double amputee and one of the founders of Honored American Veterans Afield’s Learn to Shoot Again program, discussed with Breitbart News the healing impact for wounded warriors when they go out fishing and hunting.

“How can we get more opportunities to take these guys out and show them the blessings that they still have? Get rid of that C-A-N-T word and make it the C-A-N word that it’s meant to be,” said Cicero, a communications and intelligence specialist assigned to Special Forces.

Other veterans and representatives at the meeting included:

Matthew Shuman, American Legion; Ron Regan, Association of Fish & Wildlife Agencies; Keith Tidball, Cornell University; Tom Kilgannon, Freedom Alliance; David Hagner, Freedom Alliance; Anthony Pace, Freedom Hunters; Tom Deoudes, Freedom Hunters; Jim Hazlett, Freedom Hunters; Brian Gliba, Freedom Hunters; Dan Theole, Freedom Hunters; Cathleen Pearl, Got Your 6; Brandon Eden, NASA; Tom Taylor, Honored American Veterans Afield; Sandy Sandberg, Honoring Our Veterans; Tom Porter, Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America; Susan LaPierre, National Park Foundation; Chris Cox, National Rifle Association Institute for Legislative Action; Graham Hill, National Rifle Association; Mark Oliva, National Sports Shooting Foundation; Larry Thueme, Operation Injured Soldiers; Kevin Stone, Operation Injured Soldiers – Veteran; David Folkerts, Project Healing Waters; and Amy Simon, Rivers of Recovery

October 13, 2017

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke on Friday announced a plan to combat sexual harassment, bullying and intimidation of employees within America's national parks system and to hold managers accountable if inappropriate behavior is ignored.

The plan aims to change an embedded culture that Zinke said has allowed senior officials to downplay or stonewall complaints from mostly female workers of being physically threatened, propositioned for sex and inappropriately touched.

"Under my leadership we're going to hold people accountable," Zinke announced during a visit to the National Park Service's Grand Canyon headquarters. "We're also fixing the problem of victims being afraid of retaliation or inaction by codifying the right of victims to report abuse to any manager at any location across the service, and by bringing on an independent investigative partner."

Zinke's announcement comes as the entertainment industry and other businesses are roiled by resignations of high-profile figures in harassment scandals, such as movie titan Harvey Weinstein and Uber Technologies Chief Executive Officer Travis Kalanick, who allegedly fostered a "men's club" work environment that tolerated abuse and exploitation of women.

The announcement follows a series of investigations and congressional hearings into allegations of hostile work environments and sordid incidents that a year ago led to the resignations of several senior Park Service officials, including the superintendents of Yosemite and Grand Canyon.

Zinke's plan will strengthen the agency's ability to investigate and address harassment complaints by adding 14 employees to its labor relations and ethics staffs. It will also expand training to support harassment prevention efforts.

The results of a recent survey of about half of all Park Service employees underlined the problem: The agency has failed to shield its employees from work environments that, in some cases, included routine groping.

The survey found that about 10% of those surveyed reported experiencing sexual harassment in the last 12 months. About 38% of employees reported experiencing some form of harassment over the same time period.

Stories of Park Service employees being preyed upon by men in positions of authority, agency critics say, have circulated for years within the agency that likes to project a lofty image of itself as caretaker of America's natural treasures.

Until recently, critics say, most harassment cases were handled internally, with managers sweeping the allegations under the rug, or handing down minimal penalties.

“This is the fourth declaration of zero tolerance of sexual harassment we’ve heard from the Interior Department in the past three years alone,” Jeff Ruch, executive director of the advocacy group Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. “The problem is that people at the highest levels never wind up facing consequences. Instead, they tend to kick troublemakers upstairs, or offer them the option of resignation.”

For example, Ruch’s group cites a female staffer’s complaints of unwanted hugs, lingering handshakes and inappropriate comments from Jorge Acevedo, superintendent of De Soto National Memorial in Florida. The complaints prompted an Interior Office of Inspector General investigation.

Acevedo, whom the woman also accused of lying prone on her desk while she tried to work, was transferred in April to a new position as manager of a complex of small parks in Alabama at his previous salary. He also received a $1,000 performance bonus, according to an Interior Office of Inspector General report the advocacy group obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

“If, as the Park Service claims there is zero tolerance, then why aren’t these firing offenses?” Ruch said.

The harassment allegations erupted last year, after the disclosure of an inspector general’s investigation prompted by a 2014 letter to then Interior Secretary Sally Jewell from 13 current and former female employees. The women alleged that their complaints — of being threatened and inappropriately touched and photographed by boatmen in charge of educational floats along the Colorado River — had not been addressed.

Congressional hearings led to the removal of David Uberuaga, superintendent of Grand Canyon National Park, and Myrna Palfrey, superintendent of Canaveral National Seashore in Florida, for their failure to appropriately handle such accusations.

The hearings also prompted Don Neubacher to retire in 2016 as superintendent of Yosemite National Park, where employees had complained of a systematic failure to investigate and address allegations of harassment at the California landmark renowned for its majestic waterfalls, granite ridges and serene valleys.

A few weeks later, his wife, Patty Neubacher, deputy regional manager for the Park Service’s Pacific West Region, which covers 56 national parks in six states, stepped down amid allegations that she used her position to protect her husband during the harassment scandal.

Transcript Below:

SECRETARY RYAN ZINKE: Thanks, Mike. What a beautiful day, as it was that fateful morning. We all remember 9/11 somewhat differently, for me, I was a seal instructor in Coronado. And on that fateful morning, I knew that our country would be forever changed. Now, as I was with the cabinet members on Saturday looking at hurricane Irma, and planning the recovery of Harvey and looking at the forest fires in west, the Vice President and I had a conversation about his experience as he was standing on the steps of our nation's capital. The heroism and courage of the 40 passengers and crew is special because it was their actions that protected our nation. I have fought in a lot of battles in my life and truly, their fight was worth fighting for. I'm grateful for this Vice President because he has continued the fight against evil. His family has continued the fight against evil. His son is a first marine, or a first lieutenant, in the marine corp. trained to be a pilot. His father who fought in Korea as second lieutenant in the United States army, earned a bronze star and I'm convinced from his father that the Vice President learned that not only must you fight, but you must win. So this morning it is my high honor to introduce a man that I've gotten to know as a great man of conviction and character, of faith, a man who loves his country, loves the people that are in it and also understands that evil cannot win. Evil cannot break the spirit of our great nation, and so with that is my high honor to introduce the Vice President of the United States of America Mike Pence.

VICE PRESIDENT MIKE PENCE: Governor and Secretary, Congressmen, Superintendent Clark and distinguished guests, but most of all family members of the heroes who perished in this very field. Reverend Britain, and all of those who join us and look on today. We are deeply humbled to join you on this most solemn of days, at this flight 93 memorial annual remembrance ceremony at this common field one day. That became a field of honor forever. President trump asked me to be here to pay a debt of honor to the 40 heroes of flight 93. To all the fallen and their families. And to the generation of heroes they inspired. And to tell you, that his heart is here in Pennsylvania, especially with all of you who have lost loved ones 16 years ago. Our President observed this day of remembrance at the Pentagon memorial where moments ago he paid tribute to the 184 men and women that lost their lives there. All of our hearts are with the families of the 2753 men and women, their families who lost their lives at the world trade center in New York City. As the president said just moments ago, we grieve with every family of the innocent souls who were murdered by terrorists that day, and we will never forget what happened on September 11th, 2001. Today, we pause as a nation not so much to remember tragedy as to celebrate heroism and patriotism, but permit me to say that on this day, as Gordy said before our hearts and prayers are with our fellow Americans in Florida and throughout the region, who suffered loss in the winds and waters of hurricane Irma. At this very hour, first responders and new citizen heroes are being forged among the people of Florida, and as the president has said, and I say again, to those affected by hurricane Irma we're with you and we'll stay with you and be with you every day after this tempest passes to restore, recover and rebuild.

Everyone remembered where they were on this day 16 years ago. A mom rousing her children to get ready for school. A farmer wrapping up the morning chores, a coal miner finishing the third shift and heading home. As a new member of congress, I was going through my normal workday routine at the United States Capital. When I learned of the attacks in New York City and at the pentagon, I will always remember the scenes of that day. Watching the capital complex being evacuated. It was as though the building was literally hemorrhaging with people running in every direction. I found myself just across the street from the U.S. capital eventually on the top floor of the headquarters of the capitol police chief. I was there with leaders of the house and senate. Shortly after I arrived, the chief-of-police set the phone back down and informed the leaders gathered there that there was a plane in bound to the capital and said it was 12 minutes out. In that moment the room became silent, and as people began to make plans, I found myself looking out the window. Where just across the street was the capitol dome with that majestic statue of freedom standing a top it? A dome that's a symbol of the ideals of this nation of freedom and democracy for all the world. So we waited, it was longest 12 minutes of my life. But it turned to 13 minutes, Then 14, and then we were informed that the plane had gone down in a field in Pennsylvania. In the days ahead, like every American, we would learn the story of the 40 heroes of flight 93. Men and women who looked evil squarely in the eye and without regard to their personal safety they rushed forward to save lives. They were mothers and fathers, your brothers and sisters, sons and daughters of every walk of life and background. Marc Bingham was on his way to be an usher at a college friend's wedding. Flight attendant in the wake of a career in law enforcement. Lauren carried the spark of life within her. An unborn child three months along and Bill Cashman, a former army paratrooper had actually helped to build the world trade center with his own two hands, and there were so many others whose names we heard echo into the wind this morning.

They were ordinary people, but on that day they became extraordinary. We all know the story. Flight 39 took off at 8:42 departing to San Francisco, and 46 minutes later terrorists seized control and at 9:42 plane diverted to Washington D.C. and passengers called loved ones only to find out what was happening across the country. They learned what that the rest of America knew. The world trade center had been struck and the pentagon had been hit only a few minutes after they were hijacked. They figured out that the terrorists intended to use their plane for the same purpose. But as Tom Burnet told his wife on the phone, we're going to do something and they did. The men and women of flight 93 began to join together and they devised a plan in those short moment moments, they knew their objective. They not only plan but history records that they prayed. Together with Lisa Jefferson, a phone operator on the ground below, we are told they prayed the Lord's Prayer. And recited those ancient words though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil for thou art with me. At 9:57, after only 29 minutes, Todd Beamer spoke those words that America and the world will never forget. "Let's roll". They charged the cockpit and took hold of their fate and 6 minutes later at 10:03, flight 93 plummeted here to the earth. The brave men and women aboard sacrificed their lives for the country we call home. We gather here today because the men and women of flight 93 are heroes, and this beautiful memorial stands as a testament to the American people's undying reverence for their service and sacrifice. Each of their 40 names are etched into this marble. They're carved into the memory of the American people as well. Even as they are seared into the hearts of you that were left behind, the Bible tells us that the Lord is close to the broken-hearted and to the families of the fallen here, that will be our prayer for you today. You honor us by your presence. As the President said this morning, you honor our heroes, you renew our courage, and you strengthen us all.

Today, as a nation we mourn with you. We remember with you. And we are looking forward to the day when we will hear the chimes in this place, and the tower of voices will turn the whisper of the wind into a heroic call to action and it will remember them and echo across this field for generations to come. 93 feet that tower of voices that will be completed by this time next year will honor the heroes of flight 93 and that soaring structure will hold those 40 times each with a different musical note to symbolize the voices of the 40 men and women we remember today. The notes when played together, I'm told, will form a perfect harmony. Just as in their final moments the men and women of flight 93 worked together to defend freedom. The American people will forever be inspired by their courage and resolve. We honor them by remembering them and we honor them by ensuring that we do all in our power as a nation to prevent such evil from ever reaching our shores again. As President Trump has reminded us that we are in the midst of a war between good and evil. The first battle in that war took place in the skies above us and ended in this grassy meadow. We cannot handle this place beyond what the heroes of flight 93 have already done. When the plane went down the heroes on board were the first of a new generation of heroes to rise up as citizen soldiers in what's come to be known as the global war on terror. It is remarkable to think that in the wake of their service and sacrifice, America itself experienced a rebirth. A rebirth of unity and purpose and a rededication to our idea of freedom, and every day for 16 years their actions have inspired many more of our fellow citizens to stand up and step forward, and to follow in their heroic service. The President said today, America cannot be intimidated and in the aftermath of September 11th, we've seen tens of thousands of Americans step forward to serve their communities and protect our families and defend our freedom. They donned the uniform of first responders, firefighters, police officers and more than 5 million Americans have stepped forward to serve in the armed forces of the United States of America.

Since September 11th, these men and women turned a day of tragedy into a triumph of freedom as our nation rallied together and charged forward to meet the enemy on our terms on their soil. And we will always cherish the memory of the nearly 7,000 Americans who have given their lives on the field of battle since that day 16 years ago. Like the heroes of flight 93, we'll never forget their service, their sacrifice, or the families they left behind. But we must remind ourselves, on this solid day of remembrance, the threat remains and even now the menace of global terrorism brings violence across the wider world to places like London, and Paris, and Barcelona. ISIS continues to threaten against America and against our lives and all that cherish freedom, but under the leadership of President Donald Trump as our commander in chief, our armed forces have ISIS on the run in Iraq and Syria and we will not rest or relent until we hunt down and destroy them at their source. And we also do want to remember that the perpetrators of 9/11 organized and orchestrated their attacks from a safe haven of Afghanistan, and just a few short days ago, President Trump renewed our commitment to see the fight in Afghanistan through to an honorable and enduring outcome that will be worthy of the tremendous sacrifices that have been made. Some four weeks ago, President Trump expressed the full commitment to the United States to destroy terrorist organizations and the radical ideology that drives them and so we will. America will remain engaged in Afghanistan until we eliminate the terrorist threat to our homeland and our people once in for all. We've made great gains. Our resolve is stronger than ever and I promise you together as one nation and one people we will drive the cancer of terrorism from the face of the earth.

We fight because our families deserve to live in safety and security. We fight because our fallen heroes demand justice so as long as we have strength we'll honor their neighbors and the people they died to defend. I'm here on behalf of our President and all the American people to pay a debt of honor, a debt of honor to the heroes of flight 93, a debt of honor to a generation of heroes that followed their inspiring example in and out of uniform. At home and abroad, I'm also here to pay a debt of gratitude to the heroes of flight 93 on a much more personal basis. For their actions on that day in these skies saved American lives. And as my wife Karen, who joins me here today knows, it's a debt I don't think I'll ever be able to repay. Because among the many lives that were saved by their selfless courage, they might have well saved my own life that day.

16 years ago--You know this isn't our first time standing in this field here in Pennsylvania. Not more than a year after that fateful day, Karen and I brought our three small children here to this hallowed ground on a drive back from Washington to Indiana. That day we did not find this extraordinary memorial. We found only a makeshift memorial. No more than a plywood wall and a wooden cross in the field. It was that day with, the help of a park ranger, that I learned personally the sequence of that event that day. I asked her if the U.S. Capitol was in fact the target. What time have the plane have reached the capital building? And what she told me I'll never forget...I will always believe that I and many others in our nation's capital were able to go home that day to hug our families because of the courage and selflessness of flight 93.

So I speak on behalf of the grateful nation. Thank you for giving me the privilege of speaking on behalf of my little family as well. When heroes fall, the nation mourns. For no greater love is a man than this that he's laid down his life for his friends. To the families of the fallen, as President Trump promised this morning I would say the memory of your loved ones will never die. They will always be with us. Their heroic story in our minds and hearts and enshrined in the memory of this country. As long as America endures, we will tell their story. And generations of Americans will ever be inspired by the faithful and courageous words and deeds of the heroes of flight 93. May God bless our beloved fallen. May God bless and comfort the families gathered here and all those that suffered loss on this day 16 years ago. And may God continue to bless the United States of America.

Daily Interlake-Editorial: SWAMP CRITTERS TARGET RYAN ZINKE, BUT I'M BETTING ON THE SEAL

December 16, 2017

If anything speaks authoritatively on the partisan mess that is Washington, D.C., it is the vilification of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, seemingly the left's favorite target after President Trump himself.

Just last week, former government ethics chief and serial Trump critic Walter Shaub made headlines when he called Zinke "the poster child for this lawless administration's misuse of governmental authority and resources."

Well, pardon my disbelief, but when Zinke was a member of the Montana Legislature, he was the "poster child" for moderate Republicans. In the preceding 30 years, he was also the "poster child" for over-achievers (He was a 4.0 student at Whitefish High School, as well as class president and football star). Later he was a "poster child" for military heroes, serving as a Navy SEAL in both Iraq wars, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Afghanistan. Then he was Montana's lone congressman, elected twice by the people who know him best.

Here at the Inter Lake, we got to know him as a state legislator, a local businessman, and even as a member of our editorial board for a brief tenure. In every instance, we saw in Ryan Zinke a willingness to look at both sides of an issue, but not to talk out of both sides of his mouth. He was plainspoken to the point of being brutally honest and he made it his personal mission to "restore trust in government."

It is therefore with considerable bewilderment that I have watched the Democratic establishment and the national media try to paint Zinke as some sort of Neanderthal jet-setter criss-crossing the country with a club in one hand and an arsonist's match in the other.

A lot of the issues raised about Secretary Zinke do seem to revolve around travel — taking charter flights on several occasions, bringing his wife with him on flights while he was traveling on official business, selling a campaign-related RV to a friend and fellow Republican at a favorable price. Really? Do you really think other Cabinet members have not used charter flights in the past? Besides, Zinke says that his office is spending less on noncommercial air travel than the previous two secretaries. What's wrong with that? As for the RV, it's up to buyer and seller what price a vehicle is worth. Zinke is not the first person to offer a friend a good deal on a vehicle.

How about this headline from Mother Jones magazine: "The Interior Department Is Giving Business to Secretary Zinke's Billionaire Pal." Wow! That's scandalous! Until you read the story and find out that the business amounted to three night's lodging at Whitefish Mountain Resort for 99 bucks a night. An Interior Department official needed a place to stay while attending the Western Governors Association meeting in Whitefish last June. Sure, Bill Foley, the majority owner of the resort, is a friend of Zinke, but who cares? Has Mother Jones ever been to Whitefish? It's a small world, and probably every hotel owner in the town of 5,000 people knows Zinke. And do we really think that Foley became Zinke's "pal" so that he could somehow get the corner on that $297 of hotel lodging income?

And we wonder why most Americans have no interest in running for office or serving in government! As for Lola Zinke traveling with her husband, why exactly should the Cabinet secretary's wife NOT travel with him? Considering all the stories coming out of D.C. about the antics of other men, we think it might be a good idea if more men in high office traveled with their wives.

Finally, the high crime that drove Walter Shaub crazy was that Zinke had retweeted a message from the House Natural Resources Committee about a squabble over President Trump's decision to shrink several national monuments.

As interior secretary, Zinke had recommended that Trump greatly reduce the size of the Bears Ears National Monument in Utah, among others. The outdoor retailer Patagonia took offense at this move, and sent out an online message that "The President Stole Your Land." Zinke told reporters the claim was "nefarious, false and a lie." He also retweeted the House committee's claim that "Patagonia Is Lying To You."

Shaub said, Zinke had "misused his official position by re-tweeting this wildly inappropriate tweet," and that his "thuggish interference with a business is outside the scope of his duties," suggesting that Patagonia should sue him for libel.

Well, sorry, but if Patagonia wants to engage in a debate about public policy, they had better be prepared for a fight. We know Ryan Zinke is, and we suspect he is better armed.

Anchorage \(AK\) Daily News: Trump's Interior secretary talks about administration's Alaska plans and priorities

Nathaniel Herz

December 22, 2017

WASHINGTON — From this office overlooking the National Mall with its crackling fire and snarling stuffed brown bear, U.S. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke is helping determine the fate of some Alaskans' most coveted projects — from oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to the proposed road between the communities of King Cove and Cold Bay on the Alaska Peninsula.

In a 40-minute interview last week, Zinke laid out his views on Alaska issues and offered hints at how the Trump administration will press its priorities in the state, simultaneously pledging to reinvigorate fossil fuel production on federal lands and to promote conservation and recreation.

"I don't think it's a tradeoff. I've heard this argument before: 'Well, you can either do this or you can do this,' " Zinke said. "It's called multiple use."

Since the federal government owns more than half the land in Alaska, Zinke can be thought of as something like a landlord. The Interior Department oversees Alaska's national parks, guides onshore and offshore oil drilling on federal lands and in federal waters and, through its Bureau of Indian Affairs, is the federal government's liaison to Alaska Native tribal groups.

Earlier this year, on his first trip to Alaska, Zinke pledged to reverse Obama-era restrictions and reinvigorate the state's oil industry, drawing praise from political and industry leaders.

But that pledge has yet to be fully translated into concrete policy, leaving groups with a stake in Interior Department policy — from oil companies to conservation organizations — waiting to see just how Zinke proceeds on some of the state's most contentious federal issues.

Zinke rode into his first day on the job on horseback, offering a change of course from Obama's last interior secretary, former REI chief executive Sally Jewell.

A former Montana congressman, Navy SEAL and Boy Scout, Zinke reveres Teddy Roosevelt — there's a bust next to his fireplace and a portrait above. But Zinke describes his own battles as different from those faced by the Rough Rider.

That former president, Zinke said, fought to preserve public lands for public use, not "special interests" like timber barons. But today, Zinke's foes are conservation groups and companies like Patagonia, which sued Trump over the administration's move to shrink a pair of national monuments in Utah.

"Special interests now, in many cases, are those that want to keep you off the land — that want to make it wilderness and wilderness only and restrict the American public from using the land," Zinke said. "Not everyone can afford to spend five days hunting. So there's a lot of Americans that enjoy our public lands on the weekend, right? And that requires access. That requires roads, in many cases. There's a lot of Americans that are disabled — veterans that I know. They're not able to hike seven ranges in."

Family history

Zinke's wife, Lola, once lived in Anchorage, where she worked at the Lucky Wishbone restaurant. Ryan Zinke, meanwhile, said he did military exercises in Alaska in the 1980s, from Kodiak out to the western end of the Aleutian Islands.

He said there's "really about four issues" in Alaska — two of which are well known.

One is the proposed road that would run 30 miles between the villages of King Cove and Cold Bay, on the Alaska Peninsula. It's long been a priority of the state's Republican congressional delegation.

"King Cove, we're working on it," said Zinke, who brought up the project himself before a reporter could ask about it. "Everyone knows about it. King Cove is on the map."

King Cove residents say the road would give them easier access to Cold Bay's jet runway for medical evacuations. But conservation groups have fought the proposal because about half the route would run through the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge.

Zinke wouldn't specify whether the department's next step to advance the project would be announced soon, instead saying: "The winds are very favorable."

Zinke's other high-profile priority is boosting oil production on the North Slope.

The Arctic National Wildlife Refuge's coastal plain has long been a battleground for conservation groups and pro-development politicians. And the Interior Department will ultimately be charged with guiding leasing and oil development there, assuming the GOP tax plan is approved.

Zinke downplayed environmental concerns about drilling in the refuge, saying the proposal on the table is limited to the coastal plain, known as the 1002 area, which makes up some 8 percent of the refuge's area.

"It's really Alaska 1002, and not the expanse of all ANWR," Zinke said.

But development there is still years away, since oil infrastructure inside the refuge hasn't been built yet.

Near-term prospects for production are far better in the Indiana-sized National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska, where the first project went online in 2015.

Zinke has ordered a review of an Obama-era plan that placed about half the reserve off-limits to drilling. That plan also doubled the size of a protected area around Teshekpuk Lake, in the reserve's northeastern corner.

The lake, and nearby land, is key caribou habitat, and it's also visited by birds that come from all seven continents. But it's also close to new oil discoveries, sparking industry interest in the area — which in turn has prompted fears from environmentalists that the Trump administration could try to roll back protections there.

Zinke wouldn't directly address his department's plans for revisiting the reserve's management plan. But he acknowledged that "not everywhere" in NPR-A is appropriate for oil and gas production.

"The area is so large, people tend to paint it with this big brush — they paint it as if it's monolithic," Zinke said. He added: "There are lakes, there are sensitive areas where even though it resides in the petroleum reserve, it is not appropriate under the current technology to drill."

One solution to that problem, Zinke said, could be the use of technology that allows oil companies to drill horizontally.

Help for Alaska Natives, land surveys

Two other, lower-profile issues are also at the top of Zinke's Alaska agenda, he said.

One, he said, is the 2,800 Alaska Natives who missed out on applying for Native land allotments while serving in the Vietnam War era — a problem that's long been a focus for the state's congressional delegation.

The other has to do with surveys of land that's being transferred to the state by the federal government, dating back to when Alaska first became a state. About one-third of the 106 million acres that the Bureau of Land Management has been in the process of transferring was still unsurveyed as of last year, and state officials were feuding with the Obama administration over how to more quickly finish the job.

Zinke said the solution could be in drones — and in the two sides' willingness to agree on a method to use them.

"The accuracy is plus or minus a couple of centimeters," he said. "I don't think it will take a fleet, even though Alaska is enormously large."

Meanwhile, Zinke offered few specifics when it comes to the coastal Alaska communities endangered by rising sea levels.

Barack Obama visited Alaska as president in 2015, and his administration highlighted the plight of rural villages like Newtok and Shishmaref. Those places are facing threats of flooding and erosion amplified by rising sea levels and thawing permafrost, and critics have argued that Trump and Zinke are ignoring the problem.

Asked about the federal government's role in helping to relocate some of the villages — which could cost hundreds of millions of dollars — Zinke said the new administration wants to respond to the desires of individual communities, rather than impose policies from the top down.

"There's a role because we represent the tribes and Native Alaskans. We're their advocate," he said. But, he added: "What the specific solution is, I don't think anyone knows at the moment."

U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service: A tiny town hit hard by Irma September 17, 2017

Everglades City, Florida - Billy Snyder stood in mud-caked boots in his mud-caked living room, or what used to be his living room before Hurricane Irma roared in. "If we can save the stuff that's important to us, we can just close the doors and never come back in," he told the workers who had gathered around him. "We're just gonna demolish the whole house and rebuild, this time on stilts."

Half a dozen U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service (Service) personnel waited for his instructions: What to save, what to dump. It was actually pretty easy. Anything below three feet off the ground was a smelly, sodden mess, because that was the level at which Irma's storm surge dumped a deluge of stinky gray mud and swamp water that ran through and ruined his family's house.

But there was plenty to salvage that had survived above the storm surge mark: dishes, wine glasses, his wife Shannon's macramé hangings, his son's Little League trophies.

The Service personnel got busy, saving what they could, carrying the family's possessions to a safe, dry garage in the backyard, where it would wait for the Snyders to rebuild. What could not be saved, they loaded into big black trash bags and hauled them to the curb.

"Thanks a ton," Snyder told the crew. "I don't know how we would have done it without you." The sun got hotter. The trips got repetitious. The day had just started.

"It's the right thing to do"

Everglades City is a tiny town of 400-plus, south of Naples on the southern Gulf coast of Florida. Irma blasted through here on Sunday, Sept. 10, with 140 mph winds and a storm surge that has been reported between six and 10 feet high. According to news reports, Everglades City was one of the places that suffered the most from Irma's fury; most of the town was underwater at one point. Then the storm surge receded, and left the residents with the mother of all clean-up projects. Actually, not all that much blew away in Hurricane Irma. Instead, Irma made the residents do the work themselves, hauling their ruined possessions out into their front yards and dumping them next to the street.

Even before Irma hit, the Service had set up an Incident Command team, a structure used to more effectively coordinate efforts in an emergency, and decided to send three task forces to Florida as soon as it was safe. Service coordinator David McCaghren helped assemble the Central Louisiana Task Force; the majority of its 14 members hail from that state. They mustered at Mississippi Sandhill Crane National Wildlife Refuge, then set off in a convoy for south Florida, hauling lots of chainsaws and heavy equipment. They got to Everglades City, more than 750 miles away, on Friday, Sept. 15, and got to work.

"Whole neighborhoods were trashed," said McCaghren. "Incident Command said we've got to help these people. We've got all these assets, let's put them to work for the public. "It's the right thing to do," he said.

Kayla Kimmel's day job is as a biologist in the Service's Baton Rouge, Louisiana, conservation office. She volunteered to join the task force, and is the only woman working alongside 13 men.

"We were in this situation a year ago in Baton Rouge," she said. "We had what they called a 1,000-year flood, and my mom's house got four and a half feet of water. College friends came down from different states and we cleaned out my mom's house, and then we just continued working, going house to house for eight days."

Like all the task force members, she was spattered from head to toe with the foul-smelling gray mud that is ubiquitous in Everglades City. "I'd like to be able to pay it forward," she continued. "This is a long process, and this is just the start. It's totally overwhelming for these people. But having people come in who can get big parts of it done takes a lot of the stress off."

"I just walked down the street with a chainsaw"

The task force split up into several smaller groups. Their first priority was clearing roads so that residents could move freely.

One narrow road was blocked by a battered old boat that had seen better days even before Irma. The wall of water had lifted it out of a nearby yard and deposited it in the middle of a road.

"We were gonna just push it off the road to open the road, but the guy had some attachment to that boat and asked if we could put it on its trailer, so myself, Rod Cobb and John Dickson took a little time and loaded it onto his trailer for him," said Chris Nothstine, a supervisory forestry technician at Sandhill Crane NWR. "It meant a lot to him."

Nothstine has had a busy summer. He was deployed in Utah for two weeks fighting the Western wildfires in a separate Incident Command. He returned home for one week, then left for a two-week stint in Florida.

"When we finished up with that street, pushing debris out of the road," he continued, "we met a guy named Chris Richards, whose family had stayed on the island during the storm. We followed him to his house and his whole family was out there working. We started taking a lot of the work off them that they had been doing for three, four, five days. "When they saw they had people to help, his wife went straight over to the neighbors' house and started helping them. When we finished with Chris's house, we went over to the neighbors' house where his wife was working and started helping them. We took a tree off a shed.

"At one point," he added, matter-of-factly, "I just walked down the street with a chainsaw, cutting down trees that were leaning on houses or blocking roads. The big thing is just being out here. Three people on a crew can go a long way, doing outreach."

Another group of task force members headed to Big Cypress National Preserve in Ochopee, Florida, a few miles from Everglades City. The U.S. National Park Service manages Big Cypress, and some buildings there had suffered wind damage to their roofs. A crew of four Fish and Wildlife staffers nailed down tarps on three buildings to protect the roofs. It was hot work, but at least there was no gray mud. "They're just amazing, covered in dirt"

"This community has deep roots; it's more than 100 years old, which is amazing in Florida, where everything is so new," said Jim Ragusa, principal of Everglades City School, which educates pre-kindergarten through 12th grade in one building. “Many of these people, their great-grandparents and grandparents grew up here.”

The school was already the center of this community in many ways, and Ragusa has made it more so, turning the cafeteria into a staging area to store supplies and a free lunch program for first responders and anyone else who just needs a free lunch. He takes his turn grilling hot dogs and hamburgers along with his many volunteers, but spends a lot of time on his cell phone managing disaster response logistics by the seat of his pants.

“The Fish and Wildlife people have just been tremendous,” he said. “They’ve been working their butts off. They’re just amazing, covered in dirt, busting their ass.”

As he was speaking, the Central Louisiana Task Force, most of them covered in slimy gray mud, lined up for hot dogs and hamburgers, apples and bottles of ice-cold Gatorade. Volunteers greeted them and thanked them. “When I ate lunch with the crew,” task force leader McCaghren said, “they were grinning. I told them, ‘It’s a good feeling, helping like this, isn’t it? There ain’t nothing like it.’”

“We’re gonna get you back in shape”

As the Service personnel continued to salvage what they could from Billy Snyder’s little turquoise bungalow, he paused for a minute.

“Three generations of people have lived in this house. This house has been passed around,” he reflected. “But I think it’s run its course.” When Irma was approaching, Snyder, a biologist with the U.S. National Park Service, and his wife Shannon took their sons Henry, 9, and Jack, 7, and evacuated to Enterprise, Alabama.

“When we went to leave, we explained to them why we were leaving,” he said. “We showed them the television. Let them express their feelings. There was no crying, no fussing. We are not feeling sorry for ourselves. We are counting our blessings and consider ourselves extremely fortunate. Nobody died.

“The real story is the way the townsfolk have come together and really pulled together to help one another,” he continued.

“And how the Fish and Wildlife Service just rolled up out of nowhere and said. ‘Hey, we’re gonna get you back in shape.’ ”

By Sunday morning, the task force had new orders. Incident Command wanted them to take their heavy equipment to the Florida Keys, where it was needed. They were on the road before sunrise. Pretty much all of them took a little gray mud with them.

Michael Argo – Deputy Chief of Staff to the Secretary

Michael Argo is a former U.S. Navy SEAL Captain who served for three decades which included combat during Operation Just Cause in Panama and service in Operation Enduring Freedom in Iraq. He served as Commander and Commanding Officer for four separate commands, worked three Joint commands and toured on numerous operational deployments around the world. CAPT Argo played college football at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill; he holds a B.A. in Education and an M.S in Geography. More recently, CAPT Argo served as a strategist and planner at the Office of Naval Intelligence in Washington, DC with the KENNEDY Irregular Warfare Center and worked briefly at the Department of Homeland Security in the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office.

Commented [AM*1]: I said it this way so you technically could read it as having both degrees from chapel hill

Commented [AM*2]: Is it CAPT or CAPT.

Commented [AM*3]: Sounds better than "short stint"

INTRODUCTION OF CAPT Michael P. Argo: U.S. NAVY SEAL CAPTAIN RETIRED

CAPTAIN (retired) Michael P. Argo served as a U. S. NAVY SEAL for three decades. He served as the first Commodore of the SEAL's Naval Special Warfare Group Eleven (NSWG-11) in San Diego California, as an Action Officer at the NAVY SEAL Headquarters, Naval Special Warfare Command in Coronado California, and as the Commanding Officer for three separate Navy Operational Support Centers (NOSCs); CO of NOSC Los Angeles, CO of NOSC Denver and CO of NOSC Hartford.

Commented [AM*4]: Navy or Naval?

OPERATIONALLY, CAPTAIN Argo served as the EXECUTIVE OFFICER and OPERATIONS OFFICER of SEAL TEAM TWO, where he fought in Combat Operations during Operation JUST CAUSE in PANAMA and was awarded the Combat Action Ribbon. He also served a period in Fallujah Iraq during Operation Iraqi Freedom. Throughout his career he has toured on numerous deployments in Europe, Africa, South America, the Caribbean, Korea, South West Asia and Central Asia.

Commented [AM*5]: Not sure what to capitalize

Commented [AM*6]: Not sure if you capitalize Operations here?

Commented [AM*7]: Caps?

Commented [AM*8]: Is this meant to be bold?

Commented [AM*9]: Bold?

Commented [AM*10]: Tell me if tour is an appropriate use

Commented [AM*11]: Capitalized?

Additionally, CAPT Argo served as both a Pilot and Navigator of a NAVY SEAL Mini-submarine, known as a SEAL Delivery Vehicle (SDV), where he conducted numerous s launch and recovery operations off a Nuclear Submarine.

EARLIER in his Career:

Commented [AM*12]: Caps?

-CAPTAIN (Ret) Argo graduated, as a collegiate athlete, from the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill

Commented [AM*13]: Added that if you want it

-He received his NAVY commissioned from Navy ROTC.

Commented [AM*14]: Received what?

-His first tour was onboard a Navy Destroyer, the USS John King (DDG-3), where he served as First Lieutenant, Legal Officer and Electrical Officer.

-He graduated from Basic Underwater Demolition/SEAL School Class training with Class 134

-He deployed to Haiti during Operation UPHOLD DEMOCRACY as the Joint Special Operations Task Force (JSOTF) Operations Officer

-He did a tour at Special Boat Unit Twenty (SBU-20) in Little Creek VA.

CAPT Argo's most profound accomplishments have been graduating from BUDs, establishing Naval Special Warfare Group Eleven, standing up SEAL Teams SEVENTEEN and EIGHTEEN, and convincing his beautiful wife Margot to marry him and share their lives with four daughters!

Today, CAPT Argo serves as the Deputy Chief of Staff for the Department of Interior under TEAMMATE Secretary Ryan Zinke, CAPT Argo is an active Board member of the SEAL FAMILY FOUNDATION and Member of the UDT/SEAL Association.

Commented [AM*15]: Caps?

SHORT SUMMARY SHORT

CAPT (Ret) Michael Argo has served as the Commander and Commanding Officer for four separate commands, worked in three Joint Commands (Theater Special Operation Command –TSOC's) and has toured on numerous deployments in Europe, Africa, South America, the Caribbean, Korea, South West Asia and Central Asia. He deployed to Haiti during Operation UPHOLD DEMOCRACY as the Joint Special Operations Task Force (JSOTF) Operations Officer. CAPT Argo severed at SEAL TEAM TWO, SEAL DELIVERY TEAM TWO (SDV), SPECIAL BOAT TEAM TWENTY as Executive Officer, Operations Office, Training Officer and Platoon Commander, respectively. He served as a Pilot and Navigator for a SEAL min-sub, Delivery Vehicle (SDV) at SDV TEAM TWO and conducted numerous s launch and recovery operations off a Nuclear Submarine.

Commented [AM*16]: Are these all Caps?

Secretary Zinke Names Steve Wackowski as Senior Advisor for Alaska Affairs

ANCHORAGE--Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke today announced that Steve Wackowski will serve as his Senior Advisor for Alaska affairs. Zinke made the announcement in Anchorage as part of his current tour of Alaska.

"A lifelong Alaskan, Steve is Wackowski is especially suited to advise me on matters in the state because of his exemplary military service; extensive experience with public policy for U.S. senators from Alaska; and work in the private sector with fish, wildlife, and oil and gas operations," said Secretary Zinke. "His background is invaluable as we focus on future energy opportunities in Alaska, the welfare of Alaska Natives, and the vast expanses of lands and waters under Interior's management including Denali and other crown jewels of the national park and wildlife refuge systems." Zinke just returned from a tour of Denali.

Commented [MJF1]: Current location?

Wachowski grew up in Anchorage and spent his summers working in Ninilchik for his family's halibut and salmon sport-fishing business. After graduating from Bartlett High School in Anchorage, he played division I-AA football at Saint Mary's College, where he earned a degree in Computer Science and a commission in the Air Force Reserve from UC Berkeley's Air Force ROTC program.

Commented [MJF2]: Did he also go to UC Berkeley or just to the ROTC there while at St. Mary's College?

He is currently a Major in the Reserve and drills at Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson at the 611th Air Operations Center. He has served on several active duty tours throughout his reserve career including contingency deployments to Afghanistan, Haiti, and Iraq.

After his last active duty tour Steve moved home to Alaska to work as the remote sensing operations manager for Fairweather Science, LLC in Anchorage. Steve's work detecting and mapping maternal polar bear dens for oil and gas companies on Alaska's North Slope was nationally recognized and helped earn him the Alaska Journal of Commerce's "Top 40 under 40" Award in 2015.

His public policy background includes serving as a Professional Staff member on the US Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and as the late Senator Ted Stevens' last serving Press Secretary. He most recently managed U.S. Senate Energy Committee Chairman Lisa Murkowski's reelection campaign.

Steve is avid hunter and fisherman who says he continually gets out-fished by his wife Lindsay. They enjoy spending time in the Alaska outdoors with their two-year-old son, Lucas, and their red fox lab, Cali.

NATIONAL PETROLEUM COUNCIL

1625 K Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 393-6100 Fax: (202) 331-8539

August 18, 2017

The Honorable Ryan K. Zinke
Secretary of the Interior
Washington, D.C. 20240

Dear Mr. Secretary:

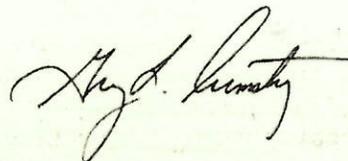

On behalf of the officers and members of the National Petroleum Council, I extend to you a cordial invitation to a reception on Monday, September 25, 2017. The reception will be held in the Thomas Jefferson Room of The Hay Adams, 800 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington, D.C., from 5:00 until 7:00 p.m.

The reception is being held in conjunction with the 127th meeting of the Council, which will begin at 3:00 p.m. in the George Washington Room of The Hay Adams. The meeting agenda will include remarks by the Honorable Rick Perry, Secretary of Energy.

The National Petroleum Council is a federal advisory committee to the Secretary of Energy and has contributed many valuable studies to successive administrations since being established at President Truman's request in 1946. The approximately 200 members, mostly chief executive officers of oil, natural gas, power, and related companies, as well as representatives from academic, public interest, and other outside organizations, are appointed by the Secretary of Energy.

The National Petroleum Council members welcome the opportunity to visit with you informally during the reception. I hope that your schedule will permit you to join us on September 25. Please notify Marshall Nichols, Executive Director of the Council, of your attendance plans. If you wish to use e-mail, you may respond to: rsvp@npc.org.

Sincerely,

Greg L. Armstrong
Acting Chair

EXECUTIVE SECRETARIAT

OFFICE OF THE

2017 AUG 22 PM 12:04

RECEIVED

Ryan K. Zinke is the 52nd United States Secretary of the Interior. Secretary Zinke served 23 years in the Navy SEALs from 1986 through 2002, retiring with the rank of Commander. Prior to accepting a position in President Donald Trump's cabinet, Secretary Zinke represented Montana as a Congressman from the state's at-large district, holding office from 2015 to 2017 and earning the unique distinction of being the first-ever Navy SEAL to be elected to the U.S. Congress. He also served in the Montana State Senate, representing the 2nd district.

A member of the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, the Secretary is a Montana native, having grown up in Whitefish, MT. Some of his earliest childhood memories are the times he spent at Glacier National Park. He is an avid hunter. Secretary Zinke attended college at the University of Oregon, where he played Division I football and graduated with a degree in Geology. He has also obtained an M.B.A. and an M.S. degree from National University and the University of San Diego, respectively.

Given the prevalence of Native American tribes in Montana, the Secretary possesses a deep understanding of tribal issues. In the U.S. House of Representatives, Secretary Zinke served on the Natural Resources Committee and the Armed Services Committee, championing legislation that would honor our military and veterans, reform forest management, and protect the rights of Native Americans. Secretary Zinke is an admirer of President Theodore Roosevelt, and he believes in the importance of a multiple-use philosophy for our public lands. He is a proponent of American energy dominance.

Secretary Zinke is married to Lola Zinke. They have three children: Jennifer, Wolfgang, and Konrad.

Ryan Zinke is the U.S. Secretary of the Interior. A Montana native, the Secretary is a former Navy SEAL Commander. He represented Montana's at-large district in the U.S. Congress.

Hi, I'm Secretary Ryan Zinke, here with my wife Lolita and the Ambassador to Happiness: Ragnar.

The holiday season in America is about faith, family, and tradition. As the New Year approaches, we come together to celebrate our blessings with the ones we love.

To our great members of the Department of the Interior, it is my honor to wish you a Merry Christmas, Happy Hanukkah, and a happy holidays.

However you celebrate, I encourage all of you to spend time with those nearest to your heart. The American family is what makes our Nation great – and it is other traditions of giving, love, and community that will keep us strong.

We have the privilege of being able to enjoy the holidays in peace at home, and we give thanks for the brave sacrifice of our troops and military families.

As a retired Navy SEAL Commander whose daughter was a Navy diver, I would ask that you keep these military families in your hearts and prayers this holiday season.

Please be sure to stay safe during the holidays and I hope you enjoy it on some of our beautiful public lands.

From my family to yours: may God bless you this holiday season, and may God bless the United States of America.

LOLA (in Spanish)

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year!

Dear Secretary Zinke,

Each year, the Jefferson Islands Club presents its Citizen of the Year Award to legislators who have distinguished themselves for their outstanding leadership, dedication to public service and contributions in the spirit of America's founding fathers.

The Jefferson Islands Club Board of Directors has nominated you as the 2017 Citizen of the Year in recognition of your leadership and public service as a U.S. Navy Seal Officer, as a member of Congress, and now as the Secretary of the Interior.

The award ceremony can be scheduled, based on your convenience, for July 25 or July 26, 2017 from 6:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m. at the Siemens Corporation, 300 New Jersey Avenue NW, Rooftop Terrace, Washington, D.C., 20001. If neither date and time are convenient, please let us know, and we will work to adjust the timing to accommodate your busy schedule.

Our Club was founded in 1931, led by Senators Key Pitman (NV), Harry Hawes (MO), and Joseph Robinson (AR) along with charter member Franklin Roosevelt, who was then the Governor of New York. Speaker Sam Rayburn and Senator Jack Kennedy were also members and President Truman visited the club often.

Today, our mission is to support bipartisanship solutions for a better America and to promote conservation of the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay. The funds raised at the reception will support conservation projects on the Club's island, located in St. Mary's County, Maryland. It is a critical ecological buffer island and host to treasured wildlife in the Chesapeake Bay watershed. The Jefferson Islands Club is a Section 501(c)(7) tax exempt and nonprofit organization.

The previous award recipients are listed on this letterhead and include: Speaker Paul D. Ryan, Minority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Rep. Kevin Brady, Senator Cory Gardner, Rep. Martin Heinrich, Rep. Dave Camp, Senator Ron Wyden, Senators Saxby Chambliss, Mark Warner, etc. Information about the Club can be found at www.jeffersonislandsclub.com.

Thank you for considering this request.

Sincerely,

Bill Baugh
 President

Came up to me at the house (just now) who is hosting the media avail in a few min and unknown to me recorded our conversation. She was crying and talking about how her husband is in jail 10 miles from here and how dare the Secretary not visit the families. She told me about the hardship their family endured and I was empathetic and said I can't imagine what they have been through but did not elaborate. She asked to meet with the Sec and I told her I was in charge of the media avail only but he did not have time. I also said that even if he wanted to, he could not do anything since this is in the courts now. I did more listening than talking but wanted to let you know. Rusty escorted her off the property because the owner of the land asked her to leave. They know each other and did not have a pleasant exchange. Media were not around to hear this but don't know who saw.

Just wanted to let you know.

A sudden change in Ryan Zinke's travel plans cost taxpayers nearly $2,000, documents show

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke attends a November event at the Marine Corps War Memorial in Arlington, Va. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's decision in April to change his travel plans for a fact-finding trip to Channel Islands National Park in California added nearly \$2,000 in costs when he left from Santa Barbara, Calif., where his wife owns a second home, according to emails sent among Interior Department officials.

The documents, obtained by the advocacy group Western Values Project under the Freedom of Information Act, show the extent to which National Park Service staff had to rearrange transportation to accommodate Zinke. The two-day trip — which included Zinke's wife, Lolita, as well as her aunt, Beatrice Walder — was originally scheduled to depart out of Ventura Harbor aboard a Park Service vessel, the Ocean Ranger.

It is unclear what prompted the change in plans for the April 17-18 trip. The Zinkes had just spent the weekend in Santa Barbara and decided to attend an evening town hall event there on the 17th that the conservative group Young America's Foundation hosted.

Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall is probing several aspects of Zinke's travel, including his trips to political gatherings and the extent to which his wife reimbursed the government for costs stemming from her attendance on multiple journeys. In a memo last month, Kendall warned the secretary and his aides that they needed to provide documentation to "distinguish between personal, political and official travel" and that management of his trips had been "deficient."

Interior press secretary Heather Swift said in an email Monday that the visit "was part of a multi-day visit" to department sites from Sacramento south to the Channel Islands. Zinke always planned to meet with the team at the national park, "and the office of scheduling reached out to the superintendent's office as soon as it was clear when he could go."

For the boat, Swift added, the Zinkes paid via check for her fare and her aunt's fare. "No costs were incurred due to Mrs. Zinke's presence."

Still, the emails chronicle how costs rose after Zinke's staff stressed he wanted to go in and out of Santa Barbara rather than Ventura.

Russell Galipeau, the Channel Islands superintendent, wrote in an April 7 email that while he was working with National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration officials to use a vessel it had in Santa Barbara, "I urge against it." A week later, Galipeau wrote that "to accommodate" Zinke's request, the crew would need to be paid three hours of overtime each, adding $300, and the government would have to add fuel for an additional eight hours of running time at a price of $1,440. The group ultimately used the Park Service's boat.

In a phone interview Monday, Western Values Project Executive Director Chris Saeger said the fact that government employees had to go to such lengths and that taxpayers incurred a higher bill suggests a broader problem at Interior. "This pattern of behavior is not just a problem for the people who are making the schedule changes," he said. "The influence they're exerting over leadership decisions at Interior is sloppy and ethically deficient."

Swift countered that Saeger's group is "a classic dark money group which is run by current and former Democratic Party members and campaign staff."

Channel Islands National Park is the site of a major restoration effort undertaken by the Nature Conservancy with the Park Service and U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to bring back native habitat and endemic species such as the island fox, the island scrub-jay and the Santa Catalina Island ironwood. Thousands of sheep, cattle and feral pigs were killed as part of the effort to eliminate invasive species on the network of eight islands.

Zinke was billed $142 on April 25 for the travel costs associated with his wife and her aunt, which grew by mid-June to $152 with late fees. It was paid by the end of June.

The Zinkes were accompanied by Nita Vail, a political supporter of Zinke who had hosted a fundraiser for him in 2014 in Carpinteria, a seaside community about 15 minutes east of Santa Barbara. Vail is a great-granddaughter of the rancher who bought Santa Rosa Island in 1901 and established the Vail & Vickers ranch there. The family, which sold Santa Rosa Island to the federal government for $30 million in 1986, ran cattle on the island until 1998 and operated a commercial hunting business there until 2011.

The National Parks Conservation Association sued in the mid-1990s to end both ranching and big-game hunting on Santa Rosa, arguing that they were degrading crucial habitat. The Vail family closed its hunting business as part of a settlement in that suit.

After touring Santa Rosa with Vail on April 18, Zinke said he would "like to highlight the significant ranching heritage on the island with a working demonstration ranch," Galipeau said in an email. "At this point it is not clear how this idea will be implemented."

Heather,
Adding my colleague Shelby to this note. She can come swing by your office Tuesday or Wednesday to pick up blankets. We will hold them in our on-site office. What room number are you?

We'll also be able to assist with a golf cart escort for the guest we discussed. Please let me know what time he'll arrive. Please have him go to the press check-in tent (its green with an arrowhead on it) across from C st on 17th. After he goes through security we'll be able to escort him and his wife around to their seats.

Thanks,

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by Chevron: Democrats call for investigation of Murkowski call — Tax reformers give up on border adjustment — BLM takes next step on coal lease expansion

DEMOCRATS DECRY ALLEGED ZINKE THREATS: The top Democrat on the House Natural Resources Committee is calling for a formal investigation, following news that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke threatened crucial Alaska priorities after Sen. Lisa Murkowski voted against health care legislation. Citing the Alaska Dispatch News' report on the matter, Arizona Rep. Raul Grijalva said Zinke had crossed the line.

"Running a department of the federal government means you serve the American people as a protector of their rights and freedoms," Grijalva said in a statement. "It doesn't mean you serve the president as a bag man for his political vendettas. Threatening to punish your rivals as political blackmail is something we'd see from the Kremlin. Secretary Zinke's willingness to deliver these threats speaks volumes about his ethical standards and demonstrates that Interior's policy positions are up for political grabs, rather than based on science or the public interest."

Ben Lefebvre reports: Democrats on the Natural Resources Committee plan to send a letter today calling for an investigation conducted by possibly the GAO or inspector general's office. But they're not the only ones: Energy and Commerce ranking member Frank Pallone (D-N.J.) asked GAO Wednesday to investigate whether Rick Perry or others at DOE violated federal laws relating to lobbying and influencing the public. More here.

MURKOWSKI CARRIES ON: The Alaska senator said in a statement today she will continue to work with President Donald Trump on health care reform, but did not address Zinke, Ben reports. "While I have disagreed with the Senate process so far, the President and I agree that the status quo with health care in our country is not acceptable and that reforms must be made," Murkowski said in a prepared statement. "I continue working to find the best path for what I believe will achieve that — a committee process where we can work issues in the open and ensure Alaskans have the health care choices they want, the affordability they need, and the quality of care they deserve."

Murkowski confirmed to reporters in the Capitol today that Zinke called her Wednesday, but she did not elaborate on the conversation. She also told E&E News earlier today that Trump had called her Tuesday after she voted against proceeding to legislation to repeal Obamacare. "It was not a very pleasant call," she told the publication.

BYE BYE BORDER TAX: In a joint statement today, the Trump administration and congressional leaders acknowledged that they would abandon plans for a controversial tax on imports, Pro Tax's Aaron Lorenzo reports. House Speaker Paul Ryan had hoped to use the import tax, known as border adjustability, to pay for other tax cuts, but the proposal drew fierce backlash from energy companies, retailers and other import-dependent industries. "While we have debated the pro-growth benefits of border adjustability, we appreciate that there are many unknowns associated with it and have decided to set this policy aside in order to advance tax reform," the statement said. They plan for the legislation to move through the committees this fall.

SENATE CLOSES IN ON SANCTIONS BILL: The Senate is close to delivering Trump his first big rebuke, POLITICO's Elana Schor reports. "The Senate is seeking unanimous consent to pass a bipartisan sanctions bill targeting Russia, Iran and North Korea" as soon as today. "That move would send to Trump's desk a measure that constrains his bid to defrost relations with Moscow by allowing Congress to block any attempt to ease or end penalties against Vladimir Putin's government. ... Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) predicted Thursday that passage in his chamber 'would be very soon,' perhaps as soon as later in the day unless any senator on either side of the aisle raises an objection."

DRINKING WATER BILL MOVES FORWARD: The House Energy and Commerce Committee sent a bipartisan drinking water measure to the full House for consideration by voice vote today, but not before it added provisions relating to security and emerging contaminants. Annie Snider reports: "The amendment to H.R. 3387 \(115\), the first major update to the Safe Drinking Water Act in two decades, tackles concerns about new or newly understood contaminants appearing in tap water by requiring utilities to monitor for such "emerging contaminants" so long as funding and laboratory capacity is available. The amendment also requires water systems to develop emergency response plans addressing their vulnerability to natural disasters and terrorism, and it creates an EPA grant program to help utilities improve their resiliency." More here.

INTERIOR WELCOMES THREE: Zinke announced three new hires to his agency today, offering a range of congressional, executive and private sector experience in the Office of the Solicitor, the Office of Communications, and the Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs. Richard Goeken has been hired as deputy solicitor for parks and wildlife; Russell Newell makes a return to the department as deputy director of communications; and Blake Deeley, a former aide to West Virginia Rep. David McKinley, will serve as an adviser in the Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs.

BLM TAKES NEXT STEP ON COAL LEASE EXPANSION: The Bureau of Land Management is moving forward with plans to conduct an environmental study that would lead to expansion of a mine in Wyoming's Powder River Basin. A Federal Register notice to be published tomorrow says BLM will prepare an environmental impact statement on an application to expand the West Antelope mine to cover another 441 million tons of coal. The agency is taking public comment on how to scope the EIS for 60 days, and will host a public meeting Sept. 20 in Wright, Wyo.

SECOND GROUP WANTS INQUIRY INTO PRUITT TRAVEL: A second watchdog group is seeking an investigation into EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's travel habits after the Environmental Integrity Project this week found Pruitt spent a significant portion of the spring in his home state of Oklahoma. EIP asked the agency's inspector general to review the matter. Today, another group, American Oversight, asked the Office of Special Counsel, an independent agency, to look into the matter as well to determine whether any ethics rules were broken or government resources wasted.

LIGHTER CLICK: NBC's Andrea Mitchell appeared on "Late Night with Seth Meyers," where she discussed health care, the secretary of State and the beginning of her career as energy correspondent for NBC. Mitchell discussed what it was like reporting on energy as a woman and the time she tried to report from Three Mile Island. "Well, a very kindly, paternalistic bureau chief, a lovely man, said — when I noticed that, five days in, I was the only correspondent not going in and covering this thing. I went, and said, 'How come I'm the only one not going to Three Mile Island?' And he said, 'Because you are a woman of childbearing age.' Democrats demand investigation of 'political blackmail' against Murkowski Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 07/27/2017 12:44 PM EDT

The top Democrat on the House Natural Resources Committee said Thursday he will request a formal investigation into whether Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke threatened projects important to Alaska in retribution for Sen. Lisa Murkowski's vote against health care legislation.

Zinke called Murkowski and fellow Alaska Sen. Dan Sullivan Wednesday afternoon — a day after Murkowski voted against taking up the bill to repeal Obamacare — to warn them that the administration's support for energy projects in the state are now at risk, Sullivan told the Alaska Dispatch News. The "message was pretty clear," Sullivan said.

Citing that report, Rep. Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said Zinke had crossed the line.

"Running a department of the federal government means you serve the American people as a protector of their rights and freedoms," Grijalva said in a statement. "It doesn't mean you serve the president as a bag man for his political vendettas. Threatening to punish your rivals as political blackmail is something we'd see from the Kremlin. Secretary Zinke's willingness to deliver these threats speaks volumes about his ethical standards and demonstrates that Interior's policy positions are up for political grabs, rather than based on science or the public interest."

Natural Resources Democrats plan to send a letter Thursday calling for an investigation conducted by possibly the GAO or inspector general's office, said committee spokesman Adam Sarvana.

Zinke holds ample sway over the state of Alaska, where the federal government controls 61 percent of the land in the state. Interior is reviewing a multitude of projects tied to Alaska energy development, including a possible opening of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil and gas drilling and allowing offshore oil drilling in currently off-limits Arctic waters.

Interior also has the final say over whether to allow a road through Alaska's Izembek National Wildlife Refuge to take residents of an isolated village reach a nearby hospital, something Murkowski has pushed for years.

"Even if this road provides health care access to hundreds, which is very much in doubt, Secretary Zinke thinks the price to build it is a vote to deny health care access to millions," Grijalva said.

But Murkowski is not without her own levers of influence over Zinke. She chairs the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which has jurisdiction over his department, as well as the Appropriations subcommittee in charge of deciding how much money Interior has to spend each year. Wednesday afternoon, the energy committee abruptly postponed a meeting that would have included votes on three Interior nominees.

Zinke's reported phone call came after President Donald Trump tweeted his displeasure with Murkowski's vote. But there are relatively few political consequences Murkowski could face in the near term. She will not be up for reelection again until 2022, and she has previously proved her political mettle in the state — winning a rare write-in victory to be reelected in 2010 after she lost the GOP primary to a Tea Party challenger.

Spokespeople for the Interior Department, Murkowski and Sullivan did not respond to requests for comment. A spokeswoman for House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop declined to comment.

Alaska Oil & Gas Association President Kara Moriarty called the threats "unfortunate."

"As the secretary has said, they want to have American energy dominance, and the only way to do that is through Alaska," Moriarty told POLITICO. "When the time comes when Alaskan energy projects are in front of Congress, I hope they are considered on their merits and not used as a political chits."

Environmentalists were unsparing in their assessment.

"Ryan Zinke is revealing himself as Trump's hitman. He's now threatening to hold public lands and energy policy hostage over a health care bill. This is the U.S. government, not the Corleone family," Jennifer Rokala, the executive director of the Center for Western Priorities, said in a statement. "Congress and the administration should discuss America's energy and lands policy on the merits, without mob-inspired threats from the Department of the Interior and the White House."

Zinke is not the first member of Trump's Cabinet without a health care portfolio to insert himself into the debate over the Senate's effort to repeal and replace Obamacare. The Energy Department earlier this week posted then deleted a tweet saying it was time to "discard" the law, with a link to an op-ed on the subject from Secretary Rick Perry.

Energy and Commerce ranking member Frank Pallone (D-N.J.) asked GAO Wednesday to investigate whether Perry or others at DOE violated federal laws relating to lobbying and influencing the public.

Meanwhile, some Republicans back in Alaska said Murkowski's vote was stirring up trouble for her at home, with state GOP Chairman Tuckerman Babcock saying his party is in "full revolt."

"I think among Republicans it is causing tremendous damage," Babcock said in a phone interview Thursday, citing "a grassroots swell" of comments on Facebook pages for the party, Murkowski and Sullivan. "It's evident to me that the Republicans [in Alaska] are in full revolt over the idea that these promises aren't going to be kept."

He added that Interior's ownership of so much of Alaska makes raises the stakes of any clash with Zinke.

"What the secretary of Interior does will have a major impact on Alaska. He's absolutely vital to moving forward with the development of the coastal plain at ANWR, National Petroleum Reserve on the Western North Slope, building the road from King Cove, the land exchange that Congressman Young has gotten through the House of Representatives," Babcock said. "I'm just hitting the tip of the iceberg on how important a cooperative relationship is with that department."

Murkowski pledges to work with Trump on health care, sidesteps details of Zinke call

By Ben Lefebvre | 07/27/2017 02:12 PM EDT

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said she will continue to work with President Donald Trump on health care reform but did not address reports that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke threatened projects in her home state in a public statement today.

"While I have disagreed with the Senate process so far, the President and I agree that the status quo with health care in our country is not acceptable and that reforms must be made," Murkowski said in a prepared statement. "I continue working to find the best path for what I believe will achieve that — a committee process where we can work issues in the open and ensure Alaskans have the health care choices they want, the affordability they need, and the quality of care they deserve."

Murkowski confirmed to reporters in the Capitol today that Zinke called her Wednesday, but she did not elaborate on their conversation. She also told E&E News earlier today that Trump had called her Tuesday after she voted against proceeding to legislation to repeal Obamacare.

Murkowski and fellow Alaska Republican Senator Dan Sullivan received calls Wednesday warning them that the administration's support for public lands or energy projects may dwindle after Murkowski's vote Tuesday against taking up a bill to repeal Obamacare. Interior has wide sway over Alaskan energy project because nearly two-thirds of the state consists of federal property. The Alaska Dispatch News first reported the calls.

House Democrats are calling for an investigation into the call Zinke made to the Alaskan senators.

Import tax officially abandoned in Big 6 tax reform talks Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 07/27/2017 02:51 PM EDT

White House and congressional leaders officially acknowledged Thursday that a controversial tax on imports would be dropped from tax reform, but otherwise provided no new details on a broader plan they expect to start moving through Congress in the fall.

The import tax, called border adjustability, was pushed by House Speaker Paul Ryan as a way to fund tax cuts, but it prompted a fierce backlash from retailers and other import-dependent industries.

In a largely symbolic statement, the "Big Six" tax reform negotiators vowed to reduce tax rates, simplify the tax code and improve U.S. economic growth by changing tax laws.

But the biggest news is what they decided to leave out.

"While we have debated the pro-growth benefits of border adjustability, we appreciate that there are many unknowns associated with it and have decided to set this policy aside in order to advance tax reform," the statement said.

"... [W]e are now confident that, without transitioning to a new domestic consumption-based tax system, there is a viable approach for ensuring a level playing field between American and foreign companies and workers, while protecting American jobs and the U.S. tax base," it said.

Expectations had grown in recent days that the negotiators — Ryan, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn — would provide more details of their talks that members could use to build support for tax reform during the August recess. But the statement lacked those kinds of details.

"The goal is a plan that reduces tax rates as much as possible, allows unprecedented capital expensing [for businesses], places a priority on permanence, and creates a system that encourages American companies to bring back jobs and profits trapped overseas," the joint statement said.

It added that "the time has arrived" for the tax-writing committees to produce draft legislation. "Our expectation is for this legislation to move through the committees this fall, under regular order, followed by consideration on the House and Senate floors," the statement added.

The series of tenets were high-level by design to demonstrate that all the parties involved are still moving in the same direction, though exact details are still being hammered out.

Representatives from various groups who were briefed on the top-line statement saw it in a positive light, given that it demonstrated compromise toward getting tax reform legislation enacted by the end of this year. Ryan and Brady hadn't stopped backing the border adjustment tax until today.

"With BAT out, Washington has an opportunity for the first time in more than a generation to pass a tax reform plan that boosts American businesses and family budgets," said a statement from the president of the Retail Industry Leaders Association, Sandy Kennedy.

Senate set to pass Russia sanctions, rebuffing White House Back

By Elana Schor | 07/27/2017 02:12 PM EDT

Congress is on the verge of delivering Donald Trump the first big bipartisan rebuke of his presidency.

The Senate is seeking unanimous consent to pass a bipartisan sanctions bill targeting Russia, Iran and North Korea as soon as Thursday. That move would send to Trump's desk a measure that would constrain his bid to defrost relations with Moscow by allowing Congress to block any attempt to ease or end penalties against President Vladimir Putin's government.

The House passed the sanctions package on Tuesday in an overwhelming 419-3 vote, and an intra-GOP squabble that threatened to delay its passage was quickly resolved Wednesday night. Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) predicted Thursday that passage in his chamber "would be very soon," perhaps as soon as later in the day unless any senator on either side of the aisle raises an objection.

"We are prepared to move this legislation by unanimous consent at any time," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said on the floor Thursday. The only no votes during the Senate's initial consideration of Russia and Iran sanctions last month were Kentucky Republican Rand Paul and Vermont independent Bernie Sanders.

Passage of the sanctions bill has drawn no Democratic objections, according to a senior aide to the minority. A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell did not immediately return a request for comment on whether there are any lingering GOP objections to quick passage of the sanctions bill.

The White House has avoided taking a clear position on the sanctions legislation all week, with communications director Anthony Scaramucci telling CNN on Thursday that Trump "may sign the sanctions exactly the way they are, or he may veto the sanctions and negotiate an even tougher deal against the Russians."

Corker, a longtime ally of the Trump administration, said he has talked to both the president and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson about the sanctions bill in recent days and "gotten no indication from them that they plan to veto it.

"It's just not a good way to start a presidency to veto something and then be soundly overridden," Corker told reporters. "It wouldn't be something I would do, but they may choose to do it."

Energy and Commerce sends bipartisan drinking water bill to the floor Back

By Annie Snider | 07/27/2017 02:25 PM EDT

The House Energy and Commerce Committee added provisions relating to security and emerging contaminants to a bipartisan drinking water measure before sending it to the full House for consideration by voice vote.

The amendment to H.R. 3387 \(115\), the first major update to the Safe Drinking Water Act in two decades, tackles concerns about new or newly understood contaminants appearing in tap water by requiring utilities to monitor for such "emerging contaminants" so long as funding and laboratory capacity is available.

The amendment also requires water systems to develop emergency response plans addressing their vulnerability to natural disasters and terrorism, and it creates an EPA grant program to help utilities improve their resiliency.

And the committee added provisions requiring water systems to make their reports to consumers more understandable, and encouraging states and EPA to look at whether restructuring or consolidation could help water systems with long-running problems.

The overall measure tackles issues raised in the wake of the lead crisis in Flint, Mich., and represents one of the first bipartisan infrastructure measures to gain traction under the Trump administration.

WHAT'S NEXT: The bill has broad support and should be able to easily pass the House, although it remains to be seen when it would get a vote. Companion legislation has yet to be introduced in the Senate.

Pruitt spent significant time in Oklahoma in spring, records show Back

By Alex Guillén | 07/24/2017 10:49 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt spent 43 days in March, April and May on trips to his home state of Oklahoma, according to travel records obtained by the watchdog group Environmental Integrity Project.

The records, released under the Freedom of Information Act, include weekend trips home as well as official business in the state, such as a tour of a chemical plant or an awards event hosted by the Oklahoma Well Strippers Association. The records indicate Pruitt sometimes paid his own airfare but often went at the government's expense.

"These travel records show that Administrator Pruitt is more focused on cultivating his relationships with industry and conservative political organizations in his home state of Oklahoma than he is on protecting the environment and the public health for the rest of America," EIP Executive Director Eric Schaeffer said in a statement.

The group will ask EPA's inspector general to investigate Pruitt's travel Monday, an EIP spokesman said. As precedent, he pointed to a 2015 IG report on a regional administrator who scheduled more than half of his official trips to areas near his home in California's Orange County, some of which the IG questioned.

EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said in a statement that Pruitt was focused on running EPA, "not running for elected office. The administrator's travel, whether to Utah, Michigan or Oklahoma, all serves the purpose of hearing from hard-working Americans about how EPA can better serve the American people."

Pruitt said at an industry conference in May that his wife would join him in living in Washington this summer since both their children are both now in college, which could decrease his weekend trips home to Oklahoma.

Pruitt's predecessor, Gina McCarthy, paid her own way for trips home to Boston approximately every other week, according to an EIP spokesman.

White House adviser clashes with Mnuchin over tax plan Back

By Nancy Cook | 07/27/2017 05:08 AM EDT

The White House is eager to present a unified front on tax reform, but those leading the effort inside the administration haven't been able to bridge deep fissures over how much to cut taxes and the best way to pay for it.

The White House's top tax staffer, Shahira Knight, who works for Gary Cohn at the National Economic Council, has feuded in the last few months with Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin and other Treasury officials, according to a senior administration official and four other people familiar with their interactions.

This comes as the administration and congressional leaders prepare to unveil a broad-brush tax proposal, weeks ahead of schedule, as a way to pivot from the grinding debate over health care — and to show movement on an issue significant to the business community before Congress adjourns for its August recess.

Yet many key outstanding questions remain, including how low the corporate tax rate can go — a major focus of the president who wants it at 15 percent — and what if any tax benefits or breaks lawmakers will need to eliminate to pay for cuts.

These trade-offs are part of what makes tax reform difficult. No businesses, or individuals, like to see any particular tax break eliminated and tend to mobilize when their goodie is threatened. Figuring out how to balance the many competing interests at play have been the focal point of Knight's disagreements with Treasury — and a foreshadowing of Republicans' challenges with any tax overhaul.

"She will be quick to point out how difficult tax reform will be. She is not some Art Laffer right-wing nut," said one former Republican congressional staffer. "She will ask, 'How are we going to pay for this?' And she will be one of the first ones to say this."

Early on in the administration, Knight and Mnuchin clashed over the type of tax system the U.S. should even have. (He was advocating for a move to a so-called fully worldwide system by getting rid of deferral payments that some companies make). That was part of one of Trump's many tax plans, dating back to the campaign in 2015.

Eventually both Knight, a former senior Hill staffer and ex-lobbyist, joined Capitol Hill lawmakers and staff to persuade Mnuchin and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn to drop that idea, according to a senior administration official.

Knight and Mnuchin have disagreed more recently and with some frequency over the best way to pay for tax cuts. Among the issues: Mnuchin does not like the idea of scrapping businesses' ability to deduct interest - a big boon to the real estate and finance industry that heavily relies on debt to make deals - while Knight views it as a way to offset tax cuts without adding to the deficit.

One of Mnuchin's top Treasury advisers called Knight a "very talented colleague and a critical part of our team." "We work together daily and she brings a deep knowledge of tax reform that benefits our current efforts," said Justin Muzinich, a counselor to Mnuchin at Treasury.

Knight knows the history of past tax reform efforts, dating back to the last major revision in 1986, and is equally proficient in the technical hiccups of the code, according to interviews with 10 people including three senior administration officials, lobbyists, and current and former congressional staff. She is a special assistant to the president and frequently briefs the president himself on tax issues.

"She is the leading person who combines the trust of the political appointees with technical knowledge, and it is clear that she is speaking to the highest levels," said one former Treasury official. "Frankly, she is one of the few people that the political people can talk to with the knowledge that she is on their side."

Knight got her break in the tax world by starting out on a subcommittee of the House Ways & Means Committee, eventually working her way up to senior adviser. She worked under former Chairman Bill Thomas, who had a reputation as a sharp-elbowed and demanding boss - traits that former colleagues and friends say that Knight shares.

"She learned at the altar of Bill Thomas. He was a stone cold killer and the most effective legislator of his generation," said Mike Sommers, Speaker John Boehner's former chief-of-staff who now heads up the American Investment Council.

On the Hill, Knight worked on the 2001 and 2003 Bush tax cuts - a huge political victory for Republicans.

But her more under-the-radar Capitol Hill policy claim-to-fame was the 2004 bill called the American Jobs Creation Act, according to several former Republican and Democratic congressional staffers. This was a highly technical and far-reaching bill that re-set some international tax rules and gave businesses what the non-partisan Tax Policy Center called a "potpourri of new tax breaks."

After the Hill, Knight went on to work as a lobbyist for the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association and Fidelity Investments where she spent more than seven years and became an expert in taxes related to savings, retirements, and pensions.

The financial services industry, in particular, has been very comforted by her role in the White House, the former Treasury official said, because they view her as one of their own.

That is true of a huge swathe of the Hill and downtown lobbyists, both Democrats and Republicans, who feel like Knight is a known quantity in an administration stocked with New York bankers and outsiders with little D.C. connections.

"The president at the beginning talked about tax policy in a way we were unaccustomed to," said a former Democratic congressional aide. "She showed up and everyone breathed a sigh of relief. She can translate the administration's more general discussion of taxes."

Recently, Knight has spent her time working with Treasury officials on hammering out a potential tax reform blueprint and sitting in on the 'Big Six' tax reform meetings with Mnuchin, Cohn, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Speaker Paul Ryan, Senate Finance Committee Chair Orrin Hatch, and Ways & Means Chair Kevin Brady.

She frequently speaks to outside groups such as the Tax Council or National Association of Manufacturers on the administration's tax goals. She also takes tons of meetings, expressing enthusiasm on the most in-the-weed topics, according to numerous people who've met with her.

"People need to be well-prepared," said Marc Gerson, chair of the law firm Miller & Chevalier who worked with Knight on the Ways & Means Committee. "She asks insightful questions, and she wants follow-up."

Those meetings also give D.C. insiders a foreshadowing of where the administration may head on tax reform; in one recent session, she told people that they did not need to spend much time talking about the border adjustment tax, leaving the impression that it was no longer on the table from the administration's perspective.

Trump and Sessions try a long-distance relationship Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 07/27/2017 01:15 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and his "beleaguered" attorney general, Jeff Sessions, may be on the outs, but they're making a unified push on immigration — by taking on the MS-13 gang.

The group has been blamed for a series of brutal murders over the past 18 months on Long Island, where Trump is scheduled to speak on Friday in a bid to pressure Congress to fork over money for his immigration crackdown, pointing to the influx of migrants from Central America as a factor in the renewed violence.

At the same time, Sessions is 3,500 miles south in El Salvador, the epicenter of the MS-13 gang, where he'll echo the same message in meetings with President Salvador Sánchez Cerén and other top officials.

The president will use his Friday speech to urge Congress to back his border wall with Mexico and to greenlight funding for new Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and immigration judges, administration officials told POLITICO.

"I think it'll be very hard for Democratic lawmakers to vote against hiring ICE officers and the other resources we need to remove some of these dangerous and violent people, like MS-13, from our country, who are quite literally terrorizing communities, committing the most heinous kinds of crimes imaginable," said one administration official, who wasn't authorized to speak on the record about the president's speech.

A die-hard immigration warrior, Sessions has given Trump credibility on the issue among conservatives — a factor that is weighing on the president as he debates whether to fire the attorney general, according to another senior administration official.

Sessions has also made eradicating MS-13 a core priority since becoming attorney general.

"Groups of murderers and rapists and traffickers and thugs are carrying out a frontal assault on the rule of law and on law-abiding men and women in communities over the country," Sessions said during a speech on Long Island in April. "They have no right, and they must not be allowed to take control of a single city block or street corner."

Asked whether the tension between Sessions and Trump could make it more difficult to implement the president's immigration agenda, the first administration official said, "The president is focused on enforcing the laws of the United States, and everybody who works with him understands that." A third administration official quipped that Sessions' absence from the Long Island speech is "not any stranger" than anything else that's been happening at the White House this week.

A Justice Department spokeswoman said Sessions' trip to El Salvador had been long planned.

MS-13 is a transnational gang that was formed in Los Angeles in the 1980s by Salvadorans fleeing the country's civil war.

While the gang has existed in the United States for decades, a recent spate of grisly MS-13-connected murders involving machetes has put a spotlight on its activities and drawn the attention of the president.

"They come from Central America. They're tougher than any people you've ever met," Trump told Time magazine last year. "They're killing and raping everybody out there. They're illegal. And they are finished."

Administration officials said Trump's fascination with the gang stems in part from the fact that the MS-13 murders on Long Island dominated New York's tabloid newspapers for months. Trump, a lifelong New Yorker, is a regular reader of the tabloids.

Trump's top aides, including chief strategist Steve Bannon and senior adviser Stephen Miller, have also highlighted the problem in conversations with the president. Bannon and Miller, a former Sessions staffer, have long pushed Trump to be more aggressive on immigration.

Miller, a native of Southern California where MS-13 took root, is expected to play a central role in writing Trump's Friday speech.

Long Island is still reeling from the MS-13 murders, and White House aides hope the speech will ratchet up political pressure on Democrats to support the president's immigration policies. But Democrats are unlikely to budge.

The House is slated to vote soon on a wide-ranging spending bill that includes funding for Trump's border wall along the Mexico border. The measure is unlikely to win support from Democrats, and it has little chance of passing the Senate.

The administration has separately called for hiring 10,000 new ICE agents, though the president's fiscal year 2018 budget proposal called for 1,000 new agents. The budget also requested funding to hire 75 new immigration judges to deal with the backlog of nearly 600,000 immigration cases pending in the courts.

Administration officials said they have been pressing members of Congress behind the scenes to back Trump's priorities, hoping to score funding for new ICE agents and immigration judges by the end of the year.

"We're pushing Congress hard on this," the first administration official said. "There's no question about that."

Rep. Peter King, a New York Republican, met with Trump in the spring to discuss his concerns with the gang and he's been in regular contact with the president's top aides.

"He is committed to doing all he can to destroy MS-13. He sees this as an evil organization," King said in an interview. "He believes that the federal government and the state and local policy working together can crush it if they move quickly and effectively."

King, like Sessions and others in the administration, blame the federal government's unaccompanied minors programs, which help young people from countries in Central America enter the United States, for boosting MS-13's numbers.

King called for a wholesale review of the programs, something that is gaining traction in the Trump White House. Another administration official said the issue is likely to come up in Trump's Friday speech, along with criticism of sanctuary cities, a frequent target for the president.

The Trump administration is using the threat of MS-13 to justify many of its immigration policies. Since Trump took office, ICE has led a number of gang-related operations across the country that have resulted in thousands of arrests. And ICE has urged its agents to take action against any undocumented immigrants they come across, even if they don't have a criminal record.

Since the beginning of January, ICE's investigations unit has arrested 3,311 alleged gang members, including more than 350 people believed to belong to or be associated with MS-13, according to the agency.

But the Trump administration's efforts are worrying immigrant rights advocates, who fear that the president's rhetoric could cause a backlash against Central American immigrants. They are also raising red flags that the administration could round up immigrants who aren't actually members of MS-13 and other gangs.

"One of our top concerns is that people are going to be labeled as gang members in an overly broad manner, which could lead to more arrests and deportations even for people who have not been active in a gang," said Shiu-Ming Cheer, a senior staff attorney at the National Immigration Law Center.

Ted Hesson contributed to this report.

Joint Chiefs: 'No modifications' to transgender policy from Trump tweet Back

By Bryan Bender and Jacqueline Klimas | 07/27/2017 11:28 AM EDT

There will be "no modifications" to the military's transgender policy as a result of President Donald Trump's declared ban on transgender men and women on Twitter, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs said in a message to top military officers on Thursday -- the latest sign of the disarray following the commander-in-chief's abrupt announcement.

Marine Gen. Joe Dunford also wrote in the message, which was sent to the chiefs of the military branches and senior enlisted leaders, that the military will continue to "treat all of our personnel with respect."

"I know there are questions about yesterday's announcement on the transgender policy by the President," Dunford wrote in the internal communication, a copy of which was provided to POLITICO. "There will be no modifications to the current policy until the President's direction has been received by the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary has issued implementation guidance."

"In the meantime, we will continue to treat all of our personnel with respect. As importantly, given the current fight and the challenges we face, we will all remain focused on accomplishing our assigned missions," he continued.

The president said Wednesday in a series of three tweets that transgender troops would no longer be allowed to serve in any capacity, sparking questions about what that would mean for the thousands currently in uniform and whether it constitutes an official policy change.

The announcement also sparked fierce criticism from lawmakers in both parties, while advocacy groups immediately threatened to take the president to court to overturn any ban.

Dunford's message was seconded later in the day by Secretary of Defense Jim Mattis' chief spokeswoman.

"The Department of Defense is awaiting formal guidance from the White House as a follow-up to the Commander-in-Chief's announcement on military service by transgender personnel," Dana White said. "We will provide detailed guidance to the Department in the near future for how this policy change will be implemented."

"The Department will continue to focus on our mission of defending our nation and on-going operations against our foes, while ensuring all servicemembers are treated with respect," she added.

The Pentagon's position underscored how the military, like legal experts, does not consider the president's social media pronouncements policy.

In an appearance at the National Press Club, Gen. Mark Milley, the Army chief of staff, also said later Thursday that Dunford is "exactly right" and that the military will work through new guidance when it gets a formal directive from the White House through normal channels.

"We grow up and learn to obey the chain of command, and my chain of command is secretary of the Army, secretary of Defense and the president," Milley said. "We will work through the implementation guidance when we get it...To my knowledge, the Department of Defense, Secretary Mattis has not received written directives yet."

Milley also doubled down on Dunford's message that every service member - "bar none" - should and will always be treated with dignity and respect.

Only a formal directive through the chain of command would lead to a real policy change, said Tobias Wolff, a professor at University of Pennsylvania Law School.

He said that Dunford's statement makes it clear that the Pentagon does not make major changes to its policy because of a tweet - "and he was right to do so."

"The chairman of the joint chiefs is respecting the rule of law and the role of the secretary of defense, and he is protecting commanders in the field from having good order and discipline undermined," Wolff said. "General Dunford should never have been put in this position. It is a reflection of the crisis we now face with this increasingly unstable and reckless individual occupying the presidency."

Dru Brenner-Beck, a retired Army judge advocate general and president of the National Institute for Military Justice, told POLITICO that under normal procedure the president would issue an executive order instructing the Pentagon to go about changing the department's personnel policy — but only after Defense Department officials coordinated with various parts of the military and weighed in on the proposed changes in the draft order.

Brenner-Beck said its even legally questionable whether a declaration from the president's personal social media account is enough to launch the process of rewriting Pentagon regulations, calling it "a whole new frontier."

"A tweet doesn't really give you policy," she said. "How do you implement a tweet? Usually you would have some kind of an actual policy document that comes down."

A Defense Department official, speaking on the condition they not be named, said Thursday that the Pentagon is scrambling to coordinate with the White House for guidance on the way forward, noting that there is an urgent need to explain to the troops what it means.

Transgender troops -- which by some estimates number as high as 15,000 and as few as 1,300 -- have been allowed to serve openly since June of 2016. The Pentagon has been studying ways to implement the decision for new recruits -- including questions about housing and medical care.

Defense Secretary Jim Mattis last month ordered that review be extended another six months.

The Pentagon's policy changes have not been without controversy. House Republicans, as part of defense spending legislation now under consideration, have sought to prohibit the Pentagon from paying for troops' gender transition surgery.

But virtually no one has suggested drumming them out of the military altogether.

"Everyone was confused and I think there are still confused," said Radha Iyengar, a senior economist at the government-funded Rand Corporation, who authored a recent study for the pentagon on the medical costs associated with transgender service members. "I think the Joint Chiefs statement helps that but we are waiting to see what the actual policy is."

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by Chevron: EPA nominees get grilled by EPW Democrats, NRC pick gets it from GOP — DOE nominees advance — Methane rule delayed
Date: Wednesday, October 04, 2017 4:12:18 PM

By Eric Wolff | 10/04/2017 04:09 PM EDT

With help from Anthony Adragna, Alex Guillén and Ben Lefebvre

NOM NOM NOM: Democrats on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee today grilled a quartet of nominees to second-level EPA posts, and Republicans gave what for to a Democratic nominee to a second term to the NRC.

Chemical nom declines to recuse himself: Michael Dourson, the nominee to head EPA's chemicals and pesticides office, declined today to recuse himself from any issue he worked on previously as an independent toxicologist, saying he would evaluate each one on a case-by-case basis, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Tom Carper, the top Democrat on the committee, asked Dourson to agree to a blanket recusal during his nomination hearing. Dourson said he would rely on guidance of agency ethics officials for any recusal issues. Carper would harp on the issue at the end of the hearing, saying: "You know what's most troubling about Mr. Dourson? I think most of us try to live our life by a set of rules or standards. One of the principles that guides me is what is right to do — not what is the easy or expedient thing to do, what's the right thing to do? He may be able to get an opinion from this administration from EPA counsel that he doesn't have to recuse himself. That wouldn't be the right thing to do."

Air nom uncertain how much humans contribute to climate change: William Wehrum, the nominee to run EPA's air office, said today that the degree of human contribution to climate change is an "open question," Pro's Alex Guillén reports. In response to inquiries from Jeff Merkley, Wehrum said human activity contributes in some manner to climate change, but declined to say whether human activity is the primary driver. Merkley said Wehrum's response indicated that Wehrum is "really quite frankly unacceptable to serve in this capacity."

Second term for NRC's Baran 'a big ask': EPW Chairman John Barrasso complained this morning that reconfirming NRC member Jeff Baran may be too high a price for Republicans to pay in exchange for Democrats easing their opposition to GOP nominees to the agency, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "Senate Democrats have refused to advance the nominations of Annie Caputo and David Wright to the NRC until Commissioner Baran is confirmed to a new five-year term," Barrasso said at nomination hearing with Baran and four nominees to the EPA. "To be clear, Mr. Baran's nomination is a big ask."

Vote won't be for a while: Looks like it will be a few weeks at least before EPW can vote on the four EPA nominees, given time for post-hearing questions for the record. Barrasso told reporters afterward that he is working on a "package" of nominations on the Senate floor, including enforcement nominee Susan Bodine, two Republican NRC nominees and a handful of Energy Department hopefuls. But Barrasso gave no sense of timing on when those might move. "There are a lot of nominees who have been through the process that the Democrats continue to hold up as part of an attempt to not allow President Trump to fill his sub-Cabinet," he added.

RESOURCES EYES REVENUE SHARING, BOEM-BSEE MERGER: The House Natural Resources Committee will bring up a draft bill on Oct. 11 that aims to make significant changes to offshore oil and gas drilling policies. An early draft was shared with ME, though we were told some unspecified changes have been made. The language would include offshore energy production revenue from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia in an offshore revenue sharing program with states; prevent future presidents from withdrawing sections of the outer continental shelf from drilling or designating marine sanctuaries; and repeal certain Obama-era rules on Arctic drilling, among other things. Democrats have said they'll oppose the measures, with former BOEM Regulation and Enforcement Director Michael Bromwich scheduled to speak as a minority witness against the draft bill's proposal for a study to merge BOEM and BSEE.

ENERGY NOMINEES ADVANCE: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee advanced two DOE nominees by voice vote today. Bruce Walker is nominated to be assistant secretary of Energy for electricity delivery and energy reliability and Steven Winberg, of Pennsylvania is nominated to be an assistant secretary of Energy for fossil energy.

METHANE RULE DELAYED: The Interior Department proposed to suspend enforcement of an Obama-era rule on methane emissions for 18 months as it plans to rewrite it, according to a document to be filed tomorrow in the Federal Register, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The agency said it is concerned that the final rule analysis "may have underestimated costs and overestimated benefits, and [BLM] is therefore presently reviewing that analysis for potential inaccuracies." The rule is intended to require oil and gas companies that extract from federal lands to capture more of the methane that leaks.

DC CIRCUIT CANCELS LNG ARGUMENTS: The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals canceled oral arguments today on two more Sierra Club lawsuits challenging the Energy Department's approval of liquefied natural gas export applications for sales to non-Free Trade Agreement countries, Darius reports. A three-judge panel canceled oral arguments over DOE's approvals of the Sabine Pass and Corpus Christi LNG projects today. Earlier today, the court canceled arguments for a case over DOE's approval of the Cove Point LNG project. The cancellations were unsurprising after the Sierra Club lost a similar lawsuit over another LNG application back in August.

SHARPEN YOUR PENCILS, BIODIESEL NOTICE COMMENTS OPEN: The EPA today published in the Federal Register its notice that it could cut biodiesel volumes required under the Renewable Fuel Standard. The proposal, released last week, was met with fierce resistance by biofuel producers. The agency will take comment until Oct. 19.

Dourson won't follow Democrat request to recuse himself on many chemicals issues Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/04/2017 11:25 AM EDT

Michael Dourson, the nominee to head EPA's chemicals and pesticides office, declined today to recuse himself from any issue he worked on previously as an independent toxicologist, saying he would evaluate each one on a case-by-case basis.

Sen. Tom Carper, the top Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee, asked Dourson to agree to a blanket recusal during his nomination hearing. Carper brought a chart that showed Dourson had often recommended significantly higher "safe" levels of substances than recommended by EPA, including chlorpyrifos — which EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt this year declined to ban despite agency scientists' recommendations — as well as perchlorate, PFOA, TCE and other chemicals.

"I can give you as many or more examples of situations where the science that we brought forward as a team actually lowered the safe dose ... for various sponsors," Dourson told Carper. He added that he has previously worked with or for various government entities.

Dourson said he would rely on guidance of agency ethics officials for any recusal issues.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has to set a date to vote on Dourson's nomination.

Wehrum says degree of human role in climate change an 'open question' Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/04/2017 01:38 PM EDT

William Wehrum, the nominee to run EPA's air office, said today that the degree of human contribution to climate change is an "open question."

In response to questions from Sen. Jeff Merkley, Wehrum said human activity contributes in some manner to climate change, but declined to say whether human activity is the primary driver.

"These are very complex issues and very important issues and I understand they're important to you," Wehrum added at a Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing before Merkley cut him off. Wehrum declined several times to answer follow-up questions, drawing the ire of Merkley, who expressed incredulity that Wehrum was not familiar enough with those issues to comment despite his lengthy history working on environmental legal issues in the private sector and at EPA.

"No one can look at what is happening on the planet and see that there is nothing happening unless you're deliberately determined to ignore that information," Merkley said. "And that makes you really quite frankly unacceptable to serve in this capacity."

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has not yet set a date to vote on Wehrum's nomination.

Barrasso: Baran renomination to NRC is a 'big ask' Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 10:59 AM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso complained this morning that re-confirming Nuclear Regulatory Commission member Jeff Baran may be too high a price for Republicans to pay in exchange for Democrats easing their opposition to GOP nominees to the agency.

"Senate Democrats have refused to advance the nominations of Annie Caputo and David Wright to the NRC until Commissioner Baran is confirmed to a new five-year term," Barrasso said at nomination hearing with Baran and four nominees to the EPA. "To be clear, Mr. Baran's nomination is a big ask."

Caputo and Wright secured the blessing of EPW in July but Sen. Tom Carper has pressed that Baran, whose seat expires in June, get a new five-year term and move alongside Republican picks as a bipartisan package.

But Barrasso bristled at the notion of having Baran on the NRC longer than President Donald Trump's GOP nominees, as well as NRC Chairwoman Kristine Svinicki. Wright and Caputo are up for terms expiring in June 2020 and June 2021, respectively. The Wyoming Republican also said he's hardly seen reason to drop his long-held opposition to Baran since former Sen. Barbara Boxer originally pushed him through the Senate years ago.

"In December 2014, the last time the Senate confirmed Mr. Baran, only one Republican voted in favor of his confirmation," Barrasso said. "Since then, Commissioner Baran has given me little reason to reconsider my vote."

WHAT'S NEXT: EPW has not yet scheduled a vote on the nominees.

DOE electricity, fossil picks easily clear Senate energy committee Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 03:03 PM EDT

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee gave its support to two Energy Department assistant secretary nominees today, the panel announced.

President Donald Trump has tapped Bruce Walker to lead DOE's electricity delivery and energy reliability office, while Steven Winberg was picked to head the agency's fossil energy programs. Both were approved by the Energy committee on a voice vote.

The panel held a hearing last week to consider both nominees and was supposed to vote on them out at a Tuesday markup that was canceled Monday night.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Winberg and Walker nominations move to the full Senate but it's unclear when they will get approved.

BLM proposes 18-month delay to methane rule Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/04/2017 09:59 AM EDT

The Interior Department proposed to suspend enforcement of an Obama-era rule on methane emissions for 18 months as it plans to rewrite it, according to a document to be filed tomorrow in the Federal Register.

"The BLM is currently reviewing the 2016 final rule and wants to avoid imposing temporary or permanent compliance costs on operators for requirements that may be rescinded or significantly revised in the near future," the agency said in the document.

The agency said it is concerned that the final rule analysis "may have underestimated costs and overestimated benefits, and [BLM] is therefore presently reviewing that analysis for potential inaccuracies."

The 2016 rule was intended to require oil and gas developers on federal lands to capture more of the methane that leaked during their operations. The rule went into effect in January 2017 and survived an effort by Congressional Republicans to repeal it.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will accept public comments on the proposal for 30 days.

Court cancels more LNG export challenges Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 01:56 PM EDT

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals canceled oral arguments today on two more Sierra Club lawsuits challenging the Energy Department's approval of liquefied natural gas export applications for sales to non-Free Trade Agreement countries.

A three-judge panel canceled oral arguments over DOE's approvals of the Sabine Pass and Corpus Christi LNG projects today. Earlier today, the court canceled arguments for a case over DOE's approval of the Cove Point LNG project.

All three lawsuits were scheduled to be heard Oct. 18.

The Sierra Club lost a similar lawsuit against the agency over its approval Freeport's LNG export application in August, Sierra Club v. DOE, 15-1489. The group did not appeal the decision, which unanimously opted to defer to DOE's "reasoned explanation as to why it believed the indirect effects pertaining to increased gas production were not reasonably foreseeable."

WHAT'S NEXT: Now that the judges intend to make a decision on all three cases without having oral arguments, a decision may be released in the next few weeks.

Appeals court cancels arguments on second LNG challenge Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 12:28 PM EDT

A three-judge federal appeals panel today canceled oral arguments on a lawsuit from the Sierra Club challenging the Energy Department's approval of the Cove Point liquefied natural gas export application.

"The court concludes, on its own motion, that oral argument will not assist the court in this case," according to an order agreed to by D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals judges David Tatel, Harry Edwards and David Sentelle.

The oral arguments had been scheduled for Oct. 18.

Environmentalists said that the agency didn't properly estimate how the gas shipments might increase prices domestically, potentially boost coal use in the power system or increase greenhouse emissions. DOE had defended itself by arguing that producing the numbers Sierra Club is seeking would be so speculative as to be meaningless.

The cancellation isn't a big surprise after the Sierra Club lost a similar lawsuit against the agency over its approval Freeport's LNG export application in August, Sierra Club v. DOE, 15-1489. The group did not appeal the decision, unanimously opted to defer to DOE's "reasoned explanation as to why it believed the indirect effects pertaining to increased gas production were not reasonably foreseeable."

Sentelle, a senior circuit judge, is on both cases.

Federal appeals court swats away challenge to DOE's LNG review Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/15/2017 11:29 AM EDT

A federal appeals court landed a major legal blow against environmentalists today when a three-judge panel upheld the Energy Department's process for evaluating liquefied natural gas export applications.

The Sierra Club had challenged DOE's authorization of the Freeport LNG terminal to export liquefied natural gas, arguing that the agency didn't properly estimate how those shipments might increase domestic prices, potentially boost coal use in the power system or increase greenhouse emissions.

DOE had argued that producing the numbers Sierra Club is seeking would be so speculative as to be meaningless, a position the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals judges unanimously felt justified in deferring to the agency.

Although DOE made some of its arguments "needlessly complicated," the judges agreed that it "offered a reasoned explanation as to why it believed the indirect effects pertaining to increased gas production were not reasonably foreseeable," Judge Robert Wilkins wrote for the panel.

During oral arguments in February, the panel seemed to sympathize with Sierra Club's desire for a more detailed analysis of exporting U.S. natural gas while also hesitating to find fault in the Energy Department's work up to that point.

The judges today ultimately opted to take a "limited and deferential review" and said the Sierra Club didn't knock down the government's concerns about a speculative analysis.

DOE reasonably argued, Wilkins wrote, that "every natural-gas producing region in the country is a potential source for new gas wells in order to meet export-induced natural gas demand."

WHAT'S NEXT: The D.C. Circuit announced Monday that it would take oral arguments Oct. 18 on a similar Sierra Club lawsuit against DOE over the agency's export approval for Dominion's Cove Point LNG project.

Tillerson: I have 'never' considered resigning Back

By Louis Nelson | 10/04/2017 11:10 AM EDT

Secretary of State Rex Tillerson said Wednesday that he has never considered resigning his position, disputing an NBC News report that he was on the verge of such a move over the summer.

"The vice president has never had to persuade me to remain as secretary of state because I have never considered leaving this post," Tillerson said during a hastily scheduled news conference at the State Department.

Tillerson did not directly address whether he had called Trump a "moron," as NBC reported. "We don't deal with that kind of petty nonsense," he said when asked about the report.

"Let me tell you what I have learned about this president, whom I did not know before taking this office: He loves his country. He puts Americans and America first," the secretary of state and former ExxonMobil CEO said. "He's smart. He demands results wherever he goes and he holds those around him accountable for whether they've done the job he's asked them to do."

State Department spokeswoman Heather Nauert later said at a press briefing that she had spoken to Tillerson about the "moron" remark and that "the secretary does not use that type of language. The secretary did not use that type of language to speak about the president of the United States. He does not use that language to speak about anyone."

Nauert also said that the two men had a "good conversation" following Tillerson's remarks and that the secretary had said he and Trump are "all good."

Shortly after Tillerson's statement, Trump tweeted that, "The @NBCNews story has just been totally refuted by Sec. Tillerson and @VP Pence," even though the secretary of state had not denied calling the president a "moron." "It is #FakeNews. They should issue an apology to AMERICA!" Trump wrote.

NBC News reported Wednesday that Tillerson had referred to Trump as a "moron" after a meeting at the Pentagon last July with members of the president's national security team. Citing multiple unnamed sources, the network reported that the secretary of state was close to resigning in the wake of the president's controversial, political speech at a Boy Scouts of America jamboree and only remained in his job after discussions with Vice President Mike Pence and other administration officials.

Trump has butted heads at times with his top diplomat, most recently last weekend on Twitter, where the president appeared to undercut Tillerson, who had said a day earlier that the U.S. was in direct communication with North Korea in an effort to reduce tensions over its nuclear ambitions. "I told Rex Tillerson, our wonderful Secretary of State, that he is wasting his time trying to negotiate with Little Rocket Man," Trump tweeted. "Save your energy Rex, we'll do what has to be done!"

Despite the back-and-forth between Trump and Tillerson, White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said earlier this week that the president retained confidence in his secretary of state. She repeated that view on Wednesday.

"As we've said many times before, if the president doesn't have confidence in somebody, they will no longer be in their position," Sanders told reporters aboard Air Force One as Trump headed to Las Vegas.

Tillerson has appeared to break ranks with the president at other critical moments. Last August, he told "Fox News Sunday" that "the president speaks for himself" when asked about Trump's equivocating response to a white supremacist rally in Charlottesville, Virginia.

R.C. Hammond, Tillerson's spokesman, issued his own clean-up of sorts on Wednesday morning, tweeting that he "spoke out of line" when he told NBC about conversations regarding U.N. ambassador Nikki Haley, who is rumored to be a replacement for Tillerson.

Hammond had told NBC that Pence had asked Tillerson "if he thought Nikki Haley, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, was helpful to the administration, or if he was worried about the role she was playing."

"Regarding the NBC News report: I spoke out of line about conversations I wasn't privy to," Hammond tweeted on Wednesday. "I should've given more complete info or none at all regarding the positive role Amb. Haley plays in the Admin."

Jarrold Agen, a spokesman for Pence, also issued a statement, denying that the vice president had talked with Tillerson about potentially leaving or that Pence had questioned Haley's role.

"The Vice President can also confirm that, as the Secretary of State made clear, at no time did he and the Secretary ever discuss the prospect of the Secretary's resignation from the administration. Any reporting to the contrary is categorically false," Agen said. "In addition, any statements that the Vice President questioned Ambassador Nikki Haley's value to the Trump Administration is also categorically false. The Vice President has known Ambassador Nikki Haley for many years, holds her in the highest regard, and appreciates her strong service to this administration at The United Nations."

Tillerson, a political newcomer who faced one of the most contentious Senate confirmation hearings in recent history, has said in the past that he was hesitant to accept the position of secretary of state and had been looking forward to retirement before it was offered.

"I didn't want this job. I didn't seek this job," Tillerson told IJR last March. "My wife told me I'm supposed to do this."

Trump loyalists lose patience with congressional Russia probes Back

By Kyle Cheney and Elana Schor | 10/04/2017 05:05 AM EDT

Loyalists of President Donald Trump are losing patience with Republican leaders over the wide-ranging Russia probes creeping into his inner circle, saying House Speaker Paul Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell have allowed the investigations to hobble the White House for months.

Congressional investigators, say some lawmakers and state GOP leaders who back Trump, have let the probes — and the media coverage they generate — sidetrack the president as his allies, family members and aides are hauled in for questioning about whether Russians had American help in their quest to tip the 2016 election against Democrat Hillary Clinton.

GOP leaders largely have kept their distance as the House and Senate intelligence committees and the Senate Judiciary Committee conduct their separate Russia probes — which are independent of the investigation underway by special counsel Robert Mueller, a former FBI director. The Senate intelligence panel will update the public on its progress Wednesday. But Trump's most ardent supporters say it's time to clamp down.

"Three investigations is just way too many," said Rep. Andy Biggs (R-Ariz.). "Some of them need to step back and wait until we see what evidence is educed."

Lori Klein Corbin, a member of the Republican National Committee from Arizona, said the probes are a distraction to Trump.

"Of course, the Republican leadership is behind these probes," she said. "The Republicans cannot get over the fact that Trump won and is our president."

Some Trump allies believe that the congressional inquiries offer Democrats platforms to raise questions that strike at the legitimacy of the 2016 election. And they allow a steady drumbeat of leaks and mini-revelations to preserve a sense of intrigue and suspicion around key figures in the Trump White House.

Steve Bannon, Trump's former chief strategist, crystallized the fury last week when, during a Fox News interview, he called out McConnell and Ryan by name.

"Mitch McConnell and Paul Ryan have allowed three investigative committees on Capitol Hill with full subpoena power, they're going after President Trump every day," he boomed. In a "60 Minutes" interview last month, Bannon suggested the investigations were an attempt by the Republican establishment to "nullify" the 2016 election.

Members of Trump's base began echoing the complaints, accusing leaders in their own party of harboring secret desires to undermine the Trump agenda.

"From the beginning, Mitch McConnell and Paul Ryan have not been friends of the president of the United States," said Robert Graham, a former chairman of the Arizona Republican Party.

GOP leadership aides reject suggestions they're working to undermine Trump and say meddling in the work of their committees would be counterproductive and wrong.

"This is not a Congress that gets in the way of investigations," said one House leadership aide, adding that if a thorough probe exonerates Trump, it would help "clear his name."

That's the tack that most Republicans in Congress have taken amid the swirl of allegations that has engulfed the White House. "I am hopeful it will be fair and impartial and will illuminate the facts of exactly what Russia did to undermine our electoral process," said Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), who ran against Trump for the 2016 GOP nomination.

But the even-handedness is partly what's infuriating Trump's most zealous supporters. They want their colleagues instead to probe more deeply into issues that could harm Democrats — from allegations about mishandling of funds by the Clinton Foundation to revelations that former FBI Director James Comey may have drafted a statement exonerating Clinton in a 2016 investigation before agents had finished witness interviews.

Democrats, they complain, surely wouldn't investigate a president of their own party with as much vigor.

"My friends on the other side of the aisle, they view almost everything through a political lens," said Biggs, "and Republicans don't seem to do that as well."

Rep. Lou Barletta (R-Pa.), who is running for the Senate on a pro-Trump platform, also indicated that he's tiring of the Russia probes.

"I think the American people just expect us to move on and get their work done instead of focusing on what appears to be a witch hunt," he said.

In the Senate Intelligence Committee, where the Russia probe appears to be the most advanced, top investigators Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) and Sen. Mark Warner (D-Va.) have attempted to maintain bipartisan comity. They've been tight-lipped about their findings so far and say they are limited in what they can discuss publicly — both by the traditional secrecy of the committee and because the probe relies on classified information.

The committee has most recently focused on Russia's manipulation of Facebook, Twitter and Google to drive an anti-Clinton propaganda campaign and inflame cultural divisions in the United States. But many Trump supporters think social media is a sideshow as well.

"People think it's crazy. I think your average person in Nebraska has concluded there's nothing there. That's certainly my conclusion," said J.L. Spray, a Republican national committeeman from Nebraska. "There's so many phantoms, and now we learn about Facebook and Google. I think we're just swinging at air. The big 'duh' is the Russians are f---ing with us on Facebook. Any 9-year-old kid would figure that out."

Veteran GOP strategist Saul Anuzis said the griping by Trump supporters reflects pent-up frustration that Trump has been besieged since his inauguration.

"I think there's a frustration that Trump seems to be constantly under attack. It doesn't matter what the process is, there's a feeling that he's not being fairly treated," he said. "The president never got his honeymoon period."

Many Republicans are still waiting to see what comes of the probes. Among the right-leaning grass roots in Burr's home state, "it's maybe 50-50" between those who support letting the investigations take their course and those who perceive the Russia inquiries as a threat to the president, said Erik Wilson, a board member of the free-market Republican Liberty Caucus of North Carolina.

"I think the greater risk would be if they didn't. The backlash and the hue and cry of cover-up and political favoritism would probably be far worse," said former RNC Chairman Michael Steele.

"Let the committees do their job and let the investigations go where they need to go," Steele said. "The general thinking is, well, if there was no behavior to investigate in the first place, well, we wouldn't be here then, would we?"

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by Chevron: Former EPA official expected to be air office pick — BLM requests comment on fracking rule — Group questions Pruitt's trips home

FORMER EPA OFFICIAL EYED FOR AIR OFFICE: President Donald Trump is expected to select an EPA official from the George W. Bush administration to run the agency's powerful air office, Alex Guillén reports. Wehrum would provide critical knowledge of EPA's workings and environmental law, but as an industry lawyer he represented several high-profile clients in lawsuits challenging numerous Obama-era EPA regulations — meaning he may face recusal and conflict issues similar to Pruitt. Bill Wehrum served as acting assistant administrator for the Office of Air and Radiation from 2005-07 and spent 2001-05 as counsel to Jeff Holmstead, Bush's first air administrator.

Since leaving EPA, Wehrum has represented a Who's Who of industry interests seeking to block Obama-era environmental and safety rules. His clients in various lawsuits have included the American Petroleum Institute, American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers, the Utility Air Regulatory Group and several other trade associations. Alex has more here.

BLM WANTS TO NIX OBAMA FRACKING RULE: The Bureau of Land Management is calling for comments on a plan to rescind an Obama-era rule which set regulations for fracking on federal land, Ben Lefebvre reports. In a proposal to be published in Tuesday's Federal Register, the agency writes: "BLM believes that the 2015 final rule unnecessarily burdens industry with compliance costs and information requirements that are duplicative of regulatory programs of many states and some tribes." For months the Interior Department has signaled that it would either rewrite, suspend or rescind the rule BLM put in place in 2015 requiring drillers to publicly disclose what chemicals they put in their fracking fluids and perform well integrity tests before drilling.

GROUP QUESTIONS PRUITT'S TRIPS HOME: The Environmental Integrity Project, a watchdog group, wants EPA's inspector general to investigate Administrator Scott Pruitt's travel home to Oklahoma. Pruitt spent 43 days in March, April and May on trips back to his home state, according to travel records obtained by the group, and include weekend trips home as well as official business in the state. The records indicate Pruitt sometimes paid his own airfare, but often went at the government's expense, Alex reports.

"These travel records show that Administrator Pruitt is more focused on cultivating his relationships with industry and conservative political organizations in his home state of Oklahoma than he is on protecting the environment and the public health for the rest of America," EIP Executive Director Eric Schaeffer said in a statement. The group asked the agency's IG to investigate Pruitt's travel today, according to an EIP spokesman said. As precedent, the spokesman pointed to a 2015 IG report on a regional administrator who scheduled more than half of his official trips to areas near his home in California's Orange County, some of which the IG questioned. More here.

PROMOTING PRUITT'S GREAT LAKES BREAK WITH TRUMP: EPA's press shop is touting its boss' independence on the topic of Great Lakes funding, after Pruitt last week broke with the White House over its proposed elimination of federal spending on the popular Great Lakes Restoration Initiative during a swing through Minnesota. The press shop this afternoon circulated to reporters an excerpt from a Minnesota Star Tribune opinion piece lauding Pruitt's support for the program — but EPA's email did not include the article's last paragraph warning Pruitt that industry cannot police itself and that "Minnesotans will be watching carefully."

PERRY TWEETS: Energy Secretary Rick Perry signaled he's working with Oregon Rep. Greg Walden, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. "Thanks @repgregwalden for joining me for lunch. Looking forward to working together with our friends @HouseCommerce toward #EnergyDominance," Perry wrote in a tweet, which also featured a photo of the two men.

REPORT: TILLERSON EXIT POSSIBLE: CNN reports today Secretary of State Rex Tillerson was turned off by Trump's public rebuke of Attorney General Jeff Sessions, so much so that a "Rexit" from Foggy Bottom would not at all be surprising to two sources who spoke to the network. The former ExxonMobil CEO "has a growing list of differences with the White House, including a new debate over Iran policy and personnel," CNN reports. "His frustration is hardly a secret and it has spilled out publicly at times. But friends sense a change of late." Two sources told CNN there has been "a noticeable increase in the secretary's frustration and his doubts that the tug-of-war with the White House would subside anytime soon." But the two "also acknowledged it could have been venting after a tough week, a suggestion several DC-based sources made when asked if they saw evidence Tillerson was looking for an exit strategy." Read it here.

STATE AGS FILE CHEMICAL SAFETY SUIT: New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman, along with a group of 10 other state AGs, filed a lawsuit today against EPA for "illegally delaying a vital rule meant to protect communities, workers, and first responders from dangerous chemical accidents," his office announced. The group is taking aim at the 20-month delay of a chemical safety rule by the agency for facilities with toxic chemicals on site, POLITICO New York's Marie J. French reports. The lawsuit, which was filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, argues that the EPA's delay exceeds the agency's authority under the Clean Air Act. AGs from Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington all signed onto the lawsuit.

SIERRA FILES INTENT TO SUE GEORGIA POWER: The Sierra Club today announced it has served a notice of intent to sue electric utility Georgia Power, in order to block the company from draining its ash ponds at 11 coal-burning power plant sites, "without getting updated permits that would protect waterways and the public's health." In a statement, Stephen Stetson, the group's senior representative for its Beyond Coal campaign in Georgia, said: "Today's filing puts Georgia Power on notice that we'll fight to make sure they adhere to the critical public health protections in the Clean Water Act before they start pumping water from these toxic coal ash ponds into our lakes and rivers."

A LOOK AT TRUMP APPROVAL IN KEY SENATE STATES: Trump's approval rating averages above 50 percent among adults in 3 out of 10 states he won in November that were held by Senate Democrats, Campaign Pro's Kevin Robillard reports. According to a new Gallup poll of the first five months of Trump's presidency, Trump's "average approval rating in Sen. Joe Manchin's West Virginia averages 60 percent, with just 35 percent disapproval. In North Dakota, where Republicans are still trying to find a recruit against Sen. Heidi Heitkamp, Trump's approval rating has averaged 59 percent, with 36 percent disapproval. And in Montana, home to Sen. Jon Tester, 56 percent approve and 41 percent disapprove," Kevin writes. More Missourians approve of Trump's performance than disapprove, 49 percent to 46 percent, but the president's numbers are underwater in the other six states where Democrats are defending Senate seats next year. In Arizona, Nevada and Texas, where Republican Senate incumbents are seeking reelection, at least half of adults disapprove of Trump's performance. Read the poll summary here.

Trump expected to pick Bush EPA official turned industry lawyer for agency's air office

By Alex Guillén | 07/24/2017 10:03 AM EDT

President Donald Trump is expected to nominate Bill Wehrum, a former George W. Bush-era EPA official, to run the agency's powerful air office, according to two sources outside the administration familiar with the plans.

While Wehrum would bring critical knowledge of EPA's workings and environmental law, he also represents several high-profile industry groups in lawsuits challenging numerous Obama-era EPA regulations, meaning he may face recusal and conflict issues similar to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt.

Wehrum served as acting assistant administrator for the Office of Air and Radiation from 2005 to 2007. Bush pulled Wehrum's formal nomination to that post after Democrats blocked him as too industry-friendly, though the new simple majority threshold on nominees likely will prevent that from happening again. Wehrum spent 2001-2005 as counsel to Jeff Holmstead, Bush's first air administrator. Holmstead emerged last month as a possible Trump pick to be EPA deputy administrator, though coal lobbyist Andrew Wheeler remains the frontrunner for that job.

In a 2013 interview with Law360, Wehrum said that despite the Supreme Court's 2007 ruling that said EPA has the authority to regulate greenhouse gases, he believes "Congress never intended the EPA to address an issue such as climate change under the Clean Air Act."

He also called for lengthening the review cycle for National Ambient Air Quality Standards beyond five years — House Republicans recently passed a bill that would stretch that to ten years — and said the Obama administration tried to shift power away from the states and toward EPA, comments since echoed by Pruitt.

And in a 2015 Wall Street Journal editorial, Wehrum said the EPA-caused Gold King mine spill highlighted how the agency "often criminalizes actions that are nothing more than accidents, many far less damaging to the environment than the Animas River disaster." That spill fouled Colorado's Animas River and downstream areas for several weeks before water quality returned to normal and the river was reopened to recreational activities.

Wehrum pointed to the 2014 chemical spill that fouled drinking water for hundreds of thousands of West Virginia residents, which led to an EPA investigation and the company's bankruptcy, as an example of "unjust" treatment.

For the last decade Wehrum has been a partner at the high-powered D.C. law firm Hunton & Williams, where he currently represents high-profile clients, including two leading oil and gas industry lobbying groups, in a number of ongoing lawsuits against EPA.

Wehrum represents the American Petroleum Institute in a challenge to EPA's methane rule for new oil and gas wells, as well as the separate legal battle over EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's decision to stay that rule while under review, where API has defended Pruitt's stay.

He also represents either API or American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers, a refinery sector group, in lawsuits over a 2015 rule limiting pollution from oil refineries; a "regional consistency" rule that governs how court rulings apply to nationwide EPA regulations; and permitting rules for Indian lands.

He represents the Utility Air Regulatory Group, a coalition that challenges EPA air regulations, in a legal challenge over an Obama-era rule meant to decrease explosions at chemical plants and other facilities. Pruitt has put that rule on hold while it is under review.

Wehrum helped the Gas Processors Association challenge two greenhouse gas reporting rules. He took an EPA boiler regulation to court on behalf of a coalition of industry groups, including the American Chemistry Council, the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Forest & Paper Association. He is challenging an EPA emissions rule for brick manufacturers on behalf of an industry group. And he represented construction interests in various lawsuits against the Labor Department, including an ongoing challenge to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's 2016 silica exposure rule.

Wehrum did not immediately reply to a request for comment on Monday. EPA and White House spokespeople did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

BLM proposes withdrawing Obama-era fracking rule Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 07/24/2017 10:04 AM EDT

The Interior Department is calling for comments on a plan to rescind an Obama-era rule setting regulations for hydraulic fracturing on federal land.

"BLM believes that the 2015 final rule unnecessarily burdens industry with compliance costs and information requirements that are duplicative of regulatory programs of many states and some tribes," the agency said in a proposal to rescind the rule to be filed in the Federal Register Tuesday.

Interior has signaled for months that it would either rewrite, suspend or rescind the rule BLM put in place in 2015 requiring drillers to publicly disclose what chemicals they put in their fracking fluids and perform well integrity tests before drilling. Focus on the rule is heating up as more rigs are being put to work this year amid a recovery from the market crash of recent ago.

Environmental groups have said the rule is necessary to ensure dangerous chemicals don't leak out of fracked wells and into water supplies. President Donald Trump singled out the rule for review in a March executive order, however, arguing that it burdened domestic energy production.

The rule never went into effect, having been fought over in court as soon as it was issued. Environmental groups and oil and gas companies are waging a legal battle whether BLM has jurisdiction over drilling procedures.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM's call for comments will last for 60 days.

Pruitt spent significant time in Oklahoma in spring, records show Back

By Alex Guillén | 07/24/2017 10:49 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt spent 43 days in March, April and May on trips to his home state of Oklahoma, according to travel records obtained by the watchdog group Environmental Integrity Project.

The records, released under the Freedom of Information Act, include weekend trips home as well as official business in the state, such as a tour of a chemical plant or an awards event hosted by the Oklahoma Well Strippers Association. The records indicate Pruitt sometimes paid his own airfare but often went at the government's expense.

"These travel records show that Administrator Pruitt is more focused on cultivating his relationships with industry and conservative political organizations in his home state of Oklahoma than he is on protecting the environment and the public health for the rest of America," EIP Executive Director Eric Schaeffer said in a statement.

The group will ask EPA's inspector general to investigate Pruitt's travel Monday, an EIP spokesman said. As precedent, he pointed to a 2015 IG report on a regional administrator who scheduled more than half of his official trips to areas near his home in California's Orange County, some of which the IG questioned.

EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said in a statement that Pruitt was focused on running EPA, "not running for elected office. The administrator's travel, whether to Utah, Michigan or Oklahoma, all serves the purpose of hearing from hard-working Americans about how EPA can better serve the American people."

Pruitt said at an industry conference in May that his wife would join him in living in Washington this summer since both their children are both now in college, which could decrease his weekend trips home to Oklahoma.

Pruitt's predecessor, Gina McCarthy, paid her own way for trips home to Boston approximately every other week, according to an EIP spokesman.

Gallup: Trump approval ratings in key Senate states Back

By Kevin Robillard | 07/24/2017 10:32 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's approval rating averages above 50 percent among adults in three of the ten states he won in November held by Senate Democrats, according to Gallup's polling summary of the first five months of his presidency.

Trump's average approval rating in Sen. Joe Manchin's West Virginia averages 60 percent, with just 35 percent disapproval. In North Dakota, where Republicans are still trying to find a recruit against Sen. Heidi Heitkamp, Trump's approval rating has averaged 59 percent, with 36 percent disapproval. And in Montana, home to Sen. Jon Tester, 56 percent approve and 41 percent disapprove.

The president's numbers are almost certainly better among registered and likely voters, which lean more Republican than the total adult population. But the numbers provide the most detailed state-by-state look at Trump's popularity since the 2016 election.

Republicans already hold the other 14 states where Trump's approval rating topped 50 percent in the first half of the year.

Missouri is the only other Democratic-held state where Trump's approval among adults outweighs his disapproval, 49 percent to 46 percent. In Ohio and Indiana, 47 percent approve on average with 48 percent disapproval. In Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, 43 percent approve on average with 52 percent disapproval. Michigan sees an average 42 percent approval and 52 percent disapproval, while Florida sees 42 percent approval and 51 percent disapproval.

Trump's ratings are similar among adults in Arizona, Nevada and Texas, where three Republican senators are up for reelection next year. Forty-four percent approved of Trump in Nevada, with 50 percent disapproval. In Arizona, 43 percent approved and 52 percent disapproved. And in Texas, 42 percent approved and 51 percent disapproved on average.

Across all 50 states, Trump's approval rating has averaged 40 percent. The polls are based on interviews with more than 81,000 U.S. adults from Jan. 20 to June 20.

GOP despairs at inability to deliver Back

By Eliana Johnson and Josh Dawsey | 07/23/2017 11:54 PM EDT

The Republican Party is more powerful than it's been in more than a decade — and yet it has rarely seemed so weak.

Continuing chaos in the White House has been punctuated by the failure to deliver on the GOP's seven-year pledge to overhaul Obamacare and has many asking whether the party can capitalize on the sweeping election victories it has achieved at the federal, state and local levels.

Ahead of this week's crucial Senate vote on health care, White House aides are considering how to distance Donald Trump from Congress and how to go after the Republicans who vote no — an idea the president seems fond of, according to people who have spoken to him. Several people said he plans to keep up the fight, no matter how this week's vote goes.

Trump threatened Republicans on Twitter, writing Sunday that they would face electoral consequences, and complained about his party not defending him — even though congressional Republicans are tired of defending him all the time.

"It's very sad that Republicans, even some that were carried over the line on my back, do very little to protect their President," he wrote.

Meanwhile, people close to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell say they are frustrated that the president has shown little focus on his political agenda, particularly health care. Trump's interview with The New York Times last week, for example, in which he raged about Attorney General Jeff Sessions instead of promoting health care, was "political malpractice," one senior GOP aide said.

With control of both Congress and the White House — and yet no major legislative successes to point to — the Republican Party is finding itself stuck. A GOP Congress is frustrated with the president and unsure what will happen next in his daily West Wing drama. And Trump wants to sign legislation to show he is effective and is frustrated bills are not on his desk.

A sudden White House shakeup on Friday made it even more clear that Trump, who campaigned as an outsider, is determined to govern as one, too — and not listen to McConnell, House Speaker Paul Ryan or other orthodox allies. The president expanded the power of the political neophytes in his administration, elevating Manhattan hedge fund manager Anthony Scaramucci to White House communications director, at the cost of an operative — press secretary Sean Spicer, who announced his resignation on Friday — with years of Washington experience.

Spicer was not the only establishment casualty. Reince Priebus, the White House chief of staff who, at least in title, holds one of the most powerful jobs in Washington, has been largely sidelined. Several West Wing aides suggested he should quit — and wondered Sunday why he doesn't, according to White House aides and advisers.

The hire of Scaramucci was the biggest shot yet at Priebus, White House officials say, because he was opposed by Priebus, will report directly to Trump and will be far more powerful than a normal communications director.

Let "the president be the president" is how Scaramucci described his new job in a Fox News interview on Sunday, an indication that the newly shaken-up White House will be the same as the old — where, last Wednesday, the president scheduled and conducted the blockbuster interview with the Times with the assistance of a single communications aide, Hope Hicks, and without the knowledge of his senior advisers.

Even Trump supporters are beginning to express frustration with the constant chaos in the West Wing. "There are a lot of missed opportunities," said Julius Krein, who founded the pro-Trump journal American Affairs in February in an effort to give the Trump movement some intellectual heft. "It has all degenerated into D.C. tempests and teapots," Krein said, characterizing policies championed by the administration in the first six months as "mediocre conventional Republicanism with a lot more noise."

While Trump has specialized in delivering self-inflicted blows, the Senate Republican Conference is demonstrating that it, too, is capable of administering them.

Sens. Mike Lee (R-Utah) and Jerry Moran (R-Kan.) ground the legislative process to a halt with their surprise announcement last week — made without informing McConnell or the White House — that they would not support the bill.

But several people involved in the process, including three chiefs of staff to lawmakers poised to support the bill, complained that McConnell ran a process that was ultimately too secretive and kept a stranglehold on information. And he has yet to speak with Lee personally since the senator's defection July 17, according to a Lee aide.

The Senate is expected to vote Tuesday on a motion to proceed to a vote on the bill, though it's not clear McConnell has the votes he needs to advance the measure.

News that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is suffering from an aggressive brain tumor cast a darker pall on the week's events.

The frustration at the inability to deliver on the long-held promise of repealing Obamacare is also deepening the soul-searching among Republicans.

Trump's rise had already exacerbated a point of internal Republican debate between limited-government conservatives and the blue-collar voters Trump helped draw into the party, voters who were essential to the victories of Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush, and with whom George H.W. Bush and Mitt Romney failed to connect.

Many of the latter rely on government subsidies and programs. "You have Republicans who run against Obamacare but actually like Obamacare," Florida Rep. Ron DeSantis told the Washington Examiner last week.

Ohio Sen. Rob Portman and West Virginia Sen. Shelley Moore Capito both represent states that Trump carried by sizable margins but that expanded Medicaid under Obamacare and have large populations afflicted by the opioid epidemic; both expressed reservations about the Senate bill. Vice President Mike Pence spent time over the weekend with Portman in Ohio, and Trump was to appear in West Virginia on Monday.

The intractability of the Obamacare repeal debate has some conservatives wondering whether the ideological tide is moving against limited government altogether. "If a Republican won this time around, it was going to show that maybe Obama was this historic exception. He got in there because of the financial crisis and then again because of a flawed opponent in Romney," said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review. "Now it looks like Trump might just be a very temporary break. It's a very bad situation."

But several top Republicans, including former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a close ally of the Trump administration, said that the effort to roll back Obamacare is not dead yet, and conservatives warned GOP lawmakers that failure will have dire repercussions.

"If this fails, it is a disaster for them. They will lose their moral authority to get anything done and lead. There will be a real breakdown of the Republican Senate," said David McIntosh, president of the Club for Growth.

White House officials and lawmakers alike worried that a setback on health care would snowball, making tax reform and an infrastructure bill more difficult. "The fear is that we look impotent, that it makes things harder for the debt ceiling and that it makes tax reform harder," said a senior administration official.

To add to those woes, the Russia-related inquiries that have enraged the president show no signs of abating. The president's son-in-law, Jared Kushner, answered questions before the Senate Intelligence Committee on Monday and is scheduled to do so again Tuesday with the House Intelligence Committee. Trump's eldest son, Donald Trump Jr., and former Trump campaign chairman Paul Manafort are also scheduled to testify before Congress in the coming days. Meanwhile, Trump himself was to address more than 40,000 Boy Scouts on Monday at their annual Jamboree in West Virginia, a state he carried by 42 points.

Against the backdrop of White House chaos and congressional paralysis, McCain's diagnosis, the proximate cause of Lee's and Moran's announcement that they had decided to sink the health care bill, seemed a literal manifestation of an illness in the GOP. His status as an American hero who has drawn bipartisan admiration during his 3 1/2 decades in Washington evoked nostalgia for the political establishment that Trump, the putative head of the GOP, was elected to raze.

"The only thing that makes it somewhat complicated is that the conventional establishment, while less chaotic, their record over the past 30 years is pretty bad. That makes it harder to desire a reversion to that sort of mode," Krein said.

Kushner defends his Russia contacts: 'I did not collude' Back

By Annie Karni | 07/24/2017 06:03 AM EDT

In his first public defense of his meetings with Russian officials during Donald Trump's campaign and transition, Jared Kushner on Monday presented his encounters with those operatives as innocent interactions, according to testimony submitted to Senate investigators.

In an 11-page opening statement to the Senate Intelligence Committee, which is part of the ongoing investigation into possible collusion between Russian officials and the Trump campaign, Kushner — now a senior White House adviser — attempted to exonerate himself, writing: "I did not collude, nor know of anyone else in the campaign who colluded, with any foreign government."

Instead, the powerful son-in-law painted a picture of himself as a loyal, overworked, under-experienced senior adviser to his father-in-law during a novice campaign that was never staffed up to win.

Kushner reiterated the message in a brief statement to reporters gathered outside the White House after testifying for more than two hours to the Senate panel. He took no questions.

But the remarks, designed to look fully transparent and take Kushner out of the Russia investigation spotlight, appeared to raise more questions about Kushner's judgment than it answered.

To wit: the former real estate developer explained the glaring omissions on his security clearance forms — which did not originally include several meetings with Russian officials that have since come to light — as an honest mistake made by his assistant at the time. And like others in the Trump orbit who met with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak before

Inauguration Day, Kushner also said he had trouble remembering the official after their first brief, previously unreported encounter at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D.C. — the same event where Attorney General Jeff Sessions met with, but didn't remember, the Russian ambassador.

Overall, his account of events "still feels incomplete, it was not fulsome," Evelyn Farkas, a former deputy assistant secretary of defense for Russia, said of the testimony. "I still wonder exactly what he discussed with Kislyak" in his subsequent conversations to the Mayflower meeting, she said. But more importantly, she added, Kushner's testimony provides no explanation for why he was cavalier in his interactions with Russians after intelligence community reports that Russia tried to meddle in the U.S. election.

"After that," Farkas said, "why not alert the FBI? It doesn't exhibit good judgment, or concerns for national security or the integrity of our democracy to be taking those meetings with the Russians."

The testimony also raised questions about how a man who blamed multiple foul-ups on sloppy paperwork, unread emails and misunderstandings, is overseeing such a vast portfolio as he does in the White House. As a top West Wing official, Kushner's situation does not appear to have changed much since the campaign: he still operates with a bare-bones staff, little bureaucracy, and impossible burdens (see: overseeing the Middle East peace process while also innovating the entire federal government).

"I am not a person who has sought the spotlight," Kushner says in his opening statement, according to a copy provided to POLITICO. But he explains that after Trump clinched the Republican nomination, his father-in-law asked Kushner to be the point of contact for foreign governments, and he was in touch with emissaries from 15 different countries, including Russia. To put his hectic life and schedule into context — and explain away his presence at a meeting where a Russian lawyer was hawking opposition research about Hillary Clinton — he also writes that he typically received about 200 emails a day during the campaign, and often didn't read through every exchange.

In his opening testimony, Kushner walks through each of his four meetings with the Russians, downplaying all of them to brief, pro forma interactions that lead to no follow-ups.

"I had no ongoing relationship with the Ambassador before the election, and had limited knowledge about him then," he writes of Kislyak, with whom he reportedly tried to set up a communications backchannel during the transition. "In fact, on November 9, the day after the election, I could not even remember the name of the Russian Ambassador."

Trying to prove his point, he adds: "when the campaign received an email purporting to be an official note of congratulations from President Putin, I was asked how we could verify it was real. To do so I thought the best way would be to ask the only contact I recalled meeting from the Russian government, which was the Ambassador I had met months earlier, so I sent an email asking Mr. [Demetri] Simes [the publisher of a foreign policy magazine], 'What is the name of the Russian ambassador?'"

Kushner also responds to a Reuters report that he had two follow-up calls with Kislyak. "A comprehensive review of my landline and cell phone records from the time does not reveal those calls," he says of the reported calls in April and August of 2016.

His second interaction with a Russian official was the now infamous Donald Trump, Jr. meeting with the Russian lawyer, Natalia Veselnitskaya, that June.

Kushner claims he had no idea what he was walking into. An email from his brother-in-law reminds him of the time change to 4 p.m. for the Trump Tower meeting, and Kushner writes that it was not abnormal to pop into each other's offices for meetings. "That email was on top of a long back and forth that I did not read at the time," he writes. "Documents confirm my memory that this was calendared as 'Meeting: Don Jr. | Jared Kushner. No one else was mentioned.'"

The meeting, where Russian lawyer Natalia Veselnitskaya, Trump, Jr., and campaign operative Paul Manafort and four other people were discussing Russian adoptions and were gathered to exchange information about Hillary Clinton, was outside of his purview, he writes.

"I actually emailed an assistant from the meeting after I had been there for ten or so minutes and wrote 'Can u pls call me on my cell? Need excuse to get out of meeting,' Kushner writes. "No part of the meeting I attended included anything about the campaign, there was no follow up to the meeting that I am aware of, I do not recall how many people were there (or their names), and I have no knowledge of any documents being offered or accepted."

His third and final contact with a potential Russian agent, he claims, was a hoax email he received from a hacker trying to obtain Trump's tax returns.

During the transition, he said, his only meeting with Kislyak lasted 23 minutes.

"I stated our desire for a fresh start in relations," he says of the meeting where Kushner reportedly tried to set up a backchannel of communication. It was Kislyak, Kushner writes, that brought up U.S. policy in Syria, and said "he wanted to convey information from what he called 'his generals,'" Kushner writes. "He said he wanted to provide information that would help inform the new administration. He said the generals could not easily come to the U.S. to convey this information and he asked if there was a secure line in the transition office to conduct a conversation."

Former National Security Adviser Michael Flynn and Kushner explained to him that there was not. "I believed developing a thoughtful approach on Syria was a very high priority given the ongoing humanitarian crisis," he explains. "and I asked if they had an existing communications channel at his embassy we could use where they would be comfortable transmitting the information they wanted to relay to General Flynn. The Ambassador said that would not be possible and so we all agreed that we would receive this information after the Inauguration."

Kushner said he declined two attempts by Kislyak in December for a follow-up, eventually sending his assistant instead. It was there that Kislyak recommended that Kushner sit down with Sergey Gorkov, the head of a Kremlin-linked Russian bank. All that was exchanged, he said, was a humble piece of art and a bag of dirt from the Belarus village where his grandparents were born.

"There were no specific policies discussed," he said. "We had no discussion about the sanctions imposed by the Obama Administration. At no time was there any discussion about my companies, business transactions, real estate projects, loans, banking arrangements or any private business of any kind."

The Putin-linked bank, however, has provided a different explanation. The Washington Post reported that the bank claimed the meeting was part of a new business strategy and that it was held with Kushner in his role as the head of his family's real estate business, Kushner Companies.

As for the confusion about his security clearance forms, he blames the omissions on an assistant.

"[People at my New York office] sent an email to my assistant in Washington, communicating that the changes to one particular section were complete; my assistant interpreted that message as meaning that the entire form was completed," he writes. "At that point, the form was a rough draft and still had many omissions including not listing any foreign government contacts and even omitted the address of my father-in-law (which was obviously well known). Because of this miscommunication, my assistant submitted the draft on January 18, 2017."

But lawyers cast doubt on his hurried explanation of the gaps on his security clearance forms. "The idea he'd have his staff fill out the questionnaire is beyond belief itself," said Nick Akerman, a former assistant Watergate prosecutor, noting the process requires a physical signature. "Someone on this committee has to go through this point by point and take him through this whole process."

Kushner is so rarely heard from in public that when he spoke, briefly, at a tech conference earlier this summer, many people joked they didn't know what his voice sounded like. "It has been my practice not to appear in the media or leak information in my own defense," Kushner notes in his testimony. But it won't be his last time on the stand.

Kushner, who will face a second grilling by the House on Tuesday, has been preparing for both sessions with his lawyers. He claims, at the end of his lengthy statement: "I had no improper contacts. I have not relied on Russian funds to finance my business activities in the private sector. I have tried to be fully transparent with regard to the filing of my SF-86 form, above and beyond what is required."

While Kushner and his aides may be hoping to make him a less juicy target than other former Trump officials under investigation, like Manafort and Trump, Jr., the statement is only the beginning of the story.

"The key," said Peter Zeidenberg, who served on the Justice Department's special prosecution team during the Valerie Plame Wilson CIA leak investigation, "will be how this story holds up to a thorough cross-examination."

Priebus sidelined as Washington outsiders' power grows Back

By Tara Palmeri | 07/24/2017 05:10 AM EDT

Reince Priebus took the punishing job of President Donald Trump's chief of staff with the idea that he would stick it out for at least one year.

Six months in, with one of his top allies in the West Wing — press secretary Sean Spicer — on his way out, Priebus is in defensive mode, his role diminished and an internal rival hogging the limelight.

Trump's decision to bring Wall Street financier Anthony Scaramucci into the role of communications director shows the rising power of political outsiders and the diminished influence of establishment figures — which Priebus, the former chairman of the Republican National Committee, epitomizes.

One White House official and two outside advisers said that while Scaramucci was brought into the White House for the communications job, he's considered an internal candidate to eventually succeed Priebus as chief of staff. There are also a handful of outside candidates.

The unexpected hire has raised questions of whether more shake-ups are coming, even as the White House has tried to downplay its internal discord. The instability has made it difficult for the administration to fend off questions about ties between Trump's 2016 campaign and Russia and to move forward an embattled legislative agenda.

Despite frequent reports his position is in jeopardy, Priebus hopes to finish out his year, according to people close to him. He is eyeing another big hurdle this week of getting the health care bill to pass through the Senate, defenders said Sunday.

"Reince is focused on driving the president's bold agenda, and that has been and always will be his top priority," White House deputy press secretary Lindsay Walters said.

Still, his stature in the White House appears to be shrinking. Priebus was fiercely opposed to hiring Scaramucci, saying the former financier had no prior experience in government communications. They have been at odds with each other since Scaramucci was passed over for the director of public liaison role in February.

Scaramucci made clear to reporters on Friday that he reports directly to Trump, not Priebus, even though the chief of staff would typically oversee communications and other portfolios.

Special assistant and social media director Dan Scavino also tweeted on Saturday that he reports directly to the president.

"In a normal White House, every staffer reports to the chief of staff," said Republican strategist Alex Conant. "Any staffer who believes that they don't report to the chief of staff is going to be a potential headache for the chief of staff."

Scaramucci also said he plans to reset the culture of the White House communications shop so that it is focused on protecting the president. Republicans in and out of the White House have grumbled that the press operation, which is staffed with RNC alums including outgoing press secretary Spicer, was disorganized in its defense of Trump's actions but always eager to boost Priebus.

"I would like to reset the culture inside the comms department so that people recognize that I'm actually there to serve them, and they're going to be working with me, not for me," Scaramucci said on FOX News. "That's a very big distinction. And that all of us are there to serve the president of the United States and his agenda."

Scaramucci has promised to "audit" the communications shop, and many staffers who are closely aligned with Priebus are bracing for their fate, multiple White House officials said.

In a White House full of internal fiefdoms, Spicer is the third senior staffer brought into the White House by Priebus who has been shown the door. After the House failed on its first attempt to pass a health care bill, Priebus' deputy chief of staff Katie Walsh was pushed out. She has since returned to the RNC. Former communications director Mike Dubke also resigned in May.

"His strength was in his people," a close White House adviser to Trump said of Reince. "He didn't have personal clout, he had organizational clout, so losing another staffer is eroding his organizational clout."

Priebus also has a reduced policy footprint now that the action on health care has moved to the Senate.

He's seen as a "House guy" because of his close relationship with House Speaker Paul Ryan. Once the Senate took over, Priebus allowed Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to work with the White House legislative affairs shop and Vice President Mike Pence.

When that effort floundered, Trump brought in outside help instead of leaning harder on his chief of staff. He has called upon his former campaign aides Corey Lewandowski and David Bossie to help strong-arm senators to support the bill.

Still, with face-time key to staffers' influence, Priebus remains at Trump's side often. He had lunch with the president Saturday at his golf course in northern Virginia, a sign to some aides that Priebus' position is safe.

"He's still the White House chief of staff," the Trump adviser said, before adding: "For now."

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by Chevron: Oil, coal state senators push for RFS deal — FERC: We're good — Murray urges "no" vote on NASA pick

OIL, COAL STATE SENATORS PRESS TRUMP FOR RFS DEAL: Nine oil- and coal-state Republicans — led by Texas Sen. Ted Cruz — are demanding President Donald Trump meet with them and Midwestern senators to consider changes to the Renewable Fuel Standard. "We request that within the next three weeks you convene a meeting regarding the RFS and pro-jobs policies with us, our Senate colleagues who previously lobbied you on behalf of the ethanol industry, and relevant members of your administration to discuss a pathway forward toward a mutually agreeable solution that will also save refining jobs and help unleash an American energy renaissance," the senators wrote in a letter to Trump sent Wednesday, but obtained by POLITICO today.

Senate Republicans are largely split on the RFS: "Oil state lawmakers are furious over their corn-state colleagues' ability to quash efforts to alter the biofuel mandate," Eric Wolff reports. Refiners argue that high prices of credits needed to comply with the RFS could push some refiners out of business. The final rule for RFS volumes is due Nov. 30.

FERC: WE'RE GOOD: FERC refrained from calling for widespread reform within its agency rules in its response to the White House's executive order calling on agencies to identify rules that are burdensome to domestic energy resources. FERC released a 15-page document that says agency staff voluntarily reviewed hydropower licensing, liquefied natural gas facility and gas pipeline siting, electric capacity policy in the three eastern power markets, and electric generator interconnection policy. "Hydropower licensing was the only subject staff said might benefit from reform, highlighting that the commission could consider allowing certain applications to be resubmitted if they're initially rejected," Darius Dixon reports. More here.

NOW IT'S PERSONAL: A federal commission said today it will require coal magnate Robert Murray to personally tell his miners that he violated a key safety law. "Murray made PowerPoint presentations at five West Virginia mines in 2014 to 3,500 miners directing employees to alert their managers to any safety complaints made to the Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration — even though the law allows those complaints to be submitted anonymously," Alex Guillén reports. An administrative law judge at Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission said in 2015 that Murray's policy was "calculated to discourage miners from using the MSHA complaint process." She fined the company and ordered Murray as CEO to read a message to his miners informing them that they are not required to report MSHA complaints to management. Murray argued that the requirement was punitive, but at a public meeting today, "the four FMSHRC commissioners agreed that Murray had waived his right to appeal the order because the company did not properly object to it in prior proceedings, and thus they will require Murray to read the message," Alex writes.

NEW YORK WILL SUE EPA: New York State says it will sue EPA for missing a key deadline to issue a federal plan tackling smog-forming pollution that floats across state lines, Alex reports. Back in August 2015, the agency said 24 states had not created strong enough plans to curb their ozone emissions to reduce pollution in downwind states, but it missed an August 2017 deadline to issue federal implementation plans for those states. "With this action, New York makes it clear that we will not stand idly by as other states shun their responsibility to keep our nation's air quality safe," Gov. Andrew Cuomo said in a statement. Five of the 24 states — Illinois, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Virginia and West Virginia — contribute to New York's levels.

HOUSE NARROWLY PASSES BUDGET: The House passed 216-212 the fiscal 2018 budget today, scoring a victory in the Republican crusade to overhaul the tax code. The measure, H. Con. Res. 71 \(115\), unleashes a special procedural power allowing the Senate to move forward on a tax reform bill, as well as opening up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling, with a simple majority vote rather than a 60-member threshold normally required. More here.

— After the budget was passed, the League of Conservation Voters launched new digital ads thanking senators, "who are working to stop this shameful effort to sell out the iconic landscape to polluters and encouraging others to join them," LCV said in a release. The ads come as part of LCV's $200,000 push to stop Congress from approving ANWR drilling through the reconciliation. The ads specifically thank Sens. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), Ed Markey (D-Mass.) and Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) for their amendment last week to remove the drilling language. LCV also thanks Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Angus King (I-Maine) for voting to protect the refuge, but it criticizes Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.) for "siding with polluters." Watch the sample ads here, here and here.

COURT WON'T DELAY BRICK MACT ARGUMENTS: A three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today said it will not postpone oral arguments over the Obama administration's brick MACT, which ratcheted down emissions limits for brick manufacturers. EPA earlier this month asked for an indefinite delay and for the case to be put on hold amid an agency review of the rule, potentially followed by revision or repeal. Though industry interests supported EPA's request, environmental challengers did not. The court did leave open the possibility that it will ultimately not decide on the rule; the order issued today instructs the parties to be prepared to discuss at arguments whether the case should be delayed further. Arguments will take place before Judges Judith Rogers, Patricia Millett and David Sentelle on Nov. 9.

MURRAY URGES 'NO' VOTE ON NASA PICK: Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) is urging her fellow Democrats to oppose the president's pick to head NASA, calling him "a dangerous choice to lead the agency." Murray sent a letter to leaders of the Senate Commerce Committee today criticizing the NASA nominee, Rep. Jim Bridenstine (R-Okla.), for his denial of climate change science, as well as his "opposition to equal rights" for women, immigrants and LGBT individuals. "It is clear Rep. Bridenstine would move us backwards not forwards and I urge you to vote against his nomination," Murray said in the letter. Bridenstine's confirmation hearing is set for Nov. 1. Pro Defense's Jacqueline Klimas reports more here.

WHITE HOUSE TAPS COAL CONSULTANT FOR OSMR: The White House today announced the president plans to nominate Kentucky mining consultant Steven Gardner to be director of the Interior Department's Office of Surface Mining Reclamation and Enforcement. Gardner is president and CEO of ECSI, LLC, a Lexington, Ky., consulting firm, which he "focused on mining issues and worked as a subcontractor to help draft environmental documents for the Obama OSMRE's stream protection rule," Esther Whieldon reports. Congress and the Trump administration repealed that rule earlier this year under a Congressional Review Act resolution. More on Gardner's background here.

ZINKE CREATES EXPEDITED PERMITTING TEAM: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke on Wednesday signed Secretarial Order No. 3358 creating an Executive Committee for Expedited Permitting that will be led by Zinke's Energy Policy Counselor Vincent DeVito and will consist entirely of politicals from the secretary's office, including Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt and the five assistant secretaries that oversee the Interior's bureaus, Indian Affairs and handle policy, management and budget. The team will be in charge of implementing Interior's plans for streamline permitting and the group's directive includes identifying energy right-of-way corridors on federal lands where projects proposed in those areas would receive expedited processing.

THANKSGIVING PARADED: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell is telling his members they should prepare to work into Thanksgiving break, POLITICO's Seung Min Kim reports today. "McConnell told GOP senators in meetings earlier this week that the chamber very well could stay in session the weekend before the week of Thanksgiving, as well as the week of the holiday, according to two senior Republican sources," Seung Min reports. Of course, a similar warning went out last week that didn't pan out — the Senate left Washington late Thursday after clearing its budget resolution — but as Republicans face tax reform and other critical legislative tasks, "an increasingly vocal faction of McConnell's conference has been urging leadership to stay in session longer, even 24-7 if necessary." FERC rule review recommends few changes Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/26/2017 11:05 AM EDT

FERC largely patted itself on the back in its response to the White House's executive order calling on agencies to sniff out rules potentially burdensome to domestic energy resources.

The 15-page document says agency staff voluntarily reviewed four areas of FERC work: hydropower licensing, liquefied natural gas facility and gas pipeline siting, electric capacity policy in the three eastern power markets, and electric generator interconnection policy.

Hydropower licensing was the only subject staff said might benefit from reform, highlighting that the commission could consider allowing certain applications to be resubmitted if they're initially rejected.

When the agency explored its 180-day "pre-filing" process for LNG terminals, the report says that procedure may slow some projects but is worthwhile because it allows potential issues to be addressed early.

"Thus, although this regulation may result in delays or additional costs to the applicant early on in a project's development, its overall result is a more timely application review by considering all issues regarding a project concurrently," staff wrote. "As such, there is no need for the Commission to consider any revision to this regulation."

When it came to generation interconnection policies, FERC listed a half-dozen orders the agency has issued to make the process as efficient as possible and said: "None of these orders materially burden the development or use of domestic energy resources."

WHAT'S NEXT: The report is a staff product and the report warns that it "does not specifically recommend actions nor indicate the timing of any potential action."

Commission will require Murray to read safety message after violation Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/26/2017 11:21 AM EDT

An federal commission today said that it will require coal magnate Robert Murray, a major supporter of President Donald Trump, to personally tell his miners that he violated a key safety law.

Murray made PowerPoint presentations at five West Virginia mines in 2014 to 3,500 miners directing employees to alert their managers to any safety complaints made to the Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration — even though the law allows those complaints to be submitted anonymously.

An administrative law judge at Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission, which deals with violations of the 1977 Mine Act, said in 2015 that Murray's policy was "calculated to discourage miners from using the MSHA complaint process." She fined the company $150,000 and ordered Murray as CEO to read a message, either in person or via videoconference, to his miners informing them that they are not required to report MSHA complaints to management.

Murray argued that the requirement was punitive and meant largely to humiliate him.

But at a public meeting today, the four FMSHRC commissioners agreed that Murray had waived his right to appeal the order because the company did not properly object to it in prior proceedings, and thus they will require Murray to read the message.

WHAT'S NEXT: After the commission issues its formal decision as early as next month, Murray will be able to appeal to either the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Va., or the D.C. Circuit.

Judge slaps Murray over intimidation of miners Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/18/2015 04:33 PM EDT

Murray Energy can no longer force its coal miners to alert their supervisors when they report safety violations to federal inspectors, an administrative law judge ruled today.

The company incurred a $150,000 fine in the case, which stemmed from a number of safety complaints made in 2013 at mines that CONSOL had recently sold to Murray. Owner Robert Murray last year told workers at each mine that they must inform management about any complaints made to MSHA.

The judge, Margaret Miller of the Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission, concluded that miners could have been "intimidated and discouraged" from making safety complaints, after listening to a recording of a speech Murray gave to miners and reviewing other evidence. In the speech, Murray connected increased safety complaints with the threat of job losses, explicitly telling miners that no other jobs in the area pay as well — in a tone the judge deemed "serious and at times threatening."

Murray's actions "went beyond what was necessary to establish a safe environment at the mine," she wrote. "Rather, they were calculated to discourage miners from using the MSHA complaint process."

Miller ordered the company to pay fines totaling $150,000, more than MSHA had sought, citing "high" negligence and indications that the company tried to intimidate witnesses. She also ordered Murray to tell workers that they are not required to report complaints to the company.

Murray did not immediately return a request for comment.

New York to sue EPA over upwind ozone pollution Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/26/2017 01:12 PM EDT

The state of New York says it will sue EPA for missing a key deadline to issue a federal plan tackling smog-forming pollution that floats across state lines.

EPA said in August 2015 that 24 states had not created strong enough plans to curb their ozone emissions to reduce pollution in downwind states. Five of those states — Illinois, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Virginia and West Virginia — contribute to New York's levels. But EPA missed an August 2017 deadline to issue federal implementation plans, or FIPs, for those states.

"With this action, New York makes it clear that we will not stand idly by as other states shun their responsibility to keep our nation's air quality safe," Gov. Andrew Cuomo said in a statement. "It's critical that these states take the necessary steps to reduce their environmental impact for future generations and I urge them to follow New York's lead to secure a cleaner and greener tomorrow for all."

EPA also missed an Oct. 1 deadline to issue non-attainment designations under the 2015 ozone standard, leaving its implementation uncertain. New York and various other states previously said they will sue over that missed deadline as well.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Clean Air Act requires anyone suing EPA over a missed deadline to provide a least 60 days notice before suing.

House narrowly passes budget — setting up mammoth tax fight Back

By Jennifer Scholtes and Rachael Bade | 10/26/2017 08:38 AM EDT

House Republicans cleared a crucial hurdle in their drive to overhaul the tax code Thursday after narrowly approving the Senate's budget.

By passing the measure, 216-212, Republicans unlocked procedural powers that allow the Senate to pass a tax bill with just 51 votes — and evade Democratic filibusters. But even with the ability to sideline Democrats, the GOP faces a daunting task as it tries to rewrite the tax code.

Heading into the vote, it was unclear whether enough GOP lawmakers would support the measure. A band of Republicans from high-tax states vowed to vote "no" on the budget unless GOP leaders scrapped plans to curb the state and local tax deduction currently in the GOP's tax proposal.

Speaker Paul Ryan and his top lieutenants were banking, however, on enough Republicans being jazzed about tax reform to back a fiscal blueprint many despise.

"A 'no' vote, as we heard from our Democrat colleagues, is to block tax reform and defend the status quo," Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) warned on the floor before the vote.

Leadership had originally sought to come up with an agreement on the nearly $1.3 trillion state and local tax break before the Thursday vote — particularly after a host of allies like Republican Reps. Lee Zeldin of New York and Tom MacArthur of New Jersey said they would need to resolve the issue before backing the budget.

But leadership suddenly postponed a negotiation session on the matter late Wednesday night, likely in a sign that enough opponents were appeased by a commitment to work toward a deal in the coming days on the state and local tax break.

The vote was filled with drama on the House floor.

As the electronic House vote board began to fill out with "yeas" and "nays," Republican holdouts like New York Rep. John Katko stood near House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.), watching the evolving tally as some waited until the last minutes to cast dissenting votes.

House Budget Chairman Diane Black (R-Tenn.), who kept her eyes on the board throughout the count, told POLITICO afterward that "we would have done what we needed to do to make sure we got that vote done."

Leadership's promise to work with angry lawmakers didn't work for all naysayers.

"I am voting NO," Rep. Frank LoBiondo (R-N.J.) tweeted Wednesday night, a promise he fulfilled Thursday. He was responding to a constituent asking him to oppose the budget and "a tax plan that favors the wealthy."

The early ultimatums serve as a preview of the challenge that lies before GOP tax writers, even before legislative text of the tax bill is set for release next week.

Brady said that Republicans will introduce the bill on Nov. 1 and his committee will begin considering it on Nov. 6.

"I'm going to stay at the table, so is the leadership, with our New York and New Jersey lawmakers to try to find a solution where their taxpayers are better off after tax reform," Brady said later on Thursday after meeting with GOP members from high-tax districts in those two states and others like California and Illinois.

Rep. Tom MacArthur (R-N.J.), one of 20 Republicans who voted against the budget, said at least 22 GOP House members stand together on the state and local tax issue. Dozens of others held their nose while voting yes for the budget, he added.

Delivering a pre-condition of his own, President Donald Trump tweeted Monday that there would "be no change" to the way 401(k) plans are taxed, even as key lawmakers said they are still considering alterations to the popular retirement plans.

"We might be debating the details of a tax reform plan that does not exist," Rep. Rob Woodall (R-Ga.) complained on the floor this week, noting that the bill has yet to be unveiled.

Many Republicans have refrained from publicly making demands on the fledgling tax proposal, feeling political pressure to remain flexible in the interest of ultimately achieving a policy priority seen as make-or-break for the GOP.

The budget the House passed Thursday is a far cry from the version the chamber first approved earlier this month and is unlikely to have garnered sufficient support without the tax debate hovering over it.

The House's initial plan, favored by fiscal hawks, would have required lawmakers to offset the costs of new tax cuts and to find $203 billion in extra savings from some welfare programs. But those requirements would not fly in the more moderate Senate, which passed its budget last week.

Under immense pressure to pass a tax reform bill by year's end, Republican leaders struck a time-saving deal to forgo a formal conference committee to resolve differences between the House and Senate plans.

Although many House GOP lawmakers have derided that decision and complained about the final text, most rank-and-file Republicans still quickly resigned themselves to supporting the budget in order to move on to the GOP's tax reform aspirations.

For their part, Democrats have seized on what they called the "hypocrisy" of fiscal conservatives backing a plan that would drive up the debt. The Senate budget envisions tax cuts that could add $1.5 trillion to the deficit over a decade.

"Republicans are always telling us how much they care about the deficit. But when it comes to giving their beloved tax cuts to their billionaire friends, they suddenly develop a convenient case of amnesia," Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.) said on the House floor as lawmakers teed up debate this week. "They say, 'What deficit? Don't worry, these tax breaks will pay for themselves.'"

Murray urges Democrats to oppose Trump's NASA pick Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 10/26/2017 10:00 AM EDT

Sen. Patty Murray is urging Democrats to oppose President Donald Trump's pick to head NASA, calling him "a dangerous choice to lead the agency."

The Washington state Democrat sent a letter to leaders of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee today criticizing the NASA administrator nominee, Rep. Jim Bridenstine (R-Okla.), for his denial of climate change science and his "opposition to equal rights" for women, immigrants and LGBT individuals.

"It is clear Rep. Bridenstine would move us backwards not forwards and I urge you to vote against his nomination," Murray said in the letter obtained by POLITICO.

Murray pointed to several specific examples that she said made the congressman unfit for the top NASA post, including Bridenstine calling the Supreme Court's decision on gay marriage a disappointment, supporting Trump's travel ban and not recognizing a difference between local weather and broader climate.

"The agency has inspired countless young people to pursue careers in science, technology, engineering and math and has stirred curiosity in billions of individuals across the world," Murray writes. "Rep. Bridenstine's denial of fundamental scientific facts and long record of bigoted and hateful statements run counter to this legacy."

Bridenstine's confirmation hearing is set for Nov. 1.

Florida Sen. Bill Nelson, the ranking Democrat on the committee that will consider the nomination, and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) previously slammed Bridenstine for being a politician, not a scientist or engineer, who traditionally has led the organization.

Gay rights advocates previously said they would push back against his nomination because of his anti-LGBT views.

Trump taps Kentucky coal mining consultant to lead OSMRE Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/26/2017 11:53 AM EDT

President Donald Trump plans to nominate Kentucky mining consultant Steven Gardner to lead the Interior Department's Office of Surface Mining Reclamation and Enforcement, the White House announced today.

Gardner is president and CEO of ECSI, a Lexington, Ky.-based consulting firm that has focused on mining issues and worked as a subcontractor to help draft environmental documents for the Obama OSMRE's stream protection rule. Congress and the Trump administration repealed that rule earlier this year under a Congressional Review Act resolution.

In 2011, Gardner testified at a House Natural Resources Subcommittee that OSMRE had pressured him and others working on the environmental impact statement to tweak the data to minimize the impact the rule would have on jobs and coal production.

Gardner was president of the Society for Mining, Metallurgy and Exploration in 2015 and he served on the UK Mining Engineering Foundation, the Kentucky Geological Survey, Biosystems & Agricultural Engineering Advisory Boards, and was a member of the Kentucky Board of Licensure for Professional Engineers and Surveyors.

McConnell to GOP senators: Be ready to work through Thanksgiving week Back

By Seung Min Kim | 10/26/2017 09:08 AM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell is telling his members to be prepared to work straight into the Thanksgiving break.

A similar warning last week didn't pan out, as the Senate left Washington late Thursday after clearing its budget resolution. The chamber usually adjourns for the week mid-afternoon on Thursdays and returns Monday evening.

But McConnell told GOP senators in meetings earlier this week that the chamber very well could stay in session the weekend before the week of Thanksgiving, as well as the week of the holiday, according to two senior Republican sources. The week of Thanksgiving is currently scheduled as a recess week.

Republicans are taking on an ambitious tax overhaul and also face other critical legislative tasks such as disaster aid, government funding and immigration. An increasingly vocal faction of McConnell's conference has been urging leadership to stay in session longer, even 24-7 if necessary.

In addition to legislation, McConnell and other Senate Republicans are eager to confirm President Donald Trump's nominees — particularly for the federal judiciary. The chamber is set to confirm one district judge and advance another on Thursday afternoon.

"President Trump should be commended for his strong judicial picks," McConnell said on the floor earlier this week. "The Senate is going to keep working hard to confirm them. And we're going to succeed."

Trump opioid declaration falls short, say state officials Back

By Brianna Ehley and Sarah Karlin-Smith | 10/26/2017 08:56 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Thursday will declare the opioid crisis a public health emergency — a move that is narrower than what his own opioid commission had recommended and that will not pump additional money into an epidemic that has ravaged communities and claimed thousands of lives.

State officials and public health experts expressed disappointment, saying the epidemic is growing faster than efforts to contain it. Trump had promised in August that his administration will spend "a lot of money" on the opioid crisis — a vow that he did not deliver upon.

"People are dying," said Andrew Kolodny, executive director of Physicians for Responsible Opioid Prescribing. "We have people dying of overdoses on waiting lists for an effective treatment."

Senior administration officials told reporters that acting HHS Secretary Eric Hargan will sign the declaration on Thursday. That will allow public health agencies to swiftly redirect existing health resources to the crisis, but won't add fresh funds. It will also cut "bureaucratic delays" in hiring personnel and expand access to telemedicine, including remote prescribing of medication commonly used for substance abuse or other mental health treatment.

The declaration will not include the extra money that state officials and some in Congress say is critical for a comprehensive response to the drug epidemic that the White House estimates is claiming about 175 lives a day. The HHS public health fund currently has only about $57,000 left in it, although Congress could replenish it and the department has some other emergency resources to draw on. An administration official said there are "ongoing discussions" with lawmakers about how much money is needed to address the emergency.

Public health and addiction experts say a multi-pronged approach is needed immediately — a national prevention strategy, greater access to substance abuse treatment and enough money for communities to stock up on naloxone, a drug that can reverse life-threatening overdoses. Some experts had urged Trump to trigger another kind of national emergency under the Stafford Act, which can unlock more federal resources and emergency powers but is usually used for more clearly delineated crises like hurricanes or fires.

The spreading opioid crisis reaches from abuse of prescription painkillers to street drugs like heroin and the even more lethal fentanyl. Drug overdoses now kill more people than traffic crashes or gun-related deaths, and there's growing fear that IV drug use will set off waves of new HIV/AIDS infections in the heartland.

Some lawmakers from hard-hit states immediately said they would be open to allocating more resources — but it's not clear how much of an appetite there is on Capitol Hill to significantly increase spending. As of now, the House and Senate appropriations bills for next year keep opioid funding levels flat. States are already getting $1 billion between 2017 and 2018 under the 21st Century Cures legislation to respond to the drug crisis.

"We're underwater," said Rep. David McKinley (R-W.Va.) during a congressional hearing

earlier this week where he criticized the federal response. "I don't understand why more resources aren't flowing to help out a rural state like West Virginia." His state has the highest overdose death rate in the country.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie in a statement praised Trump for taking "bold action." But the president's order will fall far short of the recommendations his Commission on Combating Drug Addiction and the Opioid Crisis made in its preliminary report in July.

For example, the commission recommended mandatory education for doctors and waiving a longstanding federal prohibition on using Medicaid funds to pay for inpatient substance abuse treatment — which the panel said was the single fastest way to increase treatment.

Michael Fraser, executive director of the Association of State and Territorial Health Officials, urged Congress to act. "The lack of resources is concerning to us since the opioid epidemic is presenting lots of challenges for states' budgets," he said.

Advocates worry about redirecting other health funds, particularly from programs such as HIV prevention.

"There are some measures in the package that suggest states could shift money away from HIV to the opioid crisis, but the fact is patients who are suffering from the opioid crisis, they have other health concerns too," said Tiffany Kaszuba, deputy director of the Coalition for Health Funding. "It's not even robbing Peter to pay Paul anymore. It's robbing Peter to pay Peter."

The declaration doesn't include other priorities identified by state and local officials. For example, it won't immediately address access to the emergency overdose treatment naloxone. The price of the drug has soared in the past couple of years, making it hard for cash-strapped emergency departments to stock the drug.

Ohio was able to negotiate a lower price of naloxone for emergency medicine agencies and police officers, but at a cost of $40 a vial it's still too high for many EMS agencies, particularly as some of the stronger opioids now require multiple doses per patient, said Carol Cunningham, Ohio's state medical director for the department of public safety's EMS division and the chairperson of the National Association of State EMS Officials.

Policy experts said the administration's decision to use a public health emergency fund instead of a national emergency declaration under the separate Stafford Act is not enough.

"You show me in the past a national public health emergency declaration with no accompanying funds or even requests for funds, I'd be pretty surprised," said Andrew Kessler, who runs Slingshot Solutions, a consulting firm specializing in behavioral health and drug abuse.

Some states had hoped to see more help to build out programs that show promise. Rhode Island, for instance, wants to establish a pre-arrest diversion program so that law enforcement sends people using opioids to treatment instead of jail. "We know that prevents deaths, and criminalization does not," said Rhode Island's Health Director Nicole Alexander-Scott.

Trump said in August and then again last week that he would declare the crisis a national emergency, which would give the administration more tools to fight the crisis but also raise a host of legal and economic issues.

At the time, officials were considering using the Stafford Act, which is typically reserved for natural disasters and administered by FEMA. Former HHS Secretary Tom Price, White House budget director Mick Mulvaney and the White House Domestic Policy Council had objected to such a declaration because of its potential multi-billion-dollar price tag, legal issues and questions about how it could be implemented.

The more measured response speaks to the complexity of a drug epidemic that is pervasive yet not isolated in a particular time or place like a hurricane or a fire.

Another official added the administration has already spent $1 billion on the opioid crisis since the president took office. Roughly $500 million for drug addiction response efforts was provided under the 21st Century Cures Act signed into law by former President Barack Obama last year.

The declaration of public health emergency lasts 90 days but can be renewed.

Adam Cancryn and Rachana Pradhan contributed to this report.

Leaked document shows Tillerson power play Back

By Nahal Toosi | 10/26/2017 05:02 AM EDT

A leaked State Department document is alarming diplomats and others who say it shows the accumulation of power among a small and unaccountable group of senior aides to Secretary of State Rex Tillerson.

The chart, obtained by POLITICO, illustrates the growing influence of the State Department's Policy Planning Staff, which traditionally has served as an in-house think tank but which Tillerson heavily relies upon for day-to-day decision making. Critics already complain that the office — led by Brian Hook, a powerful Tillerson aide not subject to Senate confirmation — accepts too little input from career diplomats, and the chart, which lays out a method to craft foreign policy, shows no explicit role for them.

The chart appears to show a top-down approach in which ideas emanate from the secretary's inner circle rather than bubbling up from diverse sources, including foreign service officers in the field. More than half a dozen current and former U.S. officials who have seen the document said it reveals an unusual level of control and oversight by the Policy Planning Staff, which is known in diplomatic circles as S/P.

Several current and former U.S. officials warned that the new approach, called the Policy Planning Process, or "P3," increases the risk of poor, uninformed policy choices on everything from terrorism in Africa to human rights issues at a perilous time in international relations. It could also further demoralize career State Department staffers who already feel marginalized by Tillerson and President Donald Trump.

"This says to me that they are developing a new foreign policy structure that is designed to largely ignore those who know these regions and who know these issues," said Brett Bruen, a former State Department official who served under Presidents Barack Obama and George W. Bush.

The chart suggests "a power grab by a small cabal of Tillerson aides," added a senior Democratic congressional aide. "Making policy with a token effort to engage policy experts is a recipe for disaster and further evidence that the political forces in this administration will do anything they can to dismantle the State Department."

The State Department's press section did not respond to a POLITICO request for more material and context, but a senior department official said in a statement: "Policy development starts with the administration priorities set by the president. The policy planning process develops foreign policy with broad input at all stages from within State and the inter-agency. This process has supported new policies in a range of areas, including Asia, the Middle East, and Europe."

In recent weeks, Hook has been meeting with various divisions at the State Department to explain the eight-step process. A source familiar with the issue said Hook is not seeking feedback but merely informing employees of a process Tillerson has already approved. The chart shows that policymaking begins with a "whiteboard session" between Hook and Tillerson.

Other State Department sources said Hook is simply explaining an approach that, at least in its first few steps, has slowly taken hold since Tillerson, a former ExxonMobil CEO used to corporate management structure, took over as secretary in February.

The State Department officials said Hook's policy planning chart nonetheless formalizes an unwelcome change in their status from the Obama administration.

"We are implementers of policy decided by Tillerson and his team," one veteran State Department official concluded.

Several sources were unsettled to see the chart omit any mention of other parts of the State Department, especially its many bureaus focused on specific regions and issues, such as the Middle East and economics.

Some noted that Hook and Tillerson could include career diplomats in policy discussions throughout the process, even if the chart does not describe a specific role for them. Certain longtime department employees, including acting Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Susan Thornton, are known to have Tillerson's ear. It's also possible that what the chart vaguely describes as an "internally" triggered policy demand could come from a junior diplomat with a big idea.

Regardless of those caveats, the sources consulted said the chart strongly implies that Hook and Tillerson are the authoritative drivers of foreign policy to an unusual degree.

Several sources — while cautioning that the chart could offer an incomplete picture — also noted with concern that it also implies that the secretary of state, the Cabinet and Trump himself might endorse a policy prior to any significant evaluation by the National Security Council. They argued it should be the other way around to prevent poorly informed policy options from being placed before Cabinet secretaries and the president.

One serving U.S. official said the chart seemed "delusional" in its measure of the State Department and Tillerson's influence in policy making. The Defense Department and the White House itself are major players in crafting U.S. foreign policy; and in the case of Tillerson, he's clashed with Trump on so many levels — even reportedly calling the president a "moron" — that his very future at State is in question.

"This would be a challenging process to manage effectively for even the most powerful and skilled secretary of state, and we don't have that right now," said Derek Chollet, who was a deputy director of the Policy Planning Staff under former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. "I don't understand how this comports with any reality that we're aware of."

The State Department's Policy Planning Staff was created in 1947 by legendary diplomat George Kennan at the request of then-Secretary of State George C. Marshall. It's supposed to be an independent source of analysis and often acts as a second opinion on policy for the secretary. According to the department's own explanation, Policy Planning tends to "take a longer term, strategic view of global trends."

Various secretaries of state have employed the office in different ways. It was considered unusually active under James Baker, when George H.W. Bush was president. It was also considered relatively active when Hillary Clinton was secretary of state.

But former and current U.S. officials said that, even in those days, the Policy Planning Staff worked hand in hand with other divisions at State instead of supplanting them. A case in point was the "pivot to Asia" strategy publicly articulated by Clinton — but widely considered the brainchild of then-Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Kurt Campbell.

Hook's role at State is drawing increasing scrutiny from lawmakers, many of whom are troubled by Tillerson's slowness in filling the many vacant assistant secretary and other leadership positions at State. The jobs remain unfilled as Tillerson is working on a plan to restructure and streamline the entire department.

Hook and his crew on the Policy Planning Staff — which numbers around two dozen, according to the State Department's website — wield unusual power in part because so many key jobs are empty or held by diplomats on an acting basis. And unlike assistant secretaries or other top officials, Hook's position doesn't require Senate confirmation, which troubles some on Capitol Hill.

Observers say Hook, viewed as a relatively mainstream Republican, is running ragged trying to meet the demands placed on him.

"Hook is like a one-man band frantically, albeit valiantly, trying to play all the instruments, as competent and experienced musicians are made to stand on the sidelines," one U.S. official said.

There have been reports that Tillerson, as part of a broader effort to restructure the State Department, wants to greatly expand the size of the Policy Planning Staff. The department did not immediately respond to questions about those reports. Still, even the possibility is meeting resistance among some lawmakers.

Last month, Democratic Sen. Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire tacked an amendment onto a State Department appropriations bill that seeks to limit the size of the Policy Planning Staff, subject to certain conditions. The broader bill, which was approved by the Senate Appropriations Committee, also largely rejected Trump's effort to slash the State Department's funding by a third.

Mnuchin crashes into steep learning curve on the Hill Back

By Nancy Cook | 10/26/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin is the de facto frontman for the administration's proposed overhaul of the U.S. tax system because of his extreme loyalty to President Donald Trump and the scores of tax policy experts and economists at his command.

But Mnuchin, a former investment banker and movie financier with no prior experience in Washington, hasn't been able to overcome Republicans' suspicion about his Wall Street background and limited conservative credentials. That may complicate White House efforts to influence debate as the details of a tax bill are written.

Republicans' simmering discontent with Mnuchin emerged full force in September, when he urged House Republicans to vote for the deal to temporarily raise the debt ceiling as part of a package that Trump had crafted with the two top Democratic leaders.

Behind closed doors, Mnuchin asked lawmakers to take the tough vote not for the president or for the party, but rather to do it for him, according to three people who attended or were briefed on the meeting. So few members felt any personal bond with Mnuchin that they were surprised he felt comfortable making such a request, and said it betrayed a lack of understanding about the way power works in Washington.

That was also the last time Mnuchin spoke to many of the people in the room, said one senior House aide.

"We will defer to the administration on who they want to put out there on tax reform, but we see the president as the top salesman," said a second House aide. "Trump supporters will watch Trump selling this, and they will be swayed by Trump, not Steven Mnuchin."

Mnuchin has had more success in relationship-building on the Senate side, cultivating Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and other powerful figures one-on-one as potential allies.

But he's encountered a steep learning curve on the nuances of tax and economic policy, according to current and former Treasury staffers and congressional aides.

"I think it has taken him awhile because he was thrown into the situation cold," said Hatch. "He has a tremendous business background."

He frequently also makes verbal gaffes during public appearances, often contradicting the White House's best-laid talking points. In mid-October at an international finance conference, Mnuchin said that eliminating the estate tax would ultimately help wealthy people — after the White House had already cast scrapping it as a way to aid farmers, ranchers and small business owners.

A senior Treasury official said Mnuchin has been working on tax reform daily since he assumed the job of Treasury secretary and continues to enjoy a very close relationship with the president, dating back to the 2016 campaign. As for Mnuchin's relationships with members of Congress, the official added that "just like any relationship, we are always working on it."

The administration declined to make Mnuchin available for comment.

Selling tax reform, a task that has bedeviled lawmakers since President Ronald Reagan's 1986 overhaul, would be difficult for any administration. Republicans are split over how much to lower tax rates and which breaks or deductions they should eliminate to offset the tax rate reduction.

Party members also cannot agree among themselves on whether a potential tax bill can and should add to the country's growing deficit, a concern to the fiscal and spending hawks in both the House and Senate.

It's even harder for Trump, who has already failed to orchestrate passage of Obamacare repeal — a signature campaign issue not just for him but for the Republican Party — and who has been unbridled in his criticism of leading GOP lawmakers in recent weeks, including Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee.

Corker, who recently met one-on-one with Mnuchin a few times at his Senate office and Treasury, said he'd been happy with Mnuchin's outreach so far.

"Look, I'm a business guy," Corker said. "I like people who talk business."

Business connections first led Mnuchin to sign on as Trump's chief fundraiser in the spring of 2016. He and Trump had known each other informally for roughly 15 years through New York City finance and real estate circles, Mnuchin recently said on a POLITICO Money podcast.

It was a job that many establishment Republicans had already passed up, said one adviser close to the administration — and it gave Mnuchin an opening to cement his relationship with Trump by traveling extensively across the country with him.

Ultimately, Mnuchin was rewarded for his efforts with one of the plummiest jobs in any administration and in economic circles — running the Treasury Department.

Mnuchin has managed to maintain an excellent relationship with the president during the administration's sometimes tumultuous nine-month run — a feat that other officials, such as Director of the National Economic Council Gary Cohn, former chief strategist Steve Bannon or former chief of staff Reince Priebus weren't able to do, according to Republican lawmakers, senior administration officials and advisers close to the White House.

"There is no question that he has gained influence and, shall we say, standing," said Larry Kudlow, an informal economic adviser to Trump dating back to the campaign. "As other people in the administration have lost ground, there is a seesaw effect, and Mnuchin's standing has improved."

That helped the Treasury secretary weather sharp criticism this past summer after his wife engaged in a tit-for-tat on Instagram over a photograph she posted of herself emerging from a government aircraft in designer clothes — a trip, it later emerged, that included a visit to Fort Knox, where the pair watched the eclipse. Mnuchin then made comments dismissing public interest in the solar event, inflaming the controversy.

After Trump's wavering condemnations of neo-Nazi violence in Charlottesville, Virginia, in August, Mnuchin publicly defended the president against charges that he'd equivocated between hate groups and counterprotesters. He did the same with the controversy over NFL players kneeling during the national anthem at games to protest police brutality against African-Americans, saying the players should "do free speech on their own time."

The fact that Mnuchin waded into the latter controversy, so far outside of the purview of the Treasury Department, led former Treasury Secretary Larry Summers to call Mnuchin on Twitter "the greatest sycophant in Cabinet history."

His loyalty has, however, paid dividends in keeping up his relationship with the president, and that has contributed to Mnuchin's status inside the White House, far more than his relations with Capitol Hill. This week, he's in the Middle East to coordinate efforts with allies to crack down on terrorist financing, and he'll be part of Trump's entourage when he travels to Asia next month.

"Most of our deep tax policy discussions with the president are with Secretary Mnuchin and Director Cohn together, all hashing out the issues and thinking the pros and cons," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas). "The interactions in that group has really proven to be valuable."

Yet Mnuchin's ability to stay in Trump's good graces has not translated into his ability to build warm relationships across Capitol Hill.

His debt ceiling comment still plagues his relationships in the House. The picture is not much better in the Senate, where he's still an unknown quantity to many members, thanks to the fact that he spent so little time in Washington before becoming Treasury secretary.

People who have dealt with Mnuchin acknowledge that he has a quiet, sometimes socially awkward manner that does not lend itself to chitchat or building instant rapport.

"He's reserved. He is not a slap-you-on-the-back type of guy," said Hatch. "But if you ask him a question, he'll answer it. There is no subterfuge with him."

Yet there remains a feeling among some Republican lawmakers and congressional aides that Mnuchin views tax reform through the lens of what is good for New York and Wall Street — a worldview that sometimes can mar his ability to sell the White House's efforts politically and throughout the heartland as a middle-class tax plan.

As one congressional aide remarked: "High finance does not always translate into tax reform."

Lately, Mnuchin has tried to combat these perceptions by hosting lawmakers or small groups at the agency's majestic downtown building, adjacent to the White House, as a way to help him forge better relationships in a comfortable setting, and lawmakers have appreciated the gesture.

The administration has also been putting other top officials out to help sell tax reform — particularly those with far deeper ties to the Hill.

Vice President Mike Pence gave a speech at the right-leaning American Enterprise Institute on Tuesday morning, while the director of the Office of Management and Budget, Mick Mulvaney, has emerged as a key and vocal player who has tried to allay lawmakers' concerns about the way any tax package could add to the deficit.

Mulvaney has strong relationships with House members, thanks to his roughly six years in the chamber. The White House also recently included Mulvaney in a closed-door session with some members of the Senate Finance Committee.

The test of Mnuchin's leadership on tax reform will come shortly, perhaps as early as next week, once detailed proposals emerge from the House Ways and Means Committee.

Then, Mnuchin will have to defend far more specific decisions on tax breaks and deductions and deploy Treasury's army of resources to help with the economic modeling and analysis, all while remaining a fierce advocate for Trump. "A big part of this will be to make sure the White House and Treasury is coming out with a consistent position," said one congressional aide. "Things will get tough. That will be the real test."

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by Chevron: PJM slams DOE grid proposal — GOP senators hold up disaster aid over Jones Act — Report: Pruitt spends $2 million on security

PJM: PERRY PLAN WON'T SOLVE PROBLEMS: Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposal to support coal and nuclear power generation isn't going to work, and may be contrary to law if enacted, according to Andy Ott, CEO of PJM Interconnection. "Some of the concerns raised by DOE we certainly understand [and] agree with a need for action. However, the DOE's proposed remedy is simply unworkable," Ott told reporters. He argued that Perry's plan went against FERC's core statute and the agency's practice of treating energy sources fairly, Darius Dixon reports. "It's not a uniform proposal across the nation. It seems to be a proposal that's targeted at specific resources, which we think is discriminatory and inconsistent with the Federal Power Act," Ott said. "We believe that it's contrary to law and ... [won't] really solve any problems."

"I don't know how you incorporate such a proposal without having a significant detrimental impact on markets," he added. The PJM CEO joins an array of voices condemning DOE's proposed pricing rule, including the oil and gas industry, renewable energy companies, environmentalists and others. FERC is accepting initial comments on the proposal through today.

WHAT'S THE HOLDUP? GOP Sens. Jeff Flake and Mike Lee are delaying passage of a disaster aid package, demanding that Puerto Rico be made permanently exempt from the Jones Act, among other concerns. The 1920 law, which restricts shipments between U.S. ports to vessels built and operated by Americans, has complicated efforts to send supplies to the hurricane-hit territory as it recovers. POLITICO's Seung Min Kim reports the senators are also holding the bill up over fiscal concerns. The Senate plans a procedural vote tonight "to advance the $36.5 billion measure, which has already passed the House," Seung Min reports. "Even with the objections, senators are expected to pass the bill later this week and send it to President Donald Trump for his signature. Read more."

PRUITT'S HOUSE OF CARDS: EPA has spent almost $16,000 on a card reader security system for EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's office, and the agency is hiring as many as a dozen more agents for Pruitt's personal force of 24/7 bodyguards, CNN reported today. A full team will have salaries topping at least $2 million annually, and that doesn't include other costs for training or equipment, CNN notes. It also doesn't account for travel; at least one agent travels in first class with Pruitt on flights around the country.

The card reader contract also expanded Pruitt's "duress alarm" to sound in a newly constructed office designated for Pruitt's security detail, according to the contract information posted online. CNN, citing "a source with knowledge," said that EPA is also considering biometric security measures like fingerprint scanners, "but it was not clear if a biometric system had been installed or continues to be under consideration." All this comes amid both planned budget cuts and what EPA's inspector general says is a significant increase in threats against the administrator.

PROPOSED REPEAL OF EPA GLIDER EMISSIONS RULE HEADS TO OMB: EPA has sent to the White House a proposal to repeal part of the Obama administration's Phase 2 heavy-duty truck rule covering gliders and glider kits, according to a notice on the OMB's website. The rule classified gliders — refurbished engines installed into a new tractor chassis — as new motor vehicles, subjecting them to stricter emissions limits. Pruitt met in May with representatives from Fitzgerald Truck Sales, the largest provider of glider kits in the U.S. In August, he announced that EPA would revisit those parts of the rule, as well as a separate section setting novel trailer standards.

SHOW ME THE MONEY: Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.) and Rep. Steve Scalise (R-La.) are asking for a meeting with Interior about why payments to Louisiana coming from a Gulf of Mexico oil and gas revenue sharing program may be less than half what was expected, congressional sources told AE. Louisiana Gov. John Bel Edwards sounded the alarm in a letter dated Oct. 20 that said the state's Coastal Protection and Restoration Authority estimated it would receive only up to $75 million from the Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act, not the $176 million maximum it expected to receive earlier this year. GOMESA money helps Louisiana and other coastal states repair coastal areas, but the Trump White House had proposed earlier this year that the federal government keep a larger chunk of the royalty payments now going to the revenue sharing program. An Interior spokesperson did not comment the proposed meeting or GOMESA math.

KEEP IN MINE: The Mine Safety and Health Administration today seeks public comments on its reporting requirements for mine refuse piles and impoundments, Pro Employment & Immigration's Ian Kullgren reports. The comment period will remain open through Nov. 22 and arrives as MSHA is seeking a renewal of its reporting requirements from the OMB, according to a Federal Register notice published today. The notice says OMB is particularly interested in comments that "[address] whether the proposed collection of information is necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the agency," and "evaluate the accuracy of the agency's estimate ... and minimize the burden of the collection of information on those who are to respond."

HOUSE BUDGET VOTE ON THURSDAY: The House is set to vote Thursday to formally back the Senate's budget resolution, "fast-tracking the GOP's effort to advance a tax overhaul with a simple majority in the Senate," Pro Budget's Sarah Ferris reports. "House Republicans are expected to easily clear the fiscal 2018 budget, despite the fact that the upper chamber's version is not as fiscally conservative as the plan the House advanced earlier this month. With passage, Republicans would unlock the powerful legislative tool known as reconciliation, which replaces the Senate's 60-vote threshold with a simple majority in some circumstances." SCOTT REQUESTS MORE FOR ENVIRONMENT: Florida Gov. Rick Scott announced today that he will seek spending increases for the environment next year, receiving both praise and criticism from environmentalists, POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports. "Scott said his fiscal year 2018 request will include a record $355 million for Everglades restoration along with $50 million for the Florida Forever land conservation program at the Department of Environmental Protection," Bruce writes. "Florida Forever received no funding in the current state budget, while Everglades restoration received $167.7 million. ... The announcement was praised by representatives of Audubon Florida and the Everglades Foundation who attended Scott's announcement at Audubon's Corkscrew Swamp Sanctuary in Collier County. ... PJM CEO: Perry grid plan 'contrary to law' Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/23/2017 02:38 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposal to support coal and nuclear power generation is unworkable and may be contrary to law if enacted, according to Andy Ott, CEO of PJM Interconnection.

"Some of the concerns raised by DOE we certainly understand [and] agree with a need for action. However, the DOE's proposed remedy is simply unworkable," Ott told reporters on a conference call this afternoon.

He argued that Perry's plan flew in the face of FERC's core statute and the agency's practice of treating energy sources fairly.

"It's not a uniform proposal across the nation. It seems to be a proposal that's targeted at specific resources, which we think is discriminatory and inconsistent with the Federal Power Act," Ott said. "We believe that it's contrary to law and ... [won't] really solve any problems."

The proposal was discriminatory, he said, because in boosting coal and nuclear power, the rule would create a special group of power sources that are "providing very similar or the same services" to the grid. In addition, Perry's plan was tweaked after its release but before its official publication to stipulate that the rule would apply to power markets that also had capacity markets.

"Certainly, there are generators in non-RTO areas and certainly generators in areas without capacity markets," Ott said. "The point is, why would they be compensated any differently?"

He added: "I don't know how you incorporate such a proposal without having a significant detrimental impact on markets. "

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC is accepting initial comments on the DOE proposal through the end of today.

GOP senators hold up disaster aid over Puerto Rico concerns Back

By Seung Min Kim | 10/23/2017 01:44 PM EDT

At least two Senate Republicans are delaying swift passage of a disaster aid package — demanding that Puerto Rico be made permanently exempt from a 1920 law that has complicated efforts to send supplies to the hurricane-ravaged territory.

Jeff Flake of Arizona and Mike Lee of Utah are holding up the legislation, according to GOP sources, due to fiscal concerns but also to allow Puerto Rico to bow out from the Jones Act, which restricts shipments between U.S. ports to just those vessels built and operated by Americans.

The Senate on Monday evening will hold a procedural vote to advance the $36.5 billion measure, H.R. 2266 \(115\), which has already passed the House. Even with the objections, senators are expected to pass the bill later this week and send it to President Donald Trump for his signature.

Lee wants 30 minutes on the floor to speak about his concerns before the disaster aid package passes, a spokesman said.

The Trump administration issued a 10-day waiver of the Jones Act late last month, but said it would not extend it.

Lee and another Arizona Republican, John McCain, have introduced a bill that would permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act, which the senators say has caused shipping costs from the U.S. mainland to the territory to be double the cost of goods carried from foreign islands near Puerto Rico.

The aid package has been a target of several parochial concerns from senators representing regions recently hit by disaster.

Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) were among the senators pushing for more aid to help their home states recover from the torrent of hurricanes earlier this year.

Cornyn extracted personal assurances last week from the Trump administration that another emergency funding measure will include more money for Texas, which is dealing with the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey in late August.

Ted Cruz (R-Texas) also has a hold on the disaster aid package, GOP sources said. A spokesman for the Texas senator did not return a request for comment.

EPA will review parts of Phase 2 truck emissions rule Back

EPA will revisit certain parts of the Obama administration's 2016 Phase 2 emissions rule for heavy-duty trucks, the agency announced today.

The rule set new standards for model years 2021-2027 of tractor-trailers, school buses, delivery vans and other large workhorse vehicles. The Truck Trailer Manufacturers Association sued to block EPA's novel aerodynamic requirements for trailers, arguing the agency cannot set vehicle standards for a product without an actual engine.

The Trump administration is considering revisions to the trailer standards, but it will leave in place separate requirements for tractor engines.

The final 2027 trailer standards by themselves would have secured as much as a 9 percent drop in carbon dioxide emissions and fuel consumption compared to a 2017 trailer, and the separate standards for tractor engines would achieve up to 25 percent emissions reductions by 2027, according to Obama administration estimates.

EPA said it will also reconsider part of the rule that classifies gliders — refurbished engines installed into a new tractor chassis — as a new motor vehicle. House appropriators last month voted to have EPA report to Congress on the glider issue, although that language may not survive the ultimate spending package that clears Congress.

"We intend to initiate a rulemaking process that incorporates the latest technical data and is wholly consistent with our authority under the Clean Air Act," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will begin a rulemaking process to revise or completely rescind those parts of the rule. The earliest compliance deadlines are in 2018. The trailer association unsuccessfully sought relief in court, but EPA may now offer administrative delays in light of its new rulemaking.

DOL solicits comments on mine waste records Back

By Ian Kullgren | 10/23/2017 01:58 PM EDT

The Mine Safety and Health Administration today asked for public comments on its reporting requirements for mine waste.

The comment period, which will remain open through Nov. 22, asks for feedback on the agency's reporting requirements for refuse piles and impoundments — pools of mixed coal waste and water created during the mining process.

MSHA is seeking a renewal of its reporting requirements from the Office of Management and Budget, according to a Federal Register notice published today, and must provide a comment period as part of that process. The notice says OMB is particularly interested in comments that "[address] whether the proposed collection of information is necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the agency," and "evaluate the accuracy of the agency's estimate ... and minimize the burden of the collection of information on those who are to respond."

House to vote Thursday on Senate budget Back

By Sarah Ferris | 10/23/2017 12:42 PM EDT

The House is slated to vote Thursday to formally back the Senate's budget resolution, fast-tracking the GOP's effort to advance a tax overhaul with a simple majority in the Senate.

House Republicans are expected to easily clear the fiscal 2018 budget, despite the fact that the upper chamber's version is not as fiscally conservative as the plan the House advanced earlier this month.

With passage, Republicans would unlock the powerful legislative tool known as reconciliation, which replaces the Senate's 60-vote threshold with a simple majority in some circumstances.

The Rules Committee is scheduled to meet Tuesday to set parameters for considering the budget. If the House quickly wraps up other work, floor debate could begin as early as Wednesday, with a vote on final passage postponed until Thursday.

The House GOP conference tentatively agreed Sunday to take up the budget the Senate passed last week — rather than try to reconcile differences through a conference committee — to save several weeks of legislative work.

The move is a major concession for House Budget Chairman Diane Black, who pitched her own budget as the GOP's most conservative plan in 20 years.

To pay for a tax overhaul, the Senate budget would allow for the addition of up to $1.5 trillion to the federal deficit. In contrast, the House's plan would require the tax reform bill to be deficit neutral and would force Congress to find more than $200 billion in savings from changes to mandatory programs like Social Security and Medicare — provisions considered a non-starter for Senate Republicans.

Trump spars with widow of slain soldier about condolence call Back

By Louis Nelson | 10/23/2017 08:30 AM EDT

Myeshia Johnson, the widow of a soldier killed earlier this month in Niger, said Monday that a condolence call from President Donald Trump "made me cry even worse," prompting Trump to immediately push back against part of her emotional account via Twitter.

"The president said that he knew what he signed up for, but it hurts anyways and I was — it made me cry because I was very angry at the tone of his voice and how he said it. He couldn't remember my husband's name. The only way he remembered my husband's name was because he told me he had my husband's report in front of him and that's when he actually said 'La David,'" Johnson told ABC's "Good Morning America." "I heard him stumbling on trying to remember my husband's name and that's what hurt me the most because if my husband is out here fighting for our country, and he risks his life for our country, why can't you remember his name? And that's what made me upset and cry even more because my husband was an awesome soldier."

An hour after Johnson's ABC interview aired, Trump responded on Twitter to rebut a portion of her account. "I had a very respectful conversation with the widow of Sgt. La David Johnson, and spoke his name from beginning, without hesitation!" Trump claimed in his online post.

The interview and Trump's online response to it drags the controversy surrounding the president's condolence call to Johnson into its second week, prolonging a news cycle that has resurfaced questions about the president's treatment of Gold Star families. The issue of Trump's conversation with Johnson has mushroomed just as the White House has sought to focus attention on the president's proposed tax cuts and reforms and has brought back memories of Trump's feud with the Gold Star Khan family, who railed against the president at last summer's Democratic National Convention.

The phone call between Johnson and the president became a point of contention last week when Frederica Wilson (D-Fla.), a family friend who was traveling with the widow when she took Trump's call on speakerphone, told reporters that the president had struggled to remember Army Sgt. La David Johnson's name and said the slain soldier knew what he signed up for when he enlisted.

As the week wore on, the White House lashed out at Wilson, accusing the hat-wearing congresswoman of being "all hat, no cattle" and suggesting that she had sought to politicize the soldier's death. Trump himself, in a post to Twitter, wrote that Wilson had "totally fabricated what I said to the wife of a soldier who died in action (and I have proof). Sad!"

The Trump administration's most powerful defense came last Thursday from White House chief of staff John Kelly, a retired Marine Corps general, who shared with reporters what happens when a service member dies and recalled details from the death of his own son, a Marine who was killed in Afghanistan in 2010. Kelly shared the words of condolence that his friend, Marine Corps Gen. Joe Dunford, had offered him on his son's death — that "he was doing exactly what he wanted to do when he was killed" — a similar sentiment to what Trump sought to express on his call with Johnson.

Kelly, in his briefing room remarks, also lashed out at Wilson, referring to her as an "empty barrel" as he recalled the 2015 dedication of an FBI office in Miami, where he said the Florida lawmaker inappropriately boasted that she had been instrumental in securing the funding for the facility. But the chief of staff's criticism was quickly discredited: Wilson had not yet been elected to Congress when the money for the FBI building was appropriated, and video of her remarks from the ceremony shows her celebrating the bipartisan legislation she spearheaded to name the new FBI building after two agents killed in a 1986 fire, not to secure funding for the building.

The White House stood behind Kelly's statement and Sanders told reporters Friday that "If you want to go after Gen. Kelly, that's up to you. But I think that if you want to get into a debate with the four-star Marine general, I think that's something highly inappropriate."

Despite the White House's insistence that Wilson had mischaracterized and fabricated the tenor of Trump's call, Myeshia Johnson's account of the conversation aligned with the lawmaker's account.

"Whatever Ms. Wilson said was not fabricated. What she said was 100 percent correct," she said, explaining that six people, including Wilson, had heard the call as the family made its way to meet the slain soldier's remains at Dover Air Force Base. "The phone was on speakerphone. Why would we fabricate something like that?"

The widow said she was left "very, very upset and hurt, very" by the president's call.

She also said that many of her questions surrounding her husband's death have not yet been answered by the military and that she has not been allowed to view her husband's body. She said she has not been told how he was killed or why it took two days from the time La David Johnson's unit was attacked for the military to recover his body.

"Why couldn't I see my husband? Every time I asked to see my husband, they wouldn't let me," she said. "I need to see him so I will know that that is my husband. I don't know nothing. They won't show me a finger, a hand. I know my husband's body from head to toe, and they won't let me see anything. I don't know what's in that box. It could be empty for all I know, but I need — I need to see my husband."

The man who helped cool Trump's Russia rage Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 10/23/2017 05:09 AM EDT

Since the end of July, President Donald Trump has noticeably tempered his public complaints about the Russia investigation, avoiding any Twitter allusions to a "witch hunt" or threats to fire special counsel Robert Mueller.

That's partly due to the intervention of White House lawyer Ty Cobb, who since joining the administration 2½ months ago has impressed upon Trump the risks of using such loaded language when it comes to Mueller, according to a White House official and several sources familiar with the president's legal strategy.

Cobb's ability to keep Trump's Russia rage under control is going to be tested in the months ahead as Mueller's probe heats up. The special counsel's team is interviewing current and former White House officials and campaign staffers, as well as the president's own family members, in its sprawling investigation.

Solomon Wisenberg, a former deputy on Kenneth Starr's independent counsel investigation into President Bill Clinton, credited Cobb with having "a very salutary effect" on Trump. "It's one thing to have an adviser to tell you, 'Boy, if you say this it's not good politics, it's not good for us,'" he said. "It's another thing to have your white-collar lawyer say, 'This is extremely harmful to you legally to say this.'"

Cobb's job — for which he's putting in upward of 85 hours a week — includes reviewing a vast database of internal documents relevant to the Russia probe and also speaking with reporters, though he has studiously avoided television appearances. Five staffers now work for him full time at the White House, including Steven Groves, who stepped down in August from his job as chief of staff to U.S. ambassador to the United Nations Nikki Haley.

In an interview, Cobb said he can't take credit for the change in the president's tone on Russia, and notes that John Kelly took over as White House chief of staff the same week he arrived. But, Cobb said, it's the president who really changed course, endorsing a move toward greater cooperation in hopes of speeding Mueller's probe to a close.

"He did it," Cobb said of Trump.

Now, Cobb says, "we've got a good relationship in terms of trust" with Mueller. "They know the effort we've put into it," he added.

It's a dramatic turnaround from earlier this year, when Trump's legal team was based in New York under the leadership of his longtime personal attorney, Marc Kasowitz, who often served as the president's attack dog — including at a June appearance at the National Press Club during which he declared Trump's innocence and suggested that ousted FBI Director James Comey had lied under oath to Congress.

Privately, Kasowitz had also tried but failed to get the president to stop tweeting about the Russia investigation in April and May, just before Trump's firing of Comey prompted the appointment of Mueller, according to a person familiar with Trump's legal strategy. "He was very well aware of the stakes of his tweeting and the ramifications of what could take place," this person said.

Kasowitz stepped away in July amid frustration with the president's behavior and has since been replaced by John Dowd and Jay Sekulow as Trump's lead personal attorneys, while Cobb is working alongside White House Counsel Don McGahn. While Cobb represents the White House itself, Dowd and Sekulow deal with Trump's personal legal issues, including Mueller's probe into possible obstruction of justice surrounding the Comey firing. The three attorneys are in regular communication and keep one other apprised of some aspects of their work, like their schedules, Cobb said.

Robert Bennett, a former personal attorney for Clinton and Cobb's longtime law partner, said the president's attorneys had given Trump certain legal heft and appeared to have helped in tamping down some of the most potentially damaging aspects of his earlier behavior. "I know John and Ty are two very forceful advocates with a lot of experience," said Bennett. "My surmise is they had an impact."

Cobb works out of a windowless office in the West Wing, not far from the Situation Room and White House mess hall—though he has to go through the office of a communication staffer just to get to his desk.

He started out reporting directly to Trump, a precondition he insisted upon when taking the job early this summer, though that arrangement changed with the arrival of Kelly, who now serves as a gatekeeper to the Oval Office. Cobb didn't know the president beforehand — someone who has long experience with civil litigation, but wasn't familiar with how a high-stakes Washington investigation works.

Cobb has extensive experience on Washington special counsel investigations going back decades. He represented several individuals pulled into the Starr probe, which started with the Clintons' Whitewater land deal. He also had clients who were dragged into separate cases examining Clinton's secretaries of Agriculture and Housing and Urban Development, and he represented Eli Segal, the head of Clinton's AmeriCorps national service program who was ultimately cleared of any wrongdoing during an independent counsel probe into alleged conflicts of interest.

He also served as a top investigator who examined the corruption allegations against Ronald Reagan's HUD secretary, Samuel Pierce. That case didn't result in any charges against Pierce but 17 others were indicted and convicted over the course of the five-year probe. And he represented one of the lawyers caught up in the Iran-Contra investigation.

Trump's attorneys haven't been able to stop Trump from making any comments on Mueller's investigation. In a Fox News interview earlier this month, the president called the Russia probe "an excuse used by the Democrats when they lost the election." And last week, Trump tweeted the suggestion that the Democratic Party, FBI or Kremlin could have helped pay for a dossier of salacious but unverified information about ties between him, his 2016 campaign and the Russian government.

Those comments, however, were in marked contrast with Trump's off-the-cuff and legally troublesome responses on Russia from the first half of the year. His Twitter posts alone — a May warning that Comey "better hope that there are no tapes of our conversations before he starts leaking to the press!" — have been described as invitations to sharp lines of questioning from Mueller.

Trump also has drawn scrutiny for several moves right before Cobb, Kelly and others joined the White House, including his decision to skirt his own attorney when he reportedly dictated his son's initial public statement to the press explaining the reason for a 2016 Trump Tower meeting with a Russian lawyer. That statement, written aboard Air Force One, said Donald Trump Jr. "primarily discussed a program about the adoption of Russian children" - even though his son later released emails showing the meeting was offered as a chance to see damaging material about Hillary Clinton.

Trump in mid-July — with only one communications staffer present — also gave a controversial Oval Office interview to The New York Times in which he said he regretted hiring Attorney General Jeff Sessions because of his recusal from the Russia probe and also called it a "violation" for Mueller to examine his family finances beyond Russia.

Working as one of the president's attorneys is hardly a risk-free endeavor. John Dean, Richard Nixon's White House counsel, became a federal government witness who exposed the details of the Watergate cover-up. Several of Clinton's top White House lawyers, including Bernard Nussbaum, Bruce Lindsey, Beth Nolan and Jack Quinn, ended up on the witness stand or other legal crosshairs themselves amid the Democratic president's scandals. And a federal judge ordered Harriet Miers, President George W. Bush's top counsel, to testify before Congress over the firings of U.S. attorneys.

"It's an office in which you can take some heavy fire," said Robert Bauer, the former White House counsel under Barack Obama, the only president in the post-Watergate years who didn't face an independent investigation during his time in office.

Indeed, some of Trump's attorneys are already facing legal jeopardy. Michael Cohen, one of Trump's longest serving personal attorneys, has his own lawyer and remains on the radar of the Senate Intelligence Committee, which just postponed a public hearing previously scheduled for Wednesday to examine his role in the Russia probe. McGahn, the Trump White House counsel, has also retained a lawyer and is expected to soon follow his former colleagues Reince Priebus and Sean Spicer to be questioned by Mueller's team about his role in several early moves that have become central parts of the Russia investigation, including the hiring and firing of Michael Flynn, who briefly served as White House national security adviser, and the ousting of Comey.

Several other Trump lawyers — both inside and outside the White House — could face more intense questions over their role in the Russia response. Mueller is reportedly interested in speaking with James Burnham, a former senior associate counsel in McGahn's office who now works in the Justice Department's civil division.

Two other McGahn deputies have confirmed roles in the Russia response: Stefan Passantino, who has been a main point of contact for the Office of Government Ethics as it examines the establishment of a legal defense fund for Trump staffers, and Greg Katsas, who last week acknowledged during his Senate confirmation hearing for a seat on a key federal appeals court that he'd given legal advice "on a few discrete legal questions" involving the White House response to the Russia probe.

Kasowitz could also be a potential witness over the role he played earlier this year by reportedly suggesting to White House aides they didn't yet need to hire their own attorneys. As Trump's personal lawyer, he can lean on attorney-client privilege, but legal experts say his interactions with the president's government employees could put him in Mueller's sights. "It's potentially obstruction, not to put too fine a point on it," said a lawyer representing another client mired in the Russia probe.

Sekulow, Trump's other outside attorney alongside Dowd, could face questions for the public statements he made to the media earlier this summer minimizing the president's role in crafting the response to the Times story about Donald Trump Jr.'s 2016 campaign meeting with the Russian attorney promising Clinton dirt, according to legal experts.

While Cobb, Dodd and Kelly have helped to tamp down the president's recent statements on the Russia probe, they can't erase the problems that Trump and his previous legal advisers created for themselves, said Ross Garber, a white-collar defense attorney who has defended three Republican governors during impeachment proceedings: Alabama's Robert Bentley, South Carolina's Mark Sanford and Connecticut's John Rowland. Garber added that Sekulow's multiple appearances on television publicly discussing the Trump case could set up a legal fight over whether he retains his complete right to attorney-client privilege involving conversations with the president.

"The way this was organized at the beginning," Garber said, "would have put the actions of the lawyers and the spokesmen and especially the lawyer-spokesman on the radar screen."

In an interview, Sekulow said his attorney-client privilege with Trump remains in place. And he said he isn't expecting to be personally pulled into Mueller's Russia probe. "I've not heard from Bob [Mueller]. I'm not planning on hearing from him. And I don't have a lawyer," he said.

Dowd declined comment for this story.

Cobb and Dowd have gained notoriety in other ways too. They became front-page fodder in the New York Times after a reporter overheard their public conversation on the patio at BLT Steak in downtown Washington about how much cooperation Trump should give Mueller.

Cobb last month also got duped by an email prankster who was impersonating a White House aide, a flap he said in an interview became a "complete distraction" and had prompted a threefold spike in new attempts to lure him into similar conversations.

"I always try to be responsive. Even the haters. I try to calm them down," Cobb said. "My view is I like people. I try to see the better nature in people. I hate to see people just viscerally angry. I responded to those with great success for the first couple of weeks. Now it's in a different mode."

Democrats' early money haul stuns GOP Back

By Elena Schneider | 10/23/2017 05:07 AM EDT

Democratic candidates are reporting historic early fundraising totals, alarming GOP strategists and raising the prospect that 2018 could feature the most expansive House battlefield in years.

Animated by opposition to President Donald Trump and the Republican congressional majorities, at least 162 Democratic candidates in 82 GOP-held districts have raised over $100,000 so far this year, according to a POLITICO analysis of the latest FEC data. That's about four times as many candidates as House Democrats had at this point before the 2016 or 2014 elections, and it's more than twice as many as Republicans had running at this point eight years ago, on the eve of capturing the House in the 2010 wave election.

Nearly three dozen Republican incumbents were outraised by Democratic challengers in the third quarter of this year - a stunning figure. Nine GOP incumbents already trail a Democratic opponent in cash on hand, increasing the likelihood that many veteran incumbents will face tough opposition for the first time in years.

The Democrats' fundraising success, especially from a glut of candidates who have never run for office before, is unsettling to those charged with protecting the GOP majority.

"That's something that should get every Republican's attention in Washington," said Jason Roe, a Republican strategist who works on House races. "These first-timers are printing money."

Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.), who has never gotten less than 58 percent of the vote in 12 terms in Congress, is among those suddenly facing cash-flush opposition. Three Democratic opponents outraised Frelinghuysen in the third quarter, and each has already brought in more money than any challenger Frelinghuysen has faced in a quarter-century.

In Texas, GOP Rep. John Culberson, whose Houston-area district attracted little attention from either party before Hillary Clinton carried it in 2016, finished the summer with less campaign cash than two different Democratic opponents.

The long slate of well-funded Democratic candidates, coupled with a favorable political environment and poor polling numbers for Trump, is raising Democratic hopes of erasing the GOP's 24-seat majority.

"The Democrats in 2017 are starting to very much resemble the Republicans in 2009," said former Rep. Steve Israel, who chaired the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in 2012 and 2014. "People are talking about a wave developing, but in order to even begin to think about a wave, you have to be in a position to take advantage in [case of] a wave. And Democrats are clearly in that position."

Many Republican representatives, especially ones battle-hardened from past campaigns, are already preparing hard for 2018 by shoring up their positions. Reps. Martha McSally (R-Ariz.) and Barbara Comstock (R-Va.), for example, vastly outraised all of their Democratic challengers in the last quarter as they ready for reelection campaigns in districts Trump lost in 2016.

"The fact that the environment is so intense so early is ultimately a good thing, as it makes sure more members will be prepared," said Mike DuHaime, a Republican operative. "They can see it coming."

Republican groups are also raising tens of millions of dollars to help bolster their party. The Republican National Committee in particular has outstripped the Democratic National Committee, raising over $100 million and building up cash reserves of over $44 million this year, ahead of the 2018 elections. House Speaker Paul Ryan has also raised record-setting amounts of money for House Republicans.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised $8.9 million in September, beating its Republican counterpart for the fifth month in a row. But the National Republican Congressional Committee still has more than $10 million more in its bank account — money that will come in handy across the sprawling battleground, especially if more incumbents retire.

Democrats and Republicans each have a handful of costly, open battleground seats to defend, from Rep. Dave Reichert's (R-Wash.) suburban district outside Seattle to Democratic Rep. Tim Walz's rural seat in southern Minnesota.

"Resources will be spread thin because no incumbent — in the primary or in the general — can afford to not take this seriously," said Roe, the Republican consultant. "We're just spread thin. That's our vulnerability, the strain on resources."

That strain was apparent in recent comments by Rep. Glenn Grothman, who represents a solidly Republican block of eastern Wisconsin, easily won reelection in 2016, and has not typically made lists of GOP incumbents vulnerable to a 2018 challenge. Grothman told a local radio program earlier this month that he's "very apprehensive about the future," because "the fundraising is not going as well as I'd like."

"We're not raising as much money as we should," Grothman added.

A week later, his Democratic opponent, Dan Kohl, filed a campaign finance disclosure showing him outpacing the Republican incumbent.

"Clearly there is an intensity among the Democratic base that is similar to what Republicans had in 2009, but it's hard to tell what it's going to be like a year from now," said DuHaime. "But you can't deny the enthusiasm."

Stung by over-optimistic projections in past years, Democratic operatives have been careful to avoid declaring a wave on the horizon. With so many candidates piling into crowded Democratic primaries, they worry about their own resources being drained and fear nominees could be pulled too far to the left before difficult general election battles next year.

"It's way too early to start measuring the drapes," said former DCCC executive director Kelly Ward, now a top staffer at the National Democratic Redistricting Committee, adding that under the current congressional map, "you need a tsunami, not just a wave, to overcome how badly the [district] lines are broken."

The party's first order of business in 2018 will be to navigate an unusual number of expensive primaries looming due to the free-flowing money and the opportunity Democrats smell in dozens of districts. In southern California, two of the biggest Democratic self-funders in the country — Andy Thorburn, who loaned his campaign $2 million, and Gil Cisneros, who gave his campaign over half a million dollars — are both running against GOP Rep. Ed Royce, along with a handful of other candidates. Three other districts in Orange County alone are similarly crowded, and drenched in campaign money.

In some primaries, local Democrats are pushing back on national party leaders' anointment of candidates, as in the fight to take on Rep. Mike Coffman in Colorado. Democrats also expect issues like Sen. Bernie Sanders' Medicare-for-all plan to divide candidates, and Republicans are ready to pounce on statements that may play well in Democratic primaries but could be damaging in swing-district general elections.

"Nothing beats watching candidates blow their cash trying to explain how progressive they are and how they are 'still on the fence' about Nancy Pelosi's place in their party," said Jesse Hunt, the press secretary for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Israel acknowledged the debates within his party but said he does not believe they will weaken Democratic candidates next November.

"To the extent that there are differences, they are certainly not sapping Democrats' fundraising abilities, not sapping Democratic recruitment and certainly not sapping Democratic energy," Israel said. "There may be fissures, but they are not swallowing up our party. The Republicans have fissures that are swallowing up their party."

U.S. STILL STICKING WITH ITS PARIS PLAN: Judy Garber, acting assistant secretary at the State Department, reaffirmed President Donald Trump's stance today that the U.S. "intends to withdraw at the earliest opportunity" from the Paris climate agreement, but sidestepped the controversy some in Bonn have brought by pressing for coal, via the White House's wishes. Garber, head of the U.S. delegation to the climate change talks, said during an address to COP23's high-level session that the U.S. intends to remain engaged with partners on climate issues. Garber said Washington remains "open to the possibility of rejoining at a later date under terms more favorable to the American people." Representatives in Bonn have not discussed what those "terms" might be, Emily Holden reports.

Garber noted that U.S. emissions have fallen as the economy has grown and said much of that was because of private sector innovation. But her comments strikingly diverge from the message brought by Trump aides in Bonn, who promoted new coal for developing countries at a side event and have suggested the possibility of linking with other countries in a "clean coal alliance." Full remarks here.

THE COAL SHOULDER: Canada and the U.K. today launched an anti-coal alliance, in a direct challenge to the Trump administration's coal message. Canadian Environment Minister Catherine McKenna and Claire Perry, the U.K. minister for climate change, formally launched the 27-member group, whose declaration said it will seek to close down existing coal plants and "impose a moratorium on any new traditional coal power stations without operational carbon capture and storage." Emily reports more here.

WATCHDOG SLAMS ZINKE: Because Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke failed to properly document his travel, it's impossible to say whether he has violated government rules, Interior's watchdog determined today. "Our investigation is delayed by absent or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips and a review process that failed to include proper documentation and accountability," Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall said in a letter obtained by POLITICO and first reported by The Washington Post. Zinke's travel has come under fire for mixing taxpayer-funded travel with political activities, as well as taking military or private planes rather than flying commercial, and the investigation by Interior's Office of Inspector General seeks to clarify whether all procedures were correctly followed, Eric Wolff reports.

HEAR YE, HEAR YE: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt will testify before the House Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee on Dec. 7 — his first time before the committee, Alex Guillén reports. Chairman Greg Walden (R-Ore.) and subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus (R-Ill.) said in a joint statement that they're looking forward to receiving a "much-needed update" from Pruitt on his priorities, "including his stated policy of getting EPA 'back to the basics' and its impact on the agency's activity going forward."

— The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee announced today Pruitt will testify before the committee on Jan. 31 — something committee Democrats have been clamoring for, since the EPA head hasn't returned to the panel since his confirmation in February.

FORGET ABOUT IT: FERC head Neil Chatterjee today said the agency is moving past Rick Perry's grid proposal, instead focusing on its own approach. Chatterjee told reporters after FERC's monthly meeting that the issue of supporting baseload coal-fired and nuclear power plants had caused a "hyperbolic reaction" because many people didn't understand FERC's process. "I think part of the problem is that people are still debating the [notice of proposed rulemaking] as it was submitted to us [by the Energy Department]," he said. "What I'm trying to say is we've moved past that and we're moving toward a constructive solution that still answers the questions that Secretary Perry asked in the NOPR in a way that does not distort markets and is legally defensible." Darius Dixon reports more here.

I'VE HEARD ENOUGH ABOUT THE GREAT ZEFAM COCHRANE! After a brief hiatus at monthly meetings, a handful of pipeline protesters interrupted today's FERC agenda, including 77-year-old actor James Cromwell. "You may be a federal agency but you do not represent the will or the well-being of the American people," Cromwell, known for roles in "Star Trek," "Babe" and "L.A. Confidential," yelled at the commission leaders from the back of the meeting room as he was being escorted out. "The energy that you're pushing is inimical to life on this planet."

Chatterjee throws some serious shade: "I just want to start by saying I'm fairly certain James Cromwell uttered more words there than he did in the entire movie 'Babe.' He only says, like, four words in the that movie," Chatterjee told reporters at the beginning of a press conference. "He was, for the record, awesome in 'L.A. Confidential.' ... Who said FERC's an obscure agency? C-list actors are coming to our meetings."

STAFF CHANGES AT BLM: Zinke has appointed Brian Steed, the former chief of staff for Rep. Chris Stewart (R-Utah), as acting director of the Bureau of Land Management, a change that was announced in a Wednesday email to BLM staff and obtained by POLITICO. Steed joined Interior in October as deputy director of programs and policy, Esther Whieldon reports. Mike Nedd, a career staffer at BLM, said in the email he and BLM acting Deputy Director John Ruhs "have come to know [Steed's] ethic, his intellect, and his passion for our multiple-use and sustained yield mission." Nedd said he will become acting deputy director for operations and that Ruhs will return to his job as BLM Nevada state director.

JUST IN CASE: EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers today proposed delaying the effective date for the Obama-era Waters of the U.S. regulation as insurance against the upcoming Supreme Court decision on the proper venue for litigation. More here.

REGION 1 HEAD SELECTED: Pruitt picked Alexandra Dunn, executive director of the Environmental Council of States, to run EPA's Region 1, covering Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, Alex also reports today. Dunn has been at ECOS, a state-focused nonprofit group, since 2014, and was recently elected to the American College of Environmental Lawyers' Board of Regents. Earlier this year, ECOS called for a "recalibration" of the roles of EPA and the states on environmental regulation, which the group called "cooperative federalism 2.0," echoing similar calls from Pruitt.

(DON'T) LEAN ON ME: Maine Sen. Susan Collins said today she's "leaning against" supporting Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemicals office, Anthony Adragna reports. A lack of support from Collins would leave Dourson without adequate support for confirmation in the closely divided chamber, after GOP Sens. Richard Burr and Thom Tillis both came out in opposition on Wednesday. "I have a lot of concerns about Mr. Dourson, but I've not yet made a final decision," Collins said. Dourson is currently working as an adviser at the agency. John McCain also said today he had not decided whether to support Dourson.

FRANKEN ACCUSED OF GROPING WOMAN: Sen. Al Franken, a member of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, today apologized after a female broadcaster said the lawmaker groped and kissed her without her consent during a 2006 trip overseas. Leeann Tweeden wrote that Franken's alleged actions took place while they toured the Middle East to entertain military personnel in 2006. Franken apologized in a statement, saying in part that he sends his "sincerest apologies to Leeann." Shortly after, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell called for an Ethics Committee investigation into Franken. POLITICO's Elana Schor and Seung Min Kim report more here.

TAX BILL PASSES HOUSE: The House passed a sweeping rewrite of the tax code, bringing the president and the GOP closer to a much-needed legislative win. The bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), which would slash corporate and individual rates, passed with a handful of Republicans joining Democrats in opposition.

But the bill could spell out trouble for the administration's trillion-dollar infrastructure plan. "At best, House support for the plan would signal lukewarm backing among Republicans for President Donald Trump's ambitions," Pro's Colin Wilhelm reports. "At worst, the bill would effectively end the funding structure that the administration touts as a way to reach its $1 trillion target and minimize the burden on taxpayers." More here.

PUTTING ON AIRS: A bipartisan group of senators — Collins, Sheldon Whitehouse and Tom Carper — have asked the Government Accountability Office for a review of the EPA's air quality monitoring work. "These air quality monitoring networks are increasingly important in implementing and tracking compliance with the Clean Air Act, protecting public health, sharing monitoring data with other agencies, state and local governments, and the public, and informing policy decisions," they write. U.S. climate negotiator sticks to Paris withdrawal, tiptoes around coal Back

By Emily Holden | 11/16/2017 12:23 PM EDT

BONN, Germany — The head of the U.S. delegation to the climate change talks reiterated President Donald Trump's stance that the U.S. "intends to withdraw at the earliest opportunity" from the Paris climate agreement, but did not press the case for coal, as White House aides have done at the international meeting.

In an address to COP23's high-level session, Judy Garber, an acting Assistant Secretary at the State Department, who took over for Undersecretary of State Tom Shannon, said the U.S. intends to remain engaged with partners on climate issues, and she said Washington remains "open to the possibility of rejoining at a later date under terms more favorable to the American people."

U.S. representatives here have not discussed what those terms might be, and they have until just before the 2019 U.S. elections to submit the official exit.

Garber noted that U.S. emissions have fallen as the economy has grown and said much of that was because of private sector innovation. She touted natural gas, nuclear, solar, wind, energy storage and energy efficiency, and said the U.S. is working with countries such as China and India on smart grids and carbon capture and storage.

Garber's comments diverged sharply from the message from Trump aides here who promoted new coal plants for developing countries at a side event and have suggested the possibility of linking with other countries in a "clean coal alliance," even as the United Kingdom and Canada launched a 27-member initiative today to phase out coal use.

BONN, Germany — Canada and the U.K. on Thursday launched an anti-coal alliance at the global climate summit here, a direct challenge to the Trump administration's bid to promote new high-efficiency coal-fired power plants.

Canadian Environment Minister Catherine McKenna and Claire Perry, the U.K. minister for climate change, formally launched the 27-member group whose declaration said it will seek to close down existing coal plants and "impose a moratorium on any new traditional coal power stations without operational carbon capture and storage."

"Coal is literally choking our cities, with close to a million people dying every year from coal pollution," McKenna said.

Almost 40 percent of global electricity comes from coal, and while McKenna acknowledged that phasing it out would not be easy, she said it was crucial to achieve climate goals and protect public health.

Other members include France and Italy, which both aim to phase out coal in the next decade, and Finland, Mexico and New Zealand. Two U.S. states — Washington and Oregon — will also join. Both have already announced plans to shutter their coal plants. While the group's members consume only a small fraction of the global coal supply, they aim to form a powerful political partnership.

McKenna said despite the U.S. effort to support coal, the economic case for the fuel was fading.

"There are cheaper, more sustainable sources of power, in particular clean power, renewables," she said. "The economics dictate it, but we need to be supporting countries that want to make the move. We've said that there are developing countries [where] there might be a price deferential. We want to be helping to support them. This is the huge opportunity."

Officials from the White House have used the annual climate change conference to tout "cleaner" fossil fuels, including at a controversial event on Monday that drew protesters. But the head of the American negotiating team delivered a speech to the assembled nations that carefully steered clear of coal.

Judy Garber, an acting assistant secretary at the State Department, at the COP23 high-level session said the U.S. still intends to withdraw from the 2015 Paris deal and is open to rejoining later under "more favorable" terms. The U.S. team has said it was not planning to discuss those terms at the Bonn meeting.

Garber noted "dramatic decreases in the cost of low-emissions technologies and fuels, including natural gas, solar, wind, energy storage and energy efficiency," but also referenced work with China and India capturing carbon emissions from coal.

"We know that each country will need to determine the appropriate energy mix based on its particular circumstances, taking into account the need for energy security, promotion of economic growth and environmental protection," she said. "In that context, we want to support the cleanest, most efficient power generation, regardless of source."

Not all developed countries are on board with the new anti-coal pitch, including Germany, where Chancellor Angela Merkel is still struggling to form a new government.

"We were asked whether we want to participate. I have asked for understanding, that we cannot decide this ahead of the next government," said Barbara Hendricks, the German environment minister. "The initiative, however, will keep us up to speed about what's happening."

Zinke traveled on charter, military planes Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/28/2017 07:47 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides have taken several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, according to documents and a department spokeswoman.

Zinke is at least the fourth senior member of the Trump administration to have used non-commercial planes at taxpayer expense, along with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and HHS Secretary Tom Price. President Donald Trump has fumed at Price's pricey travel, and Democrats say the revelations demonstrate a cavalier attitude by Cabinet members toward excessive spending.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said Zinke's charter or military plane trips were booked only after officials were unable to find commercial flights that would accommodate Zinke's schedule, and that all were "pre-cleared by career officials in the ethics office." Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as Price plans to do for some of the $400,000 tab he racked up on charter flights.

On June 26, a Beechcraft King Air 200 carried Zinke and several staffers from Las Vegas to Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Mont., about a 20-minute drive from Zinke's home in Whitefish, according to his official schedule. The flight cost $12,375, Swift said.

Zinke left after speaking at an event for the city's new professional hockey team, the "Vegas Golden Knights Development Camp Dinner," according to his schedule. Earlier in the day, he had been in Pahrump, Nev., for an announcement related to public lands.

Zinke's flight left Las Vegas at 8:30 p.m. PST and landed around 1:30 a.m. MST in Kalispell. The secretary stayed overnight at his residence, Interior documents show.

Las Vegas is one of the main connecting airports for commercial flights to Glacier International. Commercial flights between the two cities are available for several hundred dollars a ticket, according to travel planning websites.

In Whitefish, Zinke attended the Western Governors' Association's annual meeting, where he spoke for about 20 minutes without taking questions. He then had a private lunch with association members. In the afternoon Zinke was the subject of a photo shoot with GQ magazine at Lake McDonald and fished while being interviewed by Outside Magazine, the records show.

Zinke and staffers flew commercial back to Washington, D.C., the next day, according to the records.

The trip was not the first in which Interior booked a private jet for Zinke. On March 31, Interior chartered two flights to take Zinke and staff from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. Another two flights were chartered to return to St. Croix later that night.

Swift said she did not know how much the flights cost but that no other arrangements were available.

Commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars, according to travel booking websites.

In May, Zinke and his wife, Lolita, used a military aircraft to travel to Norway. From there, they flew on a military plane to Alaska for events organized by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The trip included charter planes to travel within Alaska, a common occurrence in the large, remote state. The Zinkes paid for Lolita's share of the trip, the full cost of which was not immediately available, Swift said.

Zinke also took a military helicopter from Fort Bliss to review the Organ Mountains monument in New Mexico in June, and he used a Bureau of Land Management helicopter to review the Basin and Range National Monument on July 30. "It is difficult to survey a half-million-acre piece of land with few roads by foot or car in an hour and a half," Swift said.

Along with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke took a military plane to Ravalli County, Mont., to check on wildfires in the area in August. "The military plane was used because of a very tight travel window, with no viable commercial airline options to transport two secretaries, security details, and associated USDA, Forest Service and Interior staff to Missoula in the time required," said USDA spokesman Tim Murtaugh. The cost of the flight was not immediately available, but the two agencies plan to reimburse the Air Force, Murtaugh said.

Watchdog slams Zinke for failing to document travel Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/16/2017 04:02 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke failed to properly document his travel, the agency's watchdog said Thursday, preventing it from determining whether he had violated government rules.

Zinke has come under scrutiny for mixing taxpayer-funded travel with political activities, as well as taking military or private planes rather than flying commercial, and the investigation by Interior's Office of Inspector General seeks to clarify whether all procedures were correctly followed.

"Our investigation is delayed by absent or incomplete documentation for several pertinent trips and a review process that failed to include proper documentation and accountability," Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall said in a letter obtained by POLITICO and first reported by The Washington Post.

Zinke's travels have drawn scrutiny after Interior revealed he had taken non-commercial flights at taxpayer expense, POLITICO and other news outlets have reported. POLITICO has also reported that the former congressman from Montana has mixed taxpayer-paid trips with political work, such as when he participated in a fundraiser on behalf of the Virgin Islands GOP.

The IG criticized Zinke for failing to complete documentation for his travel in the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, and said that the process established by Interior's Ethics Office and Office of the Solicitor "does not include sufficient documentation of the legal and ethical analysis conducted to distinguish between personal, political, and official travel, or consistent cost analysis to justify use of non-commercial travel."

The IG asked for documentation of all of Zinke's travel, as well as for the documentation of travel by his wife, Lola Zinke, with documentation for how and when the travel was paid.

Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt, the agency's second-ranking official, blamed the lack on documentation on the Obama administration for leaving behind "an organizational and operational mess."

In his response letter, Bernhardt emphasized that Interior employees would continue to cooperate with the IG, and said he would provide documentation as requested.

But he also went on to note that former Interior Secretary Sally Jewell hadn't completed her documentation for 12 trips taken last year and in January of this year, and he said some trips may have never been entered in the system.

"When I arrived at the Department in August 2017 it was clear to me that the Secretary and I had inherited an organizational and operational mess," he wrote. "From my perspective, regarding IOS travel procedures, it appears that the exact same procedures and processes utilized by the previous Administration remain in place and continue to be dysfunctional."

Zinke joins a cast of Trump administration officials, including Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and now-departed Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price, who are accused of misuse of taxpayer funds for travel.

Pruitt to testify before House panel Dec. 7 Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/16/2017 12:00 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt will testify before the House Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee on Dec. 7.

"We're looking forward to receiving a much-needed update from Mr. Pruitt on his priorities for the agency, including his stated policy of getting EPA 'back to the basics' and its impact on the agency's activity going forward," E&C Chairman Greg Walden and Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus said in a joint statement. "Following EPA's controversial and expansive interpretation of its authorities during the past administration, it is past time for EPA to refocus on pursuing its important public health and environmental missions as Congress originally intended."

The appearance will be Pruitt's first before the Energy and Commerce Committee. Democrats on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee are also seeking to have Pruitt testify soon, noting he has not appeared before that committee since his confirmation hearing on Jan. 18.

By Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 03:55 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt will appear before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee on Jan. 31, 2018, making his first return to the panel nearly a year after his confirmation, the panel announced today.

"It is important that EPA Administrator Pruitt testifies before the committee," Chairman John Barrasso said in a statement. "It will give senators the chance to hear about the important work being done at the agency."

Committee Democrats have already expressed outrage Pruitt hasn't returned since his confirmation in February so waiting more than two additional months likely won't mollify that the anger.

"Mr. Pruitt's appearance before our committee, which oversees the agency he leads, is long overdue," Ranking member Tom Carper said in a statement. "While I think it is unacceptable that members of this committee will have to wait over a year to hear directly from Administrator Pruitt, I am glad that a date has finally been set, and I look forward to his testimony on January 31st."

FERC chief urges critics to 'move past' DOE's proposal Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/16/2017 01:30 PM EDT

FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee said Thursday that the agency was developing its own approach to support grid resilience rather than working from the proposal submitted by Energy Secretary Rick Perry.

Chatterjee told reporters after FERC's monthly meeting that the issue of supporting baseload coal-fired and nuclear power plants had caused a "hyperbolic reaction" because many people did not understand the agency's process.

"I think part of the problem is that people are still debating the [notice of proposed rulemaking] as it was submitted to us [by the Energy Department]," he said. "What I'm trying to say is we've moved past that and we're moving toward a constructive solution that still answers the questions that Secretary Perry asked in the NOPR in a way that does not distort markets and is legally defensible."

Chatterjee said his effort to implement an "interim" proposal to prop up economically struggling generators in power markets is still being ironed out, but it may direct grid operators to identify what plants are needed for "resilience."

"Once it's fully fleshed out and I feel that it's a defensible product, I want to be able to present that to my colleagues so they can review it," he said, noting that he would ensure that his fellow commissioners would have sufficient time to review it.

In an interview with Utility Dive on Wednesday, Chatterjee said he was considering an order to require regional grid operators to provide "interim compensation" for power plants that contribute to grid resilience and are at risk of closing before FERC can finish a formal rulemaking, or that those grid operators "show cause that [they] not be required to do so."

Chatterjee said Thursday that "on-site, secure, firm fuel that does not depend on just-in-time delivery," as among the characteristics of power plants that contribute to grid resilience.

The interim FERC chief said that he didn't see any threat to the renewable industry or to natural gas from his plan.

"I genuinely believe that this will not have a negative impact on gas. I believe deeply in natural gas and its value. ... I don't want to do anything to hurt the gas industry," he said.

Chatterjee said that he's pushing an interim proposal to preserve certain power plants because "in the short term, I just want to make sure that the patient doesn't die while we do the longer-term analysis."

However, he didn't envision that his plan — which doesn't appear to have broad support among the FERC leadership yet — would have a mechanism to compensate consumers for paying plants that ultimately turn out not to have been necessary in any long term review.

"As we look through this, we will try and make this as minimally disruptive — we'll try to keep the costs down — to consumers as possible," Chatterjee said, adding that "consumers have paid for things that have a lot less value to the grid than long term resilience and security."

He added: "Thinking about the consequences if we got this wrong, it's a pretty reasonable ask."

Kevin McIntyre, President Donald Trump's pick to lead FERC, is expected to be sworn in in the next few days.

Zinke appoints Utah hill staffer as acting BLM director Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/16/2017 12:10 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has appointed Brian Steed, the former chief of staff for Rep. Chris Stewart (R-Utah), as acting director of the Bureau of Land Management.

Mike Nedd, a career staffer who had been acting director since March, announced the change in a Wednesday email to all BLM staff, which POLITICO obtained today.

Steed joined Interior in October as deputy director of programs and policy and Nedd said in the email he and BLM Acting Deputy Director John Ruhs "have come to know [Steed's] ethic, his intellect, and his passion for our multiple-use and sustained yield mission."

Nedd said he will become acting deputy director for operations and that Ruhs will return to his job as BLM Nevada state director.

"Brian has been an incredible asset to the Bureau since his first day," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email. "We are excited to have him temporarily step into this leadership role. We couldn't be more thankful to Mike Nedd for leading the Bureau during the initial transition. Nedd helped execute big wins for sportsmen's access, multiple-use, and energy development on BLM lands over the past few months."

The agency did not comment on whether Steed may have limitations on carrying out his responsibilities now that the Vacancies Act requirements kicked in this week.

That law states that unless the president has nominated someone for a Senate-confirmed position, any person filling that role in an acting capacity cannot carry out certain functions assigned by law or regulation beginning 301 days after that vacancy occurred. President Donald Trump has not announced an appointment for BLM director.

EPA seeks delay on WOTUS in case Supreme Court lifts stay Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/16/2017 02:48 PM EDT

EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers today proposed delaying the effective date for the Obama-era Waters of the U.S. regulation as insurance against the upcoming Supreme Court decision on the proper venue for litigation.

The rule, also known as the Clean Water Rule, was originally to take effect on Aug. 28, 2015, although it was stayed by the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in October 2015. That stay, however, could be dissolved soon by the Supreme Court, which is expected to rule in the coming months on whether WOTUS-related legal challenges must first go through district courts or should jump straight to the appellate level.

In the event the justices choose a district-first scheme, the 6th Circuit's nationwide stay would end. Thirteen states would still be covered by a stay issued by another federal judge in North Dakota, but WOTUS theoretically would apply to the other 37 states.

"This step will allow us to minimize confusion" as the agency works on the repeal and rewrite, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement.

It is unclear when EPA plans to finalize its repeal of the WOTUS rule, though officials have indicated it could be before the end of the year. The rewritten version is not expected to be proposed until next year.

The proposal would move WOTUS' effective date until two years after the proposal is finalized, which would place it sometime in 2020, almost five years after the original August 2015 start.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will take public comment for just 21 days once the proposal is published in the Federal Register.

ECOS chief picked to lead EPA's New England region Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/16/2017 10:49 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has picked Alexandra Dunn, executive director of the Environmental Council of States, to run EPA's Region 1, which covers Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Earlier this year, ECOS, a state-focused nonprofit group, called for a "recalibration" of the roles of EPA and the states on environmental regulation, which the group called "cooperative federalism 2.0." That echoed Pruitt's call for states to take on a greater role in both regulation and enforcement.

Dunn has been at ECOS since 2014, and was recently elected to the American College of Environmental Lawyers' Board of Regents. Prior to ECOS, Dunn headed the Association of Clean Water Administrators and was an attorney for the American Chemistry Council.

Collins 'leaning against' Dourson for EPA chemicals role Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 12:35 PM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins told reporters today she's "leaning against" backing Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemicals office, which would leave him without adequate support for confirmation in the closely divided chamber.

"I have a lot of concerns about Mr. Dourson, but I've not yet made a final decision," she said.

North Carolina Republican Sens. Richard Burr and Thom Tillis both came out in opposition on Wednesday to Dourson, who is currently working as an adviser at the agency. Both declined to say if he should leave that role today.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) also said today he had not decided whether to support the nomination.

Franken apologizes after woman says he groped her Back

By Elana Schor and Seung Min Kim | 11/16/2017 11:12 AM EDT

Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) apologized Thursday after a female broadcaster said the lawmaker groped and kissed her without her consent during a 2006 trip overseas.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) immediately called for an ethics investigation, and Franken vowed to cooperate.

Multiple Democratic senators quickly broke with Franken after Leeann Tweeden, a radio anchor for Los Angeles' KABC, wrote Thursday about the senator's admitted misconduct. Tweeden described harassment by Franken while she and the comedian, then a host on liberal talk radio, toured the Middle East to entertain military personnel in 2006.

According to Tweeden, Franken crafted a performance skit during the trip to make the anchor kiss him against her will. "I felt disgusted and violated," she said of the incident. "I tried to let it go, but I was angry."

Tweeden wrote that after she returned from the overseas trip she discovered a picture of the senator groping her as she slept.

Tweeden's allegations were published Thursday on the radio station's website accompanied by a picture depicting Franken grabbing the anchor's breast while she slept aboard a C-17 cargo plane as they departed from Afghanistan.

McConnell (R-Ky.) immediately called for the ethics committee to investigate, and Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Franken himself echoed the need for such a probe.

Some of Franken's fellow Democrats readily shared their dismay at his actions as Tweeden's story swept through the Capitol. A growing awareness of sexual harassment's prevalence is propelling a push to overhaul Capitol Hill's system for handling workplace misconduct complaints.

"I have every reason to believe Ms. Tweeden's account," Sen. Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.) told reporters. "I think that women should be able to feel safe and free in their workplace, and if there are such allegations they should come forward."

Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) called Franken's behavior "unacceptable," adding that he believes Tweeden.

"Sexual harassment and groping are never okay," Sen. Richard Blumenthal (D-Conn.) told reporters. "Sen. Franken will have to address the allegations in the article."

The Franken allegations come as McConnell and GOP leaders continue to isolate Roy Moore amid multiple alleged cases of sexual harassment or misconduct by the Alabama Senate nominee. While many GOP senators initially qualified their condemnation of Moore's behavior, suggesting they had yet to fully evaluate the assault charges against the Alabama Republican, the Democrats who spoke out against Franken's actions on Thursday pointedly aligned with Tweeden's story.

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.), who is seeking GOP support for legislation that would broadly reform Capitol Hill's sexual harassment policy, said that she believes Tweeden's "deeply concerning" story.

"I feel very strongly that Roy Moore should not be a senator and I feel strongly that, if he is elected, that the Senate should have its own response to it," Gillibrand told reporters. "I expect to hear more from Sen. Franken on this issue."

Other Democrats declined to answer questions about Franken on Thursday or held off making a statement. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), a frequent liberal ally of Franken, avoided questions from reporters, while Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.) said that he is "waiting to hear from Al."

Sen. Chris Coons (D-Del.), vice chairman of the ethics committee, cited policy against weighing in on a matter before the panel, as did fellow committee members Sens. Jeanne Shaheen (D-N.H.) and Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii).

In his call for an ethics committee probe of Franken, McConnell said that "all credible allegations of sexual harassment or assault" should be investigated by the panel. "Regardless of party, harassment and assault are completely unacceptable — in the workplace or anywhere else," the Kentucky Republican said.

In his second statement of the day responding to Tweeden, Franken said he is among the powerful men who "have been forced to take a good, hard look at our own actions" after the recent flood of sexual harassment and assault allegations hitting Hollywood, the media, and politics.

"While I don't remember the rehearsal for the skit as Leeann does, I understand why we need to listen to and believe women's experiences," Franken said.

"This should not have happened to Leeann Tweeden," said Franken's fellow Minnesota Democratic senator, Amy Klobuchar.

Klobuchar, who is leading bipartisan talks on an overhaul of Congress' sexual harassment policy through her position as top Democrat on the Rules Committee, added in a statement that Franken's behavior is "another example of why we need to change work environments and reporting practices across the nation, including in Congress."

Sen. Catherine Cortez Masto (D-Nev.) described herself as "very sad" about Tweeden's story and added that she would join fellow Rules panel members to "do everything we can" to make the Congress' harassment complaint system easier for victims to navigate.

Tweeden's story also prompted Democrats in vulnerable reelection races next year to immediately distance themselves from Franken. The Minnesotan canceled his scheduled appearance at a weekend fundraiser for Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), who issued a statement declaring that "sexual harassment is never acceptable."

Democratic challengers in House races who received donations from Franken have "already [donated] the money to a variety of local charities," said Meredith Kelly, a Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokeswoman.

Abby Finkenauer, a Democratic challenger in Iowa who received a donation from Franken, said that "Democrats need to hold ourselves to the same standards we would demand of Republicans."

"Sexual assault is not a partisan problem," said Finkenauer, who donated the money to a nonprofit that supports sexual assault victims.

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), who earlier this week shared her own story of sexual harassment while working as an intern in the 1970s, said she would donate money received from Franken's leadership PAC to charity. Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), who tweeted that "Senator Franken's conduct was inappropriate and unacceptable," also donated a leadership PAC contribution from Franken to charity, as did Sens. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Bob Casey (D-Pa.).

"I've decided it's time to tell my story. #MeToo," Tweeden wrote Thursday on social media, referencing the social movement that has led to dozens of accusations of sexual misconduct against powerful men in a range of industries.

In a later press conference in Los Angeles, Tweeden said her experience with Franken reminded her of a recording of disgraced movie producer Harvey Weinstein trying to cajole a woman to keep talking with him after acknowledging that he groped her.

Franken "just kept persisting," Tweeden said. "I was just like, okay, fine — just so he would shut up, you know?"

Tax reform may doom Trump infrastructure plan Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 11/16/2017 05:01 AM EDT

The tax reform bill set to be voted on Thursday by the House of Representatives could kill any chance of the Trump administration's trillion-dollar infrastructure plan ever happening.

At best, House support for the plan would signal lukewarm backing among Republicans for President Donald Trump's ambitions. At worst, the bill would effectively end the funding structure that the administration touts as a way to reach its $1 trillion target and minimize the burden on taxpayers.

The House bill ends tax breaks for private activity bonds, a key part of public-private partnerships in projects ranging from roads to low-income housing. The administration has said it wants to leverage those partnerships to reduce the direct cost of the president's building plan.

Private activity bonds leverage local or state government debt for a project deemed to be a public good but too expensive for that government to manage, so it arranges for a private entity to run it. Examples range from aquariums to water systems. Those bonds come with a tax exemption, as other municipal bonds do, on what they pay out to entice investors to buy them.

The White House did not comment on the change, but suggested that it would attempt to restore tax breaks for that type of infrastructure financing.

"We will continue working with Congress throughout the process to ensure that the President's priorities are reflected in the tax cut bill that reaches his desk," White House deputy press secretary Lindsay Walters said in an emailed statement to POLITICO.

Rep. Bill Shuster (R-Pa.), chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said he was concerned about repealing the tax exemption for those bonds.

"I don't know that there's a commitment" to restore the bond exemption between the House and Senate when they reconcile their bills. "There's a lot of money on the sidelines that comes into play, so I think it's something that would hopefully be put back in there."

Added Shuster: "The president's talked about doing these kinds of things, so it's not a helpful thing" for Trump's building plan.

Infrastructure experts agreed.

"If that moved forward, it would pretty substantially undermine the Trump infrastructure plan," said Michael Likosky, a principal at the infrastructure advisory firm 32 Advisors. "A large amount of infrastructure is financed through the tax code."

The head of the infrastructure financing desk for one major bank, who asked not to be named for fear of being seen as critical of Congress, said he viewed the tax reform provision as a sign of the House's rejection of Trump's infrastructure plan.

"Infrastructure is a lower priority for the House of Representatives as they've wrestled with tax reform," he said.

Matt Fabian, a partner at Municipal Market Analytics, estimated that 80 percent of the public-private partnerships that Trump would rely on to pay for new building use private activity bonds.

Elimination of such bonds would "effectively neuter" any infrastructure agenda that would use private financing, Fabian said.

The Joint Committee on Taxation, which does nonpartisan economic and budgetary analysis for Congress, estimates that eliminating those bonds would raise almost $40 billion over 10 years, which would help make up for lost revenue from tax cuts made by the House reform bill.

Republicans need to meet strict budget requirements to pass tax reform along a party-line vote in the Senate.

Unless Trump can create an unlikely alliance of Democrats and Republicans to pass $1 trillion in new infrastructure spending, repeal of the bonds could effectively end those hopes. That may set up a high-stakes fight to save the exemption if the House and Senate have to agree on unified tax reform legislation.

Shuster and other infrastructure spending supporters hope that the issue will be fixed, in part because the Senate's version of tax reform includes the private activity bond exemption. But the Senate tax bill is already over the budgetary limit for money the government may lose under the tax reform bill it's considering. That makes it more likely that provisions repealed by the House to fit those budgetary requirements will be included in a final product.

Even Republican supporters of private activity bonds sounded pessimistic.

"Finding revenue, finding the scorer space, it's an inside-D.C./Beltway problem; but it's the reality of the legislative sausage-making process that we're dealing with, and so finding the revenue is one of the difficult questions that has to be answered," said Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.). "Even after tax reform, we're not going to give up the fight, because I believe in these types of programs."

Likosky and other infrastructure financing experts expected major municipal bond market distortions for the remainder of the year, due to a rush to market for private activity bonds before they would be repealed by the House bill.

"The muni market itself would shrink accordingly," Fabian said, and federal government aid to assist those programs would likely need to increase to offset it. Airports, hospitals and other institutions reliant on private activity bonds may increase costs to individuals to make up for the shortfall if that federal aid didn't come.

Fabian said he expected projects important to the constituencies of many Republicans, like rural hospitals, small religious universities and charter schools, to be hit particularly hard by loss of the bonds.

According to Chris Hamel, head of the infrastructure investment group for Royal Bank of Canada, a portion of low-income housing construction would also likely stall out. According to RBC, private activity bonds financed over $4 billion worth of low-income housing projects in 2016.

But some view private activity bonds skeptically as government subsidization and see no problem killing them, regardless of the impact on Trump's infrastructure ambitions.

"What it does is dries up another revenue source with regard to that particular form of infrastructure," said Rep. Mark Sanford (R-S.C.), who sits on the House Transportation Committee. "But I think that there is fairly unanimous consent, within at least the House [Republican] conference, that they need to go."

Multiple members said they have yet to hear much pushback on the repeal from the White House, either, suggesting a potential abandonment of the private financing route for Trump's infrastructure plan.

"I think that's been a valuable tool," said Rep. Pat Tiberi (R-Ohio), a Ways and Means member. "If there is some abuse, which some say there has been, I would be for trying to limit [the private activity bond tax exemption's] scope. If it ends up being repealed, I think it will have an impact on the housing market."

Hope Hicks may hold the keys to Mueller's Russia puzzle Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 11/16/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Special counsel Robert Mueller's team is preparing to interview the woman who's seen it all: Hope Hicks.

She's been part of Donald Trump's inner circle for years, first at Trump Tower and then as an omnipresent gatekeeper and fixer who could get emails or other communications directly to the boss during the 2016 campaign.

As a senior White House adviser and now as communications director, she's been in the room for moments critical to Mueller's probe, which has grown to include the president's response to the Russia investigation itself.

Hicks' history with Trump makes her one of the more useful witnesses for Mueller as he looks for insights into the president's habits and moods. She also is one of the few people well positioned to recount the president's reactions at various moments as the Russia scandal has sidetracked his presidency — including the Mueller appointment itself.

Mueller's decision to request an interview with Hicks — who hasn't been named in any criminal wrongdoing — also indicates he's reached a critical point in the overall investigation, according to former prosecutors and veterans of past White House investigations. Typically, conversations with such senior-level aides are saved for near the end of a probe.

"Anytime you can get someone who is the right-hand person or who's been around the primary target of an investigation, under oath, answering detailed questions, means you've progressed very far along in the investigation," said Adam Goldberg, a former Clinton White House lawyer.

White House attorney Ty Cobb wouldn't say specifically when Hicks planned to appear before Mueller's team, though he did say he was "bullish" that all current White House aides, including Hicks, will have completed interviews with the special counsel "shortly after Thanksgiving."

"Nothing about the White House's commitment to fully cooperate with the special counsel, including doing necessary interviews, has changed," Cobb said on Wednesday. "We continue to be in a full cooperation posture."

Hicks, her attorney and Mueller's office all declined comment for this story.

People who know Hicks, 29, say she's been preparing for months for her sit-down with Mueller's prosecutors. She's hired as her attorney Robert Trout, a former assistant U.S. attorney and co-founder of a white-collar law firm that has represented other high-profile people mired in Washington scandals, including President Richard Nixon's Attorney General John Mitchell during Watergate, Fawn Hall during Iran-Contra and President Bill Clinton's paramour Monica Lewinsky.

Friends in touch with Hicks say they expect her to cooperate fully with the special counsel. "I think she's smart enough and sensible enough that she knows she'd be doing no one any favors by lying — the best thing she can do for everyone is to tell the truth," said one friend.

But the potential for her to be tripped up by investigators looms large given the complexity of the Russia probe and the sheer amount of time Hicks has spent by Trump's side.

"It's not going to be easy," said a former Clinton White House aide who was questioned under oath during one of the many independent-counsel investigations that shadowed that Democratic administration. "It's more of a root canal than a checkup."

Hicks first came into Trump's world in 2012, two years after graduating college, when the New York PR firm at which she was working tapped her to help one of its clients: Ivanka Trump. Donald Trump poached Hicks in October 2014, according to a GQ profile, and she's listed as the point of contact that month on a news release announcing a new reservation system for the under-construction Trump hotel in Washington that would let people buy the right to book a room "should their chosen candidate become the next President of the United States."

Hicks continued to work on Trump business operations in 2015, though her portfolio expanded into politics as her boss started hiring his first campaign staffers and early-primary state advisers ahead of his June entry into the presidential race. A McClatchy story that January — profiling the "sideshows of the Republican presidential campaign" — quotes Hicks explaining that Trump's visits to Iowa and South Carolina in recent years had been done "to advance his goal to make America great again."

In March 2015, during the span of nine days, Hicks is on a news release touting a new PGA golf tournament at Trump's Los Angeles course, as the point person for the creation of Trump's presidential exploratory committee and responding to Trump's winter residence newspaper, the Palm Beach Post, to explain that he was looking at a run for the White House as a Republican, with plans to give up his NBC show "The Apprentice."

After Trump officially entered the race in the late spring, with a controversial speech at Trump Tower, Hicks served as one of few core staffers and held a central role as the primary spokesperson for the campaign.

Hicks was dealing with Russia questions as early as December 2015, when she issued a statement on Trump's behalf calling it "a great honor" after President Vladimir Putin praised him as "an outstanding and talented personality" and the "absolute leader of the presidential race."

As the calendar flipped to 2016, Hicks started publicly crossing paths with several campaign associates who would later become central figures in Mueller's Russia investigation.

In March 2016, Hicks joined Trump at a Washington Post editorial board meeting when he first announced a foreign policy advisory team that included Carter Page and George Papadopoulos, who pleaded guilty last month for lying to the FBI about his contacts with Russian officials.

Papadopoulos, according to Mueller's court filings, emailed senior Trump campaign aides in late April, including then-campaign manager Corey Lewandowski, to tell them about calls he'd been getting "about Putin wanting to host him and the team when the time is right." A month later, in May 2016, Hicks went on the record to the Daily Mail to dismiss a story in the Israeli newspaper Maariv saying Trump was planning a trip after the GOP convention to Israel, Germany and Russia.

She also dealt with Page, who told the House Intelligence Committee during a closed-door hearing last month that he had emailed her, Lewandowski and senior aide J.D. Gordon in June 2016 to tell them he had been invited — after joining the campaign — to speak in Moscow.

A month later, Hicks made the first in a series of comments to reporters about Page's speech in Moscow — in which he slammed the U.S. for a "hypocritical focus" on democracy and corruption in Russia — trying to explain it was not reflective of the views of the Trump campaign.

Hicks tangled with Roger Stone, the longtime Trump adviser and GOP dark-arts operative who has drawn scrutiny in the Russia investigation for seemingly predicting WikiLeaks' October 2016 release of emails hacked from Hillary Clinton campaign Chairman John Podesta.

And she also had to answer for Paul Manafort, whose role spearheading GOP delegate-counting efforts at the Republican National Convention and later as campaign chairman prompted a series of media inquiries about his past business relationships. The Washington Post reported this September that Manafort had emailed Hicks in April 2016 telling her to disregard the newspaper's questions about his ties to Putin ally and Russian aluminum magnate Oleg Deripaska. Manafort was indicted last month along with his protégé, Rick Gates, on multiple charges of money laundering and fraud.

Hicks tried to avoid making waves on several other Russia-related stories as the general election campaign heated up.

She referred media questions in June 2016 to the Secret Service amid the first reports in The Washington Post that Russian government hackers had breached the Democratic National Committee. She pointed reporters back to Trump's Twitter feed that July after he joked that Russian hackers should help to "find the 30,000 emails that are missing" from Clinton's State Department account.

Two days after Trump's election win, Hicks told the The New York Times, the Washington Post and other media outlets that the campaign had no contacts with the Russian government. Those comments were quickly debunked, starting with the Russian deputy foreign minister, Sergei Ryabkov, who told reporters that Moscow had been in touch with Trump's "immediate entourage." Subsequent reports have revealed Russian meetings with, among others, Donald Trump Jr., Jared Kushner, Jeff Sessions, Manafort, Page and Papadopoulos.

Hicks has also been present for key Russia-related moments since arriving at the White House. She was with Trump in Bedminster, New Jersey, during the early May weekend when he decided to fire Comey. The Washington Post in September also reported Hicks was in the Oval Office for a meeting the day before the FBI director was ousted when the president described a draft letter he and senior aide Stephen Miller had written spelling out at length Trump's complaints about Comey.

According to the Post, Hicks, White House spokesman Josh Raffel and lawyers for Kushner tried unsuccessfully while flying home from Germany in July on Air Force One to urge Trump into a more transparent public response as news broke about the Trump Tower meeting his eldest son had organized during the campaign with a Russian lawyer who was offering dirt on Clinton.

Hicks was also the only Trump aide in the room when the president sat for a Times interview in July where he revealed he wished he hadn't nominated Sessions to be attorney general because of his recusal over the Russia probe. He also questioned the political leanings and ethics of Sessions' deputy Rod Rosenstein.

Mueller's team has already interviewed others who worked in the White House—including former chief of staff Reince Priebus and former press secretary Sean Spicer — but almost no one can offer prosecutors the window into the past 2½ years that Hicks can.

"If she is forthcoming and cooperative, she can be very useful to them," said Renato Mariotti, a former assistant U.S. attorney closely tracking the case, who added that Hicks can explain "what was normal" and "what wasn't normal" during the course of a typical day in the Trump campaign and the White House.

"Her access to Trump is going to be important, what she saw, what she heard," Mariotti added.

How Doug Jones could pull off a stunner in Alabama Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti and Daniel Strauss | 11/16/2017 05:06 AM EDT

HUNTSVILLE, Ala. — The first and most vital task for Doug Jones to pull off a once-unthinkable upset in Alabama: Get Republican voters comfortable with the idea that it's OK to pull the lever for this Democrat, if the alternative is scandal-wracked Roy Moore.

"I'm a Republican, but Roy Moore? No way," one man says in Jones' latest ad, released Tuesday. "I'm a lifelong Republican, but I just can't do it," another concurs. The word "Democrat" is not uttered once.

Nearly unthinkable even a week ago, the prospect of Jones becoming the first Democrat elected to the Senate from Alabama in a quarter century has suddenly become very real. Jones remains an underdog in a state that chose Donald Trump by a 28-point margin in the presidential election, and where Democrats make up just over a third of the electorate, according to polling.

But he does have a path. Here's how it looks, according to interviews with nearly a dozen Democrats within and near Jones' team since Moore was hit with accusations of pursuing — and in two cases abusing — teenage girls. First, create a permission structure for alienated Republicans who are skeptical of Moore — primarily those who voted against him in the GOP primary — to cross the aisle. At the same time invigorate the base, especially African-Americans, who make up over a quarter of registered voters, according to the Alabama Secretary of State's office. And finally, keep the national Democratic Party and its despised brand as far out of the picture as possible, while still benefiting from its money.

Even before the parade of Moore accusers came forward — a sixth did so on Wednesday — local Democrats were quietly upbeat. Controversial in state politics for decades, Moore received just 51 percent of the vote in his last statewide race — during a 2012 election cycle in which Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney carried Alabama with 60 percent of the vote.

Here's a look at Jones' game plan ahead of the Dec. 12 election:

Win over Strange voters

Jones will need to bring over some of the state's suburban moderate Republicans who preferred Sen. Luther Strange to Moore in September's first round of voting, which Strange lost by 10 points.

That will mean making inroads in regions with high shares of college-educated white voters, including Shelby County, Madison County (home of Huntsville), Jefferson County (home of Birmingham), and Montgomery (home of Montgomery city). And it will entail driving down turnout in the more rural parts of Alabama where support for Moore — a former official in Etowah County, home of Gadsden — is strongest.

Jones' allies expect a renewed focus on the counties that backed Strange over Moore.

"These stories about Judge Moore, I think, have the effect of having people give a harder look to him and who he is ... and what kind of senator he'd be," said Birmingham lawyer Giles Perkins, a top Jones adviser. Moore was removed twice from the state Supreme Court and has a history of racist and homophobic comments. "The race was in play before this week."

Keep D.C. Democrats at bay — to a point

In an attempt to keep the national Democratic Party at arm's length — and thereby not scare away Republicans — Jones canceled a fundraising trip to Washington this week, skipping an event that would have put him in a room with high-profile Democratic leaders like California Sen. Kamala Harris. Meanwhile, national-level Democrats are plying their hero-in-the-making with advice, money and tweets — without crossing the line into being a public, backfiring nuisance.

High-profile national surrogates are also steering clear of the state: The most famous person to visit Alabama for Jones so far, former Vice President Joe Biden, now has no plans to return. The only other prominent Democrat to appear for Jones — civil rights icon John Lewis — has been deployed to help with African-American turnout. He appeared in Mobile with Jones over the weekend.

"You don't win those kinds of races by having people from out-of-state go in and tell them what they should do — that nationalizes the race and turns the spotlight on our stereotype," said former Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, who said he'd recently spoken with Jones. "The people of Alabama will decide they've had enough, and we should get out their way and let that happen."

"There's an expectation that he can carry his own over the next four weeks," added Democrat Randall Woodfin, the mayor-elect of Birmingham, where Jones campaign signs dot the city and its suburbs.

At the same time, Jones is still relying on fundraising help from national Democrats to help fuel his massive spending advantage over Moore on the television airwaves. Senate Democrats' campaign arm is sending a stream of fundraising emails for Jones, and prominent senators, like Tim Kaine, Harris, Elizabeth Warren, and Kirsten Gillibrand have tapped their campaign supporter lists to help Jones, to great financial effect.

Indiana Sen. Joe Donnelly, in a fundraising note of his own, compared the race with his 2012 victory over a controversial Republican, and Connecticut Sen. Chris Murphy's appeals netted Jones over $125,000, according to a Democrat familiar with the figures.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and DNC have remained in close touch with Jones' team after monitoring the race for months and offering organizing and messaging guidance. But neither has made plans to step in any further, eager to keep the spotlight on Moore and away from themselves.

Even the fact that Monday's news conference held by a fifth Moore accuser with celebrity lawyer Gloria Allred occurred in New York City, not Alabama, sent grumbles through the ranks of Democrats.

Invigorate the base

Jones allies are now looking through the results of Moore's last race to see how they can improve upon the Democrats' near-win five years ago. That will likely involve running a more sophisticated turnout operation in largely African-American neighborhoods in the cities.

Much of Jones' recent campaign activity has zeroed in on these voters. In addition to the rally with Lewis, he has appeared in both Montgomery and Birmingham — two cities with among the highest proportion of African-American residents in the country. In the last week, he has also visited the far reaches of the state, from Mobile in its southwest corner to Fyffe in the northeast.

Organizing efforts, meanwhile, have largely focused on the so-called Black Belt, a collection of roughly 18 counties including Montgomery and Sumter — where Strange beat Moore.

Still, even if Jones executes this plan to perfection, there's no guarantee he'll win. Democrats haven't won any statewide race in Alabama since 2008, after all, and haven't gotten a senator elected here since 1992.

"There is unvarnished skepticism of The Washington Post, and media in general, among grass-roots conservatives," said Republican state Sen. Phil Williams of Gadsden, outlining Jones' challenge and pointing to the paper that broke the first story about Moore and his past behavior. Williams, who endorsed Moore over Strange, said the accusations meant the race would be "closer" than it otherwise would be, but predicted Moore would still win.

Many in middle class would eventually pay higher taxes in new Senate plan, study says

By Brian Faler | 11/16/2017 12:07 PM EDT

Senate Republicans' revised plan to revamp the tax code would eventually raise taxes on many middle-income people, according to a new independent analysis.

While everyone, on average, would initially see their taxes fall under the plan, the nonpartisan Joint Committee on Taxation said Thursday that by 2027, everyone earning less than $75,000 on average would face a tax increase. Those between $20,000 and $30,000 would see a 25 percent hike that year, the report found.

Though JCT did not offer an explanation of the figures, those increases are partly because most of Republicans' tax cuts for individual taxpayers would expire after 2025. At the same time, lawmakers want to change, and make permanent, how the tax code is indexed for inflation in a way that will push people into higher tax brackets faster as wages rise.

Republicans say they were forced by arcane budget rules in the Senate to make individual tax cuts temporary, and that lawmakers in the future won't allow those increases to take effect. They're also challenging Democrats to vote with them to waive those budget restrictions when their plan reaches the Senate floor. That would require 60 votes.

Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) Thursday morning blamed projected tax increases for some low-income people on Republicans' plans to kill the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate to have health insurance, as part of their tax-rewrite plan. Removing that penalty means fewer people signing up for federally subsidized coverage, which, for many, comes in the form of tax credits. Hatch complained that shows up in the JCT tables as a tax increase.

"Obviously we have no intention of raising taxes on these families," he said. "Every Republican on this committee has been committed to providing tax cuts to every income cohort."

The tax poured fuel on Democratic criticism of the plan.

"I do not know how anybody can go home to their constituents and explain why it's a good idea to hike taxes on parents who are barely staying afloat to pay for a massive corporate handout," said Sen. Ron Wyden, the Finance Committee's top Democrat. "What's happening here is shameful."

But Republicans will likely emphasize the early years of the analysis, which found middle-income people reaping some of the largest percentage tax cuts under the plan.

In 2019, people with incomes between $30,000 and $40,000 would see their tax bills fall by 9.8 percent, the study found. Those between $75,000 and $100,000 would see a 7.7 percent decline compared with a 5.4 percent cut for millionaires. Overall, the plan would cut taxes that year by 7.4 percent, the report said.

In many years, those earning more than $1 million would bear a larger share of the total tax burden under the plan than they do today, JCT said.

INTERIOR'S DESIGNER: A political operative who has benefited from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's political activity used the wife of Zinke's chief of staff to do interior design work on two of her homes, Ben Lefebvre and Nick Juliano scoop. "The chief of staff, longtime Zinke aide Scott Hommel, did not list any compensation for the work on his government ethics forms — as federal law would require if his wife had been paid for the work."

The relationship raises new questions about Zinke's relationship with direct mail consultant Kimberly Bellissimo, who has been accused of working with "scam PACs" that raise money by allegedly misleading conservative donors. "Zinke has worked with Bellissimo's ForthRight Strategy and related firms since at least 2013 through his super PAC, congressional campaign and leadership political action committee, steering at least $4.8 million to them, and as Interior secretary he helped raise money for a Virgin Islands-based PAC that was another top client of Bellissimo's firms," Ben and Nick report.

"If Lucretia Hommel made money last year with her company, Snobz Interior Design, Scott Hommel would have to have disclosed it to the Office of Government Ethics before joining the Interior Department as Zinke's top adviser. His personal financial disclosure lists his wife as a self-employed interior designer but does not indicate that the business generated any profits. ... GONE WHITE-FISHING: FEMA today said it has "significant concerns" about the contract to prepare the grid between Puerto Rico's electric utility and a small Montana-based company from Zinke's hometown, Ben reports. The agency said it was not involved with the contract between the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority and Whitefish Energy and is investigating whether the costs PREPA agreed to are reasonable. FEMA also said it has not reimbursed PREPA for any expenses related to Whitefish Energy. The White House also disavowed the contract today, CBS News reports.

BLM said in a Federal Register notice today that it has issued a draft supplemental environmental impact statement and supporting documents for EDF Renewable Energy's Palen Solar Electricity Generating System Project. BLM says it supports an alternative project design that would avoid a large area of the desert that serves as a path for floodwater and is critical to thirsty local vegetation and wildlife habitats. EDF is the third owner of the project, which was first proposed in 2009 as a solar tower but is now planned to be a series of solar arrays.

NEW YORK STATE OF MIND: Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló could visit New York "next week, I believe, as early as next week," Gov. Andrew Cuomo said, to see how the state recovered after Hurricane Sandy. Cuomo has traveled to the territory twice since it was struck by Hurricane Maria, POLITICO New York's Jimmy Vielkind reports, and discussed rebuilding from hurricanes with Rosselló while there. "We're already working with them on how to build resiliency measures into the reconstruction of Puerto Rico much the way we have here," Cuomo said today. "He's going to come to tour what we've done and to sit with experts, but my staff and his staff are already working."

ST. LOUIS COMMITS TO 100 PERCENT RENEWABLES: St. Louis — home to various coal companies like Arch Coal and Peabody — has committed to 100 percent renewable energy by 2035. "Lawmakers in St. Louis have approved a measure aimed at powering the city entirely on renewable energy sources, including wind and solar, by 2035," the Huffington Post reports. "The resolution, introduced last month by St. Louis Board of Aldermen President Lewis Reed and unanimously approved by the legislative body on Friday, tasks the city with developing a plan by December 2018 to wean itself off fossil fuels." TRUMP SUPPORTS LAKE OKEECHOBEE SPEED UP: Florida Gov. Rick Scott praised the president Thursday, following news that the White House announced support for hastening repairs to the Lake Okeechobee dike. POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports: "The federal government is repairing the dike around Lake Okeechobee to prevent it from breaking and flooding surrounding communities. Scott said last April that Trump had agreed that the federal government would partner with the state to speed up repairs but details never were provided. TRUMP TWEETS VS. STEYER: Trump used his penchant for tweeting this morning to hit billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer as Steyer ramps up his eight-figure ad campaign to impeach the president. "Wacky & totally unhinged Tom Steyer, who has been fighting me and my Make America Great Again agenda from beginning, never wins elections!" Trump tweeted this morning. Top Zinke aide's wife has worked for controversial fundraiser Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Nick Juliano | 10/27/2017 11:10 AM EDT

A Washington political operative who has benefited from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's political activity used the wife of Zinke's chief of staff to do interior design work on two of her homes, according to interviews and social media interactions reviewed by POLITICO.

The chief of staff, longtime Zinke aide Scott Hommel, did not list any compensation for the work on his government ethics forms — as federal law would require if his wife had been paid for the work.

The previously undisclosed relationship raises new questions about possible conflicts of interest stemming from Zinke's relationship with direct mail consultant Kimberly Bellissimo, who has been accused by some prominent conservatives of working with "scam PACs" that raise money by allegedly misleading conservative donors. Zinke has worked with Bellissimo's ForthRight Strategy and related firms since at least 2013 through his super PAC, congressional campaign and leadership political action committee, steering at least $4.8 million to them, and as Interior secretary he helped raise money for a Virgin Islands-based PAC that was another top client of Bellissimo's firms.

If Lucretia Hommel made money last year with her company, Snobz Interior Design, Scott Hommel would have to have disclosed it to the Office of Government Ethics before joining the Interior Department as Zinke's top adviser. His personal financial disclosure lists his wife as a self-employed interior designer but does not indicate that the business generated any profits.

"The threshold for reporting a spouse's business income is very low — $1,000," said Brett Kappel, a campaign finance and ethics lawyer for Akerman LLP. "Failing to disclose required information on the [ethics] form is serious business — it could be a criminal violation of both the Ethics in Government Act and the False Statements Act."

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift told POLITICO that Scott Hommel didn't have any discrepancies on his ethics report, but she declined to make him available for an interview. Swift declined to discuss whether Lucretia Hommel earned income from her interior design business.

Federal ethics guidelines require political appointees to disclose their spouse's income to evaluate whether they can avoid conflicts of interest, said Rob Walker, of counsel at law firm Wiley Rein LLP and a former chief counsel and staff director of the Senate and House Ethics committees.

"It's getting to the impartiality of officials in their official decision-making and if they could be affected by their own or closer relatives financial interest," Walker said.

In addition to its work with political campaigns, ForthRight Strategy, where Bellissimo is CEO, also appears to work with nonprofits that would have interest in decisions by the Interior Department, raising additional red flags over potential conflicts of interests. In a post on its Facebook page Tuesday, ForthRight says it "is proud to be part of the E&E Legal team."

The Energy & Environment Legal Institute, which the post referenced, is a nonprofit that specializes in filing public records requests and lawsuits against agencies including Interior, the Energy Department and EPA to advance conservative policy goals. E&E Legal President Craig Richardson told POLITICO the group has hired ForthRight as a fundraising vendor.

Bellissimo gushed about Lucretia Hommel's work in a review posted on Snobz Interior Design's Facebook page in October 2016.

"Currently working with Lucretia on not one but two projects!" Bellissimo wrote. "First she started on our 1905 Beachhouse on the Jersey Shore...I call it 'Jersey Shore meets St. Tropaz chic!' Now we are tackling our 1885 brownstone in downtown Washington D.C."

Bellissimo did not respond to requests for comment on her relationship with Lucretia Hommel.

Scott Hommel was the treasurer for Zinke's super PAC, Special Operations for America, when it first hired Bellissimo's direct-mail fundraising firms in 2013. Zinke's congressional campaign and a leadership PAC he founded when he was elected to the House also spent heavily on Bellissimo's firms. And Bellissimo has remained close to Zinke since he joined Interior. Bellissimo and her husband posed for a photo with the newly inaugurated secretary and Vice President Mike Pence when Zinke was sworn in last March.

Lucretia Hommel acknowledged working for Bellissimo but ended an interview before providing details on how much she was paid for the work.

"I was her interior designer for many years," Lucretia Hommel told POLITICO. "She hired me to do her house at the beach. I'm working on a project with her at her house in D.C. currently. We're finishing up. She's become a friend. She's a great person. She's just my client."

Bellissimo also uses Snobz Interior Design's website to sell furniture, Hommel added. Bellissimo's phone number and email address were listed on the site as of Friday.

Lucretia Hommel tagged Bellissimo in a June 17 Facebook post offering a "sneak peek at our favorite makeover so far," with before-and-after photos of a townhouse in Washington. An Aug. 6 update in which Bellissimo also was tagged included a photo of Bellissimo and a man who appears to be her husband painting an interior wall.

Estimating how much an interior designer may make working on a New Jersey beach home and Washington townhome would be difficult without knowing more details, several interior designers told POLITICO. But they agreed that it would undoubtedly be worth more than $1,000. "Decorators can charge $250 an hour, $400 an hour, I know people that charge $500 an hour. A thousand dollars — couldn't do even a week at that," said Mathilda Cox, an interior designer in the district and member of the American Society of Interior Designers.

Bellissimo began working with Zinke's super PAC in May of 2013, when it began paying her firms for direct mail and postage services, according to campaign finance disclosures. ForthRight Strategy was then operating as Base Connect — as it had until an executive was convicted on child pornography charges in 2014 — and a handful of other firms Bellissimo operates out of the same office in downtown Washington also were hired by the super PAC.

Zinke stepped away from Special Operations for America that September to launch his congressional campaign, though he continued to benefit from the super PAC's independent expenditures on his behalf. Zinke's campaign also hired Bellissimo's firms for direct mail work, according to FEC filings. SEAL PAC, the leadership PAC Zinke used to raise about $3 million in his first term, also relied heavily on direct mail fundraising provided by Bellissimo's companies.

In addition to developing a friendship with Lucretia Hommel, Bellissimo also appears to be friends with Zinke and his wife, Lolita, judging by their interactions on social media.

In February 2016, Bellissimo posted a photo to Facebook of her and her husband with Ryan Zinke and Rob O'Neill, a former Navy SEAL who claims to have shot Osama Bin Laden. Lolita Zinke commented "beautiful lady," to which Bellissimo replied, "Back at 'ya Lady Z!"

On May 12, 2016, Bellissimo posted a photo of her with Lolita Zinke and Lucretia Hommel at the annual First Lady's Lunch hosted by the Congressional Club at the Washington Hilton.

"At the First Lady's lunch with the ladies of Team Zinke! Thank you Lolita Zinke for inviting me," Bellissimo wrote in a Facebook post accompanying the photos that tagged Hommel and Zinke.

FEMA investigating Whitefish Energy's Puerto Rico contract Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/27/2017 11:20 AM EDT

FEMA today said it has "significant concerns" about the contract Puerto Rico's electric utility signed that appoints a small, Montana-based company to fix the island's grid.

The agency said it was not involved with the contract and has not reimbursed the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority for any payments to Whitefish Energy. FEMA also questioned whether the contract prices PREPA agreed to are reasonable.

"FEMA is presently engaged with PREPA and its legal counsel to obtain information about the contract and contracting process, including how the contract was procured and how PREPA determined the contract prices were reasonable," the agency said in a statement.

The contract between PREPA and Whitefish Energy included a provision barring government review of the company's labor cost and pricing. A copy of the contract had been posted as of last week on the Caribbean Business news website, but was apparently removed today. It attracted widespread attention Thursday night following a series of tweets from journalist Ken Klippenstein.

That provision has added to criticism about the awarding of the contract to Whitefish Energy, a two-man operation that is located in Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's hometown.

WHAT'S NEXT: Several congressional committees also are investigating the contract and have asked Whitefish Energy or PREPA to provide additional information.

U.S. Court stays EPA truck trailer rule Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/27/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today stayed an EPA rule that would have required truck trailers to be more aerodynamic.

"The EPA Final Rule on review is hereby stayed insofar as it purports to regulate trailers," the court wrote. "Petitioner has satisfied the stringent requirements for a stay pending court review."

The grant of a stay signals that the petitioners could win on the merits.

The Truck Trailer Manufacturers Association challenged the rule soon after it was finalized last year. The case has been held in abeyance at EPA's request, but the rule was set to go into effect on Jan. 1.

The lawsuit was a narrow challenge to EPA's requirement that the trailers used to haul cargo meet new regulations designed to make them lighter and more aerodynamic to reduce their fuel use and emissions.

Trump blasts 'wacky & totally unhinged' Tom Steyer after impeachment ad campaign

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 10/27/2017 07:26 AM EDT

President Donald Trump blasted Tom Steyer on Friday, calling the Democratic megadonor "wacky" and "totally unhinged."

"Wacky & totally unhinged Tom Steyer, who has been fighting me and my Make America Great Again agenda from beginning, never wins elections!" Trump tweeted Friday morning.

Steyer, a California billionaire activist, is launching a $10 million national ad campaign calling for the president's impeachment. The 60-second TV spot began running last week, according to Forbes.

The ad played Friday morning on "Fox & Friends," likely catching the president's eye.

Steyer opens the ad narrating over clips of the president and a shot of North Korea. He says that Trump has brought the U.S. "to the brink of nuclear war" with North Korea and is "accused of obstructing justice" with his May firing of then-FBI Director James Comey and "of violating the Constitution by taking money from foreign governments and threatening to shut down news organizations that report the truth."

"If that isn't the case for impeaching and removing a dangerous president, then what has our government become?" says Steyer, speaking directly into the camera and identified onscreen as an "American Citizen." "I'm Tom Steyer, and, like you, I'm a citizen who knows it's up to us to do something. It's why I'm funding this effort to raise our voices together and demand that elected officials take a stand on impeachment."

Steyer adds that a Republican-led Congress "once impeached a president for far less, yet today people in Congress and his own administration know that this president is a clear and present danger who's mentally unstable and armed with nuclear weapons, and they do nothing."

He asks Americans to join him and tell their member of Congress "they have a moral responsibility to stop doing what's political and start doing what's right."

"Our country depends on it," he warns.

The ad encourages viewers to sign a petition at NeedToImpeach.com.

Steyer responded to Trump's barbs on the president's preferred platform, tweeting that Trump is "right about one thing."

"I have been fighting your racism and corporate groveling from the beginning — and always will," said Steyer, who called on House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) "to take a stand" in subsequent tweets. "Americans deserve much better. Americans across the board know you're a danger to the people of this country."

Immediately after tweeting about Steyer earlier Friday morning, Trump thanked Fox News' morning show for its coverage.

"Thank you @foxandfriends," Trump said, one minute after his tweet about Steyer. "Really great job and show!"

Twitter urged firms to delete data during 2016 campaign Back

By Josh Meyer | 10/27/2017 05:07 AM EDT

Twitter quietly ramped up a campaign last year to permanently delete some user data from its social media platform and the files of commercial firms using it, raising concerns that the policy would help Russian cyberspies suspected of meddling in the 2016 election cover their tracks.

In June and September of 2016, the company posted updates to its privacy policy and user agreements that reminded firms that when anyone deleted or revised tweets — or closed accounts — that all others with access to them would have to destroy any trace of them as well. If they failed to comply, the company warned, they risked being cut off from the Twitter database.

The second of the directives came amid intensifying questions about who was behind efforts to hijack Twitter to sway voters, and after cyber-researchers had expressed concerns that the deletion policy was undermining their efforts to link that campaign to Moscow.

In some cases, private-sector researchers say they complained about the directives to Twitter officials, while others issued warnings on the platform itself and other online platforms.

Samuel Woolley, an information warfare expert who was director of Oxford University's Computational Propaganda Research Team, questioned the timing of the directives, saying they came after he and associates had repeatedly warned Twitter officials that the existing deletion policy already was undermining their efforts — and those of many other researchers — to determine the extent of Russia's attempts to manipulate the social media platform.

"There was a ton of research showing that Twitter was the place spreading disinformation, just overwhelmingly manufactured information," said Woolley, now director of the Silicon Valley-based Digital Intelligence Lab. "Many of us in the [cyber-research] community have made it clear to Twitter that to delete this information would be a travesty. We've been having this conversation for over four years" with people at various levels of Twitter, including senior executives.

"All social media companies have deletion policies," Woolley added. "However, when policies are changed during pivotal political moments — and when the company has regularly been warned its platform is the vessel for civic manipulation in similar moments — one is right to wonder, why then?"

People familiar with Twitter's thinking said the directives were merely efforts to reinforce and clarify existing company policies designed to protect the privacy of users, and that the September directive in particular was made to bring Twitter more in line with stringent privacy protections established by the European Union.

"It has long been our stance that developers must keep the Twitter content they consume up to date," a Twitter official said, in response to questions from POLITICO. "We've clarified our policy at several points, based both on updates to our overall Privacy Policy and based on feedback from developers about different use cases. ... But the intent is the same."

"Importantly, nearly every major social media platform requires external developers who use their data to follow these kinds of rules," the Twitter official said, citing what she said were the similar policies of Facebook, Tumblr and Instagram.

But some government and private-sector cybersecurity analysts said the changes were far more significant, and had the effect of prompting data firms to destroy potentially large amounts of information that could be relevant to probes of Russia's efforts to influence the 2016 election. Twitter was aggressive enough in its enforcement that one company lost access to the database for failing to make required deletions.

Emilio Ferrara, principal investigator at the University of Southern California's Machine Intelligence and Data Science, said he had criticized Twitter's privacy policy during last fall's campaign. He said he did so on Twitter itself, even though "they just ignore those."

"Their implementation and the decision to physically destroy these data raises critical issues on accountability that social-media service providers should be asked to address moving forward," Ferrara said. "Even if I appreciate Twitter's initiative regarding deleting abusive or propagandist content on the platform, their implementation of it is problematic: There is no need to physically destroy such content in the company's servers; it can be just hidden from the public interface and records should be kept, for auditing purposes."

For at least four years before the 2016 election, researchers who monitor Twitter had openly criticized Russia for using the platform to meddle in other elections, especially in Ukraine.

They had also pointedly criticized Twitter for its failure to do anything substantive about that meddling, including not changing its deletion policy to allow for saving of material that might be useful to researchers and law enforcement.

"This policy allows adversarial intelligence agencies and other disinformation operators to edit the news and then remove their traces," according to Thomas Rid, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University and a leading cyber-researcher who was the first person to publicly link Russia to the WikiLeaks release of hacked emails from the Democratic National Committee. "It means they can run operations more effectively and more covertly than ever before, and we may never find out exactly how they pulled it off."

Now, more than a year later, Twitter's deletion policy — and how it changed over time, and why — merits further scrutiny by congressional committees investigating Russian meddling in the U.S. election and the apparently significant role social media played in it, the analysts said.

"If certain aspects of content on Twitter reveals that there has been interference in our elections, especially by foreign actors but also by people in our country, the public has a right to know," Woolley said. "But before the public has the right to know, I think that congressional investigators, third-party researchers, a lot of other people need to have this information. And this effort to obfuscate information that has been deleted or made private is super problematic."

GOP eyes end of Russia probes with Trump collusion unanswered Back

By Kyle Cheney and Elana Schor | 10/27/2017 05:04 AM EDT

Republican lawmakers say they're approaching the end of their investigations into Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election even though the most politically explosive issue — whether associates of President Donald Trump colluded with the Kremlin — remains unresolved.

That will present Democrats who have spent a year amplifying suspicions about Trump's own ties to Russia with a wrenching choice: to join Republicans and set aside the most momentous aspect of their probes — or to break from the GOP and end any chance of presenting a united front against a continuing Russian threat.

Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Richard Burr (R-N.C.) has suggested his panel's investigation will end early next year, emphasizing that he wants to wrap up by February, ahead of the first 2018 primary elections.

His panel still has a long list of witnesses to interview, but Burr described the timeline as a "mathematical equation," one pitting the ability of the committee to schedule meetings against the calendar. And he's hinted it's possible the report will find no evidence of collusion between Trump allies and Moscow.

"If there's evidence that there was something there, that will be laid out. If there's no evidence, how could anybody object to it?" Burr said.

Rep. Mike Conaway (R-Texas), who's leading the House Intelligence Committee's Russia probe, told POLITICO this week that he hopes to finish before the Senate.

Conaway said he intends to seek a meeting with Burr, as well as the House and Senate committees' top Democrats — Rep. Adam Schiff of California and Sen. Mark Warner of Virginia — to sketch out their panels' conclusions and attempt to generally align their reports. Wildly divergent conclusions, he said, could "embarrass the institution" and could send mixed messages about the urgency of the Russian threat.

Schiff said in an interview that he agrees with Conaway on the need for a meeting of the four committee leaders as well as his drive to come to a unified bipartisan conclusion.

"I think, frankly, it would be a good idea for the four of us to be collaborating as we go along rather than wait until the conclusion of our investigation," Schiff said. "I second Mike's suggestion and actually think it would be worthwhile."

But a kumbaya moment may be wishful thinking when it comes to questions about collusion.

In the House, and possibly the Senate as well, bringing the Russia probes to a close is likely to trigger a partisan showdown.

Some Republicans on the committees have publicly dismissed allegations that Trump allies might have helped Russia's interference campaign. They've seen no conclusive evidence suggesting collusion occurred, and they're weary after interviewing scores of witnesses who they say have shed little new light on the matter.

"We've hit the point of diminishing returns long ago," said Sen. Jim Risch (R-Idaho.) "We've looked at lots of stuff. At some point in time, the jury needs to reach a verdict."

Warner didn't rule out the possibility of a meeting with Burr, Conaway and Schiff, though he dismissed as "preliminary" an effort to stave off a partisan splintering.

"We're still operating in a very collaborative fashion," Warner said in an interview.

Democrats, though, seem increasingly resigned to the fact that their probes may end without a conclusion on whether any Americans aided the Russian interference effort.

"It's quite possible that six months from now, there will be unanswered questions that we can't answer because the people we would need to answer those questions are in Russia," said Rep. Jim Himes (D-Conn.). "The probability that we're going to produce a report that buttons down every question is pretty low."

Warner has said he'd readily accept it if the Senate investigation finds no evidence of collusion.

"[I]f there's not something there, I'll be the first to acknowledge that," the Virginia Democrat told The New York Times this week.

The painful choice for Democrats is whether to attempt to forge a fragile compromise with Republicans that depicts what both parties generally agree on: that Russia orchestrated a massive interference campaign to undermine U.S. politics and stoke intense division. That would likely mean abandoning a definitive determination on collusion — or punting to special counsel Robert Mueller, who's leading a criminal probe of possible crimes connected to the Russian plot.

But even Democratic unity on those questions may be challenging.

"I'm not signing on to any report unless it's a bipartisan report," Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), a member of the intelligence panel, said in an interview.

Manchin also disputed the notion that "we're going to be that far apart" in the end.

"It's up to us to come together and say, 'OK, we agree,'" he added.

Schiff and fellow California Rep. Eric Swalwell, two of the most outspoken House Intelligence Committee Democrats, say they too hope for unity but emphasized that despite the absence of a smoking gun, they've seen compelling evidence of Trump allies' "intent to collude."

"We may not find the crime on videotape, but I believe we have already seen evidence of intent," Swalwell said. "But our investigation is ongoing and we haven't reached a conclusion."

Swalwell pointed to a slew of storylines in which figures in Trump's orbit contacted Kremlin-associated Russians. There's the secret meeting with Kremlin-connected Russians that the president's son, Donald Trump Jr., organized in Trump Tower ostensibly to obtain documents unfavorable to Hillary Clinton, as well as attempts by two Trump business associates to seek Kremlin help for a Trump Tower development in Moscow just as the presidential campaign was beginning in earnest.

There also are lingering questions about Trump's first pick for national security adviser, Mike Flynn, and allegations he secretly assured Russia's ambassador that Trump would lift Obama-imposed sanctions on Russia. And there's the mysterious admission by a GOP operative, who claimed connections to the Trump campaign, that he sought help from Russians to expose thousands of emails deleted from Clinton's private server.

"We've certainly seen evidence of an intention by the Trump campaign to collude with the Russians," Schiff said. "I would hope that, at the end of the day, we'll come to a common conclusion on that as well. I think it's too early to say."

Himes noted that new twists seem to emerge constantly, pointing to a Daily Beast report this week that a Trump campaign data firm, Cambridge Analytica, acknowledged approaching WikiLeaks to try to procure Clinton's deleted emails.

Schiff, who complained in a recent Washington Post op-ed that the White House was pressuring Congress to conclude its Russia probes, may also find allies among Senate Democrats who say there's still a long way to go before they'll feel satisfied they turned over every rock in the investigation.

"I want to get actionable items in place that can secure our voting infrastructure by" the time that primaries begin next year, Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.) said in an interview. "But I think we should follow the investigation where it takes us, irrespective of the timeframe."

Sen. Angus King, a Maine independent who caucuses with Democrats, also suggested he would have trouble signing on to any final report that left the collusion matter unresolved. "The report has to be comprehensive," King said in a brief interview.

How Republicans approach the issue of collusion, too, could determine whether Democrats join them.

Barring any dramatic new evidence, Republicans like Rep. Peter King of New York would like to plainly state that lawmakers found "no evidence" of collusion. But they worry that might turn off some Democrats.

"They're too committed," King said. "They're so dug in on this."

Capitol Hill's sexual harassment policy 'toothless,' 'a joke' Back

By Rachael Bade and Elana Schor | 10/27/2017 12:07 AM EDT

Two female lawmakers and several congressional staffers are calling for an overhaul of Capitol Hill's policies on sexual harassment, citing a culture of tolerance in a workplace long known as a boys' club.

The sexual harassment scandals involving major Hollywood and media figures are focusing new attention on Congress' procedures, which critics say are woefully inadequate for deterring bad behavior in an institution filled with powerful men and young aides trying to advance their careers. Each congressional office operates as its own small, tightly controlled fiefdom with its own rules and procedures, which makes it that much harder to come forward.

Lawmakers and congressional aides are not required to undergo sexual harassment training — a shortcoming even the office that handles complaints says should be changed. And victims must submit to as long as three months of mandated "counseling" and "mediation," as well as what one lawyer involved in such cases called a "cooling off period," before filing a complaint against an alleged perpetrator.

That's assuming they're even aware of how to lodge a grievance.

One former staffer who said she was sexually harassed by a colleague years ago told POLITICO she didn't know where to turn at the time. She'd never heard of the Office of Compliance, or OOC, the entity that exists to handle harassment complaints and enforce workplace protection laws for the legislative branch. When she called a congressional committee that deals with administrative issues to inquire about filing a complaint, she said, she was turned away without any guidance.

"I didn't even know it existed as a resource," the ex-staffer said of the compliance office. "You don't have an HR Department on the Hill. There's no one place that you go. Nobody on the Hill has any idea how you report and deal with sexual harassment."

Some officials are trying to change that. Rep. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.) next week will introduce legislation calling for an overhaul of the compliance office, which she said is "constructed to protect the institution — and to impede the victim from getting justice." On Friday, she will release a video recounting her experience years ago as a congressional staffer, when the office's chief of staff "held my face, kissed me and stuck his tongue in my mouth," she said.

"Many of us in Congress know what it's like, because Congress has been a breeding ground for a hostile work environment for far too long," Speier continued. "It's time to throw back the curtain on the repulsive behavior that has thrived in the dark without consequences."

In an interview Thursday, Speier called the OOC "toothless" and "a joke." She said "it encumbers the victim in ways that are indefensible."

"There's no accountability whatsoever," she said. "It's rigged in favor of the institution and the members, and we can't tolerate that."

The call to overhaul the OOC comes as 40 percent of female congressional staffers say there's a sexual harassment problem on Capitol Hill, according to a July survey conducted by Roll Call. The survey found that one in six female aides said they'd personally been sexually harassed in their offices, and only 10 percent were aware of structures that existed to report misconduct.

OOC Deputy Executive Director Paula Sumberg defended her office. "Any current staffer who has not heard of the Office of Compliance has somehow missed our emailed Annual Notification of Rights, our quarterly eNewsletters, and information about us on" the House intranet, Sumberg said in an email.

But even the OOC appears to acknowledge flaws in the system. In recent years, it has recommended that Congress make sexual harassment training mandatory. And the OOC recently urged Congress to raise its profile, noting that some training seminars for staffers don't mention the office as a resource for workplace disputes.

Multiple staffers, including some who've worked on Capitol Hill for years, said there is a dearth of information about the OOC. So it's not readily apparent where to turn when a colleague's — or even a boss' — actions become inappropriate.

That was the case for former staffers in former Rep. Tim Murphy's office. Aides who called POLITICO to detail a hostile work environment — slammed doors, cursing, timed bathroom breaks and verbal abuse — said they were either unaware of the OOC or told it was pointless to complain. Others feared retaliation.

Even some lawmakers aren't apparently aware of, or at least inclined to rely on, the OOC.

In 2014, a group of female staffers accused Kenny West, the chief of staff to Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), of making inappropriate comments toward them. But Meadows turned to his friend, Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), for help. Meadows asked Gowdy's chief of staff, a woman, to interview his aides to determine whether West had acted inappropriately, according to an Office of Congressional Ethics report.

Gowdy's staffer recommended Meadows fire the staffer, though Meadows kept him on payroll for months after that, the report said.

A similar situation played out in the office of Rep. Eric Massa (D-N.Y.) in 2010, after he was accused of making unwanted advances toward a junior male staffer. A more senior aide in the office brought the matter to Rep. Steny Hoyer's office, which instructed the aide to report the matter to the Ethics Committee.

A House Administration Committee spokesman said Thursday that harassment on the Hill is "a serious issue" and that the panel is "currently evaluating what additional resources might be made available" to further help lawmakers and aides. She also argued that the Office of House Employment Counsel provides training, including sexual harassment awareness training, as does the Office of the House Chief Administrative Officer.

President Donald Trump's former campaign manager, Kellyanne Conway, painted a harsh picture of the reality facing women on Capitol Hill after a video emerged last year of Trump bragging about his sexual advances on women.

"I would talk to some of the members of Congress there when I was younger and prettier, them rubbing against girls, sticking their tongues down women's throats who were uninvited, didn't like it," Conway told MSNBC in October 2016.

The comment was meant to defend Trump from lawmakers aghast by the "Access Hollywood" video. Conway's spokesperson did not respond to a request for comment on which members she was talking about.

Speier and Rep. Brenda Lawrence (D-Mich.) are looking to pre-empt such situations with legislation that would mandate sexual harassment training for every congressional office. Executive branch employees must undergo such training, but it is optional for congressional workers.

Speier has introduced her bill every year since 2014, to no avail. One year, she came close to getting it passed when House appropriators agreed to tuck her bill into an appropriations measure — only to see it stripped from a Senate spending package.

Lawrence, who used to investigate harassment issues for the federal government, said she always checked whether training had been provided. "This is a first step, and I know this is one that can make a difference," she said.

When Speier introduces her bill again this year, the legislation will go beyond sexual harassment training and seek to overhaul the lengthy process Hill victims must go through before filing a complaint.

As it stands now, after an incident but before filing a complaint, victims are required to go through 30 days of "counseling" with an OOC employee. Following that process, they have 15 days to decide whether they want to pursue the next step: 30 days of mandated "mediation."

After mediation, victims must wait another 30 days to file a complaint. The OOC allows anyone filing a complaint to ask to shorten the counseling period and doesn't require them to be in the same room as the accused during mediation, but Speier put little stock in those measures.

"Can you imagine a victim who's been sexually harassed who attempts to file a complaint and then is told they've got to go through three months of biting their tongue and continuing to work in that kind of environment?" she asked. "You've just been sexually harassed and you're told you have to be 'counseled' for 30 days. Are you kidding me?"

Les Alderman, an attorney who has represented multiple congressional employees in harassment and discrimination cases, said that OOC officials "do their best to do exactly what the law says they should." But he warned that the law that created the office "has major downfalls."

For one, Alderman said, the 30-day counseling period a harassment victim must undergo before pursuing a complaint is confidential.

Alexis Ronickher, an employment rights lawyer at Katz, Marshall & Banks who's worked with sexual harassment victims in congressional offices, said that means victims can be sanctioned and their cases jeopardized if they say publicly that they're filing a complaint against a lawmaker or fellow staffer.

"It's the strap of silence in my opinion that helps foster a broken system. The fact that you can't tell anyone that you filed a request for counseling or that you're in mediation, that everything that goes on there has to be confidential," she said. "It creates an environment in which people don't talk about what's happening and women who are being sexually harassed can't come together and say, 'I'm coming forward; you should come forward.'"

Ronickher said it's not the Office of Compliance's fault as much as the 1995 Congressional Accountability Act, which governs how the office operates and the rules governing complaints.

The GOP-controlled Congress created the OOC in 1995 amid the scandal involving then-Sen. Bob Packwood's rampant sexual harassment. Ten women told The Washington Post about the Oregon Republican's lewd behavior. The furor grew as Senate Republicans — including then-Ethics Committee chairman and now-Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) — resisted holding hearings.

Former Nevada Sen. Richard Bryan, then the ethics panel's top Democrat, recalled a "drumbeat of complaints" that eventually forced committee Republicans to join his call to act against Packwood.

"This wasn't just one woman ... there was a pattern," Bryan said in an interview.

OOC fielded 49 requests for counseling during fiscal 2016, according to its most recent annual report, including six in the House and two in the Senate. Of those requests, 15 dealt with harassment or a hostile work environment.

Despite the waiting periods, Sumberg said the OOC's process for dispute resolution is faster than that of other federal agencies. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which polices harassment cases for those agencies, can take as long as 180 days to act on a discrimination charge, according to its website.

"We probably have the fastest administrative process for bringing a sexual harassment complaint in the entire federal government," Sumberg said by email.

Alderman, the attorney who works with harassment and discrimination victims, noted another key difference between the OOC's process and the EEOC's work in other federal agencies. After an accuser has successfully navigated the system and won a complaint, the EEOC requires the posting of information about the perpetrators of discriminatory behavior, so that "hopefully public notice and shame occurs."

No such publicizing of a perpetrator's past record is required in Congress. It's a system,

Alderman said, that "helps repeat offenders keep on repeating."

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by Chevron: Zinke's secret huddle with Natural Resources — Interior touts largest ever lease sale — Democrats want Dourson details
Date: Tuesday, October 24, 2017 4:29:58 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 10/24/2017 04:27 PM EDT

THE SECRET LIFE OF THE AMERICAN LAWMAKER: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke met for secret briefings today with members of the House Natural Resources Committee, a session Democrats said was confusing and unusual, Anthony Adragna and Nick Juliano report. The Interior chief met separately with Republicans and Democrats from the committee in a secure room in the basement of the Capitol, which is typically reserved to discuss classified information. The topic of discussion was a "national security matter," and lawmakers declined to say any more than that, Anthony and Nick report.

Lawmakers offered few details: "Suffice to say that they related to international resource issues," California's Jim Costa said after the briefing. "This was a confusing meeting — certainly interesting and important issues — but I can't tell you a damn thing [about it] because it was all wrapped around the veneer of confidentiality," Jared Huffman said. "It's a check-the-box exercise to say 'I met with the Democrats.'" Ranking member Raul Grijalva said it was the first Natural Resources meeting in a sensitive compartmented information facility during his 14-year tenure in Congress.

Committee Democrats said Zinke's presentation and subsequent questions left little time for a host of other issues they hoped to raise with him, such as his review of national monument designations and the ethical questions surrounding Zinke's associations with alleged "scam PACs," non-commercial travel and reorganization plans for the agency. "He gave a brief statement about his travel and that was it," Costa said, declining to offer additional details. Read more here.

INTERIOR TOUTS LARGEST EVER LEASE SALE: The Interior Department is proposing the largest oil and gas lease sale ever held in the U.S., Zinke announced today. The proposed lease sale would encompass 76,967,935 acres in federal waters of the Gulf of Mexico, offshore Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida, and is scheduled for March 2018. Interior said it "includes all available unleased areas on the Gulf's Outer Continental Shelf, surpassing last year's region-wide lease sale by about one million acres."

The proposed lease sale would follow an August sale that Interior said at the time was the largest offshore lease sale, Ben Lefebvre reports. "That lease sale for 76 million acres fell short of the $247 million generated from a Gulf of Mexico lease sale last March."

"In today's low-price energy environment, providing the offshore industry access to the maximum amount of opportunities possible is part of our strategy to spur local and regional economic dynamism and job creation and a pillar of President Trump's plan to make the United States energy dominant," Zinke said in a statement of today's announcement. The proposed notice of sale will go into the Federal Register Oct. 26.

DEMOCRATS WANT DETAILS ON DOURSON: EPA confirmed last week that Michael Dourson, President Donald Trump's pick to head EPA's Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention, is serving as a special adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt on chemicals ahead of his official confirmation — which prompted Democrats to demand an explanation. "Your appointment creates the appearance, and perhaps the effect, of circumventing the Senate's constitutional advice and consent responsibility for the position to which you have been nominated," the 10 lawmakers, led by Sheldon Whitehouse wrote in a letter to Dourson. "Your improper involvement in EPA decisions could provide grounds for subjects of EPA regulations and oversight to challenge the legal validity of those decisions in court." They ask Dourson to describe his duties, his relationship with the career official serving as acting head of the OCSPP and whether any of that official's duties have been delegated to Dourson, Alex Guillén reports.

COURT TOSSES SUIT OVER HOTSPOT GUIDANCE: The D.C. Circuit today tossed out a lawsuit brought by environmentalists over an Obama-era update to agency guidance on how to measure a transportation project's effect on both fine and coarse particulate matter levels. Green groups argued that the "hot-spot" guidance was wrongly written without notice-and-comment rulemaking. But the three-judge panel concluded that for the fine PM guidance, the groups could not show an adverse impact and thus did not have standing to sue. As for coarse PM, the panel said the guidance is non-binding and thus is not a final agency action that can be challenged in court.

INTELLIGENCE, OVERSIGHT TO LOOK AT URANIUM SALE: Two new congressional committees will probe the Obama administration's decision to approve the sale of American uranium production capability to a Russian state-run energy conglomerate, POLITICO's Kyle Cheney reports. House Intelligence Chairman Devin Nunes said he'd be linking up with the House Oversight panel to investigate the deal, which the Senate Judiciary Committee has already said it would look into. Kyle points out the move is likely to infuriate Democrats, who have generally dismissed the issue as an attempt to distract from the ongoing investigation into Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election. Nunes' announcement follows reports suggesting the sale of uranium production facilities to the Russian-run Rosatom came amid a broader bribery plot by Russian officials to gain a foothold in the American energy industry while President Barack Obama was in office. More here.

TRUMP ASKS ABOUT DENALI NAME CHANGE: Trump asked Alaska's two GOP senators about reversing an Obama-era move to change the name of country's tallest mountain from Mt. McKinley to Denali. in a March meeting with Lisa Murkowski and Dan Sullivan, CNN reports, the president asked about undoing the name change, Sullivan told the Alaska Federation of Natives convention. "The meeting came as Trump and the senators discussed several Obama administration moves limiting development in Alaska,' CNN writes. "He looked at me and said, 'I heard that the big mountain in Alaska also had — also its name was changed by executive action. Do you want us to reverse that?'" Sullivan said. "Lisa — Sen. Murkowski — and I jumped over the desk," Sullivan said. "We said no, no!" Obama announced in 2015 that he was renaming the Alaskan mountain after the name in the indigenous Athabascan language. According to Sullivan, Trump was "perplexed that the two Republicans wanted to keep an Obama-era decision." More here.

MARK YOUR CALENDAR: The House Energy and Commerce Energy subcommittee announced three markups for 10 a.m. Thursday in 2123 Rayburn. The subcommittee will consider H.R. 1733 \(115\), to direct the the Energy secretary to review a report on the benefits of the re-refining of used lubricating oil; H.R. 2872 \(115\), on existing nonpowered Dams Act development; and H.R. 2880 \(115\), on the Closed-Loop Pumped Storage Hydropower Act.

FLAKE WON'T SEEK REELECTION: Arizona Sen. Jeff Flake will retire after his current term expires, according to a senior Republican familiar with the decision. Flake a member of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee and chairman of its water and power subcommittee, was one of the most vulnerable Republican senators up for reelection in 2018, POLITICO's Alex Isenstadt reports.

TESLA UNVEILS SOLAR IN PUERTO RICO: Telsa tweeted today images of solar generation and a storage facility it installed in Puerto Rico, at the Hospital del Niño. The facility will power the hospital, "with a combination of solar cells and Tesla's Powerpack commercial energy storage batteries," TechCrunch reports. Tesla's tweet noted that this is "first of many solar+storage projects going live." It comes "after the company discussed how it might help with Puerto Rico's ongoing recovery efforts with PR Governor Ricardo Rossello following an exchange between the Governor and Musk on Twitter. Rossello and Puerto Rican Chief Innovation Officer Glorimar Ripoli proposed turning the territory into a flagship example of what Tesla's solar technologies can do for the world," TechCrunch writes.

More than one month after Hurricane Maria hit the U.S. territory, electricity service has not been restored to most residents of Puerto Rico. The Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority had partially restored service to 18 percent of customers in 35 of 78 municipalities, as of Monday morning, the Energy Information Administration reports.

Zinke funneled millions to questionable PACs Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Nick Juliano | 10/24/2017 05:04 AM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has directed millions of dollars in political contributions since 2014 to a network of Washington operatives that prominent conservatives have accused of profiting by misleading donors.

Beneficiaries of Zinke's largesse include groups linked to Washington-area political operative Scott B. Mackenzie, organizer of a Virgin Islands GOP political action committee that hosted the secretary at a St. Croix fundraiser in March. Before that, when Zinke was a Republican congressman from Montana, his political operation steered significant portions of its spending to a handful of Washington, D.C.-area consulting firms that also have had ties to Mackenzie and his associates.

Zinke has continued this relationship even as other Republicans have recoiled from dealing with Mackenzie, whose critics say he operates "scam PACs" that raise small-dollar donations from conservative voters but then spend the bulk of the money on consultants and overhead. The critics include former Virginia Attorney General Ken Cuccinelli, who filed a suit accusing Mackenzie and other defendants of running a "national fundraising scam" after they gave his 2013 campaign for governor less than a half percent of the money they had raised in his name.

Similarly, Zinke's own leadership PAC also relied heavily on small donors while spending heavily on consultants, in a departure from how most members of Congress operate those kinds of groups.

The details about Zinke's fundraising and spending practices have not been previously reported, nor has his years-long relationship with Mackenzie's Virgin Islands Republican Party, a group that some Republicans in the Caribbean island chain have accused of misrepresenting itself to donors. POLITICO's analysis of Federal Election Commission filings, plus interviews with campaign finance lawyers and people familiar with the Virgin Islands group's fundraising, offer a deeper picture of the political activism of the retired Navy SEAL who serves in President Donald Trump's Cabinet.

None of the records indicate that Zinke violated the law or received any direct compensation from his association with Mackenzie, the Virgin Islands PAC or its consultants. But one campaign finance expert said the information shows that Zinke was not behaving like a typical politician.

"To say the least, this is highly unusual," said Karl Sandstrom, a former Democratic FEC commissioner who now works at the law firm Perkins Coie.

An Interior Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the assistance Zinke has offered to the Virgin Islands group or his use of political consultants. Mackenzie declined to be interviewed, and officials from the Virgin Islands organization — also known as VIGOP — did not respond to requests for comment.

Zinke is separately facing investigations by Interior's internal watchdog and the independent Office of Special Counsel over his habit of mixing politics and official business.

Legal limits on Zinke's partisan activities have tightened now that he's Interior secretary, and he has cut ties with his PACs since being sworn in. Still, he has kept up appearances at fundraisers and other political events — averaging more than one per month — a pace that is unusual for a Cabinet member. Those include his appearance at the March fundraiser in the Virgin Islands, which occurred during a taxpayer-funded trip less than a month after he became secretary.

Complaints among Republicans about "scam PACS" have been on the rise for years, focusing on groups that target conservative voters as a source for donations. Those complaints have repeatedly focused on Mackenzie, the founder of a number of GOP-leaning PACs that have used slogans such as "Stop Hillary Clinton" to raise money from conservatives — then appeared to do little actual politicking.

Such groups make use of what past FEC leaders have described as a loophole in campaign finance law. The commission declined to take action against one of Mackenzie's Virginia-based PACs, the Conservative StrikeForce, after former Rep. Allen West (R-Fla.) complained in 2012 that it had been "fraudulent" in raising money from his supporters while falsely implying it would aid his reelection campaign. While the PAC's actions were "troubling," the commission's attorneys wrote, they didn't violate any laws or rules that the FEC has the power to enforce.

Cuccinelli made similar criticisms in his 2014 lawsuit, which accused Mackenzie, Conservative StrikeForce and other defendants of using the bulk of the money they had raised in his name to "enrich themselves." The case was eventually settled, with Conservative StrikeForce agreeing to pay Cuccinelli's campaign $85,000 and turn over its donor lists.

Conservative commentator Erick Erickson warned campaigns as far back as 2010 that he might not endorse any Republican candidate who used one Mackenzie-linked consulting firm, then known as Base Connect and now called ForthRight Strategy. Montana Democrats accused Zinke of facilitating a "political Ponzi scheme" with his connections to Mackenzie-linked firms during his 2014 congressional campaign, though the charges apparently gained little traction.

More recently, Rep. Will Hurd (R-Texas) — who was angered last year when the Virgin Islands GOP used his photo without his permission on fundraising solicitations — said in a statement to POLITICO that the Virgin Islands group and ForthRight "are preying on seniors in a disgusting attempt to enrich themselves."

Adav Noti, a former FEC associate general counsel who now works for the nonprofit watchdog Campaign Legal Center, said in an interview that he had dealt with the Virgin Islands group and Mackenzie as an FEC official, and that in his opinion, "They are a scam

PAC."

"Scott Mackenzie has a number of scam PACs," Noti said. "He was probably the first, or one of the first, with the idea of bilking people out of money through PACs. People are being defrauded, and that needs to stop."

The FEC is scheduled to decide Thursday whether to fine Mackenzie for less-serious discrepancies in campaign filings by two other PACs of which he's the treasurer, Freedom's Defense Fund and the Conservative Majority Fund.

None of the criticism has seemed to deter Zinke, who used part of a government-paid trip to the Virgin Islands in March to attend a VIGOP fundraiser, where — as POLITICO reported in early October — an invitation listed tickets costing as much as $5,000 a couple, and Zinke's schedule indicated that high-dollar donors had a chance to take photos with him. It was at least the third VIGOP event Zinke had attended there since 2015.

VIGOP, which the FEC classifies as a "non-party" PAC, directed more than a third of its spending during the 2016 election cycle to a handful of Washington-area consulting firms, including ForthRight and at least three other companies that share its address on 15th Street Northwest, according to campaign filings and other documents. Those firms also received more than $3.2 million during the same period from Zinke's congressional campaign, leadership PAC and a super PAC he founded before running for Congress, federal campaign records show.

Between the 2014 and 2016 elections, Base Connect had renamed itself ForthRight Strategy after a former executive pleaded guilty to child pornography charges. A number of the firm's clients left, but Zinke's campaign and his newly formed leadership PAC not only stayed with the firm but also spent substantially more on it in the next election.

Zinke also publicly endorsed ForthRight's performance in his 2014 congressional race, offering a testimonial that was displayed on the firm's website until this month, when the watchdog group Campaign for Accountability filed an ethics complaint.

"Your results and personal commitment to Team Zinke were bar none!" the company quoted Zinke as saying on its website. "I greatly value the professional as well as the personal relationship we have developed over many years."

This praise came even though Zinke's campaign appears to have received less than it spent from its relationship with the firm.

ForthRight says it raised $1.9 million for Zinke's 2014 race by sending out 1.6 million pieces of mail, attracting nearly 44,000 new donors whose average contribution was $44. About $550,000 of that haul went to Zinke's campaign for "voter mail, radio ads, TV ads, get-out-the-vote activities and lawn signs," according to the firm's website. But that was less than the $608,000 that Zinke's campaign spent on postage and direct mail from Century Data Mailing Service, a firm located at the same 15th Street address as ForthRight, according to FEC records.

In the run-up to last year's election, Zinke's campaign and his leadership PAC, known as SEAL PAC, spent about $3 million combined on ForthRight Strategy, Direct Support Services and Legacy Lists — all of which operate out of the same office and list ForthRight CEO

Kimberly Bellissimo among their executives. (Bellissimo did not respond to POLITICO's requests for comment.)

Special Operations for America, a super PAC that Zinke founded in 2012 before running for office, also paid firms at that address a total of about $1.8 million during the 2014 and 2016 campaign cycles.

Mackenzie is not listed on ForthRight's website or business filings but was long associated with the firm under its previous names, Base Connect and BMW Direct, both of which listed him as a staff member as far back as 2007.

Besides sharing an affinity for the same consultants as Mackenzie's VIGOP, Zinke's SEAL PAC has also followed a similar fundraising model: It raised two-thirds of its money from small donors in 2016, then steered only 4 percent of its spending to other campaigns, with almost all the rest going to operating expenses and overhead.

Typically, members of Congress use their leadership PACs to cover expenses that cannot be funded from their campaign accounts and to contribute to fellow politicians, using donations of up to $5,000 from lobbyists and other PACs. But SEAL PAC relied on donations of less than $200 for about two-thirds of the $3 million it collected during the 2016 cycle, according to a review of the donations. The group then spent more than $2.6 million on overhead and gave just $118,000 to other congressional campaign committees.

Relying heavily on small-dollar donations is one hallmark of the "scam PAC" play, said Brett Kappel, a partner at the law firm Akerman LLP who specializes in campaign finance, lobbying and government ethics.

"Unfortunately, they generally target the most vulnerable segment of the population with the least disposable income — retired people living on fixed incomes," said Kappel, who declined to discuss specific cases. "Frequently, these are elderly conservative voters who are upset with the direction of the country."

Lorraine Hutchinson, of Butler, Pennsylvania, told POLITICO that these elderly voters included her mother, who she noticed was repeatedly contributing to SEAL PAC and other organizations, though she didn't have the disposable income to spare. Hutchinson said Zinke's PAC was one of the slowest to cease soliciting money when she asked them to stop. At one point, Hutchinson resorted to posting a plea on SEAL PAC's Facebook page.

"It took a great deal of time and effort but I managed to get most of them to stop. The Seal PAC was one of the most persistent," Hutchinson told POLITICO in a Facebook message last week. "I am convinced that these groups knowingly take advantage of the vulnerable elderly and this is a widespread problem without any easy solutions."

Erickson told POLITICO in 2015 that groups that raise political donations without doing much actual politicking are "completely a drain" on the conservative movement, saying they threatened to sap the donors' enthusiasm while achieving no concrete results.

But Bellissimo, the ForthRight CEO, defended direct-mail fundraising in a 2014 post for The Daily Caller.

Donors who send checks in response to mail solicitations "are some of the most patriotic, conservative, generous, and sophisticated people on the planet. ... They are also 'movement people," Bellissimo wrote. "They are willing to sacrifice their dollars on a principled conservative even when they know that candidate is an underdog."

Mackenzie has similarly defended his high operating costs, telling the FEC in response to West's complaint that "fundraising is expensive and getting more so every year."

Bellissimo's firm has played a crucial role in partnering with Mackenzie's Virgin Islands PAC: Several months before Mackenzie filed the VIGOP's initial paperwork with the FEC in December 2013, Virgin Islands Republican Party Chairman John Canegata signed a contract with Base Connect Vice President Timothy Webster making the firm the exclusive fundraiser for the PAC, according to a copy of the confidential document reviewed by POLITICO.

Some Republicans in the Virgin Islands objected to the use of their name in fundraising mailers urging voters to "Stop Hillary Clinton," and Canegata's involvement with Mackenzie has exacerbated divisions within the local party's governing body.

The anti-Clinton pieces, "at best, solicit donations under false pretenses," four members of the Virgin Islands Republican Territorial Committee wrote in a February 2015 internal report, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO. The members reported that "not a single penny of the funds received through these solicitations have been used for any purpose identifiable to any effort to oppose the election of Hillary Clinton as president."

Bellissimo introduced Zinke to VIGOP in 2015, his first year in Congress, a source familiar with VIGOP's operations told POLITICO. Zinke, his wife, Lola, and Bellissimo flew to St. Thomas to attend a VIGOP event in November of that year. Photos of the VIGOP members posted on Facebook show Zinke and Bellissimo mingling at the Caribbean venue alongside Canegata and Saul Anuzis, a Michigan-based GOP operative who helped raise money for VIGOP. Neither Anuzis nor Canegata responded to requests for comment.

In February 2016, Bellissimo posted a photo of Zinke speaking at the Hay-Adams hotel across from the White House and bragged that she had "the privilege of playing staffer for Congressman Zinke this afternoon." When a friend commented on the Facebook post, saying the then-House freshman should run for president, she replied: "Maybe someday.... Will you help me campaign for him?"

Zinke returned for another VIGOP event at the Ritz-Carlton in St. Thomas less than two weeks after the 2016 election, according to social media posts. Then came his appearance at the VIGOP fundraiser this past March — this time as a member of Trump's Cabinet.

Zinke separately briefs Democrats, Republicans on national security matter Back

By Anthony Adragna and Nick Juliano | 10/24/2017 03:25 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke delivered a pair of secret briefings Tuesday to members of the House Natural Resources Committee, a session Democrats said was confusing and unusual.

Zinke met separately with Republicans and Democrats from the committee in a secure room in the basement of the Capitol typically reserved to discuss classified information. The topic of discussion was a "national security matter," and lawmakers declined to say much more than that.

"Suffice to say that they related to international resource issues," Rep. Jim Costa (D-Calif.) told POLITICO after the briefing.

"This was a confusing meeting — certainly interesting and important issues — but I can't tell you a damn thing [about it] because it was all wrapped around the veneer of confidentiality," Rep. Jared Huffman (D-Calif.) said. "It's a check-the-box exercise to say, 'I met with the Democrats.'"

Lawmakers offered few details as they emerged from Zinke's separate sessions with Democrats and Republicans on the House Natural Resources Committee. Ranking Member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said it was the first Natural Resources meeting in a SCIF, or sensitive compartmented information facility, during his 14-year tenure in Congress.

Democrats who attended the session said Zinke's presentation and subsequent questions left little time for a host of other issues they hoped to raise with him, such as his review of national monument designations and ethical questions surrounding Zinke's associations with alleged "scam PACs," non-commercial travel and reorganization plans for the agency.

"He gave a brief statement about his travel and that was it," Costa said, declining to offer additional details.

Rep. Niki Tsongas (D-Mass.) said Zinke "tried to explain where the costs are coming from," but did not go into any detailed explanation about his participation in political fundraisers while on official trips or say whether Interior had been reimbursed for any of those costs. Tsongas would not elaborate further.

Zinke declined to answer questions from POLITICO as he entered the meeting about his political activity or travel. "It must be a slow news day," he quipped.

Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) said the use of the SCIF was necessary for "parts of" what Zinke had to say, but he did not anticipate that lawmakers would have to receive additional classified briefings from the secretary. Bishop declined to describe the subject of the meeting.

Grijalva said Zinke's presentation concerned "something that could have been done in another setting" and said "it did keep us from talking about some very substantive stuff."

He add that whether Zinke intended to or not, "the substance of what we came here to talk about — and the majority of members that were there came to talk about — never got talked about."

The briefing comes as new ethics questions swirl about Zinke's activities.

POLITICO reported Tuesday the former Montana congressman has directed millions of dollars to questionable groups that raise small-dollar donations from conservative voters but then spend the bulk of the money on consultants and overhead. And a little-known energy company, Whitefish Energy, that is based in Zinke's hometown recently won a \$300 million contract to help restore Puerto Rico's power grid despite being just two years old.

Those latest controversies come on the heels of the agency's inspector general looking into Zinke's use of taxpayer-funded charter planes and concerns about his participation in fundraising or other political events while on official travel. But Democrats said there wasn't enough time to dive into those topics.

"We didn't talk about much that was not directly related" to the national security topic, Rep. Donald McEachin (D-Va.) said.

Some Democrats said the secure setting was unnecessary.

"We were playing national security games in a [secure room] with the secretary of Interior at a time when we should be asking hard questions about why climate scientists are being reassigned to desk jobs, about why our public lands are being given away," Huffman said afterward. "The swamp is getting worse and worse in this administration. We should have been talking about it, and we were playing war games."

BOEM Gulf of Mexico offshore lease sale yields $121M Back

BOEM's latest auction of offshore acreage in the Gulf of Mexico drew more than $121 million in winning bids today from oil and gas companies.

Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Total and two dozen other companies bid on 76 million acres, which Interior said was the largest amount of Gulf acreage ever offered in a single lease auction. The bidding fell short of the $247 million generated from a Gulf of Mexico lease sale last March, however.

President Donald Trump and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke have touted offshore drilling as a way for the U.S. to achieve "energy dominance." But with oil prices hovering below $50 a barrel, oil and gas companies have been wary of committing to new offshore projects, which can take several years and billions of dollars to carry out.

Interior slashed the royalty rate that companies have to pay on the oil and gas they produce to 12.5 percent for leases in less than 200 meters of water depth, down from the 18.5 percent originally advertised for the sale.

WHAT'S NEXT: Public comments are due Thursday on Interior's review for a new five-year offshore lease plan.

EPA chemical nominee starts at EPA as Pruitt adviser Back

By Alex Guillén and Eric Wolff | 10/18/2017 10:56 AM EDT

Michael Dourson, the controversial nominee to run EPA's Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention, has already started at the agency as a special adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt, according to an agency spokeswoman.

"Yes, he most certainly has," EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said in an email when asked if Dourson had begun serving as an adviser to Pruitt on chemicals.

Dourson has yet to be confirmed by the Senate. A committee vote planned for today was scrapped after Sen. Joni Ernst threatened to withhold her support for Dourson and other EPA nominees over an unrelated biofuel dispute with Pruitt.

Dourson was most recently a professor at the University of Cincinnati Department of Environmental Health's Risk Science Center. Dourson was still listed as a professor as of Oct. 5, a day after his confirmation hearing, according to a cache of his department bio page, though he is no longer listed as a faculty member.

Dourson's move to EPA was first reported Wednesday by E&E.

Another pending EPA nominee, Susan Bodine, who was selected to run the enforcement office, has also started at EPA ahead of her confirmation, which has yet to receive a floor vote. She has been working as an adviser to Pruitt on enforcement matters.

"This is not unique to our administration, but something that is a common practice," Bowman said.

Democrats want details on Dourson's advisory post at EPA Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/24/2017 02:58 PM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Democrats want EPA nominee Michael Dourson to explain his role as an adviser to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt while he awaits confirmation to become head of the Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention.

The agency confirmed last week that Dourson is serving as a special adviser on chemicals ahead of his official confirmation.

"Your appointment creates the appearance, and perhaps the effect, of circumventing the Senate's constitutional advice and consent responsibility for the position to which you have been nominated," the 10 lawmakers, led by Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.), wrote in a letter to Dourson. "Your improper involvement in EPA decisions could provide grounds for subjects of EPA regulations and oversight to challenge the legal validity of those decisions in court."

They asked Dourson to describe his duties, his relationship with the career official serving as acting head of the OCSPP and whether any of that official's duties have been delegated to Dourson.

The letter also asked several questions on certain chemical and legal issues Dourson declined to answer ahead of his confirmation. "We expect that you have familiarized yourself with these issues and can be more forthright in answering the questions we previously asked," it said.

Whitehouse last month sent a similar letter to Susan Bodine, who started as a special adviser to Pruitt on enforcement ahead of her confirmation to run the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance. A spokesman did not say whether his office had received a response.

WHAT'S NEXT: Dourson's nomination will receive a committee vote alongside other nominees on Wednesday. It is unclear when he will receive a floor vote.

Trump: Russia uranium deal 'biggest story that Fake Media' ignores Back

By Louis Nelson | 10/19/2017 08:11 AM EDT

President Donald Trump complained Thursday that the "fake media doesn't want to follow" news related to an Obama-era sale of uranium deal involving the Russian government, resurfacing an issue he spoke of often on the campaign trail to attack Democrat Hillary Clinton.

"Uranium deal to Russia, with Clinton help and Obama Administration knowledge, is the biggest story that Fake Media doesn't want to follow!" the president wrote online Thursday.

The controversy, which centers around a 2010 sale that put the Russian government in control of more than 20 percent of the U.S. uranium supply, made its way back into the spotlight this week when the Senate Judiciary Committee opened a fresh investigation on the matter. That probe was triggered by a story published by The Hill reporting that the FBI had uncovered Russian nuclear officials were engaged in an array of illegal activities in the U.S., including bribery, extortion and kickbacks.

Trump often used the uranium deal during last year's presidential campaign in an effort to paint Clinton as corrupt, pointing to donations made to the Clinton Global Initiative as an indication that she approved the sale to appease donors.

But while the State Department was one of the agencies involved in approving the uranium deal, both the Clinton campaign and officials from the department have said that the former secretary of state was not involved in the approval process because such matters did not rise to her level within the department.

Two GOP-led panels launch probe of Obama-era uranium deal Back

By Kyle Cheney | 10/24/2017 04:03 PM EDT

Two more Republican-led congressional committees will probe the Obama administration's decision to approve the sale of American uranium production capability to a Russian state-run energy conglomerate, a key GOP lawmaker announced Tuesday.

Rep. Devin Nunes, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said he'd be linking up with the House Oversight panel led by Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.). The Senate Judiciary Committee has already said it would investigate the uranium deal.

The announcement Tuesday is sure to infuriate Democrats, who have generally dismissed the issue as an attempt to distract from the ongoing investigation into Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election. It comes on the same day President Donald Trump visited the Capitol to meet with Senate Republicans and as leaders of the Russian election-meddling probes have signaled the end of those investigations may be nearing.

Nunes' announcement follows reports in recent days suggesting the sale of uranium production facilities to the Russian-run Rosatom came amid a broader bribery plot by Russian officials to gain a foothold in the American energy industry while President Barack Obama was in office.

Republicans have seized on the issue to try to deflect scrutiny over Russia's actions after Democrats have spent months scouring for connections between Trump and the Kremlin. The election-meddling probes, including into whether Moscow had help from any Trump associates, have been a nonstop distraction for the White House and sent Trump into bouts of Twitter rage.

The Obama-era uranium deal was a source of Republican criticism during the 2016 campaign. Republicans latched onto reports showing that one of the parties to the uranium sale was a Clinton Foundation donor. The State Department had a role in approving the deal while Hillary Clinton was secretary of State, though there's no evidence she was personally involved.

Nunes said Rep. Pete King (R-NY), an Intelligence committee member who raised questions about the deal at the time, would be that committee's point person on the new probe.

Nunes remains head of the intelligence panel even though he stepped aside from the Russia probe in April after he raised eyebrows by unexpectedly visiting the White House to brief the president on early findings of the investigation. Democrats claimed his actions compromised the probe at a sensitive juncture.

Reps. Mike Conaway (R-Texas), Gowdy and Tom Rooney (R-Fla.) took over the daily leadership of the Russia investigation. But Nunes has remained involved, tangling recently with Fusion GPS, the firm that commissioned a salacious and disputed dossier about Trump's connections to the Russian government. Nunes recently issued a subpoena to force Fusion to reveal who funded its research, though the company has fought to avoid handing over information.

Flake announces retirement as he denounces Trump Back

By Alex Isenstadt and Kevin Robillard | 10/24/2017 02:51 PM EDT

Embattled Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) will retire after his current term expires, he announced on Tuesday in a decision that further roils a 2018 Senate landscape marked by multiple Republican retirements.

Flake was one of the most vulnerable Republican senators up for reelection next year. A vocal critic of President Donald Trump throughout and since the 2016 campaign, Flake said it became clear that that opposition would make it impossible for him to get through a Republican primary.

He took to the Senate floor to deliver a full-throated denunciation of Trump.

"We must never adjust to the coarseness of our dialogue, with the tone set up at the top," Flake said. "We must never accept the deadly sundering of our country. The personal attacks, threats against principles and freedoms and institutions, and flagrant disregard for decency."

"Reckless, outrageous and undignified behavior has become excused as telling it like it is when it is actually just reckless, outrageous and undignified," Flake continued. "And when such behavior emanates from the top of our government, it is something else. It is dangerous to a democracy."

The decision came with Flake trailing in public polling to former state Sen. Kelli Ward, an arch-conservative endorsed by former White House strategist Steve Bannon who mainstream Republicans consider unelectable in a general election. Rep. Kyrsten Sinema, a progressive-turned-moderate serving her fourth term in Congress, is the likely Democratic candidate in the contest.

"Steve Bannon adds another scalp to his collection," said Andy Surabian, a senior advisor to the pro-Trump nonprofit Great America Alliance and a top ally of Bannon's.

Establishment Republicans said they hoped Flake's retirement would increase their chances of defeating Ward, allowing them to unite behind an establishment candidate without a history of attacking the president, who remains sacrosanct with GOP primary voters.

It's not clear who else might enter the GOP primary, though operatives mentioned state Treasurer Jeff DeWit, Rep. Martha McSally and Rep. David Schweikert as possibilities who could unite both wings of the party. One top Republican strategist said Gov. Doug Ducey would likely play a leading role in finding a candidate.

Flake refused to endorse Trump during the 2016 election, and wrote a book criticizing the president as insufficiently conservative. The continued potshots at the president eroded Flake's own support among GOP primary voters, but he refused to back down and had begun hiring campaign staff, raising additional money and preparing his reelection bid.

"We've taken a banner that is not familiar to us as Republicans. And I don't know how long this will last," Flake told POLITICO in an interview last week, referring to the Trump-led GOP.

Flake informed Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) of his decision earlier Tuesday. "I knew that he was thinking about it but very sorry it's happened," McCain said. "He's one of the most honorable men I've ever known."

Democrats echoed that sentiment, speaking to Flake's popularity in the Senate among members of both parties.

"He is one of the finest human beings I've met in politics. He is moral, upright, and strong and he will be missed by just about everybody in the Senate," Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) said in a statement.

Flake's retirement upends what was pegged as one of the most closely-watched Senate races in 2018, but it's unclear exactly what the effect will be.

Steven Law, the president of the McConnell-aligned Senate Leadership Fund, predicted that Flake's departure would guarantee Ward's defeat.

"The one political upshot of Sen. Flake's decision today is that Steve Bannon's hand-picked candidate, conspiracy-theorist Kelli Ward, will not be the Republican nominee for this Senate seat in 2018," Law said.

A top Republican strategist said Flake's team had been polling the race since the beginning of the year, and had repeatedly found no path to victory in either the GOP primary or the general election. About a month ago, Flake's team delivered that news to the senator, the strategist said, and Flake had been considering retirement ever since.

"He basically lost to all comers," the GOP strategist said. "There wasn't a Republican or a Democrat you could put next to him on the ballot who he wouldn't lose to."

Flake's major problem was with the center of the electorate. Independents were either unfamiliar with Flake or disliked him. While McCain shared Flake's problems with the right wing of his own party, Independents adored McCain, helping him easily win reelection last year over then-Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick.

If Flake's floor speech — and retiring Republican Sen. Bob Corker's scathing criticism of the president earlier Tuesday — was any indication, Trump could be in for a long year of vocal opposition from prominent members of his own party before they leave the Senate.

"I'm aware that there's a segment of my party that believes that anything short of complete and unquestioning loyalty to a president who belongs to my party is unacceptable and suspect," he said. "The notion that one should stay silent as the norms and values that keep America strong are undermined, and as alliances and agreements that ensure the stability of the entire world are routinely threatened by the level of thought that goes into 140 characters — the notion that we should say or do nothing in the face of such mercurial behavior — is ahistoric and profoundly misguided."

Kid Rock: 'F--- no, I'm not running for Senate' Back

By Rebecca Morin | 10/24/2017 10:21 AM EDT

Kid Rock doesn't want his name on a ballot anytime soon.

The multi-genre singer, whose real name is Robert Ritchie, said Tuesday on Howard Stern's SiriusXM show that he was not running for Senate, despite the hype growing around the idea.

"F--- no, I'm not running for Senate. Are you kidding me?" Kid Rock said, according to the Detroit Free Press. "Who couldn't figure that out? I'm releasing a new album. I'm going on tour too."

His new album, "Sweet Southern Sugar," is set to be released on Nov. 3.

Kid Rock said that people in his circle who were "in on the joke" were beginning to take the Senate talks seriously.

He said he would tell them that "no, we're not doing it, but let's roll with it for a while."

Speculation that Kid Rock would run for Senate began circulating over the summer when, among other things, he launched a website, KidRockforSenate.com, and posted statements that he was mulling over a possible Senate bid.

Senate Leadership Fund, a super PAC backed by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, in August expressed support for the musician to take on Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) in 2018.

Trump and Corker hurl insults as GOP strives for unity Back

By Louis Nelson | 10/24/2017 08:47 AM EDT

President Donald Trump and Sen. Bob Corker dramatically escalated their feud on Tuesday, with the president accusing Corker of blocking tax reform efforts and the Tennessee Republican warning Trump that his legacy will be the debasement of America.

The nasty exchanges came ahead of a Capitol Hill lunch between Trump and GOP senators to project unity on an ambitious legislative agenda. While the two men generally avoided each other at the meeting, the rebukes still hung in the air.

Corker set off the latest tiff, appearing on all three major broadcast morning news shows to needle the president and to call on him to "step aside" on tax reform.

Trump punched back on Twitter.

"Bob Corker, who helped President O give us the bad Iran Deal & couldn't get elected dog catcher in Tennessee, is now fighting Tax Cuts," Trump wrote. "Corker dropped out of the race in Tennessee [sic] when I refused to endorse him, and now is only negative on anything Trump. Look at his record!"

Corker quickly responded, lamenting on Twitter the "same untruths from an utterly untruthful president. #AlertTheDaycareStaff." Trump's claim that Corker opted to leave the Senate only after the president refused to endorse him has been disputed repeatedly by the Tennessee Republican's office. In fact, it was Trump, Corker's office has said, who asked the senator to reconsider his retirement.

The spat escalated from there, and captured the civil war that is plaguing the Republican Party despite the GOP's control of both the White House and Congress. Trump has sparred at times with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Dean Heller (R-Nev.), among others.

Flake grabbed his own share of the spotlight on Tuesday, announcing that he would not seek reelection in 2018, and delivering a searing speech on the Senate floor in which he railed against Trump.

"Reckless, outrageous, and undignified behavior has become excused and countenanced as 'telling it like it is,' when it is actually just reckless, outrageous, and undignified," Flake said. "And when such behavior emanates from the top of our government, it is something else: It is dangerous to a democracy."

"Mr. President, I rise today to say: Enough," Flake added.

It's yet to be seen, though, if Flake will join Corker, who is also not seeking reelection in 2018, in taking up the mantle of the senator who consistently punches back against the president.

On NBC's "Today" on Tuesday morning, Corker said, "The best way for us to have a success" on tax reform is for the legislation to be driven by Congress, not the president, a recommendation he said was "based on recent history and just, interactions."

The Tennessee Republican also called Trump's scheduled lunch with Republican senators on Tuesday little more than a "photo op."

Speaking more broadly about the president in an interview on "CBS This Morning," Corker told anchor Charlie Rose that "it appears to be the governing model of this White House to purposefully divide."

Corker then notched up his rhetoric even further during an interview on CNN, saying Trump will most be remembered for "the debasement of our nation."

"At the end of the day, when his term is over, I think the debasing of our nation, the constant non-truth telling, just the name calling, the things — I think the debasement of our nation will be what he'll be remembered most for, and that's regretful," Corker said.

Asked whether he regrets supporting Trump during last year's election, Corker said, "Let's just put it this way: I would not do that again."

Trump continued the back-and-forth, asking his Twitter followers, "isn't it sad that lightweight Senator Bob Corker, who couldn't get re-elected in the Great State of Tennessee, will now fight Tax Cuts plus!"

In another two-post missive, Trump lobbed more criticism, resurrecting a nickname he pinned to the Tennessee Republican weeks earlier: "Sen. Corker is the incompetent head of the Foreign Relations Committee, & look how poorly the U.S. has done. He doesn't have a clue as the entire World WAS laughing and taking advantage of us. People like liddle' Bob Corker have set the U.S. way back. Now we move forward!"

While the war of words built expectations for a face-to-face clash at Tuesday's lunch, Corker called the meeting "uneventful" and that references to the feud did not come up.

He said on MSNBC that his earlier back-and-forth with the president was "to express concerns about, you know, the conduct and just what it means to America and Americans and what it means to the world. But I don't really have any agenda other than responding again to shots across the bow."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, too, downplayed the conflict between Corker and Trump, telling reporters Tuesday afternoon that "I don't have any observation about that." He predicted that Republicans' top priority, tax reform, would be unifying enough to bridge any fractures within the GOP.

The anticlimactic lunch meeting belied a morning of rhetoric from the president's Twitter account that was particularly biting. Corker willingly engaged the president, responding in kind with scathing criticism online and in a flurry of TV news interviews.

While some have feared that Trump's feud with a powerful committee chairman could imperil GOP priorities, including tax reform, House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said Tuesday that the spat between the two men would not alter Republican policy efforts.

"At the end of the day, I know Bob well. Bob is going to vote for Tennessee, he's going to vote for America, he's going to vote for tax reform," Ryan continued at a news conference with House Republican leaders. "So put this Twitter dispute aside," he said.

The relationship between the two men, which had already been on rocky footing, soured further this month as Corker and Trump have lobbed increasingly barbed criticisms at one another through the media. Amid a separate reported spat between Trump and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson in early October, Corker came to the defense of the secretary, telling reporters that Tillerson and other top advisers "help separate the country from chaos."

Trump replied with a Twitter barrage, launching his claim that the senator had opted to retire only once a presidential endorsement had been taken off the table. Trump also said he had rejected Corker as a possible secretary of state and said the senator was "largely responsible for the horrendous Iran Deal!" Corker was quick with a sarcastic retort, writing that "it's a shame the White House has become an adult day care center. Someone obviously missed their shift this morning."

The senator also delivered a scathing review of Trump in an interview with The New York Times, telling the newspaper that the president has behaved "like he's doing 'The Apprentice' or something" and that he could put the U.S. "on the path to World War III."

Corker said on Tuesday morning that he tried being a helpful force to Trump — with little to show for it.

"Many of us, me included, have, you know, tried to, you know — I've intervened, I have had private dinner, you know, been with him on multiple occasions to try to create some kind of aspirational approach, if you will, to the way that he conducts himself, but I don't think that that's possible," Corker said. "He's obviously not going to rise to the occasion as president."

Reid gone from D.C. — but still pulling strings Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti and Burgess Everett | 10/24/2017 05:03 AM EDT

LAS VEGAS — The Senate is done with Harry Reid, but Harry Reid isn't done with politics — not even a little bit.

The 77-year-old ex-Democratic Senate leader has been encouraging multiple Democrats to run for president, he acknowledged to POLITICO in an interview late last week at his work space two miles from the Las Vegas Strip. He skewered the congressional Republicans whom he blames for the rise of Donald Trump. And while insisting he's leaving the daily tactical maneuvering in the Senate to Chuck Schumer after 34 years in Washington, Reid acknowledged dialing and texting with Democratic senators who seek his advice on how to better fight back against Trump.

"I didn't want anyone thinking I was still trying to run the Senate, so I told them I wasn't going to try and run the Senate. I told Schumer: If you need me, you call me anytime, I'm available. I will only call you under circumstances I think I need to. And that's what I've done," he said. "I hope that makes him feel good, that I'm not saying, 'Chuck, why the hell'd you do that?' Or calling [Senate Minority Whip Dick] Durbin and saying, 'Talk to Chuck and tell him, don't do that, that's so dumb.' Or call Schumer and say, 'Tell Durbin to shut up.' I haven't done that."

Long Mitch McConnell's chief tormentor, Reid even went out of his way to give props to the GOP leader's newest nemesis: Ex-White House strategist and current Breitbart leader Steve Bannon, who is recruiting a slate of Republican primary challengers with the explicit aim of removing the Senate majority leader.

"Until the last year or so, I never heard of the man. Now I've heard of him," Reid said of Bannon. "He's obviously very persuasive and extremely smart. Everyone acknowledges he's smart and persuasive."

Ten months after his departure from Washington, Reid has carved out a significant behind-the-scenes advisory role for himself in guiding the future of his party, while strengthening his role as the mastermind of Democratic politics in his home state. He's no longer whipping votes or drawing headlines by knifing Trump: His day job is co-chairing an MGM Resorts-funded think tank with John Boehner.

But Reid is also spending his days working to solidify his legacy here by electing a slate of Democrats in 2018, including Rep. Jacky Rosen in her bid to replace Republican Sen. Dean Heller.

"When I left Washington on Jan. 6, I made a decision: I wasn't going to live in the past, I was going to live in the future," Reid said, sitting in his windowless second-floor office at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas' law school building. "Now, did I really believe it at the time? Not really, but that's what I said to myself."

Yet he's also been taking calls from potential presidential candidates, rising Democratic stars and party eminences who are asking for his guidance. During a recent trip to Washington, where he's in the midst of selling his apartment at the Ritz-Carlton, Reid met with Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, whom he helped bring to the capital in the first place nearly a decade ago.

That's not all, Reid said. In addition to sitting down with Democratic leaders like Nancy Pelosi and Schumer, his schedule also included time with former President Barack Obama, former Vice President Joe Biden, former White House chief of staff Denis McDonough, and John Podesta, the former campaign chairman for Hillary Clinton.

Schumer said he talks to Reid multiple times per month, and the topics range from political advice to casual conversations about their families. "He'll often see something on TV and just call me," said the New Yorker.

Durbin, who speaks to Reid a similar amount, said Reid "never" calls about ongoing Senate business, and is "very careful" to avoid doing anything that could undercut Schumer or confuse the caucus' hierarchy.

The conversations tend to be more quotidian: In one recent chat, Reid called Durbin and said, "Dick, I'm standing in front of a Barnes and Noble. Recommend a book," Durbin said.

When Reid speaks with current senators, he waits to be asked for advice rather than offer it unsolicited, said half a dozen Democratic senators who've spoken with him. When he comes through Washington, he has encouraged the caucus to be bold and outspoken in their resistance to Trump in order to give voters something to support.

Among those on the call list of his rarely holstered iPhone is Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders: The two are still friendly, and a former top Reid aide, Ari Rabin-Havt, is now a senior adviser to the once- and maybe future presidential contender. Reid's first meeting after his POLITICO interview last week was with Sanders' former campaign manager, Jeff Weaver, who was in town for a Democratic National Committee meeting.

Reid also speaks frequently with Warren, with whom he's built a close relationship. (Another former top Reid staffer, former communications director Kristen Orthman, now works for Warren.)

And he often connects with other progressive members of the caucus, including Sens. Brian Schatz of Hawaii and Jeff Merkley of Oregon, who caught Reid's attention with his 15-hour protest of then-Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch in April, as well as his trip to Iowa last month.

Reid acknowledges he's popular among potential presidential hopefuls eager to check in with the longtime political chief of an influential early voting battleground state.

"I am happy to see people wanting to run. That's why, all these people who want to run for president? [It's] good," he said. "They come here and say they're going to run. I say, 'Good, run.' That's what I've told a few of them."

How many? "Enough."

Reid remains polarizing within the party. So his continued activity is frustrating to critics who thought his retirement would mean a full exit from the political scene. Many Sanders allies still accuse him of quietly helping Clinton during 2016's critical Nevada caucuses.

And some Democratic senators who clashed with Reid say they're happy with the switch to Schumer, who has had to focus more on protecting red-state Democrats facing tough reelection battles in 2018.

"Harry didn't talk to me when he was here," said Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia, who had a frosty relationship with Reid and now serves on Schumer's leadership team. "I have more input than I ever had before and I feel good about that."

Reid has an extensive network in Washington through former top aides who now work in influential Senate offices and at groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union (national political director Faiz Shakir) and the Center for American Progress (senior adviser Adam Jentleson). And Reid still works closely with longtime staffer Rebecca Lambe, the top Democratic political operative in Nevada who also works with Senate Democrats' national super PAC, and his former chief of staff Susan McCue, who called him midway through the interview.

But for all his political activity, Reid now deflects when asked about Trump, saying only that the president's tenure has been "by far" worse than he feared during the campaign. How so? "I'm not going to get into that. Other people can talk about that," Reid said.

His ire is reserved for congressional Republicans.

"People are under the false impression that Trump created the Republican Congress. Wrong. They created him, they created him," Reid said. "They did not like Barack Obama, [so] they only came up with two answers: No. 1, we're going to oppose his reelection ... They failed miserably. The other, they get an A-plus. They opposed everything, everything he tried to do for eight years."

Of course, that antipathy goes both ways. "Harry Reid, I think he really poisoned the atmosphere in this place," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas).

The bulk of Reid's work is now focused on bolstering Nevada's shift toward becoming reliably Democratic. Reid, who for years considered himself a red-state Democrat, sees that evolution as a big part of his legacy.

Reid has made the case to national party leaders that his blueprint for Nevada — heavily funding grass-roots organizing and voter registration efforts — should be the model in a targeted set of states, rather than a broader-strokes approach nationwide.

Though Reid headlined a fundraiser for the DNC on Friday, much of this year's activity is focused on ousting Heller, who's taken fire from Democrats as well as Bannon-aligned insurgents on the right.

"I'm a big fan of Jacky Rosen's, I'm doing everything I can to help her," said Reid. "Dean Heller's a nice guy and I'm not going to go out of my way to whack him. There are plenty of others doing that."

He maintains a good relationship with GOP Gov. Brian Sandoval — they kept in touch during this summer's fights over Obamacare repeal, and met just before Sandoval appeared with Heller to oppose one plan in June. But the race to replace Sandoval is just one of several Nevada state races that bear Reid's fingerprints: He's also deeply immersed in elections for secretary of state and Rosen's House seat, among others.

But no matter how often local Republicans portray him as a sinister puppet master, he's not going anywhere. Without the Senate, his friends and former aides say, Reid is now free to roam as a political animal.

"I don't expect him to go away from that," said Sen. Catherine Cortez Masto (D-Nev.), Reid's successor in the Senate, who keeps in close touch with him. "And I don't think he should."

PROGRAMMING NOTE — Due to the July Fourth holiday, Afternoon Energy will not publish on Monday, July 3 and Tuesday, July 4. Our next Afternoon Energy will publish on Wednesday, July 5. Please continue to follow Pro Energy issues here.

COURT: EPA CAN'T BE FORCED TO STUDY COAL JOBS: The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals today said in a 17-page ruling that EPA can't be forced to produce a new, detailed study of how its regulations and enforcement actions affected employment in the coal industry, Alex Guillén reports. The decision effectively reverses a lower court ruling just two days before EPA's deadline to produce the study. "A district court judge in West Virginia last year sided with coal producer Murray Energy in ruling that EPA had failed to comply with Section 321(a) of the Clean Air Act, which says EPA should study how its actions affect employment. That judge ordered EPA to produce a detailed study by July 1."

But today's decision by a panel of three Obama-appointed judges means "the employment studies described in Section 321(a) do not amount to a non-discretionary duty and are not judicially enforceable. The lawsuit should never have been allowed to play out, the 4th Circuit said in vacating the lower court's ruling."

EPA says it'll study jobs anyway: "President Trump's EPA will take the economic and job impacts of its proposed regulations into account consistent with its statutory requirements, regardless of the outcome of this particular case," EPA spokeswoman Amy Graham said in a statement. But Murray still plans to appeal, a company spokesman said. More from Alex here.

PUSHING FOR A VOTE: Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski says she's pressing forward on a floor time for her new energy bill, which has only minor changes from the version that nearly made it across the finish line last year, Anthony Adragna reports. "This is not brand-new stuff," the Senate Energy chairwoman told reporters today. "These are bills that have passed the committee, passed the Senate, passed the House many of them. What we've done is put them in a package and they're ready to go."

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has taken procedural steps to allow the bill to bypass committee, but he has not yet scheduled a floor debate. Murkowski said there had been minor changes to energy efficiency provisions in the bill she introduced Wednesday (S. 1460), particularly to ensure "building codes truly are voluntary." Murkowski said she had some "talking to do with trying to find some time" on the Senate schedule, but the measure won't need to go through the committee process again.

SANCTIONS BILL HEADED TO HOUSE: The Senate is set to ease "a partisan conflict that had delayed House action on a bipartisan package of sanctions on Russia and Iran" as soon as today, POLITICO's Elana Schor reports. "A technical fix to the sanctions bill that was crafted to clear a constitutional concern in the House is in the process of getting cleared for unanimous passage in the Senate, Foreign Relations Chairman Bob Corker and his Democratic counterpart, Maryland Sen. Ben Cardin, said" today.

"That passage would end a delay driven by Democratic suspicion that the House GOP may plan to make more significant changes to a sanctions bill that cleared the Senate with 98 votes — and would place new limits on President Donald Trump." More here.

NRC KEEPS CUTTING ITS FEES: The Nuclear Regulatory Commission is set to trim its annual fees on power plant operators by 7.4 percent compared to last year, according to a notice set to publish in the Federal Register Friday. Regulators have been conducting a campaign to shrink their own budget, 90 percent of which is covered by fees, in part because the nuclear "renaissance" failed to materialize. Year-over-year annual fees on operating reactors, spent fuel storage and reactor decommissioning have gone down in 2015 and 2016 as well. The new fees take effect 60 days from the notice's publication date.

DELAYED AGAIN: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee announced this morning that it will again delay votes on nominees to the NRC and EPA until July 12. EPW had originally slated the markup for Wednesday before rescheduling it to noon today, Darius Dixon reports.

TRADE COMMITTEE RELEASES NAFTA RECS: One of the U.S. government's high-level trade advisory committees placed particular focus on streamlining customs procedures and broadening services trade in 12 pages of recommendations for the renegotiation of NAFTA. "It is time to bring the NAFTA into the 21st Century and to turn it into a high-standards agreement in accordance with the negotiating objectives of the 2015 Trade Promotion Authority," the Advisory Committee for Trade Policy and Negotiations wrote in comments filed Wednesday.

Pro Trade's Adam Behsudi reports: "The committee's recommendations, however, reflected disagreement on a number of points, with labor-group members voicing views that diverged from those held by the majority on data flows, rules of origin, government procurement and investor protections. ... There was broad agreement that a NAFTA do-over should strengthen environment and labor protections." More here.

WIND STILL FACING LOCAL SITING CHALLENGES: A new report by Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory today finds that little has changed when it comes to wind generation in the last three decades. Among other things, while wind generation has generally been viewed favorably in the U.S. over that period, "local wind developments have been challenged by vocal opposition within host communities," the report said.

'TERMINATOR' GOES IN ON CLIMATE CHANGE: While many within the climate change fight have focused on public health for years as a talking point, former Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has taken the effort to another level, California Playbook writes. Schwarzenegger joined Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti for an on-stage talk in Los Angeles on Wednesday, where he suggested the U.S. government should concern itself more with climate change than with ISIS. For a government charged with protecting its residents, he said, "It doesn't make any sense that we're all worried about ... is ISIS going to come to America and all of those kind of things, when in fact we are killing in America over 200,000 people every year."

Of people who reject mainstream climate science, he said, "Now in movies, when you do this, you take those guys who say [carbon] is not a pollutant, and you hook them at the mouth up to an exhaust pipe ... and they find out in a minute."

STUDY: THE COST OF CLIMATE CHANGE: A new study out from Science today finds that in the poorest third of the U.S., economic damages from climate change will cost as much as 20 percent of residents' income. States that will experience the worst damages to their economies will be in the South and lower Midwest. The study also found that overall, climate change will lead to economic losses and restructuring and widening inequality.

MAIL CALL: Reps. John Rutherford and Don Beyer anchor a bipartisan letter signed by more than 100 lawmakers to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, opposing seismic airgun blasting off the Atlantic Coast. The letter focuses on the threats posed to coastal communities, economies, fisheries and marine mammals. They note nearly 1.4 million jobs and over $95 billion in gross domestic product rely on a healthy Atlantic Coast, mostly via fishing, tourism and recreation. Read it here.

— Ranking member Raúl Grijalva and Virginia Rep. Donald McEachin also penned a letter to Trump today urging him to appoint an inspector general at the Department of the Interior. The position has gone without a full appointment for more than eight years. Read it here.

4th Circuit says EPA can't be forced to study coal job losses Back

By Alex Guillén | 06/29/2017 09:12 AM EDT

The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals today said EPA cannot be forced to produce a new, detailed study of how its regulations and enforcement actions affected employment in the coal industry, reversing a lower court just two days before EPA's deadline to produce the study.

A district court judge in West Virginia last year sided with coal producer Murray Energy in ruling that EPA had failed to comply with Section 321(a) of the Clean Air Act, which says EPA should study how its actions affect employment. That judge ordered EPA to produce a detailed study by July 1.

But a panel of three Obama-appointed judges on the 4th Circuit today said in a 17-page ruling that the employment studies described in Section 321(a) do not amount to a non-discretionary duty and are not judicially enforceable. The lawsuit should never have been allowed to play out, the 4th Circuit said in vacating the lower court's ruling.

The law "imposes on the EPA a broad, open-ended statutory mandate," the judges concluded, noting a lack of instruction on how EPA was to carry out the studies or deadlines to meet. "A court is ill-equipped to supervise this continuous, complex process."

EPA revealed in a court filing last month that more than 110 staffers had been assigned to produce the study on time and to create a process for ongoing review.

WHAT'S NEXT: The 4th Circuit's ruling lifts the requirement for EPA to produce the study. It is unclear whether Murray Energy will appeal to the full 4th Circuit or the Supreme Court.

EPA shrugs off coal jobs ruling as Murray promises appeal Back

By Alex Guillén | 06/29/2017 02:57 PM EDT

EPA says it will consider potential coal job losses driven by its regulations as the agency acts, regardless of an appellate court's ruling today freeing the agency from producing a report on how its rules have impacts on coal miners.

"President Trump's EPA will take the economic and job impacts of its proposed regulations into account consistent with its statutory requirements, regardless of the outcome of this particular case," EPA spokeswoman Amy Graham said in an email.

Graham did not clarify whether EPA intends to finish the study despite the ruling, or whether EPA plans to put greater emphasis on economic and job impacts during rulemakings. The Clean Air Act does not require that the job impact studies should necessarily affect EPA's thinking on environmental regulations.

Murray Energy spokesman Gary Broadbent said the company is reviewing the ruling and intends to appeal, although he did not specify whether Murray will seek an en banc review before the full 4th Circuit or if it will go to the Supreme Court.

WHAT'S NEXT: Murray plans to appeal the ruling.

Murkowski: Energy bill ready now for floor action Back

By Anthony Adragna | 06/29/2017 01:35 PM EDT

Senate Energy Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski says she's pushing for floor time for her new energy bill, which has only minor changes from the version that nearly made it across the finish line last year.

"This is not brand-new stuff," the Alaska Republican told reporters today. "These are bills that have passed the committee, passed the Senate, passed the House many of them. What we've done is put them in a package and they're ready to go."

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has taken procedural steps to allow the bill to bypass committee, but he has not yet scheduled a floor debate.

Murkowski said there had been minor changes to energy efficiency provisions in the bill she introduced Wednesday, S. 1460, particularly to ensure "building codes truly are voluntary." Ranking member Maria Cantwell agreed only "minor things" had been changed in the bill.

Senate and House lawmakers pushed until the last minute last December to iron out differences between the bipartisan Senate bill and a House companion that cleared the lower chamber with mostly Republican votes, before Speaker Paul Ryan ultimately pulled the plug on those efforts.

Text of the latest energy package has not yet been released.

WHAT'S NEXT: Murkowski said she had some "talking to do with trying to find some time" on the Senate schedule, but the measure won't need to go through the committee process again.

Senate sends fixed Russia-Iran sanctions bill to House Back

By Elana Schor | 06/29/2017 12:54 PM EDT

The Senate on Thursday approved tweaks to its bipartisan package of sanctions on Russia and Iran, ending a delay of the bill as Democrats prodded the House GOP to quickly pass it in order to put Moscow on notice for its cyber-meddling in last year's election.

The unanimous passage of a technical fix to the sanctions bill eliminates a constitutional concern that had arisen in the House, but does not fully resolve Democratic suspicion that the House GOP may plan to make more significant changes to the legislation.

The Senate approved its sanctions bill two weeks ago on a 98-2 vote, and included new limits on President Donald Trump's ability to lift or ease sanctions on Russia. Before relenting on the tweaks Thursday, Senate Democrats had sought assurances of no further major changes to the upper chamber's version of the bill and balked after failing to receive them, according to a leadership aide.

"I want to put the House on notice: If they water down the bill, weaken the sanctions, add loopholes to the legislation — they will find stiff resistance here in the Senate," Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said on the floor Thursday ahead of the passage of the fixed sanctions measure.

Schumer said that he and Majority Leader Mitch McConnell "worked hard to pass" the new penalties against Moscow in advance of next week's G-20 summit in Germany, where the White House confirmed Thursday that Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin will meet on the sidelines.

The New York Democrat urged Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) to move the now-tweaked sanctions bill through the House in the hours before lawmakers begin leaving Washington on Thursday for a week-long recess. Ryan's office did not respond immediately to a request for comment on that request, which House Republicans are unlikely to meet given time and procedural constraints.

Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Bob Corker told reporters Thursday that he spoke with Ryan the previous night and added that "I still think [the sanctions bill is] going to be taken up as-is when we get back."

The foreign relations panel's top Democrat, Maryland Sen. Ben Cardin, sounded a similar note in a brief interview: "We have an understanding with Republican leadership to move legislation," he said. "There's no guarantees of what's going to happen in the House, but I'm comfortable that they're trying to push a strong bill."

Corker declined to comment on White House plans to ask the House GOP for more Trump-friendly changes to the bill, noting that those decisions were discussed anonymously.

But the Tennessee Republican offered "hope that the delay doesn't create mischief, if you will," because the House will now wait until after next week's recess to take up the sanctions measure.

In addition to its new sanctions against Russia and Iran, the Senate-passed legislation would allow Congress to block Trump from easing or ending penalties against Vladimir Putin's government. Trump and Putin are expected to meet on the sidelines of next week's G-20 summit in Germany, the Kremlin said Thursday.

"I think it's going to become law," Corker said of the sanctions bill.

EPW reschedules NRC, EPA nomination votes to July Back

By Darius Dixon | 06/29/2017 10:10 AM EDT

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee announced this morning that it has delayed votes on nominees to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the EPA.

The votes are now scheduled for July 12. EPW had originally slated the markup for Wednesday before rescheduling it to noon today.

NRC nominees Annie Caputo and David Wright, and EPA nominee Susan Parker Bodine, who has been tapped as assistant administrator of the office of enforcement and compliance assurance, are awaiting committee approvals.

Lawmakers will also consider legislation to reauthorize and tweak aspects of EPA's popular brownfields program and a bill reauthorizing the Diesel Emissions Reduction Act, which helps retrofit diesel-powered equipment.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPW has rescheduled the markup for the morning of July 12.

Top-level trade advisory committee lays out NAFTA recommendations Back

By Adam Behsudi | 06/29/2017 11:06 AM EDT

The U.S. government's senior advisory committee representing agriculture, labor groups, manufacturing and services firms issued 12 pages of recommendations for the renegotiation of NAFTA, placing particular focus on streamlining customs procedures and broadening services trade.

"It is time to bring the NAFTA into the 21st Century and to turn it into a high-standards agreement in accordance with the negotiating objectives of the 2015 Trade Promotion Authority," the Advisory Committee for Trade Policy and Negotiations wrote in its comments, filed Wednesday.

The committee's recommendations, however, reflected disagreement on a number of points, with labor-group members voicing views that diverged from those held by the majority on data flows, rules of origin, government procurement and investor protections. The labor members also said they "sharply disagree" with the assessment that NAFTA led to growth in jobs and wages.

At the same time, a majority of committee members said they "caution against making the mistake of trying to use NAFTA to achieve goals that are beyond its reach, such as reducing the bilateral trade deficit with Mexico."

There was broad agreement that a NAFTA do-over should strengthen environment and labor protections. Mexico's shortcomings on labor rights were recognized as one of the factors fueling movement of production and jobs south of the border. "These provisions should be updated and implemented prior to the entry into force of any commercial provisions that an updated NAFTA agreement might incorporate," the comments state.

The members also reached consensus over the need to use the trade deal to tackle climate change. They recommended new commitments to expand renewable energy and eliminate fossil fuel subsidies by 2025.

06/29/2017 11:07 AM EDT

CALIFORNIA PLAYBOOK -- per David Siders and Carla Marinucci -- Proponents of climate change policies have tried in recent years to focus public attention on the immediate health effects of an especially hazardous class of pollutants, including black carbon, finding the long-term consequences of rising temperatures insufficiently compelling for the electorate at large.

Leave it to former Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to take the effort to another level. Joining Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti for an on-stage talk in Los Angeles on Wednesday, the former California governor suggested the U.S. government should concern itself more with climate change than ISIS.

For a government charged with protecting its residents, he said, "It doesn't make any sense that we're all worried about ... is ISIS going to come to America and all of those kind of things, when in fact we are killing in America over 200,000 people every year."

There are other, more violent ways that the movie star could be persuasive. Of people who reject mainstream climate science, he said, "Now in movies, when you do this, you take those guys who say [carbon] is not a pollutant, and you hook them at the mouth up to an exhaust pipe ... and they find out in a minute." <http://politi.co/1N8zdJU>

FLORIDA PLAYBOOK -- per Marc Caputo -- The Senate's Trumpcare bill is polling abysmally (with support at just 12%, 16%, 18%, 27% or 35% depending on the survey yesterday). But the effort to bring it to a vote isn't over. To undermine opposition, Sen. Marco Rubio is pushing back against the Congressional Budget Office's analysis, which damaged the bill's prospects in estimating 22 million more people would go uninsured. Rubio called some of CBO's math a "joke" and "deeply flawed" during one of his Facebook Live fireside-like chats. A partial transcript:

FUNKY BASELINE — Rubio: "They [CBO analysts] are comparing the Senate bill to Obamacare. Here's the problem. They are comparing it to Obamacare from March of 2016. That is not an accurate baseline. In just the last year, premiums have increased, less companies are in the marketplace, people have dropped out of coverage or lost coverage. ... So when you say that 15 million people are losing coverage in the next two years, compared to what? Because they're comparing it to something that doesn't exist. They're comparing it to what they thought Obamacare would do a year ago. But it's been worse than what they projected. So that baseline has to be reset."

EXPANSION 'JOKE' — Rubio: "5 of those 15 million [who would lose insurance], are people that they believe are going to lose coverage because states are going to expand [Medicaid]. And then those states are going to have to kick people off in 2026. So here's what they're basically saying ... 'The State of Texas and the State of Florida are going to expand Medicaid. They didn't do it now. But all of a sudden, Florida and Texas are going to expand Medicaid. And we're going to add a bunch of people onto Medicaid. And then in four years we're going to kick all of them off.' And that's how we get to 5 million. That's a joke. How do they know? How does their computer know what decision these state leaders are going to make? Did they talk to the state leaders? Because Florida has already decided they're not expanding. And I promise you, Texas is not expanding. And yet somehow, they throw this number out there [as] if it's accurate."

OTTOMLINE — Rubio: "Any CBO score based on a projection that Florida and Texas are going to expand Medicaid, and then kick people off, is flawed. And any CBO score that's based on what Obamacare looked like in March of 2016 is deeply flawed. Because it's a lot worse off today than it was in March of 2016. ... You can't have an honest debate about the future of healthcare in America and how to reform it, if we're not operating on the facts as our baseline. And a lot of that depends on how this is being reported."

RUBIO'S RHETORICAL LEGERDEMAIN — In pushing back against CBO and chiding the press for "regurgitating" its score, Rubio manages to say little about the bill itself. He also paints a rosier picture of the future than is likely when it comes to Medicaid by saying "As long as Florida keeps the same amount of funding or gets an increase ... there is no reason for anybody to be losing any of their current benefits under Medicaid." But how does that happen when Trumpcare cuts $772 billion in federal money from Medicaid over a decade? CBO says federal "spending on the program would decline in 2026 by 26 percent." But Florida's Medicaid program has grown 52 percent in enrollment (to an estimated 4.1 million recipients) and 47 percent in cost (to $26.3 billion in state and federal money) during the fiscal year that begins July 1 (Saturday). A 26 percent cut in federal money in 2026 would deeply affect eligibility and services. <http://politi.co/1OC2BLg>

MASSACHUSETTS PLAYBOOK -- per Lauren Dezenski -- As the holiday weekend approaches, potential Senate candidate Geoff Diehl is rallying his troops. First, he's entreating supporters to open their wallets a little wider ahead of Friday's fundraising deadline for the second quarter, saying it's "vital to our campaign momentum that I file a strong report," in a fundraising email.

That's hardly hyperbole — Diehl has previously said the strength of his fundraising in the spring and beginning of the summer will determine whether or not he officially challenges Sen. Elizabeth Warren. "I know it may seem really early, but Elizabeth Warren has a huge war chest," the email continues. "Moreover, she turns every issue into a fundraising plea to build up her funds."

Diehl's folks plan to deploy over the holiday weekend, too — sporting freshly inked "The Real Diehl" t-shirts at parades south of Boston in Braintree, Randolph, Plymouth, Duxbury and Wakefield. <http://politi.co/1KQBHPp>

NEW YORK PLAYBOOK -- per Jimmy Vielkind and Azi Paybarah -- Assemblywoman Nicole Malliotakis was on her way to Albany when she learned she had become the presumptive Republican mayoral nominee, after her challenger in the primary, real estate executive Paul Massey, announced he was dropping out because he "hadn't caught fire" and couldn't finance the effort any longer. This sets the stage for a scenario few imagined before Errol Louis wrote about it last month: "A Republican ticket of young black and Latino citywide candidates ..." Councilman Eric Ulrich is trying to alter those plans, urging Republican Party leaders to take a second look at Bo Dietl, whom they blocked from entering their contest after his remarks about the mayor's wife.

Malliotakis' role as a legislator will highlight Albany's control over New York City policies, like mayoral control and taxes. As our Jimmy Vielkind and Nick Niedzwiadek reported, Malliotakis and her Albany colleagues voted late last night on an omnibus bill late to extend mayoral control for two years as part of an "extraordinary" special session. (She told NY1 last night Bill de Blasio's problem is he spent too much money on education bureaucracy.) Malliotakis' record as a legislator in Albany for the past seven years — and how it affected the five boroughs — will now be under scrutiny. She also is a Republican who voted for Donald Trump this past November and defends a number of the policies that de Blasio says hurt New York City, like his threats to cut some federal security aid to "sanctuary cities."

ILLINOIS PLAYBOOK -- per Natasha Korecki -- Via Kevin Robillard -- The 400 major conservative donors who gathered this weekend at the Broadmoor Resort in Colorado Springs for the annual seminar run by the Koch Brothers' network were treated to entertainment, wonky policy discussion and quite a few jokes at Illinois' expense, even though the state's GOP governor, Bruce Rauner, attended the most recent Koch gathering in January. On Saturday night, at a dinnertime panel with two other governors, Missouri Gov. Eric Greitens bragged about passing a right-to-work law and declared: "One of the great things about being governor of Missouri is Illinois is right next door." The crowd laughed, and Greitens went on to suggest he could lure businesses to the other side of the Mississippi. And during a Monday panel on tax reform, Rauner ally Ken Griffin laughed along with the crowd when other panelists made jokes about the state's high taxes and general dysfunction. No one ever mentioned Rauner by name, but the jokes made clear the network's well-heeled donors still see Illinois as a liberal bastion, GOP governor or not — and no one stepped up to defend Rauner. <http://politi.co/1KIZXzz>

NEW JERSEY PLAYBOOK -- per Matt Friedman -- It's budget day and there's still no deal on the Horizon legislation, which — unless either Speaker Prieto, Senate President Sweeney or Gov. Christie backs down — the passage of the state budget depends on.

There are all kinds of things that could happen. Could a coalition of Democrats and Republicans rise up and try to force a vote on the Horizon bill, which, by the way, hasn't even been introduced in the Assembly yet? It would take a supermajority of 60 votes to even get it on the floor.

A big question is whether Prieto can get the 41 votes he needs for the budget if he doesn't pass the Horizon bill. That came up during a conference call of Democratic leaders. Ousting Prieto, I'm told, did not come up in the call. But there's been chatter, and you can't rule it out when a situation gets this dire. Even if most Democrats oppose ousting Prieto, it wouldn't be impossible for some of them to cut a deal with Republicans. (Prieto spokesman Phil Swibinski projected an "all is fine" vibe in a tweet last night about a Prieto fundraiser in Essex County.)

There are so many moving parts, and so many rumors flying around. Everyone tells me no one wants to shut down the government. But in my 10 years covering Trenton (I started the year after the 2006 shutdown), this is the worst deadlock I've seen. <http://politi.co/1WdOXgU>

Senate GOP likely to miss Friday deadline on Obamacare repeal Back

By Burgess Everett, Seung Min Kim and Sarah Karlin-Smith | 06/29/2017 11:45 AM EDT

Senate Republicans are increasingly unlikely to reach agreement on a new version of their Obamacare repeal measure by their self-imposed Friday deadline, as key senators engaged in a furious round of dealmaking.

GOP senators were close to a potential agreement to retain some of the taxes in Obamacare, including the so-called net investment income tax that levels a surcharge on some high-income earners. That would appeal to moderate holdouts, but likely would turn off conservatives who are pushing to dismantle as much of the 2010 law as possible, including its taxes.

"There's a significant amount of interest among, I would say, a good group of members for retaining that for some purpose," South Dakota Sen. John Thune, the third-ranking Senate Republican, said in an interview. But on how many conservatives would be lost if that tax was kept, Thune added: "It's not a big number, but it's enough."

Meanwhile, key Republicans have secured a new infusion of cash for the opioid crisis. But while McConnell's team might be able to satisfy more centrist GOP senators with additional funding, conservatives remain a huge headache, according to senators and aides.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and his allies are still pushing to gut Obamacare's regulatory structure, but Republican sources doubt that the Senate parliamentarian will allow it. That raises a key question: Can the party's right flank support what's going to amount to only a partial repeal of the law?

One Republican senator was "less optimistic" about meeting the Friday deadline, adding: "I'd be surprised if we get something done by Friday."

As he entered the office of Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) — where key holdouts have been cycling through in recent days during the fast-paced negotiations — on Thursday morning, Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) confirmed the party is leaning toward maintaining Obamacare's tax on wealthy individuals' investments. The GOP would then reallocate that money to help more people from low-income households pay for insurance, although Thune said some Republicans want to use those funds for deficit-reduction purposes instead.

No final decision has been made, Republicans said, but the party is leaning strongly toward reshaping the bill to be less of a tax cut for the wealthy and more to supplying health insurance options to the working poor.

"We are going to figure out a way, I believe, before Friday comes, to greatly enhance the ability of lower-income Americans to buy health insurance on the exchanges that actually covers them. And my sense is the [investment tax] is going to go away," Corker said. "It's not an acceptable proposition to have a bill that increases the burden on lower-income citizens and lessens the burden on wealthy citizens."

Killing or delaying the tax cuts will give the party significantly more money to play with and potentially change the optics of a bill portrayed by Democrats and some GOP critics as a tax cut for the rich at the expense of curtailing benefits for the poor.

The "net investment tax" imposes a 3.8 percent charge on some investments by people who make more than $250,000 a year, in addition to the capital gains tax. Centrist and dealmaking senators are ready to scrap it to take away critics' ammunition.

Corker and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) have both raised the issue in party lunches, Republicans said.

Republicans also are considering keeping a Medicare tax increase from Obamacare that their initial bill would cut. Combined, retaining the investment tax and Medicare tax could give the party more than $200 billion to invest in health care, on top of the $188 billion in savings the GOP has to spend from its initial Congressional Budget Office score this weekend.

"I am" open to keeping the net investment tax, said Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.). "But only if it's part of a plan that works, not just simply growing government for revenue purposes."

Sen. Ron Johnson, a conservative holdout who has pushed for rolling back even more of Obamacare, signaled he would nevertheless be willing to consider keeping the investment tax around.

"If we're retaining the benefit we ought to have the funding mechanisms," he said in an interview.

But conservatives such as Sen. Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania and Rand Paul of Kentucky signaled that keeping the tax would be a potential deal breaker.

"I'm for repealing Obamacare, which includes all the taxes in Obamacare," Paul told reporters.

"I expect that we'll be repealing all of the taxes in Obamacare," Toomey said.

McConnell met with a bevy of senators privately over the past two days, including conservatives like Cruz and moderates like Lisa Murkowski of Alaska.

"One of the things the working group said at the outset is that we will not set any artificial deadlines. We would keep working until we reached an agreement," Cruz said after leaving McConnell's office.

Movement on the party's tax cuts follows a Wednesday evening offer among White House and congressional negotiators. That plan would deliver $45 billion to fight opioid addiction and establish health savings accounts that would allow people to pay for insurance premiums with pre-tax money, aimed at moderates and conservatives, respectively.

Still, it was unclear whether the opioid money would be enough to win over wavering senators from the center. When asked about the additional funds, Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) responded: "I'm not there yet. I know that."

The frenzied atmosphere is a last-ditch attempt by McConnell and his lieutenants to salvage a bill that will no longer be considered this week, despite initial vows by leadership that a vote would occur regardless of the outcome.

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said he hopes Republicans can reach an agreement by Friday. Part of the difficulty, Cornyn said, is receiving a new score from CBO which he said is using a "Ouija board ... to predict the future." The Senate cannot vote without a CBO score.

"We're continuing to have conversations," Cornyn said. "I know it's aggravating to the press corps because there isn't really anything to report."

Jennifer Haberkorn and Adam Cancryn contributed to this report.

Tillerson blows up at top White House aide Back

By Josh Dawsey, Eliana Johnson and Alex Isenstadt | 06/28/2017 08:04 PM EDT

Secretary of State Rex Tillerson's frustrations with the White House have been building for months. Last Friday, they exploded.

The normally laconic Texan unloaded on Johnny DeStefano, the head of the presidential personnel office, for torpedoing proposed nominees to senior State Department posts and for questioning his judgment.

Tillerson also complained that the White House was leaking damaging information about him to the news media, according to a person familiar with the meeting. Above all, he made clear that he did not want DeStefano's office to "have any role in staffing" and "expressed frustration that anybody would know better" than he about who should work in his department — particularly after the president had promised him autonomy to make his own decisions and hires, according to a senior White House aide familiar with the conversation.

The episode stunned other White House officials gathered in chief of staff Reince Priebus' office, leaving them silent as Tillerson raised his voice. In the room with Tillerson and DeStefano were Priebus, top Trump aide Jared Kushner and Margaret Peterlin, the secretary of state's chief of staff.

The encounter, described by four people familiar with what happened, was so explosive that Kushner approached Peterlin afterward and told her that Tillerson's outburst was completely unprofessional, according to two of the people familiar with the exchange, and told her that they needed to work out a solution.

"Colleagues are capable of frank exchanges," said R.C. Hammond, a State Department spokesman, when asked about the disagreement. "Evaluating nominees did get off to a slow start, but it is now moving along at a pretty good clip."

It was the loudest manifestation yet of how frustrated Tillerson is in his new role. He has complained about White House attempts to push personnel on him; about the president's tweets; and about the work conditions in a West Wing where he sometimes finds loyalty and competence hard to come by. Above all, the former ExxonMobil CEO, accustomed to having the final word on both personnel and policy in his corporate life, has balked at taking orders from political aides younger and less experienced than he is.

Disputes between the White House and a Cabinet secretary, particularly over personnel, aren't unusual. The Obama White House told Hillary Clinton that her friend Sidney Blumenthal couldn't join her at the State Department. Other secretaries in Trump's Cabinet have also clashed with DeStefano, who has a difficult job balancing White House requests, political considerations and headstrong Cabinet secretaries, many with executive experience.

"It's very common that there would be some tensions and some tussles between the White House and departments or agencies about senior personnel decisions," said Matthew Waxman, a senior official in the State Department and National Security Council under President George W. Bush. "It's just very abnormal that these issues wouldn't be worked out more quickly."

Waxman, now a professor at Columbia University, said the fights are likely harder for a Cabinet secretary like Tillerson, who is accustomed to supreme control as a CEO. "But we have a system of government where political appointments run very, very deep," he said. "It's the way the system works. The White House has the final say."

Tillerson's frustration with White House meddling began early and has been a persistent issue. "He went into this with a very negative attitude towards the White House," said a former senior State Department official familiar with his thinking, who recounted that during the transition, Tillerson opposed a candidate proposed by Trump's team simply on the grounds that Trump's team was proposing him.

He has sometimes conducted talks with potential job candidates without telling the White House, said one person familiar with his actions. Tillerson has told senior officials that Trump promised him autonomy, and that he wanted it, according to people who have spoken to him.

"Rex is a 65-year-old guy who worked his way up from the bottom at Exxon, and he chafes at the idea of taking orders from a 38-year-old political operative," said a former transition aide who worked closely with Tillerson.

DeStefano worked for years as a senior adviser to former House Speaker John Boehner before he joined the Trump administration, where he has struggled to fill thousands of jobs across the government, though the pace has quickened in recent weeks.

White House spokesman Michael Short blamed some of the staffing delays on "obstruction" from Senate Democrats and said that many diplomatic positions need careful vetting.

"The meeting was productive and there was consensus on the topic of staffing, which is moving forward more quickly," Short added.

Where Tillerson is concerned, the frustration goes both ways. Many of his proposed nominees have been rejected by DeStefano's Office of Presidential Personnel either because they are Democrats or because they are Republicans who were critical of Trump during the campaign. Though Brian Hook, the State Department's director of policy planning, told associates several weeks ago that the department had several people in the pipeline, few have been announced since, and the White House continues to resist Tillerson's choices.

He's also faced resistance to leaning on civil servants. Tillerson has expressed his desire to nominate Susan Thornton, a career foreign service officer now serving as the acting assistant secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, to take over the job in an official capacity — a move White House staffers have resisted, saying they want a political person in the role.

"If the secretary is putting forward a nominee such as Susan, he is doing it because he believes she's the most qualified and best fit for the position," said Tillerson spokesman Hammond. "In this particular case, he has the experience of working with her, since she has been on the job since February. That includes a trip to Beijing, a visit from the Chinese president to Mar-a-Lago, and the first of a series of four dialogues."

The secretary has additionally clashed with the White House over ambassadors, according to several people familiar with the conversations, and some of the conversations are ongoing.

Tillerson has also drawn criticism for isolating himself — with the help of Peterlin, his chief of staff — in his office on the State Department's seventh floor and for excluding many career diplomats from the policymaking process. That has frustrated the White House because even the president's senior aides have had difficulty reaching him at times.

His leadership of the State Department seems a vast departure from his stewardship of Exxon, where he was considered a kinder, gentler executive than his predecessor, the combative and bombastic Lee Raymond. Asked about how to lead a large organization during a time of crisis, he told students at his alma mater, the University of Texas, early last year: "You do have to communicate in times like this and you have to be visible."

Republicans condemn Trump for crude tweets about 'Morning Joe' host Back

By Kelsey Tamborrino and Nolan D. McCaskill | 06/29/2017 09:25 AM EDT

Republican lawmakers on Thursday swiftly rebuked President Donald Trump for crudely claiming that "Morning Joe" co-host Mika Brzezinski was "bleeding badly from a face-lift," saying such tweets are beneath the office of the president.

In a two-part tweet, Trump said he "heard poorly rated @Morning_Joe speaks badly of me (don't watch anymore)." He then went on to hit Brzezinski: "how come low I.Q. Crazy Mika, along with Psycho Joe, came ... to Mar-a-Lago 3 nights in a row around New Year's Eve, and insisted on joining me. She was bleeding badly from a face-lift. I said no!"

The messages, some of the most graphic and personal since Trump became president, were condemned by Republicans who are struggling to push Trump's legislative agenda forward while the White House is consumed by the Russia probes and self-inflicted dramas.

"Obviously, I don't see that as an appropriate comment," House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said Thursday during his weekly press conference, adding, "Look, what we're trying to do around here is improve the tone, the civility of the debate, and this obviously doesn't help do that."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) went further, tweeting, "Mr. President, your tweet was beneath the office and represents what is wrong with American politics, not the greatness of America."

Graham later told POLITICO that Trump's insult was "highly inappropriate" regardless of any impact it might have on distracting from the GOP agenda. Asked if the president should apologize, Graham said, "I would, if I were" Trump.

The tweets echo some of Trump's attacks from the campaign trail, during which he went after then-Fox News host Megyn Kelly after the first debate by saying, "You could see there was blood coming out of her eyes, blood coming out of her wherever."

But the messages take on a new tenor now that Trump is in the Oval Office, and is trying to pull off big legislative lifts — including an Obamacare repeal bill and tax reform package — that require message discipline.

White House spokeswoman Sarah Huckabee Sanders quickly defended the tweets, explaining the president fights back when he feels the criticism toward him is unwarranted.

"Look, I don't think that the president's ever been someone who gets attacked and doesn't push back," Sanders told Fox News on Thursday morning. "There have been an outrageous number of personal attacks, not just to him but to frankly everyone around him. ... This is a president who fights fire with fire and certainly will not be allowed to be bullied by liberal media or liberal elites in Hollywood or anywhere else."

Sanders said she personally has been attacked on "Morning Joe" on matters that have nothing to do with her beliefs, ideology or policy. "I have seen far worse things [than the tweets] come out of that show," she said.

The first lady's office responded to the president's tweet through a spokeswoman who reiterated what Melania Trump said in an April 2016 speech.

"As the First Lady has stated publicly in the past, when her husband gets attacked, he will punch back 10 times harder," Stephanie Grisham, Melania Trump's communications director, said in a statement.

But there's evidence that the public is frustrated with the president's Twitter use. More than 6-in-10 registered voters say Trump should stop tweeting, including 49 percent of Republicans, according to a Quinnipiac University poll conducted ahead of Trump's latest attack and released Thursday.

And some Republicans in Congress said Trump crossed a line with his vulgar message.

Following a hearing on U.S. Capitol Police, Republican Sen. James Lankford said in a statement that the president "should model civility, honor, and respect in our political rhetoric. The President's tweets today don't help our political or national discourse and do not provide a positive role model for our national dialogue."

Unlike other Republicans who in the past have vocalized their opposition to Trump's actions, Lankford isn't a notably frequent Trump critic.

Republican Sen. Ben Sasse, who is a frequent critic, tweeted: "Please just stop. This isn't normal and it's beneath the dignity of your office."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi agreed, telling reporters that what Trump tweeted was "so blatantly sexist" and "really saddens me because it is so beneath the dignity of the president of the United States to engage in such behavior."

She also blasted her Republican colleagues who haven't condemned the president's rhetoric. "The Republicans, they can tolerate almost anything — a candidate beating up a reporter and then cheering him on as he arrives in Congress, the tweets of the president of the United States," she said at her weekly news conference. "They set a low standard for public officials in terms of their demeanor."

Trump's tweet dominated the conversation on a day when the House was scheduled to vote on two immigration bills, the Senate was focused on getting its Obamacare repeal legislation back on track, and part of the administration's travel ban was set to be enforced Thursday evening. The White House had also designated this "energy week," with Trump scheduled to deliver remarks at an energy event at the Energy Department.

Republicans expressed frustration that the president's tweets do nothing to further the GOP agenda.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who is among the Republican holdouts on the health care bill, tweeted: "This has to stop - we all have a job - 3 branches of gov't and media. We don't have to get along, but we must show respect and civility." Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), another skeptic of the GOP health bill, tweeted, "Stop it! The Presidential platform should be used for more than bringing people down."

Conservative commentator Laura Ingraham sent out a tweet chastising the White House's message discipline: "Today ALL comms coming out of WH shd be focused on #KatesLaw and #NoSanctuaryforCriminalsAct -- not cable TV hosts."

GOP strategist Rick Tyler, a former communications aide to Texas Sen. Ted Cruz's White House bid, told POLITICO that Trump's tweets have "zero benefit" and criticized the administration's defense of them as "childish."

"Republicans will arrive at the 2018 elections with absolutely no accomplishments and nothing to run on," Tyler said. "In order to effect large-scale public policy change through legislation, you have to have a communications strategy to convince the country that the direction you're going is somewhere they'd like to go."

While Trump's attack on Thursday morning provoked a big response, the "Morning Joe" hosts have a notorious love-hate relationship with the president. During the 2016 campaign, Trump was a frequent call-in guest to the show and as recently as March retained Joe Scarborough's advice on matters before addressing Congress. But the MSNBC show has also faced criticism for being too cozy with the administration.

In a Vanity Fair report from May on the co-hosts' recent engagement, the couple acknowledged meeting with the president more than a week after his inauguration, where Trump reportedly suggested they have their wedding at Mar-a-Lago or the White House. According to Scarborough, Trump even suggested he could be the one to marry them.

Scarborough and Brzezinski have since become increasingly critical of the president, and Trump has repeatedly attacked them on Twitter, but Thursday's messages marked a new low.

Brzezinski responded to Trump shortly after his tweets on Thursday with her own post of a Cheerios box detailing a child and the slogan "Made For Little Hands" — a seemingly pointed reference to the campaign trail during which Trump's hand size was often targeted.

MSNBC, meanwhile, was direct and unsparing in its criticism.

"It's a sad day for America when the president spends his time bullying, lying and spewing petty personal attacks instead of doing his job," an MSNBC spokesperson said, echoing a similar sentiment from the organization's spokesman Mark Kornblau, who tweeted that he "never imagined a day when I would think to myself, 'it is beneath my dignity to respond to the President of the United States.'"

It was not immediately clear what specific comments set off the Twitter attacks this morning, but Brzezinski did hit the president this morning on "lying ... and destroying the country."

"Nothing makes a man feel better than making a fake cover of a magazine about himself, lying every day and destroying the country," Brzezinski said in reference to a Washington Post

Also, on Tuesday's episode of "Morning Joe," Brzezinski and Scarborough went back and forth on Trump's hand size and his onslaught of media-focused tweets of late.

"That's a very small person," Brzezinski said.

"I work in cable news and I can tell you that's sad, pathetic. Think bigger," Scarborough countered, adding that while the "worst health care strategy ever" rages, Trump's talking about the media.

"Keep on being small," Brzezinski said.

"Tiny. That's the word," Scarborough corrected.

On the campaign trail, the president was often criticized for his treatment of women, most notably after the infamous "Access Hollywood" tape in which Trump can be heard bragging about sexually assaulting women.

And in a bizarre moment on Tuesday, while on the phone with Ireland's new prime minister, Trump called forward an Irish journalist to comment on her smile.

Despite the furor around his tweets on Thursday, Trump did get some support outside of the White House. Fox News primetime host and frequent Trump defender Sean Hannity tweeted various links to "Morning Joe"-related coverage. "Maybe liberal Joe should stop calling the @POTUS a schmuck, a liar, a thug and mentally unhinged. Were they kissing @POTUS ass at xmas? Yes," he tweeted.

Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) also appeared to defend the president, noting that he's dealing with an adversarial news media.

"The media is salting him every day," Shelby said. "I guess he's fighting back."

Other lawmakers, however, said they were trying to tune it out.

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) said he didn't want to talk about the president's tweets because he's trying to "stay positive."

"If you don't have something nice to say, say nothing at all," Johnson said.

"The American people need us to be focused on health care and tax reform, not Twitter fights and cable news," Sen. Tim Scott (R-S.C.) said on Twitter.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who unsuccessfully ran for president in 2016, summarized Trump's comments in three words: "Inappropriate. Undignified. Unpresidential."

Thursday morning's tweetstorm also fits into Trump's recently stepped-up crusade against the media in which he has targeted other outlets that he believes are publishing unfair coverage of his administration.

Trump attacked The Washington Post on Wednesday, complaining that the "fake news" newspaper was protecting Amazon from tax liabilities with its coverage.

Representatives for Brzezinski and Scarborough did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

HOUSE ENERGY SPENDING BILL OUT: The House Appropriations Committee today released its fiscal 2018 energy and water spending bill. Overall, the $37.56 billion bill cuts $209 million from this year's spending levels, but comes in $3.65 billion above President Donald Trump's budget request, according to a committee release. DOE's energy programs receive $9.6 billion, down $1.7 billion from this year but $2.3 billion more than Trump asked for. The bill would keep spending on science programs level with this year and includes funding for Yucca Mountain, among other provisions.

On the chopping block: House appropriators are endorsing Trump's call to eliminate the popular Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy, and their bill would bar DOE from issuing future loan guarantees, Nick Juliano reports. DOE's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy would see its funding cut nearly in half, while offices for fossil and nuclear energy see much smaller cuts.

EPA ANNOUNCES WOTUS REPEAL: EPA today released its proposed rule to undo the Obama administration's landmark water regulation cementing federal protections for smaller streams and wetlands. The proposal would repeal the 2015 Waters of the U.S. rule and reinstate an older process EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers used to determine where the Clean Water Act applies, Annie Snider reports. A copy of the Trump administration proposal is here.

PERRY: DOE STUDY WILL HAVE EYE TOWARD COAL: Energy Secretary Rick Perry said the grid reliability study his department is undergoing will highlight ways to reverse policies, he claimed, were motivated by a desire to harm the coal industry. While speaking at the Energy Information Administration annual conference, Perry didn't specifically mentioned the Obama administration, but made clear that he would pursue a different course.

"Over the last few years, grid experts have expressed concern about the erosion of critical baseload resources, specifically how it is dispatched and compensated," he said. "These are politically driven policies driven by a hostility to coal." Trump, Perry and other Cabinet secretaries have questioned climate science and vowed to reinvigorate the coal industry, Eric Wolff points out.

CALLING ON GRID RENEWABLES: FERC Commissioner Colette Honorable hit back today, saying renewable generation hasn't harmed the reliability of the grid and instead said she'd like to see more growth. "Do I have to recognize and be attendant to supporting different way renewables work? I say yes, but I have seen no problems with reliability," Honorable said during a Q&A at the EIA conference. "Bring on more renewables."

Coal and nuclear plants' problems are "less about regulation, more about economics," Honorable noted in her remarks, which followed Perry's. More here.

PRUITT BUDGET HEARING HAS FEW FIREWORKS: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt avoided the same level of Republican scolding over EPA's proposal to slash its budget during a Senate hearing this morning that he received two weeks ago from House appropriators. It may have helped that only two Republicans showed up to question him — spending subcommittee Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski and Montana's Steve Daines. Both praised Pruitt for rolling back regulations they disliked, but both also offered stern words about the budget's cuts to their favored programs.

"I don't believe that we can achieve the level of budget cuts proposed," Murkowski told Pruitt, pointing in particular to cuts targeting Alaska Native Villages, targeted airshed grants and a radon program. Daines questioned the 31 percent cut to Superfund clean-ups, noting his state is home to 19 Superfund sites. Pruitt said better management could make up for a smaller budget.

Sidestepping on science advice: Pruitt dodged questions from Chris Van Hollen about last night's New York Times article that said his chief of staff, Ryan Jackson, tried to alter recent testimony given by scientist Deborah Swackhamer about the Board of Scientific Counselors. "I've not read the article," Pruitt said, with Jackson sitting directly behind him. He offered to turn over any related communications to senators, and said BOSC members were free to reapply for spots on the panel.

Regionally speaking: Pruitt promised that he would work to bring permanent administrators to the agency's 10 regions, jobs that do not require Senate confirmation but are critical to overseeing field work and liaising with states. "I believe we're making progress and I'm hopeful we'll have regional administrators in place soon," Pruitt said.

Gone fishin': Pruitt also promised Murkowski that any public comment period on EPA's proposal to withdraw its previous work on Pebble Mine won't fall exclusively during Alaska's intensely busy fishing season. Murkowski noted that Bristol Bay fishers are working "20 to 24" hours a day from now through August, and expressed concern that a 60-day comment period, which has yet to begin, would preclude those fishers from commenting. Pruitt promised to "make sure all voices are heard," and said he would make the comment period "90 days or whatever" to accomplish that.

ROSNEFT HIT BY CYBERATTACK: Russian petroleum company Rosneft confirmed via Twitter today that "a massive hacker attack has hit the servers of the company." POLITICO Europe's Laurens Cerulus reports the ransomware attack is spreading across Europe, similar to the outbreak of global malware WannaCry last month, and seems to be making its way through Europe's energy and transport companies. Computers affected by the malware show messages asking people to pay $300 worth in bitcoins to a specific account.

Pro Cybersecurity's Eric Geller reports the new virus spreads via a flaw in Microsoft Windows originally exposed in a leak of apparent NSA hacking tools, according to researchers. The software, dubbed Petya, has sent law enforcement officials scrambling and sparked fears that another global ransomware attack is underway. It appears the U.S. has been largely unscathed to this point. DHS said it was "monitoring reports" of the ransomware campaign and coordinating with international authorities. More here.

IF THAT WASN'T ENOUGH: E&E News reports today it has learned authorities "are investigating a cyber intrusion affecting multiple nuclear power generation sites this year." While there's no evidence that the nuclear industry's safety systems were compromised, any cybersecurity breach at nuclear reactors "marks an escalation of hackers' probes into U.S. critical infrastructure," E&E writes. "Electricity-sector officials confirmed [on Monday] that they are working to unpack the significance of the secretive cyber event, code named 'Nuclear 17.'" Read more.

BLOOMBERG: TRUMP IS A 'PR PROBLEM': Trump's decision to withdraw from the Paris climate agreement "sends a terrible message," but won't stop U.S. efforts to cut emissions, former New York Mayor Mike Bloomberg told POLITICO in Brussels today. "The truth of the matter is, the president pulling us out, that is a PR problem," he said. "But since the federal government has not had a lot to do with what we've done in the last few years — reducing our carbon footprint — so what?"

Bloomberg also noted it's about economics, POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff and David Herszenhorn report. "It's capitalism. It's the lower cost of fracked natural gas and renewables that's really destroying the coal industry," said Bloomberg, who is now the United Nations' special envoy for cities and climate change.

MOVERS, SHAKERS: Kelly Speakes-Backman will become Energy Storage Association's first chief executive officer, effective July 1, the association announced today. Speakes-Backman joins the association after serving as senior vice president of policy and research at the Alliance to Save Energy.

House energy and water spending bill released Back

By POLITICO Pro Staff | 06/27/2017 12:01 PM EDT

The House Appropriations Committee has released its fiscal 2018 energy and water spending bill.

The \$37.56 billion bill funds the Department of Energy, Army Corps of Engineers and other agencies. Overall, it cuts $209 million from this year's spending levels but comes in $3.65 billion above President Donald Trump's budget request, according to a committee release.

DOE's energy programs receive $9.6 billion, down $1.7 billion from this year but $2.3 billion more than Trump asked for, according to the committee. The bill would keep spending on science programs level with this year and includes funding for Yucca Mountain, among other provisions.

The Army Corps would see $6.16 billion, a $120 million bump compared to this year and $1.16 billion more than the budget request.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House Appropriations energy and water subcommittee is scheduled to meet Wednesday to markup the bill.

House bill would eliminate ARPA-E, bar future DOE loan guarantees Back

By Nick Juliano | 06/27/2017 01:26 PM EDT

House appropriators are calling to eliminate a popular late-stage research program and bar the Energy Department from issuing new loan guarantees while proposing to cut spending on energy efficiency and renewables nearly in half.

The cuts reflect House Republicans' preference for DOE's nuclear and fossil energy programs, which would receive much smaller reductions. The House plan would not cut most programs as steeply as President Donald Trump called for in his budget — but lawmakers made exceptions for the Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy and the loan-guarantee program.

The energy and water spending bill House appropriators released today does not include any funding for ARPA-E, which the Trump administration also proposed zeroing-out in its budget request.

For the loan-guarantee program, the spending bill would rescind nearly $161 million in money available to underwrite loan guarantees as well as DOE's authority to issue any new loans after Oct. 1. The bill would provide $2 million for administrative costs to be drawn from fees DOE has collected, a 95 percent reduction from the equivalent sum this year.

DOE's Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy office would receive about $1.1 billion in the House bill. That's down from nearly $2.1 billion the office received this year.

But the fossil and nuclear energy offices would not see anything close to that magnitude of cuts. The fossil office would receive about $635 million, down $33 million from this year, while nuclear would see $969 million, a $48 million reduction.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House Appropriations energy and water subcommittee will mark up its bill on Wednesday. Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle are likely to resist the call to cut ARPA-E as the appropriations bill moves through Congress in the coming months.

EPA announces proposed WOTUS repeal Back

EPA is moving forward with its proposed rule to undo the Obama administration's landmark water regulation cementing federal protections for smaller streams and wetlands.

The proposed rule would repeal the 2015 Waters of the U.S. rule, also called the Clean Water Rule, and reinstate the process that EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers used for nearly a decade to determine which waterways receive Clean Water Act protection in the wake of two muddled Supreme Court decisions. EPA announced today it had completed the proposal, but a copy was not immediately available.

Last year, a court blocked implementation of the Obama rule, so today's proposal would not trigger any immediate changes. Instead, the proposal is meant as a backstop by the Trump administration in case the original legal stay of WOTUS put in place by the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals is lifted, which could occur when the Supreme Court decides whether the 6th Circuit has jurisdiction over the matter.

The proposed rule is the first in a two-step process planned by Administrator Scott Pruitt's EPA. The agency is already working on writing a new version of the rule that would include a narrower interpretation of which creeks, bogs and marshes are protected under federal law. Suggestions from states and groups representing local environmental officials were due to EPA earlier this week.

The proposed water rule is the first formal step toward repealing one of the many Obama-era environmental regulations that President Donald Trump has targeted, including climate regulations. If finalized, it is likely to be challenged in court by environmental groups and supportive states.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will open a public-comment period that will lay some of the legal battlefield for opponents who are likely to challenge the rule in court if it is finalized.

Perry: DOE grid study to ferret out policies hostile to coal Back

By Eric Wolff | 06/27/2017 11:47 AM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry said the grid reliability study his agency is conducting will look for ways to reverse policies he claimed were motivated by a desire to harm the coal industry.

Perry didn't specifically mentioned the Obama administration in his speech today to the Energy Information Administration annual conference, but he made it clear that he would pursue a different course.

"Over the last few years, grid experts have expressed concern about the erosion of critical baseload resources, specifically how it is dispatched and compensated," he said. "These are politically driven policies driven by a hostility to coal."

The Obama administration looked for ways to promote low-carbon energy sources in the name of fighting climate change. President Donald Trump, Perry and other Cabinet secretaries have questioned climate science and vowed to reinvigorate the coal industry.

"No reasonable person can deny the thumb — no the hand — that's been put on the scale in favor of certain political outcomes," Perry said.

Perry did not mention economic factors such as competition from cheap natural gas among the problems facing coal and nuclear generators. DOE's reliability study will focus on the "regulatory burden placed on baseload generation," he said.

At the same time, he stressed that DOE would "ensure that renewable energy finds its way into the grid," but that reliability would not be "tossed aside in the name of some political favorite."

Two climate protesters interrupted Perry's EIA speech, both demanding that Perry acknowledge that he was "a climate denier."

WHAT'S NEXT: Perry's grid study is expected in July.

Honorable calls for more grid renewables Back

By Eric Wolff | 06/27/2017 11:12 AM EDT

FERC Commissioner Colette Honorable said renewable generation has "absolutely not" harmed grid reliability, and she'd like to see more.

"Do I have to recognize and be attendant to supporting different way renewables work? I say yes, but I have seen no problems with reliability," she said during a Q&A following a speech at the Energy Information Administration's annual conference. "Bring on more renewables."

Honorable spoke immediately after a speech by Energy Secretary Rick Perry in which he praised renewables but also expressed concern that the shrinking number coal and nuclear generators, which serve as baseload power, threatened grid reliability.

The woes facing coal and nuclear plants are "less about regulation, more about economics," Honorable said.

FERC has been without a voting quorum for months, and Honorable's last day will be on Friday, leaving acting Chairman Cheryl LaFleur as the only remaining commissioner. New commissioners, when they are confirmed, will have to get up speed in a hurry to tackle the backlog.

"I had the luxury of voting present for my first 30 days while I got my feet on the ground, but I don't know if our colleagues will have that time," she said. "You need decisions from us yesterday."

WHAT'S NEXT: Two Republican nominees to FERC await Senate confirmation.

Cyberattack under way on Europe's energy and transport companies Back

By Laurens Cerulus | 06/27/2017 10:26 AM EDT

A ransomware attack is spreading across Europe in what looks like an outbreak of malware like the global WannaCry attack last month.

Russian petroleum company Rosneft confirmed its systems were under attack, saying in a tweet that "a massive hacker attack has hit the servers of the company." The transport company A.P. Moller-Maersk confirmed in a tweet it also suffered an attack and its systems were down. Meanwhile, Kiev's main airport has been affected by the malware, the BBC reported.

Security researchers have raised similar warnings for energy systems in Ukraine, including Ukrenergo and Kyivenergo. Other incidents are being reported.

"It looks like what happened with WannaCry," said Rickey Gevers, security researcher at RedSocks Security, a Dutch cybersecurity firm.

Computers affected by the malware show messages asking people to pay $300 worth in bitcoins to a specific account.

Ukrenergo, one of the affected companies, was the target of a severe cyberattack that downed the energy systems in large parts of Ukraine last Christmas.

NSA-linked tools help power second global ransomware outbreak Back

By Eric Geller | 06/27/2017 10:27 AM EDT

Security researchers are racing to analyze and contain a new form of ransomware that has begun seizing computer networks around the world, just weeks after a similar cyberattack crippled an unprecedented number of businesses and hospitals.

Like the massive malware outbreak in mid-May, the new virus also spreads via a flaw in Microsoft Windows originally exposed in a leak of apparent NSA hacking tools, according to researchers.

The malicious software has battered organizations in Russia, Ukraine, Spain, France and Poland, according to cybersecurity researchers, sending law enforcement officials scrambling and sparking fears that another global ransomware attack is underway. It appears the U.S. has been largely unscathed to this point.

Major energy, shipping, banking, pharmaceutical and law firms, as well as government agencies, have confirmed they are fighting off cyberattacks, although it's unknown if all these online ambushes are linked to the ransomware outbreak. In Europe, law enforcement agency Europol is "urgently responding" to infections of European businesses, the agency's executive director said on Twitter. In the U.S., DHS said it was "monitoring reports" of the ransomware campaign and coordinating with international authorities.

Researchers have been warning for weeks that the recent WannaCry ransomware virus — which locked up hundreds of thousands of computer networks in what experts called a game-changing cyberattack — was only the beginning of these fast-spreading digital sieges.

Digital security specialists say hackers have since been working to tweak the WannaCry malware, potentially allowing it to skirt the digital defenses that helped stall the global assault. WannaCry was powered by a variant of apparent NSA cyber weapons that were dumped online, raising questions about whether the secretive hacking agency should be sitting on such powerful tools.

The virus is spreading using the same Microsoft Windows flaw as WannaCry, according to digital security firms Symantec and Bitdefender Labs.

Security firm Kaspersky Lab estimated it had seen 2,000 victims — and counting — as of midday. Such an estimate is significantly lower than the massive numbers tied to WannaCry, but some researchers noted technical details of the new malware that might make it harder to kill.

Some researchers identified the infection as a novel variation of the so-called Petya malware. But researchers at Kaspersky believe it is a totally new strain they are dubbing NotPetya.

Like WannaCry, this new virus demands that victims pay a ransom using the digital currency Bitcoin before their files can be unlocked. As of midafternoon, 27 victims had paid a ransom, with the number steadily climbing.

Unlike WannaCry, however, the rapidly spreading malware does not merely encrypt files as part of its ransom scheme. Rather, it changes critical system files so that the computer becomes unresponsive, according to John Miller, a senior manager for analysis at the security firm FireEye, which reviewed the malware.

Additionally, researchers said the malware is capable of hopping around using multiple Microsoft flaws, not just the one exposed in the online dump of the purported NSA cyber weapons.

A sample of the malware initially went undetected by nearly all antivirus software.

The digital weapon cloaks itself as a file that Microsoft has already approved as safe, helping it avoid detection, Costin Raiu, director of global research efforts at Kaspersky, said on Twitter.

The malware was written on June 18, according to a sample that Kaspersky has analyzed. Researchers have not yet linked it to any specific hacking group or nation-state, unlike WannaCry, which digital specialists and reportedly intelligence officials in the U.S. and U.K. traced to North Korean-backed hackers.

Most of the infections on Tuesday were in Ukraine, with Russia the next hardest hit, according to Kaspersky's analysis. Russia was also a major victim during the WannaCry outbreak. Raiu told POLITICO that Belarus, Brazil, Estonia, Netherlands, Turkey and the United States were also affected, but that those countries accounted for less than 1 percent of all victims.

Researchers suspect that Ukraine became the nexus of the outburst after companies using a popular tax program unknowingly downloaded an update that contained the ransomware. From there, the virus could have spread beyond those companies using various flaws in Windows.

The ransomware eruption may be responsible for several major cyber incidents that began Tuesday.

The global shipping and logistics firm Maersk — which is based in Denmark — confirmed that it was dealing with an intrusion affecting "multiple sites and business units." And the Russian oil company Rosneft said it was responding to "a massive hacker attack."

Ukraine's central bank and its capital city's main airport also said they were dealing with cyberattacks. The virus appeared to be hitting the country's government computers as well.

The cyberattack also forced the Ukraine-based Chernobyl nuclear power plant to revert to manual radiation monitoring, according to a Ukrainian journalist citing the country's state news service.

Elsewhere, the German pharmaceutical giant Merck said its network was "compromised" in the outbreak and that it was still investigating the incident.

But the U.S. has been largely spared so far.

The American Gas Association said in a statement that no U.S. natural gas utilities have reported infections.

However, in Pennsylvania, the Heritage Valley Health System — which operates two hospitals and 60 physician offices — said it was grappling with a cyberattack. "The incident is widespread and is affecting the entire health system," said spokeswoman Suzanne Sakson.

Multinational law firm DLA Piper was also experiencing computer and phone outages in multiple offices, including in Washington, D.C. The company did not respond to a request for comment.

But a photo shared with POLITICO showed a sign outside the firm's Washington office that read, "All network services are down, do not turn on your computers! Please remove all laptops from docking stations and keep turned off. No exceptions."

DLA Piper's secure document storage system for clients also went down, though the firm may have done that as a precaution. "A bit stressed at moment as I am unsure if our docs there are safe," one client told POLITICO.

Trump blasts CNN as 'fake news' after it retracts story Back

By Louis Nelson | 06/27/2017 07:14 AM EDT

CNN's decision to retract a story published last week tying a member of President Donald Trump's transition team to ongoing Russia investigations offered the president an opportunity Tuesday morning to attack perhaps his favorite media target, which he labeled "fake news" and questioned for publishing "phony stories."

The story in question, published late last week, reported that the Senate Intelligence Committee was investigating the head of a Russian investment fund who met before the inauguration with Anthony Scaramucci, a financier and high-profile member of Trump's transition team. CNN also reported that the Senate committee was looking into whether or not Scaramucci had suggested that sanctions against Russia might soon be lifted.

In addition to the story's retraction, three CNN employees, including a Pulitzer Prize-winner, resigned from the company.

"Wow, CNN had to retract big story on "Russia," with 3 employees forced to resign. What about all the other phony stories they do? FAKE NEWS!" Trump wrote on Twitter Tuesday morning. "Fake News CNN is looking at big management changes now that they got caught falsely pushing their phony Russian stories. Ratings way down!" he added in a subsequent post.

Beyond bashing CNN, the president quickly pivoted to two other media foes, writing online that "They caught Fake News CNN cold, but what about NBC, CBS & ABC? What about the failing @nytimes & @washingtonpost? They are all Fake News!"

While Trump took the retraction as an opportunity to attack CNN, Scaramucci himself, who does not hold a role inside the White House but still makes occasional television appearances in support of the president, was more conciliatory.

"CNN did the right thing. Classy move. Apology accepted. Everyone makes mistakes. Moving on," Scaramucci wrote on Twitter Saturday.

The 'international man of mystery' linked to Flynn's lobbying deal Back

By Isaac Arnsdorf | 06/27/2017 05:09 AM EDT

More than two years ago, two men started visiting Washington to push Turkey's agenda in the capital. They dined with dignitaries and enlisted prominent lobbying firms from both sides of the aisle.

It was an unremarkable Washington story, except for one thing: The last lobbyist one of the men hired was Gen. Michael Flynn, President Donald Trump's campaign adviser at the time, who was later fired as national security adviser for lying about his conversations with Russia's ambassador.

Flynn's client, a Turkish businessman named Ekim Alptekin, has gained attention as federal investigators examine Flynn's apparent failures to disclose foreign contacts. But so far, the other man in the pro-Turkey efforts has largely avoided public notice, making him an intriguing figure in the mystery surrounding foreign influence in Washington.

The man, Dmitri "David" Zaikin, is not registered as a foreign lobbyist and has no apparent connection to Turkey.

What he does have, a ProPublica-POLITICO examination found, is a long track record of partnering with powerful Russian businesspeople and government officials, mostly involving energy and mining deals. More recently, Zaikin has done political work in Eastern Europe, advising parties in Albania and Macedonia that have drifted toward the Kremlin.

Zaikin also has business connections to Trump. Working at a real estate agency in Toronto in the 2000s, Zaikin brokered sales in one of the city's new high-rises: the Trump International Hotel and Tower. Perhaps coincidentally, Zaikin was also close with a Russian woman who was the exclusive agent for one of Trump's Florida developments and who was branded "Trump's Russian hand" by a glossy Russian magazine.

Zaikin has not been accused of any wrongdoing. Alptekin and Zaikin have denied knowing each other and say Zaikin had nothing to do with Flynn's lobbying deal.

As previously reported in POLITICO, three people with direct knowledge said Alptekin and Zaikin collaborated on Turkish lobbying, jointly steering the work.

Zaikin referred questions to his lawyer, who declined to comment. Flynn's lawyer didn't answer requests for comment. The White House referred questions to Trump's outside lawyer, whose spokesman also did not respond to a request for comment.

Zaikin says he was born in 1967 in Kharkiv, Ukraine. In an earlier email to Politico, he wrote that his family long faced anti-Semitic persecution in their homeland and that they fled the collapsing USSR for Canada in 1990.

"Mr. Zaikin reserves nothing but contempt for the Soviet government, and whatever vestiges of it may still exist," his lawyer, Tara Plochocki of the firm Lewis Baach Kaufmann Middlemiss, wrote to POLITICO.

But Zaikin gave a different account to Geoffrey P. Cowley, a British engineer who was his business partner from 2010 until they split in 2016. Cowley said he never heard Zaikin claim his family was persecuted, nor had he heard Zaikin criticize the former Soviet Union.

"That might be the official line," Cowley said.

Instead, according to Cowley, Zaikin had said his father was in the Soviet military or diplomatic corps.

"When he was with me, whoever I wanted to see, David would pick up the telephone and I got to see him," Cowley said, naming officials in Albania, Serbia and Guinea as examples. "That doesn't happen with some Jewish refugee out of Ukraine who doesn't know anybody."

Settling in Toronto, Zaikin was active in the community of Jews from the former Soviet Union. He soon became a real estate agent, eventually with an upscale brokerage. He marketed properties to Russian buyers. He married a woman from St. Petersburg and had three children.

In 2002, Zaikin started a side gig. He became chairman of Siberian Energy Group, which was incorporated in Nevada and was listed over-the-counter on NASDAQ. The company's archived website notes Zaikin's "extensive ties to Russia's business community, as well as to federal and regional government authorities."

Zaikin worked to help the governor of the western Siberian province of Kurgan attract Western investors for energy exploration and infrastructure, according to Tim Pears, whom Zaikin hired to help raise money in the United Kingdom.

"He did the government of Kurgan a lot of favors in terms of helping to raise money for them," Pears said. The governor reported directly to President Vladimir Putin, according to a company press release.

The region's prospects didn't pan out: Zaikin's company never pumped a single barrel of oil or cubic foot of gas, according to disclosures filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The SEC repeatedly queried the company about its financial dealings, specifically about its payments to Russian executives and consultants in shares and options whose values were opaque or shifting.

"We note that although you describe various transactions utilizing common stock of the company, it is not clear from your disclosures how the value of such stock for each transaction was determined," SEC officials wrote in one letter.

In 2006, Siberian Energy Group used shares worth $2.7 million to buy a Russian company, Kondaneftegaz. Less than two years later, Zaikin's company sold significant stakes in Kondaneftegaz to two Russian investors for just $10 each. Kondaneftegaz had actually been awarded two additional drilling licenses before those sales, according to SEC reports.

Zaikin previously told POLITICO that he was "not involved" in that transaction, though his signature appears on the purchase and sale agreements filed with the SEC.

Zaikin obtained Siberian Energy Group's licenses at auctions that weren't publicized and were attended only by people who had government connections, according to a contractor for the company. Zaikin's lawyer refused to comment on this.

"David was on the inside track," said Jordan Silverstein, who worked for a firm doing investor relations for Siberian Energy Group. "He seemed like an international man of mystery."

Zaikin's business career continued to involve both Russian oil work and Toronto real estate dealings. In 2005, Zaikin told the Globe and Mail newspaper about a new development he was promoting: the Trump International Hotel and Tower. The newspaper reported that Zaikin called his "top five international clients" and four agreed to buy.

"When this project was announced I instantly became a strong believer that it would be a significant winner," Zaikin told the newspaper. "I have stayed at Trump Hotels and seen how other similar projects went in New York, Chicago and Las Vegas."

Not long after, Zaikin and several colleagues from Siberian Energy Group became directors or shareholders of a mining company called RAM Resources, later First Iron Group, according to corporate filings. First Iron's board included the deputy chairman of Russian state bank VEB, who had also been Putin's deputy chief of staff. The company was registered in the British isle of Jersey, a haven for offshore companies.

Other investors in the company were themselves offshore firms, based in the Cayman Islands, Cyprus, the British Virgin Islands and elsewhere.

According to Zaikin's partner Cowley, who served on the company's board, the venture was ultimately controlled by Alisher Usmanov, an Uzbek-born Russian iron oligarch. Usmanov's representatives did not respond to a request for comment.

Cowley, an experienced mining executive who had worked for other Russian oligarchs, said he was impressed by Zaikin's global political connections.

A consulting firm that Zaikin and Cowley started advertised Zaikin as having "a network of contacts with senior executives and top government officials and Presidents in Senegal, Nigeria, Ghana, Guinea, Ethiopia, Albania, Sierra Leone, Mali, Liberia, Moldova, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, [and] Romania."

By 2011, Zaikin had moved to London. He set up several companies registered at his home address. One of them, EM Infrastructure Ltd., lists two names on a U.K. incorporation document: Neither is Zaikin's. One belongs to his wife, a jewelry designer, and the other name is a Viktor Grabarouk, whose address is listed as Zaikin's home and whose birth date is listed as one day after Zaikin's own.

A search of corporate records and the comprehensive British phone book showed no references to a Viktor Grabarouk.

A few years later, Zaikin's career took yet another turn. After working in residential real estate and the Russian energy sector, Zaikin became an adviser to the ruling parties in Turkey, Albania and Macedonia. He also began working with those parties to set up lobbying in the United States.

Zaikin told Cowley he wanted to be "working with the staffs of senators and high-profile people in the States," Cowley recalled. The two stopped working together as Zaikin focused more on politics.

Starting around 2015, Zaikin helped run pro-Turkish nonprofit groups to lobby U.S. lawmakers, according to an American consultant who worked with him, John Moreira. Alptekin, the Turkish businessman who later hired Flynn, told Politico he worked with the main group Zaikin helped set up.

In August 2016, Alptekin signed a contract with Flynn for $600,000 to urge the U.S. to turn over Fethullah Gülen, a cleric now in Pennsylvania whom Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan accuses of trying to topple him.

The contract refers to Alptekin as "Capt. Ekim Alptekin." Alptekin said he's not a captain and he doesn't know why the contract calls him one.

Flynn was paid by a Dutch consulting firm that Alptekin owned called Inovo, according to Flynn's Justice Department disclosures. But records show Inovo had no significant business activity in the three years before the Flynn deal. In fact, the company was in debt for more than 125,000 euros in the months before paying Flynn. Alptekin acknowledged in an interview that Inovo lacked sufficient funds and said he used his own money to pay Flynn.

Flynn's firm ultimately repaid $80,000 to Inovo. Alptekin has said it was a refund. Flynn's filing with the Justice Department called the payment a "consultancy fee."

Robert Mueller, the special counsel investigating Russian efforts to influence the election, is interested in the source of Flynn's lobbying income, according to a person familiar with the probe. Mueller's spokesman declined to comment.

While working on Turkey, Zaikin also facilitated lobbying and political consulting deals for the Macedonian political party VMRO-DPMNE, according to four people with direct knowledge of the activities. He did the same for Albania's Socialist Movement for Integration, known as LSI, according to four people familiar with the arrangements. Zaikin introduced leaders of both parties to American lobbyists and campaign advisers, the people said.

VMRO, like Turkey, historically aligns with the West but has recently cozied up to the Kremlin. VMRO for months refused to leave power despite failing to win enough seats in a December election to form a parliamentary majority. The standoff put the party at odds with the U.S. State Department, whereas it has received forceful backing from the Russian Foreign Ministry.

Albania's LSI and its leader, Ilir Meta, are avowedly pro-Western but have sometimes clashed with the State Department over the U.S.' push to reform the country's criminal justice system.

Around the same time Zaikin started getting more involved in Eastern European and American politics, he and his wife repeatedly met with a friend named Elena Baronoff, who worked with the Trump Organization to sell condos in Florida.

On social media, Zaikin and Baronoff discussed plans to meet and posted photos of themselves dining out in London. In October 2013, Zaikin posted back-to-back photos of himself and Baronoff with the chef of a French restaurant in the posh Mayfair neighborhood. Two weeks later, he tweeted a photo of his wife and Baronoff hugging with the comment, "It was warm like in Miami."

On another apparent visit, in July 2014, Baronoff posted to Instagram a photo of herself and Zaikin's wife, Yana, on a London sidewalk and then a photo of the lobby of a five-star hotel captioned, "with love to Yana and David Zaikin."

Baronoff was born in Russia, earned degrees in journalism and mass communication, and served as an official "cultural attaché in public diplomacy" for the Russian government at an unspecified time, she said in interviews and bios. In 1989, she moved to Iowa, then Florida.

Starting with little means, Baronoff became a travel agent and later a real estate agent. She wrote on LinkedIn that her diplomatic training was key to her success in "marketing and building the brand of high-end luxury condominiums under the Trump brand."

By 2004, Baronoff was Trump's on-site director of customer relations for the Trump Grande near Miami. She was photographed with Trump and his daughter Ivanka and celebrated on the cover story of The Women's City magazine as "Donald Trump's Russian hand."

As the exclusive agent for the Trump Grande development, Baronoff sold 44 units to Russian buyers, according to an analysis by Reuters. An undated photo surfaced on Twitter showing Baronoff in Moscow with Trump's children Ivanka, Eric and Don Jr.

Last month, Trump released a letter from his lawyers saying any of his firm's transactions with Russians were "immaterial," though Donald Trump Jr. said in 2008 that the company was seeing "a lot of money pouring in from Russia."

Baronoff fell ill while traveling to Turkey in 2014 and was diagnosed with leukemia. She died in 2015. Following her burial, her family received visitors at the Trump International Beach Resort.

Her son, George Baronov, said his mother worked for Trump after first doing business with Trump's partner in Florida. "She was the in-house broker," Baronov said. "She did a lot of marketing and advertising and traveling around the world." The Moscow trip with Trump's children was in 2003 or 2004, he said.

Two years before she died, Baronoff worked on a $28 million Manhattan real estate deal with Turkish President Erdogan's son and son-in-law, according to hacked emails published by WikiLeaks. The emails also showed the son and son-in-law receiving updates about Zaikin's lobbying efforts. In September 2016, as Flynn later disclosed, Alptekin arranged a meeting between the same son-in-law and Flynn himself.

McConnell warns Trump, GOP on health bill failure Back

By Burgess Everett, Josh Dawsey and Jennifer Haberkorn | 06/27/2017 10:11 AM EDT

Mitch McConnell is delivering an urgent warning to staffers, Republican senators and even the president himself: If Obamacare repeal fails this week, the GOP will lose all leverage and be forced to work with Chuck Schumer.

President Donald Trump continued to float the possibility on Monday that Congress and the White House would simply let Obamacare's individual markets collapse if the GOP's repeal effort goes down later this week. But McConnell called up Trump recently, according to people with knowledge of the call, to deliver a reality check.

Voters expect Republicans to deliver on their long-held promise to repeal the law, McConnell said, according to those people. And failing to repeal the law would mean the GOP would lose its opportunity to do a partisan rewrite of the law that could scale back Medicaid spending, cut Obamacare's taxes and repeal a host of industry mandates.

Instead, Republicans would be forced to enter into bipartisan negotiations with Democrats to save failing insurance markets.

McConnell delivered a similar warning Monday to Republican senators at his leadership meeting and to top GOP staffers, warning that Democrats will want to retain as much of Obamacare as possible in a bipartisan negotiation, according to Republican aides.

"If we fail, we're going to be negotiating with [Democratic Leader] Chuck Schumer," said one Republican staffer.

McConnell's motivational words are aimed at reviving support for his bill to repeal the health care law through the party-line reconciliation method this week. GOP leaders are hunting for votes to even start debate on the bill, with at least four Republicans currently opposed to the legislation as written and many more undecided.

Republicans will have a party lunch on Tuesday that will offer a window into the repeal bill's prospects and potential deal-making to be done.

McConnell still has about $188 billion in funds that he could use to shore up the bill's support by offering Republicans money to fight opioid abuse, as well as several more proposals he could include to attract conservative support, particularly the expansion of health savings accounts to woo the party's right flank.

The Senate is likely to vote on kicking off floor debate on the bill on Wednesday, though it could occur on Tuesday. Vice President Mike Pence will dine with wavering Republican senators on Tuesday night, which could boost the bill's prospects for a Wednesday vote.

McConnell has told senators for weeks that he fears a failed repeal effort would be followed by a large bailout of the insurance industry that would be supported by moderate Republicans and Democrats, per people familiar with his thinking. And McConnell would be content to not touch Obamacare repeal again if this bill failed.

Trump has repeatedly weighed taking away cost-sharing subsidies and has privately told activists and administration officials that Democrats would own the failure of Obamacare and that it could be a political boon for Republicans.

But some of his senior officials believe the White House would take at least some of the blame if markets imploded.

If the bill fails, Schumer (D-N.Y.) and his members would be empowered to negotiate with centrist Republicans to save the flailing markets. A trio of Democratic senators met with some Republicans this spring to discuss a bipartisan proposal to shore up the nation's health care system, but there are many elements of the GOP's bill that those Democrats will not support.

"The price of admission for me sitting down with you is I'm not willing to [per capita] block grant Medicaid and eliminate Medicaid expansion," said Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), recalling her message to those Republicans.

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by ExxonMobil: Perry grid plan hits resistance — Perry says energy subsidies justified — Trump: Puerto Rico can't keep FEMA forever

PERRY GRID PLAN HITS RESISTANCE: Energy Secretary Rick Perry's call for FERC to support coal and nuclear power plants came under scrutiny at the House Energy and Commerce Committee hearing today, with skeptical lawmakers pressing him on how he could justify the costly move in a free market. But Perry cast his plan as vital for American security, saying the grid is too crucial to submit to a traditional cost-benefit analysis.

"What's the cost of freedom? What does it cost to build a system to keep America free?" Perry said when asked whether DOE considered how much his recent proposal to aid coal and nuclear power might cost consumers. "I'm not sure I want to just put that straight out on the free market and say, 'OK, whoever can build the cheapest delivery system here to keep America free.'" Darius Dixon has more here.

Perry also contended it was fair to help certain power sources because previous administrations have done the same. "That was really kinda my goal with this [proposal], was to get to talking about the whole idea and the understanding that we have subsidized the energy industry for a long time. I frankly don't have a problem with that," he said.

— Perry sees climate change link: And, in an exchange with California Rep. Jerry McNerney, Perry acknowledged a link between climate change and the severe storms that have wrought the U.S. But Perry declined to say whether policymakers could make a difference in addressing the problem. "We're probably going to agree that it's happening, we're going to agree that it's going to have an effect on the globe," Perry said. "I think where we may or may not agree is how much of this is man's fault, and our decisions that we're going to make here. I don't believe that we need to be making decisions that put America at a very disadvantaged [position] — from around the globe — making decisions that we think might have an impact on climate change." Still, Perry added: "Are we having an impact on [climate]? Absolutely. Can we make a difference? You bet."

— Pallone wants IG to probe Perry's travel: New Jersey Rep. Frank Pallone, the committee's top Democrat, expressed concern regarding the amount of money the administration has spent on such travel for members of the Cabinet and staff, and he he's asked the Energy Department's inspector general to dig into Perry's use of non-commercial flights. Pallone added the issue was of concern because the Trump administration had proposed "extreme" budget cuts for federal agencies. Perry defended his travel by saying that many DOE sites are put in remote locations by design. "When Leslie Groves was choosing the places to start national labs and to do the Manhattan Project, he wanted to go places that were pretty difficult to get to," Perry said.

— Hitchhiker's guide to traveling: "I suppose you could even hitchhike" to some places, Perry at one point jokingly told the energy subcommittee. Perry said he tries to travel in a "thoughtful and most reasonable way," but sometimes "may have to do it in a way that does expend some taxpayers' dollars."

TRUMP: PUERTO RICO CAN'T KEEP FEMA FOREVER: President Donald Trump this morning suggested there's a limit to how much federal aid he is willing to extend to Puerto Rico in its recovery from Hurricane Maria. "Puerto Rico survived the Hurricanes, now a financial crisis looms largely of their own making," says Sharyl Attkisson. A total lack of accountability say the Governor. Electric and all infrastructure was disaster before hurricanes," Trump wrote on Twitter in a series of posts. "Congress to decide how much to spend. We cannot keep FEMA, the Military & the First Responders, who have been amazing (under the most difficult circumstances) in P.R. forever!" The official death toll from the storm has risen to 45, CNN reported Wednesday, and at least 113 people are unaccounted for. As of Wednesday, 90 percent of the island was still without power. More here.

GULLIFORD RETURNS TO REGION 7: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has selected Jim Gulliford to run the agency's Region 7. This is Gulliford's second stint as the Region 7 administrator, which oversees Iowa, Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska. He previously ran the division from 2001 to 2006. Gulliford was also the Senate-confirmed assistant administrator for what is now the Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention from 2006 to 2009. More here from Alex Guillén.

Fun fact: Gulliford — for the moment at least — is now directly behind Pruitt in the line of succession at EPA. The most recent executive order setting that line, signed Jan. 13, first lists all of the agency's Senate-confirmed positions, none of which have yet been filled. After them comes the Region 7 administrator, a post now filled by Gulliford. Catherine McCabe, the deputy Region 2 administrator who served as acting EPA chief for almost a month before Pruitt's confirmation, is ranked just after Gulliford.

FINLAND TO ADD TO CLIMATE CHANGE FUND: Finland today is announcing a $135 million climate change fund with the International Finance Corporation, a member of the World Bank Group. The fund is meant to finance early-stage mitigation or adaptation projects in low-income countries, including in sub-Saharan Africa, where energy demand is growing rapidly. The deal was on tap before the November election, but Finland's minister for foreign trade and development, Kai Mykkänen, told POLITICO that Trump's decision to exit the Paris climate agreement and cancel payments to the Green Climate Fund has "actually strengthened the commitment of us others, meaning Europeans and Chinese."

"We feel that we are really the torchbearers once important countries are shying away from the project," he said, adding that he is hopeful the U.S. federal government will be more climate friendly in the future. Climate investments have typically come more as grants or loan guarantees to middle-stage projects, said Kruskaia Sierra-Escalante, manager of blended finance at IFC. "A lot of significant, large projects to reduce greenhouse gases have been in the middle-income countries," Sierra-Escalante added. "Finland has moved to the next stage to really press all of us to try to get to do more climate finance in the poorest countries."

LCV ENDORSES IN ALABAMA: The League of Conservation Voters Action Fund endorsed former U.S. Attorney Doug Jones for Alabama Senate, it said today, in a bid against Republican Roy Moore in this year's special election. "Doug Jones has dedicated his career to helping the people of Alabama," Tiernan Sittenfeld, the senior vice president of government affairs for the group, said in a statement. "LCVAF is proud to support Jones, a candidate who has a history of standing up for hardworking communities and is determined to fight for clean air and water which are important for jobs, public health, recreation and tourism."

EXELON STEPS IN TO FUND WMATA SERVICE: Exelon, the parent company of Pepco, will pay to extend Metrorail service an extra hour tonight to accommodate Nationals fans and visitors to the grand opening of The Wharf in Washington, D.C., WMATA said today. "Our commitment to the D.C. community extends beyond powering our customers' homes and businesses," said Exelon CEO Chris Crane. "We want to make sure they can enjoy these landmark events in D.C. and have options for getting home safely and efficiently, and we are pleased to partner with Mayor Bowser to make this happen." The cost of the extended service totals $100,000.

MAIL CALL — DON'T FORGIVE FLOOD DEBT: A coalition of taxpayer advocates, environmentalists, insurance companies and housing groups condemned in a letter to congressional leadership a plan to forgive $16 billion in debt held by the National Flood Insurance Program, Pro Financial Services' Lorriane Woellert reports.

CLIMBED A MOUNTAIN AND I TURNED AROUND: The Cultural Landscape Foundation today announced its "annual thematic compendium of threatened and at-risk landscapes," this year called "Landslide 2017: Open Season on Open Space." The project "focuses on nationally significant sites, large and small, throughout the United States, including sites protected under the Antiquities Act and those threatened by confiscation, development, energy and resource extraction, and other incompatible uses," TCLF said in a release.

Perry: Where the grid is concerned, 'what's the cost of freedom?' Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/12/2017 01:46 PM EDT

The importance of keeping the nation's electric grid operating is too important to submit to a traditional cost-benefit analysis, Energy Secretary Rick Perry told House lawmakers this afternoon.

"What's the cost of freedom? What does it cost to build a system to keep America free?" Perry said when asked whether DOE considered how much his recent proposal to aid coal and nuclear power might cost consumers. "I'm not sure I want to just put that straight out on the free market and say, 'Okay, whoever can build the cheapest delivery system here to keep America free.'"

Rep. Paul Tonko was pressing Perry about whether DOE could've focused more on grid infrastructure rather than fuel security, after noting that most power outages are triggered by damage to distribution and transmission lines.

"I think the cost-effective argument on this is secondary to whether or not the lights are going to come on," Perry said.

Perry sees climate change link to storms, defers on what to do Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/12/2017 12:35 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry told a House subcommittee today he believed climate change was linked to the severe storms that battered the U.S., but he declined to say whether policymakers could make a difference in addressing the problem.

"Do you think that climate change is, in any way, a threat to our nation?" Rep. Jerry McNerney asked Perry.

"Yes, sir, I do," Perry answered.

When McNerney asked, "Do you see a relationship between the weather events we've had and climate change?" Perry replied, "most likely, yes, sir."

But he added he didn't think the U.S. should take action that could hurt the country's competitive position.

"We're probably going to agree that it's happening, we're going to agree that it's going to have an effect on the globe," Perry said. "I think where we may or may not agree is how much of this is man's fault, and our decisions that we're going to make here. I don't believe that we need to be making decisions that put America at a very disadvantaged [position] — from around the globe — making decisions that we think might have an impact on climate change."

Still, Perry added: "Are we having an impact on [climate]? Absolutely. Can we make a difference? You bet."

Pallone calls on DOE watchdog to probe Perry's travel Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/12/2017 11:27 AM EDT

Rep. Frank Pallone (D-N.J.) is asking the Energy Department's inspector general to dig into Energy Secretary Rick Perry's use of non-commercial flights, which the agency disclosed late last week.

"I continue to be concerned by the amount of money this administration is spending when it comes to non-commercial travel for members of the Cabinet and their staff," Pallone, the top Democrat on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, told Perry this morning.

The New Jersey Democrat had asked the inspectors general at Health and Human Services and EPA to probe the travel habits of the leadership at those agencies.

"Today, in light of the $50,000 you have spent in taxpayer dollars for non-commercial travel, I'm making a similar request to the Energy Department's inspector general," said Pallone, who added the issue was of concern because the Trump administration had proposed "extreme" budget cuts for federal agencies.

Perry defended his travel by saying that many DOE sites are put in remote locations by design.

"When Leslie Groves was choosing the places to start national labs and to do the Manhattan Project, he wanted to go places that were pretty difficult to get to. Hanford is one those," Perry said. "During my confirmation hearing and in front of senators, and obviously going and speaking to a number of you, almost every member invited me to come to their district. ... I travel a lot to do my job. I do it in a way that I think is thoughtful, with the taxpayers in mind."

WHAT'S NEXT: If the DOE IG opens an investigation, it's unclear when it may begin.

Trump sparks new backlash after threatening Puerto Rico aid Back

By Louis Nelson and Matthew Nussbaum | 10/12/2017 07:57 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Thursday suggested that U.S. citizens on the hurricane-ravaged island of Puerto Rico shouldn't get used to assistance from the federal government — a statement that sparked new outrage and left the White House on the defensive.

"Electric and all infrastructure was disaster before hurricanes," Trump wrote on Twitter in a series of posts. "Congress to decide how much to spend. We cannot keep FEMA, the Military & the First Responders, who have been amazing (under the most difficult circumstances) in P.R. forever!"

Trump has come under fire for appearing to blame Puerto Rico for neglecting its infrastructure and financial health in recent years, while sparring with local officials and initially giving the U.S. territory less attention than hurricane victims in Texas and Florida.

The tweets on Thursday — which landed as nearly 90 percent of the island was still without power and nearly 40 percent of residents lack access to clean drinking water — particularly touched a nerve.

"It is not that you do not get it; you are incapable of fulfilling the moral imperative to help the people of PR. Shame on you.![sic]" Carmen Yulín Cruz, the mayor of San Juan, wrote on Twitter. In recent weeks, she has been a target of severe criticism from Trump, who dismissed her and other critics as "politically motivated ingrates."

Puerto Rico's governor, Ricardo Rosselló, sought a less fiery path, writing on Twitter: "The U.S. citizens in Puerto Rico are requesting the support that any of our fellow citizens would receive across our Nation."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said at a news conference that Trump's broadside "is heartbreaking and it lacks knowledge."

And House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) took to the House floor to rail against Trump's statements. "Mr. President, do not send a message to any American that we will turn our backs on them. That is not fair, that is not right, and you ought to correct the statement you made," he said.

The concern was not contained to Democrats. House Speaker Paul Ryan echoed Trump's comment that the island needs fiscal reforms, but suggested now was not the time for that debate.

"At the moment, and it's why I'm going down there tomorrow, there's a humanitarian crisis that needs to be attended to and this is an area where the federal government has a responsibility, and we're acting on it," Ryan said.

The White House sought to clean up the comments later on Thursday, with chief of staff John

Kelly telling reporters later that "the U.S. military and FEMA can't be there forever."

"The minute you go anywhere as a first responder, and this would apply certainly to the military, you are trying very hard to work yourself out of a job," Kelly said during a surprise appearance at the White House briefing, adding that FEMA and the military can be withdrawn "hopefully sooner rather than later."

He said he had spoken with Rosselló earlier Thursday and that the White House enjoys a "great relationship" with the governor. "Our country will stand with those American cities in Puerto Rico until the job is done," Kelly added.

The White House also released a statement from press secretary Sarah Sanders on Thursday afternoon.

"Our job in any disaster affected location is to help the community respond and recover from that disaster. We continue to do so with the full force of the US government and its resources in Texas, Florida, Puerto Rico and the US Virgin Islands and other affected areas," Sanders said. "Successful recoveries do not last forever; they should be as swift as possible to help people resume their normal lives. We are committed to helping Puerto Rico. Our Administration is working with Governor Rossello and Congress to identify the best fiscally responsible path forward."

And a White House official stressed that Puerto Rico's debt crisis would be addressed independently of the disaster relief process.

Trump's morning warning came after White House officials had stressed for weeks their intention to work with Puerto Rico throughout the recovery process. And Trump himself had said last month that "we will not rest ... until the people of Puerto Rico are safe."

"These are great people. We want them to be safe and sound and secure, and we will be there every day until that happens," Trump said at a manufacturing event on Sept. 29.

Puerto Rico has struggled with the devastation from a particularly heavy hurricane season, one that included a direct hit from Hurricane Maria late last month that devastated large swaths of the island. The official death toll from the storm has risen to 45, CNN reported Wednesday, and at least 113 people are unaccounted for.

Reports of desperation are piling up, including from federal government officials. The Environmental Protection Agency on Wednesday warned Puerto Rican residents against breaking into industrial waste sites in search of drinking water. And The New York Times reported that medical care remains a challenge on the island, with just 43 of the island's 72 open hospitals currently operating with power.

Still, Trump has asserted that his administration's handling of the storm has been a great success, and he has rejected any criticism of the effort as "fake news."

Even as the president has continued to rail against the territory, Congress is moving forward on hurricane relief funds, which the White House has also advocated for.

On Thursday afternoon, the House is poised to approve a $36 billion aid package intended largely for Puerto Rico — the largest disaster package since the one provided for Hurricane Sandy victims in 2013.

The money would replenish the Federal Emergency Management Agency's coffers by roughly $18 billion, which lawmakers say is enough to last for several more weeks. That includes $4.9 billion in emergency loans to ensure the cash-strapped island government can pay its workers and other debts.

But GOP leaders have been clear that another installment of aid will be needed before the end of this year. Emergency responders from all federal agencies, from FEMA to the Defense Department, have been going quickly through their cash reserves in Puerto Rico's worst disaster in decades.

And Democrats are saying that Trump's rhetoric is not helping.

"The President of the United States' most solemn duty is to protect the safety and the security of the American people. By suggesting he might abdicate this responsibility for our fellow citizens in Puerto Rico, Mr. Trump has called into question his ability to lead," Rep. Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.) said in a statement.

Former EPA chemical chief returns to Region 7 Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/12/2017 01:34 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has picked Jim Gulliford, a former head of EPA's chemicals office, to run the agency's Region 7, which oversees Iowa, Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska.

This is Gulliford's second stint as the Region 7 administrator; he previously ran the division from 2001 to 2006. Gulliford was also the Senate-confirmed assistant administrator for what is now the Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention from 2006 to 2009.

Since leaving EPA, Gulliford has been executive director of the nonprofit Soil and Water Conservation Society. Prior to his EPA career, Gulliford had stints as an Iowa soil official and in environmental programs at Iowa State University and Southern Illinois University.

Pruitt previously named Cathy Stepp, the head of Wisconsin's Department of Natural Resources, to be principal deputy regional administrator for Region 7.

LCV Action Fund endorses Jones in Alabama Back

By Daniel Strauss | 10/12/2017 12:50 PM EDT

The League of Conservation Voters Action Fund endorsed former U.S. Attorney Doug Jones for U.S. Senate in Alabama, the latest sign of national progressive groups rallying behind Jones' long-shot bid against Republican Roy Moore in this year's special election.

"Doug Jones has dedicated his career to helping the people of Alabama," Tiernan Sittenfeld, the senior vice president of government affairs for the group, said in a statement. "LCVAF is proud to support Jones, a candidate who has a history of standing up for hardworking communities and is determined to fight for clean air and water which are important for jobs, public health, recreation and tourism."

The election is scheduled for Dec. 12.

Coalition condemns flood program's debt forgiveness Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 10/12/2017 05:02 AM EDT

A coalition of taxpayer advocates, environmentalists, insurance companies and housing groups expressed dismay at a plan to forgive $16 billion in debt held by the National Flood Insurance Program.

The group stopped short of asking lawmakers to strip the program's debt forgiveness from a disaster aid bill the House is expected to pass today.

"We understand that people have to have their flood claims paid," said Jenn Fogel-Bublick, a spokeswoman for the SmarterSafer coalition. "But at the end of the day, we're really disappointed that what Congress is going to do is simply forgive the debt without making the changes that are needed to ensure we're not in this position every year."

The conservative Heritage Foundation yesterday flagged the disaster aid bill as a key vote, urging lawmakers to vote "no" on the flood insurance bailout.

"There have been numerous efforts over the past decade to make the NFIP financially and structurally sound, but special interest pushback successfully blunted serious reforms," Heritage Action Vice President Dan Holler said. "Put another way, the NFIP's existing debt stems from poor design and congressional inaction, not an unforeseen crisis."

Recent hurricanes are projected to cost the NFIP $16 billion, putting the program on a path to exhaust its financial resources, including its $30.4 billion borrowing authority, by the end of this month. Last week, the Trump administration asked Congress to cancel $16 billion of the program's debt.

"Put plainly, the NFIP is not designed to handle catastrophic losses like those caused by Harvey, Irma, and Maria," White House budget director Mick Mulvaney wrote in his Oct. 4 request for emergency funding. "The NFIP is simply not fiscally sustainable in its present form."

Mulvaney called for a program to subsidize flood insurance for low-income homeowners, paired with premium hikes for policyholders who can afford them.

President's lawyers may offer Mueller a meeting with Trump Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 10/12/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Donald Trump's lawyers are open to having the president sit down for an interview with Robert Mueller, according to a senior White House official, as part of a wider posture of cooperation with the special counsel's Russia probe.

If Mueller doesn't request an interview by Thanksgiving, Trump's lawyers might even force the issue by volunteering Trump's time, the official said. The White House believes such an interview could help Mueller wrap up the probe faster and dispel the cloud of suspicion over Trump.

A meeting with Mueller could bring serious risks for Trump — exposing him to questions about everything from potential obstruction of justice over his firing of FBI Director James Comey to what Trump might know about Kremlin support for his presidential campaign.

But the official suggested that the White House has no reason to stonewall Mueller.

"Whatever happens with regard to whether or not, or how, the special counsel might want to interview the president, there's no reason to expect that would be combative," the senior White House official explained.

All the key decisions on Trump's potential interaction with Mueller will come from the president himself and his personal lawyer, John Dowd, who initially declined to comment for this story. In an email after this article published, Dowd said: "Totally false!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!"

Dowd disputed the senior official's characterization of the Trump legal team's position on an interview with Mueller.

Trump told reporters this spring that he was "100 percent" willing to testify under oath about alleged Russian ties to his campaign.

But even if he has nothing to hide, Trump's unpredictable nature and willingness to bend the facts pose headaches for his legal team as it strategizes for a possible sit-down with Mueller. One angry or untrue statement could have devastating political and legal consequences for the president.

Trump would be the first president since Bill Clinton to face questions under oath from a federal prosecutor. In August 1998, Clinton famously sat for four hours of testimony as part of independent counsel Kenneth Starr's investigation into Clinton's affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

Republicans made Clinton's arguments during the sworn testimony — over the definition of "sexual relations" and the meaning of the word "is" — central to his impeachment by the GOP-led House of Representatives on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Congressional Republicans later publicly released complete video of the testimony.

There's little dispute over Mueller's power to interview Trump in connection with his probe into Russian interference into the 2016 election. Every president since Watergate except Barack Obama has been directly involved in a federal criminal investigation while serving in office. All but George H.W. Bush agreed to submit to questioning.

"You can say, 'I'm busy. I'm fighting World War III. I can't talk to you right now.' But you can't just say because I'm president of the United States you have to wait until I'm out of office," said Solomon Wisenberg, a deputy to Starr who participated in the grand jury questioning of Clinton in 1998. "If they want his testimony, he's going to have to testify."

Wisenberg said that, should Trump resist meeting with Mueller, he would trigger a constitutional clash that the prosecutor would be likely to win, based on Supreme Court rulings. Short of that, the only way Trump could avoid answering questions would be to assert executive or attorney-client privilege, or to invoke his Fifth Amendment right against possible self-incrimination.

Trump allies initially took a combative posture toward Mueller, but his lawyers have recently adopted a more cooperative stance toward the special counsel's investigation, one they hope will expedite its conclusion while publicly signaling that Trump has nothing to hide.

Mueller's office, which declined comment for this story, started interviewing Trump White House aides last month, according to a source familiar with the probe. Two of his most senior lawyers, criminal fraud experts Andrew Weissmann and Greg Andres, were spotted by POLITICO last Friday afternoon leaving the grand jury room at the federal courthouse.

Veterans of past investigations into alleged executive branch misconduct said a Trump interview would probably be among Mueller's final steps before completing his work, either with indictments, a final report to the Justice Department or even the exoneration Trump often predicts.

Wisenberg said he's not yet convinced that Mueller will even press for a presidential interview. But if the special counsel does, he predicted it would be near the end of the investigation. "You certainly don't want to have to ask him twice," Wisenberg said. "You want this investigation as wrapped up as it can be."

Robert Bennett, who helped lead Clinton's high-powered outside legal team during the Lewinsky scandal, said he thinks Mueller has "done a tremendous amount of work already and probably could do the interview sooner rather than later" with Trump.

"Mueller," he added, "would want to get this guy on the record as quick as possible."

By contrast, Bennett said, Trump's lawyers may be smart to stall until they develop a clear understanding of what Mueller might want to talk about. "The wise thing to do is delay it as long as humanly possible to see what other things fall out," he said.

Clinton's attorneys resisted Starr's attempts to get the president to testify about his relationship with Lewinsky — forcing the independent counsel to obtain the first-ever subpoena for federal grand jury testimony from a sitting president.

The president's attorneys ultimately negotiated with Starr to conduct the interview in the White House Map Room. Unlike a typical grand jury interaction, Clinton was able to have his attorneys present in the room while Starr's team posed questions. The grand jury, watching via video, also asked questions.

In the Iran-Contra investigation, President Ronald Reagan answered questions under oath on three different occasions, including twice when he was out of office. Reagan wasn't officially notified until August 1992 that he wasn't a target of independent counsel Lawrence Walsh's probe. Reagan's vice president, George H.W. Bush, gave a videotaped deposition for the Iran-Contra grand jury in early 1988, but White House attorneys fought off Walsh's attempts to question him again after he became president.

A meeting with Trump could also bring perils for Mueller himself, legal experts said. Pressing Trump for answers on potential topics ranging from his business finances to his family's role in the election could risk enraging a president who has privately mused about his power to fire the special counsel.

Katy Harriger, a Wake Forest University constitutional law professor who has written a book about the role of special prosecutors, said Mueller should interview Trump "only if it is absolutely necessary to the case."

"It would be an understatement to say this president is unpredictable, and if you can make a case without his testimony I believe you would do that," she said.

Mueller or defense attorneys may also seek Trump's testimony in connection with potential criminal cases against former Trump campaign chairman Paul Manafort, former White House national security adviser Michael Flynn or other members of the president's inner circle. If so, Trump would not be the first president to field questions involving a federal criminal investigation focused on a case involving his associates.

Special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, for example, interviewed President George W. Bush during a 70-minute session in the Oval Office in June 2004, though not under oath, as part of his probe into who leaked the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame Wilson. Fitzgerald also met with Vice President Dick Cheney.

Clinton gave four hours of videotaped testimony for the defense in the 1996 trial of then-Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker and James and Susan McDougal, which produced the first convictions in the independent counsel's Whitewater probe. He also testified under oath in September 1999 during an independent counsel investigation into allegations that Labor Secretary Alexis Herman illegally solicited campaign contributions.

Trump's lawyers could push to limit the time and scope of any interview with Mueller, and also ask for advance details about what kinds of topics and documents would be raised. Trump also could seek exemptions from questions by citing executive and attorney-client privilege.

As a last resort, Trump could invoke the Fifth Amendment — but only at the risk of political fallout. Trump criticized his Democratic campaign rival Hillary Clinton after some of her former staffers did just that rather than testify in a congressional probe into her use of a private email server. "If you're innocent, why are you taking the Fifth?" Trump asked at an Iowa rally in September 2016.

Trump has pleaded the Fifth before, however, during his 1990 divorce proceedings with his first wife, Ivana Trump.

Richard Ben-Veniste, a former Watergate prosecutor, said the risks for Trump are enormous and that Trump's routine distortion of facts would make speaking to Mueller under oath highly dangerous. "Given his proclivity toward confabulation, I have no doubt his lawyers would counsel strongly against him testifying," he said.

Trump, of course, is no stranger to legal proceedings. A USA Today database counted more than 4,000 federal and state lawsuits involving him over three decades in business. He's been interviewed repeatedly under oath, including a 2007 deposition in a libel case where he acknowledged that he determined his wealth based on his own gut. "My net worth fluctuates, and it goes up and down with the markets and with attitudes and with feelings, even my own feelings, but I try," Trump said in the case.

Bennett, the former Clinton lawyer, said Trump's experience testifying in civil cases is in an entirely different league than what he'd face with Mueller.

"It's one thing to be interviewed in a real estate thing," said Bennett, "and quite another when you're the president of the United States and you're being interviewed in connection with a criminal investigation."

Even if he never meets with Mueller's team, Trump could still wind up discussing the Russia probe in an official setting. Congressional Democrats have signaled an interest in summoning Trump to address House and Senate investigators — which would not be unprecedented.

President Gerald Ford appeared before a House Judiciary subcommittee in 1974 to explain his pardon of former President Richard Nixon. President Woodrow Wilson hosted the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at the White House in 1919 to answer questions about the post-World War I U.S. peace treaty with Germany and the establishment of the League of Nations.

And in February 1862, according to the Senate historian's office, President Abraham Lincoln met privately with the House Judiciary Committee to address accusations his wife had given a reporter an advance copy of his annual message to Congress.

America's shadow war in Africa Back

By Wesley Morgan and Bryan Bender | 10/12/2017 05:00 AM EDT

America's little-known war on terrorists in Africa is becoming more perilous as the U.S. deploys growing numbers of troops to the continent's most lawless regions, including the part of Niger where four special operations soldiers died in an ambush last week.

The escalation is occurring with little public debate — and, some military experts say, too little attention from top decision-makers in Washington. The U.S. military presence in the Sahel and sub-Saharan regions has grown to at least 1,500 troops, roughly triple the official number of American troops in Syria, according to Pentagon and White House figures.

As with Iraq, Syria and Afghanistan, the dispatch of hundreds of additional U.S. troops to countries like Niger, Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Uganda and South Sudan is another instance where President Donald Trump's "America First" rhetoric hasn't kept his administration from being drawn deeper into far-flung war zones. And the U.S. lacks a comprehensive strategy for pursuing its mission in Africa, military and intelligence experts told POLITICO.

"I don't think there is any congressional oversight in this," said Michael Shurkin, a former CIA analyst specializing in Africa who is now a researcher at the Rand Corp., a Pentagon-funded think tank.

He also pointed to vacancies in top policymaking posts in the State and Defense departments, saying they've left military operations such as Africa Command and its special operations component "pretty much doing their own thing."

"It is not that there is a good policy or bad policy," Shurkin said. "There is just no policy. It is inertia."

Last week's deadly attack has thrust into the limelight a series of dangerous military deployments that normally receive scant attention compared with the far larger military missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

A central focus of the mission is the vast desert nation of Niger, nearly twice the size of Texas, which has been a magnet for jihadists of many stripes, including those recruited locally and so-called foreign fighters drawn from North Africa, the Middle East and beyond.

In June, the official number of U.S. troops supporting Niger's military as it fights the militant groups was 645, up from 575 in December 2016. But now it's at least 800, according to the Pentagon.

Many of the troops are Green Berets, Navy SEALs and Marine Raiders, but officials said the reinforcements have mostly been Air Force personnel who are there to manage a surge in surveillance flights by unmanned drones and manned spy planes.

That's a significant jump from the 100 troops that then-President Barack Obama deployed to Niger in 2013, notes a new report from the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, the research arm of Congress. "This trend has coincided with sizable increases in U.S. security assistance for African countries over the past decade, of which Niger has been a major beneficiary."

Plans are also underway to accommodate more forces, including $50 million that the Air Force requested to construct an air strip in the northern city of Agadez, considered one of the most volatile areas of the country.

The U.S. military presence has also been expanding elsewhere in the region.

As of June, another 300 U.S. troops were operating in neighboring Cameroon, up from 285 in December, according to the White House notifications to Congress required under the War Powers Act.

At least 410 more U.S. military personnel are nearby in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Central African Republic, Uganda and South Sudan, targeting the Lord's Resistance Army. Those numbers, also from June, were the first public estimates of the U.S. military presence in that area.

A Pentagon spokeswoman, Maj. Audricia Harris, confirmed the increase in American troops in Niger but did not respond to inquiries about more up-to-date U.S. troop levels elsewhere in the region.

U.S. intelligence has warned in recent months about the growing Islamic militant threat in the region that stretches from Mali in the northwest to South Sudan and Uganda in East Africa — and a number of countries in between.

"In North and West Africa, al-Qa'ida in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) escalated its attacks on Westerners in 2016 with two high-profile attacks in Burkina Faso and Cote d'Ivoire," Dan Coats, the director of national intelligence, reported to Congress in May. "It merged with allies in 2017 to form a new group intended to promote unity among Mali-based jihadists, extend the jihad beyond the Sahara and Sahel region, increase military action, and speed up recruitment of fighters."

Current and former military officials say the distinction between advising and combat is blurring as U.S. troops expand their footprint and increase the patrols they conduct in terrorist sanctuaries alongside local allies.

"You're damn right they're in harm's way," said a former military officer with direct knowledge of the Africa operations who was not authorized to speak publicly, "because we are accompanying the indigenous forces and those forces are fighting an active, thinking enemy there."

The level of danger to U.S. troops had been on display even before the deadly ambush in Niger last week.

Rep. Chris Smith, a New Jersey Republican who chairs the House Foreign Affairs Africa, Global Health, Global Human Rights, and International Organizations Subcommittee, said after the attack that "this was the first attack on U.S. forces on the ground in Niger."

But two military officers — one current and one former — with direct knowledge of the operations in Niger told POLITICO that troops had previously been injured by an improvised explosive device or mine, though it remains unclear whether Americans were deliberately targeted in that incident.

In the field, the American advisory mission in Niger relies on a mix of Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs and Marine Raiders. They go along on missions with several local forces, including a commando unit called the Expeditionary Forces of Niger.

The ill-fated patrol last week was an Expeditionary Forces mission, in a part of the country where troops are trying to hunt down and disrupt convoys of smugglers who travel through Niger's open brush land from Mali and Chad to Libya carrying arms and terrorist funds. It is one of several areas in the broader Lake Chad Basin where advisers accompany the Expeditionary Forces and other local units.

While the Americans "stay back from actual raid," the former military officer related, sometimes advisers have been under fire.

"We would go to the last covered and concealed spot" when going along with partner forces on a combat mission and then stay back from the actual raid, the former military source said. "But of course there's no concealment out there" in an arid landscape with little vegetation to hide behind.

But as the military effort ramps up, so have concerns that the Trump administration lacks a comprehensive strategy for the region. Such a strategy would also emphasize more non-military tools such as economic aid and cooperation with allies to strengthen democratic institutions in some of the world's poorest nations.

"There is a tendency to militarize things by deferring to the military," Shurkin said, adding that the military effort "should be part of a larger strategy that will include other types of assistance."

"You will end up with this piecemeal approach — focused on military stuff but in a very narrow way," he added, noting that the U.S. military is only training a few elite units in these nations.

A senior State Department official on Wednesday told Congress that the administration is seeking to do more to assist countries hardest hit by the scourge of terrorist groups.

Donald Yamamoto, an acting assistant secretary of state, told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee that the the administration's $5.2 billion foreign aid budget next year will give priority to Mali, Nigeria and other African nations where Islamic terrorist groups have gained strength.

He called promoting these fragile states "a critical priority for the United States in Africa."

But Congress received a warning last week that the larger U.S. military presence, along with that of other allies like the French, may already be angering local populations prone to the jihadist message.

"The growing foreign military footprint in the country appears to have fed a local backlash against both the government and Western countries," the Congressional Research Service report said.

"One risk is that it is ineffectual and we are wasting money," Shurkin said of the African counterterrorism mission. "We can also make things worse. Mucking around you bound to inflame things, exacerbate problems. We have no idea who these people are, which could be very, very dangerous."

Army Lt. Gen. Kenneth Tovo, who oversees all Army special operations forces, pledged in an address Wednesday to the Association of the United States Army in Washington to get to the bottom of what happened to the troops killed in Niger last week.

"I think we owe that to the American people, we owe that to the mothers, fathers, and wives of the fallen, to look critically from every echelon to see if we can do our job better," Tovo said. "I think it highlights the fact that really every mission around the world that we're undertaking has got elements of risk."

Both military sources with knowledge of the Niger operations questioned just how much the missions are accomplishing.

"I would be hesitant to say we and the Nigeriens are having significant effects in that part of Niger up near Mali," said the former officer.

"We're having an effect," he added. "Is it going to win the war? No, because the war will never end."

Will Collins leave the Senate? Announcement coming Friday Back

By Seung Min Kim and Burgess Everett | 10/12/2017 12:35 PM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) will announce at a local Chamber of Commerce event on Friday whether she will run for governor — a decision that remains shrouded in secrecy and could upend the Senate political landscape.

The influential moderate plans to make the announcement during a speech she's giving on health care in Rockport, Maine, according to a source familiar with the event. The speech is scheduled to begin at 8 a.m.

Collins has wrestled for months with whether to leave the Senate to launch a 2018 gubernatorial run, and has given few clues about where she will ultimately land. Her Senate colleagues, particularly fellow moderates, have been urging Collins to stay, and senior Republicans said this week that they were completely in the dark about what Collins will do.

One of a handful of moderates left in the Senate, Collins was first elected to the Senate in 1996 and is not up for reelection until 2020. Under Maine law, the governor would tap a replacement to serve out the rest of Collins' Senate term should she be elected as the state's chief executive. LePage is term-limited.

Because of her centrist politics, Collins has assumed an outsize role in contentious policy battles in the Senate, where Republicans hold a narrow, 52-seat majority and have been battling Democrats generally unified against major pieces of the GOP agenda. The senator opposed multiple iterations of the Senate GOP's plans to dismantle and replace Obamacare, helping to contribute to the repeal effort's demise.

Her exit could also hand Democrats another Senate seat. It would create a dynamic similar to that in 2012, when moderate Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) retired and Sen. Angus King, an independent who caucuses with Democrats, handily won election.

"In the absence of Susan Collins, Maine becomes a whole different place," said Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), who served as chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 2014, the last time Collins was on the ballot.

But while fellow senators are urging Collins to remain in the Senate, they're also sympathetic to her wishes to be closer to home.

"For people like me and Susan, our life isn't here," said Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), a close friend of Collins who wants her to stay. "Our life is back in our home state. And I think that's really a big part of it, too."

BACKTRACKING ON ETHANOL: President Donald Trump's pick to lead the Council of Environmental Quality reversed her previous opposition to the federal ethanol mandate and softened her stance on climate change at a confirmation hearing this morning.

Kathleen Hartnett White faced pressure from corn-state Sens. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.), Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) and Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) over her past criticism of the Renewable Fuel Standard. White said her previous criticism of the program as "ethically dubious" was based on flawed data. Now, she told the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, she "solidly" supports Trump's backing of ethanol producers and the RFS.

The CEQ pick also said scientific studies should not "dictate" government policies, even as she softened some of her previous comments casting doubt on human-influenced climate change. White said she believes human activity contributes to climate change, but reiterated she does not believe the extent of that contribution is known with precision — a position that's the norm for many within the Trump administration, Alex Guillén reports.

MURRAY WORK IN FOCUS: Andrew Wheeler, the deputy EPA administrator nominee who also testified this morning, faced numerous questions over his role as a lobbyist for Murray Energy, which would benefit from administration policies. Wheeler acknowledged representing the company in meetings with Energy Department and congressional officials to support Trump administration efforts to prop up ailing coal-fired power plants, Alex reports. But he denied contributing to a memo that CEO Bob Murray gave to Trump soon after the election.

Asked about ethanol, Wheeler told Ernst he would make sure EPA delivered a determination on whether the agency could grant a waiver to allow year-round sale of 15 percent ethanol using its existing authority. Ernst wants a yay-or-nay from EPA so she and her colleagues know if they need to get back to work on legislation that would accomplish the goal. "As long as I'm not pre-judging the answer, I can commit to that," Wheeler told her.

ICAHN SUBPOENAED: Federal investigators issued subpoenas for information on Carl Icahn's efforts to change biofuel policy, while he was serving as an informal adviser to Trump, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. The U.S. attorney's office for the Southern District of New York "recently contacted Icahn Enterprises L.P. seeking production of information pertaining to our and Mr. Icahn's activities relating to the Renewable Fuels Standard and Mr. Icahn's role as an advisor to the President," according to a 10-Q filing that Icahn Enterprises filed on Friday with the SEC. Read more.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. I'm your host Kelsey Tamborrino. * Presented by ExxonMobil: We're collaborating with FuelCell Energy on a novel idea to use fuel cells to capture carbon at natural gas power plants, and in the process reduce emissions and increase electrical output. This technology could be a game changer in addressing the world's growing need for energy, while also reducing the impact on the environment. Learn more. **

WEHRUM VOTE COMING: Trump's nominee to lead EPA's air office, William Wehrum, will get a Senate cloture vote this afternoon, setting him up to be confirmed as soon as Thursday, Anthony Adragna reports.

WHAT'S THE HOLD UP? Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke sent a letter to Senate leadership demanding "immediate action" on four nominees to his agency, some of whom have waited four times as long as their predecessors for a vote. He called for the chamber to immediately process the nominations of Brenda Burman to lead the Bureau of Reclamation, Susan Combs to be assistant secretary of policy management and budget, Joseph Balash to be assistant secretary for Land and Minerals Management and Ryan Nelson to be agency solicitor, Anthony reports. "Several of our nominees for leadership positions have been waiting an exorbitant amount of time to be confirmed in the Senate," Zinke wrote. "These delays are hampering DOI's ability to do the work of the people we are all supposed to be serving."

HOUSE ENERGY BILL ADVANCES: The House Natural Resources Committee reported an energy bill out of markup today, but without the support of Louisiana Republican Garret Graves. The bill, H.R. 4239 \(115\), would increase the offshore energy revenue-sharing cap and expand the program to include coastal Atlantic states, but Graves said he also wants to see Congress change the formula by which revenues are distributed to address shortfalls in money to restore coastal wetlands in his home state. "We have been speaking for not weeks but months on ways to improve the revenue sharing for the state of Louisiana," Graves told the committee, something he said the current bill does not address. "I can't explain this to people at home. I won't even try to." Graves did not offer any amendments today, and Chairman Rob Bishop said his concerns could be addressed through separate legislation. The energy bill is expected to hit the House floor in the coming weeks, but its prospects in the Senate are murky.

For the birds: The committee adopted along party lines an amendment from Liz Cheney (R-Wyo.) that would bar the government from enforcing the Migratory Birds Act against energy companies that harm protected species via actions deemed "accidental or incidental" to their operations.

CLIMATE REPORT NOT A FACTOR IN CPP DECISION: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt told USA Today the recent National Climate Assessment report showing human activity is the main cause of climate change will not affect his decision to withdraw the Clean Power Plan. "We're taking the very necessary step to evaluate our authority under the Clean Air Act and we'll take steps that are required to issue a subsequent rule. That's our focus," Pruitt said. "Does this report have any bearing on that? No it doesn't. It doesn't impact the withdrawal and it doesn't impact the replacement." Emily Holden has more.

N.C. DISAVOWS SAB APPOINTEE: Donald van der Vaart will not represent North Carolina's Department of Environmental Quality, which he used to head, or the state in his recent appointment to EPA's Science Advisory Board. Alex reports Van der Vaart "demoted himself at DEQ to a non-political position that cannot be removed at will following last fall's gubernatorial win by Democrat Roy Cooper. But his position on SAB will not come with Cooper's blessing, according to DEQ." The agency told local TV station WRAL, it "does not support his participation on the EPA's SAB."

EPA DINGED FOR CIVIL RIGHTS DELAYS: The Office of Special Counsel, an independent federal agency, concurs with an EPA investigation showing that the agency is taking far too long to process civil rights cases. In a letter to the president, OSC says EPA investigated whistleblower complaints and found that the Office of Civil Rights is taking an average of 491 days to issue Final Agency Decisions since 2011, far longer than the 60 days allowed by law.

TO THE LIMIT: The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today said the temporary construction stay on FERC's approval of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline is limited to active work in Pennsylvania, Darius Dixon reports. The federal panel was responding to Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Co.'s concerns about construction in other states along the route.

SPOTTED: Nuclear Energy Institute CEO Maria Korsnick was seen standing just outside the House floor this afternoon and eventually gathered quite the circle of visitors: House Energy and Commerce Chairman Greg Walden, and GOP Reps. Fred Upton, Joe Barton and John Shimkus all huddled with her. "She was really here just to have lunch with me," Barton told AE. "It was primarily just a personal conversation."

EPA'S PARKING LOT: EPA paid $840,000 for subsidized parking and $690,000 for unoccupied parking spaces over a two-year period, according to a report from the agency's inspector general today.

CLAYTON WADES INTO CORPORATE CLIMATE DEBATE: SEC Chairman Jay Clayton waded into the tension between activist investors and companies over shareholder proposals, during a speech today in New York, Pro Financial Services' Patrick Temple-West reports. Much like the proposal Exxon Mobil faced earlier this year, when the company was asked to report climate change risks and its board ultimately recommended voting against the proposal. "History has shown that shareholder proposals can gain traction and lead to corporate governance changes that better track the long-term interests of Main Street investors," Clayton said, acknowledging these proposals come with added costs for companies.

TRUMP TOUTS NEW PLAN FOR ENERGY PURCHASES: Twenty-four South Korean companies announced plans during the president's trip to Seoul today to purchase $57.5 billion worth of U.S. goods and services — including $22.8 billion in energy purchases, according to a joint release from both nations. Pro Trade's Doug Palmer reports more here.

CEQ nominee White flips on biofuel support Back

By Eric Wolff and Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 11:37 AM EDT

Kathleen Hartnett White reversed her position on biofuels at her confirmation hearing today, telling senators she now backed the federal program she once criticized as "ethically dubious."

Hartnett White, who has been nominated to lead the Council on Environmental Quality, was pressed by Sens. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.), Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) and Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) on her past comments calling for the elimination of the Renewable Fuel Standard. President Donald Trump has been a strong backer of ethanol producers and the RFS.

"I solidly support his support," she told Rounds.

Hartnett White said her past views were based on flawed data.

"In the early years of the program, I made some particularly critical questions about whether ethanol would challenge the global food supply," she said.

But, she said, Ernst had shared newer data with her. "What a great victory, and I congratulate the corn industry" on increasing production, she said.

CEQ has no direct regulatory role over the RFS, but it provides advice to the president on environmental matters like the biofuels program.

"As a child of rural American, I have painfully observed over my lifetime the decline of vibrant small towns. ... An industry like ethanol has really contributed to giving new life to rural communities and keeping families together," she said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will schedule a vote on Hartnett White's nomination.

Science shouldn't 'dictate' policy, CEQ nominee says Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 11:26 AM EDT

Kathleen Hartnett White, the nominee to run the White House's Council on Environmental Quality said scientific studies are important but should not "dictate" policy.

"I think science should overwhelmingly guide assessments and all of that but I don't think they dictate policy results," she said today at a Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing.

White, a longtime critic of climate science, said that she believes human activity contributes to climate change, but that she does not believe the extent of that contribution is known with precision, a position adopted by a number of other Trump administration officials.

"It's likely that CO2 emissions from human activity have some influence on the climate, but ... CO2 in the atmosphere has none of the characteristics of a pollutant that contaminates and fouls and all of that that can have direct impact on human health. As an atmospheric gas, it's a plant nutrient," said White, reiterating her past comments.

As POLITICO reported in September, some scientists now suspect that heightened CO2 levels in the atmosphere are actually making plants grown for food less nutritious. And climate scientists have long linked anthropomorphic CO2 to the effects of climate change, including warming, sea level rise, more extreme weather and ocean acidification.

WHAT'S NEXT: The EPW Committee will likely vote on White's nomination to CEQ in the coming weeks.

Trump coal backer wins big under Perry's power plan Back

By Darius Dixon and Eric Wolff | 11/06/2017 05:03 AM EDT

A proposal by Energy Secretary Rick Perry to alter the nation's electricity markets would provide a windfall for a small group of companies — most strikingly one owned by coal magnate Bob Murray, a prominent backer of President Donald Trump.

Perry's plan would force consumers to subsidize ailing coal-fired and nuclear power plants with billions of dollars, in what he calls an effort to ensure that the nation's power network can withstand threats like terrorist attacks or severe weather. But his narrowly written proposal would mostly affect plants in a stretch of the Midwest and Northeast where Murray's mining company, Murray Energy, is the predominant supplier, according to a POLITICO analysis of Energy Department data.

The company and its PAC together sent $200,000 to pro-Trump election efforts last year, while Bob Murray threw an invitation-only West Virginia fundraiser for Trump in 2016.

Perry's proposal, which needs approval from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, is the Energy secretary's most aggressive step yet toward helping Trump reverse what he has denounced as former President Barack Obama's "war on coal." But while it would stimulate demand for coal, it would also increase power prices for millions of customers.

The plan has stirred up opposition from an unlikely gathering of allies, including environmental groups, the natural gas, wind and solar industries and the American Petroleum Institute, normally one of the fossil-energy world's most potent advocates in Republican politics. But it has drawn cheers from coal companies, particularly those with operations in Appalachia.

"Customers get less than nothing while a few companies and their investors get a whole lot of something," Nora Mead Brownell, a Republican former electricity regulator, said of Perry's plan, noting the high cost estimates. "Money that gets spent there doesn't get invested in doing what you really need to do, which is upgrading the grid."

Meanwhile, Bob Murray's company has publicly acknowledged that its future depends on whether Perry's plan flies.

"Murray Energy has a vital and critical interest in the outcome of this rulemaking proceeding," the company said last month in its comments to regulators. "Given the current threats to those resources, Murray Energy, along with other coal producers and related industries ... is threatened with bankruptcy and significant economic harm if those resources are forced out of the market by unreasonable and unsupportable market pricing mechanisms."

The company declined to comment on its financial status or its communications with the Trump administration. But Bob Murray has been vocal in urging Trump and Perry to aid the U.S. coal industry, after he attacked Obama as "the greatest destroyer that America has ever seen."

Since Trump's swearing-in, Murray has made personal pleas for help in face-to-face meetings with Trump and DOE officials, including Perry and Brian McCormack, Perry's chief of staff.

At those meetings in the summer, Murray urged Trump to declare a power grid emergency and force coal-fired power plants owned by one financially troubled company, FirstEnergy Solutions, to stay open even if the company sank into bankruptcy. Those plants bought about two-thirds of their coal from Murray in 2015, according to POLITICO's analysis of U.S. Energy Information Administration data.

At DOE's urging, the White House ultimately declined to declare the emergency. But Perry's new proposed rule would accomplish the same result by requiring the power markets to cover the costs to run the economically ailing plants, enabling them to keep producing power.

Ohio-based Murray Energy, the No. 5 U.S. coal producer, is the largest supplier to the dwindling number of coal-fired power plants in one stretch of the Rust Belt and Appalachia, overseen by an electricity market called the PJM Interconnection. The power plants in PJM account for roughly 44 percent of Murray's sales, according to POLITICO's analysis.

Murray's nearest competitor, industry leader Peabody Energy Corp., sold about 9 percent of its coal in that market. In total, Murray sold 24 million tons of coal to PJM merchant coal plants in 2015, far more than Peabody's 15 million tons.

"Murray is by far the largest player in the Northern Appalachian basin and de facto one of the biggest gainers if FERC acts on the DOE [proposal]," said Joe Aldina, director of coal research for the analytics and data company S&P Global.

DOE defended its proposal, and said there was a clear need for some type of action.

"There is broad and substantial support for this action beyond coal suppliers," DOE public affairs director Robert Haus said in an email, noting that even critics have called for some kind of market reform. "Filed public comments show that while supporters and critics differ on how to approach reforming the market, there is widespread consensus that FERC needs to act."

The proposal is not Perry's first effort to promote coal, which has seen its share of the national electricity supply slump from more than 50 percent a decade ago to about one-third now — a fall mostly caused by flat power consumption and gains by natural gas.

In August, Perry's department issued a report that raised questions about whether coal's decline could threaten the country's power system, and contending that coal power plants' ability to run around-the-clock and store large fuel inventories gives them advantages over natural gas or renewable power when it comes to national security. Those advantages don't help them, though, in competitive markets where power sources go head to head on price.

The DOE proposal calls for power market operators to guarantee payments to power plants that keep 90 days of fuel on site. That requirement would be virtually impossible for natural gas-fired power plants to meet — they get their fuel via pipelines — and would totally exclude wind or solar plants.

By requiring 90 days of on-site fuel, the measure would create incentives for most coal-fired power plants to increase their fuel supplies, providing a quick boost for miners.

One recent analysis by consulting firm ICF said the proposal could cost nearly $4 billion a year, while another study by Energy Innovation, a nonprofit firm that analyzes climate and energy policies, said the figure could be as high as $10.6 billion annually. Perry has dismissed concerns over the costs, asking "What's the cost of freedom?" when pressed by lawmakers.

"It's about the coal producers, frankly," said Kit Konolige, a senior utilities analyst with Bloomberg Intelligence. The rule might affect individual power producers differently, he added, but "you can certainly say it would definitely be a plus for coal miners."

Players in the power business say the rule appears to focus on the PJM market, because it would only apply to electricity generators in certain types of regional power markets. It would exclude those in regions where state regulators oversee the economics of power companies.

The rule was "certainly targeted at the PJM region," said Andy Ott, CEO of PJM, which oversees all or parts of Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Among the nation's roughly 280,000 megawatts of coal-fired power, Perry's rule is tightly written to affect only about 40,000 megawatts, according to POLITICO's analysis. Power capacity from plants owned by the companies FirstEnergy and NRG account for nearly 40 percent of that slice, according to EIA data for 2015, the most recent year for which the information is complete. Murray provided two-thirds of the coal FirstEnergy bought for its competitive plants, and only 2 percent of NRG's.

Among those plants that would benefit from the plan are four coal power generating units at FirstEnergy's Murray-supplied Sammis plant in Ohio that are set to retire within the next three years. FirstEnergy, the parent of the troubled FirstEnergy Solutions subsidiary, could see its plants sell an additional \$500 million in electricity a year if Perry's plan is enacted, but its CEO played down the notion that Perry's effort was designed to help it.

"I don't think the DOE initiative has anything to do with FirstEnergy, despite what's been reported in some of the media," CEO Chuck Jones said on an earnings call with analysts. "I think it has to do with preserving critical fuel-secure baseload generating facilities — and I think that's what it'll do, whether FirstEnergy owns them or [FirstEnergy Solutions] creditors own them or whether FES creditors sell them to a third party that we don't even know of today."

The fate of Perry's proposed rule ultimately falls to the leaders of FERC, an independent agency largely made up of technocrats that have developed the power market rules over two decades. (The agency is overseen by a five-member bipartisan panel of presidential nominees.) Perry has directed the agency to take "final action" by Dec. 11, though the agency is not required to follow his timeline.

DOE's proposal has attracted vociferous opposition from power producers and trade groups representing wind, solar and natural gas energy, and has been criticized by five former FERC chairs from both parties. Dynegy and NRG Energy, two of the power companies likely to see the biggest benefits from the plan — and which have big investments in PJM competitive coal plants — also oppose the proposal as too expensive and a distortion of the market.

DOE's plan would also provide a lifeline to money-losing nuclear plants owned by Exelon Corp., NextEra Energy and FirstEnergy. But the coal industry says its situation is the more dire.

"We don't have time to wait for regular order," said Paul Bailey, CEO of the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, noting that DOE's plan wasn't the first to tackle problems in the power markets.

"The DOE-FERC proposal just magnifies the conversation that's going on and made it more urgent. What DOE did was good," he said. "Clearly, people are focusing on this right now to a degree they wouldn't have six months ago. No doubt about that."

Wheeler attended Murray meetings on DOE coal aid but says he didn't write company's pitch Back

Andrew Wheeler, the nominee for EPA deputy administrator, says he represented Murray Energy in meetings with Energy Department and congressional officials to support Trump administration efforts to prop up ailing coal-fired power plants.

Wheeler, who counted Murray among his clients as a lobbyist at Faegre Baker Daniels, faced numerous questions at his confirmation hearing today over his work for the company, which would be one of the main beneficiaries of DOE's proposed grid rule, and its CEO Bob Murray, a top supporter of President Donald Trump. Wheeler said he attended a Murray Energy meeting at DOE where the grid proposal was discussed several months ago, as well as a meeting on Capitol Hill on the subject. He said he de-registered as a lobbyist in August.

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse pressed Wheeler over Murray's comments in a recent PBS Frontline documentary. The CEO said he gave Trump "an action plan" outlining coal policies to pursue, including eliminating the Clean Power Plan.

"I did not work on that and I do not have a copy of that memo," Wheeler told Whitehouse at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing.

Wheeler said Murray gave him a copy to read in December or January. "I looked at it and handed it back to him, I don't have it," Wheeler said, adding that he did not recall any specifics.

Whitehouse said he hopes to get a copy of the plan with the help of EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) now that Wheeler confirmed its existence.

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee will likely vote on Wheeler's nomination in the coming weeks.

Ex-Trump adviser Icahn subpoenaed by U.S. attorney over biofuels Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/08/2017 02:46 PM EDT

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York has subpoenaed former White House adviser Carl Icahn for information about his push to change the federal biofuels program, according to a SEC filing issued by his company.

Icahn Enterprises L.P. says in the Nov. 3 10-Q filing that the U.S. attorney recently contacted it "seeking production of information pertaining to our and Mr. Icahn's activities relating to the Renewable Fuels Standard and Mr. Icahn's role as an advisor to the President."

President Donald Trump named his longtime billionaire friend as an unpaid "Special Advisor to the president for Regulatory Reform" in December, though Icahn resigned that position in August after drawing criticism that his efforts to change the RFS would benefit CVR Energy, an oil refining company he owns.

"We are cooperating with the request and are providing information in response to the subpoena," the filing says. "The U.S. Attorney's office has not made any claims or allegations against us or Mr. Icahn."

Reports of Icahn's lobbying to alter the biofuels blending program — and the EPA's subsequent rejection of those changes — are believed to have driven fluctuations in the prices of biofuel credits that refiners must buy to show they are complying with the federal program.

Ethanol producers and some ethics experts complained that Icahn's push to change the federal program was a clear conflict of interest, and Senate Democrats sent letter to the SEC and CFTC demanding investigations.

Senate to vote on Wehrum nomination to lead EPA air office Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 10:53 AM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said today the chamber would vote to move forward on William Wehrum's nomination to lead EPA's air office.

He didn't specify a time but said the cloture vote would occur after the confirmation of Peter Robb to be general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. That would likely put a final vote for Wehrum on Thursday.

McConnell lauded Wehrum as "qualified" and someone "who will help undo some of the damage" he said the Obama EPA did through regulations.

"This is an office in desperate need of new leadership from someone who understands how to implement air policies in a balanced way rather than with extreme regulatory overreach," McConnell said. "Mr. Wehrum is the right person for the job."

Democrats and environmental groups have strongly opposed the nomination.

Zinke demands 'immediate action' on 4 Interior nominees Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 10:59 AM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke sent a letter to Senate leadership demanding "immediate action" on four agency nominees, some of whom have waited four times as long as their predecessors for a vote.

"Several of our nominees for leadership positions have been waiting an exorbitant amount of time to be confirmed in the Senate," he wrote in the letter obtained today. "These delays are hampering DOI's ability to do the work of the people we are all supposed to be serving."

He called for the chamber to immediately process the nominations of Brenda Burman to lead Interior's Bureau of Reclamation, Susan Combs to be Interior's assistant secretary of policy management and budget, Joseph Balash to be assistant secretary for Land and Minerals Management and Ryan Nelson to be agency solicitor.

Zinke bashed senators for working "behind the guise of the cloakroom, putting random and unknown holds on these nominations," a practice he called "senseless and unexplainable."

New U.S. climate report at odds with Trump policy Back

By Emily Holden | 11/03/2017 05:10 PM EDT

A sweeping new U.S. government report concludes that humans have pushed global temperatures to the highest level seen by modern civilization, defying the Trump administration's pronouncements that climate change is a hoax or based on unsettled science.

The report, produced by 13 agencies as part of the congressionally required National Climate Assessment, reinforced years of research that shows human activity was the main reason temperatures have soared in the past century — and they are likely to keep climbing, boosting sea levels and threatening environmental disasters.

The report contradicts President Donald Trump's rejection of climate science, his plan to withdraw the U.S. from a global pact to fight climate change and his moves to unwind a slate of policies put in place under former President Barack Obama to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

"Foremost, we conclude based on extensive evidence, that it is extremely likely that human activities are the dominant causes of global warming," said David Fahey, one of the lead authors. "For the warming over the last century, there is no convincing alternative explanation for the warming observed."

However, the White House stuck to its stance that climate "has changed and is always changing," and it pointed to portions of the report about the uncertainty around the Earth's sensitivity to greenhouse gas emissions.

White House spokesman Raj Shah said in a statement that the Trump administration "supports rigorous scientific analysis and debate," and the U.S. will continue to promote access to "affordable and reliable energy needed to grow economically," support technology and infrastructure that reduce emissions and "enable us to address future risks, including climate related risks."

Fahey, a scientist at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, told reporters on a conference call that he saw no attempt to influence the report by the Trump administration.

"I'm quite confident to say there's been no political interference in the scientific messages of this report," Fahey said.

Virginia Burkett, an Interior Department climate scientist and chair of the subcommittee on Global Change Research, emphasized that the report steered clear of recommending any policies to deal with climate change, saying it was limited to "strictly the science."

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, who said he did not believe that man-made emissions were the main cause of climate change and has moved to eliminate Obama's rules curbing carbon dioxide pollution from power plants, did not comment on the report.

The report was reviewed by scientists at the National Academies, released for public comment and screened by federal agencies under both the Obama and Trump administrations.

Juanita Constible, a special projects director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, said in a blog post the report confirms what many other previous studies had shown.

"It's essential that our federal leaders in Congress and the Executive Branch take seriously the dire conclusions from the painstaking and authoritative work in the [the report] — and more importantly, to urgently act on the findings," Constible wrote.

Bob Kopp, a climate scientist at Rutgers University and a report contributor, said the findings "reaffirmed that climate change is real, that humans are the dominant cause of warming, and that it is having an effect in the U.S. And those effects will grow more severe as long as we continue to emit carbon dioxide into the atmosphere."

Sea levels are expected to rise one to four feet by the end of the century and could swell by up to eight feet if emissions of greenhouse gases continue to rise, the Climate Science Special Report says.

Episodes of heavy rainfall are becoming more frequent and intense, and heat waves will become more common. Kopp said the report also shows the U.S. can expect more compounded extreme weather events, like the multiple hurricanes and wildfires that occurred this summer.

Annual global average temperatures are expected to rise by 2.5 degrees Fahrenheit by 2050. And although the growth in global carbon dioxide emissions is slowing, that trend is moving too slowly to keep temperatures below a dangerous tipping point of 3.6 degrees, or 2.0 degrees Celsius, above pre-industrial levels that would see more devastating impacts, the scientists found.

The report is the most comprehensive study since the last National Climate Assessment was published three years ago and the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change published its physical science report four years ago, Kopp said.

The U.S. Global Change Research Program, which coordinates the assessment, also released a draft of a second volume, which examines impacts on public health and the environment, and a draft of a report on changes in carbon levels.

The report about how climate change impacts Americans, which will undergo public comment, notes that "Americans are responding to rapid changes affecting their everyday lives and livelihoods," because of climate change.

Reservoir managers in the Colorado River Basin are adjusting to lower water levels, cities along the Gulf and Atlantic Coasts are seeing more flooding and storm surge from rising seas and heavier rains. Farms in the Midwest are adopting new crop management strategies, and communities in the western U.S. face more wildfires, it notes.

Some risks are already unavoidable while others could be reversed if greenhouse gas emissions decline, according to the report.

"Climate change puts many things Americans care about at risk, both now and in the future, and risks will intensify without action," the report says.

Eric Wolff contributed to this report.

Pruitt says climate study doesn't change his rollback plans Back

By Emily Holden | 11/08/2017 11:21 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said a U.S. government report showing human activity is the main cause of climate change will not affect his decision to withdraw the Clean Power Plan, according to an interview with USA Today.

Pruitt proposed rolling back President Barack Obama's standards for power plants last month and said his agency is reconsidering the extent of its authority to regulate greenhouse gases.

"We're taking the very necessary step to evaluate our authority under the Clean Air Act and we'll take steps that are required to issue a subsequent rule. That's our focus," Pruitt told USA Today. "Does this report have any bearing on that? No it doesn't. It doesn't impact the withdrawal and it doesn't impact the replacement."

EPA is expected to release an advanced notice of proposed rulemaking weighing agency authority and considering a replacement that would allow states to set coal plant efficiency standards, rather than spurring them to shift toward more natural gas and renewable power.

Pruitt has questioned how much humans contribute to rising temperatures, arguing it can't be measured with precision and might not pose the risks most climate scientists expect. The National Climate Assessment, compiled by 13 agencies and reviewed by the National Academies, contradicts him, finding that human activity is "extremely likely" to be the dominant cause of climate change that is already intensifying extreme weather.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA is taking comment on its proposed Clean Power Plan withdrawal through Jan. 16.

SAB appointee doesn't represent North Carolina, state says Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 10:16 AM EDT

Donald van der Vaart, the former head of North Carolina's Department of Environmental Quality, will not represent the agency or the state in his recent appointment to EPA's Science Advisory Board, the DEQ told a local television station.

Van der Vaart, a Republican who was considered for a top EPA appointment, demoted himself at DEQ to a non-political position that cannot be removed at will following last fall's gubernatorial win by Democrat Roy Cooper.

But his position on SAB will not come with Cooper's blessing, according to DEQ.

"DEQ does not support his participation on the EPA's SAB," the agency told local TV station WRAL. DEQ will not participate as a representative of the DEQ or North Carolina, the agency added.

Neither van der Vaart nor EPA immediately returned requests for comment this morning.

Court limits stay on Atlantic Sunrise to work in Pennsylvania Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 09:43 AM EDT

A federal court panel said today that a temporary construction stay on FERC's approval of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline is limited to active work in Pennsylvania.

On Monday, a three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals issued an "administrative stay" halting work on the pipeline while judges weigh whether to grant a full emergency stay on the project requested by community and environmental groups. But, concerned about construction in Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina, Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Co. requested the court clarify whether the stay request was limited to concerns about construction in Pennsylvania, to which the judges agreed.

The stay "is limited to a stay of construction activities in Pennsylvania, and does not preclude the operation of completed facilities already in service," an order from the panel this morning stated. "The administrative stay also does not preclude the installation, monitoring, inspection, and repair of necessary environmental controls, monitoring of the pipeline rights of way, or activities needed to safeguard the horizontal directional drill, as described in the motion."

Environmental and community groups sued FERC in March, saying the agency did not conduct a thorough enough climate study before it approved the $2.6 billion pipeline project. But the lawsuit is still in its early stages, and those agency critics asked the court to grant an emergency stay until their case, Allegheny Defense Project, et al v. FERC, 17-1098, is resolved.

WHAT'S NEXT: The D.C. Circuit panel must still decide whether to grant the full emergency stay but the timing of that call is unclear.

SEC's Clayton opens debate on overhaul of corporate governance rules Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 11/08/2017 11:08 AM EDT

The head of the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday proposed changing the rules for the battles between shareholders and corporate boards over issues such as executive compensation and climate change.

In a speech in New York, SEC Chairman Jay Clayton gave his most detailed remarks since he joined the agency in May, on the issue of corporate governance. Clayton said any changes to corporate governance rules are far off, but said he wanted to start a discussion about shareholder proposals and retail investor participation in voting.

"The Commission should be 'lifting the hood' and taking a hard look at whether the needs of shareholders and companies are being met," Clayton said at the Practising Law Institute.

Clayton noted that retail investors are not voting their shares. With investments predominantly in funds, which vote on behalf of shareholders, Clayton raised the question: "Are voting decisions maximizing the funds' value for those shareholders?"

"I have become increasingly concerned that the voices of long-term retail investors may be underrepresented or selectively represented in corporate governance."

He also waded into the tension between advocacy investors and companies over shareholder proposals. Religious-affiliated funds, pension funds and other advocacy investors occasionally file shareholder resolutions with companies. One of these proposals from earlier this year asked Exxon Mobil to report about what risks it faces from climate change. The company's board recommended voting against the proposal.

"History has shown that shareholder proposals can gain traction and lead to corporate governance changes that better track the long-term interests of Main Street investors," Clayton said. He also acknowledged these proposals add costs for companies.

Clayton did not say whether he would support increasing the SEC's thresholds that shareholder proposals need to meet to be filed at companies.

"My guiding principle is that we have to consider whether our rules are serving the long-term interests of Main Street investors," he said. "We need to make sure that those investors have a seat at the table as we examine the proxy process."

Separately, Clayton followed up on the agency's warnings about so-called initial coin offerings, adding potential misconduct to a list of enforcement concerns ranging from fund fee disclosure to penny stock fraud.

"There is also a distinct lack of information about many online platforms that list and trade virtual coins or tokens offered and sold in Initial Coin Offerings," he said. "Trading of tokens on these platforms appears to be susceptible to price manipulation and other fraudulent trading practices."

Up to $2.7 billion has been raised in ICO funding in the past six months, up from $100 million in the prior period, according to an Oct. 24 report by Goldman Sachs.

South Korean companies plan $57.5B in U.S. purchases Back

By Doug Palmer | 11/08/2017 08:46 AM EDT

Twenty-four South Korean companies announced plans during President Donald Trump's trip to Seoul to purchase $57.5 billion worth of U.S. goods and services, including $22.8 billion in energy purchases, the two countries said in a joint release today.

In addition, another 42 South Korean firms unveiled plans to implement 64 projects in the United States over the next four years valued at $17.3 billion, the release said.

The deals suggest Trump's constant hectoring about the size of the United States' trade deficit with its sixth-largest trading partner may have encouraged South Korean firms to collectively announce their buying plans.

U.S. goods exports to South Korea over the past five years have averaged about $43 billion annually, including energy sales in the range of $1 billion to $1.5 billion. U.S. exports of services to South Korea were estimated at $20.5 billion in 2015.

South Korean officials have previously pointed to increased purchases of U.S. liquefied natural gas as one way of closing the bilateral goods trade gap, which totaled $27.5 billion last year.

On Tuesday, Trump touted South Korean plans to buy "billions of dollars" of U.S. military equipment, which he said would also help reduce the trade gap.

The statement notes South Korea has already made $13 billion in U.S. military purchases over the past three years, and that President Moon Jae-in plans to ramp up military spending by 2022.

That will "help cover the Republic of Korea's financial commitments made by past administrations to major United States origin programs such as F-35A Joint Strike Fighter, KF-16 Fighter Jets upgrade, Patriot PAC-3 ballistic missile defense upgrade, AH-64E Apache heavy attack helicopter, Global Hawk high-altitude UAV, and AEGIS combat systems," the statement said.

Johnstown Never Believed Trump Would Help. They Still Love Him Anyway. Back

By Michael Kruse | 11/08/2017 05:06 AM EDT

JOHNSTOWN, Pa.—Pam Schilling is the reason Donald Trump is the president.

Schilling's personal story is in poignant miniature the story of this area of western Pennsylvania as a whole—one of the long-forgotten, woebegone spots in the middle of the country that gave Trump his unexpected victory last fall. She grew up in nearby Nanty Glo, the daughter and granddaughter of coal miners. She once had a union job packing meat at a grocery store, and then had to settle for less money at Walmart. Now she's 60 and retired, and last year, in April, as Trump's shocking political ascent became impossible to ignore, Schilling's 32-year-old son died of a heroin overdose. She found needles in the pockets of the clothes he wore to work in the mines before he got laid off.

Desperate for change, Schilling, like so many other once reliable Democrats in these parts, responded enthusiastically to what Trump was saying—building a wall on the Mexican border, repealing and replacing the Affordable Care Act, bringing back jobs in steel and coal. That's what Trump told them. At a raucous rally in late October, right downtown in their minor-league hockey arena, he vowed to restore the mines and the mills that had been the lifeblood of the region until they started closing some 40 years ago, triggering the "American carnage" Trump would talk about in his inaugural address: massive population loss, shrinking tax rolls, communal hopelessness and ultimately a raging opioid epidemic. When Trump won, people here were ecstatic. But they'd heard generations of politicians make big promises before, and they were also impatient for him to deliver.

"Six months to a year," catering company owner Joey Del Signore told me when we met days after the election. "A couple months," retired nurse Maggie Frear said, before saying it might take a couple of years. "He's just got to follow through with what he said he was going to do," Schilling said last November. Back then, there was an all-but-audible "or else."

A year later, the local unemployment rate has ticked down, and activity in a few coal mines has ticked up. Beyond that, though, not much has changed—at least not for the better. Johnstown and the surrounding region are struggling in the same ways and for the same reasons. The drug problem is just as bad. "There's nothing good in the area," Schilling said the other day in her living room. "I don't have anything good to say about anything in this area. It's sad." Even so, her backing for Trump is utterly undiminished: "I'm a supporter of him, 100 percent."

What I heard from Schilling is overwhelmingly what I heard in my follow-up conversations with people here who I talked to last year as well. Over the course of three rainy, dreary days last week, I revisited and shook hands with the president's base—that thirtysomething percent of the electorate who resolutely approve of the job he is doing, the segment of voters who share his view that the Russia investigation is a "witch hunt" that "has nothing to do with him," and who applaud his judicial nominees and his determination to gut the federal regulatory apparatus. But what I wasn't prepared for was how readily these same people had abandoned the contract he had made with them. Their satisfaction with Trump now seems untethered to the things they once said mattered to them the most.

"I don't know that he has done a lot to help," Frear told me. Last year, she said she wouldn't vote for him again if he didn't do what he said he was going to do. Last week, she matter-of-factly stated that she would. "Support Trump? Sure," she said. "I like him."

When I asked Del Signore about the past year here, he said he "didn't see any change because we got a new president." He nonetheless remains an ardent proponent. "He's our answer."

I asked Schilling what would happen if the next three years go the way the past one has.

"I'm not going to blame him," Schilling said. "Absolutely not."

Is there anything that could change her mind about Trump?

"Nope," she said.

All this, perhaps, is not so surprising, considering polling continues to show that—in spite of unprecedented unpopularity—nearly all people who voted for Trump would do it again. But as I compared this year's answers to last year's responses it seemed clear that the basis of people's support had morphed. Johnstown voters do not intend to hold the president accountable for the nonnegotiable pledges he made to them. It's not that the people who made Trump president have generously moved the goalposts for him. It's that they have eliminated the goalposts altogether.

This reality ought to get the attention of anyone who thinks they will win in 2018 or 2020 by running against Trump's record. His supporters here, it turns out, are energized by his bombast and his animus more than any actual accomplishments. For them, it's evidently not what he's doing so much as it is the people he's fighting. Trump is simply and unceasingly angry on their behalf, battling the people who vex them the worst—"obstructionist" Democrats, uncooperative establishment Republicans, the media, Black Lives Matter protesters and NFL players (boy oh boy do they hate kneeling NFL players) whom they see as ungrateful, disrespectful millionaires.

And they love him for this.

"I think he's doing a great job, and I just wish the hell they'd leave him alone and let him do it," Schilling said. "He shouldn't have to take any shit from anybody."

Del Signore is by his own admission not a person who's focused on policy specifics. A short, stout genial man who wears gold chains around his neck and rings on both pinkies, he last year did something for Trump he had never done for any other political candidate. The 61-year-old Johnstown native proudly planted a Trump sign in the ground in front of his catering company. And nothing that's happened in the past 12 months, he told me when we met for lunch on Italian buffet day at the Holiday Inn, has lessened his enthusiasm for the man who so energized him.

"Everybody I talk to," he said, "realizes it's not Trump who's dragging his feet. Trump's probably the most diligent, hardest-working president we've ever had in our lifetimes. It's not like he sleeps in till noon and goes golfing every weekend, like the last president did."

I stopped him, informing him that, yes, Barack Obama liked to golf, but Trump in fact does golf a lot, too—more, in fact.

Del Signore was surprised to hear this.

"Does he?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

He did not linger on this topic, smiling and changing the subject with a quip. "If I was married to his wife," Del Signore said, "I don't think I'd go anywhere."

He added: "Some of these things are like that thing he said to Billy, Billy Bob, Billy Bud"—searching, unsuccessfully, for the name Billy Bush—"on the bus, that comment he made." Del Signore shrugged. "He's a human male. I'm glad he wasn't saying, 'Hey, I like little boys.' You know? So he's not perfect."

Del Signore said he's been following politics far more than before because of Trump. Trump, he said, is just "more interesting." So now he likes watching the news. "Ninety-nine percent of the time I watch Fox," he said. "Sometimes I'll be sitting there listening to all this Fox stuff, and I'll say, 'Maybe they aren't right, maybe I'll flip to CNN'—but every time I've found that Fox has been correct, and CNN is definitely fake news."

A Catholic whose wife goes to church every Sunday, whereas he, "shame on me," does not, Del Signore told me toward the end of our lunch that some people at church told his wife that Obama is the antichrist. "She comes home and tells me these things that they tell you in church," he said. I asked him whether that's what he thinks. "I don't know," he said. "Some people say that."

If Obama, I asked, is the antichrist—whose arrival is said to precede the second coming of Christ—what would that make Trump?

"The savior?" Del Signore suggested.

Not even Trump, though, can stop what's coming, he added. "Just looking around, and putting two and two together, a little bit of business savvy, a little bit of street savvy, a little common sense, a little bit of education, you kind of deduct different things," he told me. "I think we're going to see the end of the world in our generation."

It's maybe understandable why somebody here might think this. A little more than a month after last year's election, a 5-month-old baby starved to death in her bassinet after both her parents overdosed on fentanyl, a frighteningly potent sort of synthetic heroin. It was shocking even to a community that's become all too familiar with the unremitting ravages of opioids.

One morning last week, Arch Liston, Johnstown's city manager, drove me to the neighborhood where it happened. It's called Kernville. From the cab of his silver Chevy pickup truck, he pointed out one decrepit, vacant house after another.

"Old factory houses that people have just abandoned," he said. "Abandoned. Abandoned. Abandoned."

He sighed heavily.

Many houses I saw from inside Liston's pickup bore a big X painted on a board nailed to the front, marking them as dangerously structurally unsound. If nothing else, Liston told me, it's an instruction to the fire department: If it catches fire, let it burn. There are approximately 1,400 houses with an X, Liston said, and he would tear them all down if he could. But each demolition costs roughly $7,000, and it is money the city does not have.

Last year here, the Trump signs were everywhere. This year, my eye settled on different sorts of signs. CONDEMNED. NO TRESPASSING. BEWARE OF DOG. Empty storefronts saying FOR RENT and FOR SALE. The shuttered Hey Day Diner—not far from Coney Island Lunch, a greasy-spoon staple since 1916, once a go-to for round-the-clock shifts of steelworkers, closed this past summer. The sign in the window read: THANK YOU ALL OF OUR CUSTOMERS FOR MANY YEARS OF PATRONAGE.

Liston drove by the Social Security office. "Probably the busiest building in town," he said.

There are some positives around here. Corsa Coal's Acosta mine in neighboring Somerset County opened in June. So did Robindale Energy's new Maple Springs mine. Rosebud Mining reportedly is working to reopen its facility in Cresson, but a company spokesman wouldn't comment on the status of the project. The increased activity is largely the result of spiking Chinese demand. But even with potentially several hundred new jobs, the long-term outlook for coal is grim. An industry forecast last month from the BMI Mining Report projected coal production to grow by 6 percent and 2 percent this year and next year, respectively, but also noted: This "does not reflect an expectation for President Donald Trump to revive the sector and our longer-term view out to 2021 remains decidedly downbeat." The area's unemployment rate stands at 5.2 percent, down a point from last year at this time—but that's still higher than the state and national numbers. At Johnstown's JWF Industries, a 450-employee manufacturing company, business hasn't gone up this year, owner Bill Polacek told me, but he's expecting a 30 percent jump next year. He chalks that up to Trump and his "pro-business" "mood."

But even this optimistic stance highlights some of the deep-seated troubles here. "Right now, if I could find 150 people, I'd put them to work," Polacek said. He needs machinists. He needs welders. "But it's hard to find people," he said—people with the requisite skills, people who can pass a drug test.

"We just don't have the workforce," said Liston, the city manager. "If they are employable, and have a skill set, basically they already moved out of the area."

Some of the later-in-life blue-collar workers who are still here can be loath to learn new trades. "We've heard when working with some of the miners that they are reluctant because they're very accustomed to the mining industry," said Linda Thomson, the president of JARI, a nonprofit economic development agency in Johnstown that provides precisely the kind of retraining, supported by a combination of private, state and federal funding, that could prepare somebody for a job in Polacek's plant. "They really do want to go back into the mines. So we've seen resistance to some retraining."

Polacek, a lifelong Johnstown resident and one of the city's few remaining business titans, was a staunch supporter of Trump. He has been largely pleased with his performance as president so far, he said, but Polacek does wish Trump would try to be more bipartisan and more deliberative—and also that he and his administration would pay as much attention to Johnstown now as he did during the campaign.

"We've been trying to reach out to him to say, 'Hey, remember us? We need help here,'" he told me. "That's my only frustration. I'd just like to tell Trump, 'Hello? We're still here. We're ready for you.'"

For three decades, Johnstown had a powerful friend on Capitol Hill in Rep. Jack Murtha, who steered millions in pork-barrel money to his hometown from his seat on the House Appropriations Committee. But Murtha died in 2010, and earmarks have been banned. Now, the seat is held by a Republican backbencher named Keith Rothfus. "We have not had an influx of any federal money that has assisted us since January," Liston said. Even just a part of the $1 trillion infrastructure package that Trump once talked about would help considerably, he added.

Johnstown has been resilient in the past. A catastrophic flood in 1889 killed more than 2,000 people. A flood in 1936 killed another 25. But ever since the 1977 flood that killed 85—coupled with mounting mill and mine closures and job losses due to increased global competition—the trend lines here have been almost invariably dispiriting. And so Johnstown and surrounding Cambria County, whiter, poorer and less educated than America overall, was famished for the message Trump delivered in person at War Memorial Arena last October. "Your government betrayed you, and I'm going to make it right," he told them. "We're putting your miners back to work," he told them. "Your jobs will come back under a Trump administration," he told them. "Your steel will come back," he told them.

"The change you've been waiting for will finally arrive," he pledged.

It was what they so badly wanted to hear. On November 8, 2016, in Cambria County, Trump trounced Hillary Clinton by nearly 38 points.

By last week, though, John George told me that despite what they might have said, people here didn't really believe Trump would make good on all his promises. "Deep down inside," he said, "I don't think anybody thought the steel mills were going to come back." George is the owner of "George's Song Shop" downtown. He bills it as America's oldest record store. It's been in business for 86 years. His father ran it for 30, and he's had it for the past 56. George is a Democrat, but he voted for Trump, and he would do it again, he said. His whole adult life, essentially, he's watched potential customers leave, as the population of the city has plummeted from more than 70,000 to less than 20,000. Now he sees the names and faces of some of his customers in the newspaper. In the obituaries.

In 2015, Cambria County had 58 overdose deaths. Last year, that number soared to 94. This year, the deadly epidemic is on pace for a similar toll. One of my mornings in Johnstown, I had a meeting scheduled with the coroner. I was on my way when he called to postpone.

"I apologize," said Jeff Lees. "We just got called out on two drug overdoses. We're just getting slammed here."

Something I heard last week that I didn't hear last year: resignation. Drapes drawn, Maggie Frear, the retired nurse, sat in her darkened living room and told me there really wasn't all that much Trump could do to help Johnstown and Cambria County.

"You know, we're sort of a depressed area," she said. "We're just a little area, you know—but it's a good area. Good people here. And I think he would, if he knew of a place that had a lot of problems, I think he would try to help. I don't know what he could do, or would want to do, for Johnstown, you know?"

He said he was going to bring back the steel mills.

"You're never going to get those steel mills back," she said.

"But he said he was going to," I said.

"Yeah, but how's he going to bring them back?"

"I don't know," I said, "but it's what he said, last year, and people voted for him because of it."

"They always say they want to bring the steel mills back," Frear said, "but they're going to have to do a lot of work to bring the steel mills back."

He hasn't built the wall yet, either. "I don't care about his wall," said Frear, 76. "I mean, if he gets his wall—I don't give a shit, you know? But he has a good idea: Keep 'em out."

He also hasn't repealed Obamacare. "That's Congress," she said.

And the drug scourge here continues unabated. "And it's not going to improve for a long time," she said, "until people learn, which they won't."

"But I like him," Frear reiterated. "Because he does what he says."

John Daloni is the financial secretary of the United Steelworkers Local 2632 union. Last November, many members of his union, considered for so long here, and in so many places like it, to be guaranteed voters for Democrats, flipped and went for Trump. Daloni, who had supported Clinton, reeled. "I lost 20 pounds," he told me last week when we met at the union office, adjacent to a gun store. "I had to see a cardiologist, because I honestly think my heart was broken—I spent 24 hours walking around with one of those Holter monitors. I didn't know what was happening. I felt awful."

Last week, he reported hearing for the past year at work, at Gautier Steel, exactly what I had been hearing in my conversations around town—a remarkable, undeniable, ongoing vehemence of support.

"I don't give the guy that much credit," Daloni said, referring to the president, "but man—he knows what buttons to push, and he's pushing 'em."

His insistent declarations of success no matter the reality—it's working. Trump's inveterate blame-shifting—it's working.

They don't mind his intemperate tweets. They don't mind the specter of scandal, which they dismiss as trifling nonsense. They don't mind his nuclear saber-rattling with North Korea, saying they feel safer under Trump than they did under Obama. And they don't mind his mixed record of delivering on the promises he made in their hockey arena.

So many people in so many other areas of the country watch with dismay and existential alarm Trump's Twitter hijinks, his petty feuds, his penchant for butting into areas where the president has no explicit, policy-relevant role. All of that only animates his supporters here. For them, Trump is their megaphone. He is the scriptwriter. He is a singularly effective, intuitive creator of a limitless loop of grievance and discontent that keeps them in absolute lockstep.

One afternoon last week I stopped to talk to a small group of people who had gathered on the sidewalk across the street from the Johnstown Planned Parenthood office. One woman had set up a bucket of body parts of toy babies. Gale Bala sat on a low rock wall and held a sign that said ABORTION KILLS CHILDREN. She voted for Obama in 2008. She voted for Romney in 2012. Her parents were Democrats, her steelworker husband was a Democrat, and she was a Democrat until two years ago. She voted for Trump last fall, and she'll "definitely" vote for him in 2020, too.

"He's kind of the last best hope, in my opinion," said Bala, 65, a retired high school Spanish and reading teacher. "I haven't run into anybody who's said they'd never vote for him again."

Next to Bala was a gray-haired man who told me he voted for Trump and was happy so far because "he's kept his promises."

I asked which ones.

"Border security." But there's no wall yet. "No fault of his," the man said.

What else? "Getting rid of Obamacare." But he hasn't. "Well, he's tried to."

What else? "Defunding Planned Parenthood." But he didn't. "Not his fault again," the man said.

I asked for his name. "Bill K.," he said. He wouldn't give me his last name. "I don't trust you," he said.

More than anything, what seemed to upset the people I spoke with was the National Football League players who have knelt during the national anthem to protest police brutality and racial inequality.

"As far as I'm concerned," Frear told me, "if I was the boss of these teams, I would tell 'em,

'You get your asses out there and you play, or you're not here anymore.' They're paying their salaries, for God's sake."

"Shame on them," Del Signore said over his alfredo. "These clowns are out there, making millions of dollars a year, and they're using some stupid excuse that they want equality—so I'll kneel against the flag and the national anthem?"

"You're not a fan of equality?" I asked.

"For people who deserve it and earn it," he said. "All my ancestors, Italian, 100 percent Italian, the Irish, Germans, Polish, whatever—they all came over here, settled in places like this, they worked hard and they earned the respect. They earned the success that they got. Some people don't want to do that. They just want it handed to them."

"Like NFL players?" I said.

"Well," Del Signore responded, "I hate to say what the majority of them are ..." He stopped himself short of what I thought he was about to say.

Schilling and her husband, however, did not restrain themselves.

"The thing that irritates me to no end is this NFL shit," Schilling told me in her living room. "I'm about ready to go over the top with this shit. We do not watch no NFL now." They're Dallas Cowboys fans. "We banned 'em. We don't watch it."

Schilling looked at her husband, Dave McCabe, who's 67 and a retired high school basketball coach. She nodded at me. "Tell him," she said to McCabe, "what you said the NFL is ..."

McCabe looked momentarily wary. He laughed a little. "I don't remember saying that," he said unconvincingly.

Schilling was having none of it. "You're the one that told me, liar," she said.

She looked at me.

The NFL?

"Niggers for life," Schilling said.

"For life," McCabe added.

Senate GOP to unveil tax bill that diverges from House plan Back

By Seung Min Kim and Josh Dawsey | 11/08/2017 12:39 PM EDT

Senate Republicans plan to unveil a bill to rewrite the tax code that sharply diverges from the House GOP's plan, including by not fully repealing the estate tax.

GOP leaders will brief the conference on the details of their long-awaited tax overhaul legislation on Thursday morning at 11:30 a.m. in the Strom Thurmond room at the Capitol, according to two sources.

The session is meant to walk senators who are not on the tax-writing Finance Committee through the intricacies of the GOP's tax bill before unveiling it to the public.

The plan is expected to have significant differences from the House legislation.

For instance, the Senate plans to ax the state and local tax deduction — which will deeply disappoint House Republicans from high-tax blue states — in their bill, according to multiple sources familiar with the measure.

Sources said not repealing the estate tax entirely is in part to accommodate Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), a powerful swing vote in the Senate who has said she sees no need to eliminate it, as the House plan does.

"We want to make sure we kind of walk the members through the bill, before we start talking about it publicly," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said in an interview Wednesday. "But I would say we learned a lot from the House's experience. I'm glad the House went first because hopefully some of the things they have learned from the experience, we will avoid those problems in the Senate."

Senators are also discussing how to craft their pass-through provision — which affects businesses whose taxes flow through their individual owners — so it is more palatable to the small business lobby than the House legislation.

Meanwhile, Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Mike Lee (R-Utah) have been pushing for a more generous child tax credit than was outlined in the House bill.

The Senate is expected to publicly unveil their tax bill on Thursday, although they have been waiting for the House Ways and Means Committee to finish marking up their own bill until they can roll out the Senate version.

Russia investigators probe 2016 GOP platform fight Back

By Josh Meyer | 11/08/2017 05:03 AM EDT

U.S. investigators are focusing on an enduring mystery of the 2016 election: whether Trump campaign officials made the Republican Party platform more friendly to Russia as part of some broader effort to collude with the Kremlin, according to congressional records and people familiar with the probes.

Congressional investigators have interviewed ex-Donald Trump aides and advisers including

J.D. Gordon, the national security policy representative at last year's GOP convention, about the campaign's push to remove proposed language from the 2016 Republican platform that called for giving weapons to Ukraine. People involved with crafting the platform also were expecting interest from special counsel Robert Mueller's team, such as witness interviews or producing documents, some of those sources said.

The Trump campaign's position in the platform fight was seen at the time as making the official GOP stance friendlier toward Russia because the proposed language they defeated would have endorsed sending weapons to aid the Ukrainian government's fight against pro-Russian separatists in the eastern part of the country. Many leading Republicans backed the idea, so the platform fight came as a surprise.

Now that year-old debate is getting fresh scrutiny from the ongoing investigations into how Moscow meddled in the 2016 election and whether any Trump aides were involved, including then-convention manager Paul Manafort. The president has repeatedly denied any collusion, calling the investigations a "witch hunt."

Gordon, who has been a senior national security adviser or spokesman to four GOP presidential candidates since 2012, has largely escaped the harsh spotlight on some other Trump campaign officials. But while he has not been accused of wrongdoing, he has been questioned, in part, because of his role in the platform fight and his job overseeing two campaign volunteers, Carter Page and George Papadopoulos, who communicated with Russian officials or operatives last year.

Papadopoulos pleaded guilty to lying to investigators about his interactions with Russian-linked intermediaries, and he is now cooperating with Mueller's probe. Two other senior campaign officials who were involved in the convention, Manafort and Rick Gates, were indicted last week by the special counsel on various charges stemming from their overseas lobbying work before they joined Trump's campaign.

Manafort, who remains under active investigation in the broader collusion probes, also sent an email days before the platform debate to a longtime aide with ties to Russian intelligence, offering private briefings about the campaign to a top Vladimir Putin associate and Russian oligarch he owed millions of dollars. The month before, Manafort, Donald Trump Jr. and Trump senior adviser Jared Kushner met at Trump Tower with a Kremlin-connected Russian lawyer who had promised dirt on Hillary Clinton.

Investigators are focusing, in part, on whether those activities were part of any choreographed effort by the campaign to forge closer ties to Russia or to exchange promises — such as dropping U.S. sanctions, if elected — in return for help defeating Clinton. Lawmakers continue to ask about the 2016 platform fight as part of that probe, and Page, a campaign foreign policy adviser, faced questions on the subject when he appeared before House investigators last week.

Gordon told POLITICO in a series of exchanges that he wasn't involved in any wrongdoing and that he wasn't aware of any suspect activities by Manafort or other campaign officials or advisers. He said investigators were probing other people involved in pushing the platform change that the Trump campaign opposed, though he would not identify them.

"Investigators are rightly looking into whether or not crimes were committed by individuals connected to Ukraine, including possible FARA violations and other illegal activities,"

Gordon wrote, referring to the Foreign Agents Registration Act. "I applaud them for conducting a thorough investigation as there are clearly two sides to the GOP Platform controversy."

Gordon said it would be up to Mueller to reveal whether the special counsel's office had reached out to him or interviewed him, and he declined to provide specifics of his talks with congressional investigators except to say that they covered a range of topics. He agreed to speak on the record to POLITICO only via text message exchanges, given what he said was the sensitivity of the investigations and efforts by some Trump opponents to thrust him into the middle of them.

The "stakes are too high for error. Prison, impeachment proceedings, lawsuits," he wrote in one text message.

"Impeachment of a President at stake," he wrote in another. "Would prefer people stop trying to use my head as a battering ram."

Diana Denman — a Texas delegate to the 2016 convention who pushed for the GOP platform to support providing weapons to Ukraine, the provision Trump aides fought to change — told POLITICO that she had hired a Washington-based defense lawyer within the past 10 days. She said she spent several days in Washington last week on related issues.

"It seems that I needed to do this and I was advised to do it," said Denman, who said she proposed the pro-Ukraine amendment because she thought it was in line with the GOP position and in favor of "people fighting for their freedom."

"I was told why I should not discuss anything further," she added. "I know I'm not being very helpful, but I'm locked down."

Denman is not suspected of any wrongdoing, according to people familiar with her situation, but she likely will be asked to provide documents and testimony in the coming weeks to help investigators lock down the details of what happened behind the scenes during the week before the convention in which the platform was hammered out.

"I represent Diana, and I'm not commenting," said Robert N. "Bob" Driscoll, her lawyer. A former deputy assistant attorney general, Driscoll lists as some of his specialties representing clients involved in congressional and Department of Justice investigations.

Details of the amendment fight remain in dispute. Denman said that after her proposal was offered, Gordon intervened to lobby members of the GOP foreign policy platform committee, with help from other Trump campaign officials. Gordon has denied that, but he acknowledged asking the subcommittee to table the amendment until the end of the deliberations so he could alert campaign officials.

The amendment was tabled, and the language for the official party platform ultimately was changed to offer "appropriate assistance" to Ukraine, which Gordon said reflected the original draft language.

One of the things investigators want to know is who Gordon was consulting with, and why, during the extended period when the campaign was fighting the proposed change.

Rep. Adam Schiff, the top Democrat on the House intelligence panel, queried Page about the platform change during a seven-hour interview with the committee last week, according to a transcript released on Monday.

Schiff asked Page who he had communicated with about the platform change, referring him to an email he sent to Gordon, other campaign advisers and at least one campaign official that said, "As for the Ukraine amendment, excellent work."

"Does it refresh your recollection at all about what other interactions you may have had with the campaign about the amendment?" Schiff asked, according to the transcript.

"No," Page replied. "This ... is my only interaction that I vaguely recall. And this expresses my personal opinion. And that's all that was."

Schiff also asked Page, "Did you ever communicate with Paul Manafort about the Ukraine amendment?"

"Absolutely not," Page replied.

The Senate Intelligence Committee also has been looking at the platform issue as part of its broader probe, and has "interviewed every person involved in the drafting of the campaign platform," Sen. Richard Burr, the committee chairman, said at a briefing last month.

Based on "feedback ... from the individuals who were in the room making the decision," Burr said, the committee had tentatively concluded that Trump campaign staff were "attempting to implement what they believed to be guidance to be strong, to be a strong ally in Ukraine but also leave the door open for better relations with Russia."

But, he added, the matter was "not closed, open for the continuation."

Democrats euphoric after Tuesday election romp Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti | 11/07/2017 11:00 PM EDT

Jubilant Democrats struck a defiant tone after sweeping victories across the country on Tuesday night, led by Democrat Ralph Northam's surprise pummeling of Republican Ed Gillespie in Virginia's gubernatorial race.

Surveying their first electoral sweep in half a decade after a soul-crushing 2016 campaign and a desultory start to the Donald Trump era, Democratic leaders reset their expectations for the 2018 midterms. They're now expecting a fundraising and candidate recruitment surge, powered by grass-roots fury at the Trump administration.

While most Democrats stopped short of predicting the party will take the House next year, they noted in Gillespie the failure of a candidate who tried balancing between Trump-style populism and establishment Republicanism.

"We were all under a lot of pressure saying we need to win this thing, we need a boost. But we gave a rocket boost tonight," said outgoing Democratic Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe, celebrating at Northam's election night party. The result in the race to replace him, he said, "is a rejection of Trump, of the hatred and bigoted fear that they always bring into these campaigns."

"I certainly didn't see this ass-kicking coming; this is pretty stunning," added Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.). "Republicans have two problems: their president and their agenda. And I don't think either of those liabilities are disappearing anytime soon."

The shifted landscape remains forbidding for Democrats. They must flip 24 Republican-held seats to win the House, and are forced to defend 10 incumbent senators running for reelection in states that Trump won in 2016. They must also handle a range of painful internal tactical and policy divisions threatening to rupture their unity at any moment.

Plus, Tuesday's wide victories came in one solidly Democratic state and another that's been leaning that way, making it potentially perilous to read too much into their results.

But paired with Phil Murphy's long-expected victory in New Jersey's gubernatorial election, upsets in Virginia's House of Delegates races, and wins in mayoral elections from New Hampshire to Florida, the evening presented Democrats with a night to celebrate for the first time since Trump's shocking victory in November 2016. They have repeatedly fallen short in special elections in conservative areas so far this year, but Tuesday's results wiped that slate nearly clean in the eyes of stunned party operatives and lawmakers.

After Northam's win, New Mexico Rep. Ben Ray Luján, chairman of House Democrats' campaign wing, immediately started calling potential Democratic House candidates who were on the fence about whether to run.

"Doesn't matter if you're watching CNN, Fox News, or MSNBC: There's good news for Democrats, [and] this is a nightmare scenario for Republican incumbents, especially in Virginia," Luján said, pointing to Virginia Rep. Barbara Comstock as an example of an incumbent Republican whose path to victory suddenly looks much tougher.

"The House is absolutely in play; everything is absolutely moving in our direction," Luján said.

Even before Tuesday, optimism was building among Democrats working on 2018 campaigns. As more and more Republican House members announce their retirements rather than run again in an inhospitable landscape, the victories could tilt the midterm playing field further toward Democrats by giving them a fundraising and recruitment jolt.

And at a time when Democrats have once again become enmeshed in their own civil wars over ideology, tactics and the 2016 loss, the victories provided them with hope that Republican fissures would dominate the political conversation again. Tweeting from South Korea after the Virginia race was called, Trump distanced himself from Gillespie, accusing the former Republican National Committee chairman of not "embrac[ing] me or what I stand for."

Tuesday's losses could initiate a broader debate in the GOP over a vexing question: the extent to which the party should embrace Trump in 2018.

Gillespie engaged in a tortured balancing act, refusing to campaign with the president but embracing some of the culture-war issues that Trump has championed.

On Tuesday evening, several people close to the White House argued that Gillespie should have gone further to embrace the president — and that by not appearing with him he dampened turnout from conservatives and Trump supporters whose votes he needed.

"It should serve as a wake-up call for any Republicans who are pretending there's not a political problem going into next year. Republicans in Virginia and New Jersey worked hard and knew the challenges, but voters were sending a message," said Republican operative Mike Duhaime, outgoing New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's former top strategist.

Democratic operatives were also quick to note on Tuesday evening that exit polls showed Virginians caring deeply about health care over other issues, handing ammunition to those who argue that the party should focus on bread-and-butter economic and household topics rather than zeroing in on Trump himself.

If such a focus works in a shifting battleground like Virginia — which has now voted for two straight Democratic governors and senators, and three straight Democratic presidential candidates — it is likely to work in other battlegrounds, they said.

"Americans — not just Democrats — are getting fed up with a mean-spirited, divisive, denigrating kind of politics — one that isn't focused on a prosperity agenda but is actually, even more so, doubling down on the politics of the elite, the wealthiest in our country," said Democratic New Jersey Sen. Cory Booker. "This has been a very dark year. But the north star is rising."

WHEN IN ROME, FORGET ABOUT PARIS: Secretary of State Rex Tillerson told reporters today that it's unlikely the president will make a decision on the Paris climate change agreement before he returns to the U.S. During his visit with Pope Francis, President Donald Trump was pressed by the Vatican Secretary of State on his stance on climate change, and he asked Trump to keep the U.S. in the Paris agreement.

When asked about the meeting, Tillerson said Trump "hasn't made a final decision" on the Paris deal and likely will not until "after we get home." Tillerson told reporters that there was "a good exchange [on] the difficulty of balancing addressing climate change, responses to climate change, and ensuring that you still have a thriving economy and you can still offer people jobs so they can feed their families and have a prosperous economy." The secretary and former Exxon Mobil CEO said that's "a difficult balancing act to take" and said the administration is looking forward "to having further talks with them on climate policy."

That means Trump will likely spend two days starting Friday getting pressure to stay in the deal from the heads of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United Kingdom. The Trump administration has left its options open in the preparation for the G-7 meeting, refusing to offer clear positions on climate change, Eric Wolff reports. Tillerson, asked what could come out of the G-7 meeting, told reporters he didn't expect any trade agreement, but instead "what there will be is a very frank discussion and exchange on why these trade unbalances exist."

THE POPE'S BOOK CLUB: Pope Francis presented Trump with a copy of his encyclical on climate change and the environment — Laudato Si' — along with several books during their first meeting this morning, Anthony Adrgana reports. Trump said after receiving the gifts, "Well I'll be reading them" and later added of the pope "He is something. We had a fantastic meeting."

PRUITT: CPP STILL UP IN THE AIR: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said today that he has not yet decided on a path forward for the Clean Power Plan and regulation of greenhouse gas emissions from power plants, Alex Guillén reports. "We're going to evaluate our authority under Section 111. We're going to evaluate our authority under the Clean Air Act with respect to stationary sources and make an informed decision about what Congress has empowered us to do in those areas. And that's yet to be determined," Pruitt said at an event hosted by the law firm Faegre Baker Daniels.

DOE ABANDONS MONIZ'S BOREHOLE DRAMA: Energy Secretary Rick Perry has nixed an initiative held over from his predecessor aimed at drilling a miles-deep hole as a way of disposing of nuclear waste and studying geothermal energy, the Associated Press reports. Moniz's Energy Department underestimated the degree of opposition the borehole project would face: it was initially kicked out of South Dakota and blocked in North Dakota before proposing to dig in a different South Dakota locale. Residents, local commissioners and politicians often didn't believe DOE's statements and documents professing that the boreholes would only be for research and not actual nuclear waste. DOE was caught so flatfooted that energy appropriators scolded DOE last year over the process.

EPA PUTS OUT CALL FOR NEW SCIENCE ADVISERS: EPA is officially opening the nomination process for members of a scientific advisory board targeted by the Trump administration. A notice set to run in Thursday's Federal Register seeks nominations by July 21 for the Board of Scientific Counselors, which advises the agency on research, and which lost half its members when EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt declined to renominate nine individuals earlier this month. According to the notice, the agency is seeking people from academia, industry or elsewhere with expertise in a range of issues, including atmospheric science, climate change, engineering and public health.

The board's chairwoman, University of Minnesota Professor Deborah Swackhamer, told lawmakers Tuesday she's concerned about her board's ability to function with only five members, and said she is "troubled" and "fearful" that the administration appears to be marginalizing and politicizing science.

THREE MILE ISLAND MAY CLOSE: Exelon Corp. warned today that it may have to shut down its Three Mile Island nuclear plant before its license expires. The money-losing plant lost out for the third year in a row on an opportunity to provide standby power for the PJM market, Darius Dixon reports. It was unable to promise low enough prices to participate in the 2020-21 capacity program, which offers payments to power plants for the promise of delivering electricity when regional grid operators call on them. In a statement, Exelon said the Three Mile Island plant "did not clear in auction, placing it at risk of early retirement." The company blamed the plant's woes on "continued low wholesale power prices and the lack of federal or Pennsylvania energy policies that value zero-emissions nuclear energy."

ARMY CORPS BUDGET DOCS UP: Just like many of its projects, the Army Corps of Engineers delivered its budget justification documents late. The documents detail how specific port, levee, dam and ecosystem restoration projects across the country would share the 16 percent cut proposed by the Trump administration. Workplans, explaining how the agency will use extra money sent by Congress in this year's continuing resolution, still aren't out.

Among those dispirited by the proposal is the barge industry, which had made major advances in its priorities in recent years, including getting a 29-cent-per-gallon fuel tax passed for the industry in order to fund its share of new lock and dam projects. Not only would the Trump budget proposal collect that revenue and leave much of it in the bank rather than spend on projects, but it would levy a new user fee in the industry that would also be left to accumulate in the bank, said Mike Toohey, president of the Waterways Council, Inc.

FEINSTEIN PRESSES ZINKE ON MOJAVE WATER PIPELINE: Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) is pressing Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke about a controversial water pipeline proposal that Democrats raised conflict-of-interest concerns about during hearings for Zinke's deputy. "Given that it is the mission of your department to protect and responsibly manage our natural resources, I would hope that you would not allow a single company with powerful lobbyists to circumvent our laws and degrade a national treasure for corporate profit," Feinstein wrote in a letter to Zinke today, urging him not reverse an Obama administration decision on the Cadiz pipeline.

David Bernhardt, who Trump named to be Zinke's No. 2, lobbied for the Cadiz water project, which would pump groundwater from a fragile aquifer below the Mojave desert to southern California communities. It sought to use a railroad right-of-way to avoid federal environmental review, but the Obama administration knocked down that approach. In March, the Trump administration reversed the legal opinions behind the Obama administration denial. Bernhardt said at his nomination hearing last week that he was not involved with that decision, but Maria Cantwell, the top Democrat on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee handling his nomination, has urged him to recuse himself from such issues relating to his former clients during the entirety of his tenure.

ICAHN'S BIG WIN: Billionaire Carl Icahn's oil refining company, CVR Energy Inc. saved about $60 million in the first quarter of the year as the market shifted because of expectations that the administration will alter a regulation involving renewable fuels. "It's much more than a lucky break," Bloomberg reports. "As a 'special regulatory adviser' to President Donald Trump, Icahn has been advocating the kind of relief that will benefit his company. Icahn's cost savings show how the Trump administration has let officials' outside business interests influence policy decisions." In March, Icahn said he was shorting the credits, called renewable identification numbers — a move that has already paid off for CVR, in which Icahn Enterprises LP owns an 82 percent stake. AEE ENDORSES CHATTERJEE FOR FERC: Ahead of the Senate Natural Resources Committee hearing Thursday on FERC nominees Neil Chatterjee and Rob Powelson, Advanced Energy Economy released a statement of support for one of the would-be commissioners. AEE Vice President of Federal Affairs Arvin Ganesan said in a statement that AEE "strongly supports" Chatterjee's nomination, saying he "shares our fundamental belief that markets thrive when there is true competition on the basis of all the attributes various technologies have to offer." AEE also noted it has a long-standing relationship with Powelson, particularly during his roles as Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission commissioner and as president of the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners, "but he was unable to meet with AEE, which is necessary for a formal endorsement, prior to tomorrow's confirmation hearing," it said.

Trump won't make Paris decision until he returns to U.S. Back

By Eric Wolff | 05/24/2017 11:03 AM EDT

President Donald Trump likely won't make a decision on the Paris climate treaty until he returns to the U.S., Secretary of State Rex Tillerson told reporters today.

The Vatican Secretary of State pressed Trump on climate change today and asked the president to keep the U.S. in the Paris climate agreement.

"But we had a good exchange [on] the difficulty of balancing addressing climate change, responses to climate change, and ensuring that you still have a thriving economy and you can still offer people jobs so they can feed their families and have a prosperous economy," Tillerson said, according to a pool report. "And that's a difficult balancing act to take, and so I think we had a good exchange there, and we look forward to having further talks with them on climate policy."

Pope Francis had welcomed Trump to the Vatican by handing Trump a signed copy of his encyclical calling for action on climate change. Tillerson said he did not know if the Pope discussed the issue with Trump.

When asked about the meeting on Air Force One, Tillerson said Trump "hasn't made a final decision" on the Paris deal and likely will not until "after we get home."

That means Trump will likely spend two days starting Friday getting pressure to stay in the deal from the heads of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United Kingdom. The Trump administration has left its options open in the preparation for the G-7 meeting, refusing to offer clear positions on climate change as part of the advance preparations typical for high level meetings.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump will meet with G-7 leaders, and possibly make a decision after he returns home next week.

Trump's hazy views confuse allies ahead of summit Back

By Tara Palmeri | 05/24/2017 05:10 AM EDT

BRUSSELS — President Donald Trump's vague stances on climate and trade have frustrated U.S. allies just days before a major international summit in Italy, senior French and Italian officials said.

Officials from the G-7 countries meeting later this week are crafting the formal statement they'll issue from the gathering, as is typically done ahead of such staid, prepackaged summits of world leaders. The French are leaning on Trump to clarify whether he wants to pull out of the Paris climate agreement, and Italy hopes he will agree to accept more migrants fleeing war in the Middle East or contribute funds to help Europe deal with the flood of people.

U.S. officials, however, have so far submitted broad points that fail to nail down positions on issues the leaders will discuss Friday and Saturday in Taormina, Italy, according to four foreign officials and one U.S. official reached by POLITICO.

"We haven't exactly seen the same situation before," said Pierre Vimont, a former French ambassador to the United States who said he had spoken to people involved in the G-7 negotiations. "It's been difficult to find an agreement with the Americans."

The discord could cause drama during Trump's first foreign trip as president, which has so far gone smoothly. The president hasn't made up his mind on key policies, and he has a habit of switching stances, leaving overseas allies guessing which way Trump will lean on major decisions that could affect domestic politics in their own countries.

As a presidential candidate, Trump said NATO was obsolete and that China manipulated its currency. Since taking office, he has reversed himself on both. Leaders attending the summit hope they can similarly sway him during the upcoming meetings to remain in a major climate pact and support trade negotiations with the European Union.

Trump's indecision could be a negotiating tactic designed to see what foreign leaders will offer him. A White House official who has seen the United States' key points said the U.S. so far has agreed to include only general language in the G-7 communiqué — the formal statement out of the gathering that signals the agreements reached or commitments made by participants — such as "promote economic prosperity and global growth."

"He will address unfair trade practices and other global issues, such as the role of innovation in the economy, women's equality, and food security," the official said.

But these broad strokes aren't satisfying allies who want Trump, who has not named ambassadors to countries involved, to clear up the confusion.

"Trade and climate are holding up the communiqué," said a senior French official.

Trump has long made clear that he prefers bilateral trade deals over multilateral deals like the North American Free Trade Agreement, but the European Union trades as a bloc and does not allow members like France, Italy and Germany to reach bilateral agreements.

Negotiations on an EU-U.S. trade deal known as the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership have stalled since Trump's election.

On the Paris climate agreement, a 2015 deal to tackle global warming, Trump has said he wants to give the leaders a chance to make their case to him in person. But a White House official familiar with conversations about the deal said Trump has indicated he's leaning toward backing out.

For domestic political reasons, Italian Prime Minister Paolo Gentiloni would like a commitment from the U.S. to take more migrants or provide financial support to Italy, which will likely see a surge of migrants with the change of seasons. A senior Italian diplomat said they realize the request is unlikely to be granted.

Italian officials hope that they will get clearer signals from Trump after his meeting on Wednesday with Italian President Sergio Mattarella and Italian foreign minister Angelino Alfano, though that conversation will last only about 40 minutes with translation, a senior Italian diplomat said.

There are also expected to be precise commitments on fighting terrorism as well as on the Syrian crisis, according to a French official with knowledge of the negotiations.

It's still unclear how the disputes will be resolved, but Trump has shown a willingness to go in new directions, said Vimont, the former French ambassador.

"This new U.S. administration has been much more ready to change drastically what the previous administration was doing," said Vimont. "This is why it makes the whole process of drafting a communiqué more difficult than before."

Pope gives climate encyclical to Trump Back

By Anthony Adragna | 05/24/2017 09:17 AM EDT

Pope Francis presented President Donald Trump with a copy of his encyclical on climate change and the environment — Laudato Si' — as part of several books he gifted during their first meeting this morning.

Trump said after receiving the gifts, "Well I'll be reading them" and later added of the pope "He is something. We had a fantastic meeting."

The meeting came as Trump is mulling whether to withdraw the U.S. from the Paris climate agreement.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump is expected to make a decision on Paris around the upcoming G7 summit later this week.

Pruitt: Future for carbon rules 'yet to be determined' Back

By Alex Guillén | 05/24/2017 02:04 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said today that he has not yet decided on a path forward regarding the Clean Power Plan and regulation of greenhouse gas emissions from power plants.

"We're going to evaluate our authority under Section 111. We're going to evaluate our authority under the Clean Air Act with respect to stationary sources and make an informed decision about what Congress has empowered us to do in those areas. And that's yet to be determined," Pruitt said at an event hosted by the law firm Faegre Baker Daniels.

Pruitt reiterated his uncertainty about what "tools" EPA can use under the Clean Air Act, though as Oklahoma's attorney general he sued EPA over its use of Section 111(d) to write the Clean Power Plan with fuel shifting requirements.

Agencies tend to get into trouble when they "imagine new authority" or try to "do the job of Congress," Pruitt said.

Pruitt also hinted at a much more restrained approach that he thinks would survive court challenges.

"This Supreme Court, in my view, is a Supreme Court that will say very clearly to all executive agencies, 'do the job of the statute, do the job Congress assigned to you. If you seek to do more than that, it's going to be an issue,'" he said.

Senate appropriators scold DOE for bungled borehole project Back

DOE may be pursuing a "consent-based" approach for siting nuclear projects, but lawmakers on the Senate Appropriations Committee aren't impressed with how it handled the local outreach for a research effort in North Dakota.

The $35 million DOE research project run by Battelle Memorial Institute is studying deep boreholes as a way of disposing of nuclear waste and geothermal energy. Although DOE repeatedly emphasized that no waste would be stored in this particular borehole, state and county officials in North Dakota, where the miles-deep hole was set to be dug, said they were kept in the dark. Things quickly spiraled as locals feared that radioactive waste would eventually be shipped to the area, and they moved to block it.

In the bill report for the Senate energy and water appropriations legislation approved by the Committee today, lawmakers told the agency to get its act together if it wants to pursue more controversial projects.

"The Committee supports the Department's efforts to develop a process for consent-based siting by engaging State, local, and tribal government entities," the report says. "However, The Committee directs the Department to take a more active role in future consent-based siting processes for spent nuclear fuel or any other high level waste than it has demonstrated in the deep borehole demonstration project in North Dakota."

"The Secretary is encouraged to ensure lessons learned from the demonstration project in North Dakota are incorporated into its plan to develop a process for future consent-based siting," the bill report states.

EPA science board chairwoman 'concerned' about lack of members Back

By Annie Snider | 05/23/2017 11:24 AM EDT

The chairwoman of the EPA scientific advisory board that has been targeted by the Trump administration said she is concerned about the board's ability to function with so few members.

Deborah Swackhamer, chair of EPA's Board of Scientific Counselors and a University of Minnesota professor, told the House Science Committee's environment panel that her board is down to just five members since EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt declined to renominate nine of the board's 18 members. Four members have rotated off after their second terms and two subcommittee members also resigned in protest.

"I'm obviously concerned. My committee is no longer populated. I'm anxious that it gets repopulated as quickly as possible," she said.

An EPA spokesman has said the agency is reopening the nomination process and indicated Pruitt is looking to increase industry voices on the panel.

Rep. Brian Babin (R-Texas) defended the move, arguing there was no reason to "rubber stamp" renominations when there is a pool of other interested scientists, and he questioned why "such an open and honest process" would be an issue.

But the panel's Democrats argued the move is part of a pattern of trying to undermine science, including by removing references to climate change from agency websites and deciding not to ban the pesticide chlorpyrifos despite the recommendation of EPA's scientists.

"I'm concerned that today the Trump administration is attempting to silence federal scientists and offer alternative facts rather than scientific evidence," said the panel's top Democrat, Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson (D-Texas).

Exelon warns of more nuclear woes after PJM auction Back

By Darius Dixon | 05/24/2017 11:55 AM EDT

Exelon Corp. warned today that it may have to shut down its money-losing Three Mile Island nuclear plant before its license expires after the plant lost out for the third year in a row on an opportunity to provide standby power for the PJM market.

The plant was unable to promise low enough prices to participate in the 2020-2021 capacity program, which offers payments to power plants for the promise of delivering electricity when regional grid operators call on them.

Three Mile Island "did not clear in auction, placing it at risk of early retirement," Exelon said in a statement. The company blamed the plant's woes on "continued low wholesale power prices and the lack of federal or Pennsylvania energy policies that value zero-emissions nuclear energy."

While the plant's operating license would let it run into 2034, Exelon said it only has obligations to run Three Mile Island through May 2019, leaving its fate an open question after that. "Exelon has been working with stakeholders on options for the continued operation of TMI," it said.

The 837-megawatt reactor didn't clear the two previous capacity auctions and has been losing money for five years, the company said. Its 2016 annual report labeled Three Mile Island as its plant with "the greatest risk of early retirement."

Exelon has previously warned about shutting down nuclear plants in New York and Illinois only to reverse those decisions after it successfully convinced those states to step in with new nuclear subsidy programs.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Pennsylvania legislature recently created a bipartisan, bicameral "nuclear energy caucus" although it's unclear whether when or if the group will move legislation. Nuclear-friendly programs in New York and Illinois are in the early stages of being challenged in court and will determine how other states proceed with any new energy initiatives that critics say distort electricity markets.

Trump ditches his feud in gracious visit with the pope Back

By Louis Nelson and Giada Zampano | 05/24/2017 05:54 AM EDT

VATICAN CITY — President Donald Trump visited Wednesday with Pope Francis, one of his highest profile feuding partners from last year's campaign, exchanging gifts in a meeting that the president labeled "fantastic."

Trump's stop at the Vatican comes amid a nine-day, multi-nation trip, his first as president. Trump also met Wednesday with Italian political leaders, but the visit with Pope Francis was widely considered one of the trip's crucial moments, given the rhetoric the two men had hurled at one another from across the Atlantic during the presidential election.

The president was effusively gracious to the pope throughout the meeting, according to the traveling pool of reporters who were allowed to observe some of Trump's time with him, thanking him repeatedly as they exchanged gifts. Trump again told the pope, "Thank you. Thank you. I won't forget what you said," as their meeting came to a close. Pope Francis responded by telling the president "buena suerte," Spanish for "good luck."

"Honor of a lifetime to meet His Holiness Pope Francis. I leave the Vatican more determined than ever to pursue PEACE in our world," Trump wrote on Twitter following his visit.

Trump was accompanied at the meetings, which a traveling pool of reporters was briefly allowed to see, by senior adviser and son-in-law Jared Kushner and his wife Ivanka Trump, the president's daughter who is also a White House adviser. Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, First Lady Melania Trump and National Security Adviser H.R. McMaster were also among the U.S. delegation.

Both the first lady and the president's daughter wore black dresses and black veils, in accordance with the Vatican custom for women who meet the pontiff. Pope Francis could be heard by reporters asking the first lady, who is from Slovenia, if she had been giving the president potizza, a Slovenian dessert.

A readout of the visit provided by the Vatican called the meeting between the two men "cordial" and said they spoke of "the promotion of peace in the world through political negotiation and inter-religious dialogue, with particular reference to the situation in the Middle East and the protection of Christian communities."

Both Trump and the pope share a "joint commitment in favor of life and freedom of worship and conscience," the Vatican noted, as well as a hope for a "serene collaboration" between the U.S. government and the Catholic Church in the U.S. on issues including immigration, healthcare and education.

The president presented Pope Francis with a first edition set of books written by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., as well as a bronze statue that the White House said "represents hope for a peaceful tomorrow."

"This is a gift for you. These are books from Martin Luther King. I think you will enjoy them," Trump told the pope.

The pope, in return, gave Trump a set of his own writings, including his 2015 encyclical on climate change and the environment. Also among the pope's gifts to Trump was a copy of this year's World Day of Peace message, which the Pope said he had personally signed for Trump. The president told Pope Francis that "I'll be reading" what he was given.

Also among the gifts for Trump was a medal made by a Roman artist with an olive branch on it, which the pope said symbolized peace. The president responded by telling Pope Francis that "we can use peace."

The meeting, which the pool report noted was stiff at its start, marked a dramatic warming between the two leaders, who have regularly been at odds over issues including immigration and refugees. The pope has been especially critical of Trump's promise to build a wall along U.S.-Mexico border, visiting and saying mass along the Mexican side of the border and telling reporters last year that "A person who thinks only about building walls, wherever they may be, and not building bridges, is not Christian."

Trump called the pope's statement "disgraceful" in a statement released by his campaign, adding that "if and when the Vatican is attacked by ISIS, which as everyone knows is ISIS's ultimate trophy, I can promise you that the Pope would have only wished and prayed that Donald Trump would have been President because this would not have happened."

How Trump killed political mudslinging Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti | 05/24/2017 05:15 AM EDT

GREAT FALLS, Mont. — In Montana's upcoming special election, Republican Greg Gianforte and Democrat Rob Quist are getting pounded on the airwaves and in the local papers. Democrats paint Gianforte as an out-of-touch plutocrat with financial ties to Russia and ISIS. Republicans frame Quist, a musician, as a tax-dodging pothead who's skipped out on his debts and performed at a nudist resort.

Yet political pros from Kalispell to Washington, D.C. are amazed that so little of the mud seems to be sticking.

Now some are wondering if it's the new normal after a bitter 2016 presidential election campaign marked by an avalanche of attacks and sensational revelations against Donald Trump that once would have doomed candidates to defeat.

"The threshold for oppo is certainly higher and the shock value is at a different level given Trump," said longtime Democratic strategist Zac Petkanas, a veteran of the Democratic National Committee and the Hillary Clinton campaign, pointing to a new, hyper-charged political landscape constantly filled with Trump news.

Private GOP polling shows Thursday's contest for Montana's lone seat in the House of Representatives has tightened slightly in the home stretch. Gianforte confirmed as much on Tuesday, twice declaring to roughly 40 residents in a park here that, "This race is closer than it should be."

Among other things, Gianforte was still dealing with political blowback from the health care reform bill — the New York Times reported that he had praised his party's unpopular American Health Care Act in a private call with Washington lobbyists after refusing to take a public stance on it earlier in the day.

But that wasn't all. He's been the subject of reports asserting he has financial ties to Russian companies under sanction by the United States, and that he owns a stake in a Swiss cement company accused of making payments to ISIS.

Yet Gianforte remains the favorite, leading strategists to question what exactly it will take to break through in a noisy political ecosystem dominated by Trump, and whether the opposition research hits on him have just faded into background noise.

"There's been so much money thrown at this race — it's the most expensive race in Montana's history and the shortest race in Montana's history — [that] it's reached a saturation point," said Montana GOP Sen. Steve Daines, who held the House seat from 2013 to 2015 and is close to Gianforte.

Local operatives on both sides say their internal polling numbers for Quist have also barely budged, despite reports of the Democrat's rocky financial history — including tax liens — regular marijuana use and news that he was taking a salary from his campaign. (Public polling has been sparse for this race.)

"What moves a voter is not always going to align with what the national media is covering in a given day, so you need to adapt for that reality in the Trump era," said Jessica Mackler, president of American Bridge, the main Democratic opposition research group. That means the onus is now on researchers to find new ways to distribute their material, she said, indicating that the circulation of packaged hits online might be more effective than trying to place them in a traditional press that's so focused on Trump.

Some trace the phenomenon directly to the new president, on whom opponents on both sides of the aisle struggled to land a campaign-altering punch. It wasn't that research had no effect on Trump by November 2016 — he entered office as the least popular president-elect ever, Mackler noted — but his opponents were so overwhelmed with the amount of material suddenly flooding the zone that they were unsuccessful in using it to create a single narrative against him that resonated with enough voters.

"If you think of a campaign as a ship sailing from Point A to Point B, the role of opposition research on either side is missiles that sink the ship by driving the hull underwater," explained Colin Reed, the executive director of America Rising, the largest Republican opposition research firm.

"If you look at a guy like Donald Trump, he is someone who had decades worth of universal name ID. He was a reality star with a show, people knew who he was, he had lived and thrived in the busiest media market in the country. So he had a hull that could withstand attacks, because people felt like they knew him," said Reed, whose group spent years going after Hillary Clinton and successfully driving her favorability rating down ahead of 2016.

But with Trump now in office after a scarring campaign, the political media environment is desensitized to what would previously be major surprises, said researchers on both sides, pointing to how little national attention has been paid to Quist and Gianforte's headlines, considering their shock value and the national focus on their special election.

With the threshold for breakthrough oppo suddenly higher than ever, the parties are placing an extra premium on finding the kind of penetrating intel that might cut through the muddle. That's why the research department was the only one deemed important enough to be left intact as the Democratic Party's new chairman took over this year. It's why the RNC's research staff has ballooned to 10 researchers, and why Washington is now experiencing a boom in oppo, as outside groups staff up and Democrats search for the silver bullet that they hope will derail the Trump presidency.

"We've found that we need an even larger war room operation, and an even larger rapid response operation," said Mike Reed, the Republican National Committee's research director. "We need to always just be faster in responding. There's a need for speed, to push back, to break through the cycle."

In Georgia's Sixth Congressional District, Republicans believe oppo work on Democrat Jon Ossoff — like revealing that he doesn't live in the district and that he'd done work for Al Jazeera — did have some impact, crediting it with helping to suppress his support enough to force a runoff vote in April. But that race is widely regarded as a toss-up now, in a district HHS Secretary Tom Price routinely won by 20 or more — suggesting that Ossoff is in fact vastly over-performing and relatively undamaged.

"For better or worse, campaigns have become another form of reality television where colorful aspects of a candidate's biography may not be treated as a vice at all, but rather as proof of their authenticity," said Brian Fallon, a senior Clinton aide in 2016. "In the aftermath of Trump's election, it's fair to wonder whether anything is disqualifying anymore."

GOP turns to familiar foil amid Trump woes: Pelosi Back

By Heather Caygle and Gabriel Debenedetti | 05/24/2017 05:20 AM EDT

House Republicans are turning to a reliable villain to rev up their listless base: Nancy Pelosi.

Afraid of the ripple effect of President Donald Trump's early scandals, the GOP is looking to motivate conservative voters by painting all Democratic candidates with Pelosi's "San Francisco liberal values." It's an old standby for Republicans, which they're testing out again in special House elections in Montana and Georgia, where Democrats are running unexpectedly strong in GOP-friendly districts.

"I think we'll see if it works. I believe it still works," National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Steve Stivers of Ohio said of the GOP focus on Pelosi.

Pelosi remains a deeply unpopular figure among GOP voters. She has only a 14 percent favorability rating with Republicans, according to a Politico/Morning Consult poll released Wednesday. And she doesn't do much better with independents — just 20 percent of those voters view her favorably.

But in what's shaping up to be a tough environment for Republicans driven by Trump's tumultuous administration, some Democrats are starting to think, or at least hope, that the Pelosi-bashing trick might be growing old.

"A national campaign, using her as the boogeyman, I don't think it's going to work anymore," said Rep. Gerry Connolly (D-Va.). "It's a playbook that worked for them. And people tend to stay with what works until it doesn't. ... But I think it's a hopeful smokescreen on their part that maybe [they think] will deflect from Trump."

Republicans have long demonized Pelosi, even before she won the speaker's gavel in 2006, in a strategy that her supporters say reeks of sexism. But the plan for the most part has been wildly successful, with the GOP controlling the House since 2010 and likely for the foreseeable future. And with Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton gone but Pelosi still House minority leader, she's Republicans' primary Democratic punching bag.

This time, Republicans aren't the only ones tuning in to see whether vilifying Pelosi is still a winning strategy. Pelosi's caucus, restless after years in the minority under her leadership, is watching what happens now more than ever. And some are already privately demanding change if Democrats don't pick up one of the special election seats up for grabs.

"There's a real widespread sense if the Republicans' only attack on us is Nancy Pelosi, why are we leading with our chin?" said one House Democrat. "There's a greater and greater sense that it's time for a change in leadership."

Pelosi's advocates say any talk of a change in leadership is minor at most and completely unrealistic. And, they argue, Republicans are only targeting her because they have nothing to show for having all the power in Washington.

"The GOP brand is in tatters, and their top legislative priority, Trumpcare, polls at 17 percent," said Jorge Aguilar, executive director of Pelosi for Congress. "The tired, rehashed strategy of attacking Pelosi doesn't work and demonstrates just how bankrupt of ideas House Republicans are."

"Clearly, House Republicans recognize they have no message to run on in the midterms and they're desperately grasping at straws," said Tyler Law, a Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman.

While the special election for Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price's old seat in Georgia's 6th Congressional District pits Republican Karen Handel against Democrat Jon Ossoff, Republicans in Georgia and Washington have tried to shove Pelosi front and center, peppering mentions of her name and her picture into paid ads for months.

Republicans have used the Pelosi strategy so frequently that many Democratic strategists working on House races now bake in an assumption that they'll have to defend against that attack into their initial game plan. And that pattern has continued in the closing days of the race for Montana's at-large district, which was vacated by now-Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke.

A recent spot run by the Congressional Leadership Fund, the super PAC affiliated with Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), for example, closes by placing pictures of Democratic candidate Rob Quist and Pelosi next to each other.

"Quist doesn't stand with you, and in Washington Quist would stand with Nancy Pelosi and her liberal, out-of-touch agenda, not Montana," the narrator says. "You wouldn't trust Pelosi with your vote. Why trust Rob Quist?"

In a new robo-call running in the state, Vice President Mike Pence also gets in on the action, urging voters, "Don't let Nancy Pelosi and the liberal Democrats take this seat out of Republican hands."

One sign outside of Helena even included the words: Quist + Pelosi = GUN CONTROL.

Pelosi has appeared far more than any other national figure in Republican advertising in the two marquee special election races — even though Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders spent the past weekend in Montana campaigning for Quist, and Pelosi's personal involvement has been minimal. The ads paint her as too liberal and too out-of-touch for the voters in the districts.

And that's been a cause for consternation among Democrats involved in both campaigns, as well as for those thinking about the party's broader strategy as it looks to win over the kind of Republican-leaning and independent voters it will need to seize the House in 2018.

Several rank-and-file Democrats said there have been quiet, small-group discussions recently about whether there should be a leadership shakeup ahead of the 2018 midterms, and, if so, when.

Still, it seems unlikely that House Democrats, long publicly resistant to the party change that many privately say is needed, would choose now to turn their caucus upside down.

Even members who say it's time for a fresh leadership slate — Pelosi and her deputy, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), have led the caucus since 2003 — say the intracaucus tensions aren't as discernible right now. And they're generally happy with the way Pelosi has challenged Trump, called attention to his potential ties to Russia and united the caucus to fight GOP efforts to repeal Obamacare.

But there is an increasing awareness within the caucus, lawmakers and operatives say, that Pelosi's image could haunt them in ways it never has before. If Democrats have a real chance to take back the House by making the midterms a referendum on the president — a luxury they didn't have in the Obama era — could Pelosi stand in the way?

"Watching these specials, I've thought the name Nancy Pelosi could be the finger in the dike that prevents a wave from taking over," said one long-time Democratic consultant. "And I think Democrats are silly not to think that's an issue."

To hear Republicans tell it, using Pelosi as their main cudgel is an obvious play. After Pelosi was reelected Democratic leader, Trump campaign manager Kellyanne Conway tweeted, "What a relief. I was worried they had learned from the elections & might be competitive and cohesive again."

And since Pelosi is not perceived as a "resistance" figure in the same national way that Obama or Sanders are, tying Democratic candidates to her doesn't lend them the kind of anti-Trump feeling that might appeal to some women and independents in these suburban districts, according to national operatives and pollsters.

Many Democratic strategists dismiss the idea that Pelosi's image is a serious drag on the party, noting that Trump is far better known and more controversial, and that Republicans have been running on an anti-Pelosi line long enough that they've figured out how to combat it.

"This is what Republicans do because they're pathetic little frat boys who don't have policies to run on," said one Democratic aide.

But within the House Democratic Caucus, some members have grown concerned that Republicans see a chance to replicate their success from previous midterm cycles — chatter that only grew last month after Ossoff missed a chance to avoid a runoff in his race by 2 percentage points, after months of being hammered as a Pelosi lackey.

"We should all be concerned," said one House Democrat, "that this could be a political liability for us to pick up seats."

John Bresnahan contributed to this report.

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by the National Biodiesel Board: EPA won't settle — Enbridge gets cross-border pipeline permit — Cochran not returning today

EPA WON'T SETTLE: EPA chief Scott Pruitt today signed a directive — and accompanying memo — aimed at curtailing the "sue and settle" practice from the agency. "EPA has previously sought to resolve lawsuits filed against it through consent decrees and settlement agreements that appeared to be the result of collusion with outside groups," the directive says. It calls for more agency outreach to industry groups and will require the agency to post various documents related to lawsuits online, Alex Guillén reports.

Pruitt, along with other Republicans, has long been critical of EPA for settling suits with green groups over missed statutory deadlines. Environmentalist groups and Democrats, however, say the consent decrees generally only lock in a timeline for action, not the underlying regulatory details.

The move is garnering praise from some: Daren Bakst, a research fellow in agricultural policy at The Heritage Foundation, commended EPA "for going after the egregious sue and settle practice" in a statement today. "The EPA is making it clear that the public and the integrity of the rulemaking process are no longer going to be sacrificed for the political objectives of narrow interests," Bakst said.

— Sierra Club Environmental Law Program Director Pat Gallagher called the move a perpetration of "lies about the law as an excuse for refusing enforcing it." In a statement, Gallagher said, "The government generally seeks to negotiate settlements precisely because of significant legal vulnerability — and Pruitt's abuse of the law by delaying, obstructing and blocking numerous public health safeguards means he is extremely vulnerable to being held accountable in court."

State Department approves Enbridge oil sands pipeline expansion Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/16/2017 03:20 PM EDT

The State Department today approved a cross-border permit for an Enbridge pipeline expansion that would bring up to 890,000 barrels a day of Canadian oil sands crude to refineries in the U.S. Midwest.

The Line 67 approval green-lights a project that would transport as much oil sands crude as the more controversial Keystone XL pipeline planned by TransCanada. The State Department found the expansion would serve the national interest, but the Enbridge project continues to meet resistance from environmental groups that are protesting any increase in shipments from Canadian oil sands.

Enbridge did not immediately reply to a request for comment. Its Line 67 currently has a capacity of 500,000 barrels per day.

Keystone XL remains in limbo waiting for state regulators in Nebraska to approve its route there, even after President Donald Trump made it one of his first acts to promote the pipeline.

WHAT'S NEXT: Enbridge is expected to update the Line 67 expansion plans during its third-quarter earnings next month.

Cochran still out of commission because of health woes Back

By Seung Min Kim and Burgess Everett | 10/16/2017 10:25 AM EDT

Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) will not return to Washington on Monday as planned due to continued health problems — denying Senate Republicans a reliable vote as they take up a must-pass budget later this week.

The Senate is still planning to vote on its budget this week regardless of Cochran's presence, Republican sources said. But they have little room for error with Cochran out, and GOP leaders are laboring to convince both Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky and John McCain of Arizona to support the fiscal blueprint.

Cochran's office said Monday that Cochran, who has been recovering in Mississippi from urological issues, has developed another urinary tract infection that will keep him in his home state. Doctors monitored Cochran and advised him to stay home to recover from his health conditions, his office said.

"He will continue his recuperation at home in Mississippi," Cochran's chief of staff, Brad White, said in a statement. "The senator has expressed his intention to return to the Senate when his health permits, and to fulfill his commitment and duties to the people of his state."

The statement did not indicate when Cochran, the Senate Appropriations chairman, would return to Washington, and a Cochran spokesman said only that the senator's plan is to "get back as soon as possible." The Appropriations Committee is slated to take up spending bills on Thursday, although subcommittee markups on Tuesday were postponed.

Privately, Republicans have been increasingly concerned about the health of Cochran, who is in his seventh term in the Senate.

Several sources indicated last week that Republicans are worried Cochran's absence could last through the end of the year, which would mean the chief senator overseeing government spending would not be present for the year-end funding fight. Current government funding runs out on Dec. 8.

Cochran is not up for reelection until 2020 and is viewed as a reliable leadership ally. His seat was fiercely contested in a 2014 primary, and GOP leaders poured in resources to save Cochran from the insurgent Chris McDaniel, a state senator. McDaniel is weighing a challenge to Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) next year, and could run for Cochran's seat if he ends up stepping down and a special election is scheduled.

Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), a senior member of the Appropriations Committee, is next in line to chair the committee and often plays a significant role in fiscal negotiations, a scenario that could be heightened if Cochran is gone for a prolonged period.

Cochran's absence in the Senate could also help thwart the GOP's broader agenda.

Republicans control 52 votes in the chamber, and just three defections or absences usually means that the GOP would not be able to pass a budget resolution — which is necessary to provide Republicans with procedural powers to advance a tax plan without Democratic support.

The Senate is slated to take up its budget later this week, and Paul and McCain are both viewed as potential "no" votes.

However, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), who is on trial for federal corruption charges, is also expected to be absent from the Senate this week, which would give Republicans slightly more breathing room even with Cochran's absence.

Trump freshly hints at fully pulling out of Iran deal Back

By Louis Nelson | 10/16/2017 12:19 PM EDT

President Donald Trump said Monday that he decertified Iran's compliance with a landmark nuclear agreement because he is "tired of being taken advantage of," while also hinting that the U.S. could still fully pull out of the deal.

"I feel strongly about what I did. I'm tired of being taken advantage of as a nation," the president said Monday during a meeting with his cabinet. "This nation has been taken advantage of for many, many years, for many decades, frankly, and I'm tired of watching it."

Trump announced his move to decertify Iranian compliance with the landmark 2015 nuclear deal on Friday, triggering legislation that gives Congress 60 days to decide whether or not to reimpose certain sanctions that had been lifted under the agreement. Trump has lambasted the nuclear deal, negotiated by former President Barack Obama along with the other permanent members of the United Nations Security Council and Germany, as "one of the worst and most one-sided transactions the United States has ever entered into."

The president said Monday that he is waiting for "phase two" of the deal, one that will either improve it or prompt him to withdraw the U.S. entirely. Of the latter option, the president said, "some would say that's a greater possibility."

"We'll see what phase two is. Phase two might be positive. It might be very negative. Might be a total termination," the president said. "That's a very real possibility. Some would say that's a greater possibility. But it also could turn out to be very positive. We'll see what happens."

Trump expresses wariness of Bannon's 'season of war' Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Cristiano Lima | 10/16/2017 12:44 PM EDT

President Donald Trump, who in 2016 ran as the nontraditional, nationalist insurgent riding roughshod over the establishment, on Monday expressed skepticism about Steve Bannon's attempt to produce a wave of such candidates in coming Republican primaries.

"Some of the people he may be looking at, I'm going to see if we talk him out of that," Trump said during a Rose Garden news conference when asked about Bannon's pledge to recruit primary challengers to all but one sitting Republican senator in 2018.

While it's unclear whether Trump will follow through, his comments could mark a line in the sand, with Trump appearing to describe a willingness to stand by Republican incumbents against Bannon-backed challengers.

Trump's stance was muddled, however, because roughly two hours earlier he appeared to voice support for Bannon's vowed war on establishment figures, including Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. Trump told reporters that Bannon "is a friend of mine" and is "very committed to getting things passed" when asked about the Breitbart News chief's attacks on McConnell and other GOP leaders who have failed to pass his legislative agenda.

But after a private meeting with McConnell, Trump expressed the skepticism about Bannon's efforts, especially his support for GOP Senate candidates who will challenge McConnell's leadership role.

"Just so you understand, the Republican Party is very, very unified," Trump declared during the Rose Garden news conference, with McConnell by his side.

Trump's apparent commitment to stand by incumbent Republican senators against his former campaign CEO and White House strategist shows that even a tradition-bucking president may hue to the party line in the interest of moving his agenda forward and maintaining a governing majority.

McConnell, who Bannon has been publicly critical of since being ousted from his West Wing role in August, said that despite any differences between himself and Bannon, his goal was simple: "to win elections in November."

The Senate Republican leader said that regardless of who won during the party primaries, what mattered was that they carried their victory into the general election.

"You have to nominate people who can actually win because winners make policy and losers go home," he said. In a swipe at Bannon, he cited controversial Republican candidates from recent elections who, after beating more moderate opponents in primaries, lost to Democrats in what were widely seen as winnable races.

Bannon on Saturday ratcheted up his war against the GOP establishment — and McConnell specifically — as he vowed to challenge any Senate Republican who doesn't publicly condemn attacks on Trump.

"Yeah, Mitch, the donors are not happy. They've all left you. We've cut your oxygen off," Bannon said during a speech to religious conservatives at the Values Voter Summit in Washington.

"There's a time and season for everything and right now it's a season of war against a GOP establishment," Bannon added. "It's no longer acceptable to come and pat you on the head and tell you everything is going to be fine just to get those people in office."

Since leaving the West Wing, Bannon has raised his public profile, holding campaign events and delivering speeches to further his campaign against establishment figures. He's also relying on the powerful forces of the Breitbart News platform and the support of the ultra-wealthy Mercer family to further his agenda.

Trump's own frustration with GOP establishment leaders was clear on Monday. He told reporters earlier in the day that he "can understand where Steve Bannon is coming from" given Republican lawmakers' failure so far to pass Obamacare repeal, tax reform and other big ticket items.

While Trump stressed that he had "great relationships with many senators," he gave a grim assessment of the work by GOP lawmakers on Capitol Hill. "They are not getting the job done," Trump told reporters while meeting with his Cabinet. "And I'm not going to blame myself. They are not getting the job done."

The president added that "there are Republicans frankly that should be ashamed of themselves" for their inability to convert on repealing the Affordable Care Act and passing major tax reform legislation.

But at the Rose Garden press conference, Trump and McConnell, standing side-by-side, sought to strike a united front.

"We've been friends for a long time. We are probably now — despite what we read — we're probably now, I think, at least as far as I'm concerned, closer than ever before," Trump said. "And the relationship is very good. We're fighting for the same thing."

"I wanna underscore what the president said: We have the same agenda," McConnell said.

Trump has also already shown a comfort in breaking with Bannon, joining McConnell to support Alabama Sen. Luther Strange against a primary challenge from the far-right former judge, Roy Moore.

Moore won by about nine points, and Bannon introduced him for his victory speech.

Florida's Senate race shaping up as a clash of titans Back

By Marc Caputo and Edward-Isaac Dovere | 10/16/2017 05:04 AM EDT

Sen. Bill Nelson went to Democratic leader Chuck Schumer this summer with an urgent plea.

Florida's Democratic Party was in disarray after the 2016 presidential debacle, the senator said, and he needed help from D.C. to prepare for a likely challenge next year by GOP Gov. Rick Scott, who's spent at least $86 million of his own fortune on his two gubernatorial campaigns.

Anxious about holding onto seats — and aware that a milquetoast moderate who's been in politics for 30 years might not be ideal in the current political environment — the Senate minority leader convened a meeting of party hands. Present were Democratic National Committee chair Tom Perez, his aides and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee staff. They discussed reworking budgets and underwriting the Florida Democratic Party effort to help the three-term senior senator.

Nelson told the group that Democrats desperately needed to catch up on field staff in Florida, especially in the wake of the presidential and Senate race results last year that saw Republican-leaning voters flood the polls and took even plugged-in Democrats by surprise.

"The Democrats executed the 2012 playbook to perfection in 2016," said one person who attended the meeting. Republicans "wrote a new playbook, and it was a better one. [Nelson's] point was and is that they didn't stop organizing."

Nelson is one of 10 Democrats up for reelection in states carried by President Donald Trump — and among the most vulnerable. A loss in Florida would all but relegate Democrats to the Senate minority for at least another two years; their hopes of winning the chamber next year are already exceedingly slim.

So Democrats have been targeting Scott as if he's already an announced candidate. They're airing digital ad buys against the Republican, launching early voter registration drives and coordinating sometimes-fractious progressive groups to boost Democratic voter turnout — a strategy that's paid dividends in two local elections.

The all-hands-on-deck response to Nelson's request speaks to the deep concerns among Democratic activists and elites worried about the three-term senator's lagging fundraising and the difficulty of motivating Democratic voters in off-year elections. Nelson — who took a month off from fundraising amid the recent hurricanes — is redoubling his efforts to fill his campaign coffers, notably with a series of fundraisers headlined by one of the party's rising stars, California Sen. Kamala Harris.

Democrats don't see much of a threat to Nelson if Scott doesn't run, and argue that the main reason the governor is a challenge is due to his deep pockets. Scott, who is termed out of office at the end of 2018, is expected to decide on a Senate bid by the end of this year or early next year.

"We'll all need to raise at least $60 million for Bill," said one Democrat close to Nelson, and even then the incumbent would probably "get outspent by Scott by 2-to-1."

Due to its size and 10 media markets, Florida is so expensive to campaign in that operatives say a week's worth of campaign television ads statewide could cost nearly $3 million next year. As of the second fundraising quarter this summer, Nelson had just $5 million in the bank. Scott has about $3 million in his political committee, but he's allowed to raise bigger chunks of money from corporate interests under state law as long as he's not a federal candidate.

Polls show the two are tied in a hypothetical matchup.

Nelson downplayed the urgency of his conversation with Schumer and said he wasn't special among vulnerable Democrats on the ballot next year. Schumer, he noted, has "got 10 senators, Democratic incumbents, in states that Trump won. So he's doing this for all of them."

Still, Nelson subscribes to the theory that you run unopposed or you run scared. And the 75-year-old senator — who served in the House and won two statewide elections for insurance commissioner before clinching three terms in the Senate — is pretty sure he'll face opposition.

"The way I approach an election, I assume nothing," Nelson said in April when asked about Scott. "I run scared as a jackrabbit."

The last Democrat to face Scott was former Gov. Charlie Crist, a moderate white centrist like Nelson. After their 2014 matchup, Crist described the effect of Scott's money and his formidable consulting team, OnMessage, as "a buzz saw." Nelson can expect the same treatment, according to OnMessage founder Curt Anderson, who said he can understand why Democrats are worried.

"For Schumer and the Democrats, it really comes down to a numbers game: How do you get more seats if they've got 10 of them in states Trump won?" Anderson said.

"When it comes to the Senate, every state is the same. You get one vote for each," Anderson added. "And so you say, 'Wait a minute? Where's the biggest bang for the buck?' And Florida is really difficult because of how much it costs. You can get three states somewhere else for less money than you need to spend in Florida."

And when it comes to dropping big bucks in Florida, Scott has an extra pot of money — his "Let's Get to Work" political committee — in addition to his personal millions. Since the end of the 2016 election, Scott has raised almost $3.9 million and spent nearly $3 million on ads, polls and consultants.

Under Florida law, the governor can raise and spend unlimited dollars from corporations or individuals. If he were an announced federal candidate, his fundraising would be as constrained as Nelson's, which is largely limited to so-called "hard" donations from individuals capped at $2,700 for each election.

So in delaying an official decision, Scott has an additional edge over Nelson in raising and spending money.

Privately, some Republicans have grouched that Scott has frozen the field and made it impossible for any viable GOP candidate to file and raise money. If Scott decides not to run, they say, the eventual GOP candidate will be at a disadvantage.

Anderson said none of that matters to Scott, who is focused now on his job as governor.

Nelson has never faced an opponent as tough as Scott. He dispatched two easy opponents in 2006 and 2012 to keep his seat.

But the same is true of Scott. He won his first election in 2010 and then reelection in 2014 during the midterm elections of President Barack Obama. Though those were strong Republican years, when Democrats were at pains to distance themselves from a relatively unpopular incumbent. Yet Scott never won a majority of the vote either time, winning by 1.2 and 1 percentage points, respectively.

The 2018 cycle could be a much tougher environment for Scott and other Republicans. Trump is far less popular heading into this midterm than Obama ever was, according to polls. And in two contested local elections this year, a Miami state Senate seat and the St. Petersburg mayoral race, Trump has been a drag on the Republican candidates as Democrats have enjoyed Election Day turnout advantages.

Trump has privately and publicly urged Scott to run for Senate.

Nelson has also sidled up to one of the state's most popular Republican politicians, his Senate colleague Marco Rubio. After Hurricane Irma ripped through the state, the pair went to events together throughout Florida, reinforcing Nelson's campaign theme of bipartisanship.

In contrast, Scott and Nelson weren't seen together after the hurricane. In a break with the typical non-political etiquette in response to hurricanes, the White House arranged for Scott to have an event with Small Business Administration chief Linda McMahon and didn't inform either senator.

Rubio allies said the slight made little sense because the senator is next in line to chair the Senate's small business subcommittee and oversee McMahon's department and its response to the hurricane.

"The White House wanted an event to help Scott if he runs for Senate," one Republican familiar with the matter said.

Storm politics could cut different ways in a potential Nelson vs. Scott showdown. Nelson hopes the influx of Puerto Rican evacuees to Florida after Hurricane Maria will boost his chances in 2018.

"If they will register to vote, which I'm certainly going to encourage, because I can tell you among the Puerto Rican community in the greater Orlando area, they have been very embracing of my public service," Nelson said Sunday in a San Juan press conference, according to the Miami Herald.

Since Oct. 3, more than 36,000 people from the 3.4 million-person island arrived in Miami International Airport, Orlando International Airport and Port Everglades. Thousands more arrived elsewhere in the state, which already has more than 1 million people of Puerto Rican descent. Tens of thousands more are expected.

As for Scott, while he initially received bipartisan praise immediately before Hurricane Irma hit, Democrats criticized his leadership after a power outage at a nursing home led to the death of 14 residents. They've also accused him of a type of "cronyism" for tapping a 29-year-old former travel aide, whom they say is unqualified, to run the state's emergency management department.

Scott has accused Democrats of exploiting a tragedy and has reacted to the nursing home deaths by issuing an emergency order requiring generators to power air-conditioners at the facilities. He's also called for language to be added to the state constitution to help protect nursing home residents.

But Democrats say the tragedy revealed Scott's weaknesses running the state, which may take on greater proportions as the recovery continues. Polls show that Scott, who was constantly on TV before and after the hurricane, had a boost in his approval ratings.

But Democrats predict it won't last.

"His mismanagement of Hurricane Irma," said Democratic Senate Campaign Committee communications director Lauren Passalacqua, "only magnifies a self-serving record of putting Floridians last."

Kelly tries to get empty administration jobs filled fast Back

By Nancy Cook | 10/15/2017 05:42 PM EDT

White House chief of staff John Kelly is giving Cabinet secretaries more autonomy to pick top political appointees, reversing efforts under his predecessor Reince Priebus to run most appointments through the West Wing.

Kelly's goal, according to 10 interviews with White House officials and advisers close to the administration, is to do a better job of finding candidates for the hundreds of jobs throughout the administration that remain vacant almost nine months into President Donald Trump's first term.

"Being somebody from the Department of Defense, normally you've got key people in place and a clear chain of command," said Leon Panetta, a former White House chief of staff himself and former Secretary of Defense, who spoke to Kelly around the time he accepted the White House job. "It's very difficult to run anything if you don't have people responsible in those positions."

Kelly entered the White House with an unusually clear understanding of the flaws of the personnel process, according to two people close to him.

As a Cabinet pick and then as Department of Homeland Security secretary, Kelly was frequently exasperated during the transition and early days of the administration over his inability to choose his own staff. He got into frequent spats with the White House over filling a handful of top jobs in his department, according to one of the people close to him.

Other Cabinet secretaries, including Defense Secretary James Mattis and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, have had their own problems with the White House personnel office, with Mattis trying to circumvent it and hire his own staff.

"Look, everyone in the White House is upset. It's both a problem of getting candidates through the bureaucracy and through the Senate. Of course Kelly is upset," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, an informal adviser to Trump whose wife, Callista, has been nominated as Trump's Vatican ambassador. "The whole system is totally screwed up."

Part of the problem stems from the Trump administration's criteria for hiring staffers and top political appointees. Potential candidates must be loyal to the administration and not have spoken harshly about the president during the campaign.

That has created a particular problem when it comes to filling national security jobs, because scores of Republican experts, many of whom served in the George W. Bush administration, signed a letter criticizing the future president before the election.

Many experienced Republicans who ordinarily would have vied for middle- and top-level posts under a Republican president also decided to sit out the Trump administration in January, starving the president of choices when it came to picking appointees.

The president himself seems willing to tolerate vacancies indefinitely.

"I'm generally not going to make a lot of the appointments that would normally be - because you don't need them," Trump told Forbes in an interview which posted last week. "I mean, you look at some of these agencies, how massive they are, and it's totally unnecessary. They have hundreds of thousands of people."

The White House press office did not respond to requests for comment.

Filling vacant jobs has taken on particular urgency in recent weeks, as the White House contends with thorny policy questions such as North Korea's growing nuclear might and the fate of the Iran deal. The administration is also trying to re-negotiate the NAFTA trade agreement and roll back parts of Obamacare through regulations and executive orders.

At the State Department, more than 78 jobs do not have a nominee out of 149 key positions, and 32 countries still don't have ambassadors in place, according to data kept by the non-partisan Partnership for Public Service.

The Treasury Department has 15 key slots open out of 28 significant Senate confirmed positions as the White House dives into selling tax reform.

Just last week, Treasury announced it would not fill its No. 2 deputy secretary slot after a second candidate dropped out of the running for it.

Kelly's own former job remains open two and a half months after he moved to the White House, with Trump nominating Kelly's No. 2 Kirstjen Nielsen this week after other potential nominees were passed over.

The Department of Health and Human Services, the agency responsible for overseeing the Affordable Care Act, lacks a Cabinet secretary after former Rep. Tom Price resigned after spending hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars to charter private jets for government trips.

So far, the Senate has confirmed roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government, according to the Partnership for Public Service.

The presidential personnel office also got off to a rocky start. Its director Johnny DeStefano, who started right after the inauguration, had to find candidates for hundreds of key Senate-confirmed jobs without an existing pool of applicants after the administration discarded lists compiled by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who was fired as transition head days after the election in November.

DeStefano also entered the job with no formal experience in executive recruiting or hiring. Previously, he worked for House Speaker John Boehner and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

At the White House, both Priebus and Steve Bannon, the former White House chief strategist, were seen as his high-level protectors. Their departures this summer have left DeStefano adrift inside Kelly's new power structure, according to two people close to the administration.

Kelly recently asked DeStefano to oversee the Office of Public Liaison, whose head George Sifakis left in August following Priebus' ouster.

DeStefano, who also retains his title as head of the personnel office, did not respond to requests for comment.

Outside conservative activists and groups are no longer blaming Senate Democrats for holding up confirmations.

Last week, over 100 conservatives released a letter to remind both the administration and Capitol Hill that "personnel is policy."

The letter demands that Senate leadership schedule committee and floor action every Thursday and Friday and to work full weeks until Trump's nominees get confirmed. Among the signatories are Edwin Meese, former Attorney General under Ronald Reagan; Becky Norton Dunlop, a former Reagan adviser who worked on the Trump transition; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, and Adam Brandon, President of FreedomWorks.

Republicans say that the slow pace of appointments impedes Trump's agenda. It ends up leaving much of the agency-level, or diplomatic work to government careerists who aren't necessarily supportive of the Trump agenda.

"The career people know how to keep the government going and respond to citizens, but if there is any desire to change what the government is doing, that is most effectively done if it is being led by a political appointee," said Clay Johnson, who oversaw presidential personnel under Bush. "So without the hundreds of political appointees at each of the key agencies, the administration of government will continue, but it will be hard for the Trump administration to change or eliminate something, or create something new."

TAX REWRITE HEADED TO TRUMP'S DESK: The House gave the final OK today on the GOP's tax overhaul, H.R. 1 \(115\), sending the bill to President Donald Trump's desk. The House was forced to vote a second time today on the $1.5 trillion tax-cut measure after several provisions ran afoul of procedural rules in the Senate. Crucially, the bill contains a provision to open up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil exploration and drilling — a long-sought victory for Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski.

Ahead of the House vote today, Trump touted ANWR's inclusion in the bill as one of its key accomplishments, pointing particularly to the fact his predecessors could not succeed in opening the refuge. "So, a friend of mine who is in the oil business said, 'I can't believe it, ANWR, they have been trying to get it for 40 years,'" Trump said during a press conference. "Forty years, and I didn't know that. ... We are going to start drilling in ANWR, one of the largest oil reserves in the world that for 40 years this country was unable to touch."

"That by itself would be a massive bill," Trump added. "It will be one of our biggest — one of our biggest oil reserves. ... Puts us at a level that we're not even at now and we are doing very well in terms of, as you know, energy. ... But that's when it hit me. When he said, you know, they have been trying to get that — the Bushes, everybody, all the way back to Reagan. Reagan tried to get it, Bush tried to get it, everybody tried to get it. They couldn't get it passed."

Democrats, greens vow to keep up the fight: Sens. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and Ed Markey (D-Mass.) joined a troupe of environmental groups and tribal representatives to promise they would fight against drilling in ANWR. The group did not offer specifics of what that would look like, only promising lawsuits in the unspecified future. But the fight could also go to banks' and drilling companies' boardrooms.

SUPERFUND TASK FORCE WON'T SHOW ITS WORK: EPA had no documents to turn over related to a 34-page task force report on new plans for cleaning up toxic waste Superfund sites, according to an email from a Justice Department lawyer responding to a Freedom of Information Act request by Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. PEER asked for any documents reflecting the schedule of task force activities, meeting minutes and materials presented to the group, and the lawyer said there were none, other than a May 22, 2017 memorandum.

PEER is doubtful the self-selected group of 107 EPA staffers could write the recommendations without forming any sort of paper trail. "Pruitt's plan for cleaning up toxic sites was apparently immaculately conceived, without the usual trappings of human parentage," PEER Executive Director Jeff Ruch said in a written statement. The DOJ lawyer told PEER EPA would look for additional records but found none, according to Ruch. "It stretches credulity that 107 EPA staff members with no agenda or reference materials somehow wrote an intricate plan in 30 days," Ruch said. Many environmental groups are suing EPA over delaying or refusing to provide public records under FOIA. EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox could not comment on the specifics of the FOIA request and response.

BUNDY MISTRIAL DECLARED: A judge today declared a mistrial in the criminal case of Nevada rancher Cliven Bundy, who led a 2014 armed stand-off in a dispute with BLM. U.S. District Judge Gloria Navarro said federal prosecutors had failed to share documents with the defense, including FBI memos. A new trial date has been set for Feb. 26, 2018, Reuters reports, but it is unclear if the trial will proceed. "Acting U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre said prosecutors have yet to decide whether to pursue the case, and even if they do, the judge will hear defense arguments on Jan. 8 on whether to dismiss the case." NRC TO DISCUSS YUCCA DOCS SYSTEM: The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has scheduled a two-day January meeting to discuss four options the agency might take for rebuilding a documentation system that housed information related to the licensing of the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste project. NRC's so-called Licensing Support Network was dismantled when regulators put the licensing process for the repository on ice in 2011. Over the summer, NRC leaders, in a 2-1 vote, authorized agency staff to spend up to $110,000 on preliminary "information gathering" work on the licensing process in case Congress decided to approve new funds for Yucca Mountain after several years of financial drought.

"The information being collected will assist the Commission in making efficient, informed decisions concerning appropriate means for reconstituting the LSN's functionality if the currently suspended Yucca Mountain adjudication were to re-commence in the future," according to a Federal Register notice set to be published Thursday. Despite significant support in the House for new Yucca money, the Senate hasn't supported new funds. The meeting is slated for Jan. 30 and 31 at NRC headquarters.

REPORT: EMP ATTACK UNLIKELY TO IMPACT GRID NATIONWIDE: Detonating an electromagnetic pulse device at high-altitude could knock out systems on the ground critical to the U.S. electric grid across several states, according to a new study from the Electric Power Research Institute, but wouldn't necessarily set off a "nationwide grid collapse." The study was limited to so-called late-stage pulses termed E3s and was analyzed under 11 different target locations. EPRI suggests a set of grid modifications to limit, block or disconnect EMP-induced currents that could damage transformers and other equipment. But the organization also said additional studies should be done on how E3 pulses might compound the impacts of E1 and E2 pulses, which can damage communication and power plant SCADA systems, yet software capable of conducting those models "do not currently exist in a commercially available format."

Ricardo Rosselló vowed to mobilize the 5.3 million Puerto Ricans living on the mainland to shake up the midterm elections in states ranging from Florida to California, Pro's Lorraine Woellert reports. Rosselló remains "infuriated about a Republican tax plan that he says could hobble the island's economy even as thousands of residents remain without power and water three months after Hurricane Maria," Lorraine writes. "Everybody has seen the damage of the storm and yet policy decisions go in the opposite direction of where they should go," Rosselló said on Tuesday. "We're not just going to stand by. NRC staff starts info-gathering tasks on Yucca Mountain Back

Leaders at the Nuclear Regulatory Commission have directed staff to do some preliminary "information-gathering" on the licensing process for the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste project.

According to an agency memo dated July 31 and publicly released today, NRC staff has been permitted to spend up to $110,000 to hold meetings on how it might reconstitute its so-called Licensing Support Network — a system that compiles documents related to its hearing process. And the staff can conduct training on the process and survey potential hearing venues in Nevada.

"As staff develops any further proposals for Commission consideration, it should retain focus on those activities needed to re-establish infrastructure to support the conduct of the proceeding," the memo states, referring to Yucca Mountain's long-stalled licensing review.

All of the $110,000 would come from a pool of money previously allocated by Congress to work on Yucca. President Donald Trump's fiscal 2018 budget proposal includes $30 million for the NRC to restart the project's licensing process that stalled several years ago.

When agency leaders voted on a proposal from NRC staff earlier this year, NRC Chairman Kristine Svinicki wrote that the activities "are not a resumption of the suspended proceeding." Instead, they were "appropriate steps" to improve the agency's "readiness to execute the budget requested."

But Commissioner Jeff Baran, a Democrat, who said it was "premature" to start the information-gathering work, had insisted that "we have no idea whether Congress will ultimately appropriate Nuclear Waste Fund monies for this purpose."

WHAT'S NEXT: The agency memo did not stipulate a time frame for staff to complete the work, but the goal is to be prepared for Congress to infuse more cash into the process in fiscal 2018, which begins Oct. 1.

Shimkus: Nuclear waste bill mired in dispute with appropriators Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 06:10 PM EDT

Rep. John Shimkus is in the midst of a face-off with members of the powerful Appropriations Committee over language in his bipartisan nuclear waste bill that would limit their say in how money from the Nuclear Waste Fund is spent.

The Illinois Republican's bill, H.R. 3053, would authorize the Energy Department to open one interim storage facility while regulators review plans to permanently house it at Yucca Mountain, which would be expanded in size. But the measure also sets aside mandatory spending from the fund, an account amassed from fees on nuclear-generated electricity that was valued at $46 billion last year.

Mandatory spending in the Shimkus bill includes operating costs related to Yucca Mountain and additional payments through a "benefits agreement" with the state of Nevada. Under existing law, Congress spends money from the fund through annual appropriations bills, a process that allowed Democrats to block required regulatory reviews of Yucca Mountain for the last several years.

"We want to be able to send a signal to not just DOE to move forward and that there's going to be some consistent funding, but we also want to send a signal to the state of Nevada that if there's going to be an agreement on benefits that that's not at the whim of a year-to-year process," Shimkus told POLITICO on Wednesday. "My frustration is that we are serious but the appropriators, right now, are still wedded to a year-to-year process."

GOP leadership "wants us to resolve this conflict" before bringing the bill to the floor, Shimkus said.

Given the fund's $46 billion value last year, Shimkus' bill would permit DOE to spend at least $500 million annually for the construction and operation of a Yucca Mountain facility as well as payments to Nevada for hosting "without further appropriation."

Shimkus said the negotiations with appropriators over his bill are separate from the omnibus spending bill lawmakers need to address next month, making it difficult to estimate when the conflict might be resolved.

The showdown is only the latest hurdle for long-suffering nuclear advocates who want the U.S. to establish a permanent waste repository.

Even if Shimkus and the appropriators resolve their differences on his bill, the Senate has shown little appetite this year for addressing a permanent nuclear waste repository, despite the retirement of former Democratic Leader Harry Reid, Yucca Mountain's No. 1 foe. Nevada Republican Dean Heller, who faces one of the toughest reelection fights next year, has become the biggest roadblock in the upper chamber. The House included $150 million to restart Yucca in its fiscal 2018 spending bill for the Energy Department and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, but the Senate did not follow suit and seems unlikely to go along with including the funds in an omnibus.

"Senate Republicans have made it clear they don't want to move forward on Yucca Mountain because it could hurt Sen. Heller," a senior Senate aide said.

Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who chairs the appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over Yucca, acknowledged in a recent interview that Heller is "a well-respected, influential U.S. senator, so his views will be paid attention to by lots of senators," but that it was too soon to tell how a final deal would shake out.

Heller himself wouldn't say whether he'd secured any assurances from Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to keep new Yucca funds out of the next spending law. "I keep urging it," he said with a smile. "I think we'll get there."

The Senate is "not passionate about this," said Tim Peckinpugh, a partner at K&L Gates, a law firm that was involved with the lawsuits that sued to force the federal government to continue work on the Yucca Mountain application. "I don't see a John Shimkus in the Senate," he said. "He has passion and incredible persistence on this issue. But I do see broad-based support. I'm convinced that if there's an up-or-down vote in the Senate, it would pass by big numbers — more than 60 — and I think both sides know that, quite frankly."

Simply looking at the map of where the commercial and defense nuclear waste destined for a site like Yucca Mountain currently sits, logical supporters of the new funding would include members of the Senate Democratic leadership like Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York, Dick Durbin of Illinois and Patty Murray of Washington.

But Sen. Catherine Cortez Masto (D-Nev.), like Heller, opposes Yucca in line with the rest of her state's congressional delegation. And she's convinced that Schumer, the Senate minority leader, won't support new cash for the project next month.

"I don't anticipate that there's going to be any funding," she said. "I've talked to my leadership about it. ... Sen. Schumer is opposed to it."

Puerto Rico governor vows midterm revenge for tax bill Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 12/20/2017 09:24 AM EDT

Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló says he plans to mobilize 5.3 million Puerto Ricans living on the mainland to shake up the midterm elections in states ranging from Florida to California.

Rosselló, a Democrat and member of the island's pro-statehood New Progressive Party, is infuriated about a Republican tax plan that he says could hobble the island's economy even as thousands of residents remain without power and water three months after Hurricane Maria.

"Everybody has seen the damage of the storm and yet policy decisions go in the opposite direction of where they should go," Rosselló said in an interview with POLITICO on Tuesday. "We're not just going to stand by. We are going to take action."

The 3.4 million U.S. citizens living on the island have no vote in Congress, but they do have 5.3 million fellow Puerto Ricans scattered across the mainland who do have a vote. It's that political power Rosselló plans to leverage.

"We are a significant voting bloc in the United States that perhaps hasn't been organized well in the past," he said. "The diaspora, the Puerto Rican exodus, has always wanted to help Puerto Rico, it just hasn't been crystal clear how they can do it. If we can establish that organization we can have plenty of influence."

For Rosselló, the idea gelled with the tax vote, which blew a hole in tax and manufacturing rules granting the island both foreign and domestic status. The system has made Puerto Rico a tax haven for drug and medical device makers, who can incorporate in the commonwealth as foreign subsidiaries but label their products as made in the U.S.

The new tax plan treats companies on the island the same as those operating outside the U.S., subjecting them to a tax of up to 12.5 percent on intellectual property.

Even if he can get the tax changes fixed and pick up other legislative wins, Rosselló said he intends to stick to his plan. His office has begun cataloging Puerto Ricans and Latinos living on the mainland to see where they can have an impact.

So far, he figures they can sway congressional district votes in 14 states, including Florida, Ohio, Virginia, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina and Texas. He pointed to the influence of Florida's 2.7 million Cuban-Americans, a powerful and well-organized constituency.

Rosselló has been trading barbs this week with Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) over Rubio's support for the tax bill.

"We are twice the size. If we can get organized, we can certainly start swaying decisions our way and having at least some political leverage," he said. "We will evaluate those who gave the good fight for the people of Puerto Rico and those that didn't."

His plan also would draw attention to Puerto Rico's legal status, which he calls "this big elephant in the room".

"What are we going to do with a colonial territory in the 21st century?" Rosselló said. "The United States has unfinished business. It holds the oldest and most populated colonial territory in the world."

"Having no representation is a clear disadvantage and if you need any more evidence of this just look at the tax reform," Rosselló said. "Just because we don't have representation we got railroaded."

Ryan calls reports that he'll retire 'rank speculation' Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/20/2017 09:36 AM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan said Wednesday that he has not discussed the prospect of stepping away from Congress anytime soon with anybody, nor has the thought even crossed his mind, calling reports that he might resign next year "rank speculation."

POLITICO Magazine reported earlier this month that Ryan (R-Wis.) has privately told confidants that he will not seek another term as speaker and expressed a preference for retiring shortly after next year's midterm elections, before the next Congress is sworn in. Ryan disputed that reporting and told "CBS This Morning" that he "actually never did" discuss plans to leave after passing tax reform with anybody.

"That's what surprises me about this. That's why I thought it was a very irresponsible piece. The idea that after passing tax reform, as if it's the only thing I care about, I'm just going to leave, get up and go, it's ridiculous," Ryan said. "It's a thought that never entered my mind, let alone discussed it with anybody. So I really see this as sort rank speculation among the D.C. beltway press, speculating these things. I think it was fairly irresponsible speculation. It's faulty speculation."

The initial report did not say Ryan would leave after Congress completed tax reform.

With a massive tax reform package, policy Ryan has pursued for nearly his entire political career, on the verge of passing Congress, a late 2018 retirement would afford the speaker another year to pursue entitlement reform, another long-term legislative priority of his. It would also allow him to live full time at home in Wisconsin with his school-age children and, people close to the speaker emphasized to POLITICO Magazine, avoid appearing on a ballot with President Donald Trump in 2020.

But while Ryan was insistent that he has no plans to retire from Congress, he did not commit to serving beyond 2018 and told ABC's "Good Morning America" that he has not yet decided whether or not he will seek reelection in his outeast Wisconsin district in next year's midterms.

"Yeah look, I'm not going anywhere any time soon. I'm so focused on getting our agenda done. On questions on way down the line, I'll address those way down the line," he told ABC anchor George Stephanopoulos. "But in the meantime, we've got a lot of work to do. I'm here to stay. I'm not going anywhere. If something changes down the road in the future, I'll address that down the road in the future."

Asked by Stephanopoulos if he plans to seek reelection to Congress and as speaker, Ryan replied that "it's not even 2018 yet, so that's something my wife and I always discuss later in the campaign year, something we haven't even discussed yet. So that's something we'll discuss down the road when the appropriate time comes."

Despite his noncommittal answer on ABC, Ryan was insistent on CBS that he has much work left to accomplish and specifically disputed the notion that he might resign from Congress before the end of his term.

"I'm not going to get up and leave this Congress, our conference and my responsibilities in the middle of this term. We've got so much more work do," he said, citing criminal justice reform, welfare reform and poverty as issues that remain on his to-do list. "We've got a lot of work do, we're excited about doing it. And we're banking a big win here. I want to get back to work and get more things done, not the least of which is to get the military rebuilt. So there's a lot of work to do. That's why I'm not going anywhere soon."

Republicans drop Obamacare fix in rush to avert shutdown Back

By Sarah Ferris and Heather Caygle | 12/20/2017 11:06 AM EDT

Republican leaders Wednesday defused the simmering Obamacare crisis that threatened to keep both chambers in session through Christmas, though year-end policy items remain in flux.

Key Senate Republicans agreed to drop demands for a contentious year-end Obamacare fix, likely allowing the House and Senate to avert an 11th hour showdown before government funding expires Friday

The Senate bill intended to prop up Obamacare will no longer be jammed into this week's government funding scramble, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) conceded Wednesday afternoon. Instead, Collins said she hopes to force a vote on the subsidies bill in January.

The two chambers had been on a collision course for days over the contentious subsidies bill, with House rank-and-file Republicans staring down Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Even with the Obamacare flashpoint out of the picture, House Republican leaders will have a hard sales job to convince their fractured conference to swallow another kick-the-can spending bill.

They could get some help from the calendar: With Christmas near, members are eyeing their travel schedules as they talk about punting the most contentious issues until next month.

The GOP's current funding strategy would appear to shelve nearly every tricky political issue until Jan. 19. That includes the must-pass items, like funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program and national surveillance powers that run out Dec. 31 — though those items could see short-term extensions.

Speaker Paul Ryan's plan to keep the government funded past Friday now involves a simple funding extension through Jan. 19 — a last-minute course reversal that is roiling the conference's most conservative flank as well as defense hawks.

House Democrats are refusing to back the bill, according to multiple sources, giving Ryan and his deputies an extremely tight margin to clear the bill on the floor Thursday. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi personally informed Ryan on the House floor Wednesday afternoon of House Democrats' decision.

GOP leaders will have to sell the strategy to their skeptical conference — and fast — to avoid a fiscal showdown, just after the party's historic vote to overhaul the tax code.

As recently as Tuesday morning, the House GOP planned to pass a spending bill that would deliver a huge boost to the Pentagon while holding all other domestic budgets in flux, in a defiant attempt to jam the Senate.

But House GOP leaders abruptly pulled that plan late Wednesday after warning signs about its level of support.

One major trouble spot was a massive $81 billion disaster aid package that was slated to be attached to the funding bill.

Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy announced Tuesday that the disaster package would be merged with this week's spending bill, though the 184-page bill had been unveiled only hours before.

The last-minute addition was needed to win over dozens of Republicans from Texas, Florida and Louisiana who had demanded funding before leaving for Christmas. Without the aid, they threatened to tank any spending bill.

Some House conservatives, however, balked at the price tag and dug in with their demands for at least some spending cuts to help offset the costs. Congress is on track to spend $132 billion in emergency funding this year alone on disaster recovery.

House GOP leaders are now planning to hold a separate vote on the hurricane and wildfire measure, which would be the largest single disaster outlay in U.S. history.

As a standalone, it's unclear if the disaster package will pass with bipartisan support. After initially signaling support for the plan, House Democrats were working behind the scenes Wednesday to get more relief for storm-stricken Puerto Rico.

House Democrats have not said publicly that they will oppose the disaster bill if they don't get certain concessions but it remains a possibility.

The GOP's strategy has been shifting by the hour.

House Republicans planned to take a separate vote Thursday to reauthorize so-called Section 702 spying powers under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. But on Wednesday afternoon, the GOP abruptly backed off those plans and decided to discuss the next steps at the conference's meeting later that night.

That decision came shortly after members of the conservative House Freedom Caucus, who oppose the renewal, huddled with key GOP leaders including House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy.

The fate of the Section 702 renewal is also in question in the Senate, where Democrats hope to hold their ground on a so-called "clean" bill.

Senate Democrats argue that Congress should not tackle just one or two less-controversial issues while leaving the toughest items for January, which they believe lessens their leverage.

"We cannot do a short-term funding bill that picks and chooses what problems to solve," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said Wednesday. "That will not be fair and will not pass. We have to do them all together, instead of in a piecemeal fashion."

"It has to be a truly global deal. We can't leave any of those issues behind," Schumer said.

The trickiest vote on Thursday, by far, will be the House's stopgap spending bill, which must be sent to the Senate and signed by the president by Friday at midnight.

Many members of the House Armed Services Committee may oppose the bill, after warning for weeks that they'd oppose another stopgap spending bill. Pentagon leaders, including Defense Secretary James Mattis, have personally made their case against the short-term bill in multiple meetings on Capitol Hill this fall.

GOP leaders are personally urging defense hawks to support what they call a "clean" funding extension, given that it will include some additional flexibility for the Pentagon's budget.

The House Armed Services Committee huddled with GOP leaders earlier Wednesday on the plan, and the full House GOP conference is expected to meet at 5 p.m.

House Republicans say they haven't been briefed on a specific plan, but the rumor is that nearly every contentious political point will be punted until January.

Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) joked that GOP leaders are now on "Plan C" of their plan to keep the government open -- a strategy that he said every Republican in the chamber should get around to preserve their tax win.

"It would be an act of political malpractice, after a successful tax reform vote, to shut the government down. Talk about stepping on your own message. I mean really, how dumb would that be? But anything's possible around here. This is Congress," Dent said.

Even as House GOP leaders ditch their defense-only spending bill, some House Republicans who are strongly pro-military seem open to the idea as long as there are some tweaks to give the Pentagon greater budgetary flexibility in the meantime.

"I don't like that for the military, but I'm not going to bring down the government," Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) said. "I'm not going to shut down the government."

Nadler wins top Democratic post on Judiciary Committee Back

By Heather Caygle | 12/20/2017 10:37 AM EDT

House Democrats have tapped New York Rep. Jerry Nadler as their next leader on the Judiciary Committee, the panel that would potentially initiate impeachment proceedings against President Donald Trump if Democrats win back the House.

Nadler won a decisive victory over Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.) in a caucus-wide election Wednesday morning. Lofgren, a former immigration lawyer, is the second-most senior member on the panel behind Nadler.

"This is a pivotal time, with our country possibly on the verge of a constitutional crisis," Nadler said in a speech before the vote, according to a Democratic source in the room. "We cannot afford to make this choice based on anything but who is the best person to sit in that chair."

The caucus voted 118-72 in Nadler's favor Wednesday. Nadler, who has served on the panel since first coming to Congress a quarter-century ago, was thought to have a slight edge over Lofgren going into this week.

His advantage was further underscored when Democrats on the steering committee voted 41-18 to back Nadler on Tuesday afternoon. There were rumors Lofgren might drop out of the race after that vote, but she proceeded with the secret ballot election Wednesday.

Nadler and Lofgren have been quietly campaigning for the position for months but didn't expect the election to occur until after the November 2018 midterms. Everything was pushed forward when Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the top Democrat on the panel, resigned earlier this month amid sexual harassment allegations.

Reps. Ted Deutch of Florida and Hakeem Jeffries of New York were among the members who officially nominated Nadler on Wednesday. A handful of Democrats, eager to challenge the caucus' seniority system, tried to recruit both Deutch and Jeffries to run for the position earlier in the process, but the two lawmakers declined.

Deutch, Jeffries and several other Democrats spoke favorably of Nadler, citing his knowledge of constitutional law and leadership on criminal justice reform.

"They gave me a script. I don't need a script, because I know the man. We are in a fight for the soul of our democracy," Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), the top Democrat on the House Oversight Committee, said in a speech before the vote. "I can think of no one better to lead the House Democrats on the Judiciary Committee than Jerry Nadler."

Rep. Luis Gutiérrez (D-Ill.), a close ally of Lofgren, was among the Democrats who backed her nomination, calling her a lawmaker of "the highest caliber" and touting her decades of work on immigration issues.

"I haven't had to travel alone ... Zoe Lofgren was standing there," Gutiérrez said. "Just as important as the work you do on your committee is the work you do for your country."

Lofgren, too, touted her immigration bona fides when making her pitch to the caucus. Lofgren also noted that she would be the first woman to occupy a leadership post on the committee in its 200-plus year history.

"My presence would make a major difference in achieving immigration reform," she said. "I think it's very important that Democrats...stand up for people who have been treated unfairly."

Nadler had the advantage going into the election, partly because he has served on the committee for two years longer than Lofgren. While both members are widely liked within the caucus, Democrats, particularly from minority groups, tend to favor seniority.

Neither Nadler nor Lofgren committed to pursuing impeachment in the runup to the election. But the two did talk openly about what it would take for them to support the process if Democrats win back the House next year.

For Democrats to pursue impeachment, there would have to be some support both from Republicans — particularly in the Senate — and Trump voters, according to Nadler.

"There's not much point in impeaching a president and having him acquitted in the Senate as happened with [Bill] Clinton," Nadler said in an interview in his office late last week.

Aside from impeachment, the committee deals with a raft of controversial issues and is home to some of the House's most partisan members. Other issues within the panel's jurisdiction include immigration, abortion, guns and criminal justice.

GRASSLEY AIDE WORKED ON RFS AFTER TAKING INDUSTRY JOB: A longtime staffer for Sen. Chuck Grassley, Kurt Kovarik, continued to work in the Iowa Republican's office on one of the National Biodiesel Board's top lobbying priorities after accepting a job there, POLITICO Influence reports. Kovarik, who served as Grassley's legislative director, started talking with the NBB about a job in September but initially declined to move forward, according to Grassley's office. The trade group made him an offer in early December, while he accepted and notified Grassley's office. The Renewable Fuel Standard is a top priority of the NBB, as well as of Grassley's. NBB spent more than $1.2 million this year lobbying on the fuel standard and other issues, PI reports.

"The National Biodiesel Board announced last week that Kovarik would join as vice president for federal affairs, starting on Jan. 8. In the meantime, he continued to work on the renewable fuel standard, participating in a call last week to prepare for a White House meeting on the issue, Grassley's office said. 'Since Kurt accepted his new position, he's transitioned into a largely technical/informative support role for staff taking over his portfolios in order to maintain continuity of Sen. Grassley's leadership on the issues,' Michael Zona, a Grassley spokesman, wrote in an email. 'Other legislative staff have taken over his portfolios.'" Read more here.

VOGTLE CONTINUES ON : The Vogtle nuclear reactors got one last lifeline via Georgia regulators, who voted on continuing construction of the project today. "The state Public Service Commission did not give Southern Co.'s Georgia Power everything it wanted," Darius reports, "but a company representative said it was enough to keep going. Commissioner Tim Echols offered a motion to let Georgia Power continue building the project with certain restrictions, and it passed unanimously." The Vogtle reactors are currently billions of dollars over budget and years behind schedule. But PSC Chairman Stan Wise said that "history, over time" will prove that the commission's decision today was the correct one. Read more.

The Sierra Club hit the decision by PSC today, saying it "failed consumers." Ted Terry, the director of the group's Georgia chapter, said in a statement the commission "failed Georgia's hard-working families and businesses today by choosing to be lapdogs for Georgia Power instead of watchdogs for the people of Georgia."

INTERIOR PAUSES ANOTHER NAS STUDY: The Interior Department has stopped another study on fossil fuel issues, this time focusing on offshore drilling safety, according to the National Academies of Sciences, Engineering, and Medicine. In a Dec. 7 stop-work order, Interior's Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement ordered NAS to "suspend all work on a study to review and update the bureau's offshore oil and gas operations inspection program to enhance safety," the group said today. The order gives 90 days to determine whether the order should be lifted and work resume, or should be terminated. It's the second time a National Academies study has been stopped by DOI in the last four months; in August DOI stopped a study on how coal mining affects nearby residents in Appalachia pending a contract review, the NAS said.

FERC SEEKS LOWER CYBER REPORTING STANDARD: FERC today proposed a rule that would require power plants and transmission operators to report cybersecurity threats to the grid at a lower threshold than previously determined, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. Margaret Scott, a staff member in FERC's electric reliability office, told agency leaders there was concern that existing mandatory reporting requirements "may understate the true scope of cyber-related threat." That's partly because there were no reported cyber incidents in 2015 and 2016, while DHS responded to 59 cybersecurity incidents in the energy sector last year, she said.

EYE ON PIPELINES: FERC will review how it evaluates natural gas pipeline applications, Chairman Kevin McIntyre announced at today's meeting, his first since claiming the agency's gavel earlier this month. Darius reports that the regulators plan to "conduct an open-ended review of a policy statement that has guided the agency's natural gas pipeline review process for nearly two decades." The chairman said it's crucial for organizations to occasionally review their policies as a matter of good governance, noting he will keep an open mind. More here.

Mark your calendar: McIntyre also said he doesn't expect his agency to go past Jan. 10 deadline to respond to Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid proposal. "I arrived here, I think, less than 48 business hours before the then-deadline [of Dec. 11] was to be upon us for action, and I didn't regard that as realistic at all to try to get something done in that kind of a quick fashion," McIntyre said. "I think it would, of necessity, end up being slapdash and that's not my style." Read more.

And speaking of his arrival: McIntyre said today that the delay in his swearing-in was due to the complexity of disconnecting him from Jones Day, where he had worked for more than two decades, Darius reports. "I'm sorry to disappoint you. I don't have a tale of palace intrigue," he told reporters after today's monthly meeting.

Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur got into the Christmas spirit by presenting Neil Chatterjee with a gift for his service as interim FERC chairman. "I really thought a lot about what you get for the man who has everything," she said, before passing a colorful bag to Chatterjee. "Fortunately, I found something right in my office made in Kentucky that I thought was near and dear to your heart." "It's pulverized," she said as the Bluegrass State native pulled out a bag of ground coal. "A 90-day supply!" Chatterjee said.

PAC PICKS 6: The Democratic Conservation Alliance PAC announced its first round of endorsements in the 2018 cycle, highlighting six lawmakers who have "demonstrated leadership in advancing legislation to protect America's land, water, and wildlife, while also standing up to the Trump Administration's unprecedented attacks on the environment," the PAC said in a release. The PAC endorsed and contributed $1,000 to the reelection of Reps. Julia Brownley (D-Calif.), Salud Carbajal (D-Calif.), Ann McLane Kuster (D-N.H.), Stephanie Murphy (D-Fla.), Matt Cartwright (D-Pa.) and Tom O'Halleran (D-Ariz.).

HUD SINKS FLOOD STANDARD: In a notice today, HUD said it would abandon five proposed rules, including a flood-protection standard created during the Obama-era that requires HUD-backed properties to build at a higher elevation when in flood-prone areas, Pro Financial Services' Lorraine Woellert reports. The move comes amid Trump's two-for-one order, which requires agencies to identify two rules for elimination for each new regulation. "Since Hurricane Sandy, the agency has applied the flood-resiliency standard to disaster recovery funds," Lorraine reports. "It's not clear if that practice will continue." Read more.

TO PUSH TAX REFORM: The Koch brothers' network of political groups is set to launch a multimillion-dollar push next year to sway Americans on the just-passed tax reform bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), Campaign Pro's Kevin Robillard reports. "We have a public that distrusts anything coming out of Washington, especially anything from the majority party," said Tim Phillips, the president of Americans for Prosperity, the network's grassroots organizing arm. "We have a job that's not that hard. We have to make sure people understand the benefits they're going to receive from this legislation." The Koch network "will aim to make sure voters know they're benefiting from the tax legislation, which President Donald Trump is expected to sign soon," Kevin writes.

* A message from the Renewable Fuels Association: The Renewable Fuel Standard, helping to clean the air, was signed into law ten years ago this week. According to a January 2017 analysis by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, corn ethanol reduces greenhouse gas emissions by 43% compared to gasoline. Additionally, the same study found that by 2022, corn ethanol could reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 76% compared to gasoline. Ethanol is the best tool available to reduce tailpipe emissions of other harmful pollutants, including carbon monoxide, air toxics like benzene and fine particulate matter. White House to host Senate staff for biofuels talks Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/12/2017 04:16 PM EDT

The White House will host a meeting Wednesday with Senate staffers in the hopes of striking a deal between oil refiners and biofuel producers who have clashed over the Renewable Fuel Standard, sources tell POLITICO.

A White House aide confirmed the meeting would take place. Sources said it's a preliminary conversation intended to explore whether a deal can be reached to both help refiners, who say they are struggling with the costs of complying with the RFS, and continue supporting the biofuel industry that has matured under the RFS.

Industry sources and Republican Senate aides say that staff for pro-ethanol Sens. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) will attend, and aides to Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and Pat Toomey (R-Pa.) will be there to represent refiners. Staff from EPA, the Department of Agriculture, and the National Economic Council will also join the meeting.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) said her staff would also be attending the meeting, which was first reported by Reuters.

Midwestern senators scored a win when they forced EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to backtrack on efforts to alter parts of the RFS, but Cruz forced the White House to get involved after he put a hold on Bill Northey, who is up for a USDA undersecretary position.

Vogle construction will continue following vote by Georgia regulators Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/21/2017 10:21 AM EDT

Georgia regulators today delivered a vital lifeline to the Vogtle nuclear reactors.

The state Public Service Commission did not give Southern Co.'s Georgia Power everything it wanted, but a company representative said it was enough to keep going. Commissioner Tim Echols offered a motion to let Georgia Power continue building the project with certain restrictions, and it passed unanimously.

PSC Chairman Stan Wise said that "history, over time" will prove that the commission's decision today was correct.

The Vogtle reactors, which are billions of dollars over budget and years behind schedule, are the only units under construction in the U.S.

Vogtle has received $8.33 billion in Energy Department financing under the Obama administration, as well as other conditional commitments from the Trump administration earlier this year. It hit a major setback earlier this year when Westinghouse filed for bankruptcy, although its parent firm Toshiba fully paid $3.68 billion due to Georgia Power ahead of schedule.

FERC seeks to lower cyber incident reporting threshold Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/21/2017 11:35 AM EDT

FERC today proposed a rule that would require power plants and transmission operators to report additional cyber threats to the electric grid.

Margaret Scott, a staff member in FERC's electric reliability office, told agency leaders that there was concern that the existing mandatory reporting requirements "may understate the true scope of cyber-related threat" partly because there were no reported cyber incidents in 2015 and 2016. The Department of Homeland Security responded to 59 cybersecurity incidents in the energy sector last year, she said, which includes the electric industry.

The proposal to lower mandatory reporting requirements would focus on systems that affect the operation of the bulk electric system rather than business-side IT system, said Kevin Ryan, a staffer in FERC's general counsel's office.

The proposal would attempt to set common information reporting requirements for cyber intrusions and attempted intrusions, directs the North American Electric Reliability Corp. with setting a deadline for reporting cyber incidents with DHS and other organizations, and to produce an anonymized report on electric cyber incidents.

WHAT'S NEXT: Comments will be due on the proposed rule within 60 days of it being published in the Federal Register.

FERC to review gas pipeline permitting policy Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/21/2017 01:46 PM EDT

FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre announced today that regulators plan to conduct an open-ended review of a policy statement that has guided the agency's natural gas pipeline review process for nearly two decades.

McIntyre said it's essential for organizations to occasionally review their policies as a matter of good governance, and he would approach the review with an open mind.

"A new fresh look at our policies should not be read as a complaint about our current policy. It is not. I do not have any specific area of our current policy practice that I am proposing be changed. I'm open to change, of course," he told reporters.

The 1999 statement has served the FERC well, Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur said, but she argued that the agency has taken a narrow view of the policy in practice.

"Over time our practice has coalesced around a reliance on precedent agreements as the determiner of market need ... I think our review of pipeline applications would benefit from a broader consideration of need," LaFleur said.

In October, she explained her position in a dissent to FERC's approval of the Atlantic Coast and Mountain Valley projects, which then-Chairman Neil Chatterjee "strongly" disagreed with.

Similarly, former FERC Chairman Norman Bay attached a separate statement to a natural gas pipeline approval before he resigned in February where he suggested that the agency's view of pipeline "need" was too narrowly defined by gas shipping agreements.

WHAT'S NEXT: McIntyre indicated that reviewing the pipeline policy statement would be top tier issue for FERC in 2018 but said that it was too early to say what form the review process will take. A range of options are available, he said, including a notice of inquiry or technical conferences.

McIntyre: FERC response to DOE grid plan expected by Jan. 10 Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/21/2017 12:38 PM EDT

FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre said today that he doesn't expect his agency will slip past the

Jan. 10 deadline regulators are on to address Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resilience proposal.

"I don't envision going back and asking for more time. Whether we'll need until the 10th, it's hard to say. I hope not," he told reporters after the agency's monthly meeting. FERC was originally slated to take some "final action" on Perry's controversial effort to aid coal and nuclear power plants by Dec. 11 but McIntyre requested additional time shortly after being sworn in at FERC earlier this month.

"I arrived here, I think, less than 48 business hours before the then-deadline was to be upon us for action and I didn't regard that as realistic at all to try to get something done in that kind of a quick fashion," McIntyre said. "I think it would, of necessity, end up being slapdash and that's not my style."

He also said that he hadn't spoken to Perry about the proposal.

During his decades as an attorney, McIntyre's client list including several large energy corporations with business before FERC, but he didn't expect to recuse himself from FERC's debate on the Energy Department's grid plan. "I don't think it's going to be deemed necessary or appropriate"

"There are a lot of areas where I don't take a step around here without close consultation with the designated agency ethics official ... and this is among them," he said.

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC is expected to take "final action" on DOE proposal by Jan. 10, 2018.

FERC chairman: No funny business behind my slow swearing-in Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/21/2017 02:04 PM EDT

FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre said today that the delay in his swearing-in was due to the complexity of disconnecting him from Jones Day, where he had worked for more than two decades.

"I'm sorry to disappoint you. I don't have a tale of palace intrigue," he told reporters after today's monthly meeting. "That's a phrase not of my creation, but of one of you here at the table I believe."

The real story, he said, is far more mundane.

"Unlike my now-colleagues on the commission, I was in private practice for 30 years representing companies, mostly before this body, and I was a partner in a law firm," he said. "Each of those things carries certain complexities ... particularly as to the extraction process."

McIntyre was confirmed by the Senate on Nov. 2 and the White House cleared his paperwork shortly before Thanksgiving. But he didn't take his position at FERC until Dec. 7, setting off a range of speculation about what was slowing the process down.

Once he got the greenlight to be sworn in, McIntyre said, there was a series of steps he had to take to properly exit from Jones Day, withdraw as official counsel to several client companies and transition his work to others at the firm.

As soon as those steps had been "done with care," he said, he had himself sworn in at FERC.

HUD abandons flood and public housing rules Back

By Lorraine Woellert | 12/21/2017 01:45 PM EDT

HUD will abandon five proposed rules, including a flood-resiliency standard designed to protect houses backed by taxpayer funds.

In a notice, the agency said it won't advance a flood-protection standard generated under President Barack Obama that requires properties backed by HUD funds, including those with Federal Housing Administration mortgages, to be built at a higher elevation when they're in flood-prone areas.

The action is part of the agency's effort to conform to an executive order issued by President Donald Trump just days after his inauguration. The order requires agencies to identify two rules for elimination for each new regulation.

It comes as the country begins the difficult and costly effort of rebuilding after three destructive hurricanes. Since Hurricane Sandy, the agency has applied the flood-resiliency standard to disaster recovery funds. It's not clear if that practice will continue.

HUD will also abandon rules making it more difficult to demolish public housing and a regulation that sought to streamline the administration of public housing funds.

WHAT'S NEXT: The notice will be published Dec. 22.

Koch network to launch multimillion-dollar tax reform push Back

By Kevin Robillard | 12/21/2017 05:03 AM EDT

The big-spending Koch brothers' network of political groups is set to unleash a multimillion-dollar push next year to sell Republicans' just-passed tax reform legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), which remains deeply unpopular with the American electorate.

"We have a public that distrusts anything coming out of Washington, especially anything from the majority party," said Tim Phillips, the president of Americans for Prosperity, the network's grass-roots organizing arm. "We have a job that's not that hard. We have to make sure people understand the benefits they're going to receive from this legislation."

Independent analysts estimate more than eight in 10 Americans would receive a tax break from the bill next year, with the largest benefits going to the wealthiest Americans and corporations. The legislation would also add about $1.5 trillion to the deficit over the next decade.

Public polling indicates the bill is unpopular and that most Americans don't believe the legislation will benefit them. A CNN poll released Tuesday found just 33 percent of Americans favor the plan, with 55 percent in opposition. Two-thirds say it will do more to benefit the wealthy than the middle class, with 27 percent saying the opposite. Just 21 percent believe they'll be better off if the bill becomes law, while 37 percent believe they'll be worse off.

The Koch network, which includes Freedom Partners, the Hispanic-focused LIBRE Initiative and Concerned Veterans for America, will aim to make sure voters know they're benefiting from the tax legislation, which President Donald Trump is expected to sign soon.

The network has yet to put a figure on how much it will spend to sell the plan, but it spent $15 million on similar efforts this year in the run-up to the bill's passage by the House and Senate this week.

The new push will include town halls with economists, members of Congress and accountants to explain the plan, as well as radio, television and digital advertising to remind Americans to look at their paycheck to see the benefits or calculators to show how much they'll save.

Phillips also said there will be more targeted efforts. For instance, he said, the groups might run digital ads on websites popular with young men who make less than $50,000 a year to remind them of the repeal of Obamacare's individual mandate, which they disproportionately paid the penalty for. They could also carry out tax prep work in Latino communities to highlight how families are saving money, he added.

The group will also seek to highlight examples of an economy Phillips said "was heating up," including announcements of wage and job growth.

"Given that the tax reform bill was just finalized, there's a lot of work to be done educating Americans about its benefits," Freedom Partners Executive Vice President James Davis said. "We will make a massive push to show how pro-growth policies can revitalize the economy and open the floodgates to new opportunity, innovation, and prosperity."

The effort will be separate from the network's straightforward political work, which often involves airing attack ads targeting Democratic members of Congress. The network spent millions on ads targeting Indiana Sen. Joe Donnelly, Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill and Wisconsin Sen. Tammy Baldwin in hopes of pushing them to support the legislation, which they ultimately voted against. Phillips said to expect similar "accountability efforts" in 2018.

Cochran's future in the Senate in doubt Back

By John Bresnahan | 12/21/2017 04:55 AM EDT

Sen. Thad Cochran, chairman of the powerful Appropriations Committee, hasn't presided over a hearing since early September. The Mississippi Republican has not given a speech on the Senate floor all year, and he's introduced only two bills during that time, both of them minor.

To the extent that Cochran weighs in on any issue, it's in the form of an official statement from his office or the appropriations panel. He has stopped meeting with anyone about substantive committee business, including other senators or House members, according to several sources familiar with his activities. Cochran's aides deny this is the case.

The 80-year-old's feeble performance has fueled expectations — among senators and aides who've witnessed his physical and mental decline firsthand — that Cochran will step down from the Appropriations chairmanship early next year, or resign from the Senate altogether.

"The understanding is that he will leave after Jan. 1," said a Republican senator who serves on the Appropriations Committee. "That's what most of us believe will happen."

A spokesman for the Mississippi Republican said Cochran hasn't divulged his plans.

"Sen. Cochran has not made any statements regarding leaving office. He continues to do his work for Mississippi and the nation," Chris Gallegos, said.

Some sources in contact with Cochran's office believe that he might stay until a major government spending bill is completed, which might happen in January or February.

The concerns about Cochran come at a sensitive time for Senate Republicans. Sen. John McCain, chairman of the Armed Services Committee and former GOP presidential nominee, is undergoing treatment for brain cancer and has returned to Arizona to spend the holidays with his family. Democrat Doug Jones, who scored a stunning upset in the Alabama Senate special election this month, will soon cut the GOP majority to 51-49.

And with President Donald Trump sliding in the polls, what had looked like a chance for Republicans to pick up Senate seats in 2018 has now turned into a battle to simply retain control of the chamber. If Cochran resigns or retires, Mississippi would have two Senate elections in November; incumbent GOP Sen. Roger Wicker is also up for reelection. Republicans would be heavily favored to hold both seats in the conservative state.

Gallegos also said there is no new information on whether Cochran will continue as chairman of the appropriations panel. He used the same formulation in his response that the senator's staffers employed for months in fending off questions about their boss' health.

"He has not made any statements about relinquishing his chairmanship," Gallegos said.

When asked about why Cochran has stopped meeting with senators or members about committee business, Gallegos said, "Sen. Cochran continues to meet with constituents, advocates and administration officials, including those related to his work on the committee.

Many of these meetings have been related to defense appropriations."

Gallegos pointed to Cochran's Twitter account as proof of this statement. The account includes pictures of Cochran shaking hands with Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and King Abdullah II of Jordan in recent weeks, among others.

Cochran was absent from the Senate for several weeks during September and October due to a urinary tract infection. His wife, Kay Bowen Webber, makes $165,000 as an executive assistant in his office, according to Senate disbursement records.

If Cochran steps down in 2018, Gov. Phil Bryant (R) would appoint a replacement for him, with a special election to fill the rest Cochran's term taking place in November, the same day as the regularly scheduled election for the seat held by Wicker. If Cochran leaves office before the end of this year, the special election would take place within 100 days, according to Mississippi law.

GOP sources said they've been hoping Cochran doesn't resign or retire before next year to avoid a quick special election.

Potential appointees to replace Cochran, according to Mississippi political insiders and news reports, include Rep. Gregg Harper, Lt. Gov. Tate Reeves and Mississippi Secretary of State Delbert Hosemann, among others.

Chris McDaniel, a state senator who lost to Cochran in a bitter 2014 primary, is considered a leading candidate for the seat as well. McDaniel, however, might challenge Wicker or run for lieutenant governor, he said in an interview.

"My hope is that he's healthy and happy, I just want to see him back to his normal self," McDaniel said of Cochran, adding that he didn't want to speculate on whether a Senate seat would come open soon. "There's just no way to know for sure what will happen."

"Whatever he does, I still have to prepare for a race," McDaniel added. "If I run against Wicker, the race is in June. If there is an open seat, the race is in November. If I run for lieutenant governor, that race is in 2019."

The Senate Appropriations Committee has limped ahead in Cochran's absence. The panel approved two continuing resolutions to keep the government funded, as well as two disaster aid packages.

A Cochran aide noted that any subcommittee chairman can call for hearings, adding that the panel's work typically slows in the fall. There have been two subcommittee hearings on opioids in recent months.

However, Sen. Richard Shelby (Ala.), the No. 2 Republican on the panel, is effectively serving as chairman, according to numerous senators and GOP staffers. Shelby is expected to take over if Cochran steps aside.

Shelby declined to discuss Cochran or his own role on the panel.

Both the House and Senate have been forced to replace aging or sick committee chairmen in the past, an extraordinarily delicate undertaking. Few of these senior lawmakers easily give up their powerful posts: The decision affects not only them but their home states and districts, as well the network of lobbyists and consultants who rely on their patronage.

The late Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) voluntarily gave up his gavel at the Senate Appropriations Committee in November 2008. Byrd was 91 and faced questions about his health and ability to manage the panel.

The late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) stepped down as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in 1997, when he was 95 years old. And former Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), at age 82, was ousted as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee by the now-retired Democratic Rep. Henry Waxman.

Trump taunts Democrats as he touts tax reform win Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/21/2017 08:28 AM EDT

President Donald Trump predicted Thursday that the package of tax cuts passed Wednesday by Congress "will soon be kicking in and will speak for themselves," proving wrong Democrats who he said "hate these big cuts" and the media, who he said "is desperate to write badly" about the White House-backed legislation.

"The Massive Tax Cuts, which the Fake News Media is desperate to write badly about so as to please their Democrat bosses, will soon be kicking in and will speak for themselves," Trump wrote on Twitter. "Companies are already making big payments to workers. Dems want to raise taxes, hate these big Cuts!"

Trump hosted a pep rally of sorts Wednesday on the White House's South Lawn, gathering Republicans from both houses of Congress behind him as they celebrated the passage of a package of tax reforms and cuts that the president and GOP leaders have argued will stimulate the economy and make U.S. businesses more competitive globally.

The bill, which the president is expected to sign, is the first major legislative victory for Trump and the culmination of a career-long goal for House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), long a tax policy wonk who once served as chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. Wrapped up in the legislation were other GOP priorities, including a repeal of the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate and opening Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Reserve for oil drilling.

The legislation passed through Congress without the support of any Democrats, who have characterized the bill as a give-away to corporations and to the wealthy while offering relatively little for the middle class. Polling conducted before the bill's passage has shown Americans mostly siding with Democrats in their view of the GOP legislation, although Republicans have argued that opinions of it will quickly change once the tax cuts go into effect.

Already on Wednesday, a handful of major companies announced plans to hand out bonuses, raise wages or otherwise reward employees in the wake of the tax cut legislation's success on Capitol Hill. AT&T, Boeing, Comcast, Wells Fargo were among the companies to make such announcements, which were celebrated Thursday morning by counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway, who said Democrats' argument that the tax cuts would hurt working class Americans was "upended hours after it passed."

"It was the very first commitment of the tax break from these companies. they reinvested it right back into their employees immediately," she said on Fox News's "Fox & Friends" Thursday morning. "So many of those businesses are headquartered and/or have a presence in the states of Democratic senators who could not muster a yes vote for this historic tax plan."

"And think about that. You go back home, as a senator of that state where Boeing is, where Wells Fargo is, where Comcast is," she continued. "And these folks are going to say 'I thought you said you had to be against this because it was going to help the wealthy? I don't consider myself wealthy' those employees are going to say, 'and I'm grateful that this president and that Republican Congress passed it.'"

Subject: Afternoon Energy, presented by the Renewable Fuels Association: Zinke PAC blames software for discrepancy — Tax bill, ANWR is law — Court rules on silica BLAME IT ON THE SOFTWARE: A leadership PAC launched by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said a technical glitch was to blame for a nearly $200,000 discrepancy in its campaign finance reports. SEAL PAC told the FEC today it was working to fix problems the government office identified and that faulty software led the PAC to report having more cash on hand at the beginning of 2017 than at the beginning of last year, Ben Lefebvre reports.

"Zinke launched the leadership PAC when he was elected to the House as a Republican from Montana and stepped away from the group after joining President Donald Trump's Cabinet in March," Ben writes. "Last month, the FEC asked SEAL PAC to explain why its report for the first six months of 2017 showed it had $408,882 in the bank as of Jan. 1, when its final 2016 report showed a balance of $215,633 on Dec. 31. The PAC said the data file accounting for the surge in cash it reported having did not transfer correctly to the FEC." Read more.

TAX BILL IS LAW: President Donald Trump signed the GOP's signature tax legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), into law this morning without much fanfare. "I didn't want you folks to say I wasn't keeping my promise," he said at the impromptu signing. "... We did a rush job today and it wasn't fancy. ... We expected a formal ceremony in two weeks." Trump promised to sign the bill, which includes a provision to open up drilling exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, in a tweet this morning before his Christmas trip to Florida. "Will be signing the biggest ever Tax Cut and Reform Bill in 30 minutes in Oval Office. Will also be signing a much needed 4 billion dollar missile defense bill," Trump wrote. Read more.

FLOOD PROGRAM GETS SHORT-TERM EXTENSION: Congress has extended the National Flood Insurance Program until Jan. 19, as part of legislation, H.R. 1370 \(115\), passed last night and also signed by Trump this morning to keep the government open, Pro Financial Service's Zachary Warmbrodt reports. The program was set to expire today.

NPS RESPONDS: The National Park Service responded today to a report from the Environmental Data and Governance Initiative that more than 90 documents detailing how national parks plan to address climate change have been removed from the agency's website. Citing Section 508 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, NPS said it has a Jan. 18 deadline "to make electronic information and technology accessible to people with disabilities. As part of that process we are updating PDF documents on NPS.gov that are not yet accessible to all, including climate action plans for nearly 100 parks that were listed on a nps.gov webpage," a NPS spokesman said. "Those noncompliant PDF documents are temporarily unavailable for download while we work to make them compliant with the revised accessibility standards. In the meantime the PDF documents will be provided by email upon request."

IN SILICA CASE, COURT RULES AGAINST INDUSTRY: The D.C. Circuit Court today rejected all industry challenges to the Obama-era silica rule, Pro Employment & Immigration's Andrew Hanna reports. In its decision posted today, the court ruled against the industry, represented by the Chamber of Commerce. The Obama administration rule aimed to drastically lower the amount of permissible workplace exposure to crystalline silica, which is used in hydraulic fracturing. Now-EPA air chief Bill Wehrum had argued on behalf of the petitioners. Wehrum, a former attorney at Hunton & Williams, argued that OSHA had not proven that lowering the silica standard would provide any significant health benefits. More here.

REPORT: SUPERFUND SITES PRONE TO CLIMATE RISKS: An Associated Press analysis finds there are 327 Superfund sites "in areas prone to flooding or vulnerable to sea-level rise caused by climate change," according to flood zone maps, census data and EPA records. "This year's historic hurricane season exposed a little-known public health threat: Highly polluted sites that can be inundated by floodwaters, potentially spreading toxic contamination," AP writes. " ... The vulnerable sites highlighted by AP's review are scattered across the nation, but Florida, New Jersey and California have the most, and the most people living near them. They are in largely low-income, heavily minority neighborhoods, the data show." Read more.

EMPLOYEES EXITING EPA IN DROVES: More than 700 people have left the EPA since Trump has taken office, The New York Times along with ProPublica report. That "wave of departures ... puts the administration nearly a quarter of the way toward its goal of shrinking the agency to levels last seen during the Reagan administration," NYT writes, and reflects poor morale at the agency.

By the numbers: "Of the employees who have quit, retired or taken a buyout package since the beginning of the year, more than 200 are scientists. An additional 96 are environmental protection specialists, a broad category that includes scientists as well as others experienced in investigating and analyzing pollution levels," NYT write. "Nine department directors have departed the agency as well as dozens of attorneys and program managers. Most of the employees who have left are not being replaced." Read more.

PREPARING FOR 2018: The year may not yet be over — but Republicans are gearing up for abrasive 2018 midterm elections. Republicans have privately warned Trump to brace "for a possible bloodbath," POLITICO Alex Isenstadt reports. "In recent weeks, some of the president's advisers have taken it upon themselves to warn him directly about the fast-deteriorating political environment," Alex writes. "White House officials have convened to discuss ways to improve his standing with suburban voters." And on Wednesday, the president met with a score of advisers to discuss the political landscape.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell echoed the concern in a Thursday interview with the Washington Examiner. "The environment today is not great, the generic ballot's not good, and I'd love to see the president's approval rating higher. So I think we should anticipate a real knock down, drag out — even on the Senate side," McConnell said in the interview. More here.

The Kentucky Republican also told reporters today to expect a shift in the Senate. "I think one thing you can say about this year, it was pretty partisan," McConnell said during his traditional year-end news conference on Capitol Hill. "We're gonna be looking for areas of bipartisan agreement because that's the way the Senate is. There's only a few narrow exceptions, as all of you know, to those principles in the Senate." FEC probes discrepancies at former Zinke PAC Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/21/2017 04:50 PM EDT

The Federal Election Commission is asking a leadership PAC previously affiliated with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to provide more details about its direct mail spending and to account for a $200,000 discrepancy in its account, among other issues in its most recent campaign finance report.

SEAL PAC, which Zinke launched after winning his first congressional race in 2014, has until Dec. 26 to address the issues identified by the FEC, according to a request sent Monday. The FEC also asks about incomplete information related to some donors, excess contributions and potentially misclassified spending, some of which occurred after Zinke's affiliation with the leadership PAC ended when he joined President Donald Trump's Cabinet in March.

When Zinke was in Congress, SEAL PAC raised most of its money from small-dollar donors and funneled it back to a handful of political operatives who have drawn criticism from other GOP candidates. That approach made it unusual among leadership PACs, which typically rely on large contributions and lawmakers use to spread donations among allied politicians.

In Monday's letter, the FEC asked SEAL PAC to further explain the money it spent on direct mail and related activities, which are responsible for the vast majority of the PAC's $1 million in operating expenses so far this year. Most of the money was spent after Zinke left, but the committee relied on the same consultants it used in previous years.

The FEC also wants SEAL PAC to explain how its bank account nearly doubled in size on New Year's Day.

According to SEAL PAC's report covering the first six months of this year, it had \$408,882 in the bank on Jan. 1. But it reported having just \$215,633 cash on hand a day earlier, on Dec. 31, 2016, in its previous year-end report.

Vincent DeVito, who now works at Interior advising Zinke on energy policy, was SEAL PAC's treasurer until Zinke appointed him to his new position in May. DeVito signed the 2016 campaign finance report, which was updated several times, most recently on April 27.

SEAL PAC's current treasurer Barbara Lazaris did not respond to a call for comment. Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the department could not answer campaign-related questions.

The FEC also asked SEAL PAC to provide more information on contributions from two individuals who gave more than the $5,000 contribution limit per election cycle. Most of those donations came in after Zinke had left.

The PAC also reported giving $10,000 each to congressional campaigns run by GOP Reps. Jim Banks of Indiana and Scott Taylor of Virginia, double the legal limit. Both contributions were reported June 29. "Although the Commission may take further legal action regarding the excessive contribution(s), your prompt action in obtaining a refund and/or redesignating the contribution(s) will be taken into consideration," the FEC wrote.

Former Zinke PAC blames software for $200,000 accounting discrepancy Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/22/2017 01:54 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's former PAC blamed a technical glitch for a nearly $200,000 discrepancy in its campaign finance reports and said it is working to fix problems identified by the FEC.

SEAL PAC told the FEC on Friday that faulty software led it to report having more cash on hand at the beginning of 2017 than at the beginning of last year. Zinke launched the leadership PAC when he was elected to the House as a Republican from Montana and stepped away from the group after joining President Donald Trump's Cabinet in March.

Last month, the FEC asked SEAL PAC to explain why its report for the first six months of 2017 showed it had $408,882 in the bank as of Jan. 1, when its final 2016 report showed a balance of $215,633 on Dec. 31. The PAC said the data file accounting for the surge in cash it reported having did not transfer correctly to the FEC.

"The committee is now rebuilding the missing ... data file to compile lost data from the prior uploaded report," a representative for SEAL PAC wrote in the response. "If needed, FEC technical support will be contacted for further data recovery and amendment assistance."

SEAL PAC's former treasurer, Vincent DeVito, left the organization earlier this year to join Zinke at Interior, where he is a senior adviser on energy policy. The group's new treasurer did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The PAC reported raising $415,253 in the first six months of this year, much of which came from small donors, and spending more than $1 million over that same period, mostly on direct mail consultants and related expenses. The PAC continues to work with the same handful of political operatives it did when Zinke was in charge, many of whom have drawn criticism from other GOP candidates.

In its response to the FEC on Friday, SEAL PAC explained that the direct mail and other activities on which it spent the vast majority of its money "did not contain expressed advocacy," or specific suggestions on which candidates or measures to vote for.

SEAL PAC also said it took steps to obtain missing information about some donors and refund donations it received or contributions it made that were above legal limits.

Trump signs major tax overhaul into law Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/22/2017 10:20 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Friday signed the landmark $1.5 trillion tax overhaul legislation in the Oval Office, forgoing a public signing ceremony for the greatest legislative accomplishment of his first year in office.

Trump, seemingly in a festive mood ahead of his Christmas trip to Florida, told the pool of White House reporters who gathered to watch him sign Friday that he had initially planned to sign the bill early next year but changed his mind after watching TV news earlier in the day.

"I was going to wait for a formal signing some time in early January, but then I watched the news this morning and they were all saying, 'will he keep his promise, will he sign it by Christmas?'" Trump said. "And I called downstairs, I said, 'Get it ready, we have to sign it now.' We were going to wait until Jan. 7 or 8 and do a formal ceremony, but every one of the networks was saying 'will he keep his promise and will he sign it for Christmas, before Christmas, and so I immediately called and said, 'Let's get it ready.'"

The president also signed a temporary government funding bill, which averts a government shutdown.

The president offered the ceremonial pens that he would have handed out to lawmakers and special guests at an official signing ceremony to the journalists in the press pool — "I in particular like the boom holders, they were so nice to me the other day, and the cameramen" — warm words for a group he has often blamed for what he believes is unfair coverage of his administration and at whom he has regularly lobbed insults.

"Many of you have worked very hard. Many of you have worked very, very fairly. And we really appreciate that. So here you go, folks," he said, pushing the box of pens to the edge of the Resolute Desk.

Trump's signature on the tax cut legislation put the finishing touches on his first major legislative accomplishment since taking office last January. He celebrated the bill with congressional Republicans at a pep rally of sorts on the White House South Lawn earlier this week and touted its merits in his roughly 20-minute exchange with reporters, highlighting that the newly signed law would repeal the estate tax, open Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil drilling and lower corporate tax rates.

Trump also celebrated the wave of corporations, including AT&T, Wells Fargo, Comcast, Boeing and others who have committed to bonuses, pay increases or other spending on employees in the wake of the tax bill's passage. He said he had received a call from New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft, who Trump said told him he planned to purchase and build a "tremendous paper mill or paper products plant" in North Carolina because of the tax cut legislation. The president added that he had "had many calls such as that."

"A lot of things are going to be happening in the USA. We're going to bring back our companies. They've already started coming back. I think they had certain confidence in me. They figured we were going to get this done. They have already started," he said. "Corporations are literally going wild over this, I think even beyond my expectations, so far beyond my expectations."

Trump also highlighted the provision of the tax bill that undoes the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate, which he called "the most unpopular thing in Obamacare" and "very, very unfair." He hinted that he might be gearing up for another run at repealing and replacing his predecessor's signature health care legislation, telling reporters that "we're going to come up with something that's really going to be very good."

The success of the tax cut legislation has been widely regarded as a much-needed legislative victory for both the president and Republicans on Capitol Hill, especially after Congress failed last summer to pass legislation to undo Obamacare. Trump disputed that notion Friday, stressing the administration's success rolling back government regulations, and passing the VA Accountability Act and military legislation.

The president's White House rally with GOP lawmakers followed the legislation's passage through both houses of Congress, including a narrow 51-48 party-line vote in the Senate. The bill, which will allow Trump to make good on a campaign promise and tick a major item off his policy wish list, has thus far proved unpopular with voters, who most polls show largely oppose the legislation.

Republicans have insisted that the bill's popularity will improve once Americans begin to see its effects in the form of fatter paychecks starting next year and an economy goosed by lower corporate taxes. Asked whether he would hit the road to bolster the tax bill's popularity, the president said "I don't think I'm going to have to travel too much to sell it. It's selling itself. It's becoming very popular."

Democratic messaging, which polls show has so far been more successful, has argued that the bill is little more than a giveaway to corporations and wealthy Americans while doing relatively little for the middle-class Americans at whom Trump and Republican leaders have said the bill is aimed.

As the legislation as being hashed out in Congress, Trump regularly suggested that at least a handful of Democrats would ultimately come on board and vote for his tax cut package, a prediction that did not come true. On Friday, he said "Democrats already regret" not signing on to the plan.

"I think the Democrats will really regret — the Democrats already regret it. You know, they have their typical thing, 'It's for the rich.' They know that's not true," he said. "And they've been called out on it by the media, actually. But the Democrats very much regret it. They wanted to be a part of it. Just doesn't work out."

Trump ended his exchange with reporters on a positive note, answering a question about the process of shepherding the tax legislation across Capitol Hill with warm words for Congress, whose members — Republicans as well Democrats — he has often sparred with throughout his first year in the White House.

"One thing I've really learned is, I learned and got to know and became very friendly with the people in the House, the people in the Senate, both Republicans and Democrats. When I came, you know, I didn't know too many. I was very politically active but I didn't know too many," the president said. "I can call anybody now. I know every one of them very well. ... Many of these people, I have to say, not saying all, but I'm saying many of these people are great people that truly love this country. So I think that helps."

Trump signs spending bill, averting shutdown Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 12/22/2017 12:02 PM EDT

President Donald Trump signed a four-week stopgap spending bill this morning, ahead of a midnight shutdown deadline.

The measure (H.R. 1370 \(115\)) extends federal funding at current levels through Jan. 19, at which point lawmakers will either have to clear another temporary patch or settle on a package that provides updated spending levels through the end of fiscal 2018.

Trump and congressional leaders have yet to reach a compromise, though, on the overall defense and nondefense budget caps that would guide that broader deal.

The continuing resolution signed into law today is the third such tide-me-over bill Congress has cleared since the current fiscal year began on Oct. 1.

This latest measure keeps the Children's Health Insurance Program running through March 31, extends authority under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act until Jan. 19, provides extra emergency money for some defense programs and waives so-called PAYGO cuts that would have slashed billions from programs like Medicare as a result of the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), also signed into law this morning by Trump.

Both chambers passed the spending bill with ease Thursday evening, after GOP leaders struggled this week to settle on a plan that could garner enough Republican support in the House and sufficient Democratic votes in the Senate.

Congress extends flood insurance program Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/22/2017 11:35 AM EDT

Congress has agreed to renew the National Flood Insurance Program to Jan. 19 as part of legislation passed last night to keep the government open.

The program, which protects homeowners from the financial perils of flooding, was set to expire today without action.

WHAT'S NEXT: Short flood insurance extensions have been riding on government funding bills as lawmakers negotiate a long-term agreement to reauthorize and overhaul the NFIP. The focus of activity is in the Senate, after the House passed a reauthorization bill last month.

Report: Administration removes over 90 National Park climate pages Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/22/2017 05:01 AM EDT

The National Park Service has removed more than 90 documents on how national parks plan to address climate change, according to a report from a watchdog group tracking changes to agency websites, the latest move by the administration to scrub references to the issue that President Donald Trump has derided as a hoax.

Those climate action plans, which described what "parks are doing to respond to climate change and move park operations in a more sustainable direction" according to an archived website, include those from prominent sites such as Glacier National Park, Everglades National Park, Joshua Tree National Park and Grand Canyon National Park.

The group tracking the changes, Environmental Data and Governance Initiative, said the removals started in July but that the bulk occurred in early December. Visitors must now request a copy of the action plans by email.

EDGI notes it does not "intend to assess any agency or entity's intentions or rationale for the demonstrated changes to any web pages or other online content that appear in this report."

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke reportedly criticized the head of Joshua Tree National Park over a series of tweets related to climate change the park sent out in November.

WHAT'S NEXT: No public archive for the national park climate action plans is yet available, according to the group.

D.C. court rules against industry in silica case Back

By Andrew Hanna | 12/22/2017 12:55 PM EDT

The D.C. Circuit Court rejected all industry challenges to the Obama administration's silica rule.

The rule was aimed at drastically lowering the amount of permissible workplace exposure to crystalline silica. The court ruled against industry, represented by the Chamber of Commerce, in a decision posted today.

The Chamber asked the court to review five issues, including whether "substantial evidence" existed supporting the claim that silica exposure was dangerous and whether the rule was economically or technologically feasible for certain industries. The court rejected all the Chamber's arguments.

Building trade unions fared better with the court, which rejected their petition against a 30-day trigger for medical surveillance but approved "further consideration" of OSHA's decision to omit medical removal protections from the rule.

Republicans warn Trump of 2018 bloodbath Back

By Alex Isenstadt | 12/21/2017 09:55 PM EDT

A few weeks before Alabama's special Senate election, President Donald Trump's handpicked Republican National Committee leader, Ronna Romney McDaniel, delivered a two-page memo to White House chief of staff John Kelly outlining the party's collapse with female voters.

The warning, several people close to the chairwoman said, reflected deepening anxiety that a full-throated Trump endorsement of accused child molester Roy Moore in the special election — which the president was edging closer to at the time — would further damage the party's standing with women. McDaniel's memo, which detailed the president's poor approval numbers among women nationally and in several states, would go unheeded, as Trump eventually went all-in for the ultimately unsuccessful Republican candidate.

The backstage talks provide a window into how those closest to Trump are bracing for a possible bloodbath in the 2018 midterms, which could obliterate the Republican congressional majorities and paralyze the president's legislative agenda. The potential for a Democratic wave has grown after Republican losses this fall in Virginia, New Jersey and Alabama, and as the president's approval ratings have plummeted to the 30s.

In recent weeks, some of the president's advisers have taken it upon themselves to warn him directly about the fast-deteriorating political environment. White House officials have convened to discuss ways to improve his standing with suburban voters. And on Wednesday, the president met with Kelly, political director Bill Stepien, communications director Hope Hicks, former Trump campaign manager Corey Lewandowski and Brad Parscale, Trump's digital director in the 2016 campaign, to discuss the political landscape. Lewandowski forcefully raised concerns about the party's efforts, according to one attendee and another person briefed on the meeting.

In an interview this week, Stepien acknowledged the pattern of presidents losing seats in Congress in their first midterm election. But he argued that it's far too early to write off the GOP in 2018.

Stepien pointed to positive economic numbers that could buoy the party, along with a favorable Senate map and an RNC field deployment program that has been ramping up for months. Trump is also set to sign major tax cut legislation that Republicans are betting voters will reward them for, despite its unpopularity in polls before passage.

The White House political chief also noted that polling during the presidential election failed to pick up on Trump's support. It was a pattern, he argued, that could be repeating itself.

"History tells us it will be challenging. How challenging, time will tell," Stepien said. "But we have a strong sense of optimism."

Among GOP leaders, however, there is widespread concern heading into 2018. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has said privately that both chambers could be lost in November. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) has told donors that he fears a wave of swing district Republican lawmakers could retire rather than seek reelection.

During a conference meeting last week, House Republicans listened as the past five chairmen of the party's campaign arm addressed the political environment. One endangered lawmaker said his main takeaway was that incumbents should spend little time worrying about Trump or the White House and focus only on controlling what they can. Another person who was present came away with the impression that if lawmakers didn't shore up their political standing now, they shouldn't expect the national party to be able to save them down the road.

"In a year like this, you better not take anything for granted," said Pennsylvania Rep. Charlie Dent, a moderate Republican who is retiring. "I think most members know this is going to be a really tough challenge this cycle."

Trump is well aware of the dangers his party faces in 2018, those who've discussed it with him say. During political briefing sessions, top aides highlight positive developments — but also more concerning ones, such as his declining numbers among well-educated voters and higher earners. He has peppered advisers with questions about his approval ratings, and about whether he is getting enough credit for his accomplishments.

Trump has also questioned friends and advisers about how particular races are developing, sometimes in granular detail. He has recently asked, for example, about who will be running for the seat former Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.) recently resigned from.

The president, however, has shrugged off some early setbacks. After the Alabama loss, he gathered with Vice President Mike Pence, Kelly, Stepien and deputy chief of staff Rick Dearborn. The group dived into the results, talking through why the race played out as it did.

As they craft a 2018 campaign plan, White House officials are cognizant that the president isn't popular in some parts of the country. Trump is most likely to hit the trail in conservative states like Missouri or Montana with an eye toward mobilizing his core supporters. Discussions are underway, for example, about sending Trump and Pence to campaign in a southwestern Pennsylvania congressional district that the president won by nearly 20 percentage points that's holding a special election in March.

Trump aides expect his campaign schedule to more fully take shape in late spring or early summer, as legislative business takes a back seat to an intensifying midterm season.

"If the president is going to be campaigning, he needs to be very discreet and selective about where he goes," said Dent.

While the president's numbers are cratering in some swing states, he's expected to take on an expanded role on the fundraising circuit in 2018, which Republicans hope will allow them to swamp Democrats in campaign spending. The president has proven to be a major draw for donors, raising around $30 million for the RNC this year. There are talks about possibly holding an event next month in South Florida, where Trump is expected to spend part of winter.

The president often seems most at ease hobnobbing with friends at fundraisers. During a recent event in New York City, Trump cracked that the tax bill was so good he might go back into business, recalled one person who attended. He also joked that while many of his contributors had expected ambassadorships in return for their largess, another one, North Carolina businessman Louis DeJoy, just wanted to be his friend.

Behind the scenes, though, the White House has been racing to find solutions to the electoral challenge. Following the Virginia gubernatorial race, the administration commissioned an after-action report to examine why the party under-performed among suburban voters.

And at a staff meeting following the Virginia loss, aides discussed a range of issues important to those voters. Among the ideas suggested: underscoring the administration's efforts to curb the opioid crisis and to assist veterans, perhaps by increasing the visibility of Veterans Affairs Secretary David Shulkin.

For much of the year, Capitol Hill Republicans worried about whether Trump's team fully recognized the political realities they faced in 2018 and vented that the administration wasn't always responsive to their concerns.

In some corners of the Republican world, there is anxiety about the White House political operation and its readiness for next year's races. During Wednesday's meeting, Lewandowski laced into the RNC, saying that it had raised a fraction of the money it should have, according to an attendee and another person briefed. Several RNC officials noted that the committee had raised over $120 million this year, the most ever in a non-election year.

Afterwards, Lewandowski and Stepien had a heated exchange outside the Oval Office that stretched for around 10 minutes. The incident was first reported by the Washington Post and the New York Times.

With the election year approaching, the White House is considering beefing up its political team. Among the possibilities under discussion, one Trump aide said, is elevating staffers with political backgrounds into the administration's political shop.

Yet as a challenging 2018 grows ever closer, many senior Republicans say they've seen greater coordination with the White House political department. The administration and Senate Republicans have embarked on a joint effort to recruit North Dakota Rep. Kevin Cramer into the state's Senate race. Trump has personally spoken to Cramer, and last week the congressman met with McConnell and National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Cory Gardner (R-Colo.).

Earlier this month, Cramer and his wife, Kris, met with the NRSC's executive director, Chris Hansen, who made the case to the couple that Cramer had performed well in polling the committee had conducted.

The White House and McConnell's team have also been in talks about wooing former Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty into next year's special election for the seat being vacated by Democratic Sen. Al Franken.

On Wednesday, Stepien met with top aides from the RNC and House and Senate GOP campaign arms.

Some senior Republicans believe the departure of former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon, an avowed McConnell critic who is closely aligned with the conservative insurgency, has eased tensions with the administration.

"I think there have been incredible signs of progress in recent weeks," said Josh Holmes, a former McConnell chief of staff and top political lieutenant, adding that "almost everything seems to be headed in a much more productive direction."

But some Republicans are still sounding the alarm. Scott Jennings, a former top political adviser in the George W. Bush White House who is close to McConnell, said the president has major political challenges in the coming year: improving his approval numbers, ensuring the party nominates strong general election candidates, and selling his economic accomplishments.

"There are 10 months to improve the fundamentals here, and the Senate map is, on paper, good. But maps don't make majorities and I think there's a realization that there's at least a 50 percent chance one or both chambers could fall," Jennings said. "In less than one year, this first term could be, for all intents and purposes, over if the Democrats take control of either chamber."

McConnell bracing for 'knock down, drag out' 2018 midterms Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/22/2017 08:27 AM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell told the Washington Examiner Thursday that he anticipates a "knock down, drag out" 2018 midterm election for Republicans, who will look to maintain their majorities in both houses of Congress with a historically unpopular president in the White House.

"The environment today is not great, the generic ballot's not good, and I'd love to see the president's approval rating higher. So I think we should anticipate a real knock down, drag out — even on the Senate side," McConnell (R-Ky.) said in an interview Thursday.

While the party in control of the White House often struggles in the first midterms after a presidential election, the Senate races scheduled for 2018 would ordinarily bode well for the GOP, with Democrats defending several seats in states won by President Donald Trump last year while Republicans are protecting only a small handful of vulnerable seats.

But with most polls showing Trump with historically low approval ratings for a president one year into his first term, Republicans have struggled at the ballot box in 2017, most notably in deep-red Alabama, where Democrat Doug Jones won a special Senate election to fill the seat vacated by Attorney General Jeff Sessions. Even in the five House special elections won by Republicans, Democrats outperformed expectations, mounting competitive races in traditional GOP strongholds like suburban Atlanta, Kansas and Montana.

Republicans running in 2018 will also have to defend the massive tax reform bill passed this week by Congress, a top priority of the president's and of GOP leadership that has thus far proved unpopular with voters. McConnell said Thursday that Democrats "want to have a debate over the tax bill, we're ready for it," imagining campaign ads against Sens. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.) and Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), both of whom voted against the tax bill and are up for reelection next year.

"But that won't be the only issue. There are a lot of different things that affect the attitude of people, some of which we won't be able to control," the majority leader continued.

McConnell also said he is prepared to wade into GOP primaries to "make every effort to make sure we have a nominee on the November ballot who can appeal to a general election audience."

He attacked former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon, who has said he plans to back insurgent GOP candidates and upset the Washington establishment, over his support for controversial Republican firebrand Roy Moore, who lost to Jones in the Alabama Senate race and was accused during the campaign of molesting girls as young as 14 when he was in his 30s.

"Those political geniuses managed to elect a Democrat in the reddest state in America. I rest my case," McConnell said.

Moore won the GOP primary in Alabama's Senate race in part by campaigning hard against McConnell's leadership, a successful message among Alabamian Republican voters who rejected Luther Strange, the incumbent who was backed by the majority leader. But McConnell said his support, as well as support from his Senate Leadership Fund super PAC, won't be an issue in 2018.

"I'm not going to be an issue in a single race in America," he said. "I can assure you the support of the Senate Leadership Fund is not a negative. You can ask a lot of incumbents around here whether they believe it was important to their success, and it was. And, it will be there again in 2018."

McConnell forecasts bipartisanship in new year Back

By Seung Min Kim | 12/22/2017 01:35 PM EDT

After a rough-and-tumble year of partisan battles, Mitch McConnell says he's ready to try something new: bipartisanship.

The Senate majority leader's two marquee accomplishments in 2017 — a massive tax overhaul and confirmation of Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court — were done with little or no Democratic support. His bid to repeal Obamacare collapsed, but that was never meant to pick up Democratic votes anyway.

But now McConnell is adopting a bipartisan tone as Republicans head into a difficult election year in which control of the Capitol is at stake.

"I think one thing you can say about this year, it was pretty partisan," McConnell said Friday during his traditional year-end news conference on Capitol Hill. "We're gonna be looking for areas of bipartisan agreement because that's the way the Senate is. There's only a few narrow exceptions, as all of you know, to those principles in the Senate."

Laying out his preliminary agenda for 2018, McConnell said he is "almost certain" that he will tee up legislation that curbs part of the Dodd-Frank law that overhauled the financial industry after the 2008 crisis. That bill can likely overcome any filibuster threat, as it has nearly a dozen Democratic co-sponsors, including some who are the GOP's biggest political targets in the November midterms.

McConnell also stressed that he has committed to bringing up legislation to address the future of hundreds of thousands of young undocumented immigrants in the United States as long as a bipartisan group of senators can strike an agreement. The Kentucky Republican has also mentioned overhauling the nation's infrastructure as a potential policy target for next year.

McConnell also signaled he has little interest in pursuing some sharply partisan measures next year. Of Senate Republicans who are itching to take up Obamacare repeal again, he said simply, "I wish them well." And McConnell again threw cold water on the prospect of Speaker Paul Ryan's desire to overhaul entitlement and welfare programs.

"I've been here a while and the only time we've been able to do that is on a bipartisan basis," McConnell said of changing entitlement programs. "It was Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill, raised the age of Social Security and that was before I got here, so it's been a while."

McConnell added: "The sensitivity of entitlements is such that you almost have to have a bipartisan agreement in order to achieve a result."

President Donald Trump will meet with Ryan and McConnell in early January to begin hashing out the party's 2018 agenda, the majority leader told reporters.

On Trump, McConnell said the two men have "established a really good working relationship" — despite deep disputes between them earlier this year over the failure of Obamacare repeal and political campaign strategy.

"You can sense this tax exercise kind of brought everybody together, because we knew we weren't going to have any support from the other side," McConnell said. "We worked together seamlessly. I think we go into the new year with a high level of confidence in our ability to work together with the administration."

McConnell is even coming around to one of Trump's practices he once criticized: "With regard to the president's tweeting habits, I haven't been a fan until this week. I'm warming up to the tweets, actually."

He also urged Sens. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) and Mark Warner (D-Va.), the leaders of the Senate Intelligence Committee, to complete a bipartisan report on Russian meddling into the 2016 campaign because "if it's purely partisan, I don't think anybody will give it any credibility."

Still, McConnell acknowledged some looming political clashes are on the horizon.

While he said he hoped he could reach an agreement with Democrats on lifting strict spending caps for defense and domestic programs, the majority leader said the Pentagon has been hit harder, budgetwise, and that "there's an urgency there" with relieving the across-the-board cuts enacted under a 2011 deficit reduction law.

Democrats have demanded equal increases in spending for both domestic and defense programs.

And on immigration, McConnell declined to answer whether he personally supports a pathway to citizenship for Dreamers. While the bipartisan Senate group is discussing ways to provide a permanent status for the young undocumented immigrants, a GOP plan McConnell has endorsed only provides temporary protections to current beneficiaries of the Deferred Actions for Childhood Arrivals program for three years.

McConnell also said Congress must address "chain migration," which refers to naturalized U.S. citizens or permanent residents sponsoring immediate relatives for green cards, a frequent target of Trump and the right.

"I think you all are familiar with the fact that I'm pretty supportive of legal immigration," McConnell said, invoking his wife Elaine Chao, the current Transportation secretary who immigrated to the United States from Taiwan when she was 8 years old. On Dreamers, "we want to have a signature, we don't just want to spin our wheels here and have nothing to show for it."

Democrats block dozens of Trump nominees Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Seung Min Kim | 12/22/2017 11:37 AM EDT

About 100 of President Donald Trump's nominees have been kicked back to the White House, prolonging an unusually high number of vacancies across his administration and escalating the Senate's long-running nomination wars.

While the Senate agreed to keep roughly 150 of Trump's picks for consideration next year, it refused to do so on roughly 100 others, according to Majority Leader Mitch McConnell's office. That means the White House will have to renominate them if Trump wants them installed.

Among the high-profile picks tossed back to the White House: Alex Azar, chosen as the new head of the Department of Health and Human Services; Thomas Farr, a district court nominee whose record on voting rights has infuriated Democrats; and K.T. McFarland, the former deputy national security adviser chosen as U.S. ambassador to Singapore who is now facing questions about her communications with ex-national security adviser Michael Flynn.

That will trigger a requirement that nominees' paperwork be up to date — a gargantuan task for some nominees who've been languishing in the Senate for months, especially if their net worth changed dramatically because of the surging stock market.

That has some lawyers worried that nominees could throw in the towel, frustrated by the already laborious process of winning Senate approval.

"For some nominees, their paperwork will be obsolete," said one lawyer who represents several nominees and was not authorized to speak on the record. "The stock market has gone up, so the numbers are going to be materially different."

Many nominees hire lawyers to walk them through the confirmation process, spending tens of thousands of dollars — or much more for wealthy people with complicated financial situations — for assistance in filling out ethics and financial disclosure forms. The process requires nominees to review and document nearly every major financial decision in their adult lives, and the finished paperwork has been known to run more than 60 or 70 pages, lawyers said.

Generally, nominees will have to update their paperwork only if there's been a material change, but each Senate committee has slightly different rules governing the issue.

In a less divisive political atmosphere, lawmakers would have approved a unanimous consent agreement allowing the nominees to carry over into next year. Such agreements have rarely been controversial.

Any one senator can object to allowing a nominee to be carried over. Though it's likely Democrats are responsible for most of the rejections, Republicans also could have triggered some, too.

During the first year of the Obama administration, only eight nominees were not carried over into the next session, according to Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.), who has been researching the issue. President George W. Bush had just two picks returned to the White House.

"It definitely violates precedent," Lankford said of sending back so many nominees. "That's just a sign of the times that people are looking for a rule to be able to slow the Senate down even more. ... That's making a bad situation worse."

But Democrats said the caliber of Trump's nominees warranted a break from tradition.

In an interview earlier this week, Sen. Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.) said he would look for obstacles to oppose nominees with "egregious conflicts of interest," an "appalling lack of knowledge about the job," or "who are inclined to destroy the very agencies that they're assigned to support the mission of."

Merkley and Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) targeted Kathleen Hartnett-White, Trump's pick to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

"Unqualified or controversial nominees will not simply be rubber-stamped by the Senate," Carper said in a statement. "Let's start the new year off with a clean slate and allow President Trump the opportunity to nominate a leader for the Council on Environmental Quality who takes environmental laws and public health protections seriously."

Trump eyes former aides as West Wing staffers depart Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Annie Karni | 12/21/2017 07:48 PM EDT

President Donald Trump is basking in the first big legislative victory of his presidency — but the strong end to a shaky first year in office hasn't stopped him from privately ruminating on potential changes he could make to his inner circle in 2018.

Speculation about additions to the cast of characters in Season 2 of Trump's West Wing has ramped up as the administration braces itself for a wave of staff departures expected in the coming weeks, according to a dozen White House aides and outside advisers who have spoken with the president.

In recent weeks, these people say, Trump has been particularly high on Larry Kudlow, an outside economic adviser to the president and a former adviser to President Ronald Reagan. He helped lobby senators on the tax bill and was on hand at the White House on Wednesday for the South Lawn celebration after it passed.

Kudlow has been discussed internally as a potential successor to National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn, who has announced no immediate plans to leave but has told friends he will be weighing his options over the holidays.

A changing of the guard is normal for any administration hitting the one-year mark. But Trump, who began shedding senior officials just a month into his presidency, continues to take comfort in the outside political hands who ushered him into the White House — and has lately been talking them up behind closed doors.

At a private Christmas party at the White House last week, according to several attendees, the president gave multiple shout-outs from the podium to former campaign spokesman Jason Miller, now a CNN contributor, as well as to lobbyist and former campaign adviser David Urban. Insiders said Urban remains Trump's top choice for U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia, but could also come into the administration in some other role.

Trump has been spending more time with former campaign manager Corey Lewandowski, who has long craved a West Wing role. The president even offered support on Twitter for Lewandowski's new book, "Let Trump Be Trump."

The president met with Lewandowski and several White House aides on Wednesday in the Oval Office for more than an hour, amid what outside advisers describe as a "big push" to get Lewandowski and former deputy campaign manager David Bossie into the White House.

A person familiar with the meeting — which also included Brad Parscale, who ran the digital operation for Trump's campaign, and other West Wing aides — said Lewandowski got into an argument with White House political director Bill Stepien over what he views as the administration's lack of direction.

Trump's admiration for his old standbys is seen by some as a potential challenge for his chief of staff John Kelly, who since arriving in July has succeeded in ridding the West Wing of big personalities who stayed on after the campaign and short-circuiting direct lines to Trump himself.

In recent weeks, Kelly, according to frequent visitors to the West Wing, has started to do "bed checks"—that is, walking through the lobby waiting room to get a sense of who is coming and going from the White House.

And lately, Trump has been turning for political advice to Kelly's predecessor, Reince Priebus, who speaks with the president regularly and joined him for lunch in the White House on Tuesday.

Another recent regular on Trump's call list, according to White House insiders: Matt Schlapp, a former Bush administration official and current chairman of the American Conservative Union, whom Trump enjoys grilling for political advice. Schlapp, whose wife, Mercedes, works in the White House communications department, is another original Trump loyalist, one of the lone voices who stood by Trump in the days following the release of the damaging "Access Hollywood" tape in October 2016.

"Just because the president called somebody he has a relationship with for a long time to thank them for their support does not mean he's making them a job offer," said press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders of the president's recent conversations with former campaign hands. A White House official added that Trump's recent conversations with his friends and former aides are nothing new, but rather a constant of his presidency.

In the aftermath of Roy Moore's defeat in the Alabama Senate race, the president is increasingly focused on Republicans' electoral prospects and has complained to friends that the White House's political operation is lacking, according to multiple sources close to the president.

The president's frustration has also put White House political director Bill Stepien's future in the administration in doubt, though White House officials stressed that there are no immediate plans for a shakeup of his department. Trump has also begun weighing a revamped and expanded political operation that can begin preparing for his reelection bid.

A number of staff changes are already in the works and are expected to be formalized soon by the White House.

Jim Carroll, a former White House lawyer, will be named deputy chief of staff, according to White House officials.

Carroll would succeed Kirstjen Nielsen, who departed the White House earlier this month to become Homeland Security secretary. Nielsen, who knew Carroll when they both served in the George W. Bush administration, played a central role in picking her successor, according to a person familiar with the process. Carroll is already working out of Nielsen's old office — which originally belonged to chief strategist Steve Bannon and housed his famous whiteboard — according to several White House officials.

Deputy national security adviser Dina Powell, Office of Public Liaison Communications Director Omarosa Manigault Newman and Domestic Policy Council Deputy Director Paul Winfree all announced their departures this month. Powell is expected to stay at least until February.

Deputy chief of staff Rick Dearborn is also expected to exit the White House early next year, leaving open another senior position in the West Wing.

But the White House isn't facing a wholesale rebirth. Several senior administration officials are planning to stay for now, including Trump's daughter, Ivanka Trump, son-in-law Jared Kushner, communications director Hope Hicks and senior adviser Kellyanne Conway, lending some stability to a constantly lurching ship.

Conway — who purposefully lowered her public profile earlier this year, running the White House opioid crisis efforts and working closely with the first lady on the issue — is seen internally as a person on the rise, with some suggesting her as a potential successor to Kelly as chief of staff.

Hicks, meanwhile, was initially seen as an inexperienced pick for the role of communications director, but remains, as one White House official put it, "Trump's favorite person," and is often requested in meetings by Cabinet officials who know that her presence there means the discussion in the meeting will be relayed back to Trump.

And legislative affairs director Marc Short, who was on the short list for president of The Heritage Foundation, is expected to remain in his senior position in the West Wing.

As the end of the year approaches and Trump dangles hints about whom he wants to bring in, White House officials have begun betting on who else will leave.

"For almost all of us, if not all of us, it's a question of when next year," one White House staffer told POLITICO of the exit strategy.

Current and former administration officials fear that the raft of departures could empty the administration of policy experts who understand the mechanics of government.

One former administration official warned of a "brain drain from the policy staff and an effort to turn the White House into more of a political or messaging operation."

Alex Isenstadt contributed to this report.

'MEDIA MONITORING' CONTRACT AXED: Republican media monitoring firm Definers Public Affairs canceled its controversial $120,000 no-bid contract for services with EPA amid backlash over the company's links to GOP opposition research firm America Rising, Emily Holden reports. "Earlier this year, America Rising filed several Freedom Of Information Act requests for communications from EPA career staffers who had been critical of Administrator Scott Pruitt or President Donald Trump," Emily writes. That included an email sent by John O'Grady, a top union official at the EPA, that "mentions or refers to President Trump." Definers described the decision to end the contract as mutual, although EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox wouldn't say whether the agency or company initiated the cancellation.

The New York Times reported last week that Allan Blutstein, a Definers vice president had filed at least 40 FOIA requests in an effort to root out "'resistance' figures in the federal government" after Mother Jones first uncovered the contract. (h/t POLITICO Influence)

— "Definers offered EPA a better and more efficient news clipping service that would give EPA's employees real-time news at a lower cost than what previous Administrations paid for more antiquated clipping services," Joe Pounder, the firm's president, tweeted today. "But it's become clear this will become a distraction. As a result, Definers and the EPA have decided to forgo the contract."

Democrats sought its termination: Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Kamala Harris sent a letter today to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt asking him to "immediately" cancel the contract. "At a minimum, it presents an appearance of impropriety to which you as Administrator should never be a party," they wrote. "Hiring a public relations firm with abundant ties to industries you regulate, which is itself part of a broader network of groups active on behalf of you and fossil fuel interests, suggests that you have handed industry the keys to EPA." The senators asked for various records associated with how the contract was awarded and agency contacts with staff from Definers.

HOUSES PASSES TAX REFORM: The House today passed the most sweeping tax code rewrite in three decades, sending the bill H.R. 1 \(115\) to the Senate, where it is expected to be cleared for President Donald Trump's signature later today. The $1.5 trillion tax cut measure offers a long-sought legislative victory for Republicans, even as Democrats have vowed to run against it in 2018.

CORNYN GOES TO BAT FOR MLP BREAK: Sen. John Cornyn "inserted language into the final tax bill that would enrich three different constituencies: fossil fuel firms, Republicans' major campaign donors and a handful of Cornyn's GOP congressional colleagues including Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and two other Texas lawmakers in the House," a report from the International Business Times says. "Cornyn originally added the language in an amendment to the Senate bill at the same time his former chief of staff was lobbying both the House and Senate on the tax treatment for those same oil and gas partnerships." The amendment ensures master limited partnerships — the corporate structure for many pipeline companies — will get the "pass through" break in the bill. Read more.

Extenders prepped and ready: House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said today health care-related tax provisions could get tacked onto a federal funding bill due for consideration this week, Pro Tax's Aaron Lorenzo reports. "We're prepared with packages on Medicare reforms, on the extenders and on the health care tax items as well, you know, if the call is made to include them at any point," he told reporters. Should such talks accelerate, Brady added he is ready. "Whether it's going forward, coming back from the Senate, any of those," he said. "So we're prepared. We've got packages already in whatever the design is." At the center of the extenders package lies a handful of energy-related provisions, Aaron reports. Momentum to renew those tax benefits and others has begun in the Senate.

RGGI SETS EMISSION CUTS: The Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, a nine-state northeast cap-and-trade program, has completed its lengthy program review, finalizing previously announced plans to reduce power-sector emissions an additional 30 percent between 2020 and 2030. States will now begin to incorporate the changes. Virginia has also announced it will join the group.

REGULATORS REJECT TRANSCANADA REQUEST: TransCanada's request to the Nebraska Public Service Commission to reconsider an amended application for an alternative Keystone XL route was denied by the commission, according to a commission filing. "TransCanada requested the reconsideration after the commission ruled the company could only build the pipeline using a route different from the one TransCanada first proposed," Ben Lefebvre reports. TransCanada has yet to make a final decision on whether it will build the pipeline. Read more.

STATES SUE OVER METHANE RULE: Attorneys general from California and New Mexico have filed a lawsuit against the Interior Department for suspending the methane waste prevention rule, Ben reports. The states allege the move posed threats to human health and the environment. Filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, the suit is the latest complaint against Interior's attempted rollbacks of Obama-era environmental regulations. In the suit, the AGs request that DOI immediately reinstate the rule, and they say suspending the rule violated the Administrative Procedures Act and the National Environmental Policy Act. More here.

— Separately, the Natural Resources Defense Council and others have filed a lawsuit against the Trump administration for stopping protections against methane waste and air pollution from oil and gas operations on public lands. Read the suit here.

A STEPP UP: Cathy Stepp will become regional administrator for EPA's Chicago-based Midwest office, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reports, spanning the Region 5 office, which includes Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota. Stepp, the former head of Wisconsin's Department of Natural Resources, has been deputy regional administrator in EPA's Kansas City office since September, according to her LinkedIn page. Emily Holden reports more here.

PRUITT'S BUG SWEEP TOTALS $9K: Pruitt "used public money to have his office swept for hidden listening devices and bought sophisticated biometric locks for additional security," the Associated Press reports. The spending totaled nearly $9,000, AP found. EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox defended the move on Monday, telling the AP, "Administrator Pruitt has received an unprecedented amount of threats against him and while The Associated Press attempts to trivialize his safety, there is nothing nefarious about security decisions made by EPA's Protective Service Detail." More here.

DOE PUTS $12M IN SOLAR RESEARCH: The Energy Department today announced selections for a $12 million funding opportunity to advance predictive modeling capabilities for solar generation. "These projects will address a critical gap in our research, which is knowing precisely how much solar electricity to expect at any given hour on any given day," Energy Secretary Rick Perry said in a statement. The project selections come as Perry has prioritized research and development in grid reliability. See the Solar Forecasting 2 selections here.

MAIL CALL — BRING BACK AFTC: More than 300 groups — including NGVAmerica and the National Propane Gas Association — called on Congress to reinstate the $0.50/gallon alternative fuels tax credit in the year-end legislative package for a minimum of two years. "Renewal of the AFTC also will bring significant environmental benefits and enhance our energy independence by lowering our dependence on foreign oil," the letter says. Read it here.

WHAT'S ESA'S IMPACT? Texans for Natural Gas is out with a new report today focusing on the Endangered Species Act's impact on oil and natural gas production, comparing lawsuits brought by activists with conservation measures implemented by producers. According to the report, activist groups have overwhelmed the Fish & Wildlife Service with listing petitions and lawsuits. It found 141 ESA lawsuits related to missed deadlines were filed between 2005 and 2015 — 79 percent of which were filed by environmental groups. The report also finds that Texas oil and natural gas operators "proactively implement conservation efforts" to protect species. Read it here.

GOP firm ends controversial media monitoring contract with EPA Back

By Emily Holden | 12/19/2017 02:22 PM EDT

The Republican media monitoring firm Definers Public Affairs canceled its $120,000 contract with EPA following a media backlash because of the company's links to GOP opposition research firm America Rising.

Earlier this year, America Rising filed several Freedom Of Information Act requests for communications from EPA career staffers who had been critical of Administrator Scott Pruitt or President Donald Trump. That included email sent by John O'Grady, a top union official at the EPA, that "mentions or refers to President Trump."

News reports about the two efforts to monitor news coverage about the agency and dig up information about dissenting staffers stirred new accusations that Pruitt is fostering an atmosphere of paranoia and distrust at EPA.

Definers described the decision to end the contract as mutual, although EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox would not say whether the agency or company initiated the cancellation.

Definers President Joe Pounder said in a written statement that previous administrations paid for more for slower services, but "it's become clear this will become a distraction. As a result, Definers and the EPA have decided to forgo the contract." He added that the firm will not offer its services to any other federal agencies.

Mother Jones first reported on the contract, and The New York Times documented the ties between Definers and America Rising, which was also started by Pounder.

Conservatives demanding details on federal workers' encryption use Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 02/14/2017 03:09 PM EDT

Republicans in Congress and their conservative allies are demanding details about federal workers' use of encrypted messaging apps, part of a broader counterattack on employees suspected of opposing President Donald Trump's agenda.

Congressional Republicans are also pondering changes to longstanding laws that protect government workers, further stoking fears among some federal employees that the new administration's supporters are out to squash dissent.

Republicans on the House Science Committee took up the cause on Tuesday by asking EPA's inspector general to review reports that agency employees are using an app called Signal, which allows people to exchange encrypted text messages and phone calls. POLITICO reported this month that a group of fewer than a dozen EPA employees were using the app to discuss what they would do if Trump's political appointees flout the law or delete valuable scientific data.

The anti-Trump resistance has infuriated Republicans, who fear that dissenters in the government could undercut the president's policy proposals by unleashing even more embarrassing leaks. They also contend that the use of encrypted messaging circumvents federal record-keeping laws — an argument Science Chairman Lamar Smith (R-Texas) echoed in Tuesday's letter.

"[T]he Committee is concerned that these encrypted and off-the-record communication practices, if true, run afoul of federal record-keeping requirements, leaving information that could be responsive to future Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) and congressional requests unattainable," wrote Smith, who organized the letter to the IG. The panel has jurisdiction over many cybersecurity issues.

Outside conservative groups have launched similar efforts.

Citing POLITICO's story, the Cause of Action Institute, a right-leaning watchdog group, filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act this month seeking EPA employees' communications using Signal. "The bottom line is: An encrypted app is basically a way to avoid transparency," Institute Assistant Vice President Henry Kerner said in an interview.

It's not just encryption that is raising eyebrows. Republican research firm America Rising filed a FOIA request this month seeking all emails sent by John O'Grady, a top union official at the EPA, that "mentions or refers to President Trump."

The FOIA request came in response to O'Grady's comments to The Washington Post that Trump's decision to firing then-acting Attorney General Sally Yates "sends kind of a chilling effect" through agencies. O'Grady did not respond to a request for comment.

"The public is entitled to know whether career federal government employees are engaged in partisan politics on the taxpayers' dime," said Allan Blutstein, vice president of FOIA operations at America Rising.

EPA employees said they are not using Signal for official government business, and they raised concerns that they're being targeted because they are critical of Trump.

"I don't think anybody can dictate which apps we use on our personal time, for personal conversations," one EPA employee told POLITICO.

The debate comes as employees across the government — political appointees and career officials alike — are increasingly relying on encrypted messaging apps, fearing repercussions if their private conversations are made public.

National security officials have long used encrypted mobile phone software like Signal and WhatsApp to communicate with reporters and other staffers. Signal frequently comes up in articles advising people how they can communicate free of snooping from government officials or hackers, especially following the massive leaks of stolen Democratic Party emails that roiled last year's presidential election.

Trump's appointees have gotten into the act, too: The Washington Post reported this week that administration staff members are using an app called Confide, which deletes messages once they are read, because they're afraid of being accused of leaking to the press. That's also a threat to transparency and accountability, argued Tom Fitton, president of the conservative activist group Judicial Watch, in an interview with POLITICO on Tuesday.

"If they're conducting government business via an application that destroys records, that's a problem that needs to stop," said Fitton, adding that the administration needs to either train its staff on the issue or send them a reminder. He added that the Trump administration is "asking for a lawsuit from either Judicial Watch or someone else if they don't get their act together on these records policies."

Asked if the House Science Committee will pursue a similar probe of White House staffers' use of encrypted messaging apps, spokeswoman Kristina Baum declined to make any commitments. But she said the panel "intends to continue to monitor" cyber issues.

The growing tension across the government has some career employees worried that Republicans will try to make radical changes to laws protecting federal workers — a move that could make people more fearful to speak out against Trump. Trump has already imposed a freeze on most federal hires and has promised to reduce the size of the workforce.

"Frankly, the climate has shifted rather dramatically and we've gone from a chief executive who respects civil servants to a rather bombastic, disdainful chief executive who unfortunately empowers their disparagement," Rep. Gerry Connolly (D-Va.) said in an interview.

Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R-Utah), chairman of the House Oversight Committee, is eyeing a major overhaul of the civil service system. He has discussed phasing out pensions for new government employees, instead relying on a defined-contribution plan like a 401(k), and has advocated making it easier to fire problem workers. Chaffetz reportedly talked about some of these issues during a recent meeting with Trump.

Connolly said he's concerned that the Republican Congress could win enough support to move a bill gutting civil service protections. "It is very alarming and I think frankly very destructive in terms of the fabric of a free government and a free society," he said.

In the Senate, lawmakers are also considering changes to civil service laws, but Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.) said he is eyeing targeted tweaks that can win bipartisan support, such as efforts to improve the hiring process.

"If we can keep it small and we can keep it targeted, I think we can move it through unanimous consent," said Lankford, who chairs the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee's panel on regulatory affairs and federal management. "We need to be better at hiring. If we're better at hiring we don't have to worry about firing."

Alex Guillén contributed to this story.

Brady says health extenders package is prepared Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/19/2017 12:38 PM EDT

Legislation to extend health care-related tax provisions could get tacked onto a federal funding bill due for consideration this week, House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said today.

"We're prepared with packages on Medicare reforms, on the extenders and on the health care tax items as well, you know, if the call is made to include them at any point," he told reporters.

Should such talks accelerate, Brady said he is ready.

"Whether it's going forward, coming back from the Senate, any of those," he said. "So we're prepared. We've got packages already in whatever the design is."

Separately, Brady said House Republicans, who are on the verge of passing an agreement on more sweeping tax legislation today, H.R. 1 \(115\), would later turn their focus to tax extenders. Formal talks with the Senate haven't yet begun, he said.

"We haven't had that discussion yet just because we're focused on finishing out the tax reform bill, but we'll pivot to that discussion right after this is over," he said, adding that he assumes tax extenders would slide into next year.

A handful of energy-related tax provisions is at the center of the tax extenders package.

Momentum to renew those tax benefits and others, some of which are related to transportation and agriculture, has started in the Senate.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House and Senate plan votes today on final passage of the tax overhaul bill.

Virginia advances proposal to join RGGI Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/16/2017 04:57 PM EDT

Virginia's Air Pollution Control Board today decided to officially move ahead with a proposal for the state to join the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative.

The plan, which will now go out for public comment before it's finalized, proposes to cap carbon dioxide emissions from power generation in Virginia at 33 million tons or 34 million tons in 2020, with 3 percent annual reduction through 2030.

Outgoing Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe announced the decision to join the multi-state program earlier this week at the climate summit in Bonn, Germany. In a statement today backing the board's decision, McAuliffe made a dig at President Donald Trump.

"Virginia is uniquely vulnerable to the threat of climate change and many of our residents are already experiencing its impacts. ... I am proud that Virginia is joining states around the nation that are filling the void of leadership that President Trump has left on transforming the energy sector and protecting our environment," he said.

New Jersey, which exited the pact under Republican Gov. Chris Christie, is also set to rejoin RGGI.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Air Pollution Control Board is expected to take public comments for at least 60 days once it's announced in the Virginia Register.

Nebraska regulators reject TransCanada motion to amend Keystone XL application Back

The Nebraska Public Service Commission denied TransCanada's request that it consider an amended application related to the alternative route the commission set for the Keystone XL pipeline, according to a commission filing.

TransCanada requested the reconsideration after the commission ruled the company could only build the pipeline using a route different from the one TransCanada first proposed. TransCanada has not yet made a final decision whether it will build the pipeline.

The PSC also turned down a motion by the Nebraska landowners that the commission did not have legal standing to approve the alternative route.

WHAT'S NEXT: TransCanada and the other parties have 30 days to appeal the PSC's decision.

States sue Interior over delay to methane waste rule Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/19/2017 12:55 PM EDT

The California and New Mexico attorneys general filed a lawsuit against the Interior Department for suspending the methane waste prevention rule, alleging the move posed threats to human health and the environment.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, is the latest complaint against Interior's attempted rollbacks of Obama-era environmental regulations. Interior finalized a rule earlier this month delaying the methane waste rule until January 2019, a move designed to give the department time to repeal the rule.

In the suit, the attorneys general request that Interior immediately reinstate the rule, and they charge that Trump administration's suspending the rule earlier this month violated the Administrative Procedures Act and the National Environmental Policy Act.

"Defendants have prioritized a negligible increase in oil and gas operators' profits over the public interest in preventing the waste of a public resource that belongs to the American people," the suit claims. "In doing so, Defendants dismiss out of hand the harmful impacts of the thousands of tons of toxic air pollutants and hundreds of thousands of tons of greenhouse gases emitted as a result of operators' inefficient, outdated, and wasteful practices."

The methane waste prevention rule as written would force oil and gas producers to tighten methane leak detection and repair requirements on federal lands. Some in the industry have complained the upgrades are too expensive.

WHAT'S NEXT: Interior will respond to the lawsuit.

Stepp to head EPA Midwest region Back

By Emily Holden | 12/19/2017 12:53 PM EDT

Cathy Stepp, the former head of Wisconsin's Department of Natural Resources, will become regional administrator for EPA's Chicago-based Midwest office, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reports.

Region 5 includes Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Stepp has been deputy regional administrator in EPA's Kansas City office since September, according to her LinkedIn page.

She was previously treasurer for the Republican Party of Wisconsin, statewide communications director for Sen. John McCain's 2008 presidential bid and a state senator.

Leaked memo schooled Tillerson on human rights Back

By Nahal Toosi | 12/19/2017 05:12 AM EDT

Three months into his tenure as secretary of state, Rex Tillerson alarmed veteran diplomats with remarks that sounded like a potential shift in American foreign policy: The U.S., he said, should be careful not to let values like human rights create "obstacles" to the pursuit of its interests.

The comment, at a gathering of State Department employees, provoked an outcry among former U.S. officials and human rights activists who feared America was abandoning a vital mission. Two weeks later, a top Tillerson adviser wrote up a short tutorial, in the form of a confidential memo to his boss, recapping "the debate over how far to emphasize human rights, democracy promotion, and liberal values in American foreign policy."

The May 17 memo reads like a crash course for a businessman-turned-diplomat, and its conclusion offers a starkly realist vision: that the U.S. should use human rights as a club against its adversaries, like Iran, China and North Korea, while giving a pass to repressive allies like the Philippines, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

"Allies should be treated differently—and better—than adversaries. Otherwise, we end up with more adversaries, and fewer allies," argued the memo, written by Tillerson's influential policy aide, Brian Hook.

It is unclear what prompted Hook to author the memo, and whether he did so at Tillerson's request amid a furor in foreign policy circles about Tillerson's May 3 remarks, in which he said that "it's really important that all of us understand the difference between policy and values" like "freedom, human dignity and the way people are treated."

But the memo, a photo of which was shown to POLITICO, suggests that Tillerson, a former CEO of ExxonMobil, was still on a steep learning curve when it comes to foreign affairs. It also seems to foreshadow President Donald Trump's approach to the complex politics of human rights overseas.

During his May visit to Saudi Arabia, and while hosting the leaders of Egypt and Turkey at the White House, Trump did not publicly press the leaders of those countries on their authoritarian policies. But during an address to South Korea's Parliament in November, Trump spoke at striking length about the brutality of North Korea's regime. Trump and Tillerson have also repeatedly assailed Iran's human rights record.

Hook's memo "tells Tillerson that we should do exactly what Russian and Chinese propaganda says we do—use human rights as a weapon to beat up our adversaries while letting ourselves and our allies off the hook," said Tom Malinowski, who served as an assistant secretary of state for democracy, human rights and labor in the administration of former President Barack Obama.

"He utterly misses the elemental fact that America's moral authority is one of our main advantages in the world, and that it would disappear if we apply it as selectively as he advises," Malinowski added.

On Monday, Trump unveiled a new National Security Strategy document that uses the phrase "human rights" just once. (Obama's last plan, in 2015, mentioned the phrase 16 times.) Trump's strategy at one point states, "We are not going to impose our values on others," but later includes a section on how the administration will "Champion American Values."

The memo also offers a glimpse into how Tillerson's secretive inner circle shapes foreign policy, leaving many veteran State Department officials feeling sidelined.

Hook heads what's known as the Policy Planning Staff at the State Department. Policy Planning traditionally has served as an internal think tank doing mid- to long-term strategizing, but under Tillerson it is more involved in day-to-day work that would otherwise be the purview of the department's many bureaus.

"The classic dilemma of balancing ideals and interests is with regard to America's allies. In relation to our competitors, there is far less of a dilemma. We do not look to bolster America's adversaries overseas; we look to pressure, compete with, and outmaneuver them," Hook wrote.

"For this reason," Hook continues, "we should consider human rights as an important issue in regard to U.S. relations with China, Russia, North Korea, and Iran. And this is not only because of moral concern for practices inside those countries. It is also because pressing those regimes on human rights is one way to impose costs, apply counter-pressure, and regain the initiative from them strategically."

It is not clear whether Tillerson ever read the memo, which was categorized as "sensitive but unclassified." Hook did not answer multiple requests for comment. The memo was shown to POLITICO on the condition that only its text be reprinted.

State Department spokeswoman Heather Nauert would not confirm or deny the veracity of the memo. "We can't comment on alleged internal documents but, as a general matter, human rights remains an integral part of our values that we consistently address with other nations," she wrote in an email.

Other State Department sources, although not in a position to confirm the authenticity of the memo, said it appeared to follow standard formatting used for such papers.

Long a familiar face in conservative foreign policy circles, Hook held several positions under President George W. Bush, including assistant secretary of state for international organizations.

Hook's decision to join the Trump administration surprised some in Washington because so many other mainstream conservative foreign policy experts publicly distanced themselves from Trump during the 2016 presidential race. His disproportionate influence at the State Department has unnerved some lawmakers who note that he never had to endure the confirmation process.

Hook's three-page memo lays out the historical underpinnings of the two main U.S. foreign policy schools on human rights, which Hook divides into "realism" and "liberal/idealist/Wilsonian."

George W. Bush, like fellow presidents Bill Clinton and Obama, "worked on relatively optimistic assumptions regarding the possibilities for positive social change overseas, as nudged forward by American power and diplomacy," Hook states. "No doubt this optimism was well-intentioned.

"But in the wake of Iraq and Afghanistan, slow economic recovery, the rise of China, and the failed Arab Spring, there is understandably less optimism today that the world can be easily democratized or reshaped simply by expressing American liberal values, or by badgering American allies."

Hook approvingly writes that Ronald Reagan's "first instinct was always to back allies against adversaries, even in controversial cases, including through his second term." But Jimmy Carter, Hook states, damaged American interests because he "badgered" and undermined U.S. allies like the shah of Iran.

Today, "in the case of US allies such as Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and the Philippines, the [Trump] Administration is fully justified in emphasizing good relations for a variety of important reasons, including counter-terrorism, and in honestly facing up to the difficult tradeoffs with regard to human rights," Hook writes. "It is not as though human rights practices will be improved if anti-American radicals take power in those countries."

Malinowski took issue with some of Hook's historical lessons. Anti-Americanism in Iran, he argued, was festering before Carter arrived on the scene—thanks in part to the CIA's role in overthrowing an elected Iranian government in 1953 and America's longstanding support for the country's repressive monarch.

Malinowski also dismissed Hook's claim that Reagan's policy of "constructive engagement" with South Africa's apartheid regime worked "in the long run," noting that it is generally accepted that U.S. sanctions were more effective in changing that government's behavior. Reagan largely resisted lawmakers' demands to impose sanctions on South Africa over its segregation policies, even vetoing legislation later overridden by Congress.

A former senior official in the Bush administration, speaking on condition of anonymity, also expressed disappointment in the memo.

"The memo forgets about people entirely. It doesn't even recognize the existence of cases where criticizing a 'friendly' regime will win the United States a lot of support at the street level," the former official said. "To give an example, the United States didn't raise human rights issues with the Greek military junta in the 1970s because it was 'pro-American.' The result of this abandonment of the people of Greece was long-term anti-Americanism there."

Tillerson made his comments about balancing values and interests during his first town hall with State Department employees. He tried to be nuanced and cautious with his remarks, emphasizing that American values remain constant, even as policies change over time.

"For me, it's one of the most difficult areas as I've thought about how to formulate policy to advance all of these things simultaneously. It's a real challenge," he told the audience.

In more recent months, Tillerson earned applause from some in the human rights community for visiting Myanmar and later declaring that the Asian country was carrying out "ethnic cleansing" against its Rohingya Muslim minority.

Still, Tillerson's decoupling of American values and American interests has been cited frequently by critics in the months since his May town hall appearance.

The criticism comes as morale in the State Department has plummeted over proposed staff and budget cuts and amid mounting frustration that many career civil and foreign service employees are being shut out of the policy-making process.

One U.S. diplomat's fiery resignation letter, first reported by Foreign Policy, cited Tillerson's May 3 comments as one of the reasons she felt compelled to quit.

The real reason Trump allies are attacking Mueller Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 12/19/2017 05:09 AM EDT

President Donald Trump insists he's not going to fire Robert Mueller, but that's not stopping Republicans and others close to the president from orchestrating a relentless stream of attacks on the credibility and integrity of the special counsel and his team of Russia investigators.

In the past week, investigators on Mueller's team have been publicly accused of bias against Trump and of violating criminal procedure to get documents related to his transition. The purpose of the onslaught, according to people close to the White House, isn't to encourage the president to oust the special counsel, a move that could precipitate a crisis in the Justice Department and potentially a move to impeach Trump.

Rather, these people said, the goal is to sow public doubt about Mueller and his prosecutors in advance of upcoming criminal trials — and to give the president political cover if he wants to start issuing pardons to any current or former aides swept up in the Russia scandal.

"It is definitely a smarter strategy than outright firing of Mueller, because that is likely to create a firestorm," said Elizabeth de la Vega, a former assistant U.S. attorney from the Northern District of California. "It is also entirely consistent with Trump's modus operandi because he is surprisingly nonconfrontational, preferring to be manipulative and, frankly, sneaky."

The latest complaints against Mueller are a sharp escalation from earlier this year, when Trump and his allies took their first shots at the former FBI director, questioning his hiring of prosecutors who had predominantly donated to Democratic politicians, including President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton.

Their grievances have taken on an added sense of political urgency as the Russia inquiry creeps closer to the president's inner circle. Earlier this month, former national security adviser Michael Flynn pleaded guilty to lying to investigators about his contact with foreign officials. The plea followed a similar deal cut by former campaign adviser George Papadopoulos in October, when former Trump campaign manager Paul Manafort and his deputy, Rick Gates, pleaded not guilty on charges including tax evasion.

Mueller's critics have especially latched on to two major revelations from the past week. First, the Justice Department released to Congress and reporters several hundred anti-Trump text messages exchanged between two FBI officials who had previously served on Mueller's team. Then on Saturday, an attorney for Trump's transition team lodged a complaint that the special counsel had improperly obtained tens of thousands of the team's emails directly from the General Services Administration — claiming violations of both attorney-client privilege and the Fourth Amendment, which protects against unlawful search and seizure.

While Trump told reporters Sunday as he returned from Camp David that he wasn't considering firing Mueller, he did respond when asked about the special counsel's methods for obtaining his transition team's emails.

"Not looking good," Trump said. "It's not looking good. It's quite sad to see that. My people are very upset about it. I can't imagine there's anything on them, frankly, because as we said, there's no collusion."

Several legal experts described Mueller's moves as entirely appropriate, and the special counsel's office even defended itself through a rare public comment.

"When we have obtained emails in the course of our ongoing criminal investigation, we have secured either the account owner's consent or appropriate criminal process," Mueller spokesman Peter Carr said in a statement released after midnight on Sunday.

For Trump, launching direct attacks against Mueller has up to now been a no-no. While the businessman-turned-politician used his branding skills to great effect during his historic 2016 presidential campaign — labeling opponents with catchy monikers like "Little Marco," "Lynin' Ted" and "Crooked Hillary" — he has so far heeded the advice of White House attorney Ty Cobb and other aides who have urged him to leave Mueller alone.

But how long that lasts is an open question.

Some of the very public voices Trump listens to the most are beating the drum that Mueller's investigation has gone off the rails. The Wall Street Journal earlier this month published an op-ed asserting that the special counsel was "too conflicted to investigate the FBI" and urging him to "step down in favor of someone more credible."

Fox News host Jeanine Pirro, who is scheduled to appear with the president's son Eric in mid-January at a Mar-a-Lago event in South Florida celebrating the one-year anniversary of Trump's inauguration, also unloaded on the Russia investigators during a recent program.

"There is a cleaning needed in our FBI and Department of Justice," she said "It needs to be cleansed of individuals who should not just be fired, but who need to be taken out in cuffs!"

Jay Sekulow, the president's personal attorney, used an appearance last week on Sean Hannity's Fox show to call for a second special counsel to look into potential conflicts of interest between the Justice Department and the FBI. And then Hannity, a few days later and again with Sekulow on the program as a guest, took a direct swing at the Mueller probe. "They have been exposed as corrupted, abusively biased, incapable of conducting a fair investigation," he said.

Mark Corallo, a former Justice spokesman when John Ashcroft was attorney general who earlier this year worked as press secretary for Trump's legal team, said in an interview with POLITICO that he's tried to avoid direct attacks on Mueller — until the FBI officials' emails surfaced.

Now, he's accusing Mueller of "not just hyperpartisanship, but what seems to be actual efforts to go after Trump and his associates without the objectivity that is required of prosecutors and investigators."

Corallo said Trump would be making a "colossal mistake" in firing the special counsel.

"It'd certainly lead to serious talk of impeachment," he said, adding that talk about pardons for now was premature "until the Mueller investigation has wrapped up."

But Corallo predicted that because of recent events, Mueller investigators were going to suffer in the court of public opinion.

"Whether or not the facts that underpin the Flynn, Manafort and Gates charges are legitimate or not is now irrelevant to a large portion of the American people," he said.

Indeed, public opinion on the Mueller investigation remains a mixed bag. A POLITICO/Morning Consult poll of 1,955 registered voters conducted Dec. 8-11 — just before the release of the FBI officials' anti-Trump text messages — found 39 percent of respondents saying the special counsel had been conducting a fair investigation, with 27 percent saying it hadn't been fair and another 34 percent who said they didn't know or held no opinion.

The same poll did suggest Trump could be entering dangerous terrain if he fired Mueller: Forty-six percent said that would not be a good idea, while 19 percent approved of the president's ousting the special counsel. Thirty-five percent had no opinion or said they didn't know.

Several sources closely tracking the Russia investigation said the mixed messages coming out of Trump's camp are happening for a reason.

"The collective criticism of Mueller and his staff, the truly bizarre complaint to Congress from the transition team — are we cooperating or not? — and the calls for a second special counsel are clearly part of an orchestrated strategy to try to discredit Mueller and, in turn, to potentially lay the groundwork to justify a pardon for Flynn," a white-collar attorney representing a senior Trump aide wrote in an email to POLITICO.

"Whether Trump actually pulls the trigger will depend, in part, on what sort of feedback they get from this barrage of trial balloons," the lawyer added. "But — not to mix metaphors too awfully — this is plainly a shot across the bow."

Trump so far has brushed aside questions about pardons, even though some of his most loyal aides have landed directly in Mueller's cross hairs.

"I don't want to talk about pardons for Michael Flynn yet," the president told reporters on Friday. "We'll see what happens. Let's see."

That open-ended response prompted panic among some Trump critics. The ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, Democratic Rep. Jerrold Nadler of New York, and the panel's full slate of Democrats wrote a letter to their Republican counterparts on Monday urging them to hold hearings on the president's pardon powers.

Mueller's defenders see the attacks in a more nefarious light.

"It's all such a bunch of poppycock. It's just feeding his base. I don't understand how people buy it," said Katya Jestin, a former Justice Department prosecutor who tried a Mafia case with Mueller attorney Andrew Weissmann and later worked with him in private practice at Jenner & Block.

"I think it's a distraction," she added. "I feel this gets ginned up every time they think something is coming down the pike."

Barbara McQuade, a former Obama administration U.S. attorney from eastern Michigan, said the anti-Mueller attacks looked to be part of a long-term strategy to discredit the special counsel.

"This could be to lay the groundwork for firing him, but it seems more likely to me to be a strategy to cast doubt on any charges that Mueller files down the road," she said. "Putting the police on trial in this way is a common tactic of criminal defense attorneys. If the public is conditioned to doubt the credibility of Mueller, then the public may also doubt the validity of the charges themselves."

'I Was An Easy Pickup': How Trump Lost Manchin on Taxes Back

By Edward-Isaac Dove | 12/19/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Subscribe to Off Message on Apple Podcasts here. | Subscribe via Stitcher here.

During the transition last year and several times since, Donald Trump repeatedly pushed Joe Manchin to switch parties and become a Republican, the West Virginia senator revealed in an interview for POLITICO's Off Message podcast.

He said no—"I said, 'You need more Democrats like me, you don't need Republicans,'" Manchin explained.

So Trump asked Manchin to support repealing Obamacare, and then the Republican tax bill.

He said no to those, too.

Manchin should be the most endangered politician in America, followed closely by the nine other Senate Democrats running in states Trump carried last year, many by wide margins. And they all should have been poachable votes for the White House, if the president's outreach to red-state Democrats had worked, and if the agenda Republicans have chased in search of something to call a win hasn't consistently proved so unpopular with voters—the tax bill has a 26 percent approval rating, according to a Monmouth University poll out Monday, with 50 percent of people saying they believed it would raise their taxes.

"I was an easy pickup. Very easy pickup," Manchin said. "And a couple, two, three other Democrats would have been easy pickups, if they had just made an effort."

Not one of those Trump-state Democrats has budged on Obamacare repeal or taxes, to the surprise of Democrats themselves, who entered the year with their brains and confidence scrambled by Trump's win.

For all the lunches at the White House and trips Trump's made on Air Force One to needle them back home, Democrats are heading into 2018 complaining loudly about Trump-led Republicans abandoning what he stood for in secret, stealthy ways. Even the very not-viral Montana Sen. Jon Tester made a viral video yelling into the camera and mocking the handwritten changes in the margin of the tax bill.

And as Manchin heads into his own reelection campaign as the Senate Democrat from the most Trump-friendly state—the president carried West Virginia by 42 points, and even persuaded Gov. Jim Justice to switch parties in August—he said he's feeling just fine about his choices, and his chances.

"I'm not worried at all," Manchin said. "Not one iota am I worried."

Manchin did, as he likes to point out, win by 24 points in 2012 the same day Mitt Romney carried his state by 27 points, winning every county along the way, which he credits to a personal brand he's spent 35 years in politics building.

He's comfortable telling Elizabeth Warren directly—and saying publicly—that Washington Democrats "don't hold anybody accountable and responsible for anything." He says his colleagues who have called for Trump to resign are "foolish" and nakedly political. He's frustrated by his fellow Democratic senators calling for Al Franken to resign before the Ethics Committee completes its investigation into sexual misconduct allegations against him, and calls their treatment of Franken "the most hypocritical thing I've ever seen done to a human being."

And he proudly ripped in to National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Cory

Gardner of Colorado, whom Manchin confronted on the Senate floor two months ago, complaining about super PAC attacks on Manchin's daughter being the CEO of the drug company Mylan, which manufactures some products with opioids, aiming to undercut the hard line he's taken against opioids as the epidemic has ravaged his state.

"I said, 'Be a man enough to go after me. Don't be chicken shit.' And that's what they are. I said, 'Cory, that's not you,' I said—Cory's a good guy; I like him," Manchin said. "No different than the DSCC [Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee], too, they all do it. I despise that. Their name's not on the ballot; my name's on the ballot. OK. If you want to go after somebody, go after me, not after my family."

The NRSC, the Republicans' Senate campaign arm, points out that Manchin never complained so publicly about the DSCC roping Missouri Republican Roy Blunt's wife into its attacks last year, though in the interview, Manchin said he didn't like that either, insisting, "Democrats are as wrong as the Republicans. Someone's got to stop this. Cory's a good enough person to stop it. OK?" (Gardner declined to comment.)

Manchin believes West Virginians will see the tax bill like he does: a closed process that explodes the deficit in ways Ronald Reagan would never have allowed, helps the rich and makes little impact in the paychecks of the people in his state.

"Whenever you are upside down and you're robbing Peter to pay Paul, and you can't find Peter anymore ..." he says, then offers an even more homespun West Virginia version about his grandfather, the owner of a small grocery store: "Joe," he says, 'indebtedness—which is basically uncontrolled debt, unmanaged debt—will make a coward out of the decisions. You'll be cowardly in your decisions.' He was exactly right, and we're doing it now."

The GOP take on Manchin is, as NRSC spokesman Bob Salera put it, that he's "rejected all opportunities to work across the aisle." Salera dinged him for voting against Obamacare repeal and the Republican tax bill despite Trump's appeals for his help: "Manchin turned his back and voted with Washington Democrats."

In Manchin's populist blasts against the tax bill, DSCC Chair Chris Van Hollen of Maryland said he sees a message that will resonate across the map—in states where Democrats are defending, in states where they're trying for pickups, and in states like Mississippi or Utah where Democrats are nursing aspirations that seem slightly less like fantasies since Doug Jones won in Alabama. ("It was clear to me this year there's a very, very dramatic shift," Jenny Wilson, the Democratic candidate in Utah, said on the afternoon after the Alabama surprise.)

Take Missouri, Van Hollen said, where Democratic incumbent Claire McCaskill is presumed to be in major danger against state Attorney General Josh Hawley, a top recruit of Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Pointing to assessments of the GOP tax plan tilted in favor of the wealthy at the expenses of the middle class, Van Hollen said, "Trump promised an economic populism during his campaign, but his proposals have been all about big Republican donors. They've been all about giveaways to big corporations and the very wealthiest in this country. And that is not what Trump voters bargained for."

With Jones arriving in the Senate, Manchin has new dreams of a middle-of-the-road nucleus, along with fellow centrist Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), and from the Republican side, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), retiring Sens. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). Add in "that independent free spirit" Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Manchin said, and he thinks they might be able to reshape what happens.

As for Trump, Manchin said, he doesn't know how to break through to the president.

"When he says he's not a politician, I agree. I understand that," Manchin said. "But he's allowing politicians to set an agenda that he ought to let his gut set. He is more comfortable wanting to do a bipartisan deal than he is wanting to do a partisan deal, I can tell you. I can feel it, OK? But he gets pushed right into this partisan rhetoric: 'Democrats are all bad.'"

It's debatable just how hard Trump has to be pushed to be partisan, but ever since he rushed to Trump Tower during the transition to toy with bolting the Senate to become energy secretary, Manchin's been a Trump favorite, chatting on the phone regularly with the president and sidling in for photo-ops.

"Hey, Joe, I want you to know this is not going to be a tax cut for the wealthy and rich like me. This is going to be for the working people that got left behind," Manchin remembers Trump saying to him at one of their meetings a few months ago. "I said, 'Mr. President, that's perfect. That's a wonderful starting point. That's where we should be.'"

Manchin's office worked with the Wharton School of Finance, the president's alma mater, and the Third Way centrist Democratic think tank to develop alternative proposals that they submitted to the White House in draft form. They never heard back.

"It shows you where their values are. Their choices were that the corporations get the greatest cuts, the wealthiest get the greatest benefits, and on top of that, theirs is all permanent. The people that get the least amount and the unknown is, the people that get the temporary are the people that needed it the most," Manchin said. "So I said, 'Guys, wait a minute. Aren't we off-base a little bit here?'"

I asked him whether he said that to the president.

"I didn't see it then," he said, adding, "I haven't been back."

KEEPING UP WITH THE JONES ACT: President Donald Trump today authorized a 10-day waiver of the Jones Act for Puerto Rico less than 24 hours after officials at DHS said it was "unlikely" to be lifted. Trump suspended the shipping restriction in order to help facilitate the delivery of fuel and other goods to the hurricane-ravaged territory, White House spokeswoman Sarah Sanders said today, much like the White House did in previous weeks for Texas and Florida.

Trump waived the act at the request of Puerto Rico, Sanders said via Twitter. The waiver will allow foreign vessels to bring material from one U.S. domestic port to another, Ben Lefebvre reports. "It will go into effect immediately," Sanders said. The president is scheduled to visit Puerto Rico next week.

But, the decision runs counter to the behest of the Transportation Department, Pro Transportation's Kathy Wolfe reports. DOT argued that the Jones Act shouldn't be waived for Puerto Rico in a letter from MARAD sent to offices on Capitol Hill Wednesday afternoon. The letter argues that containers from Jones Act-compliant ships were "stacking up in the terminals faster than they can be moved inland" and that waiving the Jones Act "will likely only exacerbate the problem." More on that here.

Homeland Security officials had said just a day ago that they had not yet decided how to act on a Jones Act waiver request sent by eight members of Congress. Senior DHS officials even went as far as to say the waiver was unlikely and that an official determination could take days or weeks.

Sens. John McCain and Mike Lee introduced legislation today to permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act. "While I welcome the Trump administration's Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico, this short-term, 10-day exemption is insufficient to help the people of Puerto Rico recover and rebuild from Hurricane Maria," McCain said in a statement. "Our legislation would permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act, an antiquated, protectionist law that has driven up costs and crippled Puerto Rico's economy."

COURT THROWS COLD WATER ON GREEN CHALLENGE TO LANDFILL RULE STAY: The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today denied environmentalists' request to immediately rule that a now-expired stay of Obama-era landfill methane rules by EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt was unlawful. The green groups called the stay, which was in effect from May 31 through Aug. 29, a "carbon copy" of the one Pruitt issued over the unrelated methane rule for new oil and gas wells that was struck down by the D.C. Circuit. But a three-judge panel today declined to rule before hearing more. In a one-page order, the court asked for more detailed briefs on the issue and ordered both sides to argue whether the case is moot since the stay expired a month ago. Pruitt has not issued a subsequent, longer-term stay despite moving forward with reconsidering parts of the rule. The order was issued by Judges David Tatel, a Clinton appointee; Thomas Griffith, a George W. Bush appointee; and Cornelia Pillard, an Obama appointee.

KOCH PAYS $650K OVER SULFUR GASOLINE VIOLATION: A Koch subsidiary will pay EPA $650,000 to settle an alleged Clean Air Act violation, according to a newly released settlement agreement. Kansas-based Koch Supply & Trading, which blends fuel at a Pasadena terminal, in 2012 allegedly produced nearly 16 million gallons of a fuel known as "conventional blendstock for oxygenate blending," or CBOB, that violated EPA standards for sulfur in gasoline. The deal was approved on Wednesday by three administrative law judges on EPA's Environmental Appeals Board.

NAS REPORT SAYS DOE SHOULD OFFER ITS OWN LAND FOR ENERGY DEVELOPMENT: The National Academies of Sciences, Engineering, and Medicine in a report today contends DOE should take a page from the Interior Department's book and look for ways it can offer its land for energy development. The report recommends DOE take an inventory of its 164 sites in 32 states and create an office that would work with energy developers on leasing viable locations. "The intersection of public benefit and private interest is strong on these lands, and their development can further the national objective of energy independence and greater national security," said Paul DeCotis, who chaired the committee that wrote the report.

HANGING IN THE BALANCE: The National Flood Insurance Program has exhausted its borrowing authority after damage caused by the series of hurricanes that drenched the U.S. over the last few weeks, Pro Financial Service's Zachary Warmbrodt reports. That news ups the pressure on Congress to allow it to tap Treasury further to pay claims. "FEMA, which runs the program, said it notified Congress on Sept. 20 that it borrowed $5.8 billion from Treasury to fund losses this year, including those incurred by Hurricanes Harvey and Irma and 'anticipated programmatic activities,'" Zachary writes. "The balance of FEMA's remaining borrowing authority is now zero, according to the agency. Congress last raised its borrowing cap to about $30 billion after Hurricane Sandy." More here.

COAL EXEC, LAWYERS INDICTED ON BRIBERY: An executive at coal mining Drummond Co. and two attorneys with the prominent Alabama law firm Balch & Bingham have been indicted on charges of bribing a state legislator to oppose an environmental cleanup plan, according to the Justice Department. Joel Gilbert and Steven McKinney are named on charges including conspiracy and bribery. The two handle environmental litigation at Balch & Bingham, a law firm where Jeff Wood — who was recently tapped as a Trump adviser and acting Assistant Attorney General of DOJ's Environment and Natural Resources Division — served as a partner earlier in his career. Drummond Vice President David Roberson was charged with the same crimes. "The three are accused of bribing former state Rep. Oliver Robinson, who pleaded guilty earlier this month to accepting $360,000 in payments. Prosecutors say the law firm represented Drummond, and Robinson got a contract to oppose an expansion of an environmental cleanup site linked to Drummond." Read more here.

INDUSTRY PASSES ON TRUMP'S MARINE REVIEW: The Trump administration is reviewing 11 marine sanctuaries that cover some 425 million acres of marine life and land, but instead of applauding the move, the energy industry seems to be largely disinterested, Reuters reports. The marine review is part of a larger White House strategy to open new areas for oil and gas drilling and "put the energy needs of American families and businesses first," according to an April presidential order. "But interviews with energy industry representatives signal the effort will likely miss its target," Reuters writes. "Opening up these areas would likely help wind power companies — which Trump has lambasted — more than oil producers, they say. And neither industry is interested because of the high costs of offshore development, comparatively rich opportunities on land and the public relations headaches of developing protected oceanscapes." SCALISE RETURNS TO CONGRESS: House Majority Whip Steve Scalise returned to Congress today in a surprise appearance during a House vote. It was the first time Scalise, a member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, had been in the Capitol since he took a bullet to the hip while practicing with the Republican congressional baseball team in Alexandria, Va., POLITICO's Kyle Cheney and Rachael Bade report. "You have no idea how great this feels to be back here in the people's House," Scalise told the chamber. "The last three-and-a-half months have been a pretty challenging time for me and my family. But if you look at the outpouring of love, of warmth, of prayer — my gosh! — we've been overwhelmed. And it's given us the strength to get through all this."

PRUITT SCHEDULE MISSING MEDIA APPEARANCES: Although EPA began releasing a simplified version of Pruitt's schedule online this week, the Media Matters blog points out there is a lack of transparency in the released schedules, which go as far back as April, as they omit many of the administrator's media interviews — including at least 12 interviews with right-wing media. "Media Matters identified 13 media interviews Pruitt gave that were not accounted for on these publicly released schedules," the site writes, "and 12 of these interviews were with conservative or right-wing outlets. The more recent, bare-bones schedule lists 52 occasions on which Pruitt gave interviews to media outlets over the five months covered. For 51 of them, the outlets are not specified; the events are simply listed as 'media interview' or 'media interviews.'" Read the specifics here.

Trump waives Jones Act for Puerto Rico Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/28/2017 08:40 AM EDT

President Donald Trump today authorized a lifting of the Jones Act to help deliver fuel and other goods to hurricane-ravaged Puerto Rico, White House spokeswoman Sarah Sanders said.

The president waived the act at the request of Puerto Rico, Sanders said via Twitter. Lifting the Jones Act allows foreign vessels to bring material from one U.S. domestic port to another.

"It will go into effect immediately," Sanders said of the waiver.

Trump had come under fire for not lifting the shipping restrictions earlier. Puerto Rico is running out of fuel, potable water and other necessities after being hit by Hurricane Maria last week.

DHS waived the Jones Act for fuel delivery to Texas and Florida after hurricanes hit those states earlier this year.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump has scheduled a trip to Puerto Rico next week.

DOT urged no Jones Act waiver as late as Wednesday afternoon Back

By Kathryn A. Wolfe | 09/28/2017 11:51 AM EDT

DOT argued that the Jones Act shouldn't be waived for Puerto Rico less than 24 hours before President Donald Trump did just that.

A letter from MARAD sent to offices on Capitol Hill Wednesday afternoon, obtained by POLITICO, argues that containers from Jones Act-compliant ships were "stacking up in the terminals faster than they can be moved inland" and that waiving the Jones Act "will likely only exacerbate the problem."

"Waiving the Jones Act now will not provide any additional relief to the hurricane victims on the island," wrote Alexis Rudd from MARAD's Office of Congressional and Public Affairs. "The most pressing logistics challenge is how to get cargo to people in need after it has arrived in port. There is currently a shortage of trucks and drivers to move containers from the ports to inland distribution centers."

Rudd cautioned that the administration should only consider allowing case-by-case Jones Act waivers once infrastructure on the island is restored. "There should not be any blanket waivers of the Jones Act."

Trump this morning waived the Jones Act for Puerto Rico, following pressure to act. The waiver lasts for 10 days.

DHS says it hasn't denied Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico — yet Back

By Tanya Snyder | 09/27/2017 11:35 AM EDT

DHS officials said today that they have not yet decided how to act on the Jones Act waiver request sent Monday from eight members of Congress.

However, senior DHS officials made it clear that a waiver is unlikely and that an official determination could take days or weeks, as it requires coordination with other federal agencies.

Under statute, the Jones Act, which requires that goods moved between U.S. ports must be carried on U.S.-owned and -operated vessels, can only be waived for reasons of "national defense" or if there aren't enough U.S.-flag vessels to meet demand. In the wake of Hurricanes Harvey and Irma, the Department of Defense requested a Jones Act waiver for Texas and Florida, which was issued quickly. In the absence of a Pentagon request, DHS needs to make those determinations itself, consulting with MARAD on vessel availability.

DHS officials also told reporters that the department had "not received a formal waiver request," since Congress is not a traditional pathway for these kinds of requests. Still, the officials said they are evaluating the request and working as quickly as possible to make a determination.

The officials also reiterated that a Jones Act waiver would not help move goods within the island, which is the real problem Puerto Rico is facing right now.

The U.S. Virgin Islands are statutorily exempt from the Jones Act.

McCain, Lee pen bill to exempt Puerto Rico from Jones Act permanently Back

By Lauren Gardner | 09/28/2017 01:59 PM EDT

Sens. John McCain and Mike Lee introduced legislation today to permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act.

The move comes after President Donald Trump granted a 10-day waiver of the Jones Act to the island, which is still reeling from the destruction caused by Hurricane Maria.

"While I welcome the Trump administration's Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico, this short-term, 10-day exemption is insufficient to help the people of Puerto Rico recover and rebuild from Hurricane Maria," McCain said in a statement. "Our legislation would permanently exempt Puerto Rico from the Jones Act, an antiquated, protectionist law that has driven up costs and crippled Puerto Rico's economy."

Flood insurance program exhausts Treasury borrowing Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 09/28/2017 10:16 AM EDT

The National Flood Insurance Program has depleted its borrowing authority after a series of devastating hurricanes over the last several weeks, a turning point that will put pressure on Congress to allow it to tap Treasury further to pay claims.

FEMA, which runs the program, said it notified Congress on Sept. 20 that it borrowed $5.8 billion from Treasury to fund losses this year, including those incurred by Hurricanes Harvey and Irma and "anticipated programmatic activities."

The balance of FEMA's remaining borrowing authority is now zero, according to the agency. Congress last raised its borrowing cap to about $30 billion after Hurricane Sandy.

"Ultimately, the claims payments on Harvey and Irma will exceed the current spending authorities of the National Flood Insurance Program," a FEMA spokesperson said. "We will be collaborating with Congress so that every claim is paid in full."

For Hurricane Harvey, more than $925 million in claims have been paid, FEMA said. As of Wednesday, more than 88,000 claims have been submitted in Texas and more than 480 in Louisiana.

For Hurricane Irma, FEMA has paid $26 million on claims. More than 25,000 claims have been submitted across Florida, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands. FEMA expects the claims numbers to increase.

WHAT'S NEXT: Congress this week is debating whether to pass legislation intended to boost the private sector flood insurance market outside the NFIP. Lawmakers are also working on reauthorizing the program before it expires Dec. 8.

Trump campaign taps GOP energy lobbyist as adviser Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Elana Schor | 09/12/2016 07:18 PM EDT

The Trump campaign has recruited a Republican lobbyist and former aide to Sen. Jeff Sessions to advise the nominee on energy policy, according to sources familiar with the campaign.

Jeff Wood's role in the Trump campaign is yet another sign of Sessions's influence on the nominee's policymaking apparatus, which has suffered from internal tension in recent weeks. Wood served as a legal counsel for Sessions from 2011 to 2014, focusing on energy and environmental issues, before becoming a partner at Balch & Bingham, a firm where he served earlier in his career.

Before joining Sessions' office, Wood was an in-house lawyer at Nashville-based Ingram Barge Company, a leading inland waterway shipping business.

Sessions endorsed Trump in February, long before the New York developer locked down the Republican nomination, in a perceived blow to Sen. Ted Cruz's (R-Texas) primary hopes.

According to public records, Wood has lobbied for Southern Company and the Alabama Power Company.

Wood is working closely with Andrew Wheeler, another Trump campaign energy adviser. Wheeler is the co-leader of the energy and natural resources practice at the firm Faegre Baker Daniels and a former Republican staff director on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Trump's campaign has also received high-level energy policy advice from Continental Resources CEO Harold Hamm (a contender for energy secretary in a Trump administration), Murray Energy CEO Robert Murray and North Dakota Rep. Kevin Cramer.

Wood, Wheeler and the Trump campaign did not respond to requests for comment. It's unclear exactly when Wood began working for the campaign.

Scalise returns to Congress for first time since shooting Back

By Kyle Cheney and Rachael Bade | 09/28/2017 10:04 AM EDT

House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, seriously wounded by a gunman's bullet in June, returned to Congress in a surprise appearance during a House vote Thursday.

It was Scalise's first time in the Capitol since he took a bullet to the hip while practicing with the Republican congressional baseball team in Alexandria, Va. The shot shattered bone and tore through muscles and organs, leaving Scalise on the brink of death.

But after months of treatment and steady recovery, Scalise made his first journey from the hospital to the Hill. Tearful lawmakers from both sides of the aisle greeted him with a standing ovation as he addressed the House floor.

"You have no idea how great this feels to be back here in the people's House," Scalise told the chamber. "The last three-and-a-half months have been a pretty challenging time for me and my family. But if you look at the outpouring of love, of warmth, of prayer — my gosh! — we've been overwhelmed. And it's given us the strength to get through all this."

It was welcome sight for members, who once feared they may never see their colleague again. Rep. Rodney Davis, who watched Scalise go down at the practice that day, caught wind of Scalise's return early and sought to find the room where he was waiting before the big reveal.

"I'm going to stake him out just like you guys," the Illinois Republican said to POLITICO. He'd texted and talked to Scalise on the phone since the shooting, but had not yet seen him in person. "This is a great day! ... I didn't know that we'd have the chance to see Steve walk again, let alone be here with us."

A few minutes later, Scalise, flanked by staff and U.S. Capitol Police, emerged from a room off the House floor and slowly made his way through the speaker's lobby. He leaned heavily on two canes at each arm but seemed cheerful. When someone greeted him, he responded over his shoulder: "It feels good to be back!"

The chamber erupted with applause when Scalise walked through the door. Rep. Ryan Costello (R-Pa.) wiped away tears, as did multiple other members. Rep. Cedric Richmond, a Democrat and longtime Scalise friend from Louisiana, walked over to the Republican side of the chamber to clasp hands with his buddy.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) came over from the Senate to see Scalise. He sat in the front row on the edge of his chair for much of the address.

Though he's been absent from Congress, Scalise has worked the phones to try to help the House prepare for a hectic fall agenda.

Scalise's office said he will be resuming his work at the Capitol, while also completing an extended period of out-patient rehabilitation over the coming months.

President Donald Trump on Thursday praised Scalise as "brave" during a brief interview with NBC News.

"He's a special man. Brave. Just a great guy, a great friend of mine. We're so excited. What happened to him, just horrible," the president said. "We are so happy."

Scalise was shot while playing second base in preparation for an annual charity game against congressional Democrats. The shooting, by a lone gunman who appeared to attempt a political assassination, was a harrowing moment that rippled across Washington and the country. Lawmakers offered vivid descriptions of dodging bullets and fleeing the gunman until Scalise's Capitol Police detail was able to take him down.

The episode has since led lawmakers to seek increased funding for personal security.

In his address to members, Scalise thanked lawmakers for their support and the "true angels" in his security detail, who saved him. One of those, Officer David Bailey, was also wounded in the shooting. He stood in the chamber balcony by Scalise's wife and the surgeons who "gave me a second chance at life," as Scalise said.

"David you are my hero. You saved my life," Scalise said. The room cheered.

In one of the most moving moments of the morning, Scalise thanked Rep. Brad Wenstrup (R-Ohio), a military vet who applied a tourniquet to Scalise's leg after the shooting. Scalise's doctors said he was mere minutes away from dying due to blood loss, and without Wenstrup, he might not have made it.

"He was one of the first to come to my side," Scalise said. The tourniquet "saved my life so that I could actually made it to the hospital in time to wall the blood off."

Wenstrup, sitting several rows away from Scalise, walked over and embraced him with a bear hug.

Trump fuming over Price's charter flights Back

By Josh Dawsey, Andrew Restuccia and Louis Nelson | 09/27/2017 01:12 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and his top aides are fuming over Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price's use of expensive private jets, with some advisers privately calling for Price's ouster.

Trump rebuked Price in sharp terms Wednesday but declined to bat down speculation that the HHS chief could be fired for his lavish spending of taxpayer dollars.

"We'll see," the president told reporters when asked whether Price would stay in his job.

"I was looking into it, and I will look into it. And I will tell you personally, I'm not happy about it," Trump said. "I am not happy about it. I'm going to look at it. I am not happy about it, and I let him know it."

Administration officials said that Price is safe for now.

POLITICO has revealed that Price has flown 26 times on private aircraft since last May at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, a break with the practice of his predecessors, who generally took commercial flights.

Some Trump advisers are urging Trump to get rid of Price, according to three people familiar with the conversations.

"His conduct is pretty much indefensible," one senior administration official said. "I don't know how you defend it."

White House officials said Trump was shocked by Price's behavior, especially because he nurtured a reputation as a fiscal conservative during his time as a House lawmaker.

Two administration officials said the steady drumbeat of reports on Price's travel has made the issue impossible to ignore.

The president is annoyed with cable news coverage of Price's travel, one of these people said. "He goes, 'Why did he do this? It makes no sense,'" the official said.

Administration officials said Trump's anger at Price may not translate to his ouster. Price is the latest Trump administration official to get on the president's bad side. National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson are among those who have run afoul of the president.

Although several high-profile officials have been pushed out of the administration, others have made their way back into the president's good graces. Officials also noted that, despite the public image he earned as the star of "The Apprentice," Trump is often reluctant to fire people. And he sometimes takes weeks to make a final decision.

But Price was already on thin ice before the jet stories broke. Trump and other senior administration officials have complained that he wasn't effective in wooing House members on the Hill for Obamacare repeal initiatives, one of the reasons the former House Republican was tapped for the job.

Price has also been absent for several Oval Office meetings where repealing the law was discussed. Many of the meetings on Capitol Hill were led by Vice President Mike Pence, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services Director Seema Verma or Marc Short, the legislative affairs head.

Additionally, Trump, who cares deeply about personal chemistry, does not have a close connection with Price, one of the administration officials said. Few senior White House officials have been willing to defend him this week.

"Price isn't happy," one senior administration official said. "Wouldn't shock me if this ends in him stepping down, especially after failing on health care over and over."

White House officials also believe HHS mishandled its response to the jet stories.

HHS seemed unconcerned by the stories at first and felt there was little need to respond, according to two administration officials. One of these officials said there was no urgency — and the agency didn't quickly share facts with the White House.

HHS has said Price did not violate federal travel regulations, which allow for chartered aircraft when "no scheduled commercial airline service is reasonably available." A POLITICO review, however, showed that many of Price's private flights were matched closely by commercial options available at a fraction of the cost.

In an interview last weekend, Price said he would stop taking taxpayer-funded private flights, telling Fox News that "We've heard the criticism. We've heard the concerns. We take that very seriously and have taken it to heart."

Among the private flights booked by Price was a June day trip to Nashville, Tennessee, where he toured a medical dispensary, spoke at a health summit organized by a friend and had lunch with his son. Price also took a chartered flight last month to a resort in Georgia where he and his wife own property, arriving a day and a half before he was to address a medical conference.

The White House has sought to distance itself from Price's behavior, with press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders declining to offer a defense of the secretary's flight choices and telling reporters this week that they were not "White House-approved travel."

HHS spokespeople did not immediately return an email seeking a response from Price.

The secretary's travels have also drawn the attention of the House Oversight Committee, which launched an investigation Wednesday into the use of private aircraft by Price and other senior government officials. The HHS inspector general has also launched an investigation into Price's use of chartered planes.

"We welcome this review," Price said of the inspector general's review in his Fox News interview last weekend. "We want to make certain that we have the full confidence of not just this administration, but the American people."

That Price has made a habit of chartering aircraft for his travels as a Cabinet member is especially notable given his past criticism of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), whom Price, then a member of Congress, lambasted in 2010 for "flying over our country in a luxury jet."

White House 'back to square one' in search for DHS secretary Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Eliana Johnson | 09/28/2017 11:32 AM EDT

The Trump administration is hitting reset on its search for a permanent Department of Homeland Security secretary due to White House aides' dissatisfaction with the slate of candidates, according to two people familiar with the process.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Mike McCaul had been considered the front-runner for the job, but he no longer is in contention, these people said. White House chief of staff John Kelly, who led DHS before being tapped for his new West Wing role, privately raised red flags about McCaul's stance on immigration, which has at times diverged from that of President Donald Trump.

One person close to the process said the Trump administration is now "back to square one" on the search, and it could be weeks before a final decision is made.

The department is being helmed by Acting Secretary Elaine Duke, a DHS veteran who was Kelly's deputy, as it copes with the fallout from Trump's new travel restrictions, his decision to end DACA and a series of powerful hurricanes that have ravaged Texas, Florida and Puerto Rico.

McCaul is in lockstep with Trump on many issues. He is pushing legislation that would provide $10 billion for Trump's border wall with Mexico.

But he also has publicly broken with the president over his travel ban, distancing himself from the restrictions and criticizing its haphazard rollout as "problematic." McCaul also bashed Trump's response to the Russia investigations, saying in a July interview, "It sort of looks paranoid to me."

The White House has taken a deliberate approach to finding a new DHS secretary. Kelly and his deputy, Kirstjen Nielsen, are playing key roles in identifying candidates. White House aides are committed to choosing somebody with experience in homeland security and politics.

A White House spokeswoman declined to comment, saying, "We will let you know once we have any personnel announcements."

A McCaul spokeswoman declined to comment, referring a reporter to a Fox News interview from earlier this month in which McCaul said, "This is really the president's decision — wherever I can serve my country the best ... ultimately the president will decide that."

Dems see 2018 gains in repeated Obamacare repeal tries Back

By Elana Schor and Heather Caygle | 09/28/2017 05:03 AM EDT

To the Republicans vowing to keep their Obamacare repeal drive alive for as long as it takes, Democrats say: Please, and thank you.

While Senate Republicans abandoned their last-gasp attempt to topple Obamacare before a Saturday deadline, they're already suggesting they might try again next year. That timing — President Donald Trump said Wednesday that Congress would take up repeal again in the first quarter of next year — could keep the threat of upending the health care system front of mind in the thick of the 2018 campaign season.

And as much as they want to keep Obamacare intact, Democrats believe that political dynamic only boosts their chances of taking back the House and putting Republicans on defense in Senate races.

"I think they are falling into an enormous trap of their own making. And have at it," said Rep. Gerry Connolly (D-Va.). "I think they're going to pay a very heavy price for this."

Obamacare also has proven a uniquely unifying issue for Democrats, from the red-state Joe Manchin wing to the liberal Bernie Sanders end of the party. Activist groups that are otherwise prone to occasional clashes with party leaders have also linked arms to help Democrats defeat repeated Republican repeal efforts, and any fresh repeal attempt close to the midterms would likely spark another kumbaya moment.

"Everybody, from the most progressive to the most moderate, would be glad to vote to retain the progress we've made on health care and to prevent people's lives from being thrown into chaos," Sen. Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) said.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee homed in on the anti-repeal message after the Senate's latest push sputtered earlier this week, blasting out a reminder that all but 20 House Republicans backed the GOP's repeal plan in May.

DCCC spokesman Tyler Law declared that no matter what happens to the GOP's drive to uproot Obamacare, Democrats would work hard to hang the unpopular House-passed repeal bill around their rivals' necks.

"This issue is going to remain front and center because it's so personal," Law said. "And I would also add it's going to be front and center because Republicans are stubbornly saying, 'We are going to continue over and over again to try and take your health care away.'"

That commitment from Republicans who are still openly entertaining a return to the repeal debate before 2019 has deep roots, however. GOP donors and conservative activists who have propelled the party's seven-year push to dismantle Obamacare are not content to declare it dead for good, particularly when Trump's party is only in the early stages of its tax reform efforts.

Republicans dismissed the idea that Democrats can capitalize on Obamacare repeal.

"House Democrats have made bold claims about their electoral prospects before only to fail miserably — this is no different," Jesse Hunt, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in a statement. "Their embrace of single-payer health care has ensured that their unabashed loyalty to the progressive base, at the expense of working class families, will be the defining issue of this cycle."

Waiting until next year, Republicans wager, will give them more time to shape a more successful "replace" element for their Obamacare repeal-and-replace plan.

"Democrats have been able to use the issue, mostly because the messaging on our side hasn't been great, but the fact is that health care in the U.S. — everyone, Democrats, Republicans, recognize something needs to change. Obamacare isn't working," one GOP strategist said. "With more time, Republicans are going to be able to craft a plan that more folks can agree on within the caucus, and it will give them more time to sell it to the general public."

There's also the problem that continued failure by Republicans on their years-long campaign pledge could keep base voters home next Election Day. Proponents of the latest repeal bill were open about anger among GOP donors and the grass roots.

But after watching Republicans reap the political gains of campaigning against Obamacare, Democrats are convinced the tables have turned. Connolly singled out Rep. Darrell Issa and other politically imperiled California Republicans as particularly at risk if the GOP attempts to bring back Obamacare repeal next year. The 14 California House Republicans who voted for their party's repeal bill "went off the cliff for solidarity, irrespective of the impact on their constituents," he said.

Democrats need to pick up 24 seats to take back the House. They're eyeing 23 Republican seats in districts Hillary Clinton won and argue at least 50 more GOP seats could be competitive in the right environment.

Voters rated health care and the economy as the two most important issues when picking their member of Congress in the latest POLITICO/Morning Consult poll, released this week.

The overarching theme — vote for Democrats or Republicans will keep trying to take away your health care — could also help mask some of the party's own divisions over health care, Democratic strategists say.

Progressives, including multiple 2020 presidential contenders and 60 percent of House Democrats, have in recent weeks rallied around the Medicare-for-All push from Sanders (I-Vt.). But Democratic leaders and several vulnerable House Democrats have shied away from the proposal, wary of alienating centrist voters in districts that will be critical in the push to win back the lower chamber next year.

Republicans raced to play up the internal Democratic divide after Sanders' splashy rollout earlier this month, aiming to turn it into a campaign-trail albatross for the minority. But a broader message focused on GOP repeal efforts could help deflect the spotlight away from some of those differences and force Republicans to go on defense.

Indeed, progressive organizers who have not hesitated to criticize Democratic leaders say their grass roots won't be caught off guard again by another repeal push.

"We don't want to see this come back, but our groups have said time and time again that every time Republicans have put forward an attempt to repeal, they would step up," said Angel Padilla, policy director at the liberal group Indivisible. "We don't think that's going to change. And we think it's going to affect who controls Congress."

Democrats also argue that bipartisan Senate talks to stabilize Obamacare will only help their case heading into the midterms. Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) resumed talks Wednesday to try to salvage their bipartisan health care plan, an effort that was quashed by GOP leadership when the repeal plan seemed to have legs.

But Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) has already rejected the talks, saying any bill they come up with would never pass in the House. Democrats say that stonewalling only strengthens their case to voters in the coming months.

"The politics for us is really clear and really simple," Schatz said. "In the end, they've got to do what they think is right, but Round Seven [of repeal] doesn't seem like the right slogan for 2018."

BREAKING DOWN THE BUDGET: Senate Republicans released their long-awaited budget blueprint today for the upcoming fiscal year, paving the way for a tax overhaul without relying on Democratic support. POLITICO's Sarah Ferris reports the 89-page blueprint instructs the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to save at least $1 billion over a decade, which lawmakers widely expect will come from opening up oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge — a longtime priority of Alaskans including ENR Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski. A vote is expected next week on the resolution that is likely to be approved.

"Under the budget proposal, Republican tax writers can add up to $1.5 trillion to the deficit over 10 years, giving lawmakers more flexibility as they attempt a once-in-a-generation revamp of the U.S. tax code," Sarah writes. "With more wiggle room to slash revenue, GOP legislators hope they will be able to go even lower on tax rates for individuals and corporations."

POLITICO reported earlier this week on the plan to include the pro-drilling language in the budget. Authorizing the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge through budget reconciliation would allow Republicans to circumvent a filibuster, but could be a risky strategy as two GOP senators have opposed such provisions in the past, Nick Juliano points out.

PERRY PRESSES FERC TO HELP COAL: The Trump administration is calling on FERC to create new rules to protect coal-fired and nuclear power plants that are being squeezed by cheaper natural gas and renewable sources, saying they are "indispensable for economic and national security."

The call by Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who told miners in Pennsylvania on Thursday that "it's time for coal in this country to be revived," was done under the rarely used Section 403 authority of the Department of Energy Organization Act. And though Perry stops short of specifically asking for coal incentives, he wants full-cost recovery for power generating units that provide essential power and "ancillary" services — and have a 90-day fuel supply on site in case of natural or man-made disruptions. That would exclude most natural gas power plants, which do not typically keep large fuel inventories on hand and instead receive supplies via pipeline.

Of course, FERC, whose members are appointed by the president and operate as an independent body, isn't obligated to implement the specific policy pushed by Perry. The commission will be back to operating with a full five members in the coming weeks. More from Darius Dixon here.

ZINKE CALLS CONTROVERSY 'B.S.': Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke waved off the response to his use of a private aircraft, calling it "a little B.S." in a speech at The Heritage Foundation today. The Montana Republican spoke on the matter less than 24 hours after revelations about his use of private planes surfaced — including a $12,000 flight from a big-donor event to his hometown and a trip in the Caribbean. The Interior chief is at least the fourth member of the Trump administration to face questions over use of planes at taxpayer expense, Ben Lefebvre reports.

"All this travel was done only after department officials determined no other flights were available," Zinke told the audience at Heritage. "Every time I travel, I submit travel plans to the department, who determines line by line that I follow the law. And I follow the law." Zinke confirmed that he had taken three charter flights since being confirmed in March, but he did not go into detail about the events.

PUERTO RICO TROUBLE BREWS: The Trump administration is facing continued backlash for its recovery response in Puerto Rico, Louis Nelson reports. Tension mounted this morning, with the mayor San Juan lashing out at acting Secretary of Homeland Security Elaine Duke, who called the Maria relief efforts a "good news story" on Thursday. "Damn it, this is not a good news story. This is a people are dying story. This is a life-or-death story," San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz said on CNN. "When you have to pull people down from their buildings — I'm sorry, but that really upsets me and frustrates me. You know, I would ask her to come down here and visit the towns, and then make a statement like that which frankly it is an irresponsible statement." Roughly half of Puerto Ricans are still without running water, officials said today at a press conference in the island's capital, and just 36 of its 69 hospitals are open and have power. More here.

VOGTLE GETS BOOST IN LOAN GUARANTEE: The Energy Department has approved some conditions of a $3.7 billion increase in federal loan guarantees for the over-budget Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia, Darius reports. The agency has already approved $8.33 billion for the two-reactor project under the Obama administration, but now Perry is primed to offer an additional $1.67 billion to the struggling Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, $1.6 billion to Oglethorpe Power Corp. and $415 million to the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia. More here.

National Rural Electric Cooperative Association CEO Jim Matheson applauded the news. "This DOE loan guarantee will help promote a diverse fuel mix, which is vital as electric co-ops work to meet 21st century energy needs and ensure continued access to affordable, reliable power," Matheson said in a statement. "I applaud DOE and Secretary Perry for recognizing the value of this project and making it more affordable for our members."

EPA TO HOST SMARTSECTORS EVENT: EPA plans to host top trade groups at an event at headquarters on Tuesday to roll out its Smart Sectors program, which will designate staff liaisons for specific industries. The event follows President Donald Trump's speech on Monday that will highlight administration efforts to roll back regulations. The program focuses on several industries, including oil and gas and utilities and power generation, according to details in the Federal Register. Among groups invited are the Edison Electric Institute and the American Petroleum Institute. The agency staff contacts are meant to spend time "building relationships and improving customer service to sectors; developing additional expertise in each industry's operations and environmental performance; and informing the planning of future policies, regulations, and Agency processes," according to EPA's description.

COME TOGETHER: In a Fox News op-ed published today, Jay Timmons, president and CEO of the National Association of Manufacturers, and Sean McGarvey, president of the North America's Building Trades Unions, announced the creation of the Coalition for Regulatory Innovation. The two organizations have joined to form the coalition "because we believe reform is best achieved with a united bipartisan front," they write. "Thankfully, Republicans and Democrats in Washington have responded to this issue by offering practical solutions to improve the entire rulemaking process. Our commitment is to bring together people from the business and labor communities to get Congress to move forward on reform that is long overdue." Read it here.

Senate Republicans unveil budget blueprint to tee up tax reform Back

By Sarah Ferris | 09/29/2017 01:01 PM EDT

Senate Republicans released their long-awaited budget blueprint Friday for the upcoming fiscal year, paving the way for a tax overhaul without the need for Democratic buy-in.

The 89-page plan, which the Senate Budget Committee spent months drafting, sets up the special power of budget reconciliation GOP leaders can use to advance tax reform with just a 50-vote threshold in the Senate.

Nov. 13 is the tentative deadline for tax writers to submit their plans for an overhaul to the budget panel.

Under the budget proposal, Republican tax writers can add up to $1.5 trillion to the deficit over 10 years, giving lawmakers more flexibility as they attempt a once-in-a-generation revamp of the U.S. tax code. With more wiggle room to slash revenue, GOP legislators hope they will be able to go even lower on tax rates for individuals and corporations.

The $1.5 trillion figure comes out of a compromise struck this month between deficit hawk Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and tax-writer Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), who both sit on the budget panel. Corker had sought a revenue-neutral tax plan, while Toomey had called for as much as $3 trillion in lost revenue over 10 years.

"This budget is especially important because it will allow us to get to work on our pro-growth, pro-family, pro-jobs tax reform plan," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) wrote in a statement Friday.

As expected, the Senate's pared-down version veers drastically from the House version. The House budget would require a tax plan that does not add to the deficit, though some tax writers feared that approach would force Republicans to seek less-ambitious tax cuts.

In an unsurprising but contentious move, Senate budget writers ditched long-time conservative calls for mandatory cuts. While the House budget would deliver $203 billion in mandatory cuts, the Senate asks only one committee to find $1 billion in savings over 10 years — a disparity sure to be a sticking point when both chambers seek a compromise during conference negotiations in the weeks to come.

The only savings in the Senate version would come from the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which has been tasked with finding at least $1 billion over a decade.

Lawmakers widely expect that projected savings to come from opening up oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

The Senate budget blueprint does not appear to give Republicans another shot at repealing Obamacare next year, as some lawmakers have advocated.

The Senate Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over most Obamacare programs, is expected to focus entirely on tax reform with its $1.5 trillion instruction.

Obamacare's fate is not assured, though, since some budget experts say the Finance Committee could choose to use its existing instructions to rollback Obamacare, or simply seek authority to do so in another — separate — budget resolution next year.

In recent months, Senate budget writers had also mulled reforms for Dodd-Frank financial rules and student aid programs, according to multiple sources. But the budget document does not include instructions for either the Senate Banking Committee or the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee.

Senate Budget Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) wrote in a statement that the blueprint "puts our nation on a path to balance," in part by reducing spending by $5 trillion over 10 years. But the budget resolution itself includes no details on how lawmakers could achieve that spending surplus.

In sharp contrast to the House budget, the Senate's would comply with the budget caps mandated by sequestration. (If the Senate chose to ignore the sequester, it would violate a budget rule and prompt a point-of-order on the floor).

Under the upper chamber's plan, the military's budget would be capped at $549 billion over the next year, to comply with current law. The House budget, which is not subject to points of order, boosts defense spending to $621.5 billion.

The Senate Budget Committee plans to hold a vote on the fiscal outline next week and is expected to have enough GOP support for approval.

Reconciliation may provide opening for ANWR Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Sarah Ferris | 09/25/2017 06:07 PM EDT

Senate Republicans plan to open the door to oil drilling in an Alaskan wildlife refuge using special rules that would allow them to avoid a Democratic filibuster, according to sources tracking the budget process.

The Senate Budget Committee is still drawing up its fiscal 2018 blueprint, which is expected to lay the groundwork for tax reform using special budget reconciliation rules. Two sources familiar with the ongoing negotiations say the document also is expected to lay the groundwork for new energy production in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge — a longtime goal of Republicans and oil companies.

It's a potentially risky strategy, with two Republican senators on record opposing similar bills in the past: Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Susan Collins of Maine. If those two remain in opposition, Senate leadership couldn't lose a single other GOP vote without jeopardizing their entire reconciliation package, centered on tax reform.

Congress last tried to open ANWR more than a decade ago, and any legislation to do so would run into fierce opposition from environmental groups and virtually all Democrats. But proponents of the idea say their chances have improved since the election of President Donald Trump, who has sought to increase U.S. oil, gas and coal production.

"Energy dominance requires ANWR," said Matt Shuckerow, a spokesman for Alaska Rep. Don Young, invoking a favorite Trump administration catch-phrase. "We are working with leadership and looking at reconciliation."

The Senate budget resolution is expected to give special deficit-reducing instructions to the Energy and Natural Resources Committee in the upcoming fiscal year, totaling about $1 billion over a decade.

While budget writers can't mandate specific policies, sources say it would enable ENR Chairman Lisa Murkowski to write legislation that would remove restrictions on drilling in ANWR or other currently off-limits areas.

Opening up drilling in the arctic could raise as much as $5 billion over a decade, the CBO estimated in 2012, when oil was selling for about twice as much as it is now.

That measure could then be bundled into a massive tax reconciliation package, which will need just 50 votes in the Senate.

The House's budget, which has been stalled for months amid GOP infighting, goes even further. That version calls for $5 billion in extra energy revenues, and a House GOP aide says ANWR is "definitely on the table in terms of reconciliation."

The White House also "will continue to push for more domestic production," an administration official said. Trump's budget request sought $1.8 billion from opening new areas to energy production.

ANWR is a wide swath of tundra on the northern Alaska coast, home to polar bears, porcupine caribou and a landscape that hasn't been touched in thousands of years. Congress designated the 19-million-acre area a wildlife refuge in 1980, but set aside a 1.5-million-acre parcel known as "10-02" for possible future drilling if future lawmakers approved such a plan.

The U.S. Geological Survey estimates that part of ANWR could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil.

In the past, drilling in the refuge only became a hot issue when gasoline prices were high, said Athan Manuel, director of lands protection program for the Sierra Club, which has been lobbying heavily against its development.

"Now it's completely become an ideological and political fight," Manuel added. "There are fewer moderate Republicans than we need. The vote numbers for us are difficult on the Senate side if they go to budget reconciliation."

Young, the Alaska Republican who has spent much of his career advocating for expanded Arctic drilling, has raised ANWR with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, Shuckerow said.

Zinke is quietly working to allow oil companies to conduct seismic exploration in the region, The Washington Post reported this month. But actually letting them extract oil and gas from ANWR would require action by Congress.

The GOP has tried twice in the past to open ANWR for energy development through budget reconciliations. An attempt in 1995 failed after President Bill Clinton vetoed the overall budget package, while a second attempt in 2005 could not overcome a Democratic filibuster in the Senate.

Even using reconciliation, Republicans have little margin for error with only 52 seats in the Senate. And two of their caucus have voted against ANWR provisions in the past.

A spokeswoman for McCain, Julie Tarallo, said despite his past opposition the senator "is open to having a full debate in Congress about the United States' energy policy." Collins' office did not respond to requests for comment.

At least one Democrat, West Virginia Sen. Joe Manchin, may join Republicans if they try to use reconciliation to open ANWR.

"The energy we receive from Alaska is much needed for American energy independence," Manchin told POLITICO. "If it can be done in a safe way, and I think we've proven it can, we should look at every option we have."

Murkowski, who joined McCain and Collins to kill the Senate's Obamacare repeal bill in August, has introduced legislation that would direct the Interior Department to offer oil-and-gas production leases for at least 300,000 acres in ANWR, S. 49 \(115\). But she told POLITICO last week that Interior had not yet reached out to her about its push to open ANWR for seismic exploration or to form strategy on how to possibly open the area to drilling.

Some question whether her earlier breaks with GOP leadership and the White House will hamper her pursuit of other priorities.

"Murkowski is on the outside looking in" when it comes to GOP energy policy, said one energy lobbyist who requested anonymity to discuss political matters.

Another problem is current low oil prices. More than a decade of into the shale oil boom, the country looks cushioned from a possible oil supply shock, something that could make opening ANWR less urgent than in the past.

"Now that we're in this age of oil supply adequacy, the negotiating power of energy has diminished," said Kevin Book, managing director of energy consultancy ClearView Energy Partners. "What adequacy has done has increased the political cost of opening up ANWR for production."

Another question is whether oil and gas companies would flock to ANWR at today's crude price of $50 a barrel.

Chevron and BP drilled one exploratory well in the area in the early 1980s at the behest of a local native tribe, according to Alaska Oil and Gas Association President Kara Moriarty. The drilling was done with the permission of the Interior Department, with which Chevron shared the data, but a strict confidentiality agreement keeps the results a closely held secret.

The answer would depend on the company. Prices are expected to rise eventually, and the refuge's onshore topology would make ANWR a more tempting target than the choppy waters and extreme winds off of Alaska's coastline, Moriarty said.

The steady spread of oil and gas pipeline networks immediately outside ANWR also means that bringing any oil from the refuge to market would be easier than it was in decades past, Moriarty added.

The biggest infrastructure requirement would be a short pipeline to connect drilling wells in ANWR to the main Trans-Alaska Pipeline System pipeline taking the crude south.

"A pipeline is not a big lift,' said one oil and gas company representative who asked to speak on background to discuss the matter. "If the oil is there like they think it is, it's not prohibitive."

Chevron put itself in the group of companies that would welcome the chance to set rigs there permanently.

"Chevron supports increased access to federal and private land for the responsible exploration and development of oil and natural gas resources, including the ANWR coastal plain," Chevron spokeswoman Veronica Flores-Paniagua said.

Environmental groups and other Democrats are already alarmed about how far the talk of opening ANWR has come this year. Interior's move to allow seismic exploration, if approved, could harm the polar bears, caribou, wolves and other wildlife already feeling the effects of climate change in the region, and the oil brought from under the tundra would add to greenhouse gas emissions, environmental and Alaskan native groups said.

"Protecting the Arctic Refuge has broad public and bipartisan support and deserves a full debate in regular order, not rushed through as part of the budget process," said Alaska Wilderness spokesman Corey Himrod.

Sens. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) and Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) in April offered legislation to enshrine the entire region as a wilderness area protected from drilling. The bill, S. 820 \(115\), was introduced with 37 Democrats and Independent Bernie Sanders (Vt.) as original co-sponsors.

"We're going to battle this," Markey told POLITICO, arguing that expanded shale oil production has made ANWR moot. "With efficiency gains and growth of fracking in the lower 48 states, there's no need to open ANWR."

Nick Juliano contributed to this report.

Senate budget opens door to ANWR debate Back

By Nick Juliano | 09/29/2017 12:02 PM EDT

The Senate Budget released this morning opens the door for oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve or other off-limits areas without having to overcome a Democratic filibuster.

The budget asks the Energy and Natural Resources Committee to find $1 billion for deficit reduction, according to a summary. That money could come from authorizing new drilling in ANWR, a longtime priority of Alaskans including ENR Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski.

POLITICO reported earlier this week on the plan to include the pro-drilling language in the budget. Authorizing ANWR through budget reconciliation would allow Republicans to circumvent a filibuster, but could be a risky strategy as two GOP senators have opposed such provisions in the past.

DOE's Perry pushes FERC to support coal power plants Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/29/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The Trump administration on Friday called on FERC to create new rules to protect coal-fired and nuclear power plants that are being squeezed by cheaper natural gas and renewable sources, saying they were "indispensable for economic and national security."

Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who told miners in Pennsylvania on Thursday that "it's time for coal in this country to be revived," pressed electricity regulators to alter power markets and protect the resilience of the power grid with payments to generators that keep fuel supplies on site, a clear reference to the coal-fired and nuclear power plants.

The proposal, which DOE said gave FERC 60 days to create a final or interim rule, comes just a month after Perry's agency issued a report saying FERC should "expedite" its work with grid operators to ensure the stability of the nation's power network.

"In terms of process, this is a pretty bold move," said Tony Clark, a Republican former FERC commissioner. DOE often conducts studies on issues it believes need attention, he said, but "actually forwarding to the commission something specific for action is a pretty bold way of moving the issue right up the batting order at FERC."

The new proposal, directed at FERC under a rarely used Section 403 authority of the Department of Energy Organization Act, stops short of specifically seeking market incentives for coal. But it calls for full-cost recovery for power generating units that provide essential power and "ancillary" services — and have a 90-day fuel supply on site in case of natural or man-made disruptions. That would exclude most natural gas power plants, which do not typically keep large fuel inventories on hand and instead receive supplies via pipeline.

Perry's request represents a departure from the two decades of U.S. policy that has trended toward more market-based tools, which has helped natural gas to nearly double its power market share. Renewable energy sources like wind and solar, though still modest when compared to fossil fuels or nuclear power, have also grown quickly as federal incentives helped drive down their costs.

But the growth of renewables and natural gas — combined with tighter pollution controls and weak new demand for electricity — has forced hundreds of old coal-fired power plants into retirement. Nuclear power plants in some parts of the country are also under financial pressure, hurt by negative wholesale power market prices that sometimes require the plant owners to pay to deliver their power supplies.

"If this gets the debate started, then my hat's off," said former FERC Chairman Pat Wood, a friend of Perry and a strong advocate for market-based power systems. "But it's a pretty arresting [thing] to wake up and read. That would never have played in Texas. ... If there is a service to be valued, then a market can value that."

In the grid study ordered by Perry and released in August, DOE experts pointed to low power prices and cheap natural gas as the single biggest reason for coal ceding its position as the nation's biggest source of electricity. And that report also called for "reforms" to power markets that would help bolster the electricity network's resilience by easing the financial pressures on many power providers.

In its Friday proposal, DOE cited a spike in demand during the 2014 "polar vortex" that hit much of the U.S., which prompted utilities to run many coal plants that were slated for retirement. Without those plants, as many as 65 million people in the PJM market would have seen their power resources threatened, DOE said.

But the new regulatory pitch from the agency also fueled the growing feud between the gas and coal industries.

Paul Bailey, president and CEO American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, commended Perry for "initiating a rulemaking by FERC that will finally value the on-site fuel security provided by the coal fleet."

But the American Petroleum Institute, which also represents natural gas producers, said DOE drew the wrong conclusions from the 2014 event, and that forcing new mandates on the power market wasn't the solution.

"[A]s we review the proposal we are concerned the agency has mischaracterized the lessons learned from past weather-related events and appears to suggest that additional regulation is the answer where markets have already proven the ability to greatly benefit consumers and give our electric system the flexibility needed to meet constantly, and often rapidly, changing electricity demands," said API Executive Vice President and Chief Strategy Officer Marty Durbin in a statement.

FERC, which has struggled to integrate states' energy policies that aim to boost renewables or support aging nuclear power plants, has long maintained a fuel-neutral stance in the regional markets that it oversees. If it were to follow Perry's directive to create incentives for grid resilience to plants that maintain their own fuel inventories on site, it would be an implicit move at the national level to alter the electricity markets to support the fuels that both Perry and Trump have touted.

Montana regulator Travis Kavulla suggested on Twitter that rather than deal with the pressing issues facing the grid, "Instead, this reform is sort of the @ENERGY equivalent of the Oprah "you get a car, and you get a car. And you? A car!" approach."

However, FERC, whose members are appointed by the president and operate as an independent body, isn't obligated to implement the specific policy pushed by Perry. The commission will so be back to operating with a full five members in the coming weeks, with a Republican majority.

"FERC's going to follow its own procedures," said Marc Spitzer, a Republican former FERC commissioner. "It would be a mistake for people to assume that this is going to be some partisan Republican rubber stamp given the way FERC works."

FERC can spend months or years digging into complex issues that underpin the power markets, and its commissioners tend to seek common ground with each other to ensure that its rules are clear and ensure long-lasting regulations that give utilities stability to plan their operations.

"Is someone really going to invest [billions of dollars] when it's a 3-2 vote that partisans and the parties can flip next year? Is that a good forum for investment as opposed to a 5-0 order?" Spitzer said.

FERC declined to say when the agency last received a rulemaking from DOE using Section 403.

Zinke calls travel controversy 'a little B.S.' Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/29/2017 12:38 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke dismissed the furor around his use of private aircraft as "a little B.S." in a speech Friday at the Heritage Foundation.

Zinke spoke less than 24 hours after revelations about his use of private planes, including a $12,000 flight from an event with a big donor to his hometown and a trip in the Caribbean. He is at least the fourth member of the Trump administration to face questions over his use of private or military planes at taxpayer expense.

"All this travel was done only after department officials determined no other flights were available," Zinke told the audience at Heritage. "Every time I travel, I submit travel plans to the department, who determines line by line that I follow the law. And I follow the law."

Zinke confirmed that he had taken three charter flights since being confirmed in March, but he did not go into detail about the events.

In one case, he chartered a $12,375 flight from Las Vegas to an airport near his hometown of Whitefish, Mont. Commercial flights are available between the two locations, but Interior officials said none could accommodate his schedule because he was speaking at a dinner for the Las Vegas Golden Knights, a new professional hockey team owned by Bill Foley, the chairman of Fidelity National Financial and a major Zinke backer.

Employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and associated companies gave nearly $200,000 to Zinke's campaigns, according to the campaign watchdog group Center for Responsive Politics.

Democrats and environmentalists say the trip was inappropriate, especially in the wake of Zinke's comments earlier this week questioning the loyalty of nearly a third of his employees.

"Secretary Zinke has the nerve to blow your tax dollars on easy living and then tell oil executives that a third of his own workforce isn't loyal to the Trump administration," Rep. Raul Grijalva, the top Democrat on the House Natural Resources Committee, said in a statement. "Loyalty to this White House means treating taxpayer money like a piggy bank. He's the one with the ethics problems, not the employees he threw under the bus. Firing other Interior Department employees for ethical lapses is a fine step, but he needs to follow the same standards he applies to his team."

Zinke and several other Trump cabinet members have come under fire in recent weeks for using private jets and military aircraft for official business. HHS Secretary Tom Price accrued more than \$1 million in such transportation since May, saying yesterday he would personally repay a fraction of the total cost.

Trump faces growing backlash over Puerto Rico response Back

By Louis Nelson | 09/29/2017 11:18 AM EDT

President Donald Trump and his aides are facing a growing backlash over their response to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Maria in Puerto Rico, with federal teams on the island struggling to deliver aid to those in need even as the White House trumpets its efforts as a success story.

The tension over the Trump administration's self praise spilled out on Friday morning, with the San Juan mayor lashing out at acting Secretary of Homeland Security Elaine Duke, who said on Thursday that the Maria relief efforts are a "good news story."

"Damn it, this is not a good news story. This is a people are dying story. This is a life-or-death story," San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz said on CNN. "When you have to pull people down from their buildings — I'm sorry, but that really upsets me and frustrates me. You know, I would ask her to come down here and visit the towns, and then make a statement like that which frankly it is an irresponsible statement."

Trump, who is preparing to visit Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands on Tuesday, has also lavished praise on his administration's response, writing on Twitter Friday morning that "Puerto Rico Governor Ricardo Rossello just stated: 'The Administration and the President, every time we've spoken, they've delivered.'"

A day earlier, Trump wrote that "FEMA & First Responders are doing a GREAT job in Puerto Rico. Massive food & water delivered... Wish press would treat fairly!" adding in a post later Thursday that Puerto Rico's "governor said 'great job!'"

On Friday morning, Trump opened a speech on tax reform by pledging, "We will not rest ... until the people of Puerto Rico are safe," while also explaining that his administration has been handed an immensely difficult situation.

"This is an island surrounded by water. Big water. Ocean water," Trump said about the U.S. territory, adding later, "We've never seen a situation like this."

But while Puerto Rican officials have expressed appreciation for the White House's outreach, they have also made clear that what has been done so far has been insufficient to meet the needs of the island's 3.5 million U.S. citizens. In the same Fox News interview where Rossello praised Trump for his efforts thus far, he made clear that "we do need more aid" and that obtaining and distributing that aid remains a problem.

Roughly half of Puerto Ricans are still without running water, officials said Friday at a press conference in the island's capital, San Juan, and just 36 of its 69 hospitals are open and have power. Retirement homes "are becoming just human cages for people that are sick and unable to fend for themselves," Cruz said Friday morning.

The San Juan mayor said on CNN that it has been logistics, not the presence of supplies themselves, that has thus far presented the toughest hurdle to clear. She said Friday morning that a day earlier there had been thousands of shipping containers filled with supplies stuck at a port and unable to move. Only recently had those containers started to make their way out of the port, she said.

In San Juan, Cruz said her residents had received four pallets of water on Thursday — slightly more than 4,000 bottles for a population of roughly 350,000 people — in addition to four pallets of food and 12 pallets of baby food and supplies.

The situation is more dire in other parts of the island, she said, relaying her conversation with another mayor who said his people had no food, no medicine and were drinking from a creek that they also used to bathe and wash their clothes.

"This is a message for President Trump: Thank you for calling San Juan yesterday and listening for our mayday call. But sir, there's 77 other towns that are waiting. They're waiting anxiously and will be very grateful to you and to the American people if you continue to step up," Cruz said. "Again, Mr. Trump, we appreciate everything you are doing and we know it can be done faster. Help us save lives. We will be forever grateful."

Homeland Security Adviser Tom Bossert, in his own CNN interview on Friday morning that preceded Cruz's, disputed the suggestion that the White House's commitment to the island has been anything but absolute and that the logistical strategy employed by the federal government has been insufficient.

Because it is an island, Bossert said that recovery efforts in Puerto Rico present specific challenges, but he said criticism from "New Day" anchor Chris Cuomo and others on CNN "wasn't well placed."

"I don't accept that we're doing anything short of everything we can do. Yes, I accept that the people are going to see, at the very end, the last person in the most hardest-to-reach area is going to receive assistance in a way that's less acceptable than we'd like to," Bossert said.

"We'd like to give them a bottle of water and food immediately. But I do accept that there's going to be a difference between a full-throated, adequate response and the complete satisfaction of bringing that entire territory back to its full, functional state."

Duke, at a press conference Friday in San Juan, said the integration between Puerto Rican, U.S. military and other federal resources has been "really admirable" and will "set the standard for the future." And while she did not directly address her "good news" remark from the previous day, she stood behind her statement that she was pleased with the federal government's recovery efforts thus far.

"Yesterday, I was asked if I was happy and satisfied with the recovery. I am proud of the work that's being done. I am proud of Americans helping Americans, friends and strangers alike. I am proud of the work that DoD, FEMA, and the territory along with first responders are doing," Duke said. "Clearly the situation here in Puerto Rico after the devastating hurricane is not satisfactory. But together we are getting there, and the progress today is very, very strong. The president and I will not be fully satisfied, however, until every Puerto Rican is back home, the power is back on, clean water is freely available, schools and hospitals are fully open and the Puerto Rican economy is working."

In addition to routing supplies and manpower to Puerto Rico, the Trump administration has also sought this week to combat the notion that the island has not been top of mind for the president. Such criticism began last weekend when Trump launched a rhetorical tirade against the NFL and its players who kneel in protest during the national anthem, posting to Twitter several times on the issue while remaining silent on Puerto Rico, which was reeling from Maria's landfall last week.

Trump and his White House have insisted that Puerto Rico has remained a continuous point of focus in the days since the hurricane hit the island, and the president has mentioned the storm in his social media posts multiple times this week.

But the president also appeared to place some blame this week on Puerto Rico for its dire situation, noting the U.S. territory's "broken infrastructure & massive debt" in a tweet.

On Friday, he wrote that "big decisions will have to be made as to the cost of its rebuilding," a statement Bossert sought to clarify by explaining that Puerto Rico's lack of liquid financial assets — the island declared a form of bankruptcy last May — meant the federal government was paying for the entirety of recovery efforts.

"Once we stabilize, then let's talk about the debt," Cruz said on CNN in a second interview with the network. "You know what? There ain't going to be anybody to pay the debt. If we let them die, nobody's going to pay the debt."

DOE approves big boost for Vogtle loan guarantees Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/29/2017 11:08 AM EDT

The Energy Department has conditionally approved a $3.7 billion increase in the federal loan guarantees for the over-budget Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia, the agency announced this morning.

DOE had already approved $8.33 billion for the two-reactor project under the Obama administration. Now, Energy Secretary Rick Perry is primed to offer an additional $1.67 billion to Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, $1.6 billion to Oglethorpe Power Corp. and $415 million to the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia.

The Energy Department had originally extended loan guarantees for $3.4 billion to Georgia Power, $3.1 billion to Oglethorpe and $1.8 billion to MEAG.

WHAT'S NEXT: The new DOE loan guarantees are conditional and the firms will not be able to access the financing until they are finalized. It's unclear how long it will take to finalize.

Bernie backers give Dem incumbents a pass in 2018 Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti | 09/29/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Democrats have long been terrified that the Sanders-Clinton slugfest of 2016 would set off a prolonged civil war in the party, forcing incumbents to fight off primary challengers from the left in Senate and gubernatorial races.

It hasn't happened.

In a surprising reversal of the post-2008 dynamic — when Republicans were shut out of power, then saw a raft of tea party primary challengers take on their incumbents — Democrats have largely been spared of that predicament. Instead, it's Republican incumbents yet again facing heat from the right, as arch-conservative Roy Moore's defeat of incumbent Sen. Luther Strange (R-Ala.) this week emphatically showed.

"What Democrats right now care about more than anything is winning," veteran Democratic pollster Jeffrey Pollock said of divisive Democratic primaries. "I don't think the ultra-progressives have abandoned their principles — not at all — but I think they looked at the challenge and said, 'This is not the right place.'"

Most filing deadlines are still months away, so insurgents who aren't currently on the radar could still launch late challenges. Primary fights could also still turn uncomfortable in a range of low-profile House races.

But the relative peace on the left wasn't preordained — the divisiveness of last year's presidential primary was widely expected to manifest again in 2018 statewide elections. Yet with next year's Senate and gubernatorial races shaping up, it's Democrats whose sighs of relief are echoing around the country.

Democrats have escaped the brunt of their own party's populist fury largely because they're heading into the midterms in a defensive crouch, with 10 of their incumbent senators on the ballot in states that voted for Donald Trump. So instead of going after their own senators, progressive activists are focused on gaining Republican-held seats in the House.

"There's some reluctance to put a lot of time into [unseating Democrats], versus [building] a more progressive Congress overall," said former Communications Workers of America union President Larry Cohen, a top Bernie Sanders adviser who now chairs the board of the Our Revolution political group that was spawned from the senator's 2016 presidential campaign. "There's going to be a lot more activity where it's possible to change the makeup of the Congress."

Not all statewide Democratic incumbents are home free: Actress Cynthia Nixon has been encouraged to mount a long-shot challenge against New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo from the left next year — much like the one he fended off in 2014. Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee has suggested he may take on first-term Gov. Gina Raimondo, criticizing her for not being sufficiently progressive on an array of issues.

And in California, fourth-term Sen. Dianne Feinstein has faced fury from the left for not challenging Trump more aggressively. State Senate President Pro Tempore Kevin de León, who made the rounds in Washington this month, and liberal activist Joe Sanberg have gained notice as potential challengers.

Yet those potential fights remain long shots, and the one primary challenge that is already underway — from Hawaii Rep. Colleen Hanabusa against Gov. David Ige — is based more around his perceived unpopularity than a progressive insurgency. Meanwhile, liberal challenges to Sens. Joe Manchin of West Virginia and Claire McCaskill of Missouri have so far failed to gain traction.

The most successful GOP primary challenges in 2010 were against relatively moderate, entrenched incumbents in conservative states. In contrast, none of the many Democratic senators running in liberal states in 2018 — such as Delaware's Tom Carper, Maryland's Ben Cardin, Minnesota's Amy Klobuchar, Rhode Island's Sheldon Whitehouse, or Washington's Maria Cantwell — have seen any reason to sweat their own positions.

This wasn't always the likeliest development: in the early days after Trump's victory, a handful of activists who supported Sanders in 2016 created new efforts specifically designed to oust incumbents. But 10 months later, little has come of those pushes, leading many Democratic operatives working on statewide races to now assume those challenges won't come at all.

That Democratic relief stands in sharp contrast to the Republican fears of another round of primaries much like the ones they fought through in 2010, after they were shut out of power in Washington. That year, Sen. Bob Bennett of Utah was ousted by Mike Lee, a tea party challenger, and Rep. Mike Castle was defeated in a Senate primary. Incumbent Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana was then pushed out in 2012. (Conservative Democratic Sen. Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas also faced a primary from the left in 2010, but she won, while the only Democratic senator ousted in a primary was party-switching Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.)

After Strange's defeat, vulnerable Republican Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona and Dean Heller of Nevada are facing down Trump-friendly primary opponents coming at them from the right. And people aligned with former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon have talked about taking on Mississippi Sen. Roger Wicker, too. Another potential target, Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker, announced his retirement last week.

But on the other side, with so much of the party's grass-roots money flowing to anti-Trump efforts and candidates, there's so far no organized effort to funnel campaign cash or political support to potential Democratic challengers.

And since so much of the party's energy is organized around opposing Trump and the Republican Congress, even more centrist Democrats have occasionally escaped liberal fury by loudly opposing the GOP. Not one of the five Democratic senators running for reelection in a state Trump carried by double digits even flirted with voting for any of the attempted Republican health care repeal measures this year, for example.

"Because of Donald Trump, the last two years have allowed these people to take positions that are very much on the side of progressives," said Pollock. They "take positions that the progressives embrace, that [are politically] beneficial even in states Trump won by 40 points."

Still, messy Democratic primaries are still expected in several House districts where vulnerable Republicans are running for reelection. One conservative Democratic House member — Illinois' Dan Lipinski — already faces a primary fight.

That's reason enough for establishment-oriented and moderate Democrats to avoid complacency, insisted a handful of party operatives.

"The Sanders campaign proved — from the huge crowds he got, the enthusiasm, the bumper stickers, that he represents an anti-establishment progressive reality in the Democratic Party," said his short-lived 2016 primary foe Chafee. "I am thinking along those lines."

White House launches probe of private email accounts Back

By Josh Dawsey and Andrea Peterson | 09/28/2017 08:03 PM EDT

The White House has launched an internal probe of private email use, pulling batches of emails on the White House server to and from private accounts of senior aides, according to four officials familiar with the matter.

The effort began this week after POLITICO reported that Jared Kushner and a number of other senior White House officials used private email accounts throughout the year to conduct government business.

Of particular interest is Kushner and Ivanka Trump's private email domain, because they still work in the White House, two officials said. Accounts of other White House officials also are being reviewed.

The probe could take several weeks or even months to complete, according to one of these people, as officials are searching for all emails sent or received about government business.

The White House counsel's office is reviewing the accounts to determine whether the messages are germane to any investigations such as the ongoing Russia probes by Congress and special counsel Robert Mueller, one of these people said.

News about the private email accounts caught many White House lawyers by surprise, one of these people said, and infuriated a number of White House officials.

A White House spokesperson declined to comment on the review, but said, "The White House instructs staff to fully comply with the Presidential Records Act and briefs staff on the need to preserve records."

At least five current and former White House officials have used private email, POLITICO previously reported. Those include Kushner, Ivanka Trump, Gary Cohn, Steve Bannon and Reince Priebus.

Kushner's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, has said there are fewer than 100 emails about government business in Kushner's private email domain, and that all have been forwarded to his White House account.

The email practice has come under particular scrutiny because President Donald Trump was so critical of Hillary Clinton's private email server, leading to chants of "Lock her up!" on the campaign trail.

There is no evidence White House officials have sent or received classified or sensitive emails on their personal accounts, but the probe is set to determine whether that occurred. The probe is being led by the White House counsel's office, two of these people said.

The Senate Intelligence Committee on Thursday asked Kushner's lawyer to review all his private email and correspondence on other messaging services, citing "concern" that he didn't disclose the email account in a private interview.

Kushner's lawyer has said there is nothing on the private server relating to the investigations into potential Russian meddling in the 2016 election. Kushner previously used a business account during the transition and campaign.

Price took military jets to Europe, Asia for over $500K Back

By Rachana Pradhan and Dan Diamond | 09/28/2017 06:56 PM EDT

The White House approved the use of military aircraft for multi-national trips by Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price to Africa and Europe this spring, and to Asia in the summer, at a cost of more than $500,000 to taxpayers.

The overseas trips bring the total cost to taxpayers of Price's travels to more than $1 million since May, according to a POLITICO review.

Price pledged on Thursday to reimburse the government for the cost of his own seat on his domestic trips using private aircraft — reportedly around $52,000 — but that would not include the cost of the military flights.

Price's wife, Betty, accompanied him on the military flights, while other members of the secretary's delegation flew commercially to Europe.

HHS spokeswoman Charmaine Yoest said Price has reimbursed the agency for the cost of his wife's travel abroad, but declined to say when he did so. Price has been under intense criticism since POLITICO revealed his extensive use of charter aircraft for domestic flights last week. His travel expenditures are subject to reviews by the HHS inspector general and the House Oversight Committee. Democratic and Republican senators have also demanded information about Price's travel expenditures.

The White House assesses the use of military aircraft for overseas travel by Cabinet members on a case-by-case basis. Secretaries whose jobs involve national security functions are more likely to require military jets, but the White House occasionally approves the use of military planes for other members of the Cabinet.

"Use of military aircraft for Cabinet and other essential travelers is sometimes an appropriate and necessary use of resources," said Raj Shah, White House principal deputy press secretary.

But one of Price's recent predecessors, Kathleen Sebelius, who served for five years under President Barack Obama, said she never took a military plane on her many trips overseas; she always flew commercially. Sylvia Mathews Burwell, who served as HHS secretary for the final 2½ years of the Obama administration, used a military jet for travel to Havana, Cuba, according to former HHS aides.

It is not clear whether Burwell, who did not respond to requests for comment, used military planes on other trips overseas. Two former aides said her husband accompanied her on the trip to Cuba and reimbursed the government for the costs of the trip.

But Yoest said, "It's our understanding that previous secretaries have never reimbursed for spousal travel," referencing Burwell's trip to Cuba.

Price's overseas trips on government planes included stops in Berlin, Geneva, Beijing, Ho Chi Minh City and Tokyo, where he attended world health meetings and met with other high-level officials. In May, Price also visited Liberia, where he discussed the nation's response to the Ebola virus that ravaged the West African country three years ago.

"The trips he's gone on make total sense," one former HHS official said of Price. "It's just how he got there."

Yoest, the HHS spokeswoman, said the use of military aircraft — known as Milair — was necessary both for Price's security and his ability to communicate with the department.

"In both instances, those were Milair flights that were pre-approved," said Yoest. "We don't have a deputy secretary that's been confirmed ... Milair is important for maintaining security and having secure communications, as well."

A White House official confirmed that President Donald Trump's staff approved the flights. Trump has been sharply critical of Price's use of chartered aircraft on domestic flights, saying "we'll see" when asked whether he would fire Price over the issue.

The Trump administration pointed to statistics showing that it approved fewer trips abroad on military aircraft compared with the first eight months of the Obama administration: There were 77 military trips during the first eight months of the Trump administration, compared with 94 at the same point during the Obama years, according to a White House official.

"This @WhiteHouse has cut down on use of military aircraft for travel," Shah tweeted on Wednesday, linking to a McClatchy article.

"Fact: Trump [administration] authorized fewer flights on military aircraft by senior govt officials than previous [administration]," press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders echoed.

During six terms as a Republican House member from Georgia, Price had cultivated a reputation as a fiscal hawk keen on reining in federal spending.

In June, Price defended a proposed budget for HHS that included a $663,000 cut to the agency's $4.9 million annual spending on travel, or roughly 15 percent. "The budgeting process is an exercise in reforming our federal programs to make sure they actually work — so they do their job and use tax dollars wisely," Price testified in front of the Senate Finance Committee on June 8.

Nonetheless, his travel tab has exceeded $1 million when accounting for both the overseas trips and the more than two dozen trips he has taken on private planes domestically since May.

For instance, Price took a Gulfstream C-37B owned by the Department of Defense for a weeklong trip in late May through Africa and Europe. The six legs of travel, which represented about 30 hours of flight time, were projected to cost $311,418.25, according to an invoice reviewed by POLITICO.

On May 17, Price flew to Liberia, where he met with President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf and other top officials to discuss global health security and public health emergency preparedness, according to an HHS readout of his meetings. He then went to the G-20 health ministers meeting in Berlin, which was held May 19 and 20. His ultimate destination was the World Health Assembly in Geneva, Switzerland, where he stayed until May 24.

HHS secretaries routinely attend the World Health Assembly, often accompanied by a large delegation, as well as other ministerial meetings with world health officials. This year's delegation included nearly 50 people, all of whom were HHS staff or federal employees — except for Price's wife, a physician who was listed as an adviser.

Price, his wife and eight HHS personnel took the Gulfstream from Berlin to Geneva on Sunday, May 21, an HHS official confirmed. The 95-minute trip was projected to cost taxpayers almost $16,000, according to an invoice.

There are multiple commercial flight options on that route, such as several daily flights by EasyJet, for about $260 per ticket or less. The German airline Lufthansa is currently running a promotion for one-way flights between Berlin and Geneva for just $60.

Other members of the U.S. delegation to the World Health Assembly contacted by POLITICO said they did not take military aircraft to get to Geneva for the conference.

AIDES RISK CONFLICT IN STOCK TRADES: According to a POLITICO review of federal disclosures for 2015 and 2016, some senior congressional aides regularly buy and sell individual stocks that present a potential conflicts of interest with their work. "A smaller number of staffers trade in companies that lobby Congress and the committees that employ them," Pro's Maggie Severns reports. "In all, approximately 450 aides have bought or sold a stock of more than $1,001 in value since May 2015."

Of note: David Hoppe, who was Speaker Paul Ryan's chief of staff in late 2015 and 2016, regularly traded stocks, Maggie reports. Hoppe and his wife bought shares of the oil companies Occidental Petroleum and Devon Energy shortly before Congress announced plans to lift a years-old ban on oil exports that benefited both corporations.

— And on the House and Senate Appropriations committees, at least 18 House aides and 14 Senate aides have bought or sold at least one stock, through their own accounts or family members'. For example, one senior House Appropriations aide working for a member focused on energy and water funding has, through various family accounts, bought and sold shares in companies including Royal Dutch Shell, Energy Transfer Partners, Dow Chemical and Emerson Electric. KEEPING UP WITH PRUITT: EPA has started posting a simplified version of Administrator Scott Pruitt's schedule online in response to increased requests for his itinerary, Alex Guillen reports. The posted records currently spans April 3 through Sept. 8, but an agency official said it will update the schedule every two weeks. The agency previously released a more detailed version of Pruitt's February and March schedule in response to records requests from POLITICO and other outlets. See Pruitt's schedule here.

CUOMO TO TRUMP: FOCUS ON RELIEF: New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo has a message for the president: Tweet about Puerto Rico, not the NFL. "They're just not focused on it," Cuomo told reporters. "What I'm saying: Focus on Puerto Rico. Focus on the Virgin Islands. Focus on rebuilding the Keys and Florida and Texas. Tweet, 'Let's all go volunteer and help Florida. Let's all go volunteer and help Texas.' Tweet, 'Let's all go and make a donation to the people of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands because they are American citizens.' That would be a great tweet as president of the United States." POLITICO New York's Jimmy Vielkind reports more here.

JUDGE TOSSES ALASKA CHALLENGE TO ROADLESS RULE: A federal judge last week shot down yet another legal challenge to the 2001 roadless rule, a Forest Service regulation that limits road construction through national forests for timber harvesting or mining purposes. Judge Richard Leon of the U.S. District Court for D.C. dismissed the case brought by the state of Alaska and a litany of industry groups and companies who argued that the regulation violated eight different laws, including NEPA, the Administrative Procedure Act and the Alaskan National Interest Lands Conservation Act. They also argued that Alaska's Tongass, the nation's biggest national forest, should have been exempted from the rule. However, none of those spaghetti strands stuck to the wall, and Leon tossed the suit.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski said in a statement today that she is "deeply disappointed" in the ruling. "The rule has decimated our timber industry and serves mainly to prevent the access needed to construct everything from roads and power lines to energy and mining projects," she said. "I recognize the damage this rule is causing, particularly in Southeast, and will pursue every possible legislative and administrative option to exempt us from it."

SOLARWORLD RAMPS UP HIRING: SolarWorld Americas said today it will begin hiring new employees production ramps up in the wake of Friday's decision by a federal trade panel in its favor. Eric Wolff reports the company aims to hire up to 200 workers by May. "Friday's determination made clear that the U.S. industry's problems have not been self-inflicted, but rather are the result of surging imports," Juergen Stein, CEO and president of SolarWorld Americas said in a statement. "As such, we at SolarWorld are prepared to scale up our world-class manufacturing operations to produce leading solar products made by more American workers." While Oregon-based company is still in bankruptcy, Stein promised the commission it would increase production if it got a favorable ruling, Eric reports.

EXXON PLANS TO CUT METHANE LEAKS: Exxon Mobil has moved to cut methane leaks from its shale oil and gas operations, the Financial Times reports today. The company is "taking unilateral action on an issue that has been the subject of sustained political and legal battles in the U.S. in recent years. XTO Energy, Exxon's shale subsidiary, will replace equipment, train staff and research new technologies to curb leaks of methane, a potent greenhouse gas estimated to trap heat 28 to 36 times as effectively as carbon dioxide over 100 years," FT writes. The news comes as the Trump administration "is working to roll back or suspend regulations imposed under President Barack Obama to control methane leakage." Read more.

WESTERN GRID OPERATORS LAUNCH TALKS TO JOIN SPP: Nine western transmission owners, including utilities, cooperatives and two portions of the federal Western Area Power Administration, will next month launch negotiations to join the FERC-regulated Southwest Power Pool regional grid and market operator, the Mountain West Transmission Group announced Friday. Studies commissioned by the group estimated that joining SPP could collectively save them about $88 million a year by 2024, by which time about 700 megawatts of coal-fired generation will have retired and more than 2,000 megawatts of wind and solar generation, almost all in Colorado, will be coming online and need a market to sell into. Others participants in the group are Tri???State Generation and Transmission Association, Basin Electric Power Cooperative, Public Service Company of Colorado, Colorado Springs Utilities, and Black Hills Corporation's three electric subsidiaries. A portion of WAPA's footprint is already participating in the SPP market.

CLIMATE CAUCUS ADDS SIX: The bipartisan Climate Solutions Caucus announced six new members: Reps. John Larson (D-Conn.), Pat Tiberi (R-Ohio), Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.), Chris Collins (R-N.Y.), Stephanie Murphy (D-Fla.) and Jack Bergman (R-Mich.), bringing the Caucus' total to 58 members, with equal parts Democrats and Republicans. "The real-world implications of sea level rise have been on display for all to see in Texas, Florida and the Caribbean following Hurricanes, Harvey, Irma and Maria," Co-chair of the group, Rep. Carlos Curbelo said. "I'm grateful these members are willing to step up and turn their concern into action by joining the Climate Solutions Caucus. Congressional aides risk conflicts with stock trades Back

By Maggie Severns | 09/25/2017 05:06 AM EDT

On Sept. 28, 2016, three members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sent a letter to the Justice Department suggesting that the drug company Mylan was violating Medicaid laws.

Nine days later, the Justice Department reached a massive $465 million settlement with the firm.

In between, another action happened almost invisibly: A Judiciary Committee aide to Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) dropped somewhere between $4,004 and $60,000 in Mylan stock from his and his child's portfolios.

If an aide had done the same thing in the executive branch, he or she could be investigated for violating federal conflict-of-interest law. But the Durbin aide's ownership of shares of Mylan, and their timely sale, are reflective of Congress' persistent refusal to crack down on stock trading by staffers, even in firms overseen by their committees.

Durbin's aide, Daniel Swanson, isn't alone. A POLITICO review of federal disclosures for 2015 and 2016 found that some senior aides regularly buy and sell individual stocks that present potential conflicts of interest with their work. A smaller number of staffers trade in companies that lobby Congress and the committees that employ them. In all, approximately 450 aides have bought or sold a stock of more than $1,001 in value since May 2015.

That's likely just the tip of the iceberg, since most congressional aides aren't required to report their trades. Only those in positions earning more than $124,406 per year must reveal their investments. Of the 12,500 staffers working for lawmakers, committees and leadership offices, only about 1,700 make that much, according to data compiled by Legistorm and the Brookings Institution.

Government watchdogs say that, at a minimum, staffers should be prevented from buying shares of companies with business before their committees. But they are not. And despite the disparity between the rigorous standards for the executive branch and the laxness of Congress, the House and Senate have taken a permissive approach even to enforcing existing rules.

That's a serious problem, watchdogs say, because aides often have more of a hands-on role than the members themselves in crafting details of legislation that could have enormous consequences for individual companies. And because aides are rarely in the spotlight, there's more potential for ethical lapses to go unnoticed.

"The staff level is actually more dangerous, because they don't get scrutiny and they're not accountable," said Meredith McGehee, chief of policy at Issue One, a watchdog group for money and politics. "If a member does it, he can get defeated. A staff person can wield enormous amounts of power that isn't seen, and there's really no way to hold that staff accountable."

Indeed, one of the key findings of the POLITICO review is that senior aides to both Republican and Democratic House leaders, who often have quiet, largely unseen input into the crafting of legislation, are active traders.

At least 11 aides to House leaders have bought and sold multiple stocks in the past two years.

David Hoppe, who was Speaker Paul Ryan's chief of staff in late 2015 and 2016, regularly traded stocks. Hoppe and his wife bought shares of the oil companies Occidental Petroleum and Devon Energy shortly before Congress announced plans to lift a years-old ban on oil exports that benefited both corporations.

Diane Dewhirst, deputy chief of staff to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, disclosed her spouse's purchase of stock in two pharmaceutical companies, Astrazeneca and GlaxoSmithKline, in December 2016, shortly before Congress passed a medical research bill that benefited both companies.

Meanwhile, on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which sets energy policy and is the main committee overseeing Obamacare, at least six aides have bought and sold stock in companies with interests in the work of the committee. One longtime committee aide in an oversight role bought and sold more than two dozen health care and energy stocks during 2015 and 2016 and sold his stock in Express Scripts, the prescription drug sales company, as the company came under scrutiny over its role in setting drug prices last October.

On the House and Senate appropriations committees, which make broadly influential spending and policy decisions through annual government funding bills, at least 18 House aides and 14 Senate aides have bought or sold at least one stock, through their own accounts or family members'. For example, one senior House Appropriations aide working for a member focused on energy and water funding has, through various family accounts, bought and sold shares in companies including Royal Dutch Shell, Energy Transfer Partners, Dow Chemical and Emerson Electric. Another longtime aide on the committee's staff who is focused on investigations and research, which are at the heart of the committee's decision-making, holds and trades stock in companies with major interests in the committee's work, including pharmaceutical companies such as GlaxoSmithKline and energy companies such as Occidental Petroleum.

Swanson, Hoppe and some other senior staffers said their brokers are authorized to buy and sell stocks without their involvement, and thus they were not consulted on the trades listed in their disclosure forms. But ethics watchdogs have long frowned on such personal deals, noting that they can be abridged at any time and that outsiders have no way to verify that they're being followed. Aides, like members themselves, can create blind trusts that fully bar them from involvement in any trades. If they don't want to go to the trouble of setting up a blind trust, they could protect themselves from many potential conflicts by investing in publicly traded mutual funds.

Meanwhile, some staffers also defended their trading on the grounds that the congressional actions that affected the companies they bought and sold, including the three senators' letter to the Justice Department about Mylan, were known to the public. Ethics watchdogs, however, say that it's often difficult, if not impossible, to determine whether an aide has information that wouldn't be available to the public, and that any trading of stocks that are directly influenced by their committee work constitutes a conflict of interest.

"It causes the public to question whether personal stock holdings are influencing legislative activity," said Donna Nagy, an Indiana University law professor who has written extensively on the issue. "That doesn't necessarily mean a 'yes' or 'no' vote, as it would a senator or member of Congress. Did personal stock holdings influence the speed or slowness with which a report is written? That's something that would be in staffers' control."

Simply having a financial stake in an industry may make a person more likely to advocate for it, at least in the eyes of taxpayers. That's the premise behind the far tougher requirements for staffers in the executive branch, where employees are required by law to recuse themselves from any investments that could potentially conflict with their work.

Senate committee aides are held to no such legal standard. But a little-recognized Senate rule states that aides should divest themselves "of any substantial holdings which may be directly affected by the actions of [their] committee" unless they have permission from the Senate Ethics Committee.

But the rule is interpreted quite narrowly, watchdogs say: The Senate Ethics Committee often measures a "substantial holding" by the percentage of a company that's owned by the aide, or whether an individual investment constitutes the bulk of an aide's savings — not the amount of money that's invested. So most stock trades aren't covered. The Ethics Committee declined to comment.

And the Ethics Committee rarely probes stock trading by aides. Ethics watchdogs told POLITICO they couldn't think of a single case of an aide being investigated for a conflict of interest. The committee hasn't issued a disciplinary sanction against an aide for any reason in 10 years.

"There does not appear to be an effective system of enforcement in place," concluded Craig Holman, lobbyist at the watchdog group Public Citizen. "This is the type of conflict-of-interest rule that should apply to all members as well as senior staff, enforced by real-time public disclosure or stock trading activity."

Through their brokerage accounts, Swanson, who is Durbin's senior counsel on the Judiciary Committee, and his immediate family bought and sold stocks of at least $1,000 in value 120 times over 2015 and 2016, according to his financial disclosures. His family's holdings amount to somewhere between a minimum of $99,043 and a maximum of $785,000, based on the price ranges in the disclosure form. Some of those purchases and sales were in mutual funds, while others were in companies with significant business interests before Durbin and the Judiciary Committee.

Among a variety of trades made through his and his family's accounts, Swanson bought and sold stock in 2U, a for-profit online education company that bills itself as an alternative to the traditional for-profit colleges that have been heavily criticized by his boss, Durbin. He traded stock in Comcast and Verizon, both of which have come under Judiciary Committee scrutiny in the past because of proposed deals and mergers. And he held and sold stock in Express Scripts, a company that, like Mylan, has increasingly caught the eye of regulators and lawmakers for its possible role in drug overpricing.

When asked about the trades, Durbin spokesman Ben Marter provided a letter from Swanson's brokerage firm that says trading in Swanson's account is directed by the firm based on "a mutually agreed upon written statement of your objectives" and that the investment firm has "full authority" to make trades without giving Swanson notice.

Swanson declined to comment further.

Durbin himself is among the many House members and senators who avoid buying and selling stocks, in many cases because of the ethical ramifications of being invested in companies while voting on and passing laws. And he introduced a bill earlier this year to force President Donald Trump and Vice President Mike Pence to completely divest themselves of any holdings that could present conflicts of interest.

If Trump dropped such investments, Durbin said, it would let "the American people know with certainty that he is putting America first."

But when it comes to his aides, Durbin stops far short of requiring the sale of investments.

"Anybody who's ever met Dan knows that he has conducted himself with the utmost integrity every day of his public service on the Hill," Durbin spokesman Marter said. "That may not matter to POLITICO, but it matters in the real world and to Sen. Durbin, and that's what counts."

As Paul Ryan prepared to become speaker of the House in October 2015, he tapped David Hoppe, a fellow Wisconsin native and former Hill aide, to serve as his chief of staff. Hoppe left lobbying jobs with both his own firm, Hoppe Strategies, and the K Street powerhouse Squire Patton Boggs to work for the new speaker. After he moved back through the revolving door, Hoppe continued to trade stock in companies with interests before Congress.

Hoppe, who has a variety of investments in his and his wife's portfolios, traded dozens of stocks between mid-December 2015 and January 2017, when he left Ryan's office. Some of those trades were made days ahead of Congress passing legislation that benefited the companies Hoppe traded in, and at moments when companies were furiously attempting to sway lawmakers.

As Congress finalized a massive tax-and-spending package at the end of 2015, Hoppe and his wife invested in two petroleum companies that were aggressively lobbying Congress to lift the 30-year ban on oil exports, Occidental Petroleum and Devon Energy. Hoppe made the purchases 16 days before Congress announced plans to lift the ban on oil. During the fall of 2016, as Congress finalized and passed a $6 billion medical research bill, Hoppe's spouse invested in the pharmaceutical companies Merck and Bristol-Myers Squibb.

Such investments can present conflicts of interest, or the appearance of, even if they're not based on inside information.

"It looks terrible. They shouldn't be doing this," said Richard Painter, former ethics lawyer for President George W. Bush, referring to stock trading by aides to House and Senate leaders. "There are two separate problems. One is that if they buy or sell stock based on insider information, they're criminals. But if they make decisions on a bill that could have an effect on their own financial decisions, that might not be a crime — though it is a crime in the executive branch — [but] it stinks to high hell."

In the executive branch, employees are barred from holding investments that pose potential conflicts with their work, and must recuse themselves from decisions that could conflict with their remaining investments. In Congress, however, employees are often left to set their own standards.

Hoppe said in an interview that he doesn't direct trades in the two accounts controlled by him and his wife. Prior to joining Ryan's office, he said, he and his wife asked their brokers to keep him out of any trading decisions.

"There were no directions in which [a broker] called me and said, 'Do you want to trade this? Do you want to trade that?'" said Hoppe. "Has there been a time when they've asked me about something or another? Probably, but I can't remember it, and I can tell you it wasn't when I was working for Paul."

Dewhirst, the top Pelosi aide whose spouse bought stock in pharmaceutical companies shortly before Congress moved to pass the medical research bill, has worked for Pelosi since 2003. She also recorded purchases and sales in energy and technology stocks in the past two years. Nearly all of those transactions were listed to an account controlled by her spouse. A Pelosi spokesperson said in a statement that Dewhirst is not involved with the investments.

"All transactions are made by [Dewhirst's] spouse upon the recommendation of his investment advisor," the Pelosi spokesperson said.

Pelosi is one of few members of House and Senate leadership who actively buys and sells stocks — and she was heavily criticized for it in a 2011 report by "60 Minutes" about the stock trading habits of members of Congress. She has since scaled back the number of stocks that she and her husband buy and sell. An account owned by Pelosi's husband traded 14 stocks in the past two years.

Most senior members of House and Senate leadership avoid the practice because of the potential for conflicts of interest. Ryan, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, House Majority Whip Steve Scalise and House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer all refrain from buying and selling shares of individual companies. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell sold three stocks this year but has otherwise abstained from trading, and Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn made one purchase and one sale in recent years, each in Apple stock.

While they avoid any appearance of conflicts in their own trades, they seem to exercise little restraint on their aides, who are often the real experts on the intricacies of policies. Planned Parenthood President Cecile Richards described Dewhirst, for example, as "the first person I call if I'm trying to really get the lay of the land on an important issue, particularly on the Hill," in a 2015 interview.

Some aides who engage in trades, like those on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, are charged with overseeing powerful industries. In the House, committee aides are allowed to do so while holding and trading stocks in those very industries. Meanwhile, they're sometimes being lobbied by very same companies. The company whose stock Swanson held, Mylan, spent $315,000 lobbying Capitol Hill last fall, including $170,000 paid to the Podesta Group solely to lobby on "drug pricing and oversight," after it was accused of mischaracterizing its drug EpiPen in order to avoid having to pay a federally mandated rebate, according to public filings.

"The very senior staffers ought to be considered very much the same as members. These are policy-making individuals. They're the people lobbyists want to meet with and influence," said Holman, of Public Citizen. "It's their ability to affect public policy that matters, whether or not they receive votes or subject themselves to elections."

For his part, Hoppe recalled that during an earlier stint on Capitol Hill working for former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, he once recused himself from working on an issue involving the Walt Disney Co. because he was a shareholder. But he said he didn't see any similar conflicts while working for Ryan, and added that he was on only a temporary stint in the speaker's office, waiting to return to his lobbying job.

"I'm obviously older, and they don't pay the same on Capitol Hill as I was making in the private sector," Hoppe said. "My wife likes living in a house as opposed to living in a car."

Many Capitol Hill aides are young and don't earn enough money to have large investment portfolios, Hoppe said, and nearly all are drawn to public service for reasons that have nothing to do with making money. But he didn't rule out the possibility that aides could have access to information that would boost their holdings.

"Is it in the realm of possibility that somebody could do that? Yes. Is it very likely? No," Hoppe said. "But people who are dishonest will find a way to be dishonest."

Though congressional aides are largely invisible to the public's eye, they have played roles in well-publicized scandals in the past. In the early 1960s, a Senate aide close to Lyndon Johnson named Bobby Baker was investigated for using his office for personal gain, including accepting cash in exchange for promoting legislation, and running a vending-machine company, Serv-U. Baker's net worth as a Senate aide ballooned from $11,000 to $2.5 million over the course of two decades. He was later convicted of crimes including fraud and tax evasion, and both the House and Senate soon started requiring aides to disclose their finances for the first time.

More recently, since Congress passed the Stock Act, a 2012 law that for the first time formally barred members of Congress from insider trading, the sole Securities and Exchange Commission investigation of a potential Stock Act violation that's known to the public involves the actions of a congressional aide.

The aide, a former Ways and Means Committee staff director, allegedly leaked information about Medicare reimbursement rates that were about to rise. A firm called Height Securities, which specializes in gathering intelligence in Washington and relaying it to Wall Street, sent the information to hedge funds, causing stock to shoot up in a company that benefited from the Medicare rate hike.

The SEC has been investigating the case since 2013, but it was delayed for several years when House counsel refused to comply with SEC subpoenas for testimony and documents related to the investigation.

Though the SEC and the House reached an undisclosed agreement that settled the court case, the SEC hasn't yet announced the results of its investigation. But watchdogs say it shows why the laws governing stock trades by aides need to be tightened: Congress seems intent on protecting its unique status and perks, and the SEC remains mostly silent on stock trading.

"We'd be a lot better off if the SEC would look into it, find out what's going on, and reach the conclusion that there are no serious insider-trading concerns — or, if there are concerns, take enforcement action," Painter said.

And while concerns over separation of powers could make it difficult for the SEC to take some investigative steps, such as seizing congressional documents, Painter said, "there's absolutely no reason not to start an investigation, and I think 99 percent of what they need, they could get without problems."

The potential problems arising from aides trading stocks extend beyond insider trading. There's also the potential that investing in a company could corrupt the views or interests of staff.

New York Republican Rep. Chris Collins, a business titan who is among the House's wealthiest members, garnered headlines earlier this year for appearing to persuade at least five of his fellow House colleagues to invest in a tiny Australian drug company called Innate Immunotherapeutics, on whose board he sits.

Little noticed was the fact that Collins' chief of staff, Michael Hook, has made significant investments of his own that track closely with Collins'.

Hook, who knew Collins before joining the lawmaker's office, owned stock in Innate Immunotherapeutics when he joined Collins as chief of staff in late 2015. During his time working for Collins, Hook aggressively sold off investments in other companies and poured the proceeds into Innate Immunotherapeutics stock in three dozen transactions. Collins was and continues to be a member of Energy and Commerce, the central committee overseeing health care policy in the House. He was reelected to the board of directors of Innate Immunotherapeutics in August 2016, after a failed clinical trial drove down the company's stock.

Hook reported owning at least $1 million in Innate Immunotherapeutics stock at the end of 2016. This January, Hook unloaded at least a half-million dollars in Innate Immunotherapeutics stock amid the weeks of scrutiny of Rep. Tom Price, President Donald Trump's choice for secretary of Health and Human Services, who had bought stock in the company at Collins' urging. Hook began repurchasing stock in the company at the end of January.

Innate Immunotherapeutics isn't the only company with ties to Collins that Hook has invested in. In November and December 2016, Hook invested at least $150,002 combined — and as much as $350,000 — in two real estate LLCs that were raising private capital, Sinatra-Stadt Illinois III LLC and Linda Lane Apt. Group. Both LLCs are owned by Buffalo-area developer Nick Sinatra, who has donated to Collins' campaign every election cycle since Collins first ran for his congressional seat.

The news that Collins had suggested Price invest in Innate Immunotherapeutics set off a firestorm of bad press for the two House Republicans, both of whom served on the main panel in charge of setting health care policy. Further reports of Collins' promotion of the company to his peers — and comments made near the House floor about "how many millionaires I've made in Buffalo" — sparked an investigation from the House Ethics Committee. The committee plans to announce its course of action by Oct. 12.

Hook's investments don't appear to be part of the probe.

A Hook spokesperson declined a request for comment. The spokesperson also declined to say whether Hook had consulted with the House Ethics Committee on his investment decisions.

The committee advises lawmakers and staff on how to comply with the chamber's general guideline that employees' personal actions should not discredit Congress.

"They genuinely don't want to see the body brought into scandal, controversy or disrepute," said Joseph Birkenstock, a former chief counsel for the Democratic National Committee. "That includes things like, is your boss twisting your arm? Are you doing things because you're under some job pressure? Or is there any credible forum where someone could claim that your actions or your boss' actions are connected in any way to the commercial success of this business?"

One reason that Hook's investments have not been closely scrutinized amid all the focus on Collins' and Price's stock trading is that Hook's information — while public — isn't easy to access: It's not online and can be viewed only in person in an office tucked into a House Office Building.

In 2012, when Congress passed the Stock Act, leaders crowed that information about the investments of both lawmakers and senior staff would be available online in an easily searchable format. But a year later, Congress silently passed revisions to the bill that wiped out many of those data requirements.

Information on lawmakers is still available online, but it cannot easily be searched or sorted by date or company traded. The requirement that aides' disclosures be posted online was scrapped from the law, and today such information is available only in person at computer kiosks maintained by the House and Senate.

Individuals seeking the information must log in using their name and other personal details. The documents they seek cannot be downloaded or otherwise taken out of the office in a digital format. They can be printed for 10 cents to 20 cents a page.

"There's little excuse for these barriers, especially in the digital age," said Larry Noble, senior director at the Campaign Legal Center.

"When you have to go to an agency or to Congress to have a document printed out, and you put your name down — all that is to deter people from doing it," said Noble. "All that was outrageous 25 years ago. That's not the way the world works anymore."

Other ethics requirements don't make the same exceptions for staff members. Conflict-of-interest laws governing future employment after leaving Capitol Hill treat staff similarly to members of the House. Both House lawmakers and senior staff must take a "cooling-off" period after leaving their jobs on Capitol Hill before lobbying their former colleagues. (Senators are subject to a two-year cooling-off period, while staff follow the same one-year cooling-off period as House aides.)

"The rules in the House and the Senate on trading stock are very permissive, and essentially don't regulate members and staff who are trading in industries when they work on the committee overseeing those industries," said Kenneth Gross, who leads the political law practice at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee provides extra guidance on stock trading to staff in its committee handbook. The handbook tells employees to avoid potential conflicts of interest and err on the side of caution by consulting the House Ethics Committee with questions, according to an excerpt provided by a committee spokesperson.

Spokespeople for the House Energy and Commerce Committee and the Senate Judiciary and Appropriations Committees all declined to say what steps, if any, their staffers who trade stocks are making to comply with their Ethics Committee guidelines.

The Senate Appropriations Committee suggested that staffers are largely on their own: "Committee staff are responsible for adhering to Senate Ethics Committee rules and guidelines," committee spokesman Chris Gallegos wrote in an email.

Despite the public outrage earlier this year over Collins' and Price's trading, Congress has done little to address the rules that allowed the two members of the committee overseeing health care to buy and sell hundreds of shares of health care companies.

Congress rarely changes its ethics laws and rules. Historically, most changes were preceded by well-publicized scandals: The last major ethics reforms took place in 2006, for example, in the wake of the Jack Abramoff scandal, when lawmakers overhauled rules on what lobbyists have to disclose. And 2012's Stock Act, which explicitly barred lawmakers from insider trading, was passed in the wake of the jarring "60 Minutes" report that spotlighted Pelosi's trading.

Earlier this year — and five years after the Stock Act was passed — a POLITICO investigation found that while most lawmakers refrain from trading stocks, a small number frequently trade shares in companies they oversee in Congress. An analysis by Public Citizen this year similarly found that fewer lawmakers appear to be trading stocks, but a dedicated number of senators are regularly trading investments in industries that they partly oversee. POLITICO's findings on congressional aides who are regularly trading stocks raise further questions about whether the Stock Act put a sufficient check on conflicts of interest among lawmakers or their staff, watchdogs said.

Behind the scenes, reform groups have been shopping several proposals that would prevent lawmakers — and their aides — from engaging in such behavior. One idea floated by Issue One would ban lawmakers from trading stocks aside from mutual funds. This would ensure lawmakers have broadly diversified portfolios that they do not control. Public Citizen, meanwhile, would simply apply the much tougher conflict-of-interest rules that apply to the executive branch to members of Congress and their aides.

The groups say they have heard some interest from lawmakers — but no one has stepped forward to introduce either bill. Democrats have been focused on criticizing the Trump White House's apparent ethical lapses. And lawmakers haven't proposed other plans for overhauling the stock trading system — in part, ethics watchdogs say, because they haven't been sufficiently shamed into doing so by the public.

"The more embarrassing the story that comes out, the more pressure there is to do something," Noble said. "A lot of members do honestly believe they should not be trading in stock while they're working in legislation, [but] they may not feel as strongly about it" as the members who disagree.

EPA begins posting Pruitt's schedule Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/25/2017 11:09 AM EDT

EPA has begun posting a basic version of Administrator Scott Pruitt's schedule online in response to increased requests for his itinerary.

The posted records cover April 3 through Sept. 8. EPA previously released a more detailed version of Pruitt's February and March schedule in response to records requests from POLITICO and other outlets.

An EPA official said last week the schedule will be updated every two weeks. EPA posted a similarly basic schedule for Pruitt's predecessor, Gina McCarthy, typically on a daily basis.

SolarWorld to rehire 200 after trade decision Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/25/2017 12:43 PM EDT

SolarWorld Americas said it will begin hiring new employees as it ramps up production in the wake of Friday's decision by a federal trade panel in its favor.

The company aims to hire up to 200 workers by May, it announced today.

The Oregon-based company, which is owned by the German firm SolarWorld AG, said its decision was a response to the U.S. International Trade Commission's finding that firms had been injured by cheap imports of solar panels.

"Friday's determination made clear that the U.S. industry's problems have not been self-inflicted, but rather are the result of surging imports," Juergen Stein, CEO and president of SolarWorld Americas said in a statement. "As such, we at SolarWorld are prepared to scale up our world-class manufacturing operations to produce leading solar products made by more American workers."

SolarWorld is still in bankruptcy, but Stein had promised the commission it would increase production if it got a favorable ruling.

The case, originally brought by the Chinese-owned Suniva, is opposed by most of the U.S. solar industry, largely dominated by installers and developers. The commission will send recommendations for tariffs or quotes to the president next month, but President Donald Trump will have the final say.

WHAT'S NEXT: Participants in the case will file tariff proposals with the ITC by Wednesday, and the commission will hold a hearing on Oct. 3.

Republicans brace for failure on Obamacare repeal Back

By Burgess Everett and Josh Dawsey | 09/25/2017 11:32 AM EDT

Republicans in the Senate and White House are increasingly resigned to defeat in their final bid to repeal Obamacare this week, despite a flurry of last-second revisions meant to win over skeptical senators.

President Donald Trump seemed far more pessimistic on Monday morning than he had been last week, telling the "Rick & Bubba" radio show that he expected crippling opposition, calling it "disgusting" that party leaders can't pass a bill to repeal and replace the 2010 health law. Trump wants to continue the health care fight even though he is said to be resigned it will fail this time, a White House official said.

Meanwhile, the latest version of the bill by Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Bill Cassidy of Louisiana has not yet moved any of the "no" or undecided votes into the "yes" column.

"Well, I wish 'em luck. But I'm not convinced they have much of a chance," said Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch with a chuckle.

GOP leaders have yet to pull the plug on the effort, but a massive change in dynamics must occur in the sharply divided Senate for the Graham-Cassidy measure to pass.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is still opposed to the bill, an aide said on Monday morning. Arizona Sen. John McCain also has not changed his position, which hardened on Friday into a "no" vote against his close friend Graham's legislation.

And though the latest changes to the bill are intended to woo Sens. Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Susan Collins of Maine, Collins has not budged from her "lean no" stance, and Murkowski has yet to get on board.

The White House has actively negotiated with Murkowski, Paul and Collins but feels particularly dire about Collins. The White House official said they could get Paul, but it would cost other votes. "Collins doesn't want to vote 'yes' on this," this person said. "I'm not sure what we could do for her."

The president has told advisers that he is convinced that there will be political damage for the White House if they don't pass health care legislation.

Trump predicted Collins will oppose the bill, which along with McCain and Paul's opposition is enough to tank the legislation. With just 52 GOP senators, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) can only afford to lose two votes.

"We're going to lose two or three votes, and that's the end of that," Trump said on the Alabama-based radio show, in which he dinged McCain as "the only reason" the law is still around. He also referred to McConnell as unpopular.

Utah Sen. Mike Lee is still reviewing the bill, his office said. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz said Sunday he is not yet supportive of the legislation, and an aide said Monday his position has not changed even after the recent revisions. Some of the latest tweaks to Graham-Cassidy would further loosen Obamacare regulations in a bid to win over the two conservative Republicans.

Cruz aides said there had been an agreement last week that the bill's sponsors had backed away from to roll back more regulations to offer cheaper plans. "We thought we were there," said one aide. "It is our intent to to get to yes."

Graham and Cassidy's bill would block grant federal Obamacare funding to states and make deep cuts to Medicaid. Changes circulated on Capitol Hill on Sunday night would allow states more flexibility to eliminate federal insurance regulations and pump more resources toward Alaska, though critics argue the state would still receive less money than under Obamacare.

Murkowski opposed even debating previous iterations of repeal in the summer, but she is still engaging with Graham, Cassidy and other bill supporters this time around. Her sparsely populated and remote state faces high health care costs and unique challenges compared to other states.

Paul said Sunday he could support the bill with fewer regulations and far skimpier block grants to the states, though that position would likely turn off more centrist GOP senators.

Graham insisted on Sunday that Republicans will find the votes to repeal Obamacare.

But Capitol Hill Republicans are privately pessimistic about their chances of reversing the momentum against the bill ahead of a key Sept. 30 deadline to repeal the law by a party-line vote. The White House official said it was a "very uphill battle right now."

McConnell has not said whether he will force a failed vote on the floor, though in the past he has been reluctant to do so. Republicans also lack the votes to reopen debate on the bill, with many senators' offices noncommittal.

In a move perhaps intended to appeal to McCain, who has repeatedly called for consideration of the bill under "regular order, Republicans held a Finance Committee hearing on the bill Monday.

Critics of the bill were not mollified by the hearing, which was quickly disrupted by protests. Capitol Police dragged out nearly 20 protesters, most of whom were disabled and in wheelchairs.

The protest forced Hatch to temporarily suspend the hearing for roughly 15 minutes as the disability rights activists chanted, "No cuts to Medicaid, save our liberty."

Trump moves to get base 'stirred up' with NFL attacks Back

By Louis Nelson and Tara Palmeri | 09/25/2017 08:33 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Monday dug in on his feud with professional athletes, declaring on Twitter that "many people" booed the NFL players who kneeled during the national anthem, and denying that he's stoking racial tensions with his attacks.

Trump's clash with the NFL is extending into its fourth day, and while it's pulling attention from heated debates on health care and tax reform, those around the president say he sees the issue as a way to reconnect with his base.

"He knows it'll get people stirred up and talking about it," a senior administration official said.

The official added the Trump fears his supporters may be feeling neglected after he decided to not immediately cut off protections for undocumented young immigrants known as Dreamers and after he cut a deal with Democrats on the debt ceiling and government funding.

Chris Ruddy, the CEO of Newsmax and a longtime Trump friend, said on Monday that the president is focused on the patriotism angle of the debate and is brushing off the charges of racism.

"He's in a bubble here because he knows he's not a racist. His friends know he isn't," Ruddy said in an interview. "He sees himself standing on the high ground of the truth. But the media are telling the rest of the country a different story about him."

Trump first stoked the issue on Friday at a rally in Alabama, where he told the crowd "wouldn't you love to see one of these NFL owners, when somebody disrespects our flag, to say, 'get that son of a bitch off the field right now — he's fired.'" Trump's Twitter account was peppered with similar sentiments throughout the weekend, including one post in which he suggested that NFL ratings and attendance had dipped in part because "many stay away because they love our country."

On Monday, Trump showed no signs of backing down.

"Many people booed the players who kneeled yesterday (which was a small percentage of total). These are fans who demand respect for our Flag!" Trump tweeted. "The issue of kneeling has nothing to do with race. It is about respect for our Country, Flag and National Anthem. NFL must respect this!"

Trump's attention to the kneeling of NFL players during the national anthem — a silent protest against racial inequality in the U.S. — comes at the start of a week already brimming with other issues likely to require the president's attention, including last-ditch efforts on Capitol Hill to repeal and replace Obamacare, Tuesday's Senate primary runoff in Alabama, nuclear saber-rattling by North Korea and the ongoing recovery in Puerto Rico from Hurricane Maria.

Nonetheless, Trump is doubling down on his claims, and his aides have been defending him as a patriot, who is standing up against those who are disrespecting the millions of Americans who have fought to keep the country free.

"This isn't about the president being against anyone, but this is about the president and millions of Americans being for something, being for honoring our flag, honoring our national anthem and honoring the men and women who fought to defend it," press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said during the White House briefing on Monday.

Asked if the president regretted referring to a player who takes a knee during the national anthem as a "son of a bitch," the press secretary said, "I think that it's always appropriate for the president of the United States to defend our flag, to defend the national anthem and to defend the men and women who fought and died to defend it."

Sanders also denied that Trump is trying to start a culture war, and indicated that protests against racial inequality may be better directed at the law enforcement officials on the field.

"I think if the debate is really for them about police brutality, they should probably protest the officers on the field that are protecting them instead of the American flag," Sanders said.

She later clarified that she was not being literal with the remark. "I was kind of pointing out the hypocrisy of the fact that if the goal is and the message is that of police brutality, which they've stated, then that doesn't seem very appropriate to protest the American flag. I'm not sure how those two things would be combined."

The president's attacks only fueled protests across the league, with at least some players from nearly every team taking a knee during the anthem. Some stood with locked arms on the sidelines during the anthem, while the Seattle Seahawks, Tennessee Titans and Pittsburgh Steelers stayed in their locker rooms during the song. From the Steelers, only offensive lineman Alejandro Villanueva, a former Army Ranger who served in Afghanistan, stood in the tunnel with his hand on his heart during the anthem.

And while the NFL has borne the brunt of Trump's criticism, the president's national anthem-related focus wandered Monday morning to NASCAR, with the president praising the stock car racing league "and its supporters and fans. They won't put up with disrespecting our Country or our Flag - they said it loud and clear!"

Multiple team owners from NASCAR, which is especially popular in the South and in more rural parts of the U.S., took a tougher stance than those from the NFL, warning that they would fire crew members or drivers who protest during the anthem. The Associated Press reported that Sunday's race in New Hampshire appeared to be protest-free during the anthem.

Dale Earnhardt Jr., the recently retired NASCAR driver who nonetheless remains perhaps the sport's biggest star, weighed in Monday morning, writing on Twitter that "all Americans R granted rights 2 peaceful protests" and quoting former President John F. Kennedy, "those who make peaceful revolution impossible will make violent revolution inevitable."

In a statement, NASCAR affirmed the "right to peacefully express one's opinion."

"Our respect for the national anthem has always been a hallmark of our pre-race events. Thanks to the sacrifices of many, we live in a country of unparalleled freedoms and countless liberties, including the right to peacefully express one's opinion."

Trump's controversial remarks were met with an almost unanimously chilly reception from the NFL, including from league commissioner Roger Goodell, who called the president's message

"divisive," and New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft, who said he was "deeply disappointed" by the president's comments. Kraft is a longtime friend of Trump's who donated money to his inaugural committee and had dinner with him and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe last February at Mar-a-Lago.

Patriots star quarterback Tom Brady, who has said his friendship with Trump dates back to 2002 but who skipped a White House visit in April, called the president's remarks "just divisive." But Brady was unwilling to blame New England fans who booed his kneeling teammates before the Patriots' Sunday afternoon game against Houston, telling Boston sports talk radio station WEEI that "everyone has the right to do whatever they want to do. If you don't agree, that is fine. You can voice your disagreement, I think that is great."

"It's part of our democracy. As long as it is done in a peaceful, respectful way, that is what our country has been all about," Brady continued.

GOP senators unveil new 'Dreamers' bill Back

By Seung Min Kim | 09/25/2017 12:00 PM EDT

A new Senate GOP proposal is being released Monday that creates a pathway to legalization for so-called Dreamers, but it won't allow them to sponsor family members to the United States — one of several provisions that make the bill far more conservative than other relief measures for young undocumented immigrants.

The chief Republican writers of the bill — Sens. Thom Tillis of North Carolina and James Lankford of Oklahoma — have touted their plan as a more GOP-friendly vision for the fate of young undocumented immigrants in the United States, especially compared to the DREAM Act led by Sens. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

Tillis and Lankford hope their legislation, called the Succeed Act, can win support from conservatives as Congress scrambles for a fix following the White House's decision to begin revoking work permits and deportation protections early next year for hundreds of thousands of Dreamers.

Details of the bill, which is also sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), were obtained by POLITICO in advance of its release.

Under current law, green card holders can petition for close relatives such as a spouse or children to obtain permanent residency. But President Donald Trump has repeatedly slammed the concept of "chain migration," a term critics use to describe U.S. citizens or permanent residents sponsoring their foreign relatives to come to the United States.

"CHAIN MIGRATION cannot be allowed to be part of any legislation on Immigration!" Trump tweeted earlier this month.

Tillis and Lankford have tried to address that demand by barring Dreamers who would obtain green cards through their legislation from petitioning family members, although they would be able to sponsor them if they become citizens, according to a person familiar with the legislation.

Some of the nuts-and-bolts of the new GOP bill, which essentially creates a 15-year path to citizenship, are similar to other past proposals addressing the issue of young undocumented immigrants who came here as minors.

To be eligible under the Succeed Act, an immigrant must have been in the United States since June 15, 2012 — the start of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, the Obama-era executive action that Trump said he would end — and before the age of 16. They would be required to obtain a high school diploma, pass a "thorough" criminal background check, submit biometric data to the Department of Homeland Security and pay off any back taxes or establish a repayment plan.

This will give the Dreamers a "conditional permanent residence" status, which they have to maintain for 10 years until they can apply for a formal green card. In that status, the Dreamers must either earn a college degree, serve in the military for at least three years or be consistently employed.

The status must be renewed after five years. Once they obtain green cards, the immigrants are required to wait for five years until they can apply for U.S. citizenship, according to the legislation. Undocumented parents of Dreamers who would qualify under the new Republican bill are also barred from petitioning to stay in the United States based on their children's legal status.

Tillis, a first-term GOP senator who has expressed interest in immigration for some time, and Lankford have communicated with senior White House officials for several weeks on their bill and have gotten a positive reception, according to one Republican source familiar with their efforts.

Trump has agreed in principle with Democratic leaders in Congress on a DACA deal that would pair border security measures with legislation addressing Dreamers, although the details are far from fleshed out.

Democrats have said Trump has agreed to the DREAM Act, which is also backed by GOP Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Cory Gardner of Colorado. But many congressional Republicans are privately concerned that the DREAM Act is too closely associated with Democrats and would subsequently struggle to attract support from a substantial number of GOP lawmakers.

The legislation is written to help give cover to GOP lawmakers who want to sign onto a bill protecting Dreamers yet still seek some tougher immigration restrictions.

For example, their bill also includes provisions meant to curb future illegal immigration into the United States. It would require future temporary visa holders — such as people who come to the United States on worker or student visas — to sign a waiver that would otherwise grant them an immigration hearing or other immigration-related benefits if they violate the terms of their visa.

HOT (AND EXPENSIVE) IN HERE: Last year was the third hottest on record in 123 years of record-keeping, and the U.S. faced record-breaking losses from weather and climate disasters, NOAA said today. A NOAA study found that hurricanes, wildfires and other events did $306 billion worth of damage to the U.S. economy, factoring in destroyed property and lost business activity in affected areas, Emily Holden reports.

The most expensive storm of 2017 was Hurricane Harvey, with an estimated $125 billion in costs, followed by Hurricane Maria at $90 billion and Hurricane Irma at $50 billion. As for wildfires, they burned through more than 9.8 million acres in the West and caused close to $18 billion in damage, tripling the previous record. The U.S. in total saw 16 separate events with losses exceeding $1 billion each in 2017, tying a record set in 2011 for most billion-dollar disasters in a single year.

NOAA scientists also found the five warmest years on record for the U.S. all have occurred since 2006. Last year's average temperature clocked in at 54.6 degrees Fahrenheit. Read more.

FEDERAL ROLE CENTER IN WATER CASES: Supreme Court justices seemed open to expanding the role of the federal government in interstate water disputes today during oral arguments of two separate cases. The outcome of the cases could determine the role of agencies, like the Army Corps of Engineers and Bureau of Reclamation, when states cannot agree on how to share water from rivers that they share. In one case, Texas v. New Mexico and Colorado, the states are fighting over how much Rio Grande water New Mexico must deliver to its downstream neighbor, Annie Snider reports. The second case, Florida v. Georgia, is the latest iteration over a major river system that feeds the Atlanta region, as well as Florida's vital oyster fishery and agricultural interests in both states.

The federal government moved to join the Rio Grande case, Annie reports, but it is not a party in the Southeast water litigation — a fact that seemed to deeply frustrate the justices. "What should I do?" Justice Stephen Breyer repeatedly asked Edwin Kneedler, deputy solicitor general representing the U.S. in Florida v. Georgia. The Corps filed an amicus brief in the case, but without its full participation, Breyer said he could not be sure that Florida would receive extra supplies if Georgia conserved more water. MURRAY TURNED AWAY: The Supreme Court also opted out of hearing a case from coal producer Murray Energy seeking to force EPA to study coal job losses due to agency regulations, Alex Guillén reports. The court also declined to take up two other energy-related cases, one questioning the power of the Endangered Species Act to regulate animals within one state only and another challenging part of an Arizona air clean-up plan. It did not act on two other energy cases scheduled to be discussed at its regular conference last Friday: One on whether the threat of climate change is justification for ESA protections in the present, and one on the constitutionality of administrative law judges used at dozens of agencies.

COAL AS ICE: This past blast of Arctic weather caused some hiccups in coal deliveries, S&P Global Market Intelligence reports. The snap into sub-zero temperatures in the Eastern U.S. caused "frozen coal stuck in rail cars, mechanical problems with trains and equipment and ice on the rivers," the trade publication reported, citing two coal production sources. Anecdotes like those, plus scant evidence that natural gas availability caused utilities any headaches, could weigh on FERC's collective mind as it prepares a decision on Energy Secretary Rick Perry's "grid resiliency pricing" proposal to subsidize power companies that keep a 90-day supply of fuel on site to guard against a spike in demand, a requirement that could be met only by coal-fired and nuclear generators.

STEYER STAYS PUT: Billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer will not run for office in 2018; instead, he'll invest $30 million to help flip the House, POLITICO's Gabriel Debenedetti reports. "My fight is not just in California, my fight is in removing [President] Donald Trump from office, and from power," Steyer said today. The hedge fund manager-turned-activist plans to use his NextGen America political group to ramp up millennial turnout in 10 states, he said, singling out House Speaker Paul Ryan and Reps. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), and Barbara Comstock (R-Va.) as targets.

PUERTO RICO GETS 4 NEW ENERGY PROJECTS: Puerto Rico's federal oversight board has approved four energy projects meant to boost its ailing electrical supply, Pro Financial Services' Colin Wilhelm reports. Two of the projects would focus on renewable energy, another would focus on energy reserves and backup power generation for the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, and the fourth would work to reduce energy, water and other utility consumption. "Total investment in the projects will come close to $1.5 billion," Colin reports.

GERMANY NIXES 2020 CO2 TARGETS: German Chancellor Angela Merkel's conservatives and the center-left Social Democrats agreed today, during preliminary talks to form a government, that the country's 2020 climate goal was unrealistic. Reuters reports the two blocs decided that the goal to cut carbon dioxide emissions by 40 percent from 1990 levels by 2020 was not feasible. The parties instead said they would put together a plan to reach that goal in the early 2020s, and would stick to the country's 2030 goal of a 55 percent emissions reduction, POLITICO Europe's Emily Schultheis reports.

EPA STAFFS UP: EPA's new general counsel and top water official have arrived at the agency. Matthew Leopold was sworn in today as general counsel, according to a tweet from the office's official account. And the water office today tweeted its welcome to new Assistant Administrator for Water David Ross. Both men were confirmed by the Senate last month.

NEVER MIND: The Energy Department's general counsel nominee has withdrawn his nomination, according to his LinkedIn page. "I was one of many awaiting a final confirmation vote when the Senate adjourned before the holidays," wrote David Jonas, a partner at Fluet, Huber & Hoang, who was nominated in May and cleared the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee in September. "In considering the additional months that would be required for final confirmation, as well as my professional responsibilities at FH+H Law Firm, I respectfully and regretfully requested that my nomination be withdrawn from consideration."

BUNDY CASE DISMISSED: A federal judge in Las Vegas today dismissed a case against Nevada rancher Cliven Bundy, who led a 2014 armed standoff in a dispute with BLM. "Bundy, his two sons and a militia member will not face a retrial on charges that they led an armed rebellion against federal agents in 2014," AZCentral reports. The judge today said the federal prosecutors' conduct was "outrageous" and "violated due process rights" of the defendants and dismissed the charges against the four men "with prejudice," meaning they cannot face trial again, the website reports.

The executive director of the Center for Western Priorities said the decision to let "the Bundys walk free on a technicality should send a chill down the spines of anyone who values our parks, wildlife refuges, and all public lands." Jennifer Rokala said in a statement: "That an extremist like Bundy could blatantly break the law on national television and walk away scot-free will only embolden his followers who've threatened the lives and livelihoods of public land managers across the West."

NOAA: 2017 sets new record for costliest weather, climate disasters Back

By Emily Holden | 01/08/2018 12:52 PM EDT

The U.S. faced record-breaking losses from weather and climate disasters in 2017, the third-warmest year on record, the NOAA said today.

Hurricanes, wildfires and other events did $306 billion worth of damage to the U.S. economy, factoring in destroyed property and lost business activity in affected areas, according to the NOAA study. The most expensive storm was Hurricane Harvey, at an estimated $125 billion in costs, followed by Hurricane Maria at $90 billion and Hurricane Irma at $50 billion.

Wildfires burning more than 9.8 million acres in the West caused close to $18 billion in damage, tripling the previous record.

The nation saw 16 separate events with losses exceeding $1 billion each in 2017, tying a record set in 2011 for most billion-dollar disasters in a single year. In addition to the wildfires and hurricanes, NOAA's tally includes eight severe storms, two inland floods, a crop freeze and drought.

Congress has approved $52 billion for hurricane and wildfire recovery and is considering a package for \$81 billion more.

The second-costliest year for the U.S. was 2005, which brought $215 billion in losses, mainly from hurricanes Katrina, Wilma and Rita.

Temperatures for the contiguous U.S. in 2017 were 2.6 degrees Fahrenheit above the average for the 20th century, NOAA said.

Federal agencies reviewing climate science have concluded it is extremely likely that human activity is the dominant cause of that warming. President Donald Trump has expressed doubts about climate change, and his Cabinet is rolling back efforts to curb emissions.

Eric Wolff contributed to this report.

Justices seem ready to boost federal role in interstate water disputes Back

By Annie Snider | 01/08/2018 02:49 PM EDT

Supreme Court justices appeared inclined to give the federal government a seat at the table to help resolve interstate water disputes during oral arguments over a pair of long-running water wars Monday.

Justices heard arguments in two separate cases that could determine the role of federal agencies such as the Army Corps of Engineers and Bureau of Reclamation when states cannot agree how to share water from rivers that they share. In one case, Texas v. New Mexico and Colorado, the states are fighting over how much Rio Grande River water New Mexico must deliver to its downstream neighbor. The second, Florida v. Georgia, is the latest iteration in a long-running dispute over a major river system that feeds the booming metro Atlanta region, Florida's vital oyster fishery and agricultural interests in both states.

The federal government moved to join the Rio Grande case, but it is not a party in the Southeast water wars litigation — a fact that deeply frustrated the justices.

"What should I do?" Justice Stephen Breyer repeatedly asked Edwin Kneedler, deputy solicitor general representing the U.S. in Florida v. Georgia. The Army Corps of Engineers filed an amicus brief in the case, but without its full participation, Breyer said he could not be sure that Florida would receive extra supplies if Georgia conserved more water.

"Waive sovereign immunity, get into this, and try to help the special master reach an equitable solution," he told Kneedler.

State officials are closely watching both cases as climate change and booming populations stress water supplies not just in the arid West, but around the country. The job of divvying up water rights among farmers, cities, Native American tribes and other users has traditionally been the purview of the states, with the federal government taking a more limited role. Monday's cases test to what degree that balance can be maintained. Kansas filed an amicus brief in the Rio Grande case, and Colorado did so in the Florida-Georgia case, arguing that the decisions would set legal precedent important to them.

Both cases involve decades-long water disputes between states along river systems where the federal government plays a key management role. But court-appointed special masters, who are tasked with adjudicating the interstate disputes, came to opposing decisions in the two cases about how involved the federal government can and should be in resolving such cases.

In Texas v. New Mexico and Colorado, the U.S. intervened on the side of Texas, which argues that New Mexico is violating the 1939 Rio Grande Compact by allowing its residents to divert water from the river below a dam at Elephant Butte before it crosses the border. It was an unusual move by the Justice Department, which normally appears as an amicus rather than an intervening party, and special master A. Gregory Grimsal, a Louisiana attorney, wrote in an interim report last year that the U.S. had overstepped its bounds.

The question before the justices Monday was whether to accept Grimsal's opinion about the federal government's role, not the merits of Texas' claim against its upstream neighbor.

The U.S. has a number of interests in the fight: The federal government oversees the network of dams and reservoirs along the Rio Grande and has contracts to deliver water to users, and it is also obligated to deliver water across the border to Mexico under the terms of a separate treaty.

Attorneys for Colorado and New Mexico argued Monday that their beef is not with the federal government's involvement in the case, but with how it is attempting to participate. Instead of attempting to claim violations of the states' compact, to which it is not a party, the U.S. should pursue its interests under reclamation and treaty law, the states argued.

"If you read an implicit right here for the U.S. to raise a claim under the compact ... then I think you'd be opening up a dangerous door in which the U.S. can try to raise implicit rights not only in this compact, but in every compact across the country," said attorney Marcus Rael Jr., arguing for New Mexico.

Colorado's solicitor general, Frederick Yarger, contended that allowing the U.S. to bring compact claims would impede states' ability to use such agreements to settle claims "once and for all."

Indeed, Chief Justice John Roberts said he was "concerned" about the impact the decision in this case could have on other compacts.

But justices also repeatedly expressed concern about the federal government's ability to protect its own interests, and pointed to the fact that Congress had to ratify the compact.

"You have to think in a case like this that the approval of the compact was premised on an understanding that it would protect the United States' own interest, which is exactly what's at stake here," said Justice Elena Kagan.

In Florida v. Georgia, the U.S. took the opposite approach, declining to join the litigation when the Sunshine State sued its upstream neighbor in 2014. Florida argues that Georgia has done too little to rein in consumption along the Apalachicola-Chattahoochee-Flint River system, which originates north of Atlanta and ultimately feeds Apalachicola Bay, which then flows into the Gulf of Mexico. The Bay is home to Florida's prized oyster fishery, which has suffered due to low freshwater flows in recent years.

After the oyster fishery collapsed in 2012, Florida sued in an effort to cap Georgia's water consumption. But the suit did not name the Army Corps of Engineers, which manages a system of dams and reservoirs along the river system, and the Corps declined to voluntarily join the litigation between the two states.

After a six-week trial in 2016, special master Ralph Lancaster Jr., a Maine-based attorney, concluded that Florida had shown "real harm" and at least the "likely misuse of resources by Georgia," but said that without the involvement of the Army Corps of Engineers, there was no way to guarantee that a cap on the Peach State's consumption would result in more water for Florida.

Justices on Monday prodded Gregory Garre, the attorney representing Florida, for evidence that extra water made available by Georgia would make its way to the downstream state.

"You have common sense on your side," Kagan told Garre, "but there seems to be a real dearth of record evidence."

Garre argued that an order from the high court in favor of Florida would be part of the "constellation" of laws and regulations that the Corps uses to guide its operations along the river system, and Breyer agreed that it would be only logical for the Corps to send at least some of the water saved by Georgia under a conservation cap down to Florida. But Craig Primis, arguing for the Peach State, repeatedly said that wasn't necessarily true, and pointed out that Florida's water problem wasn't just one of quantity, but also one of timing.

"There's nothing common-sense about the operations of this basin. It's incredibly complex," he said.

At one point, Breyer burst out in frustration, "Why isn't the United States in this case?"

In neither case is the high court's ruling likely to be the end. If Texas, New Mexico and Colorado fail to reach a settlement, the case could go to trial once the question of the federal government's role is resolved. Meanwhile, additional litigation relating to the southeast water wars is already working its way through the courts. In March, the Army Corps of Engineers adopted its new Master Manual for the ACF river basin, and environmental groups sued in district court arguing the Corps failed to adequately account for environmental damage.

"This is a controversy that has been going on for decades over this river," said Gil Rogers, director of the Southern Environmental Law Center's Georgia and Alabama offices. "This is certainly the most high-profile chapter in the controversy, but it's not going to be the final, final word."

Supreme Court won't hear Murray appeal in coal jobs case Back

By Alex Guillén | 01/08/2018 10:04 AM EDT

The Supreme Court today declined to hear a case from coal producer Murray Energy seeking to force EPA to produce studies tracking coal job losses due to the agency's regulations.

The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals last year reversed a lower court and concluded that the study was included in a discretionary part of the Clean Air Act that courts cannot force EPA to follow. Administrator Scott Pruitt has promised to carry out the study and similar reviews regarding other sectors eventually, although the Trump administration opposed the tight timeline that had been ordered by the trial court given the difficulty of producing such a granular report.

The Supreme Court today also declined to take up two other energy-related cases, one questioning the Endangered Species Act's power to regulate animals that exist only within one state and another challenging part of an Arizona air clean-up plan.

The Supreme Court did not act on two other energy cases scheduled to be discussed at their regular conference last Friday. One challenges whether the future threat of climate change is justification for ESA protections in the present. The other deals with the constitutionality of administrative law judges used at dozens of agencies.

It is not clear why the court did not act, although it could indicate the justices are taking a closer look at those cases.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court will decide on the remaining cases at a later date.

Steyer to target Ryan, GOP incumbents in $30M midterms push Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti | 01/08/2018 11:30 AM EDT

Tom Steyer, the Democratic hedge fund manager-turned-activist, won't run for either senator or governor of California in 2018, instead investing $30 million in an effort to flip the House, he told reporters on Monday.

"My fight is not just in California, my fight is in removing Donald Trump from office, and from power," said Steyer, whose announcement won't dispel speculation that he might run for president in 2020.

Steyer plans to use his NextGen America political group to juice millennial voting numbers in 10 states, he said. He singled out House Speaker Paul Ryan (Wis.), Reps. Darrell Issa (Calif.), and Barbara Comstock (Va.) as targets.

The billionaire has been the biggest donor to Democrats in recent election cycles, to the tune of nearly $200 million. His national stature has grown recently with a series of straight-to-camera ads, calling for the impeachment of President Donald Trump. That campaign will continue, Steyer said, adding that he will be delivering copies of "Fire and Fury," the Michael Wolff book infuriating Trump's White House, to all congressional offices.

"We now know that the Oval Office cannot reshape a man who does not believe in constitutional democracy. We now know that the Republican Party will not cross a president who controls their base no matter what he says or does," he said at a news conference blocks from the Capitol. "By my count, Donald Trump has committed at least eight impeachable offenses."

Steyer has collected more than 4 million signatures during his impeachment petition drive — a push that some Democratic leaders have urged him to stop, calling it premature. That's given him a massive email list that could be converted into significant political influence. He also has urged individual Democratic leaders and candidates to stand for Trump's impeachment.

But his 2018 investment partially answers critics' questions about whether his money would be better spent on individual races.

Steyer has been playing heavily in races across the country in recent years, largely through his NextGen political group that initially was focused on climate issues. The group relaunched in 2016 with a broader mandate, not zeroing in on any one issue.

"We have taken a disastrous turn, and now we need to get back to a path to a just and prosperous future," he said.

Puerto Rico oversight board approves 4 energy projects Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 01/08/2018 12:42 PM EDT

Puerto Rico's federal oversight board has approved four energy projects meant to shore up the island's ailing electrical supply.

The projects all relate to the island's power grid, and would mostly use private financing. Total investment in the projects will come close to $1.5 billion. The board approved them under authority granted by Congress for infrastructure revitalization projects.

Two of the projects would focus on renewable energy, one wind, the other by using solid waste for energy generation. Another aims to provide energy reserves and backup power generation for the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, the commonwealth's electrical utility, which has received scrutiny and criticism for extended power outages following the two hurricanes that hit the island last fall.

A fourth aims to reduce energy, water and other utility consumption at government buildings and correctional facilities.

The comment period for the projects will run until Feb. 6. Comments can be registered here and will be publicly available on the board's website.

Nominee for DOE general counsel spot withdraws Back

By Darius Dixon | 01/08/2018 01:01 PM EDT

David Jonas, a partner at Fluet, Huber & Hoang, has withdrawn his nomination to be the DOE's general counsel, according to a post on his LinkedIn page today.

"I was one of many awaiting a final confirmation vote when the Senate adjourned before the holidays," wrote Jonas, who was nominated in May and cleared the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee in September. "In considering the additional months that would be required for final confirmation, as well as my professional responsibilities at FH+H Law Firm, I respectfully and regretfully requested that my nomination be withdrawn from consideration."

During his nomination hearing, Jonas faced pointed questions from lawmakers about his opposition to women and gay people serving in the military. He had previously held general counsel jobs at DOE's National Nuclear Security Administration and the Defense Nuclear Facilities Safety Board.

Jonas will also leave his post as a senior adviser to Energy Secretary Rick Perry.

How Trump's HHS nominee's drug company 'gamed' a patent Back

By Sarah Karlin-Smith | 01/08/2018 05:00 AM EDT

When Donald Trump's nominee for HHS secretary was a top executive at Eli Lilly, the patent on its blockbuster Cialis was soon to expire.

So Lilly tested it on kids.

The drugmaker believed the erectile dysfunction drug might help a rare and deadly muscle-wasting disease that afflicts boys. The drug didn't work — but under a law that promotes pediatric research, Lilly was able to extend the Cialis patent anyway for six months — and that's worth a lot when a medication brings in over $2 billion a year.

Critics say the brand-name drugmakers are "gaming" the patent system, finding all sorts of ways to protect monopolies and delay competition from generics. And Alex Azar — the former president of Eli Lilly's U.S. operations, now poised to become the top U.S. health official — professes to oppose such tactics.

But the tension between his past actions as a drug executive and his likely future as the nation's top health official are evident in both the Cialis story and in Lilly's tripling of the price of insulin.

Questions about his commitment to rein in skyrocketing drug costs, an unfulfilled Trump campaign pledge, are likely to dominate his confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee on Tuesday. The full Senate is likely to vote on his nomination to lead the Department of Health and Human Services late this month. He'd succeed Tom Price, who resigned after a taxpayer-funded travel scandal.

Azar himself told the Senate HELP panel in November that "we have to fight gaming in the system of patents and exclusivity by drug companies. I have always been an opponent of abuse and gaming of the patent systems by drug companies."

As a drug company executive, Azar's job was to find treatments and make money. The Cialis experiment was legal, and Lilly's competitors engage in similar practices. As the nation's top health official — the first drug executive to become HHS secretary, if confirmed — he might have different imperatives.

Critics, however, say that his record at Lilly crossed lines and should be disqualifying. Azar "gamed the patent system to protect Eli Lilly's taxpayer-funded profits under the guise of helping sick kids," said Tyson Brody, research and investigations director of the left-leaning Democracy Forward.

HHS officials handling communication for the nominee, who is likely to be confirmed, declined to comment, deferring to Eli Lilly. But Azar's mostly Republican supporters, noting he was well-regarded in high-level HHS jobs in the George W. Bush administration before joining Lilly, say Azar understands the system from inside and out. They say that makes him particularly well-suited to address skyrocketing drug prices.

The pediatric exclusivity law — the one that eventually encouraged Lilly to give kids a sex drug — was enacted about 20 years ago with the best of intentions. Drugs don't work the same in children as they do in adults, and companies needed incentives to do costly studies. In addition, the law encouraged drugmakers to do more research on rare disorders.

Lilly tested Cialis on Duchenne muscular dystrophy. Its competitor Pfizer tested Viagra in children with a lung disorder. Neither found a cure — Viagra was more likely to harm children than to help them — but both boosted their bottom line.

Lilly didn't hide its financial interest. The company's public discussion of testing Cialis in children centered around the likely financial perks of having a longer monopoly on the drug for use in adults — not the promise of a new treatment for seriously ill children. In fact, sometimes the company openly highlighted that it could get the financial benefits, even if the pediatric trial failed.

"The key purpose of these studies is to do relevant clinical trials done in in the pediatric population. And the studies do not necessarily have to be positive," Lilly's then Research and Development Chief Jan Lundberg said at a health care conference in March 2016.

And while Lilly did this work, it was also pushing the government on other fronts to keep the price of Cialis high — and delaying the availability of cheaper generics.

In November 2016, attorneys for Lilly and United Therapeutics wrote a letter to the federal Health Resources and Services Administration — which would fall under Azar's purview as HHS secretary — pushing back against a proposed rule that imposed strict penalties against companies that raise the price of a drug faster than the rate of inflation. The policy would have forced companies to sell some drugs to nonprofit and safety-net hospitals that treat lots of low-income people for as little as a penny.

Cialis sales would likely have taken a big hit if that rule had ever been finalized. According to United Therapeutics, which helps Lilly sell a version of Cialis for a lung condition, Lilly regularly raised the wholesale price of the drug multiple times a year, usually by 9 percent or 10 percent, far outpacing inflation. The Obama-era rule was still in the pipeline — not yet in effect — when Trump took office, and the new administration nixed it.

While Azar may have acted aggressively to protect profits at Lilly, his supporters argue that his record at HHS under Bush reflects a commitment to promoting cheaper medicines. For instance, as HHS general counsel in 2002, he helped push forward an FDA rule on generics that was designed to close loopholes. It made it harder for brand-name drug companies to keep cheaper versions off the market through tactics like filing new patents on old drugs.

And some health policy experts argue that the 1997 pediatric patent extension law is still important. Even when a drug trial fails, it can advance science. The Cialis pediatric tests were designed to help youths with Duchenne muscular dystrophy, which has no cure and kills many by young adulthood. "The pediatric exclusivity scheme is specifically designed to hold out an extremely attractive carrot for research that would not otherwise be done. This works only if the exclusivity is awarded regardless of outcome; the prize is for research, not specific results," said Erika Lietzan, an FDA-focused lawyer at the University of Missouri who spent many years representing drug companies in Washington.

Lietzan also notes that FDA has to sign off on these studies from the start if the company is seeking the pediatric patent extension. That helps ensure that studies are conducted only if there is scientific merit and that companies follow through on the research. They can't just fake it and claim the extra six months on patent.

Lilly had a reason to believe Cialis might help children with Duchenne. Earlier research had found that the drug increased blood flow to the muscles of men with another type of muscular dystrophy. Lilly told POLITICO it initiated the Duchenne study based on requests from patient advocacy groups and leading scientists who thought Cialis might slow the decline, preserving the youths' ability to walk for at least some time.

The additional patent protection granted for pediatric studies "is critical to encouraging society's understanding of how medicines can be used safely and effectively in children," Lilly's communications director J. Scott MacGregor told POLITICO. Before Congress created those patent extensions, more than 80 percent of drugs approved in adults were being used in children, without any knowledge of whether the medicines would help or harm them, Lilly said. By 2013, that had been reduced to about 50 percent.

But others have raised concerns that drugmakers are gaming the pediatric program to maximize profits, not cures. A recent study of 200 drug trials led by Tulane University's health policy director found that companies prioritized pediatric studies for drugs with high U.S. sales, and that they are more likely to launch these studies for older drugs with time running out on their patent.

Harvard drug price expert Aaron Kesselheim has similar concerns. "Pediatric trials have been conducted on a number of products with marginal public health importance for children, and the drugs most frequently used by children have been underrepresented; instead pediatric exclusivity studies have tended to involve drugs that were both popular and profitable in the market for adults," he wrote in the New England Journal of Medicine.

That doesn't mean Lilly did anything wrong when studying Cialis in kids, Kesselheim told POLITICO. But it would just make more sense, he said, to directly fund the best pediatric research, rather than to use this roundabout system that keeps prices high and makes consumers pay more.

The intricacies of pediatric patent extensions aren't likely to dominate the Finance Committee hearing. But questions about where Azar's loyalties lie — with drugmakers or patients — are likely to be aired.

"I told you in my office you've got some convincing to make me believe that you're going to represent the American people and not big pharma," Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) told Azar at his November HELP committee hearing. "And I know that's insulting, and I don't mean it to be, because I'm sure you're an honest and upright person.

"But we all have our doubts, because big pharma manipulates the system to keep prices high," Paul added. "We have to really fix it, and I — you need to convince those of us who are skeptical that you'll be part of fixing it and won't beholden to big pharma."

Bannon finds his regrets aren't good enough for Trump Back

By Annie Karni | 01/07/2018 08:01 PM EDT

Steve Bannon, like his onetime brother-in-arms President Donald Trump, is known as someone whose instinct is to double down, not kiss up.

That made his belated attempt on Sunday to de-escalate mounting tension with the commander in chief — who had been publicly and privately raging about his former chief strategist all week — notable to many of his allies, one of whom called it a "huge step for Steve, one of the most stubborn people on earth."

But inside the White House, Bannon's 297-word statement of contrition about comments he made in Michael Wolff's book "Fire and Fury: Inside the Trump White House" was seen as too little, too late for an operative unaware of the self-inflicted damage his hubris could cause.

It did nothing to quell Trump's rage at his former chief strategist or the anger of Bannon's former West Wing colleagues, according to multiple administration officials, who said the vibe in the president's circle was that people were unmoved by the statement. Asked whether there is anything Bannon can do at this point to get back in the president's good graces, one White House official said curtly, "Unlikely."

That posture has left Bannon supporters wondering whether the three-shirt-wearing bomb-thrower can switch the layers out for a hair shirt long enough to stop Trump from siding permanently with House Speaker Paul Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell — or whether Bannon's populist wing of the Republican Party has already run out of time to maintain influence in this year's midterm elections.

"The problem for Steve is that we were already into January 2018, and he doesn't really have a system, he doesn't have a fund, he doesn't have a political team," said Matthew Schlapp, chairman of the American Conservative Union, whose wife works in the White House communications department. "Now it's going to take extra time to make things up, if he's able to, and repair the trust he had with the president. The clock is no longer on his side."

A Republican pollster and operative with close ties to the White House marveled at the terrible timing of Bannon's feud with Trump. "It happens after taxes, before the Camp David meeting this weekend," the operative said, noting that McConnell and Ryan were both spending quality time with Trump during the peak of his Bannon frustration, shortly after celebrating their first big legislative victory. "He couldn't have picked a worse day on the calendar for this to happen. The swamp won."

Bannon's influence, the operative predicted, will be zilch in the coming 2018 midterms, with no recruitment plan or financial backing to offer establishment-challenging outsider candidates. The operative, who has polled Bannon's name ID in states like Alabama, said his image was 40 percent positive, 20 percent negative among Republican primary voters before the feud. "Now he's going to be 20 to 40 — or worse," the operative predicted.

Meanwhile, the "establishment" wing of the party was cheering the downfall of the anti-McConnell avatar. "This is a bigger win for the president, for whom Bannon is now less able to create problems and now unlikely to give the president continued bad advice in late-night phone calls," Karl Rove, the former chief strategist for President George W. Bush, said in an email on Sunday night. "Bannon shredded his biggest claim, that he was the president's leader on the outside, the keeper of the flame who had discarded the 'influence' of being a mere staffer for the 'power' of being the leader of the nationalist populist movement."

In issuing the statement that Bannon crafted himself — in which he expressed "regret" about his five-day delay in reacting to what he called "inaccurate reporting" regarding Donald Trump Jr. and professed undying fealty to the president and his agenda — Bannon was hoping to ratchet down what has become an untenable position for him.

He stalled in speaking out, friends said, in part because he didn't remember making the comments attributed to him in the Wolff tome — Bannon reportedly called a June 2016 meeting at Trump Tower with a Russian lawyer "treasonous" and speculated that special counsel Robert Mueller would "crack Don Jr. like an egg" — but also because the president beat him to the punch by criticizing him on Twitter.

But over the past week, mulling his options, Bannon has been most concerned with clarifying his comments about Trump Jr. and uncharacteristically "de-escalating the tension," an ally said.

He was less concerned with making peace with his White House nemeses Jared Kushner and Ivanka Trump — and doesn't mention either of them in his statement.

His Sunday statement said his comments to Wolff were meant to be critical of onetime campaign chief Paul Manafort — who also attended the Trump Tower meeting — not the president's son.

Meanwhile, Trump has done the opposite of de-escalating, finally letting loose on an over-empowered aide whom many have been urging him to dump on publicly for months. Over the past week, he derided his ex-strategist as "Sloppy Steve" on Twitter and in a news conference conducted from Camp David. There, a jeans-clad McConnell stood with Trump like the victor in a fight for the soul of the Republican Party.

Bannon was also dropped by his benefactor, Rebekah Mercer, and his future at the helm of his website, Breitbart News, remains a question mark, even as he grinds on to the next immigration policy fight.

"It would have been great if that apology had been at the beginning of the week," added Schlapp. "Waiting to the end was a big setback."

One Bannon ally said he was surprised to see the statement at all, figuring you either speak publicly immediately or don't speak out at all.

While Bannon may be at a low point and the morale at Breitbart might be sinking, there was a silver lining, according to the close ally. "You'll see a more serious Bannon come out of this," the ally said.

And there were still some voices willing to speak up for him, despite his fall from grace.

"If there is anyone, like Bannon, who is a strong supporter of Israel and a strong fighter against anti-Semitism and that person ends up having less influence on the administration," said Mort Klein, president of the Sheldon Adelson-funded Zionist Organization of America, "that is something that would sadden me."

Andrew Restuccia contributed to this report.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Chatterjee not giving up on interim rule — Hamm joins pro-Trump group's board — Offshore drilling plan on tap Tuesday
Date: Monday, December 11, 2017 4:20:14 PM

By Eric Wolff | 12/11/2017 04:18 PM EDT

With help from Anthony Adragna, Matt Daily, and Ben Lefebvre

CHATTIN' WITH CHATTERJEE: FERC Commissioner Neil Chatterjee, who gave up his interim chairman title last week, is still hoping to make his dream of an interim rule to save coal and nuclear plants come to reality. But he acknowledged that the short-term rule would have to thread a difficult policy needle he has not yet figured out, and he told the audience at an Axios event this morning that his top priority now is assessing the long-term reliance of the electric grid. "I still would like to get consensus on an interim step but it's complicated," he told reporters after his speech. He added, "I myself said things had to be legally defensible and not distort markets."

New FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre last week secured a 30-day extension to respond to Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposed grid rule, giving the commission until Jan. 10 to decide how to proceed.

Battery storage behind? Chatterjee told the audience at the Axios event that the battery storage rule FERC has been working on is farther behind than he expected it would be. Chatterjee had promised Sens. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) that he'd advance the rule, which would pay battery operators for services they provide the grid. "I intend to fulfill those commitment, it's just these major undertakings are complex and take time. I'm confident we'll get a result, it's just hard to say what time," he said.

Hi Kevin! Hi Neil! Chatterjee was away last week, so he said he would meet McIntyre as fellow commissioner for the first time today. He expects the grid rule to come up in their conversation.

HAMM JOINS PRO-TRUMP GROUP: Oil tycoon Harold Hamm, CEO of Continental Resources, joined the board of director for America First Policies, a nonprofit group that supports President Donald Trump's policies. The group has made an effort to pull together high level Trump supporters with access to Trump's Cabinet, including Perry, as POLITICO reported last month.

OFF SHORE PLAN DEETS TUESDAY: Trump will unveil the administration's new five-year drilling plan Tuesday, multiple sources told AE. Details are still scarce, but a few sources said they expect the plan to aggressively push for more drilling in federal waters. Tuesday's plan will conclude the process Trump kicked off with his April 28 executive order. We'll still have to see how much appetite oil and gas companies will have for offshore drilling in federal waters in the current era of cheap oil prices — a lease sale for all available acres in the Gulf of Mexico earlier this year pulled in just over half the bids generated in a 2016 sale offering acres in just the central Gulf region.

HOW DEEP CAN WE MINE? Much has been written about the exploding value of bitcoin over the past several weeks and the dramatic increase in the amount of energy the cryptocurrency miners are gobbling up. But Newsweek reports that Digiconomist puts it in even starker terms: At the current rate of energy consumption growth, bitcoin mining will use all the world's energy by late 2020. That's based on sustaining the 25-percent jump in energy consumption over the last month — which is improbable, to say the least. Still, since the machines creating bitcoins right now are consuming an estimated 32.6 terawatt-hours of power a year and are heavily reliant on coal-fired power generation in China, the virtual currency is certainly having a real world impact.

THE SUPREMES WON'T PLAY THAT ONE: The Supreme Court today declined to hear a case involving EPA's enforcement of a key air permitting program, Alex Guillén reports. The lawsuit was brought by utility DTE Energy after EPA prosecuted the company for violating preconstruction permitting requirements, under which the company should have informed authorities before beginning a major project at one of its power plants. The ruling leaves in place a 6th Circuit opinion which grants EPA prosecutorial discretion. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt last week issued a memo on this topic, noting that EPA will not pursue similar prosecution in the future unless actual emissions increase, and will not "second guess" industry's preconstruction projections of emissions impacts, Pruitt wrote.

IDSAL FOR EPA REGION 6: Pruitt has named Anne Idsal, a deputy land commissioner for the Texas General Land Office, to be regional administrator for EPA's Region 6, the agency said today, Emily Holden reports. The South Central region covers New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana.

The more you know: Idsal's mom, Katharine Armstrong, a well-known Republican donor, owned the ranch where then-Vice President Dick Cheney shot his companion in a hunting accident.

TOP OF THE NINTH: The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will hear both lawsuits over EPA's two major implementation rules for the 2016 update to the Toxic Substances Control Act, a small victory for environmentalists and public health advocates who had pushed for the San Francisco-based court to handle the litigation, Alex also reports this morning. Cases had been filed in both the 9th Circuit and the Richmond, Va.,-based 4th Circuit. The 9th circuit declined to release its cases, and last week EPA said it preferred to consolidate the cases into a single circuit.

MACRON PUTS HIS #MPGA WHERE HIS MOUTH IS: French President Emmanuel Macron is following through on his Make this Planet Great Again pledge, by facilitating climate research on French soil, POLITICO Europe's Sara Stefanini and Nicholas Vinocur report. He unblocked €30 million ($35.4 million) for grants and approving applications for 90 candidates to work at France's elite National Center for Scientific Research out of some 250 climatologists who applied online. The government chose 18 scientists for €20 million ($23.6 million) in grants last month, around half of them from the U.S., and will announce their names at the One Planet Summit.

THEM METERS DONE GOT SMART: The Institute for Electric Innovation is out with a new report estimating 76 million smart meters will be installed throughout the country by the end of the year and installations are expected to hit 90 million by 2020. The group further says 40 electric companies have fully deployed the technology and 50 more are actively installing it. Link here.

USING THEIR (DRILLING) PULPIT: More than 50 African-American church leaders sent a letter today to congressional leaders urging them to remove provisions opening ANWR to oil and gas drilling from their final tax package. "We may live far from Alaska, but our plight as African Americans is one and the same, and thus the call to protect the land of the Gwich'in, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, is a common cause," they wrote.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Pro-Trump group courts donors with Cabinet access Back

By Maggie Severns | 11/10/2017 03:22 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry will headline an intimate gathering of high-powered business executives in Texas next week for the pro-Trump outside group America First Policies, the first in a series of "roundtable discussions" giving donors face time with top Trump officials.

The Houston event featuring Perry, detailed in an invitation sent to a Republican donor and obtained by POLITICO, will include roughly 30 people and cover topics from energy policy to the Trump administration's broader agenda, America First spokeswoman Erin Montgomery said. Perry will not solicit donations from the attendees at the Monday event, which would be a violation of federal law — but America First officials plan to ask for contributions after Perry leaves the room.

The event highlights the cozy and growing ties between officials in President Donald Trump's administration and outside allies spending millions of dollars pushing administration policies this year. America First is brandishing its relationships with government officials to establish itself as the White House's preferred outside ally, among a mass of pro-Trump groups that have popped up this year.

In addition to holding more roundtable events, America First Policies recently held conference calls featuring White House Legislative Affairs Director Marc Short, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and Rep. Erik Paulsen, all key players on tax reform. America First leaders also huddled with White House officials recently.

America First Policies and its affiliated super PAC, America First Action, plan to raise and spend $100 million supporting Trump's agenda in the next year. Super PACs are not permitted to coordinate with candidates and there are strict rules governing Cabinet officials' political activities. But there is a loophole: Perry and others can participate in events put on by America First's nonprofit policy arm, which is legally separate from the super PAC even though the same officers run both groups.

"As long as the super PAC and the 501(c)(4) each stays in its own lane they can both operate under the same umbrella," said Brett Kappel, a campaign finance lawyer and partner at Akerman LLP.

But campaign finance reform advocates said the arrangement crosses an ethical line.

"This is all part of the very close coordination we're seeing between the campaign itself and what's supposedly an outside group," said Craig Holman, the government affairs lobbyist at the good-government group Public Citizen. The activities constitute "coordination in anyone's definition except for the Federal Election Commission's," he said.

Perry is an ideal ambassador for America First Policies in Texas, where the former governor has deep ties to the energy industry and donors who fueled his state campaigns as well as two presidential bids.

An Energy Department spokesperson did not return a request for comment. Perry was in France this week meeting with energy leaders from other countries. He is slated to attend a similar meeting in Texas on Monday, prior to the America First event, with leaders from Canada and Mexico.

America First was silent for much of this year and went through multiple staff shakeups, but has recently been working to restore its original position as the central group backing Trump's agenda.

But it has competition. Future45, which supported Trump during the 2016 elections with funding from casino billionaire Sheldon Adelson and the Ricketts family, announced a project that will spend in the tens of millions of dollars promoting tax reform earlier this month. Great America PAC, which is affiliated with former White House strategist Steve Bannon, began endorsing 2018 candidates in recent days.

Great America PAC's support for Roy Moore broke from Trump's support for Sen. Luther Strange in Alabama. America First plans to stay closely aligned with Trump and Trump's agenda, which Texas businessman Roy Bailey said could be a differentiator.

"We're not second-guessing anything; we're totally confident in [Trump's] ability to lead this nation and we're supporting him and the vice president," said Bailey, who is involved with America First.

That message has intrigued Texas-based energy executive Dan Eberhart, who said he hasn't yet made a donation to America First but is "interested in what they have to say."

"A lot of people who supported Republicans in 2016 are frustrated with the way things have turned out," Eberhart said. "If the Republican establishment won't support the president's agenda, we need alternatives who will."

Supreme Court won't hear case over air permit prosecution Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/11/2017 10:11 AM EDT

The Supreme Court today declined to hear a case involving EPA's enforcement of a key air permitting program.

The lawsuit was brought by utility DTE Energy after EPA prosecuted the company for violating preconstruction permitting requirements, under which the company should have informed authorities before beginning a major project at one of its power plants. The company complained that its measured emissions never actually increased once the project was complete.

The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled earlier this year that emitters can be prosecuted for preconstruction violations even if post-project emissions never actually increased. Today's rejection of the appeal by the Supreme Court leaves that ruling in place.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt last week issued a memo on this topic, noting that while the 6th Circuit said EPA has prosecutorial discretion in this type of enforcement. EPA will not pursue similar prosecution in the future unless actual emissions increase, and will not "second guess" industry's preconstruction projections of emissions impacts, Pruitt wrote.

WHAT'S NEXT: Pruitt has formed a task force to review and potentially revise the air permitting program.

EPA won't 'second guess' industry emissions projections in permitting program Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/08/2017 02:38 PM EDT

EPA will now defer to industry analyses on whether major projects will be subject to an important air permitting program, Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a Dec. 7 memo.

The change comes amid the Trump administration's review of the permits under the New Source Review program.

The Clean Air Act requires the owners of power plants and other emitters to study whether major upgrades to facilities will increase pollution. If so, the company must obtain an NSR permit from EPA, a process industry says is timely and costly.

Pruitt wrote that as long as companies follow the rules for how to project emissions, then "EPA does not intend to substitute its judgment for that of the owner or operator by 'second guessing'" a company's analysis. EPA will also allow companies to include in their projections any plans to "actively manage future emissions ... on an ongoing basis," which could make it easier for companies to avoid the permitting program.

In addition, Pruitt said EPA will not prosecute any companies whose analyses show they did not have to obtain permits unless measured emissions actually increase afterward, contrary to their projections.

The Supreme Court is considering whether to hear a lawsuit brought by utility DTE regarding these policies. The Trump administration urged the justices not to take the appeal, thus leaving in place a lower court ruling that EPA may — but does not have to — prosecute companies for not properly obtaining a permit if their real-world emissions did not increase afterward.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Supreme Court could say as early as Monday whether it will take the DTE appeal. In the meantime, EPA has formed an NSR task force to consider reforms to the program.

EPA appoints Anne Idsal as Region 6 administrator Back

By Emily Holden | 12/11/2017 11:09 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has named Anne Idsal, a deputy land commissioner for the Texas General Land Office, to be regional administrator for EPA's Region 6, the agency said today.

The South Central region covers New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana.

Idsal has been chief clerk and deputy land commissioner for nearly three years, according to her LinkedIn profile. Before that she was general counsel for the office and for the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality. She also served as special counsel and executive assistant to TCEQ Chairman Bryan Shaw.

Idsal interned for the Northern District of Texas and Texas Supreme courts. She also served as legal assistant for the Senate Judiciary Committee under Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas).

Both TSCA rule challenges to be heard in 9th Circuit Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/11/2017 11:54 AM EDT

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will hear both lawsuits over EPA's two major implementation rules for the 2016 update to the Toxic Substances Control Act, a small victory for environmentalists and public health advocates who had pushed for the Western court to handle the litigation.

The Richmond, Va.,-based 4th Circuit Court of Appeals had been assigned all three lawsuits over EPA's evaluation rule, which determines how the agency will review chemicals under the law. The San Francisco-based 9th Circuit, meanwhile, was assigned the litigation over EPA's prioritization rule, which determined how EPA will pick which chemicals to review.

Both EPA and the environmentalists suing over the rules sought to have the cases moved to the same court — the 9th Circuit for green groups, the 4th Circuit for EPA. The 9th Circuit last month declined to release the suits over the prioritization rule. Last week EPA said that it would prefer to have both cases in the same jurisdiction, paving the way for today's order from the 4th Circuit to move the evaluation rule lawsuits to the 9th Circuit.

WHAT'S NEXT: The 9th Circuit will take briefs in both cases and hear arguments over the rules, likely sometime next year. The cases could be assigned to the same panel of judges given the similar legal issues.

Alabama Senate race hurtles to a dramatic finish Back

By Gabriel DeBenedetti | 12/11/2017 02:06 PM EDT

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — On the day before voters cast their votes in Alabama's roller-coaster Senate special election, Democrat Doug Jones is enlisting last-minute help from former President Barack Obama, while Republican Roy Moore is expected to emerge from hiding at a final-hour rally with Steve Bannon.

The anticipation surrounding the highest-profile special election in years grew with a surprise poll from Fox News showing Jones ahead by double-digits — defying a slew of other surveys that had Moore clinging to a narrow lead.

While Moore prepped for an evening rally with Bannon, the former White House chief strategist and right-wing provocateur, Jones' campaign is circulated robocalls from Obama and former Vice President Joe Biden.

The flurry of 11th-hour activity was a fitting conclusion to a race that has captivated the country, with the possibility of Democrats picking off a coveted Senate seat in deep-red territory against a Republican accused of preying on teenagers as a man in his 30s. The contest has exposed some painful rifts in the Republican Party that have yet to heal during Donald Trump's tenure in the White House.

But it has also raised questions about Democrats' ability to win over African-American voters without Obama on the ballot, especially in Southern states where tough voter ID laws already make such turnout operations difficult.

Speaking to reporters at Chris Z's, a diner in Birmingham, on Monday, Jones dismissed the polling discrepancies and tried pivoting back to local matters by saying he cares for polls just as much as Nick Saban and Gus Malzahn, the coaches for the nationally-ranked University of Alabama and Auburn University football teams.

Still, Jones was careful not to confirm that Obama had recorded a supportive message for him, hyper-vigilant about appearing to accept support from such a controversial figure in such an overwhelmingly Republican state.

"The only robo-call I know about for sure is the one from my wife," he said.

Appearing at his first of three planned events Monday, Jones immediately reminded the press of comments made by Sen. Richard Shelby, the longtime Alabama Republican who reiterated on Sunday that he had written in a candidate rather than vote for Moore.

Jones' campaign on Sunday quickly turned two clips of Shelby denouncing Moore into digital ads, and it kept a television spot featuring similar comments in rotation for the closing stretch. In order to win in a state that hasn't elected a Democrat to the Senate since Shelby himself in 1992 — before he switched parties — Jones' team is counting on conservatives turned off by Moore to either vote for him or write in a third option.

Pushing the write-in option, Democratic super PAC American Bridge on Sunday began targeting persuadable Republican voters with a digital ad urging them to back Saban. The editorial board of AL.com, a large newspaper group in the state, chipped in on Sunday as well, urging conservatives to follow Shelby's lead.

Moore, who disappeared from the campaign trail over the weekend to watch the Army-Navy football game in Philadelphia, according to Republicans close to his campaign, has spent the closing hours aiming to shore up his own support among the GOP base.

Declining to appear in public for days before Monday's rally — he even skipped church on Sunday — Moore instead stuck to friendly radio programs, while his allies bombarded local airwaves and screens with anti-Jones ads highlighting the Democrat's support for abortion rights and lashing him to the national party.

After Trump rallied for Moore just over the border in Pensacola, Fla. late last week, he also recorded a robo-call for the candidate. And joining the pro-Trump America First Action super PAC that has disclosed spending over $1 million for Moore this month, the Republican National Committee recently resumed its support for the candidate after earlier pulling out of a joint fundraising agreement with him.

Still, that move has not sat well with many Republicans aligned with the party establishment.

In Monday, Nebraska RNC committeewoman Joyce Simmons resigned from the group.

"I strongly disagree with the recent RNC financial support directed to the Alabama Republican Party for use in the Roy Moore race. There is much I could say about this situation, but I will defer to this weekend's comments by Senator Shelby," she emailed fellow committee officials.

The move reflected one of Moore's central challenges: winning over pro-Trump Republicans who remain skeptical of him.

Solution Fund, a pro-Moore super PAC, on Monday emailed supporters asking for a final financial push making specifically that pitch.

"Hundreds of thousand[s] of voters that voted last November to stop Hillary Clinton did not vote in the September Alabama Senate Primary," the note read. "Our focus through election closing on Tuesday is to get these voters to polls."

Tax cuts alone won't cover full cost of GOP plan, Treasury says Back

By Bernie Becker | 12/11/2017 11:48 AM EDT

The Treasury Department said Monday that the GOP tax plan currently before Congress would need an assist from other Trump administration priorities to pay for itself.

Tax cuts alone aren't enough, Treasury said in a one-page analysis, citing welfare reform and infrastructure spending as additional boosts to the economy.

The analysis assumes that an economy led by Republicans would boost revenues by $1.8 trillion over a decade — more than enough to pay for the roughly $1.5 trillion in tax cuts envisioned by Republicans.

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin has been saying for months that his department would produce an analysis that proved the tax cuts would be fully paid for, and other top Republicans like Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell have insisted they have no doubt that would be the case.

The White House drew some criticism earlier this year for assuming that economic growth would hit close to 3 percent a year under President Donald Trump's watch, and Democrats quickly lashed out at what Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer dubbed "fake math" in the new analysis.

"It's clear the White House and Republicans are grasping at straws to prove the unprovable and garner votes for a bill that nearly every single independent analysis has concluded will blow up the deficit and generate almost no additional economic activity to make up for it," Schumer said.

The Treasury analysis released Monday hits that $1.8 trillion revenue growth figure by assuming that long-term economic growth would hit 2.9 percent over the next 10 years, which is 0.7 percent higher than a baseline of previous projections.

But the vast majority of outside analyses have found that the GOP tax plans would fall far short of being fully offset. The Joint Committee on Taxation said the Senate tax bill would add about $1 trillion to the deficit over a decade, and the non-partisan Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center said Monday that the Senate tax plan would increase gross domestic product by 0.7 percent in 2018 before falling off in ensuing years.

Most, but not all, of that extra economic growth projected by Treasury would come from the tax cuts themselves. Treasury assumes that corporate tax changes would spur half the economic expansion, while the other half would be come from a combination of new tax relief for "pass-through" businesses that pay taxes through the individual system and yet-to-be determined proposals for overhauling the welfare system and improving infrastructure.

"The Administration has been focused on tax reform and broader economic policies to stimulate growth, which will generate significant long-term revenue for the government," Mnuchin said in a statement.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren late last month asked Treasury's inspector general to probe the circumstances behind Mnuchin's economic growth claims.

"Either the Treasury Department has used extensive taxpayer funds to conduct economic analyses that it refuses to release because those analyses would contradict the Treasury Secretary's claims, or Secretary Mnuchin has grossly misled the public about the extent of the Treasury Department's analysis," she wrote

House and Senate GOP leaders are crafting a final tax plan behind closed doors. They plan to hold a public meeting Wednesday of the conference committee that would OK the legislation, with a goal of getting it to Trump's desk by Dec. 20 or sooner if possible, a source familiar with the matter said.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Dominion buys SCANA — Lighthouse Resources sues Inslee — Senate GOP majority lowers to 51
Date: Wednesday, January 03, 2018 3:33:45 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 01/03/2018 03:31 PM EDT

COME TOGETHER: Utility Dominion is purchasing SCANA, which recently abandoned its planned nuclear plant expansion in South Carolina. The $14.6 billion deal the two companies announced today relies on South Carolina agreeing to continue making payments on the failed V.C. Summer project, which ran over budget and halted construction last year. The merger deal would create a utility with 6.5 million gas and electric customers in eight states, and it would give cash payouts averaging $1,000 to customers of South Carolina Electric and Gas, a SCANA subsidiary. Dominion would also complete a $180 million natural gas plant. The companies will next need approval from FERC, the FTC and public utility commissions in three states.

"We believe this merger will provide significant benefits to SCE&G's customers, SCANA's shareholders and the communities SCANA serves," said Thomas F. Farrell II, CEO of Dominion Energy, in a statement. "It would lock in significant and immediate savings for SCE&G customers — including what we believe is the largest utility customer cash refund in history — and guarantee a rapidly declining impact from the V.C. Summer project." Eric Wolff has more.

COAL COMPANY SUES INSLEE: Coal miner Lighthouse Resources said today it is suing Washington Gov. Jay Inslee over the state's denial of a permit to build an export terminal to deliver coal to Asia, Ben Lefebvre reports. In the lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Tacoma, the coal company argues Inslee and the state's Department of Ecology violated current U.S. energy policy and the Constitution's foreign commerce clause by denying the permit. Lighthouse specifically points to President Donald Trump's calls to increase domestic coal production in its justification. "By taking actions and refusing to act in ways consistent with the federal Government's coal export policies, the Defendants have severely undermined the ability of the United States to speak with one voice in foreign commercial affairs," Lighthouse said in the lawsuit.

JONES, SMITH JOIN SENATE: Alabama Democrat Doug Jones was formally sworn in to the Senate today, narrowing Senate Republicans' already slim majority and complicating their agenda ahead of midterms, POLITICO's Seung Min Kim and John Bresnahan report. Tina Smith, who is replacing former Sen. Al Franken of Minnesota after he resigned following sexual misconduct allegations from multiple women, was also sworn in today, bringing Republicans' tally to a 51-49 majority. The moves make "it easier for Democrats to block President Donald Trump's nominees and filibuster his legislative proposals," Seung Min and John write. Read more.

UNCONVENTIONAL MOVES: The Energy Department announced today six projects that will receive $30 million in federal funding for cost-shared research and development in unconventional oil and natural gas recovery. The projects "will address critical gaps in our understanding of reservoir behavior and optimal well-completion strategies, next-generation subsurface diagnostic technologies, and advanced offshore technologies," DOE said. WHAT IRAN PROTESTS MEAN FOR THE NUCLEAR DEAL: Anti-government protests in Iran could open up Trump to kill the Iran nuclear deal, POLITICO's Michael Crowley and Eliana Johnson report. "Trump will have an opportunity for far more dramatic action in less than two weeks, when he must decide by law whether to continue waiving economic sanctions against Iran that were lifted by the 2015 Iran nuclear deal," the two report.

Michael and Eliana write: "Although Trump has repeatedly threatened to withdraw unilaterally from the nuclear deal, his senior national security team has persuaded him that the diplomatic costs outweigh the benefits of keeping a campaign promise and undoing one of Obama's proudest achievements. But some people familiar with administration deliberations say that the moment of vulnerability for Iran's nearly 40-year-old fundamentalist regime may move him to grander action." Read more.

GAS PRICES SET TO RISE IN 2018: Gas prices in 2018 could hit their highest levels since 2014, according to GasBuddy's 2018 outlook, which finds the yearly national average will rise 19 cents to $2.57 per gallon. Analysts also found U.S. motorists will spend $364.6 billion in 2018 — $25 billion higher than what was spent in 2017. The average household will see its yearly gasoline bill rise to $1,898, up from $1,765 in 2017, according to the GasBuddy outlook.

SCANA, Dominion announce merger in wake of scuttled nuclear plant Back

By Eric Wolff | 01/03/2018 10:49 AM EDT

Utilities Dominion and SCANA, which last year decided to stop work on nuclear plant expansion, have agreed to merge, the companies said today.

The deal is contingent on South Carolina agreeing to continue making payments on the failed V.C. Summer project, which ran over budget and will never produce any power. The South Carolina legislature is now considering whether to pass legislation ending payments on the project, the Post & Courier reports.

The $14.6 billion deal would create a utility with 6.5 million gas and electric customers in eight states. Customers of South Carolina Electric and Gas, a subsidiary of SCANA, would receive cash pay outs of an average of $1,000 and a rate reduction of 5 percent, the companies said. Dominion would also commit funds to charities in communities served by SCANA, and the utility would complete a $180 million natural gas plant.

"We believe this merger will provide significant benefits to SCE&G's customers, SCANA's shareholders and the communities SCANA serves," Thomas F. Farrell II, CEO of Dominion Energy, said in a statement. "It would lock in significant and immediate savings for SCE&G customers — including what we believe is the largest utility customer cash refund in history — and guarantee a rapidly declining impact from the V.C. Summer project."

The Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission have both subpoenaed SCANA for documents related to the Summer project.

WHAT'S NEXT: The companies will need approval from FERC, the FTC, and public utility commissions in three states.

Coal miner sues Inslee over denied export terminal permit Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 01/03/2018 03:00 PM EDT

Coal miner Lighthouse Resources is suing Washington Gov. Jay Inslee over the state's denial of a permit to build an export terminal to deliver coal to Asia.

Lighthouse Resources, in its lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Tacoma, argues that Inslee and the state's Department of Ecology violated current U.S. energy policy and the Constitution's foreign commerce clause in denying the permit. Lighthouse specifically references President Donald Trump's calls to increase domestic coal production, which has been in a decades-long decline as power plants switch to cleaner-burning natural gas.

"By taking actions and refusing to act in ways consistent with the federal Government's coal export policies, the Defendants have severely undermined the ability of the United States to speak with one voice in foreign commercial affairs," Lighthouse said in the suit.

The lawsuit is the last scuffle in the company's nearly six-year battle to build the Millennium Bulk Terminal on the Columbia River to ship coal from Wyoming and Montana to Japan, South Korea and China. Washington's Department of Ecology in September denied the terminal a water quality certification, effectively scuttling the project.

Lighthouse estimates the terminal would ship 44 million tons of coal a year, up to 60 percent more than current levels.

WHAT'S NEXT: Washington state officials will reply to the lawsuit.

Jones sworn in, and Senate Democrats rejoice Back

By Seung Min Kim and John Bresnahan | 01/03/2018 01:50 PM EDT

Democrat Doug Jones was formally sworn in as the newest senator from Alabama on Wednesday, narrowing the Senate GOP's already-slender majority and complicating the outlook for the Republican agenda ahead of the mid-term elections.

Jones, who defeated Republican Roy Moore in a contentious race this fall, became the newest member of the Senate alongside Tina Smith, who is replacing former Sen. Al Franken of Minnesota after he resigned following sexual misconduct allegations from multiple women.

Republicans now control a 51-49 majority, making it easier for Democrats to block President Donald Trump's nominees and filibuster his legislative proposals. The one-seat pick-up also boosts the once-slim prospects of Democrats regaining the Senate majority in a year when they're battling to retain seats in mostly conservative terrain.

"The voices of Jones and Smith will add to the diversity of energy of our caucus," said an ebullient Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.). "I predict that both will become influential voices in this historic chamber."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) also offered warm words to the newest senators, telling Jones in particular that he "will have big shoes to fill," including those of Attorney General Jeff Sessions, whose departure from the Senate set off the special election.

Some logistical issues will also have to be worked out with a narrower Republican margin in the Senate. For instance, McConnell and Schumer are still discussing whether the number of seats allotted to each party on committees will be adjusted to reflect the smaller GOP majority, aides said.

Who assumes Franken and ex-Sen. Luther Strange's (R-Ala.) committee assignments won't be settled until those ratios are decided. Franken in particular is vacating a coveted seat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees Supreme Court confirmations and gave Franken a major platform in interrogating controversial Trump nominees.

Three current or former vice presidents were on hand for Wednesday's ceremonial event: Mike Pence, who swore in the new senators; Joe Biden, who accompanied Jones — a close friend — as he was formally installed as senator; and Walter Mondale, a former Minnesota senator who was alongside Smith.

Mondale joked with reporters about his meeting with Biden and Pence, quipping "They behaved." And Biden in particular was clearly pleased to return to his old Senate stomping grounds, saying "Good to be back" while grinning to reporters during a photo op in the Old Senate Chamber.

More than 20 happy Senate Democrats were on hand to watch Jones and Smith get sworn in, although it was clear Jones was the star of the day. Only a handful of Republicans joined Pence and McConnell to watch the proceedings.

Jones waved to his wife in the gallery and touched his hand to heart after he officially joined what's known as the World's Greatest Deliberative Body. He was soon given a "member pin" that every senator receives.

Biden could be overheard loudly introducing Jones to Iowa Republican Chuck Grassley: "He's a good guy." Then Schumer joked to Biden while pointing to McConnell. "They need your help," Schumer said. "They need you to negotiate."

Schumer — who is scheduled to meet later Wednesday with McConnell, Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) in a bid to work out a budget agreement — then lambasted Trump on the floor, especially his Tuesday night Twitter broadside against North Korean leader Kim Jong Un.

"President Trump's foreign policy by tweet is doing serious damage to the country," Schumer said on the floor. He accused Republicans who didn't criticize Trump's tweets of "complicity in the degradation of the presidency."

Iran protests could move Trump to kill nuclear deal Back

By Michael Crowley and Eliana Johnson | 01/02/2018 07:40 PM EDT

Anti-government protests in Iran offer President Donald Trump a new reason to scrap the Iran nuclear deal later this month — a risky move that Trump's supporters are cheering but that critics warn could play into Tehran's hands.

Trump and his senior officials have offered rhetorical support for the protesters and denounced the government in statements and on Twitter. They are also exploring such further steps as targeted sanctions and warnings to social media companies not to comply with Iranian censorship.

But Trump will have an opportunity for far more dramatic action in less than two weeks, when he must decide by law whether to continue waiving economic sanctions against Iran that were lifted by the 2015 Iran nuclear deal. The sanctions waivers must be renewed every 120 days.

Trump could be further motivated to move boldly given bipartisan complaints that President Barack Obama failed to act forcefully in response to the last round of major Iranian protests, in 2009, sources familiar with administration deliberations said.

Although Trump has repeatedly threatened to withdraw unilaterally from the nuclear deal, his senior national security team has persuaded him that the diplomatic costs outweigh the benefits of keeping a campaign promise and undoing one of Obama's proudest achievements. But some people familiar with administration deliberations say that the moment of vulnerability for Iran's nearly 40-year-old fundamentalist regime may move him to grander action.

"He's not going to want to waive sanctions and keep money flowing to dictators when there are people protesting in the streets," said Richard Goldberg, a former Senate Republican aide who helped design Iran sanctions and is now a senior adviser at the hawkish Foundation for Defense of Democracies.

Another Middle East analyst with ties to the Trump administration agreed.

"I think there's a calculus that you take advantage of this moment and you don't waive the sanctions, and put further pressure on a regime which is already facing a lot of economic problems," said Andrew Bowen, a visiting scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "You use this as a wedge to try to renegotiate the deal."

Many other Middle East experts and former U.S. officials dispute that rationale, however, warning that pulling the plug on the nuclear deal would throw Iran's embattled Islamist leaders a lifeline. The agreement retains strong support from the five other nations that negotiated it with Tehran — China, Russia, Great Britain, France and Germany.

"I would not walk away" from the nuclear deal, said Dennis Ross, a Middle East adviser to three presidents of both parties. "It basically diverts attention back onto us. We have an interest in keeping the spotlight on what the Iranians are doing, not shifting it to a step that we took."

A senior administration official told POLITICO that waiving the sanctions again, amid the popular upheaval in Iran's streets, "sends a horrible message," but that Trump would also be presented with the option of preserving the deal. Even if Trump decides to continue providing Tehran with sanctions relief, the official said, the protests offer the U.S. "additional pressure over the Europeans" to modify the terms of the nuclear agreement.

Iran insists it will not renegotiate the nuclear deal. The July 2015 agreement slowed Iran's steady march toward a nuclear weapons capability, scaling back and limiting its atomic program in return for an end to punishing U.S. and European economic sanctions.

Obama called Washington's furious argument over the deal "the most consequential foreign policy debate that our country has had since the invasion of Iraq," and warned that the alternatives were a nuclear-armed Iran or war.

As a candidate, Trump repeatedly denounced the nuclear deal and vowed to shred it once in office. He has been dissuaded by top officials, including national security adviser H.R. McMaster, Defense Secretary James Mattis and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson. None are enthusiastic defenders of the agreement, but all say the costs of withdrawing now — including international isolation and the risk of a second nuclear emergency even as Trump confronts North Korea — are not worth the uncertain benefits.

European leaders have also urged Trump to preserve the deal, arguing that restored U.S. sanctions would empower regime hard-liners who say the U.S. cannot be trusted and would lead Iran to restart its nuclear program.

Confronted with an Oct. 15 legal deadline to certify whether Iran had complied with the deal, Trump declined to do so — despite the findings of international inspectors who say Iran has complied with its obligations, which include dismantling centrifuges and limiting uranium enrichment.

Trump's refusal to certify Iran's compliance was mainly symbolic. But he warned that unless Congress and European countries took unspecified steps to crack down on Tehran, "the agreement will be terminated."

No such action has followed, although Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has been talking with his Democratic counterpart, Ben Cardin of Maryland, about legislation that might satisfy Trump that the deal has been strengthened while still winning 60 votes for Senate passage. That would require coming up with language that would not violate the nuclear deal's terms while providing Trump with political cover to preserve the agreement.

Senate aides familiar with the negotiations, however, said it was unlikely that the upper chamber would produce that sort of legislation by the time the president has to decide — on Jan. 11 and over the following week — whether to certify the deal and, more important, to waive the sanctions the agreement lifted.

Seizing on the drama of the protests, Republican hawks are now pushing for a tougher bill. Corker is working to win over one of those hawks, Sen. Tom Cotton of Arkansas, a confidant of McMaster and an influential foreign policy adviser to the administration. Two sources familiar with administration thinking say it's unlikely the president would support a bill that Cotton himself has not signed on to.

Cotton is pushing for legislation that targets short-range missiles, which have become a matter of contention in the negotiations. Because they are not nuclear missiles, they fall outside the purview of the nuclear agreement, yet they pose a real threat to Iran's neighbors in the region.

"That is outside the nuclear deal, and that gives the Democrats and the Europeans heartburn," a senior administration official said.

Congress could also pursue legislation in response to the protests, unrelated to the nuclear agreement. Potential bills include enforcing provisions of existing laws against the Tehran, including the Global Magnitsky Act, a 2016 law that expanded an initial statute targeting human rights abusers in Russia to violators worldwide.

Another option would be for the Senate to pass transparency legislation cleared by the House in December that would make public the financial assets of top Iranian officials.

Sources with ties to the administration said the protests may have raised the bar for what new action against Iran will satisfy Trump when it comes to the nuclear deal.

"The protests come at a time when the politics were really against Trump and the administration internationally. Now you have a situation where Iranians are pouring into the streets. [The protests] are a reminder of the type of regime you've been dealing with," said Goldberg, the former Senate Republican aide. "I think the threshold" for congressional action "goes up much, much more."

Some supporters of the nuclear deal unhappily agree.

"I suspect that this is giving him the pretext to do what he was planning to do anyway," said Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council. "It is definitely going to make him more comfortable, but the U.S. will still be isolated and other countries will be upset."

Parsi added that negating the nuclear deal would also do a favor to Iranian hard-liners, who he said would blame President Hassan Rouhani of Iran for brokering a failed bargain with the U.S.

Obama administration officials viewed Rouhani and Mohammad Javad Zarif, his foreign minister and Iran's lead nuclear negotiator, as reformers willing to thaw decades of U.S.-Iranian hostility. Critics say that was never true, and that Rouhani's crackdown on the protesters reveals his lack of genuine support for greater political freedom.

At least 20 people have been killed over nearly a week of protests in several cities around the country, with 450 arrested in Tehran alone, according to The Associated Press.

Ross, who served as a top national security aide in the Obama White House during Iran's so-called Green Revolution in 2009, said Obama did not respond forcefully enough at the time, and he applauded the Trump administration's repeated statements drawing attention to the protests and their violent repression.

Trump administration officials are trying to back the protests without playing into Iranian propaganda that accuses the U.S. of fomenting "regime change" inside the country. In a Tuesday news conference, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Nikki Haley, quoted anti-government chants from some of the demonstrations, noting: "Those are not my words. Those are not the words of the United States. Those are the words of the brave people of Iran."

But Ross, who supports non-nuclear sanctions against Tehran, cautioned that top Iranian officials — including the nation's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, a militant Shiite cleric — would happily exploit a decision by Trump to walk away from the nuclear deal.

"Reimposing all the nuclear sanctions allows the regime to say they are standing up to pressure from the outside," Ross said. "They want to turn this into a nationalist issue. We want to raise the costs of a crackdown. Don't give them a reason to focus on us."

How the federal government hides sexual harassment payouts Back

By Andrew Restuccia, Emily Goldberg and Rebecca Morin | 01/03/2018 05:02 AM EDT

Executive branch agencies have settled dozens of sexual harassment cases involving federal workers in recent years, but the resulting taxpayer-funded payments are shrouded in mystery.

Despite a 2002 law aimed at improving federal accountability in discrimination cases, the system for tracking sexual harassment payments in the executive branch is almost as opaque and bureaucratic as the one governing Congress, where payouts similarly lack transparency — a setup that obscures the extent of workplace problems and allows for little oversight of how taxpayer money is spent, according to a POLITICO analysis.

Requests for information about the broad scope and total cost of sexual harassment settlements from the Treasury Department, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and more than a dozen federal agencies yielded no clear answers. An administration official, who requested anonymity to speak frankly about the process, acknowledged that the figures are difficult to compile because agencies don't track the settlements separately from other harassment claims that touch on everything from an employee's age to religion.

A federal fund run out of the Treasury Department, known as the Judgment Fund, distributes billions annually — more than $4.3 billion in fiscal 2016, the most recent year available — to pay financial judgments and awards against the United States on a range of issues, including sexual harassment claims.

But the exact amount paid through the fund and by federal agencies for sexual harassment settlements is unclear. Treasury publishes a yearly report to Congress that lists hundreds of payments made through the fund, yet the report does not include detailed information about the precise reason for the payments.

The Judgment Fund has come under attack by Republicans as an unchecked slush fund, especially after the Obama administration suggested it could be used to make payments promised to insurers under Obamacare after Republicans moved to stop the money from coming out of the Department of Health and Human Services budget.

House and Senate Republicans have introduced legislation that would require the disclosure of more information about the fund's settlements.

"What we're looking for is just accountability. We just feel like there should be sunlight cast on these things," bill sponsor Rep. Chris Stewart (R-Utah) told POLITICO in an interview. "I don't think people really saw the overlap with the sexual harassment issue until recent days. I can't imagine that I'm the only one in Congress who feels that it's best to be made public, rather than in secret."

But the problem of tracking harassment claims across the executive branch runs deeper than the Judgment Fund.

The EEOC, which tracks federal discrimination and harassment data, was unable to provide

POLITICO with a detailed breakdown of sexual harassment settlements at federal agencies, instead pointing to individual agency data, which often don't include that information, and a chart of private-sector workplace discrimination settlements.

Some of this data is compiled in EEOC's annual Report on the Federal Work Force, but the most recent report posted on the commission's website is from fiscal year 2014.

EEOC did not provide a formal response to POLITICO's questions.

Lawyers attributed the outdated data to a lack of resources at EEOC and federal agencies.

"The problem is that [the EEOC's] offices throughout the country have such minuscule staff that it's hard to get anybody trained to do it consistently," said Josh Bowers, a lawyer who represents federal employees in discrimination and harassment cases. "They're operating on a shoestring budget."

Federal employees who experience sexual harassment must navigate a labyrinthine bureaucratic process to even get to the point where the federal government will find in their favor or make a payment to compensate for the harassment.

The process starts when an employee contacts an agency's Equal Employment Opportunity counselor and is subsequently offered mediation or counseling. If that doesn't resolve the issue, an employee can then file a formal complaint, which could trigger an investigation that must wrap up within 180 days. After the completion of the investigation, the employee can either allow the agency to issue a decision or request a hearing with an EEOC administrative judge. Only after the administrative complaint process is complete can an employee file a lawsuit.

Experts and lawyers said many federal employees drop their complaints after the process drags on for months, often well past statutory deadlines meant to result in expeditious resolutions to their claims.

A 2002 law, the No FEAR Act, requires that federal agencies regularly publish data detailing discrimination claims by employees, but those data are often incomplete, lacking details about the circumstances of the complaints, the alleged perpetrators and the specifics of any resulting settlements.

The No FEAR Act also requires that agencies must pay for settlements and awards against them from their own budgets, which means they must repay any money paid out by the Judgment Fund.

POLITICO asked 18 federal agencies how many sexual harassment claims were lodged by agency employees since fiscal year 2012 and how much taxpayer money was paid out to settle them.

Eight agencies provided POLITICO with their No FEAR report, but they gave no further information on how much, if any, money was allocated to pay settlements, judgments or awards related to sexual harassment claims.

The Office of Management and Budget, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the departments of Education, Transportation, Energy, Commerce and Justice did not respond to POLITICO's inquiries before publication. Two other agencies — the Department of Health and Human Services and the Small Business Administration — said information on money awarded to complainants can be obtained only by filing a Freedom of Information Act request. POLITICO intends to file such requests.

Data provided by the agencies that did respond varied widely.

Department of Homeland Security data show that there were 42 formal complaints about sexual harassment in fiscal year 2017. But DHS says it doesn't have public data outlining how much money the government paid to settle those claims. The department has broader settlement figures pertaining to discrimination as a whole — more than $5 million in fiscal year 2017 — but a spokeswoman said the department, like most other agencies, doesn't have more specific figures on sexual harassment settlements.

In addition to its No FEAR report, the Department of the Interior provided POLITICO with survey results revealing that 8 percent of agency employees, or approximately 4,882 employees, experienced sexual harassment within the 12 months preceding the anonymous survey, conducted from Jan. 9 to March 5, 2017. But the agency's No FEAR report cited only 12 complaints of sexual harassment in fiscal year 2017.

The State Department also provided POLITICO with the number of complaints it has received from agency personnel, which includes not only local employees but also contractors and employees overseas.

According to a department official, the agency received 483 reports of harassment in fiscal year 2017, which was up from previous years. The department received 365 reports in fiscal year 2016, 320 reports in fiscal year 2014 and 157 reports in fiscal year 2013. The number of reports, however, doesn't represent the number of cases, the official said, adding that the agency may receive multiple reports about a single incident. And the department did not specify how many of those reports included claims of sexual harassment.

But according to information from the State Department's No FEAR documents, six complaints of sexual harassment had been filed for fiscal year 2017 as of Sept. 30. Three sexual harassment complaints were filed in fiscal year 2016, and in fiscal year 2015, eight complaints were filed — the highest number from fiscal years 2012 through 2017.

Just two agencies were able to provide dollar figures detailing the cost of payments related to sexual harassment claims.

The Agriculture Department said it received 75 formal complaints that included an allegation of sexual harassment from 2012 to September 2017. The department said it paid $627,310 to settle the complaints during that period.

A spokesperson for the Department of Housing and Urban Development said 17 sexual harassment complaints have been lodged within the agency since fiscal year 2012. Four of those complaints were resolved, and the remaining 13 entered the formal complaint process. Of the 13 formal complaints, which are reflected in the agency's No FEAR report, two were settled for a total of $8,600 and two others resulted in counseling sessions costing $1,000.

Separately, HUD also reimbursed $500,000 to the Judgment Fund in fiscal year 2015 for one case filed under federal anti-discrimination statutes, but it's not clear from the report whether the basis of discrimination was sexual harassment or other bias.

But as a whole, government agencies were unable to provide a clear picture of the cost of sexual harassment cases across the executive branch.

"If a government official is found guilty of sexual harassment or the government pays a settlement, the public has a right to know," said Hans von Spakovsky, a senior fellow at The Heritage Foundation who has testified before Congress about the Judgment Fund's lack of transparency. "The victim should be able to have confidentiality if they want it, but the government shouldn't be able to have it."

Catherine Boudreau and Ted Hesson contributed to this report.

Grassley open to public testimony from Fusion GPS leaders, spokesman says Back

By Kyle Cheney | 01/03/2018 12:44 PM EDT

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley is willing to have executives from the firm behind the disputed Trump-Russia dossier testify publicly, his spokesman said Wednesday, adding that the Iowa Republican hasn't sought the release of a transcript of his panel's earlier interview with them for investigative reasons.

The leaders of Fusion GPS, the firm that commissioned a former British spy to compile a dossier that describes an elaborate web of Trump ties to the Kremlin, said in a New York Times opinion piece Tuesday that Republicans had bottled up their closed-door testimony while leaking selective details to undermine their credibility.

"Senator Grassley has always been and remains for transparency," Grassley spokesman Taylor Foy said Wednesday. "There are, however, investigative factors that he must consider to temporarily protect certain information in the midst of an ongoing inquiry such as this one, like tainting the memory of other witnesses."

Foy said Fusion GPS co-founder Glenn Simpson rebuffed the committee's request six months earlier to testify publicly and invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination "to negotiate for a closed-door interview."

"Despite his public statements, Mr. Simpson and his attorney demanded during the interview that the transcript be kept confidential," Foy said. "Mr. Simpson has refused to answer dozens of questions voluntarily, and has failed to provide the Committee with documents and responses to follow-up questions after the interview."

"The Committee's invitation for Mr. Simpson to testify at a public hearing remains on the table," he added.

Joshua Levy, an attorney for Fusion GPS, urged Grassley to call a vote of the committee on releasing Simpson's testimony, which he said would amount to 300 pages covering a 10-hour interview. Levy also said Grassley's office "misstates the history of Mr. Simpson's cooperation with its investigation."

"We have consistently supported release of the transcript, so long as we would have the opportunity to review it for accuracy, and so long as the identities of Fusion's bank and employees could be protected," Levy said. "Having had the opportunity to review the full transcript, Fusion GPS wants it released."

Levy said Fusion was threatened with a subpoena at the same time the Judiciary Committee also warned it would compel testimony from former Trump campaign chairman Paul Manafort and Donald Trump Jr. Though all three declined interviews, "only Mr. Simpson was served with a subpoena," he said. Eventually, the committee withdrew its subpoena and agreed to terms for a voluntary interview.

Levy also accused committee Republicans of focusing too heavily on Fusion at the expense of a broader inquiry into Russian influence in the 2016 election.

"The Committee has long known that Fusion GPS is neither the story nor the reason why the U.S. government is investigating the president's campaign," he said. "We suggest Chairman Grassley acknowledge that fact and be transparent with the American people."

Simpson and fellow Fusion founder Peter Fritsch also accused the GOP of spinning a sinister public narrative about the firm's work.

"Republicans have refused to release full transcripts of our firm's testimony, even as they selectively leak details to media outlets on the far right," the duo wrote in the op-ed Tuesday.

The two men said they described for lawmakers a "yearlong effort to decipher Mr. Trump's complex business past" and troubling evidence of relationships with "dubious Russians." They also wrote that they refuted Trump allies' suggestion that they had advanced knowledge of Russians' plans to meet in Trump Tower with the president's son, Donald Trump Jr., or that the Russians involved in that meeting were sources for the dossier.

Rep. Adam Schiff, the top Democrat on the House intelligence panel, said Wednesday that Republicans have released transcripts from interviews with other witnesses.

"In light of the selective leaks of Mr. Simpson's testimony and the misleading manner in which Fusion GPS' role has been characterized, I would support a release of the transcript," Schiff said in a statement.

Grassley said in August that the committee was likely to release transcripts from the committee's Fusion interview. The Judiciary Committee was just one of three GOP-controlled panels that interviewed Simpson and colleagues.

"The answer is, it will take a vote of the committee to do it, but I presume that they will be released," Grassley said at a town hall meeting in Mount Ayr, Iowa, according to an Aug. 23 Washington Examiner report.

Trump breaks with Bannon over explosive comments in forthcoming book Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 01/03/2018 01:30 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and his senior aides were fuming on Wednesday after the publication of a book excerpt containing a series of explosive comments from former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon.

Trump ranted about Bannon in conversations with advisers on Wednesday, at one point telling aides he is "not well," according to a person briefed on the conversations.

In a statement, the president bluntly disavowed his former top adviser, who was pushed out of the White House in August.

"Steve Bannon has nothing to do with me or my presidency," Trump wrote. "When he was fired, he not only lost his job, he lost his mind."

Bannon told journalist Michael Wolff that he viewed a 2016 meeting at Trump Tower with Russian operatives arranged by Trump's son Donald Trump Jr. and son-in-law Jared Kushner as "treasonous" and "unpatriotic," according to a summary published by the Guardian.

The White House dismissed Wolff's forthcoming book, "Fire and Fury: Inside the Trump White House," as "filled with false and misleading accounts from individuals who have no access or influence."

"Participating in a book that can only be described as trashy tabloid fiction exposes their sad desperate attempts at relevancy," press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said in a statement.

A statement accompanying an excerpt published Wednesday in New York Magazine said Wolff conducted more than 200 interviews over 18 months, and Wolff said he was given "something like a semi-permanent seat on a couch in the West Wing."

The president has long leaned on Bannon for advice, both during the campaign and throughout his first year in the White House.

But people close to the president said Bannon was beginning to fall out of favor with Trump even before the latest revelations. Trump's anger at his former adviser peaked last month when Vanity Fair published a lengthy profile of Bannon in which he bashed Kushner and Trump's daughter Ivanka by name.

One person who spoke with the president in recent weeks said Trump told him he rarely speaks to Bannon on the phone these days, adding they've only had a handful of substantial conversations since he left the White House in August.

Bannon and Kushner have long had a tense relationship, and they frequently clashed when Bannon was in the White House.

Bannon did not respond to a request for comment.

In recent months, Bannon hasn't shied away from criticizing the White House, chiding the president for backing incumbent Sen. Luther Strange in the Alabama Senate Republican primary instead of Roy Moore, calling on Trump's lawyers to take a harder line in Robert Mueller's investigation and lamenting that the administration hasn't taken a harder line on China.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: FEC probes Zinke-affiliated PAC — Grassley pledges Northey help — Naftogaz hires in D.C.
Date: Tuesday, November 21, 2017 3:27:41 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 11/21/2017 03:24 PM EDT

With help from Darius Dixon

SIGNED, SEALED, DELIVERED: The FEC is asking the SEAL PAC, which Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke launched after winning his first congressional race in 2014, about certain discrepancies it found in the PAC's recent campaign finance report. Particularly, the FEC is asking the leadership PAC to provide further details on its direct mail spending and account for a $200,000 discrepancy in its account, Ben Lefebvre reports. The FEC is also asking about "incomplete information related to some donors, excess contributions and potentially misclassified spending, some of which occurred after Zinke's affiliation with the leadership PAC ended when he joined President Donald Trump's Cabinet in March." SEAL PAC has until Dec. 26 to address the issues identified by the FEC, according to the request sent Monday.

The FEC also wants SEAL PAC to explain how its bank account nearly doubled on New Year's Day. According to the leadership PAC's report covering the first six months of this year, it had \$408,882 in the bank on Jan. 1. But it reported having just \$215,633 cash on hand a day earlier, on Dec. 31, 2016, in its previous year-end report. Vincent DeVito, now an energy policy adviser at Interior, was SEAL PAC's treasurer until Zinke appointed him to his new position in May. More from Ben here.

HELP IS ON THE WAY: Iowa Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst have sought out Majority Leader Mitch McConnell for help in lifting Ted Cruz's hold on USDA undersecretary nominee Bill Northey — and he's pledged to lend a hand, Pro Agriculture's Jenny Hopkinson reports. Grassley said he and Ernst "had a conversation with the leader about the importance of getting him approved ... because his position is so important." Cruz put Northey's nomination for undersecretary for farm services and conservation on hold in October after corn-belt lawmakers worked with the White House to secure commitments on the Renewable Fuel Standard, favoring corn producers over refiners. Cruz in turn has demanded the White House organize a meeting to discuss a solution to the RFS that would protect refiners from job losses, but such a meeting has not been scheduled, Jenny reports.

NAFTOGAZ HIRES 2 IN D.C.: Ukrainian state-owned oil-and-gas firm Naftogaz has hired Daniel Vajdich and Jonathan Gregory of Yorktown Solutions to represent it in Washington, according to documents filed with the Justice Department and reported by POLITICO

Influence. Yorktown will work on "fully integrating the Ukrainian gas market with the energy market of the EU, supporting the implementation of the gas market reform in Ukraine and attracting foreign investments to the Ukrainian oil and gas market; [and] efficiently addressing threats posed by the Nord Stream 2 project," according to a contract filed with the Justice Department. The contract is worth $37,000 and runs through Dec. 31.

SUNRISE PIPELINE BRIEFING SCHEDULE: The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals announced the briefing schedule today on a lawsuit from environmental and community groups that challenged FERC's decision to approve the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline project. Those groups have been ordered to file their arguments jointly by Jan. 16 while FERC has until March 19. Final briefs are due May 10. The project recently gave observers a bit of whiplash earlier this month when it was subject to an on-again, off-again administrative stay.

And because it's FERC-related: The judges also ordered that everyone "limit the use of abbreviations, including acronyms."

POLAND SIGNS UP FOR U.S. LNG: PGNiG, a major Polish oil and gas company, has signed onto a five-year contract for liquefied natural gas from Centrica LNG, the Embassy of Poland announced in a tweet today. The move marks the first midterm deal for LNG deliveries from the United States for the company, "as part of a wider plan to cut its reliance on Russian supplies," Reuters reports. Read more.

FOR THE WATCH: The Justice Department today charged Behzad Mesri, a part-time Iranian government hacker, with infiltrating HBO and trying to extort the company, as Congress weighs moving a bill to reimpose sanctions on the nation. Mesri is charged with orchestrating the "hack of the premium cable channel earlier this year, which led to a standoff over a demanded ransom payment and the leak of unaired episodes of HBO's biggest shows, including 'Game of Thrones,'" Pro Cybersecurity's Eric Geller reports.

NUCLEAR COOLING CASE MOVES AHEAD: A federal judge refused Florida Power & Light Co.'s request to dismiss a lawsuit filed by environmental groups over the operation of its nuclear plant in Florida's Miami-Dade County. "Southern Alliance for Clean Energy, Friends of Everglades and Tropical Audubon Society earlier this year filed a lawsuit charging that FPL's operation of 5,900 acres of cooling canals violated the federal Clean Water Act. The lawsuit was filed in U. S. District Court in Miami," POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports. "The groups are challenging a state-approved plan to withdraw hyper-saline water seeping from the cooling canals into a shallow aquifer and pump it deeper underground to reduce the threat to water supplies."

EPA AWARDS NORTH DAKOTA WATER INFRASTRUCTURE PROJECTS: EPA said today it awarded $14.7 million to the North Dakota Department of Health for water infrastructure projects. The money, which comes from the agency's Clean Water and Drinking Water state revolving loan, will go toward "new and upgraded wastewater and drinking water plants," the agency said. EPA Regional Administrator Doug Benevento said the funds "will ensure that the state and its communities are providing clean and safe water to all North Dakotans."

WINTER CLEANING: EPA said today it's clearing out its backlog of FOIA requests lingering from previous administrations. As of early October, the agency had 652 open FOIA requests that were submitted in prior years. EPA says it is now "on track to provide responses to over 70 percent of those requests by the end of the calendar year." Steven Fine, EPA's acting chief information officer, said there are open requests from as far back as 2008. "EPA staff are finding ways to overcome a number of obstacles to complete the majority of the old requests by the end of December," Fine said.

FEC probes discrepancies at former Zinke PAC Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/21/2017 02:14 PM EDT

The FEC is asking a leadership PAC previously affiliated with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to provide more details about its direct mail spending and account for a $200,000 discrepancy in its account, among other issues in its most recent campaign finance report.

SEAL PAC, which Zinke launched after winning his first congressional race in 2014, has until Dec. 26 to address the issues identified by the FEC, according to a request sent Monday. The FEC also asks about incomplete information related to some donors, excess contributions and potentially misclassified spending, some of which occurred after Zinke's affiliation with the leadership PAC ended when he joined President Donald Trump's Cabinet in March.

When Zinke was in Congress, SEAL PAC raised most of its money from small-dollar donors and funneled it back to a handful of political operatives who have drawn criticism from other GOP candidates. That approach made it unusual among leadership PACs, which typically rely on large contributions and lawmakers use to spread donations among allied politicians.

In Monday's letter, the FEC asked SEAL PAC to further explain the money it spent on direct mail and related activities, which are responsible for the vast majority of the PAC's $1 million in operating expenses so far this year. Most of the money was spent after Zinke left, but the committee relied on the same consultants it used in previous years.

The FEC also wants SEAL PAC to explain how its bank account nearly doubled in size on New Year's Day.

According to SEAL PAC's report covering the first six months of this year, it had \$408,882 in the bank on Jan. 1. But it reported having just \$215,633 cash on hand a day earlier, on Dec. 31, 2016, in its previous year-end report.

Vincent DeVito, who now works at Interior advising Zinke on energy policy, was SEAL PAC's treasurer until Zinke appointed him to his new position in May. DeVito signed the 2016 campaign finance report, which was updated several times, most recently on April 27.

SEAL PAC's current treasurer Barbara Lazaris did not respond to a call for comment. Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the department could not answer campaign-related questions.

The FEC also asked SEAL PAC to provide more information on contributions from two individuals who gave more than the $5,000 contribution limit per election cycle. Most of those donations came in after Zinke had left.

The PAC also reported giving $10,000 each to Congressional campaigns run by Rep. Jim Banks (R-Ind.) and Rep. Scott W. Taylor (R-Va.), double the legal limit. Both contributions were reported June 29. "Although the Commission may take further legal action regarding the excessive contribution(s), your prompt action in obtaining a refund and/or redesignating the contribution(s) will be taken into consideration," the FEC wrote.

Cruz: Northey is going nowhere until Trump brokers RFS summit Back

By Megan Cassella and Eric Wolff | 10/31/2017 02:04 PM EDT

Sen. Ted Cruz said Tuesday he intends to keep holding up Bill Northey's nomination for a USDA undersecretary post until the Trump administration works with him on "a solution" to the Renewable Fuel Standard that protects refiners from "devastating job losses."

The Texas Republican, interviewed at a Chamber of Commerce event on the future of NAFTA, said that as the leader of a group of nine senators "who are deeply concerned about the potential job loss among refiners," he won't let Northey's nomination advance to the floor until he gets an opportunity to meet with the administration.

In effect, Cruz affirmed that Northey's confirmation as undersecretary for farm production and conservation depends on the administration brokering a compromise after a group of corn-belt senators used political muscle to get EPA to make concessions on the RFS that favored corn producers over refiners. That effort was led by Chuck Grassley and saw Joni Ernst and Deb Fischer withhold support for EPA nominees until their concerns were addressed.

"We are working to sit down with the administration and discuss a solution to the RFS that addresses the concerns of the agriculture community, but also avoids devastating job losses among refiners," Cruz said.

Cruz and the eight senators joining him wrote to President Donald Trump on Oct. 25 asking for a meeting within three weeks, but they made no mention of the effort to use Northey as leverage.

Grassley told reporters on Tuesday morning that he thought a meeting with Trump on the RFS would be "a waste of time" because the president had already intervened several times to bolster the program.

But he suggested he would be open to a meeting. "I'd be happy to discuss Secretary Northey's outstanding qualifications to be a top USDA official with any of my colleagues," Grassley said in a statement to POLITICO, referring to Northey's Iowa title, where he is a three-term agriculture secretary. "Bill Northey's abilities and record earned him a unanimous, bipartisan vote from the Senate Agriculture Committee."

Grassley, Ernst and other corn-belt senators made their power play in response to a notice EPA sent in late September that sought input on whether to reduce the biomass-based biodiesel requirement for 2018 — which had already been set under the RFS — and to lower the volume planned for 2019.

The corn-belt contingent pressured Trump for a meeting with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, and got their wish — and then some.

Following that meeting, held on Oct. 17, Pruitt committed to reverse the proposed cuts to biodiesel and cellulosic ethanol volumes in the RFS. But EPA also pulled back on plans to allow biofuel credits for exported biofuel, a move that would likely have lowered market prices for biofuel credits.

EPA uses biofuel credits, called Renewable Identification Numbers, or RINs, to ensure that refiners are blending the required amounts of biofuel into the nation's fuel supply. A small group of independent refiners have long complained that when RINs become expensive it hurts their bottom line. The issue has divided the oil industry for the last year, and since Pruitt made his promises to the Midwestern senators, RIN prices jumped higher.

Cruz said the situation won't fly. "The current RFS regime has created RINs, artificial licenses that have been driven up in cost by speculators to a level that is punitive and unsustainable," he said. "And that has to change."

An EPA spokesperson deferred to the White House when questioned about Cruz's latest comments. A White House spokesperson said she had nothing to report at this time.

Ernst, who pointed a finger at the oil industry after Cruz and his cohort wrote to the White House, thinks it's up to the administration to figure out how it wants to address the matter.

"Sen. Ernst believes that meeting is up to the White House to schedule, so we'll see if and when the time comes," spokeswoman Brook Hougeseu told POLITICO. "Her hope is that Sen. Cruz stops unnecessarily blocking Bill Northey over this situation. He is eminently qualified for the position and has nothing to do with the issue Senator Cruz is raising. His effort is misplaced."

Cruz, when asked Tuesday whether the White House had responded to his request for a meeting, said: "We're working to set up that discussion."

Grassley's spokesman told POLITICO via email on Tuesday afternoon that no one has reached out to Grassley to set up a meeting.

The pressure is on to resolve these issues. The Cruz-led group demanded a meeting within three weeks because a rule setting biofuel blending requirements must be finalized by Nov. 30. That leaves EPA little time to make adjustments if it is to meet the deadline, something Pruitt has promised on numerous occasions he will do.

John Lauinger contributed to this report.

White House ignores Cruz request for biofuels meeting Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/15/2017 09:55 AM EDT

The White House appears to have spurned a request from Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and eight other senators to set up a meeting with seven Midwestern senators to discuss the Renewable Fuel Standard.

"We won't have such a meeting," Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) told reporters today. "The White House would have to be interested in such a meeting. I've not heard from the White House."

Cruz has been blocking Iowan Bill Northey from becoming an undersecretary at the Department of Agriculture in an effort to force corn-state senators to discuss changes to the program. Last month he led a letter to President Donald Trump asking for a meeting within three weeks. That period ends today. Cruz has said he would lift the hold when he gets a meeting.

The White House did not respond to questions about setting up a meeting, nor did Cruz's office. Cruz sent a letter on Tuesday to Iowa Gov. Kim Reynolds explaining his desire to come to a compromise on the RFS to protect "liquid fuels."

Trump has consistently backed the RFS and the Midwestern senators in policy disputes, rejecting repeated efforts to change the program by a small group of refiners and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt.

WHAT'S NEXT: The final rule setting RFS requirements for 2018 and 2019 is due by Nov. 30.

Grassley: McConnell will help lift hold on Northey Back

By Jenny Hopkinson | 11/21/2017 10:45 AM EDT

Iowa's two GOP senators have appealed to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell for help in lifting Sen. Ted Cruz's hold on USDA undersecretary nominee Bill Northey — and the Senate's top Republican has pledged to lend a hand.

Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst "had a conversation with the leader about the importance of getting him approved ... because his position is so important," Grassley told reporters this morning. Northey, the Iowa agriculture secretary, is the nominee for undersecretary for farm services and conservation.

"When it comes to the farm bill, we need him in place — and from that standpoint, the leader said he would help to move it along," Grassley added.

Cruz put a hold on Northey's nomination in October after Grassley, Ernst and other corn-belt lawmakers worked with the White House to secure commitments from EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt on the Renewable Fuel Standard that favored corn producers over refiners. The Texas Republican has demanded the White House organize a meeting to discuss a solution to the RFS that would protect refiners from job losses, but a meeting has not been scheduled.

Grassley and Ernst have attempted to negotiate with Cruz, but it "hasn't done much good," Grassley told reporters.

Grassley said it was not clear what McConnell will do to get Cruz to yield, but he added that he and Ernst stressed that it should be done no later than early December. Leaders of the agriculture committees have said they plan to release a draft of the farm bill early next year.

Appeals court denies stay on Atlantic Sunrise pipeline construction Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 06:22 PM EDT

A federal court panel today denied a request from community and environmental groups to halt construction of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline while those organizations challenge FERC's approval of the project.

"Petitioners have not satisfied the stringent requirements for a stay pending court review," a three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals said in the order.

The panel instituted an administrative stay on Monday while it weighed whether to grant the full stay, which would've been in place until the lawsuit, Allegheny Defense Project, et al v. FERC, 17-1098, was resolved.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court still needs to establish the briefing schedule for the lawsuit and has not decided when or whether to hold oral arguments.

Iranian charged in HBO hack as Congress weighs nuclear pact Back

By Eric Geller | 11/21/2017 11:50 AM EDT

The Justice Department on Tuesday charged a part-time Iranian government hacker with infiltrating HBO and trying to extort the company, a move that comes amid allegations the charges were rushed to bolster President Donald Trump's case against Tehran.

The man, Behzad Mesri, is charged with orchestrating the high-profile hack of the premium cable channel earlier this year, which led to a standoff over a demanded ransom payment and the leak of unaired episodes of HBO's biggest shows, including "Game of Thrones."

Speaking at a press conference, Joon Kim, the acting U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, called Mesri "an experienced and sophisticated hacker who has been wreaking havoc on computer systems around the world for some time."

The charges are the latest in a string of geopolitically loaded indictments of hackers linked to foreign governments including China, Iran and Russia, a once unprecedented move that has become increasingly common in recent years.

But Tuesday's indictment comes just days after The Washington Post reported that Trump administration officials were pressuring DOJ prosecutors to announce more cases against Iranian hackers, giving it added diplomatic significance.

According to prosecutors, Mesri used stolen login credentials to access HBO's network, stole material including TV episodes and demanded the company pay $6 million in the digital currency bitcoin.

A grand jury in the Southern District of New York charged Mesri with seven counts, including wire fraud, unauthorized access to a protected computer and threatening to damage a protected computer.

In addition to the HBO infiltration, Mesri also allegedly conducted cyberattacks on behalf of the Iranian military, targeting "military systems, nuclear software systems and Israeli infrastructure."

Mesri, Kim said, "applied those skills that he learned against HBO for personal profit."

Additionally, prosecutors say Mesri defaced websites in the U.S. and other countries as part of an Iranian criminal hacking group, Turk Black Hat Security.

According to the Post's report, DOJ officials were pressured to announce more cases against these types of Iranian hackers, a move some found suspect after the president in October refused to certify Tehran's compliance with the deal the country struck in 2015 with the United States and five other world powers to restrain its nuclear program in exchange for reduced economic sanctions.

Trump's move gave Congress 60 days to consider moving a bill to reimpose sanctions on Iran, which would violate the agreement.

Cyber experts are concerned Iran will refocus its hacker army on the U.S. if the Trump administration and Congress abandon the deal.

Trump officials have "caused internal alarm" with their efforts to make Iranian hacking cases public, according to the Post story. Several sources told the publication that "a series of criminal cases could increase pressure on lawmakers" to reimpose sanctions on Tehran.

Observers quickly noted the indictment was thin on evidence and included the unredacted name of the grand jury foreperson, suggesting the document had been rushed. "Not a serious criminal indictment but a badly executed press release," tweeted independent national security journalist Marcy Wheeler.

But Kim vowed Tuesday's charges "will not be the last time we charge cyber offenses against hackers with ties to the Iranian government."

According to the indictment unsealed on Tuesday, Mesri stole multiple HBO employee user accounts and repeatedly accessed the company's servers to steal unaired episodes of shows like "Ballers," "Curb Your Enthusiasm" and "The Deuce." He also stole scripts for the hit series "Game of Thrones," contact information for HBO series' cast and crew, corporate financial documents and login credentials for HBO's social media accounts.

In late July, Mesri began contacting HBO employees to inform them of his theft and demand ransom payment in exchange for not releasing the data. He said he had taken a huge trove of data — approximately 1.5 terabytes — and provided proof of his claim.

"HBO was on[e] of our difficult targets to deal with but we succeeded," he wrote in one July 23 email, according to the indictment.

Mesri initially demanded HBO pay him $5.5 million in the hard-to-trace digital currency bitcoin, but he later upped his demand to $6 million. He also added a new threat: If HBO didn't pay up, he would destroy data on the company's networks.

It's unknown if HBO paid its hackers any money, but the stolen HBO files began leaking on July 30.

The United States has previously charged other nations' hackers in similar cases.

In March, DOJ charged four men, including two Russian intelligence officers, for hacking Yahoo and stealing information on 500 million users. During the Obama administration, the U.S. charged five Chinese military officers for hacking American corporations to steal trade secrets and seven Iranian men for crippling bank websites with barrages of traffic, as well as infiltrating an upstate New York dam.

The U.S. also blamed North Korea for a bruising hack on movie studio Sony Pictures — the first in a string of headline-grabbing hacks targeting entertainment firms — but chose to impose sanctions on the country instead of charging specific hackers.

Indicting foreign government hackers is often viewed more as a tool of deterrence and diplomacy than an attempt to bring the digital assailants to justice, since their governments will never extradite them to face charges.

Instead, the U.S. uses the charges as part of its burgeoning "name-and-shame" strategy of charging foreign nationals, hoping the ensuing travel and financial restrictions will deter others from following in their footsteps.

"Because Mesri is in Iran, we are unfortunately unable to arrest him today," Kim conceded on Tuesday. "But Mesri should know, and all other cyber criminals and would-be cyber criminals should know, that they are not safe behind the anonymity of their computer screens even if they are a world away."

He added: "In the game of thrones, 'Winter is Coming' is the motto of the House of Stark. ... Well today, winter has come for Behzad Mesri."

Conyers scandal rocks House Democrats Back

By John Bresnahan and Heather Caygle | 11/21/2017 11:01 AM EDT

House Democrats found themselves plunged into crisis on Tuesday, after reports surfaced that Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) secretly settled a sexual harassment claim with a staffer in 2015, with senior lawmakers calling for an immediate ethics investigation.

Conyers acknowledged the settlement, first reported by BuzzFeed, but forcefully denied he ever sexually harassed his former aide.

"I expressly and vehemently denied the allegations made against me, and continue to do so," he said in a statement. "My office resolved the allegations — with an express denial of liability — in order to save all involved from the rigors of protracted litigation."

Known as the "dean of the House," Conyers is the longest-serving current House member and one of the most prominent African-American lawmakers in Congress.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi called for an ethics probe into the allegations, saying there must be "zero tolerance for harassment, discrimination, bullying or abuse." Pelosi's office had previously said the California Democrat was unaware of the 2015 settlement.

"As members of Congress, we each have a responsibility to uphold the integrity of the House of Representatives and to ensure a climate of dignity and respect," Pelosi said in a statement. "As I have said before, any credible allegation of sexual harassment must be investigated by the Ethics Committee."

Reps. Jerry Nadler of New York and Zoe Lofgren of California, the two most senior Democrats on the House Judiciary Committee behind Conyers, also endorsed an ethics probe.

"The allegations against Ranking Member Conyers are extremely serious and deeply troubling. Obviously, these allegations must be investigated promptly by the Ethics Committee," Nadler said in a statement.

"The Committee on Ethics should take up this matter immediately with a goal of promptly assessing the validity of the news account," Lofgren said. "This reported behavior cannot be tolerated in the House of Representatives or anywhere else."

Conyers said in his statement that he would fully cooperate with an investigation if the House launches one.

Buzzfeed reported on Monday night that Conyers "repeatedly made sexual advances to female staff that included requests for sexual favors, contacting and transporting other women with whom they believed Conyers was having affairs, caressing their hands sexually, and rubbing their legs and backs in public."

Both Nadler and Lofgren have previously expressed interest in replacing Conyers atop the panel. Lofgren is a former Ethics Committee chairwoman and an ally of Pelosi. She's also a member of the House Administration Committee, which oversees sexual harassment issues in Congress.

The Michigan Democrat, first elected to Congress in 1964, reportedly "used congressional resources to fly in women they believed he was having affairs with," according to documents obtained by BuzzFeed. Another Conyers aide "said she was tasked with driving women to and from Conyers' apartment and hotel rooms."

Conyers allegedly paid $27,000 in public funds to a female employee who had filed a claim against him with the secretive Office of Compliance in 2014. The documents BuzzFeed obtained have not been independently confirmed.

"The resolution was not for millions of dollars, but rather for an amount that equated to a reasonable severance payment," Conyers noted.

Rep. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.), who has been leading calls for reforming Capitol Hill's sexual harassment policies, said Capitol Hill investigators should also look into whether Conyers misused congressional funds to pay for the settlement "under the guise of a severance payment."

"If this is true, the amount of taxpayer money used to settle these cases is even higher than the number that's been provided by the Office of Compliance," Speier said.

A prominent Michigan Democrat, Rep. Debbie Dingell, also called for an Ethics Committee investigation. Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) called the news "deeply disturbing," but didn't directly address whether Conyers should face an ethics probe.

Other top Democrats, including Congressional Black Caucus members, declined to comment. The CBC is expected to hold a conference call on the Conyers report Tuesday afternoon.

In a statement released on Tuesday morning, Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) addressed the controversy without naming Conyers.

"This report is extremely troubling," Ryan said. "Last month, I directed the Committee on House Administration to conduct a full review of all policies and procedures related to workplace harassment and discrimination. A Committee hearing last week examining this issue led to a new policy of mandatory training for all members and staff. Additional reforms to the system are under consideration as the committee continues its review."

The Conyers case is especially sensitive for Democrats given his age — 88 — seniority, and race. Conyers is the ranking member on the Judiciary Committee. He is also one of the co-founders of the CBC, a key bloc of votes within the House Democratic Caucus. Pelosi and other Democrats have been especially cautious in dealing with ethics and legal problems involving CBC members.

"This is a huge, huge problem for us," said an aide to one longtime Democrat. "I don't know how Pelosi is going to handle this."

So far, no Democrats have called for Conyers to step aside, but that could change given the explosive nature of the allegations against Conyers, the huge controversy surrounding sexual harassment in recent months, and the fact that he has faced ethics problems in the past.

In 2016, Conyers came under investigation by the Office of Congressional Ethics for paying his former chief of staff, Cynthia Martin, for six months after she pleaded guilty to receiving stolen property, a misdemeanor. Conyers refused to cooperate with the OCE probe.

In 2009, Conyers' wife Monica — then president of the Detroit City Council — pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and was sentenced to 37 months in prison.

And in 2006, Conyers came under investigation by the Ethics Committee for allegedly using his staff for personal errands, including babysitting his children. No formal action was ever taken against him by the panel.

Kyle Cheney contributed to this report.

Leading Trump Census pick causes alarm Back

By Danny Vinik and Andrew Restuccia | 11/21/2017 05:06 AM EDT

The Trump administration is leaning toward naming Thomas Brunell, a Texas professor with no government experience, to the top operational job at the U.S. Census Bureau, according to two people who have been briefed on the bureau's plans.

Brunell, a political science professor, has testified more than half a dozen times on behalf of Republican efforts to redraw congressional districts, and is the author of a 2008 book titled "Redistricting and Representation: Why Competitive Elections Are Bad for America."

The choice would mark the administration's first major effort to shape the 2020 census, the nationwide count that determines which states lose and gain electoral votes and seats in the House of Representatives.

The fate of the census under President Donald Trump has been closely watched by voting-rights advocates worried that the administration — which has already made unsupported claims about voter fraud — might nudge it in directions that over- or undercount some Americans. Subtle bureaucratic choices in the wording and administration of the census can have huge consequences for who is counted, and how it shifts American voting districts.

The pick would break with the long-standing precedent of choosing a nonpolitical government official as deputy director of the U.S. Census Bureau. The job has typically been held by a career civil servant with a background in statistics. It does not require Senate confirmation, so Congress would have no power to block the hire.

"If true, it signals an effort by the administration to politicize the census," said Terri Ann Lowenthal, former co-director of the Census Project, an organization that tracks the census. "It's very troubling."

Brunell was under consideration over the summer for the Senate-confirmable job of census director, but the administration declined to nominate him after receiving pushback from Capitol Hill, according to two people who track the census closely.

The White House and Census Bureau both referred comments to the Commerce Department, which oversees the bureau. The Commerce Department declined to comment. Brunell, reached by phone, declined to comment.

The hiring could be announced as soon as this week, though Trump administration personnel decisions often change at the last minute. One administration official said the situation remains "fluid."

As deputy director of the Census Bureau, Brunell would become the highest-ranking permanent official at the agency. Though the deputy director technically reports to the census director, that slot is temporarily being filled by a career civil servant, since former director John Thompson resigned at the end of June. There is currently no nominee for a permanent director.

"This is worse than making him director," said a former high-ranking Commerce Department official. "There still is going to be hell to pay on the optics. The Democrats and civil rights community will go nuts."

Though it may seem like a dry bureaucratic task, the $16 billion decennial census has become the focus of hotly contested political arguments in a moment when the question of who counts as an American has risen to the top of the national debate.

The census attempts to count every person who lives within the U.S. borders, and Republicans have long sought to add a question asking respondents about their immigration status, including whether they are U.S. citizens. Democrats and many civil rights groups worry that adding a citizenship question would cause a huge drop in minority response rates, with recipients concerned about what the government would do with the information.

In January, a leaked draft of an executive order directed the Census Bureau to add such a question to the "long form" census, known as the American Community Survey, which is a longer, more detailed look at a subset of people living in the U.S. According to the two people who track the census closely, the administration is currently mulling a similar executive order.

So far, fears that the administration will complicate the census with a citizenship question have not panned out. Trump has not yet issued the order, and two senior administration officials said the issue is not yet being discussed at a high level in the West Wing. Wilbur Ross, the commerce secretary — who once worked as a census enumerator himself — has previously argued that adding questions to the decennial would reduce response rates.

But rumors about the hiring of Brunell have reignited those concerns. The deputy director is effectively the chief operating officer and chief financial officer at the Census Bureau, making Brunell a critical person as the agency gears up for the 2020 census. The position has been filled by a temporary career civil servant since former deputy director Nancy Potok left in early January to accept an Obama administration appointment as the country's chief statistician.

Even a seasoned census hand would be stepping into a difficult job as deputy director now. For the past year, advocates and statistical experts have been warning that the missing top management at the agency and its underfunding by Congress could lead to an inaccurate count in 2020. The bureau is currently conducting its test run for the 2020 census, but it had to cancel components of the test due to limited funding. The agency has also delayed its regular economic census by six months due to funding shortages.

Census-watchers were also upset at the Trump administration's 2018 budget request for the Census Bureau, which was just 7 percent above its 2017 level. The bureau typically requires — and receives — a huge bump in funding as the decennial approaches, since it must hire tens of thousands of people and open dozens of field offices nationwide. In a rare move, the Trump administration publicly admitted that the bureau's 2018 budget was too low when Ross asked Congress in October for an additional $187 million, above the administration's $1.5 billion request.

Brunell's background makes him an unusual choice for the deputy director role. Based on his published curriculum vitae, he appears to have little experience in federal statistics or at managing a big organization, both characteristics that census-watchers believe are vital for the job. In comparison, Potok, his predecessor, spent most of her career at the Census Bureau.

"It's quite a difference going from an academic setting to the Census Bureau," said a person who has worked with Brunell, who asked for anonymity to speak freely about him. "I don't think he's done the administrative work that would be needed to be at a high level in a large organization like the Census Bureau."

Brunell received a Ph.D. in political science from the University of California Irvine in 1997 and worked briefly on Capitol Hill as a fellow on a House subcommittee that oversees the census. Since 2005, he has worked at the University of Texas at Dallas, where his research and writing has focused on redistricting and voting rights cases. He has frequently advised states on redrawing their congressional maps. In his 2008 book, "Redistricting and Representation," he argued that partisan districts packed with like-minded voters actually lead to better representation than ones more evenly split between Democrats and Republicans, because fewer voters in partisan districts cast a vote for a losing candidate. He has also argued that ideologically packed districts should be called "fair districts" and admits that his stance on competitive elections makes him something of an outlier among political scientists, who largely support competitive elections.

Brunell, a registered Republican, has criticized partisan gerrymandering in his work. But the GOP has repeatedly used his research in redistricting efforts, and he appeared as an expert witness to defend GOP-led states in lawsuits over potential gerrymandering. After the 2010 census, he testified or wrote a report in support of GOP redistricting efforts in Alabama, South Dakota, South Carolina and New Mexico.

In North Carolina, where GOP leaders drew congressional districts that were ultimately overturned by the Supreme Court for unfairly discriminating against black North Carolinians, he wrote a report on behalf of the state analyzing the extent of racially polarized voting in 51 North Carolina districts. In Ohio, he wrote a report in opposition to expanded early voting, which many political scientists believe favors Democrats, arguing that it reduces overall turnout because it "takes away from Election Day as a civic event."

Brunell's research has also tackled the census itself. In the early 2000s, he wrote multiple papers on the political controversy surrounding the 2000 census, which included new statistical adjustments intended to more accurately count minorities and other groups that are relatively less likely to respond to the census. Republicans argued that the new techniques were a veiled effort to boost the Democrats' political fortunes; Brunell was sharply critical of them as well, arguing that "a census with an adjustment ultimately leads to a less accurate headcount simply because the post-census adjustment becomes a crutch."

If Brunell is installed in a top Census Bureau job, "there are tons of little things he could be doing to influence what the final count looks like," said the former high-ranking Commerce official. "The ripple effect on reapportionment would be astounding."

Many of those decisions would be less visible, or even invisible, to the public. Brunell, for instance, would oversee the agency's advertising budget, which is essential to persuading groups like undocumented immigrants to respond to the decennial. The agency is set to spend more than $400 million over the next few years on those advertisements, and decisions about how and where to spend those dollars will be key to getting an accurate count.

Brunell's background also indicates that the White House is heavily focused on the political outcomes of a survey that is primarily supposed to gather objective data about the country. Since 1790, the decennial and the long-form census, along with other products produced by the agency, have been a primary source of rich and objective data for use by researchers. Beyond its impact on elections, the decennial census directs the destination of hundreds of billions of dollars of federal funds each year. Brunell's résumé, however, does not indicate that he has any expertise or experience with those elements of the agency's mission.

The selection of an outsider represents something of an unprecedented break with past leadership of the bureau. Thompson, the previous director, was nominated by President Barack Obama but had previously spent 27 years working as a career civil servant at the agency. Thompson's predecessor, Robert Groves, was also an Obama appointee. He had worked as a civil servant at the bureau in the 1990s.

"It is imperative that the Census Bureau's leadership be viewed by the public and by lawmakers as completely nonpartisan," said Lowenthal. "If either the director or the deputy director bring partisan baggage to their position, public confidence in the integrity of the census could plummet. So could congressional confidence. And it is Congress that must accept the apportionment results. All this stuff worries me."

Treasury imposes new sanctions aimed at North Korea Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 11/21/2017 02:13 PM EDT

The Treasury Department on Tuesday imposed new sanctions targeting North Korea, stepping up pressure on the regime to abandon its nuclear development program.

The sanctions come a day after the Trump administration designated North Korea a state sponsor of terrorism, adding the hermit state to a list that includes Iran, Sudan and Syria. North Korea was previously added to the list of state sponsors of terrorism in 1988 and removed from it in 2008 amid nuclear negotiations spearheaded by former President George W. Bush.

The new sanctions imposed by Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control include one Chinese individual, 13 entities and 20 boats. The sanctions include three Chinese companies that Treasury said have exported about $650 million worth of goods to North Korea and $100 million from the country. These goods have included notebook computers, anthracite coal, iron, lead and other products, Treasury said.

"These designations include companies that have engaged in trade with North Korea cumulatively worth hundreds of millions of dollars," Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said. "We are also sanctioning the shipping and transportation companies, and their vessels, that facilitate North Korea's trade and its deceptive maneuvers."

Treasury also sanctioned Sun Sidong, a Chinese national, and his company Dandong Dongyuan Industrial Co.

Sun and Dongyuan were responsible for exporting more than $28 million worth of goods to North Korea over several years, including items associated with nuclear reactors, Treasury said. Dongyuan has also been associated with front companies for North Korean organizations involved in developing weapons of mass destruction, Treasury said.

In September, North Korea conducted its sixth and most powerful nuclear test, detonating a warhead seven times larger than the atomic bomb the U.S. dropped on Hiroshima in 1945. In July, North Korea appeared to successfully test its first intercontinental ballistic missiles. It remains unclear whether the regime has successfully miniaturized a warhead small enough to fit atop one of its ballistic missiles.

But the developments indicate that North Korea in 2018 may be able to threaten the continental United States with a nuclear weapon, according to a Nov. 6 report by the Congressional Research Service. Further, the U.S. may be running out of time for a preemptive strike on North Korea without the threat of nuclear retaliation, CRS said.

In September, Treasury imposed sanctions on eight North Korean banks and 26 individuals. That followed executive orders Trump signed to target people with ties to North Korea. Also in September, the U.N. Security Council unanimously approved sanctions on North Korea.

Even excluding nuclear weapons, war with North Korea would have grave consequences. Within the first hours of military action, North Korean artillery in the demilitarized zone could kill tens of thousands in South Korea, CRS said. There are 28,500 U.S. troops and their families currently stationed in South Korea.

SUIT SHOPPING: The Sierra Club sued the Energy Department today, in hopes of pulling back the curtain on agency communications between top officials working on an electric grid study and any outside groups. The lawsuit filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California would require the agency to respond to a Freedom of Information Act request the Sierra Club filed on May 1. The deadline to comply with that FOIA passed on May 30. Sierra's FOIA request specifically demands communications that Energy Secretary Rick Perry, DOE Chief of Staff Brian McCormack and senior adviser Travis Fisher may have had with groups such as the Edison Electric Institute, the Institute for Energy Research or utility representatives. More from Darius Dixon here.

— Groups hone in on TSCA: Green groups have filed a set of lawsuits against EPA, challenging chemical safety rules finalized by the administration last month. The suits, filed Aug. 11 by Earthjustice in the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, and by Environmental Defense Fund in the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, contest the two "framework rules" for implementing last year's bipartisan overhaul of the Toxic Substances Control Act, Annie Snider reports. The rules control how the agency will evaluate tens of thousands of chemicals that are already on the market in the U.S.

— The Natural Resources Defense Council said today that it, along with the Alliance of Nurses for Healthy Environments and Cape Fear River Watch, also sued the Trump administration over its toxic chemical regulations.

EPA EYEING UPDATE FOR POWER PLANT DISCHARGE RULE: EPA will potentially revamp its 2015 power plant discharges rule, according to a letter sent by the agency's head, Scott Pruitt, to the U.S. Small Business Administration on Friday and obtained by POLITICO today. The letter says the agency will conduct a new rulemaking to "potentially revise" portions of a 2015 regulation limiting toxic discharges from coal-fired power plants. The 2015 rule in question set new technology-based limits on heavy metals that power plants discharge into waterways. The previous limits had not been updated in more than 30 years. The portions of the rule Pruitt said could be revised are the most contentious and expensive ones governing how coal waste is managed by power plants, Annie reports.

IMMELT STAYS PUT: General Electric Chairman Jeff Immelt says he is not leaving President Donald Trump's manufacturing committee, following news today that the CEO of Merck did just that in protest of the White House's response to a white supremacist rally in Charlottesville, Va., POLITICO's Madeline Conway reports. A GE spokesperson said in a statement that the company "has no tolerance for hate, bigotry or racism, and we strongly condemn the violent extremism in Charlottesville over the weekend," but added that "it is important for GE to participate in the discussion on how to drive growth and productivity in the U.S." Therefore, the spokesperson said, Immelt "will remain on the Presidential Committee on American Manufacturing while he is the Chairman of GE." More here.

LISTEN IN: FERC is out with a podcast interview today with new Chairman Neil Chatterjee. In it, Chatterjee said his No. 1 priority is going through the agency's backlog and noted that he believes "baseload power should be recognized as an essential part of the fuel mix." He went on to say generation including existing coal and nuclear "need[s] to be properly compensated to recognize the value they provide to the system." Chatterjee, a Kentucky native, said he sees "how important a contribution coal makes to an affordable and reliable electric system." Listen here.

UNDER PRESSURE: Vanguard Group said today it "has urged companies to disclose how climate change could affect their business and asset valuations," Reuters reports. Vanguard, which manages about $4 trillion, faced pressure from investors on the issue. Reuters writes: "Vanguard, the biggest U.S. mutual fund firm by assets, had not supported climate activists on similar measures. But Glenn Booraem, Vanguard's investment stewardship officer, said in a telephone interview on Monday the issue as well as shareholder proposals have evolved. 'Our support for these proposals is not a matter of ideology, it's a matter of economics,' he said. 'To the extent there are significant risks to a company's long-term value proposition, we want to make sure there is long-term disclosure of those risks to the market.'"

A LONG SEPTEMBER: No one is looking forward to the month of September in the Trump White House. POLITICO's Josh Dawsey reports senior officials have described the month as "brutal," "bad" or "really tough" as a confluence of complicated issues — like the debt ceiling, the 2018 federal budget, tax reform and infrastructure spending — stares back at them. But they also admit the month is crucial for righting the presidency's course. Aides hope to have a better blueprint for how the president wants to proceed on such issues after a series of meetings in New York this week. More here.

SPACE JAM: "A SpaceX capsule rocketed to the International Space Station on Monday, carrying tons of science research, plus ice cream," the Associated Press reports. "... It was the 14th successful booster landing for SpaceX and the sixth on the giant X at the company's touchdown spot at Cape Canaveral Air Force Station, just a few miles from its NASA-leased pad at Kennedy Space Center. ... Experiments make up most of the 6,400 pounds of cargo, which should reach the orbiting lab Wednesday. That includes 20 mice that will return alive inside the SpaceX Dragon capsule in about a month. The Dragon is also doubling as an ice cream truck this time. There was extra freezer space, so NASA packed little cups of vanilla, chocolate and birthday cake ice cream, as well as ice cream candy bars." Read it here.

OAK RIDGE MAKES TRANSURANIC WASTE SHIPMENT: Tennessee's Oak Ridge's Transuranic Waste Processing Center made its first transuranic waste shipment since 2012, the Energy Department said today. The waste, which was moved for permanent disposal at the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant near Carlsbad, N.M., "consists of materials and debris that are contaminated with elements that have a higher atomic mass and listed after uranium on the periodic table," DOE announced. "The majority of Oak Ridge's inventory originated from previous research and isotope production missions at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory."

Sierra Club sues DOE for communications on grid study Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/14/2017 01:26 PM EDT

The Sierra Club sued the Energy Department today to force the agency to divulge communications between top officials working on a contentious electric grid study and any outside groups.

The lawsuit filed in the Northern District of U.S. District Court of California would require the agency to respond to a Freedom of Information Act request the Sierra Club filed on May 1. The deadline to comply with that FOIA passed on May 30.

Sierra's FOIA request specifically demands communications that Energy Secretary Rick Perry, DOE Chief of Staff Brian McCormack, and senior adviser Travis Fisher may have had with groups such as the Edison Electric Institute, Institute for Energy Research or utility representatives.

The lawsuit says the Sierra Club had at least four email exchanges with the agency about the requested communications after the FOIA deadline passed, and EPA failed to meet subsequent goals to comply with the FOIA request by mid-July and early August.

"Given DOE's demonstrated pattern of failing to produce documents by the dates it has communicated to the FOIA requester, Sierra Club is far from certain that any documents, much less a comprehensive response to our request, will be provided in late August," Sierra Club attorneys write.

WHAT'S NEXT: Sierra Club has asked the court to direct DOE to produce the communications "immediately" but it's unclear how quickly the case will proceed.

Green groups sue EPA over TSCA rules Back

By Annie Snider | 08/14/2017 01:21 PM EDT

Environmental groups have filed a suite of lawsuits challenging a pair of chemical safety rules finalized by the Trump administration last month.

The suits, filed Friday by Earthjustice in the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, and Environmental Defense Fund in the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, contest the two "framework rules" for implementing last year's bipartisan overhaul of the Toxic Substances Control Act. The rules govern how EPA will prioritize and conduct evaluations of tens of thousands of chemicals that are already on the market in the U.S.

In particular, the suits challenge the rules' approach to excluding certain uses of chemicals from EPA's evaluation of the substance's safety. Green groups argue that, under the law, EPA must analyze all of a substance's likely uses.

"Unfortunately, in straying from the letter and intent of that law, the EPA's framework rules leave the public at risk from chemicals commonly found in our homes, schools and workplaces," Richard Denison, lead senior scientist for Environmental Defense Fund, said in a statement. "Our legal challenges seek to hold EPA to the law and ensure that the public is protected as Congress intended."

EPA did not immediately respond to a request for comment on the lawsuits.

WHAT'S NEXT: The two appellate courts will decide whether to allow the lawsuits to proceed.

EPA to revamp 2015 power plant discharges rule Back

By Annie Snider | 08/14/2017 01:43 PM EDT

EPA will conduct a new rulemaking to "potentially revise" portions of a 2015 regulation limiting toxic discharges from coal-fired power plants, according to a letter sent by Administrator Scott Pruitt to the U.S. Small Business Administration Friday and obtained by POLITICO today.

The 2015 rule set new technology-based limits on heavy metals like mercury and arsenic that power plants discharge into waterways. The previous limits had not been updated in more than 30 years.

The portions of the rule Pruitt said could be revised are the most contentious and expensive ones governing how coal waste is managed by power plants.

"This new rulemaking has the potential to gut the rule. The two most impactful provisions of the rule by far — in terms of the amount of toxics that power plants are dumping into water bodies, and the costs to industry of complying with the rule — are the two main ones that EPA is reconsidering," Thomas Cmar, an Earthjustice attorney, said in an email.

Pruitt's letter indicates EPA will ask the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals to put challenges to the 2015 rule from the coal industry on hold while EPA conducts the new rulemaking. The letter makes no mention of other lawsuits joined with that litigation from environmental groups and drinking water utilities that challenge the overall rule.

EPA did not immediately reply to a request for comment.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA would need to file an official notice in order to launch a new rulemaking. The agency is also due to update the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals today on the status of its review of the 2015 rule.

GE's Immelt not quitting Trump's manufacturing committee Back

By Madeline Conway | 08/14/2017 01:44 PM EDT

Jeff Immelt, the chairman of General Electric, plans to stay on President Donald Trump's manufacturing committee, which the CEO of pharmaceutical company Merck left today in protest of the White House's response to a white supremacist rally in Charlottesville, Va.

In announcing his resignation from the advisory group, Merck's Kenneth Frazier cited Trump's widely panned response to the rally. A car attack on a crowd of counter-protesters left a woman dead and more than a dozen others injured, but Trump initially refused to call out the white supremacists in his response and instead condemned hate "on many sides."

A GE spokesperson said in a statement that the company "has no tolerance for hate, bigotry or racism, and we strongly condemn the violent extremism in Charlottesville over the weekend," but added that "it is important for GE to participate in the discussion on how to drive growth and productivity in the U.S."

"Therefore, Jeff Immelt will remain on the Presidential Committee on American Manufacturing while he is the Chairman of GE," the spokesperson said.

Immelt was chairman of former President Barack Obama's panel of outside economic advisers. He is reportedly a candidate to be Uber's next chief executive.

Following the uproar over his initial response to the violence in Charlottesville, Trump made another statement at the White House today calling racism "evil" and specifically citing hate groups like Nazis and the Ku Klux Klan.

Trump aides predicting 'brutal' September Back

By Josh Dawsey | 08/13/2017 05:43 PM EDT

Inside President Donald Trump's White House, no one seems to be looking forward to September.

Senior officials have described the coming month as "brutal," "bad" or "really tough" because of the confluence of complicated issues — but they also say it's pivotal to getting the presidency back on course.

Aides hope to have a better blueprint for how the president wants to proceed on a series of thorny issues — the nation's debt ceiling, the 2018 federal budget, tax reform, infrastructure spending and perhaps another stab at repealing Obamacare — after a series of meetings in New York this week.

Their goal is to partially temper Trump's expectations, hammer out some compromises and get a competing band of aides on the same page. The month has taken on outsize importance among some top aides and outside advisers, who view it as key to getting the presidency on a better track.

"The stakes are very high in September," said Jenny Beth Martin, who leads the Tea Party Patriots, a conservative grass-roots group. "There is a lot to do in a very short period of time."

Trump, who is impatient, wants it all done immediately, said people close to the president — and he has ratcheted up pressure on aides in recent weeks, even though he doesn't always engage with the substance of issues.

What makes the month harder is that many of the fights are in Congress, where the president and his team have little control.

"The president has made clear his commitment to getting health care, tax reform and infrastructure passed in Congress. There shouldn't have to be a choice," said Kelly Love, a White House spokeswoman.

Trump's aides have prepared lengthy memos and presentations on the legislative calendar for Trump in New York and Washington next week to see how he wants to handle the policy debates.

The fights come as White House aides expect investigations into Russian collusion to heat up and amid a newly rocky relationship with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell following a series of critical tweets and comments from Trump during his Bedminster, New Jersey, retreat last week. Other critical decisions are approaching, such as finalizing a strategy for Afghanistan and choosing whether to suspend the payment of Obamacare subsidies that keep insurance markets functioning smoothly.

And the president is increasingly venting about the apparent inability of the Republican Congress to agree on legislation, especially the Senate's high-profile failure to agree on legislation repealing Obamacare. He has told others he will distance himself from any failures, even as some of his aides push him to cultivate stronger relationships on Capitol Hill.

"The Republicans in Congress only seem to be efficient at one thing: coordinating hearings on Russia with the Democrats," said Sam Nunberg, a longtime Trump aide who left him in 2015 but still talks to administration officials. "At least they can get that done."

September also presents several fights about which Trump's aides aren't in agreement. Fault lines are already coming into view, even as Marc Short, the head of legislative affairs, is trying to get everyone on the same page ahead of the Trump Tower meetings, several administration officials said.

A successful September for many in the administration would include keeping the government open, passing a budget without too much of a showdown, securing some money for the long-promised border wall and beginning talks on tax reform, officials said, while continuing to work on the health care issue.

But other Trump aides have loftier expectations. For some, such as strategist Steve Bannon and his allies, securing money for the wall is a fight worth having. Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney would like spending cuts as part of raising the debt ceiling, but it remains unclear how hard he would be willing to battle for them.

Short is pushing to handle many of the budget issues quickly and to try to move quickly to tax reform, a strategy supported by Gary Cohn, the president's economic adviser, and Steven Mnuchin, his Treasury secretary. But advisers are still wrangling with the fine details of a tax plan. Bannon wants a higher tax on the wealthy, which could go nowhere, and while he previously wasn't involved in health care, Bannon has recently inserted himself into that fight, administration officials said.

The top headaches for Trump's White House are the Sept. 30 deadlines for raising the debt ceiling and funding the upcoming year's budget. The White House also wants to push agenda items, like more border money and defense spending, while also trying to curb deficits. White House officials, including Bannon, Short and chief of staff John Kelly, have told others they expect those fights to be messy.

The outcome that some White House officials fear is a three-month budget extension, only postponing the fight until December. Internally, White House officials are still battling over spending levels in the budget, according to several administration officials. Pressure is likely to rise from the conservative House Freedom Caucus for spending cuts for a budget and the debt ceiling, creating another clash with moderates like the one that tanked health care reform.

Trump, aides said, is determined to get money for the wall and immigration measures — and he is likely to balk at any plan that doesn't give him a win on a signature campaign issue.

Advisers are also deciding whether it makes sense to put considerable effort into reviving the health care fight immediately, as Trump wants to do, and whether to delay tax reform for a month or so while handling other issues — a move that would dismay important outside constituencies. "Tax reform isn't going to come out as soon as we first wanted," said one senior administration official with direct knowledge of the negotiations.

A number of senior officials would quietly prefer to leave health care alone after a bruising fight that climaxed in Trump's public clashes with McConnell. While some White House officials have worked quietly with governors on securing support for a state-based block grant plan, and others have worked with the Freedom Caucus on a repeal-only vote, there is little sign of momentum, senior White House officials said.

Trump wants health care done quickly, even as many in the Senate would like to move on. The president, who is combative, doesn't like to be seen compromising — and often focuses on an issue only after he has lost and received the public sting. "He thinks if we don't get health care done, we're losers," said one adviser who speaks with him often.

On Friday, the House Freedom Caucus vowed to push a repeal-only bill, which quickly secured support from conservative groups like the Club for Growth. Martin, the head of Tea Party Patriots, said she delivered more than a million signatures to the White House calling for the repeal of Obamacare. A bill would likely fail in the Senate, though, and take valuable time from the White House, which needs legislative wins by the end of the year. The Club for Growth said it would score lawmakers on the vote, a move meant to threaten them.

"We hear about repealing Obamacare from the grass roots every day," Martin said.

For many in Trump's White House, tax reform is the greater priority. Short and other senior aides have met with senators and important outside constituencies, like the network of groups backed by the billionaire brothers Charles and David Koch.

Tim Phillips, who leads Americans for Prosperity, one of the largest groups in the Koch network, said his donors are most focused on that, and outside groups say the administration has seemed far better prepared on tax reform than on health care.

"Our view is it's all about tax reform," said Scott Reed, chief strategist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Success would help turn the page on all the drama of the White House so far."

Trump declares 'racism is evil' amid pressure over Charlottesville Back

By Louis Nelson | 08/14/2017 08:21 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Monday denounced the white supremacist groups whose rally in Virginia on Saturday turned deadly, criticizing "racist violence" in remarks that were much more direct in their condemnation than his initial, widely panned response.

"Racism is evil. And those who cause violence in its name are criminals and thugs, including the KKK, neo-Nazis, white supremacists and other hate groups that are repugnant to everything we hold dear as Americans," Trump said in televised remarks Monday afternoon from the White House. "Those who spread violence in the name of bigotry strike at the very core of America."

Trump's remarks in the White House's Diplomatic Reception Room lasted just longer than five minutes, and his comments on Saturday's episode in Charlottesville were preceded by a preamble in which the president touted his administration's economic successes. Nowhere in his remarks did he label Saturday's clash, which left one woman dead, an act of terrorism, a characterization others in his administration and other Republicans have used.

That the president waited until Monday to specifically condemn the hate groups that marched over the weekend had raised eyebrows and recalled multiple episodes from his 2016 campaign in which the president was forced to distance himself, often after a delay and under public pressure, from symbolism and language tied to white supremacist and anti-Semitic groups. On Monday, Trump did not respond to reporters' shouted questions as to why it had taken him two days to explicitly denounce white supremacy.

Attorney General Jeff Sessions and newly installed FBI Director Christopher Wray briefed Trump on Monday before his statement on the clashes in Charlottesville.

Earlier in the day, administration officials rushed to defend Trump's first response to the weekend's deadly violence, insisting that he had already condemned the ideology of hate groups. Those groups, ostensibly gathered for a rally to protest the removal of a statue of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee, clashed with counterprotesters. The violence peaked when a man drove a car into a crowd of counterprotesters, killing one woman and injuring 19 other people, authorities said.

The president's first comments came Saturday from his club in Bedminster, New Jersey, where he decried "this egregious display of hatred, bigotry and violence on many sides." A White House statement on Sunday sought to clarify the president's position as condemning white supremacists, but the statement was attributed only to an unnamed White House official, stoking questions about why it was issued behind a cloak of anonymity.

Trump's initial statement that "many sides" were to blame struck critics as equating the actions of hate groups with those of counterprotesters. Vice President Mike Pence, however, told NBC that Trump was referring to past, unrelated protests in which there were attacks on law enforcement.

Sessions insisted there was no ambiguity in the president's initial statement.

"He made a very strong statement that directly contradicted the ideology of hatred, violence, bigotry, racism and white supremacy," Sessions told NBC's "Today" show Monday. "Those things must be condemned. They're totally unacceptable. ... He's been firm on this from the beginning. He is appalled by this."

It was unclear Monday why Trump finally decided to make additional remarks or whether it would stem the flow of withering bipartisan criticism.

Prominent Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) wrote online after Trump's first statement that "We should call evil by its name. My brother didn't give his life fighting Hitler for Nazi ideas to go unchallenged here at home."

Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.), chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, addressed Trump directly on Twitter, writing "Mr. President — we must call evil by its name. These were white supremacists and this was domestic terrorism."

Michael Signer, Charlottesville's Democratic mayor, told MSNBC's "Morning Joe" on Monday that Trump's remarks had left the president "on the sidelines" of a "country that really needs to progress and heal and tell the truth about a lot of chapters in our history." Signer, who was among those urging Electoral College voters not to certify Trump's 2016 victory, connected the violence in his city over the weekend to the president's campaign.

"Look, I think some of this speaks for itself. We saw the campaign that they ran, we saw the folks they surround themselves, we saw what [former Ku Klux Klan leader] David Duke, you know, people like that say about the president," Signer said. "I think that Charlottesville is going to be synonymous with the nation at long last turning the page on this horrific chapter in American politics where bigots and, you know, the fringe of the fringe were invited into the mainstream, out from the shadows where they belonged."

Trump's handling of the issue could even disrupt his policy agenda. Merck CEO Kenneth Frazier announced via his company's Twitter account Monday morning that he would resign from the president's American Manufacturing Council. Frazier wrote that "our country's strength stems from its diversity."

"America's leaders must honor our fundamental values by clearly rejecting expressions of hatred, bigotry and group supremacy, which run counter to the American ideal that all people are created equal," Frazier's statement said. "As CEO of Merck and as a matter of personal conscience, I feel a responsibility to take a stand against intolerance and extremism."

Trump responded on Twitter by attacking Merck: "Now that Ken Frazier of Merck Pharma has resigned from President's Manufacturing Council, he will have more time to LOWER RIPOFF DRUG PRICES!"

Obama team was warned in 2014 about Russian interference Back

By Ali Watkins | 08/14/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The Obama administration received multiple warnings from national security officials between 2014 and 2016 that the Kremlin was ramping up its intelligence operations and building disinformation networks it could use to disrupt the U.S. political system, according to more than half a dozen current and former officials.

As early as 2014, the administration received a report that quoted a well-connected Russian source as saying that the Kremlin was building a disinformation arm that could be used to interfere in Western democracies. The report, according to an official familiar with it, included a quote from the Russian source telling U.S. officials in Moscow, "You have no idea how extensive these networks are in Europe ... and in the U.S., Russia has penetrated media organizations, lobbying firms, political parties, governments and militaries in all of these places."

That report was circulated among the National Security Council, intelligence agencies and the State Department via secure email and cable in the spring of 2014 as part of a larger assessment of Russian intentions in Ukraine, the official said.

There was no explicit warning of a threat to U.S. elections, but the official said some diplomats and national security officials in Moscow felt the administration was too quick to dismiss the possibility that the Kremlin incursions could reach the United States.

"Even if the Russians and [Russian President Vladimir] Putin had these ambitions, they were doubtful of their capacity to execute them," the official said of the Obama administration.

Former White House officials, requesting anonymity to discuss intelligence reporting, confirmed that the administration began receiving increased traffic in 2014 about Russian disinformation and covert influence in campaigns, but said they did not recall receiving that specific warning about Russian inroads in the United States.

Ned Price, a former spokesperson for the National Security Council, rejected the idea that the administration failed to heed warnings about Russian interference in the U.S. political system or Russian cyberespionage in general.

"The Obama administration was nothing but proactive in responding to Russian aggression in all of its forms, especially as Moscow became more brazen with and following its military moves against Ukraine beginning in 2014," Price said, citing sanctions and increased American support to NATO as evidence of the former administration's seriousness.

But subsequent events — including Russia's interference in the American election through hacks of the emails of the Democratic National Committee and Hillary Clinton campaign Chairman John Podesta, among other intrusions identified by U.S. intelligence — have left many in the former administration wondering whether they could have done more.

"People have criticized us ... for not coming out more forcefully and saying it," former CIA Director John Brennan said at the Aspen National Forum in July. "There was no playbook for this."

On Oct. 7, 2016, about a month before the election, the administration revealed, through a statement from the director of national intelligence and the Department of Homeland Security, that the U.S. government believed Russia was behind the hacks and was seeking to interfere with the election. The revelation, which many in the White House expected to be bombshell news, was largely overshadowed by the revelation that same day of an "Access Hollywood" tape in which Donald Trump made crude and sexist comments to anchor Billy Bush.

But others in the national security community say an overly cautious Obama White House could have done more both during the campaign and in the previous months and years to alert Russia that it was aware of its intentions to subvert the U.S. democracy — along with those of some other Western countries — and would retaliate forcefully at the first sign of Russian interference.

POLITICO spoke with more than a dozen current and former officials from across the national security spectrum, including intelligence agencies, the State Department and the Pentagon. Almost all said they were aware of Russia's aggressive cyberespionage and disinformation campaigns — especially after the dramatic Russian attempt to hack Ukrainian elections in 2014 — but felt that either the White House or key agencies were unwilling to act forcefully to counter the Russian actions.

Intelligence officials "had a list of things they could never get the signoffs on," one intelligence official said. "The truth is, nobody wanted to piss off the Russians."

Among the strategies put forward prior to the 2016 election were closing two Russian dachas in Maryland and New York, which were long suspected of being Russian intelligence sites, expelling diplomats and engaging in counterintelligence operations that would alert Putin to the United States' determination to strike back against any attempts at interference in the U.S. political system.

Officials outside the White House blamed micromanagement by the National Security Council for the lack of a more forceful response, while a former NSC official says any failure to act forcefully against Russia was because of concerns by the State Department and, less frequently, the Defense Department about potential retaliation by Moscow.

"The frustrations [about lack of forceful action] are justified and, frankly, were shared by the White House," said the former official, who requested anonymity due to this person's continuing work in Russia.

"The options were being discussed. They weren't being implemented," the former official added.

The State Department and Pentagon often objected to harsher measures endorsed by the intelligence community, one official said, a difference in perspective that some attributed to the fact that diplomatic staff and defense attaches were obvious targets of retaliation, rather than intelligence officers who usually work undercover.

Concerns about Russian cyberespionage and election meddling largely grew out of the events following Russia's annexation of Crimea in March 2014, followed by an aggressive Russian effort to influence the Ukrainian presidential election that May.

A Russia-backed cyberattack against Ukraine's voting infrastructure during the May election was thwarted at the 11th hour. The cyberintrusions — which in some cases could have changed voter tallies — were discovered just hours before what could have been catastrophic outcomes.

"The reports from sources deep inside the Russian government were alarming," one current U.S. official who served under the Obama administration said. "We started getting stuff in April, May [of 2014] that was extraordinary about the extent of the threat and the capacities the Russians were building."

"We were worried [Putin] would try to test us," recalled a former Obama administration official.

The Ukraine crisis — coupled with the Kremlin's embrace of National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden, who continues to be granted asylum by Moscow — was a sobering moment for the White House, one recently departed intelligence officer and the current administration official said.

Yet the administration still was reluctant to engage in more forceful counterintelligence strategies against the Kremlin, including more aggressively tracking and tailing Russian operatives within the United States, according to five of the officials who spoke to POLITICO.

Those outside the White House said they received frustrating mixed messages: The White House would subsequently dismiss Moscow's capabilities while also citing fear of an escalation with Putin.

Price, the former NSC spokesman, denied those claims.

"We responded with the same clarity of purpose following Moscow's aggression against U.S. officials in Russia and, of course, in the face of the Kremlin's attempt to undermine the integrity of our electoral process," he said.

But several senior intelligence and administration officials recall it differently.

"It just seemed like it was difficult, especially after the Crimea and the Ukraine ... there still wasn't a willingness to more heartily engage in the effort," the former intelligence officer said.

In one particularly frustrating instance, officials said, they reiterated a longstanding desire to shut down the two Russian dachas in Maryland and New York. Amid escalating tensions, it was often presented as a way to send a message to Moscow.

"For quite some time, it was an active option. Secretary Kerry refused to consider it," the former NSC official said. "We were getting pushback from the head of the agency being harassed. That was a constant frustration."

Former Secretary of State John Kerry was overseas and unavailable for comment. But a former senior State Department official, speaking as a representative of Kerry, saw it differently. "Kerry agreed to shut down the dachas, but had not settled on the timing," the official said.

Tensions finally reached a fever pitch in the summer of 2016. Just days before Russian operatives began releasing troves of stolen DNC emails, a CIA officer under official diplomatic cover was brutally beaten outside the U.S. embassy in Moscow. The officer managed to slip to safety inside the door of the U.S. compound but was immediately evacuated for medical care.

U.S. intelligence and law enforcement officials worked frantically to compile retaliatory options for the Obama White House. Despite being presented with several strategies — including more aggressively tailing Russian diplomats in the U.S. — it opted to do nothing immediately.

"There was some real anger," the former intelligence officer said. "We weren't going to mug anybody, but we could at least be more overt in our coverages. We could expel some people, we could do more overt surveillance on people."

Another former intelligence official put it this way: "The longer we don't push back, the harder they push."

Even after the release of emails designed to damage Clinton's campaign, the White House was reluctant to respond, something that several recently departed Obama-era officials have lamented.

After compiling a list of potential retaliatory options in the summer of 2016 — including kicking out more than 100 Russian diplomats, one official told POLITICO — the pushback from national security agencies was so great and varied, the NSC official said, that for months nothing was done.

"Any of these actions risked a Russian reciprocation," the former NSC official said. "We were kind of caught in a catch-22."

After the election, in December, the White House finally announced the expulsion of 35 diplomats and ordered the Kremlin officials out of the two Russian-owned dachas.

But in a further indication of the tensions within the Obama team, Kerry rejected suggestions that he personally break the news of the expulsions and closing of the dachas to Russian foreign minister Sergey Lavrov, the former NSC official said. Instead, the job was left to Pat Kennedy, one of Kerry's undersecretaries.

The former State Department official, speaking for Kerry, said the option of having Kerry communicate the expulsions and closing of the dachas to Lavrov was never discussed. But the former NSC official was unmoved.

"The idea of having Kerry doing it with Lavrov was raised several times and he didn't want to do it," the NSC official said.

The expulsions and closing of the dachas were symbolic moves that stung the Kremlin, but for many intelligence officers, it was too little, too late.

While some Obama White House officials privately concede that they, too, wish there had been a more forceful response, others stand by the decisions that were made.

"People at the working level don't necessarily understand" the full scope of policy implications, one former White House official said.

Now, to the further frustration of some intelligence officers, there is little indication that, for all Trump's bluster, he'll be tougher on the Kremlin. In his first months in office, the president has signaled a willingness to work with Moscow on several fronts, and has pushed back hard against his own intelligence community's assessment that Russia actively worked to elect him to the presidency.

It's a bitter pill for many who see Trump's election as the avoidable outcome of years' worth of counterintelligence failings against Russia.

"They were warned. They underestimated it until it was too late," the current administration official said of the Obama White House and Russia, with a tinge of bitterness. "They just didn't know how to deal with the bad guys."

The GOP rebel threatening to snag Sessions' Senate seat Back

By Seung Min Kim | 08/14/2017 05:09 AM EDT

HOMEWOOD, Ala. — Roy Moore lacks the war chest of two chief rivals in his bid to become the next senator from Alabama. He didn't land the coveted endorsement of President Donald Trump, and doesn't enjoy the advantages of incumbency.

Yet the controversial former state Supreme Court justice is coasting over his Republican challengers in Tuesday's closely watched GOP Senate primary. Moore is set to easily secure a place in a September runoff, as the establishment-backed Sen. Luther Strange and Rep. Mo Brooks scrap for the second spot.

Should Moore become the GOP nominee and the next senator from Alabama, his bombastic personality and antipathy toward Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) are sure to make more trouble for the GOP leader, who's taking constant flak from Trump as it is. McConnell and his allies are spending millions to elect Strange, and in response, Moore has made McConnell the symbol of everything he opposes in Washington.

"I resent people from Washington, raising money in Washington, and sending negative ads to Alabama and trying to control the vote of the people," Moore said in an interview after a GOP executive committee meeting here. "If the Washington crowd wants somebody, the people of Alabama generally don't."

Strange was tapped in February to temporarily assume Jeff Sessions' Senate seat after he was appointed attorney general. Strange and his supporters have spent the campaign trying to tear down Brooks, a four-term congressman and member of the Freedom Caucus, to ensure Strange slides into the runoff against Moore.

Confident they've succeeded against Brooks despite polls showing a close race for second place, the pro-Strange forces recently began running ads against Moore. Leading the way is the deep-pocketed Senate Leadership Fund, which has close ties to McConnell and pledged earlier this year to spend up to $10 million to prop up Strange. It plans to ramp up the attacks once the six-week sprint to a Sept. 26 runoff election begins.

Moore's national notoriety stems primarily from his stormy tenure on the Alabama Supreme Court. He was removed as chief justice in 2003 for opposing the removal of a Ten Commandments statue from the state Capitol. But Moore was nevertheless reelected to the court, and then suspended for declining to enforce the 2015 U.S. Supreme Court decision that legalized same-sex marriages. After losing an appeal, he resigned in April.

Moore embraces the controversies as a badge of honor.

"What I've done is stand for my country, stand for my Constitution, and I've suffered accordingly," said the 70-year-old Moore. "I think controversy will follow you if you stand up for truth. It's that simple. If you stand up for truth, you're going to have consequences."

He's also prone to teeing off rhetorically. In a recent interview with the Guardian, Moore mused that Vladimir Putin is "maybe ... more akin to me than I know" when told about the Russian president's opposition to gay marriage.

And at a candidate forum here in the Birmingham suburbs, Moore went after transgender troops in the military, telling the crowd of local party faithful: "If we're going to file for hormone treatments and medical surgeries, that's not making your military stronger. You've got to have a disciplined military."

Aside from social issues and the Constitution, Moore, a Vietnam War veteran, has campaigned on a platform of a stronger military. Talking to voters, he laments that the United States doesn't "carry the image around this world that we used to carry."

Moore — who plans to ride a horse to the polls on Tuesday with his wife, Kayla — insists he doesn't engage in negative campaigning, though his annoyance with McConnell and Strange's allies are clearly growing by the day.

"They're that out of touch in Washington that they don't understand that Alabama people aren't that out of touch," Moore complained in the interview.

That outspokenness is what has made Moore's lead in the race so durable, his fervent backers and even those endorsing his opponents say. One voter, Tom Ford of Montgomery, argued that Moore was "unethically removed for doing something that was ethical by an unethical system."

"The state itself, it does feel the connection with the history of having Judge Moore for so long," said Matt Davidson of Birmingham, a Moore supporter. "He's just so thoroughly Alabama."

Still, national Republicans believe Moore has a high floor but a low ceiling of support. They're confident they can bludgeon the jurist during the runoff so Strange emerges with the Republican nomination, which would effectively elect him to the Senate seat until 2020 in this GOP-heavy state.

Establishment-minded Republicans in the state say Moore's provocative persona is wearing thin.

"You got Roy Moore, who's just had horrible problems with being suspended twice at the Supreme Court," said Jim Wilson, an Alabama businessman who backs Strange. "That doesn't resonate very well with a lot of voters, in my opinion. Last thing we want is that type of personality in the Senate."

Polls have shown Moore steadily leading the sprawling field of nine candidates. A JMC Analytics and Polling survey taken Aug. 5-6 found Moore winning 30 percent of primary voters, Strange with 22 percent and Brooks with 19 percent. A Trafalgar Group poll taken mostly after Trump's Aug. 8 endorsement of Strange had Moore at 35 percent, Strange at 23 percent and Brooks with 20 percent.

Strange has vastly outraised his competitors, hauling in $2.8 million this cycle, compared with $456,000 for Moore and $540,000 for Brooks, according to the latest figures from the Federal Election Commission.

That financial advantage, and especially SLF's support, has allowed Strange and his allies to pummel Brooks on the air, particularly over the congressman's pointed criticism of Trump during the presidential campaign. SLF began piling on Moore earlier this month with an ad chastising the judge for taking $1 million in salary for him and his wife from a Christian charity he founded. (Moore's campaign has called the ad "blatantly false and misleading.")

Perhaps acknowledging the voter discontent over the ads, Strange distanced himself from the notion that he's the majority leader's handpicked candidate: "I just met Mitch McConnell in February."

"We had no previous relationship," Strange told reporters. "I had never met him before. To say that I'm kind of his, quote, guy, is kind of silly, if you ask me." (Both Moore and Brooks, whose campaign bus now features a "Ditch Mitch" banner, say they would not back McConnell for GOP leader.)

It's unclear how much Trump's backing of Strange will boost him in Tuesday's election; it could make a more significant difference in the runoff, particularly if the incumbent senator repeatedly reminds voters of the endorsement.

That's what Strange did in front of GOP activists here, describing the out-of-the-blue phone call he received from the White House last Tuesday. He said he was so surprised that he almost drove into a ditch.

After Trump thanked Strange for supporting him and his agenda in the Senate, the president asked the senator what he could do in advance of Tuesday's election.

"Well, Mr. President, whatever you think is appropriate. A tweet wouldn't be bad," Strange said, describing the conversation. "He said, 'You know, I have 118 million Twitter followers.' (Trump actually has 35.7 million followers.) I said, 'I do sir, I know that very well.'"

Trump called Strange again on Thursday to check up on the senator's campaign. "I'm in this fight with you now, and we need to win," Trump said, according to Strange.

One of Strange's biggest liabilities is how the senator was chosen by disgraced former Gov. Robert Bentley for Sessions' Senate seat. As the state's attorney general, Strange last November had asked a state House committee investigating a potential Bentley impeachment to hold off while his office conducted "related work." Strange has said there was no impropriety in his request.

But those insinuations, as well as McConnell's overt involvement, have apparently stuck, according to Alabama political observers. One poll last week from Cygnal/L2 found Strange with a 42 percent unfavorable rating, while the JMC survey had Strange at 50 percent unfavorable.

That means Brooks backers, should he come in third in Tuesday's primary, may gravitate toward Moore.

One former Alabama GOP official speculated that while Brooks voters around Huntsville — an area saturated with doctorate degrees that is heavily reliant on the federal government — will go with Strange in the runoff, his supporters elsewhere, particularly in the outlining counties, will break hard for Moore.

"Moore," state Rep. Ed Henry, chairman of Trump's Alabama campaign who is backing Brooks, said flatly when asked where the congressman's supporters go if he doesn't make the runoff. "Nobody will vote for Luther Strange. The negative ads don't help him any. Luther Strange is exactly what we've had for the last forever how many decades and he is more of the same. Nobody wants that."

It's clear the negative ads are leaving an impact on some voters.

"They're lies. That's what I think of them," Celia Waters, a Brooks supporter from Fairhope, said of the ads as Brooks campaigned at a Biscuit King in her hometown. "They've not only come against Congressman Brooks, but they've also come against Judge Moore."

Waters declined to say whom she'd back in the runoff should Brooks not make it.

But she added: "I'll never vote for a liar. I'll just put it that way."

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Judge rejects to dismiss Keystone XL lawsuit — Trump, lawmakers to meet next week on avoiding shutdown — Murkowski backing Obamacare mandate repeal

EPA KEEPS BIOFUEL RULES: EPA has decided not to change compliance requirements for the Renewable Fuels Standard, the agency confirms, a move that rebuffs an effort from some independent refining companies and former White House adviser Carl Icahn to ease refiners' requirements under the biofuels program. "Based on a wide range of stakeholder input and information provided as a part of the public comment period, the Agency has determined that changing the regulatory point of obligation for compliance with the RFS program is not appropriate," EPA spokesperson Liz Bowman said in an email.

The Trump administration decided in August to reject the request to move the "point of obligation" under the RFS, POLITICO reported at the time. But an official announcement did not come until today.

JUDGE REJECTS CALL TO DISMISS KEYSTONE XL LAWSUIT: A U.S. judge today rejected the Trump administration's call to dismiss a lawsuit filed by environmental groups and landowners challenging its approval of the Keystone XL project, your AE host reports. Judge Brian Morris of the U.S. District Court for the District of Montana Great Falls Division denied motions by the Trump administration and TransCanada Keystone Pipeline LP to dismiss the lawsuit, finding that the State Department's April issuance of a presidential permit for the controversial project constituted an agency action, not presidential, that is therefore subject to environmental laws and the Administrative Procedure Act.

"The mere fact that the pipeline crossed the international border did not insulate the State Department's analysis of the environmental impacts of the pipeline project from judicial review under the APA," Morris said in the order. Moreover, "no agency possesses discretion whether to comply with procedural requirements" such as the National Environmental Policy Act, the judge said. He later added that the Endangered Species Act provided "no exclusion for Presidential Permits."

TRUMP, LAWMAKERS TO MEET NEXT WEEK ON AVOIDING SHUTDOWN: President Donald Trump and top congressional leaders will meet next Tuesday to try to hammer out a year-end agreement to avert a government shutdown, according to multiple sources, as Capitol Hill careens toward a legislative pile-up next month. The so-called Big Four — Speaker Paul Ryan, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer — haven't even agreed on total government spending levels that would allow appropriators to write a massive funding bill for the rest of the fiscal year, report Seung Min Kim, Heather Caygle and Andrew Restuccia.

That means a short-term funding extension to keep the government operating beyond a Dec. 8 deadline is all but inevitable. Congressional leaders would likely need to reach an agreement on the topline figures by early next week for there to be any chance of finishing an omnibus spending bill in December.

BARTON APOLOGIZES FOR NUDE SELFIE: Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas), vice chairman of the Energy and Commerce committee admitted that a nude picture of him circulating online is authentic and apologized to his constituents, Kyle Cheney reports. "While separated from my second wife, prior to the divorce, I had sexual relationships with other mature adult women," Barton, 68, said in a statement first reported by the Texas Tribune. "Each was consensual. Those relationships have ended. I am sorry I did not use better judgment during those days. I am sorry that I let my constituents, down." The longtime congressman said he is considering his political future, after announcing plans to seek reelection just three weeks ago.

MURKOWSKI BACKING OBAMACARE MANDATE REPEAL: Sen. Lisa Murkowski said in an op-ed in an Alaska newspaper Tuesday she supports GOP efforts to repeal the individual mandate in the Affordable Care Act, Dan Diamond reports. "I believe that the federal government should not force anyone to buy something they do not wish to buy, in order to avoid being taxed," Murkowski said in the op-ed. Her support for ending the mandate — after opposing her party's Obamacare repeal bills earlier this year — is a boon for Senate Republican's tax legislation, which includes a mandate repeal and is expected to be voted on next week. But a spokesman for the senator cautioned against construing Murkowski's comments as supporting the tax bill.

Murkowski has been pushing to open part of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas development and her Energy and Natural Resources Committee earlier this month advanced legislation that directs the Interior Department to offer two ANWR leases of at least 400,000 acres each within 10 years. The legislation will be used in the wider budget reconciliation package that will include tax reforms.

CBO PUBLISHES FULL COST ESTIMATE ON ANWR: The CBO on Tuesday released a full cost estimate report of its earlier finding the ANWR legislation would raise about $1.1 billion over the 2018-2027 period for the federal government, with Alaska receiving the other half of the estimated $2.2 billion in total gross proceeds. CBO noted that it picked the midpoint in the estimated range of potential bid prices given that companies may make different assumptions than CBO "about long-term oil prices, production costs, the amount of oil and gas resources in ANWR, and alternative investment opportunities."

OIL INDUSTRY'S HAPPY THANKSGIVING: A surge in U.S. oil prices will have oil executives raising their wine glasses in thanks tomorrow. The price of light, sweet crude oil futures popped above $58 a barrel today, and finished at $57.80, helped by a nearly 2 million-barrel draw oil inventories last week, as well as the shutdown of the Keystone pipeline that delivers nearly 600,000 barrels of Canadian crude per day to the industry's storage hub at Cushing, Okla.

That pipeline outage — caused by a 210,000 gallon oil spill last week — also pushed the spot January futures contract to a premium above the February contract, a market condition known as backwardation that shows more demand for near-term supplies than those for later delivery, and which is likely to give market bulls some confidence. Not that they need it: January crude futures have rallied a whopping 36 percent since their June low. And of course, next week all eyes will shift to Vienna, where OPEC members, and perhaps 20 other nations, will meet, and likely extend production cuts through the end of next year.

FERC APPROVES TRANSCO'S GULF CONNECTOR EXPANSION PROJECT:

FERC on Tuesday approved Transcontinental Gas Pipeline Co.'s proposed $167.4 million Gulf Connector expansion project aimed at shipping 475,000 dekatherms per day of natural gas from Louisiana to LNG export terminals in Texas. Transco plans to build the project's compressor stations, pipeline interconnect and other facilities in two phases ending in 2019 and has signed long-term contracts with Cheniere Energy, the developers of the Corpus Christi LNG Export Terminal, and Japan's Osaka Gas Trading & Export, which is a customer of the Freeport LNG Terminal.

EPA will reject change that Trump backer Icahn sought Back

By Eric Wolff | 08/03/2017 11:53 AM EDT

The Trump administration plans to reject a proposal that would let oil refiners off the hook for complying with the federal ethanol mandate, a senior administration official told POLITICO, dashing the hopes of billionaire Carl Icahn and a slew of independent companies.

The Environmental Protection Agency plans to formally announce the decision within the next two weeks, the official said.

The move is a severe blow for Icahn, a longtime associate and early supporter of Donald Trump who owns the refiner CVR Energy. He was once so confident that the obligation would be changed that he tried to strike a deal with a biofuels trade association.

Ultimately, Icahn and his allies were unable to prevail over a peculiar alliance of major oil companies and biofuels producers, who opposed changing the Renewable Fuel Standard, though for different reasons.

Icahn, refining giant Valero and smaller refiners argued that purchasing compliance credits, called Renewable Identification Numbers, squeezed their bottom lines and, in some cases, threatened to put them out of business. Icahn's CVR lost $19 million in the second quarter of this year after guessing incorrectly that the administration would make the policy change.

Trump has turned away from one of Icahn's main policy goals in large part due to pressure from corn-state voters and ethanol organizations.

"President Trump supports the EPA's decision," the official said.

The decision follows through on Trump's campaign promise to support ethanol and leave the mandate intact. Corn states and ethanol interests have been lobbying hard, arguing that the change would set back an ethanol industry that is vital to some of the states where voters strongly backed Trump.

"Mr. Trump won that election because voters in Iowa and across the heartland, we rose up in support of him," Annette Sweeney, a member of Trump's Agriculture Advisory Council, said in an interview after the election. "Mr. Trump, the time I visited with him, he understood the need for home-grown fuel, the need for cleaner fuel. Here in Iowa, we were some of Mr. Trump's strongest supporters. And I really think shifting the point of obligation would interrupt America's progress toward making clean renewable biofuels."

Biofuels producers believed that if EPA had shifted the "point of obligation" away from refiners, as Icahn and other companies requested, it would cause years of upheaval. The American Petroleum Institute, which represents much of the oil industry, including the oil majors, has opposed the change, saying it would be a distraction from the kind of overhaul or full-on repeal the program needs.

EPA will finalize an Obama-era proposed decision to reject a petition by refiners that asked to change the program. The agency has been ready to act for months, but the White House Office of Legal Counsel advised waiting for the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to rule in an omnibus case of RFS challenges, the official said. The case included a challenge by merchant refiners to force EPA to make a decision on the obligation question. In its ruling, the court rejected the request by the refiners to require EPA to decide on the obligation question in every annual RFS rule, but it did say EPA should make a decision at some point. The resolution of the case opens the door for EPA to act.

Oil analysts don't believe the decision to leave the program unchanged will have a significant effect on the cost of RINs, which has fallen substantially since last year.

"The changing of the point of obligation doesn't mean RINs will be more expensive or cheaper," said Tom Kloza, Global Head of Energy Analysis for OPIS.

Critics of the RFS focus on high RIN prices as a chief reason for changing which companies are obligated. CVR lost $19 million in RIN costs in the second quarter after guessing incorrectly that the administration would expand the number of companies complying with the RFS, a move that might have pushed RIN prices down.

Valero CEO Joe Gorder said Valero spent $750 million on RINs last year, and Icahn has called RIN sales "the mother of all squeezes." Delaware Valley refiners like the Delta Airlines-owned Monroe Energy and Philadelphia Energy, already smarting from the legalization of crude exports in 2015, say RIN costs could drive layoffs or even bankruptcy.

Valero and other refiners sued the EPA over the obligation issue, arguing that EPA should address it each time it sets new mandates for biofuel blending. Oral arguments in that case were held before the D.C. Circuit last month.

For Icahn, the move could be a blow to the stock price of CVR's refining subsidiary, which shot up 40 percent between Trump's election and the first months of his presidency. But by Wednesday, CVR Refining's stock had fallen back to 6 percent below Election Day.

An early Trump supporter, Icahn was named a "special adviser" to the president, though he is not on the government payroll. Icahn was so confident the change was coming that he and Valero presented the president with draft language for an executive order in February. That same month, he called Bob Dinneen of the Renewable Fuels Association, an ethanol trade group, and told him the ink was already drying on an executive order changing the program, and offering to meet Dinneen's demands for providing support. News of the conversation drove down RIN prices and also split RFA from the biofuels community. Within days, RFA had been booted from Fuels America, a political umbrella group for ethanol producers.

The order never came, and in the wake of the news, Icahn became the subject of ethical questions surrounding his role at the White House. Public Citizen filed a lobbying complaint with both houses of Congress, and last week eight Senate Democrats, led by Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, sent letters to the Securities and Exchange Commission, EPA and Commodity Futures Trading Commission calling for an investigation into Icahn's dealings.

Icahn went quiet on the issue over the past few months, possibly as a result of all the investigations and letters from senators.

Icahn did not respond to a request for comment, and EPA did not respond for the record.

Trump and congressional leaders to hold talks to avoid shutdown Back

By Seung Min Kim, Heather Caygle and Andrew Restuccia | 11/22/2017 02:00 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and top congressional leaders will meet next week to try to hammer out a year-end agreement to avert a government shutdown, according to multiple sources, as Capitol Hill careens toward a legislative pile-up next month.

The so-called Big Four — Speaker Paul Ryan, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer — haven't even agreed on total government spending levels that would allow appropriators to write a massive funding bill for the rest of the fiscal year.

That means a short-term funding extension to keep the government operating beyond a Dec. 8 deadline is all but inevitable. Congressional leaders would likely need to reach an agreement on the topline figures by early next week for there to be any chance of finishing an omnibus spending bill in December.

The meeting is scheduled for Tuesday at 3 p.m., according to congressional sources and a White House official.

In addition to having to move a must-pass bill to fund the government, Republicans hope to pass a sweeping rewrite of the tax code by Christmas.

Further complicating matters is the ongoing dispute over the fate of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, the Obama-era initiative that has shielded hundreds of thousands of young undocumented immigrants from deportation.

Trump has announced that DACA permits will expire beginning in March, although immigration advocates have said scores of current DACA recipients have already lost protections because they weren't able to get their status renewed before an October deadline.

One source familiar with the negotiations said Democrats, particularly Pelosi, have pushed aggressively to include a DACA fix to a short-term continuing resolution that would keep the government open beyond Dec. 8. A Democratic leadership aide said Pelosi has not asked specifically for a DACA fix to be attached to a short-term extension, although she and Schumer have been publicly adamant that a legislative solution for DACA needs to pass Congress next month.

Democratic leaders have also insisted on ensuring that any agreement to raise defense spending above sequester levels also boosts funding for domestic programs.

Murkowski says she backs Obamacare mandate repeal Back

By Dan Diamond | 11/21/2017 08:33 PM EDT

Sen. Lisa Murkowski says she supports GOP efforts to repeal the Affordable Care Act's individual mandate, the Alaska Republican wrote in an op-ed for a local newspaper Tuesday.

"I have always supported the freedom to choose," Murkowski wrote in her op-ed for the Daily News-Miner, an Alaska newspaper. "I believe that the federal government should not force anyone to buy something they do not wish to buy, in order to avoid being taxed."

Murkowski's renewed support for repealing the mandate — after repeatedly opposing her party's Obamacare repeal bills this year — may be a boon for Senate Republicans' tax legislation, which includes mandate repeal and is expected to be taken up on the Senate floor next week.

A spokesperson for Murkowski told POLITICO that the comments should not be construed as support for the tax bill, which does not yet appear to have sufficient support to pass the chamber.

"Senator Murkowski said on Friday that she will be reviewing the work of the Finance Committee over the Thanksgiving holiday and plans to look at the entire package before coming to any conclusion on the legislation," the spokesperson said.

Senate Republicans can only lose two votes and still pass their tax bill through the budget reconciliation process, which requires only a simple majority. Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) opposes the bill, saying it disadvantages small businesses, and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) has said that the bill needs to be changed. Several deficit hawks have also raised concerns about the cost of the bill.

Meanwhile, Democrats and pro-ACA advocates have seized on the decision to revive Obamacare repeal efforts, exhorting activists who opposed the GOP's health care bills this spring and summer to similarly oppose the fast-moving tax legislation.

Health care industry groups and the CBO also have predicted that repealing the individual mandate could harm the health care marketplace. The nonpartisan American Academy of Actuaries on Tuesday warned Senate leaders that eliminating the mandate would lead healthy individuals to drop coverage, raising premiums for the remaining Americans in the individual insurance market and increasing the number of uninsured, barring a replacement mechanism that encouraged consumers to seek out health coverage. However, Standard & Poor's and other observers contend that repealing the mandate may not be a devastating blow to the insurance markets.

In her op-ed, Murkowski called again for Congress to pass the package of reforms pushed by Sens. Lamar Alexander and Patty Murray, which the Alaska senator argued would stabilize the ACA's troubled individual insurance market.

"While I support repealing the individual mandate, I strongly support enacting the bipartisan compromise Alexander/Murray legislation into law as fast as possible to stabilize our markets, provide more control to states and more choices to individuals," Murkowski wrote.

With TSA on the ropes, holiday travel may be a bear Back

By Stephanie Beasley | 11/22/2017 05:01 AM EDT

The Transportation Security Administration has bad news for tens of millions of Thanksgiving holiday travelers: Lines at airports may be even longer than usual as the agency tries once again to plug security holes in its baggage screening.

TSA is scrambling to respond to yet another damning investigation of its screening effectiveness, for the second time in little more than two years. And the agency is already phasing in revised security procedures — including those for passengers' electronic devices — that could cause "a slight increase in wait times," new TSA Administrator David Pekoske said in an interview.

"The procedure is new," Pekoske said. "It's new to passengers. It's somewhat new to our screeners."

The additional delays may not be as horrendous as the hourslong queues that left many passengers stranded at airports in the summer of 2016, a year after TSA leaders launched a crash course in security improvements in response to a previous failing grade from its inspector general.

But Pekoske said travelers could experience some of the longest wait times of the year on Sunday when many return home from the holiday. TSA has projected that more than 2.6 million passengers and airline crew members will be screened on Sunday alone, potentially making it one of the agency's top five busiest days ever.

The squeeze is the latest example of a predicament TSA has faced since its creation in 2001: trying to balance effective security with the need to move travelers efficiently through checkpoints. Obama-era TSA chief Peter Neffenger said the agency has spent almost all of its short lifespan fighting for the resources it needs — but when he reviewed what caused the poor performance in the 2015 audit, he found a "disproportionate emphasis on efficiency over effectiveness."

"There was a lot of pressure, we thought, on the checkpoint agents to keep people moving," he said. "We also found that we didn't have as consistent and coordinated of a training system as I would have liked to have seen."

Neffenger added that he had hoped that TSA's performance would have improved by now.

Most details of the latest IG audit, released Sept. 27, are classified, but media reports indicate that TSA failed somewhere between 70 percent and 80 percent of covert tests, allowing fake explosives, firearms and other prohibited items to slip through undetected. That's only slightly better than the 95 percent failure rate that TSA suffered in its 2015 audit by the IG.

House Homeland Security Chairman Mike McCaul (R-Texas) said he was "disturbed" by the findings and urged TSA to quickly remedy the situation. "America's enemies only have to be right once, but we have to be right 100 percent of the time," he said at a Nov. 8 hearing.

Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the committee's top Democrat, told POLITICO that not only were the findings from this latest IG report "hair raising," they also showed little improvement since the 2015 audit.

Even before the results of the new investigation were made public, TSA had ordered new procedures that will require travelers to remove any electronics larger than a cellphone from their carry-on bags and place them in a separate bin for scanning. Pecoske said TSA is partially relying on these changes to help shore up gaps revealed by the most recent audit, in addition to improving workforce training so that it's more consistent and deploying new screening technology at airports.

TSA began phasing in the procedures nationwide this fall after testing them at 10 airports. They are now in effect at airports in Arizona, Maryland, New Mexico, New York and Virginia, among other areas. They will eventually be implemented at all U.S. airports.

"We look for windows of time where we can begin to phase [in] the implementation at airports across the country, and a window of time is between the end of the summer travel season and the beginning of the holiday travel season," Pecoske said. "We've found that that process [in total] will have, in the long term, a negligible impact on passenger wait times."

Passengers will be watching to see whether this iteration of TSA's improvement plan results in the same kind of travel headaches as when the Obama administration responded to the last audit failure by ordering an increase in bomb-sniffing dog teams, hand-wanding of passengers and random bag checks, among other things. The demands of that combined with an uptick in air travel overwhelmed the agency's slim staff, resulting in long lines, missed flights and lots of unhappy passengers.

Pecoske has, so far, not suggested a return to that type of manpower-centric approach. In fact, he has been a steadfast supporter of President Donald Trump's fiscal 2018 budget proposal, which would slash funding for TSA's canine teams, called VIPR, and eliminate a grant program that reimburses airports that hire local law enforcement.

Rather, Pecoske's approach seems to be continuing with the technology initiatives that have been underway for the past two years. And that's the element of his plan that seems to interest

Congress the most.

McCaul, for example, wants TSA to pivot to outfitting all U.S. airports with 3-D X-ray machines, known as computed tomography scanners, at every airport security checkpoint in the U.S. as soon as possible.

TSA is piloting CT scanners at several airports and expects to complete the pilot by next summer. Pekoske has warned that rushing the agency to move any faster than that could be risky, given the potential for glitches.

Neffenger said Congress may think TSA has been moving slowly to adopt new technologies, but he noted that his Innovation Task Force began brainstorming with industry on how to develop CT scanners small enough to fit at checkpoints following the IG's 2015 investigation. He said it took about a year and a half just to design a downsized version of the "huge" machines used for checked bags, without losing their effectiveness.

"They moved pretty quickly, I thought," he said.

Neffenger added that while he thinks Congress understands the need for technology, lawmakers should also provide TSA with a steady and predictable funding stream for technology development. It's also important that TSA has a clear research and development plan that drives industry to create the technology that it needs, he said. The fact that the IG continues to identify vulnerabilities points to the continuing need to evolve security checkpoints, he said.

Still, some think TSA could pick up the pace. Compared with other agencies like Customs and Border Protection, TSA's adoption of automated technologies has been slow, said James Benjamin Hutchinson, a senior director at NEC Corp. America. NEC is working with CBP to stand up a national entry and exit system that would track international travelers using facial recognition technology.

"TSA is somewhat slower to the game than a lot of these other agencies," he said. "I think working more closely — not that they haven't been — working a little more closely with the stakeholder community, with the airports and the airlines to accelerate their adoption and implementation of the technology — I think that's going to be helpful."

And with air travel continuing to rise to record highs, airline and travel groups are just as keen to see TSA come up with a plan to improve security procedures without creating checkpoint logjams.

A spokesman for the trade group Airlines for America said the organization is coordinating with TSA to "determine the most effective and efficient way to maintain the highest level of security for the traveling public."

The Global Business Travel Association said improved workforce training is critical to improving TSA's airport security performance. Agents need to constantly evaluate circumstances on the ground and look for behavioral cues that could alert them to threats, said association Executive Director Michael McCormick. "That is the biggest way to combat security threats on site," he said. "Technology doesn't solve everything. It's an enabler."

He said the association would also like to see TSA increase enrollment for PreCheck and other

"trusted traveler" programs to help narrow the pool of potential "bad actors."

Turkey farmers facing squeeze after Trump kills agriculture rules Back

By Christine Haughney | 11/22/2017 05:04 AM EDT

Ike Horst raises 22,000 turkeys a year on his farm in the rolling hills of south-central Pennsylvania, selling them to a processing company that was providing him with enough of a nest egg that he hoped he could sell the farm and retire.

But a Trump administration decision to block proposed agriculture regulations may blow up those plans, preserving the multibillion-dollar meat industry's power over the smaller turkey farmers whose birds will grace the tables in millions of American homes this Thanksgiving.

Horst is one of the independent businessmen caught up in the Trump administration's governmentwide deregulation frenzy.

Obama-era rules that had yet to take effect would have given smaller farmers more power to set the terms of their deals with massive meat companies, empowering the growers to sue and better define abusive practices by processors and distributors under federal law. Trump's Agriculture Department killed two of the proposed rules, one of which would have taken effect in October.

Major agribusinesses like Cargill and Butterball fought the rules, saying they would lead to endless litigation between farmers and global food companies.

Trump's deregulatory strike — lauded by big business — has consequences, even for the mom-and-pop turkey farmers who raise free-range, antibiotic-free turkeys that have seen increasing demand as Americans become more socially conscious about the production of their foods.

Horst is afraid a planned sale of his farm will fall through because Plainville Farms, a major organic food producer and the primary customer for his turkeys, is requiring the buyer to install upgrades including fans, tunnel ventilation and a stationary generator if it wants to continue supplying to the company.

Under the rules Trump killed, Horst's buyer could have resisted such new costs.

"That was my retirement," said Horst, who is selling his farm for health reasons and is scheduled to close the sale in January.

In the days leading up to Thanksgiving, some turkey farmers said the processing and distribution companies already have been setting tougher terms. Farmers who produce birds for Plainville received letters in October amending their contracts by cutting performance incentives and demanding that they invest in equipment upgrades. They blame the Trump administration.

If Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue hadn't done away with the proposed rules, "the companies wouldn't be doing things like this," said Mike Weaver, a West Virginia poultry grower and president of the Organization for Competitive Markets, who has been contacted by Plainville's turkey growers about their fears. "We think this has emboldened the companies to abuse the growers."

Distributors and large poultry growers, for their part, have praised the decision to ditch the proposed Obama-era regulations, which were developed under USDA's Grain Inspection, Packers and Stockyards Administration and are commonly referred to as the GIPSA rules. If allowed to go into effect, they "would have opened the floodgates to frivolous and costly litigation," said Mike Brown, president of the National Chicken Council.

Meanwhile, turkey farmers have fewer and fewer choices about where to sell their birds. Contract farmers account for 69 percent of turkey production, according to the USDA. As of 2011, 58 percent of turkey slaughter was controlled by just four companies: Butterball, Jennie-O, Cargill, and Farbest Foods.

As the industry has consolidated, margins for turkey farmers have gotten thinner. Billy Turner, a Virginia-based grower who raises 54,000 turkeys annually for Cargill, noted that when he started working 25 years ago, he earned $2.25 to $2.50 for each bird he raised. Now he receives $1.35 a head. But he can't get out of the business because Cargill asked him recently to make upgrades to his barns that he had to take out a $150,000 loan to pay for. He said those upgrades have raised his utility bills from $75 a month to $700 to $800 a month. He survives by raising corn and cattle as well. He said if he raised only turkeys, "I couldn't do it. I would probably be bankrupt by now."

Plainville is not a large-scale, mass-market distributor, but one that supplies the high-end organic food segment. It specializes in antibiotic-free and organic turkey meat for which consumers pay a premium. But Plainville's farmers don't get much of that: Farmers interviewed for this article said the new contracts cut what they receive on turkeys to 11 cents a pound from 13 cents. Cook's Illustrated reported that these turkeys sell for more than 10 times more, for $1.19 a pound.

The farmers point out that Plainville's parent company, Hain Celestial Group Inc., which promotes itself as a healthy food company and owns brands like Celestial Seasonings Tea, reported a 131 percent increase in profit in its most recent earnings statement.

When contacted by POLITICO, Mickey Baugher, vice president of operations for Plainville Farms, replied via a LinkedIn message that "our decision to modify the terms of our grower agreements were not influenced by any changes in GIPSA rules." He noted that even with the updated contracts, growers make 20 percent more than the average industry grower. He added, "We do not believe that any modifications to our grower agreements will have any effect on the quality of our turkeys."

The letter he sent to turkey growers also stated that "the decision to reduce grower pay was not made quickly or lightly" and that "having the best housing in the industry will benefit the welfare of our turkeys."

Mike Lilburn, an Ohio State University professor and unit supervisor of the Poultry Research Center, explained that turkey farms are now raising larger birds much faster and require newer ventilation systems.

"It has to be done for the grower to be competitive, and it has to be done for the company to be competitive with other companies out there," Lilburn said.

Several turkey farmers interviewed for this article, however, said that there are better, more cost-effective solutions. Horst, who has been raising turkeys since 1995, said that instead of installing expensive fans, he has let his turkeys go outside.

"The best thing is natural air," he said.

Years ago, Horst said, the processing and distribution companies, known as integrators, would meet with farmers to discuss contract changes before implementing them. That no longer happens. "Integrators don't want to hear the growers griping and complaining," he said.

Despite his financial worries, he calls turkey farming a "low-stress job," one made enjoyable by the comic antics of the birds. He talks to his turkeys and tells them he won't eat them. Instead, this Thanksgiving, he'll be eating an old German dish that involves stuffing a pig's stomach with sausage and potatoes. He thinks his turkeys appreciate it.

"It's like raising kids," he said. "If you enjoy kids, they'll do good for you. But if you mistreat your children, they're going to be in trouble all the time."

Moore trumpets president's near-endorsement Back

By Daniel Strauss | 11/22/2017 02:43 PM EDT

Roy Moore's Senate campaign quickly seized on President Donald Trump's apparent support for the embattled Alabama GOP nominee, parroting Trump's attacks on Moore's Democratic rival while trying to put the sexual misconduct allegations that have dominated the race in recent weeks on the back-burner.

But Democrat Doug Jones on Wednesday swung back, posting a web video featuring the names and photos of Moore's then-teenage accusers and asking, "We will make their abuser a U.S. senator?"

Moore got a boost from the president when Trump cast doubt on the accusations by a number of women who said that Moore, when he was in his 30s, sexually assaulted or molested them. Others said Moore also pursued them romantically as teenagers. But Trump, who had long been silent on the accusations, sounded skeptical Tuesday, saying that "40 years is a long time" since the alleged incidents and suggesting that he believed Moore's denials.

Trump's comments offered cover for Republicans who may have been wavering about voting for Moore. The comments also offered the former Alabama Supreme Court justice a prime opening to bash Jones, a former U.S. attorney. In the same set of comments to reporters, the president also knocked Jones as "bad on crime, bad on borders, bad with the military."

Moore's campaign pounced on those remarks instantly. One email sent Tuesday to supporters included just a YouTube video of Trump's remarks and a transcription. The subject line read, "Donald Trump Blasts Liberal Democrat Doug Jones." A second email — headlined "Moore campaign says 'Mexico First' policies of Doug Jones put Americans at Risk" — criticized Jones on border security and immigration.

Moore has mostly avoided attacking Jones during the campaign. But Alabama Republicans argued that Trump's comments were a boon for Moore and a chance to go on offense against the Democrat.

"President Trump's support signals a big boost for Judge Moore. Outside groups or individuals who were on the fence or sitting out should become re-engaged just a few weeks before the general election," said David Ferguson, a veteran GOP strategist and native Alabamian. "A Republican victory guarantees that a majority in the Senate is maintained, and if Roy Moore has definitely done wrong and resigns in the future, then it ensures the governor will be able to choose a Republican to replace him."

The GOP offensive comes as Jones looks to woo Alabama Republicans uncomfortable with Moore.

On Wednesday, Jones' campaign posted a new 30-second video scrolling through the women who "were girls when Roy Moore immorally pursued them." Jones is promoting the ad online, but it's unclear whether it will run on television.

Jones' recent TV ads have attempted to burnish his bipartisan credentials. One notes that he was confirmed as a U.S. attorney by a Senate that included both Sen. Richard Shelby and now-Attorney General Jeff Sessions. Another ad by the campaign quotes prominent Republicans — Ivanka Trump, Shelby and Sessions — separately saying they have no reason to doubt Moore's accusers. A pro-Jones super PAC, Highway 31, is touting Jones' support for gun rights and his Christian faith in an ad that began airing on Wednesday.

The Jones campaign has been dominating Moore in ad spending, and recent polls have shown either a tight race — an unusual situation for deep-red Alabama — or Jones with a lead.

One Republican pollster who wasn't authorized to speak on the record about the race conceded that Trump's comments do help Moore. But the pollster also cautioned, "We'll have to see what polling next week looks like to confirm."

HATCH ACTS: Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch, the longest serving Republican in the Senate, has announced he will retire at the end of the year. The move from the Senate's president pro tempore will likely open the door for a run by former GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney for his Utah seat and lines up Thad Cochran to take on the title of pro tempore. If Cochran retires, which some have speculated (but Cochran has denied), Chuck Grassley would take the title, according to seniority. "Every good fighter knows when to hang up the gloves. And for me, that time is soon approaching," Hatch said in a video announcement today. "That's why after much prayer and discussion with family and friends, I've decided to retire at the end of this term." More here.

Shuster, too? Pennsylvania GOP Rep. Bill Shuster, chairman of the House Transportation Committee, will not seek reelection. Shuster said he "wants to focus exclusively on working with President [Donald] Trump to pass a massive infrastructure bill before he retires," he told the Washington Examiner. "Rather than focusing on a reelection campaign, I thought it wiser to spend my last year as Chairman focusing 100 percent on working with President Trump and my Republican and Democratic colleagues in both chambers to pass a much needed infrastructure bill to rebuild America," Shuster said in a statement posted by his personal office.

Cramer vs. Heitkamp: North Dakota Rep. Kevin Cramer is expected to meet with the president today, according to the Grand Forks Herald's Rob Port, and he's expected to discuss a now-likely Senate run. "The indications I'm getting almost universally from Republican political circles is that Cramer will almost certainly be in the Senate race against incumbent Democrat Heidi Heitkamp," Port writes.

Franken makes it official: Sen. Al Franken has officially resigned from Congress today, formally submitting his letter of resignation to Minnesota Gov. Mark Dayton. Franken's replacement, Lt. Gov. Tina Smith, will be sworn in Wednesday when Congress reconvenes, the Minneapolis Star Tribune reports.

EPA CUTS SEVEN SUPERFUND SITES: EPA has deleted "all or parts" of seven Superfund sites from the National Priorities List, the agency said today. EPA boasted that the number is "more than triple the number of sites removed from the list in 2016," which was two. "We have made it a priority to get these sites cleaned up faster and in the right way," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement. "By creating a streamlined task force and making major remedy decisions that hold potentially responsible parties accountable for clean up, the Superfund program is carrying out the Agency's mission of protecting human health and the environment more every day." The agency says Pruitt has a list of 21 sites that have been targeted for "immediate and intense attention," in response to task force recommendations from this summer. See the names of the three entire deleted sites and the portions of four others here.

STATES HOLD OWN CPP HEARINGS: If EPA won't hold additional public hearings on the Clean Power Plan, states, apparently, will do it for the agency. Delaware, Maryland and New York will hold "people's hearings" in the coming weeks on the proposed repeal of the rule, according to the State Energy & Environmental Impact Center at NYU Law. "These hearings will provide a much-needed forum for more voices to show how implementing the Clean Power Plan will turbocharge a clean energy economy that brings investment, jobs and energy security," David Hayes, executive director of the center and former Interior deputy secretary, said in a release. "State attorneys general are doing everything in their power to defend the landmark Clean Power Plan and stand ready to sue if and when repeal is finalized." The first such event will occur in Delaware on Jan. 8.

COAL DEATHS ON RISE: "Workplace deaths in the coal mining industry increased last year to their highest point in three years," The Hill reports. "A total of 15 miners died on the job in 2017, Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA) data show, compared with eight in 2016. ... The 15th death occurred early Friday morning at a Revelation Energy mine in Fayette County in southern West Virginia, West Virginia Public Broadcasting reported." Read more.

TRUMP REAFFIRMS NUCLEAR DEAL BLAME: The president took to Twitter today to warn "the U.S. is watching" ongoing anti-government demonstrations in Iran. Trump used his social media platform to again place blame on the nuclear deal struck with the support of former President Barack Obama, claiming it lined the pockets of the Iranian government. "The people of Iran are finally acting against the brutal and corrupt Iranian regime. All of the money that President Obama so foolishly gave them went into terrorism and into their 'pockets,'" the president wrote on Twitter. "The people have little food, big inflation and no human rights. The U.S. is watching!" Read more.

COLD CALLING: Cold temperatures plaguing the U.S. have chilled natural gas production in U.S. shale patches, Reuters reports. According to analyst estimates, Reuters reports "output of the heating fuel [is] down more than 20 percent since last month in North Dakota's Bakken region. ... Flows of natural gas on interstate pipelines out of North Dakota dropped to about 1 billion cubic feet per day (bcfd) on Tuesday, down from about 1.3 bcfd on Dec. 25, according to Genscape data. One bcfd is enough gas to fuel about five million U.S. homes." Read more.

STUDY: DESERTIFICATION AHEAD, IF NO PARIS: A study published Monday in Nature Climate Change found that more than one-quarter of the world's land would dry up if the Earth's temperature increases by 2 degrees Celsius by 2050 — a target the Paris climate agreement aims to counter. "The report says the solution is to prevent global warming from rising above 1.5 degrees C, which the researchers say would significantly reduce the number of regions of the world affected by 'aridification,' or the drying of the planet," the Washington Examiner reports. "Our research predicts that aridification would emerge over about 20-30 percent of the world's land surface by the time the global mean temperature change reaches 2 degrees C," Manoj Joshi, lead researcher from the University of East Anglia in the United Kingdom, tells the Examiner. "But two-thirds of the affected regions could avoid significant aridification if warming is limited to 1.5 degrees C." Read more.

Frail and disoriented, Cochran says he's not retiring Back

By John Bresnahan and Anna Palmer | 10/18/2017 04:53 PM EDT

Mississippi GOP Sen. Thad Cochran insists that he is not retiring from Congress, despite widespread speculation about the veteran lawmaker's health and political future.

The 79-year-old Cochran appeared frail and at times disoriented during a brief hallway interview on Wednesday. He was unable to answer whether he would remain chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and at one point, needed a staffer to remind him where the Senate chamber is located.

"Don't believe everything you hear," Cochran said in a low voice when asked whether he plans to retire after 44 years in office.

However, when queried about whether he would stay on as Appropriations chairman, Cochran seemed confused and just repeated the question. "As chairman of the Appropriations Committee?" Cochran asked.

Cochran had to be guided by staffers around a security checkpoint inside the Capitol. He started to walk into a first-floor room — though the Senate chamber is on the second floor. He was then ushered by an aide up to the Senate.

When another reporter asked whether leadership had pressured Cochran to return for a vote on the budget resolution — a key moment in the tax reform debate — Cochran smiled and responded, "It's a beautiful day outside."

Cochran sat quietly in his seat during Wednesday's lengthy vote session. He smiled and responded when a fellow senator stopped by to offer greetings, but generally did not speak to anyone else.

On one amendment, Cochran voted "yes" despite being told by an aide to vote "no." The staffer tried to get the senator to switch his vote, but Cochran kept flashing the "thumbs up" sign, even walking over to the clerk tallying the vote and doing so. GOP floor staffers repeatedly told him the leadership wanted a "no" vote. Several more moments passed before Cochran realized he was voting the wrong way and then changed his vote.

Cochran, who turns 80 in December, has faced questions about his health for the past several years. Cochran has been treated recently for urological problems, though his aides and political allies insisted he was fine. President Donald Trump last month spotlighted Cochran's health when he claimed that Obamacare repeal legislation would have passed had Cochran not been hospitalized. Cochran, though, wasn't in the hospital at that point.

Top Senate Republicans say they are not pressuring Cochran to retire or step down as Appropriations Committee chairman, a powerful perch from which he helps oversee hundreds of billions of dollars in government spending each year. Cochran made a career of steering federal dollars back home, working with former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) for years to ensure their state benefited from hundreds of "earmarks" inserted in annual appropriations bills.

The use of earmarks, which were banned in 2010 after the tea party movement helped Republicans regain control of Congress, helped make Cochran popular back home. He never faced a serious challenge from 1984 until 2014. But that year, conservative outside groups attacked him during the GOP primary and Cochran barely survived a runoff. He went on, however, to easily win the general election.

Cochran's seat is viewed as particularly important, given that the GOP establishment went all out to help him beat state Sen. Chris McDaniel in the 2014 primary.

Cochran is up for reelection in 2020, and Republicans are desperate for him to stay in office and avoid a special election. McDaniel already is planning a campaign against incumbent Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) in 2018.

Cochran was first elected to Congress in 1972, making him one of the longest serving GOP lawmakers in history. His election to the Senate in Mississippi in 1978 was a watershed moment for Republicans. Cochran was the first Republican to win a statewide election in Mississippi since Reconstruction.

Now, the state is overwhelmingly red, with the GOP controlling the governorship, Legislature and congressional delegation. President Donald Trump easily carried the state in the 2016 presidential election.

The Senate has had other once-vibrant members who faced questions about whether they still had the capacity to serve as they aged. The late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) served until the age of 100, but was forced to give up the chairmanship of Armed Services. Another legendary lawmaker, the late Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) was eventually replaced as chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Hatch announces retirement, Romney likely to run Back

By Alex Isenstadt and Seung Min Kim | 01/02/2018 02:12 PM EDT

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), the longest-serving Republican senator, announced Tuesday he will not seek reelection in November. The move sets the stage for a likely run for his seat by former GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney.

"Every good fighter knows when to hang up the gloves. And for me, that time is soon approaching," the 83-year-old senator, who was first elected in 1976, said in a video announcement. "That's why after much prayer and discussion with family and friends, I've decided to retire at the end of this term."

The news caps months of speculation about Hatch's political future. President Donald Trump tried aggressively to persuade the Hatch to seek another term, orchestrating a visit to Utah in which the president lavished praise on the senator and rode with him on Air Force One.

Trump's move was aimed in no small part at keeping Romney out of the Senate. During the 2016 campaign, Romney emerged as a de facto leader of the "Never Trump" movement, calling then-candidate Trump a "fraud" and "phony" who was unfit to serve.

The two warmed to each other somewhat after the election, when Trump considered Romney to be his secretary of state. Yet the president and his closest advisers remain suspicious of the former Massachusetts governor. Romney has at times gone out of his way to criticize the new president, including for his response to white supremacist violence in Charlottesville, Virginia, last year.

With Hatch out of the race, Romney will be the heavy favorite. The former Massachusetts governor, who is now residing in Utah, is widely popular in the state. He has spent the last few months huddling with key players in the state to discuss a prospective bid, including prominent businessman Kem Gardner and state House speaker Greg Hughes.

In a statement posted to Facebook Tuesday afternoon, Romney made no mention of a potential Senate bid.

"I join the people of Utah in thanking my friend, Senator Orrin Hatch for his more than 40 years of service to our great state and nation," Romney said. "As Chairman of the Senate Finance and Judiciary Committees and as the longest-serving Republican senator in U.S. history, Senator Hatch has represented the interests of Utah with distinction and honor. Ann and I wish Senator Orrin Hatch and his loving wife Elaine all the best in their future endeavors."

Hatch, who as the most senior Senate Republican serves as president pro tempore and is third in line for the presidency, had been coy for months about whether he would seek an eighth term in office — particularly as the Republican tax overhaul effort unfolded on Capitol Hill.

As chairman of the powerful Senate Finance Committee, Hatch recently helped shepherd through the biggest change to the tax code in a generation. The legislation slashed the corporate tax rate and reduced individual rates, while scrapping a key provision of Obamacare that required everyone to hold insurance.

Though the tax effort was contentious and partisan, Hatch also built up a record during his four decades on Capitol Hill of working with influential Democrats to produce landmark bills.

One is the Children's Health Insurance Program, which Hatch created alongside the late Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) in 1997. Funding for the law lapsed Sept. 30, although Congress has passed a short-term infusion of money for the popular program benefiting 9 million lower-income children.

Hatch and Kennedy had struck a close friendship: A songwriter in his free time, Hatch penned a tune for the Massachusetts Democrat when he remarried in 1992.

Hatch, who also chaired the Senate Judiciary Committee, was among the first senators to support the Dream Act with Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) in 2001 — legislation that would create a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants who came to the United States as minors.

Once Hatch retires, Sen. Thad Cochran of Mississippi will become the chamber's most senior Senate Republican, though Cochran has also faced speculation that he could soon retire. Next in line after Cochran in seniority among Senate Republicans is Sen. Chuck Grassley of Iowa.

Grassley is also in line to take over Hatch's influential Finance Committee gavel if Republicans keep control of the Senate in the 2018 midterm elections. But Grassley — who can serve for two more years as Finance chairman under the Senate GOP's term limits — would have to give up his position as head of the Senate Judiciary Committee to do so.

As protests rage in Iran, Trump backs demonstrators, blames Obama Back

By Louis Nelson | 01/02/2018 07:49 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's administration backed anti-government protesters in Iran Tuesday, seizing an opportunity to criticize not just a foreign government that the White House has framed as a chief foe but also the administration of Barack Obama.

Trump tweeted that "the U.S. is watching" the ongoing anti-government demonstrations across Iran, blaming the nuclear deal struck with the support of former President Obama for lining the pockets of the Iranian government.

"The people of Iran are finally acting against the brutal and corrupt Iranian regime. All of the money that President Obama so foolishly gave them went into terrorism and into their 'pockets,'" the president wrote on Twitter. "The people have little food, big inflation and no human rights. The U.S. is watching!"

Ambassador to the United Nations Nikki Haley said the U.S. would call for emergency sessions of the United Nations security and human rights councils in New York and Geneva, respectively, to address the Iranian government's crackdown on protesters. She said the Islamic Republic's suggestion that the protests had been fueled by outside influences was "complete nonsense."

"This is the precise picture of a long-oppressed people rising up against their dictators. The international community has a role to play on this," Haley said at a press conference at the UN in New York. "If the Iranian dictatorship's history is any guide, we can expect more outrageous abuses in the days to come...The people of Iran are crying out for freedom. All freedom loving people must stand with their cause."

Tuesday marked the sixth day of protests in Iran, where a flagging economy and an uptick in food prices have prompted demonstrators to chant anti-government slogans. The Associated Press reported Tuesday that at least nine people had been killed overnight, including a member of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, raising the overall death toll from the protests to at least 20.

In Tehran, the Iranian capital, 450 protesters have been arrested since demonstrations began, the AP reported.

The protests are the largest in Iran since 2009, when the disputed reelection of Iran's then-President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sparked anti-government demonstrations. In what seemed a veiled criticism of the Obama administration's response to those earlier demonstrations, Haley said Tuesday that "the international community made the mistake of failing" to support Iranian protesters in 2009. "We must not make that mistake again."

At Tuesday's press briefing, White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders echoed Haley's warning, telling reporters that "the international community cannot sit silent as it did" in 2009. She stopped short of saying that the president would like to see regime change in Iran, instead listing Trump's priorities as "basic human rights" for the Iranian people and an end to Iran's support for groups deemed by the U.S. government to be terrorist organizations.

"The Iranian people are angry at the rising tide of corruption in their daily lives. The people are tired of paying the price for their violent and corrupt rulers," Sanders said. "The citizens of Iran have paid a heavy price for the violence and extremism of their leaders and the Iranian people long to reclaim their country's proud history, its culture, its civilization and its cooperation with its neighbors."

Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif took a shot on Twitter at Trump and U.S. foreign policy, writing that "Iran's security and stability depend on its own people, who — unlike the peoples of Trumps regional 'bffs'—have the right to vote and to protest. These hard-earned rights will be protected, and infiltrators will not be allowed to sabotage them through violence and destruction."

U.S. Undersecretary of State Steve Goldstein on Tuesday called on Iran, however, to stop blocking social media sites, including Instagram and the messaging service Telegram, calling them "legitimate avenues for communication," according to an Associated Press report. The U.S. has an obligation "not to stand by," Goldstein said, and will "encourage the protesters to continue to fight for what's right."

Trump's Tuesday tweet echoed similar sentiments to those he has expressed online over the last three days. He has long been critical of the landmark nuclear deal negotiated in part by the Obama administration, taking steps last year to imperil it without yet making good on his campaign promise to remove the U.S. from it entirely.

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei hinted that outside influence may be playing a role in the unrest in his nation, suggesting via a statement on his official website that "in the recent days' incidents, enemies of Iran utilized various means — including money, weapon, politics and intelligence apparatuses — to create problems for the Islamic system."

White House aides already anxious about 2018 Back

By Eliana Johnson, Annie Karni and Andrew Restuccia | 01/01/2018 06:01 PM EDT

President Donald Trump returned to Washington from his sunny holiday break in Florida in an upbeat mood, relaxed and rested — but many of his top aides are dreading what's to come in 2018.

After ending their first year on a high, signing a sweeping tax reform bill into law, Trump's advisers are divided about how to capitalize on that victory and maintain momentum going forward with Hill Republicans again at odds over their legislative agenda.

They're facing a brain drain on a White House that already had trouble recruiting top talent. Many senior West Wing aides are expected to depart in the coming year, with no replacements lined up. White House chief of staff John Kelly — who has already fired several presidential aides — wants to push out more but has struggled to find suitable alternatives.

And they're still working under the shadow of special counsel Robert Mueller's Russia investigation, despite repeated assurances from the White House legal team that the inquiry is wrapping up.

The grim reality of 2018 has generated a sense of foreboding among White House aides, according to more than a dozen current and former officials and outside advisers. West Wing aides, who worked furiously to push through legislation and executive actions during Trump's first year in office, expect limited prospects for getting things done in Washington this year heading into a contentious midterm election.

"They absolutely should worry about 2018," said Ari Fleischer, a former press secretary to President George W. Bush. "I do fear a wave election. Democrats are highly motivated to vote against Trump and all Republicans. Trump has got to grow beyond the base, and he has got to make himself less hated among a group in the middle."

While Republicans were unified in their desire to reform the tax code, they are now split over which legislative initiative to tackle next — a dispute the Trump White House, which has sometimes delegated the nuts and bolts of legislating to congressional leaders, has done little to settle.

And with a diminished margin in the Senate — after Roy Moore's loss in Alabama, Republicans now hold just a 51-seat majority — White House aides and Republicans in Congress say they have little hope that much if any meaningful legislation will reach the president's desk before the midterms.

Behind the scenes, White House aides and Trump's outside advisers are engaged in a fierce debate over the shape of this year's agenda. At issue: whether to appeal to traditional conservative voters by tackling welfare reform or instead push forward on the president's long-promised infrastructure plan, which could attract Democratic support and win over a broader slice of the electorate.

Several Trump advisers have urged the president to strike a more bipartisan tone this year, encouraging him to facilitate a deal with Democrats on the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program for young undocumented immigrants and then quickly move to an infrastructure package — a sequence that would significantly delay welfare legislation.

The advisers have told the president that passing infrastructure legislation could help Republicans hold the House, pointing to polling that shows the issue is popular with the public.

Trump met before Christmas in the Oval Office with his former campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski; his former director of digital media, Brad Parscale; presidential counselor Kellyanne Conway and others about the merits of each option, according to people familiar with the discussion.

The president has privately told top aides at various points that he is eager to pursue both infrastructure and welfare reform. But Trump's top policy adviser on the subject, Paul Winfree, recently left the White House to return to the Heritage Foundation, and the president has more recently signaled that he believes infrastructure has the best chance of winning bipartisan support and buoying Republicans in the fall.

Some of the president's outside advisers say that's the right approach. "Infrastructure first," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a longtime Trump ally. "I wouldn't touch entitlements. There's zero reason to pick a fight on any of those in an election year."

But House Speaker Paul Ryan has repeatedly said he is determined to reform welfare. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, however, has publicly dismissed the idea, telling National Public Radio that he is "not interested" in taking on the issue on a party-line basis — and Democrats are in no mood to cooperate ahead of the midterms.

Trump, McConnell and Ryan are expected to settle their differences in a meeting at Camp David the first week in January, though one administration official said he nonetheless expects "lot of infighting."

The president stormed into office with a series of executive orders, but questions also linger about what the president will be able to accomplish at the executive level in the coming year. Aides expect a renewed push on trade, including the possibility that Trump will slap China and other economic competitors with tariffs in the coming weeks.

The issue was largely put on the back burner in recent months so it wouldn't distract from tax reform, according to one White House aide, but the administration is weighing trade measures on everything from steel to solar imports, stoking deep concern among Trump's free-market advisers that the president could spark a trade war.

Administration officials have been working quietly for months to curb the influence of Trump's protectionist advisers. Though the White House's leading China critic, trade adviser Peter Navarro, has been sidelined, the president's free-market aides fear their efforts have had little effect on Trump's thinking.

Compounding this challenging legislative terrain is the departure of senior aides, including deputy national security adviser Dina Powell; Jeremy Katz, deputy director of the National Economic Council; and Winfree, who was deputy director of the Domestic Policy Council.

Few expect Gary Cohn — the director of the National Economic Council, which has emerged as the White House's central policymaking hub — to stay in the administration until the end of 2018. Cohn, the former Goldman Sachs president who was integral in the passage of tax reform, is likely to depart either at the end of January or in August, at the close of the legislative session, according to a senior White House aide. Cohn has assembled a team of policy aides on the NEC — including Katz, who departs in late January — and many of his staffers are expected to follow him if he leaves.

People familiar with plans for staff changes said Johnny DeStefano, already head of the White House personnel office and interim head of the Office of Public Liaison, will also oversee the White House's political affairs and intergovernmental affairs offices — a combined portfolio bigger than any ever held by previous West Wing staff, including Valerie Jarrett under President Barack Obama or Karl Rove under President George W. Bush, one former White House official noted.

The decision to elevate DeStefano — who struggled running the personnel office last year and was slow to fill positions — rather than bringing in outsiders is another sign that the White House is having trouble recruiting new staff. Two people familiar with the hiring process said Trump's White House has had difficulty attracting outside talent as a result of the Russia probe, the complicated government vetting process and the cap on federal employees' salaries.

"My advice to them is find younger people," Gingrich said of a president who favors generals, billionaires and CEOs that he views as peers. "There are lots of ambitious people who can do the jobs. He can lean on Kelly, while Kelly hires young people."

Amid the churn, there is expected to be at least one constant for Trump: the presence, in the West Wing, of family members Jared Kushner and Ivanka Trump, whom insiders say now plan to stay in Washington at least through the 2018 school year.

After a rocky first year — when even the president questioned whether having family members serving in senior White House posts was a good idea after all — the marginalized power couple plan to start off 2018 with lower profiles and smaller, more defined portfolios than those they pursued in Trump's first year in office, according to a White House official.

Ivanka Trump will continue to serve as a surrogate selling tax reform, promoting STEM and female entrepreneurs. Behind the scenes, she is expected to continue what the official called "quiet talks" around paid family leave. Kushner, meanwhile, will be working on Middle East peace, while also working on criminal justice reform, North American Free Trade Agreement negotiations and a potential infrastructure bill.

Kushner, for his part, is still widely viewed as the White House official with the most exposure in Mueller's probe, having reportedly instructed former national security adviser Michael Flynn during the presidential transition to reach out to United Nations Security Council member countries, including Russia, to encourage them to oppose a resolution on Israeli settlements.

While the White House's lawyers, led by Beltway powerhouse Ty Cobb, have been assuring Trump that Mueller's probe into Russian meddling in the election is likely to conclude in the coming weeks, most of the president's senior aides not only dismiss that as fantasy, but also expect the special counsel's investigation to ramp up in the coming year.

For Trump's closest aides, that means weeks, and potentially months, of the president's dark moods — which his lawyers have sought to alleviate in part by assuring him the investigation was nearing its conclusion, first by Thanksgiving and then by year's end. It's a strategy that one White House aide predicted the president is likely to pick up on.

"I'm among those who can't conceive of it ending in a matter of a few weeks," said a prominent Washington attorney advising one member of the administration. "I can't imagine they actually believed it when they said it, though it's hard to imagine lawyers deliberately misleading their client like that."

Warren positions herself for potential 2020 run Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti | 01/02/2018 05:02 AM EDT

Elizabeth Warren has spent the past year making a series of below-the-radar moves that would put her in prime position to run for president in 2020 if she decides to.

The liberal icon and Republican bete noire has amassed more money in her campaign war chest than nearly any senator in modern history, groomed political connections with Democrats who've been skeptical of her in the past, and worked to bolster her bipartisan and foreign policy bona fides.

It's part of a conscious break from the heads-down posture that Warren purposefully maintained during the first five years of her Senate career, a wide range of Democrats close to the Massachusetts senator and her tight-knit political operation told POLITICO. And it's representative of Warren's tricky navigation between the wishes of advocates who want her cutting a clear path to 2020, and supporters who think her best bet is to run up the score in her reelection race this year.

The balancing act is evident everywhere, as Warren takes steps she never did when activists were pressuring her to jump into the 2016 presidential race.

Warren is sitting on more campaign cash — $12.8 million — than nearly any other incumbent senator ever has at this point in an election cycle, despite what's expected to be an easy reelection. But she also held 17 town hall events back home in Massachusetts last year.

She spent the year meeting with prominent figures with whom she's disagreed in the past — from former President Barack Obama to JPMorgan Chase CEO Jamie Dimon — sit-downs that could come in handy if she runs for president. But Warren shied from repeated invitations to political events across Iowa and New Hampshire.

And Warren has stocked her political staff with a research team directed to scour her past for political vulnerabilities — an undertaking that appears aimed at a national bid. But the group of five aides is also monitoring a gaggle of potential Republican reelection opponents in Massachusetts, where hedge fund billionaire Robert Mercer, a top backer of President Donald Trump, has funded a super PAC assailing her.

"Big money is already running attack ads against her, and she is and should be taking them very seriously. She won the first time with a formidable grass-roots organization, and she should be doing the same thing again," said former Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis, the Democratic presidential nominee in 1988, who keeps in touch with Warren. "There will be plenty of time after that to think about the national scene."

Yet the result of all her subtly intensifying prep is that one year after Trump's win, she is firmly in the top tier of Democratic presidential contenders, one of just three figures — with Bernie Sanders and Joe Biden — whom all other hopefuls must consider carefully before launching their own bids.

Warren used the publicity tour for her best-selling book that was published in April to crisscross the country and get face time with voters. Warren also reconnected with heavyweight donors who tuned in to her 2012 race — headlining events hosted by Esprit founder Susie Tompkins Buell in San Francisco and former UBS executive Robert Wolf in Martha's Vineyard, for example.

And she activated a potent network of small-dollar contributors who watch her online, especially after "nevertheless, she persisted" became a national resistance rallying cry around her.

Warren has worked to thaw her relations with local reporters after years of offering them little access, a shift that could help her prepare for the rough-and-tumble media treatment of a presidential campaign. And she has hired a staff heavy on digital talent and researchers — a line of mobilization and defense that could come in handy for both 2018 and 2020.

Increasingly the target of ire from Trump himself as he eyes his own reelection bid, Warren has started punching back on television and online when the president refers to her as "Pocahontas," a derisive nickname referring to her claiming Cherokee heritage to law school administrators in the mid-1980s.

And while Warren's cooperation with Senate Republicans this year isn't likely to transform her reputation as one of the most liberal members of Congress, it has been a striking change of pace.

She worked with Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley on legislation to improve access to hearing aids, and with Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski on opioid funding, earning unexpected praise from conservative colleagues. Plus, as a new member of the Armed Services Committee, Warren took a Fourth of July trip to Afghanistan with Arizona Sen. John McCain and South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham.

Still, she also often speaks of GOP proposals in harsher terms than many of her colleagues are willing to, ginning up the Democratic grass roots.

Republican senators only have one principle left, she said on the Senate floor last month as they finalized their tax bill: "Reward billionaire campaign donors."

"The stuff that Trump is focused on, a lot of it is big breaks to big corporations and the banks and others, and that's in her sweet spot, that's why she was elected, it's what she cares about," said Doug Rubin, the longtime Democratic strategist who helped lead Warren's 2012 Senate campaign. "So you may see more of her, just because this stuff is out there."

While Warren carefully avoided the early-state limelight after visiting both Iowa and New Hampshire for others in previous election cycles, her political schedule carved out ample opportunity to cultivate politically useful allies in other influential areas.

On top of visiting battleground states Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin, in part to raise campaign cash for Senate colleagues there, Warren is by far the most prominent early backer of Ohio gubernatorial candidate Richard Cordray, the former director of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, which Warren helped create.

"She has been, really, a nonstop presence here since 2016," said David Pepper, chairman of Ohio's Democratic Party. "For her to lend her nationally credible voice to him is obviously a big boost to him, and if he were to be our nominee, would be a huge boost to the Sherrod [Brown] reelection and our efforts to win the governor's mansion back."

"She's earned a lot of goodwill with people here," he added.

Warren also went out of her way to build connections in communities where she's less well-known, and to reach out to other Democrats who have viewed her warily in the past.

Warren entered 2017 having spent less time on civil rights issues or courting African-American voters than some of her colleagues also considering national runs. But she developed a relationship with Bernice King — Martin Luther King Jr.'s daughter — after being silenced for reading Coretta Scott King's letter denouncing Jeff Sessions when the Senate was debating Sessions' nomination to be attorney general early last year. She built ties with the Rev. Jesse Jackson and met with the Rev. Al Sharpton in Washington in October, in addition to addressing the NAACP and other civil rights groups.

One of Warren's most significant challenges in rising to the top of the Democratic Party would be winning over longtime party figures who associate her with a Bernie Sanders-style progressive insurgency. But she has been meeting with major party players behind the scenes. Warren sat down last year with Obama — with whom she occasionally clashed during his administration — according to a Democrat familiar with the meeting, and she spoke with Biden in September.

Such steps are significant because for a potential 2020 bid to be successful, Warren would likely need to rely on the kind of grass-roots progressive energy that fueled Sanders' 2016 bid without turning off more moderate voters and Hillary Clinton allies.

Already, it's been a difficult tight rope for the anti-big bank crusader to walk. She faced blowback from donors and party establishment figures after she told CNN in November that "Yes," the Democratic National Committee had been rigged in Clinton's favor in 2016, a comment she quickly tried to clean up.

And in July, former Clinton adviser Mark Penn singled out Warren by name in a New York Times op-ed blaming her for the party's turn toward "sharply leftist ideas."

Warren responded the next month in a blistering speech at Atlanta's Netroots Nation conference.

"We're not going back to the days when a Democrat who wanted to run for a seat in Washington first had to grovel on Wall Street. Democrats are heading forward, we are looking ahead, and we will not, we shall not, we must not allow anyone to turn back the clock," she said, calling Penn a "so-called Democratic strategist."

Clinton herself has spoken favorably of Warren during her own book tour, and the references to the senator in the former secretary of state's post-campaign memoir are noticeably more positive than those about Sanders or Biden. And while the Vermont senator may still run for president again, he and Warren have recently teamed up for a series of videos and a New York Times op-ed of their own blasting the GOP agenda on Capitol Hill.

If there was any political tension between the two, it hasn't translated to the screen.

After filming one of the December videos, on the federal budget, Sanders posted a photo on Instagram of the pair smiling.

"Today I had a chat with my favorite senator," he wrote. "Elizabeth Warren."

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Moving swiftly after monument reductions — ITC votes for biodiesel duties — New York Times sues EPA over Pruitt records

MOVING SWIFTLY AFTER MONUMENT REDUCTIONS: Utah's congressional delegation has introduced two pieces of legislation codifying smaller footprints for the Bears Ears (H.R. 4532 \(115\)) and Grand Staircase-Escalante national monuments and establishing specific land management plans for the areas. House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, joined by Utah Reps. Chris Stewart and John Curtis, pushed back strongly on charges the substantially reduced monuments would pave the way for oil and gas drilling. "The idea we're going to give these over to oil and gas companies is a false narrative. It's a silly narrative," Bishop told reporters. "This is not about development versus protection. This is about how you best manage the lands." He said he was hoping to see the bills hit the House floor in January.

That comes as a third lawsuit, filed by the Conservation Lands Foundation, Grand Staircase-Escalante Partners and the Society of Vertebrate Paleontology, challenged President Donald Trump's proclamation significantly trimming the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument on Monday. That filing is here.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke also publicly released his report detailing his proposals for Trump to shrink a handful of national monuments. Read it here.

ABOUT THAT PATAGONIA BANNER: Zinke fired back after outdoor gear company Patagonia changed its website to show its discontent over Trump's Utah announcement. Appearing on "Fox & Friends" this morning, Zinke criticized companies that "make their products other places, on foreign shores and special interest groups." The secretary went on to say the Utah designation restores "national forests to a national forest," and opens up public land for greater access for hunting, fishing and grazing. Later, Zinke again knocked the retailer, telling reporters, "You mean Patagonia, made in China? This is an example of a special interest. ... The federal estate remains intact."

Patagonia, which changed its website to read "The President Stole Your Land" after Tuesday's announcement, struggled to handle traffic drawn to its site, Bloomberg reports.

ITC VOTES FOR BIODIESEL DUTIES: A move today by the U.S. International Trade Commission could open the door for a potential WTO challenge against the U.S. over biodiesel tariffs, Pro Trade's Doug Palmer reports. In a 4-0 vote, the ITC approved hefty double-digit duties on imports of biodiesel from Argentina and Indonesia, citing sufficient evidence of injury to U.S. producers. The move paves a path for the Commerce Department to issue "final countervailing duties in the range of 72 percent on imports from Argentina and 35 percent to 65 percent on imports from Indonesia," Doug writes. Argentina President Mauricio Macri told Reuters last month that Argentina would challenge the duties at the WTO if the Trump administration went through with the measures. The nation exported about $1.2 billion worth of biodiesel to the United States last year, while Indonesia exported about $268 million.

The National Biodiesel Board, which brought the case along with 15 domestic producers, cheered today's news. "This unanimous vote is important progress to addressing the harm by this unfair trade on biodiesel," said Donnell Rehagen, chief executive officer of the group, in a statement. "... We are gratified that countervailing duty orders will contribute to leveling the playing field such that the domestic industry has the opportunity to produce at the levels it knows it can." API LAUNCHES METHANE REDUCTION INITIATIVE: The American Petroleum Institute today announced a voluntary program to curb methane and volatile organic compound emissions, creating a "Environmental Partnership" with 26 natural gas and oil producers. API said the participating companies — which includes BP, Chesapeake Energy, Chevron, ConocoPhillips and Shell — will begin implementing the program starting Jan. 1. "This groundbreaking partnership further demonstrates the industry's leadership and commitment to responsibly developing America's energy resources while reducing emissions," Jack Gerard, API's president and CEO, said in a statement. Read more of the partnership details here.

Faint applause: But API isn't getting much praise for the methane reduction program. The trade association is the latest to come out with guidelines to cut methane emissions, after Exxon Mobil's XTO unit issued its own methane reduction guidelines in September, and Exxon, BP, Shell and other industry heavyweights pledged last month they would reduce methane emissions by improving accuracy of emissions data, working with nonprofits and other measures.

API's version, however, focuses on its members replacing equipment "as expeditiously as practicable" and installing leak detection devices within five years. The Environmental Defense Fund, which praised the earlier corporate pledges, did not have the same enthusiasm for API's offering. "The last several months have produced a number of good examples of what leadership in reducing methane looks like," EDF Associate Vice President Matt Watson said. "The API program falls well short of these industry led efforts and doesn't reflect best practice in reductions or disclosure."

ALL THE NEWS THAT'S FIT TO FOIA: EPA is being sued by The New York Times over its refusal to regularly release Administrator Scott Pruitt's full daily schedule and who he meets with. In the lawsuit filed on Monday, the newspaper, along with Washington-based reporter Eric Lipton, allege EPA is violating public records laws by failing to routinely release those records, Emily Holden reports. "Agency heads' daily schedules have long provided a valuable way for the public to be knowledgeable about important agency decisions, including those that affect the health and safety of their families and themselves," the suit says. EPA previously released Pruitt's meetings with automobile, chemical, fossil fuel and steel executives, and with lobbyists who worked with him when he was Oklahoma Attorney General, in response to a FOIA from the nonprofit group American Oversight — something the Times says EPA must do again, and more regularly. Read more.

EXXON-MASSACHUSETTS BEGINS: Exxon today urged the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court to block the state's attorney general from obtaining records related to whether the company hid its knowledge of the role of fossil fuels in climate change. Reuters reports Exxon lawyer Justin Anderson said his "arguments were focused only on whether Attorney General Maura Healey had jurisdiction to seek records to probe whether the oil company misled consumers and investors." Anderson argued not on the merits of the climate change, but instead "said Healey was improperly trying to establish jurisdiction in part based on more than 300 Exxon-branded gas stations in Massachusetts operated by franchisees to justify probing into the Texas-based company's actions elsewhere," Reuters writes.

Richard Johnston, Healey's chief legal counsel, meanwhile contended Exxon had "control over the franchisees' marketing and conducted advertising on their behalf," Reuters reports. "We should be able to find out if whether they knew about impact of fossil fuels on global warming so they should have said more in those advertisements," Johnston said. The justices gave no indication how they would rule, but "some expressed skepticism that the 300 stations could not create jurisdiction, even if consumers bought gas from a franchisee." HOUSE GOP LAYS OUT FUNDING TIMELINE: House GOP leaders will vote on a two-week spending stopgap to fund the government, POLITICO's Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris report, with Speaker Paul Ryan today pushing for a pre-Christmas vote. Republicans today said the spending bill, H.J. Res. 123 \(115\), would not be taken up by the Rules Committee until Wednesday, instead of this afternoon as previously planned. A floor vote now is not expected until Thursday, as whipping continues. Remember: Government funding expires on Friday, and it's still unclear if the Democratic support needed in the Senate is there.

MOVER, SHAKER: Terry Boss, senior vice president of environment, safety and operations at the Interstate Natural Gas Association of America, will retire after 23 years with the group, INGAA said today. Boss will officially depart on Dec. 31, after leading INGAA's efforts on pipeline safety and operations. INGAA also announced Rebecca Massello will take on the role of director of security, reliability and resilience. Massello, along with Operations, Safety and Integrity Director CJ Osman will acquire Boss' portfolio.

ITC imposes duties on biodiesel imports from Argentina, Indonesia Back

By Doug Palmer | 12/05/2017 10:12 AM EDT

The U.S. International Trade Commission today approved hefty double-digit duties on imports of biodiesel from Argentina and Indonesia, opening the door for a possible World Trade Organization challenge against the United States.

The trade panel voted 4-0 there was enough evidence of injury to U.S. producers to justify the restrictions.

The move clears the way for the Commerce Department to issue final countervailing duties in the range of 72 percent on imports from Argentina and 35 percent to 65 percent on imports from Indonesia.

Importers have already been required to post cash deposits based on those rates.

Biodiesel is made from a diverse mix of resources such as recycled cooking oil, soybean oil and animal fats, and can be used in existing diesel engines without modification, according to the National Biodiesel Board, which brought the case along with 15 domestic producers.

Argentina exported about $1.2 billion worth of the energy product to the United States last year and Indonesia exported about $268 million.

That was a combined increase of 464 percent from 2014 levels, taking 18.3 percentage points of market share from U.S. manufacturers, the biodiesel board said.

Argentina President Mauricio Macri told Reuters last month that Argentina would challenge the duties at the WTO if the Trump administration went through with the measures.

Argentina had hoped to settle the dispute by negotiating a minimum price for its exports, but no agreement was reached before the Commerce Department announced its final countervailing duty determinations last month.

Indonesian Trade Minister Enggartiasto Lukita has also threatened to challenge the duties either through the U.S. court system or at the WTO.

New York Times suing EPA for Pruitt schedules Back

By Emily Holden | 12/05/2017 10:39 AM EDT

The New York Times is suing EPA to try to force the agency to regularly release Administrator Scott Pruitt's full daily schedule and details on who he meets with.

In a lawsuit filed Monday in the U.S. District Court for D.C., the Times and Washington-based reporter Eric Lipton allege EPA is violating public records laws by failing to routinely release those records.

Since joining EPA, Pruitt has met with automobile, chemical, fossil fuel and steel executives, and with lobbyists who worked with him when he was Oklahoma Attorney General to challenge federal environmental rules, according to records released in response to an earlier Freedom of Information Act request from the nonprofit group American Oversight. The Times says FOIA requires EPA to release that level of information for other Pruitt meetings, and to regularly respond to requests for updated copies of Pruitt's schedule.

EPA chiefs under previous presidents have routinely released detailed calendars in response to regular records requests from reporters and public interest groups. Pruitt's EPA has been intermittently updating a vague list of appointments, which the lawsuit called insufficient.

"Agency heads' daily schedules have long provided a valuable way for the public to be knowledgeable about important agency decisions, including those that affect the health and safety of their families and themselves," the suit says. "When the public knows who has the ear of an agency head and for how long, and what interests they represent, the public is better equipped to ensure that agencies remain accountable and free from undue and undisclosed influence."

House GOP leaders vow no deals with Democrats on stopgap spending Back

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/05/2017 11:06 AM EDT

House Republican leaders have promised conservatives that they won't grant concessions to Democrats to get enough votes for a stopgap spending bill — gaining GOP support but also raising the specter of a government shutdown later this month.

Majority party leaders in the House tentatively decided Tuesday morning to hold tight on their plan to fund the government through Dec. 22, bucking calls from conservatives to move the deadline to Dec. 30.

Still whipping to ensure sufficient GOP support, leaders pushed off a Rules Committee meeting and final floor action by a day, with House passage on the two-week patch, H.J. Res. 123 \(115\), now expected Thursday. Government funding runs out on Friday.

Those intraparty talks will drag into Wednesday, after a huddle with House Speaker Paul Ryan, conservative holdouts and defense hawks ended without a resolution Tuesday afternoon. A final decision isn't expected until Wednesday morning, after another last-minute meeting by the House Freedom Caucus.

The problem with the House strategy is that Senate Republicans still need the votes of at least eight Senate Democrats to advance spending legislation, likely resulting in deal-making later this month that won't fly with fiscal conservatives in the House.

Enough Senate Democratic votes appear possible for a "clean" stopgap spending bill, or continuing resolution, that would extend from Friday until Dec. 22. Both parties hope to have reached a bipartisan, two-year agreement on overall spending levels for defense and non-defense programs by later in the month.

"We don't know what the House is going to do, but if it's a short-term CR, it gives us a little more time to do the things we're talking about now," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer told reporters Tuesday afternoon, noting that top congressional leaders plan to meet with President Donald Trump on Thursday to work on topline budget caps.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell also indicated that Republicans in the upper chamber are gunning for a two-week stopgap rather than a deal until Dec. 30, which he said isn't "the best way to go forward."

But the trouble could come with the vote on a second stopgap just before the Christmas holiday, when Democrats would be expected to make more demands such as an agreement on how to treat DREAMers, young undocumented immigrants. If GOP leaders in the lower chamber stay true to their promises to the likes of the House Freedom Caucus, the game plan could result in shutdown-spurring deadlock right before lawmakers plan to leave town for the holidays.

The scheduling changes in the House came after members of the Freedom Caucus temporarily withheld support on a tax vote Monday night to get leaders to opt for a Dec. 30 deadline.

But for now, fiscal hardliners seem appeased by other commitments they've clinched after making that demand.

Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.), a member of the Freedom Caucus, said leaders "made some great assurances" during a Tuesday morning Republican Conference meeting that "the team stays together" on issues that could emerge.

"And that means you don't go to the Democrats like usual at Christmastime or right after," Brat told reporters.

Longtime spending leader Rep. Hal Rogers (R-Ky.) suggested House lawmakers could try to force the Senate to accept their version of the second patch.

"If we pass a bill on or about the 22nd and go home, then the Senate will need to make up its mind about what to do about that," Rogers said. "The option is either: Pass or have a shutdown in place."

Ryan expressed confidence that the initial funding measure will pass this week but didn't address prospects for a deal beyond Dec. 22.

"I feel like we're going to have a majority, and we're going to have 218 for passing the CR we had this week," Ryan told reporters Tuesday morning. "We're having a good conversation with our members about timing and date and tactics and all the rest. The point is, we're having the kind of family discussion that we need to have on how to proceed forward with a majority, and I'm confident we'll have that."

In punting the drama to the week before Christmas, GOP lawmakers may try to jam Democrats with big boosts to defense spending.

An unlikely mix of conservatives and defense hawks is still eyeing a plan to attach a full year of Pentagon funding to the Dec. 22 bill — a move that would cause a showdown in the Senate.

Democrats in that chamber have refused to back a bill that prioritizes the military over spending on domestic programs. And Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin dug in on that threat Tuesday.

Some conservatives in the House are betting pressure to fund the Pentagon would be just enough to convince a handful of red-state Democrats to vote in support of a second government funding bill later this month.

If the military funding isn't enough, House Republicans are tossing around another bargaining chip: a disaster aid package. That bill would include tens of billions of dollars for storm-ravaged Florida, Texas, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, making it tougher for Democrats to oppose.

Another must-pass item, funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program, could also be added to the bill, lawmakers said.

"Is the Senate going to turn around, Christmas or New Year's, and say we're not going to take care of the defense of America, we're not going to take care of these people with these hurricanes?" Rep. Bradley Byrne (R-Ala.) said. "If they are, then it's on them."

Connor O'Brien contributed to this report.

Pro-trade GOP senators to urge Trump to stay in NAFTA Back

By Andrew Restuccia, Nancy Cook and Seung Min Kim | 12/05/2017 09:56 AM EDT

A group of pro-trade Republican senators will caution President Donald Trump against withdrawing from the North American Free Trade Agreement during a meeting at the White House on Tuesday, according to multiple people familiar with the meeting.

The meeting comes as the threat of a possible U.S. withdrawal hangs over ongoing negotiations with Canada and Mexico over the pact. U.S. officials have taken a hard line in the latest round of talks that just wrapped up in Mexico, raising concerns that the negotiations could collapse and Trump could pull out.

Six senators are slated to attend the Tuesday afternoon lunch with the president, according to a list provided by a White House official: Deb Fischer of Nebraska, Joni Ernst of Iowa, Jeff Flake of Arizona, Cory Gardner of Colorado, Lamar Alexander of Tennessee and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina.

Chief of staff John Kelly, United States Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer, National Economic Council director Gary Cohn and legislative affairs director Marc Short are also scheduled to attend the meeting.

The senators are expected to tout the benefits of NAFTA directly to the president, while warning that withdrawing could have dire economic consequences for the United States, according to one person involved in planning the meeting.

A White House spokeswoman did not respond to a request for comment.

Trump vowed as far back as the presidential campaign to withdraw from NAFTA if he couldn't get a better deal. The president almost signed an executive order in April that would have pulled the United States out of the pact, but Republican lawmakers and senior members of his administration persuaded him to back off, warning of consequences for the U.S. agriculture and manufacturing sectors.

But as negotiations over NAFTA have floundered, the president has maintained that he could jump-start the talks by beginning the process of withdrawing.

Russia probe cost DOJ $6.7 million in months after Mueller appointment Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 12/05/2017 10:59 AM EDT

The Justice Department spent $6.7 million on its probe into Russian meddling in the 2016 election in the four-and-a-half months after special counsel Robert Mueller's appointment, according to a report released Tuesday.

Of the total, only $3.2 million was spent directly by Mueller on salaries, travel, rent and equipment through September.

The other $3.5 million was spent on DOJ operations and would have been spent on its own pre-existing Russia investigations if Mueller hadn't been tapped to take over in mid-May. DOJ said it wasn't legally required to figure out this total, and past special counsels didn't tabulate it.

The report could provide fodder for President Donald Trump and allies who say the investigation has a blank check and no end in sight.

Republicans were critical of Mueller's spending even before they'd seen his receipts, with former White House strategist Steve Bannon earlier this fall urging Trump defund the probe, though the White House said Trump would not do that.

On Capitol Hill, Florida GOP Rep. Ron DeSantis tried without success earlier this summer to attach an amendment to a House budget resolution that would have halted Mueller's funding just six months into the job.

Spokesmen for DeSantis and Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), two of Mueller's leading critics, didn't immediately respond to requests for comment Tuesday. The GOP chairs of the House and Senate Appropriations committees declined to comment.

Coming to Mueller's defense, Senate Judiciary Committee ranking member Dianne Feinstein said $3.2 million in spending "is entirely reasonable given the results we've already seen." The California Democrat noted the special counsel in less than five months had already brought charges against two former senior Trump campaign aides, Paul Manafort and Rick Gates, and obtained guilty pleas from former national security adviser Michael Flynn and ex-campaign adviser George Papadopoulos.

"I continue to strongly support Bob Mueller's investigation and believe he should receive all the resources he needs to follow the facts and the law where they lead," Feinstein said.

Mueller's spending totals include $1.7 million for salaries and benefits, though $1.2 million of that went to DOJ employees who have been detailed to the Mueller probe.

New hires cost $500,696 for the period between Mueller's appointment in mid-May and the end of September.

In addition to salaries, Mueller also spent $733,969 to acquire office equipment for the investigation, which the DOJ report said would remain federal government property after the probe ends. The special counsel spent $223,643 for travel, almost entirely for staffers who have temporarily relocated to the investigation's headquarters in Washington.

The Mueller probe reported $157,339 in receipts for a variety of contractual services, including $111,245 for information technology, $24,456 for transcription and $17,217 for building services.

The Mueller budget is drawn from a permanent Treasury Department account that is not tied to the annual appropriations process. DOJ rules state Mueller "shall be provided all appropriate resources" to do his work, though his spending is being audited by DOJ's Justice Management Division every six months.

Mueller's next public report will be released at some point after his receipts through March 31, 2018 are turned over for review, special counsel spokesman Joshua Stueve said Tuesday.

How the special counsel's spending totals are made public represents a break from past precedent. Historically, the Government Accountability Office had conducted the audits of independent counsel and special counsel investigations. Many of those reports, reflecting both the frequency that special counsels worked and the length of time some of them took to complete work, often covered multiple probes. For example, a March 2001 GAO report listed the latest expenses for seven investigations that all related to President Bill Clinton.

In all, there have been 21 completed independent counsel and special counsel investigations of administration practices dating back to the Carter administration. Their total price tag: $231 million — $339 million when adjusted for inflation. Twelve of those cases concluded with no indictments.

Six separate investigations during the Clinton administration ran up costs of more than $140 million. President Ronald Reagan faced eight different probes, including Iran-Contra, for a total of more than $84 million, according to a POLITICO review of government audits and reports on their spending.

Conyers resigns effective immediately, endorses son as successor Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill and John Bresnahan | 12/05/2017 10:33 AM EDT

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) has announced he is leaving Congress immediately and endorsing his son, John Conyers III, to replace him following allegations of sexual harassment.

"I'm in the process of putting my retirement plans together, and I will have more about that very soon," Conyers, 88, told a Detroit radio station.

"I am retiring today," Conyers added. "And I want everyone to know how much I appreciate the support — the incredible, undiminished support I've received across the years from my supporters, not only in my district but across the country as well."

Conyers is the first member of Congress to relinquish his seat amid the growing national uproar over the mistreatment of women that has toppled powerful figures in Hollywood, the media and now Washington.

Conyers made the announcement that he was ending his congressional career in Detroit, his home and political base for more than five decades. The unofficial "dean of the House," he was first elected in 1964 and is the longest-serving member of the body — one of the longest-serving House members in the history.

Conyers first became a congressional aide in 1958, working for the legendary Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.). His margin-of-victory in most of his 27 congressional races was overwhelming, though Conyers lost two bids for mayor of Detroit.

Conyers' fall from grace was swift, but there were growing signs of trouble for him in recent days. Last week, some of Conyers' closest allies in the Congressional Black Caucus — a group he co-founded — started urging him to step aside.

While Conyers has denied any wrongdoing, he also admitted paying out $27,000 to a former aide over sexual-harassment allegations. That incident was first reported by BuzzFeed. Conyers used a congressional fund that normally covers office expenses, which concealed the payment.

Another former aide had filed a lawsuit against Conyers earlier this year detailing numerous instances of improper sexual behavior, before later withdrawing the civil action. Then a third former female aide came forward last week to say that Conyers had propositioned her for sex as well.

With news outlets searching frantically for additional victims, Conyers' support among his Democratic colleagues quickly eroded, especially among younger female members who had not served with the Michigan Democrat for long. Reps. Kathleen Rice (D-N.Y.) and Pramila Jayapal (D-Wash.) called for Conyers' resignation, and more Democrats were expected to follow their lead.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), stung by the backlash over her initial comments that appeared to support Conyers, threw her support behind an effort to have the Ethics Committee investigate the veteran lawmaker. Behind the scenes, Pelosi and other top Democrats, including CBC members, were pressuring Conyers, telling him he didn't want to go through an ethics investigation that could ruin his legacy.

But Pelosi then moved to calling on Conyers to resign last Thursday, dramatically upping the stakes.

"The allegations against Congressman Conyers, as we have learned more since Sunday are serious, disappointing and very credible," Pelosi said at her weekly news conference then. "It's very sad and the brave women who came forward are owed justice. I will pray for Congressman Conyers and his family, and wish them well. However, Congressman Conyers should resign."

Conyers announced his plans from the hospital, calling it a "retirement" even though his departure is effective Tuesday.

"My legacy can't be compromised or diminished in any way by what we're going through now. This, too, shall pass, and I want you to know that my legacy will continue through my children," Conyers said.

"I have a great family here, and especially in my oldest boy, John Conyers III, who incidentally I endorse to replace me in my seat in Congress," he continued. "So we're all working together to make this country a better one, to make equality and justice more available for any."

Conyers was born in Detroit and attended public schools there. After seeing combat in the Korean War, he returned home and enrolled in Wayne State University. Conyers later received a law degree from Wayne State Law School.

Conyers then served as an aide to Dingell and as counsel to several labor unions. He also worked for Michigan's workmen's compensation department.

He formed ties to the ACLU and NAACP, and Conyers went to Selma, Alabama, in 1963 to help register black voters.

By 1964, Conyers was elected to the House, winning easily. He continued to do so for decades to come.

In 1989 and 1993, Conyers ran for mayor of Detroit but didn't perform well either time.

Conyers has a long record of legislative and institutional accomplishments in Congress. He chaired both the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Government Operations (now the Oversight and Government Reform Committee) during his tenure in the House.

Conyers also helped to co-found the CBC in 1969. That group has now become a major power bloc within the House Democratic Caucus.

The Michigan Democrat focused on civil rights during his tenure in Congress, especially on making it easier for average Americans to vote. He helped pass the 1988 Alcoholic Beverage Labeling Act, 1993 National Voter Registration Act (also known as the "Motor Voter Bill"), the 1994 Violence Against Women Act, and the 2002 Help America Vote Act, among other bills.

In addition, Conyers worked to enact a national holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr. He pumped hundreds of millions of dollars in federal aid into his district, a poor minority-majority area that has suffered from long-term economic distress and high unemployment.

Conyers, though, has faced several ethical scandals over the past decade. These incidents, as well as Conyers' physical and mental deterioration over the last several years, led to internal discussions in January about replacing him as ranking member on Judiciary. However, the CBC strongly objected, and Conyers kept his post.

In 2006, Conyers was investigated by the Ethics Committee for allegedly using his staff for personal errands, including babysitting his children. No formal action was ever taken against him by the panel.

Three years later, Conyers' wife Monica pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges and was sentenced to 37 months in prison. While Conyers was unaffected politically by his wife's criminal case, there were later reports of serious troubles in their marriage, leading to a divorce filing by Monica Conyers that was later withdrawn. The two had met when she worked for his campaign in the late 1980s. They were married in 1990. He was 61; she was 25. They have two children.

In 2016, Conyers came under investigation by the Office of Congressional Ethics for paying his former chief of staff, Cynthia Martin, for six months after she pleaded guilty to receiving stolen property, a misdemeanor. Conyers refused to cooperate with the OCE probe and the Ethics Committee took no action.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Pruitt heads to the Hill — Trump searching for RFS "common ground" — FERC gets to 5
Date: Thursday, December 07, 2017 4:31:20 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 12/07/2017 04:28 PM EDT

PRUITT HEADS TO THE HILL: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt today shifted from earlier statements on the Clean Power Plan and said he would write a replacement rule for the Obama-era rule designed to curb carbon dioxide emissions from power plants. Pruitt previously said EPA was also considering not replacing the rule. But when asked by Rep. Raul Ruiz (D-Calif.) whether his agency had reversed its position on the health effects of particle pollution in proposing to repeal the CPP in October, Pruitt confirmed a replacement plan. "We did not reverse it, congressman. And moreover, we are going to be introducing a replacement rule to replace the Clean Power Plan under Section 111," Pruitt replied during his first appearance before the House Energy and Commerce Committee today.

Coming soon: Pruitt also indicated his "red team" review of climate change science could begin as soon as next month, Alex Guillén reports.

Expanded asbestos review? Maybe: Pruitt also hinted today that the agency may reverse a previous decision expanding asbestos to include millions of tons of the carcinogen already in use, Alex reports. The agency back in July said it would not consider "legacy" uses and disposal while reviewing asbestos under the Toxic Substances Control Act, instead limiting the review to "manufacturing, processing and distribution." But Pruitt today said that scope may expand, after Rep. Frank Pallone (D-N.J.) raised concerns that the initial plan was insufficient. "I think it's a very important factor that we need to consider and it's something I've already raised with the office that's overseeing this," Pruitt said. More here.

In a tweet: Pruitt said he met with the Moms Clean Air Force before today's hearing. "Thanks for attending and I look forward to working together and hearing your stories," he said.

LOOKING FOR COMMON GROUND: President Donald Trump met today with 11 GOP senators and a host of senior administration officials to discuss biofuels — a meetup that's been months in the making, via calls from corn-backed states and the likes of senators like Ted Cruz (R-Texas).

Ahead of the meeting, the White House said: The president would seek "common ground" on the future of biofuels policy. "President Trump will meet with senators today to discuss his commitment to the Renewable Fuel Standard and how to effectively address the program's impact on independent refiners," a spokesman said. "He will listen to the concerns of senators who represent these workers, with the hope of finding common ground on both sides of this debate."

FERC GETS TO FIVE: Kevin McIntyre, Trump's pick to lead FERC, was sworn in as chairman this morning, the agency announced. McIntyre, a longtime Jones Day attorney, has a term running into 2023. He'll take the reins of the regulatory agency in the midst of its review of a controversial grid resiliency proposal from the Energy Department to prop up coal and nuclear plants. FERC is expected to respond to DOE's grid proposal by Dec. 11.

EPA ADDS ANOTHER: The Senate approved Susan Bodine's nomination to be assistant EPA administrator running the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance by a voice vote. Bodine was the top counsel to Republicans on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. She started at EPA in September as a special adviser on enforcement issues to Pruitt. More here.

Balash cannonball: The Senate confirmed Joe Balash by a vote of 61-38 today to be Interior's assistant secretary for land and minerals management. Sen. Lisa Murkowski congratulated the fellow Alaskan in a tweet saying, "W/ significant experience on energy & resource policy, a record of upholding Alaska's interests as a landowner, he will ensure America's interests are well represented."

BLM FINALIZES METHANE RULE DELAY: The Bureau of Land Management will post its long-term delay of its methane rule in a Friday Federal Register notice. The key provisions, "including leak detection and repair requirements, will not be enforced until Jan. 17, 2019, according to the notice. That will give BLM enough time to repeal the rule," Alex reports. A timeline for BLM's review and potential repeal remains unclear, Alex reports.

API CHIEF WARNS COST OF NAFTA WITHDRAWAL: CEO of the American Petroleum Institute Jack Gerard warned Trump that a withdrawal from NAFTA would put U.S. energy jobs and leadership at risk. "The natural gas, oil and refined products industry support efforts to modernize NAFTA, which will enhance North America's role as a global energy leader," Gerard said today during a discussion on the pact hosted by the Washington International Trade Association. "However, if a modernization agreement cannot be reached, the administration must retain its commitment to the current trade agreement," Gerard added — echoing a host of other industry leaders who are worried about the implications of a withdrawal from the agreement. More here from Pro Trade's Doug Palmer.

GE CUTS 12K JOBS: General Electric announced today it is cutting 12,000 jobs in its power equipment division, which accounts for about 18 percent of the unit's workforce, The Wall Street Journal reports. The move comes "as the conglomerate slashes costs and battles overcapacity in its core business," WSJ writes. "GE's Power unit has been a major source of pain for the struggling company as global demand has dropped in tandem with GE integrating its acquisition of Alstom SA's power business. The company has said it misjudged the market as volume dropped in traditional coal and gas-fired power, while renewable energy sources grew." Read more.

COAL CAUCUS JOINS ANTI-AMT PUSH: Republicans in the Coal Caucus today urged the writers of the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), to drop the alternative minimum tax from the final legislation, saying that failing to repeal it would be "devastating" to the coal industry, Alex reports. "Coal companies invest heavily in new equipment, oftentimes doing so with large borrowing costs. The industry is very capital-intensive, with many leveraged employers," wrote the lawmakers, led by Rep. David McKinley (R-W.Va.). "If the corporate AMT remains in the tax code, paired with new limits on interest deductibility, many companies will have a higher tax burden." Earlier this week, coal executive Robert Murray told The Wall Street Journal keeping the AMT would kill his business. More here.

FRANKEN RESIGNS: Sen. Al Franken resigned today after multiple women came forward in recent weeks to say Franken groped or tried to forcibly kiss them. The Minnesota Democrat lost the support of most Democratic senators ahead of his resignation. See the full text of his resignation speech here, and ICYMI on Wednesday, POLITICO's Maggie Severns reports Minnesota Gov. Mark Dayton is expected to appoint his lieutenant governor and close ally, Tina Smith, to take Franken's seat. More on that here.

DOE ANNOUNCES $30M FOR NUCLEAR: Energy Secretary Rick Perry announced a funding opportunity for advanced nuclear technology development to the tune of $30 million. "Targeted early-stage investment in advanced nuclear technology will support a strong domestic industry now and into the future," Perry said in a statement. "This funding opportunity is an important step to ensure our nation continues to benefit from this clean, resilient source of electricity."

Pruitt says EPA will write replacement for Clean Power Plan Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/07/2017 12:01 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said today that he will write a replacement rule for the Clean Power Plan, a shift from previous statements that EPA was also considering not replacing the Obama administration's rule designed to curb carbon dioxide emissions from power plants.

Appearing for the first time before the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Pruitt faced questions from Rep. Raul Ruiz (D-Calif.) about whether EPA had reversed its position on the health effects of particle pollution in proposing to repeal the Clean Power Plan in October.

"We did not reverse it, congressman. And moreover, we are going to be introducing a replacement rule to replace the Clean Power Plan under Section 111," Pruitt replied.

The hearing went into recess at that point so Pruitt could attend a White House meeting.

"We have no further details at this time," an EPA spokesperson said in response to questions about Pruitt's statement.

Pruitt also indicated his "red team" review of climate change science could begin as soon as next month.

Pruitt hints at expanded asbestos review Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/07/2017 12:26 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt today indicated EPA may expand its review of asbestos to include millions of tons of the carcinogen already in use, potentially reversing a decision from earlier this year.

EPA in July said it would not consider "legacy" uses and disposal while reviewing asbestos under the newly reformed Toxic Substances Control Act, instead limiting the review to "manufacturing, processing and distribution."

Rep. Frank Pallone (D-N.J.), the House Energy and Commerce Committee's ranking member, said at a hearing with Pruitt today that he is concerned that by not considering use and disposal, "you'll produce a risk assessment that fails to capture the risk to workers and ordinary Americans, and in my opinion will not be scientifically valid, and will not be protective of public health."

"I think you've raised a very valid concern," Pruitt replied. "In fact, I had a conversation last week about this very issue with the chemical office. I think you raise a very, very meaningful concern."

Pallone said he hopes to see action on the matter.

"I think it's a very important factor that we need to consider and it's something I've already raised with the office that's overseeing this," Pruitt said.

Asbestos is no longer produced in the U.S., and Pallone said the only remaining source of imports is Russia. President Trump has famously said that asbestos, once a popular flame retardant used in building construction, is "100 percent safe, once applied," despite OSHA's declaration that there is no safe level.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA is expected to issue a "problem formulation" document soon that could change the scope of the asbestos review, and will take public comment before proceeding with the risk evaluation.

11 GOP senators, senior officials to meet with Trump on biofuels Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/07/2017 09:34 AM EDT

The White House said President Donald Trump will seek "common ground" on the future of biofuels policy with 11 Republican senators and a host of senior administration officials during a meeting today.

"President Trump will meet with senators today to discuss his commitment to the Renewable Fuel Standard and how to effectively address the program's impact on independent refiners," a spokesman said. "He will listen to the concerns of senators who represent these workers, with the hope of finding common ground on both sides of this debate."

They'll be joined by White House chief of staff John Kelly, Legislative Affairs Director Marc Short, National Economic Council head Gary Cohn, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Agriculture Secretary Sonny Purdue and Deputy Energy Secretary Dan Brouillette, among others.

What's next: The meeting is scheduled for 11:30 a.m.

McIntyre sworn in at FERC Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/07/2017 10:43 AM EDT

Kevin McIntyre, who President Donald Trump intends to lead FERC, was sworn in as chairman this morning, the agency announced.

The former longtime Jones Day attorney has a term running into 2023. He was confirmed by the Senate on Nov. 2, alongside Democratic FERC nominee Rich Glick, who was sworn in last week.

McIntyre takes the reins at FERC in the midst of the agency's review of a controversial grid resiliency proposal from the Energy Department that would prop up economically struggling coal and nuclear power plants. FERC is expected to take "final action" of some kind on the proposal by Dec. 11, and interim FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee has been pressing his colleagues to support an "interim" measure that would keep generators "afloat" while seeking comprehensive changes to power market pricing.

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC is expected to respond to DOE's grid proposal by Dec. 11. Ten days later McIntyre will chair his first FERC open meeting.

Senate confirms EPA, Interior nominees Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/07/2017 01:48 PM EDT

The Senate today approved Susan Bodine's nomination to be assistant EPA administrator running the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance by a voice vote.

Bodine was the top counsel to Republicans on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. She started at EPA in September as a special adviser on enforcement issues to Administrator Scott Pruitt.

The committee's top Democrat, Tom Carper of Delaware, had sought to delay her confirmation amid a fight with EPA over responding to oversight letters from Democrats.

Bodine is just the third person confirmed to EPA in the Trump administration, after Pruitt and air chief William Wehrum.

The Senate today also approved Joseph Balash to be assistant secretary of the Interior for land and minerals management by a vote of 61-38.

BLM finalizes delay of methane waste rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/07/2017 09:34 AM EDT

The Bureau of Land Management will finalize a long-term delay of its methane waste rule in a notice to be published in Friday's Federal Register.

The rule's key provisions, including leak detection and repair requirements, will not be enforced until Jan. 17, 2019, according to the notice. That will give BLM enough time to repeal the rule.

"The BLM has concerns regarding the statutory authority, cost, complexity, feasibility, and other implications of the 2016 final rule, and therefore intends to avoid imposing likely considerable and immediate compliance costs on operators for requirements that may be rescinded or significantly revised in the near future," the agency wrote in the notice.

The Interior Department issued a hasty delay last year, but it was struck down by a federal judge who said the agency failed to follow administrative procedure, in particular collecting public comment on a delay. BLM subsequently went through notice-and-comment rulemaking to produce this new delay.

BLM said on Monday that it will appeal that judge's ruling, despite the newly finalized delay. If that appeal succeeds, it would make it easier for Interior to stop rules in the future.

WHAT'S NEXT: It is unclear how long it will take BLM to complete its review and potential repeal of the methane waste rule, also known as the venting and flaring rule.

Oil industry chief warns Trump NAFTA withdrawal would cost jobs Back

By Doug Palmer | 12/07/2017 11:28 AM EDT

President Donald Trump would put U.S. energy jobs and leadership at risk if he decides to withdraw from NAFTA because Canada and Mexico won't agree to U.S. demands for changes to the pact, the head of the American Petroleum Institute said today.

"The natural gas, oil and refined products industry support efforts to modernize NAFTA, which will enhance North America's role as a global energy leader," Jack Gerard, CEO of the American Petroleum Institute, said during a discussion on the pact hosted by the Washington International Trade Association.

"However, if a modernization agreement cannot be reached, the administration must retain its commitment to the current trade agreement," Gerard said, joining a growing chorus of industry leaders worried that Trump might follow through on repeated threats to pull out of the pact.

Trump would also jeopardize U.S. energy jobs by weakening NAFTA's investment protections, Gerard continued, referring to U.S. proposals that would reportedly allow countries to opt out of a binding investor-state dispute settlement process.

Those proposals reflects a view in the Trump administration that binding dispute settlement decisions impinge on national sovereignty. However, Gerard dismissed that as a "philosophical" argument that carries little weight with energy companies, who put hundreds of millions of dollars at risk in foreign projects.

With the North American region on the verge of energy independence by 2020, the United States, Canada and Mexico should be moving to strengthen ties, not potentially weaken them, Gerard argued.

NAFTA recently enacted reform to allow foreign and private investment in its energy sector for the first time in more than 75 years. A Trump decision to withdraw from NAFTA could encourage Mexico to favor other sources of foreign investment, such as China, over the United States, he said.

Coal Caucus pushes to drop AMT from tax bill Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/07/2017 01:36 PM EDT

Twenty-six Republicans in the Coal Caucus today urged the writers of the tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), to drop the Alternative Minimum Tax from the final legislation, saying that failing to repeal it would be "devastating" to the coal industry.

"Coal companies invest heavily in new equipment, oftentimes doing so with large borrowing costs. The industry is very capital-intensive, with many leveraged employers," wrote the lawmakers, led by Rep. David McKinley (R-W.Va.). "If the corporate AMT remains in the tax code, paired with new limits on interest deductibility, many companies will have a higher tax burden."

The House's bill would repeal the AMT, but the Senate's kept it in while at the same time limiting corporate deductions. The AMT sets a floor to prevent corporations from using tax breaks to go below a certain rate — currently, 20 percent.

"This tax hike will have far-reaching unintended consequences to an industry President [Donald] Trump promised to help," the lawmakers wrote. They also criticized the Senate-passed language for barring the use of previously generated AMT credits to offset regular taxes, saying coal companies have "significant" stores of unused AMT credits.

Coal executive Robert Murray told The Wall Street Journal this week that keeping the AMT would kill his business.

Franken resigns Back

By Elana Schor and Seung Min Kim | 12/07/2017 11:54 AM EDT

Sen. Al Franken said on Thursday that he would resign after seven women came forward in recent weeks and said he groped or tried to forcibly kiss them, capping a stunning fall from grace for one of the Democratic Party's most popular and high-profile politicians.

The second-term Minnesota Democrat, a prolific fundraiser once viewed as a possible White House hopeful, quickly lost support of the most Democratic senators after a fresh set of allegations hit this week. Franken is the second Democratic member of Congress to quit — Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the longest-serving member of the House, also resigned this week — amid a heightened consciousness and debate across the nation about the heavy toll of workplace sexual harassment.

The 66-year-old senator, a famous comedian and talk show host in his former life who was first elected in 2008, needled President Donald Trump and Alabama Senate candidate Roy Moore while announcing his departure "in the coming weeks." An aide said Thursday that an exact resignation date has yet to be determined.

"I, of all people, am aware that there is some irony in the fact that I am leaving while a man who has bragged on tape about his history of sexual assault sits in the Oval Office and a man who has repeatedly preyed on young girls campaigns for the Senate with the full support of his party," Franken said, referring to Trump's comments captured on tape about grabbing women's genitals and to Moore's multiple allegations of sexual assault or harassment of women in their teens.

"But this decision is not about me," Franken added in his floor speech, which began shortly before noon on Thursday. "It's about the people of Minnesota. It's become clear that I can't pursue the Ethics Committee process and at the same time remain an effective senator for them."

About two dozen Democratic senators attended Franken's address, including Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York, fellow Minnesota Democrat Amy Klobuchar, and several of the female senators who triggered the flood of resignation calls. Many members of Franken's staff sat behind him on the chamber, with a handful appearing very emotional — as did Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), who removed her glasses at least twice to wipe her eyes.

Only one Republican was in the chamber for Franken's speech (aside from Sen. Dan Sullivan of Alaska, who was presiding at the time): Arizona Sen. Jeff Flake, an outspoken Trump critic who called Franken a "friend" who "did the right thing." Also watching the speech from the Senate gallery were Franken's wife, Franni; longtime Democratic consultant Mandy Grunwald, a friend of Franken; and John Bessler, Klobuchar's husband.

After he concluded his address, no one applauded, as usually happens during a senator's farewell speech. No other senator stood up to make remarks about Franken's tenure. Instead, Democratic senators walked over to Franken's desk and lined up to embrace him, including women such as Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York and Mazie Hirono of Hawaii, who demanded his ouster.

Not all Democratic senators agreed with Franken's decision to step aside, however.

"You know, I just felt the process should've proceeded," Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.) said after a long pause. "I thought that Al should've been able to go through the process and in the process, he would've been able to make the statement he had to make today [that] he was forced to make, without resigning."

Franken's popularity among his party's liberal base has stoked some anxiety on the left over the party's decision to push him out. His political stardom skyrocketed earlier this year as he emerged as one of the toughest questioners during confirmation hearings for top Trump administration officials, including now-Attorney General Jeff Sessions and Education Secretary Betsy DeVos.

He was close with Schumer, who led the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee during Franken's 2008 Senate bid, which prompted a recount that left the former "Saturday Night Live" star victorious by just 312 votes and handing Democrats the all-critical 60th vote in the Senate.

Though a gregarious personality in the Senate, Franken tried to keep his profile down in some ways, eschewing the national press in favor of home-state media. But he was an outspoken force on several key issues, including on education and net neutrality.

For fellow Democrats however, particularly the women in the caucus, the tide of allegations against him became too great to ignore.

POLITICO reported Wednesday morning on the seventh woman to come forward about Franken, a former Democratic congressional aide who said he tried to forcibly kiss her in 2006. Within hours, Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) called for his resignation, followed by a half-dozen fellow female Democrats and, eventually, a majority of the caucus.

Schumer quietly urged Franken on Wednesday to step aside following the publication of the POLITICO story, and other Democratic senators privately spoke with the embattled senator before he made his announcement on Thursday.

Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.), who spoke with Franken on the phone on Wednesday, said he told him that "it matters to me that you called me personally, and I will also do the right thing."

"I said, 'Look, I think this behavior, you're a wonderful senator and you've done so much good for so many but I just think the behavior is wrong and resignation is really the only alternative now,'" Kaine recalled. "It was a hard conversation."

Still, Franken offered no apology on Thursday to the seven women who have alleged sexually improper behavior. He noted in his speech that in responding to the women, he "wanted to be respectful" of the broader national conversation about sexual harassment "because all women deserve to be heard and their experiences taken seriously."

"I think that was the right thing to do," he added. "I also think it gave some people the false impression that I was admitting to doing things that, in fact, I haven't done. Some of the allegations against me are simply not true, others I remember very differently."

Franken's seat may be in play in an expected special election next year, given that President Donald Trump lost Minnesota by an unexpectedly slim margin in 2016. The state's Democratic governor, Mark Dayton, is expected to appoint Lt. Gov. Tina Smith as a caretaker for the seat, paving the way for a potential open primary race in a 2018 special election to serve out the two years remaining in Franken's term.

Pushing Franken out, after Conyers resigned on Tuesday amid misconduct allegations from several former aides, also puts Democrats on firmer political ground on the issue of sexual harassment as the GOP prepares for Moore's potential arrival in the Senate.

Moore, the Republican nominee in Alabama's Dec. 12 Senate special election, faces multiple allegations of sexual assault or harassment from women and girls as young as 14. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has signaled he plans to pursue expulsion proceedings against Moore, but the Alabaman's endorsement by Trump is driving a wedge within the GOP.

"One of the serious issues we have to face is, what is the appropriate price to pay if you are guilty of such misconduct? To make every case resignation is not fair," Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois said. "To ignore the problem is certainly unacceptable. So we have to work this out as an institution, in terms of our ethics committee, its authority and the standards that we're going to use to grade ourselves and others."

Full text: Al Franken's resignation speech on the Senate floor Back

By POLITICO Staff | 12/07/2017 01:19 PM EDT

WASHINGTON, D.C. [12/07/17]—Today, U.S. Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) gave the following speech as prepared for delivery on the Senate floor. You can also download a video of the speech here.

A couple of months ago, I felt that we had entered an important moment in the history of this country. We were finally beginning to listen to women about the ways in which men's actions affect them. That moment was long overdue. I was excited for that conversation, and hopeful that it would result in real change that made life better for women all across the country and in every part of our society.

Then, the conversation turned to me. Over the last few weeks, a number of women have come forward to talk about how they felt my actions had affected them. I was shocked. I was upset. But in responding to their claims, I also wanted to be respectful of that broader conversation, because all women deserve to be heard, and their experiences taken seriously.

I think that was the right thing to do. I also think it gave some people the false impression that I was admitting to doing things that, in fact, I haven't done. Some of the allegations against me are simply not true. Others, I remember very differently.

I said at the outset that the Ethics Committee was the right venue for these allegations to be heard, and investigated, and evaluated on their merits. That I was prepared to cooperate fully. And that I was confident in the outcome.

You know, an important part of the conversation we've been having the last few months has been about how men abuse their power and privilege to hurt women.

I am proud that, during my time in the Senate, I have used my power to be a champion for women - and that I have earned a reputation as someone who respects the women I work alongside every day. I know there's been a very different picture of me painted over the last few weeks. But I know who I really am.

Serving in the United States Senate has been the great honor of my life. I know in my heart that nothing I have done as a Senator - nothing - has brought dishonor on this institution. And I am confident that the Ethics Committee would agree.

Nevertheless, today I am announcing that, in the coming weeks, I will be resigning as a member of the United States Senate.

I, of all people, am aware that there is some irony in the fact that I am leaving while a man who has bragged on tape about his history of sexual assault sits in the Oval Office, and a man who has repeatedly preyed on young girls campaigns for the Senate with the full support of his party.

But this decision is not about me. It's about the people of Minnesota. And it's become clear that I can't both pursue the Ethics Committee process and, at the same time, remain an effective Senator for them.

Let me be clear. I may be resigning my seat, but I am not giving up my voice. I will continue to stand up for the things I believe in as a citizen, and as an activist.

But Minnesotans deserve a Senator who can focus with all her energy on addressing the challenges they face every day.

There is a big part of me that will always regret having to walk away from this job with so much work left to be done. But I have faith that the work will continue, because I have faith in the people who have helped me do it.

I have faith in the dedicated, funny, selfless young men and women on my staff. They have so much more to contribute to our country. And I hope that, as disappointed as they may feel today, everyone who has ever worked for me knows how much I admire and respect them.

I have faith in my colleagues, especially my senior Senator, Amy Klobuchar. I would not have been able to do this job without her guidance and wisdom. And I have faith - or, at least, hope - that members of this Senate will find the political courage necessary to keep asking the tough questions, hold this administration accountable, and stand up for the truth.

I have faith in the activists who organized to help me win my first campaign and who have kept on organizing to help fight for the people who needed us: kids facing bullying, seniors worried about the price of prescription drugs, Native Americans who have been overlooked for far too long, working people who have been taking it on the chin for a generation - everyone in the middle class and everyone aspiring to join it.

I have faith in the proud legacy of progressive advocacy that I have had the privilege to be a part of. I think I've probably repeated these words ten thousand times over the years, Paul Wellstone's famous quote: "The future belongs to those who are passionate and work hard." It is still true. It will always be true.

And, most of all, I have faith in Minnesota. A big part of this job is going around the state and listening to what people need from Washington. But, more often than not, when I'm home, I'm blown away by how much Minnesota has to offer the entire country and the entire world. The people I have had the honor of representing are brilliant, and creative, and hard-working. And whoever holds this seat next will inherit the challenge I've enjoyed for the last eight and a half years: being as good as the people you serve.

This has been a tough few weeks for me. But I am a very, very lucky man. I have a beautiful, healthy family that I love, and that loves me very much. I am going to be just fine.

I'd just like to end with one last thing.

I did not grow up wanting to be a politician. I came to this relatively late in life. I had to learn a lot on the fly. It wasn't easy. And it wasn't always fun.

I'm not just talking about today. This is a hard thing to do with your life. There are a lot of long hours and late nights and hard lessons, and there is no guarantee that all your work and sacrifice will ever pay off. I won my first election by 312 votes - it could have easily gone the other way. And even when you win, progress is far from inevitable. Paul Wellstone spent his whole life working for mental health parity, and it didn't pass into law until six years after he died.

This year, a lot of people who didn't grow up imagining they'd ever get involved in politics have done just that. They've gone to their first protest march, or made their first call to a member of Congress, or maybe even taken the leap and put their name on a ballot for the first time.

It can be such a rush, to look around at a room full of people ready to fight alongside you, to feel that energy, to imagine that better things are possible. But you, too, will experience setbacks and defeats and disappointments. There will be days when you will wonder whether it's worth it.

What I want you to know is that, even today, even on the worst day of my political life, I feel like it's all been worth it. "Politics," Paul Wellstone told us, "is about the improvement of people's lives." I know that the work I've been able to do has improved people's lives. I would do it all over again in a heartbeat.

For a decade now, every time I would get tired, or discouraged, or frustrated, I would think about the people I was doing this for, and it would get me back up on my feet. I know the same will be true for everyone who decides to pursue a politics that is about improving people's lives. And I hope you know that I will be right there fighting alongside you, every step of the way.

With that, M. President, I yield the floor.

Female lieutenant governor expected to replace Franken if he resigns Back

By Maggie Severns | 12/06/2017 06:49 PM EDT

Minnesota Gov. Mark Dayton is expected to appoint his lieutenant governor and close ally, Tina Smith, to Al Franken's seat if the Democratic senator resigns on Thursday, three people familiar with the Democratic governor's thinking said.

But that appointment would be just the start of an upheaval in Minnesota. Part of the reason Smith could be heading to the Senate, the sources said, is that she has indicated no interest in running for Congress in the past and would not run for the remainder of Franken's term, which expires in 2020, in a 2018 special election. That would clear the way for a wide open Democratic primary next year if Franken steps down.

Franken's sudden fall under a deluge of sexual harassment allegations has prompted Democrats to suddenly consider a fast-approaching special election for a once-safe seat — and given Republicans an unexpected opportunity in a state President Donald Trump lost by just 1 point in 2016. But installing Smith or another placeholder in the seat would separate the appointment from potentially fractious Democratic primary politics, giving other Democrats the opportunity to fight on a level playing field in a special primary. Additionally, appointing a woman to fill Franken's role would serve as a symbolic rebuke to Franken in the wake of the allegations against him, Minnesota Democrats pointed out.

"[Smith] really gets Minnesota, she gets the players, she has great built-up relationships," said a Democratic operative with long experience in Minnesota. "She makes practical sense, and she would be a good bridge builder."

Franken's office tweeted late Wednesday that he has not decided whether to resign, but he has an announcement scheduled for Thursday and faced calls to leave the Senate from more than half of his caucus on Wednesday, including Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer. Already, a number of high-profile Minnesota Democrats — including Rep. Keith Ellison, the Democratic National Committee deputy chair, and Rep. Tim Walz, who is currently running for governor — are considered possible contenders to run for Franken's seat.

It is not an opportunity ambitious Democrats were expecting anytime soon. Franken was popular until women came forward accusing him of inappropriate touching and sexual harassment, and well-liked Sen. Amy Klobuchar is considered a lock for reelection in 2018.

Dayton could opt to appoint a senator who would run for the rest of Franken's term next year, giving that person the power of incumbency and more time to build up seniority. But the governor is currently leaning toward giving the seat to a temporary placeholder, giving divided Democrats the chance to choose the next senator through the electoral process instead of by gubernatorial choice. Dayton's office did not respond to a request for comment.

Republicans also said Wednesday that Franken's departure has opened up an opportunity they weren't expecting for years.

"This presents a major opportunity for Republicans in Minnesota," said GOP operative Brian McClung, a former top aide to ex-Gov. Tim Pawlenty. "Republicans here are going to be energized by the chance to replace Al Franken. We continue to believe that Norm Coleman beat him the first time around."

Smith, the lieutenant governor, is a former marketing professional who served as chief of staff to former Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak. She worked at the mayor's office in 2007, when the Interstate 35W bridge collapsed in Minneapolis, and played a role in helping rebuild the bridge in the months that followed.

Smith has worked with Dayton since 2010, first on his campaign and as his chief of staff and later as his running mate. Smith earlier this year passed on a run for governor to replace Dayton and signaled she might not be interested in running for office again at all.

"I feel very confident in that decision and actually really energized by being able to put all of my focus on the next, basically, two years left in the term and do this job that I really love," Smith told the Star-Tribune at the time.

That is part of Smith's appeal as a potential placeholder. And it means the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota would have an open contest for Franken's seat, meeting in late spring for the party endorsement process and then holding a primary next August. Because there is relatively little time between Minnesota's primaries and the November general election, Democrats in the state hope they can coalesce around a candidate next spring.

Minnesota Democrats were sharply divided last year over the presidential race, and a sense of division lingers. Sen. Bernie Sanders won the primary caucuses in the state and some rural Democrats ultimately voted for Trump, unnerving urban Democrats in Minneapolis and St. Paul area who tend to dominate state politics.

A number of Democrats currently running to replace Dayton could become candidates for Franken's seat, if he were to resign. That includes Walz and Attorney General Lori Swanson, who has not announced a bid for governor but has often been mentioned as a potential candidate. Ilhan Omar, a Somali-American state representative, was circulated as another potential candidate for the Senate seat on Wednesday.

Why Democrats had to dump Franken Back

By Edward-Isaac Dove | 12/07/2017 01:27 PM EDT

A year into Donald Trump's presidency, many voters still don't know what Democrats stand for — so at the very least, party leaders reluctantly decided, they better take a stand against sexual harassment.

Especially when they're going to need a huge turnout among women to do what now still seems like a reach, but six months ago seemed impossible: flip the House and maybe even the Senate, and rally in races for governor and state legislature across the country next year.

"For the last decade, Democrats have been pointing the finger at the Republican Party for devaluing women," said Guy Cecil, chairman of Priorities USA and the executive director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee during the 2012 and 2014 cycles. "This is a requirement to be able to look at them with a straight face and say we're the party that cares about them."

"As long as Republicans don't do that, there's a very sharp contrast to be drawn. And there's no question that women not only make up a majority of the voting population, but across the country, of both political parties, are sick and tired of the sexual harassment they're facing in all sorts of work places," said Rep. Pramila Jayapal (D-Wash.), who has been at the forefront of calling on Democrats accused of harassment to step down.

So it doesn't matter if Nancy Pelosi calls you an "icon," or if most Senate Democrats consider you a friend who just this year got comfortable enough in the job as senator to let his comedian side show in public. For a party heading into 2018 planning to run against Republicans as morally and legally corrupt, they know they need a clean argument.

Rep. John Conyers is the only person in history to be endorsed by both Martin Luther King Jr. and Barack Obama. Al Franken was quickly becoming a legend on the left for his aggressive questioning at hearings.

But both of them were getting in the way of what party leaders see as a bigger mission, and bigger plans. And with the standard now set by Conyers and Franken, they know that will likely mean the end of Ruben Kihuen — the Nevada congressman elected last year as a face of the next generation of Latino political power — along with any other Democrat confronted with credible allegations of harassment or assault.

"Just because Donald Trump is sitting in the White House and Clarence Thomas may be sitting in the Supreme Court," said former Democratic National Committee Chair Donna Brazile, "this is a very important moment and Democrats cannot slip-slide and not have a standard."

Cecil, who days ago was one of the first prominent Democratic operatives to call for Franken's resignation, said he sees this as "a clear-cut case."

"I wish it would be both parties, but it is critical from an ethical and political point of view for the Democratic Party to be clear about what we are willing to accept and not accept," he argued.

Voters haven't left Democrats with much of a choice. Polls show that while Republicans believe sexual harassment is a Democratic problem, Democrats think it's a problem across the board.

Beyond the White House's dismissal of the women who'd gone public with accusations against Trump, Democratic leaders know that within a week, they're likely to have a Senate without Franken but including Roy Moore, despite allegations of preying on children and being banned from a mall over his alleged pursuit of teenage girls.

They also know that while Conyers was walked to the exit by his closest allies, there has yet to be a single Republican leader to call for the resignation of Texas Rep. Blake Farenthold, who also settled sexual harassment claims with taxpayer money. (He denies wrongdoing.) And they're full of self-doubt and disappointment that two of their own have been driven from office, while Republicans have dismissed or ignored claims.

Beyond a strain of anxiety that false information could now start being circulated against Democratic politicians to force them out, Democrats worry about holding to a standard that Republicans are not — a point that Franken touched on in announcing his own resignation Thursday.

"This does establish a new standard," Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) said after Franken's resignation, and that to him behavior that predates a politician's time in office can disqualify them for serving.

"Strange principle is emerging," Democratic strategist David Axelrod tweeted Thursday. "If you admit misconduct, you resign. But if you deny it, however compelling or voluminous the testimony against you, you continue in office — or on to office — with impunity?"

But leaders say they have no choice.

"Democrats are not going to hide behind the curtain. We're going to open up the window," Brazile said, arguing that this is the natural and necessary next step for a party that led the charge for the Equal Rights Act, and the first national awakening around sexual harassment after the Anita Hill hearings. "When you go back and review the history of when this became a topic of concern for women in the workplace, it has always been Democrats and Democratic lawmakers who led the way."

Brazile wants to see her party go further, to forcefully lead the charge for all records of sexual harassment claims and payments to be made public. And once their own ranks have been purged, to focus on highlighting the lack of substantive Republican response to Farenthold and the issue overall.

Jayapal on Wednesday introduced a bill to change corporate forced arbitration clauses, which are often used to hush sexual harassment. She is calling for a revamped process in Congress of accountability and transparency about all sexual harassment claims and payments.

"While there is a spectrum of behavior," Jayapal said, "I don't think we should be parsing what behavior is acceptable and what behavior or not."

Democrats have also now reset the standard should Moore win the Alabama race next week.

Through Tuesday afternoon, Franken's Senate Democratic colleagues had been punting on the question of whether he should resign, insisting that they needed to wait on "the process" of the Ethics Committee investigation. That stance collapsed in a matter of minutes on Wednesday morning, with a POLITICO story about another woman who said Franken tried to forcibly kiss her after the taping of a radio show in 2006.

It ended the diminishing patience of most Democrats and a number of Republicans, including Senate Conference Chairman John Thune.

If elected, Republicans have said that Moore would be immediately subjected to an Ethics Committee for an investigation. On Wednesday, Democratic Sens. Chris Coons of Delaware and Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire were among those who declined to answer questions about Moore, citing the possibility he would come before them.

Others already seem much less inclined to wait for the Ethics Committee to proceed if Moore wins, and will likely call for his expulsion immediately.

Meanwhile, on Thursday morning, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich sounded out an argument on Franken that meshed with what many Republican leaders have been saying about Moore: Calling on him to step aside but saying it's up to the voters of Alabama to decide.

Gingrich noted that more than a million Minnesota voters pulled the lever for Franken in 2014, but "30 self appointed 'pure' senators want him out."

"What happened to popular vote," Gingrich tweeted.

Then again, Gingrich led the impeachment of Bill Clinton, which would have had Congress remove a president who had been elected twice by millions of votes.

Democrats will miss Conyers, and they'll miss Franken. The solace, they hope, will come both from feeling like they've done the right thing and from how they're judged next November.

"Women voters, like all other voters, are watching. But it's not just women voters," Brazile said. "Millennials are watching. Everyone is watching."

VA kills plan to cut homeless-vet program after outcry Back

By Arthur Allen and Lorraine Woellert | 12/06/2017 05:49 PM EDT

Veterans Affairs Secretary David Shulkin has killed a plan to shift money from a major homelessness program in response to a wave of protest from veterans' advocates, who said the move would aggravate conditions for chronically ill and vulnerable vets.

Advocates for veterans, state officials and even officials from HUD, which co-sponsors the $460 million program, had attacked the decision, saying the service has helped dramatically reduce homelessness among veterans. After POLITICO published a story about their anger, Shulkin reversed course late Wednesday.

"There will be absolutely no change in the funding to support our homeless program," he said in a news release, adding that the money would not be shifted to the Choice program, which enables veterans to get health care outside the VA system.

Shulkin promised to get input from local VA leaders and others "on how best to target our funding to the geographical areas that need it most."

The announcement came after a confusing week of messaging from the VA. On Nov. 27, Shulkin and HUD Secretary Ben Carson appeared at a Washington shelter to tout President Donald Trump's commitment to ending veteran homelessness.

Then on Dec. 1, Shulkin's staff told advocates on a phone call that the agency was ending the program--one of two major VA homelessness projects-- and funneling the money to local VA hospitals that could decide how to use it. The original VA decision was buried in a September circular without prior consultation with HUD or veterans' groups.

A person involved with the program said the decision to cut it was made with no input from rank-and-file VA or HUD staff and surprised even employees at the VA.

Shulkin's reversal also came after HUD on Wednesday released its annual survey showing a 1.5 percent increase in veteran homelessness over 2016 — the first rise since 2010. Most of the jump occurred in Los Angeles, where housing costs are skyrocketing.

Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.), who sits on a veterans' affairs subcommittee, had called the earlier VA decision "a new low" for the Trump administration that was "especially callous and perplexing" in view of the latest data on homelessness.

Murray and the 13 other members of the Senate Appropriations Military Construction-VA Subcommittee had asked the VA to reconsider its decision.

HUD data show there were nearly 40,000 homeless veterans in 2016, and even those with housing still need assistance. The program has reduced the number of displaced service members, serving 138,000 since 2010, and cut the number without housing on a given day by almost half. More than half the veterans housed are chronically ill, mentally ill or have substance abuse problems.

They can easily lose their housing again and need VA case managers to mediate with landlords, pay bills, and help them access the agency's services and jobs, said Matt Leslie, who runs the housing program for the Virginia Department of Veterans Services.

"The people in this program are the most vulnerable individuals," Leslie said. "If someone's going to die on the streets, they are the ones."

Veteran and homeless advocates were infuriated by the VA's original decision.

"I don't understand why you are pulling the rug out," Elisha Harig-Blaine, a National League of Cities housing official who was on last Friday's call, said in an interview afterward. "You're putting at risk the lives of men and women who've served this country."

"The VA is taking its foot off the pedal," said Leon Winston, an executive at Swords to Plowshares, which helps homeless vets in San Francisco, where he said the VA decision is already having an impact. HUD recently put up 100 housing vouchers for veterans in the program, but the local VA hospital said it could only provide support for 50.

Agency spokesman Curtis Cashour said Tuesday that the move gave VA medical centers more flexibility to "ensure resources go where they best align with veterans' needs."

The decision would have affected $265 million immediately and $195 million more under the VA's 2018 budget. Under the program, HUD offers housing vouchers for veterans, and the VA provides case management — finding them apartments and making sure they stay there.

At the Nov. 27 event, Shulkin and Carson said Trump was increasing funding for veterans homelessness. They promised to help every veteran find a home.

When asked about the administration's budget, which still includes no additional vouchers for the hard-case veterans, Carson said HUD had "excess vouchers. When we use those, we'll look for more," he said.

"The old paradigm of dumping money on problems doesn't work," Carson added.

Some communities have excess vouchers, but many more don't have enough, said Harig-Blaine, who is also a member of Shulkin's advisory committee for homelessness. Even in cities where there are excess vouchers, they exist only because the voucher community can't compete with private market rents, he said — not because there aren't homeless veterans there.

Advocates had said cuts to the homelessness program would be doubly foolish because the chronically homeless veterans it serves typically cost cities and the health care system hundreds of thousands of dollars for emergency room visits, ambulance runs and jailings that could be avoided if the veterans were reasonably sheltered.

"These are the kinds of veterans it deals with," said Kathryn Monet, CEO of the National Coalition for Homeless Veterans.

Renuka Rayasam contributed to this report.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Public Citizen seeks visitor logs for CEQ, OMB, OSTP — It's all Greek to Zinke — IPCC announces familiar names for author teams

WHO'S VISITING CEQ, OMB? A watchdog group filed a lawsuit today seeking records of visitors to the White House Council on Environmental Quality and other agencies housed in the White House complex, but with independent legal duties, reports POLITICO's Josh Gerstein. Public Citizen's lawsuit does not seek information on visitors to the core offices of the White House, including senior advisers to President Donald Trump, records that are typically not covered by the Freedom of Information Act. But several courts have concluded that the listed agencies' records are subject to public disclosure under FOIA. The suit also seeks records for the OMB, Office of Science and Technology Policy and Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Public Citizen says the Secret Service is illegally turning over the records to White House officials exempt from FOIA, and it is seeking a restraining order to stop any further transfers to the White House's central record-keeping office, Josh reports. "The D.C. Circuit has already held that the records we requested are agency records subject to FOIA," Public Citizen's Adina Rosenbaum said. "There is no legal justification for the Secret Service to withhold them." Read the suit here.

MONUMENT REVIEW ALL GREEK TO ZINKE: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has apparently taken a break from reviewing U.S. monuments to go visit Greece. Zinke's wife Lola today tweeted a photo of her and the secretary sharing alone time on a boat and wrote "Love on the Bosphorus #summer." A second photo a few hours later just showed Mrs. Zinke and the tags #Happiness #Mykonos.

The vacation pics come a week before the Interior secretary is supposed to release a review of whether to remove national monument status from about two dozen regions. Zinke had promised an "extensive on-the-ground tours of monuments and meetings with stakeholders," but only published comments on eight of the monuments on the list. An Interior spokesman told AE that Zinke is indeed out of the country, but did not say where he went, when he left, when he will return and whether the monument review is, in practical terms, already finished. The photos were first flagged by environmental group Center for Western Priorities.

BOEM DRAFTS EIS FOR ARCTIC DRILLING PROJECT: The Bureau of Ocean Energy Management today announced a draft environmental impact statement for proposed offshore oil and gas development submitted to BOEM by Hilcorp Alaska LLC. in September 2015. BOEM said it will take comments on the draft EIS through Nov. 18. "Today's publication of the draft EIS is another important step in the Department's strategy of responsible resource development and we are committed to working with states, Alaska Native communities, investors and all stakeholders when we analyze development and production plans," said Vincent DeVito, counselor for energy policy at Interior. Houston-based Hilcorp wants to build a gravel island in shallow waters of the Beaufort Sea and has proposed the Liberty Project as a "pipe-in-pipe" subsea pipeline to deliver oil to shore.

ANTI-CPP CRUSADER LEAVES FOR PRIVATE SECTOR: West Virginia Solicitor General Elbert Lin is leaving at the end of the month for an unspecified private sector job, the state's attorney general's office announced today. As solicitor general, Lin represented Attorney General Patrick Morrisey in a number of his lawsuits against the Obama EPA. He argued several key issues before the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals last year over the Clean Power Plan. Lin was solicitor general for more than four years, and prior to that was a partner at the Washington law firm Wiley Rein and a clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas. Morrisey is running to challenge Sen. Joe Manchin next year.

IPCC ANNOUNCES FAMILIAR NAMES: The U.N.'s Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change today announced authors for two of its upcoming reports, and among the ranks were U.S. academics and agency scientists. GASOLINE PRODUCTION NEARS RECORD: U.S. gasoline production by refiners and blenders is approaching record levels, the Energy Information Administration said today. Over the first seven months of 2017, production hit near record levels "with four-week rolling average production well above its five-year average and close to the top of its five-year range," EIA writes. "U.S. gasoline inventories also remain relatively high despite growing domestic and foreign demand." Read more.

Lawmakers raise cash off Trump-Russia probe Back

By Austin Wright and Darren Samuelsohn | 08/17/2017 05:03 AM EDT

Rep. Eric Swalwell's campaign website features ominous photos of President Donald Trump, Donald Trump Jr. and Jared Kushner. It warns about Russia's attacks on last year's presidential election and asks visitors to sign a petition demanding that a bipartisan commission investigate.

Those who sign are then asked to contribute $5, $10, $25 or more to the California Democrat.

Swalwell is one of the junior members of the House Intelligence Committee, which has long had an unspoken rule against engaging in partisan fundraising related to the panel's secretive work.

But the panel's high-profile Russia investigation is now putting that rule to the test, and experts are warning that some committee members' recent appeals for campaign cash could undermine everyone's credibility.

"If you're trying to fundraise in a way that whips up partisanship, that's going to make the important work of the committee that much harder, if not impossible," said Michael Bahar, who until last May was the panel's Democratic staff director.

Fundraising appeals from Intelligence Committee members have so far avoided detailed references to the panel's investigation, but there is undoubtedly a connection. And these fundraising appeals come as outside groups, including some with ties to the Trump administration, are capitalizing on the highly charged issue to bolster their own war chests.

Rep. Adam Schiff, the House panel's top Democrat, last month sent a fundraising request tangentially related to his involvement in the House investigation that is looking into potential collusion between the Trump campaign and Russia.

Trump last month took to Twitter to call Schiff "sleazy," blasting him for spending "all of his time on television" talking about the investigation.

The California Democrat responded with a tweet of his own, saying Trump had attacked him for doing his job and asking his supporters to "chip in to stand with me." His post included a link to a fundraising website for Schiff's campaign.

Democrats aren't alone in mixing the Russia probe with raising cash. House Intelligence Chairman Devin Nunes (R-Calif.) and Rep. Trey Gowdy have also done it. Gowdy's request for campaign cash came last month after Schiff told Bloomberg News the South Carolina Republican was acting like a "second attorney" for Kushner during a closed-door committee interview with the president's son-in-law and senior White House adviser.

In an email to supporters, Gowdy boasted that he had "ticked off" Schiff and Democratic leaders.

"Nancy Pelosi and Adam Schiff are lining up the Democratic machine to take me down next election," he wrote, adding: "Please consider making a financial contribution of whatever amount you are able to afford."

Nunes, meanwhile, has repeatedly talked about the investigation during private fundraising events, even though he stepped back from the probe this spring after the House Ethics Committee announced it was investigating his handling of classified information.

"The Democrats don't want an investigation on Russia. They want an independent commission," Nunes said at an April dinner where attendees paid $75 per plate, according to the Los Angeles Times. "Why do they want an independent commission? Because they want to continue the narrative that Vladimir Putin and Donald Trump are best friends, and that's the reason that he won, because Hillary Clinton would have never lost on her own; it had to be someone else's fault."

Spokespeople for Swalwell, Gowdy and Nunes declined to comment on their fundraising efforts tied to the Russia investigation. A spokesman for Schiff, Patrick Boland, said in a statement: "President Trump attacked and personally smeared Congressman Schiff for his efforts to push back publicly on the president's destructive agenda, both domestically and around the world. Congressman Schiff encourages members of both parties to refrain from politicizing the Russia investigation in any way."

The House members' actions contrast with those of Senate Intelligence Committee members investigating Russia's election meddling. Intelligence Chairman Richard Burr (R-N.C.) and top Democrat Mark Warner of Virginia have sought to present a united front, avoiding the kind of partisan spats that have characterized the House probe. Burr and Warner do not appear to be fundraising off their investigation.

Lawrence Noble, an expert in campaign finance and ethics with the Campaign Legal Center, said it was inevitable the Russia investigations would become a fundraising tool — a fact he considers unfortunate.

"It undermines public faith in the investigation and makes it look more partisan," Noble said. "It helps further politicize the issue, and that I think is not healthy because I'd like to think everybody would agree there are serious allegations of Russian involvement that need to be investigated."

Outside the House and Senate intelligence committees, the Russia investigations have been a fundraising boon — on both sides of the issue.

Trump's 2020 reelection campaign declared it had set a one-day fundraising record on May 17 — pulling in more than $314,000 — for the campaign and joint fundraising committee with the Republican National Committee. What was going on to prompt the flood of cash? A cascading series of bad headlines centering around Trump's firing of FBI Director James Comey, and the public disclosure of the president's request that Comey shut down the investigation into his former national security adviser, Michael Flynn. All of that ultimately culminated in the Justice Department's appointment of special counsel Robert Mueller.

Trump's campaign team nudged donors with a series of fundraising emails that didn't mention the Russia scandal specifically but hit on the moment's zeitgeist. They used the word "SABOTAGE" as a subject line and asked for donations as low as $1 to "DRAIN THE SWAMP."

The Russia probe has been a moneymaker in other ways.

The RNC sent out a June 8 plea from "Trump Headquarters" on the same day Comey testified before the Senate Intelligence Committee seeking donations of $1. The messages opened with this note: "James Comey stated under oath that President Trump was NOT under investigation by the FBI. ... So why has the Fake News Media spent so much time reporting on the so-called 'Russia investigation?'"

Campaigns aren't the only ones trying to make money off the Russia probe. Roger Stone, one of the many Trump associates who is under federal scrutiny over his activities during the presidential campaign, has been selling $9.99 "Comey Nut Job" T-shirts on his website since the spring. In an email, Stone said the Comey shirts are being sold "commercially" and are "not being used for fundraising."

The efforts have struck some as off base. "It's crazy," Nick Akerman, a former Watergate prosecutor and assistant U.S. attorney, said of Stone's fundraising efforts. "This guy is right in the middle of the whole thing and here he is doing all this."

Controversy has followed other lawmakers who try to raise money off congressional investigations and other hot-button issues. The National Republican Congressional Committee in 2014 used the deadly attack on the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi, Libya, to raise money for House Republicans. Gowdy, who was featured in one message, later criticized the effort and asked that the NRCC stop the ads.

Bahar, who left his Capitol Hill staff job to work at the law firm Eversheds Sutherland, said the House Intelligence Committee has long had an unwritten understanding that members don't issue appeals for campaign cash trading on their work for the committee.

"Because of the often classified nature of what the Intelligence Committee does, there are few opportunities to fundraise," he said. "And that carries over into the Russia investigation too. ... A lot of this stuff is classified or sensitive."

Pelosi, Booker push for removal of Capitol's Confederate statues Back

By Elana Schor | 08/17/2017 11:30 AM EDT

The nationwide debate over the removal of monuments to the Confederacy is coming to the U.S. Capitol.

While President Donald Trump on Thursday urged the preservation of "our beautiful statues and monuments" honoring Confederates, Sen. Cory Booker (D-N.J.) plans to craft legislation that would remove the Capitol's statues lionizing supporters of the slave-holding era and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is calling for their elimination.

Pelosi on Thursday urged Republicans to join her in supporting removal of the Confederate figures from the Capitol, lending new momentum to Booker's effort. Only a few Democrats had previously called for the statues' removal after white supremacists staged a violent rally in Charlottesville over that city's likeness of Robert E. Lee.

"The Confederate statues in the halls of Congress have always been reprehensible," Pelosi said in a statement. "If Republicans are serious about rejecting white supremacy, I call upon Speaker [Paul] Ryan to join Democrats to remove the Confederate statues from the Capitol immediately."

Congressional GOP leaders have previously stated that decisions on replacing Capitol statues should rest with individual states, and Ryan's office affirmed that stance earlier this week, POLITICO reported. A Ryan spokesman responded to Pelosi's call by reiterating his previous statement.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) was less adamant than Pelosi, welcoming Booker's proposal but turning the focus back to Trump's recent comments on white supremacist groups.

"President Trump and Steve Bannon are trying to divert attention away from the president's refusal to unequivocally and full-throatedly denounce white supremacy, neo-Nazism, and other forms of bigotry," Schumer said in a statement. "While it is critical that we work towards the goal of Senator Cory Booker's legislation, we must continue to denounce and resist President Trump for his reprehensible actions."

The push to remove the Capitol's Confederate iconography promises to reopen an emotional debate that presents pitfalls for both parties. Public polls suggest that the removal of monuments to the Civil War's losing side divides Americans, even as Trump's response to the white supremacist gathering won support from just 27 percent of respondents in a survey released Wednesday by the Marist Poll and PBS NewsHour.

In the wake of the Charlottesville rally, which left one woman dead and more than a dozen injured, Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D-Va.) and Ralph Northam, the Democratic nominee in November's election to replace him, have come out in favor of replacing the state's Confederate monuments.

The issue is more complicated for members of Congress, however, thanks to long-standing guidelines that empower state legislatures to select the statues in the Capitol that honor prominent citizens from their states.

Even so, Congress could eliminate all Confederate statues via legislation and Booker said Wednesday night that he would propose that move. "This is just one step," Booker tweeted. "We have much work to do."

Pelosi, who orchestrated the movement of Lee's likeness from Statuary Hall near the Capitol Rotunda to a less prominent spot on the first floor of the building, took a firm stance on Thursday.

"There is no room for celebrating the violent bigotry of the men of the Confederacy in the hallowed halls of the United States Capitol or in places of honor across the country," she said.

There are 10 statues in the Capitol's National Statuary Hall Collection honoring individuals who served in the Confederate army or government. Others depict supporters of slavery or the Confederacy, such as former Secretary of State and Sen. John C. Calhoun and Uriah Milton Rose of Arkansas.

"Individuals who were treasonous to the United States, who took up arms against their own country, and inflicted catastrophic death and suffering among US citizens, should not be afforded such a rare honor in this sacred space," Booker said Thursday. "These statues belong in a museum, where they are put in the proper historical context."

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill noted Thursday that Ryan has the power to call up a single piece of legislation removing the statues or move them to "a private space in the Capitol out of public view" through the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, a majority of whose members the Speaker selects.

"For Speaker Ryan to hide behind states' rights to defend the symbols of the Confederacy is as shameful as it is posterous," Hammill said by email.

Leaders of the Congressional Progressive Caucus are also backing removal of the Capitol's Confederate statues. A spokeswoman for the Congressional Black Caucus said Tuesday the group is not presently proposing any legislative solution because GOP leaders back leaving the decisions to individual states.

Booker's legislation promises to put Virginia Democratic Sens. Mark Warner and Tim Kaine in the spotlight given the sensitivity of the issue in their state.

Warner said Thursday that he and Booker are talking "about how we might move forward on" the Confederate statues housed within Congress.

"[T]his is a conversation that is going to, I think, go on now for some time, but I think that everybody needs to have a chance to be heard," Warner told a radio station in Richmond. The former Virginia governor also noted that "there's going to have to be a local process in every community, and we're going to have to have tough, and in many ways overdue conversations, about race."

While serving as Richmond mayor in the 1990s, Kaine spearheaded the installation of a statue commemorating African-American tennis champion Arthur Ashe and released an official apology for the city's participation in slavery — but he also has supported local conversations about potential monument removal.

"Sen. Kaine thinks Sen. Booker's proposal is a good idea, and he plans to work with him on the bill and support it," a Kaine spokesperson said Thursday. "He also believes the Senate needs to work to address the fundamental inequities in our society that have left African-Americans and families of color in this country with far less wealth, higher unemployment rates, fewer opportunities and less protection under the law."

Democrats are also facing a growing push from civil rights groups and outside-the-Beltway activists to take a stronger stand on the remaining statues in the Capitol as cities from Baltimore to Jacksonville take on removal of their Confederate monuments.

"This is a moment for members of Congress to come together to show that they are not complicit with those who sow hate and division," Vanita Gupta, president of the Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights, said in a statement. "One way to show they do not support white nationalists would be to take a serious look at symbols of hate and monuments to racial discrimination that are enshrined in our nation's Capitol."

In addition, Trump's alignment with supporters of maintaining the Confederate iconography could influence Democratic decision-making. Trump's call on Thursday to maintain Confederate monuments, comparing Lee and Stonewall Jackson to the Founding Fathers, mark an escalation from remarks earlier this week in which he said the issue should be discussed on a case-by-case basis.

Defiant Trump digs in as racial, GOP tensions flare Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 08/17/2017 11:38 AM EDT

A defiant President Donald Trump on Thursday further inflamed racial tensions and the GOP divide, tweeting his support for "beautiful" Confederate statues and attacking Republican senators who have panned his response to the violent Charlottesville white supremacist protests.

Republican lawmakers, CEOs and military leaders have raced to distance themselves from the president after he doubled down on his claim that "both sides" are to blame for the violent clashes that left one dead and injured more than a dozen others.

But the president is showing no signs of backing down.

"Sad to see the history and culture of our great country being ripped apart with the removal of our beautiful statues and monuments," Trump wrote Thursday morning. "You can't change history, but you can learn from it. Robert E Lee, Stonewall Jackson - who's next, Washington, Jefferson? So foolish!"

"Also the beauty that is being taken out of our cities, towns and parks will be greatly missed and never able to be comparably replaced!" added Trump, who appeared to be sympathizing with some of the white supremacists and neo-Nazis who rallied to protest the removal of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee's statue.

Trump also went on the attack against Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who had accused Trump of taking "a step backward by again suggesting there is moral equivalency between the white supremacist neo-Nazis and KKK members who attended the Charlottesville rally."

The president responded with anger, tweeting on Thursday morning that the "publicity seeking" lawmaker's statement was false. "Such a disgusting lie," Trump said. "He just can't forget his election trouncing."

Trump went after Sen. Jeff Flake as well, after the Arizona Republican had warned on Wednesday that the GOP "can't claim to be the party of Lincoln if we equivocate in condemning white supremacy."

"Great to see that Dr. Kelli Ward is running against Flake Jeff Flake, who is WEAK on borders, crime and a non-factor in Senate," Trump said, seemingly endorsing the GOP primary challenger over the vulnerable incumbent senator. "He's toxic!"

Taken together, the chaos of the week represents another low for Trump's presidency, especially as he tries to revive efforts to repeal Obamacare, pass tax reform and push an infrastructure package, while also finding a congressional compromise that can avert a government shutdown and government default this fall. Trump can ill afford to lose the support of fellow Republicans, with the slim majority the party holds in the Senate.

And it's not just lawmakers who are shunning Trump and his rhetoric. A steady flow of business leaders have also severed ties with the White House, prompting Trump to disband two advisory councils to stem the tide of defections. Even military leaders on the Joint Chiefs of Staff have taken stands, unequivocally stating that racism and hatred won't be tolerated within the armed forces.

"I can absolutely and unambiguously tell you there is no place — no place — for racism and bigotry in the U.S. military or in the United States as a whole," Marine Corps Gen. Joe Dunford, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Thursday from Beijing.

Trump is also facing heightened turmoil in his White House, a dynamic that chief strategist Steve Bannon further aggravated by giving multiple interviews in which he broke from the president on North Korea, attacked his West Wing colleagues — including economic adviser Gary Cohn — and threatened to overhaul the Defense and State departments.

He took a dig at Trump officials who are shying away from an aggressive trade policy, saying "they are wetting themselves."

"That's a fight I fight every day here," Bannon said. "We're still fighting. There's Treasury and Gary Cohn and Goldman Sachs lobbying."

The embattled White House aide also amplified Trump's culture wars message, saying the president's "where does it all end" skepticism "connects with the American people about their history, cultures and traditions."

"The race-identity politics of the left wants to say it's all racist. Just give me more," Bannon told The New York Times. "Tear down more statues. Say the revolution is coming. I can't get enough of it."

But descendants of Confederate Gen. Thomas "Stonewall" Jackson have called for the removal of his statue and others who represent the Confederacy.

"They are overt symbols of racism and white supremacy, and the time is long overdue for them to depart from public display," Jackson's great-great-grandsons William Jackson Christian and Warren Edmund Christian wrote in an open letter to the mayor of Richmond, Virginia.

Douglas Brinkley, a presidential historian at Rice University, said on Thursday that Trump has joined Andrew Johnson and Woodrow Wilson "as the most virulently racist" presidents of the post-Civil War.

"Donald Trump seems to want to incite a cultural war," Brinkley said, adding that the president is "willing to be incendiary on racial issues for political gain."

But he questioned the upside of defending Confederate monuments, noting that the Midwestern states that ultimately carried Trump to victory — Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan and Pennsylvania — all fought on the side of the Union.

A CBS News poll released Thursday morning shows that 55 percent of Americans disapprove of Trump's response to Charlottesville, though more than two-thirds of Republicans surveyed do approve. The poll was conducted Monday, when Trump declared racism "evil" and condemned hate groups by name, through Wednesday, a day after the president doubled down on his initial response that white supremacists weren't the only people responsible for violence.

Trump, however, eyed a different data point. "Many meetings today in Bedminster including with Secretary Linda M and Small Business," he tweeted, after attacking Republican senators but before tweeting about the Confederate monuments being taken down across the country. "Job numbers are looking great!"

Matthew Nussbaum and Louis Nelson contributed to this report.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Putting the "budge" in EPA's budget — Svinicki sails through — Report: DOE internal climate office shuttered

PUTTING THE 'BUDGE' IN BUDGET: House Interior-EPA spending Chairman Ken Calvert today told EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt that the proposed agency budget is "untenable." It was a sentiment that lawmakers from both parties made clear at the outset of today's EPA's appropriations hearing — the first of the year, Alex Guillén reports.

The White House's proposed $2.4 billion cut to EPA managed to hit programs important to every member of the spending subcommittee, California's Calvert said. He specifically noted cuts to a program that upgrades dirty diesel engines as key for his state, along with targeted airshed grants that were cut entirely from the budget, and a 31 percent reduction to Superfund clean-ups. Betty McCollum, the panel's top Democrat, meanwhile had even harsher words. The budget, she said, "would endanger the health of millions of Americans, jeopardize the quality of our air and water and wreak havoc on the economy."

Also during the hearing: Pruitt said the agency is not reviewing a key waiver that allows California to set stricter emissions limits for cars than the federal government. "Currently the waiver is not under review ... by EPA," the administrator said. "It's important we recognize the role of states in achieving good air quality standards," Pruitt added, noting California's early role in environmental regulation. More here.

Pruitt also sought to defend watershed work today, despite proposed cuts to programs. Annie Snider reports the administrator told Ohio Rep. Marcy Kaptur he could not recall whether he asked OMB Director Mick Mulvaney or other White House staff to eliminate the watershed programs but sought to reassure skeptical lawmakers that the administration's proposal to zero-out popular watershed cleanup programs would not interfere with their goals. Pruitt acknowledged Congress was unlikely to go along with the proposal to zero-out programs targeting regions like the Great Lakes, which received $300 million this year, and Chesapeake Bay, which got $73 million.

NEVADA UNDOES NET METERING CUTS: Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval today effectively reversed cuts to the state's net metering program that dried up the rooftop solar market in the state after they were implemented in 2015. Sandoval signed A.B. 405, a bill that would require utilities to purchase excess power from customers' rooftop solar panels at 95 percent of the rate those customers pay for power from the grid, eventually falling to 75 percent. Rooftop solar companies Sunrun and SolarCity, a subsidiary of Tesla, said they would return to Nevada once Sandoval signed the bill, according to Reuters.

THIRD TIME'S THE CHARM: NRC Chairwoman Kristine Svinicki sailed through the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee this morning on her way to a third term, Darius Dixon reports. Lawmakers on the panel approved her renomination on a voice vote. It's unclear when she will get a vote on the floor. Tom Carper, EPW's top Democrat, suggested earlier this week that Democrats are unlikely to demand a procedural vote on Svinicki's confirmation.

BIOFUEL MANDATE COMING VERY SOON: Sources tell Eric Wolff that EPA could release a proposed rule setting the biofuel volume mandates for 2018 as soon as this afternoon. An ethanol and an oil industry source said the agency will keep the conventional ethanol volumes at 15 billion gallons, and increase the requirement for advanced biofuels to 4.38 billion gallons, up 100 million gallons from 2017. More here.

CLIMATE CHANGE: The New York Times reports the staff of DOE's Office of International Climate and Technology were told to pack their bags this month, citing current and former DOE employees. The department has been in the crosshairs since it was marked for elimination in Trump's budget request. Yet its workers played an essential role in planning Energy Secretary Rick Perry's visit to Beijing last week as part of the Clean Energy Ministerial. The office is the only unit at DOE to have climate in its name, Eric reports.

YUCCA BILL ADVANCES: Draft nuclear waste reform legislation was approved by a House Energy and Commerce environment panel today on a voice vote — despite a pair of Democratic sticking points. The bill sponsored by panel Chairman John Shimkus would make the first changes in 30 years to the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, which names Yucca Mountain as the nation's sole waste repository. Darius has more here.

Ozone, brownfields too: The subcommittee also advanced a pair of bills to reauthorize a brownfields cleanup program and delay ozone standards, Eric reports. Lawmakers split along partisan lines on the Ozone Standards Implementation Act, which would delay implementation of the 2015 ozone standard through 2025 and stretch the regular air quality standard review period from five years to 10. A draft brownfields program reauthorization bill also advanced on voice vote.

NUCLEAR TAX LIFELINE: The House Ways and Means Committee today approved by voice vote a bill to extend the nuclear tax credit, Darius and Esther Whieldon report. The fate of the nuclear power credit will help decide the fate of two new projects in South Carolina and Georgia whose backers have warned they may be unable to finish work without an extension of the credit.

Woes across the industry: A majority of nuclear reactors are losing money, thanks to competition in the power sector from cheap natural gas among other factors, according to a report today from Bloomberg New Energy Finance. Losses total around $2.9 billion a year, according to the report, which found that nuclear plant operators are being paid $20 to $30 a megawatt-hour for electricity, while it costs about $35 per megawatt-hour on average to operate. More here from Bloomberg.

SUNIVA PROTECTIONS WOULD COST JOBS: If Suniva gets the trade protections proposed in its petition to the International Trade Commission, it would cost an estimated 88,000 jobs — or about one-third of the current American solar workforce, the Solar Energy Industries Association said today. Suniva has asked the ITC to place a tariff on imported solar cells and set a price floor for imported panels, making the argument that it cannot compete with foreign rivals. But SEIA said today states would stand to lose jobs if such protections were enacted. California, for one, has an expected job loss of 15,800, SEIA said. More here.

OIL SANDS PRODUCTION TO INCREASE: Canadian oil sand developers will increase production by nearly half a million barrels a day through 2018, consulting agency IHS Markit said. The boost would make it the second fastest-growing oil patch after U.S. shale development. Oil sands production reached nearly 2.4 million barrels a day last year, IHS Markit said. Future growth will come from companies that are currently they're expanding their scope, not necessarily new players entering the field. That would be welcome news for Canadian oil drillers. Low prices have most recently helped convince companies like ConocoPhillips and Exxon Mobil to either exit their Western Canada projects or cut back their estimates of how much they could profitably produce in the area.

CARBON EMISSIONS STAY FLAT: Global greenhouse gas emissions likely did not increase in 2016, which would make it the third year in a row of no growth, a BP energy economist said earlier today. Three years of flat emissions would be a big deal, given that emissions grew 2.5 percent a year during the previous decade. "Slowing carbon emissions is significant and profound," BP Group Chief Economist Spencer Dale said while presenting BP's annual energy review at The Atlantic Council. The question is now whether the non-growth in emissions is temporary or a structural change. Leaps in renewable energy production and a global move away from coal point toward the latter, but a big reason for the recent halt in emissions growth was a stark slowdown in Chinese steel, cement and iron production, Dale said. Whether those businesses stay slow remains to be seen.

House EPA spending chair: Budget cuts are 'untenable' Back

By Alex Guillén | 06/15/2017 11:26 AM EDT

Lawmakers from both parties made it clear at the outset of EPA's first appropriations hearing of the year that the White House's proposed $2.4 billion cut to the agency won't fly.

House Interior-EPA Chairman Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) told EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt that the proposed budget is "untenable."

Calvert said the budget managed to cut programs important to every member of the spending subcommittee. He specifically noted cuts to a program that upgrades dirty diesel engines as key for his state of California, along with targeted air shed grants that were cut entirely from the budget, and a 31 percent reduction to Superfund clean-ups.

"These are all proposals we are unlikely to entertain," Calvert said. "This is perhaps not how you would personally craft EPA's budget, but it's the budget you have to defend here today."

The panel's top Democrat, Betty McCollum of Minnesota also had even harsher words for the budget proposal, which she said "would endanger the health of millions of Americans, jeopardize the quality of our air and water and wreak havoc on the economy." McCollum also slammed the proposed reduction of thousands of workers.

Calvert did praise the budget proposal for maintaining funding for key state water grants and the nascent Water Infrastructure Finance and Innovation Act program.

WHAT'S NEXT: Pruitt is facing questions today from the House spending subcommittee that will write EPA's fiscal 2018 spending bill later this summer.

Pruitt: EPA not reviewing California car emissions waiver Back

By Alex Guillén | 06/15/2017 12:30 PM EDT

EPA is not reviewing a key waiver that allows California to set stricter emissions limits for cars than the federal government, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said today.

"Currently the waiver is not under review ... by EPA," Pruitt said at an appropriations hearing.

"It's important we recognize the role of states in achieving good air quality standards," Pruitt added, noting California's early role in environmental regulation.

EPA's decision to re-open a review of auto standards for model year 2022-2025 cars also raised concerns that EPA would consider revoking the California waiver. The Clean Air Act allows EPA to give waivers to California on air quality issues because of the state's historic and chronic pollution problems.

The state and environmentalists argued that the law does not allow EPA to revoke such waivers once granted, and California officials said they would fight the Trump administration if it attempted to revoke it.

The waiver in question was granted by the Obama administration in 2009. EPA and the Transportation Department later set the first greenhouse gas emissions standards for cars, but California said that any cars complying with the federal standard would also be deemed to have met the state's standards so as to avoid a patchwork of regulations.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA is continuing its review of the nationwide emissions rules for model year 2022-2025 vehicles.

Pruitt defends watershed work despite proposed cuts Back

By Annie Snider | 06/15/2017 02:35 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt sought to reassure skeptical lawmakers that the Trump administration's proposal to defund popular watershed cleanup programs would not interfere with their goals.

He did not offer any specifics on how that would happen.

Facing critical questions from both Democrats and Republicans on a House Appropriations subcommittee, Pruitt acknowledged that Congress was unlikely to go along with the proposal to zero-out programs targeting regions like the Great Lakes, which received $300 million this year, and Chesapeake Bay, which got $73 million.

Pruitt told Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio) he could not recall whether he asked OMB Director Mick Mulvaney or other White House staff to eliminate the watershed programs. "In our discussions with OMB [we] talked about the importance of the Great Lakes Initiative," he said.

EPA will continue to facilitate states' efforts around such cleanups, he said.

"Honestly, money's important, but I think this leadership role is important as well, and that's going to continue," Pruitt told Rep. Dave Joyce (R-Ohio). Joyce was careful to call the funding blueprint the "Mulvaney budget" rather than attributing it to Trump.

As an example, Pruitt pointed to EPA's role bringing the six Chesapeake Bay states together around a landmark cleanup plan. As Oklahoma's attorney general, Pruitt joined a lawsuit challenging that plan, but he has recently said that he now sees the effort as a model for how states and the federal government can work together. However environmental groups say the administration's proposal to eliminate funding for the program would devastate that effort.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Appropriations subcommittee is expected to write EPA's fiscal 2018 spending bill later this summer.

Svinicki clears EPW, heads to full Senate Back

By Darius Dixon | 06/15/2017 10:23 AM EDT

Nuclear Regulatory Commission Chairwoman Kristine Svinicki sailed through the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee this morning on her way to a third term.

Lawmakers on the panel approved her renomination on a voice vote.

Svinicki has been on the NRC's leadership board since 2008 and was elevated to the chairmanship by President Donald Trump in January, but her current term expires June 30. And unlike many other federal boards and commissions, NRC leadership members have to step down, even temporarily, if the Senate fails to confirm the nominee.

Trump has nominated two new NRC commissioners, Annie Caputo and David Wright, but EPW plans to vote on them later this month. Sen. Tom Carper, Environment and Public Works' top Democrat, has said that he supports Svinicki's renomination and that EPW Chairman John Barrasso "seemed to be comfortable" with packaging them with a renomination of NRC Commissioner Jeff Baran, a Democrat whose term runs out next summer.

WHAT'S NEXT: Svinicki's nomination is now in the hands of Senate leadership and it's unclear when she will get a vote on the floor. Carper suggested earlier this week that Democrats are unlikely to demand a procedural vote on Svinicki's confirmation.

Sources: Biofuel volume proposal could be released as soon as today Back

By Eric Wolff | 06/15/2017 10:16 AM EDT

EPA could release a proposed rule setting the biofuel volume mandates for 2018 as soon as this afternoon, industry sources tell POLITICO.

An ethanol and an oil industry source said the agency will keep the conventional ethanol volumes at 15 billion gallons, and increase the requirement for advanced biofuels to 4.38 billion gallons, up 100 million gallons from 2017.

The release of the proposal could slip to Friday, the sources said.

EPA did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The mid-June release could make it difficult for EPA to issue the final rule by the deadline of Nov. 30, something Administrator Scott Pruitt has said he wants. EPA sent the proposal to OMB last month.

The oil industry had hoped EPA might lower the volumes from the statutory maximum set for 2017, but government projections for higher gasoline consumption next year made that unlikely.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will take public comment after release of the proposal.

NYT: Staff of DOE international climate office told to pack their bags Back

By Eric Wolff | 06/15/2017 01:48 PM EDT

The Department of Energy will shutter its Office of International Climate and Technology, its staff was told this month, according to The New York Times, which cited current and former DOE employees.

The department has been in the crosshairs since it was marked for elimination in President Donald Trump's budget request. Its workers played an essential role in planning Energy Secretary Rick Perry's visit to Beijing last week as part of the Clean Energy Ministerial.

The office is the only unit at DOE to have climate in its name.

The office last made headlines in February when a supervisor told staff not to use the term "climate change," "Paris Agreement" or "emissions reduction" in written communications, as POLITICO reported at the time.

House environment panel approves nuclear waste bill Back

By Darius Dixon | 06/15/2017 12:31 PM EDT

The House Energy and Commerce Committee's environment panel approved draft nuclear waste reform legislation this morning on a voice vote despite a pair of Democratic sticking points.

The bill sponsored by panel chairman John Shimkus would make the first changes in 30 years to the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, which names Yucca Mountain as the nation's sole waste repository. The draft version of the bill includes sections regarding interim storage sites, payments to host states and limits to work on a defense waste-only repository. Several of the bill's elements are contingent on getting a final licensing decision on Yucca.

Committee Democrats offered three amendments to the bill that were ultimately withdrawn after Shimkus promised to address the issues. Two amendments were designed to change bill's linking the advancement of Yucca with action on interim storage facilities, and the third sought to eliminate a section affecting Nevada's water rights.

Although Shimkus has included a few Nevada-friendly provisions in the bill, it has not won the support of that state's congressional delegation.

GOP Rep. Joe Barton said that he particularly liked language designed to garner state support. "If we made one huge mistake early on, it was not giving the states more input into the initial process," he said. "If we'd let Nevada have a bigger say upfront we might not have the mess we have today."

After the markup, Shimkus said he expects the nuclear waste bill and two other measures to be "off the [House] floor" before the August recess although he wouldn't speculate on when any of them might get voted out of committee.

WHAT'S NEXT: The draft bill now moves to the full committee where it is likely to face more amendments from Democrats. E&C has not yet scheduled full committee hearings or markups on the bill.

Ozone, brownfields bill clear House subcommittee Back

By Eric Wolff | 06/15/2017 12:18 PM EDT

A House Energy and Commerce subcommittee today advanced a pair of bills to reauthorize a brownfields cleanup program and delay ozone standards.

The environment panel split along partisan lines on the Ozone Standards Implementation Act (H.R. 806), which would delay implementation of the 2015 ozone standard through 2025 and stretch the regular air quality standard review period from five years to 10. Democrats attacked the bill as weakening Clean Air Act standards while Republicans said the delay would allow regions to catch up to older standards. Democrats offered several amendments all of which were defeated.

A draft brownfields bill advanced on voice vote. The bill reauthorizes and adjusts the brownfields program to raise the cap on federal grant amounts for individual sites. The bill received bipartisan support in the committee, though ranking member Rep. Frank Pallone (D-N.J.) said he wished the program would get more funding.

Democrats also took the time to wonder why no EPA officials had appeared before the committee to address any of the bills at issue.

"We've had no administration witnesses before this committee since the beginning of the year, something that has never happened before in my time on the committee," said Rep. Gene Green (D-Texas).

WHAT'S NEXT: Chairman Greg Walden will likely schedule a full committee markup on the bills.

House Ways and Means approves bill to redo nuclear tax credit Back

By Darius Dixon and Esther Whieldon | 06/15/2017 12:53 PM EDT

The House Ways and Means Committee today voted to rewrite a tax credit for nuclear power that's likely to decide the fate of two new projects in South Carolina and Georgia.

The credits — worth billions of dollars to the companies building Summer and Vogtle expansions — currently require that new reactors be in service by the end of 2020 to qualify. But that timeline became just about impossible for the SCANA and Georgia Power projects following the bankruptcy of their contractor, Westinghouse, earlier this year.

The bipartisan bill, H.R. 1551, from Reps. Tom Rice and Earl Blumenauer approved today by voice vote would open the credits to projects that power up after 2020. The committee adopted an amendment from Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) that, among other things, would allow qualified public entities such as public power authorities to forego the credits and pass them along to other companies in the supply chain.

Committee members on both sides of the aisle reiterated their wish that the committee take up legislation to extend tax credits for several of energy technologies left out of a 2015 tax deal. Brady responded that he hopes "we can address this in a positive way this year in comprehensive tax reform."

Sen. Tim Scott has introduced the Senate version of the legislation, S.666.

WHAT'S NEXT: The legislation now moves to the full House but it's unclear whether it will be able to hitch a ride on another bill to get a floor vote.

SEIA: Suniva trade case threatens 88K U.S. solar jobs Back

By Esther Whieldon | 06/15/2017 01:49 PM EDT

The Solar Energy Industries Association says the U.S. solar sector would lose 88,000 jobs, or about one-third of the workforce, if President Donald Trump grants Suniva's request to impose trade tariffs on solar equipment imports.

The U.S. International Trade Commission is investigating a complaint by Suniva and SolarWorld Americas that an influx of cheap solar cells and modules largely from Asian countries is harming the U.S. manufacturing market and putting the companies out of business.

SEIA, which has opposed the petition, said the utility-scale market would be hit the hardest and see employment shrink by 60 percent, while residential solar jobs would decline by about 44 percent and commercial sector positions would drop about 46 percent.

California would be hurt the most, SEIA said, with about 15,800 jobs lost. South Carolina would lose about 7,000 jobs and Texas would see about 6,300 jobs vanish, SEIA said.

"Rather than help the industry, the action would kill many thousands of American jobs and put a stop to billions of dollars in private investment," Abigail Ross Hopper, SEIA president and CEO, said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: The commission expects to determine the extent to which the cheaper solar panels are causing injury by Sept. 22. If it finds there is injury, would send its recommendations to Trump by Nov. 13.

Senate votes to impose new sanctions on Russia and Iran Back

By Elana Schor | 06/15/2017 01:09 PM EDT

The Senate on Thursday voted 98-2 for new sanctions on Iran and Russia, including new powers for Congress to block President Donald Trump from rolling back any penalties against Vladimir Putin's government.

The bipartisan support for the year's most significant GOP-backed limitation on Trump comes as the White House remains silent on the plan to sanction Moscow, even as President Putin pushes back at U.S. intelligence officials' conclusion that Russian actors conducted cyberattacks to disrupt the 2016 presidential election. Trump has repeatedly dismissed Russian electoral meddling, raising questions about whether the White House might reject the Senate's sanctions deal.

Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) hailed the lopsided vote in favor of the Iran sanctions bill that he helped shepherd to passage with the Russia measure attached, but he stopped short of echoing previous predictions that Trump would sign the combined sanctions legislation once it clears the House.

Corker told reporters that "I only have talked a little bit with" Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, who testified twice this week that the White House would prefer "flexibility" to adjust Russia sanctions as needed. "I have no idea" if the White House is adequately concerned about Russian intervention in last year's election, Corker added, but "hopefully the White House will acknowledge" the massive level of Senate support for new sanctions against Russia.

The Senate-passed sanctions bill also converts existing penalties against Moscow into law, potentially making them more difficult to remove, and prevents the Trump administration from returning two Russian diplomatic compounds seized in December by the Obama administration as punishment for alleged electoral disruption. The State Department has said that talks are ongoing with Russia over the possible return of the compounds, underscoring the Trump administration's interest in securing more cooperation from Moscow in ending the Syrian civil war.

The Senate's Iranian sanctions legislation imposes new restrictions on Tehran's ballistic missile program, also aiming to punish Iran for supporting terrorism and human rights violations. Before passing the combined Russia-Iran measure, the chamber also attached a bipartisan amendment signaling support for NATO's Article 5 — which Trump earlier this month notably declined to endorse in Brussels — by a unanimous vote.

The only two votes against the Russia-Iran sanctions deal came from GOP Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky and Vermont independent Sen. Bernie Sanders.

Jennifer Haberkorn contributed to this report.

Correction: This story originally misidentified one of the no votes on the legislation as Sen. Mike Lee.

Scalise faces third surgery after being wounded in mass shooting Back

By Rachael Bade | 06/15/2017 11:11 AM EDT

House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, shot Wednesday during a congressional baseball practice, was undergoing his third surgery Thursday morning as his colleagues gathered to discuss the horrific shooting and share cautious optimism about the congressman's recovery.

The Louisiana Republican remained in critical condition early Thursday as doctors at MedStar Washington Hospital Center began a third operation. The bullet had fractured bones and torn through internal organs, according to a hospital statement late Wednesday night. And Scalise, who suffered severe blood loss, had multiple units of blood transfusions.

According to sources familiar with Scalise's condition, the third surgery was routine for gunshot victims with doctors checking the work they had performed the night before.

President Donald Trump, who visited Scalise on Wednesday night, said midday Thursday that the lawmaker was "in some trouble" but a "great fighter."

"It's been much more difficult than people even thought at the time. It's been — he's in some trouble, but he is a great fighter and he is going to be OK, we hope," he announced at a White House event. He added that, "I have a feeling that Steve has made a great sacrifice, but there could be some unity being brought to our country. Let's hope so."

On the Hill, lawmakers grappled with the severity of Scalise's condition, with some Republicans even speculating that Scalise could be out of commission for some time. Speaker

Paul Ryan and his leadership team called an emergency conference Thursday morning to give lawmakers an update. Scalise's Chief Deputy Whip Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.), who also has visited him in the hospital, gave a moving speech about faith in dark times — and about Scalise's strength as an individual.

Sources in the room said people tried to stay optimistic, even as some members who witnessed the horrific shooting stood and told their stories. Lawmakers signed jumbo cards for Scalise and the other victims.

Meanwhile, thoughts and prayers poured into the Hill in droves as member geared up to play the congressional baseball game Thursday evening — an annual, friendly bipartisan affair that will become a tribute to their colleague.

"All over the country, we have people praying for Steve, for Steve's wife and kids, for the others injured and for the doctors and nurses caring for our friends," said Rep. Roger Marshall (R-Kans.), the Republican team's relief pitcher. "Steve is a great friend and father and a mentor to many of us."

Several lawmakers in the conference said leadership told them Scalise was likely in surgery at that very moment. But beyond that and a brief discussion of the hospital statement released Wednesday night, leadership did not give additional details on his condition or prognosis.

They also asked members not to comment on Scalise's condition, hoping to tamp down any rumors that might start spreading as Scalise remains in the hospital. Vice President Mike Pence and his wife visited Scalise Thursday morning, but did not provide additional information about his recovery.

Multiple people were wounded in Wednesday morning's shooting, including a congressional staffer, a lobbyist and two Capitol Hill Police officers. The gunman, identified as 66-year-old James T. Hodgkinson of Illinois, died after being shot at the scene.

On the Senate floor earlier Thursday, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) urged prayer for Scalise and others injured in the shooting — adding that it has been an "immensely difficult 24 hours for all the victims."

"The events of yesterday were devastating, and we know it will take time to heal. But for now, the members of the congressional baseball team have made the decision to go forward with tonight's game, which will be played for charity," McConnell said. "I know we'll be thinking about each of them as they take the field tonight."

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) added shortly after McConnell's remarks that the four top congressional leaders — McConnell, Schumer, Ryan (R-Wis.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) — will attend the baseball game together as a show of unity.

"We would all be wise to reflect on the importance of civility in our nation's politics this morning," Schumer said. "We disagree vehemently at times here in Congress, and folks out in the country do, too. But the level of nastiness, vitriol and hate that has seeped into our politics must be excised."

Manafort still doing international work Back

By Kenneth P. Vogel | 06/15/2017 05:08 AM EDT

Paul Manafort is at the center of an FBI investigation into ties between President Donald Trump's team and the Russians, but that hasn't stopped him from doing business with international figures and companies, partly by claiming continued access to Trump, according to people familiar with his dealings.

Manafort in recent weeks has either consulted or worked with a Chinese construction billionaire looking to expand his business overseas and a telecommunications firm interested in regulatory approval from governments in Asia and the Middle East, as well as an investment fund claiming links to the Chinese government, according to documents and interviews.

Manafort quietly consulted on a proposal under which the Chinese fund — the China Development Fund — would invest $30 billion or more in the Puerto Rican government's bond debt and possibly the island's critical infrastructure, according to documents and interviews with four people familiar with the negotiations, including a Manafort business partner.

One of the people, a lawyer involved in the discussions, said Manafort indicated that he could convince the Trump administration to support any resulting deal, because he's remained in contact with Trump's team, and that he played a role in helping to soften Trump's tough campaign rhetoric on China.

"He's going around telling people that he's still talking to the president and — even more than that — that he is helping to shape Trump's foreign policy," said the lawyer involved in the discussions.

The White House press office did not respond to requests for comment.

Manafort's spokesman Jason Maloni would not comment on most of Manafort's recent business dealings. But he did assert in an email: "Paul is not engaged in government affairs/lobbying or public relations work for corporations, governments, or individuals."

Maloni declined to elaborate on how he was defining government affairs, lobbying or public relations.

Manafort has, for years, largely avoided registering with the U.S. government as a lobbyist or a foreign agent, and he has narrowly interpreted legal provisions dictating the circumstances under which individuals are required to disclose lobbying or public relations work. However, he recently announced he would retroactively file reports with the Justice Department detailing work he did for a Russia-aligned Ukrainian political party — perceived by some as a tacit acknowledgment that he failed to abide by the Foreign Agent Registration Act's disclosure provisions in real time.

In August, scrutiny of his work in Ukraine — which is currently under investigation by the FBI and congressional intelligence committees as part of their Russia probes — led to Manafort's ouster as Trump's campaign chairman after he helped guide the rookie politician to the GOP nomination.

The idea that Manafort would market his access to Trump to clients and prospective clients interested in influencing government decision-making — without registering as a lobbyist — deeply bothers Trump's allies.

Several Trump allies inside and outside the administration said it would make things easier for Trump if Manafort laid low during the Russia investigations.

"Paul certainly has a knack for making big deals, but it would be problematic for the administration to allow China to buy Puerto Rico's debt and to have Paul involved in the deal," said one outside Trump adviser, suggesting Chinese involvement in the affairs of a U.S. territory off Florida's coast could raise security concerns. The adviser added that "it would be problematic to have Paul representing himself as a liaison to the Trump administration on any deal, given the FBI investigation."

The situation also represents a tricky catch-22 for Manafort.

He is one of the few veteran lobbyists in Washington — or anywhere for that matter — who can legitimately claim a personal relationship with an outsider president who doesn't have deep connections to the Washington establishment and its lobbying industry.

Half a dozen people who have done business with Manafort said he indicated that he periodically spoke to the president and his team, including to offer political advice, well after he left the campaign, all the way up until the Russia investigation started heating up about two months ago.

Two people close to Trump disputed that, asserting there haven't been any conversations at all since the inauguration.

Trump's relationship with Manafort has become a liability for the president, thanks to the investigations into Manafort's lucrative consulting work for Russia-aligned oligarchs and politicians in Ukraine and Russia.

A federal grand jury impaneled as part of the FBI's investigation has issued a subpoena for records related to Manafort, according to NBC News. Last month, he voluntarily provided documents to the Senate Intelligence Committee, and offered to be interviewed by the House and Senate intelligence committees.

Manafort's efforts to defend himself have complicated some of his domestic business dealings, said half a handful of people who have worked with — or competed against — him.

But they said it hasn't made him toxic in international business and political circles, particularly in the developing world or in countries that lack robust democratic traditions.

Manafort, 68, made his name as a young GOP operative working on Ronald Reagan's 1980 presidential campaign. Since then, though, he's carved out a lucrative niche representing businessmen and politicians in parts of the world where real or perceived ties to a U.S.

president tend to outweigh negative press in the U.S.

Manafort's defenders reject any suggestion that he encourages the idea that he is an envoy to Trump. In fact, they assert that he actively attempts to disabuse people of that perception, though they concede that people still see him that way.

"Look, Paul has a relationship with Trump. He's always going to be a friend of Trump's. A lot of people know that," said Hector Hoyos, a tech entrepreneur who is a close friend and periodic business partner of Manafort's. "I've been with him in many places. Whenever anybody anywhere in the world starts playing that [Trump connection], the first one to state clearly and openly and publicly that he's not there representing Trump — or the administration — is Paul. But he can't be responsible for what other people may infer."

Hoyos has brought on Manafort to consult on a number of projects involving foreign companies and governments, including the proposed $30 billion deal between Puerto Rico and the China Development Fund, which presented itself to people involved in the talks as a subsidiary of the state-owned China Development Bank, according to people familiar with the talks.

Hoyos said he and Manafort also are working with Shanghai billionaire Yan Jiehe to help his company, Pacific Construction Group, win contracts to build infrastructure around the world.

Manafort met with Yan in April in Pacific Construction Group's Shanghai offices.

And before the meeting, Yan told The Financial Times, which first revealed the meeting, that Manafort was going to help him get in on Trump's promised — but yet to be detailed — $1 billion infrastructure spending plan. The paper quoted Yan calling Manafort "Trump's special envoy," and boasting "I will not seek out Trump. He will seek me out. In the entire world, I am definitely the most ideal privately owned unit to invest in construction. In the whole world, there's not another company equal to Pacific Construction."

Manafort's spokesman Maloni suggested Yan may have gotten ahead of himself, explaining, "Paul has not agreed to help any entity pursue future government infrastructure contracts in the United States." He said in an email that the discussion with Yan "took place at an impromptu meeting added to Paul's schedule at the Group's request because the Group is potentially interested in the U.S. infrastructure development market."

Hoyos, however, challenged the assertion that Pacific Construction Group is looking to break into the U.S. market. "The bulk of infrastructure development right now is going on in Africa, not in the U.S. God knows what the U.S. is going to do, because Trump hasn't moved on anything related to infrastructure," Hoyos said.

Yan already has conquered the Chinese market, Hoyos said, "but when it comes to competing against other global construction companies in the Middle East or in Latin America or Africa, it's a different ballgame. And that's what he is looking to Paul to do — to help him understand the ropes about how he can take his business and make it become a global business outside China. We believe that Pacific Construction could become one of the world's largest construction companies."

Pacific Construction did not respond to a request for comment.

But POLITICO obtained a previously unpublished company statement to The Financial Times "and related media outlets" characterizing Yan's meeting with Manafort as "a private business engagement" and decreeing that it "shall not be reported in the press without permission from the Pacific Construction Group."

Hoyos said he introduced Manafort to Yan, and that Manafort "doesn't do business with strangers. Paul will not do business unless he knows who he is getting in bed with. He is very careful about that."

Additionally, Hoyos' Florida-based telecommunications company, Hoyos VSN, in March retained Manafort as an adviser to assist in winning regulatory approval for mobile phone and satellite technology in countries including the United Arab Emirates, Japan and South Korea.

"He was brought in to help us access some of the phone companies overseas with which he had relationships, especially in places like Asia," said Hoyos. "If anything came of any introduction that he made, then he would have gotten compensation, just like any of my other consultants."

Manafort was added to Hoyos VSN's Florida corporate filings in late March as a director, but he was removed in an amended report filed just three weeks later.

"He's got too much going on, as you know," said Hoyos, who is in his late 50s and who for decades has turned to Manafort, the godfather of Hoyos' daughter, to assist his companies.

In the 1990s, one of Hoyos' companies retained Manafort's pioneering lobbying firm — Black, Manafort, Stone and Kelly — to obtain licenses to export supercomputers. "We got the export licenses, and he helped us enlist the Bush administration and then later on the Clinton administration to support us in combating the dumping that the Japanese were doing of supercomputers into the markets," Hoyos said.

And in the early 2000s, Manafort helped broker a deal in which a Portuguese company called Sociedade Lusa de Negócios (SLN) paid $31 million for a 25 percent stake in a Hoyos-owned company called Biometrics Imagineering, according to Hoyos and Portuguese media reports.

That transaction, on which Hoyos said Manafort was paid a commission, came under investigation in Portugal for alleged fraud and money laundering by SLN and the bank that backed it. Portuguese federal prosecutors in April announced that they were dropping the case without bringing charges, though they cited concerns over the "extremely complex financial engineering" at play in the deal "coupled with management decisions and practices that raised serious suspicion" over its framework.

Neither Hoyos nor Manafort was a subject of the investigation.

And while Manafort was accused by some Ukrainian officials of accepting millions of dollars in off-books cash payments from a Russia-aligned political party, Hoyos said his friend does everything by the book.

"In every single business dealing that I have had with him and that I have seen him engage with anybody, he has always demanded that the overseas Foreign Corrupt Practices Act wording be instated in every single contract as a clause, with the whole wording of the act," Hoyos said.

Nonetheless, Manafort's involvement in the prospective investment by China Development Fund in Puerto Rico raised red flags for some Puerto Rican officials, according to two lawyers familiar with the discussions.

The discussions got as far as a May 12 meeting in Manhattan that lasted four hours and was attended by Manafort, Hoyos, lawyers and other representatives from the Puerto Rican government, as well as an official with the China Development Fund named Benjamin Ng, according to four people familiar with the meeting.

Some of the people said that Ng indicated that the China Development Fund was interested in investing between $30 billion and $45 billion in Puerto Rico's debt and infrastructure, including possibly its publicly owned electric utility.

Ng said that the China Development Fund had made extensive investments in Iraq and other foreign countries, but he stressed that the fund was acutely sensitive to possible political opposition to the Puerto Rico deal. The U.S. government has to approve foreign investment in U.S. companies and infrastructure that carry national security implications, and Trump administration officials have expressed particular concern about Chinese investment in the U.S.

Manafort had previously suggested he'd be able to win approval for any resulting deal between the China Development Fund and Puerto Rico, said one of the lawyers familiar with the discussions, who did not participate in the May 12 meeting.

Hoyos dismissed that characterization, and cast Manafort as a peripheral player in the talks.

"Those relationships were all my relationships on both sides — China and Puerto Rico. I'm the one that ran the deal," said Hoyos, who is Puerto Rican. "I asked Paul to consult with me because he knows a lot about the whole government business," Hoyos explained, though he said that Manafort drifted in and out of the May 12 meeting.

The talks about a prospective deal appear to have died amid suspicion on both sides, according to several people familiar with them.

They say that Manafort and Hoyos concluded that the Puerto Rican government was not serious because it did not send top officials to the May 12 meeting.

Meanwhile, the Puerto Ricans were leery of the China Development Fund and of Manafort's involvement, which surprised them, according to the two lawyers familiar with the talks. "Manafort was a deal breaker," said one of the lawyers. "He's under FBI investigation, and the Puerto Ricans don't want to get tainted by Manafort's problems."

Representatives from Puerto Rico's governor's office and the Puerto Rico Fiscal Agency and Financial Advisory Authority — the independent government agency established this year by the Puerto Rican government to help the island dig itself out from debt and bankruptcy — did not respond to requests for comment.

Neither did Ng, the China Development Bank or the Chinese Embassy in Washington.

Hoyos argued that scrutiny of Manafort's ongoing work was part of a bigger effort — including the ongoing Russia investigations — to bring down Manafort.

Dismissing any suggestion that Manafort may have acted on behalf of Russia during the 2016 campaign, Hoyos asserted that Manafort "has been completely antagonistic to the Russians." He added "Is he friends with Russian oligarchs? Yeah, the same way he's friends with Argentinian and Mexican oligarchs. There are oligarchs around the world, but the fact that he's friends with Russian oligarchs doesn't mean that he supports or even likes [Russian President Vladimir] Putin."

Hoyos said Manafort is "under siege," adding "people saying this and that, everybody opining whatever they want to opine without any facts. It's Washington. He understands it, because that's been his arena his whole life. He knows that. That's the game and that's the career he chose."

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Shooting suspect wasn't a fan of natural gas — Michigan chief charged in Flint crisis — Methane rule parts postponed

SHOOTING SUSPECT WASN'T A FAN OF NATGAS: James T. Hodgkinson, the alleged shooter who wounded House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, members of his security detail, a lobbyist and a congressional staffer at this morning's baseball practice in Alexandria, Va., had several political posts on his Facebook page, but the most recent one was a petition calling on FERC to stop the NEXUS natural gas pipeline project. The Ohio-Michigan pipeline hasn't been approved yet by FERC, which can't give its blessing until it regains the quorum it lost in February. But there's little evidence so far that Hodgkinson, who died after exchanging gunfire with police, was active in protesting energy infrastructure, and FERC hasn't yet said whether he was one of the activists who have been removed from the agency's headquarters over the years for disrupting its meetings. Melinda Tuhus, one of the anti-FERC organizers, told AE they weren't familiar with Hodgkinson.

DOE OFFLOADS SOME CASH FOR NUCLEAR R&D: The Energy Department announced this afternoon that it had signed off on funding for 85 nuclear energy projects totaling nearly $67 million. The money is coming through a few different DOE programs, including its Nuclear Energy University Program, which is spending about $31 million on 32 R&D projects. The larger pot of funds also backs public-private partnerships aimed at getting industry greater access to research user facilities that focus on radiation applications.

DOE also announced its latest batch of ARPA-E funding this year. Sixteen projects that focus on improving the energy efficiency of data centers and boosting the production of semiconductors that can be used in industrial and high-temperature electronics could get up to $32 million.

MICHIGAN HEALTH CHIEF CHANGED IN FLINT CRISIS: The head of Michigan's Department of Health and Human Services has been charged with involuntary manslaughter related to the Flint drinking water crisis, the Associated Press reports. "Charges were read in court this morning against Nick Lyon, who is the highest-ranking member of GOP Gov. Rick Snyder's administration to be caught in the criminal probe of the impoverished city's lead contamination crisis. Lyon is accused of failing to alert the public about an outbreak of Legionnaire's disease that some experts have linked to the switch in the city's water supply and resulting poor water quality," Annie Snider reports.

Attorney General Bill Schuette also announced charges of involuntary manslaughter for former Flint emergency manager Darnell Earley and former City of Flint Water Department Manager Howard Croft today, as well as the Michigan Department of Environmental Quality's drinking water chief Liane Shekter-Smith and water supervisor Stephen Busch. Schuette announced chief medical executive Eden Wells has also been charged with lying to a peace officer and obstruction of justice related to an alleged attempt to stop an investigation into the health crisis in Flint, and later misleading investigators about her actions.

CHESAPEAKE BAY HEADING FOR BIG DEAD ZONE: The Chesapeake Bay's annual "dead zone," where low oxygen levels kill or drive away fish and other aquatic species, is likely to be larger than average this year, spanning 1.89 cubic miles — roughly the volume of 3.2 million Olympic-size swimming pools, according to federal researchers. Scientists at NOAA and the U.S. Geological Survey attributed the larger size to heavy spring rainfall in New York and Pennsylvania that washed fertilizer and other contaminants into the Susquehanna River. Pennsylvania is far behind its goals for reducing pollution runoff under a landmark Chesapeake Bay cleanup plan, prompting EPA to recently threaten consequences if the state's efforts don't improve.

KEY PARTS OF METHANE RULE POSTPONED: While litigation and interagency review plays out, BLM will suspend key parts of the methane waste rule, Alex Guillén reports. In a Federal Register notice to be published on Thursday, BLM says oil and gas producers "should not be required to expend substantial time and resources to comply with regulatory requirements that may prove short-lived as a result of pending litigation or the administrative review that is already under way." Several provisions were scheduled to take effect on Jan. 17, 2018, but have been pushed back indefinitely, BLM said. More here.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources ranking member Maria Cantwell released a statement on the Interior Department's "intent to ignore" the BLM's Methane and Waste Prevention Rule. "The BLM Methane Rule now has the force of law — and President [Donald] Trump is breaking it," Cantwell said. "Congress voted for people over polluters and the administration must respect that outcome."

JUNCKER: NO RENEGOTIATION HERE: European Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker told the European Parliament today the EU is not going to consider Trump's suggestion that the Paris climate deal be renegotiated. "The European Union will not renegotiate the Paris agreement," he told the assembly's plenary session. "The 29 articles of the agreement must be implemented and not renegotiated." POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff reports. Juncker pointed out that it took 20 years to reach the Paris agreement. "Climate action doesn't need more distractions," he said. The next international get-together of global leaders will be the G-20 summit in July, where Juncker made clear the EU wouldn't wait on the U.S. "We will work hard to have a clear message coming out of the G-20 summit in July — or at least from 19 [of the countries]."

POLITICS AT PLAY FOR E15 BILL: A bill to expand sales of gasoline with 15 percent ethanol appears to be stuck on long-running disputes over biofuel policy that could limit its support outside of corn states. Top Democrat on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Tom Carper said after a hearing on the topic today that he will oppose the E15 bill without an amendment addressing "transparency in the RIN market," a reference to the credits refiners must purchase to comply with the Renewable Fuels Standard. Merchant refiners in the Philadelphia area, along with Trump associate Carl Icahn and refining giant Valero, blame high RIN prices for threatening their profits, Eric Wolff reports. Republicans in the hearing seemed to have staked out their positions, with corn-state senators like Mike Rounds, Jerry Moran and Joni Ernst promoting the bill and long-time RFS opponents like Sen. Jim Inhofe and Chairman John Barrasso criticizing it.

WIND AND SOLAR HIT 10 PERCENT: Wind and solar power installations in March provided about 10 percent of total U.S. electricity supply and likely exceeded that level in April, the U.S. Energy Information Administration said today. Of the total March output from the two renewable sources, wind power provided about 80 percent of the electricity, EIA said. Read more.

FLOOD INSURANCE MARKUP DELAYED: The House Financial Services Committee will not mark up several flood insurance bills today as was scheduled, following the shooting at a congressional baseball practice. "Further updates on timing will be provided later this afternoon," Financial Services staff director Kirsten Mork said in an email to others on the committee. A bill that the committee was scheduled to mark up today would have limited compensation to 25 percent of premiums that policyholders pay. Sources said a new compromise would set the cap at 27.9 percent, phased in over three years, with a mandate that FEMA reduce costs from current levels by at least 1.5 percent within three years, Pro Financial Services' Zachary Warmbrodt reports.

Scalise in 'critical' condition after mass shooting Back

By Louis Nelson and John Bresnahan | 06/14/2017 08:19 AM EDT

A gunman opened fire at a congressional baseball practice in Alexandria, Virginia, on Wednesday morning, wounding House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, members of his security detail, a congressional staffer, and a lobbyist in a scene that one lawmaker said could have been a "massacre."

There were no immediate fatalities as a result of the shooting, although President Donald Trump announced during a televised address Wednesday morning that the shooter had died as a result of injuries sustained in an exchange of gunfire with U.S. Capitol Police.

A law enforcement source briefed on the investigation identified the gunman as 66-year-old James T. Hodgkinson of Illinois.

Scalise's office said Wednesday morning that he was undergoing surgery after being shot in the hip and transported to MedStar Washington Hospital Center. The hospital later tweeted that Scalise remains in critical condition. House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) told reporters that Scalise's surgery had been completed.

"Prior to entering surgery, the Whip was in good spirits and spoke to his wife by phone. He is grateful for the brave actions of U.S. Capitol Police, first responders, and colleagues," his office said. "We ask that you keep the Whip and others harmed in this incident in your thoughts and prayers."

In his remarks, the president called Scalise "a very good friend," "a patriot" and "a fighter," and said the prayers of his family, the nation and the world were with him.

"We may have our differences but we do well in times like these to remember everyone who serves in our nation's capital is here because, above all, they love our country. We can all agree we are blessed to be Americans," Trump said in his statement, delivered from the White House's Diplomatic Room.

Tim Slater, the FBI special agent in charge of the Washington Field Office, told reporters at a press conference from the scene that it was too early in the investigation to label the incident an act of terrorism or determine whether or not it constituted an assassination attempt. Likewise, he could not say whether or not members of Congress had been specifically targeted.

Shortly after the shooting, McCarthy announced via Twitter that the House would not hold any of its scheduled votes on Wednesday, although Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said votes in that chamber would go on as scheduled. House Speaker Paul Ryan did summon House members to the floor at noon on Wednesday, where he and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi delivered remarks.

"We are all horrified by this dreadful attack on our friends and on our colleagues and those who serve and protect this Capitol," Ryan said after some brief parliamentary procedures to open the House. "We are united in our shock. We are united in our anguish. An attack on one of us is an attack on all of us."

"To my colleagues, you're gonna hear me say something you've never heard me say before: I identify myself with the remarks of the Speaker," Pelosi said. "We are not one caucus or the other in this House today, but we speak for each other in saying we send our thoughts and prayers to our colleague Steve Scalise."

Former congresswoman Gabby Giffords (D-Ariz.), who also was the victim of a shooting incident, described the shooting as "an attack on all who serve and on all who participate in our democracy."

"I am heartbroken for the pain of Congressman Scalise, the other victims, and their family, friends, and colleagues who survived. I am thankful for the great courage of Capitol Police, who were my protectors after I was shot and became my friends," said Giffords, who was among the 19 people wounded during a 2011 shooting in which six people died. "I also know the courage it takes to recover from a shooting like this, and I know Steve and everyone there this morning have such courage in great supply."

Hodgkinson, the shooter, featured a prominent photo of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) on his Facebook page and Sanders said Wednesday in remarks on the Senate floor that Hodgkinson had volunteered for his 2016 presidential campaign. He offered his prayers for Scalise and the shooting's other victims, denouncing the attacker who had once supported his White House bid.

"I have just been informed that the alleged shooter at the Republican baseball practice is someone who apparently volunteered on my presidential campaign. I am sickened by this despicable act," Sanders said. "Let me be as clear as I can be. Violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society and I condemn this action in the strongest possible terms. Real change can only come about through nonviolent action, and anything else runs against our most deeply held American values."

Also among the victims was Zack Barth, a legislative correspondent in the office of Rep. Roger Williams (R-Texas), one of the GOP baseball team's captains. Williams wrote on Twitter that Barth was "receiving medical attention but doing well and is expected to make a full recovery."

Another victim, confirmed by Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas), was Matt Mika, a lobbyist for Tyson Foods and a former House GOP aide for Rep. Tim Walberg (R-Mich.), who was receiving treatment at George Washington University Hospital in Washington. His family issued a statement saying he remains in critical condition.

The hospital, which had previously said two shooting victims were there in critical condition, later amended that statement to announce that one of the patients had died. The hospital did not announce the identities of the patients and would not say if the deceased shooter was one of them.

Two other victims were members of the Capitol Police Department's Dignitary Protection Division, officers charged with protecting Scalise because of his role in House leadership. Capitol Police Chief Matthew Verderosa said that the officers, later identified as Crystal Griner and David Bailey, were in "good condition" and "have not suffered any life-threatening injuries at this point."

Verderosa said the Capitol Police officers on the scene exchanged fire with the gunman. Multiple lawmakers who were at the practice credited Scalise's protective detail with fighting back against the shooter and stopping him from having free reign to attack the otherwise unarmed attendees at the practice.

There was increased security at the Capitol Wednesday in the wake of the shooting, with police blocking off the area surrounding the main entrances to the House and Senate. Only members of Congress were allowed in while others were sent through the visitors' gallery.

The lawmakers were practicing for the annual congressional baseball game at a field in Alexandria, Virginia, when the shooting began just after 7 a.m. The game itself, a popular, bipartisan event held each summer, is scheduled for Thursday evening at Nationals Park and will go on as planned.

Rep. Mo Brooks (R-Ala.) described on CNN how Scalise was wounded in the shooting, explaining in a phone interview that the GOP whip was among the first to be shot and was hit while standing in the area of second base.

"He'd crawled into the outfield but leaving a trail of blood. We started giving him some liquids," said Brooks, who was not hit.

Sen. Rand Paul vividly recounted the scene in his own CNN interview, and gave credit to Scalise's protective detail for saving lives. "Nobody would have survived without the Capitol Hill police," Paul said on CNN. "He was just killing everyone — he would've. It would have been a massacre."

"And having no self-defense, the ... field was basically a killing field. If you were to run out while the killer was still shooting, he could have shot anybody," he continued.

GOP Rep. John Duncan (R-S.C.), who left the practice before the shooting began, told reporters that he had spoken to a man, believed to be the shooter, as he was departing who asked if the people on the field were Republicans or Democrats. He said he had shared his account with the Alexandria Police Department and that he believed the man he spoke to was the shooter "based on the profile that I saw on TV."

Brooks identified a handful of other lawmakers in attendance at Wednesday morning's practice, including Paul and Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), as well as Reps. Ron DeSantis (R-Fla.), Chuck Fleischmann (R-Tenn.), Joe Barton (R-Texas), Brad Wenstrup (R-Ohio), Gary Palmer (R-Ala.) and Williams. Brooks said Wenstrup, a medical doctor, immediately attended to victims, including Scalise.

"I felt like I was back in Iraq as a surgeon," Wenstrup, a former combat surgeon in the U.S. Army Reserve, told CBS News.

Brooks told CNN that the gunman fired from behind the field's third base dugout.

"And I look around and behind third base in the third base dugout, I see a rifle," Brooks said. "And I see a little bit of a body and then I hear another bam and I realize there is an active shooter. At the same time I hear Steve Scalise over near second base scream. He was shot."

The Alabama congressmen went on to describe that he never saw Scalise lose consciousness, though there was a 10 or 15 foot trail of blood behind him as he crawled from the infield into the outfield.

Brooks then realized that the rifle was a semiautomatic weapon as chaos ensued.

"The gun was a semiautomatic," he said. "It continues to fire at different people. You can imagine all the people in the field scatter. I run around to the first base side of home plate. We have a batting cage with plastic wrapped around it to stop foul balls. I was lying on the ground as gunfire continued."

Worried that the plastic batting cage would do little to protect him and staffers from gunshots,

Brooks said he took a gamble to get to cover.

"Heard a break in the gunfire and decided to take a chance. Ran from home plate to the first base dugout for better cover. There were a number of congressmen and congressional staffers who helped us lying on the ground," he said.

Flake, who had just batted when the incident occurred, said the gunman was shot. "There was a lot of yelling going on," he said.

There were approximately 25 members at the field, Flake said. One staffer was shot while on the field, and ran with a wound to the dugout, Flake said.

"He had a lot of ammo," Flake said, explaining why it took several minutes to get the situation under control.

Flake, in an interview with reporters at the scene, estimated that the entire incident lasted around 10 minutes. He said one victim, a female Capitol Police officer, was airlifted away from the scene.

"Just a harrowing scene," said Rep. Chuck Fleischmann (R-Tenn.), who ran into a dugout when the shooting started. "If this gunman had come into [the] dugout, we would have been sitting ducks."

Fleischmann said the incident "seemed to go on forever... It seemed like it took forever to subdue the gunmen."

Fleischmann added: "It was just horrible... The fear factor was horrific."

The shooting took place in a neighborhood baseball field near a dog park that was full of early-morning dog walkers. As the shooting started, neighbors on the adjoining streets heard what they described as "dozens" of shots as people in exercise clothing began to flee past their homes.

Virginia House of Delegates member Mark Levine decried the politics that have killed gun control efforts in the state. Asked if it's the right time to talk politics, he cried out, "Then when is the right time?!"

Trump canceled a planned event at the Department of Labor scheduled for Wednesday, while Pence canceled a morning speech to the National Association of Home Builders. At the group's annual D.C. gathering, Rep. Peter Roskam (R-Ill.) called for a moment of silence.

"I thought I was going to come up here and charm you on tax reform, but we're here on a very different day," Roskam told those assembled. "Will you just pray for these people and their families."

In the wake of the shooting, Democrats canceled a press conference announcing a lawsuit against President Trump. The Senate also postponed a hearing examining a budget request for the Capitol Police.

Kyle Cheney, Jake Lahut, Heather Caygle, Clea Benson, Negassi Tesfamichael, Toby Eckert, Caitlin Emma, Anna Palmer, Burgess Everett and Nolan D. McCaskill contributed to this report.

Michigan health official indicted in Flint water crisis Back

By Annie Snider | 06/14/2017 10:12 AM EDT

The head of Michigan's Department of Health has been charged with involuntary manslaughter related to the city of Flint's drinking water crisis, according to the Associated Press.

Charges were read in court this morning against health chief Nick Lyon, the highest-ranking member of GOP Gov. Rick Snyder's administration to be caught in the criminal probe of the impoverished city's lead contamination crisis.

Lyon is accused of failing to alert the public about an outbreak of Legionnaire's disease that some experts have linked to the switch in the city's water supply and resulting poor water quality.

Emergency managers appointed by Snyder switched Flint's water supply in 2014 from treated water supplied by Detroit to water from the Flint River that the city treated itself. However, officials failed to include corrosion controls in that treatment, causing dangerous lead to leach from service lines into tap water.

Michigan Attorney General Bill Schuette, who is widely expected to run for the GOP nomination in the 2018 governor's race, is leading the criminal probe, which has previously filed charges against 11 lower level state and local officials and two former emergency managers.

BLM delays key parts of methane waste rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 06/14/2017 10:08 AM EDT

The Bureau of Land Management will suspend key parts of the methane waste rule while litigation and an internal agency review plays out, the agency says in a Federal Register notice to be published on Thursday.

Oil and gas producers "should not be required to expend substantial time and resources to comply with regulatory requirements that may prove short-lived as a result of pending litigation or the administrative review that is already under way," BLM says in its notice.

Several provisions were scheduled to take effect on Jan. 17, 2018, but have been pushed back indefinitely, BLM said.

The postponed requirements include a mandate to capture a certain amount of waste gas produced during production, along with storage tank vapors; measure flared gas; upgrade or replace some equipment; and have in place leak detection and repair programs. Those requirements would have required operators to buy and install significant new equipment at "substantial cost," BLM said.

Some other provisions have already taken effect and are not postponed, including a requirement that new permits to drill include waste minimization plans, certain maintenance mandates and limits on venting and flaring while in production.

The rule survived a nullification attempt via a Congressional Review Act resolution last month after several Republicans sided with Democrats to keep the rule alive.

WHAT'S NEXT: Opening briefs in the lawsuit in the U.S. District Court for Wyoming are due July 3, with briefing continuing through August. The requirements stayed by BLM will remain paused until litigation and an internal review are complete, a process that could take years.

Ethanol politics bog down E15 bill Back

By Eric Wolff | 06/14/2017 02:18 PM EDT

A bill to expand sales of gasoline with 15 percent ethanol appears to be stuck on long-running disputes over biofuel policy that may limit its support outside of corn states.

Sen. Tom Carper (Del.), the top Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee, said after a hearing today that he will oppose the E15 bill without an amendment addressing "transparency in the RIN market," a reference to the credits refiners must purchase to comply with the Renewable Fuels Standard. Merchant refiners in the Philadelphia area, along with Trump associate Carl Icahn and refining giant Valero, blame high RIN prices for threatening their profits.

Carper also raised concerns about increasing ozone emissions that already plague his state if more E15 were sold, a concern shared by several influential environmental groups. Sen. Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) is the bill's only Democratic co-sponsor on the committee.

Sen. Cory Booker (D-N.J.) did not ask any questions at today's hearing, but afterward he told POLITICO he is in "negotiations" over the bill, declining to offer details. Sen. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.), the lead sponsor of the bill, said she plans to speak to Booker but has not done so yet.

Republicans in the hearing seemed to have staked out their positions, with corn-state senators like Mike Rounds (S.D.), Jerry Moran (Kan.), and Joni Ernst (Iowa) promoting the bill and long-time RFS opponents like Sen. Jim Inhofe (Okla.) and Chairman John Barrasso (Wyo.) criticizing it.

WHAT'S NEXT: Barrasso has said the committee will vote on the E15 bill, but no date has been set.

EIA: Wind, solar provided 10 percent of total U.S. power in March Back

By Esther Whieldon | 06/14/2017 10:40 AM EDT

The wind and solar power installations provided about 10 percent of total U.S. electricity generation in March and likely exceeded that level in April, the U.S. Energy Information Administration said today.

However, that share will likely fall below those levels in the summer, largely because output fluctuates based on seasonal changes, EIA said.

Of the total March output from the two renewable sources, wind power provided about 80 percent of the electricity, EIA said.

House Financial Services won't mark up flood insurance bills today Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 06/14/2017 11:12 AM EDT

The House Financial Services Committee will not mark up several flood insurance bills today following the shooting at a congressional baseball practice.

"Further updates on timing will be provided later this afternoon," Financial Services staff director Kirsten Mork said in an email to others on the committee. "Thanks to everyone for your flexibility. Please keep those wounded in your thoughts and prayers."

Flood insurance compromise wins over insurers Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 06/14/2017 12:28 PM EDT

Insurance trade groups that threatened to oppose House legislation that would overhaul the National Flood Insurance Program appear to have won concessions and are now offering their support.

One of the changes in the compromise would ease a proposed cap on compensation for private firms that work with the NFIP, people familiar with the matter said.

Spokesmen for Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Rep. Sean Duffy (R-Wis.), who chairs an insurance subcommittee, did not immediately confirm the revisions.

The committee postponed a markup of the legislation following this morning's shooting at a congressional baseball practice.

One of the changes expected to appear when the committee takes up the legislation would address insurance industry pushback against a cap on compensation for insurers participating in the NFIP's "Write Your Own" program. Under the arrangement, private companies sell and service government-backed flood insurance policies.

A bill that the committee was scheduled to mark up today would have limited compensation to 25 percent of premiums that policyholders pay. Sources said a new compromise would set the cap at 27.9 percent, phased in over three years, with a mandate that FEMA reduce costs from current levels by at least 1.5 percent within three years.

Two of the groups that threatened to oppose the legislation, in part because of the cap, now appear to be on board.

The Property Casualty Insurers Association of America sent a letter to the committee saying it backed the amended NFIP package. The National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies sent a separate letter saying the revised legislation had its "full support."

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee is expected to provide updates on the timing of the markup this afternoon.

Shooting shatters normal rhythms of Congress Back

By Burgess Everett and Seung Min Kim | 06/14/2017 10:54 AM EDT

The normal rhythms of Congress were shattered Wednesday morning by a shooting that injured House Majority Whip Steve Scalise and at least four others, stunning lawmakers and staffers. But the denizens of the Capitol sought to quickly reassert a sense of normalcy in the Senate, projecting to the world that Congress won't be intimidated by the frightening attack.

Rather than imposing new security restrictions or pausing its work, the best thing for Congress to do is just "move on," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.). One of the best-known members of Congress, he said he's received no guidance to alter his movements in and around the Capitol after the shooting. And he said he and his colleagues should not spend time or energy worrying about their own safety.

"This is terrible. Just be grateful it wasn't worse. You've got to just move on. The best thing we can all do is just get back to work," Graham told a handful of reporters. "I have long since stopped worrying about stuff like this. I have stopped worrying about things I can't control."

Still, in an era of heightened political tensions, the thought of their own safety is frequently on the minds of lawmakers, whether during daily activities in Washington or meeting with voters back home.

On Wednesday morning, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) said he recalled having that thought when the entire Senate was shuttled to the White House in April for a closed-door briefing on North Korea.

"I said, you know what? All it takes is some guy with a rocket launcher or a couple guys throwing a hand grenade and you can knock out most of the Senate," Menendez said. "That's the world in which we live in."

"There's not many hours in a day when I don't think about the potential of some goofball wanting to make a name for himself," added Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.). "So you just got to be aware and you gotta hope you're lucky."

Though some committee hearings were canceled and House votes postponed, the Capitol was mostly operating as usual, albeit with a slightly heightened security presence. Senate votes remained on schedule and Republicans were expected to continue discussing Obamacare repeal.

Party leaders offered brief comments on Wednesday morning, with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said he was "deeply saddened" by the event and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) relaying a conversation with Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), who was at the baseball field where Scalise was shot. Paul told Schumer: "Had these two Capitol Police officers, who were part of Congressman Scalise's detail, not been there it might have been a massacre."

"The shooting at the congressional baseball practice reminds us of the importance of numbering our days. May we refuse to boast about tomorrow, for we know not what a day may bring," said Senate Chaplain Barry Black in opening the chamber.

Later in the day, Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) delivered their own remarks praising Capitol Police while projecting unity and prayer in the aftermath of the shooting.

"We are giving all our thoughts to those currently being treated for their injuries at this moment, and we are united," Ryan said. "We are united in our shock. We are united in our anguish. An attack on one of us is an attack on all of us."

After acknowledging the frightening aspects of the shooting, members of Congress dug into their daily work. Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) said he met with constituents as usual on the Capitol grounds in the hours after the shooting.

"This is one of those freak deals. You can't let it impact the way you do your daily activities," Rounds said in an interview. "You're not going to be able to perform your job and your responsibilities as well as you should if you're looking over your shoulder all the time."

Scalise has a security detail, which prevented the attack from worsening. Top congressional leaders and those in the presidential line of succession receive constant security due to their prominent positions.

Others take additional measures. "I feel pretty safe back in Texas, particularly," said Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas). "My license to carry helps a little bit there, too."

"I have never felt like I needed it, except in rare situations," Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said of his security detail that shadows him in Washington. "Today is a reminder of the vulnerability."

But rank-and-file members of Congress do not generally have such security presences unless there is an active threat against them. They walk in and out of the Capitol in public areas where they can be approached by reporters, tourists and even lobbyists. And at town halls back home, where "you never know who's going to show up," in Graham's words, lawmakers generally have local police protecting them.

"It is a brutal and terrifying reminder about the prevalence of violence in our society," Sen. Richard Blumenthal (D-Conn.) said. Still, he added, "I've done public meetings, parades, forums for more than three decades, and people have more dangerous jobs."

And occasionally members face explicit threats, like threats against Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.) and his family in 2014.

"We've been very, very blessed to have so much good security around us and then we go home, we're in public places, we have our local state police and all of them have been very good helping us and everything," Manchin said. After this shooting, he added that "everybody will be on high alert. Because then what happens is, you have copycats."

Yet visitors poured into the Capitol for tours and meetings with staffers and members, all part of an apparent effort by lawmakers to put on a brave face and continue Congress's work.

"You've got to live. You just go about your business. It's just, I see the world for what it is," Graham said. "The threats against people in politics are real, but the threats against our soldiers? I've been in places where everyday you get up and everyday somebody is trying to kill you. So you put it all in perspective."

Trump faces first big domestic moment Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 06/14/2017 11:28 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's first domestic mega-moment has arrived, and his measured reaction to the unexpected tragedy is being praised by all sides as they gauge his temperament in a time of crisis.

Trump touched on all the key notes in the immediate hours after Wednesday's shooting at a congressional GOP baseball practice that sent five people to the hospital, including House Majority Whip Steve Scalise.

His first remarks: A statement saying he and Vice President Mike Pence were "deeply saddened" by the shooting and a tweet calling Scalise a "true friend and patriot."

Then, just before noon, the president embraced the role of sympathizer-in-chief, delivering a four-plus minute speech in the White House Diplomatic Room revealing Scalise and two Capitol Police officers were in stable condition and confirming the alleged gunman had died following the incident.

In other large-scale moments since arriving on the international stage, Trump sparked controversy by referring to hot-button policy points, attacking his critics and getting ahead of confirmed law enforcement reports. All that was gone in his nationally-televised remarks.

"We may have our differences, but we do well, in times like these, to remember that everyone who serves in our nation's capital is here because, above all, they love our country," Trump said near the end of his remarks.

"We can all agree that we are blessed to be Americans, that our children deserve to grow up in a nation of safety and peace, and that we are strongest when we are unified and when we work together for the common good," the president added.

Earlier this month, Trump sparked an international uproar when he touted his controversial travel ban following a terrorist attack in London and also mischaracterized the city mayor's position reassuring the public in its aftermath. During the heat of the 2016 campaign, Hillary Clinton criticized Trump after the Republican declared a bomb had detonated in New York before the local authorities had made that announcement.

Trump also drew criticism last June when he issued a seven-paragraph statement in response to the mass shooting at a night club in Orlando, criticizing President Barack Obama for not saying the words "radical Islam" during the shooting and urging him to "step down" from office because of the omission.

A White House official said while prepping for the speech, Trump was cognizant of the importance of his demeanor. "He wanted to hit the right tone. Moments like this give the president an opportunity to rise above politics and strike a certain chord that captures the sentiment of the nation, that's unifying and that's what he wanted to do."

Trump's softer and more tactful approach earned him praise from an unlikely source: Democrats.

"It looks like Trump and his team took this shooting seriously and acted accordingly. His statement was measured and respectful and hit all the right notes when he issued a call for unity," said Jim Manley, a longtime Democratic spokesman who worked for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Added a former senior Obama White House aide: "I think he sufficiently played the part."

Republicans also applauded Trump for his immediate response.

"I think he set the right tone and message," said former George W. Bush White House spokesman Scott McClellan. "This is a time to set aside politics and for all of us to come together in support of those who were injured in this tragic shooting. The president has an important role at times like this to be the comforter-in-chief for the nation."

"Temperate, compassionate, and thoughtful — the president's remarks met the test of the moment," said Michael Steel, who served as a spokesman for former House Speaker John Boehner.

Beyond the initial White House statement and tweet on Wednesday morning, Trump has stayed out of the spotlight as local and federal law enforcement piece together the shooting in Alexandria, Virginia. Law enforcement sources named the suspected shooter about four hours after the incident as James T. Hodgkinson of Belleville, Illinois. Those reports identified him as a supporter of Bernie Sanders, and his apparent social media accounts included anti-Trump posts. Sanders, in a statement, said he was "sickened by this despicable act" and condemned the shooting by "someone who apparently volunteered on my presidential campaign."

The White House canceled Trump's speech at the Labor Department that was scheduled for later this afternoon.

According to the White House, Trump has spoken to House Speaker Paul Ryan, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Scalise's wife and chief of staff and the Capitol Police chief. Pence has also spoken to Ryan, as well as House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, Texas GOP Rep. Joe Barton, Arizona GOP Sen. Jeff Flake and a staff member who coaches the Republican's baseball team.

While the president's televised response Wednesday drew praise, amid the initial presidential silence several Trump surrogates started making charged public statements and even ascribing a motive to the shooting.

The president's oldest son, Donald Trump Jr., issued a one-word post on Twitter — "This" — in sharing a tweet by conservative commentator Harlan Hill, who wrote: "Events like today are EXACTLY why we took issue with NY elites glorifying the assassination of our President." The tweet was an apparent reference to a current Central Park production of "Julius Caesar" - who in the play is made to look like the president.

Trump White House adviser Kellyanne Conway shared a post by a local South Carolina television reporter quoting South Carolina GOP Rep. Jeff Duncan, who said the shooter asked, "Is this a team of Republicans or Democrats practicing?"

"#breakingnews." Conway wrote.

New York GOP Rep. Chris Collins also placed blame on Democrats, saying in an interview with WBEN radio they need to "tone down" their rhetoric.

"I can only hope that Democrats tone down the rhetoric," Collins said. "The finger-pointing, the angst, the anger directed at Donald Trump and his supporters ... some people react to those things."

Collins referenced a "die-in" protest that happened at his office several weeks ago regarding Obamacare.

"Let's hope we can disagree on a more polite, conversational basis and not do things like they did at my office a couple weeks ago. It's gone too far," Collins said.

Several former Democratic White House aides in the hours after the shooting said they hoped Trump would avoid politics in his first major domestic shooting incident.

"The tone and the words coming out of the White House matter the most," said the same former senior Obama White House official who later praised the president's in-person remarks. "There may be a lot of breathless speculation in the press and an instinct to react strongly, but the sweet spot is typically one of respect, vigilance, and considered thoughtfulness."

"In these moments the public looks to the president to bring some rationality to what we all have difficulty rationalizing," added a former Clinton White House aide. "It's a time to be the healer-in-chief, not the tweeter-in-chief."

House Republicans fear politically motivated shooting Back

By Rachael Bade, Heather Caygle and John Bresnahan | 06/14/2017 01:21 PM EDT

House Republicans earlier this year discussed ramping up security in light of new anti-Donald Trump and anti-Republican anger on the far-left.

Now, they fear their worst nightmare has come true: a politically motivated shooting.

Republicans on Capitol Hill are fretting that their colleagues were targeted by a gunman during a Wednesday congressional baseball practice because of their party affiliation — or because of an anti-Trump sentiment pulsing through the nation. Many are asking about additional security, fearing they could be next, while also calling for civility to be restored to an increasingly divisive political discourse.

Speaking to reporters just hours after the shooting, Rep. Jeff Duncan recounted an exchange he had with the gunman before he opened fire — and before the South Carolina Republican realized the man was a threat. Duncan said the shooter stopped him in the parking lot by the field as he was leaving team practice early and asked him if Republicans or Democrats were playing.

Duncan told him it was the Republican team, and minutes later, the man opened fire.

Asked if he believed his colleagues were singled out because of party affiliation, Duncan said he did.

"Based on the question he asked me, I would make that assumption because he asked me if this team was the Republican or Democrat team privately," he said. "I responded that it was the Republican team practicing, and he proceeded to shoot Republicans."

He added: "Take that for what it's worth."

Republicans echoed Duncan's sentiment throughout the day, as news dripped out that the Facebook page of the gunman — identified as James T. Hodgkinson, a former home inspector from Belleville, Ill. — was awash in anti-Trump posts. Rep Rodney Davis (R-Ill.), for instance, brought up the current partisan political discourse as a cause behind the shooting.

"This political rhetoric and political discourse that has led to hate, has led to gunfire," Davis said. "I never thought I'd go to baseball practice for charity, and have to dodge bullets. This has got to stop, and it's gotta stop today."

Rep. Chuck Fleischmann (R-TN), speaking from the floor of the Capitol with a Tennessee Volunteers baseball hat on, called for civility on Fox News when asked whether the shooting was politically motivated: "We come up here and represent the people of the United States, and that's very sad that someone would take it upon themselves to open a weapon and fire upon anybody of any political party or any persuasion. It's very sad."

Since Trump was elected president, Hill Republicans have often taken the brunt of the anger from progressives unhappy at the direction the country is headed. They've seen their town halls and offices overrun with protesters, and while the discourse is often civil, several Republican lawmakers have complained to POLITICO about security concerns. Some have even said they won't hold town halls anymore for fear of their own safety. Others have received death threats.

POLITICO reported on a special conference more than two months ago in which GOP leadership asked former cop-turned-Rep. David Reichert (R-Wash.) to brief members on how to ensure their staff are safe. His tips included asking police to monitor town halls, a practice that most have taken up. He also advised them to install heavy solid doors instead of glass at district offices and ensure each office has a security system in place as well as a backroom exit in case of emergencies.

Wednesday's shooting is likely to only exacerbate those fears. During a members-only security briefing with House Sergeant at Arms Paul Irving Wednesday just hours after the shooting, lawmakers pressed leadership with questions about what funds they could use to increase protection for themselves and their staff. Arizona Democrat Ruben Gallego said that while no changes to security on the Hill were announced, a bunch of lawmakers asked if they could use campaign dollars to hire security back home.

Two members, Reps. Ann Wagner (R-Mo.) and Al Green (D-Texas), stood up to talk about death threats they had received recently.

Several Democrats leaving the briefing said they have received an influx of threats against them and their staffs in recent months as well and would be supportive of additional security measures.

"The concern is not about our personal safety as much as it is about our staff and our families," said Rep. Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "The lack of uniformity, especially in the districts...to even have metal detectors or a security team in place, those nuances make it more difficult to ensure the safety of our staff."

Green said congressional leaders should consider increasing members' annual expenditure allowance to provide extra money for security.

"An attack on one of us should be an attack on all of us," Green said he told members during the briefing. The Texas Democrat has recently received lynching threats after calling for Trump to be impeached.

"There should be an allocation for us to have someone in our offices, in these district offices," Green told reporters. "If it can already be used [but] budgets are tight, then we need to increase the budget so that the district offices can be protected. The staff is much more vulnerable than I am."

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said the next step is a review of "exactly what funds can and should be used in the event that there are security concerns by any member."

The review will be led by Speaker Paul Ryan's office "in communication with both the FEC and the Ethics Committee," Hoyer added as he was leaving the briefing.

Republicans' fear is grounded in a belief that politics had something to do with the incident. Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz), who was at the practice that erupted in chaos, said on TV that "you've got to assume [the gunman] knew what he was doing here" — though he added, "whether he was targeting certain members, we don't know." Rep. Mo Brooks (R-Ala.), who was also at the practice field, argued that "people know this is the Republican baseball team practicing" because of the security detail and the timing.

"It is pretty well known in the neighborhood who those folks are on the baseball field and where we practice, and there is probably also publicity about it on Capitol Hill," he said. "It's no question that he knew who we were and what he was intending to do, in my judgment, and I'm a former prosecutor in Tuscaloosa and Huntsville and yeah, he was going after elected officials, congressmen."

Coming out of the security briefing with House Sergeant at Arms Paul Irving on Wednesday, several Republicans speculated that the motivation may have been more anti-Trump than anti-Republican.

"It seems like this is was more an anti-Trump sentiment, but that's speculation," Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.) said. "There was some discussion about that but clearly speculation."

Louis Nelson and Jake Lahut contributed to this report.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Tax bill will resolve renewables BEAT issue — Ryan weighing retirement — Western Values Project targets public lands in ads
Date: Thursday, December 14, 2017 4:11:36 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 12/14/2017 04:10 PM EDT

WE GOT THE BEAT: Congressional tax reform conferees have resolved a financing issue for renewable projects, two Republicans on the conference committee tell Eric Wolff and Anthony Adragna. "Under measures in the tax proposal ... the Senate tax bill had created disincentives for financial institutions to fund renewable projects through the tax equity markets developers use to raise capital," the two write. "Clean energy proponents said the base erosion and anti-abuse tax provision would have eroded the value of incentives like the production and investment tax credits in those markets."

But tax writers today seem to have found a solution — though details remained scarce. "Well, that's where we kind of try to find a middle ground to land on, and I think we've sort of — it'll be a combination of things. It's not entirely one provision," Sen. John Thune said. And Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski said her fellow conference committee member Thune was taking the lead on fixing the BEAT issue. She agreed it had been addressed. "The fix may entail allowing financiers to take the full value of the research and development tax credit until 2025, and 80 percent of other credits, like the ITC and PTC, according to Keith Martin, an attorney who is co-head of U.S. projects for Norton Rose Fulbright. Martin said he hadn't seen actual text of the legislation, so he wasn't sure if that's what would end up in the final bill," Eric and Anthony report. Read more.

1 IN 3 DOI EMPLOYEES REPORT MISTREATMENT: More than one-third of Interior Department employees said they had been harassed or discriminated against in the past 12 months, according to an anonymous survey conducted earlier this year, the results of which were released today. Interior's survey was sent from Jan. 9 to March 5 to all Interior personnel employed as of Dec. 10, 2016, the department said and was conducted by CFI Group, a third-party contractor. The response rate was 44 percent, or 28,203 employees. Its release comes after National Park Service-specific results were released two months ago via the same survey, Interior said.

The breakdown: The survey results showed that 20.5 percent of employees experienced age-related harassment, 16.5 percent experienced gender-based harassment, 9.3 percent because of race or ethnicity, and 8 percent experienced sexual harassment. The Bureau of Indian Affairs and NPS reported the most incidents, with about 40 percent of BIA workers and 39 percent of NPS workers reporting some form of harassment.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in a statement said he had, from Day One, "zero tolerance for any type of workplace harassment." Zinke said: "All employees have the right to work in a safe and harassment-free environment. I've already fired a number of predators who other administrations were too afraid to remove or just turned a blind eye to. Under my leadership we don't protect predators. When I say 'zero tolerance' I mean that these people will be held accountable for their abhorrent actions." A memo, Interior said, was also sent today to bureau and office heads, where Deputy Secretary Bernhardt directed each to develop and a formal action plan within 45 days to address their specific survey results. The department also outlined specific steps it's taken since it had received initial survey results here.

NEW JERSEY NUCLEAR SUBSIDY BILL COMING SOON: The chairman of New Jersey's Senate Environment and Energy Committee said a nuclear subsidy bill in the works could be filed as early as today. "I'm working hard on it. I can't guarantee it will be done today, but I will try my best," Smith told POLITICO New Jersey's Danielle Muoio. "It's very close to being finished." The state's Senate energy committee and the Assembly Telecommunications and Utilities Committee "held a joint hearing earlier this month to discuss whether subsidies are necessary to prevent the premature retirement of the state's nuclear power plants," Danielle reports. Ralph Izzo, the CEO of PSEG, which owns much of the nuclear generation in New Jersey, has said the struggling plants will be unprofitable within three years and will shut down without some form of subsidy. Sources have said the subsidy could be as much as $300 million to $400 million a year, Danielle reports. Read more.

RYAN CONSIDERING RETIREMENT: House Speaker Paul Ryan has made it known to some of his closest confidants that he plans to retire after the 2018 midterm elections, POLITICO's Tim Alberta and Rachael Bade report. The news comes amid speculation on Capitol Hill that he could step down even sooner. His two most likely successors have been meeting with members to map out their strategies should a leadership shake-up occur, the two write. Read more.

FARENTHOLD WON'T RUN AGAIN: Texas Rep. Blake Farenthold, facing allegations of sexual harassment and inappropriate behavior from former staff members, will not seek reelection, Campaign Pro's Elena Schneider reports.

STATE LAWMAKERS ASK FOR FARMER AID: Florida and Texas lawmakers urged appropriators to help out farmers and ranchers in the next disaster-relief package, which Congress is expected to pass in a year-end spending deal. In a letter from Wednesday to House and Senate appropriations leaders, the delegations write that a "supplemental crafted to help our states recover from historic hurricane damage would be insufficient if it fails to address the needs of our farm and ranch families." Specifically, the lawmakers are asking that the disaster-relief package address backlogs in USDA recovery programs, including in the Emergency Conservation Program, Pro Agriculture's Catherine Boudreau reports. "Many farm and ranch families are trying to secure financing right now and should be planting within a month's time. For these families, waiting longer for help is not an option," they write. Read more.

WESTERN VALUES PROJECT ADS TARGET PUBLIC LANDS: The Western Values Project is increasing pressure on three Republicans in targeted public lands ads, Elena reports. WVP released internal polling and announced a TV, digital and radio ad campaign in the House races for Arizona Rep. Martha McSally, Oregon Rep. Greg Walden and Washington Rep. Jaime Herrera Beutler. "In the heart of the West, 2 million acres of protected public lands just got wiped off the map, selling off American heritage," one of the ads says. "Now elites in Washington have their sights set on Arizona." (Watch the AZ-02 ad here, OR-02 here, and WA-03 here.)

HALEY: EVIDENCE IRAN IS VIOLATING DEAL: U.N. Ambassador Nikki Haley said

today that she has been presented "indisputable" evidence of Iran violating its U.N. resolution the Middle East. "The nuclear deal has done nothing to moderate the regime's conduct in other areas. Aid from Iran's revolutionary guard to dangerous militias and terror groups is increasing," Haley said at a press conference at Joint Base Andrews, where reporters were invited to inspect military debris that she claimed to be of Iranian origin. "Its ballistic missile and advanced weapons are turning up in war zones across the region. It's hard to find a conflict or a terrorist group in the Middle East that does not have Iran's fingerprints all over it." POLITICO's Louis Nelson reports more here.

IMPORTANT TWEET: D.C.'s first Wawa is open today and FERC Commissioner Robert Powelson gave it a ringing endorsement. "The gold standard in convenience stores has finally arrived here in DC. Congrats Team Wawa on this mornings grand opening ceremony," Powelson said in one of two tweets, both accompanying a photo from the opening. "Honored to be invited to sip some java!" Tax change would create havoc for renewable energy financing Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/29/2017 05:56 PM EDT

Renewable energy advocates are warning that money for wind and solar power projects could dry up if Congress doesn't alter language in the tax bill that's designed to prevent banks from moving their profits abroad.

Companies that develop wind and solar projects typically sell the federal tax incentives attached to their green energy projects to banks, who can use them to reduce their own tax burdens. Those "tax equity" deals provide the renewable energy developers with the cash they need to build their projects.

But provisions in the Senate tax bill would make it difficult for banks with overseas subsidiaries to buy the credits, which are also accrued by low-income housing and infrastructure projects.

"To me it feels like a drive-by shooting," said Mike Garland, CEO of wind developer Pattern Energy. "Clearly the provision is aimed at corporations who are sending work overseas, but the result is that the investment in U.S. activities is penalized."

Under measures in the tax proposal aimed at reducing "base erosion," Congress would create a kind of minimum tax on profits earned in the U.S. to prevent companies from shifting that income onto the books of their subsidiaries in countries with lower taxes. But the current language would require energy project developers and their bank partners to recalculate their tax credits every year — creating uncertainty that would push many of the financial institutions out of the tax equity business.

"It takes us out of the market," said a source at one bank that does this kind of financing. "The best case scenario is it significantly reduces our involvement in the market, but it would be so difficult to plan in the near term at least, it would take us out. And we're talking about hundreds of millions of dollars of investment every year."

Renewable energy developers don't have the large profits that banks tend to generate, so they don't pay enough taxes to benefit directly from the Investment Tax Credit for solar or the Production Tax Credit for wind that Congress created.

So they have relied on the tax equity financing to drive their rapid growth. In a blog post, Keith Martin, an attorney who is co-head of U.S. projects for Norton Rose Fulbright, said nearly half the financing for a typical solar project and more than half the money for a typical wind project comes from tax equity deals — and four financial institutions have already told him they would leave the market if the law is changed.

There are nearly three dozen financial institutions doing these kinds of deals presently, but about 40 percent of the total funding comes from just three of them: JPMorgan Chase, Bank of America and US Bank.

"Without tax equity financing, most of these projects don't go forward, solar or wind," said one renewables industry source who's lobbying on the issue.

The Senate bill has renewable energy industry groups up in arms. The Solar Energy Industries Association, the American Wind Energy Association, Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions and the American Council on Renewable Energy sent a joint letter today to every senator asking for a fix. The lobbying source said the groups are pushing hard for changes, and they have several legislative proposals they hope to get attached to the bill during the vote-arama amendment process expected later this week. The person declined to describe the proposals because "things are at a delicate stage."

Financial institutions might be amenable to a provision that allowed banks to carry over unused tax credits to future years, according to the banking source. That would lower the returns on their investments, but it would keep them in the market.

Peter Kelley, vice president for public affairs for AWEA, said Sens. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) are "working to fix the problem before the bill is considered by the full Senate."

"We continue to advocate for a tax reform package that does not threaten the $85 billion in economic activity and the projected 50,000 new American jobs from wind farm development through 2020," he said in a statement.

Grassley, who is already playing defense to keep cuts to the wind tax credit included in the House bill out of the final bill, and a spokeswoman said, "Sen. Grassley is aware of the concerns raised and is looking into the issue."

Tax bill will resolve 'base erosion' problem for renewables Back

By Eric Wolff and Anthony Adragna | 12/14/2017 01:57 PM EDT

Congressional conferees have resolved a tax issue that put financing for renewable projects in jeopardy, two Republicans on the conference committee said today.

Under measures in the tax proposal aimed at keeping companies from sending their profits to lower tax countries, the Senate tax bill had created disincentives for financial institutions to fund renewable projects through the tax equity markets developers use to raise capital. Clean energy proponents said the base erosion and anti-abuse tax provision would have eroded the value of incentives like the production and investment tax credits in those markets.

But now tax writers seem to have found a way around the problem, though details remained scarce and the situation is fluid. Republicans are aiming to release the conference report on the tax bill by Friday and hope to have it to President Donald Trump's desk before the end of next week.

"Well, that's where we kind of try to find a middle ground to land on, and I think we've sort of — it'll be a combination of things. It's not entirely one provision," Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said Thune was taking the lead on fixing the BEAT issue, and she agreed it had been addressed. Both senators are on the conference committee.

The fix may entail allowing financiers to take the full value of the research and development tax credit until 2025, and 80 percent of other credits, like the ITC and PTC, according to Keith Martin, an attorney who is co-head of U.S. projects for Norton Rose Fulbright. Martin said he hadn't seen actual text of the legislation, so he wasn't sure if that's what would end up in the final bill.

WHAT'S NEXT: Bill text is expected Friday.

Paul Ryan Sees His Wild Washington Journey Coming to An End Back

By Tim Alberta and Rachael Bade | 12/14/2017 12:26 PM EDT

Spirits were high inside the House chamber on Thursday, November 16, when, in the early afternoon, the gavel fell and a measure to rewrite the American tax code passed on a partisan tally of 227 to 205. As the deciding votes were cast—recorded in green on the black digital scoreboard suspended above the floor—the speaker of the House, Paul Ryan, threw his head back and slammed his hands together. Soon he was engulfed in a sea of dark suits, every Republican lawmaker wanting to slap him on the shoulder and be a part of his moment.

Ryan was the man of the hour. Having spent a quarter-century in Washington—as an intern, waiter, junior think-tanker, Hill staffer and, since 1999, as a member of Congress—he had never wavered in his obsession with fixing what he viewed as the nation's two fundamental weaknesses: its Byzantine tax system and ballooning entitlement state. Now, with House Republicans celebrating the once-in-a-generation achievement of a tax overhaul, Ryan was feeling both jubilant and relieved—and a little bit greedy. Reveling in the afterglow, Ryan remarked to several colleagues how this day had proven they could accomplish difficult things—and that next year, they should set their sights on an even tougher challenge: entitlement reform. The speaker has since gone public with this aspiration, suggesting that 2018 should be the year Washington finally tackles what he sees as the systemic problems with Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Tinkering with the social safety net is a bold undertaking, particularly in an election year. But Ryan has good reason for throwing caution to the wind: His time in Congress is running short.

Despite several landmark legislative wins this year, and a better-than-expected relationship with President Donald Trump, Ryan has made it known to some of his closest confidants that this will be his final term as speaker. He consults a small crew of family, friends and staff for career advice, and is always cautious not to telegraph his political maneuvers. But the expectation of his impending departure has escaped the hushed confines of Ryan's inner circle and permeated the upper-most echelons of the GOP. In recent interviews with three dozen people who know the speaker—fellow lawmakers, congressional and administration aides, conservative intellectuals and Republican lobbyists—not a single person believed Ryan will stay in Congress past 2018.

Ryan was tiring of D.C. even before reluctantly accepting the speakership. He told his predecessor, John Boehner, that it would be his last job in politics—and that it wasn't a long-term proposition. In the months following Trump's victory, he began contemplating the scenarios of his departure. More recently, over closely held conversations with his kitchen cabinet, Ryan's preference has become clear: He would like to serve through Election Day 2018 and retire ahead of the next Congress. This would give Ryan a final legislative year to chase his second white whale, entitlement reform, while using his unrivaled fundraising prowess to help protect the House majority—all with the benefit of averting an ugly internecine power struggle during election season. Ryan has never loved the job; he oozes aggravation when discussing intraparty debates over "micro-tactics," and friends say he feels like he's running a daycare center. On a personal level, going home at the end of next year would allow Ryan, who turns 48 next month, to keep promises to family; his three children are in or entering their teenage years, and Ryan, whose father died at 55, wants desperately to live at home with them full time before they begin flying the nest. The best part of this scenario, people close to the speaker emphasize: He wouldn't have to share the ballot with Trump again in 2020.

And yet speculation is building that, Ryan, even fresh off his tax-reform triumph, might not be able to leave on his own terms. He now faces a massive pileup of cannot-fail bills in January and February. It's an outrageous legislative lift: Congress must, in the coming weeks, fund the government, raise the debt ceiling, modify spending caps, address the continuation of health care subsidies, shell out additional funds for disaster relief and deal with the millions of undocumented young immigrants whose protected status has been thrown into limbo. It represents the most menacing stretch of Ryan's speakership—one that will almost certainly require him to break promises made to his conference and give significant concessions to Democrats in exchange for their votes. To meet key deadlines, he'll have to approve sizable spending increases and legal status for minors who came to the U.S. illegally—two things that could raise the ire of the GOP base and embolden his conservative rivals on Capitol Hill. There is no great outcome available, Ryan has conceded to some trusted associates—only survival. "Win the day. Win the next day. And then win the week," Ryan has been preaching to his leadership team.

The speaker can't afford to admit he's a lame duck—his fundraising capacity and deal-making leverage would be vastly diminished, making the House all the more difficult to govern. When asked at the end of a Thursday morning press conference if he was leaving soon, Ryan shot a quick "no" over his shoulder as he walked out of the room.

Ryan is backed by the vast majority of the GOP Conference, but even a small group of dissenters can make the speaker's life miserable—and he knows it. When Ryan succeeded Boehner in the fall of 2015, the new speaker sought to eliminate—or at least weaken—the parliamentary tactic that had been used against his predecessor. By filing a "motion to vacate the chair," Rep. Mark Meadows of North Carolina had found a way to force a vote on the speakership at any time—a potential humiliation that Boehner avoided by retiring. Ryan, working with Boehner's team during the transition, was unsuccessful in banning this practice. But he made it clear to Boehner at the time, and to his own allies upon assuming the speakership, that he would not serve at the whims of Meadows and the House Freedom Caucus, a group of some 35 conservative hard-liners. In an interview this fall with POLITICO Magazine, Ryan said the motion to vacate doesn't loom large as a constant threat to his job security. "No, because it's not a job I ever wanted in the first place," Ryan said. "If I was dying to be speaker, I guess it probably would be a dagger over my head. But I don't think like that."

Members of the Freedom Caucus don't necessarily believe this rhetoric from Ryan, but they respect the strategic advantage it gives him. After all, when Boehner left town, Ryan was the only consensus replacement—and even then, members had to beg him to assume the most powerful office on Capitol Hill. Given that history, any conservative who attempts to overthrow Ryan would make the Freedom Caucus—and its two leaders, Meadows and Ohio Rep. Jim Jordan—look like nihilists who collect speakers' scalps for sport. This is especially true without any obvious, universally acceptable successor waiting in the wings. "There are no more golden boys left," Meadows said in an interview, discussing the possibility of Ryan's departure.

Ryan's problems are not limited to the Freedom Caucus; there is, without question, wider discontent in the conference than the speaker appreciates, with legislators across the ideological and experiential spectrums grumbling about a hypercentralized process that gives them a vote on the floor but little else. That said, it requires a special brand of gumption to go after the speaker's gavel—and the usual suspects can be found in and on the periphery of the Freedom Caucus. These members, who have been eerily quiet for much of 2017, have begun making noise about a mutiny. The expectation of a major betrayal on Ryan's part—either on spending levels, immigration or a combination of the two—has prompted incessant chatter in recent weeks of someone filing a motion to vacate the chair, perhaps as soon as next month. This could be gamesmanship, a bluff to make Ryan feel pressured to step aside. But with a sudden, pervasive sense that Ryan might be ready to leave anyway, a motion to vacate would make sense as a test of his desire to stay on the job.

Either way, the convergence of these realizations—Ryan wanting to retire after 2018, and a possible threat to his speakership even sooner—has sparked a flurry of activity in the offices of Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy and Majority Whip Steve Scalise, the two most likely successors to Ryan. Both believed Ryan would leave late next year and were therefore planning their next steps at an appropriately deliberate pace. This has abruptly changed: According to multiple GOP sources, both McCarthy and Scalise have taken recent meetings with members loyal to them who have been eager to strategize about life after Ryan. There is little chance Scalise runs against McCarthy, but the whip—knowing McCarthy lacked the votes to become speaker in 2015, prompting Ryan to accept the job—is taking careful stock of the conference, preparing to launch his own candidacy should McCarthy stumble a second time.

The one person who can keep these dominoes from falling, at least in the near term, is Trump. The president and the speaker have been a better pairing than anyone could have imagined a year ago, considering Ryan abandoned the GOP nominee during the homestretch of the 2016 campaign. The speaker has kept shoulder to shoulder with the White House at moments of vulnerability, knowing Trump can shield him—and his members—from the fury of the right. If the president endorses whatever grotesque legislative meatball comes out of the House in the coming weeks—publicly and unambiguously—it's impossible to see Ryan facing any real threat. If the president distances himself from the speaker, however, the floodgates could open—and quickly. Conservatives, having whispered in the president's ear about Ryan not sharing his interests, will be watching carefully for cues. So too will Steve Bannon, who has been conspicuous this year in holding his fire on Ryan, an old nemesis, while laying waste to Senate GOP leader Mitch McConnell. Bannon and Meadows, a pair of disruptive forces, have spent the past year keeping Ryan's blood out of the water—but in the unlikely scenario that Trump suddenly sours on the House speaker, they will be inviting the sharks to dinner.

Underscoring all of this palace intrigue are some strange realities—such as the fact that Ryan's survival as speaker might require cover from the very president who once believed that Ryan was trying to sabotage his presidential campaign. Or the notion that Ryan, should he secure his final year in office, will use it to pursue the type of dramatic, politically risky entitlement reforms that Trump explicitly ruled out while running for president. Perhaps no piece of irony is more striking, or effective in capturing this volatile period of Republican history, than the juxtaposition between Ryan celebrating his dream of rewriting the tax code—while hearing of renewed threats to his speakership.

Ryan nearly walked away from Congress once before. It was November 2012, after Mitt Romney's loss to Barack Obama, and the would-be vice president found himself despondent and homesick. Ryan told his wife, Janna, that he was considering retirement. That's when Boehner called. The speaker, concerned about the stability of his conference, could not afford to lose Ryan; he promised the influential Budget Committee chairman a waiver so he could lead the panel for another two years. Ryan agreed, and as the sting of 2012 receded, he began to map out his political future—and his exit strategy from Congress. Having run and lost a national campaign, Ryan rejected pleas to consider his own presidential prospects; instead, he set his sights on the Ways and Means Committee. The chairmanship, which he had long viewed as a dream job, would open after 2014, and Ryan saw it as the perfect perch from which to both pursue his long-standing policy goals and influence the direction of the national party in 2016. Ryan had it all figured out, according to interviews at the time with his friends, family and staff: He would chair the committee, help a newly elected Republican president write a sweeping overhaul of the tax code, and then ride off into the sunset.

But it wasn't meant to be. Less than a year into Ryan's Ways and Means tenure, Boehner decided to call it quits. He had asked his protege several times over the previous year—since the primary defeat of Majority Leader Eric Cantor—to succeed him as the speaker. "I gave him the Heisman every time," Ryan told POLITICO. The Ways and Means chairman was content to support his friend McCarthy. But the Freedom Caucus wasn't. Jordan and Meadows, concerned that McCarthy, a pragmatic Californian, would lead no differently than Boehner, made him a series of offers—their support in exchange for something from him. One of the proposals called for process reforms, including a drastic restructuring of the Steering Committee, which decides committee assignments and chairmanships. Another, more politically explicit offer, promised McCarthy the group's votes if he could make either Jordan or Meadows the majority leader. When McCarthy bristled, suggesting he couldn't possibly deliver what they wanted, the group told him he wouldn't have enough votes on the House floor to become speaker—even if he had already scored an overwhelming majority in the closed-door conference election.

Hours before that private vote was set to occur, McCarthy called Ryan to say he didn't want the job—and that really, Ryan should take it. He still wasn't interested. Only after several days of around-the-clock phone calls from prominent Republicans did Ryan open himself to the possibility. He began thinking about his conditions for accepting the job. One was family time on the weekends, which was non-negotiable; another was support from the Freedom Caucus. Ryan had watched Boehner struggle to contain the rebellion after the tea party wave of 2010; he would not assume the speakership over the objections of the same rambunctious members who had helped drive Boehner from office. By securing their support up front, Ryan hoped to inoculate himself against the inevitable future grumblings from House conservatives.

Some Freedom Caucus members had reservations about Ryan, but others were ecstatic at his willingness to take the job. Unlike with Boehner, they saw the Wisconsinite—an Ayn Rand devotee and fierce critic of the welfare state—as one of their own. He was equally appealing to other factions of the conference—a sober-minded, well-spoken, telegenic leader with policy experience and people skills. After five years of civil war, there was no other figure who could unite the fractured House Republican Conference. Ryan's colleagues teasingly called him "The Chosen One," and in late October 2015, he assumed the speakership.

The cease-fire was short lived. Conservatives say Ryan failed a critical first test just weeks after taking the gavel, when he refused to leverage government funding to impose new restrictions on the nation's refugee settlement program in the wake of the mass shooting in San Bernardino, California. Jordan pleaded with the new speaker to hold out for increased vetting, telling him that it would show Obama and Democratic Senate leader Harry Reid that "there's a new sheriff in town." Ryan refused—an original sin that chafes Jordan to this day. As he struggled to adjust to his complex new role—"like Einstein learning to write poetry," is how one of Ryan's admirers described it—he committed another strategic error that would prove costly with some of his members: dismissing the reality TV star running for his party's nomination. In private conversations, Ryan called Trump "a joke" whose penchant for identity politics was dividing the country and dooming the Republican Party's future. He wasn't much gentler in public: For most of the campaign, Ryan made it seem he felt honor-bound to denounce the candidate's latest incendiary remark or antic, as though the two were personally engaged in a tug-of-war for the GOP's soul.

This annoyed some of Ryan's members—both pro-Trumpers and others who disliked him but respected the anger he was tapping into. When the speaker initially withheld his support after Trump became the presumptive nominee—then continued to poke at him even after issuing a grudging endorsement—some of Ryan's colleagues wondered if he was attempting to sabotage the GOP ticket. Ryan made a point, for instance, never to be photographed with Trump—fearful of how it would be used to tarnish his brand, according to multiple sources. But the speaker came to agree that the icy relationship between them was unhelpful to the national party. Under mounting pressure from his members, as well as his longtime friend, Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus, Ryan offered an olive branch, inviting the GOP nominee to his hometown of Janesville, Wisconsin, for a Saturday afternoon campaign rally.

All hell broke loose on the evening before the event, when the Washington Post published a decade-old recording of Trump boasting about his sexual exploits—and his ability to grope women because of his celebrity status. It seemed to be the nail in his campaign's coffin. Ryan immediately disinvited Trump from Janesville, railing to Priebus and other GOP officials about the man he had never trusted or respected in the first place. Feeling validated, and certain that his members were equally outraged, Ryan wanted to take decisive action—even entertaining the idea of withdrawing his endorsement of Trump. On an emergency leadership conference call the weekend of the "Access Hollywood" tape, Ryan floated this idea as House GOP leaders debated how far to distance themselves from Trump. He would cripple their majority, the speaker said; cutting him off might be their best hope of saving the House. It was ultimately McCarthy—who has become Trump's favored member of the GOP leadership—who talked Ryan down. Withdrawing their support, he said, according to multiple sources familiar with the call, might backfire by hurting their own members. He suggested they cool off and not act on impulse.

Ryan agreed, yet somehow still crossed the line with many House Republicans when he declared—on another conference call the following Monday morning, this time with all Republican members—that he would no longer defend or campaign for Trump. That call, leaked to reporters in real time, lit a fire in the grass roots. Congressional phone lines exploded thereafter, with irate GOP constituents calling for Ryan's head. Some members began questioning the sustainability of his speakership; in late October 2016, after leaders scheduled Ryan's speakership nomination, a number of pro-Trump House members urged Ryan to postpone it so they had more time to consider if he should lead the conference. One of those was Rep. Jim Renacci, an establishment-friendly Republican who had long served with Ryan on the Ways and Means Committee. The Ohio Republican started garnering signatures on a secret letter arguing that "the conference is divided" and "there is no reason to hastily hold elections."

Freedom Caucus members sensed an opportunity. At a secret meeting at Meadows' downtown D.C. apartment, days before the election, Freedom Caucus board members devised a plan to deny Ryan the 218 votes needed to retain his speakership. The strategy called for Jordan to serve as the "sacrificial lamb," running against Ryan—not to win, but to keep the speaker from having the votes needed for reelection. The idea was that Ryan, who talked frequently (and annoyingly, to some members) about how he had never wanted the job in the first place, would step aside to avoid the spectacle. Conservatives had already begun searching for a new speaker from outside their narrow ranks—someone who would command the respect of the conference. Rep. Mike Pompeo—then a little-known, dry-witted defense hawk who'd later make friends in high places and become Trump's CIA director—became their top choice.

As Republicans schemed against their speaker, the underlying assumption was that Trump would lose and the conservative base would be out for blood—that, or Trump would win and kick Ryan to the curb. Either way, he would be finished.

Less than an hour before the polls closed on November 8, 2016, Ryan made the phone call he'd been dreading. With a handful of staffers and family members lingering nearby, Ryan was patched through to senior officials at the RNC in Washington. They had been analyzing voting patterns and running turnout models throughout the day, and were prepared to share their projections with the speaker: Trump was going to go down in flames, earning just 220 electoral votes. Republicans would lose nearly 20 House seats. Democrats would retake control of the United States Senate. Exactly the debacle Ryan had feared.

Stewing inside his team's war room at the Holiday Inn in Janesville—the site of his own election night party—Ryan could not stomach the thought of working with President Hillary Clinton. That said, he wasn't exactly thrilled about working with Trump, whose campaign—fueled by anger, resentment and nativism—was, in his view, a rejection of conservatism's highest ideals. As disappointed as he was about Clinton's apparent victory, the speaker saw a silver lining: He would seize the occasion of Trump's defeat—beginning that night—to speak about a return to an inclusive, aspirational, Jack Kemp-inspired "happy warrior" conservatism, and a rejection of Trumpism.

But Ryan never got the chance. His own race had been called early, and attendees waited patiently in the ballroom for his victory speech. But the speaker was paralyzed in the war room, watching in disbelief as Trump surged past Clinton in the pivotal battlegrounds of Florida and North Carolina. The RNC's numbers, his advisers told him, were garbage: The GOP's Senate majority appeared safe, only a handful of House Republicans were losing, and if the current trends held, Trump was going to win the biggest upset in presidential history. Just before 10 p.m. Eastern, Ryan finally took the stage and spoke for three minutes. "I've just been sitting there watching the polls," Ryan said, the shock written all over his face. "By some accounts, this could be a really good night for America. This could be a good night for us. Fingers crossed."

Ryan would seize the occasion of Trump's defeat to speak about a return to an inclusive, aspirational, Jack Kemp-inspired "happy warrior" conservatism, and a rejection of Trumpism. He never got the chance.

Ryan faced a legacy-shaping decision that night: Stay true to himself and step down as speaker, or muzzle himself and serve alongside Trump in a unified GOP government. It was a no-brainer: This was Ryan's chance to actually achieve the things he had only fantasized about. Even if that meant getting in bed with the likes of Trump and Bannon. And even if that meant accommodating behavior from a Republican president that he would never tolerate from a Democrat. It was a trade-off Ryan could not refuse. It was, in the refrain of the speaker's allies, "Paul's deal with the devil," one that he would make all over again. Chasing his legislative dreams would require keeping his criticisms of Trump to himself. "You can't create a sideshow, even if there's cause for a sideshow, because it's going to get in the way of getting the big things done," Boehner told POLITICO Magazine of Ryan's approach to Trump. "Paul has got his head on straight. He's very comfortable with who he is and what he's got to do."

As some conservatives watched eagerly for a smoke signal from the president-elect—hoping he would remember the speaker's disloyalty and recommend a replacement—Ryan moved quickly to secure his standing. He spoke with both Trump and his longtime friend, Vice President-elect Mike Pence, in the hours before Trump's victory speech, and made swift plans Wednesday morning to meet with them in Washington the next day. Before their meeting, Ryan shared with several friends that he planned to start his talk with Trump by mentioning their bad blood during the campaign, and explaining why he had said and done certain things. They cut him off: That was a terrible idea. Don't remind Trump of how much he despised you in the past, they said. Focus on the future. Ryan listened. And the advice was sound: To this day, despite Trump's famously long memory, sources in both camps say the president and speaker have never once revisited their old feud.

Indeed, a surprising subplot of the unified GOP government's first year has been the unlikely alliance between Trump and Ryan. The healing process that began in D.C. two days after the election culminated in Pence delivering the message to House Republicans, just minutes before the speakership election, that Trump supported Ryan. (Only one Republican, Thomas Massie of Kentucky, voted against him.) The relationship since has been strangely drama free: Trump and Ryan talk often throughout the week, chewing on questions of policy and process and politics. Never once has there been a blowup, either in person or over the phone. Sources close to both men say they occasionally vent about the other—Trump telling aides that the speaker can't count votes; Ryan complaining to leadership comrades about the president saying things unbecoming of his office—and yet these feuds are, somewhat miraculously, kept in the family.

Ryan's allies paint this as part of a broader picture—his stronger-than-expected partnership with the president; his landmark victories in passing tax reform, as well as a repeal and replacement of the Affordable Care Act, on the House floor; his prolific, historic fundraising on behalf of the embattled GOP majority—to argue that his Faustian bargain has proven worthwhile. And they cite these same examples to dismiss the sanity of threats against his speakership: What more could House Republicans possibly want from him?

"Paul Ryan is by far and away the best possible person we have to lead this group of people in the right direction," said one such ally, Rep. Tom Rooney of Florida. "I just think that any talk of him leaving, I hope that's not true. It would be a major setback for our cause."

Every speaker deals with varying degrees of discontent in their conference. In Ryan's case, it owes less to ideology than process. Specifically, members who felt marginalized under Boehner—who ran a top-down operation that cut out committee chairs and left little room for lawmakers to shape legislation—feel the House is even more centralized under Ryan. This was evident in the speaker's first, botched attempt at repealing Obamacare: He wrote the bill on his own, then framed it as a "binary choice" for members to either back his proposal or be viewed as supporters of Obamacare. The stunt rubbed Ryan's colleagues the wrong way, particularly Freedom Caucus members who had extracted promises from him in 2015 about opening up the House and restoring regular order.

Conservatives aren't the only ones annoyed with Ryan's approach, and it isn't just back-bench members voicing displeasure. Sources close to House Budget Chairwoman Diane Black, a longtime Ryan ally, said she was deeply upset over the summer about Ryan's treatment of her budget process—though she, like many other senior members friendly with the speaker, would never voice these criticisms publicly. Ryan trampled on Black's budget in order to expedite the push for tax reform. But when the time came to draft the legislation, members of the Ways and Means Committee—who had worked alongside Ryan for years—grew upset at what they saw as the speaker's dictatorial approach. Tax writers vented to the White House that he wielded an iron grip on the process and that they had little imprint on the final product; members grumbled about Ryan big-footing Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady. Members of his committee said they didn't see the final bill until just days before they voted on it. It's no coincidence that more than half a dozen members on Ways and Means—one of the most powerful and desired positions in Congress—are walking away from the House in 2018. Renacci, in an interview, specifically cited Ryan's top-down style as a reason he was leaving the House to run for governor of Ohio.

"You've got to be willing to let everyone bring one pebble of sand to the beach, so they at least feel they helped build the beach," Renacci said. "And that's regular order. If you don't get that, you're never going to be a leader here in the conference."

Similar complaints dogged the previous speaker. But unlike Boehner, who bunkered down and lost touch with many of his newer members, Ryan has made a sustained effort to engage the full spectrum of his colleagues on a regular basis, with both group and individual meetings. This has given rank-and-file lawmakers greater access to the speaker—though not a greater role in the legislative process.

He's more controlling than Boehner ... and I voted against John Boehner and worked with Mark Meadows to vacate the chair," said Rep. Walter Jones. "I've been here 22 years and this is the most closed shop I've ever seen."

At the end of the day, the real threat to Ryan exists in the same place it did during Boehner's speakership: on the right flank of the conference. Early this fall, as the tax-reform battle was heating up, Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina—a constant thorn in Boehner's side—joked to fellow conservatives that he wanted to issue a formal apology to the former speaker. Having experienced Ryan's tight grip on the House, Jones said, he now viewed Boehner as a legend—a remark that elicited laughs but also murmurs of agreement in the room. Since then, the idea of conservatives writing an apology letter to Boehner has become a running joke on the right. "He's more controlling than Boehner ... and I voted against John Boehner and worked with Mark Meadows to vacate the chair," Jones said. "I'm very dissatisfied. I've been here 22 years and this is the most closed shop I've ever seen."

Even so, there is no comparing the two speakers at this point. Whereas Boehner had lost all goodwill with conservatives by the time of his exit, Ryan today has strong allies on the right—even if there are an equal number of detractors. "I think Ryan has done a good job," said Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker. "He to this day has my full, 100 percent support. ... He has to herd all these different factions and people on a daily basis, and I respect that."

Ryan and his team have operated under the assumption that if Republicans enact the first tax overhaul in 30 years, much of the frustration will wane — and partywide euphoria at the realization of their first major legislative victory will make the year-end, bipartisan deals easier to swallow. But rank-and-file members aren't so sure. And they worry that Ryan's tunnel vision on tax reform has weakened the GOP's negotiating hand against the Democrats. During a recent meeting with elders of the RSC, Rep. Tom Graves, a senior member on the Appropriations Committee, argued that a "mystic, hypnotic fog of tax reform" had crippled the conference over the past two months, "paralyzing" Republicans from creating an effective spending strategy to advance other Trump priorities.

That concern has echoed throughout the conference in recent weeks. Many House Republicans fear they will be forced to back a massive spending package that drives up the deficit—and an immigration compromise antithetical to the beliefs of the party base. During a meeting in Ryan's office in early November, Rep. Warren Davidson, the Ohio Republican who replaced Boehner and promptly joined the Freedom Caucus, held up the speaker's "Better Way" pamphlet from 2016 and told him: "There is no 'DACA amnesty play' in the playbook."

Hoping to assuage these concerns, Ryan last week summoned representatives from the conference's various factions to meet and come up with a unifying plan ahead of the December 22 deadline to fund the government. The resulting strategy, one that Ryan pledged to execute, has House Republicans sending a funding bill to the Senate next week that includes GOP priorities, such as increased Pentagon funding, but nothing for Democrats—and then leaving town and daring Senate Democrats to vote no. (It's a difficult promise to keep, since McConnell needs at least eight Democratic votes to approve any deal—not to mention that the Senate is accustomed to jamming the House, not the other way around.)

Ryan can see the storm clouds gathering. But people close to him insist he would never quit mid-Congress, even if passing tax reform into law provides the perfect opportunity to walk away—and even if recent accounts of sexual misconduct among House members have made the job even more stressful. (Two friends say Ryan was visibly shaken after demanding that Arizona Rep. Trent Franks resign his seat, telling them, "I didn't realize slitting throats was part of my job.")

Two friends say Ryan was visibly shaken after demanding that Arizona Rep. Trent Franks resign his seat, telling them, "I didn't realize slitting throats was part of my job."

Even though few members believe Ryan's job is truly in jeopardy, the whispers of his not-far-off retirement have sent various constituencies scrambling to prepare for a shake up. Members loyal to Scalise have urged him to have a candid discussion with McCarthy about his inability to unify the conference, while McCarthy's allies have urged him to line up the president's support so it's ready at a moment's notice. Some neutral parties think Scalise has the inside track—that Trump's backing won't be enough to put him over the top, and that Scalise's already-high stock has skyrocketed since he survived an assassination attempt in June. But the Freedom Caucus will be focused less on personalities than process: As in 2015, conservative members are drafting various demands in exchange for the next speaker to win their votes.

This will cause eyes to roll in some quarters of the conference. But the reality is that while Ryan would surely win a hypothetical near-term battle over his speakership, the Freedom Caucus is already winning the war. This is simple math: Because of its size and willingness to vote as a bloc, the Freedom Caucus will almost certainly provide the margin to crown the next speaker. And assuming Republicans lose seats next year—with swing-district moderates the first to fall—the conservatives will have even more leverage over GOP leadership in the coming Congress.

In a period of particular tension a few months back, one conservative member presented Meadows with a fake draft of a motion to vacate the chair. It was meant to make light of what conservatives viewed as their sorry situation in that moment: nine months into a unified Republican government, and still without a single legislative victory. Meadows told the member the prank was "not funny." But to some members, the prospect of taking out Ryan clearly isn't a joke. It only takes one of them, eager to antagonize the leadership and win lots of headlines, to file the motion and plunge the House into temporary chaos.

The question at that point becomes how hard Ryan is willing to fight to retain his speakership—and how forcefully other Republicans come to his defense. When Meadows made his attempt on Boehner, dozens of allies rushed to the former speaker's office to strategize, demanding an immediate vote to show their strength. Ryan, who keeps a small circle of close friends, does not have any comparable apparatus of longtime loyalists determined to protect him—nor does he view his legacy in Congress as inextricably tied to the position of speaker of the House.

"You've got to remember, I'm the only guy in the modern era who didn't want this job," Ryan told POLITICO Magazine this fall. "I did this because I had to do it. And I'm happy and I'm grateful for the job and it's a great honor. And I feel like I was made for this moment. So I'm good with it. But I'm not a person who covets it. And I never was. So I always feel liberated by that."

Whenever Ryan exits, familiar questions will resurface about whether the Republican Party is governable—and whether, in Congress, there will ever be a leader capable of uniting its tribes. Congress runs on relationships: Boehner was personally popular among members, even those who voted against his initiatives, and the same can largely be said for Ryan. But this is no longer seems sufficient. Dissension in the House Republican ranks is explained not by incompatible personalities, but rather by a fundamental disconnect between the leadership and the rank and file over questions of legislative involvement and procedural transparency. Whoever wishes to succeed Ryan would do well to realize it. During a conference meeting last week, Raúl Labrador of Idaho, a founding member of the Freedom Caucus, ripped into the leadership. "It's not that we don't like you," he said to McCarthy, who stood at the podium. "It's that we don't trust you."

Farenthold won't seek reelection Back

By Elena Schneider | 12/14/2017 10:19 AM EDT

Rep. Blake Farenthold said Thursday he will not seek reelection after facing mounting allegations of sexual harassment and other inappropriate behavior from former staff members.

In a video posted on his Facebook page, the Texas Republican acknowledged that his office "accommodated destructive gossip, off-hand comments, off-color jokes and behavior, in general, that was less than professional."

"I had never served in public office before. I had no idea how to run a congressional office," Farenthold said. "And as a result, I allowed a workplace culture to take root in my office that was too permissive and decidedly unprofessional."

His comments comes after the House Ethics Committee opened an investigation into the harassment allegations and as former staff members have begun speaking out about his conduct.

Farenthold spoke with House Speaker Paul Ryan twice on Wednesday and met with National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Steve Stivers, according to GOP sources familiar with the conversations.

Farenthold has come under harsh scrutiny for using taxpayer money to settle a 2014 lawsuit brought by a former staffer over allegations of gender discrimination, sexual harassment and creating a hostile work environment.

Lauren Greene, the former aide, said the Texas Republican told another staffer in the office that he had "sexual fantasies" and "wet dreams" about her — and that she could wear shirts that showed her nipples anytime she wanted.

The 55-year-old married congressman, who was first elected in 2010, again denied the accusations Thursday.

"I want to be perfectly clearly: The charges that were made are false," he said.

Farenthold added that he and his family initially decided over Thanksgiving to run for reelection, but that the renewed focus on Greene's allegations had "become a political distraction" and that his "constituents deserve better."

Greene, who received $84,000 from a congressional fund used for resolving workplace disputes, told POLITICO that she found herself blackballed on Capitol Hill and unable to land full-time work after she raised concerns about the hostile work environment.

Other former aides have also spoken out about an abusive atmosphere in Farenthold's office in recent days.

Michael Rekola, who served as Farenthold's communications director in 2015, told CNN that Farenthold berated aides and often told sexually explicit jokes. Ahead of his wedding, Rekola said Farenthold warned him in front of other staffers: "Better have your fiancée blow you before she walks down the aisle - it will be the last time."

Elizabeth Peace, another former communications staffer, told CNN the four-term congressman regularly referred to aides as "fucktards."

Asked at a news conference Thursday whether Farenthold should resign immediately, Ryan demurred.

"I think he's making the right decision to retire," Ryan told reporters. "There are new stories that are very disconcerting. Unacceptable behavior has been alleged in those stories, and I think he's made the right decision that he's going to be leaving Congress."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi told reporters that the staffers' accusations are "shocking" and "unacceptable," and that he should resign rather than retire.

"I respect Congressman Farenthold's decision and thank him for his service," Stivers said in a statement, adding, "The NRCC is confident we will hold this seat."

Farenthold represents a red-tinted south Texas seat, and had already attracted primary challengers before his decision to not seek reelection. Michael Cloud, member of the Texas Republican Executive Committee, launched a bid in October. Bech Bruun, former Texas Water Development Board chairman, is also expected to get into the race.

Texas, Florida lawmakers say next disaster-aid package must help farmers Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 12/14/2017 11:48 AM EDT

Florida and Texas lawmakers are urging appropriators to help farmers and ranchers in the next multibillion-dollar disaster-relief package, which Congress was expected to pass as part of a year-end government spending deal.

"A supplemental crafted to help our states recover from historic hurricane damage would be insufficient if it fails to address the needs of our farm and ranch families," the Florida and Texas delegations wrote in a letter Wednesday to House and Senate appropriations leaders. "Many farm and ranch families are trying to secure financing right now and should be planting within a month's time. For these families, waiting longer for help is not an option."

Specifically, the lawmakers are requesting that the disaster-relief package address backlogs in USDA recovery programs, including in the Emergency Conservation Program, as well as ease certain requirements under the Livestock Indemnity Program and the Emergency Assistance for Livestock, Honey Bees and Farm-raised Fish program.

The lawmakers also requested "targeted" financial assistance for farmers, particularly those who grow commodities like vegetables that aren't widely covered by crop insurance.

A top USDA official recently told Congress that the department needs nearly $1 billion in disaster-relief funding following this year's devastating hurricanes and wildfires.

But with little more than a week to go until the Dec. 22 deadline when government funding expires, lawmakers are still negotiating details of the next round of disaster aid, stirring anxiety that the package could be punted another month.

The letter was signed by 54 members of Congress, all of whom represent Florida or Texas except for House Agriculture Committee members David Scott (D-Ga.), Austin Scott (R-Ga.) and Del. Stacey Plaskett (D-V.I.).

Western Values Project pressures three Republicans on public lands Back

By Elena Schneider | 12/14/2017 05:00 AM EDT

The Western Values Project released internal polling and announced a TV, digital and radio ad campaign in three House seats, urging members to "stop the attacks on public lands," one of the TV ads states.

The ads target Republicans: battleground Arizona Rep. Martha McSally, Oregon Rep. Greg Walden and Washington Rep. Jaime Herrera Beutler.

"In the heart of the West, 2 million acres of protected public lands just got wiped off the map, selling off American heritage," the TV ad's narrator says. "Now elites in Washington have their sights set on Arizona."

Polling conducted by Global Strategy Group show that a majority of voters in all three districts oppose legislation to shrink national monuments in Utah.

In Arizona, McSally holds a 3-point lead against a generic Democrat. But when "asked to consider a scenario where she votes to reduce the size of the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante national monuments," McSally drops to 38 percent support to a generic Democrat with 50 percent, according to the polling memo. In Oregon, Walden favorability also dropped by 5 points "if he votes for legislation to rescind federal land protections," the memo said.

"This was catalyzed by the Trump administration's effort to shrink monuments in Utah," said Chris Saeger, executive director of the Western Values Project. "There are a lot of reasons to believe Congress will aid and abet that, and we want them to know that their constituents will put them on notice for it."

Haley says U.S. has evidence Iran is violating UN resolution Back

By Louis Nelson | 12/14/2017 01:57 PM EDT

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Nikki Haley, standing before military debris that she claimed to be of Iranian origin, offered Thursday what she presented as "indisputable" evidence of Iran's UN resolution-violating actions in the Middle East.

"The nuclear deal has done nothing to moderate the regime's conduct in other areas. Aid from Iran's revolutionary guard to dangerous militias and terror groups is increasing," Haley said at a press conference at Joint Base Andrews, where reporters were invited to inspect the evidence on display behind her. "Its ballistic missile and advanced weapons are turning up in war zones across the region. It's hard to find a conflict or a terrorist group in the Middle East that does not have Iran's fingerprints all over it."

Haley's accusations were the latest in a series of actions the Trump administration has taken to try to raise international pressure on Iran, including ramping up sanctions on the Islamist regime in Tehran.

Trump's critics warn such moves could lead to an eventual military confrontation between Washington and Tehran, and some say the U.S. rhetoric and actions on Iran have echoes of the Bush administration's build-up to the invasion of Iraq.

Still, although most of the international community supports keeping the Iran nuclear deal intact, there is growing concern among U.S. allies in Europe and beyond about Iran's non-nuclear activities in the Middle East.

The U.S. ambassador said Thursday that the debris she offered as proof of Iran's inflammatory behavior was not directly related to the nuclear deal but was a violation of UN Security Council resolution 2231, which, among other provisions, prohibits Iran from progressing its ballistic missile program in certain ways and bans Iran from weapons transfers.

"We have said everything doesn't have to be tied to the nuclear deal, but it does have to be tied to the security council resolutions. This is blatant violation of what they are not supposed to be doing," Haley said. "Everybody has tip-toed around Iran in fear of them getting out of the nuclear deal, and they are allowing missiles like this to be fired over to innocent civilians."

Last October, President Donald Trump announced that he would decertify Iran's compliance with the Iran nuclear deal but not pull the U.S. out of it, declaring that the Islamic Republic had not lived up to "the spirit of the deal," in part because of its non-nuclear activities.

Behind Haley on Thursday was debris that she said included a rocket with distinctive features that only Iranian models have that she said had been fired by Houthi rebels in Yemen at a commercial airport in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. Also included in the display, Haley said, was material from an anti-tank guided missile, an explosive boat and a so-called "kamikaze drone," all of which she claimed had parts from Iran.

Some of the material had been declassified by the U.S. government, which Haley noted was an unusual step, and presented to the UN secretary general, whose report on Iran's actions Haley cited in her remarks.

Houthi rebels, increasingly backed by Iran, have been engaged in a brutal conflict with the Yemeni government and the Saudi military that is backing it. The Yemeni civil war is widely considered a humanitarian disaster and a proxy war against the Iranian government, with significant civilian casualties inflicted by Saudi forces, who have been backed by their U.S. counterparts.

Haley said the U.S. would invite every member of Congress to view the debris as well as every member of the UN Security Council. Beyond building a "coalition" to put increased pressure on Iran, she offered little in terms of concrete steps.

"What I've seen from our foreign partners is that...now they actually see that the president was right," Haley said. "Now they see that yes, there are problems. Yes, there are other activities because they're feeling it in their own countries."

Republican civil war erupts anew Back

By Eliana Johnson and Alex Isenstadt | 12/13/2017 06:39 PM EDT

Democrat Doug Jones' victory in Alabama — far from settling the score between the McConnell and Bannon wings of the Republican Party — instead touched off another round of internecine GOP infighting over who's to blame for the party's loss in one of the most conservative states in the country.

From the outset, the race served as a proxy war between the tight-lipped Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, a paragon of the party establishment, and Steve Bannon, the former White House chief strategist who has dedicated himself to disrupting everything McConnell represents.

Now, both sides are blaming the other for Tuesday's loss, with each painting the results as a case study in the other's political ineptitude. Bannon has argued from the outset that Republican leaders have positioned themselves against the president, determined to thwart his agenda. But McConnell and his allies are using Tuesday's results to tell the president — whom Bannon helped to cajole into the race on Moore's behalf — that his former chief strategist is a political liability.

Jones' victory "unmasked Steve Bannon's incompetence," said Josh Holmes, a former McConnell chief of staff and top political adviser. "What has been exposed here is that Steve Bannon has been the most harmful person to the Trump presidency in all of politics — Republican or Democrat."

Karl Rove told Fox News that Bannon, despite the hype about his political genius, did little more in Alabama than rant and rave "about the so-called establishment in Washington. Not a winning message."

Bannon, naturally, is unbowed, refusing to take any responsibility for ceding what looked like an impossible-to-lose seat in the Deep South. He has told associates that the Alabama results are a case study in McConnell's malpractice.

"Team Mitch did everything in their power to endanger our majority in the Senate and threaten the passage of the Trump agenda by ensuring the outcome that we saw last night," said Andy Surabian, a spokesman for Bannon, who went on to accuse the Senate majority leader of gloating "about the fact that the Republican nominee in Alabama was defeated."

Prior to the election, McConnell told associates that he wanted to destroy Bannon politically, according to one person familiar with the Republican leader's thinking. Their goal: to curtail his influence ahead of the 2018 midterms, in which Bannon has vowed to recruit candidates to knock off McConnell-backed incumbents.

Bannon is supporting Danny Tarkanian, who has vowed to unseat Nevada's Republican senator, Dean Heller, as well as former New York congressman and ex-convict Michael Grimm, who is trying to recapture his old House seat.

McConnell hopes Tuesday's outcome will put a dent in those efforts. His allies argue that Bannon is a charlatan — a man who has sold himself to the president as the guru of the Trump movement who possesses a preternatural understanding of the president's political base only to drive the president into a ditch in Alabama.

"Bannon hurt Trump by giving him poor advice," said Scott Reed, a political strategist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The results in Alabama, Reed said, "hurt the Trump movement."

The faceoff over the Alabama race is the latest iteration of the bitter infighting that has dominated the Republican Party since the rise of the tea party in 2010, and that reached an apex last year with the election of Donald Trump, a Bannon-backed outsider loathed by politicians in both parties.

Trump's victory did little to settle the debate over who controls in the GOP. In fact, the president now appears to be caught in a tug-of-war between McConnell and his establishment allies, some of whom urged him to endorse Sen. Luther Strange in Alabama's Republican primary, and Bannon, who eventually persuaded him to intervene on Moore's behalf.

It was an appeal from Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker that ultimately persuaded the president to campaign in Alabama on Strange's behalf. Trump even placed a cold call to Ward Baker, the former executive director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, before doing so. When Baker told Trump that Strange was, in fact, in real trouble, the president decided to intervene.

But he didn't heed the same establishment voices, including his own political advisers, who urged him to stay out of the general election after Strange's defeat. He also rejected private appeals both from his daughter Ivanka and his son-in-law, Jared Kushner, who urged him to keep his distance from Moore.

That said, Bannon's prods haven't been siren calls for the president, either. Though he has continued to flout Republican leaders, feuding with McConnell publicly on his Twitter feed, he has also signaled that he will not join Bannon's efforts to unseat several Senate incumbents, privately offering his support to Mississippi's Roger Wicker, Wyoming's John Barrasso, and Nebraska's Deb Fischer.

Privately, Republicans on Wednesday conceded that both sides were to blame for the fiasco in Alabama. Though some Senate Republicans privately breathed a sigh of relief at Moore's loss — few were eager to embrace him as a colleague — they also suggested that McConnell's insistence on backing Strange, rather than popular Republican Rep. Mo Brooks, who also ran in the GOP primary, was shortsighted.

But in hidden corners of Washington, including at the NRSC, Republicans were quietly celebrating Moore's defeat — itself a sign of a party in crisis and a president unlikely to come to the rescue.

DOJ fuels doubts about integrity of Mueller probe Back

By Darren Samuelsohn | 12/14/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Amid a rising drumbeat of Republican criticism of special counsel Robert Mueller's Russia probe, members of Congress and former prosecutors say the Justice Department has amped up the pressure by quietly putting out information bolstering claims that the investigation is unfairly biased against President Donald Trump.

Through a series of small and sometimes subtle moves, DOJ's actions appear to run counter to the goal of keeping Mueller's probe free of political meddling.

Now that Mueller's investigation has reached into Trump's White House — former national security adviser Michael Flynn pleaded guilty earlier this month and is cooperating with the Russia investigators — some say the department is playing both sides of the high-stakes investigation.

"I think that it appears to me that DOJ leadership is doing what it can to please their boss, which is ultimately the president of the United States," said Renato Mariotti, a former federal prosecutor. "They're doing whatever they can to please him without violating the law."

The latest example came earlier this week when Justice officials convened a small media briefing for a select group of reporters who were shown private text messages sent between two investigators who formerly served on Mueller's team.

That briefing — held in the midst of an ongoing inspector general investigation, and reportedly offered to the press before members of the House panel had seen the messages — was described as "very odd and unprofessional" by Samuel Buell, a former assistant U.S. attorney and Duke University law school professor.

"It shouldn't surprise anyone that there are people in the political appointee realm at DOJ who are rooting for Mueller to fail," said Buell. "That doesn't mean they are going to be prepared to actually try to derail him. It all merits vigilance."

A DOJ spokeswoman said Wednesday that the FBI agents' lawyers were notified of the disclosure and career Justice officials evaluated the messages as well to be sure they could be released "under both ethical and legal standards." She also explained that DOJ delivered the text messages to lawmakers before they were released to the press.

Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein said at a House Judiciary Committee hearing on Wednesday that the DOJ inspector general had also cleared the way for the messages' public release.

The early release of the FBI agents' text messages isn't the only DOJ move that has offered Mueller's critics new ammunition.

Earlier this month, DOJ acknowledged it was taking the unusual step of making Mueller tack on an additional $3.5 million in costs in his first budget report - almost doubling the probe's total spending to $6.7 million - so it could reflect wider department operations that are going toward the Russia investigation.

The Justice Department said the additional funding wasn't required to be disclosed by law, and it also explained that it hadn't made previous special counsels include those kinds of figures.

That larger price tag nonetheless fit nicely into the attacks leveled by critics who say Mueller has a blank check to investigate Trump. Former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon has urged the president to go after the special counsel through his budget, and Trump jumped in Tuesday with a Twitter post chastising the "thousands of hours wasted and many millions of dollars spent" digging into alleged Russian meddling in the 2016 election.

Other unusual Justice Department moves include Rosenstein's vague media statement in June casting doubt on anonymous sources in news stories just as the Washington Post and New York Times were reporting Mueller had determined Trump was the subject of an obstruction of justice investigation.

And DOJ has opened Mueller up to questions by refusing to disclose details on the process that led up to the special counsel being granted an ethics waiver to serve as special counsel after working as a partner at WilmerHale, a private law firm that originally represented two critical figures in the case: former Trump campaign manager Paul Manafort and White House senior adviser and Trump son-in-law Jared Kushner.

"The conspiratorial side of me thinks somebody at Justice is not giving you the explanation for the waiver because they want to create the impression that Robert Mueller has a problem when Robert Mueller doesn't have a problem," said Richard Painter, a former White House ethics lawyer under President George W. Bush. "This is going to lead to Fox News conspiracy talk."

He called DOJ "sloppy" for not releasing under the Freedom of Information Act to POLITICO more details about why Mueller got a green light to lead the Russia probe.

The Justice Department also didn't come to Mueller's defense in late October when Republicans accused the special counsel's office as being the potential source of a CNN story teasing the first indictments in the whole Russia case. The cable network's story, citing "sources briefed on the matter," dominated a 48-hour period of weekend news before a federal court in Washington ultimately unsealed the charges.

"It is kind of ironic that the people in charge of investigating the law and executing the law would violate the law," South Carolina GOP Rep. Trey Gowdy, the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said on Fox News that weekend. A DOJ spokeswoman later told Newsweek that the matter had been referred to the department's inspector general for investigation.

Mueller won bipartisan praise with his appointment in May, but that didn't last long. By June, Trump surrogates were castigating the special counsel over his purported friendship with the ousted FBI Director James Comey - their associates denied there was any significant personal relationship - and the campaign contributions his staff had largely given to Democrats.

The complaints about Mueller have only grown as his investigation has accelerated.

On Air Force One last Friday, freshman Florida GOP Rep. Matt Gaetz said he warned Trump that Mueller's team was "infected with bias" against the president and the country was at risk of a "coup d'etat" because of the investigation. A Wall Street Journal editorial published last week suggested it was time for Mueller to "step down in favor of someone more credible."

Paul Rosenzweig, a former George W. Bush-era Homeland Security official and senior counsel from the Kenneth Starr investigation into President Bill Clinton, said he sees the recent onslaught of criticism as Trump "laying the groundwork for firing Mueller." DOJ officials, he added, are in a tough spot as they try to uphold their mandate of impartial justice while serving under a president who has blurred the lines between his administration and the nation's law enforcement apparatus.

"I do tend to think they're under pressure. They're making some judgment calls that are challenging," said Rosenzweig, a senior fellow at the R Street Institute, a free market think tank. "This is one of those cases where they can't win from losing no matter what they do."

In his public testimony Wednesday in the House, Rosenstein sought to defend Mueller -- who consistently declines comment on even the most basic of questions about his investigation's scope and status -- against a barrage of fastball questions.

The deputy attorney general said he backed Mueller up on his decision to immediately dismiss FBI agent Peter Strzok from the Russia investigation this summer after his anti-Trump texts were uncovered as part of a separate inspector general investigation. He also pushed back at the criticism that multiple members of Mueller's team could not be impartial prosecutors because they'd donated to Democrats.

Still, Rosenstein left open plenty of room for Mueller's critics. He repeatedly skirted answering specific questions about his interactions with the special counsel, or how frequently he's spoken to President Trump about the Russia investigation.

He also gave Republicans a glimmer of hope by pledging to evaluate their calls for the appointment of another investigator.

Rosenstein also faced several questions from Democrats seeking an explanation about why reporters had gotten access to Strzok's text messages before the hearing.

"I was amazed" by the disclosure, said Rep. Jamie Raskin, a Maryland Democrat who noted DOJ's policy is typically to reject public release of any material related to an ongoing investigation.

Across the Capitol, California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, the top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, also said the Justice Department had played directly into Republican hands by sharing the FBI agents' text messages with reporters before the hearing.

"Well, they were used for propaganda purposes," she said. "And I think there is an ongoing effort to malign both Mr. Bob Mueller and the work that the special counsel's office is doing. And I think it's very precise. I think they're going to grab at every single thing to diminish it, to demean it, and it shows me that there's fear out there about what they might come up with."

But Feinstein said she didn't think the Justice Department itself was behind the efforts. "No, these are efforts in the Republican party, Fox News, others -- to demean Bob Mueller," she said.

Rosenstein said DOJ got the inquiry for the text messages from Congress and then made the decision to put them out with the press. "Generally speaking our goal is to be as forthcoming with the media as we can when it's lawful and appropriate to do so," he said.

Republican set to propose harassment response overhaul Back

By Elana Schor | 12/14/2017 01:50 PM EDT

The House Administration Committee's GOP chairman is set to propose a draft bill next week that would overhaul the chamber's system for handling workplace harassment complaints amid a drumbeat of bipartisan calls for change.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Gregg Harper (R-Miss.) said his forthcoming proposal would "focus on all aspects of" the 1995 law that created Capitol Hill's current rules for policing misconduct at the office, "including the reporting and settlement process."

Sexual misconduct allegations forced three lawmakers to resign and two more to retire in recent weeks, with Rep. Ruben Kihuen (D-Nev.) facing pressure from some colleagues to follow,

Harper's committee has held two hearings examining Capitol Hill's harassment policy. Members of both parties have criticized the current system, which shields the identities of offices that use taxpayer money to settle complaints, as too secretive and prone to deterring victims from coming forward.

Rep. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.) and Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) have offered legislation that would end the requirement for congressional employees alleging harassment to undergo counseling and mediation, as well as require lawmakers to personally pay if they are found liable for harassment, in addition to other changes.

It's unclear how much Harper's forthcoming draft legislation would incorporate from those proposals — Speier has 19 Republican cosponsors, while Gillibrand has yet to draw Democratic backers for her version.

Subject: Afternoon Energy: TransCanada asks Nebraska commission to reconsider — EPA to publish rejection of biofuel change — Supreme Court opts out of tribal groundwater case

TRANSCANADA: PLEASE RECONSIDER: TransCanada asked Nebraska regulators to reconsider their decision approving an alternate route through the state for its Keystone XL pipeline. The company filed a motion to reconsider Friday in an effort to get the Nebraska Public Service Commission to "to address some questions that were raised by" its Nov. 20 approval of a new path for the pipeline that differed from TransCanada's preferred route, according to company spokesman Terry Cunha. "It is not an attempt by TransCanada to have the PSC alter its approval of the Alternative Mainline route," he said.

TransCanada asked the PSC to "consider Keystone's filing of an amended application in accordance with the findings of the Commission that the Mainline Alternative Route is in the public interest," according to the filing. Nebraska landowners filed their own motion on Saturday demanding the PSC hold oral arguments on TransCanada's request, saying the company sought to file a new application "because it realizes there was no mechanism to approve the Mainline Alternative Route as occurred." Both motions were posted online today. TransCanada has not made a final decision on whether to build the pipeline and is continuing to study the implications of the PSC's decision. Ben Lefebvre reports more here.

RISKY BUSINESS: The risk assessments TransCanada provided to regulators before it began operating the existing Keystone pipeline substantially underestimated how much and how often the pipeline would leak in the U.S., documents reviewed by Reuters found. The 2,147-mile system from Alberta to the Texas coast "has had three significant leaks in the United States since it began operating in 2010, including a 5,000-barrel spill this month in rural South Dakota, and two others, each about 400 barrels, in South Dakota in 2016 and North Dakota in 2011," Reuters reports. But TransCanada's spill risk assessment estimated the chance of a leak of more than 50 barrels to be "not more than once every seven to 11 years over the entire length of the pipeline in the United States," according to its South Dakota operating permit. In South Dakota alone, the estimate was for a "spill no more than once every 41 years," Reuters reports. Read more.

MAKE IT OFFICIAL: EPA will publish on Tuesday its official rejection of a biofuel change request led by refining giant Valero Energy, according to the pre-publication Federal Register. The petitioners sought to expand the number of companies that must show compliance with the Renewable Fuel Standard, but the EPA said they had not shown how a change to the point of obligation would make the program more effective, Eric Wolff reports. "EPA believes that a change in the point of obligation would unnecessarily increase the complexity of the program and undermine the success of the RFS program, especially in the short term, as a result of increasing instability and uncertainty in programmatic obligations," the agency said in its filing. "We believe that the current structure of the RFS program is working to incentivize the production, distribution, and use of renewable transportation fuels in the United States."

COURT DECLINES TRIBAL GROUNDWATER CASE: The Supreme Court passed on making any decisions today in the legal battle over tribal groundwater rights, leaving in place a previous ruling from the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. That court ruled — based on the 1908 Winters doctrine — that Native Americans are entitled to rights to the groundwater beneath their reservations. The immediate dispute involves the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians in California and two water districts in the state. Alex Guillén reports more here.

WELLS FARGO: INDEPENDENT REFINERS DOING FINE UNDER RFS:

Independent refiners are making money on biofuels credits, called Renewable Identification Numbers, under the Renewable Fuel Standard. "In what may be a surprise to some, most Independent Refiners now enjoy a net benefit from Renewable Identification Numbers (RINs), based on our analysis," Wells Fargo analysts Roger Read and Lauren Hendrix wrote in a research note. "Consumers now bear the majority of RINs costs — like a tax." The analysis undercuts arguments from refiners who claimed high credit prices have been hurting their bottom lines. But it also supports the argument from big oil companies that consumers are paying the costs of the program. Ethanol backers say it depends on who you define as a consumer. "The consumer in this case is the wholesale purchaser of gasoline blendstock — not the retail consumer," said Geoff Cooper, a vice president for the Renewable Fuels Association. "The RIN cost is effectively erased when the gasoline blendstock is combined with ethanol (which comes with a RIN credit) to make the finished fuel (E10) that is sold at retail."

ACC BACKS HEITKAMP, BARRASSO: The American Chemistry Council, which last week began airing ads in support of Sens. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) and Dean Heller (R-Nev.), is planning to air ads supporting North Dakota Sen. Heidi Heitkamp and Wyoming Sen. John Barrasso, according to FEC disclosures. The group is spending $571,000 on ads supporting Stabenow, $590,000 for Heller, $153,000 for Heitkamp and $133,000 for Barrasso. FRANKEN APOLOGIZES: Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) today once again apologized over groping allegations he faces from multiple women. "It's been clear that there are some women — and one is too many — who feel that I have done something disrespectful and it's hurt them and for that, I am tremendously sorry," Franken, a member of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, told reporters outside his Senate office. "I know that I am going to have to be much more conscious when in these circumstances, much more careful, much more sensitive, and that this will not happen again going forward." POLITICO's Seung Min Kim reports more here.

MICHIGAN, ENBRIDGE STEP UP SAFETY: Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder and oil company Enbridge today announced an agreement to boost safety procedures related to twin pipelines beneath Lakes Michigan and Huron, the Associated Press reports. The deal includes a "procedure for temporarily halting the flow of oil through the 5-mile-long underwater segment when storms cause sustained periods of high waves," as well as steps to allow faster detection and quicker response to a potential spill. "It also calls for a study to examine the possibility of digging a tunnel beneath the Straits of Mackinac through which the existing pipelines — or a new one — could be routed," AP writes.

DOE GIVES $99M TO EFRCs: Energy Secretary Rick Perry proposed $99 million for funding Energy Frontier Research Centers in fiscal 2018, the Energy Department announced today. The funds will help "accelerate transformative scientific advances for the most challenging topics in materials sciences, chemical sciences, geosciences, and biosciences," DOE said. Perry said in a statement the money will go toward helping "mobilize our top scientists in the effort to secure America's energy future." DOE also announced a competition for another round of funding, as the centers' support is set to expire in July 2018. "The competition will be open to proposals both from existing EFRCs seeking renewal of support and from institutions seeking to establish new EFRCs under the program," DOE said. Read the request here.

WATCHDOG FILES SUIT RELATED TO AG PRUITT: Watchdog group Campaign for Accountability today filed a lawsuit against Oklahoma state officials over the release of documents related to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's tenure as state attorney general. Filed in the District Court of Oklahoma County, the suit is against state Attorney General Mike Hunter and state Auditor and Inspector Gary Jones "for failing to release copies of audits and documents related to corruption allegations associated with the management of the Tar Creek Reclamation site in the state," CfA said in a release. During his previous job as AG of Oklahoma, Pruitt "declined to bring criminal charges in response to an audit that found evidence of criminal wrongdoing at the Tar Creek Reclamation site," CfA Executive Director Daniel Stevens said. "Why did he refuse to bring charges? We don't know because the Oklahoma Attorney General's office has repeatedly refused to release documents related to this audit." Read the complaint here.

ABOUT THAT TIME TAKEOVER: The Koch brothers' $650 million investment supporting Meredith Corporation's takeover of Time Inc. — which a Koch spokesman on Sunday night described as "passive" — is being met with skepticism, POLITICO's Michael Calderone and Jason Schwartz report. For one, John Huey, a former Time Inc. editor in chief, told POLITICO that "it's difficult to believe the Kochs would pay a premium to buy into the print media model without the hope that they can harness Time and Fortune to further their agenda." More on that here.

HALLIBURTON TERMINATES LOBBYING REGISTRATION: Oil services company Halliburton has terminated its lobbying registration, POLITICO Influence reports. The company has spent $330,000 on lobbying this year and employed two in-house lobbyists, Bob Moran and Jessica Franks. Halliburton continues to retain the S-3 Group and Jackson Lewis, according to lobbying disclosure reports, although the latter firm hasn't actively lobbied for Halliburton since last year.

Keystone XL pipeline wins green light in Nebraska — but may face new hurdles Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/20/2017 11:25 AM EDT

Nebraska regulators approved the Keystone XL pipeline Monday, but only if it is built along a new path that may force the project developer to jump through a new set of regulatory hoops.

The 3-2 vote by the Nebraska Public Service Commission gave the green light to a different route than the one preferred by Keystone developer TransCanada, moving it east to run partially alongside the original Keystone pipeline and through a portion of the state's ecologically sensitive Sandhills area as well across the Ogallala Aquifer.

The Trump administration is evaluating whether it would have to re-approve the controversial pipeline to account for the new route. But activists who have spent the better part of a decade fighting to block Keystone said the decision throws the whole project into jeopardy, while TransCanada, the company seeking to build the project, said only that it is evaluating its next steps.

"This decision today throws the entire project into a huge legal question mark," said Jane Kleeb, the activist who led the opposition to the pipeline and who is now Nebraska Democratic Party chair. "TransCanada will have to go back to the State Department because that route has never been reviewed by the feds."

The State Department said it is reviewing the PSC decision for just such a possibility.

"We won't know about any impacts until we learn precisely the extent of any changes, something we are currently engaged in," State Department spokesman Vincent Campos said.

TransCanada President and CEO Russ Girling said the company "will conduct a careful review of the Public Service Commission's ruling while assessing how the decision would impact the cost and schedule of the project."

Former President Barack Obama had blocked the permits for the pipeline in 2015, citing the oil sands' impact on climate change, but President Donald Trump quickly reversed that decision after taking office. Keystone XL is designed to transport up to 830,000 barrels per day of crude from Canada's oil sands and North Dakota's shale fields to oil refineries on the Gulf Coast.

The Nebraska PSC vote comes as TransCanada adds new crews to its cleanup operations in South Dakota, where the original Keystone Pipeline ruptured last week and released 210,000 gallons of oil. But Nebraska law bars the regulators from considering spills or pipeline safety in its decision-making process.

Environmentalists and landowners who opposed Keystone XL's construction have promised to try to overturn the commission's decision.

"We will appeal," Kleeb said. "We will challenge a foreign corporation being given eminent domain in the county courts, with every intent to bring it to the Supreme Court if needed."

Even with the approval, the project, whose costs to build the nearly 1,200 mile artery have ballooned to $8 billion, is still not ready to be built since TransCanada is gauging the economics of the huge investment. Though prices for oil have rebounded moderately in recent months, and while TransCanada has said demand for space on the pipeline is strong, it's not yet clear that enough companies will commit to the 20-year contracts required to reserve space on it.

The opposition to Keystone XL had been a rallying cry for green activists who have long said mining Canada's oil sands would be a disaster for global climate change, releasing vast amounts of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

But supporters have said tapping the oil fields in Alberta is no worse than the oil production in Venezuela, where much of the heavy sour crude that is shipped to U.S. refineries comes from now.

Many in the oil industry, however, no longer see the Keystone XL pipeline as crucial to the U.S. refineries as they once did, especially since the railroad sector stepped in to offer a more flexible — though more expensive — way to ship the oil.

"There's not going to be a parade thrown, although everyone in the industry is going to be grateful," said Tyler Nelson, an energy lobbyist for Cornerstone Government Affairs. "It should have been done years ago. But now a lot of people want it to be over with and done and move on."

The pipeline may struggle to succeed in the oil business. Energy markets have made the Alberta oil sands less attractive, with ExxonMobil, ConocoPhillips and others pulling out of the region to concentrate on U.S. oil shale development in Texas. Meanwhile, rival pipeline company Enbridge has expanded its pipeline system delivering Canadian crude to the U.S.

Critics have pointed to the recent shale oil boom as a reason that supply from the Canadian and North Dakota fields is in less demand, and they argue that much of the oil from Keystone XL could end up on tankers bound for export. U.S. oil production is on target to average more than 9 million barrels a day this year, nearly double what it was when TransCanada first proposed the massive pipeline.

If TransCanada gives its final approval to go ahead, construction would not start until 2019 at the earliest, Paul Miller, TransCanada's president of liquids pipelines, said during a conference call earlier this month.

The pipeline already is the focus of a court challenge stemming from Trump's State Department approving the project. A coalition of groups is arguing the State Department did not do due diligence before approving the cross-border pipeline in March. The case is still in the beginning stages, with a decision pending from the U.S. District Court of Montana on a Trump administration motion to dismiss.

TransCanada asks Nebraska regulators to reconsider Keystone XL route decision Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/27/2017 04:24 PM EDT

TransCanada asked Nebraska regulators to reconsider their decision approving an alternate route through the state for the Keystone XL pipeline, according to a new filing.

The company's motion to reconsider, filed Friday, is an effort to get the Nebraska Public Service Commission to "to address some questions that were raised by" its Nov. 20 approval of a new path for the pipeline that differed from TransCanada's preferred route, according to company spokesman Terry Cunha. "It is not an attempt by TransCanada to have the PSC alter its approval of the Alternative Mainline route," he said.

TransCanada asked the PSC to "consider Keystone's filing of an amended application in accordance with the findings of the Commission that the Mainline Alternative Route is in the public interest," according to the filing. Nebraska landowners filed their own motion on Saturday demanding the PSC hold oral arguments on TransCanada's request, saying the company sought to file a new application "because it realizes there was no mechanism to approve the Mainline Alternative Route as occurred." Both motions were posted online today.

TransCanada has not made a final decision on whether to build the pipeline and is continuing to study the implications of the PSC's decision. Project opponents say the company will need to secure new permits from the federal government if it decides to build along the new route.

WHAT'S NEXT: The landowners said Nebraska state law requires the PSC to schedule oral arguments on TransCanada's motion.

EPA set to publish official rejection of biofuel change Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/27/2017 12:53 PM EDT

EPA will publish on Tuesday its official rejection of a request to expand the number of companies that must show compliance with the Renewable Fuel Standard, according to the pre-publication Federal Register released today.

The agency said petitioners, led by refining giant Valero Energy, had not shown how the change to the "point of obligation" would make the program more effective.

"EPA believes that a change in the point of obligation would unnecessarily increase the complexity of the program and undermine the success of the RFS program, especially in the short term, as a result of increasing instability and uncertainty in programmatic obligations," the agency said in its filing. "We believe that the current structure of the RFS program is working to incentivize the production, distribution, and use of renewable transportation fuels in the United States."

The publication brings to a close the battle to make the RFS change that was aggressively pushed by billionaire Carl Icahn, an adviser to President Donald Trump and the owner of a refining company that would benefit from the change.

POLITICO first reported that the petition would be denied in August.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA is expected to publish the blending requirements for biofuel in 2018 and 2019 no later than Thursday, which is the legal deadline.

Supreme Court won't hear tribal groundwater appeal Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/27/2017 10:03 AM EDT

The Supreme Court today declined to get involved in a legal battle over tribal groundwater rights.

The justices' decision leaves in place a ruling from the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals that concluded Native Americans are entitled to rights to the groundwater beneath their reservations. That ruling was based on the Winters doctrine, a 1908 Supreme Court ruling that concluded the federal government reserved water rights in creating tribal lands.

This was the first time that doctrine was expanded to include groundwater as well.

The immediate dispute was between the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians in California and two water districts in the state.

WHAT'S NEXT: Lower courts still have a variety of issues to hash out, including a storage space dispute, water quality measures and just how much groundwater the tribe can claim.

'Ashamed' Franken apologizes in Senate over groping allegations Back

By Seung Min Kim | 11/27/2017 01:50 PM EDT

Sen. Al Franken apologized again on Monday after multiple women accused the embattled Minnesota Democrat of groping them in recent years, adding that he is open to making the results of an ethics probe public.

Top Senate leaders and Franken himself have called for an investigation by the Senate Ethics Committee into his alleged behavior that prompted four women to come forward. Franken noted that he has not dealt with the ethics panel before, but he would be open to disclosing the results of any investigation.

"It's been clear that there are some women — and one is too many — who feel that I have done something disrespectful and it's hurt them and for that, I am tremendously sorry," Franken told reporters outside his Senate office. "I know that I am going to have to be much more conscious when in these circumstances, much more careful, much more sensitive, and that this will not happen again going forward."

Franken stressed again during his news conference that he recalls some of the encounters differently, such as a 2006 incident in which Leeann Tweeden said he kissed her without her consent. But he added: "I feel that you have to respect women's experience. And so I apologized to her, and I meant it."

The senator, now in his second term, said he is "embarrassed" and "ashamed."

"I know that I let a lot of people down: the people of Minnesota, my colleagues, my staff, my supporters and everyone who has counted on me to be a champion for women," he said. "So all of you, I just want to again say I'm sorry."

Koch brothers' 'passive' role in Time Inc. takeover met with skepticism Back

By Michael Calderone and Jason Schwartz | 11/27/2017 02:34 PM EDT

Charles and David Koch have actively promoted conservative and libertarian policies for years by pumping tens of millions of dollars into political campaigns, advocacy organizations, think tanks and university groups.

Yet the billionaire industrialists' $650 million investment supporting Meredith Corporation's takeover of Time Inc., the magazine giant behind titles like Time, Fortune, People and Sports

Illustrated, was characterized by a Koch spokesman on Sunday night as a "passive" one. And Meredith said in a release that Koch Equity Development — the Koch brothers' private equity arm involved in the deal — "will not have a seat" on its board and "will have no influence" on editorial or managerial operations.

Reports of the Koch brothers' role, or lack thereof, have been met with skepticism from journalists, media watchers and Koch chroniclers.

"I think, for them, they're always looking to exert influence in one way or another," Daniel Schulman, Mother Jones' deputy Washington bureau chief and Koch biographer, told POLITICO on Monday, "but I don't think they would have done this deal unless they thought it made good business sense. I'm just curious how the return side is going to work out for them and what their long-term strategy is, and these guys are nothing if not strategic."

Schulman suggested the Kochs could also be interested in the consumer data owned by Time Inc. and Meredith. Magazines are known for collecting information about their customers, which could be used to the benefit of the data analytics company controlled by the Koch network, i360.

Some Time veterans are also wary of the billionaires' motivations being purely business-related.

"The deal raises concerns if the Koch brothers intend to use Time as a vehicle for their ideological views from behind the scenes," said Richard Stengel, a former top Time editor and undersecretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs during the Obama administration. "It would be naive to think that just because the Koch brothers don't have a seat on the board that they wouldn't wield some kind of editorial influence."

John Huey, a former Time Inc. editor-in-chief, similarly told POLITICO that "it's difficult to believe the Kochs would pay a premium to buy into the print media model without the hope that they can harness Time and Fortune to further their agenda." Huey also said he agreed with former Wall Street Journal editor and Columbia professor Bill Grueskin, who compared the Kochs' "no influence" assurance to his former paper creating an "editorial independence committee" to keep Rupert Murdoch in check after he bought the paper in 2007. The media mogul quickly got his way.

Meredith, a Des Moines, Iowa-based publisher behind popular titles like Better Homes and Gardens and Shape, wasn't interested in newsier Time Inc. titles like Time and Fortune when it made a run at the publishing company a few years back. Some Time Inc. titles, like People, InStyle, Cooking Light and Southern Living, would seem the better fit for Meredith, given its portfolio is heavily focused around women's and lifestyle publishing. Recode's Peter Kafka suggested Sunday that whether Meredith ends up selling Time or Fortune could serve as a gauge for the Kochs' level of interest.

The Koch brothers nearly became major media owners in 2013 when they considered buying the Tribune Company (now Tronc), which includes major newspapers like the Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune and Baltimore Sun. The Kochs' desire to buy a media company came as the company faced criticism for its aggressive dealings with the press, which included running a site, KochFacts, to rebut unflattering articles. InsideClimate News publisher David Sassoon said at the time he felt "completely disrespected and attacked" when covering Koch Industries and accused the company of "media intimidation."

"As the Koch Bros prepare to buy a hunk of Time Inc, I'm remembering that time they took out an attack ad on me for reporting on their company," Rolling Stone's Tim Dickinson tweeted Sunday night in reference to a 2014 article on the brothers' "toxic empire." The New Yorker's Jane Mayer found herself the target of private investigators and the subject of a smear campaign after reporting on the Koch brothers.

Meanwhile, the Kochs have helped fund journalism coming from a conservative-leaning perspective, like the Franklin Center for Government and Public Integrity's Watchdog.org.

Schulman said he doubted the Koch brothers would take any active role in trying to shape coverage at Time Inc. publications, but suggested their influence may be baked in with such a large-scale investment.

"Influence works in a lot of different ways. They could influence coverage without lifting a finger, basically. If the staff of these publications are aware that the Kochs are significant financial backers of Time Inc., they may not go out of their way to be critical of the brothers or the company," Shulman said. "That would be the way I think it would work."

Bernie makes moves pointing to 2020 run Back

By Gabriel DeBenedetti | 11/27/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Bernie Sanders is taking steps to address longstanding political shortcomings that were exposed in 2016, ahead of another possible presidential bid in 2020.

From forging closer ties to the labor movement to shoring up his once-flimsy foreign policy credentials, the moves have provided the senator inroads into party power structures that largely shunned him in favor of Hillary Clinton last year. They've also empowered the progressive icon to harness his newfound political power and help Democrats fight President Donald Trump's administration.

Sanders has been working closely with figures who are close to the party establishment he's long railed against, like American Federation of Teachers President Randi Weingarten. And he's been meeting with international affairs experts such as Bill Perry, a defense secretary in the administration of President Bill Clinton, around a series of speeches designed to define his international vision, one year after running a campaign heavy on domestic policy and light on the rest of the world.

The Vermont independent hasn't decided whether to run for president again in 2020. To his closest allies, his efforts represent a natural next step in his role as "outreach chairman" for Senate Democrats, a new position created for him late last year by Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York.

Yet the maneuvers could form an important part of a Sanders 2020 effort, a dozen of those allies acknowledged to POLITICO — one that looks markedly different from his surprise 2016 bid, which often suffered from a lack of mainstream political support.

"He is now in a very different position than he's ever been in before. He's just stepping into the role," said senior adviser Ari Rabin-Havt, insisting Sanders doesn't see the changes as prep for 2020. "Let's be clear: He's in charge of outreach for the caucus. So when people say he's doing a better job of reaching out? Well, yeah, he's doing his job. This is a new phase of his career."

Much of Sanders' time is now spent fighting Republican plans to repeal the Affordable Care Act and helping organize a constellation of outside liberal groups against GOP tax proposals. But while Sanders himself bristles at questions about 2020, multiple operatives in his political orbit have been gaming out what such a campaign might look.

Constantly reminding themselves and others that the senator is now the country's most popular active elected official, they believe other candidates will have to build their campaigns around him — the unparalleled center of gravity on the left. Their prep now includes game-planning for a handful of other progressives trying to chip into his political lane.

As Sanders monitors his post-2016 political group Our Revolution and the Democratic National Committee's reform efforts, he has also slightly expanded his tight circle of 2016 aides. Campaign manager Jeff Weaver has returned to the senator's political payroll after helping build Our Revolution — which still hosts Sanders' campaign email list and provides him a nationwide foothold.

In contrast to the run-up to 2016, the group of counselors also now includes pollster Ben Tulchin, who joined that year's campaign only after Sanders was convinced that hiring a pollster was worth it. A pair of senior advisers in Sanders' Senate office have also joined. Rabin-Havt, a former Harry Reid aide, has been directing political outreach, and Matt Duss, former president of the Foundation for Middle East Peace, is working on foreign policy.

Recognizing the senator's post-campaign national platform and 99 percent name ID across the country — and aware that his status as a potential 2020 front-runner draws further eyeballs — his team has stopped sticking to just a few pet issues. Now it tries to inject him into as many productive national conversations as possible, sometimes with the support of his wife's new Sanders Institute think tank.

Sanders has often stated his wish to win over other lawmakers to his theory of grass-roots change, and his new Facebook Live show and podcast are largely designed to amplify his voice and grow his audience, in pursuit of that goal.

At times, his team has also tried smoothing over potentially controversial situations that could turn into the kind of political headaches a 2020 hopeful would prefer to avoid, but which would not likely have bothered Sanders four years ago. For example, he ditched a speaking gig at the Detroit Women's Convention in October after his expected presence ignited a firestorm, instead opting to visit storm damaged areas of Puerto Rico.

To allies on the outer rings of Sanders' political circles, the flurry of moves looks like the beginnings of a full-fledged political operation, in contrast to last year's relatively bare-bones organization. But it's a complex balance for someone who hates any perception that he could be an insider.

"Does he do as much politics as we'd like him to? No, but now he's actually playing the game," said one of Sanders' close political advisers. "Before, he'd say he was going to play by his own rules."

Nonetheless, one year after running an anti-establishment campaign that had the support of just one other senator, Sanders is clearly aiming to improve his standing inside the party. He has worked closely with Schumer and others on defending Obamacare. He has traveled in conjunction with giant liberal advocacy group MoveOn.org to hold health care-focused rallies.

And he has headlined events and conference calls back in Washington with progressive organizations like the Working Families Party.

"I see him taking more responsibility," said Weingarten, one of Hillary Clinton's most prominent labor supporters in 2016, who backed Sanders' pick to lead the DNC after that election. The pair have worked together on Puerto Rico recovery efforts and on a community college unionization drive in Vermont, and Weingarten backed Sanders' signature health care proposal this fall.

"That's why you saw so many 'mainstream Democrats' sign on to his Medicare-for-all bill," she said.

After resisting advisers' pleas to give more foreign policy-oriented speeches during his campaign, Sanders has also now been working with Duss to build a public record on international affairs. That work has entailed more than just his trio of major public speeches on the topic this year — a February address to J Street on Trump, Israel and anti-Semitism; a speech on authoritarianism, in June, at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; and a September talk at Missouri's Westminster College to stress the importance of partnerships "not just between governments, but between peoples."

He has also been meeting with veteran policymakers — including Perry; former Obama administration National Security Council Middle East official Robert Malley; and Sarah Chayes, a former special adviser to retired Adm. Mike Mullen, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff — to discuss foreign developments.

Sanders' moves to bolster his political presence have largely been confined to Washington. He inherited a political infrastructure in the early voting primary states in 2015 after Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren decided not to run. Now, however, he has refrained from dispatching aides to such states, and he has yet to order up polling there.

He has visited Iowa and New Hampshire twice each this year, in addition to other politically important states like Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Virginia, to talk health care and other policy issues. But his traditional political outreach in early voting states is largely limited to occasional check-ins with local leaders like former Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin, according to Democrats familiar with the discussions.

Instead, his in-state supporters have maintained their own networks. In New Hampshire, his roughly 75-person steering committee still meets monthly behind closed doors, but the tightly organized group refuses to let local allies know even the location or timing of their meetings, Democrats in the state told POLITICO.

Even to some of Sanders' biggest cheerleaders, that dynamic reveals an operation that's revving up but still far from a fully fledged campaign. Yet to the allies dedicated to converting his newfound popularity into results in Washington, it's significant progress.

After all, the party needs the 13 million voters who enthusiastically backed Sanders last year to show up again in 2018 and 2020, said Minnesota Rep. Keith Ellison, the DNC deputy chairman and Sanders' most prominent ally on Capitol Hill.

"Anything that makes Bernie more effective at reaching that movement and continuing to build a powerful progressive base of engaged Americans," Ellison said, "is good for the Democratic Party."

Trump doesn't know what's next after taxes Back

By Eliana Johnson, Andrew Restuccia and Ben White | 11/27/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The White House and Capitol Hill are singularly focused on passing a tax reform bill — but almost no one in Washington seems to know what the Trump administration will bear down on next.

White House policy initiatives are typically planned months in advance, with congruent strategies for communications and a view toward working them through Congress. But there is little agreement between White House officials and Republican leaders on the Hill about what should follow tax reform.

Over the course of conversations with nearly a dozen senior aides in the White House and on Capitol Hill, a range of possibilities surfaced, from welfare reform to the infrastructure program President Donald Trump touted on the campaign trail to revisiting Obamacare repeal — an effort that has twice frustrated the Trump administration.

The looming vacuum in the Republican agenda underscores how the relative chaos and disorganization of the Trump White House can affect policymaking across Washington. Former administration officials say the situation is virtually unprecedented, and that it is threatening the president's ability to score legislative victories for the GOP heading into next year's midterm elections. It may also cost Trump personally once the 2020 reelection campaign begins in earnest about a year from now.

"There is very little in the pipeline, and no obvious next item on the agenda after tax reform except maybe a return to health care," said Yuval Levin, the editor of National Affairs, a leading conservative policy journal, who works closely with Republicans on Capitol Hill. "Combine that with a president who doesn't think in terms of policy, and you've got no clear next step."

There are some things the administration needs to do no matter what. White House officials will have to work with Congress to get a budget passed in December. And, thanks to the president's executive order rolling back President Barack Obama's work-permit program for young undocumented immigrants, there will have to be a politically explosive debate between now and March about passing a Republican version — which will likely include a showdown over Trump's long-promised wall between Mexico and the United States.

The administration's disorganization is in part a reflection of the president's own indifference toward many policy issues — but the structure of Trump's White House staff has in many ways inhibited the sort of long-term policy planning characteristic of previous administrations.

Trump has never appointed a deputy chief of staff for policy solely responsible for developing a legislative strategy and coordinating the messaging around it, for example. Many White House aides have moonlighted in the position while attending to their formal duties. The president's former chief strategist, Steve Bannon, laid out early policy targets and was frequently photographed in front of a whiteboard in his office where he kept a handwritten "to do" list of priorities.

Former White House chief of staff Reince Priebus leaned on staff secretary Rob Porter, asking him at various points to take on a policy coordination role in addition to his full-time job — but Priebus himself never laid out a vision for what the policy process should look like.

Several other White House aides have also played a key role in policy development, including domestic policy chief Stephen Miller and deputy chiefs of staff Kirstjen Nielsen and Rick Dearborn, but none is fully responsible for charting administration policy over the long term.

Chief of staff John Kelly, who replaced Priebus in July, has brought some order to the White House, but the retired Marine general doesn't have a deep background in policymaking — and where domestic policy initiatives are concerned, domestic policy aides say they have felt fettered and complained of order without purpose, according to three people close to the president.

The White House's relatively weak domestic policy team has been overshadowed by Gary Cohn and his National Economic Council. Cohn, a government neophyte, has built out a staff capable of rivaling the Domestic Policy Council, which typically charts domestic policy, introducing a source of internal rivalry and instability — a key reason Cohn has taken the lead on tax reform, for example, while domestic policy aides have taken a back seat.

"The NEC team is much larger than in previous White Houses, and the DPC team leaves something to be desired," said a senior White House aide. "In that void, I think Gary's team has proven much stronger than the DPC team."

The general disorganization may exact costs on the administration beyond depriving it of legislative victories. It may also make it harder for the White House to retain staff or to attract replacements as administration officials begin to leave next year.

Domestic policy aides who eagerly joined the administration in January to roll back Obamacare and reform the tax code in the first year of the Trump presidency are less clear what staying on for another year might entail. And while health care and tax reform were legislative causes with which conservative policy wonks have long engaged — and even those lukewarm on Trump's candidacy felt they could contribute to the administration in a policy role — they feel differently about the coming year.

The absence of clear goals for the year ahead has several White House staffers eyeing the exits, according to three people familiar with their plans. The director of the Domestic Policy Council, Andrew Bremberg, who worked on health care before joining the administration, has told associates that he plans to leave the administration in January. Jeremy Katz, a deputy assistant to the president who has served as Cohn's right hand on economic initiatives, as well as others on the free-trade side of the administration's debates on economic policy, have told colleagues they are uncertain whether they will stick around beyond tax reform.

Cohn is expected to remain in his job next year if the tax reform push is successful, but he could wind up leaving if Trump embraces anti-free-trade positions, such as a unilateral pullout from NAFTA.

There are signs that both the White House and Congress are preparing to turn to welfare reform in the new year. House Speaker Paul Ryan told donors assembled at a Koch brothers conference in Wichita, Kansas, late last month that Republican lawmakers would tackle welfare after tax reform passes the Congress, according to two people familiar with the remarks — an idea the president mentioned last week, telling reporters that "people are taking advantage of the system."

Ryan's 2016 "Better Way" agenda laid out a blueprint for welfare reform, but there is no indication that the White House is prepared to sign on to his approach, and, on the staff level, little work has been done at the White House to indicate to lawmakers what the president wants a bill to look like.

Meanwhile, when the tax package moved from the House to the Senate, Cohn said publicly that "we'll put infrastructure into the House" — a sequence at odds with Ryan's message to GOP donors.

Senior White House officials did not dispute characterizations of the general confusion surrounding the sequencing of these legislative initiatives, and they said the administration is likely to push welfare reform as well as infrastructure and a health care bill — something that resembles the Graham-Cassidy legislation that stalled in the Senate in September — over the next year.

"It will be all three of them in an order that depends on what the congressional calendar looks like," said a senior White House aide.

"The president ran on and has pushed a bold, aggressive agenda that is ending business as usual in Washington and putting Americans first," said deputy press secretary Hogan Gidley. "President Trump has delivered on many of his agenda items in record time — and no arbitrary amount of unnecessary bureaucratic layers will prevent continued successes on behalf of the American people in the new year."

The dynamic inside Trump's White House differs from that of previous administrations, where the sequencing of domestic initiatives was carefully planned by White House officials working closely with party leaders on Capitol Hill.

In the George W. Bush administration, the role of deputy chief of staff for policy was held both by Josh Bolten, who went on to become the president's chief of staff, and by Karl Rove, who served as the mastermind behind the timing and rollout of policy initiatives throughout his time in the White House.

During Bolten's tenure, Bush administration officials recall, weekly meetings in his West Wing office focused on a calendar he had pinned on his wall that folded out from the current month to reveal the next four months.

"We thought about this stuff very carefully; we had detailed discussions about it," said a former Bush administration official who participated in the conversations. "The timing of this stuff was carefully thought through, as was the messaging."

Bush officials say they made mistakes — but not for lack of planning. Rove has said publicly on many occasions that one of the biggest mistakes of the Bush presidency, a plan he fought for at the time, was pushing for changes to Social Security after Bush's 2004 reelection before tackling immigration reform. Both efforts ultimately failed, a reality that underscores the importance of the sequencing of domestic policy initiatives given the political mood in the country and in the Congress.

"I believe that running the Social Security idea right after the '04 elections was a mistake," Bush said in his final news conference. "I should have — should have argued for immigration reform."

Obama administration officials tell a similar story of balancing the president's priorities with attention to the hard deadlines in Congress and the political mood of the country. "We had clear priority areas that we went into every year and that we refreshed at the six-month point," said Cecilia Muñoz, who served as director of the Domestic Policy Council for five years during the Obama administration.

With the exception of immigration, Trump didn't campaign on a detailed policy platform. In office, he has relied on Congress to hammer out the details of legislation and, at times, the order of policy pushes. It was Ryan's idea, for example, to tackle health care before tax reform, and as the health bill crumbled, the president told associates he regretted agreeing to put Obamacare repeal first.

A more traditional White House, however, would be guiding Congress rather than vice versa. "It's not unusual for people in Congress to have different perspectives about what's important and what comes next," said Muñoz.

But over the Thanksgiving weekend, Trump gave hints that he's still preoccupied with the victory that eluded him in his first months: a health care overhaul. "Even though Dems want to Obstruct," he tweeted on Thanksgiving Day, "we will Repeal & Replace right after Tax Cuts!"

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Trump team cheers Ukraine coal export deal — Summer nuclear projects to end — Greens ask court to revive methane rule

U.S. COAL HEADED TO UKRAINE: A Pennsylvania-based mining company is expected to begin exporting U.S. coal to a Ukrainian electric utility this year. The Energy Department said today Xcoal Energy and Resources agreed to sell Ukraine's Centrenergo PJSC roughly 700,000 tons of coal by the end of 2017 — an announcement the Trump administration cheered, Darius Dixon reports. Xcoal's first shipment is expected to arrive in Ukraine in late August.

Energy Secretary Rick Perry and Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross applauded the deal, which their respected agencies helped negotiate, according to an administration fact sheet. "Today's announcement will allow Ukraine to diversify its energy sources ahead of the coming winter, helping bolster a key strategic partner against regional pressures that seek to undermine U.S. interests," Ross said in a statement.

Perry added: "This announcement will also boost our own economy by supporting jobs in the coal and transportation industries. This Administration looks forward to making available even more of our abundant natural resources to allies and partners like Ukraine in the future to promote their own energy security through diversity of supply and source." SCANA ENDS SUMMER NUCLEAR PROJECT: Construction on South Carolina's V.C. Summer nuclear project is ending, according to the utilities involved in building the two reactors. SCANA, the majority owner of the unfinished reactors through its South Carolina Electric & Gas Co. unit, announced today that it ceased construction on the effort and plans to "promptly" file a petition with state regulators to abandon the project, Darius reports.

The company listed various reasons for not finishing the two Westinghouse-designed AP1000 reactors, including cost concerns about the already over-budget project, "uncertainty" about a congressional extension of nuclear production tax credits and the decision by co-owner Santee Cooper, a state-owned electric utility, to walk away from the project today. More here.

Industry responds: Maria Korsnick, president and chief executive officer of the Nuclear Energy Institute, responded to the news with a statement maintaining that nuclear energy is still vital. "It is unfortunate that circumstances beyond their control have led to this outcome today," she said. "All the more now, we must impress upon our energy policy decision makers the vital role of nuclear energy in America's energy portfolio."

GREENS ASK COURT TO REVIVE METHANE RULE ON WELLS: Green groups today asked a federal court to order EPA to resume enforcing its methane rule for new oil and gas wells, given the agency did not ask for an appeal in the window provided by the court. Earlier this month, Alex Guillén reports, a panel of three judges on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that Administrator Scott Pruitt's 90-day stay of the methane rule was unlawful. It agreed, however, to keep Pruitt's stay in place for two weeks to give the agency a chance to appeal. "That time ran out last week, and while industry groups and states opposed to the rule asked for en banc review by the full court, EPA has remained silent," Alex writes. More here.

PRUITT OPENS UP: Pruitt talked to The Oklahoman about his agency's upcoming "red team-blue team" review of climate change and his political future in an interview out today. "The American people deserve an honest, open, objective and transparent discussion on what do we know and what don't we know" about climate change, Pruitt said, but added that no formal decision has been made on whether to organize the teams.

As for his post-EPA ambitions, Pruitt denied interest in running for governor next year but appeared more circumspect about the chances for a Senate run in 2020. "To think somehow that ... I would go through a confirmation process which, by any measure, is pretty intense, serve five months and move to Washington, D.C., in order to run for governor ... I mean, who would do that? For folks to think that, it's just legendary. People, they don't think through these things," Pruitt said. But he declined to speculate when asked if he would stay with the Trump administration through 2020, the Oklahoman reports. "I'll do it as long as the Lord calls me to and as long as the president wants me to do it," he told the newspaper. Read the story here.

FOUR NEW INTERIOR POLITICALS REVEALED: The Interior Department today released an updated list of all political appointees at the agency as of July 10 that included four previously unreported staffers. First on the list is Preston Beard, who is an advisor in the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement and previously worked on BSEE Director Scott Angelle's 2016 congressional campaign. The list also included Leila Getto, a former DOE senior adviser and staffer on the Chamber of Commerce's Global Energy Institute who joined the agency in June as deputy director of scheduling and advance. The third new staffer is David Mihalic, a former superintendent of Yosemite National Park and Glacier National Park near Zinke's home in Montana, who is now senior advisor to the secretary. Rounding out the list is former Zinke congressional staffer Lacey Smethers who joined Interior in June as special assistant to the secretary.

EPA ADDS HOOSICK FALLS, OTHERS TO SUPERFUND LIST: EPA today added seven sites to its Superfund National Priorities List, including the high-profile contamination of PFOA from a plastics factory into the water supply in Hoosick Falls, N.Y. Other sites added to the NPL include a battery recycling facility in Puerto Rico, an old lumber treatment site in Florida, and a former dry cleaner in Memphis. EPA also proposed adding four more sites to the NPL, including a groundwater contamination in Delaware and a former aircraft fire extinguisher repair facility near Oklahoma City.

IG: ADEQUATE SEXUAL HARASSMENT RESPONSE AT REGION 5: EPA's inspector general released a report today that found its Region 5 had adequate policies and practices in place for addressing sexual harassment allegations. The IG report comes in response to a congressional request to determine whether Region 5 managers appropriately handled sexual harassment allegations. No recommendations were made by the IG "because pertinent policies and procedures were in place and being followed." Read the report.

PENCE ABROAD: WE WILL 'HOLD RUSSIA ACCOUNTABLE:' Vice President Mike Pence pledged the U.S. will "hold Russia accountable for its actions" in a speech to NATO allies in Estonia today. Pence reassured the bloc's Baltic members that the Trump administration would maintain its Article 5 commitment to defend them in the face of Russian aggression, POLITICO's Louis Nelson reports. "Under President Donald Trump, the United States will continue to hold Russia accountable for its actions — and we call on our European allies and friends to do the same," Pence said. "President Trump has made it clear: America is open to a better relationship. But the president and our Congress are unified in our message to Russia — a better relationship, and the lifting of sanctions, will require Russia to reverse the actions that caused sanctions to be imposed in the first place."

CLARK: DOE GRID STUDY IS IMPORTANT: Former FERC Commissioner Tony Clark penned an op-ed in the Washington Examiner on Sunday that addressed the importance of the Energy Department's electrical grid study. "It's a timely topic, and like many people, I'm looking forward to the final report," he wrote. "Our nation's electric grid is undergoing some of the most profound changes since its inception, so it's natural that the secretary would ask for an assessment of the electric system and recommendations to head-off any potential problems." U.S. firm reaches agreement to export coal to Ukraine Back

By Darius Dixon | 07/31/2017 01:01 PM EDT

Trump administration officials today cheered the announcement that a Pennsylvania-based mining company is expected to begin exporting U.S. coal to a Ukrainian electric utility this year.

Xcoal Energy and Resources agreed to sell Ukraine's Centrenergo PJSC roughly 700,000 tons of coal by the end of 2017, according to the U.S. Energy Department.

Energy Secretary Rick Perry and Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross lauded the deal, which their agencies helped negotiate, according to an administration fact sheet.

"Today's announcement will allow Ukraine to diversify its energy sources ahead of the coming winter, helping bolster a key strategic partner against regional pressures that seek to undermine U.S. interests," Ross said in a statement.

Perry added: "This announcement will also boost our own economy by supporting jobs in the coal and transportation industries. This Administration looks forward to making available even more of our abundant natural resources to allies and partners like Ukraine in the future to promote their own energy security through diversity of supply and source."

Xcoal CEO Ernie Thrasher's statement announcing the deal praised "President Trump's efforts to create a regulatory and business environment that allows the U.S coal industry to freely, and fairly, compete in a global market."

The move would significantly increase the amount of coal being shipped from the U.S. to Ukraine for power generation, compared to 32,211 short tons of thermal coal last year, according to the Energy Information Administration. About 2 million short tons of metallurgical coal, used in industries like steelmaking, was exported from the U.S. to Ukraine in 2016, according to EIA.

WHAT'S NEXT: Xcoal's first shipment is expected to arrive in Ukraine in late August, according to DOE.

South Carolina utilities spike Summer nuclear project Back

By Darius Dixon | 07/31/2017 02:04 PM EDT

Construction on the V.C. Summer nuclear project in South Carolina will come to an end, according to the lead utilities involved in building the two reactors.

SCANA, the majority owner of the unfinished reactors through its South Carolina Electric & Gas Co. unit, announced today that it ceased construction on the effort and plans to "promptly" file petition with state regulators to abandon the project.

The company cited a long list of reasons for not finishing the two Westinghouse-designed AP1000 reactors: cost concerns about the already over-budget project, "uncertainty" about a congressional extension of nuclear production tax credits and the decision by co-owner Santee Cooper, a state-owned electric utility, to walk away from the project today.

"Based on these factors, SCE&G concluded that it would not be in the best interest of its customers and other stakeholders to continue construction of the project," SCANA said in a statement today.

The project's primary contractor, Westinghouse, filed for bankruptcy protection earlier this year.

Santee Cooper's board of directors today decided to suspend construction on the new reactors, arguing that the decision would save its customers $7 billion in additional costs and that a new analysis found they wouldn't be finished until 2024.

"Generation diversity remains an important strategy for Santee Cooper, but the costs of these units are simply too much for our customers to bear," said Leighton Lord, chairman of the Santee Cooper board of directors, in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: SCANA has scheduled a 4 p.m. call for analysts to discuss the impact of suspending its work on Summer.

Greens urge court to revive EPA's methane rule for new oil and gas wells Back

By Alex Guillén | 07/31/2017 11:06 AM EDT

Environmentalists today asked a federal court to order EPA to resume enforcing its methane rule for new oil and gas wells after the agency did not ask for an appeal in the window provided by the court.

A panel of three judges on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals earlier this month ruled Administrator Scott Pruitt's 90-day stay of the methane rule was unlawful but agreed to keep Pruitt's stay in place for two weeks to give the agency a chance to appeal. That time ran out last week, and while industry groups and states opposed to the rule asked for en banc review by the full court, EPA has remained silent.

The environmental groups today called the industry and state rehearing petitions "transparent attempts to seek further delay" that should not stop the court from ordering EPA to lift Pruitt's administrative stay, which otherwise is slated to expire on Aug. 31.

"The filing of such flimsy petitions cannot be permitted to accomplish the very delay this Court found unlawful, to the detriment of Petitioners' members and other Americans who are suffering continued exposure to dangerous—and easily preventable—air pollution," they wrote.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court must decide whether to grant the environmentalists' request and order the rule reinstated, or explore the industry and states' appeal requests. The order keeping Pruitt's stay of the rule in place temporarily was specifically said to give EPA time to appeal, which the agency has not done.

Pence: We will 'hold Russia accountable for its actions' Back

By Louis Nelson | 07/31/2017 08:08 AM EDT

Amid a fresh wave of sanctions and renewed tension between the United States and Russia, Vice President Mike Pence reassured NATO's Baltic member states that the U.S. stands firmly behind its mutual-defense commitment in the face of stepped-up aggression from Moscow.

"The United States stands with the nations and people of the Baltic States — and we always will. We stand with our NATO allies in our commitment to your security," Pence said Monday in remarks at the headquarters of Estonia's defense forces. "Today we stand where East meets West — on a great frontier of freedom. No threat looms larger in the Baltic States than the specter of aggression from your unpredictable neighbor to the east."

Pence's remarks came before members of the U.S., French, British and Estonian militaries and followed a meeting between the vice president and the presidents of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. Pence offered optimism that the U.S.-Russia relationship might improve but said that any warming would come with a shift in Moscow's behavior. The vice president reaffirmed President Donald Trump's commitment to signing sanction legislation targeting Russia that passed overwhelmingly last week in Congress.

In response to the forthcoming sanctions measure, Russian President Vladimir Putin ordered the U.S. to reduce the number of diplomats stationed in Russia by more than 700. The dueling diplomatic maneuvers marked a new low in already frosty relations for the former Cold War rivals.

Trump's presidency brought with it the possibility of improved relations with Russia after the president spent much of the 2016 campaign speaking warmly of Putin and expressing optimism that he would be able to build a strong relationship with the Kremlin. Instead, relations have worsened amid investigations into Russia's efforts to interfere in last year's election, continued Russian military activity in Ukraine as well as Moscow's support for Syrian dictator Bashar Assad.

Trump, too, has shifted his rhetoric in regard to Russia, drawing a relatively tougher line even if some critics would prefer him to take an even more aggressive approach. And after characterizing NATO as "obsolete" and questioning the U.S.' willingness to comply with the treaty's all-for-one, one-for-all defense agreement, Trump has more recently reaffirmed his nation's commitment while also urging member states to increase their defense spending.

"Under President Donald Trump, the United States will continue to hold Russia accountable for its actions — and we call on our European allies and friends to do the same," Pence said Monday in Estonia. "President Trump has made it clear: America is open to a better relationship. But the president and our Congress are unified in our message to Russia — a better relationship, and the lifting of sanctions, will require Russia to reverse the actions that caused sanctions to be imposed in the first place."

Trump ousts Scaramucci as communications director Back

By Tara Palmeri | 07/31/2017 02:39 PM EDT

President Donald Trump has removed Anthony Scaramucci as communications director, a little more than a week after the former financier was named to the post, the White House said on Monday.

The change came at the request of new chief of staff John Kelly, who started Monday, two White House officials said. It was not clear whether Scaramucci would take on a new role after leaving the communications job, nor was it immediately apparent who would take over the position.

"Anthony Scaramucci will be leaving his role as White House Communications Director," press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said in a statement. "Mr. Scaramucci felt it was best to give Chief of Staff John Kelly a clean slate and the ability to build his own team. We wish him all the best."

Scaramucci was expected to announce his new communications team Monday afternoon, but he was instead informed of the decision to remove him that morning in Kelly's office. Scaramucci was not present when senior staff were told of the change, a White House official said. Another senior aide said the move came after discussions over the weekend. There was "no way" Scaramucci could work with Kelly, the senior aide said.

"Kelly is already changing the culture here," said another White House aide. As the news broke, Kelly was spotted in the White House's East Room for a ceremony, chatting with other senior officials.

Scaramucci's brief tenure brought turmoil to the West Wing, including the exits of press secretary Sean Spicer and former chief of staff Reince Priebus. Scaramucci had tried unsuccessfully to get a White House job earlier in the year, but he settled temporarily for a position at the U.S. Export-Import Bank.

His time as communications director seemed to start smoothly, with a friendly on-camera appearance in the White House briefing room on July 21, the day his new position was announced. Spicer's tenure had been marked by combative exchanges with reporters, and the briefings were largely moved off camera until Scaramucci took over.

But Scaramucci quickly ramped up the drama by threatening to fire "everybody" in the White House press office if leaks to reporters did not stop. On Tuesday, he told POLITICO he planned to fire a press aide — but after he made the move public, it was delayed until the aide, Michael Short, resigned later that day.

Scaramucci also was widely criticized for a profanity-laced tirade last week in a conversation with a New Yorker reporter.

Trump, however, had denied the reports of disorder in the West Wing. "No WH chaos!" he tweeted on Monday morning.

Josh Dawsey and Theodoric Meyer contributed to this report.

Ivanka and Jared find their limits in Trump's White House Back

By Annie Karni and Eliana Johnson | 07/30/2017 06:38 PM EDT

By one measurement, last week was a good one for Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner.

President Donald Trump's daughter and son-in-law had been double-teaming for weeks to persuade him to oust chief of staff Reince Priebus, pushing for a new chief who could "professionalize the West Wing," according to multiple White House officials. On Friday, Trump finally announced he'd replace Priebus with John Kelly, his secretary of Homeland Security, starting Monday.

That victory followed Trump's appointment a week earlier of financier Anthony Scaramucci, a campaign surrogate and donor, as communications director, a move the couple also strongly supported.

But if Ivanka Trump and Kushner, socially liberal former Democratic donors, remain influential voices with Trump on personnel decisions, they have so far had little effect on his policies.

Last week they were blindsided by the president's tweet saying he planned to ban transgender people from serving in the military, according to several White House aides, a major coup for conservatives who had been quietly lobbying the administration on the issue for months.

White House officials said the first daughter was surprised by her father's posts; in the past, Trump has been a supporter of gay rights. Ivanka Trump, according to these officials, learned of the decision when she saw her father's tweet on her phone.

The decree came less than a month after the first daughter tweeted, in honor of Pride Month: "I am proud to support my LGBTQ friends and the LGBTQ Americans who have made immense contributions to our society and economy." And it spurred another wave of liberal rage directed at Ivanka Trump.

For all the talk of a White House war between New York City liberals and traditionalist conservatives, it was the latest example of the limited influence the moderates have been able to wield on policy.

Six months ago, few would have thought the president would have been circumventing his daughter to deliver victories to fiscal and social conservatives—but that's precisely what happened with the transgender military ban, which the Pentagon has put on hold pending review.

Now, as Ivanka Trump runs up against some of limits of her power in the White House, she appears to be narrowing her objectives—and disappointing those progressives who had pinned their hopes on the president's family members exerting more of a moderating influence on his presidency.

"Actions speak louder than words," said Sarah McBride, national press secretary for the nonprofit Human Rights Campaign. "Either Ivanka is ineffective in her advocacy within the building, or her voice doesn't matter to the president as much as she hopes it does."

Ivanka Trump has had some victories. While she lost out on persuading her father not to withdraw from the Paris climate accord, she had much more success in limiting a religious liberties executive order to abortion and procreation issues, cutting out many other possibilities that would have angered the LGBT community.

"She's in there doing what she can," said R. Couri Hay, a publicist and a longtime friend of the Trump family. "It's unrealistic, unfair and cruel to expect her to change climate policy and pre-K and women's issues in six months."

But Ivanka Trump — who once met with Planned Parenthood CEO Cecile Richards to discuss a needle-threading way to potentially fund the organization — is staking out her reputation on getting a child care tax credit passed in a Republican Congress as part of tax reform, and fighting for paid family leave to be included in the budget.

She has told allies that she wants to be held accountable solely on those issues she is actively working on — uphill battles that will count as major victories if she is successful — and the success of a World Bank fund she helped start, geared at helping female entrepreneurs gain access to capital. She has also said she wants to make ending human trafficking a White House priority.

Kushner, for his part, remains focused on projects that are peripheral to the White House's main domestic agenda, like introducing technological innovations to the federal government. In the first six months of the administration, he has steered clear of the legislative battles that have been the meat of the work of Trump's policy shop, focusing instead on relations with Mexico, China, Canada and the Middle East.

Ivanka Trump has explained to critics that she doesn't want to ruin her credibility with Republicans, whose support she will need, by being perceived as what she sometimes refers to as a "super-lib" and expressing her personal disagreement with the administration's most conservative policies.

Meanwhile, she desperately wants to lower expectations of what she can achieve in an administration where she views herself as one person on a large team — even though other White House officials said she still has access to the president whenever she desires it. Allies have bucked up her spirits by telling her that her legacy will look better in hindsight if she is successful in moving the needle on her stated issues. And as she navigates the unique role of working-daughter-in-the-White House, she is reading Eleanor Roosevelt's biography for guidance and inspiration.

Both Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner declined to comment for this story.

People close to her say Ivanka Trump is aware of the criticism hurled at her — and sometimes frustrated by the misunderstanding of the limits of her power.

From her newly renovated, all-white office in the West Wing, Ivanka Trump often fields messages from progressive friends pushing her to speak out on their pet issues. Actor Leonardo DiCaprio messaged her ahead of the climate decision, begging her to do more to intervene.

She's no newcomer to the difficult balancing act. In the early aughts, as she sought to make a name for herself in New York society, she had to simultaneously embrace the family brand while trying to distance herself from the gaudy reputation of the Trump name, already unwelcome in the upper echelons of Manhattan society.

One well-known socialite who was friendly with Ivanka Trump put it bluntly: "Everyone knew that Jared's father was a felon and her father was a buffoon, but you looked past that because they stood on their own two feet and were sophisticated and presentable. They were accepted despite their parents. Now, there's no separating the two."

But friends and acquaintances who knew Ivanka Trump before her move into politics said they are not surprised that she has remained publicly in lockstep with her father. "I know her well enough to know her relationship with her father, which is that she will never, ever, go against the grain," said one former fashion-world friend who has socialized with Ivanka for years but has not spoken to her since she moved to Washington.

Another close friend of the family, who has known Ivanka Trump her entire life, said: "She wanted to be the apple of her father's eye. There's no question, she worked hard to be the perfect image her father wanted."

In the wake of one of the most tumultuous weeks in Trump's presidency, his daughter had a private lunch with the United Nations secretary-general Friday to discuss economic empowerment for women. She's made similar diplomatic excursions, traveling to Berlin in April to join German Chancellor Angela Merkel for a women-themed summit and meeting with female entrepreneurs in Saudi Arabia.

It's a world apart from her father's domestic policies — and one more in line with the first lady-like role that she bristles at. The prime movers behind Trump's decision to ban transgender people from serving in the military were two of the House's most conservative members: North Carolina Republican Mark Meadows and the chairman of the House Freedom Caucus, Jim Jordan.

After the failure of an amendment that would have stripped Pentagon funding for gender reassignment surgeries, the duo approached Defense Secretary James Mattis. They discussed a number of options, including a two-year delay on the implementation of Obama administration policy guidelines that permitted Pentagon funding for the surgeries. When that path lead nowhere, they took their case directly to the White House, where they spoke with several officials including Marc Short, the director of legislative affairs.

Inside the White House, the issue was so closely held — and resolved so quickly — that just a handful of West Wing aides were aware of what was transpiring. In addition to Kushner and Ivanka Trump, Vice President Mike Pence, a Catholic evangelical with a history of pushing religious liberty policies, had no inkling of what was underway.

Meadows and Jordan had also corralled a group of conservatives capable of sinking the appropriations bill, making it clear to the White House they were willing to do so if the funding issue wasn't resolved. "They were frustrated with Mattis and DOD, and the White House was sympathetic to them on the policy," said a senior White House aide. Neither Meadows nor Jordan responded to a request for comment.

Meanwhile, Christian conservatives such as Tony Perkins and Gary Bauer were also lobbying the Trump White House, a factor that boosted the congressmen's cause, according to a second senior White House official.

Their requests ran the gamut: While the congressmen asked the White House to resolve the funding issue, which had riled both fiscal and social conservatives, some Christian leaders came asking for the blanket ban the president delivered on Wednesday. But even they were surprised when Trump came down on their side. "I wish the Republican Congress was as bold as the president is on a wide range of issues," said Steve Scheffler, president of the Iowa Faith and Freedom Coalition. "But unfortunately, like on health care, they don't seem to be."

Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, in an interview with Fox News radio, cheered the president for "showing that the bottom line is the bottom line is the bottom line."

The other bottom line: Ivanka Trump is aware she needs a real win — not just starting a conversation about paid family leave that may or may not materialize in a final budget — to win back credibility.

Her old circles are skeptical. When asked what her view was on Ivanka Trump, the fashion designer Charlotte Ronson wrote in an email: "Fortunately, I don't know her well enough to give any good accounts."

Without Priebus, Trump Is a Man Without a Party Back

By Tim Alberta | 07/30/2017 03:55 PM EDT

Reince Priebus looked battered. It was Monday, October 10—the morning after the final presidential debate—and our eyes met as I boarded a Southwest Airlines flight from St. Louis to Washington, D.C. It had been an extraordinary weekend: On Friday night, the biggest bombshell of the 2016 campaign dropped when the Washington Post published a decade-old audio recording on which Donald Trump made lewd comments about groping women. Speaker Paul Ryan disinvited Trump from a unity event in Wisconsin scheduled for the following day, and Priebus, then the chairman of the Republican National Committee, quietly made the case to Trump and his associates that he should quit the race. Trump refused. The Sunday debate, 48 hours after the tape's release, was dominated by discussion of Trump's history with women. He dismissed his recorded remarks—"grab them by the pussy," Trump had said, boasting that his celebrity status allowed him to get away with aggressive advances on the opposite sex—as "locker room talk."

Priebus occupied a window seat, a pair of staffers to his left. The chair behind him sat empty; my instinct was to grab it and start firing questions through the slit at his left shoulder. But after studying Priebus—the slouched posture, the uncharacteristically rumpled suit, the groaning bags under his eyes—I decided it might backfire. Whether it was pity or strategy, or a bit of both, I settled in two rows back, deciding it would be better to talk upon landing in Washington.

It was an eventful flight: Ryan, while we were at 30,000 feet, had told House Republicans on a conference call that he wouldn't be defending the president anymore—and urged them to do whatever was necessary to survive in their districts. Meanwhile, there were reports Priebus would hold his own call with RNC members to discuss ousting Trump. Priebus was understandably not keen to discuss any of these developments. But he seemed to appreciate my earlier gesture. When I greeted him, just beyond the entrance to the jet bridge, his staffers tried to shut down any interview. Priebus told them to back off. "It's OK," he said, offering the sort of forced half-smile you see at hospital visitations. "Go ahead. Shoot." We walked out of the terminal and past the baggage claim, covering all of it: the tape, the debate, Ryan, the RNC and what (if anything) it could do at this point. Priebus asked twice to speak off the record, which I allowed. But his most telling comment—in retrospect—came at the end of our conversation, after he explained that the RNC had no mechanism to remove Trump as its nominee.

"Look," he said, stepping into the sunlight outside Reagan National Airport, his staffers loading up an idling black Chevrolet Suburban. "We don't get to pick the nominee. And we don't get to just walk away from him, either."

By "we," the chairman was referring to the RNC and the broader party leadership. But it seems obvious now—in studying his approach to Trump throughout the primary season, the general election and during his tumultuous 27-week run as chief of staff, the shortest in history—that Priebus was also talking about himself. As head of the party, Priebus never foresaw the real estate mogul running, much less becoming its standard-bearer. He cracked jokes about Trump early on and flashed outrage at some of his incendiary rhetoric. But as Trump gained momentum and won the nomination and, later, the presidency—and as the RNC chairman emerged as the bridge between him and the Republican Party—Priebus could never bring himself to abandon Trump.

It's not without irony that some will hold him responsible for Trumpism—Priebus should have kicked Trump out of the GOP debates, some critics suggest—seeing how the RNC chairman would have personally loved to see Scott Walker or Marco Rubio as the party's nominee. Trump was the last choice of the party establishment, which Priebus embodied. It became clear, however, that Republican voters had other ideas—and Priebus made it his mission to ensure a level playing field. He ignored calls to remove Trump from debates after he threatened to run as an independent, and bent over backward to make the reality TV star feel welcome in the GOP. Priebus knew he would be accused of sabotaging the party, but he was unwavering in the belief that it was his job to be a facilitator and an ambassador, not a kingmaker.

His friends had mixed feelings about the chief of staff position, and some cautioned Priebus against taking it. After all, he had inherited a penniless, disorganized, technologically bankrupt Republican Party in 2011 and transformed it by 2016 into a financial behemoth with adequate field and data operations. On his watch, the GOP had kept the House, taken back the Senate and now won the presidency; why not ride into the sunset, spend time with his family and cash in on those triumphs?

The fateful answer: Because Priebus couldn't just walk away. He felt a sense of loyalty to Trump, and more acutely, an enduring responsibility to the party and the country. Plus, the second-most prestigious office in the West Wing was beckoning. Priebus jumped at the job.

It was a mismatch from the start. As RNC chairman, Priebus had two primary responsibilities: dialing for dollars (typically three to five hours each day) and sorting out disputes among his 168 members to keep everyone happy. Key administrative functions were mostly handled by other RNC staff, including Priebus' own chief of staff; some associates feared that Priebus' skill set simply would not translate to the new job. Making success all the less likely was the Wisconsinite's disposition: laid back, naturally soft-spoken and nonconfrontational, a classic people pleaser. Priebus kept a mini-fridge stocked with Miller Lite in his RNC office and would later hold occasional Friday happy hours in his West Wing suite, inviting officials from across the building to grab a can of beer or a Solo cup of wine and commiserate about the week that had been. This calm, consensus-minded approach made Priebus a beloved party chairman, and Republicans held out hope that it would make him a good chief of staff. But it didn't. Trump trampled Priebus from Day One, sending out press secretary Sean Spicer, a longtime Priebus ally, to deliver a demonstrably false rant about the inaugural crowd size. Trump resented the idea that his chief of staff was there to tame him, and resented even more the notion that Priebus was the conduit to a Republican Party he had conquered.

But Priebus was the conduit. By firing him, Trump has severed a critical connection to his own party—not simply to major donors and GOP congressional leaders, but to the unruly, broader constellation of conservative-affiliated organizations and individuals that Priebus had spent five years corralling. He was effortlessly tagged as an "establishment" figure—inevitably, given his title atop the party—but Priebus was a specialist at coalition-building. He convened regular meetings as RNC chairman with influential players in the conservative movement, picking their brains and taking their temperatures on various issues. That continued as chief of staff: Priebus spoke by phone with prominent activists, such as the Family Research Council's Tony Perkins, at least once a week. There is a meeting scheduled at the White House this Wednesday of the Conservative Action Project—an umbrella group that brings together leaders from across the right—and Priebus was planning to attend. It was this kind of systematic outreach that made Priebus, whatever his flaws as a West Wing manager, an essential lieutenant for Trump.

There is no question, however, that Priebus' absence will echo loudest on Capitol Hill—particularly in the speaker's office. Ryan's team had heard whispers for months of Priebus' possible departure, but the news was nonetheless a dagger, especially on the heels of a health care defeat and at the dawn of tax-reform season. Ryan and Priebus, both Green Bay Packers fans and local beer loyalists, have been friends for decades; Ryan's former chief of staff, Andy Speth, was Priebus' college roommate at the University of Wisconsin-Whitewater. Priebus was the first call Ryan made when things got hairy this year, and vice versa. Working with a West Wing that contains few other true allies—and with a volatile president who has viewed him suspiciously ever since the speaker accused him of making "the textbook definition of a racist comment" about a Hispanic-American judge—Ryan saw Priebus as his staunchest ally and bunker mate. And now he's gone.

In his place is John Kelly, a retired four-star Marine general and respected disciplinarian whose mandate is to succeed where Priebus failed: imposing order and organization on a chaotic White House. Kelly, however, is not a political figure; he did not support (or oppose) Trump's campaign, and is not known to hold strong political or ideological inclinations. Looking around Trump's inner circle, there is communications director Anthony Scaramucci, a political novice who in the past donated to Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton; chief strategist Steve Bannon, who used Breitbart to try and burn the Republican Party to the ground; National Economic Council director Gary Cohn, a lifelong Democrat; director of strategic communication Hope Hicks, who has zero history with GOP politics; and Jared Kushner and Ivanka Trump, a pair of self-professed Manhattan progressives. Of Trump's closest advisers, only Mike Pence has any association with the Republican Party.

This no longer seems accidental. Trump has, since taking office, consistently referred to Republicans as though he is not one himself—it's invariably "they" or "them." Unlike past presidents of his party, Trump entered the White House with few personal relationships with prominent Republicans: donors, lobbyists, party activists, politicians. This liberated him to say whatever he pleased as a candidate, and, by firing Priebus, Trump might feel similarly liberated. The fear now, among Republicans in his administration and on Capitol Hill, is that Trump will turn against the party, waging rhetorical warfare against a straw-man GOP whom he blames for the legislative failures and swamp-stained inertia that has bedeviled his young presidency. It would represent a new, harsher type of triangulation, turning his base against the politicians of his own party that they elected.

Things have not yet escalated to that point. But some, including officials in his own administration, took the dismissal of Priebus as a signal that Trump is willing to go rogue against the GOP. Only a day after announcing Kelly as his new chief of staff, the president let loose on Twitter, calling out Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell for not changing the Senate's filibuster rules and saying Republicans "look like fools" for not doing so. He also tweeted that Democrats are "laughing at" the GOP. In a final taunt, Trump tweeted that Republican senators would be "total quitters" if they move on from health care following last week's failed repeal vote.

More and more, Trump talks as though there are Democrats and Republicans—and him, a party of one. If unchecked, this poses an existential threat to the GOP. But it's not Priebus' problem anymore. He is officially unemployed. And with a few weeks of summer vacation remaining, chances are that he—along with his wife and two young children—will soon be on an airplane, heading someplace where no reporter will be waiting to ask him about Donald Trump.

McConnell wages war down South Back

By Alex Isenstadt | 07/31/2017 05:07 AM EDT

Mitch McConnell is unleashing the full force of his political machine in an all-out push to stop two far-right conservatives who threaten to make his life miserable in the Senate.

The Republican leader is aiming to thwart Rep. Mo Brooks and former state Supreme Court Chief Justice Roy Moore in a special election in Alabama next month. Both men are campaigning against McConnell as a despised symbol of the establishment — and both would exacerbate his already stiff challenge wrangling his GOP Conference.

McConnell is responding in kind. His super PAC is set to spend as much as $8 million to boost his favored candidate, recently appointed Republican Sen. Luther Strange. McConnell has activated his sprawling donor network and pressed the White House for more resources. And the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the Senate GOP campaign arm McConnell controls, has warned consultants they'll be cut off from future work if they assist Strange's opponents.

And in a highly unusual step, one of McConnell's top political lieutenants has begun quietly advising a long-shot Republican primary candidate running for Brooks' House seat. The move is designed to get in the congressman's head and dissuade him from emptying his campaign war chest in the race for Attorney General Jeff Sessions' old Senate seat.

It's a massive undertaking by McConnell and his allies on behalf of Strange, who was appointed a mere six months ago to fill the seat until a special election. In part, McConnell's urgency reflects his long-standing promise to protect besieged Republican incumbents in primaries. But it also underscores his struggles managing his narrow Senate majority, which were punctuated by the collapse of Obamacare repeal legislation last week after three Republicans broke ranks.

This past week, Brooks, a member of the conservative House Freedom Caucus, said he would not vote for McConnell as majority leader and called for him to step down after the failure of the health care bill.

Moore, who rose to national fame after he refused to obey a federal order to remove a monument of the Ten Commandments from an Alabama judicial building, made his feelings clear about the leader in a lengthy fundraising appeal with the subject line, "You & Me vs Mitch McConnell."

"If Mitch McConnell is accusing me of being a 'conservative rebel' who won't march in lockstep behind his Big Government, big-spending agenda," Moore wrote, "then I plead guilty as charged!"

"I don't have — nor want — the backing of Mitch McConnell and his cronies in Washington," Moore added.

As he corralled Obamacare repeal votes last week, McConnell said he was all in for Strange. "As I would be with any Republican senator. I think he's done an outstanding job."

McConnell will put his formidable fundraising operation to work this week. On Tuesday evening, he's slated to co-host a Capitol Hill reception and dinner benefiting Strange. Attendees are being asked to give up to $10,000, according to an invitation.

Much of the Republican leader's effort in the race is being overseen by the pro-McConnell Senate Leadership Fund. In April, the super PAC held an event in Birmingham, Alabama, to outline its plans to defend Strange, who made an appearance for part of the gathering. Also present was former George W. Bush adviser Karl Rove, who knows Strange, a former state attorney general, from his past work on Alabama judicial races.

"We're in for Luther — money, marbles or chalk," Rove told the crowd, according to one attendee.

Since that time, the group has orchestrated a blistering assault against Brooks. Ads portray the four-term congressman as unsupportive of President Donald Trump, a damaging line of attack in a state where the president is widely popular. One recent Senate Leadership Fund TV ad used footage from 2016 in which the Alabama congressman called then-candidate Trump untrustworthy.

The offensive was borne out of private polling the group conducted in May testing how voters in the state felt about Brooks' comments about Trump last year. There is evidence that the attacks are taking a toll on the congressman. An independent survey released last week showed Strange leading with 33 percent, Moore at 26 percent, and Brooks at 16 percent.

Senate Leadership Fund has spent $3.5 million on the race, by far the largest expenditure of any outside group. Yet that figure is expected to grow significantly, especially if no candidate receives a majority of the vote in the Aug. 15 primary and the contest is forced into a September runoff, as is widely expected. The group has pledged to drop $6 million to $8 million.

"While he doesn't direct what we do, McConnell has made it very clear that Luther's race is his No. 1 political priority right now," said Steven Law, Senate Leadership Fund's president and a former chief of staff to the Republican leader.

The McConnell team is also trying to rattle Brooks. Republican strategist Ward Baker, a McConnell ally whom the leader hand-picked to serve as NRSC executive director during the 2016 campaign, has been offering guidance, free of charge, to Clayton Hinchman, a 34-year-old, West Point-educated Iraq War veteran who has launched a primary campaign against Brooks for his north Alabama congressional seat. Hinchman is echoing many of the same themes national Republicans are using against Brooks in the Senate race, casting him as deeply disloyal to the president.

In an interview, Brooks said he believed McConnell's fingerprints were all over Hinchman's campaign. Brooks said the leader had engaged in a systematic effort to "strong-arm" and "bully" candidates opposing Strange.

"Alabama voters are starting to develop a strong dislike for Mitch McConnell and the establishment machine that thinks they have a right to dictate to the people of Alabama whether a person can qualify as a candidate and who voters would vote for," Brooks said.

Before entering the race in May, Brooks said he reached out to McConnell's office to arrange a meeting with the leader to discuss a list of concerns he had about Strange, whom he has described as ethically compromised. (When then-Alabama Gov. Robert Bentley appointed Strange in February, Bentley was under investigation by Strange's office, which his critics have seized on.)

But Brooks said his request was rejected. "I don't know if he cares or not," the congressman said. "I know that he denied me the opportunity to meet with him to share this information." (McConnell's office declined to comment.)

While McConnell's team is increasingly optimistic about Strange's prospects, it concedes the race hasn't been easy. Senate GOP officials have made it clear to the administration they would like to see Trump express some measure of support for Strange. Yet three White House aides said they don't expect a Trump endorsement, reasoning that the president has little to gain by injecting himself into a fierce intraparty fight.

McConnell recently grew frustrated when the Republican National Committee refused to release coordinated funding that the Senate GOP campaign arm would be able to use to boost Strange — a holdup that the leader and his political aides blamed on the White House. The expenditure was eventually made, but only after weeks of appeals. While McConnell personally lobbied then-chief of staff Reince Priebus, Strange spoke with Trump about it.

In a brief interview, Strange said he and Trump had discussed the race — "We just had a conversation about 'How's the race going, how you doing?' That sort of thing" — but that he wasn't expecting any kind of declaration of presidential support.

As for the help he was getting from McConnell, Strange said he was "very happy to have the support of my colleagues. Who wouldn't be?"

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Trump to roll back flood-risk standard — And set permitting process goal — Panel delivers blow to greens' LNG challenge
Date: Tuesday, August 15, 2017 3:43:09 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 08/15/2017 03:41 PM EDT

With help from Darius Dixon

COME HELL OR HIGH WATER: President Donald Trump will continue his quest to dissolve Obama-era standards and regulations by today rolling back a 2015 standard that requires new federally funded projects be built to withstand strong storms and flooding. The flood standard was designed to protect federal investments from the impacts of climate change, but a White House source said the measure will be killed as part of the executive order Trump is slated to sign this afternoon.

What is it? The Federal Flood Risk Management Standard, as it is known, was established under an executive order issued by former President Barack Obama in 2015, Annie Snider reports. It requires projects ranging from government buildings, like VA hospitals, to bridges and schools funded by federal grants be built to withstand the stronger storms and additional flooding projected to occur as the climate changes. The standard offers options for achieving this, but generally requires construction to withstand a 500-year storm. It hasn't actually taken effect yet, as "each federal agency is tasked with developing its own regulation for implementing the standard, and none have yet been finalized," Annie writes.

ABOUT THAT INFRASTRUCTURE ORDER: The executive order Trump is slated to sign this afternoon will set a two-year goal for the federal government to complete the permitting process for infrastructure projects, Anthony Adragna reports. The order will establish the protocol of "one federal decision" and strive to create accountability for federal agencies involved in the review process, according to the White House.

PANEL DELIVERS BLOW TO GREENS' LNG CHALLENGE: A federal appeals court today swatted away environmentalists' challenge to the Energy Department's liquefied natural gas review. A three-judge panel opted instead to uphold the department's process for evaluating LNG export applications, after the Sierra Club challenged DOE's authorization of the Freeport LNG terminal to export LNG. The group argued the agency "didn't properly estimate how those shipments might increase domestic prices, potentially boost coal use in the power system or increase greenhouse emissions," Darius Dixon writes. "DOE had argued that producing the numbers Sierra Club is seeking would be so speculative as to be meaningless, a position the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals judges unanimously felt justified in deferring to the agency." The judges agreed that DOE "offered a reasoned explanation as to why it believed the indirect effects pertaining to increased gas production were not reasonably foreseeable," Judge Robert Wilkins wrote for the panel. More here.

The Sierra Club criticized the decision as opening the door for more pollution from fracking. "We are disappointed with the Court's refusal to require DOE to use available tools to inform communities of the impact of this additional fracking prior to approving exports," staff attorney Nathan Matthews said in a statement. "This LNG export approval creates unnecessary risks for the people of Freeport, Texas, and for every community that is saddled with fracking rigs next to their homes, schools, and public spaces."

REGULATORS APPROVE MOTION ON VOGTLE: Regulators in Georgia cleared a 14-point motion this morning that outlines the information they want from the owners of the Vogtle nuclear project. Southern Co., the lead owner of the over-budget two-reactor project through its Georgia Power company, is expected to submit a recommendation by the end of the month that will argue for either building one or both units, or abandoning it altogether. The motion was approved alongside a "friendly amendment" from commission Vice Chairman Tim Echols that says the Public Service Commission can rescind or revise its orders if Georgia Power decides to pull the plug on the project for any reason.

MONIZ GROUP PRESSES FOR NUCLEAR SUPPORT: Maintaining the U.S. nuclear industry is critical to maintaining American nonproliferation goals and Navy resources, according to new report from the Energy Futures Initiative. The group, recently formed by former Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz, consolidates several long-standing concerns about the industry's future in light of troubled over-budget projects in the South, including the deterioration of the nuclear supply chain and equipment industries that also support the nuclear Navy. Among its recommendations, the report argues that FERC, an independent agency, be "direct[ed]" to place "greater emphasis on the national security importance of nuclear power and its associated supply chain." It also suggests that the Energy Department loan program continue, an office the Trump administration and Republicans in Congress have pressed to shut down. Read the report.

TRUMP TWEETS ON CEO 'GRANDSTANDERS': The president today hit back at CEOs who recently jumped ship from his manufacturing council. In a tweet this morning, Trump issued a sharp warning: "For every CEO that drops out of the Manufacturing Council, I have many to take their place," he said. "Grandstanders should not have gone on. JOBS!" POLITICO's Nolan McCaskill has more here.

JULY 2017 MATCHES 2016 IN WARMEST TEMPS: Last month was "statistically tied" with July 2016 as the warmest July in the 137 years that records have been kept, according to scientists at NASA. "Last month was about 0.83 degrees Celsius warmer than the mean July temperature of the 1951-1980 period," the agency said in a release. "Only July 2016 showed a similarly high temperature (0.82 [degrees] C), all previous months of July were more than a tenth of a degree cooler."

SETTLEMENT IN CWA CASE WITH CALIFORNIA FARMER: The DOJ set a $1.1 million settlement with a California farmer over wetlands destruction, ending a case that agricultural groups and property rights activists had criticized as federal overreach under the Clean Water Act. John Duarte and Duarte Nursery Inc. agreed to pay $330,000 in civil penalties and fund $770,000 in restoration work to compensate for damage to 22 acres of protected streams and wetlands on his property. The agreement allows Duarte to return most of the site back to agricultural use and seek future determinations about whether streams and wetlands on the property are subject to federal protections.

MEET RICK PERRY: The White House posted a video interview with Energy Secretary Rick Perry today, as part of its "Meet the Cabinet" series. In it, Perry says that the most rewarding part about his job is his staff, which he called a "substantial bunch of professionals," and touted their work as "the most interesting work in the world." The former Texas governor also said he is most excited about the nuclear side of the department, and said in his free time he heads home to Texas to spend time with his wife and "four great dogs." Trump to roll back climate-focused flood standard Back

By Annie Snider | 08/15/2017 12:41 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will roll back a flood standard designed to protect federal investments from stronger storms as part of an executive order set to be signed this afternoon, according to a White House source.

The Federal Flood Risk Management Standard was established under an executive order issued by President Barack Obama in 2015. It requires that new federally funded projects — from government buildings like Veterans Administrations hospitals to bridges and schools funded by federal grants — be built to withstand the stronger storms and additional flooding projected to occur as the climate changes. It does not apply to the National Flood Insurance Program.

The Obama administration's standard offers multiple options for achieving greater flood protection, but generally requires construction to withstand a 500-year storm. The previous standard, on the books for more than four decades, required construction to take place outside of the 100-year floodplain. The new standard has not actually taken effect yet; each federal agency is tasked with developing its own regulation for implementing the standard, and none have yet been finalized.

Industry groups objected to the standard, arguing it was developed behind closed doors and could greatly increase costs.

Environmental groups have objected to efforts to repeal the standard.

"Ninety percent of all natural disasters in the United States involve flooding. These events claim lives and strain the capacity of government agencies and local communities to adequately respond and provide relief," Laura Lightbody with the Pew Charitable Trusts said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump is slated to sign an executive order on infrastructure containing the roll back of the Federal Flood Risk Management standard at 3 p.m. today.

Trump order to change 'protocol' for infrastructure permitting Back

By Anthony Adragna | 08/15/2017 09:05 AM EDT

President Donald Trump will today sign an executive order setting a two-year goal for the federal government to complete the permitting process for infrastructure projects, a spokesperson told POLITICO.

The order, which Trump plans to sign after meeting with his infrastructure team, will establish the protocol of "one federal decision" and strive to create accountability for federal agencies involved in the review process, according to the White House.

Among those slated to attend are Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao and White House Office of Management and Budget Director Mick Mulvaney.

In January, Trump signed an executive order instructing the chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality to create expedited procedures and deadlines for environmental reviews and approvals for high-priority infrastructure projects.

Then, in June remarks at the Department of Transportation, Trump announced a new office within CEQ that he said would "root out inefficiency, clarify lines of authority and streamline federal and state and local procedures so that communities can modernize their aging infrastructure without fear of outdated federal rules getting in their way."

There's been no further word since then on the new CEQ office and Trump has not nominated anyone to run the White House's in-house environmental policy shop, although names of some contenders have emerged. Mary Neumayr, formerly senior counsel to the House Energy and Commerce Committee, serves as acting CEQ chairwoman.

Federal appeals court swats away challenge to DOE's LNG review Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/15/2017 11:29 AM EDT

A federal appeals court landed a major legal blow against environmentalists today when a three-judge panel upheld the Energy Department's process for evaluating liquefied natural gas export applications.

The Sierra Club had challenged DOE's authorization of the Freeport LNG terminal to export liquefied natural gas, arguing that the agency didn't properly estimate how those shipments might increase domestic prices, potentially boost coal use in the power system or increase greenhouse emissions.

DOE had argued that producing the numbers Sierra Club is seeking would be so speculative as to be meaningless, a position the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals judges unanimously felt justified in deferring to the agency.

Although DOE made some of its arguments "needlessly complicated," the judges agreed that it "offered a reasoned explanation as to why it believed the indirect effects pertaining to increased gas production were not reasonably foreseeable," Judge Robert Wilkins wrote for the panel.

During oral arguments in February, the panel seemed to sympathize with Sierra Club's desire for a more detailed analysis of exporting U.S. natural gas while also hesitating to find fault in the Energy Department's work up to that point.

The judges today ultimately opted to take a "limited and deferential review" and said the Sierra Club didn't knock down the government's concerns about a speculative analysis.

DOE reasonably argued, Wilkins wrote, that "every natural-gas producing region in the country is a potential source for new gas wells in order to meet export-induced natural gas demand."

WHAT'S NEXT: The D.C. Circuit announced Monday that it would take oral arguments Oct. 18 on a similar Sierra Club lawsuit against DOE over the agency's export approval for Dominion's Cove Point LNG project.

Trump attacks CEO 'grandstanders' who quit his manufacturing council Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 08/15/2017 11:47 AM EDT

President Donald Trump issued a sharp warning Tuesday to American CEOs who sit on his manufacturing council: You're not irreplaceable.

"For every CEO that drops out of the Manufacturing Council, I have many to take their place," Trump boasted in a tweet Tuesday morning. "Grandstanders should not have gone on. JOBS!"

But just minutes after Trump fired off the tweet, another executive joined the ranks of the three CEOs who withdrew from the president's manufacturing council on Monday in the wake of Trump's response to racial violence in Charlottesville, Virginia, over the weekend.

"I'm resigning from the Manufacturing Jobs Initiative because it's the right thing for me to do," Scott Paul, president of the Alliance for American Manufacturing, tweeted Tuesday morning. Paul represents the steel industry, which has been a major supporter of Trump.

Merck CEO Kenneth Frazier first drew Trump's ire on Monday after becoming the first executive to quit the president's council.

"I am resigning from the President's American Manufacturing Council," Frazier said in a statement posted by Merck's Twitter account Monday morning. "America's leaders must honor our fundamental values by clearly rejecting expressions of hatred, bigotry and group supremacy, which run counter to the American ideal that all people are created equal."

Trump responded within the hour, although he ignored the root of Frazier's exit. "Now that Ken Frazier of Merck Pharma has resigned from President's Manufacturing Council, he will have more time to LOWER RIPOFF DRUG PRICES!" Trump wrote Monday afternoon.

Hours later, he added: ".@Merck Pharma is a leader in higher & higher drug prices while at the same time taking jobs out of the U.S. Bring jobs back & LOWER PRICES!"

The CEOs of Under Armour and Intel also resigned from their perches on Monday.

"I love our country & company. I am stepping down from the council to focus on inspiring & uniting through power of sport," Under Armour tweeted in a statement attributed to CEO Kevin Plank.

"I have already made clear my abhorrence at the recent hate-spawned violence in Charlottesville, and earlier today I called on all leaders to condemn the white supremacists and their ilk who marched and committed violence," Intel CEO Brian Krzanich said in a company blog post. "I resigned because I want to make progress, while many in Washington seem more concerned with attacking anyone who disagrees with them."

Trump, who premised much of his presidential campaign on his business acumen, has embraced executives since entering the Oval Office. He has often invited business leaders to the White House for roundtables and frequently pledges to reduce burdensome regulations to allow their businesses to thrive.

But his rhetoric has made it increasingly difficult for companies to embrace the Trump White House, and the relationship between the two has been rocky at times.

Tesla CEO Elon Musk and Disney CEO Bob Iger, for example, both quit the president's advisory councils earlier this summer after the president announced he would pull the U.S. out of the Paris climate accord.

Former Uber CEO Travis Kalanick similarly resigned his council post in February after facing pressure over the company's response to the president's travel ban barring immigration from Muslim-majority countries. Kalanick resigned as CEO of Uber in June.

Even as recently as Monday, another CEO distanced himself over Trump's Charlottesville comments, which initially failed to called out hate groups like white supremacists, neo-Nazis and the KKK. For his part, though, he didn't go so far as to quit the president's council.

"GE has no tolerance for hate, bigotry or racism, and we strongly condemn the violent extremism in Charlottesville over the weekend," a company spokesperson said Monday, adding that "it is important for GE to participate in the discussion on how to drive growth and productivity in the U.S., therefore, Jeff Immelt will remain on the Presidential Committee on American Manufacturing."

DOJ settles high-profile Clean Water Act case with farmer Back

By Annie Snider | 08/15/2017 02:41 PM EDT

The Department of Justice today announced a $1.1 million settlement with a California farmer over wetlands destruction, ending a case that agricultural groups and property rights activists had criticized as federal overreach under the Clean Water Act.

John Duarte and Duarte Nursery Inc. agreed to pay $330,000 in civil penalties and fund $770,000 in restoration work to compensate for damage to 22 acres of protected streams and wetlands on his property. The agreement allows Duarte to return most of the site back to agricultural use and seek future determinations about whether streams and wetlands on the property are subject to federal protections.

Duarte was found guilty by a federal district court judge last year of violating the Clean Water Act by hiring a consultant to conduct "deep ripping" through waterways protected under the 1972 water law. Most farming practices, including plowing, are exempted from the law's permitting requirements, but deep ripping is not.

"Today's agreement affirms the Department of Justice's commitment to the rule of law, results in meaningful environmental restoration, and brings to an end protracted litigation," said Jeffrey Wood, acting assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resource Division. The DOJ emphasized that "this case is not (and will not be used as) a pretext for federal prosecution of farmers who engage in normal plowing on their farms."

In a statement, Duarte said settling was a "difficult decision" that he came to "reluctantly" given the risks that an even greater penalty would have posed to his business.

WHAT'S NEXT: The settlement agreement is subject to 30 days of public comment and must ultimately be approved by the court.

Trump may not get the 'win' he seeks in NAFTA talks Back

By Doug Palmer | 08/15/2017 05:20 AM EDT

This article is part of a continuing series examining the finer points and nettlesome issues as the United States, Canada and Mexico revisit NAFTA.

As a candidate, Donald Trump constantly called NAFTA the worst trade deal in history and promised "to get a better deal for our workers."

Now that he is president, Trump is about to find out how hard it is to get an agreement that satisfies not only those workers who feel "shafted by NAFTA" but also the powerful business interests currently benefiting from billions of dollars in cross-border sales.

Top trade officials from the United States, Canada and Mexico will sit down on Wednesday to begin thrashing over hundreds of issues as distinct as Canadian dairy barriers and digital trade issues affecting both countries.

Even if negotiators from all three nations are able to come to consensus quickly on a new deal in the coming months, Trump still has to get the agreement through Congress, which past votes on trade issues have shown is no easy task.

"This whole business of renegotiating NAFTA was a campaign pledge in search of a constituency," said Scott Miller, a former lobbyist for Procter & Gamble now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "No business community member, no enterprise, no farm group ever asked for this."

Trump blames the North American Free Trade Agreement for shuttering factories across the industrial Midwest. The current reality, however, business groups warn, is that pulling out of the pact would endanger an estimated 14 million jobs that depend on trade with Canada and Mexico — the two largest export markets for the United States.

Miller said he saw at least a 5 percent chance that Trump would get so frustrated that he would make good on a campaign threat to withdraw from the pact, which would damage the economies of many predominantly rural states that voted for him last year. That could divide the party headed into the 2018 midterm election, potentially increasing the chances of Democratic Party gains.

Another possibility is that Trump strikes a deal, but there's so little support in Congress that he never submits it for a vote and the pact is left as is, Miller said, an outcome that would also make him appear weak.

Although many Democrats share Trump's negative view of NAFTA, they are setting a high bar for what needs to be changed to get their support. They have also criticized, for example, borrowing provisions from the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which he discarded on his third day in office.

"NAFTA has cost millions of jobs and suppressed incomes across America," said Rep. Rosa DeLauro, a Connecticut Democrat who led the fight to defeat TPP. "Americans want a better deal: one that addresses our job losses and stagnant incomes by changing provisions in NAFTA that make it easier to outsource good-paying American jobs, as well as eliminating special rules that allow corporations to sue the U.S. government before a private panel of three corporate lawyers for unlimited taxpayer compensation. A free trade deal that actually helps our economy should include strong, fully enforceable labor and environmental protections, and rules to prevent currency manipulation."

On the Republican side, if the White House brings Congress what the party considers to be a bad NAFTA agreement, it could face stiff opposition led by Sen. John Cornyn, the No. 2 Senate Republican, who has urged Trump to modernize the pact, not end it.

The White House seems to have gotten the message that it needs to tread carefully in talks with Canada and Mexico.

"NAFTA needs to be reformed to help protect American workers and create more jobs at home. We should keep the parts that work, especially for much of American agriculture, but fix the parts that don't," White House chief economic adviser Gary Cohn said in a statement over the weekend, setting a civil tone for the talks. "Working together, we will modernize this agreement to meet the needs of today's economy, just as the president promised."

Trump also stands to face a revolt from business and farm groups that typically round up support for trade agreements. They are the ones who have the most to lose if he makes drastic changes to the pact.

"Any efforts to modernize the deal must be done the right way and guided by a few key objectives," U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Tom Donohue said in a speech earlier this year. "First and foremost, do no harm. We must not disrupt the $1.3 trillion in annual trade that crosses our borders."

That point was underscored by 32 freshman House Republicans in a recent letter to U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer. Twenty-seven of those new members come from parts of the country that Trump won last year, including Rust Belt states like Pennsylvania and Michigan, where his anti-NAFTA message seemed to resonate the most.

"We recognize that a 23-year-old agreement needs updating, and commend your desire to make improvements and ensure strict enforcement," the lawmakers wrote. "We are also keenly aware of the potential for damage to U.S. farmers, businesses, manufacturers, service providers and workers if long-standing agreements are suddenly vacated."

Meanwhile, labor and environmental groups that have long clamored for changes to NAFTA and other trade agreements are already complaining that Trump's proposed reforms don't go far enough.

"These objectives largely replicate those of the failed Trans-Pacific Partnership and won't satisfy the expectations the president created for a revival of America's manufacturing heartland," Richard Trumka, president of the AFL-CIO, said shortly after the Trump administration rolled out its goals for renegotiating the pact.

A glimpse of Trump's tough road ahead can be seen by looking back at a 2015 vote to give former President Barack Obama "trade promotion authority" to finish the 12-nation TPP deal.

Obama tried to sell that agreement as an update of the NAFTA agreement, since it included both Canada and Mexico, along with nine other countries in the Asia-Pacific region. Even so, he got support from only 28 Democrats in the House and 13 in the Senate.

Congressional aides say it is unlikely that many of the 158 House Democrats and 33 Senate Democrats and independents who opposed Obama on TPP will rally to Trump's side on a revised NAFTA agreement, especially because the Trump administration's negotiating points borrow heavily from the TPP deal.

Trump's best hope for passage, one lobbyist said, is to craft a revised NAFTA agreement that hews closely to traditional Republican priorities; ignores demands from those Democrats who are unlikely to vote for the pact; and takes the best pieces from the TPP while strengthening other areas, like intellectual property protections, that could muster enough votes for bipartisan approval in both chambers. The lobbyist spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his clients.

But for every concession made to pick up Democratic votes, Trump's chief negotiators will have to calculate how many he loses on the Republican side, one congressional aide said.

The U.S. International Trade Commission is required to do an economic analysis of the new NAFTA before it is submitted to Congress. The panel's assessment of the much larger TPP pact estimated it would create only 128,000 net new full-time jobs by 2032, and increase gross domestic product by just 0.15 percent over the same period.

Further complicating matters, Mexican voters go to the polls next July to elect a new president. That means Mexican negotiators have a window between now and possibly February to make significant concessions, Miller said. After that, talks could shut down and not resume until the new Mexican president takes office in December 2018, he said.

Striking a deal in the next six months would be extremely fast. To put it in perspective, a recent agreement between the United States and Mexico on just one issue — sugar — took months to negotiate. Talks between the United States and Canada on another single issue — lumber — began in the Obama administration and still are not finished. The revised NAFTA agreement could have as many as 30 different chapters, covering all aspects of trade.

However long it takes, Trump will be graded on his work when NAFTA 2.0 is complete. And he risks the possibility that he may not find much to tweet about in the results.

The GOP's nastiest primary Back

By Maggie Severns and Kevin Robillard | 08/15/2017 05:09 AM EDT

The slugfest underway between Republican Reps. Luke Messer and Todd Rokita in Indiana isn't just for the right to compete for possibly the GOP's best opportunity to seize a Senate seat from Democrats in next year's midterms.

It's a chance to finally settle the score between two ambitious pols who've been vying to outdo one another politically since they graduated from the same small college more than 25 years ago.

Yes, this one is personal.

Their campaign didn't officially get underway until last week, but Messer, 48, has already accused Rokita of attacking his wife and "spreading lies" about his record. Rokita, 47, has questioned his rival's mental health, calling Messer "unhinged" and a "ticking time bomb."

With 10 Democratic senators from states that President Donald Trump carried up for reelection in 2018, the scale of opportunity for Republican gains has already spawned several no-holds-barred primaries. But few states are as ripe for a Republican challenge as Indiana — where Democratic Sen. Joe Donnelly is unusually vulnerable, running in a state Trump carried by 19 points — and no primary has gotten so nasty, so quickly.

More than a dozen professional colleagues and personal acquaintances painted the hostility between Rokita and Messer as the product of three decades of pent-up rivalry. The two men, who both declined interview requests, have climbed Indiana's political ladder alongside each other for years and even attended the same small, all-male Wabash College together in the early 1990s — a school whose unofficial motto, a former dean noted with a touch of irony, is "competition without malice."

"I've been watching the race between Todd and Luke," said David Hadley, the former dean of students at Wabash College, "and wondering if that's going to carry through or not."

Over the years, Messer has enjoyed the full embrace of Indiana's political elite, which appointed him to a seat in the state Legislature and embraced him as part of its leadership. That same elite has always kept Rokita at bay.

Rokita became one of the nation's youngest statewide elected officials when he was elected Indiana's secretary of state at age 31. But he made enemies among Republicans in the state Legislature, which years later redrew Rokita's congressional district in a way that put his home on the wrong side of the new boundary. Many of Indiana's most prominent political leaders, including Vice President Mike Pence's brother Greg, have lined up behind Messer. And when Rokita put his name forward for governor last year when Pence became Trump's vice presidential nominee, the state Republican central committee instead went with now-Gov. Eric Holcomb, a former party chairman.

"Todd has a sense that 'Messer gets all the breaks and I don't,'" said one GOP operative. "Now they're placed in a zero-sum game, and their underlying feelings come out."

Those feelings reached a boiling point in May and have not calmed since. Messer had been considering a challenge to Donnelly since at least last summer, according to allies, and at first, Rokita waited quietly in the wings. But early this year, Rokita started raising money and meeting with Republican leaders in Washington. Then, a May Associated Press story revealed that Messer's wife, a lawyer, was being paid a $240,000-a-year consulting fee from an Indianapolis suburb.

The attack struck a particular nerve with Messer, who thought it was prompted by Rokita, according to two people familiar with his thinking. And he didn't hold back.

"Frankly, I've known Todd a long time and very little surprises me," Messer told a local TV station. "But I would say it's not typical that someone starts a campaign by coming after someone's spouse."

Rokita kept needling Messer in public, about that story and for relocating his family to Virginia. Messer distributed a lengthy email accusing Rokita of "spreading lies and half-truths," which Rokita's campaign responded to by calling Messer "unhinged" and a "ticking time bomb." Soon, as both candidates lashed out at each other in the press, a dozen edits appeared on Messer's Wikipedia page echoing one of Rokita's main lines of attack on Messer: his work as a lobbyist.

They have not always clashed, though their careers have been entwined from their earliest days. The affable Messer was the starting middle linebacker and captain of the football team at clubby Wabash, which has produced an unusual number of Indiana politicians for its size, while the hard-charging Rokita worked at the student newspaper.

When the secretary of state race came up in 2002 and Rokita decided to run, Messer, who had made a failed bid for Congress and then became the executive director of the Indiana GOP, passed on running himself and instead worked to raise money, make ads and bring in staff to elevate the relatively unknown Rokita. Bob Grand, a longtime Indiana lobbyist who is now supporting Messer, described Messer as a "tireless advocate" for getting Rokita elected.

But many of the men who helped Rokita defeat a slew of other prominent Republicans in the primary have since abandoned him and are backing Messer for Senate, including his campaign manager Tom John and Grand. Rokita has gone on to earn a reputation as an exacting boss, prone to calling staff late at night.

"Todd has been more of a squeaky wheel than Luke," said Dan Dumezich, chairman of Rokita's finance committee. "Sometimes the squeaky wheel gets the grease, and sometimes the squeaky wheel just irritates people."

Rokita and Messer declined to comment for this story.

Rokita ran particularly afoul of the state Legislature — where Messer had quickly risen up the ranks during a stint several years earlier — in 2009, as lawmakers began preparing for the once-in-a-decade redistricting process. Then in his second term as secretary of state, Rokita proposed making it a felony for lawmakers to consider politics when drawing political boundaries. He toured the state promoting his idea and drew up sample maps with new boundaries.

The Legislature bristled at Rokita's suggestion, which would have given his office new power and disrupted lawmakers' safe seats. The state Senate president — a fellow Republican — said Rokita had "crossed the line."

Two years later, lawmakers gave Rokita his due: The Legislature drew Rokita, who by then was serving his first term in Congress, out of his district. His home sat just 500 yards from the line — a slight that lawmakers called coincidental and Rokita publicly labeled as "comeuppance." (Rokita would later move into his new district.)

Messer had a very different experience in the Legislature: He was appointed to a state House seat in May 2003, and by 2005 was serving in the chamber's leadership. After a Time magazine story spotlighted Indiana as a center of the high school dropout crisis, Messer embraced school reform and found support from Gov. Mitch Daniels, as well as Indiana's elite donors.

Rokita eyed running for Senate in 2010, but opted instead to run for the House. He arrived on Capitol Hill in 2011 and within months found himself at the center of a national clash after he joined other newly elected conservatives in refusing to vote to raise the debt ceiling, enraging House leaders. Messer ran for Congress in 2010 unsuccessfully, but succeeded two years later on his third try. The Wabash grads then found themselves rubbing elbows — and at times, throwing them — on Capitol Hill.

Messer again rose up the ranks fast: Within two years he was elected as chair of the House Republican Policy Committee. And he again embraced education by leading a school choice caucus, hosting rallies attended by John Boehner and Eric Cantor that featured Messer as the smiling emcee.

While Rokita appears endlessly willing to take on unpopular — but important — fights, Messer has been quick to build coalitions and quickly rose to leadership positions in both the state House and in Congress.

But Messer's skill at listening to people and building coalitions can have downsides as well, a GOP strategist warned. "Luke's personality is to try to placate both sides. You may not ultimately satisfy anybody," he said.

And Rokita, who led an education subcommittee, jockeyed with Messer for prominence on their key issue. In 2015, he was working diligently on a major education bill when Messer nearly unraveled a year's work. Messer made a stand in favor of adopting school vouchers, a controversial issue that jeopardized the bill; Rokita fumed to colleagues until Messer backed down.

Today, both men are fuming in public as they launch their campaigns. Both say they're focused on running campaigns that can eventually defeat Donnelly — but they frequently fall back into a now-familiar habit, nipping at each other instead of their Democratic foe.

But there's also an upshot for people like Grand, the Indiana lobbyist, who happens to share an alma mater with the two Indiana congressmen.

"Either way," Grand said, "Wabash College wins."

Trump plays both sides with Charlottesville response Back

By Eliana Johnson | 08/14/2017 08:47 PM EDT

President Donald Trump caved to pressure from his senior advisers on Monday when he rebuked neo-Nazis and white supremacists for their involvement in the rally that ended in the death of a 32-year-old Charlottesville woman — but it may have been a Pyrrhic victory.

His remarks on Monday, authored in part by chief speechwriter Stephen Miller, put some of his most ardent supporters in the cross hairs, and quelled the outrage sparked by his initial statement, which was widely considered weak and equivocal.

But the White House's slow-footed response, which played out over three days, fit a broader pattern that has hobbled the president before. Pushed to condemn some of the ugly factions of the alt-right made prominent by his candidacy, Trump has fallen back on the same tactic: delay, delay, delay.

In fact, Trump had a written statement on Saturday that was similar in tone and substance to the one he delivered on Monday, according to a senior White House adviser. But the president veered from those prepared remarks.

Political analysts said Trump's drawn-out response was part of a double game — an effort to avoid alienating part of his base followed quickly by a pivot to tamp down the outrage.

"He feels he can keep his base happy by being mute for 48 hours, and then he can come in and mute the so-called mainstream media world," said presidential historian Douglas Brinkley.

The White House's response appears to have done just that. The president's short speech on Monday earned bipartisan praise while leaving some of Saturday's marchers still feeling a part of the Trump movement.

"He actually sounded presidential," Virginia Sen. Mark Warner, a Democrat, told NBC News. "But I'm disappointed it took him a couple of days."

Meanwhile, Richard Spencer, an organizer of the Charlottesville rally, told reporters that Trump had not condemned his movement. "His statement today was more kumbaya nonsense," Spencer said. "Only a dumb person would take those lines seriously."

The white supremacist website the Daily Stormer celebrated the president's response over the weekend. David Duke credited the president with inspiring Saturday's rally and lashed out at Trump for his initial remarks. He did not respond to a request for comment.

Trump's Johnny-come-lately response to the tragedy followed the template he established during the campaign when he was pressed to disavow the endorsement of Duke — a former imperial wizard of the Ku Klux Klan and a leader of the Saturday event. In August 2015, Duke declared Trump "the best of the lot" of the GOP candidates.

Over the course of several months, Trump dodged questions, feigned ignorance and stonewalled reporters to avoid directly repudiating Duke's endorsement. "Sure, if that would make you feel better, I would certainly repudiate. I don't know anything about him," he told MSNBC's John Heilemann in August 2015.

Duke ratcheted up his support for Trump in February 2016, urging listeners of his radio show to cast their ballots for the real estate mogul turned politician, culminating in a testy exchange with CNN's Jake Tapper. "I don't know anything about what you're even talking about with white supremacy or white supremacists," Trump told him. "I don't know — did he endorse me, or what's going on? Because I know nothing about David Duke. I know nothing about white supremacists."

Pressed about the Klan in particular, Trump said, "You may have groups in there that are totally fine and it would be very unfair, so give me a list of the groups and I'll let you know."

Trump later blamed his fumbled response on a faulty television earpiece — of course he disavowed Duke, he told NBC the following day. But that came after his remarks had become front-page news and sparked backlash on both sides of the aisle.

As the violence escalated on Saturday, the president was briefed by several aides. Homeland Security adviser Thomas Bossert told Trump that protesters on both sides white supremacists armed with torches, baseball bats and batons, as well as counterprotesters, club-wielding "anti-fas" — were inciting violence, according to a White House aide familiar with the situation. That gave the president the runway to point the finger at both sides, setting off a three-day political firestorm that didn't subside until Monday.

"It was David Duke redux," Brinkley said. The president's name was not attached to a statement circulated by the White House to reporters on Sunday indicating that he condemned the hate groups behind the rally, which exacerbated the situation.

Politicians and editorial pages across the political spectrum condemned Trump's mealy-mouthed response over the weekend. National Review's editors called it "vague and equivocal." The Wall Street Journal editorial page labeled it a "missed opportunity." And the New York Post, the president's favorite hometown newspaper, declared, "It shouldn't be that hard to summon up a few Trumpian terms like 'losers' and 'really, really bad people' to describe the hundreds of neo-Nazis, Klansmen, white supremacists and the like who descended on the college town — not after one of them has killed an innocent."

There are also signs that Trump's response to the crisis is causing him to bleed political support — if not from the alt-right, from rank-and-file Republicans who are moving to distance themselves from the president as his daily approval rating dipped to just 34 percent, according to Gallup, the lowest level of his presidency.

Sen. Cory Gardner of Colorado, who leads the National Republican Senatorial Committee, was one of the first GOP lawmakers to criticize Trump's response on Saturday. Gardner is responsible for protecting and growing the Senate majority in 2018.

"Mr. President, we must call evil by its name," Gardner wrote on Twitter. "These were white supremacists and this was domestic terrorism."

Subject: Afternoon Energy: Trump to say au revoir — EU, China reaffirm commitment — Greens decry Trump decision
Date: Wednesday, May 31, 2017 3:52:50 PM

By Kelsey Tamborrino | 05/31/2017 03:50 PM EDT

TRUMP TO SAY AU REVOIR: In a move that is already infuriating American allies globally, a White House official said today President Donald Trump has decided to pull the U.S. out of the Paris climate change agreement. The decision to withdraw would mark a victory for the nationalist wing of the Trump White House, including chief strategist Steve Bannon and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, who argued that the Paris agreement could hobble domestic energy goals. But it'd be a huge blow to Trump's daughter Ivanka and son-in-law Jared Kushner, who raised concerns that a withdrawal would damage U.S. relations with European nations and other countries that support the pact.

Andrew Restuccia and Josh Dawsey report that administration officials have cautioned that they are still sorting out the details of how exactly Trump will withdraw. One noted that nothing is final until an announcement is made and the Associated Press reports there could be "caveats in the language" announcing a withdrawal.

For his part, the president continued to stoke the suspense on Twitter, writing: "I will be announcing my decision on the Paris Accord over the next few days. MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN!" If the president does withdraw from the 195-nation pact, the U.S. would join only two other countries who have declined to join the agreement: Syria and Nicaragua.

Welcome to Afternoon Energy. I'm your host, Kelsey Tamborrino. EXXON SHAREHOLDERS BACK CLIMATE RESOLUTION: Exxon Mobil shareholders today called on the company to share more information on how it plans to address climate change and associated regulations, Ben Lefebvre reports. "Nearly two-thirds of Exxon's shareholders backed a proposal on Wednesday calling for the company to assess how climate change and global efforts to limit temperature increases will affect its business. The vote is non-binding, but the results show that the once-fringe idea of linking climate change to big oil's operations has gained momentum." More here.

MORE PARIS FALLOUT: The reaction to the news around the globe has been swift. "Climate change is undeniable," the United Nations tweeted from its official account this morning, quoting from a speech by Secretary General António Guterres. "Climate action is unstoppable. Climate solutions provide opportunities that are unmatched."

Tesla CEO Elon Musk, the Trump administration's go-to tech industry executive, was not pleased with the reports. If the president follows through on the decision to pull out of Paris, Musk said on Twitter that he would "have no choice" but to cut off his participation in White House business councils, Nancy Scola reports.

And green groups reacted with fury: Both the Sierra Club and LCV promised to push ongoing action at the state and local level to accelerate decarbonization, Eric Wolff reports. "Trump has made a historic mistake which our grandchildren will look back on with stunned dismay," Sierra Club Executive Director Michael Brune said in a statement. And Gene Karpinski, president of the League of Conservation Voters, said in his own statement that the president "has abandoned the standard of American leadership."

Conservative groups are encouraged by the news that Trump will withdraw, although they are eager to hear it directly from him, Eric reports. "I am super happy, but of course I don't believe in counting chickens before they're hatched," said Marlo Lewis, a senior fellow at the Competitive Enterprise Institute.

ANY QUESTIONS? What exactly would it mean for Trump to withdraw from the pact? Nick Juliano has some answers here.

EU AND CHINA HONE IN: Internationally, the EU and China have responded to the news by deepening their commitment to address climate change, POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff reports. Both are set to pledge deeper cooperation on the Paris climate agreement and to promote clean energy technologies. "The EU and China consider climate action and the clean energy transition an imperative," a draft leaders' statement for their summit on Thursday and Friday says. "Stepping up action will provide both sides with significant opportunities."

IT'S [NOT] THE END OF THE WORLD, AS WE KNOW IT: Maroš Šefcovic, the EU's vice president for the energy union, said today the U.S. decision to pull out of Paris wouldn't bring about the end of the world. "For Europe there is no plan B, because we do not have a planet B. ... If they decide to pull out, this would be disappointing, but I really don't think that this would change the course of mankind," he told reporters.

HOT TAKES: Former EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy today penned an op-ed in Foreign Policy, where she observes it's time for the U.S. to "lean in" on the issue of climate change. "All nations and peoples have an interest in lowering pollution, which harms our health, stifles economic growth, creates instability, and knows no boundaries," the former EPA head writes. In short, McCarthy says, "the current administration doesn't seem to get it." It argues that EPA needs to return to its "core mission," McCarthy writes, "as if carbon pollution doesn't threaten public health and safety — never mind its impact on clean air and water."

— Todd Stern, who served as special envoy for climate change during the Obama administration, wrote in The Atlantic today that "the president seems prepared to follow his own misguided calculus" on Paris "and, in the coming days, could render a decision that is indefensible." Pulling out of Paris could cause serious diplomatic consequences, Stern writes. Read more here.

NEW YORK TAKES ACTION: New York Mayor Bill de Blasio said today in a tweet his state will take matters into its own hands. "I plan to sign an executive order maintaining New York City's commitment to the Paris Agreement," he wrote in reply to a previous tweet that said the Paris agreement "was the biggest step forward we've taken in many years. It's unconscionable for the president to step away from it."

CLIMATE CAUCUS DOUBLES DOWN: Republican Rep. Carlos Curbelo, one of the founders of the Bipartisan Climate Solutions Caucus, said the group's members must "redouble our efforts" after news surfaced of Trump withdrawing from the Paris climate agreement. Curbelo was one of the few Republicans commenting on news the White House planned to pull out of the deal. The Democratic co-chair of the caucus, Ted Deutch, also slammed the White House news, saying Trump's decision "has the potential to irreparably harm our earth, dramatically hinder our economic growth and fundamentally change our way of life." Eric has more here.

EPA HALTS METHANE RULES: EPA today placed a 90-day stay on multiple additional portions of its 2016 rule setting methane emissions limits for new oil and gas industry sources, Alex Guillén reports. The delay is needed as the agency considers several petitions to reconsider parts of the regulation, other pieces of which the agency put on hold in April. Two more parts of the rule EPA will now reconsider are standards for well site pneumatic pumps and requirements for closed vent systems to be certified by a professional engineer, according to a Federal Register notice signed by Pruitt on Friday and running soon.

NRDC readies lawsuit: Following the announcement, the Natural Resources Defense Council said it will sue to block the Trump administration from "rolling back protections against dangerous air pollution from the oil and gas industry."

TEXAS LAWMAKERS SEND GOVERNOR BILL ON WIND NEAR MILITARY BASES: The Texas Legislature has sent Gov. Greg Abbott a bill, S.B. 277, that would disqualify wind projects that were built or started construction on or after Sept. 1 from certain property tax exemptions if they are built within 25 miles of a military airbase or facility. The legislation says the bill is needed for security purposes.

Trump expected to withdraw from Paris climate deal Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Josh Dawsey | 05/31/2017 08:27 AM EDT

President Donald Trump is planning to pull the United States out of the Paris climate change agreement, a White House official said Wednesday morning — only to have Trump himself revive the suspense less than an hour later.

The withdrawal would fulfill a Trump campaign promise but would be certain to infuriate America's allies across the globe. It would threaten to destabilize the most comprehensive pact ever negotiated to blunt the most devastating effects of climate change. And it would fly in the face of support the deal has drawn from a host of major business interests, including giant oil companies such as Shell and Exxon Mobil.

Intrigue surrounding Paris has accelerated in the past week, after Pope Francis and other world leaders pressed Trump during his European visit not to abandon the nearly 200-nation 2015 agreement. Administration officials said they are still sorting out the details of how exactly Trump would withdraw, and one noted that nothing is final until an announcement is made.

Trump declined to make it official, at least not yet. "I will be announcing my decision on the Paris Accord over the next few days. MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN!" he tweeted Wednesday morning.

Trump was slated to continue discussing the issue with senior advisers on Wednesday. But reaction began pouring in Wednesday, including a threat by Tesla CEO Elon Musk to stop participating in White House business councils if the president pulls out.

Axios first reported the news that Trump would withdraw.

Administration officials sent mixed messages on Wednesday, with some saying they are confident the president would pull out and others urging caution. But officials on both sides of the issue have become increasingly convinced he plans to exit the deal, despite arguments from moderate advisers like Trump's daughter Ivanka that withdrawing would damage U.S. relations abroad. Others who have supported staying included Trump's secretary of state, Rex Tillerson.

Prime supporters of leaving the deal, including senior White House adviser Stephen Bannon, argued that its terms would hobble the U.S. economy and Trump's energy agenda.

Reaction from the international community Wednesday was swift, mostly without mentioning Trump by name. "Climate change is undeniable," the United Nations tweeted from its official account Wednesday morning, quoting from a speech by Secretary General António Guterres. "Climate action is unstoppable. Climate solutions provide opportunities that are unmatched."

German Chancellor Angela Merkel's chief of staff expressed hope that the president could still be swayed. "As far as I can see, it is an ongoing debate within the administration," Peter Altmaier said at a POLITICO Connected Citizens Summit Wednesday afternoon in Berlin.

In the U.S., conservative groups were preparing to celebrate.

"Au revoir to the Paris agreement indeed," said Nick Loris, an economist at the Heritage Foundation, praising Trump for showing "resolute leadership."

"Without any impact on global temperatures, Paris was the open door for egregious regulation, cronyism and government spending that would have been as disastrous for the American economy as it is proving to be for those in Europe," Loris added.

But the watchdog group Public Citizen said Trump was committing an "epic blunder."

"In an administration that seems incapable of doing much right, Trump's stances on climate change and clean energy still stand out as exceptionally wrongheaded," said David Arkush, managing director of the group's climate program. "The U.S. already is suffering from the effects of global warming, and right now we are on course for catastrophic harm as soon as the second half of this century. At the same time, solutions are readily available."

Meanwhile, the deal's support from business leaders showed how the politics of climate change have evolved, as some multinational companies seek regulatory certainty while some start-ups see opportunities in a shift toward greener forms of energy. Nearly two-thirds of Exxon's shareholders voted Wednesday to urge the company to incorporate the Paris deal in its business models, regardless of what the U.S. does.

One of the most outspoken responses to Trump's expected decision came from Musk, whose electric-car, solar and battery initiatives aim to promote the move away from fossil fuels.

"Don't know which way Paris will go, but I've done all I can to advise directly to POTUS, through others in WH & via councils, that we remain," Musk tweeted. Musk followed up with a tweet saying, "Will have no choice but to depart councils" if Trump pulls out of the Paris deal backed by nearly 200 other countries.

Musk's threat comes as the White House is trying to bring tech CEOs and other top executives to Washington on June 19 for a daylong summit on modernizing government technology.

Trump's move would mark the second time in two decades that the United States has negotiated, signed but then spurned a major international climate pact following a change of party control in the White House. The previous occasion — the decision by George W. Bush to abandon the 1997 Kyoto accord negotiated by the Clinton administration — caused years of distrust of the U.S. in international climate circles.

Since then, climate scientists say, the problem has grown only more dire, with few years left for nations to act if they want to avoid the droughts, floods, famines, mass migrations and worsening storms that a changing climate would bring.

Only two countries declined to join the Paris agreement: Syria and Nicaragua.

Republican leaders in Congress had warned other countries before the Paris talks not to trust Obama's promises, noting that a future GOP president could undo any commitments he made. The Obama administration had insisted that the deal's carbon-cutting targets be nonbinding, avoiding the politically disastrous Senate ratification fight that a binding treaty would require.

It would take years for the U.S. to formally withdraw from the Paris deal. But the U.S. is the world's second-largest carbon polluter, and its decision to walk away would threaten to weaken the resolve of major emitters such as China and India to keep their own pledges, even though both nations have pledged to remain in the agreement.

The move is certain to draw the ire of dozens of American allies who received assurances from the Obama administration that the United States was committed to the deal.

Wednesday's news comes on top of separate steps by Trump to weaken the major domestic planks of Obama's climate agenda, including Environmental Protection Agency regulations requiring cuts in greenhouse gas pollution from power plants.

Trump's advisers have been — and remain — at odds over how the administration should approach Paris. Ivanka Trump and her husband, Jared Kushner, had pushed to stay in the deal, and Ivanka even brought Al Gore to Trump Tower to meet with her father in December. Gore spoke with Trump again this month in an effort to encourage the president to remain in the agreement.

Trump was also personally lobbied by world leaders at last week's G-7 summit in Italy, and foreign diplomats repeatedly made their case for remaining in the agreement during frequent calls with administration officials.

Others in the "remain" camp included Tillerson, who had praised the Paris deal when he was Exxon Mobil's CEO. During his confirmation hearing this year, he said the United States must keep "its seat at the table" for international climate talks.

But ultimately, Bannon and his allies in the White House appeared to win Trump over, arguing that the agreement wasn't in the U.S. interest.

Even if the U.S. stuck with the deal, scientists and climate activists have warned that the targets Obama and other leaders promised in Paris wouldn't cut enough carbon pollution to prevent the worst effects of climate change. Instead, they said, the signing nations would have to steadily escalate their commitments in coming years.

The agreement calls on countries to aim to limit global warming to "well below" 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit from pre-industrial levels, and it said countries should "pursue efforts" to keep temperature increases to 2.7 degrees Fahrenheit. Under a business as usual scenario, global temperatures could rise by between 4.7 degrees Fahrenheit and 8.6 degrees Fahrenheit by the end of the century, according to the United Nations, an increase that would have catastrophic consequences.

U.S. greenhouse gas output has slid sharply in the past decade — a trend driven partly by increases in energy efficiency and a shift from coal to natural gas as a power source — and Obama had pledged to continue those reductions in the coming decade to meet the American commitments in Paris. Hillary Clinton had promised even steeper reductions.

Trump, meanwhile, vowed during the campaign that he would reverse Obama's policies, lift restrictions on the energy industry and "save our wonderful coal miners." Those pledges helped him win fossil fuel-producing swing states like Pennsylvania and Ohio.

Trump's upcoming decision raises the prospect that other countries will move on without the U.S., lessening America's influence. Indeed, the European Union and China are set to pledge deeper cooperation on the Paris agreement and the promotion of clean energy technologies, according to a draft leaders' statement for an upcoming summit that was seen by POLITICO.

Maroš Šefcovic, the vice president of the EU's energy union, said Thursday that Europeans will stick with their climate efforts regardless of what the Americans do.

"For Europe there is no plan B, because we do not have a planet B," Šefcovic told reporters. "If they decide to pull out, this would be disappointing, but I really don't think that this would change the course of mankind."

Trump tweets Paris climate decision coming in a 'few days' Back

By Eric Wolff | 05/31/2017 09:35 AM EDT

President Donald Trump did not confirm the reports emerging from the White House that he intended to pull the United States out of the Paris climate change agreement, saying only that his decision was coming shortly.

"I will be announcing my decision on the Paris Accord over the next few days. MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN," he tweeted this morning.

The Tweet landed after White House official told POLITICO that the U.S. plans to withdraw from the 195-nation agreement on climate change.

Trump is just back from a 9-day overseas trip in which world leaders, including Pope Francis, pressed him to stay in the agreement. The administration's top advisers have been divided over whether to stay in the deal.

Exxon shareholders win vote to build Paris climate pact into plans Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 05/31/2017 02:37 PM EDT

The Trump administration may be preparing to withdraw the U.S. from the Paris climate change accords, but shareholders at Exxon Mobil and at least one other U.S. oil company are demanding the companies incorporate the international deal in their business models.

Nearly two-thirds of Exxon's shareholders backed a proposal on Wednesday calling for the company to assess how climate change and global efforts to limit temperature increases will affect its business. The vote is non-binding, but the results show that the once-fringe idea of linking climate change to big oil's operations has gained momentum.

The vote at the Exxon annual shareholder meeting in Dallas came after investors in its smaller rival Occidental Petroleum earlier this month cast more than two-thirds of their votes for a measure calling for the company to assess how its business would be affected by the Paris climate change accord's target of holding global warming to 2-degrees. Company credit rating agency Moody's said last year it would start to use the Paris pledge to assess financial risk for corporations.

"Shareholders have spoken clearly on climate," said Danielle Fugere, president and chief counsel for As You Sow, a group that helps shareholders introduce environmental proposals. "If there's less demand for oil and the world is awash in oil, there's going to be more competition among these companies. Shareholders are trying to figure out who is the best bet."

Not all of these climate-related investor proposals succeeded, however. Chevron shareholders Wednesday morning rejected a motion that the company issue a report on how limiting global temperature increase to 2 degrees Celsius (3.6 degrees Fahrenheit) would affect its business. Only 27 percent of voting shareholders approved the proposal, down from more than 40 percent who voted for a similar proposal last year.

Exxon, Chevron and other energy companies facing such proposals argue that they are already taking the Paris agreement seriously and incorporating it into their business plans. Exxon in particular pointed out that it was developing technology that would capture the carbon emitted at natural gas power plants and then either store it or use it to produce more electricity.

"We believe the goal of carbon policy is to reduce emissions at the lowest cost to society," Exxon Chief Executive Darren Woods said at the shareholder meeting. "These goals led us to support the Paris Agreement." Woods sent President Donald Trump a letter earlier this month urging the U.S. to stay in the Paris deal.

For Exxon, the votes also illustrate how entangled the company has become in New York state climate change politics. The climate change proposal shareholders approved was partly sponsored by the New York State Common Retirement Fund, which is run by the State's comptroller. Meanwhile, the company is embroiled in a lawsuit with the New York and Massachusetts attorneys general over whether it withheld its own research on climate change from shareholders.

"The burden is now on Exxon Mobil to respond swiftly and demonstrate that it takes shareholder concerns about climate risk seriously," New York State Comptroller Thomas P. DiNapoli said in a prepared statement after the vote.

Elon Musk: Paris deal departure would force break with Trump Back

By Nancy Scola | 05/31/2017 02:23 PM EDT

Tesla CEO Elon Musk said today that if President Donald Trump follows through on pulling the U.S. out of the Paris climate change agreement, he'd "have no choice" but to cut off his participation in White House business councils.

"Don't know which way Paris will go, but I've done all I can to advise directly to POTUS, through others in WH & via councils, that we remain," Musk tweeted. Musk followed up with a tweet saying, "Will have no choice but to depart councils" if Trump pulls out of the Paris deal backed by nearly 200 other countries.

POLITICO and others have reported that Trump is expected to withdraw the U.S. from the climate agreement.

Musk has emerged as the Trump White House's go-to tech industry executive. The Tesla and SpaceX CEO has taken part, for example, in the so-called "President's Strategic and Policy Forum."

Uber CEO Travis Kalanick stepped down from that group in February after a public backlash, including from inside the technology industry. At the time, Musk decided to stay involved, saying, "I believe at this time that engaging on critical issues will on balance serve the greater good."

Musk's threatened break with Trump comes as the White House is trying to bring tech CEOs and other executives to Washington on June 19 for a day-long summit on modernizing government technology, cybersecurity, immigration and other topics.

Greens decry Trump decision to exit Paris climate deal Back

By Eric Wolff | 05/31/2017 10:06 AM EDT

Green groups reacted with fury over news that President Donald Trump will withdraw the U.S. from the Paris climate agreement.

"Donald Trump has made a historic mistake which our grandchildren will look back on with stunned dismay at how a world leader could be so divorced from reality and morality," Sierra Club Executive Director Michael Brune said in a statement. "Trump has abandoned the standard of American leadership."

White House sources said this morning that the U.S. will withdraw from the 195-nation agreement, but President Donald Trump followed up with a tweet saying he would announce his decision "in the next few days."

The delay in an announcement did little to mollify environmentalists.

"This would be a new low, even for President Trump and [EPA] Administrator [Scott] Pruitt who have prioritized polluter profits over kids' health at every step of the way," Gene Karpinski, president of the League of Conservation Voters, said in a statement.
