The U.S. House passed a $36.5 billion aid package, much of it targeted at Puerto Rico, by a vote of 353-69. The legislation marks the largest disaster package since the one provided for Hurricane Sandy victims in 2013.

The money would replenish the Federal Emergency Management Agency's coffers by roughly $18 billion, which lawmakers say is enough to last for several more weeks. That includes $4.9 billion in emergency loans to ensure the cash-strapped island government can pay its workers and other debts.

But GOP leaders have been clear that another installment of aid will be needed before the end of this year. Emergency responders from all federal agencies, from FEMA to the Defense Department, have been going quickly through their cash reserves in Puerto Rico's worst disaster in decades.

And Democrats are saying that Trump's rhetoric is not helping.

"The President of the United States' most solemn duty is to protect the safety and the security of the American people. By suggesting he might abdicate this responsibility for our fellow citizens in Puerto Rico, Mr. Trump has called into question his ability to lead," Velázquez said in a statement.

Conservatives fret Perry's grid rule runs counter to market goals Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/12/2017 05:24 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry hardened his position Thursday calling for changes to electricity markets to support coal-fired power plants, even as a rising chorus of conservative voices accused him of abandoning the free market principles that have been a cornerstone of the Republican Party.

Testifying before a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee, Perry rejected the notion that power markets were fair, and he pointed to financial support that has been doled out to other energy sources for years.

"I don't think that you have this perfect free-market world," Perry told lawmakers. "We subsidize a lot of different energy sources. We subsidize wind energy. We subsidize ethanol. We subsidize solar. We subsidize oil and gas. The question is how do you make it as fair as you can?"

Perry's proposal, made public late last month, directed FERC to fast-track a new regulation in power markets overseen by the agency that would allow full cost recovery for power plants that keep 90 days' worth of fuel on-site, a threshold that would only include coal and nuclear power plants.

"We have subsidized the energy industry for a long time. I, frankly, don't have a problem with that," he said.

Perry's plan quickly drew opposition from the renewable energy industry and many power generators, as well as the oil and natural gas sector, which has been the biggest competitor for coal in recent years. Market advocates have also criticized Perry, saying that he has turned his back on the market mechanisms that have been at the heart of Republican economic policies — and that his home state of Texas implemented under former Gov. George W. Bush.

"This is inconsistent with a longstanding policy of fiscal responsibility and open markets that have always been espoused by what I thought of as the Republican Party. I'm not sure that we're in the same place today," said former Republican FERC commissioner Nora Mead Brownell. "This doesn't feel like draining the swamp to me. It feels like the swamp is expanding and oozing, and now is tinged with coal dust."

Perry's proposal "undoes 20 to 25 years of really hard work," she said.

Republican Rob Powelson, a new FERC commissioner, told a gathering of state regulators last week that he didn't "sign up to blow up the markets," according to S&P Global Market Intelligence. He later added in an email to POLITICO that the agency was "looking to address some of these market issues but not looking to [undo] the organized markets by picking winners and losers or creating moral hazards in the marketplace."

Critics contend that if FERC adopted Perry's proposal, the electricity markets that dictate prices for tens of millions of Americans from New Jersey to Illinois would be fundamentally altered to anchor coal and nuclear plants to the electric grid at great cost without a clear guarantee that they wouldn't lose power when the next natural disaster swings through.

But Perry has cast the issue as critical for ensuring the security of the country.

"What's the cost of freedom? What does it cost to build a system to keep America free?" Perry asked Rep. Paul Tonko (D-N.Y.), who had pressed him on whether DOE had considered how much his recent proposal to aid coal and nuclear power might cost consumers.

Coal is the nation's most abundant power-plant fuel, but a combination of environmental regulations, huge surges in natural gas and renewable-energy production and slumping demand for electricity have prompted power companies to shutter many coal-burning plants over the past decade. As recently as 2007, coal provided more than half the electric power sector's net electricity generation — but as of this summer, that share had fallen to less than a third.

Still, other members of the administration are still using free-market arguments to attack former President Barack Obama's climate change policies. At a Monday event in Kentucky's coal country with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, EPA chief Scott Pruitt stuck to complaints Republicans have long used to bash the Obama EPA's Clean Power Plan, decrying it as something that "really was about picking winners and losers."

But for many conservatives, it's hard to savor the victory of dismantling Obama's Clean Power Plan when the Trump administration is standing up a new government intervention.

"It certainly came out of left field for me," Nick Loris, an energy and environment fellow for The Heritage Foundation, said of Perry's proposal. "When I think about what 'all of the above' energy looks like, it shouldn't mean subsidize all of the above. And this DOE regulation is pushing us down that pathway, and not to limited government."

Loris was also unhappy with DOE's recent decision to increase federal loan guarantees for over-budget Vogtle nuclear reactors in Georgia by $3.7 billion.

"For an administration that is intent on wanting to drain the swamp, this is certainly not helping," Loris said.

Perry, who President Donald Trump has pressed to keep Ohio coal-fired power plants open, has said he was interested in a "conversation" about how to increase the resilience of the grid, but he emphasized on Thursday it was imperative that FERC take quick action.

"We can have a conversation and I think [FERC] must move. I think they must act. We've kicked this can down the road," he told lawmakers.

But some conservatives say even though U.S. energy markets are far from perfect, Perry's approach is the wrong one.

"There is no free market, but you don't fight intervention with intervention," said Tom Pyle, president of the pro-market Institute for Energy Research who led Trump's DOE transition team. "He's recognized the symptoms but he's not proposing the right cure."

Other critics pointed to the irony of a Texan seeking to undermine the power markets, since the Lone Star state runs perhaps the most free-wheeling electricity system in the country.

"If you've just joined the conversation today, I think you'd be knocked over by the irony of a Republican — indeed a Texas Republican — advocating for getting in the way of market competition and directly imposing a winner-picking outcome," said Joe Goffman, a senior EPA air adviser under Obama.

"To say that there's no free market in electricity is so beside the point as to border on the disingenuous," he added. "Nobody's arguing that there's a free market. What people are arguing for is an unrigged market."

Even other conservatives find Perry's position particularly awkward.

"There's no free market for electricity, but the one example you could find that might actually call that into question is the state of Texas," said Travis Kavulla, a Republican who is a vice chairman of Montana's utility regulator. "It's certainly dissonant with both his reputation, but also the policies of his state, which is really unique among the states and has an extremely vibrant and competitive wholesale and retail market for electricity."

Perry had the power to fast-track the issue but the proposal's fate decision will ultimately fall to five commissioners at FERC, an agency made up largely of technocrats that has long sought to safeguard the energy markets. But a DOE official said that the proposal was not shared with federal regulators before it was filed but also emphasized that DOE expects — and is almost counting on — FERC to make major changes to the proposal.

"It is impossible to actually foresee this being implemented as-written," Kavulla said. "It's inconceivable that FERC would adopt this. In some ways, this is just DOE lighting a firecracker and throwing it in FERC's direction and saying, 'These coal people have really been on our case. Do something about it!'"

Trump eyes climate skeptic for key White House environmental post Back

By Alex Guillén and Andrew Restuccia | 04/12/2017 06:00 PM EDT

President Donald Trump may tap a vocal critic of climate change science to serve as the highest-ranking environmental official in the White House.

Kathleen Hartnett White, who says carbon emissions are harmless and should not be regulated, is a top contender to run the Council on Environmental Quality, the White House's in-house environmental policy shop, sources close to the administration told POLITICO.

White House officials brought White in for an interview late last month, according to a person familiar with the hiring process, and Trump met with White at Trump Tower in November when she was under consideration to lead the Environmental Protection Agency.

Adding White to the administration would be a major win for Steve Bannon, Trump's chief strategist, and other hard-line conservatives in the White House, who have been feuding behind the scenes for weeks with the more moderate forces in the West Wing over issues like climate change. And her nomination could appease Trump's climate skeptic supporters, who have criticized EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt for hesitating to revisit his agency's conclusion that global warming threatens public health.

Trump administration officials are divided over whether White is the best person for the job, and they are also considering other candidates to lead CEQ, sources said. A White House spokeswoman declined to comment, saying, "We will let you know when we have an announcement."

Like Pruitt, the former Oklahoma attorney general and fossil fuel ally, White would be another voice from a large oil and gas producing state in charge of climate change and environmental policy.

White is a former chairwoman of the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality who now works for a conservative think tank in the Lone Star State. Energy Secretary Rick Perry, a former Texas governor, is said to be advocating on White's candidacy behind the scenes.

Tapping White would only deepen environmentalists' fears that the new administration will implement a wholesale reversal of former President Barack Obama's approach to climate change as a serious, long-term threat to the environment and national security.

White sat on Trump's economic advisory council during his campaign and since 2008 has worked at the Austin-based conservative think tank Texas Public Policy Foundation, which has received funding from Koch Industries, ExxonMobil, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, Devon Energy and other energy companies and utilities. White, who was a registered lobbyist with the group until Nov. 29, has long been a major voice in the niche industry of public figures who question climate science data or downplay the risks of global warming.

"Carbon dioxide is not a pollutant, and carbon is certainly not a poison. Carbon is the chemical basis of all life on earth. Our bones and blood are made out of carbon," White wrote in a June op-ed. She added that CO<sub>2</sub> is the "gas of life" because it is a nutrient used by plants — an argument frequently raised by climate skeptics that most scientists say distracts from the climate-changing components of the gas.

White's position contrasts sharply with established climate science. In its most recent comprehensive report, the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the leading scientific body on global warming, concluded that the Earth is warming because of human-generated emissions — and that time is running short to stave off the worst risks of climate change, including increased temperatures, more extreme weather, sea level rise and ocean acidification.

Similar findings have been reached by U.S. authorities, including EPA, NASA and NOAA — all agencies that would be subject to guidance White would issue as CEQ chair, if she were confirmed by the Senate.

In an interview with POLITICO in September, White proposed establishing a "blue ribbon commission" to relitigate climate science, underscoring her unorthodox belief that the science showing human-induced climate change is unsettled.

The commission, she said, would develop an "alternative scientific methodology" to the IPCC, whose usefulness she said has "reached its peak."

If nominated, White would likely be an advocate within the administration of reopening the foundation of Obama's climate change agenda: EPA's 2009 "endangerment finding," a scientific conclusion that greenhouse gases constitute a threat to public health or welfare.

Trump told an industry-backed think tank last year that he will "review" the endangerment finding, a potentially difficult task given the scientific consensus on the issue. Any withdrawal of the finding would be challenged by environmentalists in court.

Pruitt has so far declined to reopen the endangerment finding, a decision that has infuriated some of Trump's conservative supporters.

White would be able to play a key role in shaping the Trump administration's overall approach to climate change, and she has been clear that she does not think the issue should be addressed by EPA. In 2015, she argued that Obama's rules to limit carbon emissions from power plants marked "an unprecedented expansion of federal administrative power" with "no measurable climate benefits." And last May, she urged House Speaker Paul Ryan to pass a bill that would block EPA from regulating carbon dioxide, methane, hydrofluorocarbons or other greenhouse gases.

At CEQ, White could direct other agencies to turn their attention away from climate change, and she would be in charge of implementing recent executive orders on energy development and regulatory streamlining. Last month, Trump ordered the council to revoke recently issued guidance directing all federal agencies to consider climate change when they conduct environmental reviews under the National Environmental Policy Act, a decision that would be difficult to challenge in court. And in January, the president told CEQ to come up with a plan to expedite environmental reviews for major infrastructure projects.

While environmentalists have long accused GOP officials of dragging their feet on climate change, White is by far the most outspoken critic of the underlying science — and the most ardent defender of fossil fuels — that Trump has considered to serve in his administration.

In a 2014 blog post, White took aim at an article in The Nation by MSNBC host Chris Hayes, whose "recommendation to avert global warming, like most warmist policies, toys with the greatest advance made by mankind," she wrote. In White's view, there is a connection between "the abolition of slavery and humanity's first widespread use of energy from fossil fuels." The rise of coal and oil, she argued, provided economic incentive to end the practice of slavery in the U.S. and elsewhere. (One critic fired back that the industrial revolution actually "exacerbated" slavery by increasing the demands for slave-produced goods such as cotton.)

Putting a permanent CEQ chair in place would also raise the question of where Trump wants decision-making on environmental issues to happen — in the White House or at agencies.

The Obama administration shifted major environmental responsibilities from CEQ to EPA and some other agencies as it sought aggressive action on climate change. It remains unclear whether Trump's CEQ will continue in that vein or have a greater role in policymaking, though outside Republicans have encouraged Trump aides to grant the council wide latitude.

The council was run from 2015 through the end of Obama's term by Christy Goldfuss, an unconfirmed managing director. Obama never nominated a replacement for his first CEQ chair, Nancy Sutley, who left in 2014.

White's criticisms of Obama environmental regulations go beyond climate change.

She said in 2015 that EPA's Waters of the U.S. rule, which determines which bodies of water are subject to federal oversight, "is about amending the definitions of well understood words into tortured versions of themselves so that the EPA can seize control of dry land where water may flow after heavy rains."

She also criticized the new ozone standard of 70 parts per billion, calling the rule's scientific conclusions "a statistical house of cards" and predicting it "may be the straw that breaks the back of our struggling economy."

White, who received her bachelor's and master's degrees from Stanford University, was a commissioner at the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality from 2001 to 2007, serving as chairman for the last four years of that term. She previously sat on the Texas Water Development Board.

Environmentalists do give White some credit for advances made during her tenure at TCEQ.

Luke Metzger, director of Environment Texas, told POLITICO that she helped implement a legislative order to create an online reporting system for major emissions events, which is still used by green activists to track noncompliance by major energy companies. Metzger also credited her with a "slightly improved" enforcement policy, though he noted that she blocked an effort by a fellow TCEQ commissioner in 2006 to boost penalties.

In 2008, White joined the Texas Public Policy Foundation, where she directs its Armstrong Center for Energy & the Environment.

Trump's pick for NOAA chief causes a storm Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 10/12/2017 07:52 PM EDT

As a top executive at AccuWeather, Barry Myers has pushed for limits on the kinds of products that the National Weather Service offers to the public, saying they offered unfair competition to his industry.

Now, President Donald Trump's nomination of Myers to lead the weather service's parent agency could allow him to make those kinds of restrictions mandatory — to the benefit of his family-run forecasting company.

The AccuWeather CEO's nomination to head the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration is stirring criticism from people who worry he would hobble the weather service, which provoked an industry backlash more than a decade ago by making hour-by-hour forecasts, cellphone alerts and other consumer-friendly data widely available online. A bill that Myers supported 12 years ago, sponsored by then-Sen. Rick Santorum, would have prohibited the agency from competing with private providers in most circumstances.

Myers, who has served as a NOAA adviser, has more recently spoken of cooperation with the agency, including industry's advocacy for Congress to fund its budget. But his critics expressed misgivings nonetheless.

"I fear that he'll do irreparable harm to an agency whose primary mission is to save lives," said

Daniel Sobien, the president of the National Weather Service Employees Organization, which strongly opposes Myers' nomination. "There seems to be a huge conflict of interest considering his business background and belief system."

Sen. Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) agreed, calling Myers a "questionable" choice.

"As the CEO of AccuWeather, Barry Myers views NOAA as a direct competitor that provides high-quality forecasts for free," Schatz said in a statement Thursday. He added that "Mr. Myers will have to work very hard to persuade me that he will run NOAA for the public good."

Myers' defenders say they hope he'll use his long experience running a major weather enterprise to modernize NOAA, which also oversees fisheries, marine sanctuaries, endangered species, climate research, satellite data and its own uniformed officer corps.

"In past decade, AccuWeather has embraced 'Big Data' and become an advertising & digital innovation behemoth under Myers' leadership," wrote Ryan Maue, the chief operations officer at the website Weather.us, in a post on Twitter. Maue separately told POLITICO: "I expect Myers to bring that same vision to NOAA and enhance collaboration with the private sector especially in the role of space-based remote sensing and satellites."

Myers did not return a call to his office Thursday, and a lobbyist who works with AccuWeather did not respond to emails seeking comment.

Myers, whose brother Joel founded AccuWeather in 1962, would join a roster of other business leaders whom Trump has installed atop his agencies — many of them bringing considerable potential conflicts of interest to the job. He has degrees in law and business, not the science and math degrees that Bush's and President Barack Obama's NOAA chiefs had.

Richard Painter, who served as the top ethics official for President George W. Bush, said Myers can probably meet the legal requirements to separate himself from his business. But, he added: "The appearances are awful. He should recuse from any matter that could have a financial impact on the company. And he should sell the stock."

Myers indeed "will be liquidating all of his private sector holdings," said a spokesman for NOAA's parent agency, the Commerce Department, adding that he'll "be subject to the same ethics and recusal requirements as any federal official."

The spokesman also rejected suggestions that Myers would clamp down on the weather service's public offerings. He said Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross, who chose Myers for the job, "sees the provision of timely, accurate data to the public as one of the Department's core missions. This includes weather data provided by the NWS, so there is no risk that Myers will restrict NWS provision of data to the public."

"Myers has also been a strong proponent of free and open weather data to the public," the spokesman added.

But in 2005, Myers supported Santorum's widely panned bill, which would have prohibited the weather service from offering a product or service "that is or could be provided by the private sector" — a provision that would have benefited companies like AccuWeather.

The bill made some exceptions, including information needed to protect life and property, but weather entrepreneurs, hobbyists, airline pilots and open-government advocates said it would have choked off a wealth of data that the National Weather Service had begun making widely available. The legislation would have countered a 2004 policy change by the Bush administration that had eased restrictions on the weather service's ability to offer new products and services.

"It is not an easy prospect for a business to attract advertisers, subscribers, or investors when the government is providing similar products and services for free," Santorum said when introducing his bill. Critics, including Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), noted that taxpayers had already paid for the weather service's data.

Myers told The Palm Beach Post at the time that he wanted the weather service to return to its "core mission ... which is protecting other people's lives and property," rather than spending "hundreds of millions of dollars a year, every day, producing forecasts of 'warm and sunny.'"

"We work hard every day competing with other companies and we also have to compete with the government," he told ABC News a month later.

Myers had donated $1,000 to Santorum's Senate campaign in 2004 and 2005, though the executive also has a track record of donating to both Democratic and Republican politicians, including Trump, Hillary Clinton and Mitt Romney. Santorum and Myers are both prominent alumni of Penn State University, and AccuWeather is based near the school's main campus in State College, Pa.

Santorum's bill went nowhere, however — an outcome that Maue said turned out to be "the best thing that could have happened for Accuweather as they were on the ground floor of the digital/smart phone App revolution for weather apps."

More recently, Myers testified to the House Science Committee last year about the need for "embracing free and open data in all situations," while maintaining that "the best public facing forecasts and information comes from the weather industry." Still, he said government, industry and academia each bring their own strengths to the relationship, adding that "NWS need not do everything to keep Americans safe. Others can share the load."

Myers estimated that cooperation among the federal government, the private weather industry and academic researchers had saved 1 million to 2 million lives since the late 1950s.

But Sobien, the union chief, expressed skepticism about the kind of partnership Myers envisions.

"In the past, he has supported proposals that essentially made it so the National Weather Service's only function was to provide data to companies like AccuWeather who would then repackage that data and sell them," Sobien said.

AccuWeather, which says its forecasts appear on more than 200 major television stations, 900 radio stations and 180,000 websites, has also been aggressive over the years in criticizing the weather service for what it sees as its shortcomings. Among other incidents, the company complained that the weather service had underestimated the strength of Hurricane Claudette before it hit Texas in 2003, and it said the federal agency was late to issue warnings about a 2015 tornado in Oklahoma.

As recently as February, AccuWeather's website highlighted an incident in which some of NOAA's weather data suffered a "significant outage," while noting that "AccuWeather-produced services remained available and reliable."

AccuWeather's sharp-elbowed approach also extends to competition with its rival The Weather Channel, which it replaced two years ago on Verizon's FiOS television lineup. AccuWeather's website has also inspired eye-rolling among some in the weather community by offering 90-day forecasts, which one meteorologist blogging for the American Geophysical Union dismissed as "scientifically indefensible" and "even worse than the Farmer's Almanac."

Members of the small community of weather watchers, who never forgot AccuWeather's support for Santorum's bill, contend it will be nearly impossible for Myers to fully eliminate his conflicts of interest.

Myers' brother Joel still serves as the company's president and chairman of the board. Their brother Evan is the chief operating officer.

"His family owns the business and he knows the decisions he makes are going to affect the business for years and potentially decades to come," said Andrew Rosenberg, director of the Union of Concerned Scientists' Center for Science and Democracy. He added, "My biggest concern is not that somebody has a business background, but do they genuinely recognize that a job in government is a fundamentally different one from managing and running a private business for profit."

Others are reserving judgment.

David Titley, a former NOAA official during the Obama administration, said he prefers not to comment on personnel decisions. "We will all have to wait & see in what direction Barry wants to take NOAA," he said in an email.

Dems move to shield whistleblowers who report pricey travel Back

By Kyle Cheney | 10/12/2017 03:08 PM EDT

House Democrats on Thursday sought to expand whistleblower protections for federal workers who call out superiors for "improper use of air transportation," following the mounting questions about Trump administration officials' use of expensive forms of travel.

Lawmakers offered the proposal as part of a debate over broader whistleblower protection. It was rejected by Republicans, as expected, but forced GOP lawmakers to vote on an issue that has drawn increasing scrutiny, as several Trump Cabinet members have faced criticism for regular use of chartered or military jets.

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price resigned last month after a POLITICO investigation revealed he took hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of chartered flights, sometimes to go short distances. And other Cabinet members — including Treasury Secretary

Steve Mnuchin and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke — have faced questions about expensive travel at taxpayer expense.

A bill under consideration — the Chris Kirkpatrick Whistleblower Protection Act — would prohibit federal employees from accessing medical records of job applicants or subordinates and includes punishment for supervisors who retaliate against whistleblowers. The bill also offers more training to supervisors about whistleblower protections.

Democrats offered their proposal as a "motion to recommit," which would have sent the bill back to the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform to be changed to include their proposed amendment.

Ohio River jam highlights absence of Trump's infrastructure plan Back

By Eric Wolff and Tanya Snyder | 10/12/2017 06:59 PM EDT

Shipments of coal and grain are paralyzed at a critical chokepoint on the Ohio River due to dilapidated infrastructure, highlighting the need for the kind of major capital investment that President Donald Trump promised, in a speech along the banks of the same river, three months ago.

Lock 52 on the Ohio River in southern Illinois closed Oct. 9 because its infrastructure is too decrepit to function effectively in high water, and it could be several more days before the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers reopens it. The closure has created a 57-mile backup of 51 towboats and 564 barges waiting to pass, according to the Waterways Council, an advocacy group for water infrastructure.

Trump visited this key inland waterway in June, emphasizing the importance of waterways and promising investment. But Trump's fiscal 2018 budget proposal called for cuts to civil works spending. And his campaign promise of $1 trillion for infrastructure is so far unrealized, even as the New Deal-era locks and dams on the Ohio River degrade and unscheduled delays balloon.

That's left commodities producers, who depend on waterways for bulk transportation, in the lurch. In 2015, companies shipped 575 million tons of commodities worth $302 billion via waterways. Of that total, coal makes up the largest single industry at 23 percent, with grains following at 15 percent.

Waterways infrastructure, much of which was built in the 1920s and 1930s and some as part of President Franklin Roosevelt's public works programs, is long past its expected lifespan. The Waterways Council says unscheduled delays have grown by 700 percent over the last decade. The closure of a single lock on the Mississippi River during harvest season could cost $933 million, according to a University of Tennessee study.

Carol Labashosky, a spokeswoman for the Louisville district of the Army Corps of Engineers, said having to close Lock 52 isn't unique historically, but there have been frequent intermittent closures at this lock as well as another one downriver throughout September and October. "This fall we've had quite a few closures," Labashosky said. "Some of them have only been a couple of days or one day, but this is a lengthy delay."

Labashosky said they'll reopen the lock "as soon as the river cooperates," which she estimated would happen Friday or Saturday. Others are betting on Oct. 15 or 16.

Industries reliant on waterways are looking to Trump's promises of infrastructure investment to help modernize and update the locks and dams. The Waterways Council agrees. Deb Calhoun, a spokeswoman for the group, said they want to "hold the administration's feet to the fire.

"The president said we need to fix it," she said.

In June, Trump spoke on the banks of the Ohio River, in front of a barge filled with West Virginia coal, to proclaim that "America must have the best, fastest and most reliable infrastructure anywhere in the world." Noting the "dilapidated system of locks and dams that are more than half a century old" and the "$8.7 billion maintenance backlog that is only getting bigger and getting worse," Trump declared: "We cannot accept these conditions any longer."

But in May the administration released a fiscal 2018 budget that proposed to cut the Corps' civil works budget by about 17 percent. The amount proposed would fund only a small number of the 25 congressionally authorized priority projects, which have a combined portfolio value of $8.8 billion.

Calhoun said they are "trying to move forward and not stop and go backwards," and observed that the budget came out when Trump was "pretty new on the job."

Trump's budget did address the urgent bottleneck at Locks and Dams 52 and 53. Though it proposed to shut down work on four ongoing Corps waterways projects, it requested $26 million out of the Inland Waterways Trust Fund for the Olmsted Locks and Dam project, which was supposed to solve the problems at Locks and Dams 52 and 53 years ago, but has been mired in delays due to a misguided attempt at a new dam-building method.

The Olmsted project, authorized in 1988, was supposed to be finished in 10 years for $775 million. The Corps claims it will be done next summer, nearly 30 years later — with a final cost close to $3 billion.

For the remainder of the 25 projects Congress wants to see built, industries are waiting on the infrastructure package Trump promised during the campaign.

Trump himself hasn't spoken much about his infrastructure package since proposing that $1 trillion in spending could be leveraged by $200 billion from the federal government. In fact, he has since indicated he may be souring on public-private partnerships, which administration officials and Republican lawmakers had long said would fund 80 percent of the plan. The battle over health care has pushed back the promised tax overhaul, which is not expected to be quick business either. The fall timeline for Congress to craft a legislative infrastructure package has slipped away, and no one knows to when.

Ohio-based coal producer Murray Energy depends on inland waterways to move its product, and is calling for more spending.

"We certainly support President Trump's commitment to rebuild America's infrastructure, particularly the locks and dams along the Ohio, Monongahela and Mississippi Rivers," spokesman Gary Broadbent told POLITICO.

Even if the Olmsted Locks and Dam opens on time next summer, the project won't be finished until 2022, when the existing Lock 52 and 53 are finally pulled out of the river.

HELP'S ON THE WAY: The Senate is expected to confirm William Wehrum today at 11:30 a.m. to run EPA's air office, sending Administrator Scott Pruitt a key, if controversial, lieutenant as he embarks on a sweeping agenda to roll back a host of Obama-era air regulations. Barring any huge surprises (the cloture vote was along party-lines), Wehrum is expected to receive unanimous Republican backing and universal Democratic opposition.

Al Franken made a candid hot mic comment during the cloture vote. Watch here.

Pressure to testify ramps up: With help on the way to the agency, look for Congress to further lean on Pruitt to return for oversight hearings. House Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus told reporters he's personally told Pruitt within the past two weeks that he needs to appear before the committee. "I know that I said, 'You know you're eventually going to have to come before the committee, and the sooner you do it the better,'" he said. "He was quiet." House Science Chairman Lamar Smith said in a letter his staff was working on finding "a mutually convenient time" for Pruitt to come. From ME's perspective, Hill Republicans may have to do more than nicely ask for Pruitt to appear.

Speaking of Pruitt, a tipster tells ME they spotted the administrator in first class on a flight from D.C. to Detroit on Wednesday morning. An agency spokeswoman wouldn't say where he was going or what he was doing once he arrived.

Hey, EPA: That's not how this works. Pruitt is a Cabinet official, not a private citizen. His responsibilities include testifying before Congress regularly, and the public has a right to know where he is on a given day. Unlike Pruitt, other Cabinet officials — including Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, Defense Secretary Jim Mattis, Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross (even President Donald Trump himself) — regularly provide their daily schedules in advance.

So where is he today? Pruitt's slated to meet with the American Chemistry Council's board of directors for 2-1/2 hours on Kiawah Island, S.C.

IF IT'S THURSDAY, ME'S HERE FOR YOU! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and EPA deputy nominee Andrew Wheeler was first (on the morning of his confirmation hearing!) to identify that Sen. Shelley Moore Capito's father, Arch Moore, served three terms as West Virginia governor before legal troubles ended his career. ANWR LEGISLATION RELEASED: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski released a four-page reconciliation package late Wednesday that would open Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska to oil and gas drilling. According to the CBO, the measure would net $1.092 billion over the 10-year budget while limiting development to 2,000 acres of federal land. The release allows the committee to move on to a markup on Nov. 15. Efforts to open ANWR to drilling are staunchly opposed by Democrats, including Ranking Member Maria Cantwell, and environmental advocates. Remember instructions in the budget resolution, H. Con. Res. 71, require Murkowski's committee to raise $1 billion in revenue over the next decade.

NEW EAST V. WEST BEEF: Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resiliency push to boost the coal and nuclear sectors is casting a brighter light on the ever-expanding divide between the coal industry's Appalachian mines and Wyoming's Powder River Basin, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. And though the Trump administration has paid close attention to boosting the fortunes of Appalachia in its early months, experts say the industry's future appears brighter out West. "The industry recognizes it's just a fact of geology and Mother Nature and economics," said analyst Michael Dudas of Vertical Research Partners. "Over the past decades, the mix has certainly gone away from Appalachia towards the Powder River Basin."

Eastern and Western coal states have been on different trajectories for decades, with 56 percent of U.S. coal production in 2015 coming from the Western region and just 25 percent from Appalachia. Western coal is easier to access and reserves are so abundant that companies were able to absorb an Obama-era moratorium on new leases largely unfazed. "In the grand scheme of things, economically, we're the better bet for a utility," Travis Deti, executive director of the Wyoming Mining Association, said.

But the nostalgia factor: Appalachia is the nation's sole producer of metallurgical coal, high-grade fuel used to make steel and other metals and is better-positioned to export its coal. But beyond those factors, it continues to occupy an overwhelming cultural and political presence in parts of the country. "Our advantage is we have the best coal miners in the world and we got probably some of the best coal in the world right here. The Lord blessed us in that standpoint," Bill Raney, president of the West Virginia Coal Association, said.

NUCLEAR WASTE BILL HITS NEW HURDLE: A dispute between Shimkus and House Appropriators over how money from the Nuclear Waste Fund is spent must be resolved before a bipartisan nuclear waste bill can hit the floor, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. At issue is mandatory spending in the Shimkus bill that would go to operating costs related to Yucca Mountain and additional payments through a "benefits agreement" with the state of Nevada. Current law has Congress dole out monies from the fund during the annual appropriations process and lawmakers on that panel don't want to cede that power. "My frustration is that we are serious but the appropriators, right now, are still wedded to a year-to-year process," Shimkus told Darius.

It's a pile-on! Even if the bill gets out of the House, there's been little appetite to move on the issue in the Senate where leadership doesn't want to put vulnerable Nevada Republican Sen. Dean Heller in a tough spot. "Senate Republicans have made it clear they don't want to move forward on Yucca Mountain because it could hurt Sen. Heller," a senior Senate aide said. Heller said in an interview — with a smile — he'd been pushing Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to keep Yucca funding out of the next spending package. "I think we'll get there," he added.

** Presented by ExxonMobil: We're collaborating with FuelCell Energy on a novel idea to use fuel cells to capture carbon at natural gas power plants, and in the process reduce emissions and increase electrical output. This technology could be a game changer in addressing the world's growing need for energy, while also reducing the impact on the environment. Learn more. **

HOW ABOUT A MEETING? The Senate's number two Democrat has no plans to lift his hold on multiple Interior nominees until Secretary Ryan Zinke meets with his office about his review of national monument designations, your ME host reports. "A meeting, how about that for a radical idea?" Sen. Dick Durbin told ME when asked what it would take to lift the holds. "We asked the secretary to meet with us and he won't do it." Zinke demanded the senators "lift the random and senseless holds" in a tweet late Wednesday.

ROUGH WATERS FOR CORPS NOMINEE? Rickey Dale "R.D." James, Trump's pick to run the Army Corps of Engineers, is likely to face scrutiny today before the Armed Services Committee over what critics say are his conflicts of interests, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. His thousands of acres of valuable Missouri farmland lie within the New Madrid floodway, a relief-valve channel that can be used to divert floodwaters from the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. James, a long-time member of the powerful Mississippi River Commission, has admitted to being conflicted about flooding the area because of his ties there. "I could not displace from my mind what the decision would mean to my friends and neighbors," James told the Defense Media Network in 2012.

His defenders include both of Mississippi's senators — Thad Cochran and Roger Wicker — and major waterways groups. Once he clears the Armed Services Committee, he will go through another hearing and vote before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. The session gavel in at 10 a.m. in Dirksen G-50.

OLD KING COAL: Michael Bloomberg and Bloomberg Philanthropies today will announce a $50 million cash infusion to launch the Europe Beyond Coal campaign to reduce the continent's dependence on coal energy. Done in partnership with the European Climate Foundation and a sister campaign on ongoing U.S efforts, both groups plan a Nov. 11 event on the sidelines of the UN's COP23 to discuss their new push.

Taking stock: As the climate confab in Bonn continues, a new analysis from Data-Driven Yale finds nearly 15,000 subnational and non-state actors have set close to 100,000 goals to curb climate change. The researchers synthesized information from 17 platforms and organizations, finding that more than 7,000 cities representing 17 percent of the world's population have climate targets. Most (5,831) are in Europe, and 554 are in North America. The study identified climate commitments from about 6,225 companies and investors with $36.5 trillion in revenue, and from 34 of the world's 57 largest banks, as well as 700 U.S. colleges and universities

HYDROPOWERING THROUGH: The House voted 257 to 166 on Wednesday to approve the Hydropower Policy Modernization Act H.R. 3043 \(115\) revamping the permitting process for hydropower projects. "This bill won't change outcomes or environmental standards. Instead, it will speed up the relicensing process and save time and money," bill sponsor Rep. Cathy McMorris Rodgers said in a statement. Twenty-six Democrats backed the measure, while three Republicans voted against it.

BISHOP'S 'DISAPPOINTED' BY PREPA'S ABSENCE: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop told ME he's "disappointed" but not surprised the head of Puerto Rico's utility backed out of a congressional hearing earlier this week. "They would have had to face all the questions about Whitefish, so I kind of understand why they didn't necessarily want to be there," he said. "If we're trying to solve the problem, spending a lot of time on Whitefish would be fun but not necessarily essential with moving forward."

FIGURE IT OUT: Democratic Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Michael Bennet asked FERC in a Wednesday letter to reverse course and include the social cost of carbon as part of its review of pipeline projects. They included a point-by-point rebuttal of a recent draft FERC analysis in which the commission said it would not include the figure estimating societal costs of carbon pollution in its analyses.

ATLANTIC SUNRISE CAN PROCEED: A three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit denied a request Wednesday from community and environmental groups to halt construction of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline while a broader challenge to FERC approval of the project proceeds, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "Petitioners have not satisfied the stringent requirements for a stay pending court review," the court said in its order.

MAIL CALL! THANKS, MR. PRESIDENT! A group of advanced biofuel producers, including ethanol giants Archer Daniels Midland and POET, sent a letter to Trump thanking him for past support of the ethanol industry and asking him to make sure advanced biofuel volumes are raised from proposed levels. "Mr. President, we very much appreciate your ongoing commitment to the biofuels industry and the Americans who work every day to produce biofuels and other bio-based, agricultural products," the letter says.

Hey, House, lay off our wind tax credit: Rhode Island Gov. Gina Raimondo and South Dakota Gov. Dennis Daugaard are asking House tax writers to lay off changes to the wind tax credit. In a letter to Ways & Means Chairman Kevin Brady and ranking member Richard Neal, the pair, who are also the current and past chairmen of the Governors Wind and Solar Energy Coalition, say the bill should drop its provisions that change how wind projects qualify and that eliminate an inflation adjustment. Fifteen House members, led by Rep. David Young, made a similar plea in their own letter Wednesday.

Not sold: A group of 17 environmental and public health groups sent a letter to the House on Wednesday strongly opposing the chamber's tax package, H.R. 1 \(115\). "The plan puts at risk our clean energy future by preserving tax breaks for dirty energy sources while slashing them for cleaner forms of energy," the letter, signed by groups like the Center for Biological Diversity, Sierra Club and Oil Change International, says. "And if the tax plan itself weren't harmful enough, it is also being packaged in the Senate with unrelated, controversial legislation that hands over the pristine and sacred Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to exploitation by Big Oil."

Energy research can be fun(ded)! A group of business leaders sent a letter to top House and Senate appropriators urging robust energy research funding. "Ensuring America stays at the forefront of global energy technology research is both an economic and security imperative," the letter, signed by leaders including Southern Co's Tom Fanning, ClearPath's Jay Faison and the U.S. Chamber's Thomas Donohue, says.

GOOD YEAR FOR PARKS: The Trust for Public Land ran the numbers and voters around the country approved $1.5 billion in local and state ballot measures for parks and conservation.

Twenty-six of the 30 local park and open space measures passed. "At a time when Americans seem to be increasingly divided, one thing we all agree on is that we love our parks, whatever our political party," Will Rogers, the group's president, said in a statement.

TAKE A GLANCE! Energy In Depth, a research program of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, is launching a website today pushing back on claims made by the #ExxonKnew campaign.

Wehrum clears cloture hurdle Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 05:30 PM EDT

The Senate invoked cloture on William Wehrum's nomination to run EPA's air office, leaving just one final vote until Administrator Scott Pruitt lands his first lieutenant.

The vote was 49-46 along party lines.

It's been an arduous process for Wehrum, a veteran of the George W. Bush Office of Air and Radiation in EPA. A vote in the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee was briefly delayed due to Republican concerns over the agency's plans for the Renewable Fuel Standard.

Democrats and environmental groups oppose his selection. During his confirmation hearing, Wehrum said the degree that human activity drives climate change remains an "open question," contradicting mainstream science.

WHAT'S NEXT: A final vote on the nomination is likely sometime on Thursday.

Nuclear waste bill clears House committee with bipartisan backing Back

By Darius Dixon | 06/28/2017 12:05 PM EDT

The House Energy and Commerce Committee approved nuclear waste reform legislation this morning on a bipartisan 49-4 vote, facing only a handful of Democratic holdouts.

The bill, H.R. 3053, sponsored by E&C Environment Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus, would make the first changes in 30 years to the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, which names Yucca Mountain as the nation's sole waste repository.

The committee agreed to a compromise manager's amendment that would let DOE open one interim storage facility while regulators continue to work on a permanent repository. That eliminated most of the Democratic objections to a draft version of the bill that would have barred such work until the Nuclear Regulatory Commission issued a decision on Yucca Mountain.

Yucca Mountain supporters have been concerned that a storage site would take the pressure off of approving a repository. Meanwhile, lawmakers have been anxious to move the waste building up at defunct nuclear power plants in their states.

Another bipartisan amendment, also approved on a voice vote, removed the bill's original language impacting Nevada's water rights and air permitting. The amendment would also increase Yucca's capacity from 70,000 metric tons to 110,000 metric tons.

The bill also authorizes payments to host states and limits work on any defense waste-only repository.

New Jersey Rep. Frank Pallone, the top Democrat on E&C, said that the bill was "a delicate and difficult negotiation, but I believe we have arrived at a very good compromise."

WHAT'S NEXT: Shimkus has said he expects the bill to get a vote by the full House before the August recess, but GOP leaders have not yet scheduled floor time for the bill.

Shimkus: Nuclear waste bill mired in dispute with appropriators Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 06:10 PM EDT

Rep. John Shimkus is in the midst of a face-off with members of the powerful Appropriations Committee over language in his bipartisan nuclear waste bill that would limit their say in how money from the Nuclear Waste Fund is spent.

The Illinois Republican's bill, H.R. 3053, would authorize the Energy Department to open one interim storage facility while regulators review plans to permanently house it at Yucca Mountain, which would be expanded in size. But the measure also sets aside mandatory spending from the fund, an account amassed from fees on nuclear-generated electricity that was valued at $46 billion last year.

Mandatory spending in the Shimkus bill includes operating costs related to Yucca Mountain and additional payments through a "benefits agreement" with the state of Nevada. Under existing law, Congress spends money from the fund through annual appropriations bills, a process that allowed Democrats to block required regulatory reviews of Yucca Mountain for the last several years.

"We want to be able to send a signal to not just DOE to move forward and that there's going to be some consistent funding, but we also want to send a signal to the state of Nevada that if there's going to be an agreement on benefits that that's not at the whim of a year-to-year process," Shimkus told POLITICO on Wednesday. "My frustration is that we are serious but the appropriators, right now, are still wedded to a year-to-year process."

GOP leadership "wants us to resolve this conflict" before bringing the bill to the floor, Shimkus said.

Given the fund's $46 billion value last year, Shimkus' bill would permit DOE to spend at least $500 million annually for the construction and operation of a Yucca Mountain facility as well as payments to Nevada for hosting "without further appropriation."

Shimkus said the negotiations with appropriators over his bill are separate from the omnibus spending bill lawmakers need to address next month, making it difficult to estimate when the conflict might be resolved.

The showdown is only the latest hurdle for long-suffering nuclear advocates who want the U.S. to establish a permanent waste repository.

Even if Shimkus and the appropriators resolve their differences on his bill, the Senate has shown little appetite this year for addressing a permanent nuclear waste repository, despite the retirement of former Democratic Leader Harry Reid, Yucca Mountain's No. 1 foe. Nevada Republican Dean Heller, who faces one of the toughest reelection fights next year, has become the biggest roadblock in the upper chamber. The House included $150 million to restart Yucca in its fiscal 2018 spending bill for the Energy Department and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, but the Senate did not follow suit and seems unlikely to go along with including the funds in an omnibus.

"Senate Republicans have made it clear they don't want to move forward on Yucca Mountain because it could hurt Sen. Heller," a senior Senate aide said.

Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who chairs the appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over Yucca, acknowledged in a recent interview that Heller is "a well-respected, influential U.S. senator, so his views will be paid attention to by lots of senators," but that it was too soon to tell how a final deal would shake out.

Heller himself wouldn't say whether he'd secured any assurances from Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to keep new Yucca funds out of the next spending law. "I keep urging it," he said with a smile. "I think we'll get there."

The Senate is "not passionate about this," said Tim Peckinpaugh, a partner at K&L Gates, a law firm that was involved with the lawsuits that sued to force the federal government to continue work on the Yucca Mountain application. "I don't see a John Shimkus in the Senate," he said. "He has passion and incredible persistence on this issue. But I do see broad-based support. I'm convinced that if there's an up-or-down vote in the Senate, it would pass by big numbers — more than 60 — and I think both sides know that, quite frankly."

Simply looking at the map of where the commercial and defense nuclear waste destined for a site like Yucca Mountain currently sits, logical supporters of the new funding would include members of the Senate Democratic leadership like Sens. Chuck Schumer of New York, Dick Durbin of Illinois and Patty Murray of Washington.

But Sen. Catherine Cortez Masto (D-Nev.), like Heller, opposes Yucca in line with the rest of her state's congressional delegation. And she's convinced that Schumer, the Senate minority leader, won't support new cash for the project next month.

"I don't anticipate that there's going to be any funding," she said. "I've talked to my leadership about it. ... Sen. Schumer is opposed to it."

Durbin freezes Interior nominees over monument review Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 04:17 PM EDT

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin said in a letter today that he's placed a hold on multiple Interior nominees until the agency responds to an earlier October letter concerning his review of national monument designations.

"I remain hopeful that a meeting can be scheduled in the near future to discuss these important issues," he wrote to Micah Chambers, acting director of Interior's Office of Congressional and Legislative Affairs. "Please let the Secretary know that while my colleagues and I await his scheduling decision, my holds on Department of Interior nominees will continue."

In that previously unreleased October letter, Sens. Tom Udall, Martin Heinrich and Jeff Merkley and Durbin asked Zinke to meet with Durbin's office to explain his recommendations to shrink several national monuments created under the Antiquities Act by prior administrations.

They also requested maps, documentation and justifications for those recommendations and called for his report to be released publicly.

Zinke sent a letter earlier today to Senate leadership demanding "immediate action" on multiple Interior nominations that have been held up for months.

WHAT'S NEXT: Durbin said his hold on the nominees will continue until Zinke agrees to a meeting.

Army Corps nominee to face scrutiny over Mississippi River project Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 06:36 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's pick to run the Army Corps of Engineers, Rickey Dale "R.D." James, is likely to draw some scrutiny on Thursday over what critics complain is his conflict of interest over a controversial Mississippi River flood control project.

James, a civil engineer by training, was recommended to Trump by Sens. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) to head the agency with a $6 billion budget that takes the lead on major water infrastructure projects across the U.S.

The pair were impressed by James' 36 years sitting on the Mississippi River Commission, which along with the Corps oversees water projects on the nation's biggest river and its many tributaries.

"He has been a friend to Mississippi in terms of supporting projects and policies to improve navigation and flood control in our state," Cochran said in a statement.

Cochran chairs the Appropriations Committee and thus exercises great power over the Army Corps' budget, while Wicker is a senior member of the Armed Services Committee, which will host Thursday's hearing.

Major waterway groups are pleased as well.

"Given his tenure on the Mississippi River Commission, he really has an in-depth knowledge of the Corps of Engineers and the importance of investing in infrastructure," said Amy Larson of the National Waterways Conference.

But James' critics say he used his position on the powerful commission to protect his own interests, which include thousands of acres of valuable Missouri farmland sitting inside a controversial floodway.

"He has a long history of advocating for environmentally devastating and costly projects that benefit a handful of special interests," said Melissa Samet, a water attorney at the National Wildlife Federation. "And a lot of that advocacy has been carried out despite what we see as a clear conflict of interest with his position at the Mississippi River Commission."

James and his wife own New Madrid farmland worth between $2.5 million and $11 million, according to his financial disclosure. Some of that land is rented out via a family limited partnership. If confirmed to the Army Corps post, James has promised to hand over control of the farmland and a company he owns to his son, although he will still receive crop rent income.

James' farmland lies squarely within the New Madrid floodway, a relief-valve channel that can be used to divert floodwaters from the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. But using the floodway — as has happened twice in the last 90 years — means damaging James' farm and the land of other politically powerful landholders.

Following the most recent flooding in 2011, the Army Corps delayed blowing out a levee that would activate the floodway, and the state even sued in an attempt to stop it, despite rising flood levels in Cairo, Ill., up the Mississippi River. James, who consulted on the decision, said he had been conflicted about flooding the Missouri farmland because of his family's holdings.

"My family's land lies within the floodway, and I could not displace from my mind what the decision would mean to my friends and neighbors," James told the Defense Media Network in 2012.

The political battle over whether to replace that levee, which would protect the land owned by James and other farm owners but leave small Illinois towns at risk of flooding in the future, continues to this day.

James will likely also find himself at the center of budget battles between the White House, which has proposed a steep 16 percent spending cut in the Army Corps' budget to $5 billion, and lawmakers who are desperate to fund more major civil works projects in their states.

The Senate budget package calls for a small boost to $6.2 billion, slightly above the $6.16 billion sought by the House. It is unclear whether those increases will survive whatever spending deal Congress eventually strikes, but the Army Corps' funding is unlikely to decrease from fiscal 2017.

Larson said James' personal experiences with Corps projects means he is well placed to pressure the White House to maintain or increase project funding. "Given his position, he understands that we need additional funds for investments in the nation's infrastructure," she said.

And James will play a major role in helping EPA rewrite its Waters of the U.S. regulation, which will determine the waterways that fall under federal jurisdiction. EPA has indicated it will not propose a new version of the Obama rule until early next year.

Once James clears the Armed Services Committee, he will go through another hearing and vote before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

In addition to the farm, James manages a Missouri cotton gin and grain elevator company. His term on the Mississippi River Commission is the group's second-longest tenure, and he was most recently reappointed by former President Barack Obama in January.

James has given more than $21,000 to federal candidates since the 1990s, according to FEC records. Most of that money went to Missouri lawmakers, including former Sen. Jim Talent and former Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, both Republicans, and Rep. Marion Berry, a Democrat from Arkansas' 1st Congressional District. The only presidential campaign he gave to was Rudy Giuliani in 2007.

James and his wife report owning stocks in the utilities Dominion Energy and American Electric Power, natural gas company Spectra Energy and oil giant Shell.

Appeals court denies stay on Atlantic Sunrise pipeline construction Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/08/2017 06:22 PM EDT

A federal court panel today denied a request from community and environmental groups to halt construction of the Atlantic Sunrise natural gas pipeline while those organizations challenge FERC's approval of the project.

"Petitioners have not satisfied the stringent requirements for a stay pending court review," a three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals said in the order.

The panel instituted an administrative stay on Monday while it weighed whether to grant the full stay, which would've been in place until the lawsuit, Allegheny Defense Project, et al v. FERC, 17-1098, was resolved.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court still needs to establish the briefing schedule for the lawsuit and has not decided when or whether to hold oral arguments.

AT LAST MY TAX IS COMPLETE AGAIN! Senate tax writers waited until 9 p.m. Thursday to roll out their tax bill, and here's what jumped out to ME's bleary-eyes:

— The big stuff everyone gets: The Senate bill, like the House bill, cuts the corporate tax rate to 20 percent, something pretty much all the energy companies will like. And the bill provides a temporary ability to use 100 percent expensing of capital, a boon to capital-intensive energy industries like oil, natural gas, coal mining, and even renewables, though solar companies have an interaction between the Investment Tax Credit and expensing that may cause unpleasant side-effects.

— Oil gets a change to treatment of foreign income: ME noticed that oil comes up several times in the tax bill, but the one that jumped out was the oil industry got a $4 billion boost from a change to the treatment of refining and pipeline operations overseas in the Senate bill, the same as it got in the House bill. An industry source told ME earlier in the week that the change actually has little impact on bottom lines, since it mostly changes in what tax year foreign subsidiaries transfer money up to parent companies. The source was baffled as to why the Joint Committee on Taxation gave it a score in the House version, and will no doubt still be baffled at the score in the Senate version.

— Utilities keep their exception to the interest deduction changes. The Senate bill cuts the amount of interest businesses can deduct, but utilities, who favor the provision much more than 100 percent expensing, get a carveout.

— No home for the orphans: Senate tax writers opted not to deal with a slew of expired energy tax credits that found homes in the House bill. Nothing for fuel cells, small wind, microturbines, or even the nuclear tax credit extension. And there appeared to be nothing related to a carbon capture and sequestration credit pushed by a bipartisan group.

— Then again, windies can becalmed: The senators also did not include the changes the House made to Production Tax Credit. Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley has said the House bill didn't need to make its changes, since the PTC was already going to phase out under a 2015 agreement. "The Senate tax reform bill keeps a promise to America's more than 100,000 wind energy workers and restores the confidence of businesses pouring billions of dollars into rural America," Tom Kiernan, CEO of the American Wind Energy Association, said in a statement.

— Charged up for EVs: The Senate did not follow the House lead on electric vehicles, either. While the House wiped out a $7,500 tax credit, the Senate bill is silent.

Environmental groups are already trashing the effort. "The GOP is once again trying to redirect taxpayer money to the super-rich and super-polluting fossil fuel industry — and they expect us to pay for it by giving up our healthcare, our safety, and our children's future," Janet Redman, U.S. policy director for Oil Change International, said in one typical statement.

Bigger picture: There are massive differences between the House and Senate versions of the tax overhaul that signal hard bargaining lies ahead, POLITICO's tax gurus Aaron Lorenzo, Brian Faler and Bernie Becker report. Their take: "Reconciling the House and Senate plans and getting sign-off from Trump is likely to be daunting." Score of the Senate proposal here.

CLIMATE HAWKS LAND IN BONN: Five Democratic senators — Ben Cardin, Ed Markey, Sheldon Whitehouse, Brian Schatz and Jeff Merkley — are on the ground at the Bonn climate talks this weekend and will hold a call today at 12:30 p.m. to discuss their goals. But their message is clear: "We're not all nuts," Whitehouse told ME.

Still in it to win it: On Saturday, California Gov. Jerry Brown and former NYC Mayor Michael Bloomberg will unveil America's Pledge with a report detailing the scope of the actions planned by non-federal entities to fight climate change. Joining them to reiterate U.S. commitment to aggressive climate action: Cardin, UNFCCC Executive Secretary Patricia Espinosa, COP23 President and Fijian Prime Minister Frank Bainimarama and Pittsburgh Mayor Bill Peduto, among others.

Big spenders: The World Resources Institute announced Thursday a private cash infusion of $2.1 billion in private funds to help restore degraded lands in Latin America and the Caribbean. "With more than $2 billion of investments earmarked for Latin America alone, restoration is a climate solution that works and is a great investment," Walter Vergara, coordinator of the new push, said in a statement. WHEN HE'S NOT WRITING OP-EDS: Energy Secretary Rick Perry, back from a trip to Paris this week, will headline a "roundtable discussion" in Houston on Monday afternoon on behalf of America First Policies, the pro-Trump political nonprofit, Campaign Pro's Maggie Severns reports. America First has been quiet much of the year but is now pushing to give a jolt to its fundraising and reassert its close ties to President Donald Trump. But Texas businessman Roy Bailey, who has deep ties to group, said Perry won't be there looking to raise funds. "It's a nice opportunity for people to understand what's going on at the Energy Department," Bailey said.

Remember: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has generated controversy and several investigations over his habit of mixing political activities with official government business.

CORNSTATERS NOT ALL SOLD ON WHITE: Kathleen Harnett White, Trump's pick to chair the Council on Environmental Quality, will need the support of all the Midwesterners on the Senate Environment committee if she's going to advance, and it looks like she still has some work to do on that front. Despite disavowing her previously staunch opposition to the Renewable Fuel Standard thanks to "new data" from Sen. Joni Ernst, White doesn't yet have Ernst's backing. "We're still debating that one," Ernst told ME. Veteran ME readers know the Iowa Republican extracted concessions from EPA on the RFS before backing new agency air chief Bill Wehrum.

Nebraska's Deb Fischer is also "still debating" White's nomination, and she is still looking for more information on how White would do her job. The CEQ chair doesn't have a regulatory role on RFS, but she would offer advice to Trump. "If you look at the questioning I had, I was looking at also how she would present options to the president," Fischer told ME. "That's going to be her job, not necessarily on the RFS, but where she gets her data from, how she prepares that and what kind of facts she has. We'll see how it shakes out."

Rounds a tentative yes: Mike Rounds of South Dakota said he's not totally on board, but, "I would lean yes as opposed to no." He thought she answered his questions well. "What I wanted to make sure people understood is that the RFS in its current form is the minimum we can do," he said.

PRUITT ADDRESSES ANTI-CLIMATE ACTION CONFERENCE: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt delivered a two-minute video address to a conference in Houston sponsored by the Heartland Institute, the group that opposes action to fight climate change. "I want to say to you at the Heartland Institute, thanks for what you're doing to advance energy, thanks for what you're doing to advance natural resources," Pruitt said. "There's great optimism across the country and I pray you feel that in Houston, Texas."

PAUSED FURTHER: A federal appeals court once again ordered lawsuits over the Obama administration's Clean Power Plan held in abeyance for another 60 days, until Jan. 8, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. The D.C. Circuit ordered EPA to file status updates on its CPP repeal effort every 30 days.

BLUNT MESSAGE FOR BARRASSO: Whitehouse told ME he understands why Pruitt might not want to testify before the Senate EPW committee but that Chairman John Barrasso should not let him off. "There's a point where oversight becomes a responsibility irrespective of your loyalties," he said. "I think there will be really awkward questions for him and I think the farther he stays away from a forum where he has to tell the truth, the happier he is."

DOURSON REALLY IN TROUBLE? If a vote came up today, ranking member Tom Carper told reporters, Michael Dourson, Trump's pick to run EPA's chemicals office, wouldn't have the necessary votes. "Privately, in my conversations with a number of Republicans, they have expressed deep concerns," he said. "We're going to make sure at the end of the day that he does not have the votes." And North Carolina's Thom Tillis confirmed Wednesday he's not yet ready to back Dourson: "We've heard the concerns and we're working on getting the background information."

ZINKE SAYS HE'S READY TO MEET WITH DURBIN: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a letter Thursday said he would be "happy to meet ... to discuss any issue" involving the agency with Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin who has put the confirmation of multiple Interior nominees on hold until he gets a meeting with the secretary to discuss his review of several dozen national monument designations. Zinke pointed out that he talked with a number of Democrats prior to sending the report to the White House in late August and also with Sen. Tom Udall in mid-September on the New Mexico Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks and Rio Grande Del Norte monuments. In a tweet Thursday, Zinke said he'd be "happy to talk monuments and nominees. Call anytime, Dick."

MORE INFORMATION SOUGHT ON PERRY'S PLAN: Four environmental groups — the Sierra Club, Earthjustice, the Environmental Defense Fund and the Natural Resources Defense Council — filed FOIA requests with Energy and FERC seeking information on the development of Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resiliency proposal to FERC. "It's outrageous that there is so little transparency at DOE that we have to repeatedly file these Freedom of Information Act requests instead of Rick Perry simply allowing the public and energy stakeholders to inform the policy making process," the Sierra Club's Mary Anne Hitt said in a statement.

HERE'S SOMETHING: The compromise version of the National Defense Authorization Act would require the Pentagon to rank the top 10 installations in each military branch's that are the most vulnerable to the effects of climate change over the next two decades, Pro Defense's Connor O'Brien reports. Conservatives sought to take out the provision during House floor debate earlier this year, but Democrats and moderate Republicans teamed up to leave it in.

ZINKE DENIES IMPROPRIETY IN WHITEFISH DEALINGS: During an interview with Fox News late Thursday, Zinke denied playing any role in his son landing a job with controversial Whitefish Energy — "he got a job by himself" — and said he had no role in the Montana-based company getting a now-cancelled contract to repair Puerto Rico's electric grid. "I didn't have any influence, didn't have any knowledge of the contract. Puerto Rico is not under Interior. And those elitists that would think from being a small town somehow is a crime, shame on ya," he said.

MAIL CALL! CONSERVATIVES ENDORSE 'BIGGER' MONUMENT REVIEW: Twenty-four House Republicans sent a letter to Trump Thursday urging him to "think big and act bigger" as he mulls final recommendations about what to do to a host of prior national monument designations. It recommends the outright rescission of several monuments and significant downsizing of others. "We ask that you take these recommendations to heart and that you not be deterred by a few vocal special-interests groups from finishing what you set out to accomplish with this review," they wrote.

Democrats to GAO: Expand adviser probe: Ten members of the Senate Democratic caucus, led by Whitehouse, asked GAO in a Thursday letter to expand its existing probe into EPA scientific advisory appointments to evaluate Pruitt's new order barring scientists who receive grants from serving on advisory boards. "When a policy, like this one, does not on its face address the problem it purports to solve it should get exacting scrutiny to determine what in fact its true purpose is," they wrote.

How about that coal memo? Frustrated by the lack of response from the White House and EPA, Whitehouse demanded Murray Energy head Bob Murray turn over a copy of the three-page "action plan" he gave to the administration. The document became a major focus of Andrew Wheeler's nomination hearing to be EPA deputy administrator on Wednesday.

Think of us: The Petroleum Marketers Association of America sent a letter to Barrasso on Thursday asking him to urge the Trump administration "to reduce the ethanol mandate given that the [underground storage tank] system compatibility issues present severe economic harm to small businesses" as senators discuss the RFS with administration officials. Link here.

ETHANOL, GRAINS PRODUCERS WANT BRAZIL PUNISHED: U.S. ethanol and grains producers are urging the U.S. Trade Representative to suspend Brazil's tariff benefits under the Generalized System of Preferences, which grants tariff relief on imports from developing countries, because of complaints that the South American country has put in place a restrictive quota on ethanol imports. "Brazil's decision to engage in protectionist trade measures as a result of a short-term and market-oriented deficit against the largest agriculturally related product imported from the U.S. is not in keeping with the spirit of the GSP program," the Renewable Fuels Association, Growth Energy and the U.S. Grains Council wrote in a letter to Lighthizer on Thursday.

SKEPTICISM OVER CBO'S ANWR ESTIMATE: Count Taxpayers for Common Sense among the deep skeptics that Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski's proposal to open ANWR would generate more than $1 billion in revenue over the next decade, as the Congressional Budget Office estimated it would. The non-partisan group forecasts that oil and gas companies would have to bid at levels 10 times higher than historic norms to meet the $1 billion CBO estimates would flow into federal coffers. "If Congress were to enact legislation that opened up the 1002 Area to oil and gas leasing, it is unlikely — near to the point of impossibility — that such leasing would generate the amount of revenue to the Treasury that the CBO predicts," the group's new fact sheet states. It released a second fact sheet outlining a series of other options to raise revenue through federally-owned natural resources.

California's dirty secret? The Center for Biological Diversity released a report finding three-quarters of California's oil is as harmful to the environment as Canadian tar sands. Link here.

High stakes in the desert: Failing to keep the Navajo Generating Station open could put at risk the reliability of Arizona's electric grid and the regional power supply, according to a study funded by coal giant Peabody Energy. Among the cities potentially hardest hit include Phoenix, Scottsdale, Tucson and Flagstaff, according to the study. Summary link here.

NO FUN! Amid reports the National Park Service is considering closing the National Mall to softball and frisbee games permanently, the Sierra Club's DC-based softball team, the Conservation Laborers Against Wrong, vowed a fight. "Maybe the hundreds of Congressional Republican staffers who play organized softball every summer will let Zinke and Trump know there is nothing to drill or mine for underneath the Mall," the team's coach Lauren Lantry quipped.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Senate GOP's tax bill points to nasty fight ahead Back

By Bernie Becker, Brian Faler and Aaron Lorenzo | 11/09/2017 11:49 AM EDT

Yawning divisions have emerged between the House, Senate and White House over tax reform, raising doubts about whether Republicans will be able to achieve their most important political and policy priority before the end of the year.

The Senate and House are split on some key issues, including the top tax rate and the timing of the corporate tax cut, and also at odds with President Donald Trump in many areas. Hard bargaining, battles between GOP factions and an onslaught of lobbying are the gauntlets Republicans will have to run to get legislation to Trump's desk by the end of the year — and into their mailers and ads for the 2018 elections.

If one thing unifies Republicans and makes the job easier than it might appear, it's the fear that they will have nothing to take into those contests after the failure of another marquee effort, repealing and replacing Obamacare. House Speaker Paul Ryan and other GOP leaders used the drubbing the party took in Tuesday's election in Virginia as a warning to the rank and file: Pass tax reform or face the wrath of Republican voters.

"We are going to conference," Ryan told reporters Thursday, after the Senate unveiled its long-awaited plan and House tax writers advanced theirs to the House floor. "Yes, the Senate bill is going to be different than the House bill because that's the legislative process."

The House Ways and Means Committee approved its bill on a party-line 24-16 vote, and House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy said the full House would vote on it next week. The Senate Finance Committee will start working on its bill next week, maybe as early as Monday.

One of the first differences to emerge was the Senate's plan to delay slashing the corporate tax rate to 20 percent from 35 percent until 2019. The House wants to cut the tax immediately, and has the White House on its side.

Cutting the corporate rate is the centerpiece of the GOP plan to lower tax rates and spur faster economic growth. But the Senate is trying to limit the revenue impact to allow a bill to pass with just 51 votes and avoid a possible Democratic filibuster.

In another break with Trump, neither the Senate bill or the House bill includes a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate requiring Americans to have health insurance. But Senate Republicans are still considering a repeal to help cover the cost of making some tax cuts permanent.

GOP leaders are talking with rank-and-file members to assess whether they have the necessary 50 votes to scrap the least popular part of Obamacare.

"I'd sure like to do that," said Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) "I think we're counting votes. It sure gives us a lot more flexibility."

Trump has pushed for repealing the mandate, along with conservative senators and House members. But many lawmakers said reopening the health care debate would just make passing the tax bill harder.

The Senate plan would set a top individual tax rate of 38.5 percent, compared to the House's 39.6 percent for annual income above $1 million, and keep deductions for people with high medical bills and for student loan interest that the House wants to discard.

It would completely eliminate a federal deduction for state and local taxes, while the House had to mollify a group of GOP lawmakers from high-tax blue states by keeping the deduction for property taxes, up to $10,000.

The Senate kept the maximum mortgage deduction at the interest on loans up to $1 million. The House would cut it to $500,000.

The House targeted the estate tax — a favorite foil of conservative Republicans — for elimination in 2025, after doubling the current exemptions to about $11 million for individuals and $22 million for married couples. The Senate is proposing only to double the exemptions.

The House proposed expanding the child tax credit to $1,600 per child from $1,000. The Senate set the increase at $1,650.

But that is still too low for some senators who want a $2,000-per-child credit because they worry some middle-income people could otherwise see their taxes go up under the plan — and they have an ally in Ivanka Trump. "While we are glad to see an increase to the child tax credit, like the House bill, it is simply not enough for working families," Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Mike Lee (R-Utah), the main champions of the issue in the Senate, said in a joint statement.

On another hot-button issue, the treatment of "pass-through" businesses that pay individual tax rates, the Senate would set a top rate of 30 percent, while owners of those businesses have been clamoring for parity with corporations. The House is offering a super-low 9 percent rate on the first $75,000 those businesses earn, which attracted praise from the powerful National Federation of Independent Business, which had panned the House bill last week.

Both bills would shift the U.S. to a "territorial" tax system that would largely shield offshore corporate income from U.S. taxation. But they parted ways on a mechanism to discourage more companies from moving abroad to take advantage of the change.

As the first details were trickling out about the Senate plan, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas) unveiled a new round of changes to the House GOP's plan.

Their tax plan had ballooned beyond their budget, allowing them to cut taxes by no more than $1.5 trillion, after Republicans earlier this week gutted a plan to crack down on international tax avoidance hated by the Koch brothers and a number of multinational corporations.

The revisions include hundreds of billions of dollars in new revenue aimed at filling that budget hole. Republicans did it in part by taking back much of the money — $87 billion — they had lost when they watered down those overseas tax avoidance provisions.

Another $70 billion would come from charging companies more in a one-time tax on their overseas earnings. Under the new plan, they'd pay 14 percent on their liquid assets and 7 percent on illiquid ones like factories overseas. That's up from 12 percent and 5 percent, respectively, under the previous proposal.

House lawmakers want to raise another $20 billion by requiring people claiming the popular child tax credit to provide a Social Security number for their child, a provision long sought by Republicans aimed at preventing undocumented immigrants from taking the break.

Delaying their plans to repeal the estate tax by another year saved them $21.5 billion. They'd raise another $109 billion from companies tapping a long-standing break for research and development expenses.

Other House provisions would expand a tax on private university endowments and impose a surtax on life insurance companies.

The plan also would allow organizations such as charities and churches to engage in political speech without risking their tax-exempt status, and it restored a tax break for adopting children that had been on the chopping block.

Senate Finance Committee aides said the panel was still working to make its bill compliant with the chamber's budget rules, which don't allow the tax bill to add to deficits outside the 10-year budget window.

Given the GOP's slim majority in the Senate and the danger of a repeat of their Obamacare fiasco, some House Republicans were resigned to more or less having to defer to the Senate.

"I look at it more as a priority of process and procedure over substance," said Rep. Dennis Ross (R-Fla.). "While there are some very good things, don't get me wrong, substantively in our bill, I think the canvas will probably be painted in its final stage in the Senate once we give them the vehicle."

Perry to headline Texas event for pro-Trump outside group Back

By Maggie Severns | 11/10/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry will attend an event in Texas next week put on by America First Policies, the pro-Trump political nonprofit, according to an invitation obtained by POLITICO.

The invitation, which was sent to a Republican donor, says that Perry will headline a "roundtable discussion" in Houston on Monday afternoon. Details of the event's location will be available only to those who RSVP shortly before the event, the invitation said.

Perry's trip to Texas comes at an auspicious moment for America First Policies and its affiliated super PAC, America First Action. The organization is working to lock in support from donors and establish itself as a center of gravity for pro-Trump activity with close ties to the Trump administration.

America First was silent for much of this year, prompting some to question what role, if any, it would play for President Donald Trump, but organizers are working to reinvigorate the group's fundraising and reassert America First's close ties to the president. The group aims to spend $100 million promoting tax reform and supporting 2018 candidates in the next year. Leaders of the group have convened at the White House in recent weeks, and with donors at a Texas ranch owned by megadonor T. Boone Pickens. Donald Trump Jr. was present at the ranch to signal his support.

Perry has deep ties to both the energy industry and donors in Texas, which helped power his two presidential runs. But Perry will not be in Houston asking for funds, said Texas businessman Roy Bailey, who is deeply involved in America First Policies. "It's a nice opportunity for people to understand what's going on at the Energy Department," Bailey said.

An Energy Department employee did not return a request for comment. Perry was in France this week meeting with energy leaders from other countries.

America First is ramping up activity as other high-profile Republican operatives and donors are accelerating pro-Trump outside efforts of their own.

Future45, which supported Trump during the 2016 elections with funding from casino billionaire Sheldon Adelson and the Ricketts family, announced a project that will spend in the tens of millions of dollars promoting tax reform earlier this month. Great America PAC, which is affiliated with Steve Bannon, began endorsing 2018 candidates in recent days.

Great America PAC's support for Roy Moore broke from Trump's support for Sen. Luther Strange in Alabama. America First plans to give unwavering support to Trump's agenda, which Bailey said could be a differentiator from other groups.

"We're not second-guessing anything; we're totally confident in [Trump's] ability to lead this nation and we're supporting him and the vice president," Bailey said.

Trump's Interior chief 'hopping around from campaign event to campaign event' Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Esther Whieldon | 10/05/2017 05:01 AM EDT

Republican donors paid up to $5,000 per couple for a photo with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke at a fundraiser held during a taxpayer-funded trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, according to documents reviewed by POLITICO — raising questions about his habit of mixing official government business with political activism.

The new details about Zinke's March trip to the Caribbean, including the previously undisclosed invitation to the Virgin Islands Republican Party fundraiser, emerged after weeks of scrutiny of the former Montana GOP congressman's travels. The nearly two-hour event was one of more than a half-dozen times Zinke has met with big donors or political groups while on department-paid trips, Interior travel records and other documents show.

Ethics watchdogs say Zinke is combining politics with his Interior duties so frequently that he risks tripping over the prohibitions against using government resources for partisan activity, even though his appearance at the Virgin Islands event seems to have been legal. Democrats have also seized on the issue, including 26 House members who wrote in a letter Tuesday that Zinke's travels "give the appearance that you are mixing political gatherings and personal destinations with official business."

Zinke has said all his actions have obeyed the law, dismissing concerns about his travel as "a little BS."

But some ethics advocates say Zinke's attendance at a fundraiser during his first month as secretary is not in line with past administrations' conduct, even if he crossed no legal red lines.

"It happens on occasion with other Cabinet secretaries, perhaps even a little more often as you get near the election, but it is not a very common practice for Cabinet members to be hopping around from campaign event to campaign event like we're seeing with Zinke," said Craig Holman, government affairs specialist for government watchdog Public Citizen.

The secretary is already under investigation by his department's inspector general over his use of taxpayer-funded private planes for some of the trips, and the Office of Special Counsel is looking into an activist group's allegations that he violated the Hatch Act, the law limiting political activism by federal employees. The White House has cracked down on Cabinet members' travel habits following former HHS Secretary Tom Price's resignation on Friday, which occurred after POLITICO reported on his own expensive flights.

Zinke visited the Virgin Islands from March 30 to April 1 on an official trip related to the Interior Department's role overseeing the U.S. territory. On his first day, following a "veterans meet and greet" and a reception with Gov. Kenneth Mapp, he appeared in his personal capacity at a March fundraiser for the local Republican Party at the patio bar of the Club Comanche Hotel St. Croix, department records show.

Tickets for the fundraiser ranged from $75 per person to as much as $5,000 per couple to be an event "Patron," according to Zinke's official calendar and a copy of the invitation. Patrons and members of the host committee, who paid $1,500 per couple, could get a photo with Zinke at the start of the event, which was attended by local party members and elected officials.

The following day, Zinke took a $3,150 flight on a private plane, paid for by the department, from St. Croix to official functions on St. Thomas and returned later that evening. Interior Department officials said there was no other way to accommodate his schedule, which included official events on both islands commemorating the 100th anniversary of the Dutch government transferring control of the islands to the United States.

Zinke is allowed to engage in partisan political activity in a "purely personal (not official) capacity," so long as he does not use government resources, according to Interior Department guidelines on the Hatch Act and other federal laws. The invitation to the GOP fundraiser did not identify Zinke by his official title and included a disclaimer that the money is being solicited by the local party and "not by any federal official."

All told, Zinke has spent around $20,000 for three charter flights as secretary, nowhere near the $1 million tab Price racked up on non-commercial trips. But he has on numerous occasions attended political receptions, spoken to influential conservative groups or appeared alongside past campaign donors during trips has taken outside of Washington, D.C., for official department business.

In one instance, Zinke gave a motivational speech for a professional hockey team owned by a major campaign contributor that he said was official business — and which required him to charter a $12,000 flight to Montana for an appearance at the Western Governors Association the next day.

In another case, during a speech to the Western Conservative Summit in Denver, he was introduced via a recorded voice as the Interior secretary and Zinke proceeded to talk about the agency's priorities. The summit was organized by the Centennial Institute, which bills itself as Colorado Christian University's think tank and is a part of the State Policy Network of organizations that collectively push for conservative state-level legislation.

An Interior spokeswoman said Zinke always follows the law but declined to answer specific questions about his appearance at the Virgin Islands fundraiser, nor say whether he would keep raising political money. The agency also has yet to post Zinke's trip expenses involving any of the political events.

"The Interior Department under the Trump Administration has always and will always work to ensure all officials follow appropriate rules and regulations when traveling, including seeking commercial options at all times appropriate and feasible, to ensure the efficient use of government resources," spokeswoman Heather Swift said in a statement.

Swift did not respond to questions about whether the department had gotten reimbursement for the political portion of Zinke's three-day Virgin Islands trip, as the head of one watchdog group says it should have.

"Some of this travel is clearly political and that part of the travel should have been paid for by the RNC, NRCC, state political parties, a campaign committee or Zinke personally," said Daniel Stevens, executive director of the Campaign for Accountability.

No payments to the department are listed in the Virgin Islands Republican Party's FEC records.

Zinke is not the first Interior secretary, or Cabinet member, to have his activities questioned.

In 2012, a watchdog group called Cause of Action urged the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether President Barack Obama's then- Interior Secretary Ken Salazar had violated the Hatch Act while taking an Obama reelection campaign RV tour of Colorado with a couple of lawmakers and the state lieutenant governor. Local organizers of one stop on that tour had billed Salazar on its online events calendar as attending the political rally in his official role. OSC would not say whether its investigation uncovered any problems, but travel records Interior has posted show that one of Salazar's aides had told the tour's coordinator the schedule "should not refer to (Salazar as) 'secretary.'" Salazar did not respond to a request for comment.

A former Salazar aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the Obama administration generally tried to avoid scheduling political events that coincided with official travel because it was difficult to divvy up what expenses should be reimbursed by a campaign.

The special counsel's office found Obama HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius in violation of the Hatch Act in 2012, saying she had made "extemporaneous partisan remarks" by endorsing a candidate for North Carolina governor during a speech she made in her official capacity. Sebelius tried to scrub the violation by reclassifying the appearance as political and reimbursing the Treasury Department for costs associated with the trip.

Sally Jewell, who was Interior secretary during Obama's second term, said Zinke was within his rights to appear at the fundraiser in the Virgin Islands. Jewell said she once appeared at a fundraiser for Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell while in Obama's Cabinet, though she paid her own way to Washington state and was not identified by her official title.

"If he had legitimate business while he's on the island, to do a political thing on the side, I don't think that is that unusual," Jewell said in an interview.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt canceled his scheduled appearance at a fundraiser for the Oklahoma Republican Party in April because an invitation had identified him by his official title and said he would discuss his work at the agency. EPA ethics officials said he would have been cleared to attend the event if not for that language on the invitation.

Watchdog groups say Zinke's behavior fits a pattern for Trump's Cabinet.

"These government resources have been abused by this administration," said Virginia Canter, an executive branch ethics counsel for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington who previously worked as an ethics official for Presidents George H.W. Bush, George W. Bush and Obama. "To the extent that some of that supports their political ambitions is inconsistent with the intent of this authority."

The Campaign for Accountability called on Interior's inspector general and the Office of Special Counsel to investigate whether Zinke violated the Hatch Act or department ethics rules with his speech to the hockey team, which the group said appeared to be a favor for a donor. Interior's IG office announced its investigation earlier this week, and OSC told the Campaign for Accountability that it was looking into the group's complaint, according to an email shared with POLITICO. The OSC declined to comment.

Reps. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Donald McEachin (D-Va.) have asked Interior's IG to also look into any trips on which the secretary was accompanied by his wife, Lola Zinke, who is chairing the campaign of Montana Republican Troy Downing, a candidate to unseat Democratic Sen. Jon Tester next year. Swift said Lola Zinke was not in the Virgin Islands and has paid her own way whenever she has traveled with her husband on official trips.

Many who know him see Zinke's travels as an attempt to keep in touch with political contacts as he contemplates what he will do after leaving the Trump administration. Back home, the 55-year-old former Montana congressman is seen as an attractive candidate for the open-seat governor's race in 2020, when Democratic Gov. Steve Bullock will have to step down because of term limits.

"I think he's definitely got political aspirations; that's one of the reasons why he is where he is at right now," said Land Tawney, executive director of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers, a Montana-based sportsman group that supported Zinke's bid for Interior secretary. "You don't go from being a Montana legislator to a first-term congressman to [Interior] secretary without having ambition."

The Virgin Islands trip was Zinke's first interaction with big donors or influential conservative groups during his travel as Interior secretary.

A weeklong trip in May that took Zinke through Montana, Utah and California also offered a chance to squeeze in some political events.

Zinke delivered the keynote speech at the RNC spring meeting on May 11 in Coronado, Calif. Zinke had flown to California the previous night, after several days touring monuments in Utah, and the RNC speech was his only event in the state aside from a meeting earlier that afternoon with Rep. Amata Radewagen, the Republican delegate from American Samoa, and members of the American Tunaboat Association.

The next day, Zinke flew back to Montana, where he joined Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) and Vice President Mike Pence to tour a coal mine on the Crow Indian reservation operated by the Westmoreland Coal Co.

The trip offered Zinke and Pence an opportunity to tout the Trump administration's work to promote new coal mining on federal lands — and it allowed them to make a brief detour to promote Zinke's congressional replacement. That Friday night, Zinke, Pence and Daines attended a political rally for GOP candidate Greg Gianforte, and Zinke attended a get-out-the vote event for the Montana GOP the next day.

Zinke apparently paid for his return trip to Washington out of his own pocket — it was marked "personal travel" on his calendar, a designation not applied to the other flights on that trip.

Gianforte, whose wife is a major political donor in Montana, won the May 25 special election to take over Zinke's House seat.

Greg and Susan Gianforte donated more than $10,000 to Zinke's 2016 congressional campaign and another $10,000 to a joint Zinke-Daines PAC, according to federal records. The couple donated $5,000 for his earlier run for Congress.

Zinke met with big influencers and donors in June as well.

On June 25, he flew from D.C. to Reno, Nev., where his only scheduled event was a meeting of the Rule of Law Defense Fund, a group of Republican attorneys general that has been linked to the Koch brothers, where he spoke and took questions for about 30 minutes, according to his schedule.

After his remarks, he sat at a dinner table with Montana's attorney general, the government relations specialist for the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino and Las Vegas Sands, and Koch Industries lobbyist Allen Richardson, Interior documents show.

The next day, Zinke flew to Las Vegas for an event on public lands in nearby Pahrump, Nev., and a speech that night to the National Hockey League's Vegas Golden Knights. Bill Foley, the team owner and chairman of Fidelity, introduced Zinke. Foley donated $7,800 to Zinke's 2014 campaign, while employees and PACs associated with Fidelity and related companies gave another $180,000. Interior officials said the speech to the NHL team was part of Zinke's official duties, and they pointed to scheduling conflicts it created to justify his use of a $12,000 private plane to get to a Western Governors Association meeting in Montana the next day.

In July, Zinke spoke to several conservative groups in Colorado during a three-day trip that also included tours of Interior Department facilities in the state. He flew into Denver on July 20 so he could appear that evening at a closed-door reception for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a group of conservative state legislators, lobbyists and industry groups that has pushed for more state control over federal lands.

And over the next two days, he was a featured speaker at a Republican committee roundtable and attended the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Court again freezes Clean Power Plan litigation for 60 days Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/09/2017 04:55 PM EDT

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today once again placed the lawsuits over the Obama administration's Clean Power Plan in abeyance for another 60 days, until Jan. 8.

The court's single-page order did not include any sort of note such as the one included in the court's previous 60-day abeyance order on Aug. 8. In that order, two of the judges attached a stern note saying EPA was skirting its statutory duty to regulate greenhouse gases.

EPA last month released its proposed repeal, and will take public comment through Jan. 16. The agency has yet to release its advance notice of proposed rulemaking seeking suggestions on whether and how to craft a narrower replacement regulation.

WHAT'S NEXT: The court ordered EPA to file status updates on its CPP repeal effort every 30 days.

Final defense policy bill would require Pentagon climate change study Back

By Connor O'Brien | 11/09/2017 04:04 PM EDT

The Pentagon would be required to detail threats posed by climate change to military installations under to the compromise version of the National Defense Authorization Act, H.R. 2810 \(115\), released today.

The legislation calls on the Pentagon to rank the 10 most vulnerable installations within each service to the effects of climate change over the next two decades — including from rising sea levels, flooding, drought and wildfires — and outline steps to mitigate any damage.

The report would be due within a year of the bill's enactment.

The climate change study was included in the House version of the defense policy bill, and the Senate accepted the provision in a joint conference committee.

Conservatives attempted to strip the provision during House floor debate in July, but Democrats and moderate Republicans joined to preserve the study requirement.

Wheeler attended Murray meetings on DOE coal aid but says he didn't write company's pitch Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 01:08 PM EDT

Andrew Wheeler, the nominee for EPA deputy administrator, says he represented Murray Energy in meetings with Energy Department and congressional officials to support Trump administration efforts to prop up ailing coal-fired power plants.

Wheeler, who counted Murray among his clients as a lobbyist at Faegre Baker Daniels, faced numerous questions at his confirmation hearing today over his work for the company, which would be one of the main beneficiaries of DOE's proposed grid rule, and its CEO Bob Murray, a top supporter of President Donald Trump. Wheeler said he attended a Murray Energy meeting at DOE where the grid proposal was discussed several months ago, as well as a meeting on Capitol Hill on the subject. He said he de-registered as a lobbyist in August.

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse pressed Wheeler over Murray's comments in a recent PBS Frontline documentary. The CEO said he gave Trump "an action plan" outlining coal policies to pursue, including eliminating the Clean Power Plan.

"I did not work on that and I do not have a copy of that memo," Wheeler told Whitehouse at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing.

Wheeler said Murray gave him a copy to read in December or January. "I looked at it and handed it back to him, I don't have it," Wheeler said, adding that he did not recall any specifics.

Whitehouse said he hopes to get a copy of the plan with the help of EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) now that Wheeler confirmed its existence.

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee will likely vote on Wheeler's nomination in the coming weeks.

BONN JOUR! Starting today, international negotiators gather in Bonn for the COP23 — the first U.N. climate summit to be chaired by a small island nation, Fiji. It's also the first meeting after President Donald Trump announced his intention to pull the U.S. out of the landmark Paris accord in June. Let's take a quick look at what to expect between now and the conference's end on Nov. 17:

—The U.S. question: An open question remains how much the U.S. decision to withdraw from the Paris accord will be a distraction to the nitty gritty work of filling out the details of the 2015 pact. The Trump administration opted to send longtime diplomat Thomas Shannon as the delegation's lead in Bonn rather than a cabinet member, suggesting a low-key role on the sidelines. But U.S. officials are expected to tout the benefits of nuclear energy and fossil fuels in combating emissions, according to the New York Times. Meanwhile, a high-profile delegation of U.S. governors, mayors, private sector leaders and others are traveling the conference as a signal that much of the country remains committed to aggressive climate action.

—Loss and damage: Fiji, backed by other vulnerable island countries, is keen to focus attention on the loss and damage already linked to climate change (think, hurricanes, floods and rising sea levels). Many island nations are raising pressure on negotiators, especially from wealthy nations, to tackle loss and damage issues such as funding, risk preparedness, weather forecasting and new insurance proposals. This, compounded by a number of high-profile weather events this year, will make it one of the more challenging discussions at the summit, according to Camilla Born from the environmental think tank E3G.

—Working out the rules: Another challenge will be to advance work on rules to make sure countries meet the Paris agreement's goals ahead of next year's COP24 — when parties said they would sign off on the rulebook underpinning the deal. A thorny discussion here will be around setting a common and transparent monitoring and reporting system that ensures emissions reductions can be compared across countries. It's a sensitive issue with emerging economies such as China, long wary of letting outsiders glance their domestic books, but a priority for the EU, which wants to make sure everyone pulls their weight. The battle could therefore be over whether it will be a bifurcated system, setting different guidelines for developed and developing countries, or universal.

—Assessing progress: Negotiators will also have to work out how the first stock-take of national progress toward achieving climate pledges will play out next year. The idea behind the 2018 meeting is to pave the way for countries to increase their emissions reduction targets in 2020, when parties are for the first time required to communicate renewed (and ideally strengthened) commitments, as set out under the Paris deal. The outgoing Moroccan COP22 presidency and the incoming Fijian presidency have published a joint document outlining their vision for the meeting.

—Who's coming? According to the UNFCCC, close to 20 world leaders, including French President Emmanuel Macron and German Chancellor Angela Merkel, are slated to attend. Also expected to participate: Arnold Schwarzenegger, UN Secretary-General António Guterres, Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo, California Governor Jerry Brown, UN Special Envoy Michael Bloomberg and several U.S. lawmakers, including Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Brian Schatz. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt won't attend, though other agency staff will.

NEXT STEP IN WOTUS UNWIND: EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers sent a proposed rule delaying the effective date of the Waters of the U.S. Rule to the White House for review, a move designed to give the administration more time to design its own version, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. An agency spokeswoman said the action would "amend the effective date associated with the 2015 Clean Water Rule to give the agencies time to consider the two-step process proposing to rescind and revise the 2015 rule." The new proposed rule is separate from any rule intended to replace WOTUS. The agency declined to say when the new effective date would be or if it would make any other tweaks to the regulation.

DEMOCRATS TALK DISASTER RELIEF PRIORITIES: Thirty members of the Senate Democratic caucus sent a letter Friday to OMB Director Mick Mulvaney outlining their priorities for a third disaster supplemental spending package expected to be requested by the administration later this month. "We can invest in technology, conservation and infrastructure that will mitigate further damage and make our communities more resilient," they wrote. Particular requests include "specific legislative language" concerning electric grid reconstruction in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, as well as "further investments" in NOAA's weather infrastructure and forecasting capabilities.

High-profile visitors: House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster and Ranking Member Peter DeFazio, Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and Senate EPW Ranking Member Tom Carper were among those lawmakers visiting Puerto Rico this weekend, according to local media. Also along: Sen. Kamala Harris, Sen. Bill Cassidy, Sen. Al Franken and Rep. Garret Graves.

Let's reschedule: House Homeland Security ranking member Bennie Thompson wrote to Chairman Michael McCaul asking for the panel to reschedule a hearing on hurricane response and recovery that was suddenly shelved last week. Link to letter here.

QUITE THE PUBLIC PITCH: Tweeting at 2:49 a.m. in Hawaii, Trump asked Saudi Arabia to list shares of its biggest oil company on the New York Stock Exchange. "Would very much appreciate Saudi Arabia doing their IPO of Aramco with the New York Stock Exchange. Important to the United States!" he wrote. That comes as Saudi Arabia moves toward an offering of shares of its state-run oil company — the world's largest energy company — on international markets. He later told reporters aboard Air Force One: "They're not looking at it, but I want them to strongly consider the New York Stock Exchange or NASDAQ, or frankly anybody else located in this country, but those are the big two... I just spoke to the king a little while ago, and they will consider it."

ANOTHER INVESTIGATION ARRIVES: GAO agreed last week to probe whether Pruitt's appearance in an August video from National Cattlemen's Beef Association violated laws "on the use of appropriated funds for lobbying and publicity or propaganda purposes and the Antideficiency Act," Pro's Alex Guillén reports. House Democrats asked GAO to begin the investigation.

TEAM ETHANOL FIRES BACK: If Trump watches the ads on Fox & Friends, then he's getting an earful on the Renewable Fuels Standard these days. Starting today and through the Nov. 20, Fuels America, an umbrella group of ethanol producers and trade associations, will be running an ad reminding Trump of his promises to farmers and accusing oil refiners of demanding a taxpayer funded bailout. The refiners had the inverse ad up during Fox & Friends last week.

Ticking clock: EPA's final RFS rule went to the White House for review last week, and Pruitt has promised to release it by the statutory Nov. 30 deadline.

** Presented by ExxonMobil: We're collaborating with FuelCell Energy on a novel idea to use fuel cells to capture carbon at natural gas power plants, and in the process reduce emissions and increase electrical output. This technology could be a game changer in addressing the world's growing need for energy, while also reducing the impact on the environment. Learn more. **

HIT THE FLOOR! House lawmakers this week are expected to vote on the Hydropower Policy Modernization Act H.R. 3043 \(115\), which aims to speed the regulatory approval process for hydropower projects. And they're also expected to consider compromise legislation H.R. 2874 \(115\) overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program to impose new penalties on homeowners with repeat flooding, though with softer consequences than originally floated.

MEGA HOUSE ENERGY PACKAGE GETS MARKUP: The House Natural Resources Committee is expected Wednesday to mark up a broad new energy package H.R. 4239 \(115\) on Wednesday after its introduction on Friday, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Among other provisions, the SECURE American Energy Act would roll back Obama-era offshore drilling rules, create an offshore oil and gas revenue program for East Coast drilling and give more oil and gas permitting power to the states.

CLIMATE REPORT AT ODDS WITH TRUMP STANCE: Even as the White House stuck with its line the climate "has changed and is always changing," scientists from the 13 agencies who worked on the National Climate Assessment that concluded human activity is driving climate change said they saw no effort from the administration to meddle in their work, Pro's Emily Holden reports.

In response, Paul Bledsoe, who helped release the first national climate assessment while at the Clinton White House in 2000, emails his take: "The White House clearly judged that the firestorm over delaying or suppressing the report release, especially ahead of the Bonn climate talks, would be greater than from the findings themselves."

NEW TACTIC IN CLIMATE FIGHT: Speaking at the Vatican over the weekend, California Gov. Jerry Brown asked the Catholic Church to throw its weight behind his efforts to undermine Trump's climate rollbacks abroad, POLITICO California's David Siders reports. Brown urged religious establishments to help "awaken the world" to efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and described the president's rejection of mainstream climate science as a "lie within a lie."

PRINCE OF WYOMING? Blackwater founder Erik Prince tells NBC News he's still "mulling" a challenge to Wyoming Sen. John Barrasso. "They have been in the wilderness for eight years, saying oh, if only we had a Republican president and now they have one," he said. "[They're] kind of out of excuses." One fact of note: Barrasso has received just 5.5 percent of his total $2.4 million haul of itemized individual contributions since the start of 2013 from Wyoming. There's no public polling on how the theoretical Barrasso v. Prince matchup would go.

MAIL CALL! TIME OUT! Two top Energy and Commerce Committee Democrats — Frank Pallone and Bobby Rush — sent a letter asking that a hearing slated for Tuesday on two bills making significant changes to the Energy Star programs and efficiency standards for ceiling fans be postponed until witnesses from EPA and DOE are available. "These bills would make substantial changes to the popular Energy Star Program and efficiency standards for ceiling fans, and should not be rushed through the Committee process without adequate input from the agencies tasked with executing these potential changes," they wrote to Chairman Greg Walden and Energy Subcommittee Chairman Fred Upton.

DEMOCRATS TO PRUITT: WITHDRAW SCIENCE ADVISER POLICY: Six senior House Democrats on the Science and Energy and Commerce committees asked Pruitt to withdraw his "biased, harmful" policy barring scientists who receive agency grants from serving on scientific advisory panels. "We advise you to follow [Federal Advisory Committee Act] regulations and policy in selecting qualified individuals to serve on EPA's science advisory committees just as previous administrations led by both parties have done. Anything less is a great disservice to the public interest," they wrote.

CALIFORNIA TALLIES WILDFIRE NEEDS: Golden State bigwigs, including Brown, Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Kamala Harris and 39 California House members, sent a letter to Trump Friday asking for $7.4 billion in federal funds to help the state recover from devastating wildfires. Letter link here.

MORE TIME NEEDED: A bicameral group of 81 Democrats, led by Sens. Maria Cantwell and Tom Udall and Reps. Jared Polis and Raúl Grijalva, asked Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in a letter released Friday to extend the public comment period on its proposed repeal of BLM's methane waste rule from 30 to 90 days and to offer public hearings in the Western U.S. "The American people deserve to get a proper return on this natural gas resource, and any attempt to roll back this rule would represent a giveaway to industry polluters," they wrote.

THIS TIME IT'S PERSONAL: In light of U.S. Forest Service recommendations to potentially allow new uranium mining near the Grand Canyon, House Natural Resources Ranking Member Raúl Grijalva wrote Chairman Rob Bishop a letter to ask for a hearing on his bill H.R. 360 \(115\) to create a national monument in the area. Grijalva separately asked Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue for his rationale behind the recommendation and whether the public would have the opportunity to comment.

NEW PHASE OF KEYSTONE FIGHT: Volunteers with Bold Nebraska went door-to-door in the five Nebraska Public Service Commissioners home districts to raise concerns about the use of eminent domain and environmental concerns surrounding the Keystone XL pipeline. The Nebraska regulators expect to make a final decision on the pipeline permit by the end of the year.

ADS URGE NO DRILLING IN ANWR: The League of Conservation voters is targeting Republican Reps. Bruce Poliquin and Darrell Issa with ads (sample here) urging them not to support opening ANWR to drilling. It's part of an ongoing $200,000 campaign.

NO REAL RUSH ON METHANE: EPA is now all-but-certain not to take any final action on the Obama-era 2016 methane regulation targeting emissions rule for new oil and gas wells until the next year, Pro's Alex Guillén reports in Energy Regulation Watch. That comes as the agency issued a notice last week floated the idea (offered by the American Petroleum Institute) to implement longer phase-in periods for key requirements of the rule rather than seeking an outright stay.

MOVER, SHAKER: Katie Waldman leaves her post as press secretary for Montana Sen. Steve Daines this Thursday for a "new opportunity."

State Dept's Shannon to lead U.S. delegation to climate talks Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 10/06/2017 07:18 PM EDT

Thomas Shannon, the State Department's undersecretary for political affairs, will lead the U.S. delegation to a major international climate change summit next month in Bonn, Germany, according to an administration official.

The news comes amid swirling rumors that Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt was angling to lead the delegation, a move that would have made a skeptic of established climate science the face of the United States at the talks.

In previous years, the State Department's climate envoy led the U.S. delegation to the annual gathering. But the Trump administration has declined to fill that position.

The Bonn negotiations are aimed at implementing the 2015 Paris climate change agreement, from which President Donald Trump has said he intends to withdraw.

Neither the White House nor the State Department responded to requests for comment.

EPA, Army Corps seek delay to WOTUS start date Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/03/2017 05:48 PM EDT

The EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers sent to the White House a proposed rule on Friday delaying the effective date of the Waters of the United States regulation to give the administration more time to craft a new version of rule, according to an agency spokeswoman.

EPA declined to specify the new effective date for the regulation, also called the Clean Water Rule. Nor would it say if the proposed rule would make other changes. The notice will appear on the OMB's website this morning.

"In order to provide regulatory certainty, EPA and the Department of the Army have sent a proposed rule to the Office of Management and Budget for interagency review that would amend the effective date associated with the 2015 Clean Water Rule to give the agencies time to consider the two-step process proposing to rescind and revise the 2015 rule," the spokeswoman said.

In June, EPA proposed a repeal of the rule, which aimed to clarify which waters fall under federal jurisdiction. The comment period closed in September with 190,000 comments filed.

The proposed rule is separate from any rule intended to replace WOTUS.

"The agency is also in the process of holding listening sessions with states, tribes and stakeholders as we work to develop a proposed step 2 rule that would revise the definition of 'waters of the United States,'" the spokeswoman said.

The current rule was stayed by the 6th Circuit in some states last year.

WHAT'S NEXT: OMB will send the proposed rule back to EPA for release and publication in the Federal Register.

Trump urges Saudi Arabia to list state oil company on N.Y. stock exchange Back

By POLITICO Staff | 11/04/2017 09:58 AM EDT

President Donald Trump on Saturday urged Saudi Arabia to list shares of its biggest oil company on the New York Stock Exchange.

"Would very much appreciate Saudi Arabia doing their IPO of Aramco with the New York Stock Exchange. Important to the United States!" Trump tweeted shortly before he was due to leave Hawaii on the first leg of a 13-day trip to Asia.

Saudi Arabia is preparing to sell shares of its state-run oil company — the world's largest energy company — on international markets.

Saudi Prince Mohammed has said the initial public offering of about $100 billion could value the company at some $2 trillion, according to Reuters.

In an on-the-record meeting with reporters aboard Air Force One later Saturday, Trump clarified: "Aramco is going public. It will be perhaps the biggest going public ever. It's the Saudi Arabian oil company and it will be just about the biggest ever.

"And I want them to consider, because right now they're not looking at it, because of litigation, risk and other risk, which is very sad, they're not looking at it, but I want them to strongly consider the New York Stock Exchange or NASDAQ, or frankly anybody else located in this country, but those are the big two

"I just spoke to the King a little while ago, and they will consider it."

The Trump administration has been working hard to strengthen ties with Saudi Arabia.

Trump in August described his relationship with King Salman of Saudi Arabia as "very great," calling him "a friend of mine."

Trump's son-in-law and senior adviser Jared Kushner made an unannounced visit to Saudi Arabia at the end of October — his third trip to the country this year. He was accompanied by deputy national security adviser Dina Powell and Middle East envoy Jason Greenblatt.

Kushner is tasked with leading the administration's efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East. The White House would not say who Kushner met with on his visit.

In August, Trump offered to personally mediate a dispute between Saudi Arabia, Qatar and other Arab countries centered around alleged support of terrorism.

"I was telling the emir before that if I can help between UAE and Saudi Arabia ... if I can help mediate between Qatar and, in particular, the UAE and Saudi Arabia, I would be willing to do so," he said at the time.

Trump visited Saudi Arabia with a large White House entourage in May, committing the United States to a deeper alliance with the "sacred land."

As a presidential candidate, Trump had previously accused the Muslim-majority kingdom of complicity in the World Trade Center attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

GAO to review Pruitt appearance in beef group's anti-WOTUS video Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/03/2017 06:22 PM EDT

The Government Accountability Office will investigate EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's appearance in an industry group's video calling for public comments in favor of repealing the Waters of the U.S. rule, according to a letter released today by House Democrats.

Rep. Peter DeFazio (D-Ore.) asked GAO to investigate whether Pruitt's actions violated laws "on the use of appropriated funds for lobbying and publicity or propaganda purposes and the Antideficiency Act," according to the letter, dated Oct. 31.

The video was posted on Aug. 16 by the National Cattlemen's Beef Association, a major critic of the Obama-era WOTUS regulation. It includes an interview in which Pruitt discusses his criticisms of the rule, along with text urging viewers to submit pre-written comments via the NCBA's website.

The video quickly drew criticisms from environmental groups. EPA at the time said Pruitt sought "engagement with all stakeholders, especially those who felt their voices were ignored by the previous Administration."

GAO previously dinged the Obama-era EPA in 2015 when it concluded the agency's use of a "Thunderclap" social media campaign promoting the WOTUS rule amounted to "covert propaganda."

WHAT'S NEXT: GAO's letter does not specify how long the inquiry will take.

House Natural Resources Committee unveils new energy bill Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/03/2017 03:34 PM EDT

House lawmakers today unveiled a new energy bill that would roll back Obama-era offshore drilling rules, create an offshore oil and gas revenue program for East Coast drilling and give more oil and gas permitting power to the states.

Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) introduced the bill, with House Natural Resource Committee Chairman Rep. Rob Bishop (R-Utah) and Texas Democratic Reps. Henry Cuellar and Vicente Gonzalez. The bill is expected to move through the committee next week and hit the House floor "in the near future," committee spokesman Parish Braden said.

Among the bill's provisions is a directive to create an offshore oil and gas revenue program for states along the Atlantic coast and Alaska, where the Interior Department is exploring opening more of the waters for offshore oil drilling.

The bill would also require Congress to approve any future removals of offshore acres from lease sales or establishment of new marine sanctuaries, an apparent response to the Obama administration's last-minute removal of some Alaska and Atlantic waters from development.

Onshore, the bill would also allow states to oversee drilling plans on federal land within their borders.

The bill calls on Interior to hold a lease sale for wind power projects off the California coast within one year of the bill's passage. Interior would also conduct feasibility studies for wind lease sales off the coasts of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Guam, with results due in six months and possible sales within a year of the bill's passing.

WHAT'S NEXT: The House Natural Resources Committee expects to take up the bill next week.

New U.S. climate report at odds with Trump policy Back

By Emily Holden | 11/03/2017 05:10 PM EDT

A sweeping new U.S. government report concludes that humans have pushed global temperatures to the highest level seen by modern civilization, defying the Trump administration's pronouncements that climate change is a hoax or based on unsettled science.

The report, produced by 13 agencies as part of the congressionally required National Climate Assessment, reinforced years of research that shows human activity was the main reason temperatures have soared in the past century — and they are likely to keep climbing, boosting sea levels and threatening environmental disasters.

The report contradicts President Donald Trump's rejection of climate science, his plan to withdraw the U.S. from a global pact to fight climate change and his moves to unwind a slate of policies put in place under former President Barack Obama to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

"Foremost, we conclude based on extensive evidence, that it is extremely likely that human activities are the dominant causes of global warming," said David Fahey, one of the lead authors. "For the warming over the last century, there is no convincing alternative explanation for the warming observed."

However, the White House stuck to its stance that climate "has changed and is always changing," and it pointed to portions of the report about the uncertainty around the Earth's sensitivity to greenhouse gas emissions.

White House spokesman Raj Shah said in a statement that the Trump administration "supports rigorous scientific analysis and debate," and the U.S. will continue to promote access to "affordable and reliable energy needed to grow economically," support technology and infrastructure that reduce emissions and "enable us to address future risks, including climate related risks."

Fahey, a scientist at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, told reporters on a conference call that he saw no attempt to influence the report by the Trump administration.

"I'm quite confident to say there's been no political interference in the scientific messages of this report," Fahey said.

Virginia Burkett, an Interior Department climate scientist and chair of the subcommittee on Global Change Research, emphasized that the report steered clear of recommending any policies to deal with climate change, saying it was limited to "strictly the science."

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, who said he did not believe that man-made emissions were the main cause of climate change and has moved to eliminate Obama's rules curbing carbon dioxide pollution from power plants, did not comment on the report.

The report was reviewed by scientists at the National Academies, released for public comment and screened by federal agencies under both the Obama and Trump administrations.

Juanita Constible, a special projects director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, said in a blog post the report confirms what many other previous studies had shown.

"It's essential that our federal leaders in Congress and the Executive Branch take seriously the dire conclusions from the painstaking and authoritative work in the [the report] — and more importantly, to urgently act on the findings," Constible wrote.

Bob Kopp, a climate scientist at Rutgers University and a report contributor, said the findings "reaffirmed that climate change is real, that humans are the dominant cause of warming, and that it is having an effect in the U.S. And those effects will grow more severe as long as we continue to emit carbon dioxide into the atmosphere."

Sea levels are expected to rise one to four feet by the end of the century and could swell by up to eight feet if emissions of greenhouse gases continue to rise, the Climate Science Special Report says.

Episodes of heavy rainfall are becoming more frequent and intense, and heat waves will become more common. Kopp said the report also shows the U.S. can expect more compounded extreme weather events, like the multiple hurricanes and wildfires that occurred this summer.

Annual global average temperatures are expected to rise by 2.5 degrees Fahrenheit by 2050. And although the growth in global carbon dioxide emissions is slowing, that trend is moving too slowly to keep temperatures below a dangerous tipping point of 3.6 degrees, or 2.0 degrees Celsius, above pre-industrial levels that would see more devastating impacts, the scientists found.

The report is the most comprehensive study since the last National Climate Assessment was published three years ago and the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change published its physical science report four years ago, Kopp said.

The U.S. Global Change Research Program, which coordinates the assessment, also released a draft of a second volume, which examines impacts on public health and the environment, and a draft of a report on changes in carbon levels.

The report about how climate change impacts Americans, which will undergo public comment, notes that "Americans are responding to rapid changes affecting their everyday lives and livelihoods," because of climate change.

Reservoir managers in the Colorado River Basin are adjusting to lower water levels, cities along the Gulf and Atlantic Coasts are seeing more flooding and storm surge from rising seas and heavier rains. Farms in the Midwest are adopting new crop management strategies, and communities in the western U.S. face more wildfires, it notes.

Some risks are already unavoidable while others could be reversed if greenhouse gas emissions decline, according to the report.

"Climate change puts many things Americans care about at risk, both now and in the future, and risks will intensify without action," the report says.

Jerry Brown's holy war on Donald Trump Back

By David Siders | 11/05/2017 07:12 AM EDT

VATICAN CITY — California has opened a new front in its war on Donald Trump — the Vatican, where Gov. Jerry Brown on Saturday sought to enlist the Catholic Church in his effort to undermine the president's climate policies abroad.

Brown, addressing a somber gathering of scientists, politicians and religious leaders here, rebuked Trump's rejection of mainstream climate science as a "lie within a lie," urging religious establishments to help "awaken the world" to efforts to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The conspicuous repudiation of the president, in this center of Christendom on the eve of this week's international climate talks in Bonn, Germany, served to underscore Brown's role as one of the most prominent figures in the anti-Trump resistance. But it also highlighted California's deep antipathy toward the president on a global stage, allying the nation's most populous state with the international community against the backdrop of simmering tension between the White House and Pope Francis on climate change.

The pope, who did not appear at the conference, implicitly criticized the president in October for withdrawing from the Paris climate agreement, a decision that weighed heavily over the gathering.

Brown wasn't the only Californian emphasizing the American divide over global warming — or the state's determination to blaze its own trail on the issue. Rallying the same audience the previous day, California Democratic state Senate leader Kevin de León cast California's leaders — and not, explicitly, Washington's — as the "faithful stewards of God's creation."

Daniel Kammen, the University of California, Berkeley, professor who resigned noisily from his role as science envoy to the State Department in August, called Trump's election America's "existential crisis" and encouraged efforts to impeach him. And California Democratic Congressman Scott Peters said the relatively large proportion of U.S. Congress members who are Catholic is "one reason why Pope Francis' commitment to making environmental stewardship a priority of his papacy has such a potential to affect American climate policy."

The meeting, hosted by the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, preceded two weeks of climate talks in Bonn, where Brown and leaders of other Democratic states will seek to persuade the world's nations that wide swaths of the United States remain committed to the Paris agreement. Trump's withdrawal from the pact has cast a cloud over the upcoming gathering in Germany.

Still, California's Democratic governor minimized the significance of Trump's withdrawal from the accord, saying the decision helped focus public attention on the issue.

In comparison to worldwide efforts to address climate change, Brown said, "The Trump factor is very small, very small indeed."

Instead, Brown called for a fundamental transformation of people's way of life.

"It's not just a light rinse," Brown said. "We need a total, I might say brainwashing. We need to wash our brains out and see a very different kind of world."

Yet the Catholic Church's ability to move American public opinion on climate change remains in doubt. For one thing, relations between Trump and the spiritual leader of America's more than 50 million Catholics remain cool after Pope Francis criticized Trump on issues ranging from climate change to immigration to refugee resettlement.

"The state of relations between the pope and Trump is not good and has never been good," longtime Vatican analyst Iacopo Scaramuzzi said in an email. "They are openly at odds on almost every point, from personal style of life to issues as climate change or migrations, from attitude towards China, Iran or Cuba to the concept of 'people' and 'populism.'"

While the pope's encyclical on the environment served as an inspiration for negotiations in Paris two years ago, many climate activists hoped lobbying by a popular religious figure might also nudge public opinion on climate among conservatives in the United States. There is little evidence that has happened.

Following the encyclical's release and the pope's 2015 U.S. tour, researchers at the Yale Project on Climate Change Communication found a short-term increase in the number of Americans who said climate change was a "moral," "social justice" or "poverty" issue. Soon after, however, they found public opinion returned to pre-encyclical levels.

"It was him coming to the United States, where he got 24-7, wall-to-wall coverage .... we saw a significant impact on public opinion," said Anthony Leiserowitz, director of the Yale Project on Climate Change Communication. "We also found that six months later, that effect had faded away."

Bob Inglis, a former Republican congressman whose progressive views on climate change contributed to his defeat in a South Carolina primary in 2010, said of the pope's encyclical, "I do acknowledge that it hasn't exactly — it hasn't yet turned into the barn burner that I had hoped that it might have been."

For conservatives, Francis may be an imperfect messenger, controversial for his relatively progressive views not only on climate, but on marriage and immigration. The pope and Trump traded jabs during the presidential campaign last year about Trump's proposal to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, and Trump announced his withdrawal from the Paris climate agreement just days after a visit in which the pope handed him a copy of his encyclical, Laudato Si.

"I've got a Catholic friend in Congress who will go nameless, who told me that, and he was only halfway joking, that he thinks this pope is the anti-Christ," Inglis said. "There's a contingent of American Catholics who really think that the pope has left the reservation."

Inglis said he is optimistic for the long-term effect of the pope's advocacy on climate change, as the issue is taught in local parishes and other religious organizations. Climate activist Bill McKibben said the Catholic Church is "one of those bureaucracies through which things work their way kind of slowly," and he said its effects will likely percolate for years.

But Francis is also suffering in America from a problem that he shares with Trump: a declining base. Though about 1 in 5 American adults are still affiliated with the Catholic Church, their numbers are in decline. A survey last month from the Pew Research Center found a majority of U.S. adults do not think it is necessary to believe in God to be moral. And regardless of religious affiliation, climate change has failed in recent elections to register a top level of concern for most voters.

Jim Nicholson, the former secretary of Veterans Affairs and Republican National Committee chairman who served as ambassador to the Holy See under George W. Bush, said Trump's relationship with the Vatican "got off to a ragged start" but has improved steadily and is now "pretty good." He cited Trump's nomination of Callista Gingrich, the wife of former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to be ambassador to the Holy See.

"There are obvious differences on some subjects, like climate and immigration and the death penalty, always. But there's an awful lot of alignment in values — religious freedom and trafficking and life," he said.

Trump has said he is withdrawing from the Paris agreement because it puts the United States "at a very, very big economic disadvantage." But he heartened many religious leaders with his appointment of Neil Gorsuch to the U.S. Supreme Court and his opposition to funding for nongovernment organizations that perform abortions.

For many religious voters, said Mitch Hescoc, president of the Evangelical Environmental Network, matters such as abortion and Supreme Court nominations carry more weight at the ballot box than climate change.

"The problem is that [climate change] is not on the radar screen of the reasons they vote yet at this point in time," Hescoc said. "That's my job, is to help them to see why it is as important as being pro-life. Our No. 1 message is that climate change is a pro-life issue."

Climate experts stewed throughout the Vatican meeting over global climate projections they described as "horrific," "terrifying" and "depressing."

Brown, who left the Vatican for an 80-minute meeting with Arturo Sosa, the superior general of the Jesuits, said Saturday night that he is "going around enlisting allies" in the battle over climate change.

"What it all comes down to is we've got to act sooner, and we have to act more decisively, and that's not happening," Brown said. "There's real horror in store for us if we don't take action."

FERC APPROVES CONTROVERSIAL GAS PROJECTS: FERC gave its blessing late Friday to two contentious pipelines that would carry gas out of the Marcellus shale formation in West Virginia. The 2-1 approval came over the objections of Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur, who said the Atlantic Coast and Mountain Valley pipeline projects were not in the public interest. Atlantic Coast would run through Virginia's Shenandoah Valley on its way to North Carolina, while Mountain Valley would end in southern Virginia. At the heart of LaFleur's 5-page dissent is concern about the footprints and redundant elements of the 900 miles of new gas infrastructure, which she believed could've been reined in in order to limit their collective environmental impacts. Although Atlantic Coast has documented demand for all of its capacity, MVP could only account for 13 percent of its capacity, she wrote.

LaFleur's dissent highlighted two alternative approaches requested by FERC staff that they ultimately dismissed because of how much of a design overhaul they would require, significantly upsetting proposed schedules. One option would've shaved 173 miles off the collective 900 miles, and avoided the Monongahela National Forest and the George Washington National Forest while reducing the number of crossings of the famous Appalachian Trail and Blue Ridge Parkway. The second alternative — a single, larger pipeline — would essentially remove all the environmental impacts associated with the Mountain Valley project. "[T]he decision before the Commission is simply whether to approve or reject these projects, which will be in place for decades. Given the environmental impacts and possible superior alternatives, approving these two pipeline projects on this record is not a decision I can support," she wrote. LaFleur, who doesn't seem to have voted against a natural gas project approval since a controversial compressor station decision in 2012, went to Twitter Friday night to say that her dissent "was a very difficult decision."

It's an issue in the Virginia governor's race: Republican nominee Ed Gillespie said in a Saturday statement he was "glad" for FERC's decision and called on Democratic nominee Ralph Northam to voice support for the projects. According to The Roanoke Times, Northam did not take a firm stance on the pipeline Saturday, noting the Army Corps of Engineers and Virginia's Department of Environmental Quality must still sign off on them. Elana Schor wrote about the dicey politics of the Atlantic Coast pipeline in 2015, when Virginia Republicans were fighting the project's route.

More pipeline drama in New York: FERC's approval of both projects came the same day New York lobbed a new test of the authority that states have to block natural gas pipelines, when Gov. Andrew Cuomo's administration challenged the commission's decision to overrule a state denial of a water quality permit for the 7.8-mile Millennium Valley Lateral project, POLITICO New York's Marie J. French reports.

And out of Europe: Russian gas giant Gazprom didn't think it would have much trouble expanding the Nord Stream pipeline, but those beliefs are being severely challenged, POLITICO Europe's Anca Gurzu reports. And Trump administration officials went to Brussels last week to reiterate U.S. opposition to the project.

AND WE'RE ROLLING INTO A NEW WEEK! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Duke Energy's Michael Sewell was first to pick Sen. Luther Strange as the tallest in U.S. history. For today: Which two-term congressman did Paul Ryan succeed as representative of Wisconsin's 1st? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

NEW MEMBERS OF THE INNER CIRCLE: A conservative Texas think tank that had close ties to Energy Secretary Rick Perry while he served as Texas governor has now seen three members of its staff selected for energy and environmental posts in President Donald Trump's administration, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The latest addition from the Texas Public Policy Foundation is Kathleen Hartnett White, Trump's controversial nominee to lead the White House's Council on Environmental Quality. Sometimes viewed as too far right even among Texas GOPers, the think tank has already landed staff in important roles overseeing oil and gas rules and federal enforcement of environmental standards.

Brian Roberts, a University of Texas professor specializing in political institutions and interest groups, said the group's rise appears reflective of the mutual disdain between Trump and D.C.-establishment Republicans that's forced the administration to look outside traditional GOP channels to fill political slots across the federal government. "Texas is a very large state that's been under Republican control for a generation, so it hardly seems far-fetched that there might be some conservative policy talent here," Roberts said. "Couple that with the fact that the Trump administration is going out of its way to avoid 'establishment' talent — those most likely to be resting comfortably in D.C.-area think tanks — it makes even more sense that we find them fishing for talent outside the swamp."

Other TPPF veterans in Trump slots: Susan Combs, who is awaiting Senate approval to become Interior's assistant secretary for Policy, Management, and Budget, and Doug Domenech, tapped to be Interior's assistant secretary of Insular Areas.

Sen. John Barrasso called White, an "excellent choice" in a statement to ME. "She deserves full and fair committee consideration, followed by a Senate vote," the Environment and Public Works Committee chairman said.

ON THE PRESIDENT'S MIND: Trump shot back at a New York Times story examining his struggles at implementing a host of campaign promises by largely touting his accomplishments in the energy arena. "The Failing @nytimes, in a story by Peter Baker, should have mentioned the rapid terminations by me of TPP & The Paris Accord & the fast.....approvals of The Keystone XL & Dakota Access pipelines. Also, look at the recent EPA cancelations & our great new Supreme Court Justice!" he tweeted. ME would just note Trump merely kicked off the multi-year process of withdrawing from Paris and those EPA "cancelations" must still go through the formal rulemaking process and survive vigorous legal challenges.

OIL RIG EXPLODES IN LAKE PONTCHARTRAIN: One person is missing and six others are injured after an oil rig reportedly owned by Clovelly Oil Co. exploded in Lake Pontchartrain, La. shortly after 7 p.m. Sunday, The New Orleans Advocate reports. Video footage filmed shortly afterward showed the platform still on fire. The Coast Guard and local police are reportedly responding to the scene.

KING COVE ROAD COMING? Turns out Interior's been working quietly behind-the-scenes on a land swap that would enable the construction of a long-sought one-lane gravel road from the isolated southwestern Alaska village of King Cove through the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge, The Washington Post reports. Opponents of the road fear it would harm the habitats of a variety of animals and potentially endanger other wildlife refuges throughout the country. The proposal would turn federal land over to King Cove Corporation that would enable construction of a road through the refuge that could be connected to roads on both sides. This has long been a pet project of Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and briefly delayed the confirmation of Obama-era Interior chief Sally Jewell.

FEINSTEIN GETS A CHALLENGER: California state Senate leader Kevin de León, who ushered ambitious climate legislation and an extension of the state's cap and trade program through his chamber, announced a primary bid against Sen. Dianne Feinstein, POLITICO California's David Siders reports. "California needs a senator who will stand up and fight for Medicare for All, one that prioritizes the fight against climate change, that will protect Dreamers and our economic prosperity," he said in an interview.

NEW PUSH TO FILL POLITICAL VACANCIES: Even as his boss has repeatedly voiced comfort leaving hundreds of high-level political appointments vacant, White House Chief of Staff John Kelly has granted Cabinet officials new autonomy to select top political appointees, POLITICO's Nancy Cook reports, citing 10 interviews with White House officials and advisers close to the administration. According to the Partnership for Public Service, the Senate has confirmed to date roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government.

— Four EPA nominees, including the highly controversial picks of Michael Dourson as chemicals chief and William Wehrum as lead air official, get votes Wednesday in the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Also on the to-do list are the nominations of David Ross to head the water office, Matthew Leopold to be general counsel and Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC, which Barrasso called a "big ask" even if packaged with two GOP selections.

PROBE SOUGHT INTO SUPERFUND DRINKING WATER: In light of reports some Puerto Ricans were drinking water from Superfund sites out of desperation, Homeland Security Ranking Member Bennie Thompson asked DHS to investigate whether that behavior was occurring and what could be done to stop it. Nearly one month after the storm, just 15 percent of the island has electricity and 31 percent of people still lack potable drinking water, according to government figures.

MICROBREWED LNG WITH A SIDE OF AVOCADO TOAST: Today is the last day to comment on the Energy Department's proposal to setup a special application process for the export of small batches of liquefied natural gas to countries that are not part of free trade agreements with the United States. According to its Federal Register notice, DOE wants to ease approvals for applications to export LNG in quantities up to 140 million cubic feet per day, so long as they don't require an environmental impact statement or an environmental assessment under the National Environmental Policy Act. The agency expects that the small-scale shipments will serve LNG customers in the Caribbean, as well as Central and South America. A few weeks after issuing this NOPR, DOE approved small-scale LNG exports to the Caribbean from a site in Florida.

FOR YOUR VIEWING PLEASURE: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop's full half-hour interview with C-Span's "Newsmakers" is available here. He said Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has "exceeded my expectations" so far. Other topics included wildfires, Antiquities Act and Puerto Rico, among others.

BIPARTISAN GROUP BASHES BIODIESEL CUTS: A bipartisan group of at least 25 senators — led by Heidi Heitkamp, Roy Blunt, Patty Murray and Chuck Grassley — are today sending EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt a letter urging him to reverse course on proposed cuts the advanced biofuel volume for 2018 and his intention to hold biomass-based diesel volume stagnant for 2019. "The industry is poised for growth, in accordance with the intent of the law, if EPA sends the market signals with increased volumes. Reducing volumes and especially those RVOs that were previously finalized is disruptive, unprecedented, and very troubling," the letter said.

ME FIRST — RFA REPORT SAYS RIN PRICES DON'T HURT GAS PRICES: The Renewable Fuels Association is out with a report today arguing that a jump in prices for credits under the Renewable Fuel Standard had little impact on gas prices. The report is an attempt to rebuff arguments from oil refiners that volatility in the market for Renewable Identification Numbers drive up gas prices, and thus EPA should act to reduce those costs. "This analysis demonstrates that EPA's efforts will have no impact on consumer gasoline prices," RFA CEO Bob Dinneen said in a statement. "If finalized, however, these proposals will have a decidedly negative impact on the U.S. ethanol industry by artificially cannibalizing demand."

EPA FOUND A CARBON RULE IT CAN LIKE: Sure EPA is proposing to roll back the Clean Power Plan, but that doesn't mean all carbon rules are off the table: The agency is even now working on a rule to regulate carbon from jet engines, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. The rule would implement an agreement struck by the International Civil Aviation Organization to increase jet efficiency and thereby reduce carbon emissions on international flights. The rule is crucial for Boeing, which needs federal agencies to certify its engines before it can sell aircraft overseas in 2020, when the agreement takes effect. "For Boeing, GE and Pratt and Whitney, it's critical," said Daniel Rutherford, marine and aviation program director for ICCT. "If they want to sell aircraft after 2020, they need this rule."

A good sign for HFCs agreement? The ICAO agreement had the strong backing of industry, much as does an amendment to the Montreal Protocol to reduce use of global warming hydrofluorocarbons. "Without reading too much into it, the administration's pending carbon emission rule for aircraft could be a positive sign for its eventual support of the Kigali Amendment to the Montreal Protocol," Francis Dietz, spokesman for the Air Conditioning Refrigeration, and Heating Institute, told ME. "Just as the ICAO agreement has the U.S. aircraft industry's support, so too is Kigali strongly supported by U.S. manufacturers, who would like to see a unified, global phase down of HFC refrigerants rather than the hodgepodge of national, regional, and even state policies that would likely be the case without it."

** Presented by the National Biodiesel Board: President Trump repeatedly pledged to protect biodiesel and the Renewable Fuel Standard (RFS). But EPA's latest actions threaten the 64,000 jobs supported by biodiesel. A strong RFS will be key to keeping these jobs and upholding his promise. Tell EPA to grow the RFS: <http://bit.ly/2ghDL03> ** currently EPA's acting assistant administrator for the Office of Research and Development, plans to leave that role Nov. 3, CNN reports. Though the agency's top science adviser initially declined to comment on the reasons for his departure, he later said "the time was right to go for a variety of reasons" and that his retirement was not early.

REPORT: ACTING EPA SCIENCE ADVISER STEPPING DOWN: Robert Kavlock,

ALASKA OFFICIAL TO RUN EPA REGION 10 — REPORT: Chris Hladick, Alaska's commissioner of the Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development, has been picked to run EPA's Region 10, according to the website Must Read Alaska, citing unnamed sources familiar with the pick. Region 10 is headquartered in Seattle and covers Alaska, Washington, Oregon and Idaho. Region 10 is home to one of the more contentious matters EPA faces: The proposed Pebble Mine, which the agency is allowing to apply for mining and discharger permits but is opposed by Gov. Bill Walker. As commissioner, Hladick oversees several divisions and corporate agencies, including the Alaska Energy Authority and the Alaska Gasline Development Corps. He previously served as city manager of Unalaska.

GREEN MESS WITH TEXAS (HAZE RULE): Environmentalists have major issues with the Trump administration's recent federal haze rule covering Texas, calling it in a Friday court filing "a sham rule that flagrantly violates notice and comment procedures mandated by the Clean Air Act." Greens say EPA put out a "drastically different" final rule compared to what the Obama administration proposed in January and that the new version could actually allow for an increase in emissions. The groups ask the court to toss the rule and force EPA to issue a new version closer to the proposal within 30 days.

Also likely to affect the proceedings are the recent announcements from Texas utility Luminant about plans to close three coal plants that were major emitters of haze-forming pollutants. Those retirements could affect this rulemaking, though the filing didn't address the closures.

GOOD MONDAY READ: POLITICO's Michael Grunwald looks at why Trump's been laser-focused on the coal industry and why the industry's thrilled about his first flurry of actions.

Divided FERC approves Atlantic Coast, Mountain Valley pipeline projects Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/13/2017 08:00 PM EDT

FERC gave a green light to the contentious Atlantic Coast natural gas pipeline project tonight, with Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur as a dissenting vote.

FERC voted 2-1 on approvals for both Atlantic Coast as well as a the Mountain Valley Pipeline Project.

"Given the environmental impacts and possible superior alternatives, approving these two pipeline projects on this record is not a decision I can support," LaFleur wrote in a 5-page dissent attached to both orders, saying that "I cannot conclude that either of these projects as proposed is in the public interest."

Pipeline politics: Virginia's Keystone? Back

By Elana Schor | 05/03/2015 01:32 PM EDT

Call it the Keystone next door.

A core group of Virginia Republicans and other landowners is leading the charge against a proposed natural gas pipeline near their backyards and using tactics similar to the environmental crusade against the Keystone XL oil pipeline — the very project Republicans in Congress have elevated into a matter of national economic survival.

Financial services super-lobbyist Phil Anderson is joining other politically active Republicans in carrying out a well-funded campaign against Dominion's $5 billion Atlantic Coast Pipeline, which would cross Virginia's Shenandoah Valley while running 550 miles from West Virginia's fracking fields to North Carolina. They're calling the effort "All Pain, No Gain," which echoes the "All Risk, No Reward" coalition that Keystone opponents formed two years ago.

"Job One is to stop this route — it would be a tragedy for the state of Virginia," said

Anderson, whose family has owned land for more than a century along Atlantic Coast's proposed path 20 miles west of Charlottesville. His allies include other landowners in the area, as well as Tom Harvey, a national security staffer in the George H.W. Bush administration; and Taylor Keeney, a former spokeswoman for Republican ex-Gov. Bob McDonnell.

The pipeline opponents say their fight is neither Republican nor Democratic, and Anderson said his campaign against Atlantic Coast is "not mutually exclusive" with the overwhelming GOP support for Keystone. He notes that Dominion could use condemnation to acquire access to private property for the project if it can't work out agreements with the owners.

"A lot of conservatives oppose this pipeline — eminent domain for a pipeline that's not providing any true public utility," Anderson said. He added: "The XL debate obviously has raised talking points about pipelines to a higher level, but in many ways they are not germane to this issue in Virginia. It's a different type of pipeline, a different sort of need."

Still, Atlantic Coast's opponents acknowledge the parallels with the anti-Keystone push that has pitted President Barack Obama against a chorus of GOP lawmakers in Washington. The dispute is also a reminder of how Keystone has changed the politics of pipelines nationwide, offering a template that activists from New England to Minnesota and Wisconsin are using to grind projects to a halt.

"In some ways, I think we're not too far from the crowd of folks who say, 'No pipelines, nowhere,'" said campaign co-Chairwoman Charlotte Rea, an Air Force veteran and self-described independent. "We have a lot of common ground with those folks, more common ground probably than we do differences."

The activists leading the fight against the Alberta-to-Texas Keystone XL project say: Welcome aboard, Virginians.

"Any effort to slow the building of new fossil fuel infrastructure is a blow for climate sanity at this point," said Bill McKibben, co-founder of the group 350.org.

"I am happy to see Republicans got their backbone back after selling out landowners along the Keystone XL route for the very same risks and concerns about property rights and water," said Nebraska anti-Keystone activist Jane Kleeb. She added, "If the K Street lobbyists want to learn how to run a grass-roots campaign to protect property rights and water, they can come visit us in Nebraska."

Anderson, whose firm Navigators Global has represented big-name clients such as AIG and AT&T, said his main concern is blocking Atlantic Coast's current route — not necessarily "nuances of opinion about subsequent routes [or] having no pipelines at all." He complained that Dominion "consulted with no one" before choosing the path.

He also contends that Virginians have no guarantee that they would benefit from either the fuel the pipeline would carry or the jobs it would create, saying that "there is very little gain for the citizens of Virginia from this pipeline." That's pretty much Obama's slam on Keystone, which he has said would be "very good for Canadian oil companies" but not even "a nominal benefit to U.S. consumers."

Atlantic Coast's foes are aiming their political pressure at Gov. Terry McAuliffe and Sens. Tim Kaine and Mark Warner, all of them Democrats, and have been running television and radio ads in the Virginia heartland urging people to contact the senators. Anderson said the campaign aims to grab the politicians "by the shoulders and say, 'Let's have a conversation about how this thing should go.'"

Fundraising for the All Pain, No Gain campaign is halfway to organizers' $1 million goal, Anderson said. The Global Environment & Technology Foundation, an Arlington, Virginia-based nonprofit that Harvey chairs, is the vehicle for donations to the campaign.

Although McAuliffe was among Atlantic Coast's earliest backers, activists still hope to persuade him to shrug off what Anderson quipped is Dominion's "letter jacket." McAuliffe spokesman Brian McCoy seemed to offer little hope for a change of heart, underscoring McAuliffe's support in a statement that said the governor "has no role in the planning of the project" but "has urged the companies involved to proceed with as much deference to the concerns of landowners and local communities as possible."

But McAuliffe, a longtime ally of Bill and Hillary Clinton, suggested new caveats for the pipeline on Thursday in an interview with Richmond radio station WRVA. McAuliffe told a caller that the state should "pick the best route that doesn't affect the homeowners. I want a route that doesn't affect our pristine environmental areas."

Warner and Kaine have steered clear of any firm stance on the project, though both have spent weeks urging the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to extend its initial public comment period before starting an environmental review.

Kaine and his aides have met with landowners and environmentalists about Atlantic Coast, and the senator "believes their concerns are worthy of careful consideration," a spokeswoman said. Warner remains "committed to listening to the concerns of constituents, taking into consideration the environmental impacts, and carefully monitoring the final pipeline route to ensure it is in the best interest of the state," spokeswoman Rachel Cohen wrote in an email.

The campaign has stirred a battle royal with Dominion, the state's dominant electricity supplier. Dominion is a 45 percent partner in the Atlantic Coast project, along with Duke Energy, Piedmont and the Atlanta-based energy services company AGL. Dominion began its own ad campaign in support of Atlantic Coast even before All Pain, No Gain's ads started. It has also prepared a "Myth vs. Fact" sheet that seeks to counter the opponents' arguments, including their contentions that the pipeline would be used export fuel as well as criticisms of gas as bad for the climate.

Dominion wants "to find the route with the least impact to the environment, to historical and cultural resources, and that's what we believe we're doing through conversations with landowners," spokesman Jim Norvelle said. He added that the green movement "also wants to close coal-fired power stations," which makes Atlantic Coast's gas important for power companies that "still have a responsibility to keep the lights on."

Norvelle acknowledged that fewer landowners in Rea's home of Nelson County have given Dominion access to their land than in any of the other Virginia counties where surveying for the pipeline is underway — although he added that they seem willing to "bring reporters on their property."

All Pain, No Gain co-Chairwoman Nancy Sorrells countered that Dominion would be unable to find any "alternate responsible routes" for the pipeline through Augusta County, where she lives, or in Rea's county. "Our economy is too dependent on things that would be harmed," she said.

Sorrells, who like Rea is an independent, said the group wants Dominion and its partners to show a demonstrated need to ship 1.5 billion cubic feet of gas through their state every day. (Atlantic Coast's annual capacity is more gas than Virginia consumed last year, according to the Energy Department.) It also has significant questions about the safety of building a 42-inch pipeline across Nelson and Augusta counties, which depend on agriculture and tourism.

Meanwhile, Republicans in neighboring states are pressing FERC to sign off on the project. West Virginia Sen. Shelley Moore Capito recently urged the agency "to proceed without further delay" on the review, while North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr called for "a robust and transparent public process" in a letter that hails the economic benefits of Atlantic Coast.

Those benefits would include $377 million in lower annual energy bills for Virginia and North Carolina customers, according to a Dominion-commissioned study released earlier this year.

Glen Besa, director of the Sierra Club's Virginia chapter, said his group's activists and the new crew of plugged-in Atlantic Coast opponents have indeed found an agenda they can share. They're "all pushing to minimize the impact of any pipeline that's built, and from our perspective stop any pipeline from being built," he said.

"In one sense," Besa added, "there's a common enemy: Dominion Virginia Power."

POLITICO Pro New York: State challenges feds to block pipeline for natural gas power plant Back

By Marie J. French | 10/13/2017 05:19 PM EDT

ALBANY — Gov. Andrew Cuomo's administration is challenging a federal decision to overrule New York's denial of a water quality permit, in a test of the authority that states have to block natural gas pipelines.

The Department of Environmental Conservation on Friday filed a petition for a rehearing with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission over the commission's decision to overrule the DEC's rejection of the 7.8-mile Millennium Valley Lateral project.

DEC rejected the permit in August, arguing federal regulators hadn't considered the project's climate change impacts. FERC didn't account for the emissions from the CPV Valley power plant the pipeline would supply, the department said.

In September, FERC ruled that the DEC waived its authority to approve or deny a water quality permit because the agency missed its statutory one-year deadline to act on the permit under federal law. That ruling has already led the backers of the Constitution Pipeline, for which the Cuomo administration rejected a key permit, to appeal to FERC on the same grounds.

The state's petition focuses on whether the one-year deadline for action was triggered by the first application submitted by Millennium, which the state said was incomplete, or the refiled application.

"Under FERC's erroneous interpretation of Section 401, the waiver period would commence upon the Department's receipt of any request for a [water quality certificate], however perfunctory," the petition states.

If DEC simply denied incomplete applications as FERC's September decision suggested, it "would be inefficient and penalize both the Department and an applicant by foreclosing the opportunity to work cooperatively to ensure that a given application contains all the necessary information for a Department to render a decision on the merits," it says.

The state's requirement for a complete application is also consistent with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' practice, according to the state.

The power plant the pipeline would supply is part of a corruption case against Joe Percoco, a top former aide to Cuomo. Environmental activists have seized upon that link in calling for blocking the plant. The alleged corruption scheme did not involve permits or other state actions benefiting the 685 megawatt Orange County plant, but Percoco did play a role in a bi-state agreement — since ended — with New Jersey that benefited a CPV plant in that state.

The Texas think tank filling out Trump's energy, environment team Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/16/2017 05:00 AM EDT

The nomination of Kathleen Hartnett White to lead the White House's Council on Environmental Quality makes her the third member of a conservative Texas think tank to land a prominent energy or environmental job in the Trump administration.

That think tank, the Texas Public Policy Foundation, was closely tied to Energy Secretary Rick Perry during his years as governor. And though it sometimes skewed too far to the right for even some Texas GOP members, it's finding success in filling prominent positions overseeing oil and gas rules and federal enforcement of environmental standards.

"It seems to be there is expertise outside of D.C.," said Heritage Foundation research fellow Nick Loris. "In some sense, it's refreshing to get some folks from outside the bubble."

The foundation's rising profile appears to reflect the mutual disdain between Trump and D.C.-establishment Republicans, which has prompted the White House to search further afield for staff, said Brian Roberts, a University of Texas professor specializing in political institutions and interest groups.

"Texas is a very large state that's been under Republican control for a generation, so it hardly seems far fetched that there might be some conservative policy talent here," Roberts said. "Couple that with the fact that the Trump administration is going out of its way to avoid 'establishment' talent — those most likely to be resting comfortably in D.C.-area think tanks — it makes even more sense that we find them fishing for talent outside the swamp."

As head of the CEQ, White would help guide federal environmental initiatives and develop the administration's policies on issues such as implementation of the National Environmental Policy Act, the landmark 1970 law that requires environmental analyses for federal projects.

But she's drawn sharp criticism for her unconventional views, including her stance that carbon emissions are harmless.

"Appointing a climate denier and friend of the fossil fuel industry like [White] to such a vital environmental policy position is a complete joke," said Gene Karpinski, president of the League of Conservation Voters.

White, who also chaired the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, pressed "the moral case" for fossil fuels in a 2014 paper for the Foundation, arguing that coal, oil and gas should not be moved aside for "inferior energy sources" given their role in spurring the Industrial Revolution. And in a controversial 2014 blog post, she credited the rise of fossil fuels with helping to end slavery.

The TPPF first set up shop in Texas in 1989 to push the issue of school vouchers in the state. It has since gotten behind policies that, among other things, would repeal all Texas taxes except a sales tax, and has called for a convention of states to rewrite parts of the U.S. Constitution. It also seeks to end state-backing of programs curbing greenhouse gas emissions and boosting renewable energy.

"Our founder's goal almost 30 years ago was to produce Heritage-caliber research on Texas issues," said Alicia Pierce, TPP spokeswoman, referring to the Heritage Foundation. "As we've realized so many state policies are hamstrung by federal actions, we've started to explore those angles in a way that supplements the work done by our friends such as Heritage, not to encroach on their work."

Heritage, for its part, has welcomed the the Texas group's growing role, and it hosted a TPPF-sponsored event in Washington. The group has also recommended experts for panel discussions, Loris said.

The TPPF flourished during Rick Perry's record-long stint as Texas governor, and Perry's policies and budgets often followed the direction of Foundation policy papers, Texas political analysts said. TPPF Chief Executive Brooke Rollins served as Perry's deputy general counsel and later his policy director in Austin. Chip Roy, another Foundation expert, was Perry's senior adviser in Texas, as well as a staff member for Republican Sens. John Cornyn and Ted Cruz.

"A lot of Republican leaders here in Texas take their cues from a small selection of conservative think-tanks, and the TPPF is one of them," said Adrian Shelley, director for the Texas branch of government watchdog Public Citizen.

The relationship with Perry's administration helped the Foundation attract donors. By the time

Perry finished his 15-year tenure as governor, the Foundation's annual revenue had grown tenfold, to nearly $11 million in 2015, according to IRS filings.

The ties with Perry were strong enough that the foundation even named a part of the $20 million headquarters it built in Austin in 2015 the "Governor Rick Perry Liberty Balcony." Its website also offered Perry as an expert available for interviews.

An Energy Department spokesman did not reply to questions about Perry's relationship with the Foundation.

Another TPPF alumnus called to make the jump to Washington is Susan Combs, a former Texas comptroller under Perry, who is awaiting Senate approval to become Interior's assistant secretary for Policy, Management, and Budget.

Democrats are sure to probe Combs' long-running fight to against the Endangered Species Act. During her tenure as Texas comptroller, a little-noticed amendment to a state spending bill empowered her office to manage the Texas Fish and Wildlife Service's endangered species list. Combs used that power to help block the FWS from designating as an endangered species the dunes sagebrush lizard, a small reptile that lives mainly in the oil-rich Permian Basin in west Texas.

The decision was made over the protest of a career FWS scientist who was subsequently transferred out of the state, according to a whistleblower complaint the scientist filed in 2014.

Combs, whose website offers her as a public speaker on topics such as "Winning the Battle Over Regulatory Issues Under the Federal Endangered Species Act (ESA)," was unavailable for comment.

Trump has also tapped Doug Domenech to be Interior's assistant secretary of Insular Areas. He joined the TPPF in 2015 as director of the think tank's Fueling Freedom Project, billed as a way "to combat the Environmental Protection Agency's proposed Clean Power Plan" and "push back against the EPA's onerous regulatory agenda that threatens America's economy, prosperity, and well-being."

Domenech has also praised a booklet written by Dr. Roy Warren Spencer, a climate change denialist who has also questioned the theory of evolution. Separate from the Foundation, Domenech has written for the Capital Research Center, a group that has argued that carbon dioxide is harmless and regulating would destroy jobs. Domenech said in Senate testimony that he doesn't "minimize that the climate is changing," but he has also written that the change is "in very small ways."

Domenech was also Virginia's Secretary of Natural Resources for four years up to January 2014, who's emails contained an unusual footer message: "It's OK to print this email. Paper is a Biodegradable, Renewable, Sustainable product made from trees and recycled paper. Growing and harvesting trees provides jobs for millions of men and women."

Domenech and White were not available for comment.

Perry's successor, Gov. Greg Abbott, has remained close to the group, and some of TPPF board members have bankrolled challenges to lawmakers who blanch at implementing many of its conservative policy proposals. But other Texas Republicans have been wary of whether the group pushes ideological stances over sound policy, including its dubious claims about state spending in a bitter 2013 state budget battle.

And its argument in its effort to repeal Texas' corporate and property taxes have also raised eyebrows, said Jim Keffer, a Republican who served 20 years in the Texas Legislature before stepping down last year.

"They swing a lot of weight, no doubt about it," Keffer said of the foundation. "But I think the data is skewed. We would have had to raise our [sales] tax from six percent to 20 percent for the sales tax to do what they wanted to do as far as getting rid of all the other taxes. That would literally ruin the Texas economy."

Another problem is that while the foundation has had Texas lawmakers' ears, they haven't had much success in getting their policies passed into law, notes Scott Braddock, editor of the Quorum Report, which focuses on Texas politics. Despite school choice being its core policy issue since its founding, there remains no school voucher system in Texas, Braddock notes.

"For someone who prides himself on getting things done, there is some irony in Trump choosing folks who are increasingly legislatively ineffective in their home state and importing them to Washington," Braddock said.

Alaska's long road war Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 04/04/2014 05:00 PM EDT

In the fall of 1998, Frank Murkowski took to the Senate floor to make an impassioned plea for the authority to build a one-lane gravel road from the isolated southwestern Alaska village of King Cove to a neighboring community with an all-weather airport.

"This is a road to life for the residents of King Cove," he said.

More than 15 years later, his daughter, Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski — along with the rest of the Alaska congressional delegation — is still fighting for the road, insisting it's the only viable way to ensure that King Cove's 965 largely native Alaskan residents have access to emergency medical care.

( Also on POLITICO: Full transportation and infrastructure policy coverage )

What seems like a simple request is anything but. The proposed road would cut through federally protected wilderness land in the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge, a 315,000-acre sanctuary near the tip of the Alaska Peninsula. And the Interior Department says the road would threaten vulnerable plants and animals that rely on the area's unique ecology.

The oftentimes ugly fight has pitted Alaska politicians against the federal government for decades, sowing mistrust and frustration. It has also reinforced the view of many in Alaska that policymakers in the Lower 48 are out of touch with their needs.

At the same time, the battle has laid bare tensions between Alaskan leaders and conservation groups, which argue that approving the road could set a dangerous national precedent in other protected wilderness areas.

Lisa Murkowski and Alaska Democratic Sen. Mark Begich, who faces a tight reelection fight, are vowing to do everything in their power to win approval for the road, even though the Interior Department rejected the proposal late last year after a four-year analysis.

Murkowski is using her position as the top Republican on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to elevate the issue, expressing her outrage at hearings and in floor speeches and holding a series of news conferences with King Cove residents. She has also lambasted Interior Secretary Sally Jewell, who announced the most recent rejection of the road just two days before Christmas.

"I am not willing to let a day go by without raising this as an issue," Murkowski said in an interview.

The road would give King Cove residents access to the larger airport in the nearby community of Cold Bay when extreme weather grounds flights at the smaller King Cove airport. King Cove has a medical clinic, but residents often have to travel to Anchorage for major procedures and emergencies.

The road, proponents argue, is the best solution to the transportation problems that have long plagued isolated King Cove.

Besides its small airport, the town has access by boat across the Izembek Lagoon, but foul weather can make air and boat travel difficult, residents say. Supporters of the road say at least 19 deaths over the years have resulted from plane crashes or an inability to obtain adequate medical care.

( Sign up for POLITICO's Morning Transportation tip sheet)

Della Trumble, a King Cove resident and longtime advocate for the road, said its approval is a matter of life and death.

"I just feel strongly that the human factor far outweighs the wildlife," she said. "We will protect the wildlife. It's who we are."

Trumble and other residents have made dozens of trips to Washington to make their case, telling stories of family and friends who have been hurt or killed trying to get out of the community during storms. Trumble said she watched as her niece was flown out for a medical emergency amid winds of 70 to 80 mph. She said another niece was born on the galley table of a crab boat during an evacuation attempt.

Just this week, an injured fisherman was flown out of King Cove by the Coast Guard, marking the fifth medical evacuation of the year, according to King Cove officials.

But opponents say the road would wreak havoc on the refuge and its wildlife. The refuge hosts more than 200 species, including caribou, grizzly bear and, in the fall, about 98 percent of the world's Pacific black brant. It also has one of the largest eelgrass beds on the planet and was one of the first areas in the U.S. to be designated as a wetland of international importance.

"You can't punch a road through there without doing serious damage," said Don Barry, who served as Interior's assistant secretary for fish, wildlife and parks during the Clinton administration.

In addition, the proposed road faces major legal hurdles. In 1980, Congress designated most of the refuge as wilderness, the highest level of public land protection.

Barry, now a senior official at the conservation group Defenders of Wildlife, said it would be unprecedented to allow a road through a wilderness area. Though the refuge has some old military roads, they were built before the conservation laws were enacted.

Several opponents raised concerns that approving the road would lead to a push for development in other protected areas.

"Once you carve a road of this kind right through the middle of a national wildlife refuge, where does it stop?" former Clinton administration Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt asked.

Babbitt and other opponents have also suggested that the road could be used for commercial purposes, noting that Peter Pan Seafoods has a cannery in King Cove. "But despite pledges and promises to the contrary, the real purpose for building the road is the same as it ever was: moving fish and workers to and from King Cove's canneries," Babbitt wrote in the Los Angeles Times last month.

Peter Pan has rejected those accusations, and Murkowski notes that her legislation calling for approval of the road specifically bars using it for commercial purposes.

The fight over the road burst into public view in the late 1990s, when then-Sen. Frank Murkowski pushed legislation that would allow for approval of the road as part of a land exchange. The bill passed the Senate in 1998 but never passed the House. President Bill Clinton threatened a veto amid concerns about the road's effect on wildlife.

Soon after, then-Sen. Ted Stevens launched into a tense series of negotiations with the Interior Department. The resulting compromise was a $37.5 million appropriation approved by Congress to improve the King Cove medical clinic and airport and make accommodations for a hovercraft to transport residents to Cold Bay. The hovercraft was used until 2011, but it is being sold because, operators said, it was too expensive to operate.

"Finally it was settled — and now it turns out it isn't," said Babbitt, who worked with Stevens to negotiate the deal and strongly opposed the road.

Within several years, the issue was back on the table. Lisa Murkowski included a provision in a 2009 bill calling on the Interior Department to analyze the road and proposing another land exchange. In exchange for setting aside land in the refuge for the road, the federal government would receive more than 43,000 acres of Alaska state land and more than 13,000 acres of land owned by the King Cove Native Corp.

The provision set off a four-year analysis by Interior that culminated in December with the department's rejection of the road.

"While the proposed land exchange would bring many more acres of land into the Refuge System, the analysis indicates that the increased acreage could not compensate for the unique values of existing refuge lands, nor the anticipated effects that the proposed road would have on wildlife, habitat, subsistence resources and wilderness values of the Refuge," the department said in a statement at the time.

The decision infuriated the Alaska delegation and has strained Murkowski's relationship with Jewell.

After hearing about the decision, Murkowski said she told Jewell, "I cannot forgive the fact that you have delivered this, that you have dashed all hope for the people of King Cove, and the fact that you did this the week of Christmas is absolutely callous and cold-hearted."

Other Alaska lawmakers have similarly taken Jewell to task. "If someone dies out of King Cove, I want you to really think about it and be ashamed of yourself," Rep. Don Young told Jewell at a hearing Thursday.

The road's opponents say viable alternatives exist — a notion that Murkowski and others reject. Opponents also argue that the road, which would snake through isolated land often battered by extreme weather, would pose its own dangers.

At a recent Senate hearing, Jewell said she is committed to working with King Cove residents to find alternatives. During a recent meeting with Begich, she said she will again listen to the community's concerns.

"Jewell committed to reviewing the information that the community plans to provide on the issue and to provide a response to the senators, State of Alaska and the community on their request to reconsider the final decision," Interior spokeswoman Jessica Kershaw said in an email.

Alaska lawmakers face major hurdles toward changing Interior's mind but say they're not giving up.

Begich said in a recent interview that he hopes to attach his bill approving the road to upcoming Interior appropriations legislation. Murkowski vowed to continue hammering away as well.

"This secretary has made a decision, and I think she thought the people of King Cove were tucked far enough away that nobody would be making a big deal about this," Murkowski said. "But I'm not forgetting them, and it's not just an idle threat."

Feinstein draws primary challenge from Democrat de León Back

By David Siders | 10/15/2017 01:56 PM EDT

LOS ANGELES - Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) will face a primary challenge from California state Senate leader Kevin de León, who cast himself on Sunday as a progressive champion of California's resistance to President Donald Trump.

Launching his campaign, de León said in an email to supporters that he will "take the fight to Trump from California to Washington DC," doing his part "to work even harder to reunite this nation with a progressive agenda."

The announcement, which had long been expected, comes less than a week after Feinstein announced her re-election bid.

De León did not mention Feinstein in his public campaign roll-out. In a subsequent interview with POLITICO, he avoided criticizing Feinstein by name. "California needs a senator who will stand up and fight for Medicare for All, one that prioritizes the fight against climate change, that will protect Dreamers and our economic prosperity," he said.

He said he was a "bundle of nerves" and that the announcement was "just like jumping off a cliff."

"It will be David and Goliath...I'm under no illusion," he said.

De León, a Los Angeles lawmaker, faces an uphill climb in his effort to unseat Feinstein. First elected to the Senate in a 1992 special election, Feinstein has long served as a pillar of California's Democratic Party and has connections that could make fundraising difficult for de León. The state's junior senator, Kamala Harris, endorsed Feinstein immediately after she announced her re-election campaign, as did former Sen. Barbara Boxer and Lt. Gov. Gavin Newsom, the Democratic frontrunner to succeed Jerry Brown as governor.

Still, Feinstein's more centrist politics could present an opening for de León, who will run against her from the left. Feinstein, 84, has come under criticism from progressive activists for her skeptical view of single-payer health care legislation and her support for some of Trump's earliest nominees.

De León this year championed a failed universal health care measure and a successful bill granting additional protections to undocumented immigrants. De León cheered Feinstein's critics earlier this year when, seizing on Feinstein's remark that Trump could become a "good president," he said Democrats should "not be complicit in his reckless behavior."

Yet Feinstein's public approval ratings, though slipping slightly since Trump's inauguration, remain relatively favorable in California. And de León is little known statewide. When the Berkeley-IGS Poll asked Californians in April who they would support for U.S. Senate if Feinstein opted not to run, De León polled at 3 percent.

De León, who will soon have to leave the state Senate due to term limits, had few options for advancement. The 50-year-old had considered entering California's race for governor, but the field is already crowded with Democrats.

It remains unclear if de León will be the only high-profile Democrat challenging Feinstein. Billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer is mulling a run, and Joseph Sanberg, a wealthy Orange County progressive activist, is considered another potential candidate. Some long-shot candidates are already in the race, including a progressive lawyer, Pat Harris.

Under California's primary rules, the top two finishers in next year's primary will advance to a November runoff regardless of party affiliation.

Kelly tries to get empty administration jobs filled fast Back

By Nancy Cook | 10/15/2017 05:42 PM EDT

White House chief of staff John Kelly is giving Cabinet secretaries more autonomy to pick top political appointees, reversing efforts under his predecessor Reince Priebus to run most appointments through the West Wing.

Kelly's goal, according to 10 interviews with White House officials and advisers close to the administration, is to do a better job of finding candidates for the hundreds of jobs throughout the administration that remain vacant almost nine months into President Donald Trump's first term.

"Being somebody from the Department of Defense, normally you've got key people in place and a clear chain of command," said Leon Panetta, a former White House chief of staff himself and former Secretary of Defense, who spoke to Kelly around the time he accepted the White House job. "It's very difficult to run anything if you don't have people responsible in those positions."

Kelly entered the White House with an unusually clear understanding of the flaws of the personnel process, according to two people close to him.

As a Cabinet pick and then as Department of Homeland Security secretary, Kelly was frequently exasperated during the transition and early days of the administration over his inability to choose his own staff. He got into frequent spats with the White House over filling a handful of top jobs in his department, according to one of the people close to him.

Other Cabinet secretaries, including Defense Secretary James Mattis and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, have had their own problems with the White House personnel office, with Mattis trying to circumvent it and hire his own staff.

"Look, everyone in the White House is upset. It's both a problem of getting candidates through the bureaucracy and through the Senate. Of course Kelly is upset," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, an informal adviser to Trump whose wife, Callista, has been nominated as Trump's Vatican ambassador. "The whole system is totally screwed up."

Part of the problem stems from the Trump administration's criteria for hiring staffers and top political appointees. Potential candidates must be loyal to the administration and not have spoken harshly about the president during the campaign.

That has created a particular problem when it comes to filling national security jobs, because scores of Republican experts, many of whom served in the George W. Bush administration, signed a letter criticizing the future president before the election.

Many experienced Republicans who ordinarily would have vied for middle- and top-level posts under a Republican president also decided to sit out the Trump administration in January, starving the president of choices when it came to picking appointees.

The president himself seems willing to tolerate vacancies indefinitely.

"I'm generally not going to make a lot of the appointments that would normally be - because you don't need them," Trump told Forbes in an interview which posted last week. "I mean, you look at some of these agencies, how massive they are, and it's totally unnecessary. They have hundreds of thousands of people."

The White House press office did not respond to requests for comment.

Filling vacant jobs has taken on particular urgency in recent weeks, as the White House contends with thorny policy questions such as North Korea's growing nuclear might and the fate of the Iran deal. The administration is also trying to re-negotiate the NAFTA trade agreement and roll back parts of Obamacare through regulations and executive orders.

At the State Department, more than 78 jobs do not have a nominee out of 149 key positions, and 32 countries still don't have ambassadors in place, according to data kept by the non-partisan Partnership for Public Service.

The Treasury Department has 15 key slots open out of 28 significant Senate confirmed positions as the White House dives into selling tax reform.

Just last week, Treasury announced it would not fill its No. 2 deputy secretary slot after a second candidate dropped out of the running for it.

Kelly's own former job remains open two and a half months after he moved to the White House, with Trump nominating Kelly's No. 2 Kirstjen Nielsen this week after other potential nominees were passed over.

The Department of Health and Human Services, the agency responsible for overseeing the Affordable Care Act, lacks a Cabinet secretary after former Rep. Tom Price resigned after spending hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars to charter private jets for government trips.

So far, the Senate has confirmed roughly 142 political appointees out of the 602 key jobs throughout the government, according to the Partnership for Public Service.

The presidential personnel office also got off to a rocky start. Its director Johnny DeStefano, who started right after the inauguration, had to find candidates for hundreds of key Senate-confirmed jobs without an existing pool of applicants after the administration discarded lists compiled by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who was fired as transition head days after the election in November.

DeStefano also entered the job with no formal experience in executive recruiting or hiring. Previously, he worked for House Speaker John Boehner and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

At the White House, both Priebus and Steve Bannon, the former White House chief strategist, were seen as his high-level protectors. Their departures this summer have left DeStefano adrift inside Kelly's new power structure, according to two people close to the administration.

Kelly recently asked DeStefano to oversee the Office of Public Liaison, whose head George Sifakis left in August following Priebus' ouster.

DeStefano, who also retains his title as head of the personnel office, did not respond to requests for comment.

Outside conservative activists and groups are no longer blaming Senate Democrats for holding up confirmations.

Last week, over 100 conservatives released a letter to remind both the administration and Capitol Hill that "personnel is policy."

The letter demands that Senate leadership schedule committee and floor action every Thursday and Friday and to work full weeks until Trump's nominees get confirmed. Among the signatories are Edwin Meese, former Attorney General under Ronald Reagan; Becky Norton Dunlop, a former Reagan adviser who worked on the Trump transition; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, and Adam Brandon, President of FreedomWorks.

Republicans say that the slow pace of appointments impedes Trump's agenda. It ends up leaving much of the agency-level, or diplomatic work to government careerists who aren't necessarily supportive of the Trump agenda.

"The career people know how to keep the government going and respond to citizens, but if there is any desire to change what the government is doing, that is most effectively done if it is being led by a political appointee," said Clay Johnson, who oversaw presidential personnel under Bush. "So without the hundreds of political appointees at each of the key agencies, the administration of government will continue, but it will be hard for the Trump administration to change or eliminate something, or create something new."

EPW to vote next week on EPA, NRC, DOT nominees Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/13/2017 04:42 PM EDT

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will vote Oct. 18 on four EPA nominees, plus appointments to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Federal Highway Administration.

The committee will vote on Michael Dourson to run the EPA's chemicals and pesticides office, William Wehrum to run the air office, David Ross to head the water office and Matthew Leopold to be general counsel.

Sen. Tom Carper, the committee's top Democrat, indicated last week that he will oppose Wehrum over his strong ties to industry and Dourson because he declined Carper's request to recuse himself from issues he worked on previously as an independent toxicologist.

The committee will also vote on Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC. Chairman John Barrasso called Baran's re-confirmation, even in exchange for Democrats moving two Republican NRC nominees, as a "big ask."

And the committee will vote on Paul Trombino as administrator of the FHWA. His nomination hearing was held last week.

Barrasso indicated last week that he is working to get a package of energy-related nominees onto the floor, including possibly several pending nominations to FERC and the Energy Department.

WHAT'S NEXT: The vote is scheduled for Oct. 18 at 10 a.m. in Dirksen 406.

Barrasso: Baran renomination to NRC is a 'big ask' Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/04/2017 10:59 AM EDT

Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso complained this morning that re-confirming Nuclear Regulatory Commission member Jeff Baran may be too high a price for Republicans to pay in exchange for Democrats easing their opposition to GOP nominees to the agency.

"Senate Democrats have refused to advance the nominations of Annie Caputo and David Wright to the NRC until Commissioner Baran is confirmed to a new five-year term," Barrasso said at nomination hearing with Baran and four nominees to the EPA. "To be clear, Mr. Baran's nomination is a big ask."

Caputo and Wright secured the blessing of EPW in July but Sen. Tom Carper has pressed that Baran, whose seat expires in June, get a new five-year term and move alongside Republican picks as a bipartisan package.

But Barrasso bristled at the notion of having Baran on the NRC longer than President Donald Trump's GOP nominees, as well as NRC Chairwoman Kristine Svinicki. Wright and Caputo are up for terms expiring in June 2020 and June 2021, respectively. The Wyoming Republican also said he's hardly seen reason to drop his long-held opposition to Baran since former Sen. Barbara Boxer originally pushed him through the Senate years ago.

"In December 2014, the last time the Senate confirmed Mr. Baran, only one Republican voted in favor of his confirmation," Barrasso said. "Since then, Commissioner Baran has given me little reason to reconsider my vote."

WHAT'S NEXT: EPW has not yet scheduled a vote on the nominees.

DOE gives nod to Florida small-scale LNG project Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/15/2017 01:37 PM EDT

The Energy Department approved a company's application to export small amounts of liquefied natural gas from Florida, the agency said today.

Eagle LNG Partners Jacksonville II LLC is now authorized to ship 10 million cubic feet a day of natural gas in intermodal containers, DOE said. The company plans to ship the LNG to Caribbean islands to be used mainly as ship fuel, according to its website.

DOE has now approved up to 21.35 Bcf/d of natural gas exports.

WHAT'S NEXT: The U.S. is expected to become a net exporter of natural gas this year, according to U.S. Energy Information Administration forecasts.

Trump administration restarts work on airplane carbon rule Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/13/2017 02:48 PM EDT

The EPA confirmed it is developing a rule to regulate carbon emissions from aircraft, a rare step by the Trump administration to address climate change, and one that's seen as critical for the U.S. aerospace industry.

The rule, still under development, is part of the effort agreed to by a United Nations body last year to set a global carbon standard for international flights. Aircraft manufacturer Boeing, and its engine-makers Pratt & Whitney and GE, supported the agreement, and the companies need EPA to create the emissions regulation that would allow DOT to certify its equipment for international sale.

The rulemaking runs counter to President Donald Trump and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's steadfast opposition to efforts to combat climate change, and their rollback of Obama's climate policies. EPA had paused development of the aircraft rule over the summer as part of Trump's broader deregulatory push. But official schedules show Pruitt met with Boeing and GE in July, and the agency restarted the work this fall.

In crafting the rule, the administration appears to be willing to support a climate change effort that is strongly backed by industry, and could be an indicator of how it will consider a treaty to limit global warming-causing coolants. The carbon rule for aircraft is essential for Boeing, one of the top U.S. exporters.

"If the U.S. does not write a rule, U.S. manufacturers, particularly this would be Boeing, and manufacturers of engines on planes, they would not be able to sell those on international service and U.S. airlines would not be able to buy them for international operations," said Nancy Young, vice president for environmental affairs for the lobby group Airlines for America.

A committee of the International Civil Aviation Organization, an international standards-setting body, first agreed to the carbon standard for aircraft engines early in 2016. New engine designs in 2020 would be required to be an average of 4 percent more efficient than 2015 engines, and all new aircraft will have to meet the standard by 2024. ICAO issued a final approval in the spring, and EPA had already begun work on the rule, publishing an endangerment finding in July last year.

But Trump's election put the effort in doubt, and work on the rule paused over the summer as part of the new administration's regulatory reviews. Pruitt's schedule showed he had at least one meeting with Boeing over the summer, and work has begun now in earnest to produce a rule implementing the agreement.

"EPA is working on CO2 standards for aircraft to align them with the ICAO agreement," an EPA spokesman told POLITICO, confirming news first reported by Bloomberg BNA. The agency had said in its deregulatory agenda on July 20 that work on the rule had been suspended.

ICAO sets a wide variety of technical and safety standards, and federal agencies like the FAA and DOT typically implement them with little fanfare. Agreements by the body do not typically require Senate ratification. The ICAO agreement requires action by EPA to set the emission standards, and DOT would use those standards to certify engines promoted by Boeing, but it would not require Senate ratification.

But any carbon rule seemed unlikely under the Trump administration, which has spent its first months in office erasing regulatory efforts to fight climate change, including the Clean Power Plan and the U.S. participation in the Paris climate agreement.

Without an EPA rule implementing the deal, Boeing would have been unable to export its aircraft, or would have been forced to get them certified by another country that had implemented the deal, like Canada or Mexico. Boeing is a major exporter: The U.S. exported $136 billion in aerospace equipment in 2016, and Boeing exported $25 billion in aircraft to China alone. The International Council on Clean Transportation, a transportation think tank, characterized the stakes by noting Boeing's $250 billion order backlog that could be at risk without a rule.

Boeing declined to comment for this story.

Boeing and GE met with Pruitt on July 13, a week before the public learned the rule had been paused, according to a schedule of Pruitt's meetings released by EPA last month.

"For Boeing, GE and Pratt and Whitney, it's critical," said Daniel Rutherford, marine and aviation program director for ICCT. "If they want to sell aircraft after 2020, they need this rule."

Greens are split on the ICAO standard. Bill Hemmings, who leads aviation work at Transport and Environment, an international green group, lambasted it at the time as "a nice try" that fell short of making major strides to reduce emissions. According to ICCT's analysis, Boeing will exceed the standard with the products in their pipeline by 10 percent.

But defenders of the agreement say it has value for preventing backsliding in engine efficiency, and for stopping other countries from producing less efficient products that undercut higher-quality U.S. goods.

"With this agreement, ICAO created the first-ever standards for carbon dioxide performance for a major sector of the economy, the aviation industry," said Rick Duke, a former aide to Obama who worked on the agreement. "It's good for American industry because we produce efficient aircraft and so we want to make sure that laggards are not grabbing market share with poor-performing aircraft."

The administration's action could also be good news for the U.S. coolant-making industry, which is strongly backing a separate agreement struck at the end of last year to limit global-warming hydrofluorocarbons. The industry supports the agreement reached in Kigali, Rwanda, because U.S. companies are the leaders in next-generation coolants. But unlike the ICAO agreement, the amendment to the Montreal Protocol requires Senate ratification.

Now, the willingness of Trump's EPA to write a carbon rule on behalf of industry could signal at least tacit approval to remain part of the international business arrangement, if not administration support for the Kigali agreement itself.

"I think that's what we saw happen last year with the Kigali agreement with HFCs where U.S. industry strongly pushed for successful outcome there," Duke said. "And like the aircraft sector, the industry produces high-performing products, and they very much appreciate having a level playing field and allows them to have a clear path."

Texas utility to shut down two major coal plants Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/13/2017 11:30 AM EDT

Texas utility Luminant announced plans today to shut down two major coal-fired power plants that it said are "economically challenged."

The plants, with a combined 2,300 megawatts of capacity, were undercut by "low wholesale power prices, an oversupplied renewable generation market, and low natural gas prices," Luminant, a subsidiary of Vistra Energy, said in a release.

The plants are Big Brown, a 1,150-megawatt plant about 80 miles southeast of Dallas, and Sandow, a 1,137 MW-plant that sits 45 miles northeast of Austin.

Both plants burn lignite coal. The mine associated with Big Brown, Turlington, was already scheduled to close this year, according to Luminant. The Three Oaks mine that supplies

Sandow will close down soon as well.

About 650 workers at all those sites will be affected. Luminant said it will provide severance and help finding new work.

Environmentalists have targeted those plants, and particularly Big Brown, for years. But Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, in a statement downplayed the notion that the closures are a further sign of trouble for coal "but rather as an important part of an increasing diverse array of generation sources."

Luminant last week announced it will shut down its 1,800-megawatt Monticello coal plant about 100 miles east of Dallas on Jan. 4. It was supplied by coal from the Powder River Basin.

WHAT'S NEXT: Assuming the decommissioning process is approved by ERCOT, the Texas grid regulator, Big Brown will shut down on Feb. 12 and Sandow will close on Jan. 11.

Trump's Love Affair with Coal Back

By Michael Grunwald | 10/15/2017 07:06 AM EDT

In February, surrounded by coal miners at the White House, President Donald Trump signed a bill repealing the Obama-era Stream Protection Rule, which would have restricted coal companies from burying streams. "This is a major threat to your jobs," Trump said, "and we're getting rid of this threat." He did not mention streams.

In March, this time surrounded by coal miners at the Environmental Protection Agency, Trump signed an executive order vowing to roll back Obama-era climate change policies, including the Clean Power Plan limiting carbon pollution from coal-fired power plants. "C'mon fellas, you know what this says?" Trump asked. "You're going back to work!" He did not mention climate or pollution.

So it was no surprise when, last week, Trump's EPA administrator, Scott Pruitt, announced he was launching the formal process to repeal the Clean Power Plan in a speech to coal miners in the coal town of Hazard, Kentucky. He proclaimed, as his boss has many times, that "the war on coal is over." There was once again little pretense that the move had much to do with the EP part of the EPA.

As the Trump administration has battled internally and seesawed publicly over issues like trade, health care, infrastructure and even immigration, there's no issue where it's been more consistent and emphatic than its support for coal. Miners held up "Trump Digs Coal" signs at his raucous campaign rallies, and sure enough, he's been a relentless advocate for this small and beleaguered industry.

He has stocked his administration with coal veterans, hacked away at coal regulations, and done what he can to prop up struggling coal companies. He probably won't be able to keep his promise to revive a once-dominant fossil fuel that has been declining around the world—and most rapidly in the United States—but he is already changing the policy landscape around our dirtiest source of energy. He is also sending a political message to his base that he is waging a war on the war on coal, standing with tough guys who earn their living underground against tree-huggers who whine about climate change and clean air.

So far, coal is continuing its slump despite Trump's support. Utilities have announced the retirements of 12 more coal-fired power plants since he took office, including two massive ones in Texas added to the closure list on Friday. That announcement marked a milestone: Half of America's coal fleet has been marked for mothballs since 2010, a total of 262 doomed plants. And as jobs go, coal mining is now a tiny sliver of the U.S. economy, employing about 52,000 Americans last month, down 70 percent over three decades. (The count is up about 4 percent since Trump took office, but mostly because a snafu in China's steel industry temporarily boosted U.S. exports.) By contrast, the solar and wind industries employed almost 10 times as many Americans last year, and they're both enjoying explosive growth.

Coal is America's leading source of the carbon emissions that warm the planet, as well as a host of other air and water pollutants. And the economics of coal has cratered. Still, politically, the coal industry is one of the purest distillations of Trump's base, uniting right-wing business executives who hate environmental regulations and taxes along with blue-collar miners who wish America was more like it used to be when coal was king. While polls suggest that fewer than one-third of Americans approve of Trump's indelicate approach to the environment, more than two-thirds of the Republicans he's courted approve. At the ceremony where he erased the stream rule, Trump ticked off a list of coal states—West Virginia, Kentucky, Wyoming, Ohio—that all happened to have been big Trump states in November.

"Special people, special workers, we're bringing it back and we're bringing it back fast," he crowed.

So even if Trump can't stop the decline of coal, the industry is thrilled that he's doing his part to try to slow it, especially after eight years of an eco-friendly, climate-concerned Democrat in the White House. Bob Murray, a prominent coal CEO and early Trump backer, says in a new Frontline documentary that he handed Trump a 3½-page action plan when he took office, and the president has already plowed through Page 1.

"From a government whose avowed aim for eight years was to destroy the industry, we've understandably benefited from one that for eight months has helped us," says Luke Popovich, vice president of the National Mining Association.

Trump began by hiring coal-friendly aides like Pruitt, who had repeatedly teamed up with fossil-fuel interests to sue President Barack Obama's EPA when he was Oklahoma attorney general, and Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross, the founder of a coal company that once had a deadly disaster in one of its mines. Trump's nominee to be Pruitt's deputy is a coal lobbyist; his nominee to be assistant labor secretary for mine safety and health ran a mining company with a checkered safety record.

The result has been a flurry of coal-friendly actions. Pruitt is taking aim not only at Obama's carbon plan for the power industry but a host of other rules limiting mercury, soot, smog and other discharges from coal operations. The president defied the world by withdrawing from the Paris climate agreement, specifically complaining that it was unfair to American coal. His administration has also lifted Obama's moratorium on coal leases on federal land, ended Obama's restrictions on financing coal projects overseas, and shut down a study of the health effects of coal mining that blasts away entire mountains. His energy secretary, Rick Perry, recently proposed new subsidies for coal plants that keep stockpiles of coal handy, galvanizing opposition from an odd coalition of renewable energy advocates, environmentalists, Koch Industries and other oil and gas interests, manufacturers and other electricity consumers.

At a hearing last week, a Democratic congressman asked Perry why he was pushing a plan that could prop up outdated coal plants and increase costs to ratepayers. The secretary's response summed up the administration's approach to coal: "I think you take costs into account, but what's the cost of freedom? What's the cost to keep America free? I'm not sure I want to leave that up to the free market."

Coal's long decline did get worse during the Obama years—partly because of his anti-pollution regulations, partly because of the Sierra Club's well-funded and well-executed anti-coal campaign, but mostly because of the cruel realities of the market: Natural gas and even renewables got cheaper. And the slump is only expected to accelerate, since scores of still-operating coal plants are already scheduled to shut down over the next few years, and nobody is building new coal plants. Even if the economics made sense, and even if utilities didn't have to worry about carbon emissions, coal plants belch all kinds of pollution into the air and water; the American Lung Association believes its particulates kill about 7,500 Americans every year.

Still, Trump is a fan, and he's unusually forthright in his fandom. He's often either misleading or misinformed about the impact of his other policies—claiming his tax plan wouldn't help the rich, or that his health policies would expand access and protect pre-existing conditions—but when it comes to coal, Trump is clear about his goals, and transparent about whose interests he's pushing. Murray, the coal executive, was by his side when he signed the order attacking Obama's climate policies. Vice President Mike Pence, Pruitt, Perry and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke have all toured coal operations this year.

So it was no surprise that the National Mining Association held a board meeting this month at the Trump International Hotel in Washington, putting money in its presidential benefactor's pockets. And as the Washington Post first reported, three Cabinet secretaries spoke to the group—Perry, Ross and Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta, who was once an attorney for a Murray Energy subsidiary in a dispute with its union. Zinke couldn't make it, but he sent his deputy, former fossil-fuel lobbyist David Bernhardt, in his place.

The meeting was private, but an activist at the Climate Investigation Center sent me photos the group obtained of Bernhardt speaking to the group—including photos of his notes. They appear to show that Interior is "considering appropriate adjustments" to the Obama administration's decisions to prohibit mining claims on certain environmentally sensitive public lands. Bernhardt's notes described some of those decisions as "nothing short of uninformed, arbitrary, and frankly senseless." Bernhardt had also jotted down the cellphone number of Luke Russell, vice president of external affairs for Hecla Mining. Hecla is seeking permits from Interior's Fish and Wildlife Service for two copper mines in Montana, and Russell said in an interview that the process has been dragging out for years.

"We're encouraged by the actions of this administration to try to move things along and get to a yes or no much quicker," Russell said.

The Interior Department did not respond to a request for comment. But the department's leaders have not been shy about their belief that Obama treated mining companies and other extractive industries unfairly. In August, for example, they rescinded an Obama-era rule that closed a loophole coal mining firms and other fossil-fuel companies were using to evade federal royalties on public lands. Zinke argued that the rule was causing too much "confusion and uncertainty" and holding back U.S. energy development.

***

Trump administration officials often frame their attacks on energy-related rules as an aversion to "picking winners and losers," accusing their predecessors of harming coal in order to help wind (which tripled its capacity under Obama) and solar (which increased about 40-fold). But environmentalists point out that Obama's EPA, for example, never targeted the coal industry; it targeted pollution, and coal happens to produce an inordinate amount of pollution. Bruce Nilles, senior director of the Sierra Club's Beyond Coal campaign, says a distraught EPA career official recently told him the agency's political bosses have given clear marching orders: Do whatever you can to promote coal. That certainly sounded like picking winners.

"The insanity is, it's not a secret," Nilles says. "They make no bones about it. They see their job as helping coal companies pollute as much as they want."

The EPA's focus has often shifted with the partisan winds, but it's still a bit jarring to see an agency founded to fight pollution used so aggressively to assist some of America's biggest polluters. Pruitt believes the EPA has strayed far beyond its original mandate, and he has been open about his desire to give the subjects of its regulations a break. He recently told a group of farmers that he's often asked why he meets so much more with industry groups than environmental groups, and he was surprisingly forthright: "The answer is, you count more."

Pruitt has tried to ditch or delay just about all of Obama's coal regulations—prominent ones limiting carbon, mercury and ozone as well as lesser-known ones dealing with coal ash, "nonattainment areas" and "regional haze." Two weeks ago, his agency gave one of the Trump administration's most consequential gifts to the industry so far, gutting an Obama-era effort to force the state of Texas to rein in coal-fired pollution around Big Bend National Park.

But neither coal-friendly Texas nor the coal-friendly EPA could stop Luminant, considered one of the coal-friendliest utilities, from announcing the retirements of four Texas coal plants in the past 10 days. Coal used to be dirty but cheap, but now it's just dirty—and utilities who have to make long-term investment decisions can't assume that Trump's willingness to ignore coal pollution will continue beyond his term in office. American Electric Power, a coal-heavy utility that is America's largest carbon emitter, recently invested $4.5 billion in the nation's largest wind farm—in Pruitt's home state of Oklahoma.

The Supreme Court had put the Clean Power Plan on hold even before Trump took office, but the U.S. electricity sector has already met the plan's 2030 target for reducing coal use, and it is on track to meet its overall emission goals next year. And while the EPA has not yet proposed a replacement for the plan, it is still bound by a Supreme Court decision requiring it to regulate carbon pollution, so it will have to defend whatever it decides in court. The same goes for Pruitt's efforts to gut Obama's other coal-related rules as well as unrelated rules. Rules are rules, and while it's pretty easy for administrations to ignore them, it's much harder to change them to guide future administrations.

Nilles talked to me from Oakland, where he could see haze from California's historic wildfires, this month's awful reminder of the dangers of climate change. I talked to him from Miami, where I could still see debris from Hurricane Irma, one of last month's awful reminders of the dangers of climate change. Trump has described global warming as a hoax manufactured in China, and his newly announced chair of his Council on Environmental Quality is a climate denier who has written florid praise of carbon emissions. But the impacts are getting harder to ignore—even China is shutting down coal plants around Beijing—and the American executives making electricity investments do not seem to think they will be ignored for long.

"Trump can't revive coal. The transition is already happening," Nilles says. "What Trump can do is allow more pollution and death during the transition."

The mining association's Popovich pushed back a bit, noting that coal exports and production are up slightly so far this year, "thanks in part to this regime change." But he says the Obama-era retirements have battered the industry badly, and even Trump's support can't magically fix a stagnant market.

"Conditions," he says, "are still challenging."

THERE'S A LESSON HERE: It seems President Donald Trump's administration made significant progress Wednesday toward appeasing a bloc of corn-state Republicans blocking EPA nominees over the agency's actions on biofuels, but the small-yet-powerful group proved over the last two days that they have significant power to throw sands in the gears of the president's agenda if they want. "We have enough of a bloc of Midwestern senators that they're going to have to pay attention to us," Sen. John Thune, a member of Senate leadership, told ME.

So where are we? Key corn-staters seemed more optimistic of the directions of talks but weren't ready to declare victory just yet. Sen. Joni Ernst, who held up a scheduled EPW vote Wednesday, said she wanted guarantees "either in writing or a public announcement" and her frustration level remains "pretty high" over the administration's biofuels stance. "We want the president, we want the EPA administrator to be very public about the steps that they can announce in a meaningful manner," she told reporters. "We want to know that [EPA Administrator] Scott Pruitt, as the head of the agency, is going to follow the spirit of the law. I have no doubt that they might try and follow the letter of the law but the spirit of the law is for energy independence here in the United States and to support the renewable industry in the United States."

Note to all EPW Republicans: "I told them outright that I would not support [air nominee Bill Wehrum] if I didn't have assurances," Ernst said. "I am the single Iowa Republican on that committee — 11 to 10. Eleven Republicans, 10 Democrats. One vote makes a difference."

Other Republicans too: Iowa Republican Chuck Grassley said his concerns had "not yet" been satisfactorily addressed. And Sen. Deb Fischer, who indicated she'd vote in favor of Wehrum after meeting with Pruitt on Tuesday, told reporters: "I feel better, but I think more can be done."

EPA's response: Pruitt spoke to Iowa Gov. Kim Reynolds Wednesday, a spokesman said. "What Administrator Pruitt said in his confirmation hearing still stands: he doesn't want to take any steps to undermine the objectives in the statute of the RFS."

And ICYMI: White House officials asked EPA to stop back off plans to reduce advanced biofuel volumes and allow credits for exported ethanol, Pro's Eric Wolff reports, citing multiple sources. "They had no choice," said one refining industry source who'd spoken to White House aides.

Meanwhile, the heads of four refiners at the heart of the skirmish — Valero, HollyFrontier, PBF and Monroe Energy — sent a letter to Trump Wednesday urging the administration to make biofuel exports eligible for credits, known as RINs. Pruitt has reportedly been considering such a move. "EPA has within its power the ability to level the playing field by treating exports the same as domestically-consumed products, removing a self-imposed trade barrier that unfairly discriminates against exports," they wrote.

WELCOME TO THURSDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and the American Chemistry Council's Jonathan Corley was first to correctly ID Jeanne Shaheen as the senator who won a 2008 rematch to win her seat. For today: There were three (!) separate Senate EPW chairs in 2001. Name them! Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

ANWR AMENDMENT ARRIVES: Democrats Sen. Ed Markey and Maria Cantwell have filed an amendment to the fiscal 2018 budget that would remove language opening ANWR to drilling. They intend to push for a vote as part of a vote-a-rama on the budget today. Their party has opted to try to force the Republicans into 20 to 25 tough amendment votes, instead of hundreds, as in past years. Remember several GOP senators have voted against ANWR drilling in the past, so the vote likely would be close. Budget and Appropriations Brief sets the scene on what to expect today.

PUERTO RICAN GOVERNOR TO MEET TRUMP: Puerto Rican Gov. Ricardo Rosselló heads to the White House today for a meeting with Trump at 12:15 p.m. as more than 80 percent of the island remains without electricity and 30 percent still lack drinking water almost a month after the hurricane. "We're continuing to do everything that we can to help the people of Puerto Rico," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said.

Even as the Senate prepares to turn to a House-passed disaster relief package H.R. 2266 \(115\) later this week, a bipartisan group of senators sent their leaders a letter requesting the next bill include the Wildfire Disaster Funding Act S. 1842 \(115\), which would ensure the U.S. Forest Service and Department of Interior have "stable, reliable" resources to fight future fires. That comes as FEMA Director Brock Long toured California wildfire damage on Wednesday.

Flint mayor to White House: Administration officials invited Flint Mayor Karen Weaver to the White House to discuss critical water infrastructure needs in urban communities in response to her open letter to San Juan's mayor. "I have spoken with Mayor Cruz who expressed support and encouragement for me to take the lead on articulating the critical infrastructure needs for communities such as Flint and San Juan," she said in a statement.

** Presented by the National Biodiesel Board: EPA Administrator Pruitt could harm American workers and break the president's promise to rural America to protect the Renewable Fuel Standard (RFS). A strong RFS will be key to keeping these jobs and upholding his promise. Tell EPA to keep the president's promise and grow the RFS: <http://bit.ly/2ghDL03> **

PRUITT COMING TO EPW? EPW Chairman John Barrasso said EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt "has an invitation" to appear before the committee, though he would not comment beyond that. That comes as ranking member Tom Carper's frustration over Pruitt's absence continues to mount: "It's beyond strange that the administrator for EPA still has not appeared before the committee of jurisdiction for nearly a year," he said. "It defies understanding."

He's going to Texas though: Pruitt is scheduled to speak at the 2017 Lone Star Energy Forum Agenda in The Woodlands, Texas. Friends of the Earth plans to fly over the event with a message — "Pruitt, # PayItBack" — referencing the non-commercial flights he's taken as administrator. The Texas Oil and Gas Association, hosting the event, didn't respond to request for comment.

WE NEED MORE: Ten federal agencies, including EPA were only "partially" compliant with a House Oversight request for information on private jet usage by officials and must provide more information, POLITICO's Kyle Cheney reports. That's better than Department of Justice and Department of Agriculture, both of which received subpoena threats for failing to adequately respond. Ten agencies, including DOE and Interior, fully complied with the requests.

TODAY'S FERC MEETING: There are only two rulemakings on FERC's monthly meeting agenda for today, but Chairman Neil Chatterjee offered a preview earlier this week. "We will consider a revised [Critical Infrastructure Protection] Standard on cybersecurity management controls ... I'd encourage you to stay tuned for details," he told a meeting of the Energy Bar Association on Tuesday. The cybersecurity item started with a petition NERC, the industry standards-writers, in March to make changes to how regulations apply to "low impact" grid systems as well as how cyber rules are applied to portable electronic devices in those facilities. Chatterjee also said FERC "will consider a new policy statement on establishing license terms for hydroelectric projects."

And now that the D.C. metro area finally seems to be getting fall weather , FERC leaders are scheduled to receive their annual briefing on the winter energy market outlook this morning too (think: natural gas storage levels, gas-electric coordination etc.). It should be interesting to compare the tone of these presentations to that of the Trump administration when it comes to grid reliability. The Energy Department has argued that FERC needs to act on Energy Secretary Rick Perry's pricing rule "before the winter heating season begins so as to prevent the potential failure of the grid from the loss of fuel-secure generation" and help avoid the grid "crisis at hand." ME can't predict whether we're in for Polar Vortex II, but we're sure that if we asked Commissioner Rob Powelson he'd remind us not to blame natural gas.

Remember what it was like to have a FERC meeting every month? The meeting starts at 10 a.m. at FERC HQ, 888 First St., NE, and will be webcast.

GOING TOO SLOW FOR INHOFE: Unless there's a deal to move ahead with some of the administration's EPA picks, Sen. Jim Inhofe has no plans to release his hold on Democratic FERC nominee Richard Glick, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "I don't think it could happen as one package, but it could be an agreement that they will bring those up prior to the next recess," he said of the nominees. In slowing the process — picks usually move in bipartisan pairs — Inhofe is delaying down the efforts of Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski, who has attempted to have both FERC nominees confirmed quickly.

SHIMKUS: 'NEVER SAY NEVER' ON YUCCA BILL IN SENATE: Speaking during a trip to Nevada, Energy and Commerce Environment Subcommittee Chairman John Shimkus acknowledged his nuclear waste legislation H.R. 3053 \(115\) would face an uphill climb in the Senate but expressed confidence it would clear the House, according to the Nevada Independent. "I would say never say never," he said. "But I do not assume that it's going to be easy to get the bill through the Senate." Doesn't sounds like much momentum in the Senate though with Murkowski telling reporters Wednesday: "I have not been following the status of the Shimkus bill."

NOT GOING ANYWHERE: Despite appearing frail and at times disoriented during a brief Wednesday interview, Senate Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran vowed he's not retiring or going anywhere, POLITICO's John Bresnahan and Anna Palmer report. "Don't believe everything you hear," the Mississippi Republican, who helps oversee hundreds of billions of dollars in government spending each year, said.

MAIL CALL! HOW TO SAVE A BUCK: Energy and Commerce Chairman Greg Walden released a letter Wednesday that included responses from EPA and DOE about what those agencies are doing to save taxpayer dollars. Read it here.

SUPPORT FOR RESCINDING MONUMENTS: A collection of conservative activists, organized by the National Center for Public Policy Research, sent Trump a letter urging him to implement Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's recommendations on a host of national monuments. In particular, it called for the elimination of Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument, Bears Ears National Monument, Katahdin Woods and Waters National Monument and Northeast Canyons and Seamounts Marine National Monument.

TAKE A GLANCE! HOW TO DISMANTLE AN OLD PLANT: Resources for the Future released a report Wednesday on key considerations when decommissioning coal, gas, oil, wind, and solar assets. It's especially timely given a recent wave of plant retirements with more expected to follow in the near future.

BIG BUCKS IN SAGE GROUSE PROTECTION: The Western Leaders Network is out with a report today looking at the federal funds states receive to restore sagebrush landscape, prevent wildland fire and improve sage-grouse habitat. It says these millions of dollars are at risk if Zinke follows through on plans to alter land-use plans the agency put in place in 2015. Meanwhile, Sen. Jon Tester sent a letter to BLM requesting a comment period extension from 45 to 90 days on its sage grouse plan review.

TAKE A LOOK! The Center for Biological Diversity surprised Zinke as he manned the welcome booth at the Grand Canyon and asked about his plans to shrink national monuments. After explaining portions of the Antiquities Act, he said: "I love our monuments." Full minute-long clip here.

THAT'S ALL FOR ME!

** Presented by the National Biodiesel Board: Made from an increasingly diverse mix of resources such as recycled cooking oil, soybean oil and animal fats, biodiesel is a renewable, clean-burning diesel replacement that can be used in existing diesel engines without modification. EPA wants to reduce biodiesel volumes in the Renewable Fuel Standard (RFS), which would kill jobs, thwart economic growth and potentially bankrupt farmers. We must support U.S. workers and grow the economy with more biodiesel in a growing RFS. Today is the last day to make your voice heard with the EPA: <http://bit.ly/2ghDLo3> **

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Sources: White House told EPA to back off on biodiesel cuts, export credits Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/18/2017 04:18 PM EDT

The White House has instructed EPA to back off its plans to reduce advanced biofuel volumes and allow credits for exported ethanol, according to biofuel and oil industry sources.

That move indicates the administration is yielding to pressure from the Midwestern senators and governors who are furious over EPA's proposal last month to cut biodiesel requirements for both 2018 and 2019.

"They had no choice," said one refining industry source who had spoken to White House aides.

The White House did not comment.

Corn-state officials were also concerned about internal EPA discussions to allow biofuel credits for exported biofuel, a move that would likely have lowered the market prices for Renewable Identification Numbers.

Neither the biodiesel cuts nor the credits for exported fuel will be in the final rule setting blending requirements for 2018 and 2019, the sources said.

Republican corn-state senators aggressively used their leverage to sway EPA. Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley forced a meeting with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt in his office on Tuesday, and Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst had withheld her support for Bill Wehrum to become head of EPA's air office.

Today, Ernst indicated that EPA was moving toward her position, saying "we're closer to reassurances, and once we have those, we can move forward." But she said she wanted a public statement from the administration.

And biofuels backers say they aren't taking anything for granted.

"We are waiting for affirmative, public declarations from WH," a biofuels source said.

House-passed aid package lacks 'fire-borrowing' fix Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 10/12/2017 06:20 PM EDT

The emergency funding California desperately needs got House approval on Thursday, but the long-term problem was ignored.

The $36.5 billion disaster aid package (H.R. 2266 \(115\)) the House passed does not include provisions that would reform how federal wildfire suppression efforts are funded, prompting several lawmakers to request that the next aid package address the problem.

"Unfortunately, we've missed an opportunity to fix the way the federal government funds wildfire suppression," Rep. Betty McCollum (D-Minn.) said on the House floor before the measure passed by a vote of 353 to 69. "Let me be clear: The next supplemental must include a legislative fix for wildfire spending."

As wildfires have increased in number and in intensity in recent years, so too has the cost of fighting them. To keep pace, the U.S. Forest Service has had to routinely borrow money from fire prevention programs, such as prescribed burns and forest thinning, to cover suppression costs.

McCollum was joined in her call for Congress to reform wildfire-suppression funding by Republican Reps. Jeff Denham and Ken Calvert, who both represent California, where the fires ravaging parts of the northern wine country have claimed at least 29 lives and scorched an estimated 180,000 acres.

The trio of lawmakers, all of whom voted for the aid package, said they were glad the measure would allocate $577 million to battle the California blazes and those in other western states, as well as help repay the Forest Service for its funding shortfall in fiscal 2017. The recently concluded fiscal year was the most expensive on record for wildfire suppression, with the tab running to $2.4 billion, McCollum said.

Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue has made addressing the so-called fire-borrowing problem one of his top priorities, and lawmakers in both chambers of Congress have said they want to pass legislation before the end of the year.

Inhofe waiting for deal on EPA picks before lifting his FERC hold Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/18/2017 05:19 PM EDT

Sen. Jim Inhofe said he doesn't plan to release his hold on Democratic FERC nominee Richard Glick until senators reach a larger deal to move ahead with President Donald Trump's nominees to the EPA.

"I've still got a hold on Glick," the Oklahoma Republican told POLITICO. He said he is "concerned that we don't have our nominees confirmed on the EPA."

Inhofe said that he has raised the issue with Senate leadership and that he hopes there might be an arrangement to consider the EPA and FERC nominees within the next month or so. Both Republicans and Democrats have raised concerns about EPA nominees.

"I don't think it could happen as one package, but it could be an agreement that they will bring those up prior to the next recess," he said of the nominees.

FERC nominees traditionally move in bipartisan packages, so Trump's pick for FERC chairman, Kevin McIntyre, will likely be stuck until Glick's nomination gets floor time.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) attempted to have both FERC nominees approved just before the Senate's most recent recess earlier this month, but Inhofe objected.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate's next extended recess is Thanksgiving week.

Frail and disoriented, Cochran says he's not retiring Back

By John Bresnahan and Anna Palmer | 10/18/2017 04:53 PM EDT

Mississippi GOP Sen. Thad Cochran insists that he is not retiring from Congress, despite widespread speculation about the veteran lawmaker's health and political future.

The 79-year-old Cochran appeared frail and at times disoriented during a brief hallway interview on Wednesday. He was unable to answer whether he would remain chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and at one point, needed a staffer to remind him where the Senate chamber is located.

"Don't believe everything you hear," Cochran said in a low voice when asked whether he plans to retire after 44 years in office.

However, when queried about whether he would stay on as Appropriations chairman, Cochran seemed confused and just repeated the question. "As chairman of the Appropriations Committee?" Cochran asked.

Cochran had to be guided by staffers around a security checkpoint inside the Capitol. He started to walk into a first-floor room — though the Senate chamber is on the second floor. He was then ushered by an aide up to the Senate.

When another reporter asked whether leadership had pressured Cochran to return for a vote on the budget resolution — a key moment in the tax reform debate — Cochran smiled and responded, "It's a beautiful day outside."

Cochran sat quietly in his seat during Wednesday's lengthy vote session. He smiled and responded when a fellow senator stopped by to offer greetings, but generally did not speak to anyone else.

On one amendment, Cochran voted "yes" despite being told by an aide to vote "no." The staffer tried to get the senator to switch his vote, but Cochran kept flashing the "thumbs up" sign, even walking over to the clerk tallying the vote and doing so. GOP floor staffers repeatedly told him the leadership wanted a "no" vote. Several more moments passed before Cochran realized he was voting the wrong way and then changed his vote.

Cochran, who turns 80 in December, has faced questions about his health for the past several years. Cochran has been treated recently for urological problems, though his aides and political allies insisted he was fine. President Donald Trump last month spotlighted Cochran's health when he claimed that Obamacare repeal legislation would have passed had Cochran not been hospitalized. Cochran, though, wasn't in the hospital at that point.

Top Senate Republicans say they are not pressuring Cochran to retire or step down as Appropriations Committee chairman, a powerful perch from which he helps oversee hundreds of billions of dollars in government spending each year. Cochran made a career of steering federal dollars back home, working with former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) for years to ensure their state benefited from hundreds of "earmarks" inserted in annual appropriations bills.

The use of earmarks, which were banned in 2010 after the tea party movement helped Republicans regain control of Congress, helped make Cochran popular back home. He never faced a serious challenge from 1984 until 2014. But that year, conservative outside groups attacked him during the GOP primary and Cochran barely survived a runoff. He went on, however, to easily win the general election.

Cochran's seat is viewed as particularly important, given that the GOP establishment went all out to help him beat state Sen. Chris McDaniel in the 2014 primary.

Cochran is up for reelection in 2020, and Republicans are desperate for him to stay in office and avoid a special election. McDaniel already is planning a campaign against incumbent Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) in 2018.

Cochran was first elected to Congress in 1972, making him one of the longest serving GOP lawmakers in history. His election to the Senate in Mississippi in 1978 was a watershed moment for Republicans. Cochran was the first Republican to win a statewide election in Mississippi since Reconstruction.

Now, the state is overwhelmingly red, with the GOP controlling the governorship, Legislature and congressional delegation. President Donald Trump easily carried the state in the 2016 presidential election.

The Senate has had other once-vibrant members who faced questions about whether they still had the capacity to serve as they aged. The late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) served until the age of 100, but was forced to give up the chairmanship of Armed Services. Another legendary lawmaker, the late Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) was eventually replaced as chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Interior to reverse Obama sage grouse land protection, reconsider pacts with states Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/05/2017 01:57 PM EDT

The Interior Department says it is terminating the Obama administration's proposal to block mining on about 10 million acres of sage grouse habitat in the West, and it announced plans to alter the land-use plans the agency put in place in 2015.

In notices posted on its website that will be published in the Federal Register, the Bureau of Land Management terminated its plans set out under the Obama administration for an environmental impact statement that would have potentially led to the agency withdrawing land in so-called sagebrush focal areas in Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah and Wyoming.

"The BLM has determined that the lands are no longer needed in connection with the proposed withdrawal," the notice says.

The agency is also asking for comment on changing the nearly 100 land-use plans BLM put in place under an agreement with states in lieu of listing the bird as either endangered or threatened under the Endangered Species Act.

BLM said it is re-opening the plans to comply with to a court decision earlier this year that held the agency did not adequately evaluate the designation of sagebrush focal areas in its 2015 greater sage-grouse plan amendment for Nevada.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will accept comments on the land use plan changes for 45 days after the notice is published in the Federal Register.

PUTTING MAJOR RFS CONCESSIONS INTO WRITING: Sen. Joni Ernst released a letter late Thursday from EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt outlining a number of steps the agency intends to take on the Renewable Fuel Standard that will be music to the ears of a small bloc of Midwest corn-state Republicans. Those include:

— A decision to be finalized "within 30 days" not to move the point of obligation downstream to fuel wholesalers (as previously reported),

— A commitment to finalize biofuel volumes on time by Nov 30 at levels equal to or greater than those in the proposed rule, — Direction for EPA staff to "actively explore" whether the agency has legal authority to grant a waiver allowing year-round sale of gasoline with 15 percent ethanol. Pruitt also expressed openness to working with Congress on "definitive analysis" on the agency's ability to issue a waiver, and,

— A pledge not to make biofuel exports eligible for credits, known as RINs.

In a statement, Ernst said: "I am appreciative of Administrator Pruitt's pledges to rural America, and I will continue to work collaboratively with the EPA going forward on this and other issues." She didn't specifically say she'd vote for EPA air nominee Bill Wehrum in light of these public commitments — remember Ernst said Wednesday she needed public evidence of the administration's biofuels support — but ME would be surprised if the nomination didn't move forward now.

EPW REPUBLICANS SPLIT ON PRUITT APPEARANCE: At least some EPW Republicans are ready for Pruitt to come before their committee again (he hasn't testified since his confirmation hearing in January), but that feeling is not universal. "I wouldn't think that would be necessary," Deb Fischer said of Pruitt testimony right now. And John Boozman and Jim Inhofe both wanted to focus on getting lower-level nominees confirmed and into their roles at the agency first. "I'd like to get him beefed up with his staff and not only get him back, but actually get some undersecretaries with some authority," Boozman said.

But that sentiment wasn't unanimous: Others voiced interest in having Pruitt back to testify even as they applauded his early efforts at EPA. "I think he's doing a really good job, but I think regular updates are useful," Dan Sullivan told ME. West Virginia's Shelley Moore Capito was more succinct on her desire for an appearance: "That would probably be a good idea. It's been a while."

What's the holdup? Chairman John Barrasso told ME on Wednesday he'd extended an invitation to Pruitt, but the committee didn't respond to further requests for comment. "We will respond to the Senate EPW Committee through the proper channel," Jahan Wilcox, an agency spokesman, said about when Pruitt might testify. ME would note Barrasso could definitely expedite Pruitt's appearance if he actually wanted to make it happen.

For the record: Former Administrator Lisa Jackson made her first post-confirmation appearance at the committee in May 2009.

TRUMP THROWS LIFELINE: In phone calls this week, President Donald Trump told EPW senators Barrasso, Fischer and Sen. Roger Wicker he'd back their 2018 reelection bids over any insurgent primary challengers, POLITICO's Burgess Everett reports. "Sen. Barrasso is grateful that President Trump would take the time to call him directly to express his support," said Dan Kunsman, a top aide to Barrasso, said. Formal endorsements are expected to eventually follow.

TGIF EVERYONE! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and LCV's Tiernan Sittenfeld correctly identified Sens. Harry Reid, Jim Jeffords and Bob Smith as your three EPW chairmen in 2001. ANWR LANGUAGE STAYS: Senators refused, by a vote of 48-52, to strip out language from their fiscal 2018 budget resolution that could open the door for drilling in ANWR, your ME host reports. Sen. Susan Collins was the lone Republican to vote for the amendment, while Sen. Joe Manchin was the lone Democrat to oppose it. Though the budget doesn't explicitly mention ANWR, it calls for the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to identify ways of raising an additional $1 billion in revenue. Chairman Lisa Murkowski said on the floor her committee is "prepared to meet this instruction" by "expanding our energy development in our federal areas" that would almost certainly include ANWR. "We can and we must do more as a nation to responsibly develop our energy resources," she said.

Just the beginning? A coalition of 20 environmental groups said the vote was just the beginning of a "long fight" to remove the rider from any subsequent reconciliation package. "There is no reason why Congress should hijack the budget with a controversial rider to drill in the Arctic Refuge," the groups, which include Clean Water Action, the National Audubon Society and the Sierra Club, said.

Two Lee amendments fail: Senators rejected one amendment from Sen. Mike Lee that would have barred regulating species that exist only in one state under the Endangered Species Act by a vote of 49-51. Another amendment, which would have made the federal government compensate local governments for the full value of the property taxes they are losing when much of their jurisdiction is covered by federal land, actually failed by a tally of 50-50 since Vice President Mike Pence wasn't available to break the tie.

The budget passed 51-49 just after 9:30 p.m., following a mere six-and-a-half hours of vote-a-rama.

BIG PROMISE: Speaking to the Texas Oil and Gas Association in the Woodlands, Texas, Pruitt vowed his agency would respond to permit requests within six months by the end of the year, Reuters reports. "It can be done. It's just a matter of having the process in place to achieve results," Pruitt said. That comes after the administrator held a roundtable with representatives of the Texas Health and Environmental Alliance, Galveston Bay Foundation, Houston Advance Research Center and Harris County Attorney Vince Ryan concerning the cleanup of the San Jacinto Superfund site during his Texas swing ( pictures).

CHATTER ON REBUILDING PUERTO RICO'S GRID: During an appearance with Trump on Thursday, Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló floated the idea of using public-private partnerships to help rebuild the island's electric grid. Rosselló said he hoped to "rebuild a much modern, much stronger platform, and not only have Puerto Rico have energy but actually be a model of sustainable energy and growth towards the future." Trump replied: "You were talking about rebuilding your electric plant long before the hurricane; you've been wanting to do that for a long time. So maybe this is a reason that we can do it. And we'll help you and we'll all do it together."

Side note: Seems like Trump is referring to the electric grid when he refers to the "electric plant."

Patience is a virtue: Trump said it would be a "period of time" before electricity could be restored on the island given its electric infrastructure had been "totally destroyed." The president floated one potential policy idea: "It would be wonderful if you could have underground wire. It makes it a lot better in these storms." (Side note: Underground wires didn't fare so well during Hurricane Sandy in New York and it would be hugely expensive for the whole island).

Rosselló promises corruption crackdown: "If there is a public official that is purposefully mishandling the food that should go to the people of Puerto Rico, there is going to be some hell to pay," he said.

HOLD UP: Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn has placed a hold on Russell Vought's nomination to be deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget unless he gets more funding for Texas hurricane relief, Axios reports. That comes as Florida Sen. Bill Nelson said Thursday he'd also placed a hold on Vought's nomination after the administration kicked funds for his state's citrus growers to a later disaster relief package.

** Presented by the National Biodiesel Board: President Trump repeatedly pledged to protect biodiesel and the Renewable Fuel Standard (RFS). But EPA's latest actions threaten the 64,000 jobs supported by biodiesel. A strong RFS will be key to keeping these jobs and upholding his promise. Mr. President: please stop EPA from thwarting growth in rural America. <http://bit.ly/2xn5Sgm> **

IT'S NOT UNUSUAL: He doesn't like it and vehemently opposes his nomination, but EPW ranking member Tom Carper sees nothing irregular in EPA chemical pick Michael Dourson joining the agency early. "I don't see it as going around us — there's plenty of precedence for this in earlier administrations," he told ME. "What I find troubling most recently is his abject failure to respond to basic questions."

Whitehouse disagrees: Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse told ME in a statement Dourson's move showed contempt for the Senate's advice and consent role. "Not only is this move contemptuous of the Senate as an institution, it risks undermining the legal validity of EPA actions involving the nominee," he said. "The administration may find it easier to nominate individuals with bipartisan support and a commitment to the EPA's mission rather than industry-funded hacks."

UPTON WAVERS ON SENATE BID: While he was once 95 percent likely to mount a Senate bid, former House Energy and Commerce Chairman Fred Upton is now "more like 50-50" on challenging Michigan incumbent Debbie Stabenow, according to the Detroit News. "He's gone coy over the last few days," one source told columnist Ingrid Jacques, citing fears in particular about Steve Bannon's potential involvement.

STILL MOVING FORWARD: Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts hopes to schedule a hearing on Trump's controversial pick to be chief scientist at USDA, Sam Clovis, next week, Pro Ag's Helena Bottemiller Evich reports. "Hopefully, we can get that done next week," Roberts said, noting staff continues to assemble all of Clovis' past statements. Democrats say Clovis doesn't fit legal requirements for the job and condemned past statements that climate change is a hoax.

Garrett too: Even as the business community has come out strongly against his nomination, the Senate Banking Committee announced an Oct. 1 hearing on Scott Garrett's selection to run the Export-Import Bank.

PLEASE, NO CH-CH-CHANGES: Some of the state-focused climate change web pages EPA took down in April reappeared in late July as "energy resources," according to a report from watchdog group Environmental Data and Governance Initiative. The agency removed all 15 references to "climate," on the main page, as well as several climate-specific links and tools, including webinars and example policies. The website still hosts information about renewable power and energy efficiency.

LAWSUIT LODGED OVER RFS ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACTS: The Sierra Club filed a lawsuit in federal district court Thursday alleging EPA has failed to conduct required environmental impact and air quality analyses for the Renewable Fuel Standard. "Today's lawsuit is a reminder to Administrator Pruitt that his duty is to the American people, and we will continue to hold him accountable for both his harmful actions and inaction alike," attorney Devorah Ancel said in a statement.

GETTING ANTSY IN UTAH: Gov. Gary Herbert hasn't heard a peep from the Trump administration on the status of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's review of national monument designations but wants a decision ASAP. "Whether the president will act on those recommendations and, if so, how, whether he'll modify them, I don't think anybody knows for sure," he told local reporters in video posted by KUED. "I hope he makes a decision soon so we can all get past the uncertainty." Trump must make the final call, but Zinke suggested shrinking several monuments previously designated under the Antiquities Act.

MAIL CALL! WYDEN SAYS ABANDON GRID RESILIENCY PROPOSAL: Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden urged FERC to withdraw Energy Secretary Rick Perry's grid resiliency plan from consideration. "Arbitrarily propping up a dying industry goes against what the GOP has long claimed is its goal - an all-of-the-above energy strategy," he wrote in a letter. "This rule clearly picks winners and losers in energy resources, which robs taxpayers of the benefits of competitive markets."

ABOUT THAT ROAD...:Two House Democrats are questioning whether Zinke can transfer land that would clear the way for a road to be built through Alaska's Izembek National Wildlife Refuge — a long-time pet issue of Murkowski. The Washington Post on Sunday reported the agency is mulling transferring land to the tribal King Cove Corp. even though the agency previously found allowing the 12-mile road would hurt migratory birds, caribou and other species. In the Thursday letter, House Natural Resources Committee ranking Democrat Raul Grijalva and subcommittee top Democrat Donald McEachin asked Zinke to describe his authority to transfer or exchange the land and whether the agency will conduct a new public environmental review before making the call.

KEEPING GAO BUSY: Grijalva asked GAO to examine whether and how much public revenue has been lost due to changes in how Interior leases drilling parcels in the Gulf of Mexico. Link here.

TAKE A GLANCE! The National Wildlife Federation released a report Thursday on the dramatic rise in wildfire activity, which it links to unhealthy forest conditions, insufficient forest restoration activities, rapid climate change and increasing housing development in high-risk and fire-prone areas. "By restoring and better managing U.S. forests, it is possible to reduce fire risks to communities, increase populations of cherished wildlife species, and protect our climate by enhancing the carbon sequestration and storage potential of our forests," it concludes.

LIGHTER CLICK: The Sierra Club launched a spoof airline Pruitt-Zinke Airlines, or PZ Air, over their non-commercial travel. Watch the video here.

THAT'S ALL FOR ME!

** Presented by the National Biodiesel Board: Made from an increasingly diverse mix of resources such as recycled cooking oil, soybean oil and animal fats, biodiesel is a renewable, clean-burning diesel replacement that can be used in existing diesel engines without modification. Biodiesel and the Renewable Fuel Standard (RFS) have been essential to staving off a recession in rural America throughout the country's economic downturns. Weakening the RFS may pad the pockets of certain oil companies, but it will devastate rural America. Please keep your promise, Mr. President, to rural America. <http://bit.ly/2xn5Sgm> **

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Source: EPA will reject refiners request to change ethanol rules Back

By Eric Wolff | 08/03/2017 10:46 AM EDT

The Trump administration plans to reject a proposal that would let oil refiners off the hook for complying with the federal ethanol mandate, a senior administration official told POLITICO, dashing the hopes of billionaire Carl Icahn and a slew of independent companies.

EPA plans to formally announce the decision within the next two weeks, the official said.

The move is a severe blow for Icahn, a longtime associate and early supporter of Donald Trump who owns the refiner CVR Energy. He was once so confident that the obligation would be changed that he tried to strike a deal with a biofuels trade association.

Ultimately Icahn and his allies were unable to prevail over a peculiar alliance of major oil companies and biofuels producers, who opposed changing the Renewable Fuel Standard, though for separate reasons.

Icahn, refining giant Valero, and smaller refiners argued that purchasing compliance credits, called Renewable Identification Numbers, squeezed their bottom lines and, in some cases, threatened to put them out of business. Icahn's CVR lost $19 million in the second quarter of this year after guessing incorrectly that the administration would make the policy change.

Trump has turned away from one of Icahn's main policy goals in large part due to pressure from corn state voters and ethanol organizations.

"President Trump supports the EPA's decision," the official said.

The decision follows through on Trump's campaign promise to support ethanol and leave the mandate intact. Corn states and ethanol interests have been lobbying hard, arguing that the change would set back an ethanol industry that is vital to some of the states where voters strongly backed Trump.

"Mr. Trump won that election because voters in Iowa and across the heartland, we rose up in support of him," Annette Sweeney, a member of Trump's Agriculture Advisory Council, said in an interview after the election. "Mr. Trump, the time I visited with him, he understood the need for home grown fuel, the need for cleaner fuel. Here in Iowa we were some of Mr. Trump's strongest supporters. And I really think shifting the point of obligation would interrupt America's progress toward making clean renewable biofuels."

Biofuels producers believed that if EPA had shifted the "point of obligation" away from refiners, as Icahn and other companies requested, it would cause years of upheaval. The American Petroleum Institute, which represents much of the oil industry, including the oil majors, has opposed the change, saying it's a distraction for the kind of overhaul or full-on repeal the program needs.

EPA will finalize an Obama-era proposed decision to reject a petition by refiners that asked to change the program. The agency has been ready to act for months, but the White House Office of Legal Counsel advised waiting for the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to rule in an omnibus case of RFS challenges, the official said. The case included a challenge by merchant refiners to force EPA to make a decision on the obligation question. In its ruling, the court rejected the request by the refiners to require EPA to decide on the obligation question in every annual RFS rule, but it did say EPA should make a decision at some point. The resolution of the case opens the door for EPA to act.

Oil analysts don't believe the decision to leave the program unchanged will have a significant effect on the cost of RINs, which have fallen substantially since last year.

"The changing of the point of obligation doesn't mean RINs will be more expensive or cheaper," said Tom Kloza, Global Head of Energy Analysis for OPIS.

Critics of the RFS focus on high RIN prices as a chief reason for changing which companies are obligated. Icahn's CVR lost $19 million RIN costs in the second quarter of this year after guessing incorrectly that the administration would expand the number of companies complying with the RFS, a move which might have pushed RIN prices down.

Valero CEO Joe Gorder said Valero spent $750 million on RINs last year, and Icahn has called RIN sales "the mother of all squeezes." Delaware Valley refiners like the Delta-Airlines-owned Monroe Energy and Philadelphia Energy, already smarting from the legalization of crude exports in 2015, say RIN costs could drive layoffs or even bankruptcy.

Valero and other refiners sued the EPA over the obligation issue, arguing that EPA should address it each time it sets new mandates for biofuel blending. Oral arguments in that case were held before the D.C. Circuit last month.

For Icahn the move could be a blow to the stock price of CVR's refining subsidiary, which shot up 40 percent between Trump's election and the first months of his presidency. But by Wednesday CVR Refining's stock had fallen back to 6 percent below Election Day.

An early Trump supporter, Icahn was named a "special adviser" to the president though he is not on the government payroll. Icahn was so confident the change was coming that he and Valero presented the president with draft language for an executive order in February. That same month he called Bob Dinneen of the Renewable Fuels Association, an ethanol trade group, and told him the ink was already drying on an executive order changing the program, and offering to meet Dinneen's demands for providing support. News of the conversation drove down RIN prices, and also split RFA from the biofuels community. Within days RFA had been booted from Fuels America, a political umbrella group for ethanol producers.

The order never came, and in the wake of the news, Icahn became the subject of ethical questions surrounding his role at the White House. Public Citizen filed a lobbying complaint with both houses of Congress, and last week eight Senate Democrats led by Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) sent letters to the SEC, EPA and Commodity Futures Trading Commission calling for an investigation into Icahn's dealings.

Icahn went quiet on the issue over the last few months, possibly as a result of all the investigations and letters from Senators.

Icahn did not respond to a request for comment, and EPA did not respond for the record.

EPA proposes trimming advanced biofuel volumes for 2018 Back

By Eric Wolff | 07/05/2017 04:09 PM EDT

EPA today proposed reducing its volume mandate for use of advanced biofuels under the Renewable Fuel Standard next year, but kept the requirements for ethanol at the maximum level set under the law.

The agency put the overall 2018 biofuel volume mandate at 19.24 billion gallons, with 15 billion gallons of that in conventional biofuels, or ethanol, and 4.24 billion gallons in advanced biofuels. That put the reduction in advanced fuels at 40 million barrels from the level set for this year.

"Increased fuel security is an important component of the path toward American energy dominance," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement. "We are proposing new volumes consistent with market realities focused on actual production and consumer demand while being cognizant of the challenges that exist in bringing advanced biofuels into the marketplace."

The mandate for cellulosic ethanol, which is included in the advanced biofuel figure, was cut to 228 million gallons, down 23 percent from 2017.

Volumes for advanced biodiesel, also an advanced biofuel, were previously set at 2.1 billion gallons for 2018 and would stay at that level in 2019.

An executive summary attached to the Renewable Volume Obligations said the reduction in advanced biofuels was a move to enhance domestic production at the expense of foreign.

Pruitt also reiterated his promise to get the final rule out by Nov. 30.

WHAT'S NEXT: The agency will take public comment and then try to finalize the rule before the Nov. 30 statutory deadline.

Trump offers support to GOP senators in Bannon's cross hairs Back

By Josh Dawsey and Burgess Everett | 10/19/2017 04:01 PM EDT

President Donald Trump called three Republican senators this week and expressed support for their 2018 re-election bids, aligning with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell in the senator's intra-party feud with Steve Bannon.

Trump dialed GOP Sens. John Barrasso of Wyoming, Deb Fischer of Nebraska and Roger Wicker of Mississippi, according to five people familiar with the calls. He promised to help the three senators against any insurgent challengers, one of these people said, and said he hoped they would be reelected.

The calls are expected to eventually be followed by formal endorsements, GOP senators said. Wicker, Barrasso and Fischer declined to comment on private discussions with the president. Wicker wasn't available for comment. Bannon has criticized both Fischer and Barrasso and has told people he would like state Sen. Chris McDaniel to beat Wicker.

"The president has been very supportive, and Senator Barrasso is grateful that President Trump would take the time to call him directly to express his support," said Dan Kunsman, a top aide to Barrasso.

A White House spokesman didn't immediately respond to a request for comment, and a representative for Bannon declined to comment.

Republicans hope to avoid spending money protecting incumbents in primaries and instead focus on defeating the 10 Senate Democrats representing states Trump won. They hope Trump will go further and make a public statement of support for the senators.

"I hope he will. I think he will," said Sen. John Thune of South Dakota, a GOP leader. "They are the kind of people he needs to get his agenda done."

The three incumbent senators have the strong support of McConnell, who has said that many of the anti-establishment candidates Bannon and others may support don't have a path to victory in general elections. Many of McConnell's top advisers and allies consider Bannon a political charlatan interested in mischief-making.

"You have to nominate people who can actually win," McConnell said in the Rose Garden. "Winners make policy, losers go home."

Bannon has said privately the trio are among the senators he would like to unseat, and the former Trump strategist has zigzagged the country, looking for candidates and donors. He has bragged repeatedly about trying to take McConnell down, though the majority leader still enjoys considerable support in his conference. "We've cut your oxygen off, Mitch, OK," Bannon told conservative activists last weekend.

Trump has given mixed signals to Bannon's efforts, saying he understands why Bannon is doing it but that he might also try to dissuade him.

"We're not getting the job done folks," Trump said Monday morning, when asked about Bannon's political efforts in the Roosevelt Room. He added: "I'm not going to blame myself."

By Monday afternoon, standing with McConnell in the Rose Garden, Trump said he would try to talk Bannon out of some of his moves. When meeting with Trump in the Oval Office on Monday, McConnell made a practical case on why the president should support incumbents without mentioning Bannon by name, people familiar with the meeting said.

The former chief strategist has been buoyed by Roy Moore's victory in Alabama's primary race, where Bannon surged into the state in the final weeks and saw Moore resoundingly defeat GOP Sen. Luther Strange, the candidate backed by Trump and McConnell.

Senators said privately that they doubt Bannon's political acumen and say he merely associated himself with the insurgent Moore, who already had strong support among conservatives and had twice been elected statewide.

"Bannon's claiming Roy Moore. Hell, he didn't have anything to do with that," said one GOP senator.

Democratic bid to block ANWR drilling in budget falls short Back

By Anthony Adragna | 10/19/2017 09:12 PM EDT

The Senate narrowly shot down a bid today from Sens. Ed Markey, Michael Bennet and Maria Cantwell to remove language from the budget that could open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

The amendment failed by a vote of 48 to 52, with Democrat Joe Manchin and Republican Susan Collins breaking with their parties.

Though the budget doesn't explicitly mention ANWR, it calls for the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to identify ways of raising an additional $1 billion in revenue. Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski has long sought to open the area to drilling, and including the language in the budget reconciliation would allow Republicans to circumvent a filibuster.

Alaska Sen. Dan Sullivan slammed the Democratic amendment ahead of the vote. "To me, we've reached kind of a low point in politics if there's not bipartisan support for more energy," he told POLITICO.

Democrats and environmental groups have long opposed opening the pristine wilderness area to energy exploration, with Markey describing the budget language as "a Big Oil polar payout." More than 300 groups sent a letter to senators today opposing any ANWR language in the budget.

Senators also shot down two amendments from Utah Sen. Mike Lee. One to bar regulating species that exist in only one state under the Endangered Species Act failed 49-51. The other, which failed 50-50 with Vice President Mike Pence absent, would have made the federal government compensate local governments for the full value of the property taxes they are losing when much of their jurisdiction is covered by federal land.

EPA chemical nominee starts at EPA as Pruitt adviser Back

By Alex Guillén and Eric Wolff | 10/18/2017 10:56 AM EDT

Michael Dourson, the controversial nominee to run EPA's Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention, has already started at the agency as a special adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt, according to an agency spokeswoman.

"Yes, he most certainly has," EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said in an email when asked if Dourson had begun serving as an adviser to Pruitt on chemicals.

Dourson has yet to be confirmed by the Senate. A committee vote planned for today was scrapped after Sen. Joni Ernst threatened to withhold her support for Dourson and other EPA nominees over an unrelated biofuel dispute with Pruitt.

Dourson was most recently a professor at the University of Cincinnati's Department of Environmental Health's Risk Science Center. Dourson was still listed as a professor as of Oct. 5, a day after his confirmation hearing, according to a cache of his department bio page, though he is no longer listed as a faculty member.

Dourson's move to EPA was first reported Wednesday by E&E.

Another pending EPA nominee, Susan Bodine, who was selected to run the enforcement office, has also started at EPA ahead of her confirmation, which has yet to receive a floor vote. She has been working as an adviser to Pruitt on enforcement matters.

"This is not unique to our administration, but something that is a common practice," Bowman said.

Roberts hopes for hearing on Clovis next week Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 10/19/2017 04:15 PM EDT

Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts expressed a desire today to hold a hearing next week on Sam Clovis' controversial nomination to be USDA's chief scientist — but added that staff continues to work on processing all of Clovis' past statements.

"Hopefully, we can get that done next week," Roberts said after the panel approved by voice vote the nominations of Greg Ibach and Bill Northey for USDA undersecretary posts. Asked if that meant a hearing could be held next week, he replied: "That would be my hope."

Roberts told reporters that his committee has all of Clovis' written testimony and is planning to meet with both Clovis and Stephen Vaden, President Donald Trump's pick for USDA chief counsel.

Roberts said his staff is still working with the minority to ensure they have all of Clovis' past statements from political blogs and an Iowa conservative talk-radio show he once hosted. He said the committee wants to "make sure all of that is available."

Clovis is being opposed by Senate Agriculture ranking member Debbie Stabenow, who argues he does not possess the qualifications that are legally required of one nominated for the position of undersecretary for research, education and economics.

PRUITT'S CHARM OFFENSIVE HAS FEW ACTUAL PROMISES: Seven corn-state Republican senators emerged smiling from what they deemed a "good" meeting with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt on Tuesday but they got no concrete policy promises on the Renewable Fuel Standard from him, Pro's Eric Wolff and your ME host report. Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley said following the meeting he was "watching this issue closely" and plans "to hold the administration accountable," while his Iowa colleague Joni Ernst said: "Administrator Pruitt again claimed today that he will not do anything to undermine the program. However, we have heard this before. We now need to see it."

Ernst's statement is key because, unlike Sen. Deb Fischer, the Environment and Public Works Committee member pointedly declined to back Bill Wehrum to run the agency's air office following the meeting. That's likely why the committee announced a few hours after the meeting that it would postpone "until further notice" a vote slated for today on various EPA, NRC and federal highway picks. With just an 11-10 majority on the panel, Republicans can afford no defections. The committee provided no explanation for the last-minute move and didn't respond to requests for comment.

So what did they talk about with Pruitt? Senators said they reminded the administrator of President Donald Trump's repeated support for biofuels. They also discussed the possibility of allowing year-round sales of 15 percent ethanol and got positive signals on that front: "I'm also encouraged there about the fact that there's a lot of dialogue inside the EPA," Sen. Ben Sasse told reporters. And Pruitt — who showed up with a flock of senior staff and fled without taking questions — brought up the cost of biofuel credits, called Renewable Identification Numbers, one of the primary complaints of some independent refiners. "He also talked a lot about the volatility of RINS and the fact we need to address that," Sen. Mike Rounds told ME. "And we all agreed with him."

Attendees: Ernst, Grassley, Fischer, Rounds, Sasse, John Thune and Pat Roberts.

Watch this: Biofuels defy normal partisan politics and this bloc of corn-state Republicans could wreak havoc on their party's agenda if they throw their weight around on RFS issues. "We have a big enough group that is passionate about these issues that I think we can get their attention when we need to," Thune told ME of the dynamic.

Some greens agree with Pruitt, albeit for different reasons. A group of five environmental groups, including the Clean Air Task Force and Sierra Club, are backing Pruitt's call to reduce biodiesel requirements. "We support EPA's current effort to determine whether reductions to these RFS mandates are warranted," they write in a letter.

For your radar: Iowa Gov. Kim Reynolds is holding a press conference today at 2:30 p.m. to discuss the "growing threat" to the RFS posed by EPA's signals. Watch here. Trump's slated to Speak with Reynolds by phone at 11 a.m.

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Entergy's Rob Hall was first to identify Sen. CONCERNS RAISED OVER PUERTO RICO FRAUD: A group of House Natural Resources lawmakers, led by Chairman Rob Bishop, sent letters Tuesday to FEMA and the FBI seeking information about alleged mishandling by local officials of emergency relief supplies in Puerto Rico. "Allegations that local elected officials are distributing life-sustaining FEMA emergency supplies based on political loyalty is deeply disturbing," they wrote. "Any persons misappropriating FEMA emergency supplies should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law." The lawmakers want briefings from both agencies by Oct. 23.

Hearing announced: Bishop announced the committee would hold an oversight hearing on the Puerto Rico response efforts Oct. 24. Energy and Commerce subcommittees are expected to announce similar sessions this week.

McCaskill seeks her own investigation: Sen. Claire McCaskill, the top-ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, called for a bipartisan investigation into the federal government's response to the string of recent hurricanes. Letter here.

INTERIOR-EPA MARK SHELVED: Citing "uncertain timing of votes on the budget resolution," the Senate Appropriations Committee announced late Tuesday it would postpone a scheduled markup of the fiscal 2018 EPA-Interior spending package until next week. The move comes as the panel's chairman, Thad Cochran, returned to Washington after being away several weeks due to health problems. Separately, 115 scientists and health professionals sent a letter to committee members Tuesday urging them to maintain current funding levels for EPA.

TRUMP CLAIMS WEST VIRGINIA 180: During a Tuesday interview on "Fox News Radio," Trump personally took credit for boosting the fortunes of West Virginia thanks to his efforts to boost coal. "I've turned West Virginia around, because what I've done environmentally with coal," he said. "And everyone's saying 'I can't believe it,' because they were having such problems." West Virginia's senators have repeatedly acknowledged coal will never return to where it once was so it's unclear what exactly Trump's taking credit for here.

PENCE: SOME ENERGY BREAKS WILL STAY: During an appearance in Buffalo, N.Y., Vice President Mike Pence suggested some current tax incentives for energy efficiency would likely stick around as Republicans advance tax reform. "Those incentives that are in the tax code today, tax credits that are in today will remain in effect unless we've addressed them in the plan that we've outlined," Pence said. "Some of those historic energy incentives, I expect to remain in place unless Congress decides otherwise."

WHITEHOUSE SLAMS EPA NOMINEE RESPONSES: Prior to the nomination hearing being shelved without explanation, Rhode Island Democratic Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse released responses from Wehrum and EPA chemical office pick Michael Dourson where they dodged questions on a host of matters related to their new posts. "The President's pick to run the air pollution office hasn't read the most pivotal Supreme Court ruling on greenhouse gas regulation ever?" Whitehouse said of Wehrum. "He's 'not familiar' with the science on the health effects of ozone, an all-too-common pollutant that affects vulnerable groups across the country? Really?" Read them here.

ME FIRST — CLEAN ENERGY GROUP BACKS GILLESPIE: Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions today endorsed Republican Ed Gillespie's gubernatorial bid in Virginia and Jill Vogel's bid to become lieutenant governor. FERC CHIEF CALLS FOR ENFORCEMENT REVIEW: After a string of court rulings that rejected FERC's penalties, Chairman Neil Chatterjee said Tuesday it's time for the commission to take a hard look at its enforcement policies, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "The courts have rejected FERC's interpretation of de novo review five times under the Federal Power Act," he told energy lawyers. "The courts have spoken, and I, for one, am listening." Chatterjee said his goal is to "chart a new course that is fair and legally defensible."

Don't hold your breath: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski doesn't expect any package of energy nominees to advance this week given everything that's going on. "I don't think it's going to happen this week," she told ME. "Do I want it to happen? Yes." Two additional FERC picks are among the nominees awaiting floor action.

SENATORS TO FERC: IGNORE PERRY'S PUSH: Eleven members of the Senate Democratic caucus, led by Energy and Natural Resources Ranking Member Maria Cantwell, are urging FERC in a letter to reject Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposed grid resiliency plan that would benefit coal and nuclear sectors. "We urge the Commission to reject this ill-conceived proposed rule and return, in a deliberative manner and with the benefit of a full Commission, to reviewing and building upon the record developed in existing proceedings related to the organized markets in a way that truly benefits consumers," they wrote.

EARLY GRID STUDY WRITER CHIPS AT DOE PROPOSAL: Alison Silverstein, an early author of the Energy Department's grid study, gave a presentation Tuesday in Nevada that seemed to undermine the agency's controversial resiliency pricing proposal for coal and nuclear power. Speaking at the joint meeting of the fairly obscure Committee on Regional Electric Power Cooperation and Western Interconnection Regional Advisory Body, Silverstein's talk included a slide titled "Coal needed for resilience? Not so much..." which explained how "Coal plants that retired recently did not operate as baseload" — countering the crux of Energy Secretary Rick Perry's pricing plan to FERC — and pointed out that "[a]verage coal on-site inventories today only 45-70 days, not 90 days." Silverstein left DOE well before the final grid study was released in August.

SPARED? In private conversations with GOP leaders, Trump has pledged to spare Sens. John Barrasso and Deb Fischer from primary challenges launched by Steve Bannon, National Journal reports, citing conversations with two GOP sources familiar with the discussions. The president hinted at such a move during a Monday press conference.

LAWSUIT FILED OVER ROYALTY RULE: California and New Mexico filed a lawsuit Tuesday in the U.S. District Court for Northern California challenging the Trump administration's plan to repeal the 2017 valuation rule for coal, oil and natural gas extracted from federal lands, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. In their filing, the states argue Interior's explanations for repealing the rule "are nothing more than trumped-up technicalities that do not justify throwing out the Rule in its entirety." They call for the rule to be reinstated.

EXAMINING FOSSIL FUEL IMPACTS IN OKLAHOMA: The Coalition for Oklahoma's Renewable Energy released a report looking at the public health impacts of oil and gas development in Pruitt's home state. They note it comes as Pruitt's EPA and Interior have moved to suspend methane standards.

MAIL CALL! BUT REALLY, SHOW ME THE MONEY: House Natural Resources ranking member Raul Grijalva asked Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in a Tuesday letter to explain what he's done with $400,000 in appropriated funds toward a study on the health impacts of mountaintop removal mining. Zinke's agency ordered the National Academy of Sciences to cease all work on the study back in August.

NEW CHALLENGE TO ENDANGERMENT FINDING: A group of 60 skeptics of mainstream climate change science sent Pruitt a letter Tuesday seeking "an honest, unbiased reconsideration" of the agency's 2009 endangerment that compelled it to take action on climate change. The Competitive Enterprise Institute led the effort.

FOR YOUR RADAR: The Bipartisan Policy Center hosts former Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz today at 9 a.m. for a discussion on the "role U.S. nuclear energy plays in achieving national security objectives." Watch here.

SENDING HELP: The offices of seven attorneys general fighting Trump administration environmental regulatory rollbacks — Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, Washington and Washington, D.C. — will receive legal fellows from State Energy & Environmental Impact Center at NYU School of Law, the organization announced Tuesday.

Pruitt wins Fischer's support for Wehrum after RFS meeting Back

By Eric Wolff and Anthony Adragna | 10/17/2017 06:18 PM EDT

Sen. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) said she would back the nomination of Bill Wehrum to be EPA air chief after meeting with Administrator Scott Pruitt to discuss his recent moves that had angered biofuels supporters in Congress.

Pruitt offered no concrete policy promises to the seven Midwestern senators who gathered in Sen. Chuck Grassley's office, according to the lawmakers, but he appeared to ease their fears that he would follow through on his proposal to reduce EPA's mandates on biodiesel volumes or take other actions to undermine the Renewable Fuel Standard.

Fischer, who had said earlier Tuesday she was unsure whether she would support Wehrum's nomination, offered her backing after her meeting with Pruitt. "I am," she said, when asked if she planned to vote for Wehrum.

In addition to Fischer and Grassley, the meeting was attended by Sens. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa), John Thune (R-S.D.), Mike Rounds (R-S.D.), Pat Roberts (R-Kansas) and Ben Sasse (R-Neb.).

"The administrator has made the commitment that we'll continue those discussions," Fischer said. "He fully understands the importance to the United States when it comes to biodiesel and biofuel."

But Ernst, who like Fischer had said earlier on Tuesday the meeting would determine whether she would support Wehrum to run EPA's air office, which oversees the RFS, appeared skeptical about Pruitt's support for biofuels, and she would not commit to supporting the nominee.

"Administrator Pruitt again claimed today that he will not do anything to undermine the program. However, we have heard this before. We now need to see it," she said in a statement.

Republicans have only a one-seat edge in the Senate Environment and Public Work Committee and with opposition from Democrats expected, the loss of one vote would sink Wehrum's nomination.

Thune, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, said he believed the lawmakers had delivered a clear message about supporting biofuels to Pruitt, who has long been close to the oil industry.

"We have a big enough group that is passionate about these issues that I think we can get their attention when we need to," Thune told POLITICO.

But Sasse said Pruitt was still in the deliberative process of the rulemaking.

"He can't give us any assurances at this stage," he said.

Grassley told reporters he reminded Pruitt of President Donald Trump's promise to him in August that he supported corn ethanol.

"You can get in the weeds about what you want to do or not do in the way of policy, but this is about a promise the president made," Grassley said.

The senators also said they had discussed the possibility of allowing year-round sales of 15 percent ethanol, whether through EPA regulation or through a bill Fischer has proposed.

"The administrator can possibly look at it through action within the EPA," Fischer said. "I think legislation is the best way to go."

Pruitt brought his top aides to the meeting, including policy office head Samantha Dravis, chief of staff Ryan Jackson, special adviser for air Mandy Gunasekara and the head of intergovernment relations office, Troy Lyons.

EPW postpones votes on EPA, NRC, FHWA picks Back

By Anthony Adragna | 10/17/2017 07:25 PM EDT

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has postponed votes that had been scheduled for Wednesday on the nominations of various EPA, NRC and federal highway picks.

No reason was provided and the committee didn't respond to requests for comment.

The uncertain fate of Bill Wehrum's selection to run EPA's air office may be partially to blame for the delay. Sen. Joni Ernst pointedly declined to state she'd vote in support of his nomination even after Administrator Scott Pruitt's efforts this afternoon to reassure corn-state senators about how he'd implement the Renewable Fuel Standard. With just an 11-10 majority on the panel, Republicans could afford no defections.

Other nominations now delayed: Michael Dourson's to be EPA chemicals chief; David Ross' to head the EPA water office; Matthew Leopold's to be EPA general counsel; Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC and Paul Trombino's selection to be administrator of the FHWA.

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee said the hearing is postponed "until further notice."

FERC chief calls for review of agency enforcement work Back

By Darius Dixon | 10/17/2017 03:29 PM EDT

FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee told energy lawyers today the time is ripe for FERC to revisit its policies on enforcement following a string of court rulings that rejected the agency's penalties.

FERC's work to police the energy markets is a critical part of the agency's mission, Chatterjee told the Energy Bar Association, but it had "not come without some controversy."

When companies refuse to pay a fine sought by the agency, FERC takes them to court and to ask judges to approve or deny lengthy orders — without considering much additional evidence. The courts have not decided the merits of those cases, but the string of procedural losses has suggested that FERC leadership reconsider how they craft their penalty decisions before heading to court.

"The courts have rejected FERC's interpretation of de novo review five times under the Federal Power Act," Chatterjee said. "The courts have spoken, and I, for one, am listening."

He added that "the proper scope of de novo review is a matter my colleagues and I need to examine so we can chart a new course that is fair and legally defensible."

Chatterjee also repeated his hope that FERC would revisit its position on the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act.

PURPA, he said, "often feels like it's out of sync" with today's energy landscape, which is "fundamentally different" from when it was conceived.

California, New Mexico sue over repealed Interior royalty rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/17/2017 04:56 PM EDT

California and New Mexico today sued the Interior Department for repealing the 2017 valuation rule for coal, oil and natural gas extracted from federal lands.

Interior had originally paused the rule, and the two states, along with environmental groups, convinced a federal judge in August to declare that hold illegal. However, Interior had repealed it in the meantime, at a cost of up to \$75 million in lost royalty payments.

In their new suit over that repeal, again filed in the U.S. District Court for Northern California, the two states argue that Interior's explanations for repealing the rule "are nothing more than trumped-up technicalities that do not justify throwing out the Rule in its entirety." They also say Interior didn't explain how it came to a new conclusion with the same data it used to write the rule.

California and New Mexico ask for the repeal to be vacated and the rule reinstated.

WHAT'S NEXT: Litigating the repeal likely will take well into 2018.

BIOFUEL FIGHT HEATS UP TODAY: Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley, joined by home-state colleague Joni Ernst, Nebraska's Deb Fischer and possibly others, will meet with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt today amid growing concern that President Donald Trump is reneging on a campaign promise and undermining the biofuels industry, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. EPA's recent proposal to cut biomass-based biodiesel quotas for 2018 and 2019, as well as recent reports the agency was considering allowing the use of credits from ethanol shipped overseas, has drawn multiple Senate letters in recent weeks, including a bipartisan letter from 38 senators and another with 29 signatures.

The recent moves have proven a huge financial boon for the oil refiners and rattled the market for biofuel credits known as RINs. Pruitt, who had immensely close ties to the oil industry as Oklahoma attorney general, is looking for ways to help them out, according to an administration official and oil industry sources who have spoken with EPA. "The administrator wants to drive down RIN prices," said one oil refining source who recently spoke to multiple EPA career and political officials. "The reason he wants to do that, he's going to screw them on point of obligation. He's willing to [push] any crazy idea that accomplishes that goal in the short term. It doesn't matter what the litigation risk is."

Remember Trump made his support for the Renewable Fuel Standard a rare policy-heavy portion of his campaign in Iowa, and Grassley, in particular, took Pruitt's proposed changes personally. He recently called them a "bait and switch" from what the administrator had told him before his nomination. Separately, four Republican governors — Kim Reynolds (Iowa), Sam Brownback (Kan.), Eric Greitens (Mo.) and Dennis Daugaard (S.D.) — sent a letter to Trump Monday voicing concern over EPA's recent RFS moves. "Cutting the biomass-based diesel volume set a year ago is not only unnecessary, it's highly disruptive, unprecedented and potentially catastrophic," they wrote.

Another refining industry source sums up the administration's dilemma to Eric: "The administration faces a conundrum on this issue. On the one hand guys are really leaning on them and talking about how they made a promise to rural America. On the other hand, the president made a promise to protect manufacturing jobs.... Politically what they're facing is a lot of heat."

WELCOME TO TUESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NEI's Robert Powers was first out of the gate to identify Mark Neumann as the previous holder of Speaker Paul Ryan's House seat. BRINGING INDUSTRY TO THE TABLE: In his Monday move to end what he terms

EPA's sue and settle practice, Pruitt vowed to seek the consent of the companies the agency regulates before agreeing to any deadlines for environmental action, Pro's Alex Guillén reports . "EPA shall seek to receive the concurrence of any affected states and/or regulated entities before entering into a consent decree or settlement agreement," he said. EPA noted the directive does not outright require industry consent on any agreement, while adding it applied to lawsuits from both environmental and industry groups.

But critics argue his action targets a non-existent problem that will empower the entities Pruitt is supposed to be regulating. "His targeting of legal settlements, especially where EPA has no defense to breaking the law, will just allow violations to persist, along with harms to Americans," NRDC's John Walke said. During the Obama administration, EPA frequently entered into settlements with environmental groups after missing statutory deadlines. But the subsequent regulations still went through the lengthy rulemaking process, and a 2014 GAO study concluded the "effect of settlements in deadline suits on EPA's rulemaking priorities is limited."

BLM CLEARS WAY FOR CONTROVERSIAL CALIFORNIA WATER PROJECT: Regulators cleared the biggest remaining federal obstacle for Cadiz Inc. water pipeline in California's Mojave Desert when ruled the project can move forward without additional BLM approval, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports, citing a letter released Monday. Acting Director Mike Nedd axed an Obama-era 2015 finding that the project could not use an existing railroad right of way and would need to apply for its own. Cadiz in a statement said it will begin working on final engineering designs, contracts and obtaining a conveyance agreement with the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California.

Opponents slammed the move: Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a longtime opponent of the project, said Cadiz's pipeline would draw more water than the aquifer can recharge naturally and expose residents to potentially harmful levels of chemicals. "The Trump administration might be willing to let Cadiz profit by harming our public lands but California shouldn't give up," she said in a statement. "Our state can still require a stronger review of Cadiz's plans. The fight to protect our desert isn't over."

The Bernhardt question: A spokeswoman said Interior Deputy Secretary David Bernhardt "has absolutely no role in anything related to Cadiz." The agency's number two did legal work for Cadiz before joining the agency, and his former firm stands to benefit if it's completed.

CARPER BASHES EPA NOMINEE RESPONSES: Sen. Tom Carper, top Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee, released responses to questions from four nominees to senior EPA roles that he told ME were "shocking" in their lack of substance. He was in particular critical of the responses of the agency's chemicals pick, Michael Dourson, who didn't provide specific answers on a host of questions related to the agency's implementation of the Toxic Substances Control Act and air chief, Bill Wehrum, who provided vague answers on topics like the Paris Climate Accord and how he would approach various air regulations. But ME didn't get a sense from Carper or aides that committee Democrats were likely to boycott a Wednesday vote on the nominations of Dourson and Wehrum, as well the picks of David Ross to head the water office, Matthew Leopold to be general counsel and Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC.

Read the responses to Carper's questions for the record here.

EPA OFFICIAL LANDS IN PUERTO RICO : Newly sworn in EPA Region 2

Administrator Peter Lopez landed in Puerto Rico Monday to meet with local officials "to make sure my team at the EPA continues to help lift these communities up." Army Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Buchanan, leading the administration's response to the disaster, said in a statement it would be "months" before the electric grid could be rebuilt: "FEMA asked the Army Corps of Engineers to take the lead in that, not necessarily with military power guys, but with contracts with local workers," he said. A short-term priority is getting water treatment plants back up and running through generators followed by the longer-term goal of getting other critical infrastructure back on the electric grid.

Sign of the times: NBC News correspondent Gabe Gutierrez tweeted a picture of a drinking water well on a Superfund site with protective fencing ripped off. "People are desperate," Lopez told Gutierrez, adding people are breaking into sealed-off wells.

Trump critical of island again: Once again casting the island's struggles as partially self-inflicted, Trump said the military "shouldn't have to be" distributing food and water on the island, POLITICO's Cristiano Lima reports. Meanwhile, the Senate is likely to take up a House-passed relief package H.R. 2266 \(115\) once it passes its budget.

ALASKAN PICKED FOR INTERIOR ROLE: Trump late Monday announced his intent to nominate Tara Sweeney, executive vice president of external affairs for Arctic Slope Regional Corporation, as assistant Interior secretary of for Indian Affairs. She chaired the Arctic Economic Council from 2015 to 2017. "Secretary Zinke could not have chosen a better leader to help him fulfill the federal government's trust responsibility," Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski said in a statement.

** Presented by the National Biodiesel Board: More than 64,000 jobs are supported by clean-burning biodiesel. But the EPA is threatening to reduce biodiesel use and weaken the Renewable Fuel Standard (RFS). We must protect those biodiesel jobs with a strong RFS program. Watch the president promise to protect the RFS here: <http://bit.ly/2xn5Sgm> **

HOLD YOUR HORSES: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell used a lunch with the president Monday to stress that Steve Bannon was going after some staunch supporters of Trump's agenda, such as John Barrasso and Deb Fischer, with his pledge to recruit primary challengers for sitting Republican senators, POLITICO's Matthew Nussbaum and Cristiano Lima report. That point apparently resonated with Trump, who later told reporters: "Some of the people he may be looking at, I'm going to see if we talk him out of that."

UNITED WE STAND? Even as Trump and McConnell projected a united front Monday, White House officials behind-the-scenes are increasingly wondering what's going on in the Senate and afraid the chamber won't be able to pass Republican tax overhaul, POLITICO's Burgess Everett and Josh Dawsey report. "You ask me if the Republican-controlled Senate is an impediment to the administration's agenda: All I can tell you is so far, the answer's yes," OMB Director Mick Mulvaney, a former member of the House Freedom Caucus, said.

RALLYING AGAINST ANWR LANGUAGE: Six Senate Democrats — Ed Markey, Michael Bennet, Tom Udall, Maria Cantwell, Al Franken and Jeff Merkley — are joining environmental groups at 11:15 a.m. in the Senate swamp to urge the removal of language opening ANWR to drilling from the fiscal 2018 budget resolution.

DOE WATCHDOG: CLOSE, BUT NOT QUITE: The Department of Energy needs to improve control over who can access systems, the security of its web applications and mitigation of vulnerabilities, according to a recently released inspector general report. The IG had pointed out those flaws and others in a prior report. "The weaknesses identified occurred, in part, because department officials had not fully developed and/or implemented policies and procedures related to the issues identified in our report," the IG concluded. "Without improvements to its cybersecurity program in areas such as enhanced controls over vulnerability management and access controls, the department's systems and information may be at a higher-than-necessary risk of compromise, loss, and/or modification." Overall, however, DOE had addressed 13 of the 16 weaknesses the IG previously identified.

TAKE A GLANCE! NUTRIENT CREDIT PROGRAM USE LIMITED: Despite 11 states having 19 nutrient credit trading programs meant to help hit discharge limits, use has been limited, according to a report released by GAO Monday. Programs in Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Virginia saw the bulk of credit trading.

GTM: HIGHER TARIFFS MEAN LESS SOLAR: A 40 cents per watt tariff would cut solar demand in half, GTM Research says in a study out today. The research group found that lower tariffs had less of an impact: For example, adding 10 cents per watt would drive down sales 9 percent. The study also found that utility scale solar would be hardest hit, as utilities are more sensitive to cost than the residential market.

REPORT: LET'S COMMISSION A COASTAL COMMISSION: The Regional Plan Association released a report Monday calling for New York, New Jersey and Connecticut to form a new coastal commission as the region prepares for the impacts of climate change over the next decades.

HOT DOC: The Environmental Defense Fund released a new document called "Pruitt's Playbook" chronicling what it says is Pruitt's assault on EPA's mission.

WINTER IS COMING: The American Gas Association today predicts cooler temperatures this winter will mean a five percent increase, on average, on heating bills as consumers are likely to use three percent more natural gas.

MAIL CALL! MORE CRITICISM OF MONUMENT REVIEW: More than 350 National Park Service employees sent Zinke a letter today saying they are "extremely disappointed" in his review of national monuments designated under the Antiquities Act.

— Separately, more than 350 companies largely from the outdoor recreation retail industry in a Monday letter to Trump urged the president to "embrace the conservation ethic of your predecessors and keep current protections in place for our public lands and waters." The letter also asks Trump not to roll back protections on monuments. The Commerce Department has until Oct. 25 to send the White House a report on marine monuments and Trump is mulling Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's recommendations to shrink and/or allow mining, commercial fishing and logging in 10 existing monuments.

MOVER, SHAKER: Bryan Rice, an Interior veteran and member of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma, started as director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs on Monday. He most recently led the agency's Office of Wildland Fire as the latest stop on a federal career spanning more than 20 years.

EPA's Pruitt boosts industry role in negotiations with green groups Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/16/2017 03:57 PM EDT

Industry groups will soon get a seat at the table when EPA decides how to respond to some lawsuits from environmental groups.

EPA will ask for the consent of the industries and companies it regulates before agreeing to any deadlines for environmental action sought by "special interest groups," according to a new

EPA will notify states or industries of any petitions or lawsuits that may affect them and will take "any and all appropriate steps to achieve the participation" of industry during negotiations, Pruitt wrote in his directive that is intended to end the agency's so-called sue and settle practice.

"Accordingly, EPA shall seek to receive the concurrence of any affected states and/or regulated entities before entering into a consent decree or settlement agreement," Pruitt continued.

In response to questions from POLITICO, EPA noted the directive does not outright require industry consent on any agreement. And the agency said Pruitt's directive applies to both environmental and industry groups' suits.

But EPA's new directive to seek industry approval first could lead to "back-room deals" between the agency and those it regulates, according to Amit Narang, a regulatory expert at watchdog group Public Citizen.

"There's simply nothing for industry groups to come in and discuss with the EPA related to these lawsuits except how they want the EPA to potentially craft a new regulation that was already unlawfully delayed in a way that's industry-friendly," he said.

"Pruitt's doing nothing more than posturing about a non-existent problem and political fiction," said John Walke of the Natural Resources Defense Council. "His targeting of legal settlements, especially where EPA has no defense to breaking the law, will just allow violations to persist, along with harms to Americans."

Republicans have complained for years that environmental groups would sue EPA and quickly reach a deal for the agency to take certain actions, bypassing industry input, a practice they termed "sue and settle." They note that it was those type of lawsuits that led EPA to write the Clean Power Plan, for example.

"Sue and settle ... interferes with the rights of the American people to provide their views on proposed regulatory decisions and have the agency thoughtfully consider those views before making a final decision," Pruitt wrote in a memo accompanying his directive.

Democrats and environmentalists argue that the deals Republicans have complained about largely targeted missed statutory deadlines, and that any subsequent regulations were still open to the full rulemaking process. And the Clean Power Plan may have been spurred in part by a settlement agreement, but the final rule was developed with all required public input and was subject to legal challenge.

A 2014 study by the Government Accountability Office concluded that the "effect of settlements in deadline suits on EPA's rulemaking priorities is limited." That study also said that long-standing Justice Department policy prevents EPA from striking a deal in a deadline suit that specifies the substance of any subsequent rule.

Pruitt's directive quickly landed plaudits from conservative groups.

"The EPA is making it clear that the public and the integrity of the rulemaking process are no longer going to be sacrificed for the political objectives of narrow interests," Daren Bakst of

The Heritage Foundation said in a statement.

William Yeatman of the Competitive Enterprise Institute called it a "welcome" first step, but added that EPA had routinely missed deadlines for years under the Clean Air Act and other laws, and should seek more resources from Congress to meet those deadlines and avoid environmental groups suing.

The 2014 GAO study also noted that EPA's proposed consent decrees, published in the Federal Register, traditionally took public comment for 30 days before moving forward.

Pruitt acknowledged that in his memo, and while he admitted those comments sometimes led to changes in the final agreements, "numerous stakeholders lack faith in the effectiveness of this comment opportunity" because EPA and environmental groups "have already agreed in principle to the proposed settlement."

It remains unclear how EPA plans to defend itself in court over clearly missed deadlines set by Congress. The agency said only that it "will handle any lawsuits consistent with today's directive."

But the agency's critics say there's simply no viable defense.

"These are the simplest lawsuits for environmental groups to win and for the EPA to lose. There's no point in EPA fighting these lawsuits. The evidence is as simple as looking at the calendar and saying a congressional deadline has been missed," said Narang. "If EPA was to fight these cases in court, that would be one of the most wasteful uses of taxpayer money."

In recent weeks, Pruitt has racked up several such deadline suits.

For example, Democratic attorneys general and environmental groups are preparing to sue Pruitt for missing a key implementation deadline for the 2015 ozone standard. EPA is also facing down a lawsuit from the state of Maryland for failing to respond to its petition seeking pollution controls on upwind power plants.

Similar consent decrees have been reached in the past with industry groups as well. The agreement setting deadlines for EPA to issue its 2014-16 Renewable Fuel Standard volumes, for example, was reached with oil and refining industry groups.

BLM clears the way for Cadiz California water pipeline Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/16/2017 06:06 PM EDT

The Bureau of Land Management has ruled the proposed Cadiz Inc. water pipeline in California's Mojave Desert can move forward without agency approval, effectively clearing the biggest remaining federal hurdle for the project.

In a Friday letter, which Cadiz released today, BLM acting Director Mike Nedd reversed a 2015 finding by the Obama administration that the project could not use an existing railroad right of way and would need to apply for its own.

The proposed pipeline would pump groundwater from a desert aquifer across 43 miles of land, much of it federally owned, and the project's opponents have argued it would draw more water than the aquifer can recharge naturally.

The Interior Department in September also reversed a legal interpretation made under the Obama administration and found railroads have broad discretion to lease their rights of way. The Center for Biological Diversity has filed a public records request with Interior to figure out why the agency revoked that legal interpretation.

David Bernhardt, Interior's second-in-command, did legal work for Cadiz before joining the agency. An Interior spokeswoman in an emailed statement said "the Deputy Secretary has absolutely no role in anything related to Cadiz."

WHAT'S NEXT: Cadiz in a statement said it will begin working on final engineering designs, contracts and obtaining a conveyance agreement with the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California. A Cadiz spokeswoman in an email said the storage component of the project will still require federal permits.

Trump: Military 'shouldn't have to be' distributing food in Puerto Rico Back

By Cristiano Lima | 10/16/2017 03:39 PM EDT

President Donald Trump said military personnel assisting in Hurricane Maria recovery efforts "shouldn't have to be" distributing food in Puerto Rico, again casting the U.S. territory's challenges as partially self-inflicted during a Monday press conference.

The president said that while federal agencies have provided "massive" amounts of food and water to Puerto Rico — where access to resources and power remains severely hampered by last month's storm — they should not also be expected to distribute them. Trump has previously said Puerto Ricans relied too much on federal government resources instead of a "community effort" to rebuild.

"We have massive amounts of water. We have massive amounts of food," Trump said at the White House, where he spoke alongside Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. "But they have to distribute the food."

Trump added: "We now actually have military distributing food — something that, really, they shouldn't have to be doing."

The president has singled out issues with infrastructure and other challenges in Puerto Rico that he said pre-dated the storm as hurdles in the path to recovery. He has also warned that he won't leave federal employees in Puerto Rico indefinitely.

"We cannot keep FEMA, the Military & the First Responders, who have been amazing (under the most difficult circumstances) in P.R. forever!" he tweeted.

The House of Representatives on Thursday overwhelmingly approved a $36.5 billion relief package for Puerto Rico and other impacted regions. It is headed to the Senate, where it is expected to be approved.

Trump expresses wariness of Bannon's war on GOP establishment Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Cristiano Lima | 10/16/2017 12:44 PM EDT

President Donald Trump, who in 2016 ran as the nontraditional, nationalist insurgent riding roughshod over the establishment, on Monday expressed skepticism about Steve Bannon's attempt to produce a wave of such candidates in coming Republican primaries.

"Some of the people he may be looking at, I'm going to see if we talk him out of that," Trump said during a Rose Garden news conference when asked about Bannon's pledge to recruit primary challengers to all but one sitting Republican senator in 2018.

While it's unclear whether Trump will follow through, his comments could mark a line in the sand, with Trump appearing to describe a willingness to stand by Republican incumbents against Bannon-backed challengers.

Trump's stance was muddled, however, because roughly two hours earlier he appeared to voice support for Bannon's avowed war on establishment figures, including Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. Trump told reporters that Bannon "is a friend of mine" and is "very committed to getting things passed" when asked about the Breitbart News chief's attacks on McConnell and other GOP leaders who have failed to pass his legislative agenda.

But after a private meeting with McConnell, Trump expressed the skepticism about Bannon's efforts, especially his support for GOP Senate candidates who will challenge McConnell's leadership role.

"Just so you understand, the Republican Party is very, very unified," Trump declared during the Rose Garden news conference, with McConnell by his side.

Trump's pronouncement came after he and McConnell discussed primaries over lunch, according to a person briefed on the exchange. McConnell told Trump that Bannon was targeting senators who were supporters of Trump's agenda, like Sens. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) and John Barrasso (R-Wyo.). That point resonated with Trump, according to the person briefed, and McConnell went on to explain how past insurgent primary winners had wound up losing in the general election.

Trump's apparent commitment to stand by incumbent Republican senators against his former campaign CEO and White House strategist shows that even a tradition-bucking president may hew to the party line in the interest of moving his agenda forward and maintaining a governing majority.

McConnell, of whom Bannon has been publicly critical since he was ousted from his West Wing role in August, said that despite any differences between himself and Bannon, his goal was simple: "to win elections in November."

The Senate Republican leader said that regardless of who won during the party primaries, what mattered was that they carried their victory into the general election.

"You have to nominate people who can actually win because winners make policy and losers go home," he said. In a swipe at Bannon, he cited controversial Republican candidates from recent elections who, after beating more moderate opponents in primaries, lost to Democrats in what were widely seen as winnable races.

Bannon on Saturday ratcheted up his war against the GOP establishment — and McConnell specifically — as he vowed to challenge any Senate Republican who doesn't publicly condemn attacks on Trump.

"Yeah, Mitch, the donors are not happy. They've all left you. We've cut your oxygen off," Bannon said during a speech to religious conservatives at the Values Voter Summit in Washington.

"There's a time and season for everything and right now it's a season of war against a GOP establishment," Bannon added. "It's no longer acceptable to come and pat you on the head and tell you everything is going to be fine just to get those people in office."

Since leaving the West Wing, Bannon has raised his public profile, holding campaign events and delivering speeches to further his campaign against establishment figures. He's also relying on the powerful forces of the Breitbart News platform and the support of the ultrawealthy Mercer family to further his agenda.

Trump's own frustration with GOP establishment leaders was clear on Monday. He told reporters earlier in the day that he "can understand where Steve Bannon is coming from" given Republican lawmakers' failure so far to pass Obamacare repeal, tax reform and other big ticket items.

While Trump stressed that he had "great relationships with many senators," he gave a grim assessment of the work by GOP lawmakers on Capitol Hill. "They are not getting the job done," Trump told reporters while meeting with his Cabinet. "And I'm not going to blame myself. They are not getting the job done."

The president added that "there are Republicans frankly that should be ashamed of themselves" for their inability to follow through on repealing the Affordable Care Act and passing major tax reform legislation.

But at the Rose Garden news conference, Trump and McConnell, standing side by side, sought to strike a united front.

"We've been friends for a long time. We are probably now — despite what we read — we're probably now, I think, at least as far as I'm concerned, closer than ever before," Trump said, glossing over their public feuding in recent months. "And the relationship is very good. We're fighting for the same thing."

"I wanna underscore what the president said: We have the same agenda," McConnell said.

Trump has also already shown a comfort in breaking with Bannon, joining McConnell to support Alabama Sen. Luther Strange against a primary challenge from the far-right former judge, Roy Moore.

Moore won by about 9 points, and Bannon introduced him for his victory speech.

Trump White House fed up with the Senate Back

By Burgess Everett and Josh Dawsey | 10/16/2017 07:01 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and Mitch McConnell stood side by side at the White House Monday afternoon to declare they're "together totally" and "very united" heading into this fall's tax reform battle.

But behind the scenes, Trump, his administration and even some senators are increasingly worried that taxes will go the way of Obamacare repeal in the Senate: Months of bickering ending in extreme embarrassment.

The debate hasn't even started on the GOP's plan, yet some senators are pushing their own tax proposals, while others are increasingly emboldened to defy the Republican president. It's a dangerous mix considering that McConnell can lose only two votes assuming Democrats band together in opposition.

"We look at the Senate and go: 'What the hell is going on?'" White House budget director Mick Mulvaney said in an interview Friday.

"The House passed health care, the House has already passed its budget, which is the first step of tax reform. The Senate hasn't done any of that. Hell, the Senate can't pass any of our confirmations," Mulvaney fumed in an interview, slapping a table for emphasis. "You ask me if the Republican-controlled Senate is an impediment to the administration's agenda: All I can tell you is so far, the answer's yes."

The revulsion for the Senate's age-old traditions and byzantine procedure boiled over in public repeatedly on Monday. Trump complained in front of TV cameras that the Senate is "not getting the job done" and said he sees where Steve Bannon — his former chief strategist now planning to run primary challengers against incumbent Republican senators — "is coming from."

And House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), when asked Monday to name the biggest impediment to tax reform, replied: "You ever heard of the United States Senate before?"

Shortly after, Trump and McConnell held an unusual 40-minute unity news conference intended to sooth a jittery party that's watched Trump attack "Mitch M" for failing on health care reform and McConnell assert that Trump had "excessive expectations" for Congress. Trump suggested he would try to get Bannon to back off on some of McConnell's incumbents, and McConnell sought to keep the tax reform critics at bay after Trump said he wants it done this year.

"We're gonna get this job done and the goal is to get it done by the end of the year," McConnell said after lunching with the president. The meeting had been long-planned, but the impromptu news conference was Trump's idea, two sources familiar with the event said.

McConnell is expected to hold a vote this week on the budget — a precondition for tax reform — and GOP aides expect it to pass. That will relieve some of the pressure on the chamber, which has been receiving flak nonstop from donors, House members and the president since the health care implosion this summer.

Administration officials are hoping that frustration produces enough pressure to force the Senate to pass tax reform. But already, there are signs of trouble.

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) is so skeptical that the Senate can enact the GOP's tax framework that he's begun pitching his own tax plans to colleagues. It would shift the burden of corporate taxes onto shareholders and allow individuals to opt out of the existing tax code and into a system without the confusing array of tax preferences and deductions that people can now choose.

It's radically different from what congressional leaders and the president proposed. But Johnson said in an interview that leadership's plan "is going to be very difficult to pass. We've already seen with the outline now, with the principles given, that's going to be a challenge."

"I don't want to be a problem child here, but what I'm offering is a plan B," Johnson added. "If they can't get the votes ... I've got an alternative."

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) brushed off any negativity about the Senate's work, insisting that he never thought the party's agenda is "off track." But he said the sniping from Mulvaney and Ryan — and skepticism from some Republican senators about the prospects for tax reform — is not helpful.

"I don't think that sort of thing is very constructive myself," Cornyn said Monday.

The House is sure to labor to pass tax reform, too. Members from high-tax states are already rebelling against plans to gut the deduction for state and local taxes. But two White House officials said the most serious concerns are in the Senate.

"I was really not happy that this Congress couldn't control its own members and get to a winning vote on health care," said Sen. David Perdue (R-Ga.). "This tax code is something we've got to do. We've got to do that this year. It's a test of the Republican majority."

But like with health care, the tax reform process is moving more slowly than many Republicans would like. There's no bill yet, for starters. And White House officials have deliberately left some policy details vague because they're unsure what it will take for various senators to get on board and want to leave their options open, one of these people said.

The White House officials expect a multitude of demands from Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) regarding the deficit, and from Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) on middle-class tax cuts. Nevada Sen. Dean Heller, perhaps the most endangered Republican senator on the ballot next year, is expected to have his own asks.

Other moderate Republican senators are expected to hold major sway as well, including Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Susan Collins of Maine. Another wild card is Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has voted against past tax cuts and cast the decisive vote against Obamacare repeal.

"We're expecting to have to make some deals here," one official said.

Rattled that many senators are still on the fence, the Koch network encouraged its donors at a recent retreat to call Republican senators and push them to vote for tax reform. Vice President Mike Pence told donors at the Koch summit that they thought they could convince Paul and that Trump planned to travel more to win over wavering senators.

And after working for months on an Obamacare repeal-and-replace bill that went nowhere, senators say they feel more urgency than they ever have on taxes.

"If you just stand there you get run over," said Sen. John Kennedy (R-La.). "I don't want to see what happened to us on health care happen to us on tax reform. Which is basically, we analyze it until we are paralyzed."

If that happens again, Republicans are warning of dire consequences: Losing the House and possibly the Senate, and inviting a new wave of ire at incumbents. In an urgent plea over the weekend, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) even suggested on CBS' "Face the Nation" that if the party can't pass tax reform and repeal Obamacare within the next few months, "it will be the end of Mitch McConnell as we know it."

People close to Trump said the White House isn't there yet.

"We don't get into leadership races down here," Mulvaney said. But maybe, he suggested, the pressure on McConnell and "the Senate's failure to pass health care might actually help us to get tax reform passed. Because I think they know they need to get something done."

CLIMATE TALK PROMINENT IN U.N. MEETINGS: Look for talk of climate change and the Paris climate agreement to continue to pop up throughout the United Nations General Assembly today, but any fog around the White House's position appears to be clearing. President Donald Trump reiterated his view that the landmark international accord was unfair to the U.S. during a Monday meeting with French President Emmanuel Macron, according to a White House official. "The President talked through that he believes it's just simply unfair — that he thought other countries, particularly China, received a better deal than the United States negotiated," State Department policy planning director Brian Hook said. "He does not believe that the Paris Agreement is a framework to achieve those goals around clean energy, protecting the environment, and promoting economic growth."

Chicago to host climate conference: Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel announced Monday his city would host a two-day conference to discuss how cities around the world are addressing climate change and implementing the Paris agreement. And former U.N. climate chief Christiana Figueres said in a statement the Dec. 4-5 event would "provide an opportunity for mayors to continue acting on the political will demonstrated in Paris, showing that local action is being taken to fulfill commitments." Participants will include Paris' Anne Hidalgo, Montreal's Denis Coderre, Austin's Steve Adler and Atlanta's Kasim Reed, among others.

MOVE ALONG, MOVE ALONG: It should be a quick and easy process for five FERC, DOE and Interior nominees to get through the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee this morning. On the agenda are votes on the selections of Kevin McIntyre for chairman of FERC, Richard Glick for FERC commissioner, David Jonas for DOE general counsel, and Ryan Nelson and Joseph Balash for solicitor and assistant secretary for land and minerals management at DOI, respectively. The vote is set for 9:30 a.m. in Dirksen 366. Watch here.

FIGHT AGAINST DOURSON HEATS UP: Outside groups are ramping up what's expected to be an intense push against the nomination of Michael Dourson to head up EPA's chemicals office (and the lead role in implementing the revamped Toxic Substances Control Act). Clean Air Moms Action is out with an ad hitting him for being a "toxicologist-for-hire for corporate clients" who minimized the dangers of second-hand smoke and dangerous chemicals. The Environmental Defense Fund and Environmental Working Group are holding their own press call today to draw attention to Dourson's past work.

MURKOWSKI ENERGY BILL BACK ON ICE? Congressional GOP lawmakers consider the bill S. 1460 \(115\) Sen. Lisa Murkowski introduced in June "too moderate" and don't expect it to move until next spring at the earliest, energy lobbyist and GOP sources tell ME. Republicans want to see language paring back DOE's role in approving LNG export projects in any energy bill package, sources said. One item lobbyists and Senate and House aides said would help jumpstart its chances would be adding language similar to the bills Republicans Ted Cruz and Bill Cassidy also introduced in June that would require DOE automatically approve LNG export applications to any country that isn't on a U.S. sanctions list.

But even with that included, the legislation could languish as the energy industry focuses its attention on the White House, said one GOP staffer familiar with the bill's negotiations. "I think something will happen this Congress, but there's no appetite to get anything done anytime soon. Spring sounds about right," the aide said.

MORE CLIMATE LUMINARY CHATTER TODAY (AND LEO ALERT!): John Kerry's climate change summit is back for another packed day of action at Yale. First up at 10:30 a.m.: A session on what non-federal entities are doing to tackle the problem, featuring Govs. Jerry Brown and Jay Inslee, World Bank President Jim Yong Kim and Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo. After that comes a panel at 2:30 p.m. on "potential new avenues for bipartisanship" with former Secretary of State James Baker and recorded video remarks from Sens. Lindsey Graham and John McCain.

Bringing it home: Kerry closes his summit at 5:00 p.m. along with remarks from actor/activist Leonardo DiCaprio. Watch all the events online here.

EXPECT MORE OF THESE! The Sierra Club filed a lawsuit Monday in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia seeking to compel EPA to release a host of records about the activities of Administrator Scott Pruitt, including his schedule, list of meetings and records of communications with outside parties, your ME hosts report. The legal actions comes after the group filed Freedom of Information Act requests in June and the agency has not yet produced responsive records nor provided any indication of when it might be able to.

BISHOP SEEKS INVESTIGATION ON MONUMENT REPORT LEAK: As Democrats and outside groups condemned the leak of Zinke's recommendations on national monument

(and threatened immediate legal action), House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop said its release warranted investigation. "The fact this was leaked is troubling and merits an immediate and thorough investigation," Bishop said. "The President should have the time to evaluate the Secretary's review and develop actions without the encumbrance of incomplete information being leaked to the press."

CLINTON TO FEDERAL WORKERS: DON'T QUIT: Hillary Clinton urged federal employees to remain in their posts if possible, arguing their experience is needed more now than ever, POLITICO's Gabriel Debenedetti reports. "I don't want us to lose the decades — really, if you added it all up, the thousands of years — of experience in the EPA, in the State Department, in the Labor Department, in a lot of the places being targeted by the administration," Clinton said at an event at the Warner Theatre in Washington. "At some point they're going to need you, and the country is going to need you. And I hope you're still there."

VIRGIN ISLANDS NOT READY FOR HURRICANE: Utility restoration efforts are now on pause with Hurricane Maria bearing down, but the U.S. Virgin Islands lack adequate basic supplies like drinking water and electric generators, POLITICO's Sarah Ferris reports, citing internal FEMA briefing documents.

EXAMINING VEGETATION MANAGEMENT: The Senate Energy committee will hear testimony regarding "the vegetation management requirements for electricity assets located on federal lands." Witnesses include representatives from the Forest Service, BLM, the Wilderness Society, Arizona Public Service and a Montana electric cooperative. "I fully recognize that the fires burning in Montana today were all lightning sparked. But, for me, these fires serve as a vivid reminder and warning of what could occur as a result of long delays in permit approvals and inconsistent application of policies by federal land managers," Mark Hayden, Missoula Electric Cooperative general manager, will say.

STEYER HITS TRUMP OVER CLIMATE: Billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer is criticizing Trump over his failure to act on climate in a full-page ad appearing today in The New York Post, one of the president's preferred papers. "The most dangerous part of a hurricane isn't the wind or the surge," the ad says. "It's a President who fails to act on climate change."

MAIL QUESTION! INTERIOR ORDER QUESTIONED: House Natural Resources Ranking Member Raul Grijalva sent a letter Monday seeking additional information on an Interior order setting page and time limits on National Environmental Policy Act reviews. Grijalva argues the agency failed to provide adequate evidence that NEPA analyses are indeed overly complex or that they have caused infrastructure project delays.

LEAKED EPA MEMO MANDATES ANTI-LEAK TRAINING: All federal agency employees this week will undergo a one-hour training course for employees on preventing leaks, according to a EPA memorandum slipped under the door to ME. "As federal government employees and federal contractors, we have a responsibility to properly protect this information from unauthorized disclosure," Donna J. Vizian, acting assistant administrator for EPA's Office of Administration and Resources Management, wrote. The agency didn't respond to request for comment.

RUFFALO SENDING CLIMATE PLEA: Actor Mark Ruffalo is emailing the Progressive Change Campaign Committee's 1 million members today, urging them to donate to Hurricane Irma relief and fight back against Pruitt. "As we help hurricane victims, we need to stay true to our progressive values," he'll say. "This means acknowledging climate change and remembering that marginalized communities who are least equipped to escape are hardest hit in crises like this."

SCIENTIST PAC ROLLS OUT ENDORSEMENTS: 314 Action, which backs scientific professionals seeking public office, announced endorsements of four House hopefuls Monday: Mai-Khanh Tran against Rep. Ed Royce; Joseph Kopser against House Science Chairman Lamar Smith; RD Huffstetler against Rep. Tom Garrett; and Kathie Allen, who's seeking to replace former Rep. Jason Chaffetz. The group also endorsed Ralph Northam's run for Virginia governor.

REPORT: ASSESSING RISKS TO RATEPAYERS: Oil Change International is out today with a report in partnership with Public Citizen and the Sierra Club arguing FERC offers little meaningful analysis of market need for new gas pipelines. "FERC fails ratepayers when it takes at face value pipeline company estimates of future gas demand while the momentum behind clean energy's disruption of fossil fuel markets is accelerating," Lorne Stockman, senior research analyst at Oil Change International, said in a statement.

REPORT: 15 PLACES LIKELY FOR ENERGY DEVELOPMENT: The Wilderness Society is out with a report today examining 15 places on public lands seen as likely targets for drilling, mining and other energy development by the Trump administration. "Some places are simply too wild to drill," Jamie Williams, president of The Wilderness Society, said in a statement. "The federal government must resist pressure from energy companies and other special interests to open up our last remaining wild places for development."

ZINKE'S 'HAVING A BALL': Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke invoked his well-known love of Teddy Roosevelt and said he was "having a ball" running his agency in a Monday interview with the Washington Examiner. "No one loves public land more," Zinke said. "Roosevelt, who've I've admired since I was a Boy Scout, had it right. He carved the path of putting under federal protection millions of acres and and beginning our experience of our public lands, unique to the U.S." The secretary added that Trump "has got a lot of Roosevelt in him, in that he's a man of action."

MOVER, SHAKER: Todd Snitchler has joined the American Petroleum Institute as group director for the association's market development department. He previously chaired both the Public Utilities Commission and the Power Siting Board of Ohio.

SPOTTED: At the Capitol last night, STARZ screened "Age of Consequences," a new documentary examining how climate change is affecting U.S. national security and global stability. Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse delivered opening comments before the screening, which was followed by a panel discussion featuring David Titley, founding director of the U.S. Navy's Task Force on Climate Change and the film's executive producer Sophie Robinson. The documentary premiered on STARZ Monday.

Sierra Club sues EPA over unfulfilled public records requests Back

By Anthony Adragna | 09/18/2017 05:42 PM EDT

The Sierra Club filed a lawsuit today in federal district court seeking to compel EPA to release a host of records about the activities of Administrator Scott Pruitt, including his schedule, list of meetings and records of communications with outside parties.

"EPA has chosen to engage in a pattern of unlawfully rebuffing, or vaguely and indefinitely delaying response to, FOIA requests from a variety of public-interest requesters, including Sierra Club," the group wrote in its lawsuit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

The green group originally filed its Freedom of Information Request in June and the agency has not yet produced responsive records nor provided any indication of when it might be able to.

In addition to Pruitt's communications, Sierra Club filed similar requests for several senior EPA officials. They included external communications and calendars of Chief of Staff Ryan Jackson and Associate Administrator Samantha Dravis; records from Pruitt's scheduler and communications between Senior Policy Advisor Mandy Gunasekara and specific members of the National Mining Association.

An EPA spokesperson said the agency would not comment on pending litigation.

Clinton urges government workers not to quit their posts Back

By Gabriel Debenedetti | 09/18/2017 08:56 PM EDT

Hillary Clinton on Monday urged federal employees who disagree with the Trump administration to stay in their jobs if they can, condemning what she called the "disregard, even contempt, among many in this administration about what federal workers know and what they've done, and the advice they can give."

The 2016 Democratic presidential nominee, speaking at Warner Theatre in Washington in the first speaking event of the national tour for her new book, urged government workers to "stick it out, stick it out, because the tide has to turn."

Scores of federal workers held over from the Obama administration have left the government since President Donald Trump took over, but Clinton pointed to the ongoing North Korea crisis as an example of why their expertise is needed in Washington.

"I don't want us to lose the decades — really, if you added it all up, the thousands of years — of experience in the EPA, in the State Department, in the Labor Department, in a lot of the places being targeted by the administration," Clinton said. "At some point they're going to need you, and the country is going to need you. And I hope you're still there."

"If [Democrats] can take back one or both houses of Congress in 2018, you will have people you can talk to again," she added toward the end of the hourlong event, in which she largely stuck to the themes of her book, "What Happened," which rehashes the 2016 campaign and other portions of Clinton's life.

The event was formatted as a question-and-answer session hosted by former Clinton speechwriter Lissa Muscatine, owner of the Politics and Prose Bookstore, which sponsored the event.

PARIS POSITION AS CLEAR AS MUD: A weekend full of conflicting signals and mixed messages culminated with President Donald Trump's administration reiterating its intention to withdraw from the Paris climate agreement "unless we can re-enter on terms that are more favorable to our country." Confusion first emerged Saturday when Everett Eissenstat, the No. 2 official on the National Economic Council, made comments at a Montreal meeting that some diplomats interpreted as signaling the U.S. might remain in the international deal while revising Obama's climate pledge. But White House and international officials told POLITICO's Nancy Cook, Andrew Restuccia and Kalina Oroschakoff those comments were misconstrued. "This is being misreported. Unhelpfully so I think," a non-U.S. attendee of the meeting said of the comments.

Administration officials stressed that view Sunday. National Security Adviser H.R. McMaster called The Wall Street Journal's original report on Saturday that the U.S. was considering remaining in the Paris agreement a "false report" on "Fox News Sunday," POLITICO's Theodoric Meyer reports. But Secretary of State Rex Tillerson was less adamant on CBS' "Face the Nation," saying there was a possibility the Trump administration could stick with it if they can negotiate what they deem a better deal: "The president said he is open to finding those conditions where we can remain engaged with others on what we all agree is still a challenging issue," he said. "The plan is for [National Economic Council] Director [Gary] Cohn to consider other ways in which we can work with partners in the Paris climate accord. We want to be productive, we want to be helpful."

It's worth noting: Italy, France and Germany have said the underlying framework of the Paris agreement won't be renegotiated, but multiple experts have said the U.S. could weaken its voluntary emissions reduction pledge — nationally determined contribution in diplomatic parlance — whenever it wants. Or in the words of Democratic Connecticut Sen. Chris Murphy : "Dear White House, READ THE AGREEMENT. It already allows each country to set their own terms of compliance. So we good? Back in?"

Reminder: The U.S. cannot fully withdraw from the Paris agreement until Nov. 4, 2020, though the State Department announced last month it would continue participating in international climate change negotiations.

COHN TALKS CLIMATE TODAY: As world leaders and diplomats descend on New York this week for the United Nations General Assembly, Cohn meets today with international officials on a host of issues, including U.S. engagement on climate change. A readout from the ministerial meeting on climate action held over the weekend in Montreal is available here.

Environmental delegation cut: Tillerson won't send the State Department's bureau on oceans and the environment to participate in traditional meetings during the United Nations General Assembly, the New York Times reports. That comes as he's reduced the overall number of officials participating in the sessions by about half from last year.

CLIMATE BIG SHOTS MEET ON THE SIDELINES: Former Secretary of State John Kerry convenes a two-day climate change summit at Yale beginning today with a host of VIPs. A session at 11 a.m. features former Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz, Obama climate czar Heather Zichal and chief climate negotiator Jonathan Pershing discussing the future of energy. Then, former George W. Bush Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson and GE's Jeff Immelt are among the panelists discussing the role of the private sector in addressing the problem at 2:30 p.m.

California Gov. Jerry Brown plans to spend the week highlighting opportunities for cities and states to curb emissions, regardless of the administration's stance. Today he'll speak alongside Tom Steyer and then with France's Minister of Ecology Nicholas Hulot and World Economic Forum head of industries Cheryl Martin. The 15 states that comprise the Climate Alliance, which was formed after Trump's decision to withdraw from the Paris deal, are expected announce the greenhouse gas levels they hope to achieve by 2025.

Brown also launched the America's Pledge initiative along with former New York mayor Michael Bloomberg. "We're not where we need to be, we're not moving as fast as we need to move, not changing as fast as we need to change," Bloomberg senior adviser Carl Pope said of overall U.S. action. "But we think we are accelerating at a rate that we can get there." He added America's Pledge has seen a doubling of participants in the past three months.

REPORT: SEVEN MONUMENTS IN CROSSHAIRS: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's unreleased report to Trump on national monuments recommends shrinking or changing the boundaries of seven national monuments, The Wall Street Journal reports. Among the national monuments targeted are the Utah's Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante; Oregon's Cascade-Siskiyou; Nevada's Gold Butte; Maine's Katahdin; and New Mexico's Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks and Rio Grande Del Norte. Zinke's recommendations would also reopen Northeast Canyons and Seamounts off the Massachusetts coast and both Rose Atoll and the Pacific Remote Islands to commercial fishing.

Utah pushed drastic Bears Ears rollback: Utah Gov. Gary Herbert's office suggested to Zinke shrinking Bears Ears National Monument to one-tenth of its current 1.35 million acres, down to about 120,000 acres, The Salt Lake Tribune reports, citing an open records request. Native American leaders bashed the state's proposal and said it disregards the wishes of the tribes who pushed for the monument designation in the first place.

REPORT: ADMINISTRATION INCHING TOWARD ANWR DRILLING: Interior has proposed in an internal memo to lift a ban on exploratory seismic studies in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, taking a first step toward opening up the wilderness to drilling, the Washington Post reports. It's unclear how much interest energy companies would have in pouring significant investments into the region with oil prices remaining low, and Congress would ultimately have to authorize oil and gas drilling in the area. But U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service Acting Director James W. Kurth requested in a memo that the agency update a 1980s regulation that allowed exploratory drilling as the agency pushes to remove legal obstacles to energy exploration in ANWR.

TRUMP MOCKS LONG GAS LINES IN NORTH KOREA: Trump tweeted Sunday (in addition to calling its leader Kim Jong Un "Rocket Man") that "Long gas lines forming in North Korea. Too bad!" It's unclear where Trump got his reports of long lines, but he appeared to be touting the effectiveness of new sanctions cleared by the U.N. Security Council last week. Though not as strong as the administration hoped, the sanctions capped North Korea's crude oil imports and barred the secluded nation from importing all natural gas liquids and condensates.

PRUITT VISITS TEXAS SUPERFUND SITES: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt on Friday visited the San Jacinto River waste pits, a Superfund site encompassing a group of impoundments holding 1960s-era paper mill waste that were affected by Hurricane Harvey. Following his visit, Pruitt promised the agency would make a final call on how to remediate the site before Oct. 14, The Baytown Sun reports. "So as we look to answers here, they need to be permanent, they need to provide confidence with the people of this area that it's going to be for the long haul and we fix this situation, so that anxiety goes away," the administrator said in a local TV interview.

EPA said Pruitt also received an aerial tour of other Superfund sites caught up in the storm, including Patrick Bayou, U.S. Oil Recovery, Highlands Acid Pits, French Unlimited, Brio Refining and Dixie Oil Processors.

More waivers granted: EPA announced it would extend waivers from certain Clean Air Act requirements through Sept. 22 for petroleum distribution facilities, gasoline storage facilities and bulk fuel terminals in Texas affected by Hurricane Harvey.

LET ME BE NU-CLEAR! Energy Secretary Rick Perry is in Vienna, Austria for the International Atomic Energy Agency's general conference. He posted pictures from a "wonderful dinner" with the group's Director General Yukiya Amano, a meeting with Chinese officials, discussions with Japanese representatives and a chance encounter with Austrian President Alexander Van der Bellen.

BIG WEEK FOR TRUMP NOMINEES! The House is out this week, so all eyes from congressional watchers will be on the Senate and the fate of ten energy and environmental nominees in committees. After a couple of false starts, the Energy and Natural Resources Committee is expected to clear five DOE, Interior and FERC nominees during a Tuesday business meeting at 9:30 a.m. without much drama.

It'll be a much different story the next day when the Environment and Public Works Committee holds a confirmation hearing for four EPA nominees. Expect vehement opposition from panel Democrats to the nominations of Michael Dourson to be the agency's chemical chief and William Wehrum to be the top air official. More on both sessions as we get closer.

MAIL CALL! ACTION SOUGHT ON BRAZILIAN TARIFF: A bipartisan group of 10 senators want U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer to talk Brazil out of its ethanol tariffs. "We are writing to ask that you directly engage the Brazilian government and quickly work to resolve this issue," the letter says. It doesn't call for any specific remedies other than asking Lighthizer to get Brazil to back down from its 20 percent tariff on ethanol imports above 600 million liters (158 million gallons). "We are writing to ask that you directly engage the Brazilian government and quickly work to resolve this issue," the senators say. The letter is signed by six Democrats and four Republicans, and includes Sens. Chuck Grassley and Debbie Stabenow, both of whom are on the Finance committee, which has oversight of the Trade Representative.

TAKE A GLANCE! WHAT WORKS IN OFFSHORE WIND: The Center for American Progress is out with a report today examining state policies that helped offshore wind projects in Rhode Island, Massachusetts and New York get off the ground. Among the items they recommend states consider for the policy toolkits: Strong renewable energy requirements, legislation guaranteeing demand for offshore wind power, comprehensive ocean planning, competitive and reasonable long-term power purchase agreements and infrastructure investments in areas like ports. CAP argues the lessons could be applied to states like New Jersey, North and South Carolina, Ohio, Maryland, Virginia and California.

THIS SEEMS LIKE A BIG DEAL: The House on Friday argued in legal filings federal agencies should not release congressional records through Freedom of Information Act requests, POLITICO's Josh Gerstein reports. In a federal district court filing, House General Counsel Thomas Hungar said a House body known as the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group voted unanimously in favor of the intervention to "protect the institutional interests of the House."

ME FIRST — CLEAN ENERGY WEEK KICKOFF IN STYLE: Perry and Zinke are teaming up to kick off National Clean Energy Week on Sept. 26 at the Reserve Officers Association on Capitol Hill in a discussion moderated by former New Hampshire Sen. Kelly Ayotte. Also expected to speak throughout the day are Rep. Cathy McMorris Rodgers and Sen. Lindsey Graham.

WEEKEND PAPAL THOUGHT: "Global action is needed in order to reduce pollution and at the same time promote development in poorer countries," Pope Francis tweeted Saturday.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

White House denies backtracking on Paris pact withdrawal Back

By Nancy Cook, Andrew Restuccia and Kalina Oroschakoff | 09/16/2017 06:09 PM EDT

The White House denied Saturday that the administration was backtracking on its long-held plans to withdraw from the Paris climate deal.

"There has been no change in the United States' position on the Paris agreement. As the President has made abundantly clear, the United States is withdrawing unless we can re-enter on terms that are more favorable to our country," said White House Press Secretary Sarah Sanders, in a statement.

The denial came after the Wall Street Journal reported that a White House senior official, Everett Eissenstat, had told people at a meeting of energy ministers in Montreal that the administration may revise or craft a new climate deal and emissions standards rather than pull out altogether, according to a top European energy official cited by the Journal.

As recently as early August, the White House signaled its intent to continue the process of withdrawal by delivering an official notice to the United Nations vis-à-vis the State Department.

President Donald Trump announced his intentions to withdraw the U.S. from the agreement in June during a speech in the Rose Garden — though under the terms of the original deal, the U.S. cannot fully withdraw until Nov. 4, 2020.

The president also indicated at that time that he would be open to re-entering the climate pact if he believed the United States could get out of it what Trump deemed a better deal.

The State Department announced last month that the U.S. would continue participating in international climate change negotiations, including talks aimed at implementing the Paris pact, "to protect U.S. interests and ensure all future policy options remain open to the administration."

Since then, the international community has largely been left in the dark about the United States' plans. Foreign diplomats have long suspected that the U.S. will ultimately remain in the agreement, while weakening former President Barack Obama's pledge to cut domestic emissions 26 percent to 28 percent below 2005 levels by 2025.

Diplomats have been buzzing about this weekend's climate meeting in Montreal, where energy ministers were set to discuss the climate deal.

An international official familiar with the meeting told POLITICO earlier Saturday that Eissenstat, the No. 2 official on the National Economic Council, told diplomats during a closed-door meeting that the U.S. was mulling plans to remain in the Paris deal and to rethink Obama's climate pledge.

But White House officials strongly denied that.

Another White House official said Saturday diplomats were mischaracterizing Eissenstat's comments.

A second, non-U.S. attendee at this weekend's meeting also said Eissenstat's comments were being misconstrued. The attendee, who witnessed his comments in person, said Eissenstat simply reiterated the administration's existing position, which is that the U.S. will continue to engage in climate talks with an eye toward reaching a better deal.

"He basically repeated exactly the State Department press release from August," the person said, referring to a recent statement from the department outlining its intention to eventually withdraw, but continue participating in Paris discussions. "This is being misreported. Unhelpfully so I think."

The news comes as National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn is set to meet with foreign officials in New York City on Monday to discuss climate and energy issues ahead of the United Nations General Assembly.

McMaster rejects report U.S. will remain in Paris deal as 'false' Back

By Theodoric Meyer | 09/17/2017 12:19 PM EDT

National security adviser H.R. McMaster on Sunday shot down a Wall Street Journal story reporting that the U.S. would remain in the Paris climate accord despite President Donald Trump's announcement in June that he would pull the country out.

"That's a false report," McMaster told Chris Wallace on "Fox News Sunday." "The president decided to pull out of the Paris accord because it was a bad deal for the American people and a bad deal for the environment."

The Journal reported Saturday that Trump administration officials at a climate summit in Montreal had said the U.S. wouldn't leave the accord after all, citing multiple officials there. "U.S. officials in Montreal, led by White House senior adviser Everett Eissenstat, broached revising U.S. climate-change goals, two participants said, signaling a compromise that would keep the U.S. at the table even if it meant weakening the international effort," The Journal's Emre Peker reported.

But McMaster bashed the Paris deal after denying The Journal's story.

"It gave the worst polluters the ability to continue polluting and emitting carbon without significantly reducing those levels," McMaster said on "Fox News Sunday." "The president is committed to the cleanest water on Earth, the cleanest air on Earth, to an energy policy that reduces carbon emissions but then also provides clean fossil fuels to generate growth in this country and globally."

McMaster was more equivocal in an interview with George Stephanopoulos on ABC's "This Week." Asked whether the U.S. would remain in the accord if the administration can negotiate better terms before 2020 — the earliest the U.S. can quit the accord under the terms of the deal — McMaster said it was a possibility.

"If there's an agreement that benefits the American people, certainly," he said.

Cohn to participate in energy, climate discussion at United Nations Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 09/12/2017 03:37 PM EDT

National Economic Council director Gary Cohn will host an energy and climate change discussion with international officials in New York next week, an administration official confirmed.

The Monday meeting comes the day before the opening of the United Nations General Assembly, where President Donald Trump and dozens of other world leaders will speak.

Cohn invited officials from more than a dozen countries to the breakfast meeting to discuss "international energy and climate issues," according to a copy of the invitation obtained by POLITICO.

The invitation, which Cohn sent on Sept. 7, says the huddle is an "opportunity for key ministers with responsibility for these issues to engage in an informal exchange of views and discuss how we can move forward most productively."

The administration official stressed that the meeting, first reported by the New York Times, will not focus solely on climate change.

Trump infuriated foreign diplomats when he announced in June that he would withdraw from the Paris climate change agreement, which has won the support of nearly 200 nations. Cohn was among White House officials pushing Trump not to exit the Paris agreement at the time.

But so far, the United States has not formally withdrawn, and Trump administration officials have sent mixed signals about whether it is willing to reach a deal to remain in the pact.

The State Department announced last month that the U.S. would continue participating in international climate change negotiations, including talks aimed at implementing the Paris pact, "to protect U.S. interests and ensure all future policy options remain open to the administration."

Trump, who has called climate change a "hoax" perpetrated by the Chinese, has said the United States is getting an unfair deal in the Paris agreement.

U.N. Security Council approves new North Korea sanctions Back

By Associated Press | 09/11/2017 06:36 PM EDT

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. Security Council on Monday unanimously approved new sanctions on North Korea but not the toughest-ever measures sought by the Trump administration to ban all oil imports and freeze international assets of the government and its leader, Kim Jong Un.

The resolution, responding to Pyongyang's sixth and strongest nuclear test explosion on Sept. 3, does ban North Korea from importing all natural gas liquids and condensates. It also bans all textile exports and prohibits any country from authorizing new work permits for North Korean workers - two key sources of hard currency for the northeast Asian nation.

As for energy, it caps Pyongyang's imports of crude oil at the level of the last 12 months, and it limits the import of refined petroleum products to 2 million barrels a year.

The watered-down resolution does not include sanctions that the U.S. wanted on North Korea's national airline and the army.

Nonetheless, U.S. Ambassador Nikki Haley told the council after the vote that "these are by far the strongest measures ever imposed on North Korea." But she stressed that "these steps only work if all nations implement them completely and aggressively."

Haley noted that the council was meeting on the 16th anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attack. In a clear message to North Korean threats to attack the U.S., she said: "We will never forget the lesson that those who have evil intentions must be confronted."

"Today we are saying the world will never accept a nuclear armed North Korea," she said. "We are done trying to prod the regime to do the right thing" and instead are taking steps to prevent it "from doing the wrong thing."

Haley said the U.S. doesn't take pleasure in strengthening sanctions and reiterated that the U.S. does not want war.

"The North Korean regime has not yet passed the point of no return," she said. "If it agrees to stop its nuclear program it can reclaim its future. If it proves it can live in peace, the world will live in peace with it. ... If North Korea continues its dangerous path, we will continue with further pressure."

The final agreement was reached after negotiations between the U.S. and China, the North's ally and major trading partner. Haley said the resolution never would have happened without the "strong relationship" between President Donald Trump and Chinese President Xi Jinping.

But its provisions are a significant climb-down from the very tough sanctions the Trump administration proposed last Tuesday, especially on oil, where a complete ban could have crippled North Korea's economy.

The cap on the import of petroleum products could have an impact, but North Korea will still be able to import the same amount of crude oil that it has this year.

According to the U.S. Energy Information Administration, China supplies most of North Korea's crude oil imports, which a U.S. official put at 4 million barrels a year. The agency cited U.N. customs data showing that China reported sending 6,000 barrels a day of oil products to North Korea, which it said is mostly gasoline and diesel fuel vital to the country's agriculture, transportation and military sectors.

That would mean North Korea imports nearly 2.2 million barrels a year in petroleum products, so the 2 million barrel cap in the resolution would represent a 10 percent cut. But the U.S. official, who was not authorized to speak publicly, said North Korea now receives about 4.5 million barrels of refined petroleum products, which would mean a more than 50 percent cut.

The textile ban is significant. Textiles are North Korea's main source of export revenue after coal, iron, seafood and other minerals that have already been severely restricted by previous U.N. resolutions. North Korean textile exports in 2016 totaled $752.5 million, accounting for about one-fourth of its total $3 billion in merchandise exports, according to South Korean government figures.

Haley said the Trump administration believes the new sanctions combined with previous measures would ban over 90 percent of North Korea's exports reported in 2016.

As for North Koreans working overseas, the U.S. Mission said a cutoff on new work permits will eventually cost North Korea about $500 million a year once current work permits expire. The U.S. estimates about 93,000 North Koreans are currently working abroad, the U.S. official said.

The original U.S. draft would have ordered all countries to impose an asset freeze and travel ban on Kim Jong Un and four other top party and government officials. The resolution adopted Monday adds only one person to the sanctions list - Pak Yong Sik, a member of the Workers' Party of Korea Central Military Commission, which controls the country's military and helps direct its military industries.

The original U.S. draft would also have frozen the assets of North Korea's state-owned airline Air Koryo, the Korean People's Army and five other powerful military and party entities. The resolution adds only the Central Military Commission of the Workers' Party of Korea and the party's powerful Organization and Guidance Department and its Propaganda and Agitation Department to the sanctions blacklist.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry issued a statement early Monday saying it was watching the United States' moves closely and warned that it was "ready and willing" to respond with measures of its own. It said the U.S. would pay a heavy price if the sanctions proposed by Washington are adopted.

Britain's U.N. ambassador, Matthew Rycroft, told reporters who questioned the watering down of the initial U.S. text that "there is a significant prize in keeping the whole of the Security Council united."

Rycroft called the resolution "a very significant set of additional sanctions," declaring that "we are tightening the screw, and we stand prepared to tighten it further."

French Ambassador Francois Delattre said, "We are facing not a regional but a global threat, not a virtual but an immediate threat, not a serious but an existential threat."

"Make no mistake about it," he said, "our firmness today is our best antidote to the risk of war, to the risk of confrontation, and our firmness today is our best tool for a political solution tomorrow."

China and Russia had called for a resolution focused on a political solution to the escalating crisis over North Korea's nuclear program. They have proposed a freeze-for-freeze that would halt North Korean nuclear and missile tests in exchange for the U.S. and South Korea stopping their joint military exercises - but the Trump administration has rejected that.

China's U.N. ambassador, Liu Jieyi, said Beijing has been making "unremitting efforts" to denuclearize and maintain peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula.

Liu again urged the council to adopt the freeze-for-freeze proposal and said talks with North Korea are needed "sooner rather than later." He expressed hope that the United States will pledge not to seek regime change or North Korea's collapse.

Russian Ambassador Vassily Nebenzia went further, making clear that while Russia supported the resolution, it wasn't entirely satisfied with the council's approach.

He said the "unwillingness" of the U.S. to reaffirm pledges not to seek regime change or war in North Korea or to include the idea of having U.N. Secretary-General Antonio Guterres use his good offices to try to resolve the dispute "gives rise to very serious questions in our minds."

"We're convinced that diverting the gathering menace from the Korean Peninsula could be done not through further and further sanctions, but by political means," he said.

The resolution does add new language urging "further work to reduce tensions so as to advance the prospects for a comprehensive settlement." It retains language reaffirming support for long-stalled six-party talks with that goal involving North Korea, the U.S., Russia, China, Japan and South Korea.

House goes to court to protect secrecy of records Back

By Josh Gerstein | 09/15/2017 08:21 PM EDT

The House of Representatives is taking legal action to make sure that federal agencies don't release congressional records to the public through the Freedom of Information Act.

The move, which came Friday evening in a lawsuit demanding access to discussions about health care reform between the Trump administration and Congress, threatens to cut off a mechanism liberal watchdog groups were using to gain insight into closed-door negotiations on a variety of policy issues.

In legal papers filed in U.S. District Court in Washington, House General Counsel Thomas Hungar said the move to protect congressional correspondence was authorized by a House body known as the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group. While the panel of top House leaders has divided in the past on sensitive issues, Hungar wrote that they "voted unanimously to authorize this intervention ... to protect the institutional interests of the House."

Hungar complained that last week the Department of Health and Human Services and the Office of Management and Budget gave the liberal group American Oversight four documents that originated with the House Ways and Means Committee. He argued that legal precedents established that congressional documents were exempt from disclosures pursuant to FOIA.

The House's legal filing also complains that the Trump administration is failing to respect Congress's prerogatives.

"Defendants have already demonstrated their unwillingness to defend that interest by failing to treat those documents as congressional records not subject to disclosure under FOIA and instead producing portions of those documents to plaintiff," Hungar wrote. "The Committee 'should not need to rely on a doubtful friend, when it can represent itself,'" he added, quoting a prior case.

The move comes after the chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), drew attention and a backlash from pro-transparency groups after he sent letters in April to about a dozen federal agencies warning them not to release congressional correspondence or submissions. He called the materials "sensitive and confidential."

Some Democrats questioned Hensarling's move.

"It is the height of hypocrisy for him to take such extraordinary measures to shield himself from the oversight of the American public," said Rep. Maxine Waters of California, the financial panel's ranking Democrat.

A spokeswoman for House Speaker Paul Ryan referred questions about the court action to the Ways and Means Committee.

"Unfortunately, OMB and HHS decided to release Congressional records over which our Committee had expressed a clear intent to retain control," said a panel spokeswoman, who asked not to be named. "By releasing these congressional documents that were clearly not subject to FOIA, these agencies went against decades of case law. With the strong support of all members of the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group, the Chairman decided it is in the best interest of the Ways and Means Committee and the House of Representatives to seek to intervene in this lawsuit and protect our Congressional prerogatives."

A Democratic leadership aide said the decision to step into the case was consistent with past practice.

"Congressional records are not subject to this statute," said the aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "It has long been the position of the bipartisan leadership of the House of Representatives that congressional requests to agencies are also not subject to FOIA."

The executive director of the group that sued for the records said he was troubled by the House's actions.

"In a rare moment of bipartisanship, House leaders came together late on a Friday night to try to block the American people from learning the truth about the Obamacare repeal effort," said Austin Evers of American Oversight. "From the very beginning, health care negotiations between the Trump administration and Congress have taken place in secret, and with talks reportedly starting again, it speaks volumes that Congress's first priority is to keep the public in the dark."

MARIA HITS PUERTO RICO ENERGY INFRASTRUCTURE HARD: Nearly 3.5 million Americans are without electricity on Puerto Rico following Hurricane Maria's direct hit, but the impacts to its bankrupt power provider could be felt for months after what its governor called an "unprecedented atmospheric system." The Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority declared bankruptcy on July 2 after being bogged down by old power plants that need of billions in repairs and the island's heavy reliance on imported oil. Ahead of Hurricane Irma earlier this month, Moody's Investors Service warned that "longterm power outages will have negative impacts on PREPA's revenues and will pose added challenges in Puerto Rico's overall recovery from this natural disaster." And consumers on the island already pay "more for their power than consumers in any state except Hawaii," according to the Energy Information Administration. San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz summed up the devastation to MSNBC: "We're looking at four to six months without electricity" in Puerto Rico.

President Donald Trump's administration said in a statement it "continues to direct all necessary Federal resources to protect the people of the United States territories affected by Hurricane Maria" and Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rossello said he'd requested a disaster declaration that could help speed the deployment of federal assistance. Dangerous winds and flood surges are possible over the coming days, according to federal officials. Another thing to watch is the status of the island's 18 Superfund sites. EPA said it had "temporarily paused all response operations" until the storm passed but pledged to "ramp up response activities quickly" once it is safe to do so. In a statement late Wednesday, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop said: "Both Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands are in dire need of our assistance and we will do everything in our power to ensure that all necessary resources are made available."

Nelson, Rubio request help: Florida Sens. Marco Rubio and Bill Nelson, still dealing with the impacts of Hurricane Irma on their own state, asked Trump in a letter to closely monitor the needs of Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands. And they separately wrote to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt urging the agency to expedite federal assistance to local entities to reduce sewage and wastewater exposure risks stemming from Irma. They also asked Pruitt for help to improve existing water systems so they're less vulnerable to damage in future hurricanes.

Looking ahead: Expect the recovery needs from Maria to factor into the next disaster relief package likely to take shape in Congress in the weeks ahead. Senior House members, including Speaker Paul Ryan and Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen, toured areas in Florida hardest hit by Hurricane Irma on Wednesday.

STATES ON TRACK FOR PARIS-STYLE REDUCTIONS: A bloc of 14 states representing 40 percent of the U.S. economy — or equal to the world's third-largest economy if they were a single nation — said Wednesday they expect to slash their greenhouse gas emissions 24-29 percent by 2025, Pro's Emily Holden reports. "While Donald Trump has told the world to count us out, our message is simple in New York City this week — you can count us in," Washington Gov. Jay Inslee said at a press conference. But while those reductions are in line with the U.S. target under the Paris deal Trump vowed to withdraw from, the members of the bipartisan Climate Alliance account for only about one-fifth of the country's net emissions, according to 2015 figures from the analysis firm Rhodium Group. The group released a report on their progress available here.

Environmentalists hailed the status update: "President Trump can keep attacking climate action, but he can't stop local innovation from continuing our progress," League of Conservation Voters State Policy Director Bill Holland said in a statement.

Getting lonely out here: Syria and the U.S. will soon be the lone holdouts from the Paris climate agreement after Nicaragua announced Wednesday it would ratify the accord in solidarity with other nations suffering from climate impacts, local media reports. The nation's previous resistance to the international deal was because it had said it doesn't go far enough and doesn't do enough to hold major emitters accountable.

May lightly hits Trump over Paris exit: British Prime Minister Theresa May lightly rebuked Trump for withdrawing from the accord during Wednesday remarks at the U.N. General Assembly, POLITICO Europe's Paul Dallison reports. "It is this rules-based system which we have developed — including the institutions, the international frameworks of free and fair trade; agreements such as the Paris climate accord; and laws and conventions like the Non-Proliferation Treaty — which enables the global co-operation through which we can protect those values," the British PM said.

BIWEEKLY PRUITT SCHEDULE COMING SOON, AGENCY SAYS: EPA will soon begin publicly releasing Administrator Scott Pruitt's schedule, an agency attorney tells ME. Requests for records are up this year, and Pruitt's schedule is of particular interest, but the agency so far has only released his schedule for February and March. Now the agency's plan is to release every other week an "abbreviated version" of Pruitt's doings, going back to when he was confirmed, according to the attorney. It's not yet clear just how thorough the releases will be, but it appears internal EPA meetings will be included. Daily schedules released under the previous administrator, Gina McCarthy, typically revealed only public appearances at conferences or other venues.

GREEN AD HITS LAWMAKERS OVER SPENDING BILL: The League of Conservation Voters is out with a digital ad today hitting six congressmen for their votes in favor of a spending package H.R. 3354 \(115\) with a host of cuts to environmental programs.

Targets of campaign are Darrell Issa, Rodney Frelinghuysen, Ken Calvert, Collin Peterson, Barbara Comstock and Mimi Walters. Sample ad here. LCV will also thank Betty McCollum and Frank LoBiondo for voting against the bill.

LAWMAKERS PRESS GRID OPERATOR FOR CARBON STUDY: Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Bernie Sanders have asked ISO-New England to assess the impact of using a carbon price in their power markets. New York's ISO brought in the Brattle Group to study the same thing for their state, and the New England lawmakers suggested that "the current system may discriminate against carbon-free resources in the absence of a carbon price." The pair also point to utility regulators in Minnesota and Colorado using carbon metrics to size up energy projects. But there's an obvious elephant in the room: ISO-New England serves six states and despite looking like tiny hardcore liberal states from the outside, they're hardly a monolith on this issue. Back in May, the ISO's chief economist told us that New England states "currently have a regional greenhouse gas market that exists, they govern it, many states have indicated a comfort retaining that and a discomfort with going beyond that." The Whitehouse-Sanders letter.

CALIFORNIA SUES OVER TRUMP'S WALL: California Attorney General Xavier Becerra challenged the legality of Trump's push to build a border wall in a lawsuit filed in federal court in San Diego on Wednesday, POLITICO's Josh Gerstein reports. Among the allegations is that the administration failed to comply with National Environmental Policy Act and the Administrative Procedure Act by failing to prepare an environmental impact statement for projects related to the border wall in San Diego and Imperial counties.

GREEN QUILTS TRADE BOARD OVER CLIMATE: Bill Snape, a law professor at American University and attorney for the Center for Biological Diversity, has resigned from a federal trade advisory board with a letter where the first letter in each paragraph spells out N-O-T-A-H-O-A-X — a reference to Trump's comments on climate change and in the same acrostic-style flair employed by previous resignees in recent months. Snape had been a member of the U.S. Trade and Environment Policy Advisory Committee, overseen by the U.S. Trade Representative, since 2005. He wrote in his letter that TEPAC can be "enormously useful," but that "I do not believe in this president, or his severely shortsighted and harmful policies" and that "it's time to be real about global warming."

JUSTICE FOR MANCHIN? GOP West Virginia Gov. (and former coal executive) Jim Justice appeared to back Democratic Sen. Joe Manchin's reelection bid over the Republican candidates — Rep. Evan Jenkins and Attorney General Patrick Morrisey — during remarks to state Republican lawmakers this week, West Virginia Metro News reports. "Joe Manchin is — and I know this — Joe Manchin is Donald Trump's liaison with the Democrats. And you want, and I want, what Donald Trump is trying to get done," Justice said, adding he liked both Morrisey and Jenkins but considered Manchin a "friend."

NEW SENSE OF PURPA? FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee told reporters Wednesday the agency might look at changing its rules on facilities that qualify for preferential treatment under the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. "Any major changes to PURPA I think are going to have to come from Congress," he said. But "what we could look to here are what potential changes we could do within our purview whether it relates to the one-mile rule or other items."

LAST VOICES WEIGH IN ON SUNIVA CASE: A group of retired military officials warned the International Trade Commission that slapping tariffs on imported solar products, as requested by Suniva and SolarWorld USA, would harm the Defense Department's energy security and resilience efforts in a letter sent Wednesday. "The proposed tariffs and minimum prices would double the cost of imported solar cells and modules used in utility-scale defense energy projects," they write. "This dramatic cost-increase could potentially jeopardize the financial viability of planned and future solar investments on or near domestic military bases."

SWING AND A MISS? Germany appears poised to miss its 2020 renewable energy target by more than previously estimated, POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff reports, citing a German Renewable Energy Federation report out Wednesday. Renewables should account for 18 percent of Germany's energy consumption by 2020 under European Union targets, but the new forecast estimates it will reach only 16 percent by that year. That's lower than a previous estimate of 16.7 percent, which the group blamed on higher fuel consumption and low use of renewables in the heating and transport sectors.

REVIEWS ARE IN: NRDC chief Rhea Suh slammed Trump's Tuesday U.N. speech for leaving out all mentions of climate change in a tweetstorm. "Did you watch Trump's UN address yesterday? Me too. Somehow he fit in an Elton John reference, but missed an important issue: climate change...His silence is especially troubling when you consider who was in the audience: reps from 193 countries there to shape and change our future...Neglecting to mention climate change in his speech is outrageous, and It reflects Trump's deeply misguided world view."

ZINKE'S WIFE RETWEETS CONSPIRACY THEORY: Lola Zinke, wife of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, retweeted a user who raised questions about the death of Democratic National Committee staffer Seth Rich, a popular target for conspiracy theorists. His murder sparked Pizzagate-like internet chatter among fringe groups, but those theories have been debunked by police.

McKIBBEN ENDORSES LAMAR SMITH CHALLENGER: Environmentalist Bill McKibben endorsed Democrat Derrick Crowe Wednesday in his bid to unseat House Science Chairman Lamar Smith. "Derrick Crowe has long been active in the fight for a working environmental future, and now it's very good to see him enter the political arena," McKibben said in a statement.

LOOKING AT FOSSIL FUEL CEO PAY: Food and Water Watch released an analysis Wednesday arguing nine oil and gas CEOs received approximately $88,000 per million metric tons of greenhouse gases they emitted last year. The group said "almost without exception" greater greenhouse gas emissions led to greater take-home pay for the executives.

TWO NAMED TO SENIOR NRC SLOTS: The Nuclear Regulatory Commission announced the selection of two career staff Wednesday for new positions within the agency. Mary Muessle will direct the Office of Administration and Anne Boland will run the Office of Enforcement. Both appointments are effective Oct. 29.

Moody's issues warning on Puerto Rico power utility over Irma Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/07/2017 04:45 PM EDT

Moody's Investors Service issued a preliminary statement on how it views Hurricane Irma's effect on the billions in bond debt owed by Puerto Rico's electric power authority.

Reports of widespread power outages "highlight longstanding liquidity pressures and an aging infrastructure that have beleaguered [the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority] for many years," Rick Donner, a Moody's senior credit officer, wrote.

"Longterm power outages will have negative impacts on PREPA's revenues and will pose added challenges in Puerto Rico's overall recovery from this natural disaster," he said. "Any damage from the storm will also add to the stress related to PREPA's recent default and could impact ultimate recovery for bondholders."

Seventy percent of PREPA's customers have reportedly lost power.

WHAT'S NEXT: Though experts anticipate the Federal Emergency Management Agency will help with the immediate costs following Irma, the cash-strapped utility could face longer term infrastructure problems and lose customers due to increased emigration from the U.S. territory to the mainland.

14 states expect to cut emissions on par with Paris pledge Back

By Emily Holden | 09/20/2017 02:51 PM EDT

The 14 states that plan to keep shrinking their carbon footprint despite President Donald Trump's plan to abandon the Paris climate agreement say they are on track to slash greenhouse gas emissions 24-29 percent by 2025.

In proportional terms, that is in line with the U.S. target under the Paris deal — a 26-28 percent reduction below 2005 levels by 2025. But the states, members of the bipartisan Climate Alliance, account for only about one-fifth of the country's net emissions, according to 2015 figures from the analysis firm Rhodium Group.

"While Donald Trump has told the world to count us out, our message is simple in New York City this week — you can count us in," Washington Gov. Jay Inslee said at a press conference in New York today.

The states represent 40 percent of the U.S. economy, equal to the third largest economy in the world if they were a single nation, Inslee added.

The states in the alliance are California, New York, Washington, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Virginia, plus Puerto Rico.

Former Secretary of State John Kerry, who joined the press conference, slammed Trump's decision to exit Paris.

"He forfeited American leadership, he put at risk the momentum that has been created and he said to the American people, 'I'm buying into the denial hoax,'" Kerry said, citing Hurricanes Harvey and Irma as signs that climate change is already exacerbating severe weather.

FERC mulls carbon pricing as salve for tensions with states Back

By Darius Dixon and Esther Whieldon | 05/03/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The Trump administration's doubts about climate change were nowhere to be found this week in discussions among state officials, power companies and federal regulators seeking a compromise that might meld power markets with state carbon-cutting plans.

The stark contrast between President Donald Trump's push to rescind his predecessor's climate rules, such as the Clean Power Plan, and the detailed technical discussions among FERC and state officials about the merits of policies such as a carbon tax drew the attention from a few speakers.

FERC is the "only federal building where there is a discussion of carbon pricing," said Susan Tierney, a senior adviser at the Analysis Group and who worked with both Clinton and Obama administration Energy Departments.

States and Congress have nibbled at the electricity markets for more than a decade through state renewable portfolio mandates and federal wind and solar tax credits. But after New York and Illinois — fearing a loss of jobs and emissions-free electricity — created large incentive programs for nuclear power plants in their states, market operators, economists and other energy power generators cried foul fearing energy companies would distort markets by increasingly pressuring states for special subsidies instead of trying to deliver the cheapest possible electricity.

"The status quo is just not sustainable," Richard Mroz, president of the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities, told FERC leaders and staff. "You've got the industry and the markets potentially now chasing the next subsidy that comes from a state. The concern is that it will continue to destabilize the market. That's not good for anyone."

One of the few areas of agreement among most speakers — few of which veered away from their long-held positions about state policies — was that FERC needed to exert itself, offer policy guidance and start setting timelines for action.

"The one message that seems to resonate right now with the commissioners and the staff is that FERC's gotta do something," Mroz later said in a brief interview. "FERC has to show some leadership in these issues and heretofore FERC has been either reluctant or really not fully appreciated the fact that it needed to help lead to a solution."

Acting FERC Chairman Cheryl LaFleur and outgoing Commissioner Colette Honorable, both Democrats, each acknowledged that putting a market price on carbon was one obvious solution to easing the jurisdictional tension between states and the federal government, an option often touted by environmental groups and economists but spurned by many Republicans.

"I want to say from the start I know that pricing carbon makes sense," LaFleur said. But both commissioners also noted that some states may not be so keen on that idea particularly since they want the option of choosing exactly what technologies are being promoted and they don't want to pay for other state policy decisions.

But with three vacancies on the five-member commission curtailing most of its policy work, FERC may be unable to act before states push new policies that markets have to work around.

"I think the tech conference moves the issue very little for the sole reason that there's not a lot of reasons for people to move off their positions," said former FERC staffer Jeff Dennis, who worked in ex-Commissioner John Norris' office and led FERC's policy development division. "You don't know who the commission's going to be."

Still, Dennis, who is now at Akin Gump, said, "FERC staff did an excellent job of laying out several potential paths forward to try to close the gap."

The White House has given no indication of when it might announce nominees, although sources close to the process say the administration has identified its picks.

Until at least one new member is confirmed, FERC will be unable to act on requests to review complaints charging that state policies unfairly interfere with the operation of the markets. New York's "zero emission credit" program started last month and Illinois' begins in June. Both are being challenged in federal lawsuits that will not be resolved for months.

The Electric Power Supply Association, which represents independent generators, filed complaints in January calling on FERC to ensure electricity prices in upcoming spring auctions in the New York and the mid-Atlantic area PJM Interconnection markets were not artificially lowered by state decisions to subsidize struggling nuclear plants.

LaFleur acknowledged in an interview Tuesday that "there seems to be a clear urgency to take action on this issue of state policies in the market." But without a quorum, "we're limited to soft power like having tech conferences and making statements."

The topic of carbon pricing, normally a radioactive subject in Washington, permeated the two-day technical conference as perhaps the most straightforward way of setting up a market-based system that could reflect state environmental goals.

But states participating in the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, a cap-and-trade program that has already effectively put a price on carbon in its nine participating states, have signaled that they're wary to do more.

"The states have expressed considerable reservations about pricing carbon beyond what they currently do," said ISO-New England's chief economist Matthew White. "They currently have a regional greenhouse gas market that exists, they govern it, many states have indicated a comfort retaining that and a discomfort with going beyond that."

For some states, their programs are more than dealing with carbon emissions, Mark Vannoy, chairman of the Maine Public Utilities Commission.

"At the end of the session we have a lot of bills that relate to out-of-market purchases of various types of resources for a whole variety of reasons other than just carbon," he said of his state legislature.

New York may be a test case for the idea. Bradley Jones, the CEO for the state's grid operator, said it's doing preliminary analyses on factoring in a carbon price but said that implementing one would take at least three years.

LaFleur said she hopes the FERC summit will lead the grid operators and their market players to come up with their own solutions faster.

"Hopefully, this will help spur the RTOs and some of the market participants to work together," she said. "The idea was to try to give a push for action."

Yet that worries some consumer advocates concerned about the transparency rules and governance structure of the market operators, who are private entities largely driven by the energy industry.

The RTOs already have a "deeply flawed stakeholder process," said Tyson Slocum, who directs Public Citizen's energy program. "What's going to come from this technical conference is an accelerated timeline of action by the RTOs."

California sues to block Trump's border wall Back

By Josh Gerstein | 09/20/2017 09:01 AM EDT

The state of California is suing to block President Donald Trump's plan to construct a wall along the U.S. border with Mexico, the top lawyer for the state told reporters Tuesday.

The lawsuit filed in federal court in San Diego on Wednesday argues that the effort violates federal law and the Constitution by intruding on state authority, California Attorney General Xavier Becerra said.

"They're violating the 10th Amendment and infringing on a lot of state laws, not just federal laws, that affect our state. At the same time, they're trying to do something that only Congress can do," Becerra told journalists in Washington in advance of an official announcement he plans to make in San Diego on Wednesday.

Becerra said the suit contends that federal officials are running afoul of the law by declaring the expansion of the border wall to be an emergency that justifies waiving environmental studies and usual contracting procedures.

During the presidential campaign, Trump repeatedly promised to create a border wall that the Mexican government would pay for. Mexican officials have flatly rejected contributing any funds to such a project. With most Democrats in Congress staunchly opposed to the idea, it's unclear how Trump will get money for construction.

Nevertheless, Trump administration officials are pressing forward with studies and prototypes. In recent weeks, the Department of Homeland Security awarded contracts to eight companies to produce prototypes of potential barriers. Half the awards were for concrete wall designs, while the others will explore use of other materials.

Becerra announced the suit during a press conference at a state park near the border.

One of the Trump administration's most outspoken supporters of tougher measures at the border — Attorney General Jeff Sessions — was nearby a bit earlier on Wednesday announcing record drug seizures.

Asked about the suit, Sessions said: "Well, in the United States, anybody can sue, but the United States of America has a border. The United States government has the control of that border and a responsibility to secure it. We would expect to be fully successful in moving forward with a border wall as Congress gives us the money to do so."

Chairman says FERC mulling tweaking PURPA one-mile rule Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/20/2017 04:48 PM EDT

FERC may change its rules that determine what facilities qualify for preferential treatment under the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act, including one that prevents developers from getting around size restrictions by breaking large projects up into smaller ones within one mile of each other.

"Any major changes to PURPA I think are going to have to come from Congress," Chairman Neil Chatterjee told reporters today following the agency's meeting. But "what we could look to here are what potential changes we could do within our purview whether it relates to the one-mile rule or other items."

PURPA requires utilities to buy power from relatively small "qualifying facilities" such as wind and solar projects of 80 megawatts or smaller that are located within the utilities' service territory. FERC also has a rule that any projects with the same owner or affiliated owners that are within one mile of each other will be counted as one project in calculating whether they exceed the megawatt cap.

FERC earlier this month dodged requests by developers of two wind projects in Montana to change how it calculates the distance between projects under the one-mile rule. The commission held it didn't have to answer that question because the owners of the Beaver Creek II and Beaver Creek III projects were not affiliated with each other. FERC hasn't acted on the PURPA applications of two other nearby and similarly named wind projects.

Chatterjee in a statement attached to the decision said FERC should continue to examine the one-mile rule policy.

SOLAR TRADE CASE GETS MOMENT IN THE SUN : The U.S. International Trade Commission will vote today on whether U.S. solar manufacturers were economically harmed by imports of low-cost solar panels and solar cells. The case has solar installers and developers on edge, as they believe tariffs stemming from a determination could be ruinous for their industry. The Solar Energy Industries Association believes higher panel costs could make many projects uneconomic, and ultimately eliminate of 88,000 jobs — one-third of the $19 billion industry's workforce. But Suniva and SolarWorld USA, the companies that filed the complaint, believe tariffs will give U.S. solar manufacturing a chance to blossom and ultimately lead to a solar boom.

The nitty gritty: The two companies are requesting comprehensive import relief under Section 201 of the 1974 Trade Act, a "safeguard" provision that's legal under WTO rules but often challenged in practice. For the industry to get relief, the ITC must agree that solar products are being imported "in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause of serious injury or the threat of serious injury to a U.S. industry." Only two of the four commissioners who will hear the case (two additional commission slots need to be filled) need to vote in the affirmative for the case to go to the remedy phase. In the event of a 2-2 tie, both sides will make recommendations for tariffs.

Trump effect: Once injury is determined, the final call goes to President Donald Trump, who is widely expected to slap tariffs on the imports that are largely shipped by Chinese companies' from plants in several Asian countries.

WTO: The last time the U.S. used this broad authority to impose a quota or tariff, it was a 2002 safeguard action on steel imports under President George W. Bush. The EU, Japan, Korea, China, Switzerland, Norway, New Zealand and Brazil brought the case to the WTO. The United States lost that case and had to remove its steel safeguard duties to avoid trade retaliation.

Governors urge rejection of petition: Four governors — Brian Sandoval of Nevada, John Hickenlooper of Colorado, Charlie Baker of Massachusetts and Ray Cooper of North Carolina — urged the ITC to reject the petition (though they misidentified SolarWorld as SunWorld) in their letter to ITC Chairman Rhonda Schmidlein, Pro Trade's Doug Palmer reports. "As governors representing states with a robust solar industry, we write to express our opposition to Suniva and SunWorld's (sic) Section 201 petition," the governors said. "At a time when our citizens are demanding more clean energy, the tariff could cause America to lose out on 47 gigawatts of solar installations, representing billions of dollars of infrastructure investment in our states."

READY TO RESPOND IN PUERTO RICO: EPA said Thursday initial reports showed a "devastating" situation in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands. Staff intends to travel to Puerto Rico as soon as air travel is possible and among their first priorities is "assessing facilities where there are known hazardous substances" to make sure those areas are safe for surrounding residents.

Trump declared a major disaster Thursday, freeing up additional federal resources to respond to the storm that knocked out power to the entire island of Puerto Rico. "Ships with additional supplies en route to PR & making ALL efforts to reach our most vulnerable citizens," Resident Commissioner Jenniffer Gonzalez tweeted.

HALEY: VENEZUELA OIL EMBARGO 'NOT OFF THE TABLE': She declined to firmly back the idea, but U.N. Ambassador Nikki Haley told reporters Thursday the U.S. had not ruled out enacting an oil embargo against Venezuela. "If things don't improve, all those options are always there, and so that's what we're watching to see," she said. "It's not off the table, I can tell you that." She didn't respond to a similar question about pushing for an oil embargo against North Korea.

IF YOU HAPPEN TO BE IN RALEIGH: There's a rare opportunity to hear from EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's staff today at the Association of Air Pollution Control Agencies annual meeting in Raleigh, N.C. Speaking at a regulatory roundtable event are Samantha Dravis, Pruitt's senior policy counsel, and Brittany Bolen, senior deputy associate administrator within the Office of Policy. Mary Neumayr, chief of staff at the White House Council on Environmental Quality, is also expected to provide an update on the administration's activity. Mandy Gunasekara, Pruitt's senior advisor on air activities, offered her own update Thursday. Full schedule here.

ME INTERVIEW — SEN. BRIAN SCHATZ: One of the strongest climate hawks in Congress, the Hawaii Democrat was one of the few Democrats to explicitly link recent hurricanes to a changing climate. ME caught up with him about how extreme weather may alter the congressional climate conversation.

Whether it's appropriate to talk climate change after severe weather: "I'm not trying to score political points, but when the biggest unexpected costs for the federal government are severe weather events — and the most harmful recent events from California to Montana to Texas to Florida to Puerto are getting more frequent and severe — you just have to admit what's happening and try to do something about it together."

What impact the severe weather is having on Republicans: "It is impacting their thinking. I don't think it's going to impact the way they talk about climate change. It is impacting the way they talk about severe weather. There's a space here if we're careful with our language and we're respectful of different points of view to work together on clean energy and also on severe weather adaptation."

Why he's so concerned with Trump's EPA picks: "It's not just you're getting a Bush-era person who leans more to the right on these issues. You're getting people whose mission in their professional lives is to gut the underlying statute that they're responsible for implementing."

CLIMATE REMOVED FROM MORE EPA PAGES: EPA has stripped climate change language from web pages about its SmartWay program, which is meant to help companies improve their freight transportation efficiency, according a watchdog group tracking agency website changes. The Environmental Data & Governance Initiative reports that EPA has nixed references to "carbon," and "greenhouse gases" in favor of more general terms, like "pollution." The group says the agency also reduced emphasis on SmartWay's international efforts, including work with a United Nations environment program. Most of the changes appear to have occurred between late March and May, EDGI said.

TOM CARPER, CARPENTERS FAN: Sen. Tom Carper, top Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee, cautiously applauded Pruitt's decision to post his schedules online but said he still wouldn't endorse moving additional EPA nominees without agency responses to oversight requests. "I hope that this is a step in the right direction, but, as the song goes, 'we've only just begun,'" Carper said in a statement. "I am hopeful that Administrator Pruitt will continue to focus on responses to my other outstanding requests for information."

GOP CHAIRMAN: MAYBE YOU SHOULD MOVE: The federal government should not have to continue to foot the bill for properties that flood repeatedly, Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling said on CNBC's "Squawk Box." "At some point, God is telling you to move," the Texas Republican said. MAIL CALL! GROUP TO DOJ: YOU SETTLED TOO LOW: Clean Water Action wants DOJ to reconsider a settlement reached with California farmer John Duarte, arguing its unjustifiably low penalties set an awful precedent for future Clean Water Act cases. "Failure to seek these appropriate remedies is a failure to enforce the Clean Water Act," the group writes in a letter. Democrats argue the measure would make it possible to obtain a silencer without going through a background check, although Republicans dispute that.

RICHARD BRANSON BASHES TRUMP OVER CLIMATE: Virgin's Richard Branson told CNN Thursday that while "you can never be 100 percent sure about links" between climate change and hurricanes, "we've had four storms within a month, all far greater than that have ever, ever, ever happened in history." Branson, who rode out Hurricane Irma on his private island, said: "Ninety-nine percent of scientists know it's real. The whole world knows it's real except for maybe one person in the White House."

MEETING JERSEY'S CLIMATE CHALLENGE: It'll take "significant new policies and enhancements of current strategies" for New Jersey to hit its goal of achieving 80 percent emissions reductions by 2050 from 2006 levels but there are multiple approaches available to do so, according to a new report. ### 4 governors urge ITC to reject tariffs on solar products Back

By Doug Palmer | 09/21/2017 06:11 PM EDT

Four governors today made a last-minute effort to prevent President Donald Trump from getting the chance to impose tariffs on solar products — and in the process misidentified one of the companies involved in the case.

The move came on the eve of a critical U.S. International Trade Commission vote on Friday in a complaint brought by Suniva and SolarWorld. The ITC must decide whether U.S. solar producers have been seriously injured, or are threatened with serious injury, by a surge of imports from China and other suppliers.

The panel will have until late October to recommend a relief plan if it finds injury, which Trump could then follow or he could craft his own. U.S. law allows up to four years of initial protection.

The four governors — Brian Sandoval of Nevada, John Hickenlooper of Colorado, Charlie Baker of Massachusetts and Ray Cooper of North Carolina — said they were concerned about the impact of import restrictions and related measures on their states' economies. However, they misidentified SolarWorld as SunWorld in a letter to ITC Chairman Rhonda Schmitlein.

"As governors representing states with a robust solar industry, we write to express our opposition to Suniva and SunWorld's Section 201 petition," the governors said. "At a time when our citizens are demanding more clean energy, the tariff could cause America to lose out on 47 gigawatts of solar installations, representing billions of dollars of infrastructure investment in our states."

The ITC currently has two vacancies, so just four commissioners will decide the case. In the case of a tie, Trump would still be able impose relief if he decides it's needed.

Only commissioners who find injury can make remedy recommendations to the president, according to an ITC fact sheet.

DOJ settles high-profile Clean Water Act case with farmer Back

By Annie Snider | 08/15/2017 02:41 PM EDT

The Department of Justice today announced a $1.1 million settlement with a California farmer over wetlands destruction, ending a case that agricultural groups and property rights activists had criticized as federal overreach under the Clean Water Act.

John Duarte and Duarte Nursery Inc. agreed to pay $330,000 in civil penalties and fund $770,000 in restoration work to compensate for damage to 22 acres of protected streams and wetlands on his property. The agreement allows Duarte to return most of the site back to agricultural use and seek future determinations about whether streams and wetlands on the property are subject to federal protections.

Duarte was found guilty by a federal district court judge last year of violating the Clean Water Act by hiring a consultant to conduct "deep ripping" through waterways protected under the 1972 water law. Most farming practices, including plowing, are exempted from the law's permitting requirements, but deep ripping is not.

"Today's agreement affirms the Department of Justice's commitment to the rule of law, results in meaningful environmental restoration, and brings to an end protracted litigation," said Jeffrey Wood, acting assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resource Division. The DOJ emphasized that "this case is not (and will not be used as) a pretext for federal prosecution of farmers who engage in normal plowing on their farms."

In a statement, Duarte said settling was a "difficult decision" that he came to "reluctantly" given the risks that an even greater penalty would have posed to his business.

WHAT'S NEXT: The settlement agreement is subject to 30 days of public comment and must ultimately be approved by the court.

House GOP pushes to loosen gun rules Back

By John Bresnahan | 09/21/2017 05:31 PM EDT

House GOP leaders are moving forward with plans to vote on two gun-related measures in the coming weeks, the first time Congress has taken up the controversial issue since Donald Trump became president.

A bill easing regulations on the purchases of gun silencers — also known as suppressors — could reach the House floor as early as next week.

Another measure allowing concealed carry permit holders to take their weapons to other states is also expected to move through the House Judiciary Committee and onto the floor this fall, possibly in October, according to GOP lawmakers and aides.

Both proposals are almost certain to pass the House, despite intense opposition from gun-control groups. In the Senate, Democrats will likely block the measures. Trump would almost certainly sign such bills if they ever got to his desk.

Nearly five years after the tragic shooting at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown, Connecticut, left 20 children dead and spurred an impassioned debate over expanding background checks for gun sales, the GOP-controlled Congress and the Trump administration are clearly moving in the opposite direction. Republican congressional leaders and Trump administration officials — at the urging of the National Rifle Association and other gun-rights groups — are looking to roll back restrictions on guns imposed during the Obama era.

The push for looser gun rules comes as Rep. Steve Scalise (R-La.) is still recovering from a gunshot wound he suffered at a congressional baseball practice in June.

Gun-control groups — including those tied to Michael Bloomberg, the former New York City mayor and publishing billionaire — claim that the NRA and its allies on Capitol Hill and inside the Trump administration are really looking to help the gun industry, which has seen its sales slump since President Barack Obama left office and Trump was sworn in.

The Sportsmen's Heritage and Recreational Enhancement Act, introduced by Rep. Jeff Duncan (R-S.C.), may come up for a House vote as early as next week.

The Duncan legislation includes language revising federal regulations on silencers, which currently have tougher purchasing requirements than guns. Democrats contend that Duncan's bill would make it possible to obtain a silencer without going through a background check, although Republicans insist that's not true.

Another provision makes it more difficult for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to classify certain ammunition as "armor piercing." Regulations on interstate transportation of weapons would be revised as well.

Duncan and other proponents of his bill say silencers are popular with recreational shooters and hunters. The South Carolina Republican points out 40 states allow hunters to use such devices.

Duncan's bill has already been approved by the Natural Resources Committee. The Judiciary Committee, which also has jurisdiction, apparently is not going to act on the legislation but will allow it instead to go straight to the floor.

"Sportsmen are the foundation of the conservation movement in the United States, yet some radical organizations seek to limit access to this pastime by restricting the Second Amendment, as well as land and game management," Duncan said in a statement.

While some law-enforcement officials and organizations oppose any effort to loosen the restrictions on silencers, Jim Pasco, head of the Fraternal Order of Police, says his group has no objections to the proposal. The FOP claims to be the nation's largest police union.

"With respect to the silencer provision, we have taken a position that we do not object to that provision," said Pasco. "The reasoning is because silencers are not — and have not been in the recent past — a law enforcement problem."

Pasco said his organization has pushed for language allowing silencers to be traceable, which has been added to the bill.

The NRA has thrown its considerable political muscle behind the Duncan bill as well.

"Allowing law-abiding citizens to purchase suppressors without paying a $200 government tax and submitting extensive paperwork, but while undergoing an instant background check, will have a positive impact on the public health issue of hearing loss," said Jennifer Baker, an NRA spokeswoman. "The fact that the world's largest organization of sworn law enforcement officers expresses zero opposition to the bill debunks the gun lobby's false claims the bill poses a public safety risk."

But Peter Ambler, executive director of Americans for Responsible Solutions, a gun-control group founded by former Rep. Gabby Giffords (D-Ariz.), said the "vast majority" of gun owners don't support any move to loosen silencer regulations, according to polls.

"The NRA poured unprecedented amounts of political money into the 2016 elections," Ambler said. "They're trying to ram this through when the country is distracted by the health-care debate. Most Americans oppose this bill, most major law-enforcement organizations oppose the bill."

Ambler said Duncan's bill could potentially allow purchases of silencers without any background check at guns shows or through private transactions.

Just as controversial is a bill by Rep. Richard Hudson (R-N.C.) to allow concealed-carry permit holders to take their weapons with them to another state, as long as that state also allows concealed carry.

Concealed-carry permit holders would also be allowed to take their weapons onto some federal land, such as national parks.

Hudson's bill currently has 212 co-sponsors, including several Democrats, and it is expected to easily clear the House once it reaches the floor. A Judiciary Committee mark-up could come in October or early November, with a vote by the full House shortly thereafter.

Hudson insists his bill would not override any other state, municipal or local regulations on concealed carry. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) has introduced a similar bill in the Senate.

In a statement, Hudson said his bill "would allow law-abiding citizens with a state-issued concealed carry license or permit to conceal a handgun in any other state that allows concealed carry. It also allows law-abiding residents of Constitutional carry states the ability to carry in other states that recognize their own residents' right to concealed carry."

But ARS' Ambler said Hudson's bill would essentially create a "50 state" gun license, arguing that if someone received a concealed carry permit in one state, they would be allowed to carry their weapon into every state.

A number of states also have stricter permitting for a concealed-carry holder than is required to pass a federal background check. For instance, more than half the states prevent someone with a domestic violence or stalking conviction from obtaining such permits. Ambler said Hudson's bill would essentially pre-empt those restrictions.

Ambler added that gun purchasers could "permit shop," meaning obtain a concealed carry permit from a state that issues permits to nonresidents, as Florida and nine other states do.

"Even if your state has stronger laws and does not allow concealed carry, you would still be able to bring your gun into that state," Ambler insisted. "It undermines the way we permit firearms in this country."

Interior official files whistleblower complaint over job reassignment Back

By Esther Whieldon and Ben Lefebvre | 07/19/2017 07:06 PM EDT

A former senior Interior Department official has filed a whistleblower complaint after the agency transferred him from a leadership position focused on climate change to a desk job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies.

In a complaint and disclosure filing with the Office of Special Counsel and in a Washington Post op-ed, former Interior Office of Policy Analysis Director Joel Clement claimed he was reassigned to a position at the Office of Natural Resources Revenue to stop him from publicly discussing climate change impacts on native Alaskan coastal communities.

Clement was among dozens of senior executive staff reassigned to other jobs in June.

Clement told POLITICO no Interior political staffers ever raised concerns about his activities prior to his reassignment. "It was kind of obvious to reassign the climate adaptation experts to the accounting office where they collect fossil fuel royalty checks. That was pretty flagrant, I would say, in terms of sending the message. So that message was received loud and clear that they wanted me to quit."

Clement said he'd like his old job back, and he hoped other staff would also complain.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the personnel moves were "conducted to better serve the taxpayer and the Department's operations."

Clement may have difficulty proving his case because agencies have wide discretion to reassign staff, according to Jeff Ruch, executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. "It sounds like he's being retaliated against because of his job, not because of any disclosure he made," Ruch said. "He's suffering due to the nature of his job, and maybe because he did it too well."

WAIT UNTIL NEXT YEAR: The millions of Puerto Ricans reeling from months without electricity, Californians battling devastating wildfires and communities in Texas, Florida and the Caribbean rebuilding from a string of crippling hurricanes must wait until next year for disaster relief after Congress left town without sending funds their way. "Disaster is a lot more complicated, a lot more moving parts, a lot more varied interests, competition between various jurisdictions over who gets what," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said on Thursday. It now faces the prospect of languishing for weeks, Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief's Sarah Ferris reports.

A disaster assistance bill cleared the House on a 251-169 vote that would have doled out $81 billion to communities around the country. But it faced resistance in the Senate where Minority Leader Chuck Schumer demanded more help for Puerto Rico's cash-strapped Medicaid program and fixes to the GOP's tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), to prevent a disproportionate hike in taxes on the island.

The government stays open: Congress did okay funding H.R. 1370 \(115\) for federal agencies through Jan. 19 on a 231-188 House vote and a 66-32 tally in the Senate, POLITICO's Rachael Bade, John Bresnahan and Seung Min Kim report.

Looking to 2018: Twelve attorneys general, led by New York's Eric Schneiderman, sent a letter to congressional leaders opposing "deep and damaging proposed cuts" to EPA's fiscal 2018 budget and urging the House not to include environmental riders as they consider spending legislation.

NOMINATIONS CLEARED: Before heading out for holiday cheer, the Senate confirmed three energy-related nominations by unanimous consent: Linda Capuano to run the Energy Information Administration; Timothy Petty to be assistant Interior secretary for water and science; and John Vonglis to be chief financial officer of the Energy Department. The chamber also cleared four nominations to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Try again: It appears the White House will have to renominate Susan Combs to be Interior's assistant secretary of policy management and budget, and Ryan Nelson to be agency solicitor. Their forced do-overs come in addition to Kathleen Hartnett White, who as expected must be renominated to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

Bills, bills, bills: Senators passed legislation S. 1447 \(115\), reauthorizing the Diesel Emissions Reduction Act, which helps retrofit diesel-powered equipment; S. 2030 \(115\) delaying the compliance date for efficiency standards for ceiling light kits into 2020; and H.R. 518 \(115\) exempting certain devices from energy conservation standards for external power supplies.

REMOVED: More than 90 documents detailing how national parks plan to address climate change have been removed from the National Park Service's website, according to a report from the Environmental Data and Governance Initiative. The bulk of the removals happened in early December and users must now request copies of the climate action plans by email. Among the documents axed were those detailing what "parks are doing to respond to climate change and move park operations in a more sustainable direction" at such landmarks as Glacier, Everglades, Joshua Tree and Grand Canyon national parks.

THAT CARBON MAY BE CAPTURED, BUT DON'T LET IT GO: The carbon capture tax credit expansion in the tax extender bill released Wednesday won bipartisan praise, but some Democratic senators are concerned about a separate provision in the bill to reduce monitoring requirements on carbon once it's in the ground. One Senate Democratic aide said the provisions, which would relieve oil companies from tracking CO2 leakage once they use it, could serve "as a poison pill for many Democrats in the coalition of cosponsors, and an aide to another Democratic senator said, "the language is a non-starter." Whether the monitoring issue is enough to drive off Democrats who may like the bill's other measures, like tax credits for energy efficient homes and commercial buildings, remains to be seen. "There are members on the D side, particularly, who think that if you are getting a tax credit for something you ought to demonstrate that you're doing what you ought to be doing to get the credits," said Kurt Waltzer, managing director of the Clean Air Task Force. "I think people take that seriously."

SCIENTISTS SUE: A coalition of doctors, scientists and other groups filed a lawsuit Thursday asking a court to throw out Pruitt's directive barring anyone receiving agency grants from serving on its various advisory panels. They argue Pruitt's action violates federal ethics rules and is arbitrarily biased toward individuals with industry ties. "There are already procedures in place to avoid a potential conflict-of-interest among advisory board members, which makes this latest effort seem to be more about stacking the board with members who will support the new administration's deregulatory agenda," Robyn Wilson, one of the professors booted off the Science Advisory Board, said in a statement.

BISHOP WANTS CONGRESSIONAL SCRUTINY OF PARK FEES: Interior should not be able to unilaterally raise admission fees for national parks and should come to Congress annually to seek approval, Bishop told reporters Thursday. "Agencies should not be able to raise park fees independently, but I also have legislation to do away with all park fees so it's got to be somewhere in the middle of that," he said. "I'm insisting they have to have approval by us."

Democrats oppose Zinke's plan: That comes as 11 Natural Resources Democrats sent Zinke a letter Thursday opposing his plan to hike the fees at 17 national parks, which they said is "at odds" with Interior's mission to improve access to public lands. Link here.

WHEELER-ING AND DEALING: Dropping Kathleen Hartnett White's nomination to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality would "help" the Senate advance Andrew Wheeler's selection for EPA deputy, top Senate EPW Democrat Tom Carper told ME. "I'm interested in seeing what happens to Ms. White and I think if the administration wants to continue to push hard on that nomination, I think it makes progress on Andy Wheeler more difficult," he said. Many in the Democratic caucus are concerned with Wheeler's nomination as well, though Carper wouldn't say if he'd oppose the former EPW aide himself.

GOP TO PRUITT: WHAT'D YOU DO: Three senior Energy and Commerce Republicans aren't pleased with Pruitt's top 21 list of priority Superfund sites and want details on how he crafted it. "Members specifically asked you about the list, and despite many of the sites included being of particular concern to Committee Members, we did not receive any indication from you that these sites would be included," Greg Walden, Fred Upton and John Shimkus said in a letter. They also asked what Pruitt means by his pledge to have "direct engagement" on each of the sites.

NRDC HITS COMSTOCK: The Natural Resources Defense Council is launching a six-figure ad campaign within the Beltway media market over the holidays to hit Virginia Republican Rep. Barbara Comstock for her vote in favor of the tax bill that included a provision opening ANWR to drilling. Watch the ad here.

SWAPPED: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit said Thursday it would swap Obama appointee Judge Michelle Friedland for now-resigned Judge Alex Kozinski in the case of children seeking dramatic government action against greenhouse gas emissions. Remember Kozinski participated in oral arguments where the panel seemed skeptical of stopping the lawsuit at this point.

TAKING THE NEXT STEP: Pebble Limited Partnership today plans to kick off the permitting process for its controversial proposed gold and copper mine in Alaska by submitting an application with the Army Corps of Engineers, your ME host reports. That'll kick off the review under the National Environmental Policy Act. But look for opponents of the project, including green groups and salmon fisherman, to continue to vigorously contest it.

WAIT AND SEE ON TCE? The majority of industrial entities are waiting to see whether EPA ever follows through on its proposed ban of the cleaning solvent trichloroethylene rather than phasing out its use immediately, according to a report from Safer Chemicals Healthy Families released Thursday. EPA has moved to indefinitely delay the proposed ban on certain uses of TCE.

MOVER, SHAKER: Catherine McCabe, who briefly ran EPA after President Barack Obama left office but before Pruitt's confirmation, will be named commissioner of the New Jersey Department of Environmental Protection, POLITICO New Jersey's Ryan Hutchins reports. She'll have the task of restoring morale to the department and honoring Gov.-elect Phil Murphy's pledge to rejoin the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative within 100 days of assuming office. They'll also be working to undo what they see as years of deleterious actions under Gov. Chris Christie. "New Jersey's environmental leadership has been severely eroded," Murphy said.

Anna Aurilio leaves her post as director of Environment America's Washington office on Jan. 1. "I've been honored to help shape a growing movement to tackle the climate crisis and shift towards a 100% renewable energy future," she writes, adding she'll take a couple of months to plot her next move.

Congress clears funding bill, staving off shutdown Back

By Rachael Bade, John Bresnahan and Seung Min Kim | 12/20/2017 09:52 PM EDT

Congress passed a short-term government funding bill Thursday, ensuring that Washington will not face a shutdown just days before Christmas.

The House passed the measure, which would keep federal agencies open through Jan. 19, on a 231-188 vote. The Senate cleared it 66-32 soon after, giving congressional leaders and President Donald Trump another month to hash out a long-term spending deal for the remainder of fiscal 2018.

Lawmakers staved off a last-minute revolt from Democrats who threatened to vote against any funding measure if it didn't include legal protections for young undocumented immigrants who are losing work permits after Trump rescinded an Obama-era executive action. But the contentious issue is sure to return in January when the next round of spending talks resume.

"The Republican continuing resolution serves only to continue the anxiety in the lives of DREAMers, veterans, children and working families across America," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "It had been our hope not only to improve the quality of this bill but to add the DREAM Act to it, which enjoys strong bipartisan support from the American people."

The Congressional Hispanic Caucus met with Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer in an impromptu meeting earlier Thursday afternoon, pressing the New York Democrat to persuade his ranks to reject the funding bill. However, it was clear after the meeting that there would not be enough Democratic senators to block the bill later Thursday over immigration.

"Basically, Leader Schumer promised he'd urge the majority of senators to vote no, as many as possible," Rep. Darren Soto (D-Fla.) said. "And if we can't get it done now, we will lay it all on the line on the 19th when we come back in January."

The short-term funding bill also extends a federal surveillance program, includes money to continue the Children's Health Insurance Program through March and waives automatic cuts to Medicare and other programs, which were threatened because of the GOP tax bill's big deficit increase. The Senate voted to waive the automatic cuts 91-8 on Thursday.

The House also passed a massive $81 billion disaster aid package Thursday, after dozens of Democrats from states hit by hurricanes and wildfires backed the measure. Pelosi had signaled that members who have districts affected by disasters would not be asked to oppose the measure.

During a private meeting Thursday morning, Speaker Paul Ryan and his team secured support for the government funding bill from almost all Texas and Florida GOP lawmakers who represent areas pummeled by deadly hurricanes this summer. These lawmakers had told party leaders they didn't want to adjourn without passing the disaster aid package.

But the Senate had already signaled that it likely wouldn't approve the disaster aid bill this week due to Democratic opposition to the proposal, which was crafted by the GOP-led House Appropriations Committee.

"I don't think we have enough time to vote on disaster aid," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said. The package now looks likely to languish for weeks.

That left House GOP leaders wondering whether the powerful state delegations would band together and withhold their votes for government funding until the Senate changed course. It turned out, they wouldn't for fear it would cause a shutdown.

"My key issue is to make sure my agriculture community back home is heard," said Florida Republican Dennis Ross. "I can't control what the Senate is going to do, but I can control what I said I was going to do, and getting that supplemental passed is crucial."

Leadership also got some backup from President Donald Trump, who encouraged GOP lawmakers to support the continuing resolution.

"House Democrats want a SHUTDOWN for the holidays in order to distract from the very popular, just passed, Tax Cuts. House Republicans, don't let this happen. Pass the C.R. TODAY and keep our Government OPEN!" Trump tweeted Thursday morning.

With House Democrats united against a short-term spending plan that doesn't include their top priorities, Ryan had to rely on his divided conference to carry the bill over the finish line. GOP defense hawks and conservatives alike spent the previous 24 hours criticizing leadership's plan. But Republican leaders had been whipping votes since then and felt confident Thursday afternoon that they could secure the needed 217 Republican votes for passage.

"We're working through some final issues, but... we're going to pass our bills," said House Majority Whip Steve Scalise on Thursday morning, zipping past reporters on the way out of a meeting with the Texas and Florida lawmakers.

The fate of the disaster relief supplemental was initially less certain in the House, as GOP leaders knew they would not find 217 Republican votes for passage. They started reaching out to Democrats for help, with hope that Democrats from Texas and Florida will back the package.

On Wednesday night, House GOP leaders made changes to the hurricane relief bill in hopes of winning Democratic votes. The tweaks to the bill addressed the concerns of Democrats that Puerto Rico was not receiving sufficient help to recover from Hurricane Maria. They also offered to insert a provision stabilizing Medicaid programs in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, and suggested they could make additional tweaks to the bill.

The last-minute shuffle for votes shows just how difficult it is for Ryan to corral his fractured conference, even just hours after his biggest win as speaker. Hill Republicans celebrated passage of their most significant legislative achievement, tax reform, at the White House on Wednesday afternoon — only to return to the Hill to spar over thorny spending issues. Even though GOP leaders passed the funding bill Thursday, the House Republican conference remains frustrated by how the year-end scramble was handled. Those tensions were on full display during a Wednesday evening conference meeting, as Pentagon allies stood up and railed against Ryan's plan to fund the government until Jan. 19 without a full-year boost for the Pentagon.

House Armed Services Committee GOP members, including Austin Scott of Georgia, Liz Cheney of Wyoming and Mike Turner of Ohio, reminded leaders that they endorsed a yearlong military boost just two weeks ago and criticized their sudden change of course.

GOP leaders responded by telling the conference that there were not 217 votes to pass the original plan, which increased defense spending but left domestic funds flat. Texas and Florida Republicans whipped against the idea when it did not include their own hurricane funding. Then, when leaders added the provision, some conservatives flipped from yes to no because it was not paid for.

Ryan also told the conference that Defense Secretary James Mattis had given his blessing to a short-term funding plan. Rep. Ann Wagner of Missouri, who has a son in the military, also grew emotional when she argued that the House needed to pass a straight continuing resolution for the men and women in uniform.

Some House Freedom Caucus conservatives, meanwhile, balked at GOP leadership's plan to temporarily reauthorize the government's surveillance authority as part of the spending patch. Conservative sources suggested Wednesday, however, that the issue had been ironed out enough that some members could back the spending bill.

Pruitt bars EPA grant recipients from advisory positions Back

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt officially announced today he will bar scientists who receive agency grants from serving on EPA advisory boards, a move he said was designed to preserve the EPA's scientific integrity.

Pruitt's move will force some current scientific advisers to either give up funding or resign their board positions. Other open seats on the Science Advisory Board and Clean Air Scientific Advisory Committee are being filled by employees of fossil fuel and chemicals industries or red state environmental offices, according to an unconfirmed list of new appointees. The changes also affect the Board of Scientific Counselors, EPA said in a press release.

Pruitt announced new chairs of the three boards but said he will make other new members public in the next week.

Michael Honeycutt, of the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, will head SAB, while Tony Cox, a statistician from Cox Associates, will head CASAC, which is required by law to suggest air quality limits based on science. Paul Gilman, chief sustainability officer at Covanta and a former EPA official under President George W. Bush, will head the BOSC.

Current members who may lose their spots say the changes are meant to stack the boards with industry-financed individuals who support Pruitt's deregulatory efforts. John Walke, senior attorney and clean air director for the Natural Resources Defense Council said the biggest credential Cox has is "a very, very public record of testifying against public air quality standards."

Pruitt said that current members of the committees received $77 million from EPA grants.

The announcement came with a memo and draft directive.

EPA announces 21 Superfund sites to prioritize Back

By Emily Holden | 12/08/2017 04:13 PM EDT

EPA has named 21 Superfund sites on its priority list for cleanup.

The list follows recommendations from a task force convened this summer. Administrator Scott Pruitt had previously said he would make a top-10 list of sites that needed the most attention.

"The list is designed to spur action at sites where opportunities exist to act quickly and comprehensively," EPA said in a press release. "The Administrator will receive regular updates on each of these sites."

There are more than 1,300 of the toxic waste sites around the country, and environmental advocates have warned that prioritizing just a few may take resources away from others and allow Pruitt to provide resources in states run by his political allies.

The new list includes sites in red states but also in New England and on the West Coast. It includes the San Jacinto Superfund site in the Houston area, which was damaged by flooding during Hurricane Harvey. EPA has already ordered two companies to pay $115 million for cleanup efforts there.

Judges appear skeptical of stopping kids' climate lawsuit early Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/11/2017 02:51 PM EDT

Two appellate judges today hinted they believe a lawsuit brought by children seeking dramatic government action against greenhouse gas emissions should be allowed to continue, even as they raised significant questions about whether the suit can succeed.

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments today after the Trump administration asked it to take the unusual step of blocking the matter from reaching a trial phase. The Trump administration says the children do not have standing to bring the lawsuit.

But two of the 9th Circuit judges expressed skepticism at the unprecedented step of getting involved at this stage.

Judge Marsha Berzon, a Clinton appointee, said the suit is troublingly broad, but acknowledged that lawsuits are often narrowed at trial. "I would hope if this case did go forward that it would be pared down and focused and directed at particular orders or agencies," said Berzon.

Chief Judge Sidney Thomas, another Clinton appointee, said stopping the case now would mean the court would be "flooded" with similar requests for all kinds of suits.

Meanwhile, Judge Alex Kozinski, a Reagan appointee, appeared skeptical of the case's future, opining about what would happen if the Trump administration defied a court order to act and questioning the children's standing to sue.

Thomas also raised concerns about whether the children can plausibly seek relief over such a complex issue. Their attorney argued that courts have ordered the government to take wide-ranging action before, as with school desegregation.

WHAT'S NEXT: If the 9th Circuit lets the suit move forward, discovery will resume and a new trial date will be set, likely for sometime next year.

Company behind Pebble Mine to start permitting process Friday Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/21/2017 04:15 PM EDT

Pebble Limited Partnership announced it would kick off the permitting process for its controversial proposed gold and copper mine in Alaska with an application to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers on Friday.

It's a significant step forward for the Pebble Mine project, which was left on life support when then-President Barack Obama's administration restricted certain waters from being used as mining disposal sites back in 2014. The application Friday begins the review process under the National Environmental Policy Act.

"We have listened to our stakeholders, supporters, and skeptics, and are presenting a much smaller mine with enhanced environmental safeguards," Pebble CEO Tom Collier said in a statement.

Opponents of the mine, which include salmon fishermen and environmental advocates, vowed to continue their fight against its construction.

"Our scientists will review the documents closely and we will demand close public scrutiny," Chris Wood, CEO of Trout Unlimited, said in a statement. "But the science is already clear that mining the Pebble deposit will cause irreparable damage to the nation's most significant salmon fishery."

WHAT'S NEXT: The permit application is expected to be filed with the Army Corps of Engineers on Friday.

ON THE PRECIPICE: House lawmakers have to vote again this morning after procedural snafus in the Senate, but the Republican tax package H.R. 1 \(115\) now on a glide path to passage will realize the GOP's long-held objective of opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil and gas drilling. "It's a very special day," Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski told reporters before the vote. What seemed like a pipe dream just months ago turned into reality despite the vehement objections of Democrats and environmental groups. As written, the legislation calls for Interior to hold two lease sales for drilling in ANWR over the next decade and is estimated to raise $1 billion over that period (though critics say those estimates are unrealistically rosy). The final tax package spares the solar and wind industries from provisions in earlier iterations they worried would cripple their sectors (reminder on those provisions here).

For the record: Six of the 12 House Republicans who signed a letter opposing ANWR drilling — Carlos Curbelo, Dave Reichert, Ryan Costello, Brian Fitzpatrick, Pat Meehan and Mark Sanford — voted in favor of the tax bill on Tuesday. In addition, 24 of the 31 GOP members of the Climate Solutions Caucus backed the package. That prompted Climate Hawks Vote to call for the group's dissolution: "With today's vote, the Climate Solutions Caucus has demonstrated its nihilism. The Democratic members of the caucus are only providing political cover for consistent Republican votes for climate destruction," RL Miller, the group's president, said in a statement.

Spotted: Murkowski sporting "Incredible Hulk" earrings and a scarf ahead of the final tax vote in tribute to the late-Sen. Ted Stevens, who spent decades trying to open ANWR to oil and gas drilling (and famously wore a "Hulk" tie ahead of tough policy battles). "I can't ever think about the ANWR debate without thinking about Ted," she told reporters, adding she met with her father, former Sen. Frank Murkowski, and Rep. Don Young to celebrate the impending victory in the decades-long fight. Picture via E&E's Geof Koss here.

ANWR opponents aren't giving up: Environmental groups and lawmakers, including Sen. Ed Markey, will "discuss what comes next" in the drilling fight during a press call this morning at 11 a.m. And top Senate Energy Democrat Maria Cantwell took to the floor to note that "[w]e didn't create the Arctic coastal plain, but I can tell you this— we cannot re-create it. What we're doing today is taking a step towards destroying it."

Bashed: Majority Whip John Cornyn slammed a report he personally inserted a provision to give deductions to investors in master limited partnerships that are widely used in the oil and gas business and specific lawmakers as "more fake news."

WHERE WE STAND ON THE CR: Amid opposition within their own ranks, House

Republicans are changing strategy again and plan to extend funding until Jan. 19 for the whole government, POLITICO's John Bresnahan and Rachael Bade report. A $81 billion disaster relief package, which faces surprisingly strong opposition, will get its own separate vote.

Meanwhile, The Senate is poised to load up its stopgap spending package with a host of goodies, including tens of billions in disaster relief spending, Cornyn told reporters Tuesday. But as Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief's Sarah Ferris reports, some House members say they will draw a hard line against potential Senate add-ons. "If they expect we're going to automatically accept it, that's about as smart as us thinking they're going to automatically accept what we send over," Tom Cole said.

Cornyn seemed pretty favorable to the House's $81 billion disaster relief package, though he suggested changes were possible. "The amount is pretty generous but the need is tremendous — and it ranges all across the country from the wildfires out west to the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, Florida, Texas and Louisiana," he said. "So we'll take a look at it and see whether it reflects the Senate's priorities but we ought to be able to work certainly within that number."

How long will we be here? That depends on who you ask. "We're prepared to be here as long as it takes," Cornyn said. Others bet on a quicker fold. "I actually believe that we'll send the Senate our thing, they'll adjust it, and ping it back to us, and we'll pass it," House appropriator Mike Simpson said.

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NEI's Jonathan Rund correctly named nine House members as being 80 or older. For today: Minnesota is slated to have both senators up for election in 2018 with Sen. Al Franken's forthcoming resignation. When was the last time a state had both seats up in the same year? SMALL PAYMENT, BIG IMPLICATIONS: Interior got back $275 from the Virgin Islands Republican Party for an appearance Secretary Ryan Zinke made last spring at a fundraiser, a small payback with big legal weight, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. That's because the payment may shield Zinke from accusations that his appearance at the event where donors paid as much as $5,000 per couple violated the Hatch Act, which prohibits government officials from using taxpayer resources to advance partisan causes. "The invoice was calculated to cover the political activities portion of the Secretary's travel to the USVI in accordance with Hatch Act regulations," spokeswoman Heather Swift said. "There is a formula used to determine what percentage of a given trip the political event makes up, and how much to reimburse."

But questions remain: The Virgin Islands Republican Party hasn't listed donations in its March and April FEC reports matching the amounts solicited for the fundraiser or from people on the guest list, making it impossible to know who shelled out big bucks for a picture with a Trump administration Cabinet official. The Caribbean fundraiser, which occurred during a three-day official trip by Zinke to the island chain, is his only political event so far for which FEC filings show the Interior Department as having received reimbursement. Zinke has appeared at more than a dozen events with former campaign donors or conservative activists while traveling on official business, including at least four fundraisers for politicians or PACs, only two of which Interior says required reimbursements. But still, "they may be in technical compliance with the law, but from appearance's perspective there could be abuse," Virginia Canter of the group Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington told Ben.

ON THE CLOCK: EPA has until Jan. 12 to give a federal appeals court a timeline "with precision and specificity" for when it will issue a final rule identifying remaining parts of the U.S. that meet its tightened 2015 ozone standard, according to a Tuesday order. Democratic attorneys general, as well as environmental and public health groups, have sued the agency for not meeting a statutory deadline to identify whether many of the urban and downwind regions in the country meet the standard.

SEEMS LIKE A BIG DEAL: New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo backed a push Tuesday to divest the state's $200 billion pension fund from all fossil fuel investments, POLITICO New York's Marie J. French reports. He suggested no timeline for the divestment from fossil fuel companies but also called for the fund to stop any new investments in businesses with "significant fossil fuel-related activities." But state Comptroller Tom DiNapoli, a long-time divestment opponent, did not support the move in a statement even as he vowed the fund would increase its low-carbon emission index fund investments.

LAWMAKERS PRESS TRUMP FOR 'STRONG' SOLAR REMEDY: About a dozen members of Congress are calling on President Donald Trump to take "strong and effective" action to protect the U.S. solar industry against foreign competition that they said could undermine U.S. energy independence. "In order to ensure electrical grid security, the U.S. cannot afford to become dependent on imports from China and other countries for cutting-edge [crystalline photovoltaic] solar cell and module technology," Sens. Ron Wyden, Jeff Merkley and Sherrod Brown said in a letter to Trump. Eight House lawmakers sent a nearly identical letter making the same argument.

Trump faces a decision by the end of January on whether to restrict imports of solar cells and modules from around the world to give the U.S. industry time to become more competitive. The U.S. International Trade Commission has already recommended relief in an "emergency safeguard" case brought by Georgia-based Suniva and Oregon-based SolarWorld, but it is up to Trump to decide what, if any, action to take. "We urge you to impose a strong and effective remedy that will ensure a growing and competitive U.S. CSPV solar cell and module manufacturing industry and promote robust growth across our entire domestic solar industry," the lawmakers wrote.

FILL EM' UP? Murkowski said she's disappointed the Trump administration has yet to fill a host of "pretty high-profile" positions throughout the administration, such as leaders for the Fish & Wildlife Service, BLM and National Park Service. "We need to have these positions filled," she said, adding there are efforts afoot to clear some slots under the Energy Committee's jurisdiction via consent before the end of the year.

That Strange situation: There hasn't been any word about who will fill the slot of outgoing Alabama Sen. Luther Strange on the energy panel, Murkowski said, adding she expected Republican leadership would figure that out over the holiday break.

PROBE SOUGHT IN NOW-AXED CONTRACT: The Environmental Defense Fund asked EPA's inspector general to look into the agency's now-canceled contract with Definers Public Affairs for media monitoring services. "Although EPA reportedly intends to terminate its contract with Definers in light of widespread concern, a full investigation is essential to determine whether EPA's multifaceted interactions with Definers and its affiliates has led to improper uses of agency resources," the group wrote. Link here.

TRY AGAIN: Top Senate EPW Democrat Tom Carper said Tuesday he'll force the administration to resubmit the nomination of Kathleen Hartnett White to run the Council on Environmental Quality next year, your ME host reports. "Unqualified or controversial nominees will not simply be rubber-stamped by the Senate," he said in a statement. Senators typically allow nominees not confirmed by the end of the first year of a congressional term to remain pending without forcing them to be renominated.

First Republican expresses unease: Maine Republican Sen. Susan Collins told ME she'd viewed a clip White's confirmation hearing that "raised a lot of issues in my mind" but said she's not examined her record in-depth.

WON'T PAY FOR THIS: The Georgia Public Service Commission released a proposed order Tuesday that would prevent nearly $500 million in costs from Georgia Power's Vogtle nuclear project from being passed on to consumers, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "Basic fairness dictates that ratepayers should not have to pay for those excessive costs of the Project over which [Georgia Power] had some level of control," the proposed order reads. The commission is expected to vote on the order Thursday morning.

HEARING WATCH: A Senate EPW subcommittee looks at freight transportation today at 10 a.m. ME expects Monday's fatal accident in Washington state could dominate the discussion, but would also be on the lookout for discussion of the Trump administration's push to roll back Obama-era safety regulations for trains carrying crude oil. Watch here.

THANKS, NO THANKS: Citing "little hope you are working in good faith," the head of Patagonia pointedly declined the House Natural Resources Committee invitation to testify before the panel in a letter Tuesday. "I find it disingenuous that after unethically using taxpayers' resources to call us liars, you would ask me to testify in front of a committee for a matter already decided by the administration," founder Yvon Chouinard wrote. "It is clear the House Committee on Natural Resources, like many committees in this failed Orwellian government, is shackled to special interests of oil, gas and mining."

MAIL CALL! HERE'S SOME IDEAS ON PERMITTING: The National Association of Clean Air Agencies sent a letter to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt on Tuesday offering "principles and recommendations" for the agency to consider as it mulls tweaks to its Clean Air Act permitting programs. Read it here.

NOT LOOKING GOOD: Three freshmen House Democrats said Tuesday they doubted the administration would make a host of changes to NAFTA, including significantly strengthening environmental provisions, to secure their support, Pro Trade's Doug Palmer reports. "I'm not seeing a lot of hope," Rep. Pramila Jayapal said at a press conference on Capitol Hill with Reps. Jamie Raskin and Ro Khanna.

ICYMI: The White House suffered an embarrassing defeat as former Rep. Scott Garrett's selection to run the Export-Import Bank went down 10-13 in the Senate Banking Committee

Senate passes tax bill, teeing up final House vote Back

By Brian Faler | 12/19/2017 11:45 AM EDT

The Senate cleared the Republican tax overhaul early Wednesday, putting the GOP on the cusp of the major legislative victory that has eluded it all year.

The sweeping $1.5 trillion package of tax cuts and tax code revisions will have to go back to the House for another vote later Wednesday after a procedural glitch in the Senate. But that vote is considered a formality, and President Donald Trump is expected to sign the bill before the week is out.

"From a Republican point of view, this is as good as it gets and we're more than happy to take our argument [for the tax bill] to the American people in an election contest," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said in an interview with POLITICO before the chamber's 51-48 vote.

Democrats have vowed to make the legislation a liability for Republicans going into the 2018 mid-term election, arguing most of its benefits will go to wealthy individuals and corporations.

President Donald Trump sent out an early morning tweet hailing the Senate's passage of the tax plan, which includes a repeal of Obamacare's requirement that people have health insurance or face a fine.

"The United States Senate just passed the biggest in history Tax Cut and Reform Bill. Terrible Individual Mandate (ObamaCare) Repealed. Goes to the House tomorrow morning for final vote. If approved, there will be a News Conference at The White House at approximately 1:00 P.M.," Trump wrote.

The procedural glitch put a damper on Republican plans to get the bill to Trump on Tuesday. House Republicans were barely done celebrating their initial 227-203 vote in favor of the legislation when word spread that several provisions of the bill ran afoul of Senate rules. That meant the Senate had to remove those provisions, approve the bill and send it back to the House for another vote.

One offending provision involved using tax-advantaged college savings accounts for home schooling expenses. Another - important to McConnell — would have protected Kentucky's private Berea College from a proposed excise tax on university endowment earnings.

The stumble was an embarrassment for Republicans. It also played into the hands of Democrats who complain the legislation has been moving so quickly through the Capitol that it's been poorly vetted.

"The House revote is the latest evidence of just how shoddily written the GOP tax scam really is," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a statement after it was clear the chamber would have to take another vote.

But McConnell called the problem "a couple of little glitches" in an interview with Fox News, and it didn't appear to slow the bill's momentum at all.

The swift pace of final action underscores Republicans' determination to wrap up the tax bill by their self-imposed year-end deadline and before Democrat Doug Jones is seated as Alabama's new senator. Republicans also need to turn to other matters this week, notably keeping the government running beyond a Friday deadline.

For House Speaker Paul Ryan, the legislation is the culmination of a career-long pursuit of overhauling the tax code.

"This is a day I have looked forward to for a very long time," he said on the House floor Tuesday. "Today is about how much better things can be: More jobs, fairer taxes and bigger paychecks. Faster growth and real upward mobility. A strong economy that makes all of us stronger."

Democrats scoffed, calling the legislation a giveaway to the rich.

"The bill provides crumbs and tax hikes for middle-class families in this country, and a Christmas gift to major corporations and billionaire investors," said Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer. "How can Republicans defend this? The only people who want it are their very wealthy paymasters."

House Republicans were largely united on the bill in Tuesday's vote, a departure from the usual drama in the chamber over major legislation, which often gets tripped up by hardline conservatives.

Still, 12 House GOP lawmakers voted against the bill, all but one from high-tax New York, New Jersey and California. They objected to how the legislation scaled back a state and local tax writeoff, which they complained would mean tax hikes for many of their constituents.

The legislation would be the biggest tax rewrite in decades, and would slash the corporate tax rate for the first time in 30 years, overhaul the taxation of both small and large businesses and reduce rates on individuals.

With an eye toward next year's midterm elections, Republicans are emphasizing the millions - 80 percent of taxpayers, according to the independent Tax Policy Center - who would see a tax cut next year. The average break would total $2,100, the group said Monday, though the benefits would vary widely by income.

Democrats are emphasizing how much of the cuts would accrue to the highest earners along with the minority of taxpayers - about 5 percent, according to the Tax Policy Center - who would pay more next year under the plan.

Americans are broadly skeptical of the tax plan.

One new poll shows low overall public support for the bill, but strong backing among Republicans. Only 33 percent of all respondents to a CNN poll released Tuesday supported the plan, but among just Republican respondents support stood at 76 percent. Democratic opposition was overwhelming: 89 percent.

Republicans got slightly better news from a new POLITICO/Morning Consult poll. The survey shows 42 percent of voters support the legislation and 39 percent oppose it, with another 18 percent undecided.

McConnell dismissed the polling.

"If we can't sell this to the American people we ought to go into another line of work," he said after the Senate vote. "I think it's a little easier to sell that you have more money in your pocket than the government running the health care system."

Lawmakers are sure to continue battling over the legislation long after Trump inks it into law.

The plan would make the government's budget outlook substantially worse, adding $1.456 trillion to a debt that's already nearly doubled over the past decade. Federal red ink is now at the highest levels it's been since the government was paying down its World War II debts, and that's sure to stoke calls to rein in the deficit.

Democrats are already accusing Republicans of using the worsening debt as a pretext for controversial cuts in government entitlement programs.

What's more, much of the Republican plan is only temporary, with many provisions beginning to expire after next year. Most of the individual breaks would be gone by 2026, ensuring ongoing battles over their fate, much like lawmakers wrestled for years over what to do with George W. Bush's tax cuts or their annual practice of extending dozens of expiring tax breaks.

The plan may also alter Republicans' relationship with the IRS. For years they've beaten up on the tax agency, yet they are now relying on it to implement their proposal. In section after section, their plan delegates authority to the IRS to figure out the details of how the provisions would work, an increased workload that will make it harder for lawmakers to continue pounding on the agency politically and slashing its budget.

For taxpayers, the bill will mean major - and sudden - changes in policy, most of which will take effect on New Year's Day. The bill would hit urban areas particularly hard through cuts to the mortgage interest deduction, a long-standing break for state and local taxes, subsidies for public transportation, and a key funding method for roads and other public projects.

But because the bill was largely written in secret - a final draft was only released last Friday - tax experts are still poring through the legislation trying to understand the changes.

Solar, wind get reprieve in final tax bill Back

By Eric Wolff and Ben Lefebvre | 12/15/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The conference tax bill released Friday by Congressional Republicans resolves a slew of issues faced by the energy industry.

— Wind and solar credits saved: The final tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), follows the Senate's bill when it comes to the production tax credit and the solar tax credit, meaning both are left untouched. The House bill had proposed reducing the value of the PTC and changing when a project qualified for it, and it had proposed dropping the permanent 10 percent credit for the ITC. Both credits will phase down as agreed to in a deal struck in 2015.

— MLP benefits added: It also includes language Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) proposed that would give deductions to investors in master limited partnerships, the corporate structure for many pipeline companies.

— EVs roll on: A tax credit for electric vehicles was preserved.

— Oil recovery restored: Credits for abandoned oil wells and enhanced oil recovery that were eliminated in the House version were restored in the final bill.

— Selling off the oil: The bill retains the Senate language that would sell up to $600 million in Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil to offset any shortfall from opening up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling. The Senate language forecast drilling in ANWR would generate $1 billion in revenue over 10 years, an estimate critics have said is too optimistic.

— More revenue sharing: The bill also temporarily lifts offshore Gulf of Mexico oil and gas production revenue sharing caps to $650 million annually for fiscal years 2020 and 2021, up from a previous limit of $500 million, to support coastal restoration and protection projects.

— Base erosion eased for renewables: Tax writers created some room to keep banks and other financiers of renewable projects in the game by allowing them to take 80 percent of the credits for the PTC and the ITC.

— No tax extenders: Numerous senators have been saying it for weeks now, and the bill makes it official: None of the expired tax credits for small wind, fuel cells, and other "orphans" made it into the conference bill. The extension of the nuclear tax credit that was in the House bill has also been dropped.

— Utilities still get to deduct interest: The bill preserves provisions in both the House and Senate versions that allowed utilities to continue to deduct interest on loans without the limitation placed on other businesses.

House Republicans ditch partisan spending plan ahead of shutdown Back

By John Bresnahan and Rachael Bade | 12/19/2017 10:32 PM EDT

Facing opposition within their own ranks — and a potential government shutdown — House Republicans are once again changing their strategy on a funding bill.

Gone is the plan for a bill funding the Pentagon for the rest of the fiscal year and other government agencies until mid-January. Now House Republicans will extend funding only until Jan. 19 for the whole government, hoping the new strategy will produce enough support to stave off a funding lapse come midnight Friday.

A massive $81 billion disaster aid bill will be broken out and have a separate vote. There is surprisingly strong opposition to that package, which was unveiled by the House Appropriations Committee only on Monday.

It is still unclear whether GOP leaders will include funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program as part of the new funding bill. And while some defense programs are expected to get a boost under the plan, those details are still under wraps.

A proposal to reauthorize so-called Section 702 spying powers under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act will go as a standalone bill as well.

A Senate plan to add bipartisan Obamacare stabilization funds to the funding bill — known as a continuing resolution — looks dead on arrival in the House. That is likely to spur a tense legislative back-and-forth in the final hours before funding is set to expire this week.

The change in direction shows once again how difficult it is for House Speaker Paul Ryan to get anything through the House, especially if he is relying on GOP votes alone.

Republican House leaders had planned to hold a vote Wednesday on the initial funding bill, seen as a way to placate the party's most conservative members. But after deciding to tack on billions of dollars in disaster aid — with all that money set to add directly to the deficit — those same members ultimately reneged on commitments of support.

Now, House GOP leaders hope to vote on all these bills on Thursday, and then adjourn, leaving the Senate to finish up consideration of the measures. Top Republicans believe Senate Democrats will accept the plan and avoid a government shutdown, or having to return to Washington next week.

For their part, Democrats are already jumping at the opportunity to note the GOP's miscalculation.

"Republican leadership is so preoccupied with their tax giveaway to corporations and contributors that they managed to get surprised by this — the most predictable train wreck in history," said Matt Dennis, Democratic communications director for the House Appropriations Committee.

Senate to pack stopgap bill with CHIP, disaster aid, Obamacare subsidy fix Back

By Sarah Ferris | 12/19/2017 04:18 PM EDT

Senate GOP leaders are planning to load up this week's must-pass spending bill with contentious provisions ranging from Obamacare subsidies to surveillance powers, the No. 2 Republican said Tuesday.

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) told reporters Tuesday afternoon that the stopgap spending bill would serve as a catchall for a spate of "must-do" policy items — offering the clearest signal yet of the chamber's plan to avoid a shutdown on Friday.

Cornyn's checklist includes broadly bipartisan initiatives like funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program, disaster recovery dollars and veterans' health care.

But it also includes thorny issues like a funding fix for Obamacare cost-sharing subsidies and a renewal of the cyber surveillance tools authorized under Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The Senate's stopgap bill would also include procedural language to avert massive cuts to social programs next year, under Congress' PAYGO rule, Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) told POLITICO on Tuesday.

Both chambers must agree to waive those cuts — triggered by the GOP's costly tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\) — by mid-January to avoid cuts to mandatory programs like Medicare and farm subsidies.

The Senate's funding strategy, which has been buried amid the furious scramble for a tax bill, threatens an eleventh-hour showdown with the House.

Government funding expires Friday, and congressional leaders are facing a half-dozen daunting deadlines before they leave for a weeklong Christmas break.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell hinted at those must-resolve items Monday night, though he did not specifically say they would all be added to the government funding bill.

House Republicans are planning to vote Wednesday on a stopgap spending bill that looks substantially different from the Senate's plan. The vehicle for that continuing resolution is expected to be H.R. 1370 \(115\).

But Cornyn rejected the House plan outright.

"I doubt, unfortunately, that will survive," Cornyn told reporters. "We've got to do the math, get 60 votes."

Under pressure from their far-right flank, House GOP leaders have crafted a bill that includes a full year of funding for the Pentagon, with a patch through Jan. 19 for domestic programs. It includes a massive $81 billion disaster funding bill, but it leaves out almost every other policy item on the Senate GOP's list.

The House would fund CHIP, but it would include partisan pay-fors that Democrats have already rejected.

The only item that both House and Senate Republicans have agreed to punt is the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program. Some Democrats, however, are still demanding a fix by year's end.

House Speaker Paul Ryan warned members in a closed-door meeting Tuesday morning that their funding bill is likely to be altered in the Senate.

But some House members say they will draw a hard line against potential Senate add-ons.

"If they expect we're going to automatically accept it, that's about as smart as us thinking they're going to automatically accept what we send over," Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) said.

There are big questions remaining about how exactly the Senate would pay for the CHIP funding and which version of the Section 702 renewal would be included.

"My suspicion is, probably what we're going to be looking at is a short-term extension," Cornyn said about the 702 surveillance powers.

When asked if the funding bill could clear both chambers before the deadline, Cornyn replied: "We're prepared to be here as long as it takes."

Interior reimbursed for Zinke Virgin Island fundraiser, but contributions unaccounted for Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/19/2017 06:57 PM EDT

Taxpayers have been reimbursed for Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's participation in a political fundraiser last spring in the Virgin Islands — but questions remain about the donations he helped solicit, according to campaign finance records and interviews.

The Virgin Islands Republican Party repaid on Oct. 5 the Interior Department $275 for expenses related to Zinke's appearance, according to recent federal campaign finance filings. Despite its small sum, the reimbursement carries significant legal implications. And it came on the same day POLITICO first reported that Zinke was the featured guest at the March 30 fundraiser, where records indicate that donors paid as much as $5,000 per couple for a chance to pose for a photo with the secretary.

The Virgin Islands Republican Party — a political action committee nominally based in the islands but run by a Washington-area GOP consultant — did not list any donations matching those amounts in its Federal Election Commission reports for March and April. That makes it impossible to know who may have paid thousands of dollars for access to a member of President Donald Trump's Cabinet, whose office has refused to provide advanced schedules of his travels and appearances.

Still, the reimbursement may be enough to protect Zinke from accusations that his Virgin Islands appearance violated the Hatch Act, which prohibits government officials from using taxpayer resources to advance partisan causes. Zinke is facing multiple investigations for his pattern of mixing politics and official business during taxpayer-funded travels.

The Caribbean fundraiser, which occurred during a three-day official trip by Zinke to the island chain, is his only political event so far for which the Interior Department has received reimbursement.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the department invoiced the VIGOP PAC for the amount. Swift did not reply to questions as to the timing of Interior's request for reimbursement.

"The invoice was calculated to cover the political activities portion of the secretary's travel to the USVI in accordance with Hatch Act regulations," Swift said. "There is a formula used to determine what percentage of a given trip the political event makes up, and how much to reimburse."

Swift said Interior had not sought reimbursement related to Zinke's stop at a fundraiser for Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska) at an Anchorage steakhouse, or his attendance at a ski resort weekend organized by the leadership PAC of Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.), which POLITICO previously reported. The amount of time Zinke spent at the Young fundraiser did not meet the minimum required to merit repayment under Hatch Act regulations, and Interior did not require reimbursement for the fundraiser in Montana because Zinke was on his personal time, Swift said.

Zinke also attended a July fundraiser for Republican Rep. Greg Walden in Oregon, which was reported in a local media account from the time. Swift said Interior has issued an invoice to Walden's campaign for that trip. The campaign's most recent FEC disclosures, which run through Sept. 30, do not show any payments to Interior.

The independent Office of Special Counsel, which investigates possible Hatch Act violations, has said in previous cases that timely reimbursement of the government's expenses is sufficient to avoid violating federal regulations that prohibit taxpayer dollars from paying for political activity. OSC, which declined to comment, is one of several agencies investigating Zinke's political activities.

Federal employees can face reprimands or even lose their jobs for violating the Hatch Act, but it is up to the president to decide how to punish violations by presidential appointees. OSC found that two members of former President Barack Obama's Cabinet had violated the Hatch Act, but neither faced major penalties.

Interior "should not be paying for any of Zinke's political travel," said Brendan Fischer, director of the bipartisan watchdog group Campaign Legal Center's federal and FEC reform program. "That being said, there is certainly a pattern of Zinke and other administration officials mixing official and political business, which the inspector general is looking into. Public resources are supposed to be used to advance the public interest, not to coddle political donors."

Besides reimbursing Interior for Zinke's appearance, VIGOP also paid $875 for catering for a "VIGOP event" on March 30, according to FEC documents. That suggested the federal PAC was the one raising contributions at the event, Fischer said. But it does not appear to have disclosed at least some contributions associated with the appearance, something Fischer said could be a violation of campaign finance laws.

VIGOP has a murky relationship with the U.S. territory's official Republican Party organization, which has been riven by its own internal conflicts in recent years. The FEC classifies VIGOP as a nonparty PAC and lists its treasurer as Scott B. Mackenzie, a D.C.-area political operative who declined to comment when reached by POLITICO.

Zinke has for years worked with the VIGOP, attending at least two of its meetings on the island while he was a Montana congressman. Zinke's own fundraising organizations spent millions of dollars on a group of political operatives tied to the PAC, including direct mailing company Forthright Strategies, whom Republicans have accused of preying on small donors. POLITICO first reported a week before the reimbursement on Zinke's use of a charter flight to travel to the islands on official business.

The chairman of the territorial Republican Party, John Canegata, said the fundraiser had been the work of the territorial party, not the PAC, and would be listed in reports filed with the Virgin Islands' election committee.

"All our donations, we will put that together in a form they provide and give that to them at the end of the year," Canegata told POLITICO.

Campaign finance reports for groups registered with the islands' government are due in June and December of each year, a spokeswoman for Election Services of the Virgin Islands said. Money raised at a March fundraiser would have had to have been reported on the June disclosure report, the spokeswoman said.

VIGOP is not officially part of the Virgin Island Republican Party structure and is not registered with the Elections System of the Virgin Islands as a fundraising organization, said Genevieve Whitaker, deputy supervisor of elections for the agency's St. Croix district.

Other Republicans in the Virgin Islands Republican territorial committee have complained about Canegata's relationship with Mackenzie's VIGOP, saying very little, if any, of the money Mackenzie's organization raises gets distributed to the party or candidates.

The committee also complained that Canegata signed a contract in 2013, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO, identifying VIGOP as a client of Base Connect, a direct mail fundraising company that other Republicans have accused of exploiting small donors. Political committees linked to Zinke have long done business with many of the same political consultants as VIGOP.

An invitation for the March 30 event in St. Croix solicited donations of up to $5,000 per couple to be event "patrons" or $1,500 to be part of its "host committee." According to Zinke's schedule, he participated in a photo line with donors in those categories. But no donations in VIGOP's federal campaign finance reports match the names of 10 other individuals listed as guests of honor on the invitation, which was obtained by POLITICO.

VIGOP reported 88 donations in March and April, mostly between $100 and $500 apiece. Three donations of $1,000 were the largest received in those months.

However, VIGOP's decision to reimburse Interior may insulate Zinke from some potential sanctions associated with his political behavior, judging by previous cases.

The Office of Special Counsel in 2012 determined that then-Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius had violated the Hatch Act by endorsing Obama's reelection and a local gubernatorial candidate during a speech in North Carolina at a gala for the Human Rights Campaign, where she was appearing on official business.

After HHS began receiving media inquiries about the speech, it reclassified the event as political and sought reimbursement from Obama's campaign and the Democratic National Committee. While the OSC said her remarks themselves violated the Hatch Act, it determined that HHS had satisfied requirements that the government be reimbursed for costs associated with political appearances.

In 2016, OSC determined that then-Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro had violated the law when he endorsed Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign in an interview with Yahoo News anchor Katie Couric.

Since joining Trump's Cabinet in March, Zinke has appeared at more than a dozen events with former campaign donors or conservative activists while traveling on official business, including at least four fundraisers for politicians or PACs, according to a POLITICO review of his schedule, event invitations, Interior Department emails and other documents.

The sort of mixing of official business with political activity that Zinke has engaged in could lead to an ethical breach even if it is legal, said Virginia Canter, executive branch ethics counsel for good-governance watchdog group Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington.

"What you become very concerned about is if you see the political activity driving the official activity," Canter said. "They may be in technical compliance with the law, but from appearance's perspective there could be abuse."

Zinke is under investigation by OSC and the Interior Department's inspector general. The FEC has separately raised questions about VIGOP's spending and is looking into Zinke's former leadership PAC, which relied on many of the same political consultants as the VIGOP.

GOP firm ends controversial media monitoring contract with EPA Back

By Emily Holden | 12/19/2017 02:32 PM EDT

The Republican media monitoring firm Definers Public Affairs canceled its $120,000 contract with Environmental Protection Agency after a media backlash because of the company's links to GOP opposition research firm America Rising.

Earlier this year, America Rising filed several Freedom of Information Act requests for communications from EPA career staffers who had been critical of Administrator Scott Pruitt or President Donald Trump. That included email sent by John O'Grady, a top union official at the EPA, that "mentions or refers to President Trump."

News reports about the two efforts to monitor news coverage about the agency and dig up information about dissenting staffers stirred new accusations that Pruitt is fostering an atmosphere of paranoia and distrust at EPA.

Definers described the decision to end the contract as mutual, although EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox would not say whether the agency or company initiated the cancellation.

Definers President Joe Pounder said in a written statement that previous administrations paid more for slower services, but "it's become clear this will become a distraction. As a result, Definers and the EPA have decided to forgo the contract." He added that the firm will not offer its services to any other federal agencies.

Mother Jones first reported on the contract, and The New York Times documented the ties between Definers and America Rising, which was also started by Pounder.

Carper to force White House to renominate White in 2018 Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/19/2017 04:50 PM EDT

Sen. Tom Carper, top Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee, said today that he will force the Trump administration to renominate Kathleen Hartnett White to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality in 2018.

"Unqualified or controversial nominees will not simply be rubber-stamped by the Senate," Carper said in a statement. "Let's start the new year off with a clean slate and allow President Trump the opportunity to nominate a leader for the Council on Environmental Quality who takes environmental laws and public health protections seriously."

Senators typically allow nominees not confirmed by the end of the first year of a congressional term to remain pending without forcing them to be renominated. But Carper said White's controversial views on climate change and other environmental matters means she shouldn't be afforded that courtesy.

That comes as the first Republican senator expressed unease with White's nomination. Sen. Susan Collins told POLITICO she had viewed a clip of her confirmation hearing that "raised a lot of issues in my mind" but said she's not examined her record in-depth.

WHAT'S NEXT: Carper said he plans to object to any unanimous consent motions that would keep White's nomination pending after Congress adjourns for the year. That would force the White House to resubmit the nomination in 2018.

Georgia PSC staff issue proposed order curbing Vogtle cost recovery Back

By Darius Dixon | 12/19/2017 04:53 PM EDT

Staff at the Georgia Public Service Commission released a proposed order this afternoon for regulators that would prevent nearly $500 million in costs from Georgia Power's Vogtle nuclear project from being passed on to consumers.

"The Project is uneconomic on a going forward basis by $1.6 billion," the 25-page proposed order reads.

"Basic fairness dictates that ratepayers should not have to pay for those excessive costs of the Project over which [Georgia Power] had some level of control," the order adds.

Southern Co.'s Georgia Power has asked state regulators to approve $542 million it spent on the two-reactor project over the first six months of the year. But PSC's Public Interest Advocacy staff have argued that the company should only be allowed to pass $44 million to consumers.

The over-budget project, which has received $8.33 billion in Energy Department financing as well as other conditional commitments from the agency, hit a major setback earlier this year when contractor Westinghouse filed for bankruptcy. Reducing Georgia Power's ability to recoup its expenses on the project would cast considerable doubt on whether it continues to build the reactors.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Georgia PSC, whose leaders have tried to keep the program going, is expected to vote on the order Thursday morning.

Freshman Democrats urge Trump to 'flip NAFTA on its head' to get their support Back

By Doug Palmer | 12/19/2017 02:21 PM EDT

Four freshman House Democrats said today President Donald Trump could win their support for a revamped NAFTA agreement, but expressed doubt that he would make the changes necessary to benefit workers.

"I'm not seeing a lot of hope," Rep. Pramila Jayapal (D-Wash.) said at a press conference on Capitol Hill with Reps. Jamie Raskin (D-Md.), Val Demings (D-Fla.) and Ro Khanna (D-Calif.).

"I do believe he's going to have a challenge now if he reauthorizes NAFTA in a way that doesn't do what he talked about" during last year's presidential campaign, Jayapal continued. "But we all know, he's the master of saying one thing and doing another thing."

So far, the signs for finding common ground don't bode well, Raskin said, citing how Trump has embraced a tax reform bill that mainly benefits "the 1 percent."

Raskin said it was possible that Trump would keep his promises to make NAFTA a better agreement for workers, "but that's just hope over experience because everything so far has just been written by corporate special interests."

Jayapal, Raskin, Khanna and 18 other House freshmen Democrats sent a letter to U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer last month outlining their demands for changes in the nearly 24-year-old NAFTA agreement.

Those include significantly strengthening the labor and environmental provisions, eliminating the controversial investor-state dispute settlement mechanism and protecting "Buy American" set-asides for U.S. manufacturers by getting rid of waivers for Canada and Mexico in the pact. They also called on the administration to open up the negotiating process and give workers more opportunity to influence the negotiations.

"We're hopeful that the ambassador will follow our guidelines and flip this trade agreement on its head so it actually works for working people," Jayapal said.

GOP defectors block Trump nominee to head Ex-Im Bank Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/19/2017 11:42 AM EDT

Two Senate Republicans joined with Democrats on Tuesday to block the confirmation of President Donald Trump's pick to head the Export-Import Bank, a rare rejection of a Trump appointee by members of his own party and prominent business groups.

The outcome had been building for months after the White House and the nominee, former Rep. Scott Garrett (R-N.J.), failed to win over lawmakers who were suspicious of why Garrett would want to lead an agency that he tried to shut down when he served in Congress.

Garrett went down in a 13-10 vote by the Senate Banking Committee. Sens. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) and Tim Scott (R-S.C.) voted against him.

"We need to both reform the Export-Import Bank and ensure it continues to function as an important tool for American businesses," Scott said. "Given Mr. Garrett's long history opposing the Ex-Im Bank, I believe it would be hard for him to accomplish both of those goals."

The vote was the latest battle in a long-running war over the future of the Export-Import Bank, which guarantees loans for foreign buyers of U.S. exports.

Garrett's rejection was a victory for business groups that have been fighting off attempts by conservatives to grind the agency's operations to a halt. In Congress, Garrett was among those who fought to kill the bank, which he said "embodies the corruption of the free enterprise system."

Robert Wasinger, a former Trump campaign official, said Garrett's nomination was a "too-clever-by-half attempt to appease the Freedom Caucus faction" of the GOP.

"Garrett was a divisive pick inside the Republican caucus that was bound to be a debacle from the get go," he said.

Part of that divisiveness stemmed from Garrett's social views, which have sparked controversy. An issue that weighed on his unsuccessful reelection bid last year was a 2015 POLITICO story reporting that he told lawmakers he did not pay National Republican Congressional Committee dues because it recruited gay candidates. He later denied that he opposed gay candidates and said his concern was about support for same-sex marriage.

The Banking Committee on Tuesday approved four less-controversial nominees to serve on the bank's board, which is lacking enough members to approve transactions worth more than $10 million.

The nominees are former Rep. Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.), Kimberly Reed, Judith Pryor and Claudia Slacik.

Though the four advanced with bipartisan support, they could remain in limbo for months. Sens. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) and Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), who wanted to see Garrett appointed, have pledged to derail the confirmation of other nominees.

Lawmakers critical of the bank could force the Senate to spend several days' worth of floor time to consider the nominees if Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) chooses to move forward.

They could also force the Senate to let the nominations expire at the end of this year because of Senate rules that require lawmakers to agree to carry over unresolved appointments to the next session of Congress.

"We are disappointed that the Senate Banking Committee missed this opportunity to get the Export-Import Bank fully functioning again," White House director of legislative affairs Marc Short said in a statement. "We will continue to work with the committee on a path forward."

Garrett's failure to win Ex-Im confirmation stings Pence, too Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt and Andrew Restuccia | 12/19/2017 06:02 PM EDT

The decision by a bipartisan group of senators to block President Donald Trump's pick to lead the Export-Import Bank marked a stinging defeat for Vice President Mike Pence, who worked for months to boost the nomination despite doubts from some administration officials.

Pence continued to push senators to support former New Jersey Republican Rep. Scott Garrett's nomination to lead the bank until the final hours before the Senate Banking Committee met for a vote Tuesday morning, according to lawmakers and others briefed on the issue.

But Pence's entreaties on behalf of his old conservative congressional ally weren't enough to mollify lawmakers after major manufacturers and trade groups raised concerns about Garrett's ability to oversee an agency he once tried to shut down.

Every Democrat and two Republicans — Sens. Mike Rounds of South Dakota and Tim Scott of South Carolina — voted against Garrett's nomination in a rare rebuke of a nominee by members of the president's own party.

Rounds told POLITICO he spoke with Pence about the nomination several times and that the vice president reached out to him Monday night before the vote. "He made it very clear his interest in having the nomination go forward," Rounds said. "I expressed to him my concerns with the nomination and hope that we could find some other alternative."

A Pence spokeswoman did not respond to a request for comment.

Tuesday's committee vote capped eight months of drama over the nomination, with constant speculation that Garrett would be pushed out by the administration or withdraw amid vocal opposition to the pick from some Republican senators.

Some administration officials had long ago given up hope that Garrett could win Senate approval, privately grouching that the White House should cut its losses and find a replacement, according to a person briefed on the discussions. Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin privately raised concerns about Garrett's nomination, an administration official told POLITICO.

Trump himself, facing intense pressure from business groups who rely on the bank, weighed pulling the nomination, though administration officials later said the president would give Garrett a chance to secure enough support in the Senate.

But Pence remained a steadfast backer of Garrett.

The two served together in the House and are said to share similar worldviews. In Senate testimony last month, Garrett thanked Pence for "taking the time to have been as supportive as he has been of my nomination."

In October 2016, when Trump was heard bragging about sexual assault in a 2005 "Access Hollywood" recording, Garrett denounced Trump — and said Pence would be the best nominee to defeat Hillary Clinton.

Garrett was nominated to lead the bank after losing his New Jersey seat, in part because of his social views. POLITICO reported in 2015 that he'd refused to pay National Republican Congressional Committee dues because it recruited gay candidates. He subsequently denied that he opposed gay candidates and said his problem was about support for same-sex marriage.

But Garrett was known as a crusader against the bank — long a favorite target of fiscally conservative Republican lawmakers — when he served in Congress, once saying the bank "embodies the corruption of the free enterprise system."

Garrett's record alarmed companies that have benefited from the loan guarantees that it offers foreign buyers of U.S. exports. Firms including Boeing and General Electric, as well as trade groups such as the National Association of Manufacturers, fought the nomination for months. After being nominated, he tried to make the case that he would keep the bank fully functional.

One person familiar with the matter said Pence repeatedly discussed the nomination with senators on the Senate Banking Committee in recent months.

"It's Mike Pence," Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.) said when asked who was driving the nomination. "It's the vice president."

The White House pushed back against the notion that Pence was the sole advocate for Garrett in the administration. "It was the president's nomination," a White House official told POLITICO.

As it became clear last week that Garrett didn't have the votes to clear the committee, some in Washington began scratching their heads, wondering why the White House didn't save itself the embarrassment and quietly pull the nomination.

"At least for a while early in this process, I think they legitimately thought that Garrett could get the votes," U.S. Chamber of Commerce chief policy officer Neil Bradley said. "Once it became clear that Garrett couldn't get the votes, I'm not sure why they persisted to move all the way through to an actual vote and have him defeated."

Rounds said he shared his reservations about Garrett "very early on" and that he wanted to give the White House an opportunity to withdraw the nomination. Rounds held off announcing his "no" vote until the committee publicly announced the timing of the vote last week.

Garrett's failure to win confirmation was the latest roadblock for one of Trump's nominees. The president has withdrawn more than a dozen nominees since he took office in January, and the White House is coming under new scrutiny for what critics call its poor vetting of candidates for key jobs.

"We're going to work with the committee on a path forward," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said at Tuesday's press briefing. "That hasn't yet been determined. We're certainly very disappointed in the Senate Banking Committee."

White House officials said they were placed in a difficult situation with the Garrett nomination that reflected deep divisions within the Republican Party over the merits of the Ex-Im Bank.

Republican senators who were critical of the bank strongly backed the Garrett pick, seeing it as a sign that the administration supported major changes to the way the agency operates. Those senators made it clear to the White House that if the president pulled the Garrett nomination, they would try to block other nominees to the agency, further complicating the efforts to fill out the bank's board.

But some Trump backers have long believed Garrett was a bad pick.

"Garrett was a lousy choice foisted on the president by people who clearly don't have his best interests in mind and use Trump to push their own narrow agenda," said Robert Wasinger, a former Trump campaign official.

POISED FOR TAX PACKAGE PASSAGE: Congressional Republicans are poised this week to pass a massive tax package HR 1 \(115\), and the final text that emerged Friday evening was mostly good news for the renewables industry that had been unnerved by provisions in earlier versions. And the package will realize a decades-old GOP dream of opening the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling that Speaker Paul Ryan's office hailed as "a win for American energy" Sunday. Check out some of the highlights via Pro's Eric Wolff and Ben Lefebvre here.

—Spared: The final bill leaves wind and solar tax credits untouched, meaning they will continue to be phased down as originally envisioned in a 2015 bill. It preserves a tax break for electric vehicles and restores credits for abandoned oil wells and enhanced oil recovery that the House-passed bill removed. And it keeps a provision allowing utilities to continue to deduct interest on loans without the limitation placed on other businesses.

—What's on oil's mind? The bill keeps Senate language permitting the selloff of up to $600 million in Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil if revenues from opening ANWR drilling come up short of the $1 billion forecast, as many critics have warned is likely. It adds a provision offering deductions to investors in master limited partnerships, the corporate structure for many pipeline companies. And it temporarily lifts the cap on Gulf of Mexico oil and gas production revenue sharing to facilitate additional coastal restoration and protection projects.

—Can't stop the BEAT: Senate taxwriters made an effort to tweak the Base Erosion Anti-Abuse Tax in ways that would help renewable project developers. The tax is intended to keep U.S. profits domestic — but the final version doesn't go far enough to solve the problem in earlier iterations, renewables backers say. The fix in the conference bill allows banks to take 80 percent of the production tax credit and investment tax credit until 2025, but also expands which institutions are affected and makes other tweaks. "We are uncertain how the marketplace will react to the fact that more multi-national firms may now be covered by the BEAT, and tax credits may not all be useable in any given year," Gregory Wetstone, president and CEO of the ACORE, said in a statement. If you really want to get down and dirty with the BEAT and how other parts of the tax bill affected renewable projects, check out this blog post by Keith Martin, the co-head of U.S. projects for the law firm of Norton Rose Fulbright.

—Not there: As expected, none of the expired tax credits for small wind, fuel cells, and other "orphans" made it into the finished product. There's some chatter of moving an additional package before breaking for the holidays, but count ME as decidedly skeptical. Lawmakers will find the energy for such a push.

Timeline on this: Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn expressed confidence the bill would pass his chamber this week "probably on Tuesday" during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." Pro Tax's Bernie Becker has an excellent look at how the bill's expected passage is the culmination of half a life's work for a large number of Washington tax insiders.

FINAL SPRINT TO THE HOLIDAYS! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Bracewell's Frank Maisano was first up to identify former Alabama Rep. Parker Griffith as the last sitting congressman to switch parties. For today: How many current senators are older than 80? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to adragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

SHUTDOWN WATCH: Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin isn't expecting a government shutdown at the end of this week, though he said during a Sunday appearance on "Fox News Sunday" he couldn't be sure. POLITICO's Martin Matishak reports. "I can't rule it out, but I can't imagine it occurring," he said. Remember, facing a Friday deadline, lawmakers still aren't sure how much money they'll have to spend in fiscal year 2018 since they haven't reached a spending cap deal. POLITICO's Rachael Bade, Seung Min Kim and Jennifer Haberkorn look at the sticky situation facing the GOP this week here.

Ahead of the deadline, Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló asked congressional leaders to provide emergency assistance to his devastated island before they skip town for the holidays. "No governor should ever be put in the position of having to deny that hope in the aftermath of a catastrophic disaster due to the inaction of Congress," he said. Lawmakers from Florida and Texas have also been pushing aggressively for disaster relief in this stopgap spending package.

ICYMI: A White House document circulating among agencies and obtained by POLITICO is setting the stage for a solar trade war with China, Pro's Emily Holden reports. The administration appears to be preparing its messaging ahead of setting punitive tariffs on Chinese-made solar power equipment. The tariffs would increase the cost of solar power in the U.S. and could slow expansion of the energy source and eliminate installation jobs. But the White House paper suggests trade barriers may be necessary to foster domestic solar manufacturing, particularly for advanced solar technologies.

The document notes solar power demand in the U.S. and abroad is growing rapidly and argues "federal policies should ensure that the United States can benefit from this expansion." And it argues the administration should consider "the potential negative impact on U.S. energy security of increased reliance on imported energy technology," in carrying out an executive order on energy independence and in developing a response to the Section 201 trade case from the two domestic manufacturers. "China will likely expand its dominance to include advanced solar technologies," the paper says. "U.S. policy should be focused on creating competitive conditions for U.S. companies to thrive in the global marketplace, and compete against China and other solar players."

Suniva, one of the companies seeking the tariffs, issued a statement in response to the article: "Suniva applauds the Trump Administration for championing American manufacturing in the face of cheating by China and its proxies who want to kill American jobs and make America dependent on China for its energy and security needs."

SOMETHING ELSE TO WATCH: President Donald Trump is expected to discuss his National Security Strategy today and his administration will remove climate change from the list of national security threats, The Federalist reports. The Obama administration's Pentagon called climate change a "threat multiplier" and the former president warned back in 2015: "Climate change constitutes a serious threat to global security, an immediate risk to our national security, and, make no mistake, it will impact how our military defends our country." Secretary of State Rex Tillerson told a Senate committee back in January he didn't consider climate change an "imminent national security threat." According to excerpts, the new document will state: "Climate policies will continue to shape the global energy system. The United States will continue to advance an approach that balances energy security, economic development, and environmental protection."

UNDER SCRUTINY: A lawyer working with America Rising has been filing public records requests for EPA employees who have been critical of Administrator Scott Pruitt's leadership of the agency, the New York Times reports. "This is a witch hunt against EPA employees who are only trying to protect human health and the environment," Gary Morton, an agency employee in Philadelphia, said. That comes as a group associated with America Rising, Definers Public Affairs, has been hired by EPA for "media monitoring" services to track how the agency is being covered.

NYC PLANS 'PEOPLE'S HEARING' ON CLEAN POWER PLAN: After being snubbed by EPA for a public hearing on its plans to repeal the Clean Power Plan, New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman and New York Mayor Bill de Blasio announced Friday they'll hold a "people's hearing" on the regulation Jan. 9 where they'll hear and compile testimony for the agency. Registration here. ME readers no doubt remember Schneiderman is leading a group of states and localities defending the Obama-era regulation's legality.

DEPARTMENT OF BAD TIMING: Just a few days ahead of a Thursday vote on the future of Georgia Power's two new nuclear reactors at Plant Vogtle, Hartfield-Jackson International Airport suffered an hours-long power failure that grounded thousands of travelers as the holiday travel season kicked into high gear, USA Today reports

HAPPY ANNIVERSARY! Today marks two years since Congress passed and then-President Barack Obama signed legislation that lifted the crude oil export ban as part of a broader package that also extended prized tax credits for the wind and solar industries

GREENS SUE OVER EPA'S PLAN FOR TEXAS HAZE: Environmental groups on Friday sued EPA over its federal plan to limit haze-causing pollution from Texas power plants. The rule has been supposed to have been in place by 2007, a delay that prompted a federal court to order a plan be finalized by either Texas or EPA by September. Without a submission from Texas, EPA was forced to finalize a federal version, but environmentalists complained that the Trump administration's plan was a "sham rule" that would not reduce pollution nearly as much as the Obama administration's proposal would have. In addition to a lawsuit in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, the groups also submitted a petition for reconsideration to EPA.

KEEP AN EYE OUT: Pro's Alex Guillén notes in Energy Regulation Watch that while the holidays tend to be a slower time for regulatory news, EPA told a federal court this week that its Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking for a replacement to the Clean Power Plan will publish "in the upcoming weeks." That notice, which OMB completed its review of on Thursday, sets the stage to replace the Obama-era rule.

PUBLISH THE RULE! Three senior House Energy and Commerce Democrats — Frank Pallone, Paul Tonko and Diana DeGette — aren't pleased by Pruitt's plan to gather more input on the agency's Lead and Copper Rule and urged him to immediately move ahead with a proposed rule. "Administrator Pruitt is hiding this delay behind the guise of a novel consultation process with the states, but the states need to see the proposed rule in order to provide relevant comments," they said in a statement. "The EPA previously pledged to publish a proposed rule to revise the Lead and Copper Rule this month, and therefore we call on Administrator Pruitt to publish the proposed rule immediately."

FOR YOUR READING PLEASURE: POLITICO New York's Keshia Clukey takes a look at how new SUNY Chancellor Kristina Johnson, a former official with the U.S. Department of Energy under the Obama administration, is proposing the use of 21st century innovation to help solve SUNY's fiscal and infrastructure problems. The benefits of making campuses more energy efficient are threefold, she told POLITICO. The lion's share of SUNY's energy use is attributed to its approximately 2,800 buildings — 2,346 of which are state-operated, including academic buildings, hospitals and residence halls. Upgrades could include weatherizing buildings, using more efficient heating and cooling techniques, or even adding solar panels. This helps the bottom line, saving campuses money, reducing operating costs and giving "local budget relief, which allows them and the presidents to do more for the academic mission," Johnson said. ANYBODY WANT IN? Republicans are struggling to find a top-tier candidate to challenge North Dakota Sen. Heidi Heitkamp even though she represents a state that was a solid win for Trump, the Associated Press reports. Perhaps the highest-profile potential challenger, Rep. Kevin Cramer, has been reticent about launching a bid even though the president strongly pushed him to run earlier this fall. "I'm not sure that our party fully grasps or understands the magnitude of a campaign against Heidi Heitkamp," former Republican Gov. Ed Schafer said.

PERDUE WRITES GRIJALVA ON GRAND CANYON MINING: Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue attempted to reassure House Natural Resources Ranking Member Raúl Grijalva in a letter that a recommendation from the administration to look into lifting a moratorium on uranium mining near the Grand Canyon was merely "for consideration" and did not represent a federal action. But that didn't reassure Grijalva: "Opening up new uranium mines or allowing new claims to be filed in this region is a dead issue. Let's drop it and move on once and for all," he said in a statement.

By Eric Wolff and Ben Lefebvre | 12/15/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The conference tax bill released Friday by Congressional Republicans resolves a slew of issues faced by the energy industry

— Wind and solar credits saved: The final tax bill, HR 1 \(115\), follows the Senate's bill when it comes to the production tax credit and the solar tax credit, meaning both are left untouched. The House bill had proposed reducing the value of the PTC and changing when a project qualified for it, and it had proposed dropping the permanent 10 percent credit for the ITC. Both credits will phase down as agreed to in a deal struck in 2015.

— MLP benefits added: It also includes language Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) proposed that would give deductions to investors in master limited partnerships, the corporate structure for many pipeline companies.

— EVs roll on: A tax credit for electric vehicles was preserved.

— Oil recovery restored: Credits for abandoned oil wells and enhanced oil recovery that were eliminated in the House version were restored in the final bill.

— Selling off the oil: The bill retains the Senate language that would sell up to $600 million in Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil to offset any shortfall from opening up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling. The Senate language forecast drilling in ANWR would generate $1 billion in revenue over 10 years, an estimate critics have said is too optimistic.

— More revenue sharing: The bill also temporarily lifts offshore Gulf of Mexico oil and gas production revenue sharing caps to $650 million annually for fiscal years 2020 and 2021, up from a previous limit of $500 million, to support coastal restoration and protection projects.

— Base erosion eased for renewables: Tax writers created some room to keep banks and other financiers of renewable projects in the game by allowing them to take 80 percent of the credits for the PTC and the ITC.

— No tax extenders: Numerous senators have been saying it for weeks now, and the bill makes it official: None of the expired tax credits for small wind, fuel cells, and other "orphans" made it into the conference bill. The extension of the nuclear tax credit that was in the House bill has also been dropped.

— Utilities still get to deduct interest: The bill preserves provisions in both the House and Senate versions that allowed utilities to continue to deduct interest on loans without the limitation placed on other businesses.

Tax bill a dream come true for some GOP wonks Back

By Bernie Becker | 12/17/2017 06:58 AM EDT

For the large contingent of Washington supply-siders and tax-cutters, the sweeping tax overhaul that President Donald Trump is poised to sign into law this week has been a generation in coming — and the culmination of half a life's work that started during Ronald Reagan's 1980s.

Grover Norquist, arguably the best-known anti-tax activist in the country, started Americans for Tax Reform at then-President Reagan's request to help marshal support for the 1986 tax overhaul. He's been working ever since to rally support for more tax cuts.

House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) for years said his dream job was to be House Ways and Means chairman, a position that would have allowed him to quarterback the sort of tax revamp that his mentor, the late Jack Kemp, helped get through Congress in 1986.

When he became Speaker, Ryan said he was reluctantly passing the title of Ways and Means chairman, and the opportunity to focus attention on tax reform, to Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas).

Now, the 2017 tax revamp will bring the American tax system more into lockstep with those conservatives' thinking than perhaps ever before — making the idea that what works for corporate America will work for the country at large a central plank of U.S. policy for decades to come, maybe even a generation or more.

"This tax cut and reform will drive further reforms and reductions for the next 50 years," Norquist said Friday.

The corporate rate would be slashed from 35 percent to 21 percent under the GOP plan, which would also allow businesses to immediately write off investments for five years and scrap Obamacare's individual mandate. In an extra bonus for the right, it also shrinks the deduction for state and local taxes, an incentive that mostly helps blue, high-tax states.

"This is a pretty historical moment for the conservative movement," said Stephen Moore, another of those supply-siders, who has over the years worked at the Club for Growth, The Heritage Foundation and The Wall Street Journal editorial page.

"I've been in this game for 30-some years. This, if it passes, will be the single biggest policy triumph for conservatives since the 1996 welfare reform. It's up there with the '81 Reagan tax cuts," added Moore, who's an informal adviser to the president and, along with fellow supply-sider Larry Kudlow, helped then-candidate Trump craft his tax plan.

The start of the conservative tax-cutting movement is frequently traced back to 1974, when a young economics professor named Arthur Laffer met an equally young Dick Cheney, then a top aide to President Gerald Ford, at a restaurant. Laffer doodled on a napkin the case that cutting taxes can increase revenues for the government, a theory now known as the Laffer Curve.

That case is maybe most famously argued by Kudlow, who worked in Reagan's White House and has spent more than 15 years defending its merits on CNBC. Perhaps even more importantly, Moore said, Kudlow worked overtime to pitch the GOP tax plan to skeptical Republicans like Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Bob Corker of Tennessee, both of whom now seem likely to back the measure.

It might be hard to imagine now, but the Republican Party hasn't always been dominated by would-be tax cutters. Former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.) once joked that "the good news is that a bus full of supply-siders went off a cliff. The bad news is that two seats were empty," according to "Showdown at Gucci Gulch," the book about the 1986 tax overhaul.

But the supply-side theory eventually won out, if in fits and starts. Reagan's 1981 tax package cut the top individual rate from 70 percent to 50 percent — with the rate getting down all the way to 28 percent in 1986.

Republicans now credit those 1981 tax cuts with sparking years of economic growth, higher wages and job creation. But with the economy floundering in 1982, Dole and other Republicans pushed through a tax increase. And Democrats have long said that there was no trickle in the GOP's "trickle-down economics," pointing to a 1990s economic boom that happened after President Bill Clinton raised taxes.

Conservatives believe the growth had more to do with a cut in the capital gains rate under Clinton's watch, which itself was followed several years later by the two rounds of tax cuts under George W. Bush.

Now, 15 years later, all that work by supply-siders has culminated in a new kind of tax reform, which marries the theory that tax cuts for business will be a boon for the economy with tax reform's customary discarding of various tax incentives that have collected over the years and that they say distort the economy

Marty Sullivan of Tax Analysts said the 2017 tax overhaul looks more like the 1981 and 2001 tax cuts enacted under Republican presidents, as opposed to tax overhauls in 1969, 1976 and 1986. The 1986 tax reform, while lowering the top corporate rate from 46 percent to 34 percent, actually hiked taxes on corporations to pay for tax relief for individuals, and to keep from adding to deficits.

"Those were all workman-like reforms where the staff and members looked hard for unfair and complicated tax breaks to take out of the code to simplify it, make it fair and reduce rates," said Sullivan, a former economist for both the Treasury Department and the Joint Committee on Taxation. "In this bill, tax cutting is the primary motivation and reform is an afterthought."

The next question is whether this bill will jolt the economy the way its supporters predict. Trump and other top Republicans have said that the economic growth created by the tax cuts will more than offset its current $1.456 trillion price tag.

But while outside analysts and JCT have found that the Republican tax plan would create hundreds of billions of dollars in new revenue, none of them have found that the plan would come close to paying for itself. On top of that, Democrats are already making it clear that they'll do everything in their power to unwind this year's tax bill, especially if they win back some power in Washington next year.

"One of the lessons of '86 is it's really hard to get tax reform, but it's even harder to keep it," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Congressional Budget Office director and president of the conservative American Action Forum. "I think it's a concern. The partisan nature makes it ripe for change the moment the Democrats get the opportunity."

For their part, conservatives say they're in better shape than ever to protect the new tax cuts. Republicans were united against former President Barack Obama's efforts to allow Bush-era rates for the wealthy to expire, though they weren't successful in the end, and Norquist notes that bipartisan efforts that erased parts of the 1986 tax overhaul came before practically all GOP lawmakers were signing his organization's pledge against tax hikes.

But Moore also called the 2017 tax cuts a "riverboat gamble," echoing the late Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker's thoughts on the 1981 Reagan tax cuts. Their success or failure, Moore added, will have a big impact on whether the supply-siders' influence grows or diminishes over the next generation.

"We say it will work, and they say it won't and this will be put to the test," Moore said. "If this doesn't work, I'll eat some crow."

Mnuchin won't rule out a shutdown, but doesn't see one coming Back

By Martin Matishak | 12/17/2017 10:00 AM EDT

Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin on Sunday wouldn't rule out the possibility of a federal government shutdown at the end of the week, but said he doesn't see one coming.

"I can't rule it out, but I can't imagine it occurring," he said on "Fox News Sunday."

"I would expect that both the House and Senate, Republicans and Democrats, understand if they can't agree on this they need to have another short-term extension to move this to January," Mnuchin added.

"We can't have a government shutdown in front of Christmas," he emphasized.

The government is set to run out of money Friday, unless Congress acts. Lawmakers are expected to take up a funding measure after they deal with the $1 trillion-plus tax bill early in the week.

House GOP leaders have proposed a partisan funding bill that covers a full year of defense spending at $640 billion but keeps the doors open at other federal agencies only until Jan. 19. Many of the provisions, however, likely won't pass muster in the Senate, adding to the time crunch.

Mnuchin declined to comment on what impact a shutdown might have on the U.S. economy, but said he "can't imagine sending government workers home for Christmas."

"I hope that Congress gets this done," he said.

The Treasury secretary also declined to weigh in on whether short-term funding bills is the right way to run the government.

"That's something we'll talk about more. Hopefully we'll look at reforms for different things next year," he said.

GOP leaders in House, Senate endorse conflicting shutdown strategies Back

By Rachael Bade, Seung Min Kim and Jennifer Haberkorn | 12/17/2017 06:22 PM EDT

Republican leaders in both houses of Congress face a sticky situation this week as they try to avert a government shutdown: Each side has promised its members things that will not fly in the other chamber.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) told moderate Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) he'd support passage of legislation by the end of the year to prop up Obamacare insurance markets — so long as she votes for tax reform. That addition, however, puts Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) in a pickle: His members are loath to be seen as bailing out a health care law they hate.

Ryan, meanwhile, green-lighted a short-term spending strategy that funds the Pentagon but does nothing for Democratic priorities — and suggested House members could leave town to try to "jam the Senate" into accepting their bill. But McConnell needs eight Democrats to pass anything, so the House plan is sure to fail in his chamber.

"Right now, they're just headed straight off a cliff," one person familiar with the negotiations said of the House. "[The] Senate's not likely to jump with them."

Instead of addressing the obvious inconsistencies, GOP leaders have tried to put off the issue and focus on tax reform for now. They're eager to delay internal spending fights until the tax package — which Republicans view as critical to maintaining their congressional majorities in the 2018 midterm elections — reaches the Oval Office for President Donald Trump's signature sometime this week

"It's going to be a bipartisan [spending] deal; [some House Republicans] are going to be unhappy with that — and you don't want to have the tax issues as the place they decide to retaliate," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a member of the House appropriations panel, hinting at House GOP fears that conservatives could hijack tax reform to make a stand on spending issues

But time is running out, and the GOP's tax-reform tunnel vision has left Republican leaders without a clear strategy for the spending legislation. All this is quietly raising concerns that the government could shut down after Friday, when, short of congressional action, federal coffers are set to dry up.

While Democrats have at times struggled to fend off GOP legislative efforts, this time they have leverage. Democratic leaders Nancy Pelosi of California and Chuck Schumer of New York appear to have backed off immigration demands they initially wanted addressed by the new year, but they're still adamant that any boosts in defense money be matched by increases in domestic spending.

Leaders in both chambers hoped to strike a deal to raise strict spending caps for both by Friday. But the so-called Big Four — Ryan, Pelosi, McConnell and Schumer — have yet to agree on those numbers. The most likely outcome, some Republicans now say, is kicking everything into 2018: They predict another short-term funding bill, leaving a broader spending and immigration agreement until January.

There has been some progress on the immigration front, aides say. A bipartisan group of seven senators met multiple times last week to try and hammer out an immigration deal that combines legislation for Dreamers — hundreds of thousands of whom are losing their temporary work permits and deportation protections due to actions by Trump — with other immigration enforcement measures.

The group includes Democratic Sens. Dick Durbin of Illinois and Michael Bennet of Colorado, and GOP Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, James Lankford of Oklahoma, Cory Gardner of Colorado and Thom Tillis of North Carolina. They want to be able to strike a deal on immigration they can subsequently present to their leadership.

It's unclear, however, whether Democrats will go along with pushing major issues into next year, upping the pressure on Republicans to come up with a funding proposal that can avert a shutdown.

First up this week is tax reform. House Republicans expect to pass the tax bill Tuesday morning, huddling for a rare Monday night conference to discuss the final package negotiated with Senate Republicans. After that, the Senate will take up the bill as the House sends them its "continuing resolution" through Jan. 19, which also includes Republicans' much-desired Pentagon funding boost.

The upper chamber is expected to amend the government funding bill and send it back to the House — which is where things could get ugly. Leadership sources in both chambers say the Senate version of the spending bill could include the bipartisan Obamacare stabilization effort, written by Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.), to satisfy Collins.

The White House is expected to back that approach because the tax bill repeals another part of Obamacare that conservatives despise: the requirement that everyone carry health insurance.

It's unclear, however, whether even a Trump endorsement would make the Obamacare language on the spending bill palatable to House conservatives. House GOP leaders during a Thursday afternoon conference last week began running the idea by lawmakers — but it didn't go over well. Multiple Republicans encouraged leaders to continue with the "jam the Senate" strategy rather than accepting changes made by the other chamber. GOP leaders said they needed to make sure the conference gives them "flexibility" to negotiate with the Senate.

Privately, senior Republicans say any House plan to stick the Senate with a bill it can't pass would be political suicide. They worry it could lead to a shutdown — which could backfire in the November midterms.

Even more complications could still arise for the spending legislation. Anti-abortion groups with strong connections to House conservatives have said recently that if the bill includes the Obamacare subsidies patch, they want it to also include language barring federal funding for abortions. Senate Democrats, whose votes are needed for passage, would likely push back.

"Any Member voting for the Alexander-Murray proposal, or other Obamacare stabilization legislation not covered by the Hyde amendment, would not only be voting to sustain what many have called the largest expansion of abortion since Roe v. Wade, but would also be voting to directly appropriate taxpayer dollars for insurance that includes abortion," wrote Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List, in a letter to lawmakers.

Beyond that, lawmakers also have to iron out several less-discussed policy matters that could wind up tied to the spending bill. One of those includes funding for a popular children's health insurance program whose funding has expired; another includes reauthorizing the government's surveillance authority.

A third has become more than a little contentious: a sorely needed disaster aid package for hurricane-ravaged areas in Texas, Florida, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

"We've been told time and time again by the speaker and the House leadership that the supplemental's going to be coming, but it never seems to come," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), one of the loudest voices urging for more aid for his home state, said last week. "The can always seems to be kicked down the road. It's a source of more than a little frustration on my part and I think on the entire Texas delegation."

Nonetheless, Trump administration officials and senior Republican lawmakers are publicly confident that funding for the government won't dry up — particularly three days before Christmas. Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin told "Fox News Sunday" that while he couldn't rule out the prospects of a government shutdown, "I can't imagine it occurring." And Senate GOP leaders, from McConnell on down, have been adamant that Congress will successfully avert one by the end of the week.

"I think we're determined that it's not going to happen, and it won't happen," Cornyn said late last week.

U.S. setting stage for solar trade war with China Back

By Emily Holden | 12/15/2017 05:13 PM EDT

An unreleased White House document offers the strongest hint yet that the Trump administration is laying the groundwork for punitive tariffs on Chinese-made solar power equipment — a step that would promote the president's "America First" trade agenda while sharply increasing the costs of solar power in the U.S.

The prospect of such tariffs, which President Donald Trump could announce in January, has deeply alarmed the U.S. solar installation industry. It warns that it could lose tens of thousands of jobs if the cost of solar spikes, slowing the booming growth that sun-powered energy enjoyed during the Obama administration.

But the White House is preparing to argue that trade barriers are needed to foster solar manufacturing inside the United States, something it calls important to both national security and the economy, according to a document draft obtained by POLITICO. The paper argues that cheap solar imports allow China to unfairly profit from Americans' use of renewable power and gain influence in the developing world's energy infrastructure

"While solar energy is forecast to play a larger role in the world's energy mix, other countries stand to benefit significantly more than U S workers," says the four-page paper, which is circulating within executive branch agencies for comment

Trump has not said whether he intends to initiate the trade barriers on solar equipment imports, but he has accused China of "ripping off" the U S in international trade and called for the U S to become energy dominant by hiking production of oil, natural gas and coal The new paper is likely to inspire a debate about whether the White House's rhetoric about creating U S -based solar manufacturing masks an effort to kneecap a growing, green alternative to fossil fuels such as coal — an energy source that Trump has repeatedly championed on the stump

While the administration has touted an "all of the above" energy approach, it has instead taken significant steps to bolster fossil fuels, proposing measures to give financial support to coal-fired power plants even as it works to repeal the Obama administration's climate rules for the power industry It has also pushed to grow U S exports of liquefied natural gas, and sent EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to Morocco this week to promote U S gas shipments

Trump must decide by Jan 26 whether to institute the tariffs that the U S International Trade Commission recommended last month, after two U S solar manufacturers, Suniva and SolarWorld Americas, filed complaints accusing Chinese competitors of undercutting them

Suniva, which is majority owned by a Chinese investor and is in bankruptcy, and SolarWorld, whose German parent is also in bankruptcy, say the flood of solar cells and panels from factories across Asia that are owned by Chinese companies has driven prices too low for them to compete

Suniva spokesman Mark Paustenbach welcomed the White House's approach

"Suniva applauds the Trump Administration for championing American manufacturing in the face of cheating by China and its proxies who want to kill American jobs and make America dependent on China for its energy and security needs," he said in a statement Friday

But the U S Solar Energy Industries Association has said the drop in solar panel prices has triggered a boom in sales across the U S , and establishing high tariffs could eliminate more than a third of the 260,000 solar jobs in the United States Solar energy prices have tumbled dramatically over the past decade, and large, utility-scale plants in the Southwest are cost-competitive with natural gas and coal-fired power plants now The industry fears that tariffs would reverse those cost declines, dealing a blow to project developers just as federal incentives for solar power phase out over the next four years

The companies suing have countered that they believe tariffs could result in a net increase in jobs across the solar industry

The Office of the U S Trade Representative heard from both sides at a hearing earlier this month and will soon send its own report to the White House

The White House also opposes incentives for renewable energy The paper advises against the federal and state tax incentives and mandates that have helped fuel the growth of renewable power, saying they are "subsidized by U S taxpayers," and "become overseas job creation programs "

The new White House paper says the international solar sector, "including its supply chain and critical minerals requirements, will grow in importance from an economic and energy security perspective," and it cites estimates that the global solar market will expand to $140 billion in 2023 from $65 billion in 2015 Chinese companies hold about 80 percent of the solar manufacturing capacity, although the U S is the second-largest market for solar energy, the paper says The U S has about 38,000 solar manufacturing jobs, and China has 1.5 million, it notes

The document says that depending on foreign countries for energy technology imports also jeopardizes U S energy independence and dominance

It suggests the U S could focus on advanced solar technologies, rather than current ones already dominated by other countries, but it doesn't offer any potential policies Trump has announced a review of the nuclear power sector, and the White House document says that might be necessary for solar and other energy sectors

The White House document claims China has used its "monopoly" to punish U S industries that are part of the global supply chain, including by imposing its own tariffs

U S producers "could benefit from moves designed to undermine China's monopoly over much of the sector and generate competition, including steps to revitalize U S manufacturing," it says "Yet questions remain about the scope and extent of those potential benefits, especially in the context of various policy options that, depending on the course chosen could backfire on the U S supply chain, while imposing minimal harm on Chinese state-owned enterprises "

'Time is running out' to slow climate change, Obama tells Coast Guard grads Back

By Sarah Wheaton | 05/20/2015 01:25 PM EDT

President Barack Obama delivered a somber lecture on the science of climate change to the graduates of the United States Coast Guard Academy on Wednesday as argued that global warming poses a threat to national security

Obama's call to cut carbon emissions, which emphasized the impact that Arctic ice melt would have on the Coast Guard, came just over a week after he opened Alaska's Arctic Coast to oil drilling — and about seven months ahead of a United Nations summit in Paris at which the president hopes to cement his legacy as a global leader on climate change

"Climate change constitutes a serious threat to global security, an immediate risk to our national security, and, make no mistake, it will impact how our military defends our country And so we need to act — and we need to act now," Obama told cadets at an outdoor ceremony in New London, Connecticut "After all, isn't that the true hallmark of leadership?"

Also on POLITICO

Bin Laden's 'bookshelf' included 9/11 conspiracy material

NICK GASS

Though he didn't name a political party or individual, Obama castigated "folks back in Washington who refuse to admit that climate change is real "

Or those, he added, "who will equivocate They'll say, 'I'm not a scientist ' Well, I'm not either But the best scientists in the world know that climate change is happening "

Obama cited a Pentagon's assessment that climate change is a "threat multiplier," telling cadets that they will be on the front lines in responding to an increase in climate refugees He contended that the terrorist group Boko Haram took advantage of drought in Nigeria, and that famine was a factor underlying the civil unrest in Syria

One of Congress's top climate skeptics, Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.), responded by calling Obama's threat assessment a "severe disconnect from reality."

In a statement that cited a litany of issues — including nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, the military success of the militant groups known as the Islamic State and potential chemical weapons in Syria — Inhofe continued: "The president's repeated failure to understand the real threat to our national security and inability to develop a coherent national security strategy has put this nation at an unknown level of risk with consequences that will span over decades."

Outside of the dire warnings, Obama took on a jaunty tone with the graduates, peppering his speech with inside jokes and references to "Swab Summer," "Rodeo Buffing" — "that looks dangerous," he said, noting that he saw the video — and apparent high jinks committed in campus buildings

ADAM B. LERNER

"Which reminds me," he said, "in keeping with longstanding tradition, I hereby absolve all cadets serving restrictions for minor offenses."

But the majority of the speech was devoted to the challenges this generation of servicemembers will face, from budget cuts to shifting coastlines.

Obama also put special emphasis on a frigid region with potential to become a new global hot spot.

"We're witnessing the birth of a new ocean," Obama said, describing the effect of receding Arctic ice.

A White House report released Wednesday predicted that as "shorter shipping routes become more accessible and more profitable, increased ship traffic and human activity in the region will require that the United States be more prepared to respond to emergencies in this remote region."

Even as his administration warns about new dangers in the Arctic, his administration gave Shell the green light last week to drill for oil in the Arctic as part of its "all-of-the-above" energy strategy. The move infuriated environmental groups, who've tried to keep the Chukchi Sea off limits to the oil industry and fear a spill would be devastating to the ecosystem.

"The president has made it a real priority to deal with climate change — it's clearly part of the legacy he's building — and saying yes to drilling in the Arctic doesn't fit in that frame," said the Sierra Club's Lena Moffitt. "That's something they're going to have to reconcile."

POLITICO PRO

Full coverage of energy policy

In his speech, Obama emphasized his administration's efforts on the cleaner parts of his energy strategy, noting new standards to double the fuel efficiency of cars, strict new rules for coal-burning plants, and the military's experimentation with solar power and biofuels.

"Today we can be proud that our carbon pollution is near its lowest levels in almost two decades," Obama said, adding that he is committed to doubling the pace of cutting carbon emissions.

"There comes a point where the worst effects will be irreversible, and time is running out," Obama warned. "That's why I've committed the United States to leading the world on this challenge."

Obama is hoping to spearhead history's most sweeping agreement to curb carbon emissions at a climate conference in Paris in December which would set climate policy decades beyond his tenure.

"If you see storm clouds gathering or dangerous shoals ahead, you don't do nothing. You take action," Obama told the cadets. "Anything less would be dereliction of duty."

Meanwhile, the fate of one of the most symbolic environmental issues of Obama's presidency remains open. Asked whether the administration had completed its assessment of the environmental impact of the proposed Keystone XL pipeline, White House spokesman Eric Schultz replied: "That is a policy review that's underway at the State Department."

Tillerson: Climate change isn't 'imminent national security threat' Back

Rex Tillerson challenged assertions that climate change is a major national security threat, arguing that the science linking global warming to destabilizing events around the world isn't conclusive.

"I don't see it as the imminent national security threat that perhaps others do," Tillerson, President-elect Donald Trump's pick for secretary of State, said during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing today.

Asked about the contention by many military officials and scientists that climate change is exacerbating droughts and extreme weather that in turn leads to international tumult, Tillerson said, "The facts on the ground are indisputable in terms of what's happening in terms of drought, disease." But he added, "The science behind the clear connection is not conclusive."

Tillerson also said that the fact that we can't predict climate change with "precision" doesn't mean we should do nothing.

The former Exxon Mobil CEO said he is opposed to pulling out of international climate talks in part because they give the United States a window into other countries' commitment to slashing emissions.

"I think we're better served by being at that table than leaving that table," Tillerson said

Congress approves spending deal lifting oil export ban Back

By Darren Goode | 12/18/2015 12:03 PM EDT

Congress sent a massive spending deal to the White House Friday that would lift the 40-year-old ban on crude oil exports while extending clean energy tax breaks and preserving President Barack Obama's ability to adhere to the commitments he made as part of the global climate deal reached in Paris this month

The oil and renewable provisions negotiated as part of the $1.1 trillion omnibus spending bill represent the most significant energy policy enacted in years, a compromise that delivered major wins to interests on either side of the ideological spectrum. The omnibus sailed through the House 316-113, with the winning votes split virtually evenly among the two parties. The omnibus was packaged with a $680 billion tax cut package that passed the House Thursday, and the combined bill cleared the Senate, 65-33.

The compromise handed a major victory to Republicans and oil-state Democrats. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) was the first to call for an end to the Ford-era ban on crude exports early last year, and the campaign quickly accelerated amid falling prices and the impending end to sanctions on Iran's oil industry. But it remains to be seen whether the ban's end will have much immediate impact, amid a global supply glut that has left prices well under $40 a barrel.

But Democrats gained a big haul in return. The deal extends and phases out the wind production tax credit until 2020, and phases down the solar investment tax credit until 2022. That should provide a bridge until the administration's Clean Power Plan takes hold to further boost demand for carbon-free power.

And notably, the bill contains no Republican riders targeting major elements of President Barack Obama's environmental and climate agenda and legacy. It leaves in place EPA greenhouse gas restrictions for power plants and its Waters of the U.S. rule, as well as Interior Department rules on hydraulic fracturing and stream buffer zone controls, among other high-profile initiatives.

The bill also does not block the administration's ability to contribute to the Green Climate Fund, the United Nations-run bank tasked with helping poor countries deal with the effects of climate change, to which Obama has pledged a total of $3 billion.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi overcame objections from progressive Democrats to lifting the oil export ban, arguing that Republicans' "desperate thirst" to do so led them to give up clean energy provisions that would "eliminate around ten times more carbon pollution than the exports of oil will add" and preserve the rest of the administration's climate agenda. In the end, just 18 House Democrats opposed the deal.

The lack of riders incensed some coal-state Republicans who said they were promised more by GOP leaders in a final deal. "I feel we were disregarded," said Rep. David McKinley (R-W. Va.), chair of the Congressional Coal Caucus, who voted against the spending deal.

House Appropriations Chairman Hal Rogers (R-Ky.) touted language directing Interior to consult with states on the stream buffer rule and an infusion of economic assistance to clean up abandoned coal mines, especially in Appalachia.

EPA funding would remain flat from last year around $8.1 billion — which Republicans noted also was the lowest level of funding for the agency since 2008. The Interior Department would receive $12 billion, more than $1 billion above last year. The Energy Department would see funding increased across its accounts. And the Army Corps of Engineers would see its budget rise 10 percent.

The White House backed the measure, noting it was "largely free of new unrelated ideological riders" and praised the wind and solar tax incentives as "driving significant reductions in carbon pollution and other dangerous air pollutants and providing certainty for investments in clean energy."

Despite these wins, the overall deal was viewed as a convoluted mixed bag, leading the League of Conservation Voters to decline to include it in its annual scorecard. Groups linked to the Koch brothers, as well as to more liberal environmental groups both opposed the deal, representing dissatisfaction on both poles of the energy-politics divide.

GETTING CR-AZY: Less than 48 hours before the government shuts down, Republican leaders now plan to hold a separate votes today on a short-term government funding package and a massive $81 billion disaster package responding to a string of hurricanes and wildfires, POLITICO's Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report. But there are significant internal tensions within the House GOP and it remains to be seen what the Senate does with whatever the House ultimately passes. And there's concern that resistance to the disaster aid package in the Senate may push its consideration into 2018, which would infuriate Texas and Florida lawmakers who have vowed not to leave town for the holidays until they get the disaster funding approved.

Retiring Pennsylvania Rep. Charlie Dent summed it up: "It would be an act of political malpractice, after a successful tax reform vote, to shut the government down. Talk about stepping on your own message. I mean really, how dumb would that be? But anything's possible around here. This is Congress."

Twenty-four environmental groups sent a letter to lawmakers asking them to ensure adequate funding for environmental programs, no anti-environmental policy riders and equal treatment for defense and non-defense programs as Congress mulls lifting budget caps. Link here.

A HOLIDAYS CHRISTMAS PRESENT! Meanwhile, the Senate Finance Committee gave out special interest holiday gifts Wednesday in the form of a bill that will revive, extend or expand just about every energy credit anyone ever lobbied for, Pro Tax's Aaron Lorenzo reports. Tax writers didn't do a bunch of creative heavy lifting, since they mostly changed the end dates for credits that were gone.

Cold water: Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady said Wednesday he "doesn't want to do extenders" right now, but said he'd turn to a strategy for how to advance them "after we get back" from the holiday break, Aaron also reports. A spokesperson for Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch wouldn't offer specifics on timing either but said the Utah Republican wants to addressing the extenders "in short order."

The heavy hitters: The bill includes all three of the credits that have attracted the most support: A nuclear tax credit extension, an expansion of the carbon capture tax credit, and the biodiesel blenders' credit. Those three credits bring the support of South Carolina's delegation, the Midwesterners, and the unusual combination of states concerned about climate change and states with heavy coal production.

And the list: Santa gathered up all the wishlists and compiled them together into this bill. This bill retroactively applies and extends tax credits through 2018 for biodiesel blenders, cellulosic biofuel producers, fuel cells, energy efficient homes, energy efficient commercial buildings, small wind, two-wheeled electric scooters, solar water heaters, geothermal heat pumps, and coal production on Indian land.

The one that got away? Sen. Chuck Grassley had made no secret that he wanted to convert the biodiesel blenders' credit, which goes to companies that mix biodiesel into petroleum diesel (think truck stops), into a producers credit, which would go to the folks who make the biofuel. He didn't get it. The Finance Committee simply extended the expired blenders' credit and made it retroactive.

MERRY FERCMAS: To understate things a bit, this has been a bizarre year for FERC. The quorum loss, four chairs, four new members, and curious senior staffing choices. Like court opinions, every FERC decision is important to someone but let's be honest: The agenda for today's meeting is not the centerpiece of the agency's monthly get-together.

Kevin McIntyre, who has a term running into 2023, will smack down the FERC gavel publicly for the first time and set a tone for how he plans to lead and what his priorities are. For his part, McIntyre said, in an agency podcast recorded last week and posted Wednesday, he hopes to bring greater transparency to FERC's processes. As journalists, we hope that extends to a forthrightness with the press and clarity on a range of issues that happened over the past few months that set the rumor mill spinning. And between now and the agency's first meeting of 2018, FERC will take some "final action" on Energy Secretary Rick Perry's controversial grid resilience proposal.

Oh, and about that agenda: Although today's agenda isn't particularly long, it does include a rulemaking on "fast-start" power sources, one element of FERC's so-called price formation initiative that largely stalled when FERC lost its quorum in February. A year ago, FERC issued a proposed rule aimed at boosting market payments to resources that can cycle up quickly when grid operators need additional electricity. Today, FERC leaders seem poised to issue a final rule that sends instructions to the grid operators. The agenda also includes a new docket on cybersecurity incident reporting standards, which could be a proposed rule or something more early-stage, such as a request for information. The meeting starts at 10 a.m. at FERC headquarters and is livestreamed.

ALASKANS TAKE VICTORY LAP: Recognizing a long-held Republican policy goal of opening ANWR to drilling, the Alaskan congressional delegation took was front in center at the White House on Wednesday afternoon as President Donald Trump and congressional Republicans took their victory lap on the tax bill's H.R. 1 \(115\) passage. "Perseverance overcomes intelligence any day of the year" is how Alaska Rep. Don Young summed up the achievement, which he said he's been pushing for 37 years (after Trump mistakenly called him "Dan," prompting the gruff Alaskan to shoot back "It's Don!"). Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski and Sen. Dan Sullivan also spoke.

Anyone think this is Harold Hamm? Trump said during the press conference: "So a friend of mine called up about ANWR -- he's in the oil business — he said, 'You didn't get ANWR?' And I said, 'Tell me about ANWR.' He said, 'We've been trying to get that passed. The whole country — the world — they tried in Ronald Reagan. They tried with the Bushes. They tried with everybody. They never got ANWR.' But we got ANWR in this bill."

But the victory lap may be short-lived: Conservatives aren't pleased with a looming package — colorfully referred to by some as the "shit sandwich" — that will likely include billions in spending that won't be offset. POLITICO's Rachael Bade and Seung Min Kim with more here.

Quick analysis: The American Council on Renewable Energy released a quick analysis of the tax package now headed to Trump's desk that it deemed "a measured victory for renewable energy." Read it here.

LAST NUKE STANDING: The eyes of the nuclear energy community turn to Georgia this morning. Leaders of the Georgia Public Service Commission are considering an order from agency staff that would prevent Georgia Power from billing nearly $500 million the company spent on the Vogtle nuclear project to consumers. Southern Co.'s Georgia Power has asked regulators to greenlight $542 million in expenses it paid on the two-reactor project — the only units under construction in the U.S. — over the first six months of the year. But the commission's Public Interest Advocacy staff have said that the company should only be allowed to pass $44 million to ratepayers, arguing that payments to Westinghouse, the lead contractor who filed for bankruptcy this spring, were "not deemed reasonable."

Commission staff criticized Georgia Power, which has the largest single stake in Vogtle, for offering less than "active" oversight of Westinghouse and said that it deserves blame for missing the window to receive nuclear production tax credits. The utility has also asked that if the project is eventually cancelled, that regulators let it "recover its prudently incurred investment in the partially completed facility along with the cost of carrying the unamortized balance of that investment." Commission will hold a special energy committee meeting at 9 a.m., followed immediately by a special administrative session to vote. The audio will be broadcast here.

So what'll happen? Georgia Public Service Commission Chairman Stan Wise told WABE he expects the panel will allow the project to continue under certain conditions. "This commission will not say, 'Do not continue this plant,'" he said. "The commission will say, 'Here's what we think that you should have to do to continue the plant. Accept or reject.'"

ASSESSING NEW EPA REGIONAL CHIEFS: Anne Idsal, the new EPA Region 6 chief, told the Dallas Morning News she doesn't "necessarily" buy the consensus view that human activity is driving climate change. "I think it's possible that humans have some impact on climate change, the extent of which I have not made up my mind on," she said. Meanwhile, critics warn Cathy Stepp, the new EPA Region 5 Administrator, left the Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources "in tatters" following her tenure there where she infamously scrubbed its website of climate change information. According to MLive, prominent Midwest leaders including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker praised her selection.

ANOTHER CITY SUES FOSSIL FUEL INDUSTRY OVER CLIMATE CHANGE:

Santa Cruz County and the city of Santa Cruz on Wednesday filed two lawsuits against 29 oil, gas and coal companies asking them to be held accountable for the impacts associated with climate change including sea level rise and exacerbated wildfires. "It's time for oil companies to pay for the damage they've caused, rather than ask local residents to pick up all the costs associated with protecting us from sea level rise, increasing fires, and severe weather," County Supervisor Ryan Coonerty said in a statement. Similar lawsuits were filed over the summer by cities like San Francisco and Oakland.

In response to the lawsuits, Linda Kelly, senior vice president and general counsel of the National Association of Manufacturers, said: "Sadly this is just the latest in a long line of actions taken by wealthy activists and plaintiff's attorneys with an agenda to undermine manufacturing in America and rake in millions of dollars through the courts by politicizing natural disasters. The place to solve these issues is not in the courts."

SCHNEIDERMAN BACKS CARBON TAX: New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman became the first New York statewide elected official to back a carbon tax this week, POLITICO New York's Danielle Muoio reports. "That includes passing legislation to dramatically reduce greenhouse gas emissions, including a carbon tax, while expanding investment in the people and places hit hardest by climate change," he said in a statement.

MILLIONS REMAIN WITHOUT POWER IN PUERTO RICO: More than three months after Hurricane Maria hit, the Army Corps of Engineers doesn't think it will fully restore power to Puerto Rico until next May, CBS News reports. Power restoration is expected to hit 95 percent in February. More than 3,600 linemen are working to restore electricity "neighborhood by neighborhood," a senior DOE official told the news service.

ACCEPTED: Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse announced Wednesday GAO had accepted his request to examine White House calculations of the social cost of carbon and other similar figures. The agency said it would begin its review in the coming months. Whitehouse and six other Democrats expressed concern in their original request that the Trump administration's lowered estimates could undermine a host of environmental regulations.

MAIL CALL! TOO MUCH AUTONOMY? A 16-state coalition of governors and attorneys general, led by Texas AG Ken Paxton, sent a letter to Trump on Wednesday calling for the administration to "extend greater regulatory oversight to independent agencies." Though they weren't mentioned by name, independent agencies affected by such a move could include FERC, NRC and the Chemical Safety Board.

Information sought on sage grouse review: Thirteen Democratic senators sent a letter to the Forest Service seeking information on its role in the review of management plans for the greater sage grouse and an extension of the public comment period by 45 days. Link here.

REPORT ROUNDUP! DRILL, MAYBE, DRILL? Resources for the Future is out with a report looking at how various local communities have coped and responded to volatility in local demand for drilling over the last decade. It found most local communities reported "net fiscal benefits" from expanded oil and gas drilling, and that fiscal conditions had generally improved in 2016 and 2017. Read it here.

Keep getting more efficient: Energy efficiency programs in the electric utility industry saved 183 terawatt-hours of electricity in 2016 and savings have grown 45 percent over the past 5 years, according to a report from the Institute for Electric Innovation.

Industry report: Methane emissions declining: A report from Energy In Depth argues there have been continued reductions in methane emissions within the country's most productive shale basins. Emissions from the San Juan Basin, for example, have dropped 47 percent since 2011.

THERE'S A TRADE GROUP FOR EVERYTHING: The International Mountain Biking Association has split with its San Diego chapter over a proposal from Rep. Tom McClintock to allow bikes in federally designated wilderness areas, The Los Angeles Times' Evan Halper reports. "Resentment of these cyclists over the longstanding ban on 'mechanized' transportation in that fraction of the nation's public lands presents a political opportunity for Republicans eager to drill fissures in the broad coalition of conservation-minded groups united against the GOP environmental agenda. 'People who enjoy mountain biking have just as much right to use the public trails as those who enjoy hiking or horseback riding,'" McClintock said during a hearing on the bill, which has passed committee. The mountain biking association opposes the bill, while the San Diego chapter supports it (h/t POLITICO Influence).

Hatch releases tax extenders bill Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/20/2017 05:12 PM EDT

Legislation to extend lapsed tax benefits related to race horses, race tracks, railroad maintenance and a raft of energy provisions officially emerged today.

The bill, introduced by Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), would revive a range of tax extenders that expired at the end of 2016 under the PATH Act, which made a number of other extenders permanent and gave two- and five-year extensions to others.

The legislation would also extend and alter other energy credits, including the Investment Tax Credit, the nuclear production tax credit and the credit for carbon dioxide sequestration.

"Extending these provisions would help families, individuals and small businesses in Utah and across the country, and the chairman is committed to working with members to address the expiring extenders in short order," said an email from Katie Niederee, a Senate Finance spokesperson.

She offered no more specifics on timing, though pressures have been mounting from influence groups to attach extenders to any end-of-year legislation still moving through Congress.

GOP senators revive tax extender legislation, again Back

By Aaron Lorenzo | 12/20/2017 08:40 PM EDT

Senate Republicans introduced legislation Wednesday to breathe new life into a host of lapsed tax benefits, the same day they also passed a wider-reaching tax overhaul that they previously touted as the end of temporary tax policy.

The so-called extenders bill, introduced by Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), would give another two years of life to nearly three dozen tax provisions that expired at the end of 2016.

They include benefits related to owning race horses, building auto-racing tracks and ongoing railroad maintenance. The bill also would let homeowners continue to itemize their mortgage insurance premiums and would extend and alter energy credits, including the Investment Tax Credit, the nuclear production tax credit and the credit for carbon dioxide sequestration.

No cost for Hatch's bill was provided, but supporters of the broader tax legislation, H.R. 1 \(115\), already claimed a fiscal benefit.

They declared about $500 billion in savings from the cost of extending the numerous tax provisions, using what's known as a current policy baseline, which assumes the provisions would stay on the books since they have been routinely extended. By contrast, using a current law baseline would recognize the scheduled expiration of the benefits, meaning proposals to extend them would cost money.

Hatch's House counterpart, Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas), declined to comment on the accounting method.

"You're talking to the chairman who doesn't want to do extenders," Brady said.

The extenders included in the new package were last renewed at the end of 2015 under the Protecting Americans from Tax Hikes, or PATH, Act. It made a number of extenders permanent and gave two- and five-year extensions to others.

The strategy to advance this new bloc of extenders hasn't been determined, Brady said.

"We'll turn to that after we get back" from the holiday break, he said. "That's my anticipation."

A spokesperson for Hatch, Katie Niederee, offered no more specifics on timing, though pressure has been mounting from influence groups to attach extenders to any end-of-year legislation still moving through Congress.

"Extending these provisions would help families, individuals and small businesses in Utah and across the country, and the chairman is committed to working with members to address the expiring extenders in short order," Niederee said in an email.

A letter to Hatch, Brady and other congressional leaders from about 60 trade associations representing energy, housing, transportation, agriculture and other interests called on Congress to preserve all the benefits dear to their member companies.

"Allowing these tax provisions to remain lapsed creates confusion in the marketplace, and effectively increases taxes on entities that create jobs and economic growth," said the letter. "Accordingly, we respectfully ask that Congress add a multi-year extension, beginning January, 2017, of these important tax provisions to any end-of-year legislative vehicle."

But conservative groups have weighed in with opposition.

Extenders represent tax code carve-outs to special interests and continuing them would be wrong, said Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity. The group, funded by the conservative, billionaire Koch brothers, worked closely with Brady, Hatch and other congressional Republicans to get the broader tax overhaul legislation to President Donald Trump.

"We have not made any deals to look the other way on extenders," said Phillips, insisting that he wouldn't back down from opposing the effort to yet again revive temporary tax policy.

Tax victory may be fleeting for Ryan and McConnell Back

By Rachael Bade and Seung Min Kim | 12/20/2017 02:36 PM EDT

A beaming Speaker Paul Ryan high-fived and hugged his lieutenants after the House first passed the GOP tax bill Tuesday. As the Senate prepared to follow suit hours later, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell was elated.

"Couldn't be better," he said in an interview with POLITICO.

Capitol Hill Republicans have every reason to feel euphoric. Ryan and McConnell have ushered the biggest tax overhaul in a generation through Congress and delivered President Donald Trump his first major legislative victory since Inauguration Day.

But on the periphery is palpable angst, particularly in the House. Just hours before the Tuesday vote, some House Republicans fretted privately about the prospect of getting railroaded into propping up Obamacare by the end of the week. And conservatives have been stewing quietly over a looming legislative package coming in early January that most believe will increase spending and codify an Obama-era immigration program they believe is illegal.

"It's kinda like leaving a hospital finding out you're cancer free and getting run over by a Mack truck," said Republican Study Committee Chairman Mark Walker. On the one hand, the North Carolina Republican cheered passage of the tax plan. But he was also aghast that a unified Republican government was even discussing the possibility of enacting Obamacare subsidy payments they campaigned against for years.

Ryan and McConnell scored an undeniable win this week when Congress passed a sweeping tax overhaul. For the speaker, it was a chance to check his No. 1 policy goal off his bucket list. For the majority leader, it was an opportunity to regroup with a once-in-a-generation success, particularly after the Senate failed to repeal Obamacare this summer.

But the victory lap for both men may be short-lived.

By Friday Republicans will have to figure out how to fund the government, and there are no good options. House Republicans hoped to increase defense spending without giving Democrats any funding boost for their own priorities — an idea GOP leaders retracted after realizing it would go nowhere in the Senate. McConnell, for his part, recently backed the idea of adding Obamacare stabilization payments to the short-term spending bill — something House Republicans have flat-out rejected.

That's to say nothing of January, when Congress is expected to raise strict spending caps without equivalent cuts and potentially offer deportation relief to Dreamers. Both could repel the conservative base even more.

Republicans throughout Washington have begun calling the January legislative agenda the "shit sandwich."

"It's going to take a lot of the win away and a lot of the momentum away if we go back on our principles, and to me that's why the [Obamacare] payments are toxic," said Rep. Warren Davidson (R-Ohio), a Freedom Caucus member who enjoys a strong relationship with Ryan and even sat with him on the floor in the moments before the House vote Tuesday. On Wednesday afternoon, Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) said they would not push for an Obamacare stabilization measure to hitch a ride on this week's stopgap spending bill and would instead seek passage early next year.

Ryan may have sensed that other policy matters were about to infringe on the tax triumph: Just three hours before the House first passed the bill Tuesday, the Wisconsin Republican told his colleagues in a closed-door conference meeting to treasure the moment they passed the tax overhaul and remember it as Republicans tackle a series of thorny year-end issues. Be proud, Ryan said — and don't get bogged down in the drama.

Some heeded his advice; others did not. As Republicans streamed out of the room, several balked at Ryan's suggestion that McConnell might tack Obamacare subsidies onto the government-funding bill at week's end. Minutes later, when the gavel fell on tax reform in the House, some conservatives declined to join the party's standing ovation on the floor, frustrated over leadership's handling of the year-end to-do list.

Republicans' mixed emotions will again be on full display Wednesday: Around 3 p.m., GOP lawmakers will head to the White House for a celebration, where most will laugh and pat each other on the backs like one big happy family. But right after, House leaders expect to call a private conference meeting to discuss how to avert a shutdown — a discussion that's likely to displease conservatives, appropriators and defense hawks alike.

The Senate, a more bipartisan body comprised of more centrist Republicans, is having less heartburn for now. McConnell is determined that his hard-fought legislative victory on taxes — in which he kept together his fractious conference — not be swiftly overshadowed by a shutdown battle that could bruise Republicans.

"I think there's a bipartisan desire to wrap up our business here in a fairly non-contentious way, and I think you'll see that develop at the end of the week," McConnell told POLITICO. "This is not a place we haven't been before."

His top deputy, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), was also adamant that the looming battles wouldn't detract from the tax win: "I don't know anybody that believes we're going to shut down."

A shutdown just two days before Christmas would tar the victory that GOP leaders on both ends of the Capitol have spent months working toward. Democrats have criticized the messy legislative process and accused the GOP of rushing through the tax bill with little public scrutiny, charges Republicans dismiss.

"I think it's a real tribute to our majority leader that he's been able to get this up and hopefully out," Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said.

Winning over Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee, the lone GOP senator to reject the Senate's version of the tax bill, was also a feat for McConnell.

At a party lunch on Tuesday, Corker spoke to his fellow Republican senators about how he came around on the tax measure despite initially opposing it out of concerns it would blow through the deficit. He didn't mention, according to one senator, the controversy that exploded around him in the final days of the tax fight after a report suggested he flipped his vote only after securing provisions in the tax bill that would profit him personally.

McConnell came to Corker's defense in the interview with POLITICO, calling such suggestions about the Tennessee senator "absolutely outrageous."

The majority leader was unconcerned with the perception that some lawmakers could benefit financially from the tax overhaul. McConnell noted that his own accountant ran through how the Kentucky Republican would fare under the tax bill, and "I come out almost exactly where I am now."

"Every taxpayer in America has got a different set of facts," McConnell said. "Not a single member [was] casting a vote on this bill based upon their own personal tax situation."

In the House, there was never really a question about whether tax reform could pass. Ryan was able to muscle through an Obamacare repeal bill earlier in the year, and his conference was so sick of losing that they were willing to swallow almost any tax bill if it meant a legislative victory.

"It's a feather in his cap," said Rep. Bill Posey of Florida of Ryan. "He said this was one of his goals since the day he was on staff. And that says a lot, that it's been important to him — but also very important to the president and the country."

Even if GOP leaders iron out their government funding differences in the next three days with little drama, January is sure to be harder. While Republicans could pass tax and health care bills by themselves, negotiations on spending and immigration will require Democratic votes.

And Democrats, most lawmakers and aides on the Hill agree, have the upper-hand in those talks. That means it's only a matter of time before Republicans cut loose their right flank. But perhaps when that happens, and the intra-party bickering reaches a new crescendo, they'll look back to the day tax reform passed with fond memories.

"The nice thing about doing a big package that has been in the making and overdue for 31 years is this is going to have lasting impacts," said Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), who hopes Republicans will keep talking about tax reform well beyond the shutdown drama. "I don't think any of us are going to lose any of our enthusiasm or gonna stop talking about it."

POLITICO Pro New York: Schneiderman expresses support for a carbon tax Back

By Danielle Muoio | 12/20/2017 08:47 PM EDT

New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman this week voiced his support for a state carbon tax, joining ranks with a statewide coalition pushing for the legislation.

His comments, made in the Flatiron District, make Schneiderman the first statewide elected official to endorse the implementation of a carbon tax. They come as Schneiderman prepares to sue the Trump administration over its decision to repeal the Clean Power Plan.

"New York must invest in an equitable transition to a clean energy future — one that creates jobs, protects workers, and supports the communities most affected by climate change," Schneiderman said in a statement. "That includes passing legislation to dramatically reduce greenhouse gas emissions, including a carbon tax, while expanding investment in the people and places hit hardest by climate change."

The coalition, called New York Renews, is composed of clean energy, environmental justice and labor groups. It has said it will push legislation in 2018 calling for a carbon tax that would generate revenue for investments in renewables and energy efficiency projects.

A carbon tax has been proposed in the Legislature, but this is the first time a large coalition of environmental groups have made a concerted campaign to pass the measure. The New York Independent System Operator, which runs the state's power market, has also begun the first stages of examining what such a tax may look like.

"Sea levels are rising, major storms are occurring with increasing frequency — and it is low-income communities and communities of color who are hit the hardest," ALIGN Executive Director Maritza Silva-Farrell, a coalition member, said in a statement. "New York must dramatically increase its use of renewable energy to combat the threat of climate change. ... The fairest and most effective way to do this is to put a fee on pollution."

Schneiderman expressed support for the Climate and Community Protection Act, also a main focus for the coalition. The act would turn New York's renewable goals into law and set benchmarks for clean energy initiatives.

The Cuomo administration has been hesitant to support a carbon tax outright, noting that federal action would be needed to ensure it doesn't hurt the state's economic competitiveness.

Gov. Andrew Cuomo has committed New York to reducing emissions by 40 percent by 2030 as part of his Reforming the Energy Vision. Under the plan, the state is tasked with getting 50 percent of its electricity from renewable sources by 2030.

DEJA VU ALL OVER AGAIN: Even as Congress prepares to green-light its massive tax package as soon as today, there's little clarity from senior leaders about how to pass a separate bill before Friday keeping the government open and even less about what's going to be inside it. There's a push to stick disaster aid in the package — Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell backed that Monday — as well an effort to extend a lifeline to clean energy "orphan" tax credits.

House lawmakers rolled out a $81 billion disaster relief package to help states and territories still recovering from hurricanes, wildfires and other natural disasters. It includes $12.1 billion for the Army Corps of Engineers for immediate repairs after these storms, as well as provisions to expedite projects meant to mitigate the impacts of future ones. For those playing along at home, that means Congress would have spent more than $130 billion on severe weather this year, outpacing the total amount of aid after both Hurricanes Katrina and Sandy, and the request would be nearly double the $44 billion ask from the White House this go round. "We have a commitment to our fellow citizens that are in the midst of major rebuilding efforts in all areas, including Texas, Florida, California, Louisiana, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. Virgin Islands," Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen said in a statement.

What other appropriators are reading: Forty Senate Democratic caucus members, led by Ben Cardin, sent a letter to senior chamber leaders urging them to keep end-of-the-year spending legislation free of any environmental riders. If the group holds together, that's enough to uphold a filibuster on the underlying package. Read it here.

Senate Democratic leader Chuck Schumer didn't sound optimistic Monday on the floor, noting unresolved issues include addressing mine workers pension funding and "adequate" disaster relief. And he slammed Texas Gov. Greg Abbott for requesting immediate federal aid while refusing to tap into the Lone Star state's rainy day fund in the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey: "On its face, it's an absurd position for a routine critic of the federal government to take," Schumer said. "I for one don't want to vote a nickel for Texas unless they tap that rainy day fund."

More than 50 groups are out with a letter this morning urging Congress to tackle tax extenders before skipping town this year. That comes as more than 20 groups, including Alliance to Save Energy and National Association of State Energy Officials, asked senior lawmakers in a letter to extend several energy efficiency incentives that lapsed at the end of 2016. And six groups made a similar pitch for a retroactive, multi-year extension of the biodiesel tax incentive.

Most likely outcome? Via Budget & Appropriations Brief: 1. The House passes its partisan "defense-only" spending bill, with mostly Republicans. That bill is H.J. Res. 124 \(115\), but it is expected that today, its language will be attached by the Rules Committee to H.R. 1370 \(115\), which would then become the vehicle for the third continuing resolution. 2. The Senate strips out the extra Pentagon funding and adds a handful of riders. (Think "PAYGO" waiver, Alexander-Murray, FISA and maybe hurricane funding.) 3. The House eventually agrees to that bill, but on the backs of Democrats.

Speaking of that tax bill, the League of Conservation Voters sent a last-ditch letter urging members to oppose the conference report, H.R. 1 \(115\), raising particular alarm over language that would open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling. "This provision is being included in an attempt to generate $1 billion in government revenue to somehow justify the $1.5 trillion in tax cuts for the wealthy, but multiple analyses show that it is unlikely to raise anywhere close to even that miniscule amount," the letter states. Reminder of the energy-related provisions in the package here.

WELCOME TO TUESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NRDC's Ed Chen was first to guess there are eight senators older than 80. For today: Same question, different chamber. How many House lawmakers are over 80? SOMEBODY'S WATCHING ME? EPA paid $3,000 in March to have Administrator Scott Pruitt's office checked for surveillance bugs, according to an unnamed EPA source sharing documents with The Hill. The sweep, by New Jersey-based Edwin Steinmetz Associates, did not uncover any bugs. Shortly after that, EPA spent $25,000 on a private phone booth for Pruitt's office late this summer.

PROBE SOUGHT IN EPA'S 'MEDIA MONITORING' CONTRACT: American Oversight and the Environmental Working Group have asked EPA's inspector general to investigate the agency's $120,000 no-bid contract with a firm tied to Pruitt to track news coverage of its activities. "The EPA's decision to award a no-bid contract to a highly political organization with close ties to the current EPA Administrator, particularly combined with the fact that a related organization has been using the Freedom of Information Act to investigate the agency's employees, raises numerous questions about how the EPA is allocating its funds and whether it is complying with all government contracting, legal, and ethical requirements," they wrote. An employee of the group, Definers Public Affairs, has also filed dozens of public records requests for information on employees who have been critical of the Trump administration.

Meanwhile, Public Citizen asked GAO to find the contract was awarded improperly and recommend it be rescinded.

Won't back down: One of EPA's top unions, the American Federation of Government Employees Local 704, vowed not to be scared off by the tactics in a statement. "None of us got into this work to be voices of dissent," Nicole Cantello, an official with the union, said. "But in the face of grave injustice and the dangerous actions of the Trump administration, we have a moral obligation to speak out and do everything within the bounds of the law that we can to fight back."

** A message from the Renewable Fuels Association: This week marks the tenth anniversary of the Renewable Fuel Standard, helping to provide consumer choice at the pump. The RFS has been an unmitigated success, helping to clean the air, lower gasoline prices,

ON AN EMISSION: EPA will take comments on options for a proposal to replace the Clean Power Plan, rather than openly questioning its authority on greenhouse gas emissions, Pro's Emily Holden reports. But any new rule is unlikely to significantly reduce greenhouse gas emissions. EPA is seeking feedback on ways for coal plants to run more efficiently, which could potentially raise some emissions if plants run more as result. A replacement could also take years to materialize.

Reactions abound: The Clean Air Task Force notes that the George W. Bush administration issued a similar advance notice of proposed rulemaking on the same question and never followed up. (See POLITICO's U.S. climate change timeline.) "The Obama EPA has already engaged in this exercise, beginning nearly seven years ago with listening sessions and a full rulemaking effort with a robust and voluminous supporting record," CATF said in an emailed statement, adding that the Trump administration's own analysis found the rule would have prevented as many as 4,500 premature deaths each year by 2030. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, which represents many coal-reliant co-ops, praised EPA's move.

CONFIRMATION WATCH: The Senate Banking Committee convenes at 10 a.m. today to vote on a host of nominations. But all eyes will be on the fate of former Rep. Scott Garrett's selection to run the Export-Import Bank. Remember Sen. Mike Rounds came out against his nomination last week, which could sink Garrett in the closely divided committee. South Carolina Republican Sen. Tim Scott is also likely a "no" on the nomination, McClatchy DC reports.

Boring but important: The Senate Rules Committee gathers today at 2:30 p.m. to hear testimony on a resolution, S. Res. 355 \(115\), from Sen. James Lankford. Among other things, the bill would lower the amount of procedural time that could be burned on most lower-level nominees from 30 to eight hours. The time for considering Supreme Court, circuit court and Cabinet-level nominees would remain unchanged. It would also lower the initial procedural requirement for beginning debate on legislation from 60 to 51 votes, while keeping in place the 60 vote threshold for final passage.

CHALLENGED: The New York Times sued the Interior Department on Monday for communications with Secretary Ryan Zinke concerning Bears Ears National Monument. Read it here.

MAIL CALL! MAJOR WORK NEEDED ON REUSE PROGRAM: More than a dozen public health and environmental groups sent a letter to Pruitt urging him not to revive a coal ash reuse promotional program "unless and until significant changes are made to the program." They further ask the agency to evaluate existing "structural fill and beneficial reuse sites" to assess their impacts on human health and the environment. "EPA, or any other federal agency, must not promote coal ash reuse unless the safety of those practices has been fully evaluated and EPA has published peer-reviewed findings concluding that the specific reuses are safe for human health and the environment," the letter says.

TOSSING OUT SOME TWEAKS: The National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners sent a letter outlining a series of suggestions for revamping the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act. "FERC already has the statutory authority to enact comprehensive reforms of PURPA's implementing regulations, and it would be an enormous missed opportunity if FERC enacted only small changes to them," Travis Kavulla, past president of NARUC, said in a statement.

FAA TO DRONES: BUZZ OFF OUR NUCLEAR SITES: Drones must stay at least 400 feet from seven key DOE facilities, the FAA said Monday. The move marks the first time the FAA has restricted DOE sites from drones. ME knows there will be more than a few folks receiving nicely gift-wrapped drones soon, so here's the map of where not to go. Mostly you would do well to stay away from national labs and nuclear waste sites.

'UNACCEPTABLE' CLIMATE REMOVAL: GOP Rep. Carlos Curbelo slammed Trump's decision Monday to remove climate change as a national security risk from his strategy document and urged Congress to step up instead. "Congress needs to take action to ensure our military installations around the world are adapting and mitigating when it comes to climate change, and I challenge the Members of the Climate Solutions Caucus to step up to help lead that effort," the Florida Republican said. Curbelo didn't offer any specific policy ideas for doing so.

STAFFING UP: Tesla has added Holland & Knight to its roster of Washington lobbyists. Former Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) and three of his colleagues have been lobbying for Tesla on the GOP tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), and "solar tariffs" since Nov. 1, according to a disclosure (h/t POLITICO Influence).

MOVER, SHAKER: Bud Albright, a longtime energy sector veteran, is launching his own firm, Albright Strategies, in January. "I plan to focus on my strengths in matters before the Energy and Commerce Committee, issues of oversight and crisis management, and all matters energy, telecom, health care, and environment related," he emails. Albright's previously been an undersecretary at DOE and former staff director of E&C, among many other stops.

Solar, wind get reprieve in final tax bill Back

By Eric Wolff and Ben Lefebvre | 12/15/2017 06:57 PM EDT

The conference tax bill released Friday by Congressional Republicans resolves a slew of issues faced by the energy industry.

— Wind and solar credits saved: The final tax bill, H.R. 1 \(115\), follows the Senate's bill when it comes to the production tax credit and the solar tax credit, meaning both are left untouched. The House bill had proposed reducing the value of the PTC and changing when a project qualified for it, and it had proposed dropping the permanent 10 percent credit for the ITC. Both credits will phase down as agreed to in a deal struck in 2015.

— MLP benefits added: It also includes language Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) proposed that would give deductions to investors in master limited partnerships, the corporate structure for many pipeline companies.

— EVs roll on: A tax credit for electric vehicles was preserved.

— Oil recovery restored: Credits for abandoned oil wells and enhanced oil recovery that were eliminated in the House version were restored in the final bill.

— Selling off the oil: The bill retains the Senate language that would sell up to $600 million in Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil to offset any shortfall from opening up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling. The Senate language forecast drilling in ANWR would generate $1 billion in revenue over 10 years, an estimate critics have said is too optimistic.

— More revenue sharing: The bill also temporarily lifts offshore Gulf of Mexico oil and gas production revenue sharing caps to $650 million annually for fiscal years 2020 and 2021, up from a previous limit of $500 million, to support coastal restoration and protection projects.

— Base erosion eased for renewables: Tax writers created some room to keep banks and other financiers of renewable projects in the game by allowing them to take 80 percent of the credits for the PTC and the ITC.

— No tax extenders: Numerous senators have been saying it for weeks now, and the bill makes it official: None of the expired tax credits for small wind, fuel cells, and other "orphans" made it into the conference bill. The extension of the nuclear tax credit that was in the House bill has also been dropped.

— Utilities still get to deduct interest: The bill preserves provisions in both the House and Senate versions that allowed utilities to continue to deduct interest on loans without the limitation placed on other businesses.

EPA to kick off rewrite of Clean Power Plan Back

By Emily Holden | 12/18/2017 02:56 PM EDT

EPA is launching a process to consider proposing a new rule to replace the Clean Power Plan, according to a regulatory document released today, a move that goes further than a previous draft that sought to determine whether the agency had the power to regulate greenhouse gases at all.

The new document, which the agency is expected to release soon, acknowledges that the Supreme Court ruled that the agency has authority to regulate greenhouse gases and that the agency found that those emissions harm human health, requiring it conduct a rulemaking. It also notes that EPA did not issue a separate endangerment finding for power plants, and instead relied on one it issued for motor vehicles.

EPA argues in the new document that if the agency writes a new rule, it can only apply to coal-fired power plants, not to the broader power system, as the Clean Power Plan did.

The agency is primarily focused on opportunities for power plant efficiency improvements, it said.

The notice lists examples of those possible upgrades.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will take comment on the notice for 60 days after it's published in the Federal Register.

The long road to an international climate deal Back

By Emily Holden | 11/07/2017 05:02 AM EDT

It's been 25 years since the landmark U.N. summit that set the world on a path to climate agreements in Kyoto and Paris. And more than a decade has passed since the Supreme Court first ruled that the EPA can regulate greenhouse gas emissions. The Trump administration is withdrawing from the Paris Agreement and revoking Obama-era rules to limit those emissions from power plants, reversing decades of momentum behind policies to address the causes of climate change.

Let's take a look:

Trump Ex-Im Bank nominee will likely be blocked Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/12/2017 04:20 PM EDT

Scott Garrett, President Donald Trump's pick to lead the Export-Import Bank, will likely be blocked by bipartisan opposition after he struggled to convince lawmakers that he should run an agency he once tried to kill in Congress.

Garrett's fate was all but sealed Tuesday when Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) said he would oppose the former congressman's confirmation when it comes up for a vote at the Senate Banking Committee on Dec. 19. The panel has 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats, and all the Democrats are expected to oppose Garrett.

"I believe him to be a proponent of the abolition of the bank rather than a reformer of the bank," Rounds told POLITICO. "I'm looking for reformers, not abolitionists."

Rounds had raised concerns that small contractors in his state could be hurt if their larger customers lost access to financing. U.S. companies rely on the agency to provide loan guarantees to the foreign buyers of American exports.

If Garrett's nomination were blocked or withdrawn, it would be a major victory for companies and manufacturing groups, including Boeing and the National Association of Manufacturers. They have fought to stop his Senate confirmation based on his record of trying to shut down the bank while serving in Congress.

Before losing reelection in his New Jersey district last year, Garrett said the bank "embodies the corruption of the free enterprise system." As he tried to save his nomination in recent months, he struck a less aggressive tone and pledged publicly to keep the bank running.

Garrett's attempts to shore up support fell flat, and opposition to his nomination could grow before next Tuesday's vote.

Other Republicans on the committee said they had not yet made up their minds.

Sen. Tim Scott (R-S.C.), whose vote is one of the most closely watched on the panel, represents a state that's home to plants operated by Boeing and GE, two of the bank's most prominent beneficiaries. He has raised concerns with Garrett's record but has not announced how he would vote.

"My attention's all on the tax reform package," Scott said in an interview today. "I'm sure I'll have enough time before Tuesday to come to a decision."

Asked if Garrett will drop out or if the White House is looking for a new nominee, an administration official told POLITICO, "We plan on having a vote."

The administration has warned for months that if Garrett failed to advance then GOP lawmakers critical of the bank would hold up the confirmation of other nominees to head the agency. Sens. Pat Toomey (R-Penn.) and Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) have threatened to derail other Ex-Im appointees if Garrett were not cleared.

Four less controversial nominees for the bank's board are also scheduled for a committee vote on Dec. 19, and they're expected to move forward. Their confirmation would help the bank's board regain a quorum that's needed to approve transactions worth more than $10 million.

Shelby said on Tuesday that if Garrett were blocked, "a lot of us will probably vote against all of them," but he conceded that "we're probably outliers — the minority."

In an interview Friday, White House director of legislative affairs Marc Short declined to say what the administration would do if Garrett fell short of the necessary votes in committee.

"There are some who look at it myopically and will say, 'Here's your challenge in committee,'" Short said. "But I think focusing on the committee in and of itself doesn't factor in other members of Congress who will oppose a different nominee."

Underscoring the wedge that the Export-Import Bank has driven between Republicans, manufacturers on Tuesday applauded Rounds for announcing his opposition, while conservative groups went on the attack.

"Sen. Rounds is placing special interests and lobbyists above the interests of the American people," Club for Growth President David McIntosh said. "A vote against Scott Garrett is a vote for business as usual in Washington. Rounds' opposition will serve to protect the swamp and its creatures rather drain it."

NEW FUEL FOR THE CLIMATE SKEPTIC FIRES: The small group of climate change skeptics, led by the Heartland Institute, has seized upon a recent peer-reviewed study to vindicate their calls for a debate on the fundamentals of climate change, Pro's Emily Holden reports. The paper concluded the planet can tolerate more greenhouse gas emissions in the near future than previously thought, a finding its authors said does not undercut the basic consensus that human activity is causing temperatures to rise faster than normal. But Heartland Institute President Tim Huelskamp, whose group has submitted nominees for EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's red team, blue team exercise and EPA's Science Advisory Board, says the report raises more questions. "This is exactly the type of debate discussion scientists need to be having," said Huelskamp, a former Republican congressman from Kansas. "If they were wrong 10 years ago, what makes their new modeling correct?"

Scientists bash mischaracterizations: Authors of the study said their work has been willfully misinterpreted for political purposes. While they expected their conclusions to be mischaracterized, they said they hadn't expected such an intense reaction. "We are not trained in PR.... Our job is to do solid science and communicate that. It's not really our job to guard against every possible critique, especially when they're not real critiques," said Damon Matthews, a study author and Concordia University Research Chair in Climate Science and Sustainability. "[T]here is no scientific result in our story that questions the basics of climate change and the imperatives for mitigation action."

What did the report find? The study found Earth has 20 years at the current rate of carbon dioxide emissions — 10 years more than the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change had estimated in its 2013 report — before average global temperatures grow 1.5 degrees Celsius. While previous research suggested countries had a "carbon budget" between 200 billion to 400 billion metric ton of carbon emissions before temperature increases exceeded 1.5 C, their paper pegged the figure above 700 billion metric tons. Some respected scientists have disagreed with the methodology the authors used to come to their conclusions.

FEARS OF A SOLAR SUNSET IN 2018: Experts point to the last time the U.S. slapped steep tariffs on imported goods as a cautionary tale for President Donald Trump as he ponders whether to erect harsh trade barriers sought by Suniva and SolarWorld USA on imported solar panels, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Back in 2002, President George W. Bush put a 30 percent tariff on several types of steel imports, but the move led directly to a supply shortfall in the U.S., causing wild fluctuations in prices, according to Tom Werner, CEO of SunPower Corp and a tariff opponent. "There's a very good chance it could end up the same way," said Tori Whiting, a research associate at the Center for International Trade and Economics at the conservative Heritage Foundation. A reminder that we're at this point due to Friday's International Trade Commission ruling that opens the door for Trump to penalize cheap Chinese solar imports through tariffs.

Suniva and SolarWorld USA have both promised to restart production at shuttered factories if they get trade protections, and they reject the notion that tariffs would cost jobs. But getting factories back into operation will take years and attracting capital may prove difficult since tariffs are limited to four years under the law.

RAISING EYEBROWS, NOT PIPELINES, IN THE EMPIRE STATE: Amid speculation he's positioning himself for a possible 2020 presidential bid, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo has blocked three pipelines in the last 16 months, drawing national attention as his environmental policy has grown decidedly more progressive, POLITICO New York's Marie J. French reports. Cuomo most recently denied a permit for Millennium Pipeline's 7.8 mile project — including a novel legal argument involving concerns about the greenhouse gas emissions from the power plant it would serve — after previously denying two other major pipelines permits over fears of how they'd affect water quality. "I think environmentalists have no choice but to pay some respect to Gov. Cuomo's moves — banning fracking was a big step, and he's followed it up with some other courageous decisions," 350.org co-founder Bill McKibben said. "We hope very much that he'll support the call for 100% renewable energy that's becoming the basic test for politicians going forward."

GUESSING GAMES: Trump's penchant for leaving himself wiggle room on contentious policy decisions like trade, taxes, immigration, health care and climate change is inducing whiplash in many of the political insiders, business leaders and even foreign governments with a stake in the outcomes, POLITICO's Emily Holden, Andrew Restuccia, Aaron Lorenzo and Ted Hesson report. On the international climate front, diplomats have been left in the dark about what precisely the United States wants since June, when Trump announced his intention to exit the Paris agreement but "begin negotiations" to either reenter the nearly 200-nation accord or join an entirely new deal.

White House spokeswoman Kelly Love said: "President Trump was put into office precisely because he isn't beholden to lobbyists and special interests. If they're upset that they can't stroll into the White House and drive administration policy anymore, that's a badge of honor for a president who was elected to drain the swamp."

BONN BONN BONNNNN: Trump's decision to leave the Paris climate accord have raised the stakes for international climate negotiations in Bonn, Germany for nations around the world to reiterate their commitment to the accord, Pro's Eric Wolff reports, citing an interview with the top climate negotiator for Fiji who's leading the meeting. "Our aim was changed by President Trump's announcement," Ambassador Nazhat Khan said. "Now we must deliver a visionary [conference]. Every work item for COP 23 is measured for the enhancing and restating of the overall vision."

RELIEF FINALLY BEGINS TO FLOW IN PUERTO RICO: A ship carrying 1.6 million gallons of water, 23,000 cots, dozens of generators and food arrived Sunday in Puerto Rico — the first of many expected in the coming days — as millions of Americans brace themselves for potentially months without electricity and damaged drinking water infrastructure, the Associated Press reports. Rep. Nydia Velazquez plans to request a one-year waiver from the Jones Act, a federal law requiring domestic cargo shipments to move only on U.S. vessels. "We will use all our resources," Velazquez said. "We need to make Puerto Rico whole again. These are American citizens."

Dam worries linger: There were mixed reports on the status of the Guajataca Dam in Northwest Puerto Rico. Some suggested the structure remained in danger of collapse Sunday after authorities previously evacuated 70,000 residents in that area, while others quoted local officials saying the risks were overblown.

Congress plots relief efforts: Lawmakers are beginning to plot potential relief options for the island, which may include tax breaks and more Medicaid funding, POLITICO Financial Services' Colin Wilhelm reports. "This is a natural disaster in Puerto Rico like we haven't seen ever," said Carlos Mercader, executive director of the commonwealth's Federal Affairs Administration. "Think about Katrina but even worse because this is the whole island." In an interview with Colin on Sunday, Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rossello called for Congress to treat Puerto Rico like a state in any comprehensive emergency aid package. Remember Puerto Rico was already dealing with a massive government debt crisis, crumbling infrastructure and a bankrupt electric utility before the storm.

Relief not fast enough for many: Cuomo, who visited Puerto Rico on Friday, jabbed Trump for his focus on the NFL instead of the emerging humanitarian crisis over the weekend: "Instead of arguing with football players, instead of obsessing about how to take health care from the poor, why don't we put the politics aside and focus on helping Americans in desperate need?" he said, according to the Albany Times-Union. Hillary Clinton tweeted: "President Trump, Sec. Mattis, and DOD should send the Navy, including the USNS Comfort, to Puerto Rico now. These are American citizens."

Toxic waste removed in Texas: Tucked away in a Friday press release was the disclosure EPA recovered 517 containers of "unidentified, potentially hazardous material" from Superfund sites in Texas affected by Hurricane Harvey but the agency isn't providing any additional information about the waste, the Associated Press reports. EPA won't say what sites the material came from, whether they've been identified or if there's a human health threat.

QUID PRO QUO? EPA staff directed staff to take the first toward reversing the proposed veto of Alaska's Pebble Mine in July shortly after Pruitt met with Tom Collier, CEO of Pebble Limited Partnership, CNN reports, citing interviews and government emails. "This is a process issue," Collier told CNN in an interview. "[Pruitt] is not saying he's not going to veto this project. He's just saying that the rule of law says that you do an environmental impact statement first, right? That's Mr. Pruitt's position." Collier said Pebble plans to file mining permit applications in December. Pruitt's move allows the company to submit a permit application but does not guarantee it would be approved.

NATIONAL CLEAN ENERGY WEEK KICKS OFF: A veritable who's who and VIPs of the clean energy world are in town this week to tout the benefits of clean energy technologies and try to rally support in Congress and the administration for the sector's continued growth. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Energy Secretary Rick Perry launch the festivities in earnest on Tuesday at 8 a.m. A full schedule is available here.

LET'S MAKE A DEAL?: California may go along with some changes the Trump administration and automakers would like to see to vehicle emissions rules in the near future, as long as the White House and industry agree to tougher rules that would kick in later. Mary Nichols, chair of the California Air Resources Board, told Bloomberg that she has spoken with White House energy adviser Mike Catanzaro about the administration's review of EPA emissions standards through model year 2025.

If EPA weakens those rules, California would still be able to enforce its own, more stringent standards, which 13 other states also have adopted. That would create a complex regulatory patchwork — or a protracted court fight over California's authority — that all parties would prefer to avoid, if possible. "The price of getting us to the table is talking about post-2025," Nichols told Bloomberg. California would be "willing to talk about specific areas if there were legitimate concerns the companies raised" as part of a larger discussion.

MAIL CALL! REMEMBER THAT TALK WE HAD? Six senators, led by Sheldon Whitehouse, sent a letter to FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee on Friday requesting the commission move "as quickly as possible" to complete a rule on better integrating energy storage and small renewable energy installation, which Whitehouse and Sen. Ed Markey discussed with Chatterjee prior to his confirmation. At the time of meeting, Whitehouse said he received a commitment the rule would not be "unduly delayed."

CHINA MOVES TO CUT OFF OIL FOR NORTH KOREA: Moving to implement the latest round of U.N. sanctions, China announced Saturday it would ban exports of condensates and liquefied natural gas immediately, Reuters reports. The country also said it would limit exports of refined petroleum products from Oct. 1.

GREENS APPEAL HFC DECISION: ME readers previously learned it was coming, but the Natural Resources Defense Council on Friday formally asked a federal appeals court for an en banc rehearing of last month's decision striking down an EPA rule limiting use of hydrofluorocarbons, potent greenhouse gases, Pro's Alex Guillén reports in Energy Regulation Watch. The group feels the D.C. Circuit erred in its 2-1 decision and are likely to be joined in their appeal by Honeywell, a U.S. manufacturer.

GREENS OPPOSE FOUR EPA NOMINEES: Ten environmental organizations, including the Sierra Club, League of Conservation Voters and Waterkeeper Alliance, sent a letter to senators Friday urging them to oppose the four nominees expected to shortly come before the Environment and Public Works Committee for confirmation hearings. "Each of these individuals have demonstrated a willingness to advance the agenda of polluters and industry before health protections and safeguards for clean air and clean water," they wrote of the nominations of Matthew Leopold to be general counsel, William Wehrum to run the air office, Michael Dourson to run the Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention and David Ross to run the water office

MORE CONCERN OVER CADIZ PROJECT: California Sen. Dianne Feinstein released a letter Friday from the Metropolitan Water District questioning of safety and viability of the controversial California water project. David Bernhardt, Interior's number two, previously did legal work on behalf of the Cadiz project while in the private sector and the issue came up

repeatedly during his confirmation process. Feinstein, a vocal opponent of the project, accused the Trump administration of trying to "muscle the Cadiz water project through" back in April.

Energized by Trump, climate critics seize on new study Back

By Emily Holden | 09/25/2017 05:04 AM EDT

A small, vocal community of climate change skeptics is using the Trump administration's climate policy rollback and its doubts about humans' role in boosting temperature to dig into unsettled issues — including a new report that indicated countries may have more latitude in curbing emissions.

While the vast majority of the world's scientists agree that human activity like burning fossil fuels is raising temperatures at a pace far faster than would naturally occur, studies are still staking out the specifics about the levels of greenhouse gas the atmosphere can absorb before the Earth reaches dangerous temperature benchmarks and how climate change influences extreme weather events.

A new study published in the peer-reviewed journal Nature Geoscience last week suggests the planet can tolerate more greenhouse gas emissions than previously forecast before reaching a critical point of 1.5 degrees Celsius of warming. Earth's temperatures are already up about 1 degree C above pre-industrial levels. Some respected scientists have disagreed with the methodology the authors used to come to their conclusions, but the study drew wide attention.

The conservative Heartland Institute, one of the biggest voices for U.S. climate skeptics, has seized on the research as proof that scientific models used to forecast temperature changes are wrong and overestimate the rate of global warming.

But the authors behind the study say their work has been willfully misinterpreted for political purposes. Damon Matthews, a study author and Concordia University research chair in climate science and sustainability, said the group had been prepared for its research to be mischaracterized, but hadn't expected the reaction to be so intense.

"We are not trained in PR. We don't have the resources to hire PR firms," Matthews said. "We're trying to balance teaching, research, media outreach. Our job is to do solid science and communicate that. It's not really our job to guard against every possible critique, especially when they're not real critiques."

Climate science of any kind is under increasing scrutiny, and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has called for public debates about whether humans are causing temperatures to rise. Trump administration officials gathered at the White House last week to hone their messaging on the issue.

Heartland Institute President Tim Huelskamp, a former Republican congressman from Kansas, told POLITICO the new study supports the need for Pruitt's debates.

"This is exactly the type of debate discussion scientists need to be having," he said. "This article proved that there can be a lot of debate about the fundamental issues."

Huelskamp said the study raises the question that "[i]f they were wrong 10 years ago, what makes their new modeling correct?"

Several scientists associated with the Heartland Institute have been nominated to EPA's Science Advisory Board that reviews environmental regulations, according to E&E News. Heartland has also suggested researchers to take part in Pruitt's red-team, blue-team exercise, but Huelskamp declined to release any of their names.

Huelskamp said he saw no scientific consensus supporting man-made climate change, and argued his side has "dozens, hundreds, perhaps thousands that say that is not the case." The mainstream research community has said the climate skeptics overstate their numbers and are amplifying their message through the White House.

Climate scientists fear critics at advocacy groups like Heartland cherry-pick details from research to try to fuel doubt that climate change is real and poses dire threats to the environment and human health.

"[T]here is no scientific result in our story that questions the basics of climate change and the imperatives for mitigation action," Matthews said.

Pierre Friedlingstein, another co-author of the study and chair of mathematical modeling of climate systems at University of Exeter, said the new research showed the Earth has 20 years at the current rate of carbon dioxide emissions before lifting global average temperatures 1.5 C. That's more than the 10 years the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change had estimated in its 2013 report, but "certainly not a reason to encourage inaction. The emission mitigation challenge in front of us is still herculean and unprecedented," he said.

Previous research had estimated that countries had a total "carbon budget" between 200 billion to 400 billion metric tons of carbon emissions before temperatures climbed 1.5 C. But the new paper put the figure above 700 billion metric tons. That carbon budget is often used by policymakers to determine what actions they should take to curb climate change, and that's why the authors decided to take a second look.

Stefan Rahmstorf, the head of Earth System Analysis at the Potsdam Institute for Climate Impact Research, who outlined some doubts about the paper's findings in a blog post on RealClimate.org, said the paper didn't alter the science showing action to reduce emissions needed to be taken.

"At this point, debating whether we have 0.2 [degrees] C more or less to go until we reach 1.5 [degrees] C is an academic discussion at best, a distraction at worst. The big issue is that we need to see falling emissions globally very, very soon if we even want to stay well below 2 [degrees] C," he said.

The 2015 Paris climate agreement states the goal of keeping greenhouse gas emissions below the level that would cause 2 degrees C of warming, and the nearly 200 countries that signed on backed a more ambitious goal of keeping a temperature increase at no more than 1.5 degrees C.

Many island nations say that any warming over that level would be catastrophic for them. Fiji will chair the next United Nations meeting on climate change in November in Bonn, Germany, giving those countries a bigger spotlight.

Asked about the study last week, Fiji's' COP23 Chief Negotiator Ambassador Nazhat Khan said she wanted to wait for the IPCC report to "see exactly how we're doing."

"It would be great news," she said. "We are committed to 1.5 degree target, and it is the 1.5 degree target that is going to give hope. ... On the question of whether things are better, we don't know. We hear on a daily basis of more intense cyclones, and in the Pacific Rim itself we have disappearing shoreline."

Richard Millar, the lead author of the new study and a research fellow at the University of Oxford, said the team tried to be clear that the paper does not argue for fundamentally revising ranges of uncertainty about how strongly the environment responds to carbon dioxide. Instead, the paper reinterpreted data that IPCC used to re-evaluate the world's carbon budget.

"It's because we're so close that we're thinking about how best to use the modeling tools we have available ... to really answer the direct question that's required by policymakers," Millar said.

Rahmstorf's blog suggested the researchers found a bigger carbon budget because they had used a different baseline year when counting rising emissions, and incorporated recent temperature data that may not account fully for Arctic warming.

Millar explained that the research took into account a slowing growth in emissions by developing countries that have begun to back away from coal, and said he was disappointed that the paper's conclusions have been "willfully manipulated."

"We tried our hardest to conduct a press briefing and put out there a clearly written, nontechnical blog trying to explain our finding," he said. "There certainly seemed to be a sort of snowball effect."

A first set of news articles covered the study well, he said, but then opinion writers followed and "facts got lost along the journey."

Matthews said he expects that to continue.

"It's fairly obvious that having people in the Trump administration who are openly questioning the science of climate change is going to give fuel to the people who were already doing that more quietly," he said.

Tariff threat could foreshadow grim 2018 for solar industry Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/25/2017 05:04 AM EDT

The U.S. solar industry could face a grim 2018 if President Donald Trump slaps stiff tariffs on imported solar panels, according to solar industry and trade experts.

The U.S. International Trade Commission ruling Friday that domestic manufacturing had suffered injury because of solar equipment imports will give Trump the opportunity to hit the Chinese companies that own the lion's share of the global production of photovoltaic cells and modules. Proponents of steep trade barriers sought by Suniva and SolarWorld USA argue the U.S. capacity to build panels will disappear under the wave of imports from Asian countries.

But others, including the solar industry lobby group, warn that instituting tariffs or a floor price as Suniva has recommended would cost 88,000 jobs, double the price of solar installations and set the industry's growth back by years. And the last time the U.S. used the same trade tactic — under former President George W. Bush — could serve as a warning to the Trump administration.

The U.S. installed 14.8 gigawatts of solar capacity last year, fed by imports of 12.8 gigawatts of solar panels in 2016, according to the Energy Information Administration. U.S. production capacity of solar modules is less than 3.0 GW, leaving a gap that will require solar installers to rely on imports to meet the demand, even if companies that may be considering building U.S. manufacturing plants decide to shift operations to the U.S.

"U.S. manufacturing is extremely unlikely to fill in the gap between supply and demand in 2018. A near-zero chance," said Tom Werner, CEO of solar manufacturer and project developer SunPower Corp., who opposes the tariffs.

If Trump institutes tariffs — as administration officials say he is likely to do — he would be the first president since 2002 to use the safeguard provisions of the Trade Act. That year, Bush put a 30 percent tariff on several types of steel imports, a move Werner said led directly to a supply shortfall in the U.S., causing wild fluctuations in prices. One paper showed prices for some steel products jumped 80 percent, and steel-consuming industries shed 200,000 jobs, causing a loss of $4 billion in wages.

"There's a very good chance it could end up the same way," said Tori Whiting, a research associate at the Center for International Trade and Economics at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "That's part of how the market works, and it's the same the case for solar when domestic production doesn't meet domestic demand."

The two petitioners in the case, Suniva and SolarWorld USA, are both in bankruptcy proceedings, but both have promised to restart production at shuttered factories if import measures are put in place. But revving up machinery, buying new equipment, or starting a factory from scratch takes months or even years, and getting investment may be difficult when tariffs are limited to four years under the law.

Recent reports indicate that some companies may consider shifting production to the U.S. if Trump puts trade barriers in place, though there are few firm plans. The most ambitious project underway now is the Tesla and Panasonic panel plant in Buffalo, N.Y., a project that has been delayed because of financial struggles of Tesla's SolarCity arm. It's slated to eventually employ 500 people and reach 1 GW of module and cell production capacity by 2019.

"The idea that Suniva's tariff is going cost jobs is simply not true," a Suniva spokesman said in a statement. "The only thing at question here is how much we're going to grow as an industry, something even our critics acknowledge."

Building new factories takes time. SunPower's Werner said it could take at least a year to get a factory up and running at full capacity, leaving even a diminished U.S. solar market searching for supply, and potentially willing to pay tariff-inflated prices from importers.

That has happened in the lumber industry after Trump imposed tariffs of up to 31 percent on Canadian softwood imports. Strong U.S. demand for construction materials, spurred on by devastation from hurricanes Harvey and Irma, has drawn a steady flow of Canadian lumber — and pushed up material costs for house builders in the U.S. by 20 percent, according to Jerry Howard, chief executive officer of the National Association of Home Builders. That has benefited the Canadian companies, which supply more than a quarter of the lumber to the U.S. market, more than their U.S. counterparts.

But the solar sector is much more price sensitive. Residential rooftop systems already have high upfront costs, and utility-scale projects, which make up the bulk of the U.S. market, can be killed by small changes in panel costs. Solar Energy Industries Association CEO Abigail Ross Hopper said a crash in demand caused by higher prices will diminish the appetite for new factories.

"We have 36,000 workers in the solar manufacturing," she told reporters on a conference call last week. "If prohibitive tariffs are put in place, that number will decrease, not increase."

In 2003, the Bush administration withdrew its steel tariff after the World Trade Organization found that the U.S had violated the international rules. But since then, the division of the WTO that adjudicates trade disputes has become understaffed, and petitioners now face a six-month backlog. If the Trump administration were to implement tariffs around the end of the year, it would likely be at least another year before WTO would weigh in.

"I would be surprised if the WTO made its decision before December 2018, more likely middle of 2019," said Gary Hufbauer, a senior fellow with the Peterson Institute for International Economics. "The other important point about these cases [is] no retroactive relief, so during the next year, at least, and maybe longer, whatever remedy Trump decides, there will be no restitution for the importer."

Trade panel puts solar tariff decision in Trump's hands Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/22/2017 11:18 AM EDT

A federal trade panel declared Friday that surging imports of solar panels have hurt U.S. manufacturers — a decision that will allow President Donald Trump to penalize Chinese companies but could also choke off the fast-growing green energy industry in the U.S.

The U.S. International Trade Commission voted to uphold a complaint brought by two domestic solar manufacturers that complained that the low-cost imports had damaged their businesses. The decision was opposed by the much larger U.S. solar installation industry, which has seen the influx of the cheap panels spark a boom in construction of giant solar farms and rooftop systems around the country.

The issue will give Trump the opportunity to erect trade barriers he has hailed as key to his strategy to revive domestic manufacturing, and at the same time hit the Chinese companies that have largely evaded previous U.S. import penalties to become the leading suppliers of solar cells and panels. Administration officials say the trade case hasn't been a central one for the president, but they are increasingly confident Trump will favor tariffs when the commission sends the White House its recommendations in the next couple of months.

In a statement, the White House said Trump would make a decision that "reflects the best interests of the United States," and it praised the solar-makers, saying the domestic "solar manufacturing sector contributes to our energy security and economic prosperity."

The case could also give Trump a platform to advance his "America First" agenda and tout his effort to revive the ailing coal sector. Coal companies have complained that the Obama administration waged a regulation-heavy "war on coal" while tilting federal tax incentives and loans to renewable energy sources in order to advance climate change policies.

"[Trump] could easily reward his buddies in the coal industry who would really like to see high-priced solar panels competing with coal for space on the grid," said Clark Packard, a policy analyst and trade lawyer with the conservative think tank R Street Institute, which opposes tariffs. He added: "He may just want to stick it to people — your coastal elites who never would have voted for him who are more likely to use solar panels. He's looking for any circumstance to impose tariffs, it doesn't seem he cares what they are."

Trump has not weighed in on the case so far, though his administration has re-opened the landmark NAFTA agreement with Mexico and China, and he has regularly blasted China and other countries for what he calls unfair trade with the U.S.

"He's a protectionist, there's no doubt about it, and he's not very sympathetic to the renewable energy," Gary Hufbauer, senior fellow for the Peterson Institute of International Economics. "As much as you can predict any president, I think his conclusion is foregone."

The complaint brought by Georgia-based Suniva and Oregon-based SolarWorld USA has brought sharp opposition from most of the U.S. solar industry, which has seen its growth skyrocket as costs for the technology fell to a fraction of what they were a decade ago. Aided by federal tax incentives and state-level programs, large solar power installations have sprung up across the country, driving down costs for those plants to levels that are now competitive with coal and natural gas power power stations. That's lifted employment in the sector to 260,000 even as the number of U.S. companies that make solar cells and panels sinks.

The solar industry has warned that high tariffs would eliminate 88,000 U.S. jobs by boosting costs and making many projects uneconomic just as the industry, which generates $29 billion in revenues, was starting to stand on its own.

"If companies are going to be injured, we're going to be bringing in employees who will lose their jobs, mayors and governors and senators and representatives," said Abigail Ross Hopper, head of the Solar Energy Industries Association. "We're going to be making sure folks understand the impact, and putting a human face to it."

The four members of the ITC will now begin to formulate a remedy to address the injury suffered by the U.S. manufacturers, and they will take recommendations from solar companies. Any remedies taken by the U.S. will not apply to imports from Canada.

Suniva brought the case under Section 201 of the Trade Act, a rarely used but powerful tool that gives the president the ultimate authority to take or discard the recommendations of the commission. Most trade complaints — including two solar cases acted upon by the Obama administration — are limited to imports from specific countries, but Section 201 allows the president to impose tariffs on all imports of a product. The authority was last used by President George W. Bush in 2002 to implement a tariff on imported steel, but it was withdrawn 15 months later.

The commission will hold hearings on potential remedies on Oct. 3 and send its recommendations to the White House by Nov. 13.

Unlike trade complaints that allege foreign companies had unfair advantages because of subsidies in their home countries or that companies were "dumping" products at below-market prices to squeeze out competitors, a case brought under Section 201 needs only to show that imports were harming the domestic industry. That lower standard appears to have been met by data showing imports from Asian countries surging as some 30 companies in the U.S. shuttered their manufacturing plants.

While solar manufacturers in China ship about 20 percent of the equipment that is imported in the U.S., many Chinese companies have moved production to countries like Malaysia or Vietnam to avoid trade penalties imposed during the Obama administration.

Suniva, which lodged the original complaint and filed for bankruptcy protection earlier this year, has said that putting tariffs or setting a floor price for imported solar equipment would generate new manufacturing jobs in the U.S.

"President Trump can remedy the industry's injury with relief that ensures U.S. energy dominance that includes a healthy U.S. solar ecosystem and prevents China and its proxies from owning the sun," Suniva, which is itself majority owned by a Chinese company, Shunfeng International, said ahead of Friday's decision.

The company has recommended a remedy that would set a price floor of 78 cents per watt, as well as a tariff that starts at 40 cents per watt and declines over four years — proposals that would more than double the current panel costs. Analysts have said that could erase five years of cost declines made by the industry.

"We are confident there is a way to strengthen and save U.S. solar manufacturing without harming the strong growth that has made America such a powerful market for solar products," said Timothy Brightbill, an attorney at Wiley Rein who is representing SolarWorld. That company is a unit of Germany's SolarWorld Industries GMBH, which has also filed for bankruptcy in its home country.

Several lawmakers and governors had urged the commission to reject the trade complaint, including in a letter sent Thursday by Govs. Brian Sandoval, of Nevada; John Hickenlooper, of Colorado; Charles Baker, of Massachusetts; and Roy Cooper, of North Carolina.

"At a time when our citizens are demanding more clean energy, the tariff could cause America to lose out on 47 gigawatts of solar installations, representing billions of dollars of infrastructure investment in our states," they wrote to ITC Chairman Rhonda Schmittlein.

A bipartisan group of 16 senators sent a letter last month to the ITC asking it to "carefully consider the negative impact" of an injury finding. Those lawmakers included Georgia Sen. Johnny Isakson and Kansas Sen. Jerry Moran, both Republicans, along with coastal Democrats like Massachusetts Sen. Ed Markey.

Conservative groups that support free trade have also opposed erecting the trade barriers. Earlier this month, a group of six conservative organizations, including the R Street Institute, the American Legislative Exchange Council and the National Taxpayers Union, published an open letter arguing against tariffs. The conservative Heritage Foundation, which was not on the letter, also opposes a policy of tariffs and has been tracking the Suniva case closely.

"We believe that policies that pick winners and losers by imposing tariffs are bad, pretty much no matter what they are," said Tori Whiting, a research associate at the Center for International Trade and Economics at Heritage.

Suniva and SolarWorld are not without their own defenders: Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and two members of the Washington House delegation sent a letter of their own in favor of the tariffs, and House members from Georgia and Michigan have both backed the petition. The groups have also been backed by steel manufacturers.

Businesses struggle with Trump's indecision Back

By Emily Holden, Andrew Restuccia, Aaron Lorenzo and Ted Hesson | 09/24/2017 05:04 PM EDT

President Donald Trump has threatened to pull out of NAFTA, the Paris climate agreement and the Iranian nuclear deal — unless he opts to stay. He decided to revoke legal protections for the DREAMers, then urged Congress hours later to enact new ones. And he has repeatedly demanded that lawmakers enact major legislation on health care, tax reform and a $1 trillion infrastructure plan — without making it clear what he wants the final product to look like.

Of all the factors that have made the president's first year so turbulent, one of the most important has been Trump himself: Combining quick mood shifts, a rancorous White House staff and his own fuzziness on the details, the self-proclaimed dealmaker has left his options way open on a range of contentious decisions — while inducing whiplash in many of the political insiders, business leaders and even foreign governments with a stake in the outcomes.

Some business groups are making long-range decisions based on their best guesses of where the administration will land, while others try to outflank the White House by talking to key lawmakers before Trump does.

"It's exhausting because there are so many places that you have to touch, so many different bases, because you never know who he's listening to," said Brian Wild, a Republican adviser to businesses on energy, tax, labor, transportation and health care at the law firm Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck. "You never know who's going to get the final 'yes.'"

One longtime GOP lobbyist added: "You would've never seen a situation with Bush or Obama when a position in the administration got flipped overnight. Sometimes you win, sometimes you lose, sometimes you get half a loaf, but rarely do you ever just change sides."

"I think he thinks of everything as a trial balloon," the lobbyist said of Trump.

The flux is especially vexing for conservatives who were invigorated after Trump won but now worry that their years of pushing to lower tax rates and repeal former President Barack Obama's health care law might have been in vain.

"Nobody is happy," said another Republican lobbyist. "It's very likely that at the end of the year, we'll be left with Obamacare and the same tax code."

White House spokespeople rejected the idea that the president has waffled on policy issues, saying he's been "abundantly clear" that he'll leave the Paris agreement if he doesn't get a better deal and has been "very clear" he wants Congress to act on immigration.

"President Trump was put into office precisely because he isn't beholden to lobbyists and special interests," White House spokeswoman Kelly Love said. "If they're upset that they can't stroll into the White House and drive administration policy anymore, that's a badge of honor for a president who was elected to drain the swamp. This president makes his decisions based on what's best for Main Street, not K Street."

But the frustration has repercussions far beyond the Beltway. As tax talks between the White House and lawmakers stall, more than half of CEOs surveyed by Business Roundtable said they would have to shelve plans to hire and invest more if an already long-delayed overhaul doesn't move through Congress.

The outcome of the tax debate will determine whether Guy Chemical Co. in Somerset, Pa., can buy extra equipment, hire 10 new employees and give raises to existing staff, company President Guy Berkebile said. But Berkebile, who was recently in Washington to urge lawmakers to lower business tax rates, said he's not getting his hopes up.

"I am already thinking what I will do with the extra money at Guy Chemical if business taxes are lowered," he said. "If tax reform does not get done, I will continue to grind away with the same typical investment I have put back into my company over the past 10 years."

The details of what Trump wants in a tax overhaul are still in flux, complicating his sales pitch to conservative Republicans. The uncertainty includes whether the White House will insist on his oft-stated desire to cut the corporate tax rate to 15 percent, down from 35 percent.

On health care, Trump has spent the entire year pushing Congress to repeal Obamacare but has offered vague, often contradictory clues about what he wants to see take its place. At times he's promised "insurance for everybody," supported a House Republican bill that guaranteed nothing of the sort, or mused about letting Obama's system "explode" on its own or moving on to other issues like taxes.

Trump's tough talk on trade has also left industries he's vowed to support hanging.

The United Steelworkers Union complains that foreign steel imports have "skyrocketed" since April, when the White House suggested the U.S. might limit them for national security reasons. Data from the American Iron and Steel Institute show that steel imports jumped more than 21 percent in the three months following the announcement versus the first three months of the year.

The Commerce Department was supposed to issue recommendations at the beginning of June but has delayed them indefinitely.

Vagueness and wishy-washiness might seem unlikely problems for Trump, who's shown no reluctance to speak his mind and often expresses his thoughts in the most caustic terms — including using the epithet "Rocket Man" last week for North Korean leader Kim Jong Un. He's spent years espousing certain consistently held policy beliefs, such as his charge that "stupid" trade deals are letting other countries rip off the U.S.

But that doesn't make it any easier to predict the details of what Trump will decide as president, especially on the myriad issues where he's offered no well-formed opinion. And he's changed his mind on a host of issues — such as endorsing an influx of new U.S. troops to Afghanistan after previously calling for a pullout. Or holding a Rose Garden celebration in May after the House passed a bill to repeal Obamacare, only to describe the same bill as "mean" a month later in a meeting with Republican senators. Or deciding in early September to end the Obama-era program that prevented deportations for thousands of young undocumented immigrants who were brought to the United States as children — only to say hours later that he has "love for these people" and wants Congress to "help them."

"Does anybody really want to throw out good, educated and accomplished young people who have jobs, some serving in the military?" he tweeted about the so-called DREAMers a week later. "Really!"

Despite those kind words, 29-year-old Dallas systems engineer Erik Burgos said Trump's decision threatens to turn his world upside-down.

"A lot of uncertainty and fear starts to creep in," said Burgos, who was brought to the U.S. from Mexico at age 2 and later enrolled for protection under the Obama program. After Trump's announcement, Burgos postponed his plans to purchase a house and wonders if Congress will find a fix before his permit expires.

Still, he said, Trump's unpredictability gives him "a glimmer of hope" that his ability to work legally will continue.

Trump is different from most politicians, said Wild, who previously served as an adviser to top Republicans such as then-House Majority Whip Kevin McCarthy and former Speaker John Boehner.

"Typically, all these candidates build out a pretty profound policy notebook throughout the campaign, and then when they get elected they're implementing that," Wild said. But with

Trump and his aides, "they're kind of building this policy notebook in real time."

The second Republican lobbyist also blamed congressional leaders for the uncertainty on many policy fronts, noting that House Speaker Paul Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell have had trouble controlling their divided Republican caucuses on issues like health care.

White House aides insist that the lack of policy detail is sometimes strategic — though they acknowledge that Trump sees himself as a dealmaker, not an ideologue, and is apt to change his mind. A detailed set of legislative principles on issues like tax reform and infrastructure could draw attacks not just from Democrats but from conservatives who are essential to the passage of any bill. And having learned from the earlier collapse of Obamacare repeal efforts, the White House is eager to let Congress take the lead so Trump won't have the sole blame if a bill fails.

Wiggle room exists even in some of Trump's most starkly ideological decisions, on issues he alone controls.

In June, for example, he announced that the U.S. would withdraw from the 2015 Paris climate agreement, a decision championed by his most staunchly nationalist advisers. But he also said his administration would "begin negotiations" to either re-enter the nearly 200-nation accord or join an entirely new deal.

"So we're getting out," Trump said at the time. "But we will start to negotiate, and we will see if we can make a deal that's fair. And if we can, that's great. And if we can't, that's fine."

Since then, international diplomats have been left in the dark about what precisely the United States wants. (Some have even grouched privately that Trump should just pull the trigger and leave.) Many people missed the nuance in June about possibly remaining in the deal, until that detail provoked a welter of confusing news headlines last weekend following an international meeting of energy ministers in Montreal.

Despite all the back-and-forth, high-ranking officials only this week had a meeting on aligning their messaging on climate change.

Similar ambiguity reigns about Obama's 2015 nuclear deal with Iran, which Trump denounced at the United Nations this week as "one of the worst and most one-sided transactions the United States has ever entered into." He later said he had decided whether to exit the agreement — but refused to tell anybody, including British Prime Minister Theresa May, what his verdict was.

Trump has also threatened to withdraw from NAFTA unless Mexico and Canada agree to new terms and has raised the idea of a "sunset" provision, in which the agreement would terminate after five years unless the countries agreed to renew the terms.

Such a withdrawal "could endanger literally hundreds of thousands of jobs" and damage security cooperation among the countries, argued John Murphy, senior vice president for international policy at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Republican leaders in Congress have expressed alarm about the idea too. But a month after formal talks among the three nations began, it's unclear where the discussions are headed.

"In our trading relationships, we need certainty and security about what the terms of trade are going to be going forward, over multiple years," Murphy said. "Investments are made on the basis of that kind of certainty, and economic growth and job creation flow from it."

U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer said the countries were "moving at warp speed" to try to strike a deal by the end of the year, but he couldn't guarantee it would happen.

"We don't know whether we're going to get to a conclusion," Lighthizer said. "That's the problem. We're running very quickly somewhere."

In one key domestic policy, Trump has repeatedly pledged a big-ticket plan to rebuild the nation's roads and bridges — and demanded last month that Republican leaders "get back to work" and put "a great Infrastructure Bill on my desk for signing." But his administration hasn't offered much detail on what such a package would entail, aside from a six-page outline it issued last spring. Nor has it been clear how Trump would dole out his proposed $200 billion in new federal infrastructure spending, although Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao said in May that some of the money would go projects meant to "lift the American spirit."

Marcia Hale, the president of the advocacy group Building America's Future, said the administration has done more behind the scenes on infrastructure than may be apparent — though she acknowledged that it has "been a little more, shall we say, hectic than even some of the most recent administrations, and a little less predictable."

"You always know with this administration that things could change quickly, or policies could change quickly, or allegiances could change quickly," Hale said. "So you just go with the flow."

Despite the confusion, some people trying to persuade the administration have found at least one common theme they can use for making their arguments.

"We're telling our clients that ... any argument that has a jobs impact has to be framed as a jobs argument," said Stewart Verdery, CEO of the Republican lobbying firm Monument Policy Group, who has represented tech companies including Amazon and Microsoft. "An intellectual argument, a fairness argument, even a federal spending argument is not nearly as powerful as a jobs argument."

Fiji ambassador: Trump's Paris move raises stakes for Bonn conference Back

The U.S. plan to withdraw from the Paris climate pact has raised the stakes for the upcoming international climate negotiations in Bonn, Germany, to reaffirm the international commitment to the agreement, according to the top climate negotiator for Fiji, which is leading the upcoming meeting.

"Our aim was changed by President Trump's announcement," said Ambassador Nazhat Khan told POLITICO. "Now we must deliver a visionary [conference]. Every work item for COP 23 is measured for the enhancing and restating of the overall vision."

The meeting, like the one in Marrakech, Morocco, last year, was intended to focus on implementing the 2015 Paris agreement. Most observers had expected next year's meeting in Katowice, Poland, to hold more drama as final decisions are made on funding and transparency around the international agreement.

But, according to Khan, the U.S. intention to withdraw from the agreement changed that.

"After the announcement of President Trump, what states were looking for ... is a very clear direction," she said. "We must act to maintain the direction of Paris together, and we aren't going to have other countries that express reservations. It's very important that we maintain this overall vision. ... The U.S. role has really shaped the way Fiji is approaching COP."

Khan said the U.S. had made clear its at previous international meetings it would remain engaged in the Paris process, despite its intention to leave. She said U.S. willingness to engage is "very encouraging."

WHAT'S NEXT: Fiji will host COP23 in Bonn, Germany, from Nov. 6 through Nov. 17.

Aid begins to flow to hurricane-hit Puerto Rico Back

By Associated Press | 09/23/2017 11:01 PM EDT

Large amounts of federal aid began moving into Puerto Rico on Saturday, welcomed by local officials who praised the Trump administration's response but called for the emergency loosening of rules long blamed for condemning the U.S. territory to second-class status.

In northwest Puerto Rico, people began returning to their homes after a spillway eased pressure on a dam that cracked after more than a foot of rain fell in the wake of the hurricane.

The opening of the island's main port in the capital allowed 11 ships to bring in 1.6 million gallons of water, 23,000 cots, dozens of generators and food. Dozens more shipments are expected in upcoming days.

The federal aid effort is racing to stem a growing humanitarian crisis in towns left without fresh water, fuel, electricity or phone service. Officials with the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is in charge of the relief effort, said they would take satellite phones to all of Puerto Rico's towns and cities, more than half of which were cut off following Maria's devastating crossing of Puerto Rico on Wednesday.

The island's infrastructure was in sorry shape long before Maria struck. A $73 billion debt crisis has left agencies like the state power company broke. As a result the power company abandoned most basic maintenance in recent years, leaving the island subject to regular blackouts.

A federal control board overseeing Puerto Rico's finances authorized up to $1 billion in local funds to be used for hurricane response, but Gov. Ricardo Rossello said he would ask for more.

"We're going to request waivers and other mechanisms so Puerto Rico can respond to this crisis," he said. "Puerto Rico will practically collect no taxes in the next month."

U.S. Rep. Nydia Velazquez of New York said she will request a one-year waiver from the Jones Act, a federal law blamed for driving up prices on Puerto Rico by requiring cargo shipments there to move only on U.S. vessels as a means of supporting the U.S. maritime industry.

"We will use all our resources," Velazquez said. "We need to make Puerto Rico whole again. These are American citizens."

A group of anxious mayors arrived in the capital to meet with Rossello to present a long list of items they urgently need. The north coastal town of Manati had run out of fuel and fresh water, Mayor Jose Sanchez Gonzalez said.

"Hysteria is starting to spread. The hospital is about to collapse. It's at capacity," he said, crying. "We need someone to help us immediately."

The death toll from Maria in Puerto Rico was at least 10, including two police officers who drowned in floodwaters in the western town of Aguada. That number was expected to climb as officials from remote towns continued to check in with officials in San Juan.

Authorities in the town of Vega Alta on the north coast said they had been unable to reach an entire neighborhood called Fatima, and were particularly worried about residents of a nursing home.

"I need to get there today," Mayor Oscar Santiago told The Associated Press. "Not tomorrow, today."

Rossello said Maria would clearly cost more than the last major storm to wallop the island, Hurricane George in September 1998. "This is without a doubt the biggest catastrophe in modern history for Puerto Rico," he said.

Rossello and other officials praised the federal government for planning its response in detail before the storm hit, a contrast with what Puerto Rico has long seen as the neglect of 3.4 million Americans living in a territory without a vote in Congress or the electoral college.

"This is the first time we get this type of federal coordination," said Resident Commission Jenniffer Gonzalez, Puerto Rico's non-voting representative in Washington.

A dam upstream of the towns of Quebradillas and Isabela in northwest Puerto Rico was cracked but had not burst by Saturday night as water continued to pour out of rain-swollen Lake Guajataca. Federal officials said Friday that 70,000 people, the number who live in the surrounding area, would have to be evacuated. But Javier Jimenez, mayor of the nearby town of San Sebastian, said he believed the number was far smaller.

Secretary of Public Affairs Ramon Rosario said about 300 families were in harm's way.

The governor said there is "significant damage" to the dam and authorities believe it could give way at any moment. "We don't know how long it's going to hold. The integrity of the structure has been compromised in a significant way," Rossello said.

Some residents nonetheless returned to their homes Saturday as the water levels in the reservoir began to sink.

"There were a lot of people worried and crying, but that's natural, because the reservoir was about to break through," said Maria Nieves, 43. "They couldn't open the spillway until later in the night."

The 345-yard dam, which was built around 1928, holds back a man-made lake covering about 2 square miles. More than 15 inches of rain from Maria fell on the surrounding mountains.

Officials said 1,360 of the island's 1,600 cellphone towers were downed, and 85 percent of above-ground and underground phone and internet cables were knocked out. With roads blocked and phones dead, officials said, the situation may worsen.

At least 31 lives in all have been lost around the Caribbean due to Maria, including at least 15 on hard-hit Dominica. Haiti reported three deaths; Guadeloupe, two; and the Dominican Republic, one.

Across Puerto Rico, more than 15,000 people are in shelters, including some 2,000 rescued from the north coastal town of Toa Baja. Many Puerto Ricans planned to head to the mainland to temporarily escape the devastation.

Storm-battered Puerto Rico looks to Washington for help Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/22/2017 01:52 PM EDT

As Puerto Rico reels from the devastation of Hurricane Maria, the Trump administration and Congress are pledging to provide more aid to the commonwealth, which is already suffering from a historic debt crisis.

Tax breaks and more Medicaid funding could be a part of a recovery package, and activists would like to see debt relief for the U.S. Virgin Islands attached as well. Though damage assessments have only begun, the post-Katrina and Sandy relief bills likely will serve as guideposts for Congress.

"This is a natural disaster in Puerto Rico like we haven't seen ever," said Carlos Mercader, executive director of the commonwealth's Federal Affairs Administration. "Think about Katrina but even worse because this is the whole island."

President Donald Trump vowed Thursday to visit Puerto Rico, which lost 100 percent of its electrical power in the Category 4 storm, and House Speaker Paul Ryan promised a second recovery bill in Congress after the House and Senate passed a disaster relief package after Hurricane Harvey.

Maria's crippling impact will also force Puerto Rico and the federal board that Congress created last year to oversee its finances to reassess how to bring the territory out of its debt crunch and decade-long recession.

Hurricanes Maria and Irma greatly complicate the tangled debt web that has ensnared Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. The storms come just months after Puerto Rico entered a court-supervised restructuring process for its $70 billion debt — in what amounted to the largest municipal bankruptcy in U.S. history. And with a population of 100,000, the U.S. Virgin Islands owes even more money per resident on the $6.5 billion held by creditors than does Puerto Rico.

Before Maria hit, Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló and the federal oversight board were locked in a battle over furloughs and pension cuts that the board said were necessary to balance the budget. The seven-member, bipartisan board had also approved a fiscal plan submitted by Rosselló that could face significant revisions after the storms.

"There's no way they'll make budget. There's just no way," said Luis Fortuño, who was governor of Puerto Rico from 2009 to 2013, and now a partner at the law firm Steptoe & Johnson. "Both the government and the oversight board had certain assumptions that are out the window now."

That fiscal plan affects every decision made by Puerto Rico's government and charts a course for the commonwealth for the next 10 years. The oversight board has final say over revenue and spending decisions, so it must approve any changes.

Late Thursday, the board essentially gave Rosselló a pass on that budget, allowing him to re-allocate up to $1 billion at his discretion for emergency response efforts. The board also said it would help lobby federal agencies for further assistance.

"Furthermore, if the Government determines increases to the Territory Budget are needed to respond to Hurricane Maria, we stand ready to expeditiously approve such requests, in anticipation of much needed federal funding," the board wrote to Rosselló. "To that end, we will join the Government of Puerto Rico in actively seeking FEMA and any other potential sources of federal funds for the recovery and reconstruction of Puerto Rico."

This month's storms may also temporarily align groups of creditors that have fought the board, the commonwealth government and each other for years over the billions owed to them by Puerto Rico. Though lobbyists for creditors contacted by POLITICO had not yet made specific plans, they may be willing to cooperate because Puerto Rico will be able to pay its debts quicker if there's a robust recovery.

Ryan also offered words of sympathy and support.

"To our fellow citizens in Puerto Rico, they are front and center in our thoughts and we want them to know the federal response will be there," the House speaker said during a visit to sections of Florida damaged by Hurricane Irma.

Rep. José E. Serrano (D-N.Y.), a member of the House Appropriations Committee, which is likely to write the aid package, said he would reach out to its chair and ranking member over the weekend to urge funding to the territories affected by the storms. He also wants to see a panel set up for Puerto Rico similar to the one established for New York after Superstorm Sandy to guide reconstruction.

"I'm asking President Trump to do the same thing for Puerto Rico [as after Sandy], that looks at the needs they have now and the needs they have in the future," Serrano said.

Trump said yesterday that the U.S. is starting the process of helping Puerto Rico and will work with Rosselló. Mercader, the point person for Puerto Rico with the federal government, said the level of commitment and response from the Trump administration pleasantly surprised him.

"It's been more than what I expected," he said. The commonwealth and federal responders also hoped to bring online a joint operations center in San Juan's convention center by the end of the day Friday.

So far the government has confirmed six storm-related deaths, though the tally could climb much higher. Mercader's office in Washington was deputized to field emergency calls from Puerto Rico as most of the commonwealth's communications went offline.

Entire sections of the island have yet to be heard from, and even local government agencies were having a hard time reaching one another to coordinate, creating a "cloud of uncertainty," Mercader said. Mudslides and flooding continued in areas, and FEMA will send helicopters to try to reach towns that have become inaccessible by road.

In the longer term, the fallout from the recent hurricanes could also bring more attention to the debt crisis in the Virgin Islands.

Eric LeCompte, executive director of Jubilee USA, a religious-affiliated organization that lobbied on behalf of debt restructuring for Puerto Rico last year, said his group would push for the Virgin Islands to be treated as Puerto Rico was in disaster relief legislation.

"Congress is going to have to step in in some new ways," said LeCompte. "At this point, no one's going to get paid anyways."

Jubilee, which has ties to about 650 faith-based groups and organizations, would also push for the U.S. to lead the charge on a temporary debt moratorium on money owed to the International Monetary Fund by non-U.S. Caribbean islands affected by the storms. The U.S. holds more votes than any other country in the IMF.

"We're just looking at delaying payments for six months to a year," during the disaster recovery, LeCompte said.

Puerto Rico's government praised Trump and the Department of Homeland Security for their response efforts. But the territories, used to receiving less attention than states despite their own U.S. citizenship, remain concerned that Congress and the White House will forget them after floodwaters recede and the winds die down.

"There ought not to be a difference" between the response to Harvey's flooding of Texas and Irma and Maria's buffeting of the U.S. Caribbean, Fortuno said.

Puerto Rico's governor calls for greater federal response to Maria Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 09/24/2017 10:44 PM EDT

Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rossello called on the Pentagon to provide more search-and-rescue help and humanitarian resources to help the beleaguered island recover from "complete devastation" from Hurricane Maria.

"We need more resources from the Department of Defense so we can get helicopters and resources," Rossello told POLITICO in a phone interview Sunday night.

"We know that there are capabilities in the surrounding areas, helicopters, planes and so forth," he said. "And our petition is for us to be able to use them."

A Defense Department spokesperson said in an e-mail that six Navy helicopters and three Marine Osprey planes capable of vertical takeoff and landing had begun search-and-rescue operations and damage assessments.

Days after the category 4 hurricane battered the island, only a handful of municipalities have been able to make contact with San Juan or the outside world. That has prompted the commonwealth government to dispatch runners to make contact, since roads throughout much of Puerto Rico have been made impassable.

Rossello said that in addition to more military resources, he would petition the Trump administration to lower the threshold for disaster expenditures that the island would need to refund.

He did not criticize President Donald Trump personally and praised promises of help the president made before the hurricane, as well as the response of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Still, the island awaits a federal disaster declaration for 24 out of its 78 municipalities.

Rossello also called on Congress to treat Puerto Rico like a state in any comprehensive emergency aid package.

"Whatever relief package we have, whatever impact we have, we are U.S. citizens," Rossello said. "We shouldn't be the lesser for it."

He called on the federal government to recognize Puerto Rico's dire fiscal situation and consider the possibility that residents could leave in droves if the commonwealth doesn't recover quickly, compounding the island's troubles.

If Congress doesn't step up, he said, "my fear is we're going to have some side effects that are devastating both for Puerto Rico and the United States. Mainly massive migration that would deteriorate our [economic] base here in Puerto Rico and would provoke significant demographic shifting in other areas of the United States."

Cantwell slams DOI nominee for water lobbying ties, nondisclosure agreement Back

By Annie Snider | 05/18/2017 01:09 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee for the No. 2 spot at the Interior Department on Thursday argued that the administration may be able to withhold information related to the transition from Congress, including about a Trump administration policy reversal that removed a major roadblock for a controversial water project he had a vested interest in.

During a hearing on David Bernhardt's nomination for deputy Interior secretary, Maria Cantwell, the top Democrat on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, asked whether nondisclosure agreements signed by members of Trump's transition team could allow administration officials to withhold information from Congress, or whether the federal Whistleblower Protection Act would apply. Bernhardt, a lobbyist for Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck, led the Trump transition team for the Interior Department for a period of time.

"I hate to give you a lawyer's answer to a legal question in a hearing, but I think the first question would be whether or not the Whistleblower Act would even apply to the transition because it's my understanding that Trump for America is a nonprofit entity, so I'm not sure that the legal rubric that falls for government would even apply for that," Bernhardt said.

Cantwell particularly focused on Bernhardt's activities related to Cadiz Inc., a company seeking to build a 43-mile pipeline to pump water from the Mojave Desert to southern California communities. Cadiz has paid $2.75 million in fees to Brownstein Hyatt since 2010, and one of the lobby firm's shareholders is chief executive of the company.

Bernhardt did legal work for the project, and his firm receives part of its compensation in stock shares. So far it has received 200,000 shares in Cadiz and is in line for another 200,000 if the project is built, according to filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The Cadiz project is fiercely opposed by environmentalists and California Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein, who say it would deplete a fragile aquifer feeding protected federal land.

The Trump administration last month reversed two Obama administration legal guidances that prevented the Cadiz project from skirting federal environmental review by building the pipeline in a railroad right-of-way. Bernhardt said he had "no involvement" with the issue during the Trump transition, and that neither he nor his firm had benefited financially from the policy shift as far as he knew.

Bernhardt, who has also lobbied for Westlands Water District, a group of powerful Central Valley agricultural growers, has said he will recuse himself from issues related to former clients for one year.

But Cantwell argued that isn't long enough, and that he should recuse himself for the entirety of his tenure.

"I personally think that Westlands and Cadiz represent such large public policy issues with financial interests that it would be better if you recused yourself for the entire time that you were at the department, not just one or two years," she said.

Berhardt said he would clear any issues related to his former lobbying interests with Interior's ethics office.

"If I get a whiff of something coming my way that involves a client or former client or my firm, I'm going to make that item run straight to the ethics office," he testified Thursday.

Feinstein says Trump trying to push through controversial water project Back

By Annie Snider | 04/04/2017 05:31 PM EDT

Opponents of a controversial California water project are accusing the Trump administration of reopening a loophole to allow infrastructure projects crossing federal land to avoid environmental review.

Last Wednesday, the Bureau of Land Management rescinded a pair of Obama administration memos laying out how any infrastructure project that uses a railroad right-of-way must be related to the railroad itself. These guidelines largely blocked proponents of oil, gas and water pipelines like the contentious Cadiz groundwater pipeline proposed in California's Mojave Desert from avoiding federal environmental review by building their projects along the many existing railroad rights-of-way.

In a statement today, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) called the Trump administration's move "a blatant attempt to muscle the Cadiz water project through."

"This is clearly just an effort to circumvent an environmental review that any project of this magnitude on federal land would normally undergo," she said.

The proposed Cadiz pipeline would pump groundwater from a fragile desert aquifer across 43 miles of land, much of it federally owned. Project opponents have argued it would draw more water from the aquifer than can be recharged naturally, potentially drying up springs that are critical to wildlife at nearby nature preserve and a newly created national monument.

The project stalled after the BLM told Cadiz in October 2015 it could not use an existing railroad right-of-way and would need to apply for its own. The project has appeared on several recent lists of infrastructure projects being touted to the Trump administration.

WHAT'S NEXT: Cadiz could try again to use the existing railroad right-of-way for its project. However, an Interior Department legal interpretation saying that railroad rights-of-way must be used for purposes related to the railroad remains on the books. The Trump administration could decide to write its own implementing guidelines.

FEARS OF HUMANITARIAN CRISIS IN PUERTO RICO: Federal officials appeared to dramatically ramp up their response to the devastated Puerto Rico on Tuesday as the dire conditions became ever clearer. According to the Defense Department, just 44 percent of the island's residents have potable drinking water while only 11 of 69 hospitals have fuel or power. In addition, 80 percent of the island's electricity transmission system and 100 percent of the distribution system are damaged. Florida Republican Sen. Marco Rubio, who toured the island Monday, called for a "more aggressive" federal response and summed up the severity of the situation: "I'm concerned about human suffering and potential loss of life if aid doesn't reach the places it needs to reach quickly enough," he said.

President Donald Trump, who one day earlier appeared to partially blame the territory's plight on its "broken infrastructure & massive debt," touted the "amazing" response Tuesday. "We are literally unloading, on an hourly basis, water, food, supplies," he said. "And we are going to do far more than anybody else would ever be able to do. And it's being recognized as such, but it is a tough situation." Trump later convened two briefings on relief efforts, the second of which included EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Energy Secretary Rick Perry. EPA also approved a waiver for certain fuels on Puerto Rico on Tuesday. POLITICO's Andrew Restuccia and Louis Nelson with more here.

Both Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Speaker Paul Ryan reiterated Congress would respond with additional hurricane aid when the administration made a formal request. "I also want the people of Puerto Rico to know that they are going to get the kind of help and aid that Texas and Florida enjoyed," Ryan said. But Pro Budget and Appropriations Brief's Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes report that formal request is likely several weeks away as officials focus right now on delivering supplies rather than requesting more funds.

What about the Jones Act? The Trump administration is not waiving the Jones Act for Puerto Rico, as it did for Florida and Texas after hurricanes ravaged those states earlier this year. And Sen. John McCain wants to know why. McCain, a long-time proponent of revamping the law requiring shipments between domestic ports be carried on U.S.-flagged vessels, sent a letter to DHS urging the agency to reconsider its decision. "I am confident that repealing this law would lead to hastened recovery efforts where our country needs it most," he wrote.

Separately, Tuesday, the unlikely duo of Sens. Cory Gardner and Kamala Harris asked Perry in a letter to "work expeditiously" with utilities around the country to help get the lights back on. But Southern CEO Tom Fanning, co-chairman of the Electricity Subsector Coordinating Council, sought to keep expectations realistic in a Tuesday statement: "Puerto Rico is facing complicated logistical challenges for life and safety that need to be stabilized before full power restoration efforts can get underway."

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and the American Chemistry Council's Jon Corley was first up to name Ralph Nader as the 1977 SNL host (his opening sketch here). NOT FREAKING OUT — YET: Utility-scale solar developers and environmentalists remain hopeful BLM's ongoing leasing program will remain on track despite Zinke's comments Tuesday that large-scale solar development is a poor use of federal lands, Pro's Esther Whieldon and Eric Wolff report. "Our hope is that he was just blowing off steam, it was just a casual off the cuff conversation and that it doesn't have any material or practical implications for the permitting process for our projects," Shannon Eddy, executive director of the Large-scale Solar Association, said referring to his comments at National Clean Energy Week event in Washington.

ICYMI: During his speech, Zinke highlighted some negative environmental consequences of renewables and said fossil fuel development was the best use of public lands. "I think the biggest opportunity in solar is the roof," Zinke said. "Because when I see solar cells out on land, that land is no longer useful for anything else but energy. But there's a lot of roofs. And I think the greatest opportunity for the solar industry is look at where the roofs are." But he also didn't mention the Obama-era solar leasing program at BLM, an omission that some are taking as an encouraging sign.

BISHOP DEFENDS ZINKE'S LOYALTY COMMENT: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke faced heated criticism Tuesday for his Monday comment that one-third of his agency's workforce is "not loyal" to the administration, but House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop told reporters that guess is "probably low." Bishop added: "The assumption is, you have a whole lot of professional staff — in quotes — that stay from administration to administration. So having that [lack of loyalty] would not surprise me."

'Deeply insulting': In a joint statement, the Coalition to Protect America's National Parks, the Public Lands Foundation and the Association of Retired Fish and Wildlife Service Employees called Zinke's comments "simply ludicrous" and "deeply insulting." And top Natural Resources Democrat Raul Grijalva expressed similar outrage: "Secretary Zinke should clarify his comments and apologize to the public servants he is supposed to be leading," he said in a statement.

IT'S A SECRET: EPA has hired a Virginia contractor to build a "privacy booth for the administrator" at a cost of $24,570, according to records first uncovered by The Washington Post. As Pro's Alex Guillén reports, the booth — known formally in Washington speak as a Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility — is secured against physical and electronic eavesdropping and hacking. The agency already has such a facility for classified discussions, the newspaper reports. EPA contract records also indicate the agency spent $8,000 this month for another firm, Fairfax-based Secure Mission Solutions, to "remove CCTV equipment to accommodate a secure phone booth for the administrator's office."

PRUITT'S PRICEY TRAVEL: Turns out it's not just $25,000 soundproof booths that Scott Pruitt has a taste for. On June 7, the EPA administrator flew from Cincinnati to New York on an Air Force jet with a cost to taxpayers of $20,000, CBS News reports. Then, on Aug. 4, Pruitt took a private plane from Denver to Durango, Colorado and back for a meeting with state officials, but only after declining to fly on Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper's plane. A spokesman said Pruitt, a self-described "fiscal conservative," booked the plane "after his flight was significantly delayed in order to ensure that he did not miss a critical meeting," and ethics officials were consulted. But the spokesman did not respond to requests for why he used a military plane for the earlier trip or why he declined to fly with Hickenlooper, CBS reports.

**A message from the U.S. Chamber's Global Energy Institute: American infrastructure needs attention, and energy infrastructure should be front and center in that discussion. Today, it is too difficult to build infrastructure, and our electricity grid and pipeline network needs investment. Without ways to move energy of all kinds, our economy will stall. Visit www.globalenergyinstitute.org for more. **

HAMM TO PRESS PERRY ON EIA ESTIMATES: Oil titan Harold Hamm, a major Trump supporter, will meet today with Energy Secretary Rick Perry to argue that EIA is missing the mark with its oil production estimates, he told POLITICO's Mike Grunwald, who tweeted a few tidbits from their conversation Tuesday. The Hamm-backed Domestic Energy Producers Alliance prepared slides outlining its case that EIA is too optimistic with its forecast of U.S. oil production growing to close to 10 million barrels a day next year. The group points out oil companies reported an overall second-quarter drop in production rates, while rig counts and well completion rates also fell — that implies activity is too slow to boost production from August's 9.2 million barrels a day. "EIA's Phantom Forecast needs huge growth to catch up to projections," DEPA argues in slides it shared with POLITICO. Hamm and the association have a vested interest in downplaying production rates — less oil coming out of the ground equals higher prices — but the EIA forecasts have been known to be wrong before. "The EIA analysts do credible, independent work. Of course, no one gets everything right 100 percent of the time," Raymond James energy analyst Pavel Molchanov told ME.

GUARDIANS OF THE ENVIRONMENT: New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman asserted the U.S. was entering a new era of "progressive federalism" on Tuesday with a coalition of attorneys general responsible for guarding against environmental rollbacks, POLITICO New York Marie J. French reports. "With the new administration clearly in the pockets of the fossil fuel industry, the chemical industry and others, and putting people in power who deny the most basic science, it's very important to recognize the brilliance of our federal system that there is this second tier of protection at the state level," he said.

NEXT WEEK EYED FOR EPW NOMINEE HEARINGS: Senate EPW Chairman John Barrasso told reporters Tuesday he plans to hold two separate nomination hearings next week on "seven or eight" of Trump's agency nominees. The committee declined to provide further details, but the hearings would likely include four EPA and one NRC nominees who saw their confirmation hearing postponed last week, as well as several Tennessee Valley Authority selections. Barrasso did say he planned to spread out the sessions between Wednesday and Thursday.

LOOK TO FEBRUARY IN CHALLENGE TO CHEMICAL RULE FREEZE: The legal challenge over Pruitt's decision to delay a key chemical facility safety rule until 2019 will stretch through February at least. The D.C. Circuit set a briefing schedule Tuesday beginning next month and stretching through Jan. 31, 2018.

Don't mess with Texas (counties): Harris County, Texas, has decided to sue Arkema, the owner of the Crosby chemical plant that burned in the wake of Hurricane Harvey's flooding.

The county had to dedicate "literally dozens of first responders" to that event rather than helping other people, county attorney Rock Owens told the Houston Chronicle.

FUEL TRANSPORTATION SAFETY PICKS GETS HEARING: Skip Elliott, Trump's selection to run the Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration gets a nomination hearing today at 10:30 a.m. before the Senate Commerce Committee. Also in the hot seat is Timothy Gallaudet, the administration's pick for the No. 2 position at NOAA.

CLEAN ENERGY CHAMPS NAMED: Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions will today announce Govs. Kim Reynolds and Brian Sandoval, Reps. Mia Love and Cathy McMorris Rodgers, and Sens. Thom Tillis and Susan Collins as its 2017 clean energy champions.

SENATE PASSES BILL TO FIGHT ALGAL BLOOMS: Lawmakers cleared by unanimous consent legislation S. 1057 \(115\) aimed at controlling harmful algal blooms. The bill would authorize the appropriation of $110 million to NOAA over the 2019-2023 period.

MAIL CALL! PRUITT'S MEETING RECORDS SOUGHT: Rep. Frank Pallone, top Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee, sent a letter Tuesday to EPA's inspector general asking for a "factual record" of Pruitt's meetings that may have violated the Antideficiency Act and other anti-lobbying provisions. Of particular interest is an April meeting with the National Mining Association where Pruitt reportedly encouraged members of the group to criticize the Paris climate accord.

NEW MEXICANS: TOSS OUT INACCURATE MONUMENT REPORT: Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, as well as Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham, sent a letter to White House Chief of Staff John Kelly on Tuesday calling on the White House to reject Zinke's report urging changes to a host of national monuments after they claimed to find a number of factual errors surrounding recommended changes to two in their state. "The public deserves better than predetermined political conclusions based on hearsay and claims that are easily disproven if the Department had taken the time to listen to and work with local communities," they wrote.

HOUSTON SUPERFUND SITE RESPONSE PROBED: Texas Democratic Rep. Gene Green, whose district took a direct hit from Hurricane Harvey, asked Pruitt in a Tuesday letter to provide a host of information concerning the agency's response to the U.S. Oil Recovery Superfund site, which was potentially damaged in the storm. "The apparent slow response and lack of transparency from your agency is already causing harm, by fostering fear and distrust," he wrote.

ME FIRST — LOCAL OFFICIALS: NO CUTS TO EPA'S BUDGET: More than 300 local elected officials are out with a letter today urging Congress not to cut EPA's budget as it considers fiscal 2018 spending packages. "Deep budget cuts will suddenly impose significant new funding requirements — including some unfunded mandates — on states," they write. "To the extent that states cannot make up for the loss of EPA grant funds, public health will be put at risk."

GROUPS: PLEASE SPEND THAT MONEY: A group of energy efficiency organizations, companies and trade associations are asking the House and Senate to ensure funds directed to critical energy efficiency and clean energy programs are actually spent by the Trump administration while longer-term funding is negotiated. "When letters and written inquiries are not enough, we urge you to call on senior leaders to testify on the record about the status of programs and their plans to ensure their agencies are acting consistently with congressional intent," they write.

DOE IG: AGENCY SLUGGISH TO TAKE ON ADDED IT SECURITY: The Energy Department has been slow to setup multifactor logins across its computer systems, a new inspector general audit says. "Although requirements existed for more than 10 years, none of the locations reviewed had fully implemented multifactor authentication for secure access to information systems and resources," the report says, while noting that DOE had nevertheless made progress on the issue. The IG's office studied 18 federal systems and "identified weaknesses related to ensuring adequate protections over access to network and application resources" and found that information DOE reported to OMB on a 2015 "Cybersecurity Sprint" initiative was not consistent. The lack of an agency-wide multifactor authentication process exposes DOE information to "a higher than-necessary risk of compromise," the audit says. DOE concurred with the IG's five recommendations and laid out a plan to square things up over the next year.

READY TO FIGHT: The environmental justice group Green for All kicked off its fly-in last night at a dinner featuring moms from Flint, Mich., and other communities hit hard by pollution. Today they'll visit Capitol Hill to protest EPA budget cuts and urge action on climate change. Rep. Nanette Diaz Barragan, a California Democrat who sits on the House Natural Resources committee, said Republican members of the panel "won't even mention the words 'climate change,'" and she urged women in the group to run for public office.

REPORT: REVAMP OF CLEAN WATER ACT NEEDED: Today's the last day to comment on EPA's efforts to repeal the previous administration's Waters of the U.S. regulation, but the Regulatory Transparency Project, a venture of the Federalist Society, released a paper Tuesday questioning whether Congress needs to fundamentally revisit the Clean Water Act to clarify how to decide what constitutes a waters of the U.S. Read it here.

MAP ALLEGES BIG AIR POLLUTION RISKS FROM OIL, GAS PRODUCTION: Earthworks is out this morning with an updated analysis finding 2.9 million children are at risk from toxic air pollution from active oil and gas production sites within half a mile of their schools.

White House weeks away from formal funding request for Puerto Rico aid, sources say

By Sarah Ferris and Jennifer Scholtes | 09/26/2017 03:01 PM EDT

The White House is likely weeks away from a formal funding request for Puerto Rico, as the storm-ravaged island enters its sixth day without power, according to Trump administration and congressional sources.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer is demanding that lawmakers approve a disaster aid package by week's end to help Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands recover from Hurricane Maria. But aides familiar with the devastation on the Caribbean islands say the government is far more focused on delivering resources right now than getting more cash from Congress.

"The thing is, funding doesn't help them. Getting people and supplies there is what needs to happen," one administration aide said Tuesday. "There's no crunch in the short term for cash."

Still handling three simultaneous hurricane relief efforts, FEMA's staff is stretched thin. But the agency's disaster relief fund is still flush after Congress provided $15 billion in disaster aid, H.R. 601 \(115\), earlier this month, as well as another $6.7 billion that will kick in at the start of the fiscal year Oct. 1.

Advocates argue that funding for FEMA doesn't mean Puerto Rico's government can pay its own bills, however, including its already depleted Medicaid program.

While the federal government continues to calculate a damage estimate, responders deployed to the region are focused on logistics like getting food and water to millions of people who remain without power as temperatures hit 90 degrees and humidity hovers above 70 percent.

The administration contends that much of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands is so damaged that officials can't even begin damage assessment, meaning the federal government may not know for weeks how many roads, buildings or power lines will need to be rebuilt.

"The issue is not paying for any of this," the administration source said. "It's like: Paying for what?"

But Democrats say the administration's response is already wholly anemic, accusing President Donald Trump of taking potshots at the ailing islanders while neglecting to deploy the full force of federal resources.

"We have the greatest military the world has ever seen," Rep. Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Caucus, told reporters on Tuesday. "We know how to invade other nations. We know how to bring that equipment in. We have paratroopers. We have sailors. We have Marines. We have men and women who would want to help their fellow countrymen in their time of need. It's time for the president to invoke that and to bring that type of response."

Trump said Tuesday that he plans to travel to Puerto Rico early next week to survey damage, more than a dozen days after Maria compounded devastation wrought by Hurricane Irma earlier this month.

The president has fielded criticism for neglecting to visit the islands as quickly as he arrived in Texas and Florida following Hurricanes Harvey and Irma. But he told reporters at the White House on Tuesday that his administration is "getting really good marks for the work we're doing" in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

Congressional Democrats have derided Trump for focusing on the NFL's national anthem controversy in the wake of the disaster and noting Puerto Rico's financial issues. "Texas & Florida are doing great but Puerto Rico, which was already suffering from broken infrastructure & massive debt, is in deep trouble," Trump tweeted late Monday.

Rep. Nydia M. Velázquez (D-N.Y.), who is the first Puerto Rican woman to be elected to Congress, said she is "offended and insulted" by the president's tweet.

"If you don't take this crisis seriously, this is going to be your Katrina," Velázquez told reporters Tuesday about Trump, suggesting the president appoint a military general to organize comprehensive emergency response.

Rep. José E. Serrano (D-N.Y.) said Tuesday that he has gotten commitments from House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) and House Speaker Paul Ryan that Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands will be "treated equally in any funding package to come.

"You can't look at this funding and say, 'Whatever is left over can go to the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico.' No — it has to be equal to Texas, to Florida, to Louisiana, to Georgia. ..."

Serrano said. "Now it's incumbent on us to stay on top of the leadership to make sure that a certain segment of the other party doesn't break this promise that the speaker and the chairman of Appropriations have put out."

Congress approved its massive hurricane relief package on Sept. 8 — six days after Harvey made landfall in Texas — yet appropriators appear weeks away from an aid request devoted to Puerto Rico.

The White House believes there is "plenty of money" for the hurricane response in the short term, an administration aide said, acknowledging that much more will be needed in the months to come.

While White House officials plan to discuss that longer-term funding strategy this week, even a back-of-the-envelope estimate will be incredibly difficult, according to one person familiar with the damage assessment efforts.

The government officials charged with surveying the damage — including those from FEMA, the Defense Department and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention — each have to come up with their own funding estimates. But many of the damage assessment teams are still working on recovery in states like Texas and Florida.

White House denies Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/26/2017 02:07 PM EDT

The Trump administration will not waive a rule banning foreign vessels from delivering fuel to hurricane-ravaged Puerto Rico, the Department of Homeland Security said today.

Waiving the Jones Act would not address the lack of port space needed for vessels to deliver the fuel to the island, DHS spokesman David Lapan said. DHS consulted with other federal agencies and found that "there is sufficient numbers of U.S.-flagged vessels to move commodities to Puerto Rico," Lapan told POLITICO in an email.

"The limitation is going to be port capacity to offload and transfer cargo, not vessel availability," Lapan said. "The fuel supply challenges facing Puerto Rico are not a function of the lack of fuel being shipped to the island, but caused by the devastation to Puerto Rico's transportation networks that have prevented fuel from being transported on the island to all of the places that need it."

The Jones Act stipulates that only U.S.-flagged ships can deliver fuel to domestic ports, keeping the number of vessels available to deliver fuel. Puerto Rico is running out of fuel and other necessitates after taking a direct hit from Hurricane Maria last week.

DHS waived the rule when hurricanes ripped through Texas and Florida in recent weeks, but in those cases, the ships were necessary to replace lost fuel production after refineries were shut down during the storms, Lapan said.

WHAT'S NEXT: President Trump is scheduled to visit Puerto Rico next week.

Solar industry stays calm after Zinke says it's a bad fit for public lands Back

By Esther Whieldon and Eric Wolff | 09/26/2017 06:23 PM EDT

Renewable energy supporters are worried — but not yet panicked — after Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke slammed large-scale solar development as a poor use of federal lands.

Zinke urged solar companies to focus on smaller rooftop projects rather than sprawling installations on federal lands. But utility-scale developers and environmentalists remain hopeful that BLM's ongoing leasing program will remain on track.

"Our hope is that he was just blowing off steam, it was just a casual off the cuff conversation and that it doesn't have any material or practical implications for the permitting process for our projects," said Shannon Eddy, executive director of the Large-scale Solar Association.

Zinke's speech Tuesday at a National Clean Energy Week event in Washington offered the clearest indication to date of his preference for fossil fuel development over renewable energy.

"If you are operating on public land, extraction is going to be in the best public interest," he told the audience, which included representatives from the renewable energy, natural gas and nuclear industries.

In his speech, Zinke stressed his support for an "all of the above" approach to energy, though he focused more heavily on the negative environmental consequences of renewables than of fossil fuel development. He pointed to bird deaths or habitat loss that can be caused by wind and solar development, but said little about the air pollution or spills that can come with oil, gas or coal production. And climate change was hardly mentioned at all.

"I think the biggest opportunity in solar is the roof," Zinke said. "Because when I see solar cells out on land, that land is no longer useful for anything else but energy. But there's a lot of roofs. And I think the greatest opportunity for the solar industry is look at where the roofs are."

By the end of 2016, utility scale solar made up 70 percent of the industry's growth, according to the Solar Energy Industries Association, the largest solar trade association.

Environmentalists accused Zinke of trying to draw attention away from the harm the administration is doing to the environment by promoting fossil fuel production.

"It's a false choice to say that we can either protect our wildlife or advance renewables on public lands," said Alex Daue, assistant director for energy and climate campaign at The Wilderness Society.

Zinke did not mention the solar leasing program at BLM, which was launched during the Obama administration, an omission that some are taking as an encouraging sign. If he does not formally tell BLM field staff to slow down or turn their attention to other matters, it could lessen the immediate effect on the environmental studies and other work happening on the ground, said Nathanael Greene, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council's renewable energy policy initiative.

Still, his general disinterest in the solar industry's priorities such as improved siting and streamlined permitting could amount to "death by neglect" for the program, he said.

Solar developers also could lose valuable federal tax incentives if BLM slow rolls its approval of their projects, Eddy noted.

Furthermore, it's unlikely that rooftop solar panels would be able to replace the potential generation available on public lands without unduly straining the electric grid, said Kim Delfino, Defenders of Wildlife California program director.

California "learned the hard way that ... we do have to have a certain amount of utility scale renewable energy as we work really hard to put in place the grid and policies to have rooftops," Delfino said in an interview Tuesday.

BLM estimated in 2012 that about 24,000 megawatts of solar panels could be installed on about 214,000 acres of federal land over a 20-year period. Under the Obama administration, BLM authorized 42 projects totaling 9,540 MW. No new leases are expected to be offered until next year at the earliest, officials have said.

Solar leasing is dwarfed by the amount of land occupied by the oil and gas industry. The oil and gas industry held 27 million acres under lease as of Sept. of last year, including 12 million acres under production, according to BLM data. And that figure is down from a peak in 1989 when the industry had 67 million acres under lease. BLM leased 62,000 acres to solar developers by October 2016.

The Interior Department and BLM did not respond to requests for comment Tuesday.

Zinke's remark may foretell yet more gloom and uncertainty for the solar industry, which already faces the prospects of tariffs on the cheap, imported solar panels that fueled its growth. Tariffs would likely jack up costs for developers and installers, leading to project slowdowns and the loss of as many as 88,000 jobs, the industry says.

The Solar Energy Industries Association, which represents both rooftop and utility-scale developers, offered an optimistic interpretation of Zinke's comments.

"The beauty of solar energy is it can be deployed in multiple ways. From rooftop panels to large scale installations owned by utilities, there is room for all solar energy and each one plays an important role in the diversification of our nation's electricity mix," SEIA CEO Abigail Ross Hopper said in a statement. "We are pleased both Sec. Zinke and [Energy Secretary Rick] Perry took part in National Clean Energy Week and we look forward to continued conversations with both of them on the ways in which solar is strengthening America."

Other proponents pointed to the wide support solar enjoys on both sides of the political aisle.

"I think there's bipartisan support for providing access to federal lands for energy development, I can't imagine it's been undermined, despite what the Secretary said today," said Todd Foley, senior vice president of policy and government affairs at the American Council on Renewable Energy. "To put it as some people do, we shouldn't be picking winners and losers."

EPA building Pruitt secure communications room Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/26/2017 03:59 PM EDT

EPA is building a special secure communications room for Administrator Scott Pruitt, according to contract records first reported today by the Washington Post.

EPA hired Richmond, Va.-based Acoustical Solutions to construct a "privacy booth for the administrator" at a cost of $24,570, according to the contract details. It is expected to be completed by Oct. 9.

The privacy booth will serve as a Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility, EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman told the Post. SCIFs, as they are known in Washington lingo, are rooms specially secured against physical and electronic eavesdropping and hacking that are used for discussing classified issues.

EPA already has a SCIF facility used for discussing sensitive matters, the Post reported. The agency's SCIF appears to have existed for years; an agency guide on national security issues dated 2006 includes information on accessing and maintaining the agency's CIA-accredited SCIF facilities.

EPA last week said employees will have to complete new rounds of training for handling sensitive information, including classified data on critical infrastructure.

How Bannon and Pruitt boxed in Trump on climate pact Back

By Andrew Restuccia and Josh Dawsey | 05/31/2017 08:00 PM EDT

Donald Trump's chief strategist and Environmental Protection Agency administrator maneuvered for months to get the president to exit the Paris climate accord, shrewdly playing to his populist instincts and publicly pressing the narrative that the nearly 200-nation deal was effectively dead — boxing in the president on one of his highest-profile decisions to date.

Steve Bannon and Scott Pruitt have sought to outsmart the administration's pro-Paris group of advisers, including Trump's daughter Ivanka, who were hoping the president could be swayed by a global swell of support for the deal from major corporations, U.S. allies, Al Gore and even the pope. But some of that pro-Paris sentiment wound up being surprisingly tepid, according to White House aides who had expected that European leaders would make a stronger case during Trump's trip abroad in May.

Those who want Trump to remain also faced an insurmountable hurdle: The president has long believed, rightly or wrongly, that the U.S. is getting a raw deal under the accord, and it proved nearly impossible to change his mind.

The internal reality show will culminate Thursday when Trump finally announces his decision, after a rush of leaks Wednesday from administration officials saying he was on the verge of pulling the plug on U.S. participation in history's most comprehensive global climate agreement.

"I will be announcing my decision on Paris Accord, Thursday at 3:00 P.M.," Trump tweeted Wednesday night, without revealing the outcome. "The White House Rose Garden. MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN!"

Some White House aides held out the prospect that the president still might take the middle course that Ivanka Trump and others had advocated — staying in the deal while drastically scaling back the Obama administration's nonbinding carbon cleanup promises. But three White House officials said Wednesday that they expect Trump to make a clean break by withdrawing from the agreement, though they noted it's possible the president will change his mind at the last minute.

In recent months, Pruitt and Bannon made sure Trump heard from a parade of conservative leaders and Republican lawmakers who raised concerns that the deal would hobble his pro-fossil-fuel energy agenda.

"We made very much the economic message argument," said Club for Growth President David McIntosh, whose group wrote letters to the White House and spoke to senior staff. "It was bad for the U.S. economy. It would stifle economic growth and the United States should withdraw."

As the news of the impending decision spread Wednesday, White House chief of staff Reince Priebus began calling and fielding calls from lawmakers, indicating that the U.S. was unlikely to stay in the agreement, one person familiar with the conversations said.

If Trump withdraws, Paris' foes will have Pruitt and Bannon to thank.

One Republican close to the White House called it the "classic split" and said conservative activists had flooded the White House in recent weeks, after seeing increasing chatter that Trump might stay in. This person said Bannon and Pruitt worked quietly to make sure Trump was hearing their side and touched base occasionally on political strategy to woo him.

"You had the New Yorkers against it, and all the campaign loyalists for it," this person said, referring to the push to withdraw. "When the New Yorkers get involved, it gets complicated for Trump and everyone else around him."

Pruitt and Bannon have told others repeatedly for months that Trump will pull out of the agreement, as they aggressively pushed a narrative that they hoped would prove to be true, even as White House aides continued to debate the issue.

"Some of the debate was for show to help the moderates feel like they had their say," said one person who has spoken to Pruitt. "Pruitt has believed all along that this was never in doubt."

Pruitt, who frequently attacked the EPA's regulations in court when he was Oklahoma's attorney general, used his new post as EPA administrator to orchestrate an aggressive campaign to marshal conservative opposition to the Paris agreement.

He bashed the deal during a closed-door April meeting of the National Mining Association's executive committee, telling the group that the agreement would hurt the economy. Pruitt's staff also urged lawmakers and conservative groups to publicly criticize the agreement, sources familiar with the issue told POLITICO, which had the effect of increasing public pressure on Trump.

Bannon similarly argued in meetings with Trump and his team that the president would be breaking his campaign promise to "cancel" the agreement if he decided to remain. And he argued that the accord is a bad deal for the United States because other countries aren't doing enough to curb their emissions.

Pruitt and Bannon's anti-Paris campaign was meant to counter a separate offensive by members of the administration who supported staying in the pact, including Ivanka Trump and her husband, Jared Kushner.

In recent months, Ivanka Trump set up a process in which the president would regularly hear from people who supported remaining in the agreement, according to administration officials.

The "remain" camp believed, perhaps naively, that Trump could be influenced by the support the Paris deal has received from major corporations, including Exxon Mobil, which Secretary of State Rex Tillerson led for more than a decade.

"Ivanka is doing what she can to get him to stay," one official said. "But that doesn't mean he's going to do it."

White House aides outlined a plan to remain in the agreement while weakening former President Barack Obama's pledge to cut domestic greenhouse gas emissions. They made the case that Trump could use the goodwill generated from remaining to negotiate better economic incentives for fossil fuels, and they even won the buy-in of several coal companies that detested Obama's climate policies.

They hoped European leaders could convince Trump he would risk damaging diplomatic relations if he withdrew. Ivanka Trump also brought Gore to Trump Tower to try to sway her father's mind during the presidential transition, and Pope Francis handed the president a copy of his papal encyclical on climate change when the two men met at the Vatican last week.

Trump took calls from a parade of business leaders and foreign leaders in recent weeks, most pressing him to remain, according to a senior administration official — and the calls continued on Wednesday.

"He had tremendous pressure from international leaders, from members of his own Cabinet and advisers in the international sphere not to pull out of the accord because of the perceived loss of face," said McIntosh, the Club for Growth president.

But while the leaders of G-7 nations all pressed Trump to remain in the agreement during last week's summit in Italy, Paris supporters in the White House have privately grouched that they didn't make an aggressive enough case.

European officials countered they tried not to push Trump too much during the meetings, believing that a hard sell could backfire. And they were buoyed by early signals from White House officials ahead of the summit that Trump was open to remaining.

Indeed, European officials received a series of mixed messages from Trump's team during the summit. National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn, a Paris supporter and the only U.S. official permitted to attend meetings with G-7 leaders, told reporters that Trump was "evolving" on climate change, which many interpreted to mean that he would remain.

White House officials chalked up Cohn's comments to Trump's habit of echoing the perspective of the last person he talked to. By that time, Bannon and other opponents of the agreement had returned to the United States. But Trump's decision to delay a final verdict on the agreement gave Pruitt and Bannon a final opportunity to make their case. Pruitt met with Trump to discuss Paris on Tuesday.

Most European officials were unwilling to comment about the prospect that Trump will withdraw, as they have not yet received official word from the White House and are still holding out hope that the president will change his mind.

The officials have already begun looking to other countries for support on climate change, with the European Union set to promise deeper cooperation with China. Some officials have even adopted a new informal nickname for the major remaining countries that support action on climate change: the G-6.

Some Trump administration officials were reeling on Wednesday after the news first broke that Trump was prepared to withdraw.

Trump had not officially told his entire team of senior aides he was considering leaving the agreement Wednesday when news leaked out. "Everyone assumed that's what was going to happen, but we weren't called all in and told, 'Oh, we're putting this story out today,'" one person said.

Having learned a lesson after Trump changed his mind about pulling out of NAFTA, administration officials cautioned against definitive reporting, warning that the president is notoriously fickle. As administration officials began tamping down reports that Trump's decision was final, White House aides were swamped with calls, emails and texts from lobbyists and diplomats seeking clarification.

Officials close to Trump sometimes leak information before it is final — hoping to back him into a corner, or believing that comments during a private meeting represent his ultimate view. White House officials put out word in April that he was pulling out of NAFTA, even though Trump had not made up his mind, and news leaked during the campaign that he would pick Mike Pence as his running mate even as he weighed other candidates.

"Sometimes people close to Trump put things into the media environment to see how he'll react to it," one adviser said. "If your idea gets good coverage, it's likely to help him decide to go with what you're saying."

One of the biggest lingering questions: If he withdraws, how will Trump do it?

He could abide by the formal procedures in the underlying text of the agreement, which mandate that a formal withdrawal will not go into effect until Nov. 4, 2020, at the earliest. Or he could pull out of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, the underlying 1992 treaty that governs the negotiations, which would allow for a speedier pullout — a far more radical step that would see the U.S. abstain from the entire climate negotiating process.

He could also declare that the agreement is a treaty, which would require a two-thirds-majority ratification vote in the Senate that would certainly fail.

Whatever he does, supporters of the climate agreement expect a harsh reaction from the United States' friends if the country pulls out.

"I think the diplomatic backlash will be worse than it was when the U.S. rejected Kyoto," said Susan Biniarz, the State Department's longtime former climate change lawyer, referring to the George W. Bush administration's decision to spurn the 1997 Kyoto climate agreement.

One former U.S. official agreed: "Will global leaders trust the U.S. to negotiate a climate treaty ever again? After Kyoto and Paris, who will trust us to keep our word as a nation? Our credibility is gone."

NOT FLYING SOLO: EPA chartered a plane for Administrator Scott Pruitt to visit the Gold King mine because he otherwise would not have been able to travel with a member of his security detail, according to documents obtained by ME. EPA officials have said Pruitt had to take the charter flight from Denver to Durango, Colo., because his commercial flight had been delayed and no other arrangements were available. However, Pruitt apparently could have taken another commercial flight or caught a ride with Gov. John Hickenlooper on a state-owned plane, but neither option would have allowed Pruitt to be accompanied by a member of his around-the-clock security detail. Instead, EPA booked a charter plane, which cost taxpayers more than $5,000.

"While there was one potential alternative identified that had only one seat available (and the airline may have gone as far as to reserve that seat in case we determined it would meet the travel needs requirements), [chief of staff Ryan Jackson]'s understanding from the security detail was that there was not any additional seat for a Special Agent to accompany the Administrator and, therefore, that flight did not meet the travel and security needs," wrote Kevin Minoli, EPA's acting general counsel, in an Aug. 4 detailing his decision to approve the commercial travel. "Similarly, there was only one seat available on the plane with the Governor, so without the Governor removing someone else from the trip that was not an option either." The email was included with an Aug. 24 memo from Minoli formally authorizing the flight, copies of which EPA shared with ME.

EPA has spent at least $58,000 for Pruitt and his entourage to fly on private or government-owned planes this year, according to reports in the Washington Post and CBS News Wednesday, citing records provided to Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse. The Washington Post also noted that Pruitt "flies either in business or first class when those seats are available on commercial flights. Multiple EPA travel documents state that Pruitt 'is entitled to business class accommodation due to security concerns.'" His non-commercial flights also included:

—An early June flight from Cincinnati to New York on an Air Force plane so he could make his flight to an international energy ministers meeting in Italy. That trip cost $36,068.50. Approval here.

—A July 27 trip on an Interior plane from Tulsa to the tiny outpost of Guymon, Okla. to discuss water regulations with farmers that cost $14,434.50. The agency argued "time constraints" prevented Pruitt from making the five-hour drive. Approval here.

—An Aug. 9 trip on North Dakota's state aircraft so Pruitt could participate in a roundtable at the University of North Dakota's Environmental Research Center at a cost of $2,144.40.

MEXICO, U.S. SIGN NEW WATER DEAL: Officials with the U.S. and Mexico announced an agreement at a Santa Fe, N.M. water conference to help preserve the Colorado River, the Associated Press reports. Under the agreement, the U.S. will spend $31.5 million in water conservation projects in Mexico and any water saved would then be split between the two countries and environmental projects. Pro's Annie Snider took an in-depth look at the backstory and negotiations last November. The river supplies water to about 40 million people and 6,300 square miles of farmland in the U.S. alone.

BIOFUEL BACKERS FEAR TRUMP BETRAYAL: Biofuels producers and their farm-state backers in Congress fear the Trump administration is wavering in its commitment to Renewable Fuel Standard, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Sen. Joni Ernst on Wednesday slammed EPA's notice seeking input on whether to reduce the already set 2018 biomass-based biodiesel requirement and shrink the mandate in 2019. In a letter to Trump, Ernst said she hoped "that your EPA has not forgotten about the pledges that were made to my constituents and to farmers across the country." More from Eric here.

What's more, EPA is considering a policy shift within the next few months that would allow all domestically produced biofuel to count toward annual biofuel compliance quotas, Bloomberg reports, citing people familiar with the discussions. That would lower costs for refiners but come at the expense of corn farmers.

CLIMATE NOW CONSIDERED IN PIPELINE CASE: FERC announced Wednesday it added a new 5-page analysis of the Southeast Market Pipelines Project to ensure it complied with a federal court's requirement that it include an assessment of greenhouse gas emissions from the Florida power plants that may use the fuel, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. FERC has until Oct. 6 to decide whether it will appeal the D.C. Circuit's Aug. 22 ruling, though the move to issue a supplemental EIS on greenhouse gas emissions suggests an appeal is less likely. The analysis found that the pipeline would increase Florida's annual greenhouse gas emissions between 3.7 percent and 9.7 percent compared to 2014 levels for the state.

MIXED SIGNALS ON JONES ACT WAIVER: Several House Democrats introduced legislation Wednesday permitting Jones Act waivers for humanitarian relief. That came after Trump said he was "thinking about" granting a waiver to help deliver fuel and other goods to Puerto Rico, but noted "we have a lot of shippers and a lot of people and a lot of people who work in the shipping industry that don't want the Jones Act lifted." DHS previously said it was unlikely to grant the request, arguing the problem wasn't the number of ships with supplies but the lack of delivery logistics on the island.

Status update: All of Puerto Rico remained without electricity and 44 percent of the island's residents still lacked drinking water, according to status reports. "Right now we are in emergency mode," Gov. Ricardo Rosselló told CNN on Wednesday. "Our focus is not necessarily restoring energy. The energy grid has been destroyed. ... And we need to rebuild it. That does not get rebuilt in days."

IN OTHER PRUITT NEWS: His agency has threatened to cut off support for a program within Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division that reimburses DOJ for Superfund litigation seeking to force polluting entities to pay to clean up toxic contamination they caused, The New York Times reports, citing budget documents. EPA payments accounted for 27 percent of the division's budget — amounting to $810 million — between 1987 and 2016.

ENERGY GROUPS WEIGH IN ON TAX PLAN: The oil and gas industry are among the early fans of the Republican tax proposal released Wednesday, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. One principle in the plan, allowing companies to fully expense their spending, is of particular interest to the sector, which says it pours an average of $232 billion a year in capital expenditures in the U.S. "The right pro-growth tax policies can accelerate these economic investments and create more jobs while keeping energy affordable for consumers," American Petroleum Institute President Jack Gerard said.

Utility and renewables industries are withholding their verdicts for now. The Edison Electric Institute is concerned about the potential loss of the interest tax deduction. "For us, the interest deduction is how we raise capital," Eric Grey, EEI's director of government affairs, told Eric. "Our companies are in the debt and equity markets every single day trying to build the necessary financing for the large [capital expenditure] we do." The Solar Energy Industries Association and the American Wind Energy Association both said they were still studying the proposal.

PENCILS DOWN ON WOTUS REPEAL: More than 190,000 comments had already flooded the government's inboxes on the last day to submit comments on the Trump administration's proposal to replace the Obama-era Waters of the U.S. rule with an earlier version while EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers write a new one. Everyone seems to have stuck to well-worn talking points, but a couple of highlights here:

—Agricultural groups: They argued in separate letters the Obama-era EPA regulation "ignores the limits and structure that Congress put in place" for the Clean Water Act and urge the agencies to "move quickly" on a new regulation after rescinding the 2015 version.

—Environmental groups: The Southern Environmental Law Center, on behalf of dozens of other groups, vehemently opposed the proposal and said reviving "an under-protective, case-by-case regime would result in renewed uncertainty and an unlawful abdication of the agencies' responsibility for protecting clean water." The Natural Resources Defense Council said in its own comments the proposal represents "woefully misguided and unlawful environmental policy" without adequate public input opportunities.

—Senate EPW Republicans: Lawmakers commended the administration for pulling the earlier rule, which they said in a letter stemmed from "the erroneous premise that federal jurisdiction over water is whatever the federal wants it to be" and unlikely to survive legal challenges. They asked for a new regulation that "respects the intent of Congress" ASAP.

GREENS GIVE GREEN: The League of Conservation Voters Action Fund, NRDC Action Fund PAC and NextGen America today are announcing they've raised or contributed $3 million to state and federal candidates so far the 2017-2018 cycle. The groups hit the mark after a 48-hour fundraising push, GreenStorm, meant to boost priority candidates like New Jersey's Phil Murphy, Virginia's Ralph Northam and Oregon Gov. Kate Brown.

SECRETARIES IN PENNSYLVANIA — PERRY VISITING COAL COMPANY: Energy Secretary Rick Perry, along with Rep. ZINKE WON'T SPEAK TO MINING GROUP: Zinke dropped out of addressing the National Mining Association's annual fall meeting at the Trump Hotel next week, the group tells ME. "He was scheduled, but is not speaking now," NMA spokesman Luke Popovich said. "He will not be attending." NMA did not give the reason for the cancellation, and Interior did not respond to questions. The meeting, first reported in The Intercept, drew criticism for NMA money flowing into a business of which Trump is still a majority owner. Zinke has also come under fire from public watchdog Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington for addressing the American Petroleum Institute at the hotel and conducting at least one lunch there.

INTERIOR TO SEEK COMMENT ON SAGE GROUSE PLANS: The Interior Department could as early as today issue a request for public comment on potential changes to how it manages sage grouse populations in the West, including to make it easier for fossil fuel development and livestock grazing, according to sources familiar with the situation. Zinke in August ordered staff to move forward on internal staff recommendations to change BLM's land-use conservation plans for the bird, revise guidelines for fossil fuel leases and allow states to set population targets.

EPW NOMINATION HEARING SET FOR OCT. 4: The Senate EPW Committee plans to hold a confirmation hearing for four EPA and one NRC nomination on Oct. 4, your ME host reports. They'll also consider Jeff Baran's renomination to the NRC.

MAIL CALL! E&C LEADERS ASK GAO TO PROBE DOE CONTRACTORS: Eight bipartisan Energy and Commerce Committee members asked GAO in a Wednesday letter to examine so-called data calls from DOE contractors, requests for various information from the contractors running the national labs and performing other projects for the agency.

CBD SEEKS RECORDS ON BLM DECISION LINKED TO CADIZ: The Center for Biological Diversity has filed a public records request with the Interior to figure out why the agency earlier this month reversed a legal interpretation it made under the Obama administration that would have required Cadiz Inc. to go through an environmental review process to use a railroad right of way for its controversial water pipeline in California. Interior's second in command, David Bernhardt, was a lobbyist for Cadiz before joining the agency but an Interior spokesman in an emailed statement said Bernhardt was not involved in the decision to revoke the legal finding.

Price traveled by private plane at least 24 times Back

By Rachana Pradhan and Dan Diamond | 09/21/2017 05:58 PM EDT

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price has taken at least 24 flights on private charter planes at taxpayers' expense since early May, according to people with knowledge of his travel plans and a review of HHS documents.

The frequency of the trips underscores how private travel has become the norm — rather than the exception — for the Georgia Republican during his tenure atop the federal health agency, which began in February. The cost of the trips identified by POLITICO exceeds $300,000, according to a review of federal contracts and similar trip itineraries.

Price's use of private jets represents a sharp departure from his two immediate predecessors, Sylvia Mathews Burwell and Kathleen Sebelius, who flew commercially in the continental United States. HHS officials have said Price uses private jets only when commercial travel is not feasible.

But many of the flights are between large cities with frequent, low-cost airline traffic, such as a trip from Washington to Nashville that the secretary took on June 6 to make a morning event at a medication distributor and an afternoon speech. There are four regular nonstop flights that leave Washington-area airports between 6:59 a.m. and 8:50 a.m. and arrive in Nashville by 9:46 a.m. CT. Sample round-trip fares for those flights were as low as $202, when booked in advance on Orbitz.com. Price's charter, according to HHS' contract with Classic Air Charter,

HHS spokespeople did not respond to questions about specific aspects of Price's travels, including how many charter trips he has taken. Charmaine Yoest, the agency's top spokesperson, said Price's travel for official business "comes from the HHS budget."

In a statement, Yoest said, "The Secretary has taken commercial flights for official business after his confirmation. He has used charter aircraft for official business in order to accommodate his demanding schedule. The week of September 13 was one of those times, as the Secretary was directing the recovery effort for Irma, which had just devastated Florida, while simultaneously directing the ongoing recovery for Hurricane Harvey . . . Some believe the HHS Secretary should be Washington-focused. Dr. Price is focused on hearing from Americans across the country."

Nonetheless, POLITICO identified at least 17 charter flights that took place before the first storm — Hurricane Harvey — hit in late August, and included flights that did not appear to be for urgent HHS public health priorities.

For example, Price took a Learjet-60 from San Diego to the Aspen Ideas Festival — a glamorous conference at the Colorado resort town — that arrived at 3:33 p.m. on Saturday afternoon, June 24, nearly 19 hours before his scheduled panel. That flight likely cost more than $7,100, according to one charter jet agency estimate.

"If you're going to a conference, you have some [advance] flexibility to book travel" and shouldn't need last-minute charters, said Walter Shaub, who was the Barack Obama-appointed director of the United States Office of Government Ethics until July. "This shows a complete disregard for the expense to the taxpayer."

Since being confirmed in early February, Price has developed a reputation inside the agency for flying on private charters rather than taking other means of transportation, people inside and outside the Trump administration said.

After a POLITICO investigation identified five private flights that Price took up and down the East Coast last week, Price took a charter jet to Oklahoma on Tuesday of this week, Sept. 19, where he met with Native American tribes and toured health care facilities by car — although HHS initially explored flying him by charter around the state, two people with knowledge of Price's travels said. "There was a push from political [staff] at HHS to fly him and not drive him to these small communities," said one of the people.

Price's staff cut short his news conference in Oklahoma on Wednesday when reporters raised questions about his use of taxpayer funds, an attendee said.

Price's frequent trips around the country have rankled staff inside the White House, with a senior official saying many trips aren't related to priorities like Obamacare repeal and other items on the president's agenda. While Price has flown to Maine, New Hampshire, Oklahoma and Pennsylvania since last Wednesday, President Donald Trump and Senate Republicans have been frantically rallying support to pass an Obamacare repeal bill by Sept. 30. After that date, the GOP will need 60 Senate votes, not 50, to overturn the 2010 health law.

"No one is quite sure what [Price] is doing," a senior White House official said. "You look at this week, we're doing a last final push trying to get this over the finish line, and he's nowhere to be found."

Many of Price's trips have centered on making announcements related to the use of opioids and holding listening sessions about the epidemic, which Trump labeled a national emergency and continues to contribute to rising death rates from drug abuse. Price has labeled fighting the opioid epidemic one of his top priorities.

But rather than fly commercially to these events, which are scheduled well in advance, Price tends to rent corporate-style jets. Sometimes, he ferries big-name guests along with him. In May, Price and Kellyanne Conway — the White House counselor and former Trump campaign manager who traveled with Price to Philadelphia last week to tour an addiction treatment center — made stops in four different states in the span of two days.

The pair traveled to Lansing, Michigan, and Charleston, West Virginia, for opioid-related meetings in the morning and early afternoon on May 9. That happened to be the same day Trump abruptly fired FBI Director James Comey. On May 10, Conway and Price were in Augusta, Maine, and Concord, New Hampshire, for more opioid-related events.

On July 6, Price again made an opioid-related visit to Chattanooga, Tennessee, where he took a private plane, according to two sources with knowledge of the situation. According to records, HHS signed a $14,570 charter plane contract for Washington to Tennessee travel with a July 6 effective date.

In June, Price spoke at a physicians association conference in San Diego, where he vowed to wring out wasteful spending in the government's health care programs. Getting "value" for spending "is incredibly important," he said.

Price took a private plane to get to the meeting, which was one stop on a five-state sprint of charter travel that cost $50,420.

Trump win churns U.S.-Mexico water talks Back

By Annie Snider | 11/26/2016 07:41 AM EDT

Negotiations between the U.S. and Mexico to seal a water-sharing deal over the dwindling supplies on the Colorado River are confronting a new deadline: the inauguration of Donald Trump.

A 16-year drought has sent water levels at the river's most important reservoir, Lake Mead, to their lowest point since it was first filled in the 1930s, threatening supply cuts for 40 million people across seven U.S. states and two Mexican states. It's also raising the stakes for the two countries as they try to hammer out an extension of a four-year-old agreement on how to share the water.

That agreement expires at the end of 2017, but negotiators who have worked for years are pressing to finish a new pact before President Barack Obama leaves office — or put at risk years of fruitful collaboration on the sharing of cross-border water supplies that are vital to both countries.

The fear is not only that Trump — who has called Mexicans criminals and vowed to erect a massive border wall — could derail any potential deal, but that even turning the talks over to new negotiators would stall the process at a critical moment, since it would take them months to get up to speed.

The issue is just one of dozens of crucial international topics, from relationships with NATO and Russia to Asian trade deals, that may take a dramatic shift under a Trump team that campaigned on an "America First" platform.

Farmers and cities in Arizona and Nevada could face their first cuts in water supplies a year from now, just as the existing agreement ends. Without a new agreement with Mexico, it is unclear whether or how those cuts could be shared across the border, raising the prospect of either deeper, swifter cuts to U.S. states or a bitter cross-border dispute.

Water policy experts say that even before Trump's election, the Obama administration had been pressing to tie up a new deal for the Colorado River and avoid any delays caused by the change in administrations.

"There's pressure to finish off any type of arrangement that you start with one administration," said Carlos de la Parra, a Mexican water analyst who advised his country's lead negotiator on the previous water sharing deal. "Now there's this surprise, and there's a President-elect Trump, and obviously that becomes a little more acute given his discourse."

The Colorado River provides the lifeblood of much of the American Southwest, feeding desert metropolises including Phoenix, San Diego and Las Vegas, and supplying farmers who grow 15 percent of the nation's food. The river rises on the Continental Divide in Rocky Mountain National Park, and snakes 1,450 miles before finally draining into the Gulf of California on the Mexican side of the border — although most of the time there's barely a trickle left by the time the river reaches its delta.

Experts say the arrival of a potentially hostile new U.S. president doesn't necessarily mean Mexico will settle for less than it wants. Mexico holds significant leverage since its water is the most protected as a treaty obligation. It also has the right to take the U.S. to international arbitration, and controls the delivery of Rio Grande water to American farmers in Texas.

While Mexico has been "very fair to the U.S. — more than it had to be" in previous negotiations, the water treaty is a sovereignty issue that "gets down to the raw material of Mexican nationalism," said Stephen Mumme, a political science professor at Colorado State University.

"There are big incentives on both sides to get this done, and done in a way that's sustainable," he said. "But it's not going to come at Mexican expense and Mexico cannot be bullied or pressured in this. I think that's one of those things that's going to be a little bit of a wake-up call for the Trump administration."

Negotiators are focusing on the technical aspects of crafting a water-sharing deal and hoping to keep politics out of the talks. Sally Spener, foreign affairs officer at the International Boundary and Water Commission, the U.S.-Mexican agency that negotiates and applies the treaties, said the American commissioner "has instructed his staff to continue with our work and we continue to do that."

Roberto Salmon, the lead Mexican negotiator, told POLITICO the primary urgency to sign a new deal comes from the ongoing drought and dire predictions for the basin, rather than "political issues or political aspects or the political life of either country." But keeping calm heads only stands to get harder as flows on the river continue to dwindle.

Under a 1944 treaty with Mexico, the U.S. must send 1.5 million acre-feet of water — nearly half a trillion gallons — across the border each year, an amount that's roughly enough to supply 3 million homes. But the treaty's provisions laying out rules on what happens during a drought are vague and undefined.

Moreover, hydrologists now realize that the period in the early 20th century when the Colorado River's water supply was divvied up was unusually wet. And as temperatures rise and climate change shrinks the winter snow pack that feeds the Colorado, the river is likely to carry even less water in the future.

The strain is already being felt: Water levels behind the Hoover Dam at Lake Mead this year plummeted to the lowest level since the reservoir was built. Under existing law, Arizona and Nevada must start taking cuts when water levels reach 1,075 feet above sea level in late summer. The Bureau of Reclamation estimates a 50-50 chance that the lake will hit that level next year, triggering the first supply cuts for the U.S. — and potentially Mexico — in 2018.

In fact, if the existing compacts and treaties had been strictly followed, the cuts would already have begun. But after years of battling each other in court and across the negotiating table, the U.S. and Mexican governments and the seven U.S. states in the Colorado River basin decided to stop fighting and start working together, ultimately staving off water delivery cuts for several years.

In the U.S., the lower basin states of Arizona, Nevada and California have struck several deals to undertake and fund aggressive water conservation programs. The U.S. and Mexico struck a similar deal as part of the water sharing agreement signed in 2012 that is set to expire next year. Under that deal, called Minute 319, the states and the U.S. government are investing $21 million in water conservation programs in Mexico like lining canals to reduce leaks and improving water efficiency at farms.

That deal also takes steps to restore the parched river delta south of the border, and allows Mexico to store some of its Colorado River water supplies in Lake Mead to make up for capacity that was lost in Mexico after a 2010 earthquake damaged its dams. That helped Mexico solve its shortage problem while bolstering water levels at the critical reservoir.

But that history of collaboration may be tested if the negotiations drag on into the new Trump administration, which has focused much of its most bombastic rhetoric on international trade agreements and immigration from Mexico.

"All this blustering, all of these insults being hurled around just doesn't help, because we depend on Mexico in so many ways," Mumme said.

Trump hasn't spoken about the Colorado River's issues, and his transition team did not respond to a request for comment. But during the campaign he championed the plight of farmers in the Central Valley of California, who have had their water deliveries cut because of a five-year drought combined with endangered species protections that restrict pumping from the Sacramento-San Joaquin delta in the northern part of the state. In a May campaign stop in Fresno, Trump vowed to fix the state's "insane" water problem to "bring jobs back."

And in what could be signal of the type of policies to expect, David Bernhardt, a former Interior Department solicitor who is now the top lobbyist for a powerhouse Central Valley water district, was tapped to lead Trump's initial transition for the Interior Department.

Getting a Colorado River deal done before Trump's inauguration will be a heavy lift. Mexico has indicated it doesn't want to sign the deal until a separate but related agreement is in place on the U.S. side of the border. That deal, a drought contingency plan among California, Arizona and Nevada, calls for the states to conserve additional water above and beyond mandatory cuts in order to increase reservoir levels and stave off the most severe scenarios. Although the states have agreed to top-line numbers, they've haven't yet worked out with their farmers, cities and other users how to share the cuts. And in Arizona, the state legislature must give its approval to any pact.

Water experts agree it's only a matter of time until a shortage declaration is declared on the river, and without a new U.S.-Mexico deal in place, what would happen then is anyone's guess.

The U.S. could simply implement the delivery cuts agreed to under the 2012 deal, hoping that Mexico wouldn't object to extending those provision under the expired deal. But it's not clear whether those cuts would still be acceptable to Mexico.

"Without a U.S.-Mexico agreement, it's entirely possible that Mexico asserts that it does not have to take a shortage," said Jennifer Pitt, Colorado River project director for the National Audubon Society.

Moreover, whatever the U.S. does on the Colorado River could have knock-on effects elsewhere. In particular, the same treaty that governs the Colorado River also covers the Rio Grande, where Mexico is obliged to deliver water to the U.S.

It was Mexico's failure to deliver agreed-upon water volumes from the Rio Grande to the U.S. that last raised U.S.-Mexico water issues to the presidential level. That was in 2005 under President George W. Bush, who was acutely aware of the importance of that water to farmers in his home state of Texas.

Cross border tensions were also high in the mid-2000s, when some of the United States' Colorado River water was seeping into the ground and over the border and being pumped by Mexican farmers. The two countries also feuded during the late 1960s over salinity levels in the water that the U.S. was sending south, a dispute still fresh in the minds of water experts on both sides of the border. Mexico repeatedly threatened to sue the U.S. over that issue, and ultimately President Richard Nixon appointed a special ambassador to deal with the problem.

Key players on the Colorado River hope that relations won't get that bad anytime soon, even as they acknowledge that Trump's fiery campaign rhetoric presents a major wild card.

"On the merits, having Mexico conserve more water to improve the reliability of the Colorado River water supply for 36 million users in the U.S., for 15 percent of U.S. agricultural output, that seems to me to have enormous value," Pitt said.

"On that basis, I have confidence. But on the basis of how rhetoric can sometimes get detached from those merits — I don't know," she said.

Biofuel producers unite against potential EPA biodiesel cuts Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/27/2017 06:57 PM EDT

Biofuels producers and their farm-state backers in Congress are keeping the pressure on EPA, accusing the agency of betraying President Donald Trump's promises to back the Renewable Fuel Standard after the agency signaled it would cut its biodiesel volume mandates.

EPA's Tuesday notice seeking input on whether to reduce the already set 2018 biomass-based biodiesel requirement and shrink the mandate in 2019 is drawing opposition from both biodiesel and ethanol producers, who say EPA's move marks its second attempt to undermine the program this year.

The new EPA notice has already driven down prices for biofuel credits, which are used by refiners to meet the obligations under the RFS. That's a boon to refiners like CVR Energy, the company owned by former Trump adviser Carl Icahn who had joined with other fuel processors like Valero Energy earlier this year in an unsuccessful effort to shift the compliance burden of the RFS away from their companies.

Trump has repeatedly offered public support for ethanol producers and the RFS, and just last month, he told Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) to assure Iowans he had their backs on the RFS — a position Trump staked out early in his presidential campaign and which helped him carry Iowa and other Midwestern states.

On Wednesday, Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) blasted the new EPA move, saying in a letter to Trump that the biodiesel cut would be "bad for American farmers, American manufacturing and American rural communities," adding that she hoped "that your EPA has not forgotten about the pledges that were made to my constituents and to farmers across the country."

That letter came a day after Grassley said the proposal "seems like a bait-and-switch from the EPA's prior proposal and from assurances from President Trump himself and Cabinet secretaries in my office. ... This all gives me a strong suspicion that Big Oil and oil refineries are prevailing, despite assurances to the contrary."

And biodiesel makers are drawing strong support from the ethanol industry, who see the EPA's move as a step toward undercutting the RFS.

"This would undermine renewable fuel production in the U.S. and cause severe harm to our friends in the biodiesel industry," Robert Walther, vice president of federal advocacy for ethanol producer POET, told POLITICO. "That harm would radiate throughout the entire biofuel value chain from starch biofuel plants, to cellulosic facilities now scaling up, to the corn and soybean farmers who voted overwhelmingly for Trump."

In its Tuesday notice, EPA relied on letters from Valero, the American Petroleum Institute, and the American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers to argue the agency expects biodiesel prices to climb because of the expiration of a tax credit last year — as well as the new tariffs the administration is putting on biodiesel imports from Argentina and Indonesia.

As a result, the agency asked for comment on revising down the amount of biodiesel to be used in 2018 by 15 percent, and on setting 2019 biodiesel requirements possibly as low as the 1 billion gallon floor laid out in the law, less than half the original 2018 level of 2.1 billion gallons.

Biodiesel credits are linked to the ethanol credits — called Renewable Identification Numbers — since U.S. ethanol producers typically fall short of supplying the volumes required under the RFS program. Oil refiners then must buy biodiesel RINs to meet requirements, according to research by University of Illinois economist Scott Irwin.

While corn ethanol credit prices are cheaper than biodiesel RINs, the two tend to move in tandem, so the effect of EPA's notice on RIN prices for ethanol, advanced biofuel and biodiesel was immediate: a 20 percent decline in prices for credits of biodiesel and ethanol after EPA's notice, according to the fuel price tracking service OPIS.

The proposal to cut the biomass-based fuel shocked the biodiesel makers such as Gene Gebolys, CEO of World Energy, who said the industry "froze" as soon as the notice came out.

"The more baffling part is Trump has been consistently supportive of the RFS, over and over and over and over again, he has been supportive of the RFS," he said. "This has been a frontal assault on the RFS. You have to ask yourself, is EPA taking direction from the White House or the oil industry?"

EPA also did not respond to a request for comment. Nor did API or Valero, both of whom EPA cited in its notice, although the AFPM trade association was pleased by the action.

"EPA is on the right track in adjusting renewable fuel requirements," AFPM CEO Chet Thompson said in a statement. "This proposal more appropriately advances Congress's stated purpose of bolstering America's energy independence. American drivers shouldn't have to shoulder more costs to help foreign biofuel producers."

But ethanol producers think EPA may be putting key states in play if it follows through and makes cuts to biodiesel.

"If I am a Democrat thinking of taking Trump on in Iowa and Wisconsin in 2020, I am licking my chops," Walther from POET said.

FERC amends pipeline study to add climate impact Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/27/2017 04:31 PM EDT

FERC announced today that it is amending an environmental study for a natural gas pipeline to meet a federal court's requirement that it include an assessment of greenhouse gas emissions from the power plants that may use the fuel.

The new 5-page analysis of the Southeast Market Pipelines Project, which consists of three natural gas pipelines under construction in Alabama, Georgia and Florida, conducted by FERC staff says they "would not result in a significant impact on the environment" so long as the developer followed the mitigation measures mentioned in the final 2015 environmental impact statement.

The original EIS didn't include an assessment of carbon dioxide, methane and nitrous oxide emissions associated with use and combustion of the natural gas that would be transported by the project when it was done. Last month, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals sided with the Sierra Club and vacated FERC's approval of the project, saying the agency must redo the EIS it used in its decision.

FERC's move to issue a supplemental EIS on greenhouse gas emissions suggests that it may not appeal the court's decision.

The analysis also states that using the social cost of carbon in its greenhouse gas analysis "is not appropriate for use in any project-level NEPA review."

WHAT'S NEXT: FERC has until Oct. 6 to decide whether it will appeal the D.C. Circuit's Aug. 22 ruling, which could require the agency to revisit the EISs it conducted for several pipelines.

Trump: Shipping industry doesn't want Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico recovery Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/27/2017 03:40 PM EDT

President Donald Trump cited objections from the shipping industry when asked today why his administration has not waived the Jones Act to help deliver fuel and other goods to hurricane-ravaged Puerto Rico.

"We're thinking about that, but we have a lot of shippers and a lot of people and a lot of people who work in the shipping industry that don't want the Jones Act lifted," Trump told reporters outside the White House today. "And we have a lot of ships out there right now."

The Jones Act stipulates that only U.S.-flagged vessels can ship goods between domestic ports.

DHS said earlier today that it was not likely to grant a Jones Act waiver to Puerto Rico, where water, fuel and other necessities are in short supply since Hurricane Maria hit the island last week. Enough ships are available to deliver goods to the U.S. territory, with the problem being the lack of delivery logistics on the island itself, a department spokesman said.

DHS waived the Jones Act for fuel deliveries to Texas and Florida after hurricanes hit those states earlier this year.

WHAT'S NEXT: Congress has promised to ramp up aid to Puerto Rico.

DHS says it hasn't denied Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico — yet Back

By Tanya Snyder | 09/27/2017 11:35 AM EDT

DHS officials said today that they have not yet decided how to act on the Jones Act waiver request sent Monday from eight members of Congress.

However, senior DHS officials made it clear that a waiver is unlikely and that an official determination could take days or weeks, as it requires coordination with other federal agencies.

Under statute, the Jones Act, which requires that goods moved between U.S. ports must be carried on U.S.-owned and -operated vessels, can only be waived for reasons of "national defense" or if there aren't enough U.S.-flag vessels to meet demand. In the wake of Hurricanes Harvey and Irma, the Department of Defense requested a Jones Act waiver for Texas and Florida, which was issued quickly. In the absence of a Pentagon request, DHS needs to make those determinations itself, consulting with MARAD on vessel availability.

DHS officials also told reporters that the department had "not received a formal waiver request," since Congress is not a traditional pathway for these kinds of requests. Still, the officials said they are evaluating the request and working as quickly as possible to make a determination.

The officials also reiterated that a Jones Act waiver would not help move goods within the island, which is the real problem Puerto Rico is facing right now.

The U.S. Virgin Islands are statutorily exempt from the Jones Act.

Oil industry backs GOP tax proposal, but utilities, renewables industries wary Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/27/2017 04:02 PM EDT

The oil and gas industry praised the tax proposal released Wednesday by Republican leaders, though the utility and renewables industries withheld their verdicts for now.

The "Big Six" Republican tax writers — consisting of Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin, National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn and key congressional leaders — called for lowering the corporate tax rate for businesses to 20 percent, and allowing companies to write off the full value of capital investments. But they left many details out of the plan, including how to pay for their tax cuts. The proposal would partially curb the interest tax deduction for businesses, and it would alter how overseas profits would be taxed.

Allowing companies to fully expense their spending would benefit the oil and gas sector, which says it pours an average of $232 billion a year in capital expenditures in the U.S. The proposal also shifts international taxes to a territorial system, under which profits from overseas subsidiaries would not be taxed, and it allows profits currently held overseas to be repatriated without being taxed.

"The right pro-growth tax policies can accelerate these economic investments and create more jobs while keeping energy affordable for consumers. This includes strong cost-recovery provisions, which are a critical part of any pro-growth tax code to allow new investment and help fuel the U.S. economy," American Petroleum Institute President Jack Gerard said.

Wednesday's tax proposal was vague on the fate of the interest tax deduction, saying it would be "partially limited" but leaving tax-writing committees to work out the details.

The Edison Electric Institute, which represents Investor-owned utilities, said it was still reviewing the proposal; but in an interview earlier this week, Eric Grey, EEI's director of government affairs, said the group was concerned about the loss of the interest tax deduction. EEI says utilities spend $125 billion a year on capital investments, and they depend on debt and equity markets to fund transmission lines, substations and wires. Grey said utilities wouldn't get an immediate benefit from 100 percent expensing.

"For us, the interest deduction is how we raise capital," Grey said. "Our companies are in the debt and equity markets every single day trying to build the necessary financing for the large [capital expenditure] we do."

The Solar Energy Industries Association and the American Wind Energy Association both said they were still studying the proposal. SEIA CEO Abigail Ross Hopper told POLITICO last week that the industry was concerned about the interaction between the investment tax credit and full expensing.

EPW to host EPA, NRC nomination hearing Oct. 4 Back

By Anthony Adragna | 09/27/2017 04:25 PM EDT

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will hold a confirmation hearing Oct. 4 on a host of President Donald Trump's picks for posts at EPA and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

The session will include four EPA nominees: Matthew Leopold to be general counsel, William Wehrum to run the air office, Michael Dourson to run the Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution Prevention and David Ross to run the water office. Lawmakers will also consider Jeff Baran's re-nomination to the NRC.

The committee shelved a hearing planned for last week on the picks after the Senate adjourned earlier than expected for Rosh Hashanah. Wehrum's and Dourson's nominations have attracted the most controversy from Democrats and the environmental community.

WHAT'S NEXT: The full EPW Committee will consider the nominees at the Oct. 4 hearing.

Court delays coal ash arguments to November Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/27/2017 04:54 PM EDT

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals today granted a one-month delay in arguments over EPA's 2015 coal ash rule following Administrator Scott Pruitt's decision to reconsider key parts of the regulation.

Arguments had been scheduled for Oct. 17, but a three-judge panel ordered them delayed until Nov. 20.

The judges ordered EPA to reveal by Nov. 15 which portions of the rule will be reconsidered "and setting forth with specificity the timeline for reconsideration." In addition, all sides, including industry and environmental challengers, are supposed to file new briefs by Oct. 11 addressing whether the new state-based coal ash permitting program that passed Congress as part of the Water Infrastructure Improvements for the Nation Act at the end of 2016 affect the broader lawsuit at all. And the court told attorneys to be ready at arguments to discuss whether a longer delay in the lawsuit is appropriate, opening up the possibility of further delay.

The court set 90 minutes' worth of arguments in total, split into four sections: Three dealing with various legal and technical challenges to the rule and one on whether the case should be delayed longer.

The case will be heard by Judges Karen LeCraft Henderson, a George H.W. Bush appointee, and two Obama appointees, Judges Patricia Millett and Cornelia Pillard.

WHAT'S NEXT: The parties must submit briefs regarding the permitting program by Oct. 11. Oral argument is scheduled for Nov. 20.

AN OPENING FOR ANWR? Senate Republicans intend to use their fiscal 2018 budget blueprint to lay the groundwork for new energy production in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge by using special rules that would allow them to avoid a Democratic filibuster, Pro's Ben Lefebvre and Sarah Ferris report, citing sources familiar with the process. While the budget document couldn't mandate specific policies, it would enable Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski to write legislation that would remove restrictions on drilling in ANWR that could be bundled into a massive tax reconciliation package that needs just 50 votes in the Senate.

Doing so would realize a long-standing goal of Republicans and oil companies, while attracting vehement opposition from environmental groups and virtually all Democrats. The U.S. Geological Survey estimates that part of ANWR, a wide swath of tundra on the northern Alaska coast, home to polar bears, porcupine caribou and a landscape that hasn't been touched in thousands of years, could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil. But Senate Republicans have little margin for error since two members of their caucus — Sens. Susan Collins and John McCain — have opposed similar bills in the past, though they'd be forced to consider that provision as part of the broader tax effort. A McCain spokeswoman says he's open to a "full debate" on the subject despite his past opposition. Collins told ME Monday night that ANWR has been far from her mind recently. "I've been focused on health care," she said, just after coming out against the latest Obamacare repeal effort.

There are a number of key questions. Some wonder if Murkowski's prior breaks with GOP leadership and the White House will hamper her pursuit of other priorities. Current low oil prices might make opening ANWR less urgent than in the past and there's some question whether oil and gas companies would flock to the area at today's crude price of $50 a barrel (though that answer would likely depend on the company). Infrastructure is not likely to be a major barrier, though, with the biggest requirement a short pipeline to connect drilling wells in ANWR to the main Trans-Alaska Pipeline System pipeline. "A pipeline is not a big lift," said one oil and gas company representative who asked to speak on background to discuss the matter. "If the oil is there like they think it is, it's not prohibitive."

LOTSA GROUND COVERED: Energy Secretary Rick Perry and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke covered a wide array of topics during a Monday appearance at the National Petroleum Council. Highlights from that event via Pro's Ben Lefebvre:

—New infrastructure study coming: DOE Deputy Secretary Dan Brouillette, in coordination with the National Petroleum Council, will lead a study on how to improve the permitting process for pipelines and other energy infrastructure, Perry announced. The former Texas governor also called on the group to study how to make carbon capture, utilization and storage infrastructure economically viable. More here.

—Interior reorganization still under consideration: Zinke expects to complete an evaluation of whether to combine the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement and Bureau of Ocean Energy Management within the next couple months. He's also mulling the possibility of establishing Interior offices according to 13 watershed areas and moving BLM and Bureau of Land Reclamation headquarters out West. More here.

—Zinke's report on national monuments remains under review by the White House. "We're working on it. Most people will find it to be a very reasoned approach," he said.

—Perry touts benefits of energy industry: After being interrupted several times by protesters, Perry launched an extended diatribe against environmentalists criticizing the industry's record on climate change. "If you want to talk to something that saves lives, it's energy across the globe. You're involved in an industry that saves lives, lots of them, every year, around the globe," he said.

—On loyalty to the administration: Zinke said about a third of his workforce remained loyal to the previous administration. "I know that when I assumed Interior that I have 30 percent of the crew that's not loyal to the flag," he said. "I had a Fish & Wildlife Service that hated people to a degree."

DEMOCRATS CALL FOR FOCUS ON PUERTO RICO: FEMA Director Brock Long and Homeland Security adviser Tom Bossert arrived Monday on the devastated island, but congressional Democrats expressed concern the administration wasn't doing enough. "Puerto Rico has taken a serious punch to the gut and they need our help. They need it now," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said. "The administration must quickly prepare an appropriate aid package for Florida, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and the Western States for Congress to act on in the near future," he added. Speaker Paul Ryan said: "Our fellow citizens in Puerto Rico remain in our prayers as we make sure they have what they need."

Jones Act waiver sought: Seven House Democrats requested a one-year waiver from the Jones Act to expedite hurricane relief aid to Puerto Rico, Pro Transportation's Tanya Snyder reports. An Energy Department status report Monday found nearly all of the island remained without power.

POLITICO's Jacqueline Klimas reports from San Juan that political leaders on the island are once again afraid their needs are an afterthought in Washington. "The important part is to make sure it's not forgotten," Sen. Marco Rubio said. "We have a fundamental obligation to a U.S. territory and American citizens to respond to a hurricane there the way we would anywhere in the country."

Governor assumes dam will collapse: Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló said he's operating under the assumption the Guajataca Dam will collapse, a fear that led to the evacuation of tens of thousands of area residents. "Some of the dam has fallen apart," he told CNN Monday. "I'd rather be wrong on that front than do nothing and having it fail and costing people their lives."

The president tweets: "Texas & Florida are doing great but Puerto Rico, which was already suffering from broken infrastructure & massive debt, is in deep trouble," President Donald Trump said in a statement released via his Twitter account Monday night. "It's (sic) old electrical grid, which was in terrible shape, was devastated. Much of the Island was destroyed, with billions of dollars...owed to Wall Street and the banks which, sadly, must be dealt with. Food, water and medical are top priorities - and doing well." he added in a pair of follow-up tweets.

Trump's first words on Puerto Rico since Sept. 20 came after the White House forcefully defended his fixation with NFL players' protests, which generated more than a dozen tweets since Friday.

U-TURN ON CLIMATE RULE: Reversing course, DOT told a federal judge in New York in a letter it will publish a regulation requiring states to track emissions from highways and craft reduction goals, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Once published, the regulation takes effect immediately. Environmental groups and Democratic attorneys general had sued Federal Highway Administration for placing the rule on hold indefinitely. "Our lawsuit held the Trump administration accountable for illegally halting a common-sense tool to curb carbon pollution from transportation," said the NRDC's Amanda Eaken in a statement. The regulation is expected to run in the Federal Register Sept. 28.

ZINKE, PERRY SPEAK AT NATIONAL CLEAN ENERGY WEEK: It's a day of events as National Clean Energy Week kicks off in earnest today with a breakfast discussion at 8 a.m. featuring Perry and Zinke (hosted by former GOP Sen. Kelly Ayotte). Also expected to speak throughout the day are Sen. Lindsey Graham, House Republican Conference Chair Cathy McMorris Rodgers and Reps. Derek Kilmer and Ryan Costello. Full details here.

But greens cry foul: Twelve environmental organizations sent a letter to Congress arguing that technologies like biomass, carbon capture or nuclear energy should not be considered clean. "The sponsors of 'National Clean Energy Week' include some of the dirtiest actors in the energy industry," the groups, which include 350.org, Food & Water Watch and Oil Change International, wrote.

HEARING ROUNDUP — TWO DOE NOMINEES IN SPOTLIGHT: Murkowski's push to quickly advance agency nominees continues today as her committee examines Steven Winberg's nomination to be assistant Energy secretary for fossil energy and Bruce Walker's selection to be assistant Energy secretary for electricity, delivery and energy reliability. Winberg previously headed up research and development for CONSOL Energy and also was a member of DOE's National Coal Council, while Walker's resume includes stints at National Grid and Consolidated Edison. Things get going at 10 a.m. in Dirksen 366.

E&C LOOKS AT ADVANCED ENERGY TECHNOLOGIES: The House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee holds the latest in its "Powering America" series of hearings today with an examination of "the role advanced energy technologies play in empowering the nation's electricity consumers." Witnesses include representatives from Advanced Energy Economy, Holy Cross Energy, ComEd and LO3 Energy, among others. The hearing is set for 10 a.m. in Rayburn 2123.

GATHERING INPUT ON WATER INFRASTRUCTURE NEEDS: The House Transportation and Infrastructure Subcommittee on Water Resources and Environment hosts a hearing at 10 a.m. today with a panel of public and private sector witnesses on what they'd like to see for water infrastructure in a forthcoming legislative package. The full list of witnesses for the hearing in Rayburn 2167 is available here.

MAIL CALL! CEQ VETERANS CALL OUT NEPA SHORTCUTS: Trump's efforts to streamline environmental reviews leave his administration's decisions more vulnerable to being overturned in court because they don't allow for enough input from the public, four veterans of the Council on Environmental Quality warned in a letter to the White House Monday. "Emphasizing speed over quality sends the wrong message to agencies and creates significant legal risk that future environmental reviews of federal actions will be rejected by the courts and need to be redone," wrote Katie McGinty, Nancy Sutley, Christy Goldfuss and Brenda Mallory, all of whom served in Democratic administrations.

STATE AGs DISCUSS TRUMP-ERA ENVIRONMENTAL LITIGATION: A session at 2:45 p.m. with three attorneys general — Maryland's Brian Frosh, Illinois' Lisa Madigan and New York's Eric Schneiderman — discussing ongoing environmental litigation fighting White House efforts to weaken environmental protections is among the highlights of the Institute for Policy Integrity's state climate action conference today. Follow along here.

DEMOCRATS SEEK INFORMATION ON MINE SAFETY PICK: Sens. Sheldon Whitehouse and Bob Casey released a letter Monday seeking information on Mine Safety and Health Administration's investigations into Rhino Resource Partners, which mine safety nominee David Zatezalo worked at in a variety of senior roles between 2007 and 2014. They asked for the records no later than Sept. 29.

FAA, FLOOD INSURANCE FLOPS: Democrats blocked a Republican push to fast-track an FAA extension that also included additional provisions on flood insurance and tax credits for victims of recent hurricanes, POLITICO's Heather Caygle and Lauren Gardner report. The chamber is expected to consider the measure again later this week under a rule, which requires a simple majority, unlike Monday's fast-track procedure that required a two-thirds vote.

STUDY: RAIL DAMPENING PIPELINE INVESTMENTS: New research out from the National Bureau of Economic Research finds the flexibility associated with crude-by-rail shipping has led to decreased investments in long-term pipeline projects given the high upfront costs of such infrastructure. "The ability to ramp rail shipments up and down is valuable to crude oil shippers, and it reduces incentives to make long-run investments in pipeline capacity," Ryan Kellogg, a professor at the Harris School of Public Policy who co-authored the study, said in a statement.

CHAMBER URGES REJECTION OF GARRETT: Count the U.S. Chamber of Commerce as the latest group urging senators to reject former Rep. Scott Garrett's nomination to head the Export-Import Bank, Pro Financial Services' Zachary Warmbrodt reports. In a Monday letter, senior executive vice president Suzanne Clark expressed concern Garrett could use his position to prevent the agency from properly functioning while voicing strong support for four other nominees: Kimberly Reed, Claudia Slacik, Judith Pryor and Spencer Bachus.

ZINKE SPENT $2.5K ON TRAVEL IN MARCH: Zinke spent $2,508 in flights, lodging and meals meet with members of the Blackfeet Nation, agency staff and toured national parks in Wyoming and his home state of Montana in his first month in office in March, according to public records the agency released Monday. Zinke stayed at his home in Whitefish for most of his first trip, according to the secretary's trip itinerary for March through July the agency released earlier this month. Unlike Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price who POLITICO earlier reported took private jets, Zinke's flights were commercial.

GRID-CONNECTED BATTERIES TAKING OVER RESIDENTIAL STORAGE MARKET: Homeowners are increasingly installing electricity batteries that connect to the grid instead of closed systems that feed power only to the residence, GTM Research says in a report out today. The report does not cite a specific reason for the change but notes customers are looking for back-up power in case of electric outages and to save money, while utilities are encouraging adoption to mitigate the impacts of growing solar power. Grid-connected projects will make up 57 percent of annual deployments by the end of this year, the report says.

DOESN'T LOOK STRESSED: Murkowski doesn't look like the heated health care debate is getting to her in this picture with a pink polar bear she tweeted out Monday from her visit over the weekend to the Anchorage Museum.

ALL-TIME HIGH: Bolstered by more than 500,000 people who've joined since last November, the Natural Resources Defense Council tells ME it now has three million-plus members and online activists.

MOVER, SHAKER: Ann Bartuska has joined Resources for the Future as vice president in its newly formed land, water, and nature program. She comes after serving as deputy undersecretary for research, education and economics as well as chief scientist at USDA.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Reconciliation may provide opening for ANWR Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Sarah Ferris | 09/25/2017 06:07 PM EDT

Senate Republicans plan to open the door to oil drilling in an Alaskan wildlife refuge using special rules that would allow them to avoid a Democratic filibuster, according to sources tracking the budget process.

The Senate Budget Committee is still drawing up its fiscal 2018 blueprint, which is expected to lay the groundwork for tax reform using special budget reconciliation rules. Two sources familiar with the ongoing negotiations say the document also is expected to lay the groundwork for new energy production in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge — a longtime goal of Republicans and oil companies.

It's a potentially risky strategy, with two Republican senators on record opposing similar bills in the past: Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Susan Collins of Maine. If those two remain in opposition, Senate leadership couldn't lose a single other GOP vote without jeopardizing their entire reconciliation package, centered on tax reform.

Congress last tried to open ANWR more than a decade ago, and any legislation to do so would run into fierce opposition from environmental groups and virtually all Democrats. But proponents of the idea say their chances have improved since the election of President Donald Trump, who has sought to increase U.S. oil, gas and coal production.

"Energy dominance requires ANWR," said Matt Shuckerow, a spokesman for Alaska Rep. Don Young, invoking a favorite Trump administration catch-phrase. "We are working with leadership and looking at reconciliation."

The Senate budget resolution is expected to give special deficit-reducing instructions to the Energy and Natural Resources Committee in the upcoming fiscal year, totaling about $1 billion over a decade.

While budget writers can't mandate specific policies, sources say it would enable ENR Chairman Lisa Murkowski to write legislation that would remove restrictions on drilling in ANWR or other currently off-limits areas.

Opening up drilling in the arctic could raise as much as $5 billion over a decade, the CBO estimated in 2012, when oil was selling for about twice as much as it is now.

That measure could then be bundled into a massive tax reconciliation package, which will need just 50 votes in the Senate.

The House's budget, which has been stalled for months amid GOP infighting, goes even further. That version calls for $5 billion in extra energy revenues, and a House GOP aide says ANWR is "definitely on the table in terms of reconciliation."

The White House also "will continue to push for more domestic production," an administration official said. Trump's budget request sought $1.8 billion from opening new areas to energy production.

ANWR is a wide swath of tundra on the northern Alaska coast, home to polar bears, porcupine caribou and a landscape that hasn't been touched in thousands of years. Congress designated the 19-million-acre area a wildlife refuge in 1980, but set aside a 1.5-million-acre parcel known as "10-02" for possible future drilling if future lawmakers approved such a plan.

The U.S. Geological Survey estimates that part of ANWR could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil.

In the past, drilling in the refuge only became a hot issue when gasoline prices were high, said Athan Manuel, director of lands protection program for the Sierra Club, which has been lobbying heavily against its development.

"Now it's completely become an ideological and political fight," Manuel added. "There are fewer moderate Republicans than we need. The vote numbers for us are difficult on the Senate side if they go to budget reconciliation."

Young, the Alaska Republican who has spent much of his career advocating for expanded Arctic drilling, has raised ANWR with Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, Shuckerow said.

Zinke is quietly working to allow oil companies to conduct seismic exploration in the region, The Washington Post reported this month. But actually letting them extract oil and gas from ANWR would require action by Congress.

The GOP has tried twice in the past to open ANWR for energy development through budget reconciliations. An attempt in 1995 failed after President Bill Clinton vetoed the overall budget package, while a second attempt in 2005 could not overcome a Democratic filibuster in the Senate.

Even using reconciliation, Republicans have little margin for error with only 52 seats in the Senate. And two of their caucus have voted against ANWR provisions in the past.

A spokeswoman for McCain, Julie Tarallo, said despite his past opposition the senator "is open to having a full debate in Congress about the United States' energy policy." Collins' office did not respond to requests for comment.

At least one Democrat, West Virginia Sen. Joe Manchin, may join Republicans if they try to use reconciliation to open ANWR.

"The energy we receive from Alaska is much needed for American energy independence," Manchin told POLITICO. "If it can be done in a safe way, and I think we've proven it can, we should look at every option we have."

Murkowski, who joined McCain and Collins to kill the Senate's Obamacare repeal bill in August, has introduced legislation that would direct the Interior Department to offer oil-and-gas production leases for at least 300,000 acres in ANWR, S. 49 \(115\). But she told POLITICO last week that Interior had not yet reached out to her about its push to open ANWR for seismic exploration or to form strategy on how to possibly open the area to drilling.

Some question whether her earlier breaks with GOP leadership and the White House will hamper her pursuit of other priorities.

"Murkowski is on the outside looking in" when it comes to GOP energy policy, said one energy lobbyist who requested anonymity to discuss political matters.

Another problem is current low oil prices. More than a decade of into the shale oil boom, the country looks cushioned from a possible oil supply shock, something that could make opening ANWR less urgent than in the past.

"Now that we're in this age of oil supply adequacy, the negotiating power of energy has diminished," said Kevin Book, managing director of energy consultancy ClearView Energy Partners. "What adequacy has done has increased the political cost of opening up ANWR for production."

Another question is whether oil and gas companies would flock to ANWR at today's crude price of $50 a barrel.

Chevron and BP drilled one exploratory well in the area in the early 1980s at the behest of a local native tribe, according to Alaska Oil and Gas Association President Kara Moriarty. The drilling was done with the permission of the Interior Department, with which Chevron shared the data, but a strict confidentiality agreement keeps the results a closely held secret.

The answer would depend on the company. Prices are expected to rise eventually, and the refuge's onshore topology would make ANWR a more tempting target than the choppy waters and extreme winds off of Alaska's coastline, Moriarty said.

The steady spread of oil and gas pipeline networks immediately outside ANWR also means that bringing any oil from the refuge to market would be easier than it was in decades past, Moriarty added.

The biggest infrastructure requirement would be a short pipeline to connect drilling wells in ANWR to the main Trans-Alaska Pipeline System pipeline taking the crude south.

"A pipeline is not a big lift," said one oil and gas company representative who asked to speak on background to discuss the matter. "If the oil is there like they think it is, it's not prohibitive."

Chevron put itself in the group of companies that would welcome the chance to set rigs there permanently.

"Chevron supports increased access to federal and private land for the responsible exploration and development of oil and natural gas resources, including the ANWR coastal plain," Chevron spokeswoman Veronica Flores-Paniagua said.

Environmental groups and other Democrats are already alarmed about how far the talk of opening ANWR has come this year. Interior's move to allow seismic exploration, if approved, could harm the polar bears, caribou, wolves and other wildlife already feeling the effects of climate change in the region, and the oil brought from under the tundra would add to greenhouse gas emissions, environmental and Alaskan native groups said.

"Protecting the Arctic Refuge has broad public and bipartisan support and deserves a full debate in regular order, not rushed through as part of the budget process," said Alaska Wilderness spokesman Corey Himrod.

Sens. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) and Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) in April offered legislation to enshrine the entire region as a wilderness area protected from drilling. The bill, S. 820 \(115\), was introduced with 37 Democrats and Independent Bernie Sanders (Vt.) as original co-sponsors.

"We're going to battle this," Markey told POLITICO, arguing that expanded shale oil production has made ANWR moot. "With efficiency gains and growth of fracking in the lower 48 states, there's no need to open ANWR."

Perry calls for study on expanding energy infrastructure Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/25/2017 04:14 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry called for a study on how to improve the permitting process for pipelines and other energy infrastructure, saying protests against those plans were slowing economic growth.

Perry asked the National Petroleum Council, whose membership includes various heads of the energy industry, to conduct the study with help from the Energy Department.

While domestic oil production has steadily increased since the mid-2000s, pipelines, railways, oil storage "and related system components" needed to move fossil fuel from well to market have to be "expanded, upgraded and maintained," Perry said.

With the rise of oil and natural gas fields in North Dakota, environmentalists have objected to major oil pipeline projects, including Keystone XL and the Dakota Access Pipeline.

"We have to ensure we have an uninterrupted flow of energy product," Perry said. "In recent years, objections to and restrictions on the construction of needed transportation infrastructure have increased, slowing the development of new infrastructure and hindering economic growth."

Perry also called on the NPC to study how to make carbon capture, utilization and storage infrastructure economically viable.

The event also attracted protesters, two of whom were escorted from the room after demanding Perry and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke address climate change.

WHAT'S NEXT: Perry designated DOE Deputy Secretary Dan Brouillette to coordinate on the study with the NPC.

Zinke: BOEM-BSEE study expected in two months Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/25/2017 05:48 PM EDT

The Interior Department expects within two months to complete a study on the feasibility of combining its bureau that regulate offshore drilling safety with one that sells leases, Secretary Ryan Zinke said today.

Zinke said he hasn't yet decided whether to combine the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement and Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, which were carved out of the former Minerals Management Service in 2010.

Rejoining BOEM and BSEE is one of several ideas Zinke is considering to reorganize the department around the Trump administration's goal of increasing domestic energy production. Zinke also floated the possibility of establishing Interior offices according to 13 watershed areas and moving BLM and Bureau of Land Reclamation headquarters out West.

"There's no reason for BLM to be where they don't have holding. Push your generals out to where the fight is," Zinke told members of the National Petroleum Council today.

Zinke blamed a lag in oil and gas project permitting on the abundance of choke points in the existing process.

"There's too many ways in the present process for someone who doesn't want to get it done to put it in a holding pattern," he said.

He also estimated that a third of Interior's workforce remained loyal to the previous administration.

"I know that when I assumed Interior that I have 30 percent of the crew that's not loyal to the flag," Zinke said, comparing his tenure to "capturing a prize ship at sea and only the captain and first mate row over."

WHAT'S NEXT: Zinke said he expected the report on BOEM and BSEE to be ready within 60 days.

Lawmakers ask for Jones Act waiver for Puerto Rico Back

By Tanya Snyder | 09/25/2017 06:35 PM EDT

Rep. Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.) and six other Democrats are asking the Trump administration for a one-year Jones Act waiver to expedite hurricane relief aid to Puerto Rico.

In a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke, the lawmakers, most of them members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, asked for a "one-year comprehensive waiver of the Jones Act requirements for Puerto Rico." The Jones Act, which requires that all goods shipped between U.S. ports be carried on U.S.-built, -owned and -operated vessels, is often blamed for driving up prices in Puerto Rico.

"The island is now facing an unprecedented uphill battle to rebuild its homes, businesses and communities," the lawmakers wrote in the letter. "Temporarily loosening these requirements — for the express purpose of disaster recovery — will allow Puerto Rico to have more access to the oil needed for its power plants, food, medicines, clothing, and building supplies."

In a separate statement, Velázquez noted that the storm has brought about a sustained and complete shutdown of Puerto Rico's power grid, which "already faced serious infrastructure problems." Local officials predict it could take six months to get the power fully restored.

"Even before Maria made landfall, the Island was already suffering from economic and financial crisis," she said. "Now, at the worst time possible, the Island has endured a natural disaster of historic proportions ... We cannot and will not turn our backs on them."

In Puerto Rico, another desperate plea for help Back

By Jacqueline Klimas | 09/25/2017 09:39 PM EDT

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Days after Hurricane Maria barreled through here virtually no people are on the streets and the usually bustling tourist area is littered with curled sheets of metal. Lines of cars waiting to fill up on gas are backed up along the highway off-ramps.

"We haven't forgotten about you," Adm. Paul Zukunft, the commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard, told a gathering on Monday after what the governor has called the "biggest catastrophe" in the U.S. territory's history.

But the political leadership of Puerto Rico worries that the suffering of its 3.5 million U.S. citizens is once again an afterthought in Washington.

"We don't have a voice in the Senate unless it's Marco Rubio," Jenniffer Gonzalez-Colon, Puerto Rico's single nonvoting member of the House of Representatives, said at an emergency operations center here, where POLITICO accompanied visiting dignitaries before touring the Coast Guard's main base in the region, which suffered extensive damage.

"We don't have two senators," added Rep. Stacey Plaskett (D-Virgin Islands), whose constituents have been similarly hard hit by the season's historic storms and similarly lack a vote in Congress.

President Donald Trump has come under fire for failing to focus more attention on the plight of Puerto Rico and the nearby Virgin Islands over the weekend, while tweeting over a dozen times about the National Football League. The crisis was also largely absent from the 24-hour news networks, where Hurricanes Harvey in Texas and Irma in Florida received wall-to-wall coverage.

Trump on Monday tweeted about the island's plight but seemed to blame Puerto Rico itself for its woes.

"Texas & Florida are doing great but Puerto Rico, which was already suffering from broken infrastructure & massive debt, is in deep trouble," he tweeted. "It's old electrical grid, which was in terrible shape, was devastated. Much of the Island was destroyed, with billions of dollars owed to Wall Street and the banks which, sadly, must be dealt with. Food, water and medical are top priorities — and doing well."

It's an all-too-familiar predicament for disenfranchised residents of Puerto Rico, which is poorer than all 50 states, has an unemployment rate of nearly 12 percent, and is still reeling from a financial crisis of historic proportions in which it declared a form of bankruptcy earlier this year.

After Maria, the territory's leaders are hoping their strongest leverage to get long-term aid from Washington will be the sizable populations of Puerto Ricans who reside on the mainland and constitute a powerful voting bloc, especially in places like New York and Florida.

They are focused on building a coalition of lawmakers to gain support for a new federal aid bill. Congress has already passed a $15 billion package to assist those affected by Hurricane Harvey in Texas, but House Speaker Paul Ryan has signaled that more aid is on the way.

While Puerto Rico does not have a vote in Congress, large populations of Puerto Ricans on the U.S. mainland do have a voice in the midterm and presidential elections, and some experts predict how the White House and Congress respond could have an impact at the ballot box.

About 20 percent of Puerto Ricans live on the U.S. mainland, said Robert Stein, who teaches urban politics at Rice University's Baker Institute for Public Policy. The two states with the largest Puerto Rican populations, Florida and New York, control 54 House seats and 58 votes for president in the Electoral College.

"This may be a big issue in upcoming elections," Stein predicted.

Rubio of Florida said on Monday that helping Puerto Rico is personal for him.

"The important part is to make sure it's not forgotten," the former GOP presidential hopeful said. "We have a fundamental obligation to a U.S. territory and American citizens to respond to a hurricane there the way we would anywhere in the country."

Rubio said it will be a challenge to get more hurricane aid through the Senate, but said lawmakers knew the first aid bill "would not be enough."

"There's an acknowledgment that we have to go back and do more, and now maybe sooner than anticipated," he said, noting that he expects Congress to address a funding bill for Maria and Irma later this month or early next.

Florida's other senator, Democrat Bill Nelson, who is up for reelection in 2018, tweeted Monday that he is "calling on U.S. military to send additional search & rescue, medical and construction teams to Puerto Rico."

Even before Maria, Nelson and Rubio sent a letter to Trump last week urging a greater role for the federal government in assisting U.S. territories after recent storms emanating from the Caribbean, including Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

Other Puerto Rican officials also argued it is time for lawmakers to make the territory's needs a greater priority.

"Let them know that we are committed U.S. citizens, that we are proud U.S. citizens, that we helped others when they were going through difficult times not more than 10 days ago and that now it's the time to help Puerto Rico back," Gov. Ricardo Rossello told reporters Monday.

The situation in Puerto Rico, where downed trees and power lines and roofs and siding ripped off of buildings are now commonplace, could become more dire before it improves.

Residents lack basic necessities, including food and clean drinking water, and the island could have no electricity for many months. Many residents have no safe place to live. And a lack of temporary housing means residents are at greater risk of disease, such as dengue fever or other mosquito-borne ailments.

Early reports from the island's rich farmland also suggest its agricultural sector, which along with tourism is a major element of its already shaky economy, could be set back for a year or more.

Over the weekend, reports of hysteria started to spread from areas outside the capital, including a warning that a hospital full to capacity was at risk of collapsing, along with a major dam. Rossello, calling Maria the "biggest catastrophe" in the island's history, appealed for far more assistance, especially from the Pentagon.

"We still need some more help. This is clearly a critical disaster in Puerto Rico. It can't be minimized and we can't start overlooking us now that the storm passed, because the danger lurks," he told the The Washington Post.

Plaskett, who was elected to the at-large Congress seat in 2014, also said she expects Rep. Nydia Velazquez (D-N.Y.), the first Puerto Rican woman elected to Congress, and Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla.), who has previously worked on legislation to address Puerto Rico's problems, to take the lead for Puerto Rico on a recovery bill in the House.

But Plaskett said she is also aware that her fellow lawmakers from the mainland can easily get distracted once Puerto Rico's plight drops from the headlines.

"They have their own interests to look out for as well," she said.

Compounding the island's dire situation is the fact that Hurricane Maria itself followed two other major storms in the 2017 season: Harvey in Texas and Irma in Florida.

"We're tired," Zukunft told POLITICO en route to Puerto Rico on Monday to assess the damage. "Hopefully we get a chance to take a knee at some point in time."

At Coast Guard Sector San Juan, the power is still off but sunlight streams in through gaping holes in the roof. There is the overwhelming smell of mold.

A Coast Guard cutter is anchored just off shore to ensure those helping with the storm response have some communications. (Zukunft related that tons of cocaine are aboard because the ship had to be quickly diverted from its drug interdiction mission to aid in storm relief).

But the bigger challenge may be ahead as the government tries to manage the rebuilding of economies from Texas to Florida to Puerto Rico.

"There's no doubt that agencies are being stretched to their limits. As much as they've been challenged up until this point, the real challenge lies ahead," said Gary Webb, the chair of emergency management and disaster science at the University of North Texas. "It's a totally different ballgame managing the recovery from three disasters."

Rubio assured Puerto Rican leaders Monday that he would be a solid voice for them among his colleagues on Capitol Hill.

"I will do everything I can when I get back to Washington tonight to be sure you have the resources and support not just to be able to respond now, but to get ready for the next one," Rubio told a room full of first responders in San Juan.

But experts predict it will have to be a multiyear investment by Congress to truly rebuild the island. The territory was already suffering from a debt crisis before the storm, and now the hurricane has wiped out its other major industry: tourism.

When asked if he thought there was an appetite in Congress to provide funding over the longer term to support rebuilding Puerto Rico, Rubio, responded, "I don't know, I hope so."

White House defends Trump's NFL fixation as Puerto Rico seeks help Back

By Matthew Nussbaum and Colin Wilhelm | 09/25/2017 06:56 PM EDT

The White House on Monday defended President Donald Trump's muted response to the devastation Hurricane Maria left behind in Puerto Rico, brushing off criticism that he's been more interested in kneeling NFL players than a U.S. territory suffering from a humanitarian crisis.

Before Monday night, Trump last tweeted about the storm on Sept. 20, writing, "Governor @RicardoRossello- We are with you and the people of Puerto Rico. Stay safe! #PRStrong."

For five days after that, as the scale of the devastation became apparent, Trump did not address the catastrophe from his Twitter account. Over the same period, he tweeted twice about Hillary Clinton, three times about Sen. Luther Strange (R-Ala.), once about NBA star Steph Curry and 12 times about the NFL, along with numerous additional posts about the national anthem that did not explicitly mention the NFL.

"It really doesn't take that long to type out 140 characters and this president is very capable of doing more than one thing at a time and more than one thing in a day," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said Monday, arguing that Trump's Twitter feed should not be taken as an indication of his priorities.

Several hours after Sanders spoke, and after four days of back and forth with the NFL, Trump wrote a series of tweets about the dire situation Puerto Rico, contrasting it with Texas and Florida, which he said were "doing great" after Hurricanes Harvey and Irma. Puerto Rico, he said, was in "big trouble" and had already been suffering from "broken infrastructure & massive debt."

"It's old electrical grid, which was in terrible shape, was devastated. Much of the Island was destroyed, with billions of dollars.... owed to Wall Street and the banks which, sadly, must be dealt with. Food, water and medical are top priorities — and doing well. #FEMA," the president tweeted.

Earlier Monday, Sanders called the Trump administration's response to the storm "unprecedented," even as it has been far less public than the responses to Irma and Harvey. Maria has left much of Puerto Rico — a U.S. territory of 3.4 million citizens — without power and with limited access to food and water.

"We've done unprecedented movement in terms of federal funding to provide for the people of Puerto Rico and others that have been impacted [by] these storms, we'll continue to do so," Sanders said, noting that FEMA Administrator Brock Long and Homeland Security Adviser Tom Bossert had traveled to the island to assess the damage and the response efforts.

She also pushed back against the idea that Trump is sending a message by tweeting attacks against NFL players for kneeling during the national anthem and not tweeting about Puerto Rico or the U.S. Virgin Islands, which also took a big hit.

"He's not emphasizing sports. You're missing the entire purpose of the message," Sanders said.

Trump, however, has been noticeably less engaged with Maria's devastation.

After Harvey and Irma ripped through Texas and Florida, Trump told several advisers he was very pleased with the administration's handling of the storms, and senior administration officials were buoyed by the idea that the response caused his poll numbers to climb.

But Trump has not seemed as focused on Maria, administration officials say, though they note he has called Puerto Rico's governor, Ricardo Rossello, to ask about the damage.

Rossello has so far praised FEMA's response and other parts of the Trump administration, but has had to petition the government for more military resources, mainly aircraft, for searches and air drops of essential goods to towns cut off by the natural disaster.

"We know that there are capabilities in the surrounding areas, helicopters, planes and so forth. And our petition is for us to be able to use them and be flexible in using them with making sure that resources arrive to those areas of that are more vulnerable in Puerto Rico," Rossello told POLITICO on Sunday night.

Rossello stopped short of criticizing Trump's level of engagement.

"I think he's paid attention," Rossello said. "He's called me three times and he offered two prelandfall emergency declarations before both storms hit Puerto Rico," though Rossello said Trump had overlooked the "granular detail" of declaring a federal disaster for every section of the island.

But criticism against Trump has mounted from other corners. And reports that a White House disaster-aid request might not reach Congress until October further fanned the flames.

"Hey @realDonaldTrump you can't wait that long," Lin-Manuel Miranda, the "Hamilton" playwright of Puerto Rican descent, wrote on Twitter. "There will be a lot of American deaths on your watch if you wait that long."

"Just spoke w/ fmr Gov @luisfortuno51: 'PR on brink of humanitarian disaster.' USVI too. DC must put aside controversies, prioritize rescue," former GOP presidential candidate Mitt Romney tweeted.

Trump's election rival Hillary Clinton also called on Trump's administration to do more, and to recognize Puerto Ricans as U.S. citizens.

"President Trump, Sec. Mattis, and DOD should send the Navy, including the USNS Comfort, to Puerto Rico now. These are American citizens," Clinton tweeted on Sunday, referring to Defense Secretary Jim Mattis.

Puerto Rico's government, which is effectively bankrupt and in over $70 billion of debt, has asked the federal government to waive the costs the commonwealth might have to pay out of pocket. A majority Republican federal oversight board put in place last year to oversee the island's economic recovery already loosened its budgetary requirements on the local government to allow Rossello to spend more in the immediate response, though Puerto Rico had limited resources to begin with.

Though implicit, Rossello's fears about being forgotten came across. During his interview, Rossello underscored the uniquely precarious situation Puerto Rico faces because of its long-term economic struggles, while maintaining that Americans in Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands should receive no less aid than the residents of any state.

"Whatever relief package we have, whatever impact we have, we are U.S. citizens. We shouldn't be the lesser for it," the governor said. If a response proves lackluster, Rossello predicted "massive migration that would deteriorate our [economic] base here in Puerto Rico and would provoke significant demographic shifting in other areas of the United States."

On Monday the governor, who like Trump is highly active on Twitter, retweeted a statement from Puerto Rico's last Republican governor, Luis Fortuno.

"The Federal Gov needs to act immediately to assist PR," it said. "Congress should support the 3.5 m US citizens residing in PR in same way as TX and FL."

DOT reverses course, will publish highway emissions rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/25/2017 04:55 PM EDT

The Transportation Department will allow an Obama-era rule aimed at reducing greenhouse gas emissions from big highways to take effect following lawsuits from environmental groups and Democratic attorneys general.

The Federal Highway Administration delayed the rule from taking effect several times earlier this year before placing it on hold indefinitely.

But DOT today reversed course. In a letter to a federal judge in New York, the Justice Department said the rule has been submitted to the Federal Register and is expected to run on Sept. 28. The rule will take immediate effect upon publication, DOJ wrote.

The rule will require states to track emissions from highways and craft reduction goals.

"Our lawsuit held the Trump administration accountable for illegally halting a common-sense tool to curb carbon pollution from transportation," said the NRDC's Amanda Eaken in a statement. "Now the Federal Highway Administration should get busy working with planners nationwide to clean up the air, protect our health and provide smarter transportation options for Americans such as more public transit, bikeways and pedestrian walkways."

WHAT'S NEXT: DOT says the rule is expected to be published in Thursday's Federal Register.

House Democrats block FAA extension Back

By Heather Caygle and Lauren Gardner | 09/25/2017 12:25 PM EDT

House Democrats on Monday blocked a Republican push to fast-track an FAA extension , with just days to go until current law expires Sept. 30.

Top Democrats announced plans to vote against the six-month extension earlier in the day, citing opposition to unrelated Republican add-ons dealing with flood insurance, tax credits for victims of recent hurricanes and expiring health care programs.

The bill failed 245-171. The fast-track process used to consider the bill requires two-thirds support of members for passage.

House Republicans are expected to bring up the bill again under a rule — which requires only a simple majority for passage — later this week. But Senate Democrats are also uneasy with the extension, and it's unclear whether they would block the bill in the upper chamber.

Speaker Paul Ryan blasted Democrats for their opposition, accusing them of playing politics while federal aviation programs hang in the balance.

"It is a sad day when House Democrats will — in the name of politics — vote against disaster relief and air traffic safety measures," Ryan (R-Wis.) said in a statement Monday afternoon.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a statement that the "sprawling" bill goes far beyond just extending federal aviation programs and includes many provisions that don't have Democratic backing, including language dealing with the federal flood insurance program and tax credits for hurricane victims.

The Democratic leader also cited Republican inaction on the Dream Act — the bipartisan bill that would provide a path to citizenship for some young, undocumented immigrants known as Dreamers — as reason for her opposition.

Ryan said Republicans are committed to addressing Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA), the program that shields Dreamers from deportation, before it ends in March. But, Ryan said, that issue should remain separate from the six-month FAA extension.

"These are two unrelated and bipartisan initiatives with broad support from both sides of the aisle," he said. "It's shameful that politics will trump meaningful relief for families suffering from these devastating hurricanes. House Democrats are willing to shut down air traffic control to make a political point."

Some Republicans who oppose House Transportation Committee Chairman Bill Shuster's separate effort to divorce air traffic control functions from the FAA have said they also oppose the extension. These lawmakers think the Transportation chairman should accept that the Senate has no interest in such an overhaul and don't want the agency to operate in fits and starts under stopgap measures.

Rep. Peter DeFazio (D-Ore.), the top Democrat on the Transportation Committee, called Republicans "a bunch of losers" for continuing to push breaking up the FAA.

"We're here today because the chairman of the committee has stubbornly persisted in trying to privatize air traffic control," DeFazio said, blasting Shuster on the House floor.

Senate Democrats are reviewing the legislation, but, like House Democrats, believe the flood insurance provisions are problematic and noted that the tax breaks included in the FAA bill weren't offered to Hurricane Sandy victims in 2012, according to a senior aide.

Pelosi panned the bill's tax relief provisions for citizens affected by hurricanes Harvey, Irma and Maria for not "treat[ing] all families recovering from natural disasters the same."

The California Democrat also criticized Republicans for not quickly acting on other programs that need reauthorization — such as the children's health insurance program — and reiterated her call for a vote on the Dream Act.

"Instead of acting on these priorities, House Republicans are advancing a sprawling FAA extension package laden with completely unrelated and inadequate items," she said.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, top Transportation Committee Democrat Peter DeFazio of Oregon and other Democrats also signed onto a Dear Colleague letter opposing the bill.

Chamber urges Senate to reject Garrett for Ex-Im, confirm other nominees Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 09/25/2017 02:58 PM EDT

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is joining the chorus of business groups calling on lawmakers to block the confirmation of former Rep. Scott Garrett to head the Export-Import Bank.

In a letter sent today to Senate Banking Committee leaders, U.S. Chamber senior executive vice president Suzanne Clark said the group was "extremely concerned" about reports that the bank's critics might try to derail the confirmations of other appointees to the export agency if Garrett's nomination were rejected.

"Each nominee deserves to stand or fall on his or her own merits," Clark said. "We trust that senators from both parties will reject any attempt to hold qualified nominees who enjoy the support of the majority of the Senate hostage in an attempt to gain leverage for the approval of a nominee who does not enjoy the support of a majority of the Senate."

Business groups have been lobbying to stop Garrett's appointment after he worked to kill the Export-Import Bank while in Congress.

The Chamber strongly supports the nominations of Kimberly Reed, Claudia Slacik, Judith Pryor and Spencer Bachus to serve on the Export-Import Bank's board, Clark said. But Garrett could use his position to prevent the agency from properly functioning, she added.

"As Chairman of the Ex-Im Bank, Mr. Garrett would have extraordinary powers to stop transactions from being voted on by the board, even when they have the support of a majority of Board members," she said. "While the temporary lapse in Ex-Im's charter and the lack of a quorum for the Ex-Im board have hobbled the bank's activities from the outside, confirming an opponent of Ex-Im as its chair would have the same impact regardless of a quorum."

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Banking Committee has not scheduled a vote on the nominees.

Price's private-jet travel breaks precedent Back

By Dan Diamond and Rachana Pradhan | 09/19/2017 10:30 PM EDT

last week took private jets on five separate flights for official business, at a cost of tens of thousands of dollars more than commercial travel.

The secretary's five flights, which were scheduled between Sept. 13 and Sept. 15, took him to a resort in Maine where he participated in a Q&A discussion with a health care industry CEO, and to community health centers in New Hampshire and Pennsylvania, according to internal HHS documents.

The travel by corporate-style jet comes at a time when other members of the Trump administration are under fire for travel expenditures, and breaks with the practices of Obama-era secretaries Sylvia Mathews Burwell and Kathleen Sebelius, who flew commercially while in the continental United States.

Price, a frequent critic of federal spending who has been developing a plan for departmentwide cost savings, declined to comment.

HHS spokespeople declined to confirm details of the flights or respond to questions about who paid for them, with a spokesperson saying only that Price sometimes charters planes when commercial flights aren't feasible. All three organizations that hosted Price last week — the Massachusetts-based health IT firm athenahealth, Goodwin Community Health Center in New Hampshire and the Mirmont Treatment Center in Pennsylvania — told POLITICO they did not pay for his flights or other travel costs.

"As part of the HHS mission to enhance and protect the health and well-being of the American people, Secretary Price travels on occasion outside Washington to meet face to face with the American people to hear their thoughts and concerns firsthand," an HHS spokesperson said, adding, "When commercial aircraft cannot reasonably accommodate travel requirements, charter aircraft can be used for official travel."

Price's spokespeople declined to comment on why he considered commercial travel to be unfeasible. On one leg of the trip — a sprint from Dulles International Airport to Philadelphia International Airport, a distance of 135 miles — there was a commercial flight that departed at roughly the same time: Price's charter left Dulles at 8:27 a.m., and a United Airlines flight departed for Philadelphia at 8:22 a.m., according to airport records.

Sample round-trip fares for the United flight ranged from $447 to $725 per person on United.com, though the price would have been lower if booked in advance or if Price's party received government discounts. Similarly priced commercial flights also left from Reagan National Airport and Baltimore Washington International. By contrast, the cost of chartering the plane was roughly $25,000, according to Ultimate Jet Charters, which owns the Embraer 135LR twin jet that ferried Price and about 10 other people to the clinic event.

In addition, Amtrak ran four trains starting at 7 a.m. that left Washington's Union Station and arrived at Philadelphia's 30th Street Station no later than 9:58 a.m. The least-expensive ticket, on the 7:25 a.m. train, costs $72 when booked in advance. It is just a 125-mile drive from HHS headquarters in downtown Washington to the Mirmont Treatment Center outside of Philadelphia, where Price spoke. Google Maps estimates the drive as about 2½ hours. A one-way trip was estimated by travel planners to be about $30 in gasoline per SUV plus no more than $16 in tolls.

An HHS spokesperson declined to answer questions on how many private charter flights Price has taken since being confirmed as secretary on Feb. 10, but wrote in an emailed response, "Official travel by the secretary is done in complete accordance with Federal Travel Regulations."

Current and former staffers, speaking on the condition of anonymity, say Price has been taking private jets to travel domestically for months.

Ethics experts say the use of private charters by government officials, while legal, is highly dubious and in most cases a misuse of taxpayer funding.

"I can understand why the secretary might have to use a charter flight to get to a hurricane-devastated region, but Philadelphia is not one of those regions this year," said Walter Shaub, who was director of the United States Office of Government Ethics until July. "I find it hard to believe he couldn't find a suitable commercial flight to Philadelphia."

"This wasteful conduct reflects disdain for the ethical principle of treating public service as a public trust," said Shaub, who was appointed by former President Barack Obama. "Public office isn't supposed to come with frivolous perks at taxpayer expense."

Shaub said that the trips violate the "spirit" of the Federal Travel Regulations, citing the express guidance contained in the regulations that "taxpayers should pay no more than necessary for your transportation."

Members of the Trump administration have come under scrutiny for excessive use of government travel resources. The president and his family have rung up travel expenses at a faster rate than previous presidential families. The inspector general of the Environmental Protection Agency recently announced a probe into Administrator Scott Pruitt's frequent travel to his home state of Oklahoma. The Treasury Department's inspector general is looking into Secretary Steve Mnuchin's use of a government jet on a trip to Fort Knox, Kentucky, that involved viewing the solar eclipse. Most recently, ABC News reported that Mnuchin had requested a government plane to take him on his overseas honeymoon. The request was withdrawn on the grounds that it was unnecessary.

Price is an orthopedic surgeon who served in the U.S. House for 12 years representing a district in suburban Atlanta. After President Donald Trump nominated him to be HHS secretary in January, Price came under fire from Democrats and ethics watchdogs for having made stock trades in health-care companies while serving on a House panel overseeing Obamacare and other health issues.

He has also positioned himself as a champion of fiscal efficiency, backing major spending reductions to agencies he oversees and legislation that would cull hundreds of billions of dollars from health entitlement programs. This month, Price had been scheduled to submit a department reform plan to the White House that is expected to propose new spending and staffing cuts. He also backed a nearly $6 billion proposed cut to the National Institutes of Health in March, and an overall 18 percent spending cut to HHS included in Trump's first budget proposal.

"Tough choices had to be made to identify and reduce spending within the department," Price said in a statement to Congress about his budget request. "Our goal is to ... [try] to decrease the areas where there are either duplications, redundancies or waste ... and get a larger return for the investment of the American taxpayer."

Price's travel itinerary last week included five charter flights that charter operators estimated would cost at least $60,000. The itinerary, according to airport records and sources with knowledge of Price's travels, began on Wednesday, Sept. 13 (arrows do not represent actual flight paths):

- Price and staff took a private charter that left Dulles that Wednesday at 2:26 p.m. and arrived in Waterville, Maine, at 3:37 p.m., where he then traveled to the Point Lookout resort and spent the night.
- On Thursday, Sept. 14, Price held a fireside chat with the CEO of athenahealth at the Point Lookout resort. He then took a private jet that departed Waterville, Maine, at 11:41 a.m. and arrived in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, at 12:09 p.m. for a scheduled visit to nearby Goodwin Community Health Center.
- Later on Thursday, Price made an announcement about grants for fighting the opioid epidemic, after which he took a private jet that left Portsmouth at 2:34 p.m. and arrived at Washington Dulles at 3:45 p.m.
- On Sept. 15, Price, accompanied by White House counselor Kellyanne Conway, left Dulles aboard a charter at 8:27 a.m. and touched down at Philadelphia International Airport at 9:01 a.m. for a scheduled visit to Mirmont Treatment Center, a local addiction treatment facility.
- Also on Sept. 15, Price, Conway and other staff departed Philadelphia aboard a charter plane at 12:39 p.m. and touched down at Dulles at 1:19 p.m., where the plane was met on the tarmac by two SUVs and a police escort.

The round trip to the Philadelphia airport, which is about 15 miles from Mirmont Treatment Center, where Price and Conway met with staff and patients — cost about $25,000, an official with the charter agency told POLITICO.

Eddie Moneypenny of Ultimate Jetcharters, who confirmed that his company's 30-seat jet was used for a Dulles-Philadelphia roundtrip last week, said he wasn't aware that the trip was for a government official and the charter had been booked through a third party.

Other charter services confirmed that charter flights between Washington and Philadelphia run tens of thousands of dollars when retaining the same plane.

"I've been doing this for seven years," said Jake Sheeley of EvoJets, another charter service. "I've never seen a flight like this for less than $20,000." Sheeley also estimated that an itinerary modeled on Price's three-flight trip between Washington, Maine and New Hampshire would cost about $40,000.

Several former HHS staffers who had close knowledge of the travel plans of former HHS secretaries Burwell and Sebelius could not recall booking a charter flight for short-haul travel.

Staff for Burwell and Sebelius said booking even a single charter flight was, in the words of one, a "non-starter" within the department. For example, for last year's Obamacare enrollment kick-off, HHS staff had planned a multi-city tour for Burwell to urge Americans to sign up for coverage. The effort, which would have required charter aircraft, was ultimately scrapped because of its estimated $60,000 cost.

"We were worried about the optics and the cost to taxpayers," said one former staffer involved in the planning.

In her more than five years as a Cabinet secretary, Sebelius says she took a charter flight only to get to remote areas in Alaska, which she and staff said were otherwise inaccessible.

"The basic rules that our scheduling team worked under were, you flew commercial and you flew economy," she said in an interview. "That's just what they did."

Tracking Price's travel and meetings has been much more difficult than tracking those of his predecessors. His office only recently began informing reporters of trips ahead of time, and have declined to post most of his remarks and speeches to the HHS website despite his frequent speaking engagements.

Nonetheless, he's spent much of his tenure on the road. POLITICO identified at least 24 separate flights that Price has taken to conduct HHS business in the past four months alone. Those flights don't include Price's weekend trips home to Georgia. An HHS spokesperson said, "Secretary Price pays for personal travel out of his own pocket."

One of those unannounced trips was to last week's conference hosted by athenahealth, the health information company, at the Point Lookout resort in Maine. Price held a wideranging fireside chat with athenahealth CEO Jonathan Bush, the nephew of former President George H.W. Bush and first cousin of former President George W. Bush.

The HHS secretary apparently used his remarks to tweak the government's role as would-be reformers.

"Don't assume the federal government is gonna do the right thing in health care," Price said, according to one account of his talk.

ZINKE JOINS FLIGHT CLUB: Turns out Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has also used military and charter airplanes while in office, including a charter plane he took to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports, citing documents and a department spokeswoman. That makes him at least the fourth member of President Donald Trump's Cabinet to bill the costs of non-commercial flights to U.S. taxpayers while in office. Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the agency selected those options because they couldn't find commercial flights that would work with Zinke's schedule and that ethics officials had given them the all-clear.

Among the most notable trips is a June 26 charter flight Zinke and several staffers took from Las Vegas to an airport about 20 minutes from his residence in Whitefish, Mont., at a cost of $12,375. Commercial flights between Vegas and Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Mont., are available for several hundred dollars, according to travel planning websites. During his time in Vegas, Zinke gave a motivational speech at an event for the city's new NHL team hosted by Bill Foley, chairman of Fidelity National Financial, a company whose employees were among Zinke's largest donors during his two congressional campaigns, according to The Washington Post, which also reports the plane Zinke flew on was owned by oil and gas executives.

Zinke and staff also took two chartered flights on March 31 from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. No other arrangements were available, according to Swift, though websites show commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars.

As for your next question: Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as HHS Secretary Tom Price said he would late Thursday. But Zinke will be at the Heritage Foundation today for what's billed as "a major policy address" entitled "A Vision for American Energy Dominance" and slated to take questions. More information here.

CAN YOU PUT A PRICE ON PRUITT'S NON-COMMERCIAL FLIGHTS? Amid growing criticism from members of both parties on Capitol Hill, EPA said late Thursday that Administrator Scott Pruitt wouldn't pay out of pocket for the $58,000 worth of non-commercial flights he and his staff have taken on four occasions, Pro's Emily Holden reports. "If a reimbursement was necessary, we would have been told during the approval process and acted accordingly," agency spokeswoman Liz Bowman said. EPA's general counsel provided ethics approvals for at least three of the four trips.

Concern from some Republicans: Lisa Murkowski expressed openness to adding language to a spending bill that would prevent Pruitt from taking private flights but hoped it wouldn't come to that, your ME host reports. "I don't think it's appropriate," Murkowski said regarding Pruitt's and Price's use of private aircraft. (We spoke to her before the Zinke news broke.) Meanwhile, Sen. Chuck Grassley asked Trump in a letter Thursday for information on what steps Cabinet secretaries are taking to ensure the "most fiscally responsible travel."

But not everyone was so concerned. EPW Chairman John Barrasso wanted more information before he could judge appropriateness of Pruitt's flights and would only commit to having him testify "this year." Barrasso and Majority Whip John Cornyn were among the Republicans who wouldn't answer the broad question of whether Cabinet officials should take private transportation. And others like Sen. Jim Inhofe defended the flights. "If there is a problem with it, then there would be a rule against it and there isn't one," Inhofe, a friend of Pruitt's, said. "That's why he checked first to make sure there wouldn't be a problem."

Meanwhile, Sen. Tom Udall, top Democrat on the Appropriations subpanel responsible for EPA spending, asked Pruitt in a letter for details on his flying habits and further information on his "privacy booth" that cost taxpayers $25,000. "I do think we can both agree that a fundamental part of any federal agency's 'core mission' must be the proper and responsible stewardship of taxpayer dollars," he wrote. And three House Democrats introduced a bill — the SWAMP FLYERS Act (points for creativity) — barring the U.S. of taxpayer funds on non-commercial travel.

PUERTO RICO STILL REELING: More than a week after Hurricane Maria struck, most of Puerto Rico remains without electricity, phone services and potable water as fuel shortages persist and supplies remain trapped at the port. Trump's Homeland Security Adviser Tom Bossert said the administration was providing "as much federal relief into Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands as we can muster," but the government sent a three-star general, Lt. Gen. Jeff Buchanan to help coordinate the response.

More aid sought now: House Democrats are banging the drums for another relief package now, according to Pro's Budget & Appropriations Brief. "This has to happen soon, not weeks from now, not in late October," Nydia Velazquez said at a press conference. "We need to see action as early as next week." But Speaker Paul Ryan said those aggressive timelines aren't what first-responders on the ground actually need and vowed to act on a disaster request once received from the White House. Meanwhile, 19 House Democrats asked the Natural Resources Committee to hold an oversight hearing on the government's response.

Three tweets from POTUS: "FEMA & First Responders are doing a GREAT job in Puerto Rico. Massive food & water delivered. Docks & electric grid dead. Locals trying.....really hard to help but many have lost their homes. Military is now on site and I will be there Tuesday. Wish press would treat fairly!...Puerto Rico is devastated. Phone system, electric grid many roads, gone. FEMA and First Responders are amazing. Governor said "great job!"

THEY MADE A DEAL! U.S. and Mexican negotiators overcame tensions between the two nations because of Trump's immigration and trade stances to address issues caused by shrinking supplies from the Colorado River, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. "Water is the lifeblood of this region," Jennifer Pitt, Colorado River Project director for the National Audubon Society, said. "It's just too important for the two countries not to have good relations over (it) and not have a plan in place about how to manage supplies reliably for that enormous population." Failing to reach a deal risked years of litigation in a crisis that would force choices between cutting off water supplies to either farms and sensitive wildlife habitats or to major population centers.

COMPANIES TWEAK SOUGHT SOLAR RELIEF: Suniva and SolarWorld USA submitted a joint brief to the International Trade Commission recommending different remedies to imported solar equipment but said that either option could be selected, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Suniva recommends a price floor for all solar modules that starts at 74 cents per watt and declines over the four years of the tariff, as well as tariffs for both modules and the solar cells. SolarWorld said it was seeking a quota of 220 MW on imported cells and 5,700 MW on imported modules. Trump has the final call on what to select.

Group: Use caution: The Advanced Energy Buyers Group released a letter Thursday asking the ITC not to set "excessive remedies" on imported solar products as it considers a response to the initial ruling last week that imports harmed U.S. manufacturers of solar panels. "We recommend a balanced approach with respect to remedies that avoids unduly increasing the cost of solar energy," they wrote. "This case has already had a damaging effect on solar projects, raising costs as solar providers prepare for shortages."

FAMED WOTUS JUDGE GETS A PROMOTION: The Senate confirmed Judge Ralph Erickson, 95-1, Thursday to a seat on 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren was the lone vote against. Among energy watchers, Erickson gained national attention when he issued a nationwide stay on the Obama-era Waters of the U.S. regulation back in 2015.

A LITTLE HELP FROM MY FRIENDS: Zinke's loaded up his advisory board on staffing and personnel issues with just political appointees, including several former industry lobbyists, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The move contradicts federal guidelines that recommend giving career employees an equal voice in such discussions with the Executive Resources Board.

EPA CONFIRMS DAMAGE TO HOUSTON-AREA SUPERFUND SITE: After confirming the protective cap on the San Jacinto River Waste Pits Superfund site sustained damage during Superfund Harvey, EPA directed International Paper and Industrial Maintenance Corporation, the potentially responsible parties at the site, to take "immediate action" to repair the damage. Sampling from one of the areas showed dioxins present at 70,000 nanograms per kilogram, far above the recommended clean up levels of 30 ng/kg.

EPW DEMOCRATS WANT SUPERFUND ANSWERS: All the EPW Democrats sent a letter to Pruitt Thursday asking him to affirm his agency would continue to reimburse Superfund litigation costs assumed by the DOJ Environment and Natural Resources Division, after the New York Times reported those payments may be on the chopping block. "If these cuts are adopted, neither EPA nor State regulators will be able to adequately fund site clean-ups or enforce clean-up agreements, and DOJ will be unable to prosecute polluters in order to compel clean-ups to be paid for by those who caused the contamination in the first place," they wrote.

FLOOD INSURANCE-LESS FAA BILL CLEARS CONGRESS: Senators stripped out controversial private flood insurance language and the House then approved a stopgap FAA measure H.R. 3823 \(115\) on Thursday, Pro Transportation's Lauren Gardner reports. A bipartisan group of senators objected to language in the original package encouraging private insurance companies to enter the flood arena. "We can't have a situation happen where people can't sell or buy property because you can't get a mortgage unless you get flood insurance, and you can't get flood insurance because there's none available that's cost-effective," Sen. Marco Rubio said.

MAIL CALL! BISHOP SEEKS REVIEW OF MINERAL WITHDRAWALS: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop sent a letter to Zinke and USDA Secretary Sonny Perdue asking for them to review mineral withdrawals done over the past eight years of the Obama administration. "Millions of acres of federal lands were inappropriately withdrawn from mineral access due to false premises of environmental protectionism and the intentional misuse of statutory authority," he wrote.

PELOSI CRITICIZES TIMING OF BILL WITH GUN MEASURE: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi criticized the House GOP for pushing a sportsmen's package with a provision that relaxes rules on purchasing gun silencers — expected to come up for a vote shortly — so soon after welcoming back House Majority Whip Steve Scalise, POLITICO's Heather Caygle reports. "This is not a sportsmen's package. This is an NRA wish list," a spokesman for Pelosi said. No date for a vote has yet been announced.

PERRY'S IN OHIO: He had to cancel a planned July trip to DOE's Portsmouth Gaseous Diffusion plant due to a Cabinet meeting, but Energy Secretary Rick Perry will be in Piketon, Ohio today to tour the Cold War nuclear site that has been undergoing decommissioning since 2011. Joining Perry are Ohio Sens. Rob Portman and Sherrod Brown as well as Reps. Bill Johnson and Brad Wenstrup.

NO FLY ZONE: The FAA and Interior announced Thursday they had restricted the operation of drones within 400 feet of the boundaries of ten Interior sites, including the Folsom, Glen Canyon, Grand Coulee, Hoover and Shasta dams. The restrictions, which also include the Statue of Liberty and Mount Rushmore, take effect Oct. 5. More information here.

N.Y. POL PICKED FOR EPA REGION 2: Pruitt announced Thursday his selection of New York assemblyman Pete Lopez to run EPA's Region 2 office, which covers New York, New Jersey, Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Lopez, a Republican, has been in the state assembly since 2007 and currently represents a district southwest of Albany.

PEER BLASTS ZINKE'S STAFF LOYALTY COMMENTS: Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility is slated today to send a letter to its subscribers blasting Zinke for earlier this week questioning the loyalty of staff and not following through on his promise to give the front-line staff more say over decisions. "Public employees work for the public, not for politicians," PEER will say. The very idea of a civil service "was to replace a spoils system where employment was based on political allegiance."

NOT MINCING WORDS: Former FWS biologist Felix Smith, who in the 1980s blew the whistle on the mass poisoning of migratory birds in California's Kesterson National Wildlife Refuge, sent an angry email to Zinke Wednesday blaming him for any pushback he is getting from staff. "You and President Trump have chilled or killed the moral of a large portion of the rank and file of DOI. ## Stories from POLITICO Pro

Interior Secretary Zinke traveled on charter, military planes Back

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and his aides have taken several flights on private or military aircraft, including a $12,000 charter plane to take him to events in his hometown in Montana and private flights between two Caribbean islands, according to documents and a department spokeswoman.

Zinke is at least the fourth senior member of the Trump administration to have used non-commercial planes at taxpayer expense, along with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and HHS Secretary Tom Price. President Donald Trump has fumed at Price's pricey travel, and Democrats say the revelations demonstrate a cavalier attitude by Cabinet members toward excessive spending.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said Zinke's charter or military plane trips were booked only after officials were unable to find commercial flights that would accommodate Zinke's schedule, and that all were "pre-cleared by career officials in the ethics office." Swift said she had not spoken to Zinke about whether he would reimburse the government for the cost of the flights, as Price plans to do for some of the $400,000 tab he racked up on charter flights.

On June 26, a Beechcraft King Air 200 carried Zinke and several staffers from Las Vegas to Glacier Park International Airport in Kalispell, Mont., about a 20-minute drive from Zinke's home in Whitefish, according to his official schedule. The flight cost $12,375, Swift said.

Zinke left after speaking at an event for the city's new professional hockey team, the "Vegas Golden Knights Development Camp Dinner," according to his schedule. Earlier in the day, he had been in Pahrump, Nev., for an announcement related to public lands.

Zinke's flight left Las Vegas at 8:30 p.m. PST and landed around 1:30 a.m. MST in Kalispell. The secretary stayed overnight at his residence, Interior documents show.

Las Vegas is one of the main connecting airports for commercial flights to Glacier International. Commercial flights between the two cities are available for several hundred dollars a ticket, according to travel planning websites.

In Whitefish, Zinke attended the Western Governors' Association's annual meeting, where he spoke for about 20 minutes without taking questions. He then had a private lunch with association members. In the afternoon Zinke was the subject of a photo shoot with GQ magazine at Lake McDonald and fished while being interviewed by Outside Magazine, the records show.

Zinke and staffers flew commercial back to Washington, D.C., the next day, according to the records.

The trip was not the first in which Interior booked a private jet for Zinke. On March 31, Interior chartered two flights to take Zinke and staff from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands to attend the centennial of the Danish government turning the islands over to the United States. Another two flights were chartered to return to St. Croix later that night.

Swift said she did not know how much the flights cost but that no other arrangements were available.

Commercial flights between the two islands generally run a few hundred dollars, according to travel booking websites.

In May, Zinke and his wife, Lolita, used a military aircraft to travel to Norway. From there, they flew on a military plane to Alaska for events organized by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The trip included charter planes to travel within Alaska, a common occurrence in the large, remote state. The Zinkes paid for Lolita's share of the trip, the full cost of which was not immediately available, Swift said.

Zinke also took a military helicopter from Fort Bliss to review the Organ Mountains monument in New Mexico in June, and he used a Bureau of Land Management helicopter to review the Basin and Range National Monument on July 30. "It is difficult to survey a half-million-acre piece of land with few roads by foot or car in an hour and a half," Swift said.

Along with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke took a military plane to Ravalli County, Mont., to check on wildfires in the area in August. "The military plane was used because of a very tight travel window, with no viable commercial airline options to transport two secretaries, security details, and associated USDA, Forest Service and Interior staff to Missoula in the time required," said USDA spokesman Tim Murtaugh. The cost of the flight was not immediately available, but the two agencies plan to reimburse the Air Force, Murtaugh said.

Price says he'll repay taxpayers for his private jet travel Back

By Rachana Pradhan | 09/28/2017 04:23 PM EDT

Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price said he will write a personal check to the federal government for his costs of traveling on private jets and will permanently halt his use of charter flights.

"The taxpayers won't pay a dime for my seat on those planes," Price said in a statement Thursday afternoon.

The announcement follows a POLITICO investigation that found Price has taken at least 26 charter flights costing taxpayers more than $400,000 since May to conduct official business within the country. Price's travel, which was first reported over a week ago, has increasingly come under fire from President Donald Trump and former colleagues in Congress.

HHS confirmed to several media outlets that Price will write a check to the U.S. Treasury worth $51,887.31 — just a fraction of the total travel costs. The department did not confirm those details to POLITICO, which broke the story of his chartered flights. HHS did not address the costs of the staff and security officials who accompanied Price on those flights.

Price, whose use of private jets is being investigated by the HHS inspector general and Congress, said he will no longer charter flights for official business. "No exceptions," he said.

President Donald Trump on Wednesday wouldn't commit to keeping Price in his administration, saying only "we'll see" when asked whether Price would be fired. Trump has privately fumed over Price's use of expensive charter jets, and some aides have called for firing Price. Hours before Price's announcement, the White House on Thursday said it had ordered HHS to halt all private flights.

"As the president said yesterday, he's not thrilled — certainly not happy with the actions," White House press Secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said.

Many of Price's flights were between major cities that offered inexpensive alternatives on commercial airlines, including Nashville, Philadelphia and San Diego. On some of those trips, Price mixed official business with personal affairs.

Price's statement came after increasing scrutiny from the Hill. The House Oversight Committee on Wednesday launched a bipartisan investigation into the use of private planes by all Cabinet secretaries. Sen. Chuck Grassley on Thursday sent a letter asking the White House to rein in officials' travel costs.

Price's decision to reimburse just the costs of just his airfare is unlikely to satisfy Democratic lawmakers, who've ripped him for lavishly spending taxpayer dollars while advocating for major cuts to health insurance programs covering low-income Americans.

"Until @SecPriceMD has paid back the full amount of his private jet flights he is still ripping off taxpayers," tweeted Sen. Ron Wyden, the top Democrat on the Finance Committee.

Price, who appeared at a White House event on opioid abuse with First Lady Melania Trump on Thursday, gave no indication that he planned to step down amid the outcry over his private travel. Earlier in the day, Price told reporters he believed the president still supported him, but he later refused to say whether he was worried about losing his job.

"I work at the pleasure of the president," Price said on Fox News, adding that he hopes to "regain the trust" of the American people and those working in the administration. Price said he's complying with the inspector general's review and contended that all his trips passed legal review.

Other Cabinet officials' travel has also come under recent scrutiny. Department auditors are reviewing private and military flights taken Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin and EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt

Price, who represented Georgia for more than a decade in the House, has a longstanding reputation as a fiscal hawk and a staunch opponent of Obamacare. As a former chair of the House Budget Committee, he proposed federal spending plans that would have repealed the 2010 health law and culled hundreds of billions from health care entitlement programs. During his time as secretary, Price backed the White House's proposal to cut $6 billion from the National Institutes of Health and slash overall HHS spending by 18 percent. Congress has opposed those cuts.

On Thursday, Price said he regretted the concerns that his travel practices has raised.

"All of my political career I've fought for the taxpayers," Price said. "It is clear to me that in this case, I was not sensitive enough to my concern for the taxpayer."

Pruitt won't cover costs for private flights Back

By Emily Holden | 09/28/2017 06:48 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt doesn't plan to pay out of pocket for the $58,000 worth of non-commercial flights he and his staff have taken on four occasions, according to an agency spokeswoman.

Pruitt has taken three private government flights and one chartered plane. EPA has said those flights represented the only travel options for reaching scheduled events in time, including taking an Air Force plane to New York at a cost of $36,068.50 to travel to events ahead of an international energy ministers' meeting in Italy. The agency received ethics approvals from EPA's acting general counsel for three of the four trips.

"If a reimbursement was necessary, we would have been told during the approval process and acted accordingly," agency spokeswoman Liz Bowman said.

HHS Secretary Tom Price today said he would write a personal check to the federal government to cover the cost of his seat on private jet flights that cost more than $400,000 since May.

Senate Republicans offer mixed reviews on Pruitt's pricey plane trips Back

By Anthony Adragna | 09/28/2017 05:14 PM EDT

Senate Republicans were split Thursday over whether to condemn, defend or sidestep questions about EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's expensive use of charter and military planes.

Lisa Murkowski, who oversees the Appropriations subpanel responsible for EPA funding, said she was open to adding language to a spending bill that would prevent Pruitt from taking private flights, after reports this week revealed EPA spent more than $58,000 for charter flights on private or government-owned planes. But the Alaska Republican said she hopes it doesn't come to that.

"I don't think it's appropriate," Murkowski said regarding Pruitt's and HHS Secretary Tom Price's use of private aircraft. "That is clearly something that the executive reins in. You tell your people, 'Look, there's no charter flights.' You set the standard. You set what is acceptable. And I think that should be done."

Pruitt used non-commercial flights during trips to Oklahoma, North Dakota and Colorado, as well as to ensure he made a connecting flight to an energy ministers meeting in Italy. The agency's general counsel signed off on the trips, though their high cost has drawn criticism as the Trump administration seeks to slash the agency's budget by one-third.

But not everyone was ready to criticize the trips.

Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.), the former Environment and Public Works chairman and a friend of Pruitt, defended the administrator's flights.

"If there is a problem with it, then there would be a rule against it and there isn't one," Inhofe told POLITICO in an interview. "That's why he checked first to make sure there wouldn't be a problem."

Current EPW Chairman John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) said he was "going to wait and see what comes out" before weighing in on the appropriateness of Pruitt's flights. He did not commit to holding a hearing on the issue, saying only that Pruitt would testify before the committee sometime this year.

Asked if it was generally appropriate for Cabinet officials to take private aircraft, or if he would have similarly held off criticism if it were an Obama administration official involved, Barrasso said, "I want to see what the information is." He added, "With Cabinet members, sometimes it's the only way to get from place to place."

Other Republicans declined to answer the broad question of whether Cabinet officials should take private transportation or said they were unaware of the details of Price and Pruitt's travel. "Good to talk with all of you," Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) told reporters when asked if Cabinet officials should fly in private jets.

Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), meanwhile, said he has more questions about Pruitt's and Price's plane tabs. Grassley sent a letter to President Donald Trump requesting information on what steps Cabinet secretaries are taking to ensure the "most fiscally responsible travel."

Democrats demanded a full accounting of the trips and wanted to know if Trump officials are getting different treatment than Obama Cabinet members.

"I wonder why Scott Pruitt is different from [former EPA Administrator] Gina McCarthy in terms of his needs," Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) said. "Whatever they need [in terms of security], I think we ought to give it to them, but they shouldn't get anything more than they need."

Tom Carper (D-Del.), top Democrat on EPW, called for Pruitt to testify in the near future.

"This is one of those situations where the best disinfectant is sunshine," Carper said.

House Democrats want White House briefing on Puerto Rico Back

By Heather Caygle | 09/28/2017 02:02 PM EDT

House Democrats want top Trump administration officials to brief the caucus as soon as possible on what lawmakers say has been the White House's anemic response to the devastation in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.) on Thursday invited White House Chief of Staff John Kelly and acting Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke to come speak to the caucus, according to a letter obtained by POLITICO.

"We are deeply concerned by the unfolding humanitarian crisis in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands as a result of the recent devastating hurricanes, and what has seemed to be an inadequate response by the federal government to date," wrote Crowley and several other Democrats with close ties to Puerto Rico.

"Natural disasters know no political bounds and have no party affiliations. That is why a meeting between the both of you and the House Democratic Caucus is needed," they added.

Democrats also say they're concerned by reports that the White House might not send Congress a formal request for disaster aid until several weeks from now, something lawmakers say is unacceptable given the state of the two U.S. territories.

Puerto Rico remains without power and many of its 3.5 million U.S. citizens have limited access to basic human necessities including food and clean water. The U.S. Virgin Islands and its more than 100,000 inhabitants were also devastated by the storm.

Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle have chided the Trump administration for what they say is an indefensibly slow response to help the territories after they were devastated by Hurricanes Irma and Maria.

The White House said Thursday it would temporarily grant Puerto Rico a reprieve from the Jones Act, a decades-old law that blocks non-U.S. ships from transporting goods to the island.

The Trump administration denied a similar request two days ago, with the president telling reporters Wednesday that the shipping industry had objected to granting the waiver.

But some Democrats criticized the move saying the waiver — which will last for 10 days — doesn't provide nearly enough time for supplies to get to the island to start the rebuilding process. DHS has said the waiver can be extended if necessary.

Democrats, in the letter, inviting Kelly and Duke, say the administration should also be sending telecommunication supplies to Puerto Rico to restore phone service and refrigeration units for food and medicine.

"We also cannot forget that residents of Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands are citizens of the United States, and they are deserving of our federal government's full attention and resources," the lawmakers wrote.

Other members who signed the letter include House Democratic Caucus Vice Chair Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.), Reps. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.), José Serrano (D-N.Y.), Luis Gutiérrez (D-Ill.), Darren Soto (D-Fla.) and U.S. Virgin Island Delegate Stacey Plaskett.

U.S., Mexico set aside Trump tensions for Colorado River deal Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/29/2017 05:02 AM EDT

The water-sharing pact signed this week by the U.S. and Mexico emerged despite tensions caused by President Donald Trump's policies on immigration and trade, showing the negotiators' willingness to take on problems caused by shrinking supplies from the Colorado River, according to western water experts.

That deal signed Wednesday was supported by state water agencies and major users in both countries, and sets out procedures to reduce off-take during times of drought that are expected to persist for the foreseeable future.

"Water is the lifeblood of this region," Jennifer Pitt, Colorado River Project director for the National Audubon Society, said in an interview. "It is fundamentally important to the economies of southwestern U.S. and northwestern Mexico. ... It's just too important for the two countries not to have good relations over [it] and not have a plan in place about how to manage supplies reliably for that enormous population."

Representatives from the International Boundary and Water Commission of the United States and Mexico signed the pact, called Minute 323, that largely carries forward for another nine years a prior agreement that was due to expire this year. Water levels at the Colorado River's most important reservoir, Lake Mead, have been plummeting, and both the U.S. and Mexico could have faced the threat of mandatory supply cuts starting as early as next year.

The river supplies drinking water to tens of millions of people in both countries and irrigation for millions of acres of agriculture, both of which would suffer unless the countries reached a deal.

Federal officials failed to sign a deal before the end of the Obama administration, raising fears that Trump's calls to build a wall along the Mexican border and the reopening of NAFTA would undo years of progress in the negotiations. But the officials, supported by state water agencies and Mexico water license holders, knew they had to reach a deal or risk years of litigation in a crisis that would force them to choose between cutting off water supplies to farms and sensitive wildlife habitats or to major population centers.

"In a crisis, you would have winners and losers, and some of the biggest losers would be agriculture and the environment," said Ted Kowalski, director of the Colorado River initiative at the Walton Family Foundation. "I think it's highly unlikely the Bureau of Reclamation is going to turn off the city of Las Vegas or the city of Phoenix."

So the officials continued plodding away at negotiations, hoping the Trump administration would in the end agree to a deal.

The water agency officials were "largely insulated from the political conversation between Washington, D.C., and Mexico," said Chuck Cullom, Colorado River programs manager for the Central Arizona Project. The water managers "focused on providing the greatest benefits for the country and the communities ... rather than the political winds that might be blowing in a number of directions," he said in an interview.

The basin states made reaching a deal a top priority this year, according to Pitt.

"There's a long-standing balance of power between the states and the federal government on the Colorado River where the federal government tries to as much as possible defer to the states, who are really the owners of the water. So as the states made it clear to the incoming administration this was a priority, the administration said, 'We will support you on this,'" she said.

A key sticking point in the negotiations had been Mexico's insistence that the lower basin states of California, Arizona and Nevada first agree to a drought contingency plan under which they would voluntarily conserve additional water beyond mandatory cuts in order to increase reservoir levels.

Mexico officials were worried they would be left holding the bag if a water crisis occurred before the states reached a deal. But Mexico eventually agreed to make additional cuts once the states pass a contingency plan.

Mexico is very dependent on the upstream dams in the U.S. for its water delivery, since a 2010 earthquake damaged its dams. But Mexico also took the position that the original 1944 treaty between the countries only required it to cut supplies if the U.S. suffered extreme drought, a vague term that left too much open to interpretation.

"That was a big concession for Mexico to follow our lead," said Tom Buschatzke, director of the Arizona Department of Water Resources. But the U.S. also agreed to fund $31.5 million in water efficiency projects in Mexico through 2026 and to explore the possibility of investing in a desalinization plant that could help address future water supply challenges.

What made the deal possible is "the hard work that long preceded Trump," said Stephen Mumme, a political science professor at Colorado State University. "This is a classic example of ... a situation where not doing it could be really costly, and the sheer complexity of the number of players and the importance of the U.S. stake in this policy arena really overrode the Trump administration," he said.

"It's a good example in my mind of the limits of rhetorical breast beating and name calling and wall building."

Suniva, SolarWorld modify remedy proposal in trade case Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/28/2017 07:20 PM EDT

Suniva and SolarWorld USA are pressing a U.S. trade panel to recommend that President Donald Trump institute either a floor price for imported solar equipment or tariffs plus a quota that caps the amount of solar panels and cells that can enter the country.

The two solar panel manufacturers filed a joint brief to the U.S. International Trade Commission, and each recommended different remedies, though they said that either option could be selected.

Suniva recommends a price floor for all solar modules that starts at 74 cents per watt and declines over the four years of the tariff, as well as tariffs for both modules and the solar cells. SolarWorld said it was seeking a quota of 220 MW on imported cells and 5,700 MW on imported modules.

"Both co-petitioners agree that an effective remedy must include either the co-petitioners' requested tariff plus Suniva's requested module floor price or the co-petitioners' requested tariff plus SolarWorld's requested quota," the companies said in a joint statement.

Briefs were due on Wednesday to the ITC, and the companies publicly released their proposals to today, excluding proprietary company information.

The ITC voted unanimously last week that low-cost imports had harmed the domestic solar manufacturing industry. Under the "safeguard" provisions of the Trade Act, Trump will have the final say in what tariffs to impose.

WHAT'S NEXT: The commission will have a hearing on remedies on Oct. 3.

Zinke stacks staffing board with political aides, former lobbyists Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/28/2017 03:41 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has assigned only political appointees, including several former industry lobbyists, as members of an advisory board on staffing and personnel issues, a move critics say sidelines members of the government workforce who are supposed to get a seat at the table.

The makeup of the Executive Resources Board contradicts federal guidelines that recommend giving career employees an equal voice in such discussions, and it is fueling criticism Zinke is crowding out independent experts and giving too much voice to the industries his department oversees.

The nine-member board is being led by Deputy Secretary of the Interior David Bernhardt, a former lobbyist whose clients included oil and gas interests; Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason, who worked energy issues for Kelly, Anderson & Associates, Inc.; and White House liaison Lori Mashburn, among other political staff with history of lobbying for the oil and gas industry.

Zinke established the board to "oversee all aspects of the management of executive resources," including senior managers, scientists and policy staff at the department, according to an Aug. 11 memo.

"This is very much of a pattern," said Chris Saeger, executive director of the Western Values Project, which obtained the memo through a Freedom of Information Act request and shared it with POLITICO. "They have made a practice of shuffling career staff, marginalizing them. They're sending a very clear message, that they want to consolidate power with people who are loyal to Zinke and President. "

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift did not answer questions about why Zinke included only political appointees as members of the ERB. She did point out that two career employees, acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for Human Capital and Diversity Mary Pletcher and Deputy Solicitor for General Law Ed Keable, will serve as advisers to the board.

Zinke came under fire earlier this week when he questioned the loyalty of many Interior staffers, and he has previously raised eyebrows for shuffling senior employees into jobs they did not seem suited for, in one instance reassigning a manager overseeing climate change issues to a job collecting oil and gas royalties. Interior's inspector general has launched an investigation into the staff moves.

The secretary's decision does not comport with recommendations from the Office of Personnel Management, which has suggested that such boards consist of a mix of career staff, senior executive staff and political staff.

"It is not advisable to have an ERB that is exclusively or predominantly career executives, nor is it recommended to have an ERB that is exclusively or predominantly political appointees; both perspectives should be well represented to ensure a balanced view, when possible," OPM said in a 2009 report.

House clears FAA stopgap, avoiding shutdown Back

By Lauren Gardner | 09/28/2017 04:24 PM EDT

Congress Thursday voted to extend the FAA's tax authority for six months after senators jettisoned private flood insurance language that had threatened the bill's chances, with just days before portions of the FAA's authorities were set to lapse.

After wrangling between the House and Senate over the flood insurance language, Congress wrapped the measure, H.R. 3823 \(115\), up two days before the FAA's authority to collect and spend excise taxes was set to expire.

Allowing that authority to lapse would have led to a partial shutdown of the FAA, affecting the agency's airport funding, equipment and research and development functions and leading to the furlough of thousands of employees. (Air traffic control and safety operations would have continued, albeit without pay for the employees.)

The House was forced to act a third time on the measure after a bipartisan group of senators objected to the original package's language encouraging private insurance companies to enter the flood arena.

While some of those members support changes to the National Flood Insurance Program, they've argued that any effort to promote a private market should be considered as part of broader legislation that addresses the existing federal program.

"We can't have a situation happen where people can't sell or buy property because you can't get a mortgage unless you get flood insurance, and you can't get flood insurance because there's none available that's cost-effective," Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) said.

Thursday wasn't the first time this week the House had to take a mulligan on the extension bill.

GOP leaders put the legislation, which also includes tax relief provisions for victims of recent hurricanes and extensions for certain health care programs, on the suspension calendar Monday, meaning they needed two-thirds of lawmakers present to vote in favor of the bill for it to pass. But Democrats revolted, and the vote came up short.

House leaders then tweaked the bill to broaden eligibility for tax breaks to U.S. citizens in Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands — addressing a criticism lobbed by Democrats — and prepared it for a quick floor debate where only a simple majority was needed for passage; it succeeded.

But senators who are active on NFIP policy began agitating against the House bill, with Senate Commerce Chairman John Thune conceding Thursday evening that his colleagues would likely change the bill and kick it back to the House.

House leaders had left themselves some breathing room for such a scenario through the way the rule governing debate on their bill was crafted. But it wasn't clear whether the Senate would try to jam the House until Thursday afternoon, when leadership surveyed lawmakers on whether they would object to an FAA extension that dropped the flood insurance language.

While this week's drama over the FAA extension was tied to policy outside the aviation space, House Transportation Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.) is still gunning for a massive overhaul of the FAA's air traffic control operations.

His broader bill, H.R. 2997 \(115\), which would strip those functions from the agency and put them under the control of a nonprofit corporation, could get a floor vote next month, provided he rounds up enough support.

Pruitt taps New York lawmaker for EPA Region 2 job Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/28/2017 11:27 AM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has picked New York Assembly member Pete Lopez to run EPA's Region 2 office, which covers New York and New Jersey — as well as the hurricane-devastated Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands.

Both territories suffered significant damage to their electric and water systems, with an estimated 42 percent of Puerto Ricans without access to potable water, according to the FEMA.

Lopez, a Republican, has been in the state assembly since 2007 and currently represents a district southwest of Albany. He ran to replace Rep. Chris Collins (R-N.Y.) but dropped out of the race early last year.

"His familiarity with the region and his experience working to solve environmental problems in New York will be invaluable in helping EPA serve Americans in the Northeast and the Caribbean," Pruitt said in a statement.

Judith Enck, the Obama administration's previous Region 2 chief, told the Times Union that Lopez "cares about the environment" and is "is as good as it's going to get in this administration."

ANOTHER TAX BILL WARNING OVER ANWR? Even as Senate Republicans scrambled Thursday evening to rewrite their tax package H.R. 1 \(115\), a small bloc of House Republicans objected to including ANWR drilling in the package — adding a new potential complication for the bill's passage once the chambers head to conference. A dozen House Republicans, six of whom voted for their chamber's bill previously, sent a letter to their party's leaders raising "concerns with any proposal that would implement an oil and gas leasing program" in ANWR though they stopped short of threatening to pull their support for the bill if it was not removed, Pro's Nick Juliano reports.

GOP Reps. Dave Reichert, Brian Fitzpatrick, Carlos Curbelo, Ryan Costello, Pat Meehan and Mark Sanford all backed the tax package on the floor, but are now expressing unease with the ANWR provision, along with six colleagues who opposed the initial bill over issues such as the state and local tax deduction. Remember Speaker Paul Ryan can only afford 10 additional defections from the original November vote tally for the final package to pass, meaning the small bloc holds some juice in the negotiations.

Other former Republican leaders oppose: A group of seven former Republican officials, including the first EPA Administrator William Ruckelshaus and former Interior Deputy Secretary Lynn Scarlett, sent their own letter to congressional leaders warning there's "simply no need to reverse protections" for ANWR and that fiscal projections for revenue are "highly speculative." They added that tacking the provision into the package would "complicate passage of important and vitally needed tax reform."

ICYMI, Senate Republicans tweaked drilling language in their bill to propose selling more oil from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. What's interesting is the lack of criticism from Republicans who previously been outspoken against such efforts. (EPW Chairman John Barrasso said in 2012 tapping the SPR is "for emergencies — not political disasters.") Sen. Bill Cassidy summed up the party's thinking to ME: "I'm okay with that, because obviously the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is about energy security, and if ANWR is developed that is far more important to energy security than two days of SPR."

MURRAY LABELS OIL GIANTS 'ENEMIES' OF FOSSIL FUELS: Three of the major oil and gas corporations are "enemies" of fossil fuels because of their past advocacy for climate action, including a carbon tax, coal executive Robert Murray said Thursday at a conference hosted by the Heritage Foundation and the Texas Public Policy Foundation. Prompted by comments from TPPF's Brooke Rollins calling their carbon tax advocacy "so disingenuous," Murray declared BP, Shell and Exxon Mobil "our enemies," citing politics and shareholders. "They're not doing our grandchildren justice, those three companies. The other oil and gas companies, they realize that once our enemies get rid of coal, they're next," Murray said. "But those three companies are all about politics and shareholders and I don't buy those products." Oil and gas executive Bud Brigham agreed: "It's cronyism that they chose to have a seat at the table with the government and collusion with special interests a la Elon Musk, etc. It's very disappointing."

Murray math: The coal magnate dropped some eyebrow-raising stats during his appearance, including that he has met with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt a whopping seven times so far this year. Murray also said he has received 71 death threats, "some serious," although he did not specify over what period those were received.

MORE THAN A LITTLE SHAVE: During his swing to Utah next Monday, President Donald Trump is expected to cut the 1.353-million-acre Bears Ears National Monument down to about 201,400 acres and break it into two new monuments called Indian Creek National Monument and Shash Jaa National Monument, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports, citing proclamations. He'll also divide the existing Grand Staircase-Escalante monument into three parts — Grand Staircase National Monument, Kaiparowits National Monument and the Escalante Canyons National Monument. The action is certain to set off a fierce legal battle almost immediately.

House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop welcomed the move and pledged to attend the ceremony. "The president has stood against prior abuses of executive power and his administration has demonstrated a commitment to work in concert with local communities to protect unique public antiquities and objects the right way," he said in a statement. But Sen. Tom Udall, joined by Native American and environmental groups, will discuss what they're calling an "illegal abuse of power" during an 11 a.m. telephone press conference today.

ZINKE HEADS TO LOUISIANA: This Saturday Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke heads to Louisiana for events on coastal restoration and the state's plan for addressing it along with Sen. John Neely Kennedy, Cassidy and Rep. Garret Graves. They'll participate in events in Baton Rouge, Thibodaux, and Ama, La.

But faces ads in Washington: The Western Values Project is out with a six-figure ad this morning on Fox News and up digitally in Utah urging Trump to reject Zinke's recommendations on national monuments. "One Cabinet member in Washington has become one embarrassment after another for President Trump," it starts. The final line: "Don't let this wannabe cowboy embarrass you once again."

LAST CALL! Today's your last chance to weigh in Interior's vows to redo sage grouse conservation plans. Advocates, including the Audubon Society and the National Wildlife Federation, say they've submitted at least 163,000 already in support of the existing plans. And a group of fish, wildlife and natural resources professionals urged Interior to ensure any changes made to sage grouse management plans are backed up by appropriate science.

PRUITT PROMISES FINAL WOTUS BY MID-2018: Pruitt is due to make remarks to farmers and biofuels groups today in Nevada, Iowa, today fresh off his agency's biofuels decision on Thursday and a swing through Kentucky. During a speech to the Kentucky Farm Bureau Thursday, Pruitt promised a final replacement to the Waters of the U.S. regulation by mid-2018 that he said would focus on "navigability," according to video posted by WHAS. He also met with Kentucky Gov. Matt Bevin.

On his relationship with Trump: "It is a blessing to serve him and my desire each and every day is to bless him as he makes decisions."

GREENS DEMAND DOURSON DOCS: American Oversight and the Environmental Working Group are beginning a joint investigation this morning into EPA chemicals office nominee Michael Dourson's early work at the agency prior to his Senate confirmation. They're sending out six FOIA requests seeking copies of his communication with senior political staff; ethics and recusal documentation; calendar and telephone logs; records of political appointees discussions about Dourson; contacts with outside groups like Koch Industries and DuPont; and interactions with anyone helping Dourson on his confirmation. "Michael Dourson has been at the EPA for more than a month, and if he's been using his position to help his old clients in the chemical industry, the public needs to know before the Senate votes on his confirmation," Austin Evers, executive director of American Oversight, said. Reminder: Dourson appears to be short the votes needed for Senate confirmation.

FROM FARM TO CAR: EPA issued its rule Thursday making official the Renewable Fuel Standard requirements for 2018 and 2019. Cellulosic ethanol got a 50 million gallon increase because, EPA said in the rule, the agency received updated data that suggested greater production capacity. The requirement is still lower than it was this year.

Biodiesel doesn't lose: Biodiesel producers wished for a larger target, but EPA also abandoned its October threat to make deep cuts. EPA had said that it was concerned about import tariffs, feedstock problems, and the expiration of a biodiesel tax credit crimping supply, and so it wanted to make big reductions. The agency is still concerned about those forces, but, it said, "We find it unnecessary to resolve whether to adopt such interpretations at this point in time because under any approach we would find exercise of these waiver authorities not appropriate based on the record before us."

QUICK SENATE ACTION ON BROWNFIELDS EYED: The House passed legislation H.R. 3017 \(115\) reauthorizing EPA's Brownfields program Thursday afternoon and Sen. Jim Inhofe said he thought it could pass by unanimous consent in the Senate in the near future. "There's no one opposed to it that I know of," he told reporters. The bill cleared the House by an overwhelming 409-8 tally with eight Republicans voting no.

CRITICISM OF PUERTO RICO CONTRACTS: Two former Obama administration officials are out with an op-ed this morning in POLITICO urging the Trump administration to stop its practice of awarding massive reconstruction contracts in Puerto Rico to single companies, such as Whitefish Energy. And that comes as the top Homeland Security Democrat Claire McCaskill sent a letter to FEMA asking questions about why it awarded $30 million in contracts to a newly-formed Florida company that was unable in the end to complete the work on the hurricane-ravaged island.

WEST VIRGINIA'S SENATORS ON BLANKENSHIP BID: Even as convicted coal baron Don Blankenship released his first ad in his Senate bid, his possible opponent Sen. Joe Manchin didn't seem perturbed by his entry "I'd just say, 'jump in, the water's fine," he told ME. Republican Sen. Shelley Moore Capito told ME she expected a lively primary campaign and added: "I was surprised and I said, 'It's a free country.'"

MAIL CALL! DO YOU REMEMBER? Top House Energy and Commerce Democrat Frank Pallone sent a letter to Chairman Greg Walden demanding oversight hearings and investigations into the use of private planes by Trump Cabinet officials. "It is critical that we ensure there are effective Agency controls that exist to prevent the risk of fraud, waste, and abuse related to leadership and staff travel," he wrote. Both Perry and Pruitt used non-commercial aircraft, and their agencies fall under the committee's jurisdiction.

INHOFE ON ENDANGERMENT FINDING: NOW OR NEVER: Though it hasn't come up in his conversations with Pruitt, Inhofe wants his fellow Oklahoman to make a push to overturn the endangerment finding now. "If there's a chance of getting it done, I don't see a downside," he told reporters. "I would recommend he do that."

Inhofe spoke with Pruitt on Tuesday and said he was upbeat. "He's warding off the harassment, the opposition, the death threats and these things," Inhofe said. "He's just real happy in his job."

LOOKING FOR WEEKEND PLANS? Hundreds of faith leaders, environmental activists, native tribes, business owners and others gather on Saturday to encircle the Virginia State Capitol on Saturday in protest of the Atlantic Coast and Mountain Valley pipelines. More information here.

Republicans rewriting tax bill — with fight pushed into Friday Back

By Seung Min Kim and Colin Wilhelm | 11/30/2017 10:59 AM EDT

Senate Republicans are still scrambling to win over enough votes to pass their massive tax code overhaul, with major changes to the bill still up in the air and debate pushed into Friday.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said the next vote in the tax debate will come at 11 a.m. Friday, as work continues behind the scenes to win over skeptical deficit hawks and other swing votes.

Multiple GOP senators leaving the chamber after a dramatic late afternoon vote said a key proposal for deficit hawks — a trigger to raise tax rates if sufficient economic growth did not materialize — would not pass procedural muster and would need to find something else to satisfy the bloc of deficit hawk holdouts, led by Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.).

"It doesn't look like the trigger is going to work, according to the parliamentarian," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said. "So we have an alternative, frankly: a tax increase we don't want to do to try to address Sen. Corker's concerns."

Corker told reporters: "My understanding is, that the parliamentarian has ruled against it so they're just going to automatically put [tax increases] in, period." Corker and Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) said the revenue raised with tax increases — which senators say would kick in six years after the enactment of the tax legislation — would total about $350 billion, although Cornyn suggested that figure may need to go higher.

Late Thursday, Republicans huddled with leadership and tax policy staff to work on a solution.

Sen. Thom Tillis (R-N.C.), who supports the current package, estimated that Republicans needed to find an additional $370 billion to $400 billion within their package to placate concerns about increased deficits.

"What we're trying to do right now is get to the point where nobody's going to get exactly what they want but enough for us to get the bill passed," he told reporters.

The sudden need to regroup came after extended drama on the Senate floor Thursday during an otherwise mundane procedural vote, when Corker, Flake and Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) initially withheld their support on a vote to move forward with the bill. Ultimately they aligned with their party, but it suggested real concerns remained, including friction among Republicans over whether to stick to the 20 percent corporate tax rate rate insisted on by the White House.

Johnson withheld his vote during the standoff in exchange for votes on his amendments, including one that would further increase a tax deduction for pass-through businesses to around 25 percent.

The legislation would slash the corporate tax rate and lower rates for many, though not all, individuals. Senate Republicans have said their plan would boost the economy but not by nearly as much as some lawmakers hope, a new official analysis shows.

The nonpartisan Joint Committee on Taxation said Thursday that the GOP plan would fall well short of covering its $1.5 trillion cost through additional economic growth; it predicted $407 billion in additional revenue would come in by boosting the economy by 0.8 percent over the next decade.

That would mean a $1 trillion deficit increase, which is problematic for lawmakers like Corker, who has said he would vote against a tax bill that increased the deficit. A Senate Finance Committee aide noted that the analysis was "incomplete" since the bill text has yet to be finalized.

Democrats have blasted Republicans for rushing the bill to the floor while considering significant eleventh-hour changes to the sprawling tax code rewrite.

"This is tax, one of the most complicated issues before us," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said on the floor Thursday. "These changes and the way the majority leader is handling this make it impossible for any independent analyst to get a good look at the bill and how it would impact our country."

Yet, Sen. John McCain, who gave Republicans a boost earlier in the day when he broke his long silence and said he would back the legislation, signaled he was satisfied with the process, noting the bill went through "a thorough mark-up in the Senate Finance Committee."

The Arizona Republican, who helped tank the party's Obamacare repeal efforts earlier this year, had said going through a regular legislative process was one of his major concerns.

But it was clear Senate Republicans still have myriad issues to resolve in order to lock down at least 50 votes to ensure final passage of the tax bill on the floor. Republicans are using powerful budget procedures to evade a Democratic filibuster.

Other key GOP votes such as Corker, Flake and Susan Collins of Maine have yet to commit to the bill, for varying reasons. And Johnson and Steve Daines of Montana are trying to secure even more generous treatment of small businesses after extracting a boost in an earlier round of negotiations.

Collins plans to offer a half-dozen amendments, including one that would hike the proposed corporate tax rate of 20 percent to restore a deduction for up to $10,000 for property taxes. She is among a handful of Republican senators who say they are open to raising the proposed corporate rate in order to fund other tax provisions in the bill.

The moderate senator is also seeking to extract some health care assurances because the current tax bill repeals Obamacare's requirement that everyone carry insurance or pay a penalty. She has pushed for two separate health care bills — one to stabilize the markets and another to protect pre-existing conditions and use high-risk pools — to be grafted to a short-term spending bill that would need to pass before government funding expires Dec. 8.

Conservatives in the House Freedom Caucus, a group of about 40 Republicans that frequently buck their party's leadership, rejected the notion of supporting those health care bills.

Members of the group also said they opposed amendments that would raise the proposed corporate income tax rate above 20 percent, and bristled at the idea of a delayed cut, which the Senate's bill does largely due to budgetary rules.

"It's a great strategy if you're looking to put the Democrats in the majority and give them credit for what we did," Rep. Louie Gohmert (R-Texas) said of the Senate's proposed one-year delay to a corporate tax cut.

ANWR drilling in tax bill draws opposition from a dozen House Republicans Back

By Nick Juliano | 11/30/2017 06:33 PM EDT

A dozen House Republicans raised concerns today about a rider in the Senate tax bill that would allow drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

The lawmakers did not mention the tax bill by name in their letter, and they stopped short of promising to pull their support if ANWR drilling is included. But they said they had "concerns with any proposal that would implement an oil and gas leasing program in the Refuge" and questioned whether new drilling there was necessary.

"Further, the resources beneath the Refuge's Coastal Plain simply are not necessary for our nation's energy independence," wrote Reps. Brian Fitzpatrick, Dave Reichert and 10 of their GOP colleagues.

Six of the 12 lawmakers already voted against the House tax bill earlier this month, citing objections such as its elimination of the state and local tax deduction.

Opening ANWR is a priority for Sen. Lisa Murkowski, a key swing vote in the upper chamber, which hopes to pass its version of the bill as soon as this week.

GOP tweaks Arctic drilling language to bump up revenue Back

By Sarah Ferris | 11/30/2017 11:51 AM EDT

Senate Republicans have reworked language on Arctic drilling in their tax bill to further boost revenue, hoping to resolve a procedural hiccup before the impending passage vote.

Senate Budget Committee leaders have tweaked provisions that would authorize drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, altering the language in a way they believe will comply with so-called Byrd rule requirements, a GOP committee aide confirmed today.

The budget panel had expected to raise $1 billion over a decade by opening up ANWR for drilling. But a report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated it would fall short by about $366 million, according to a Senate Democratic aide.

The GOP's revised drilling language would propose selling more oil from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, potentially producing hundreds of millions of dollars in additional revenue, the aide said.

If approved by the Senate parliamentarian today, the new language will be formally added before the high-stakes Senate floor vote on the tax plan, H.R. 1 \(115\).

The fate of the provision — championed by swing vote Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) — was called into question Wednesday after a warning from the parliamentarian.

Each part of the GOP's tax plan must comply with a complex set of budget reconciliation rules that allow the legislation to avoid a Democratic filibuster.

Documents show Trump set to shrink Bears Ears, Grand Staircase monuments Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/30/2017 04:35 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will shrink Utah's Bears Ears National Monument by 85 percent and Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument by about 41 percent, according to copies of the proclamations and maps obtained by POLITICO.

Trump is expected to travel to Utah on Monday to make the announcement about the monuments that were established by former presidents Barack Obama and Bill Clinton, and which Utah lawmakers and conservative groups have complained were created over their objections. Trump has called Obama's creation of Bears Ears in the waning days of his presidency an "egregious abuse of federal power."

Both of the Utah monuments contain fossil fuel resources and Trump's move is sure to touch off a legal battle over the president's authority to dramatically alter his predecessors' actions under the Antiquities Act, which environmental groups view as one of the nation's bedrock conservation laws.

Trump's proclamations, which were first reported by The Washington Post, would cut the 1.353-million-acre Bears Ears down to about 201,400 acres and break it into two new monuments called Indian Creek National Monument and Shash Jaa National Monument. In addition to oil and gas resources, the area also holds uranium deposits.

Trump would divvy the Grand Staircase-Escalante monument into three parts — Grand Staircase National Monument, Kaiparowits National Monument and the Escalante Canyons National Monument — ending protections over swatches of areas high in mineral resources. The land will remain under federal control.

The newly drawn monuments are "confined to the smallest area compatible with the proper care and management of objects," the proclamations state.

The move will be welcomed by Utah's congressional delegation and other Republican lawmakers who had accused Obama of federal overreach by creating monuments despite local opposition and using the Antiquities Act to head off commercial activity. Obama created dozens of land and marine monuments, protecting more than 5.7 million acres — the most any president has set aside under the century-old Antiquities Act.

Trump's expected order is the latest move in his effort to roll back Obama's regulations and federal decisions that he has said hinder the economy and fossil fuel development.

But Trump's order on the Bears Ears monument, which was created to protect thousands of sensitive archaeological sites, is certain to spark a court fight with tribes and conservation groups that have complained the Native American ruins there were being damaged and would be threatened by oil and gas development in the area.

Environmental groups and tribal organizations are planning a protest at the Utah state capitol this weekend over Trump's planned visit.

Democrats have criticized Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's review of more than two dozen monuments for being conducted in secrecy, and they have chided Zinke for not releasing copies of his full report to the White House. Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin had put holds on four of Trump's Interior nominees in order to force Zinke to brief him on the monument plans. He lifted two of those holds after a meeting with Zinke.

Rob Bishop's House Natural Resources Committee in October reported out a bill, H.R. 3390, that would amend the Antiquities Act to more clearly define a president's authority to change monuments. Previous legislative attempts by the Utah delegation to curb federal monuments have failed.

The White House and Interior Department did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

ANWR SLIPPING THROUGH BELOW THE SURFACE? With Senate Republicans barreling towards a floor vote on their tax package as soon as this week, Democrats are worried their battle to keep oil and gas drilling out of the untouched Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is being lost in the broader debate, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. "It's really not gotten the attention that it should," Sen. Tammy Duckworth said of legislation that easily cleared the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. "It's not just the budget discussion. It's about everything else that's going on, the flurry of all sorts of other news."

Democrats don't have the votes to stop ANWR drilling since it's hitching a ride on the tax bill moving under budget reconciliation rules. The Budget Committee cleared its filibuster-proof package Tuesday, and there were several other signs of momentum for the GOP tax overhaul effort, POLITICO's Seung Min Kim, Bernie Becker and Colin Wilhelm report. Sen. Susan Collins, a key swing vote who's opposed ANWR drilling in the past, said she'd "certainly try" to remove drilling language from the package but that doing so would not be a prerequisite for her support of the overall bill.

It wasn't always this way. President Bill Clinton vetoed a budget package in 1995 over ANWR, and Democrats fought off another attempt to open a slice of the refuge 10 years later. But this time around, the issue "hasn't drawn as much extremist opposition because it is completely overshadowed by tax reform," says Chris Guith, senior vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Global Energy Institute. Environmentalists decried that approach. Republicans "know they can't pass it under regular order, that's why they're doing a sneak attack," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, the League of Conservation Voters' senior vice president of government affairs.

Environmental groups have targeted a few congressional districts with ads opposing ANWR drilling. Vet Voice Foundation and Sierra Club Military Outdoors released ads Tuesday urging GOP Reps. Brian J. Mast and Lee Zeldin not to support the final tax proposal. The ads highlight what the groups say are the unacceptable risks of ANWR drilling. Sample ad here.

Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski's ANWR push directs Interior to hold two lease sales over the next decade and CBO said it would raise $1 billion over that period, meeting budgetary instructions. But critics argue the Republican tax package would actually harm energy-producing states. That's because it would trigger required "pay-as-you-go" cuts to mandatory spending programs, such as an energy royalty revenue sharing program carried out through the Mineral Leasing Act that would cost Murkowski's Alaska an estimated \$15 million in energy royalty payments next year alone. "This is yet another example of the consequences associated with forcing through legislation to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit in order to give tax cuts to the wealthy," House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer said in a statement.

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and the Union of Concerned Scientists' Katherine Catalano named former Hawaii Rep. Patsy Mink as the most recent person to win reelection posthumously. For today: Alabama Sen. Richard Shelby was once part of a group of conservative southern Democrats known by what name? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

DECISION DAY IN EPW: Two key Trump administration nominations, Kathleen Hartnett White's selection to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality and Andrew Wheeler's to be EPA's No. 2, get votes today at Senate EPW, where they're expected to pass on a party-line vote. Chairman John Barrasso confidently told reporters he anticipated both clearing the panel, though the wild card (at least for White's nomination) is Iowa's Joni Ernst. White didn't win Ernst's backing immediately after backtracking on her previous sharp criticism of the Renewable Fuel Standard during her confirmation hearing, and her office didn't respond to requests for comment on her current stance. White's responses to questions for the record from ranking member Tom Carper are here.

WELL, I SWEAR (IN): It's not clear exactly when it will happen, but Democrat Rich Glick formally joins FERC at some point today. There's no word on when Kevin McIntyre, Trump's pick to be FERC chairman, will be sworn in, but ME is reupping Chairman Neil Chatterjee's words from Tuesday pushing back on some rumblings: "There is no intentional delay or dragging things out to some nefarious end. ... It's simply a matter of timing, prioritization, getting documents signed and once the documents were signed. ... People have to unwind their own professional obligations in their current jobs."

PRUITT'S TRAVELS: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt reportedly plans to swing by Iowa Friday, one day after the final biofuel volumes are due under the Renewable Fuel Standard. Iowa Agribusiness Radio Network reports Pruitt will attend an invite-only town hall in the city of Nevada (confusing, ME knows).

Pruitt also made a day trip to Disney World on Monday to highlight a program taking food waste and converting it into electricity, the Wall Street Journal reports. One comment he made: "When you think about those things, the Paris [climate] accord or the CPP, none of those produce results."

Back for more: Meanwhile, EPA gathers in Charleston, W.Va., for its second day of public testimony on its proposed repeal of the Clean Power Plan. Pruitt did not attend Tuesday's opening of the agency's only public hearing on the subject and hasn't announced plans to show up today. The agency didn't respond to requests for comment.

If Tuesday was any indication, don't expect a ton of new developments. A preliminary list of witnesses for Day Two is available here. Nearly 550 members of Environmental Entrepreneurs urged Trump and Pruitt not to move forward with their planned withdrawal in a letter. And Climate Hawks Vote released an analysis Tuesday finding a much more muted reaction from both parties to the proposed repeal than its original proposal or Trump's withdrawal from the Paris climate accord

TILLERSON TALKS EUROPEAN ENERGY COOPERATION: Secretary of State Rex Tillerson said in Tuesday remarks the U.S. would work to ease rules on shipping crude oil and liquid natural gas to Europe given Russia has previously used energy as a "political weapon." "We're eager to work with European allies to ensure the development of needed infrastructure like import terminals and interconnecting pipelines to promote the diversity of supply to Europe," he added during remarks at The Wilson Center.

LAWSUIT FILED OVER CADIZ APPROVAL: Two advocacy groups — the Center for Biological Diversity and Center for Food Safety — filed a lawsuit challenging the administration's effective approval of a proposed Cadiz Inc. water pipeline in California's Mojave Desert back in October. The legal challenge argues BLM's decision to allow Cadiz to use an existing railroad right of way is "illegal."

California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a longtime opponent of the project, hailed the lawsuit: "The company's recent 'pause' indicates it has no plan to address the many problems associated with its project. Instead, it relied on its friends in the Trump administration to clear any hurdles. This lawsuit shows Cadiz that won't happen without a fight."

AROUND THE HILL TODAY! LOOKING AT AGENCY DEREGULATORY ACTIONS: Two House Oversight subcommittees hear from senior EPA, Interior and DOE officials on their implementation of deregulatory executive orders today at 10 a.m. Deputy Interior Secretary David Bernhardt; Daniel Simmons, who runs DOE's energy efficiency and renewables office; and Brittany Bolen, EPA's deputy associate administrator in its Office of Policy, all testify. If lawmakers and their staffs are feeling particularly wonky, Simmons' appearance would be a good chance to ask about DOE's information request this week aimed at vetting ways of getting "additional flexibilities" into its appliance efficiency rulemaking process. More here.

Taking a look at NEPA: The House Natural Resources Committee holds a hearing entitled "Modernizing NEPA for the 21st Century" today at 10 a.m. It'll then kick off a markup on seven bills with opening statements at 4 p.m. (more on those bills in Thursday's ME).

WOTUS gathering: ME goofed Tuesday and the House Science subcommittee hearing on the future of the waters of the U.S. regulation is actually today at 10:15 a.m. Former Obama-era EPA waters chief Ken Kopocis is among those testifying. Watch here.

E&C looks at financial trading: The House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee convenes at 10:15 a.m. to examine the role of "financial trading in the nation's wholesale electricity market." Witnesses representing PJM Interconnection, California ISO, NRG Energy, Power Trading Institute, Financial Marketers Coalition and a former FERC general counsel are among those slated to testify. More here.

WHAT A COINCIDENCE? The Center for Biological Diversity filed a FOIA request seeking information on a trip taken by Greg Sheehan, acting director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, to Tanzania during which his agency announced it would overturn a ban on elephant trophies from two African nations. (It subsequently abandoned those plans.)

GRIJALVA DISPUTES HOSTILE WORKPLACE REPORT: Rep. Raúl Grijalva, ranking member on the Natural Resources Committee, pushed back strongly on a report that he offered a former aide five months' severance pay to settle a hostile workplace claim related to alleged alcohol use, POLITICO's Elana Schor reports. He accused The Washington Times of eventually publishing "a misleading article trying to link me to sexual harassment complaints made against other people." Grijalva's alleged behavior was not sexual in nature.

GREEN TECH LAWSUIT ENSURES SEVERAL VIPS: Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe and former Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton's brother Anthony Rodham are among those caught up in a fraud lawsuit filed by Chinese investors over investments in Greentech Automotive, POLITICO's Josh Gerstein reports. The lawsuit says each Chinese investor lost $560,000 apiece as a result of misrepresentations made by McAuliffe and Rodham about the electric car company that appears to be struggling to survive.

SOLAR REPORT DELUGE! There's now nearly double the amount of solar power installed at schools around the country than in 2014, according to a report out this morning from The Solar Foundation. That comes as GTM Research finds Brazil, Egypt, Mexico, the Netherlands and Spain will cross the 1-gigawatt mark in annual PV installations by the end of this year with five more countries expected to top that threshold by the end of 2018. And the Solar Energy Industries Association released a guide for valuing installed residential solar energy systems.

TAKE A GLANCE! Public Citizen released a report Tuesday finding the Trump administration withdrew 457 rulemakings in its first semi-annual report on regulations, known formally in Washington-speak as the Unified Agenda. That's more than any administration ever. "Administration officials have taken a victory lap to celebrate their efforts to halt regulations but have largely avoided discussing the details of the rulemakings they have stopped," Michael Tanglis, a senior researcher with the group, said.

NEW TOOL: Resources for the Future released a new calculator Tuesday meant to estimate the impacts of a carbon tax on various fossil fuel prices. Check it out here.

Democrats worry ANWR being lost amid tax debate Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/28/2017 03:44 PM EDT

Democrats' fight to keep oil and gas rigs out of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is losing ground as the Republican tax plan advances — and it's almost as if no one has noticed.

The prospect of drilling in the untouched Alaskan tundra is as close to reality as it's been in more than a decade, with none of the political drama that in past decades turned the refuge's fate into a top-tier rallying cry for liberals. Legislation to allow drilling in ANWR is quietly hitching a ride on the tax code overhaul that Senate Republicans hope to complete by the end of the week, overshadowed by larger debates on whether the bill is a giveaway to rich people and corporations at the expense of the poor and working class.

"It's really not gotten the attention that it should," Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.), a member of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, told POLITICO about the ANWR provision. "It's not just the budget discussion. It's about everything else that's going on, the flurry of all sorts of other news."

Angus King (I-Maine) said Republicans were trying to shield ANWR from opposition by adding it to the larger bill rather than bringing it to the floor on its own under rules, which would require it to win support from 60 senators to overcome a filibuster.

"Well, clearly the strategy is to try to get it through as part of this tax reform effort and thereby avoid a direct up-or-down vote," King said in an interview earlier this month.

The nonstop news cycle and preponderance of other concerns with the tax bill are making it difficult to focus on an issue that normally fires up Democratic voters.

"I do think that putting ANWR in the budget reconciliation package hasn't drawn as much extremist opposition because it is completely overshadowed by tax reform, which is the center of the package," said Chris Guith, senior vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Global Energy Institute. "But there are some who aren't exactly supportive of tax reform that support ANWR, and it's possible to see ANWR bring a vote or two to help pass tax reform."

Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) easily advanced legislation through her committee directing the Interior Department to hold two lease sales for drilling in ANWR over the next decade. It would raise $1 billion over that period, according to the Congressional Budget Office, making it eligible for inclusion in a budget reconciliation package that Democrats cannot filibuster.

The reconciliation package also will include Republicans' tax plan and a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate. While Murkowski helped scuttle the Obamacare repeal push earlier this year, she says she supports ending the mandate. Murkowski's office did not respond to a request for comment.

ANWR, a swath of tundra on the northern Alaska coast, is home to polar bears, porcupine caribou and a landscape that hasn't been touched in thousands of years. Congress designated the 19-million-acre area a wildlife refuge in 1980, but it set aside a 1.5-million-acre parcel known as "10-02" for possible future drilling if future lawmakers approved such a plan. The U.S. Geological Survey estimated in 1998 that part of ANWR could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil, and President Donald Trump and Alaska Republicans have called it essential for their plans for American "energy dominance."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who is undecided on the tax bill for a several reasons, said she will support an amendment on the Senate floor to eliminate the ANWR language, but she said success there is not a prerequisite for her to vote for the underlying bill. "No it is not, but I would certainly try to get it out of the package," Collins told reporters Tuesday. Collins was the only Republican to cross the aisle on an unsuccessful amendment to keep pro-drilling language out of the underlying budget resolution, meaning it is unlikely that she would be able to strip the ANWR provision from a reconciliation bill.

But Democrats say that passing a deficit-increasing tax bill in order to open ANWR would actually harm energy-producing states. That's because the $1.5 trillion shortfall from the GOP tax cuts would trigger required "pay-as-you-go" cuts to mandatory spending programs, according to a CBO analysis sent to House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

One of the programs on the PAYGO chopping block would be the energy royalty revenue sharing program carried out through the Mineral Leasing Act. Cutting those payments would lose Alaska an estimated \$15 million in energy royalty payments next year alone, an amount important to a state already facing budget shortfalls.

"Communities throughout the West would be impacted by the loss of revenue, which is used to support a variety of needs including infrastructure, school funding, conservation, and recreation," Hoyer said in a statement to POLITICO. "This is yet another example of the consequences associated with forcing through legislation to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit in order to give tax cuts to the wealthy."

PAYGO cuts also would hit popular programs like Medicare and student loans, but Congress can waive the law with 60 votes in the Senate. Democrats are not yet on board with that approach.

The current push to open ANWR, coming amid a swarm of competing headlines and buried in larger legislation, has come nearer to succeeding than in the GOP's two previous attempts. President Bill Clinton vetoed a budget package in 1995 that included language opening ANWR, while a Democratic filibuster thwarted a second attempt in 2005.

What public engagement environmental groups have made has targeted only a handful of congressional districts. The League of Conservation Voters also spent $550,000 on television ads in three Republican congressional districts. The LCV also paid for a bipartisan polling firm to probe public opinion on opening ANWR, but even that focused only on registered voters in eight congressional districts.

"The reason they're trying to sneak it into the tax package is they know they don't have the votes otherwise," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, the league's senior vice president of government affairs. "They know they can't pass it under regular order, that's why they're doing a sneak attack."

Even ANWR supporters are staying out of the spotlight.

"I haven't seen any full out, front-page ads, nothing like that," Alaska Oil and Gas Association President Kara Moriarty said. "We're a little battle weary, to be honest. Alaskans support opening up ANWR. There's been a few statements reiterating that."

Senate GOP gets breathing room as tax plan advances Back

By Seung Min Kim, Bernie Becker and Colin Wilhelm | 11/28/2017 12:33 PM EDT

Senate Republicans got some sorely needed momentum behind their tax overhaul Tuesday as key GOP swing votes inched closer to backing the legislation — after Senate leaders launched a frenzied round of negotiations to convince the holdouts.

The Senate Budget Committee voted to advance the GOP tax reform bill on Tuesday on a party-line vote, with both Sens. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) backing the measure a day after threatening to withhold their support. That critical vote came after President Donald Trump came to Capitol Hill to rally the troops in the tax battle.

Johnson voted for the tax bill after a back-and-forth with Trump during the lunch, according to multiple sources, over the Wisconsin Republican's main concern: that the current proposal gives more benefits to corporations than to businesses that pay taxes through the individual system.

At one point, Johnson — who has persistently pressed his case for so-called pass-throughs to other senators — said jokingly that no one grandstands better than him, according to one senator who attended the lunch.

Corker, one of the fiscal hawks concerned about the deficit impact of tax cuts, said he was satisfied with details for a "trigger" to reverse tax cuts if economic growth fell short of projections in years to come. He expects details to be released Thursday.

"I've got details but I want to get it all sort of put to bed," before disclosing them, he told reporters. "It's an agreement in principle, a very strong agreement, with [Senate Majority Leader Mitch] McConnell, with [the] Finance Committee, and of course the White House has been in the midst of all this too."

The agreement was primarily brokered between Corker and Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), a member of the tax-writing Finance Committee, according to one GOP source. The two key lawmakers struck an agreement in September on the overall price tag of $1.5 trillion for the Senate plan.

Corker has also been working on the trigger idea with Republican Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona and James Lankford of Oklahoma.

Corker said he believes there is a viable workaround if a trigger violates budget rules of the Senate that Republicans plan to use to pass their tax bill along party lines.

The Budget Committee vote became even more dramatic after Capitol Police were forced to escort multiple protesters out of the room. Chants of "kill the bill, don't kill us" repeatedly disrupted the panel's proceeding.

Despite Tuesday's developments, Senate Republicans have a way to go before locking down at least 50 votes in favor of the tax bill. The GOP has not formally unveiled changes that would appease the likes of Corker, Flake and Lankford, as well as Johnson.

Several other Republican senators remain wild cards as the chamber races to a vote by the end of the week.

Earlier in the day, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, members of his leadership team, and key Senate Finance Committee Republicans met with Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) — who, like Johnson, has concerns about the bill's treatment of so-called pass-through businesses.

"It's a challenging exercise," McConnell said Tuesday. "Think of sitting there with a Rubik's Cube trying to get to 50."

Another critical Republican swing vote — Sen. Susan Collins of Maine — is seeking several provisions before she is willing to endorse the tax bill, including passage of separate legislation to stabilize the health insurance markets.

The tax bill includes a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate that everyone carry health insurance, and Collins told reporters Tuesday afternoon that Trump committed to backing a stabilization measure from Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.), as well as a bill from her and Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) to protect pre-existing conditions and use high-risk pools.

The commitments from the president came in a separate meeting with Collins, Alexander and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), Collins said.

"I think they're eager to help me get to 'yes,'" she said.

The moderate senator also said in an interview earlier Tuesday that she wants the top individual tax rate to remain at the current 39.6 percent, restore the state and local tax deduction on property taxes to aid those in high-tax states, and make the child care tax credit refundable "so it would help lower-income working families."

She also wants to kill a proposal in the plan that would eliminate the ability of employees of the government as well as nonprofits, churches and others to make catch-up contributions to their 401(k) retirement plans, saying "this makes no sense whatsoever — we should be encouraging people to save for their retirement, and there seems to be a receptivity to fixing that provision."

Meanwhile, Corker and other fiscal hawks have become increasingly vocal about their concerns that the bill might fall short of paying for itself, as its chief backers claim.

"If we could take the entire individual side of this, throw it in the trash can and take it directly to the incinerator, I would be thrilled," Corker said on CNBC. "But I'm willing to swallow the individual side, which to me is not what it needs to be, to get the business side as long as we're not increasing deficits."

And the addition of the health care battle has further complicated matters. Top Democratic senators have said that every member of their 48-person caucus supports the stabilization measure, but that calculus is sure to change if Republicans are using the Alexander-Murray deal to try and mitigate the impact of repealing the individual mandate.

"You can't sabotage the entire system and then say you're going to do a small little fix on top of that sabotage," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer said Tuesday.

Senate Democrats from states Trump won handily signaled they felt little political pressure to support the current effort, though they walked a fine line between arguing the Senate's tax reform bill could be improved on a bipartisan basis and shutting the door on supporting it.

"If you've heard the rhetoric that Democrats don't want tax reform, that's false," said Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.). "We want tax reform. The country needs meaningful tax reform."

Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), who accompanied Trump to a tax reform event in her home state earlier this year, knocked the bill as "a moving target" that still contains a number of provisions that concern her, particularly tax cuts that it would benefit wealthy individuals more than they would benefit middle-class taxpayers.

"Every member of Congress is going to be a winner" under the current Republican tax bill, she said. "But I've got constituents who aren't going to be winners who make a lot less than I do."

When asked whether moderate Democrats might support the Republican tax reform effort at the end of the day, Manchin said Democrats "haven't seen the final version" and noted that several Republicans remain on the fence.

"We think they're still trying to find ways to get 51 votes," he said. "We're saying, why work on getting 51 votes, why don't you work on getting 60 votes?"

The Senate budget panel was required to green-light the tax bill because Republicans are using a budget maneuver that would allow them to pass the bill with only 51 votes. Under those procedural rules, the committee could not substantially change the legislation before it heads to the floor for a full vote.

"Our work today is of a ministerial nature," Budget Committee Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) said during the markup.

CEQ nominee White flips on biofuel support Back

By Eric Wolff and Alex Guillén | 11/08/2017 11:37 AM EDT

Kathleen Hartnett White reversed her position on biofuels at her confirmation hearing today, telling senators she now backed the federal program she once criticized as "ethically dubious."

Hartnett White, who has been nominated to lead the Council on Environmental Quality, was pressed by Sens. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.), Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) and Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) on her past comments calling for the elimination of the Renewable Fuel Standard. President Donald Trump has been a strong backer of ethanol producers and the RFS.

"I solidly support his support," she told Rounds.

Hartnett White said her past views were based on flawed data.

"In the early years of the program, I made some particularly critical questions about whether ethanol would challenge the global food supply," she said.

But, she said, Ernst had shared newer data with her. "What a great victory, and I congratulate the corn industry" on increasing production, she said.

CEQ has no direct regulatory role over the RFS, but it provides advice to the president on environmental matters like the biofuels program.

"As a child of rural American, I have painfully observed over my lifetime the decline of vibrant small towns. ... An industry like ethanol has really contributed to giving new life to rural communities and keeping families together," she said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will schedule a vote on Hartnett White's nomination.

Glick to be sworn in at FERC Wednesday Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/28/2017 12:11 PM EDT

Democrat Rich Glick is slated to be sworn in as a FERC commissioner on Wednesday, FERC spokeswoman Mary O'Driscoll said today.

There were no updates on when Kevin McIntyre, President Donald Trump's pick to be FERC chairman, would do the same.

Both McIntyre and Glick were confirmed by the Senate early this month, and though their paperwork cleared the White House shortly before Thanksgiving, neither have officially joined the agency. That delay had fueled speculation among FERC watchers that there was a dispute over staffing decisions or Energy Secretary Rick Perry's controversial grid proposal.

Current FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee sought to tamp down the rumors today.

"There is no conspiracy here. There is no intentional delay or dragging things out to some nefarious end," he told reporters after a Consumer Energy Alliance event. "It's simply a matter of timing, prioritization, getting documents signed and once the documents were signed ... people have to unwind their own professional obligations in their current jobs."

Chatterjee also said it was unfair to compare the slow pace in bringing McIntyre and Glick aboard to the quicker process that put him and Commissioner Rob Powelson on the commission in August, when the agency had gone months without a quorum.

"There was considerable pressure to get the paperwork signed and moved as quickly as possible," he said. "The circumstances here are different because we have a functioning quorum."

BLM clears the way for Cadiz California water pipeline Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/16/2017 06:06 PM EDT

The Bureau of Land Management has ruled the proposed Cadiz Inc. water pipeline in California's Mojave Desert can move forward without agency approval, effectively clearing the biggest remaining federal hurdle for the project.

In a Friday letter, which Cadiz released today, BLM acting Director Mike Nedd reversed a 2015 finding by the Obama administration that the project could not use an existing railroad right of way and would need to apply for its own.

The proposed pipeline would pump groundwater from a desert aquifer across 43 miles of land, much of it federally owned, and the project's opponents have argued it would draw more water than the aquifer can recharge naturally.

The Interior Department in September also reversed a legal interpretation made under the Obama administration and found railroads have broad discretion to lease their rights of way. The Center for Biological Diversity has filed a public records request with Interior to figure out why the agency revoked that legal interpretation.

David Bernhardt, Interior's second-in-command, did legal work for Cadiz before joining the agency. An Interior spokeswoman in an emailed statement said "the Deputy Secretary has absolutely no role in anything related to Cadiz."

WHAT'S NEXT: Cadiz in a statement said it will begin working on final engineering designs, contracts and obtaining a conveyance agreement with the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California. A Cadiz spokeswoman in an email said the storage component of the project will still require federal permits.

Grijalva blasts report on hostile workplace allegations Back

By Elana Schor | 11/28/2017 02:43 PM EDT

Rep. Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) on Tuesday demanded an apology from the Washington Times for a report that he paid more than $48,000 from his office's budget to settle a former aide's hostile workplace environment claim related to alleged alcohol use.

Grijalva pushed back after the newspaper reported that he had offered a former aide five months' severance pay to settle her claim, which was never taken to Capitol Hill's workplace misconduct adjudicators at the Office of Compliance.

The Arizonan is the second House Democrat in one week to become embroiled in a growing scandal over Congress' secret system for settling workplace misconduct complaints, with a third woman coming forward Tuesday to allege sexual harassment by Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.).

Grijalva's alleged behavior was not sexual in nature — although he claimed Tuesday that the Times initially contacted him about a sexual misconduct case.

"Last week, the Washington Times contacted me seeking comment on what it described as a sexual harassment claim that, in fact, had never been made," Grijalva said in a statement. He accused the newspaper of eventually publishing "a misleading article trying to link me to sexual harassment complaints made against other people."

Grijalva acknowledged the basic facts of the report that he and the former aide "mutually agreed on terms for a severance package, including an agreement that neither of us would talk about it publicly," with the assistance of the House's chief employment counsel. That office is tasked with representing the interests of lawmakers during such negotiations with employees.

"The terms were consistent with House Ethics Committee guidance," Grijalva added. "The severance funds came out of my committee operating budget. Every step of the process was handled ethically and appropriately."

The Times "owes me an apology," Grijalva added.

The $27,000 settlement Conyers reached in 2015 with a former aide accusing him of sexual harassment was paid through his personal office's budget, meaning that the compliance office did not tally the payment in its annual reporting of workplace misconduct settlements on the Hill.

It is unclear, beyond the House employment counsel's office, which entity on the Hill maintains a comprehensive record of workplace misconduct settlements that lawmakers pay using their taxpayer-funded personal budgets.

Chinese investors sue McAuliffe, Rodham over green-car investments Back

By Josh Gerstein | 11/28/2017 01:22 PM EDT

Virginia Governor Terry McAuliffe and former Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton's brother Anthony Rodham are facing a $17 million fraud lawsuit from Chinese investors in Greentech Automotive, an electric car company that appears to be struggling to survive.

A group of 32 Chinese citizens filed the suit last week in Fairfax County, Virginia court, claiming that they were swindled out of about $560,000 apiece as a result of misrepresentations made by McAuliffe and Rodham—two of the most prominent and politically connected proponents of the venture aimed at manufacturing electric cars in the U.S.

The suit is yet another headache for McAuliffe as he mulls a potential presidential bid in 2020, buoyed in part by Democrats' strong showing in the state in the election earlier this month. McAuliffe confirmed last year that his business dealings with foreign nationals were under investigation by the FBI and federal prosecutors. It's unclear whether that probe involved Greentech or whether the inquiry is still ongoing.

The Chinese investors plowed their money into Greentech with the promise of winning permanent residency in the U.S. under a program that awards green cards to foreign-funded ventures that generate U.S. jobs. However, the suit contends that the investors now face the threat of deportation from the U.S. because the Department of Homeland Security has determined that Greentech did not generate the number of jobs required to sustain the number of visas issued through the so-called EB-5 program.

"Plaintiffs now face the prospect of having to uproot their families once again, with the expense and stress of deportation to China looming before them," the suit says, accusing McAuliffe, Rodham, Greentech founder Charles Xiaolin Wang and others of running a "scam."

McAuliffe and Rodham did several tours through China to seek investments in the electric car startup, the suit says. As brother-in-law of President Bill Clinton and as brother of the then-secretary of state—Rodham appeared to serve as a means of attracting Chinese interest in the project. The suit contends that Rodham's involvement conveyed that the electric-car firm was politically-connected and likely to prosper.

"Defendants milked these connections in marketing materials," the suit says. "Defendants exploited those relationships to assure investors of both the success of the company and their ability to obtain U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS") approval of the visa applications."

A spokeswoman for McAuliffe, Crystal Carson, disputed the claims and noted that the governor gave up his role in the firm years ago.

"We strongly reject this baseless suit which has no merit whatsoever. The claims, which regurgitate old political attacks regarding a company that Governor McAuliffe left five years ago, were brought by a lawyer with conservative ties," Carson said. "We are confident it will be dismissed."

One of the attorneys who drafted the suit, Scott Abeles of Los Angeles-based Gerard Fox law, disputed any political motivation.

"I represented the Chamber of Commerce once or twice...I'm not a conservative dude," he said in an interview Tuesday.

As McAuliffe prepared to run for Virginia governor, Greentech was a bright spot on his resume, combining entrepreneurial spirit with environmentalism and an effort to bring jobs to an impoverished area of Mississippi. A 2012 ribbon-cutting for the Mississippi factory drew former President Bill Clinton and Mississippi Governor Haley Barbour generated glowing press coverage.

However, the firm soon ran into trouble finding its footing. Production was repeatedly delayed. Hiring for the assembly line fell well short of the 350 jobs promised.

McAuliffe was once the largest individual investor in the company but stepped down as chairman in 2012 and sold his shares as he prepared to be sworn in as governor in 2014.

Once McAuliffe took office, bad publicity for the firm kept coming. It emerged that the Securities and Exchange Commission had an investigation into the company, although no charges were ever brought.

A Department of Homeland Security inspector general report issued in 2015 said USCIS Director Alejandro Mayorkas created "an appearance of favoritism and special access" by responding to entreaties from McAuliffe and Rodham to speed up action on applications related to the project. The report did not accuse McAuliffe or Rodham of wrongdoing.

The Mississippi factory apparently closed in January. In July, the state's auditor said Greentech's employment in the state peaked at 143 and the firm now owes the state $6.4 million for failing to live up to promises it made to get a $5 million financing package from the government there.

Earlier this month Attorney General Jim Hood (D-Miss.) filed a lawsuit against the firm seeking about $3 million in damages, plus forfeiture of land used for the factory in Tunica.

Abeles said the Chinese involved in his suit approached his firm as a group, although the group grew somewhat before the case was filed.

"We had done one or two of these EB-5 cases out there in California," he said. "This group came to us."

A key challenge for the investors' suit will be proving that McAuliffe, Rodham or Wang should be individually liable for any losses. Typically, use of a corporation to solicit investments makes it difficult to recover against the people involved, but Abeles said the companies are little more than paper structures.

"As we see it, these people invested in Terry McAuliffe. They invested in Anthony Rodham. They invested in Charlie Wang," Abeles said. "More than the typical case, the individuals drove the bus here."

Greentech did not respond to messages seeking comment for this story. Wang and Rodham could not be reached for comment.

With help from Eric Wolff and Emily Holden

'PURGE' OF EPA SCIENCE BOARDS FEARED: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt framed his move to bar researchers who get agency grants from serving on its advisory boards as ensuring true scientific independence, but science advocates and Democrats slammed it as a "purge" of qualified scientific advice that will profoundly alter the information Pruitt uses for evaluating public health risks and writing regulations, Pro's Emily Holden reports.

Reactions from critics: "He is single-handedly doing the most violence to science itself of any member of any administration in recent history," Sen. Brian Schatz told ME. And Robert Johnston, an economics professor at Clark University who has been on the Science Advisory Board for five years, said: "I've put a lot of work into trying to do my best to help the EPA use the best science possible to make good decisions on behalf of the public," Johnston said. "I think it's really unfortunate that that role is now being politicized in a way that it never has before under any administration."

Who's affected? At least five of the 47 current Science Advisory Board members appear to receive funding under EPA grants, and Pruitt may ultimately be able to replace more than half the members of SAB, Emily reports. At risk of losing their spots are scientists from Harvard University, Stanford University, Carnegie Mellon University and the University of California at Berkeley, who study cancer, immunology and respiratory diseases, as well as the effects of exposure to chemicals. Pruitt said SAB members "will have to choose: either the grant or service, but not both."

What will they do? Johnston said he got a call from EPA yesterday notifying him of the change. He will cede his advisory role, rather than give up the grant project with his students that is considering what value people place on various water quality improvements. Francine Laden, a board member who has funding to study how exposure to pollution impacts low-income communities, said she also would likely opt to keep her grant, adding she has "serious concerns about the motivations and implications of this decision."

Coming aboard: Michael Honeycutt, of the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, will chair the Science Advisory Board. Tony Cox, a statistician from Cox Associates, will head the air advisory board. Both have argued against the benefits of reducing smog. Paul Gilman, chief sustainability officer at Covanta and a former EPA official under President George W. Bush, will serve as chairman of the panel that advises the Office of Research and Development. Several potential incoming members to various boards, which Pruitt said he'd announce in the coming weeks, are from state environment agencies and have been critical of Obama-era regulations. Stan Young, a scientist who formerly worked for major pharmaceutical companies and is affiliated with the Heartland Institute, and Richard Smith, a longtime consultant for the American Petroleum Institute who has opposed stricter ozone standards, are also expected to be named.

GOP EYES RULE CHANGE TO SPEED CONFIRMATIONS: Frustrated with the slow pace of confirmations, Senate EPW Chairman John Barrasso said Tuesday he wants to lower the amount of time that can be used post-cloture to speed confirmations of various nominees. "I believe it is time to change the rules of the Senate ... so that President Trump can get his team in place," he said.

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell appeared to back the proposed change, POLITICO's Elana Schor reports. Another member of Senate Republican leadership, Roy Blunt, added: "Protections of the minority in the Senate rules is only there until the minority takes advantage of those protections." ME would note Republicans routinely dragged out the process on Obama-era nominations, and some of the current delays stem from internal Republican disputes.

Speaking of which, Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski said there had been no progress in freeing a host of DOE, FERC and Interior nominations from being held up due to a hold Jim Inhofe placed on Democratic FERC nominee Richard Glick over inaction on multiple EPA and NRC picks. "Inhofe is making good progress in working with leadership to prioritize floor consideration of EPA nominees," a spokeswoman told ME. "He is optimistic that they will come to an agreement soon and he can lift his hold on Richard Glick."

HELP WANTED: Puerto Rico's utility asked two trade groups — American Public Power Association and the Edison Electric Institute — in a letter Tuesday to send mainland crews to help get the lights back on the island and both agreed. "While this will not be a typical restoration process, we are fully committed to overcoming those challenges and to bringing our experience and resources to Puerto Rico," the groups said in a letter in response.

FEMA: Nothing spent on Whitefish deal: FEMA Administrator Brock Long told a Senate committee "not one dollar" of the agency's funds were spent on the now-cancelled $300 million contract awarded to Montana-based Whitefish Energy for grid restoration work on the island. "There's no lawyer inside FEMA that would've ever agreed to the language that was in that contract to begin with," Long said.

On the Hill today, House Democrats hold a press conference with San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz at 10:30 a.m. in HVC-210 Alcove in the Capitol Visitor Center after the Homeland

Murkowski planning trip to island: Murkowski says she's planning to visit the devastated island, where just 33 percent of people have electricity, "shortly" and said her priority remains getting the lights on as quickly as possible following the Whitefish contract's cancellation. "My real interest is going to be to ensure that we don't have a delayed or protracted delay in getting to the work," she told reporters. "Really, we got to get moving here."

DOE OUTLINES OBAMA-ERA NON-COMMERICAL TRAVEL: Obama-era Energy officials used government aircraft on three occasions and a non-commercial plane once during 2016, according to records submitted to the House Oversight Committee on Tuesday. Then-Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz flew on a government plane while traveling on official business to Mexico City in January 2017 and took a Bonneville Power Administration plane during a trip in Washington in August 2016. Then-Deputy Secretary Elizabeth Sherwood-Randall also used a Bonneville aircraft to tour the Grand Coulee Dam in February and a Southern Co. plane to visit the Vogtle and Kemper plants in March 2016.

TAX ROLLOUT KICKED: House Ways and Means members postponed the rollout of their much-anticipated tax bill until Thursday as many of the critical details remain undecided, POLITICO's Rachael Bade, Bernie Becker, Brian Falter and Aaron Lorenzo report. Critically, lawmakers have yet to iron out how to pay for their proposed $5.5 trillion in tax cuts, since any major revenue-generator is certain to antagonize some powerful lobby or group of lawmakers who could defeat it.

MAJOR ENERGY DISCUSSION DRAFT RELEASED: After months of gathering input, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop released a discussion draft of legislation overhaul onshore and offshore energy development regulations. "This comprehensive overhaul of upstream energy policy creates the regulatory certainty that is needed to spur economic investment on federal lands," he said in a statement. A Natural Resources subcommittee holds a legislative hearing Nov. 7 on the draft.

Forest bill gets a vote: House lawmakers today take up the Resilient Federal Forests Act H.R. 2936 \(115\), which overhauls forest management activities on public lands. Critics say it eviscerates bedrock environmental laws.

MURKOWSKI: FULL CONFIDENCE IN ZINKE: Concerns over his non-commercial travel, the controversial $300 million Whitefish Energy contract and various campaign activities haven't shaken Murkowski's faith in Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke. "What I can tell you is [that on] the issues that we have been working with him on, he is dogged, he is focused," she told reporters. "We're good."

Attractions yet to come: Murkowski has no plans to bring Zinke or Energy Secretary Rick Perry before the committee this month, but hopes to schedule a hearing with Perry after the comment period on his grid resiliency push closes at FERC. "That would be an interesting hearing," she said. "There's been a lot of focus on that and a lot of interest in it."

Pruitt seeks independent science advisers, critics see purge Back

By Emily Holden | 10/31/2017 05:22 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt banned researchers who get EPA grants from serving on its advisory boards Tuesday, a move critics say will purge the influential bodies of top scientists and replace them with advisers from energy companies and conservative groups.

The move is the latest shift at EPA by Pruitt, who long contended during his previous role as Oklahoma attorney general that the agency had ignored states and businesses it regulated. Pruitt's move is expected to alter the advice from the scientific boards that is used for evaluating public health risks and writing regulations.

Pruitt said his new directive was designed to ensure the scientists who were giving EPA advice were truly independent, and not receiving agency funding. Current science board members had received $77 million in research funding over the past three years, he said.

"To the American people across the country, we want to ensure that there's integrity in the process and that scientists that are advising us are doing so with not any type of appearance of conflict," he told an event at EPA headquarters with Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), who heads the House Science Committee, and Sens. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) and Mike Rounds (R-S.D.).

Environmental advocates and Democrats quickly condemned the announcement as hypocritical, since many of the industries that could have representation on the boards stand to benefit from Pruitt's efforts to roll back or stall environmental standards.

"It flies in the face of a long history of Republicans and Democrats who took their jobs seriously as EPA administrator," Sen. Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) told POLITICO. "He is single-handedly doing the most violence to science itself of any member of any administration in recent history."

Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) said Pruitt's "efforts to delegitimize the work of nonpartisan scientists doesn't just offend the long tradition of this science-based agency," but also "endangers the health of every American."

"Mr. Pruitt has repeatedly worked to silence EPA scientists, deny the facts and discredit science inconvenient to his agenda; now he's trying to get rid of agency access to scientific advice altogether," Carper said in a statement.

The new policy applies to EPA's Science Advisory Board, which considers whether the research the agency uses to make decisions on protect public health is rigorous enough, as well as the Clean Air Scientific Advisory Committee, which is required by law to recommend science-based standards to control air pollution. It also applies to the Board of Scientific Counselors, which advises EPA's Office of Research and Development.

At least five of the 47 current SAB members appear to receive funding under EPA grants, according to an analysis by the Union of Concerned Scientists.

Members, Pruitt said, "will have to choose: either the grant or service, but not both."

Three other SAB members who are serving unexpired terms did not appear on an unconfirmed list of prospective members, while some other members' terms won't be renewed. In all, Pruitt could fill more than half the spots on the panel.

"The real intention of doing this is so he can wipe out the current composition of the Science Advisory Board," said Joe Arvai, a researcher from the University of Michigan whose SAB term ended in September and will not be renewed. "They know the numbers. They know if they can do this, they can effectively wipe from the rolls the vast majority of people the previous administration appointed."

Arvai said the new directive would allow Pruitt to stack the board with "scientists for hire who would be more than happy to rubber-stamp his deregulatory agenda."

Angela Nugent, a staffer for the SAB from 1998 to 2015, said that board's vetting for potential conflicts of interest was already extensive, and she noted that industry scientists already held spots on the SAB, which has reviewed such controversial issues as the environmental impacts of fracking for oil and gas.

"We try to get eminent scientists on the SAB, its standing subcommittees and its panels," Nugent said. "We want to get people who can speak authoritatively from their disciplinary perspective."

The other board, CASAC, recommends acceptable levels of pollutants such as soot, smog, lead, sulfur dioxide, nitrogen dioxide and carbon monoxide. It has long been a target for Republicans and industry groups who say EPA scientists have an anti-business bias and conceal data they use to come to conclusions. But the courts have repeatedly required the agency to abide by CASAC recommendations.

The dismissals appear to hit scientists from Harvard University, Stanford University, Carnegie Mellon University and the University of California at Berkeley who study cancer, immunology and respiratory diseases, as well as the effects of exposure to chemicals.

Their replacements, according to the list of new appointees, could include Richard Smith, a longtime consultant for the American Petroleum Institute and University of North Carolina professor who has opposed tougher ozone standards and questioned benefits the Obama administration claimed for lowering particulate matter levels.

Another new appointee is Stan Young, a scientist who formerly worked for major pharmaceutical companies and is affiliated with the Heartland Institute, an advocacy group that argues there is no link between human activity and climate change.

Several potential incoming members are from state environment agencies, including former North Carolina Department of Environmental Quality Donald van der Vaart, a chemical engineer. Van der Vaart opposed the Obama EPA's climate standards for power plants, which Pruitt has begun to unwind.

Myron Ebell, an early EPA adviser to the Trump administration who works at the conservative Competitive Enterprise Institute, said van der Vaart is an "outstanding" choice, citing his doctorate in chemical engineering from Trinity, Cambridge, a law degree, and a substantial publication record in science and law.

"But on top of that he knows how science interacts with regulation and also how the EPA interacts with state environmental agencies because he has been an air regulator in N.C. for over 20 years and served for several years as secretary of environmental protection in the McCrory administration," Ebell said.

Pruitt also announced the heads of the three panels on Tuesday and said he will disclose other appointees in the next week.

Michael Honeycutt, of the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, will chair the Science Advisory Board, while Tony Cox, a statistician from Cox Associates, will head the air advisory board. Both have argued against the benefits of reducing smog, which irritates the lining of the lungs and can cause asthma attacks.

Paul Gilman, chief sustainability officer at Covanta and a former EPA official under President George W. Bush, will serve as chairman of the panel that advises the Office of Research and Development.

Among the scientists losing their positions is Robert Johnston, an economics professor at Clark University who has been on the Science Advisory Board for five years. His research team receives EPA funding to study how and why Americans value and benefit from different kinds of improvements to water quality improvements, one of the core causes that Pruitt has repeatedly said he supports.

Johnston said his grant hasn't affected his advice to EPA on a range of issues, from toxicology assessments to methods for evaluating the benefits and costs of environmental regulations.

"I've put a lot of work into trying to do my best to help the EPA use the best science possible to make good decisions on behalf of the public," Johnston said. "I think it's really unfortunate that that role is now being politicized in a way that it never has before under any administration. In my personal view, this doesn't have anything to do with science, it has to do with politics."

Scientists at academic institutions typically get their funding from a variety of government sources and foundations, as well as some companies who are seeking unbiased information on specific issues.

Former EPA officials familiar with the boards stressed that they review each member's work history for any appearance of bias.

"There are systems to make them competitive, independently reviewed and selected away from the politics of EPA," said Tom Burke, the head of the Office of Research and Development under former President Barack Obama. "So the question becomes, why would EPA choose to eliminate from service to our national EPA the best and brightest from the fields of environmental science?"

McConnell floats rules change to limit debate on nominations Back

By Elana Schor | 10/31/2017 04:07 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) suggested on Tuesday that he would support a rules change limiting Democrats' ability to delay confirmation of President Donald Trump's nominees.

Although they cannot filibuster Trump's nominees because of previous rules changes, Democrats have tied up the Senate floor with lengthy confirmation debates — from Cabinet nominees to a series of less-senior names whose approvals were delayed during the tense battle over Obamacare repeal.

McConnell has committed to maintaining the Senate minority's power to filibuster legislation, but on Tuesday he left the door open to backing further limits on Democratic slowdowns of the confirmation process.

The consideration process for presidential nominees "is a different matter" than the legislative filibuster, McConnell said, lambasting recent Democratic slowdowns as "just simply ridiculous."

McConnell's protest rings hollow for Democrats who keenly recall his obstruction of former President Barack Obama's nominees, including Judge Merrick Garland's failure to get a hearing after Obama nominated him to the Supreme Court.

"Sen. McConnell does not come to the court with clean hands on these issues," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) told reporters when asked about the Kentucky Republican's suggestion of a future rules change. "He delayed and blocked so many of Obama's nominees."

Schumer, like many of his fellow Democrats, also noted that Trump already has gotten more judges confirmed to the federal bench than Obama did at the same point in his presidency, despite the GOP's push for a faster pace of confirmations.

McConnell cited a proposal crafted by Sen. James Lankford (R-Okla.) that would limit the minority's power to run out the clock after debate has been formally curtailed. Lankford began floating the idea in April as Democrats forced a procedural showdown over the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch — who occupies the seat Garland had been nominated to fill.

The Senate currently has 30 hours of floor time to discuss a nominee after cloture is invoked to limit debate, and Lankford's plan would limit that to 8 hours.

McConnell said on Tuesday that "there may be a possibility to adjust" the amount of time Democrats have to prolong floor debate on nominees after cloture is invoked "in a way more consistent with the Senate, and the administration getting its positions filled in a timely fashion."

McConnell suggested that Lankford is seeking Democratic buy-in for the rules change, and Lankford said through a spokesman: "Conversations with my colleagues about my proposal have been positive. The American people expect us to get more work done."

But another member of GOP leadership said that bipartisanship shouldn't be a requirement in order to limit the minority's ability to force lengthy confirmation debates.

If Democrats don't scale back their delays, "I think we should do whatever is necessary, either with cooperation or without, to stop that procedure from being used to keep us from the other work we need to do," said Missouri Sen. Roy Blunt, No. 5 in Republican leadership. "It's obvious that's what they're doing."

House GOP delays tax bill rollout Back

By Rachael Bade, Bernie Becker, Brian Faler and Aaron Lorenzo | 10/31/2017 05:43 PM EDT

House Republicans postponed the much-anticipated rollout of their tax reform proposal Tuesday night, an ominous sign for a direly needed legislative accomplishment for President Donald Trump and his party.

House Ways and Means Committee members spent all day Tuesday holed up in conference rooms trying to iron out last-minute disagreements. Senior committee staff worked through the night Monday and were expected to do the same on Tuesday to unveil the bill at a GOP Conference meeting at 9 a.m. Wednesday.

But in a move that foreshadows the difficulties awaiting the party of Reagan, GOP leaders and tax writers postponed their big reveal to buy themselves more time. They now hope to release the bill Thursday but privately acknowledge they have a number of disagreements to resolve first.

The delay comes despite the half-decade Republicans have spent readying themselves for this very moment. The Ways and Means Committee for years has held tax hearings and working groups, but overhauling the code means creating winners and losers in a politically sensitive environment.

The stakes couldn't be higher. After failing to repeal Obamacare, tax reform could mean the difference between a Republican majority and a Democratic takeover in 2018.

But for the bill to pass, Republicans — known for their constant infighting — will have to unify. That's proving easier said than done.

Rumors of a potential postponement started to spread Tuesday afternoon. At the center of the problem were questions about how to pay for the proposed $5.5 trillion in tax cuts, since any major revenue-generator is certain to antagonize some powerful lobby or group of lawmakers who could defeat it.

"Our plan is to release the bill tomorrow," Ways and Means Committee Chairman Kevin

Brady told reporters Tuesday afternoon, leaving himself some wiggle room for a delay. Asked whether the expected Wednesday release would be legislative text, Brady responded: "When we release the bill, it will be text."

Later, Brady issued a statement formally announcing the delay, adding, "We are pleased with the progress we are making and we remain on schedule to take action and approve a bill at our Committee beginning next week."

Some details of the bill started leaking out Tuesday after Speaker Paul Ryan briefed conservative leaders on text that had been finalized. The proposal, sources in the meeting said, would lower the corporate tax rate to 20 percent, meeting their initial goal. They've also decided to keep the current top 39.6 percent tax rate on the wealthiest individuals — though they have not settled on which incomes would be hit by that rate.

Ryan told conservative group leaders Thursday that the income threshold for the top rate would likely be higher than it currently is, likely between $750,000 and $1 million. He said the estate tax would likewise be repealed but may have to be phased out to save money in the short term.

But it's the unresolved issues that caused Ways and Means members the most heartburn this week — and ultimately led to the delay. Those include: how to win over GOP lawmakers from high-tax states that are balking over curbing the state and local tax deduction, which their constituents rely on. There are also question about how to ensure that wealthy individuals don't take advantage of the lower 25 percent small business or "pass-through" rate.

Many of the unresolved items are hot-button issues, including what to do with 401(k) retirement plans.

Trump asked Brady in a phone conversation last week to drop his plans to curb such tax preferred savings. And some senior House Republicans who believe that doing so would incite severe pushback have been urging Brady to leave the matter alone.

But Brady has refused to ditch the idea of imposing some limitation on the popular retirement plans. The reason comes down to basic math: Republicans want to lower the corporate tax rate to 20 percent, and collapse and lower individual rates into four brackets — and targeting 401(k) plans could help pay for those cuts.

The search for cash is one reason the panel earlier this week briefly considered the idea of phasing in the lower corporate tax rate over several years instead of immediately all at once — an idea Senate tax writers has discussed.

But the White House and more than a few GOP tax committee members quickly nixed that proposal, and it is not expected to be included in the legislation.

"We're not looking for that, no," Trump told reporters when asked Tuesday whether he was open to such a phase-in. "We're not looking for that. Hopefully not."

Ways and Means members have been trying to tweak other provisions in search of savings. Sources say the panel has been sending proposals to the Joint Committee on Taxation several times a day to see how much money they would save, and then shopped the ideas to panel members.

"I would say there is a lot of Red Bull and Monster being drank in there right now," said Rep. Doug Collins (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference. "The whole Ways and Means crew knew this would be a tough lift — and we've not even gotten to the rollout of the actual details yet!"

The vast majority of House Republicans have only an inkling of what's in the legislation. The details, including the key question of who loses under the legislation, have been closely held by party leaders for months in order to keep lobbyists at bay. Even tax aides to members of the Ways and Means committee have not yet been briefed on the plan.

Ryan "said the committee is 'turning the dials' and getting it to work. It's all last-minute stuff," said Scott Hodge, president of Tax Foundation, as he left Ryan's office after meeting with the speaker. "I think they have all this — it's just a matter of tweaking ... addressing certain members' interests and concerns."

During a gaggle Tuesday, Brady suggested there were plenty of key decisions that still needed to be made before a measure could be rolled out, and that the GOP Conference's response would likely lead to some changes in the bill before it's considered by his committee — a mark-up that's supposed to be next week.

Without offering details, Brady said the House bill would either strengthen retirement accounts or leave them as is, and noted that he still planned to have further meetings with GOP lawmakers from New York and New Jersey concerned about the state and local tax deduction ahead of the tax overhaul's release.

"We certainly are listening very carefully to make sure that we're delivering tax relief for those families," he said.

And asked whether final decisions had been made on expanding the child tax credit and where to set individual brackets, Brady would offer only: "I think we have a real good feel for all of this."

Time is running out to move those dials, however. And Republicans may have to release their tax plan without all the wrinkles ironed out.

Some Republicans think that's exactly what will happen with the dispute over the state and local tax deduction. As a middle ground, Brady has floated the idea of allowing people to deduct their property taxes. But leaders are not sure the change would be enough to win over Republicans from New York and California who could block any tax bill that hurts their constituents.

By leaving some matters unresolved, GOP leaders risk blowback at a time when they're in desperate need of momentum. House leaders hope to pass the tax bill by Thanksgiving and send the bill to Trump before the end of the year.

They could know as early as Thursday afternoon whether that's an impossible feat. Within just a few hours of unveiling their Obamacare replacement bill last spring, GOP leaders knew they had a serious problem: Conservatives came out swinging against the plan, which they dubbed "Obamacare lite."

Something similar happened when former Ways and Means Chairman Dave Camp (R-Mich.)

released his own tax bill in 2014. The Republican Conference turned on him and the bill, scoffing at the pay-fors and leaving the bill dead in the water.

GOP leaders and Brady are doing their utmost to safeguard against such a situation this time.

Ryan (R-Wis.) huddled with Trump at the White House on Tuesday afternoon before meeting with conservative tax leaders who are expected to help defend the tax plan against attacks from Democrats or K Street. And they're expected to try to rally the GOP Conference around the bill Thursday morning — if there's a bill by then.

Even if the already-delayed rollout goes smoothly, the tax bill has a long road ahead.

The Senate tax bill, expected to be released next Wednesday, is likely to look different from the House's. Some of the tough choices that the House made might not fly among Senate Republicans, who have a narrow margin for passage and can lose only two GOP votes.

Sen. John Thune, the chamber's No. 3 Republican, for instance, said the Senate is undecided about what to do with the state and local tax deduction.

"We're trying to sync this up as much as we can, but we realize there's going to be differences of opinion," said Thune.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) suggested that resolving those issues might drag them well past New Year's Eve.

"I know there's going to be a lot of hype around the fact that if Republicans somehow don't pass tax reform by the end of the year, then X happens, but I'm a lot more focused on the details of the policies that we put in place," he said. "If it takes longer to get it done right, that's not an issue to me."

Alaska to tackle climate change, meet Paris goals Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/31/2017 03:55 PM EDT

Alaska Gov. Bill Walker (I) said today the state will try to meet the goals of the Paris climate accord, and he announced the creation of a new committee to address the impacts of climate change.

Walker, a former Republican turned independent in 2014, called climate change a "nonpartisan issue."

"We're going to follow the goals of the Paris accord," he said. "We're going to do them in our time frame, and in our way. "

President Donald Trump earlier this year promised to withdraw the U.S. from the Paris climate agreement, but some states and cities aim to comply on their own.

Walker said he recognized the contradiction in trying to address climate change from a state whose economy is 70 percent based on oil and natural gas production.

"There are those who will say, 'How do you balance the two?' But we have to," he said. "We will continue to responsibly develop our non-renewable resources and use that as the bridge funding to do what we need to do deal with the impact of climate change on Alaska."

At least 10 villages in Alaska will have to be uprooted before they are swamped by rising sea levels, and Walker said he was "not confident" the federal government will help with relocation costs.

WHAT'S NEXT: Lt. Gov. Byron Mallott (I) will chair Walker's Climate Change for Alaska Leadership Council, and he will seek nominees for the rest of the board's seats.

Clovis said to be 'cooperative witness' in Senate Russia probe Back

By Catherine Boudreau and Josh Dawsey | 10/31/2017 12:44 PM EDT

Sam Clovis, President Donald Trump's controversial nominee to be the Agriculture Department's chief scientist, has been "a fully cooperative witness" in the Senate Intelligence Committee's investigation of Russian interference in the 2016 election, Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts told POLITICO.

Clovis, a former co-chair and policy adviser to Trump's campaign, knew that another campaign adviser, George Papadopoulos, was talking to Russians, according to documents released Monday as part of special counsel Robert Mueller's probe and campaign and administration officials.

Papadopoulos was arrested in late July and pleaded guilty to a charge that he made false statements to the FBI about his contact with a professor who has ties to the Kremlin and promised thousands of pages of emails related to Hillary Clinton.

Meanwhile, NBC News reported Tuesday that Clovis has been questioned by Mueller's team and has testified before Mueller's grand jury.

Clovis' nomination to the top scientific job at the Agriculture Department has already drawn significant opposition from Democrats and scientists who have raised concerns about his climate-change skepticism, his credentials and his history of making disparaging statements about blacks, women, LGBT individuals and others. But there's been no public opposition from Republicans.

Roberts said Monday that he planned to continue with a scheduled Nov. 9 confirmation hearing. But on Tuesday, when asked whether he'd consider delaying the hearing amid the Russia developments, he said that was "to be determined."

"I don't think he's a target of any investigation," Roberts said of Clovis on Monday, describing him as someone likely on the fringes of the inquiry.

Clovis brought Papadopoulos into the campaign in March 2016, when he was asked to put together a foreign-policy advisory committee, according to the administration and campaign officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. Trump felt pressure to hastily assemble a team because he was getting criticism for a lack of foreign policy manpower, these people said.

But Clovis, an Air Force veteran and radio host who taught management and public policy at Morningside College in Iowa until 2015, didn't have foreign-policy connections and scrambled to find people willing to align themselves with Trump. He brought in a group of people with little vetting, the officials said.

Papadopoulos had little contact with most campaign insiders, but he was in touch with Clovis, the people said.

Victoria Toensing, a lawyer representing Clovis, said in an e-mailed statement that after an initial meeting of the advisory panel, all of Papadopoulos' communications with the campaign were "self-generated," and that Clovis did not believe an improved relationship with Russia should be a foreign policy focus of the campaign.

"Dr. Clovis always vigorously opposed any Russian trip for Donald Trump or staff," Toensing said. "However, if a volunteer made any suggestions on any foreign policy matter, Dr. Clovis, a polite gentleman from Iowa, would have expressed courtesy and appreciation."

Neither Senate Intelligence Committee officials nor the USDA press office responded to a request for comment.

Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and Agriculture ranking member Debbie Stabenow, along with a handful of other Democrats, have publicly announced their opposition to Clovis. They argue that Clovis does not have the academic and research background required for the post, and also point to the disparaging comments, including some about former President Barack Obama and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi.

LET'S MAKE A DEAL? The White House is hoping it can get out of a bind between its oil industry supporters and its agricultural supporters by bringing representatives for the two groups together today for a preliminary meeting on a grand bargain for the Renewable Fuel Standard, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Refiners, with some backing from unions, say they're drowning under heavy RFS compliance costs, and the biofuel industry insists it needs the mandates in the RFS to keep expanding and to grow advanced biofuels.

Who's attending? Aides from the pro-ethanol Sens. Chuck Grassley, Joni Ernst and Deb Fischer will be there for the corn-state contingent, while staffers for Sens. Ted Cruz and Pat Toomey will make the case for refiners. Staff from EPA, the Department of Agriculture and the National Economic Council will also join.

What about Congress? Sen. Jim Inhofe declined Tuesday to offer any details on the plan he and Sen. John Cornyn are working on to address the issue, but said it would have to address the exploding cost of buying biofuel credits that EPA uses to ensure refiners are blending the required amounts of biofuel into the nation's fuel supply. "The RIN values are a huge consideration because you're talking about millions and millions. And it wasn't meant to be that way. Anytime you have a value system that jumps around from eight cents to 800 dollars, that shows it's a broken system," Inhofe said.

Important context: Senators like Grassley are desperate to get Bill Northey, the nominee to be USDA undersecretary for farm production and conservation, confirmed since he'll play a crucial role in crafting the farm bill that lawmakers are three months behind schedule in drafting, Pro Agriculture's Catherine Boudreau reports. Cruz, who was upbeat after last week's meeting but declined comment on Northey, placed a hold on his selection recently after corn-state Republicans extracted concessions from EPA on the RFS.

Can there be a bargain, grand or petite? Ethanol producers have been deeply skeptical of any kind of deal to be made with the oil industry, which they feel wants to squeeze them out of the fuels market if at all possible. But it's not even clear what parameters there are for a deal. University of Illinois economist Scott Irwin said on Twitter, the mandates in the RFS drive up RIN costs. You can't push down RIN costs without undermining the mandates. "There is no 'win-win' on the RFS concerning mandates and RINs," he wrote in a thread. "Lower RINs prices go with lower mandates and vice versa. Straightforward economics."

WELCOME TO WEDNESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and API's Khary Cauthen was first to identify Erskine Bowles as the former White House chief of staff who lost consecutive Senate bids in North Carolina. For today: Sens. Bernie Sanders, Angus King and Joe Lieberman are well-known third-party senators. Who was the last independent senator to serve before them? NO MOORE: Sen.-elect Doug Jones shocked the political world by winning the Senate election in ruby-red Alabama on Tuesday evening, but it's worth pointing out he ran on a pretty progressive platform on environmental and climate change issues. His website says he "believe[s] in science" and opposed Trump's decision to leave the Paris accord. One thing to watch now is the committee shuffle: outgoing Sen. Luther Strange will vacate a spot on the Energy Committee (so some other Republican will get it).

HERE'S LOOKING AT YOU, PRUITT: EPA revealed Tuesday night that Administrator Scott Pruitt has been in Morocco this week promoting "the potential benefit of liquefied natural gas imports on Morocco's economy," as well as U.S.-Moroccan environmental cooperation. Pruitt's visit included a meeting with Morocco's energy minister to "discuss new and ongoing areas of collaboration under the Free Trade Agreement and the country's interest in importing LNG," according to EPA. The agency said he also met with top foreign affairs and justice officials. Morocco produces little natural gas and relies heavily on imports, although it also plans a major expansion of solar and wind power, according to the Energy Information Administration.

ROUNDUP FROM PARIS: The private sector took the center stage at the One Planet Summit in Paris Tuesday to show what they're willing and able to close the €179.6 billion ($210.9 billion) a year gap between the investment needed to fulfill the goals of the Paris climate agreement and what's foreseen in policies adopted so far. POLITICO Europe's Sara Stefanini with the roundup and here's a sampling of the goings on:

— Moving on from Trump: Six months after Trump announced he wanted to leave the Paris agreement, the world is going ahead without him. "If we're here, so many of us today, it's because we've decided not to accept America's decision," French President Emmanuel Macron said in a speech. Former U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry agreed when asked if non-state actors can make up for a lack of federal leadership: "It is possible, yes," he told reporters.

— Carbon pricing in the Americas: Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Mexico, the governors of California and Washington and the premiers of Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec launched a cooperative framework on carbon pricing.

— ING ditches coal: Dutch bank ING said that by the end of 2025 it will quit financing utilities that are over 5 percent reliant on coal-fired power in their energy mix. The bank already does not finance companies that are over 10 percent reliant on coal — up from ING's pre-Paris threshold of 50 percent. Greenpeace applauded the latest announcement.

YOU CAN'T DO THAT! Democrats vowed to keep a watchful eye after GAO found the Trump administration illegally withheld $91 million budgeted for the Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program earlier this year, your ME host reports. Top Senate Energy Democrat Maria Cantwell said in a statement: "The President cannot ignore statutory requirements or funding direction provided by Congress. I expect nothing less than Secretary [Rick] Perry's full compliance with the law." DOE ultimately relented and released all the funds.

AROUND CONGRESS — EPW LOOKS AT NRC: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee gavel in at 9:45 a.m. to vote on R.D. James' nomination to run the Army Corps of Engineers and then holds an oversight hearing on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission immediately afterwards. Watch here.

Looking at solar energy deployment: A House Science subcommittee holds a hearing at 2 p.m. entitled "Advancing Solar Energy Technology: Research Trumps Deployment." Witnesses include: Daniel Simmons, principal deputy assistant secretary with DOE's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy and Martin Keller, director of the National Renewable Energy Laboratory. Watch here.

Natural Resources holds mega-markup: Lawmakers on House Natural Resources Committee hold a markup of 15 bills today at 10 a.m. More information here.

Examining the future of North American energy trade: The House Energy and Natural Resources Energy Subcommittee holds a hearing entitled "The Impacts and Future of North American Energy Trade." Witnesses representing the National Association of Manufacturers, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers and Resources for the Future appear. Background memo and watch here.

Congressional Democrats, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, rally at 10:30 a.m. to push lawmakers to protect pensions, including those of retired miners, from cuts as they weigh end-of-year spending legislation.

INTERIOR STAFF SHUFFLE INVITES LAWSUIT: Interior Department employee Matt Allen has filed a FOIA lawsuit in an effort to determine why he and other senior employees were suddenly transferred earlier this year. Interior's Inspector General's office is already investigating Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's plans to shuffle dozens of Senior Executive Service employees, and another now-former employee filed a complaint with the Office of Special Counsel and a lawsuit after being reassigned. Allen, who became a BLM spokesman in the waning days of the Obama administration, was reassigned to a public affairs position at BSEE in September. "My client's demotion reeks of reprisal, and these documents will provide us the tools we require to prove that," plaintiff's lawyer Katherine Atkinson said in a press release. An Interior spokesperson was not immediately available to comment.

NOT GIVING UP: Senate EPW Chairman John Barrasso told ME Tuesday he's not giving up on Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemicals office even as Republican defections have put a damper on his confirmation prospects. "It's a question of how Sen. McConnell chooses to prioritize them," the Wyoming Republican said, downplaying the challenges facing Dourson, a former industry-funded toxicologist.

CURTAINS FOR GARRETT? Former New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett, Trump's pick to run the Export-Import Bank, is likely to have his nomination blocked after Sen. Mike Rounds came out against his selection on Tuesday, Pro Financial Services' Zachary Warmbrodt reports. "I believe him to be a proponent of the abolition of the bank rather than a reformer of the bank," Rounds said. "I'm looking for reformers, not abolitionists." Garrett's selection has been roundly criticized by the business community. The Senate Banking Committee has 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats, so Rounds' defection would sink the selection in committee.

MURKOWSKI UPBEAT ON ANWR'S PROSPECTS: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski told ME Tuesday she's optimistic language opening ANWR to oil and gas drilling will make it into the final Republican tax package H.R. 1 \(115\), even though a dozen of her House colleagues oppose its inclusion. "I'm feeling pretty good about where we are with ANWR right now," she said. "We just need to make sure that we're able to come together as conferees and get a package that both bodies can support."

Speaking of which, Conservation Voters of Pennsylvania and PennFuture are running a full page ad in the Philadelphia Inquirer today urging Republican Reps. Pat Meehan, Ryan Costello and Brian Fitzpatrick to vote against any final tax package that contains ANWR drilling. You'll remember they were three of the 12 House Republicans who said in the letter they opposed opening the Arctic area to oil and gas drilling.

Murkowski also said she wasn't ready to weigh in on whether Zinke's use of helicopters to attend Washington area events, like a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, was appropriate until she got more information. "I think we all recognize that there is a responsibility that we have as lawmakers, when you're using the taxpayer dollar, that you do so in a responsible way and something that's not wasteful," she said. "But I also understand that there are sometimes requirements of the job that require you to perhaps take a different mode of transportation."

And she told your ME host she hadn't been following the ongoing battle between Patagonia and Zinke, but that she too had been irked by the outdoor clothing giant's advocacy for barring drilling in ANWR last year. "Last Christmas, I actually looked at the Patagonia catalog that came to my house," Murkowski said. "I didn't think they were marketing their outdoor clothing. It was a full on effort to build support for turning ANWR into wilderness ... It was enough to get me, as a consumer, riled up enough to say 'I'm not buying Patagonia products.'"

UNUSUAL MOVE IN VIRGINIA: A state panel granted the Atlantic Coast pipeline's water quality permits, but took the unusual step of delaying their effective date until soil and erosion control plans and stormwater management plans are finished, the Associated Press reports. "While this is most definitely not what Dominion wanted and gives opponents of the pipeline more time to push for rejection, the [Virginia State Water Control Board] should have rejected the certificate outright," Lorne Stockman with Oil Change International said in a statement.

SOLAR FOR SAMARITANS: EPA says it's partnering with the non-governmental organizations in Puerto Rico to provide generators or solar panels to run drinking water pumps and wells that supply water to 3 percent of the population and are not managed by the island's government. EPA and other U.S. and Puerto Rican agencies are working with Water Mission, Samaritan's Purse, Project Hope and RCAP Solutions. Solar panels have been installed in four communities and will be provided to four more before Christmas, EPA said in a press release.

More than two months after Hurricane Maria hit, about 43 percent of island residents didn't have power and 17 percent didn't have drinkable water, according to statistics issued on November 20 by the U.S. territory's government. The Natural Resources Defense Council finds that, according to government test results, more than two-thirds of the population was at potential risk of exposure to bacterial contamination in water systems.

MAIL CALL! SICK OF THOSE TALKING POINTS: The EPW Democrats asked Kathleen Hartnett White, nominee to lead the White House Council on Environmental Quality, to redo her responses to questions for the record after they contained identical language as previous nominees. Link here.

DON'T DO IT! The Environmental Working Group is urging Toyota in a letter not to enter into a management partnership with EPA as Pruitt suggested the automaker was going to do at a congressional hearing last week. "By partnering with Mr. Pruitt's EPA, you are aiding and publicly aligning yourself with his irresponsible agenda," EWG President Ken Cook wrote, warning Toyota it risked "irreparable harm" to its brand by pairing with Pruitt.

LEARNING FROM THE DRUG COMPANIES? The Hamilton Project at Brookings is out with a report today arguing energy research and development could be improved by implementing some practices from the pharmaceutical industry. Those include: Creating a strong system of contract research, implementing consistent technical standards and offering better incentives for electric utilities to deploy and test new technologies. Link here.

TAKE A GLANCE! Texans for Natural Gas is out with an analysis this morning finding that even as exports of natural gas have increased dramatically, prices have fallen. That goes against the previous predictions of the Energy Information Administration, which warned more exports would cause price spikes.

White House to host Senate staff for biofuels talks Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/12/2017 04:16 PM EDT

The White House will host a meeting Wednesday with Senate staffers in the hopes of striking a deal between oil refiners and biofuel producers who have clashed over the Renewable Fuel Standard, sources tell POLITICO.

A White House aide confirmed the meeting would take place. Sources said it's a preliminary conversation intended to explore whether a deal can be reached to both help refiners, who say they are struggling with the costs of complying with the RFS, and continue supporting the biofuel industry that has matured under the RFS.

Industry sources and Republican Senate aides say that staff for pro-ethanol Sens. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Joni Ernst (R-Iowa) will attend, and aides to Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and Pat Toomey (R-Pa.) will be there to represent refiners. Staff from EPA, the Department of Agriculture, and the National Economic Council will also join the meeting.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) said her staff would also be attending the meeting, which was first reported by Reuters.

Midwestern senators scored a win when they forced EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to backtrack on efforts to alter parts of the RFS, but Cruz forced the White House to get involved after he put a hold on Bill Northey, who is up for a USDA undersecretary position.

Grassley: Senate Ag is 3 months behind in drafting farm bill Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 12/12/2017 11:10 AM EDT

Sen. Chuck Grassley said today that senators are three months behind schedule in drafting the next farm bill and that he had previously anticipated the Agriculture Committee would have advanced legislation before Christmas.

"We can't horse around any longer," Grassley told reporters during a conference call, adding that the farm bill should be finished in the first half of next year so producers have predictability.

Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts, during an interview on C-SPAN on Sunday, said he is aiming to have the panel finish a farm bill "blueprint" by February and to bring the measure to the Senate floor in early spring.

A factor that could thwart progress on drafting the farm bill is the uncertainty surrounding Bill Northey, the nominee to be USDA undersecretary for farm production and conservation, who has not been confirmed, Grassley said.

Northey, the Iowa agriculture secretary, continues to see his nomination held by Sen. Ted Cruz. He would oversee three agencies that implement key farm bill programs, including loans, commodity subsidies, crop insurance and conservation.

Cruz placed a hold on Northey in retaliation after corn-state lawmakers — Grassley included — used political power to stymie a recent effort by the EPA to weaken the Renewable Fuel Standard. Cruz and other oil-state lawmakers believe those changes create the potential for job losses among refiners, and held up Northey until a meeting with the White House could be arranged.

Cruz and company left a meeting with President Donald Trump on Thursday with a directive to find a compromise with their colleagues, but the Texas Republican did not comment on whether he'd let Northey advance.

Grassley said he hopes Northey doesn't get fed up with the politics of Washington and withdraw from consideration. He said he doesn't have any indication Northey would do that, however.

Alabama earthquake: Democrat Jones wins Back

By Daniel Strauss | 12/12/2017 06:08 PM EDT

Democrat Doug Jones defeated Roy Moore in a special election earthquake Tuesday, flipping an Alabama Senate seat to Democrats for the first time in a quarter-century and dealing a huge political setback to President Donald Trump.

The Associated Press called the race for Jones, a former U.S. attorney, who had 49.9 percent of the vote to Moore's 48.4 percent with all precincts reporting — a difference of more than 21,000 votes.

Still, Moore declined to concede, saying there were still military and other votes that need to be counted. Alabama Secretary of State John Merrill told CNN it would be "highly unusual and highly unlikely" for the outstanding ballots to change the results of the race.

In Alabama, an automatic recount is triggered when the margin between the two candidates is under 0.5 percentage points. A candidate, however, has the option of seeking a recount if the margin is wider than that but has to pay for it, Merrill said.

Barring a miracle, all of that pointed to a victory for Jones.

"I am truly overwhelmed," the Democratic told ebullient supporters in a Birmingham hotel ballroom after the race was called. "At the end of the day, this entire race has been about dignity and respect. This campaign has been about the rule of law. This campaign has been about common courtesy and decency."

Jones' win — after Moore was accused of sexual assault and other misconduct by multiple women — will shrink Republicans' already tenuous Senate majority to 51-49, just as the party approaches final consideration of its sweeping tax bill and prepares for the 2018 midterm elections in a difficult political environment.

Moore's loss does relieve Senate Republicans from one burden: Considering whether they would expel him from the chamber if he won. But the party will have a reed-thin margin for error in the coming months as it tries to push through its agenda. And Moore's defeat was a major setback for Trump, who gave the candidate a full-throated endorsement in the final days of the race, in a state he carried with over 60 percent of the vote in 2016.

"Congratulations to Doug Jones on a hard fought victory," Trump tweeted. "The write-in votes played a very big factor, but a win is a win. The people of Alabama are great, and the Republicans will have another shot at this seat in a very short period of time. It never ends!"

The election is also a major defeat for the president's former chief strategist, Steve Bannon, who as the head of Breitbart led a bare-knuckles campaign to elect Moore and drag down Jones. Bannon had cast the race as an existential showdown between the activist base and Washington elites, but only to wind up on the losing end.

The president set up the election as one with outsized consequences for his administration and the GOP, tweeting repeatedly that Alabama could not afford to elect Jones. Trump also praised Moore at a rally in nearby Pensacola, Florida, and the Republican National Committee injected late money into the race after Trump reengaged.

It was a surreal scene at Moore's election night gathering in Montgomery.

The night started out with tons of energy in the room, but it dissipated as the vote returns accumulated until eventually the room fell silent. After the race was called but before Moore delivered his concession speech, a man took the stage and sang Christmas hymns.

When Moore emerged, he would not say the race was over, telling supporters that he wanted to consult with the secretary of state's office about next steps.

"Part of the problem with this campaign is we've been painted in unfavorable and unfaithful light," Jones said. "We've been put in a hole, if you will."

Trump's late play for Moore went against the will of Senate Republicans, who abandoned Moore after women came forward to say that Moore had pursued relationships with them when they were teenagers and he was in his 30s, including one who described sexual contact with Moore when she was 14.

"The people of Alabama deemed Roy Moore unfit to serve in the U.S. Senate," said National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman Cory Gardner, who had called for Moore to be thrown out of the Senate if elected. "I hope Senator-elect Doug Jones will do the right thing and truly represent Alabama by choosing to vote with the Senate Republican Majority."

Steven Law, the president of the super PAC aligned with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, blamed Bannon for Jones' victory.

"This is a brutal reminder that candidate quality matters regardless of where you are running," Law said in a statement. "Not only did Steve Bannon cost us a critical Senate seat in one of the most Republican states in the country, but he also dragged the President of the United States into his fiasco."

As Moore's campaign fought scandal, Jones became cause of national Democrats eager to defeat the Republican. Online donors flooded his campaign with money as Jones criss-crossed Alabama focusing on what he called "kitchen table issues" (and rarely mentioning his party). His TV ads blanketed the airwaves, hammering Moore as a sexual predator while also introducing Jones as a Second Amendment-supporting federal prosecutor who had convicted Ku Klux Klansmen involved in the bombing of Birmingham's 16th Street Baptist Church during the civil rights era.

Jones rode a surge of energy among black voters and got a key bump from white-collar suburbanites who often vote Republican but turned away from the controversial Moore. The GOP nominee's history of inflammatory comments about women, Muslims and LGBT people had already damaged his standing — and the sexual misconduct allegations scared more voters away.

Moore still won college-educated white voters 57 percent to 41 percent, according to the National Election Pool exit poll — but the group shifted hard in Democrats' direction compared to past Alabama elections.

Trump prompted the special election by nominating former Sen. Jeff Sessions to be his attorney general. Jones will replace appointed Republican Sen. Luther Strange and will hold the Senate seat until 2020, when Sessions' old term expires.

GAO: Administration illegally withheld $91 million in ARPA-E funds Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/12/2017 05:17 PM EDT

The Trump administration violated federal law when it withheld $91 million budgeted for the Advanced Research Projects Agency-Energy program earlier this year, the GAO said in a letter released today.

House Science Committee ranking member Eddie Bernice Johnson (D-Texas) asked GAO to investigate in May amid reports the agency was withholding money for grants that were already approved. In a Nov. 29 letter to GAO, the agency confirmed all funds had been released to be dispensed.

"I hope that the Administration now understands that Federal agencies must provide lawfully directed appropriations to the programs to which they are dedicated," Johnson said in a statement. "It cannot attempt to shut down an agency or starve a program it doesn't like by withholding funds. It is illegal and we in Congress will not allow it."

ARPA-E, which the Trump administration proposed eliminating entirely in its budget this year, selects energy technology projects and awards funding as those ventures meet a series of development milestones.

The Energy Department didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

WHAT'S NEXT: Congress must decide how much funding to award ARPA-E in the future.

Interior IG probing Zinke's senior staff reshuffle Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/08/2017 05:09 PM EDT

The Interior Department's internal watchdog has launched a probe into Secretary Ryan Zinke's June reassignment of a number of senior executive staff, an official told POLITICO today.

The inspector general's office is auditing Zinke's decision to reassign dozens of senior executive service employees, including Joel Clement, who was moved from a managerial position involving climate change issues to a job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies. The office has begun interviewing key agency staff and asked the secretary's office to hand over documents, IG spokeswoman Nancy DiPaolo said.

The audit follows a request in July from Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and seven of her colleagues for Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall to look into the matter.

Depending on what the audit uncovers, it could lead to a broader investigation to determine whether any laws were broken.

WHAT'S NEXT: DiPaolo said the IG hopes to wrap up its work within a few months.

Interior official files whistleblower complaint over job reassignment Back

By Esther Whieldon and Ben Lefebvre | 07/19/2017 07:06 PM EDT

A former senior Interior Department official has filed a whistleblower complaint after the agency transferred him from a leadership position focused on climate change to a desk job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies.

In a complaint and disclosure filing with the Office of Special Counsel and in a Washington Post op-ed, former Interior Office of Policy Analysis Director Joel Clement claimed he was reassigned to a position at the Office of Natural Resources Revenue to stop him from publicly discussing climate change impacts on native Alaskan coastal communities.

Clement was among dozens of senior executive staff reassigned to other jobs in June.

Clement told POLITICO no Interior political staffers ever raised concerns about his activities prior to his reassignment. "It was kind of obvious to reassign the climate adaptation experts to the accounting office where they collect fossil fuel royalty checks. That was pretty flagrant, I would say, in terms of sending the message. So that message was received loud and clear that they wanted me to quit."

Clement said he'd like his old job back, and he hoped other staff would also complain.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said the personnel moves were "conducted to better serve the taxpayer and the Department's operations."

Clement may have difficulty proving his case because agencies have wide discretion to reassign staff, according to Jeff Ruch, executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. "It sounds like he's being retaliated against because of his job, not because of any disclosure he made," Ruch said. "He's suffering due to the nature of his job, and maybe because he did it too well."

Dourson at risk of rejection as more Republicans lean no Back

By Nick Juliano and Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee to a key chemical safety job at the EPA is at risk of rejection after Republican senators balked amid accusations that he is too eager to cover for companies peddling dangerous products.

North Carolina's two GOP senators have said they will vote against confirming Michael Dourson as an EPA assistant administrator, citing a record that included work on a chemical linked to cancer deaths near a Marine Corps base in their home state. And Maine Republican Susan Collins said Thursday that she is leaning no as well — a vote that would be enough to sink his nomination.

Democrats are optimistic about turning four additional Republicans who they believe should be in play based on contamination issues back home.

Republican leaders have not decided what to do about Dourson's nomination, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said Thursday.

"We'll have to see whether it's a viable nomination, and with two against him obviously that doesn't leave us a lot of room," Cornyn told POLITICO. "We haven't made a decisions on that yet, but we'll be revisiting it."

Critics say Dourson, a former industry-funded toxicologist, regularly downplayed the risks of chemicals such as PFOA and trichloroethylene that are contaminating soil and water in communities across the country. Dourson has already begun working at EPA as a senior adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt, an arrangement Democrats have condemned as improper.

"There are all these local contamination issues across the country that have been bubbling up recently or have been out there for years, and because Dourson is this hired gun ... he's almost by nature of his job been working on these really controversial chemicals," said Jack Pratt, chemicals campaign director for the Environmental Defense Fund, which opposes Dourson's nomination.

Republican North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr said Wednesday that they could not support Dourson because of his past work as a toxicologist who was frequently hired by industry to rebut public health concerns about chemicals. Collins said Thursday that she is "leaning against" confirming him.

A legislative aide said Democrats are eyeing Republican Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Bob Corker of Tennessee and Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, although Flake, Toomey and Corker told POLITICO they're still undecided.

"Sen. Toomey remains concerned about the PFOA issue in Bucks County and Montgomery County and remains dedicated to addressing it," a spokesman for the Pennsylvania Republican said, naming two Philadelphia-area counties where toxic firefighting chemicals leached into the ground from two closed naval bases. Toomey is reviewing the nomination "with these concerns in mind," but the spokesman did not say how he plans to vote.

However, even if the nomination is pulled or rejected, Dourson will still be able to influence EPA's implementation of a major chemical safety law because he has already started working at the agency. Democrats have criticized that arrangement, though EPA says previous administrations allowed people to begin working there before being confirmed.

EPA's chemical safety office, which Dourson has been nominated to lead, has a heavy workload after Congress in 2016 passed a bipartisan law updating the Toxic Substances Control Act for the first time in nearly 40 years. The office has been charged with evaluating the safety of chemicals already in use and determining how to test new chemicals before they are allowed into the marketplace.

The near-universal support TSCA reform won in Congress last year may help explain the wariness among lawmakers about giving chemical industry allies too much of a foothold in EPA.

"They wanted to give the public some assurance that the products on their shelf are safe, and when you put the chemical industry in charge that's not going to happen," said Madeleine Foote, a legislative representative with the League of Conservation Voters.

Tillis and Burr stopped short of calling for Dourson to step down from his existing position at the agency. "I'll leave that up to the EPA to decide," Tillis told POLITICO.

Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), who has supported several Trump nominees, said he would vote against Dourson but not object to him continuing to work at EPA.

Before joining EPA last month, Dourson was a professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine's Risk Science Center, and he founded the nonprofit Toxicology Excellence for Risk Assessment, which was often conducted industry-funded research. He also previously worked at EPA from 1980 to 1995. Past clients of Dourson and his research group have included Dow Chemical, Koch Industries and Chevron, according to the Associated Press.

Critics say Dourson's research routinely concluded that chemicals were safer in far higher concentrations than those recommended by agencies like EPA, putting communities at greater risk of finding toxic substances like perchlorate, TCE or PFOA in their air or drinking water.

Pratt said Dourson's work followed a pattern.

"Over and over again these chemical companies would hire him, he'd look at the research, and say the standard that EPA or whatever regulatory body has is too strict — it should be looser," Pratt said.

EPA defended the nominee.

"Dr. Michael Dourson is a highly qualified scientist to lead EPA's Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution," EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox said in a statement. "He worked at EPA for 15 years, founded a program that characterized the health hazards of chemicals, performed pro-bono work that saved a family near Cincinnati and his expertise on TCE contamination resulted in settlements that helped 130 families outside of San Francisco."

Dourson told the Environment and Public Works Committee at his confirmation hearing last month that he did not have a thumb on the scale.

"I can give you as many or more examples of situations where the science that we brought forward as a team actually lowered the safe dose or risk position for various sponsors," Dourson told Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) at the hearing. "If confirmed, I will rely on the guidance of EPA ethics officials."

Tillis and Burr said they could not support Dourson based on his record and North Carolina's history of chemical pollution problems, such drinking water at Camp Lejeune that was contaminated for decades by chemicals including trichloroethylene. TCE is one of the first 10 chemicals EPA must evaluate under the new safety law, but Dourson has previously endorsed health standards that are 1.5 to 15 times less protective than those backed by other researchers, according to EDF.

Retired Marine Corps Master Sgt. Jerry Ensminger, whose daughter died of leukemia linked to the contaminated water at Camp Lejeune, met with Tills and aides to Burr to urge their opposition, according to the Wilmington Star News.

Among his other industry-funded work, Dourson appeared before an EPA scientific advisory panel session concerning the pesticide chlorpyrifos on behalf of CropLife America. He led a 2008 paper on acrylamide, which can form during high-temperature cooking of some starchy foods, that received funding from major food companies like Burger King, Frito-Lay and McDonald's. And he studied 1-bromopropane, a solvent linked to some neurological and reproductive disorders, in 2004 with funding from Albemarle Corp. and Ameribrom Inc.

In all cases, he recommended standards many factors less protective than public health and EPA research suggested.

He also has done work for industry-friendly state governments. In the early 2000s, Dourson helped West Virginia set drinking water guidance limits for PFOA, also known as perfluorooctanoic acid or C8, at 150 parts per billion. That was 150 times less protective than manufacturer DuPont's own internal standard of 1 part per billion and more than 2,000 times less protective than EPA's recommendation of 70 parts per trillion.

During his confirmation hearing, Dourson argued that the research had evolved significantly since his recommendation to West Virginia, saying that "the science has progressed, significantly advanced since the time of 2004 and the new science indicates a lower level." And he defended the integrity of his work overall.

"Throughout my career — with EPA, TERA and now with the University of Cincinnati — I have been objective in my work and applied sound science to come to my conclusions," Dourson said.

Trump Ex-Im Bank nominee will likely be blocked Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 12/12/2017 04:20 PM EDT

Scott Garrett, President Donald Trump's pick to lead the Export-Import Bank, will likely be blocked by bipartisan opposition after he struggled to convince lawmakers that he should run an agency he once tried to kill in Congress.

Garrett's fate was all but sealed Tuesday when Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) said he would oppose the former congressman's confirmation when it comes up for a vote at the Senate Banking Committee on Dec. 19. The panel has 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats, and all the Democrats are expected to oppose Garrett.

"I believe him to be a proponent of the abolition of the bank rather than a reformer of the bank," Rounds told POLITICO. "I'm looking for reformers, not abolitionists."

Rounds had raised concerns that small contractors in his state could be hurt if their larger customers lost access to financing. U.S. companies rely on the agency to provide loan guarantees to the foreign buyers of American exports.

If Garrett's nomination were blocked or withdrawn, it would be a major victory for companies and manufacturing groups, including Boeing and the National Association of Manufacturers. They have fought to stop his Senate confirmation based on his record of trying to shut down the bank while serving in Congress.

Before losing reelection in his New Jersey district last year, Garrett said the bank "embodies the corruption of the free enterprise system." As he tried to save his nomination in recent months, he struck a less aggressive tone and pledged publicly to keep the bank running.

Garrett's attempts to shore up support fell flat, and opposition to his nomination could grow before next Tuesday's vote.

Other Republicans on the committee said they had not yet made up their minds.

Sen. Tim Scott (R-S.C.), whose vote is one of the most closely watched on the panel, represents a state that's home to plants operated by Boeing and GE, two of the bank's most prominent beneficiaries. He has raised concerns with Garrett's record but has not announced how he would vote.

"My attention's all on the tax reform package," Scott said in an interview today. "I'm sure I'll have enough time before Tuesday to come to a decision."

Asked if Garrett will drop out or if the White House is looking for a new nominee, an administration official told POLITICO, "We plan on having a vote."

The administration has warned for months that if Garrett failed to advance then GOP lawmakers critical of the bank would hold up the confirmation of other nominees to head the agency. Sens. Pat Toomey (R-Penn.) and Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) have threatened to derail other Ex-Im appointees if Garrett were not cleared.

Four less controversial nominees for the bank's board are also scheduled for a committee vote on Dec. 19, and they're expected to move forward. Their confirmation would help the bank's board regain a quorum that's needed to approve transactions worth more than $10 million.

Shelby said on Tuesday that if Garrett were blocked, "a lot of us will probably vote against all of them," but he conceded that "we're probably outliers — the minority."

In an interview Friday, White House director of legislative affairs Marc Short declined to say what the administration would do if Garrett fell short of the necessary votes in committee.

"There are some who look at it myopically and will say, 'Here's your challenge in committee,'" Short said. "But I think focusing on the committee in and of itself doesn't factor in other members of Congress who will oppose a different nominee."

Underscoring the wedge that the Export-Import Bank has driven between Republicans, manufacturers on Tuesday applauded Rounds for announcing his opposition, while conservative groups went on the attack.

"Sen. Rounds is placing special interests and lobbyists above the interests of the American people," Club for Growth President David McIntosh said. "A vote against Scott Garrett is a vote for business as usual in Washington. Rounds' opposition will serve to protect the swamp and its creatures rather drain it."

ANWR drilling in tax bill draws opposition from a dozen House Republicans Back

By Nick Juliano | 11/30/2017 06:33 PM EDT

A dozen House Republicans raised concerns today about a rider in the Senate tax bill that would allow drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

The lawmakers did not mention the tax bill by name in their letter, and they stopped short of promising to pull their support if ANWR drilling is included. But they said they had "concerns with any proposal that would implement an oil and gas leasing program in the Refuge" and questioned whether new drilling there was necessary.

"Further, the resources beneath the Refuge's Coastal Plain simply are not necessary for our nation's energy independence," wrote Reps. Brian Fitzpatrick, Dave Reichert and 10 of their GOP colleagues.

Six of the 12 lawmakers already voted against the House tax bill earlier this month, citing objections such as its elimination of the state and local tax deduction.

Opening ANWR is a priority for Sen. Lisa Murkowski, a key swing vote in the upper chamber, which hopes to pass its version of the bill as soon as this week.

Zinke booked government helicopters to attend D.C. events Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/07/2017 06:31 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke spent more than $14,000 on government helicopters this summer to take himself and staff to and from official events near Washington, D.C., in order to accommodate his attendance at a swearing-in ceremony for his replacement in Congress and a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, according to previously undisclosed official travel documents.

The travel logs, released to POLITICO via a Freedom of Information Act request, show Zinke using taxpayer-funded vehicles from the U.S. Park Police to help accommodate his political events schedule.

In a case detailed in the new documents, Zinke ordered a U.S. Park Police helicopter to take him and his chief of staff, Scott Hommel, to an emergency management exercise in Shepherdstown, W.Va., on June 21.

Zinke's staff justified the $8,000 flight by saying official business would prevent him leaving Washington before 2 p.m., too late to make the two-hour drive to the exercise, according to the documents.

The event that prevented Zinke from leaving before 2 p.m. was the swearing-in ceremony for Rep. Greg Gianforte (R-Mont.), according to Zinke's official Interior calendar. Gianforte, who won a special election for Zinke's old seat in May after assaulting a reporter, contributed along with his wife $15,800 to Zinke's two congressional campaigns.

"Secretary Zinke's last engagement in Washington D.C. is at 2 p.m.," an Interior staffer wrote as justification for using the helicopter. "Driving to [the West Virginia event] would not enable him to be on time and fully participate as scheduled."

Interior defended the trips.

"The swearing in of the Congressman is absolutely an official event, as is emergency management training," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Thursday. "Shame on you for not respecting the office of a Member of Congress."

Zinke also ordered a Park Police helicopter to fly him and another Interior official to and from Yorktown, Va., on July 7 in order to be back in Washington in time for a 4 p.m. horseback ride with Pence. The trip cost about $6,250, according to the documents.

The horseback ride through Rock Creek Park also included Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and CMS Administrator Seema Verma, according to a post on Pence's Facebook page.

While in Yorktown, Zinke completed a walking tour of the local Revolutionary War battlefield and attended a boating industry roundtable discussion, according to the documents. The day before the trip, an Interior trip planner added to the schedule a 30-minute flyover of an area where Dominion Energy is building high-voltage electric transmission lines to run across the James River.

Interior officials originally estimated that driving to Yorktown would take about three hours, although one noted that "there is a major construction project on I-64, which will slow things down."

In an email to Interior travel scheduler Tim Nigborowicz, an Interior employee justified Zinke's using the helicopter instead of less expensive method by saying "the Secretary will be able to familiarize himself with the in-flight capabilities of an aircraft he is in charge of" and that the Park Police staff on board would "provide an added measure of security to the Secretary during his travel."

Interior officials certified ahead of the flight that Zinke's use of the helicopter would not compromise law enforcement obligations.

The Park Police helicopter, Eagle One, is deployed for medevac and emergency response situations around Washington, a part of its mission Zinke praised later that month.

"U.S. Park Service helicopter pilot and crew provided a life-saving medevac flight during the attack on members of Congress during baseball practice," Zinke said in the July 25 video celebrating American Heroes Week.

The former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL is already being investigated by the Interior Department's Inspector General and the independent Office of Special Counsel for his mixing of official travel and political events. Interior earlier this year released records documenting Zinke's use of charter and military aircraft, including a $12,000 flight from Las Vegas to Montana that allowed him to give a speech for a hockey team owned by a major campaign donor.

WHITEFISH CONTRACT CANNED: Hours after Gov. Ricardo Rossello called for its immediate termination, Puerto Rico's utility axed a $300 million grid repair contract awarded to two-year-old Montana-based Whitefish Energy. "It's an enormous distraction," Ricardo Ramos, CEO of Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, said at a Sunday press conference, according to the Associated Press. "This was negatively impacting the work we're already doing." Ramos said the contract's cancellation will result in delays of 10 to 12 weeks, though the company will complete work it's already started.

In a statement, Whitefish said it was "very disappointed" by the decision and claimed it would "delay what the people of Puerto Rico want and deserve - to have the power restored quickly in the same manner their fellow citizens on the mainland experience after a natural disaster." During an interview with NBC News on Saturday, Whitefish CEO Andy Techmanski welcomed an audit into the contract and said his company had "nothing to hide."

Doubt this is the end of the story: Multiple congressional committees, government watchdogs and others are still going to want to answers to why the island's bankrupt utility awarded the massive contract in the first place to the tiny company from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's hometown. Just Friday, the top Democrat and Republican on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs panel asked DHS to review the contract to determine whether FEMA could be responsible for reimbursing the island's power company for Whitefish's work.

Hearings starting this week: Expect the Whitefish scandal to dominate two congressional hearings on the government's response to a string of recent hurricanes this week. Homeland Security ranking member Claire McCaskill said the contract "raises every red flag in the book" and told federal officials they had "better be ready to answer tough questions" during a Tuesday hearing. A House Energy and Commerce subcommittee holds its own session Thursday on response efforts.

ICYMI: Both the White House and Zinke on Friday denied playing any role in Whitefish landing the contract after a meeting between the Interior secretary and President Donald Trump where the topic came up, POLITICO's Cristiano Lima and Ben Lefebvre report.

Just don't say climate change: After returning from a bipartisan trip to the island, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy called on the government to think about resiliency as it rebuilds the island's infrastructure. "Their grid system is probably the oldest, least efficient, and one that we need to not rebuild as is but put a new 21st century grid system in there," he said on Fox News. "When we go back and make investments there, we should prepare ourselves there will be a future hurricane some time in the future. It's happened before and it will happen again but we should prepare ourselves, so we're not repaying for the exact same thing." ME would gently remind everyone that's exactly what the Obama-era flood standard that Trump rolled back earlier this year sought to address.

Side note: Sen. Bernie Sanders also visited the island on Friday and met with San Juan Mayor Carmen Yulín Cruz. "The level of destruction in Puerto Rico is unprecedented. Rebuilding will require significant resources over a long period of time," he tweeted.

For the record: More than a month after the hurricane hit, 70 percent of the island lacks power and more than 20 percent of people still don't have drinking water, according to government figures.

PRUITT WANTS RIN FRAUD CRACKDOWN: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt called for "some reforms" to the program under the Renewable Fuel Standard through which companies buy credits to comply with biofuels mandates during a Sunday radio interview. "There's lots of fraud endemic to the RIN program," Pruitt told New York radio host John Catsimatidis. "There needs to be efforts to address that and that's what the discussion will continue to be as we look at that statute." Remember that even the rumbling that Pruitt was considering tweaking the program by making biofuel exports eligible for RINs pushed Midwest Republicans to threaten to withhold votes for EPA nominees, so treading carefully seems warranted.

FOREST BILL HITS THE FLOOR: The House is expected to this week consider legislation H.R. 2936 \(115\) from Rep. Bruce Westerman that would overhaul a host of forest management activities and that sponsors claim will address fire-borrowing, streamline environmental review processes and minimize litigation. Critics say it undermines crucial environmental protections by using "the specter of wildfire to facilitate commercial logging on national forests shielded from public scrutiny and environmental review." The House Rules Committee meets on the measure Halloween at 5 p.m.

Confirmation hearing watch: Over in the Senate, the Commerce Committee gavels in Wednesday at 10 a.m. to consider the nomination of Rep. Jim Bridenstine to run NASA. At the same time, the Banking Committee mulls former Rep. Scott Garrett's selection to run the Export-Import Bank, which has been sharply criticized by the business community.

ME INTERVIEW — Virginia Democrat Rep. Don Beyer: The second-term member of the Natural Resources and Science committees is deeply discouraged by the first months of the Trump administration on the environment, but preparing to offer a carbon dividend bill he hopes will attract Republican support and form the basis for future action to address climate change.

His warning to Republicans: Beyer thinks the GOP may regret allowing Trump officials to ignore oversight letters and skip testifying regularly. "If you end up with a President Biden or a President McAuliffe in 2021, I can't imagine [Republicans] are going to want to think 'all the letters I write the next few years aren't going to be returned or even acknowledged.' And [that] none of their Cabinet secretaries are going to be willing to come testify before us. It's just not the right way to run the government."

His message to the demoralized federal workforce: "Please hang in there. We especially need them to stay to offset the Pruitts of the world."

MAIL CALL! BECAUSE EVERYBODY'S HEARD ABOUT THE BIRD? Seven Democratic senators, led by Colorado's Michael Bennet, asked Zinke in a Friday letter to extend the comment period by 45 days as Interior mulls changes to how it and states implement conservation plans for the sage grouse in the West. "Given the importance and complexity of the proposed rule, and the intersection with BLM's resource management plans, it is essential that all stakeholders have sufficient opportunity to prepare and provide feedback," they wrote.

Please CC me on that: Ten senators, led by Florida's Marco Rubio, asked OMB in a letter to send them copies of each agency's funding request as the administration prepares to request billions more in disaster relief funding.

Greens oppose Eid nomination: Ahead of a flurry of circuit court confirmations by the Senate this week, the League of Conservation Voters sent a letter urging lawmakers to oppose the nomination of Allison Eid to sit on the Denver-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit. "Based on her record, if Eid is confirmed to serve a lifetime appointment on the federal bench, it could prove disastrous for environmental laws and regulations," the group wrote.

It's the Maine attraction: Maine Sens. Angus King and Susan Collins sent a letter to Zinke urging him to consider alternative solutions to address the national parks maintenance backlog rather than dramatically increasing fees at 17 parks nationwide, including Acadia National Park in their state.

NEW CAMPAIGN ON ENERGY LAUNCHES: The Consumer Energy Alliance, whose members include major manufacturers, oil and gas companies, utilities and other business groups, is launching a new push across 12 key states today to tout the benefits of energy production. In a letter to members of Congress, CEA President David Holt says the group's Campaign for America's Energy "will recognize and promote what anti-energy groups have failed to acknowledge: American energy and a healthy environment do AND must go hand-in-hand." Holt's letter does not mention climate change at all, nor outline any specific policies the campaign is supporting. Sample site from the campaign here.

LCV UP FOR BALDWIN: The League of Conservation is out with a $300,000 ad buy today thanking Wisconsin Sen. Tammy Baldwin for her support of the Great Lakes. "Baldwin worked with both parties to ensure less pollution, cleaner water, and safer lakes for Wisconsin families," the ad says.

SHORING UP: The European Union is taking steps to fortify its biggest tool for cutting greenhouse gases — the Emissions Trading System — from severe damage if Britain breaks away without a deal on its relationship with the bloc in 2019, POLITICO Europe's Sara Stefanini reports. But the moves would hit the UK hardest since its government — and others — would be left holding unusable junk permits.

MOVERS, SHAKERS: House Science Chairman Lamar Smith named Chris Wydler his deputy chief of staff for policy and legislation. Ashley Smith becomes deputy chief of staff for strategy and operations. Both previously worked in other roles on the committee.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Puerto Rico utility cancels controversial energy contract Back

By Colin Wilhelm | 10/29/2017 02:20 PM EDT

Puerto Rico's Electric Power Authority canceled its $300 million contract with Whitefish Energy, a Montana-based company, after additional scrutiny surrounding the repair contract worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

The move comes after Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló called for the cancellation of the contract this morning. Rosselló's public call to the federal oversight board of Puerto Rico happened after days of resisting any change to the contract, according to a source with knowledge of the situation.

A spokesperson for the governor did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Rosselló publicly objected last week to the oversight board's installation of an emergency chief transformation officer to oversee the recovery of PREPA, Puerto Rico's beleaguered government-backed power utility, after the board filed in court to do so last week. That board-installed officer is placed above PREPA's Executive Director Ricardo Ramos, who signed off on the Whitefish contract. That contract uses federal funds overseen by the utility to repair

Puerto Rico's electrical grid, most of which remains offline weeks after Hurricane Maria hit the island.

The law passed by Congress last year allows the board to act as trustee for any Puerto Rico government entities that seek to reorganize their debt in court, a process similar to bankruptcy. A judge overseeing the restructuring of Puerto Rico's debt granted the request, according to a court document.

Several congressional committees sent investigative inquiries about the contract last week, and members of the House Natural Resources Committee also sought information as to why Rosselló did not seek to activate "mutual aid" agreements with nearby states to increase the number of work crews available, an action Rosselló ultimately took today.

"Transparent accountability at PREPA is necessary for an effective and sustained recovery in Puerto Rico," said Parish Braden, a spokesperson for that committee, in an email to POLITICO. "Immediate actions must also be responsibly aligned with long-term rebuilding and revitalization efforts. Success depends on the cooperation and coordination of the Governor, the Oversight Board, PREPA's Chief Transformation Officer and federal partners."

In a press conference Sunday, Rosselló urged the immediate end of an agreement between the commonwealth's electric utility, PREPA, and Whitefish Energy, a two-year-old Montana-based company whose selection for a no-bid contract worth hundreds of millions of dollars has drawn intense political scrutiny. Rosselló also criticized the federal government for a delay in sending brigades of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

In a news release sent Sunday, Rosselló said his comments were "intended to reaffirm our commitment to transparency in the contracting process in the government of Puerto Rico and to achieve the highest degree of efficiency possible in the restoration of the power grid of our island, in the shortest amount of time possible."

"The goals I established are aimed at achieving 30 percent of the power generation capacity. I am grateful for the effort that the PREPA staff is doing together with the contracted companies," Rosselló said in the release. "At the moment, PREPA and its contractors have 404 brigades working on the island, while the [Army Corps of Engineers] has seven."

Earlier this month the Washington Post reported that Whitefish had previously employed the son of Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and that the company was selected despite having no experience in large-scale electrical repairs and with only two full-time employees. The company has subcontracted out its work on the island.

Since then the contract, initiated by PREPA using federal emergency funds, has come under congressional scrutiny and put Zinke on the defensive.

Zinke on Friday said he had "absolutely nothing to do" with the awarding of the contract to Whitefish, which is from his hometown. "Any attempts by the dishonest media or political operatives to tie me to awarding or influencing any contract involving Whitefish are completely baseless. Only in elitist Washington, D.C., would being from a small town be considered a crime," Zinke wrote in a statement.

Zinke says he had 'absolutely nothing to do with' Puerto Rico contract Back

By Cristiano Lima and Ben Lefebvre | 10/27/2017 03:53 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke on Friday said he had "absolutely nothing to do" with Puerto Rico awarding a small, for-profit company from his hometown a $300 million contract to repair the island's electrical grid in the wake of Hurricane Maria.

"Any attempts by the dishonest media or political operatives to tie me to awarding of influencing any contract involving Whitefish [Energy Holdings] are completely baseless. Only in elitist Washington, D.C., would being from a small town be considered a crime," Zinke wrote in a statement.

"Neither myself nor anyone in my office has advocated for this company in anyway (sic)," he continued. "After the initial contract was awarded, I was contacted by the company, on which I took no action. All records, which are being made available to appropriate officials, will prove no involvement."

Zinke's statement came after the White House denied any role by the federal government in the deal between Whitefish Energy and the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority.

"This is a contract that was determined by the local authorities in Puerto Rico, not something that the federal government played a role in," White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said at Friday's briefing.

Sanders added: "But as we understand, there is an ongoing audit and we'll look forward to seeing the results of that later."

Sanders said President Donald Trump and Zinke discussed the controversy during their meeting on Friday and that the interior secretary said he had no involvement in the contract being awarded to company.

Zinke "reiterated once again that we have no role, the federal government, specifically he had no role in that contract," Sanders said.

Multiple congressional committees are probing the controversial contract, which awarded the task of restoring transmission and distribution lines damaged or destroyed by the powerful Hurricane to a small, 2-year-old company that had only two full-time employees on its payroll as the storm hit in September.

The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee late Friday became the latest panel to probe the business deal. Committee Chairman Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) and ranking member Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) asked the Department of Homeland Security to review the contract to determine whether the Federal Emergency Management Agency will be responsible for reimbursing PREPA the cost of Whitefish Energy's work.

Sanders' and Zinke's comments distancing the Trump administration from the decision to solicit Whitefish's services echo a statement released earlier Friday by FEMA.

"The decision to award a contract to Whitefish Energy was made exclusively by Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority (PREPA)," the agency said in a statement. "FEMA was not involved in the selection."

FEMA added it had "significant concerns" with how officials in Puerto Rico acquired the company's services and that it had not yet confirmed "whether the contract prices are reasonable."

Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rossello said Friday, according to ABC, that there will be "hell to pay" if any wrongdoing is discovered in the contract being awarded to Whitefish.

Trump to roll back climate-focused flood standard Back

By Annie Snider | 08/15/2017 12:41 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will roll back a flood standard designed to protect federal investments from stronger storms as part of an executive order set to be signed this afternoon, according to a White House source.

The Federal Flood Risk Management Standard was established under an executive order issued by President Barack Obama in 2015. It requires that new federally funded projects — from government buildings like Veterans Administrations hospitals to bridges and schools funded by federal grants — be built to withstand the stronger storms and additional flooding projected to occur as the climate changes. It does not apply to the National Flood Insurance Program.

The Obama administration's standard offers multiple options for achieving greater flood protection, but generally requires construction to withstand a 500-year storm. The previous standard, on the books for more than four decades, required construction to take place outside of the 100-year floodplain. The new standard has not actually taken effect yet; each federal agency is tasked with developing its own regulation for implementing the standard, and none have yet been finalized.

Industry groups objected to the standard, arguing it was developed behind closed doors and could greatly increase costs.

Environmental groups have objected to efforts to repeal the standard.

"Ninety percent of all natural disasters in the United States involve flooding. These events claim lives and strain the capacity of government agencies and local communities to adequately respond and provide relief," Laura Lightbody with the Pew Charitable Trusts said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: Trump is slated to sign an executive order on infrastructure containing the roll back of the Federal Flood Risk Management standard at 3 p.m. today.

Interior to reverse Obama sage grouse land protection, reconsider pacts with states Back

By Esther Whieldon | 10/05/2017 01:57 PM EDT

The Interior Department says it is terminating the Obama administration's proposal to block mining on about 10 million acres of sage grouse habitat in the West, and it announced plans to alter the land-use plans the agency put in place in 2015.

In notices posted on its website that will be published in the Federal Register, the Bureau of Land Management terminated its plans set out under the Obama administration for an environmental impact statement that would have potentially led to the agency withdrawing land in so-called sagebrush focal areas in Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah and Wyoming.

"The BLM has determined that the lands are no longer needed in connection with the proposed withdrawal," the notice says.

The agency is also asking for comment on changing the nearly 100 land-use plans BLM put in place under an agreement with states in lieu of listing the bird as either endangered or threatened under the Endangered Species Act.

BLM said it is re-opening the plans to comply with to a court decision earlier this year that held the agency did not adequately evaluate the designation of sagebrush focal areas in its 2015 greater sage-grouse plan amendment for Nevada.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will accept comments on the land use plan changes for 45 days after the notice is published in the Federal Register.

McConnell preps judicial confirmation frenzy Back

By Seung Min Kim and Josh Gerstein | 10/26/2017 01:53 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell is launching a circuit court confirmation blitz.

The top Senate Republican on Thursday teed up votes to install four nominees to the powerful appellate courts, which give the final word on the vast majority of cases that don't reach the Supreme Court.

The nominees are Allison Eid for the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Stephanos Bibas for the 3rd Circuit; Joan Larsen for the 6th Circuit; and Amy Coney Barrett for the 7th Circuit.

Eid and Larsen are among the names Donald Trump floated during the presidential campaign last year as potential Supreme Court picks, adding more significance to their confirmations to the appellate courts.

"By confirming these nominees we can take a big step toward restoring our nation's courts to their proper role: interpreting and applying the law based on what it actually says, not what a judge wishes it might say," McConnell said on the Senate floor. "It's quite a departure from the last administration's philosophy when it came to selecting judicial nominees."

Eid and Bibas were reported to have advanced out of the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier Thursday. Nominees typically have to wait a day after a committee vote before they can be considered on the floor, but Democratic senators gave consent to speed up the process in exchange for not working on a Friday, a McConnell spokesman said.

Nonetheless, Senate Democrats say the nominees are being rushed to the floor, leaving senators little time to vet the candidates.

"I think it's awful fast to move," said California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "I think members have to read the writings, members have to take a look at their qualifications, members are leaving today. We found about it today, and it's on the floor next week."

Feinstein used a committee meeting earlier Thursday to highlight the fact that two of the court vacancies the panel moved to fill Thursday were open for Trump only because Republicans used the "blue slip" process to block President Barack Obama's nominees for the same slots.

The committee had advanced six judicial nominees other than Eid and Bibas, as well as three U.S. attorney candidates to the Senate floor.

"Last year, the Obama administration nominated different people to these same vacancies," Feinstein noted, referring to slots on the 3rd Circuit and the district court in South Carolina. "Those nominees didn't get blue slips from their home state senators, so their nominations didn't proceed. ... Not returning blue slips is the right of home-state senators."

Judiciary Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley didn't address the blue slip issue directly, but said Democrats should be wary about blocking female nominees in particular.

"I was disheartened by colleagues who voted against the two female nominees last week," Grassley said. "When the Republicans voted against female circuit court nominees in 2013, Democrats called it 'unjust.' I won't do that here to my friends, but I also don't want to see a double standard for qualified female nominees from different presidents."

While Republicans and Democrats split along party lines over four of the judicial nominees, Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) singled out Bibas for unusually blunt criticism. The Senate minority whip said an article Bibas authored in 2009 promoting electric shock and other forms of corporal punishment for criminals should keep him from the bench.

"I believe what Prof. Bibas wrote ... disqualifies him from a lifetime appointment to the second-highest court in the land," Durbin said. "This man is outside the mainstream of American legal thinking. I believe he's outside the mainstream of conservative political thinking. Who has stepped forward on the Republican side and called for what this professor has called for?

Durbin continued: "Democrat or Republican, seriously, are we going to vote this man into this position?"

The panel ultimately split 11-9 on Bibas' nomination, as well as Eid's to the 10th Circuit, Liles Burke to a district court seat in Alabama, and Michael Juneau to a district court judgeship in Louisiana.

The transformation of the federal judiciary has been one of the enduring early successes of Trump's presidency, particularly because he entered office with an unusually high number of vacancies in the district and circuit courts.

Conservative advocacy groups have been pressuring McConnell to confirm judicial nominees more quickly, although Trump already has gotten more judges installed at this point in his presidency than his predecessor.

ALL QUIET ON THE CLIMATE FRONT: Even as the double whammy of Hurricanes Harvey and Irma offers the U.S. an up-front glimpse of the types of devastation the world faces due to a warming climate, Democrats are largely holding their fire on Republicans, Pro's Emily Holden and Elana Schor report. Instead, they appear to be heeding the warnings of several of President Donald Trump's Cabinet officials that discussing climate change with large swaths of land still underwater would be insensitive. "The response to Hurricanes Harvey and Irma thus far has been more muted, likely in part because of a desire to keep the focus on immediate disaster relief," said Trevor Houser, former energy adviser to Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign.

Democrats say there will be opportunities to explore the linkage between extreme weather and manmade climate change moving forward. "We have a lot of time to make that point, and I think we also have a lot of legislative opportunities as we look at reauthorizing flood insurance and funding the disaster relief," Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse, one of staunchest climate hawks, said. Environmental advocates have hit Trump's inaction on climate change online, but have shied away from criticizing Democrats. "The truth is, I'd settle for politicians not talking about climate at all, and instead actually doing something," Bill McKibben, founder of 350.org, said.

Tone shift at the White House? Tom Bossert, Trump's homeland security adviser, told reporters Monday that the cause of both devastating hurricanes is "outside of my ability to analyze" but he acknowledged a need to bolster flood and coastal defenses threatened by rising seas and powerful storms. "We continue to take seriously the climate change, not the cause of it, but the things that we observe," he said. "What President Trump remains committed to is making sure that federal dollars aren't used to build things that will be in harm's way later or that won't be hardened against the future predictable floods that we see." While those words may offer hope to some, ME would note Trump has erased climate considerations from government processes, nixed flood standards for federal projects, withdrawn the U.S. from the Paris climate change agreement, pulled back a regulation to limit carbon dioxide from power plants and halted funding to help poor nations adapt to new weather extremes.

More money needed? Asked if the administration would put more money into agencies like FEMA and EPA, Bossert expressed openness to requesting additional funds — "We'll put money in as money is needed to address the need," he said — but added "right now we have plenty of resources to get through this."

Irma could've been even worse: Even as millions lost power during Hurricane Irma, the head of the state's largest utility said outages could've been even worse if Florida Power & Light Co. had not spent $3 billion to improve the energy grid, POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports. "With this kind of storm what I can tell you is, we would be facing a much longer restoration" without the work, FPL President and CEO Eric Silagy said Monday.

Nelson wants Perry's help: The federal government should establish a fuel reserve in Florida to help prevent the fuel shortages that occurred during the response to Irma, Sen. Bill Nelson wrote in a Monday letter to Energy Secretary Rick Perry. "A Florida gasoline supply reserve would ensure that residents and first responders have access to an emergency supply of fuel, and help prevent the shortages that may have kept some from evacuating and may hinder recovery efforts going forward," Florida's senior senator wrote. DOE created the Northeast Gasoline Supply Reserve in 2014 following similar issues during Hurricane Sandy, he noted.

Checking in on Texas: EPA reported late Monday that 35 of the 2,238 drinking water systems affected by Harvey remain shut down, while 35 of the 1,219 wastewater treatment plants in affected countries also remain inoperable. The agency further said it had "directed potential responsible parties or has independently started collecting samples at the 43 Superfund sites to further confirm any impacts from the storm" and said additional assessments continue at two sites — San Jacinto Waste Pits and U.S. Oil Recovery. In addition, Reuters reported federal officials are cleaning up spills of oil and chemicals spilled from a dozen industrial facilities in the aftermath of Harvey.

Yikes: Water testing arranged by The New York Times from two Houston neighborhoods showed alarmingly high levels of bacteria and toxins. Tests from the Briarhills Parkway in the Houston Energy Corridor showed levels of E. coli at levels four times of what's considered safe, while Clayton Homes public housing development downtown showed concentrations of E. Coli more than 135 times healthy levels, as well as elevated levels of lead, arsenic and other heavy metals. The EPA said Monday that 40 of 1,219 waste treatment plants affected by Harvey were not working.

SIREN! Trump meets this morning at 10 a.m. in the Oval Office with EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross. EPA and the White House did not respond to further requests about what they'll be chatting about.

WELCOME TO TUESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and NRDC's Ana Unruh Cohen was the first (of many) to identify Sam Rayburn as the longest-serving House speaker. Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

EPA LAUNCHES PROBE INTO ARKEMA INCIDENT: Officials at EPA have requested information from Arkema to help them ascertain whether the chemical company properly followed Clean Air Act safety regulations before Hurricane Harvey. EPA asked in its letter, obtained by ME Monday, for a response from the company within 10 calendar days of receipt. Among the information sought is what the company did before the storm to prepare for potential flooding and loss of electricity, as well as the quantities of chemicals stored on site. Several chemical containers at the Crosby, Texas, facility caught fire after the hurricane deluged it with water.

MINE PRUITT VISITED FURLOUGHS WORKERS: Consol Energy's Bailey Mine complex, which EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt visited back in April as one of the first stops on his "Back to Basics" campaign, furloughed more than 300 workers Monday after Pennsylvania's Department of Environmental Protection failed to approve a permit modification in time, the Observer-Reporter reports. A company spokesman said it was the first time in the site's history that state environmental regulators failed to approve a permit in a "timely manner" to maintain operations.

THEY'RE BACCCCCCK: House lawmakers return for a day and a half of work, with a slate of 6:30 p.m. votes expected to include the Interior and EPA section of eight-title, spending package H.R. 3354 \(115\) under consideration.

SPORTSMEN'S PACKAGE PUSH BEGINS AGAIN: The House Natural Resources Federal Lands subpanel today considers a broad sportsmen's package, H.R. 3668 \(115\). It contains a controversial provision that would make it easier to obtain gun silencers, bars EPA from ever regulating lead ammunition under the Toxic Substances Control Act, and reauthorizes the North American Wetlands Conservation Act for five years at $50 million per year. The subpanel cancelled the initial hearing on the bill following the June congressional baseball shooting, which the measure's sponsor, Jeff Duncan (R-S.C.), witnessed.

If you go: The session kicks off at 10 a.m. in Longworth 1334. Ranking member Raul Grijalva and Rep. Mike Thompson will discuss the gun silencer provision during a press availability following the hearing.

Other hearings shelved: After Hurricane Irma delayed the House's return, the Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee canceled what was to have been a blockbuster hearing on the grid's reliability. Witnesses would have included FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee (in what would have been his first appearance since confirmation), as well as Gerry Cauley, president of the North American Electric Reliability Corporation, and a DOE official. In addition, the House Science Committee postponed a full committee hearing on the electric grid's resilience that had also been slated for 10 a.m.

SENATE ENERGY LOOKS AT LABS: Senators on the Energy and Natural Resources Energy Subcommittee take a look at the contributions of DOE's national laboratories at a hearing beginning at 3 p.m. Sens. Cory Gardner and Joe Manchin deliver opening remarks, followed by testimony from representatives of West Virginia University, Argonne National Laboratory, Duke Energy and National Renewable Energy Laboratory. More here.

MAIL CALL! UPTON PUSHES ENBRIDGE FOR REPAIRS: Rep. Fred Upton, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee, sent a letter Monday urging Enbridge to "conduct repairs immediately" on its Line 5 pipeline after revelations of gaps in the line's protective coating. "The more recent disclosure of a loss of protective coating and the likelihood that human error was a factor raises serious concerns about Enbridge's compliance with federal pipeline safety laws," Upton wrote. "Rest assured I will remain hyper-vigilant and expect prompt response to my request."

MORE VOICES WEIGH IN ON SOLAR TARIFF CASE: Six right-leaning policy groups will urge the International Trade Commission not to back a bid from solar manufacturers Suniva and SolarWorld USA to impose tariffs on imported solar products in a letter today, Pro Trade's Megan Cassella reports. The groups fear an affirmative ITC decision would double the cost of solar products in the U.S. and leave the country vulnerable to retaliation and challenges at the WTO. "Similar to steel in 2002, solar tariffs today would amount to nothing more than a crony capitalist giveaway to failing companies," they wrote.

GREENS CHALLENGE NEVADA LEASE SALES: The Sierra Club and the Center for Biological Diversity filed a lawsuit Monday challenging BLM's June sale of oil and gas leases in northern Nevada. The lawsuit argues the government failed to consider the possible consequences of drilling in the area, ranging from contamination of desert water sources to increased greenhouse gas emissions. The June 13 sale brought in just $38,560 from three parcels covering approximately 5,760 acres out of more than 95,000 acres offered.

NO MASS EXODUS AMONG THE FEDS: Just more than two percent of federal employees have left their positions since Trump became president, more than during presidents George W. Bush and Barack Obama's opening months but less dramatic than the mass departures feared, BuzzFeed reports. Among the highest departure rates were the departments of Energy (2.7 percent) and Interior (2.5 percent).

REPORT: ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT FOR SOLAR DIVERSITY: A report out Monday from the Solar Foundation finds women represent just 28 percent of employees in the 260,000 person strong solar industry and people of color are a tiny share of the workforce. African-Americans hold just 7 percent of solar jobs, while Hispanic or Latino employees are 17 percent of the workforce and Asians are 9 percent. The study concludes "women and people of color face significant hurdles to achieving equal pay and positions in the solar industry."

MOVERS, SHAKERS: Adam Kolton has been named executive director of the Alaska Wilderness League, effective Oct. 10. He'll join from the National Wildlife Federation where he's currently vice president of federal advocacy.

SPOTTED: Gina McCarthy, sporting a rolling backpack, at the Dirty Habit bar near the EPA. She was drinking red wine and laughing jovially on Monday evening, per our tipster.

Democrats mum on climate as storm damage climbs Back

By Emily Holden and Elana Schor | 09/12/2017 05:05 AM EDT

Hurricanes Harvey and Irma have handed Democrats their most potent opportunity in half a decade to hammer Republicans on climate change — with the massive storms giving tens of millions of Americans an up-front glimpse of the types of devastation the world faces if the warming planet spawns a surge in extreme weather.

But instead, they're mostly keeping quiet.

Aside from a handful of outliers like Hawaiian Sen. Brian Schatz, leading Democratic politicians have been slow to use the double whammy from the tropics to denounce President Donald Trump, who has dismissed climate change as a "hoax."

That's a contrast from past storms like 2012's Hurricane Sandy, when Democratic New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo called the disaster a sign that "climate change is a reality." Even then-New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, an independent, cited the storm and climate change at the time among his reasons for endorsing Barack Obama's reelection as president.

This time, Democrats appear to be heeding the warnings of Trump appointees like EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, who said last week that it's "very, very insensitive to the people in Florida" to talk about climate change now.

The wariness of appearing to seize on a disaster is "part of" the party's calculus behind keeping the climate politics to a minimum after the hurricanes, said the top Democrat on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, Tom Carper of Delaware.

"When we've done a good deal more work in terms of cleanup and getting folks' lives back to normal, I hope we do a deep dive into whether or not the warming in the Gulf of Mexico is really what's causing this," Carper added in an interview, vowing that a broader climate conversation is "coming soon."

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.), a climate hawk known for delivering more than 100 floor speeches on the issue, said he doesn't view the immediate aftermath of Harvey and Irma as heightening the sense of urgency to talk about global warming.

"We have a lot of time to make that point, and I think we also have a lot of legislative opportunities as we look at reauthorizing flood insurance and funding the disaster relief," Whitehouse said in a brief interview.

Sen. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) late Friday noted climate change's impact on extreme weather, citing the hurricanes as he unveiled a bill with Schatz and Sen. Cory Booker (D-N.J.) that would block Trump's cancellation of an order requiring federally funded infrastructure to take global warming into account. But Van Hollen underscored that the bill was already in the works before Harvey and Irma made their devastating landfalls.

"We actually feel like we have not been talking about these bills during this period of time" while Gulf Coast residents recover, Van Hollen told POLITICO, adding that his proposal is "designed to focus on how we rebuild. The idea is, when we invest federal dollars in infrastructure, we want it to be safe. So this is going to be a constructive part of the rebuilding conversation."

Trevor Houser, a former energy adviser to Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, said Democrats indeed may see dangers in latching onto the climate issue so soon after the twin disasters.

"The response to Hurricanes Harvey and Irma thus far has been more muted, likely in part because of a desire to keep the focus on immediate disaster relief," said Houser, who is now at the think tank Rhodium Group.

It's not a good idea to try to land a "punch to the gut of climate change deniers" while first responders are still "pulling bodies out of the water," said Jeff Schlegelmilch, deputy director of the National Center for Disaster Preparedness at Columbia University's Earth Institute.

But green groups haven't hesitated to take aim at Trump online, with the Natural Resources Defense Council criticizing his recent move to rescind climate standards for federal infrastructure and the League of Conservation Voters praising Miami's Republican Mayor Tomás Regalado for saying it is time to talk about climate change.

Bill McKibben, founder of the outspoken climate activist group 350.org, shied away from disparaging Democrats, though.

"The truth is, I'd settle for politicians not talking about climate at all, and instead actually doing something," he said via email. "We've reached the point where they expect a gold star for announcing they believe in science — that's not enough."

Climate advocates argue that now — when the issue is blaring from every TV screen — is the best time to call attention to scientists' abundant warnings that rising global temperatures may worsen extreme weather such as hurricanes, droughts or the wildfires now raging in California. Images of Irma's flooding are still topping national news coverage, and the air of crisis may continue next week depending on where Hurricane Jose decides to land.

In contrast, Republicans who deny that humans are causing rising temperatures have mostly put their public focus on responding to the immediate danger of the storms. While acknowledging the historic nature of the flooding in Houston and the record-breaking intensity of Hurricane Irma, the Trump administration has brushed off questions about climate change, focusing instead on the immediate recovery needs in Texas, Florida and hard-hit Caribbean territories like Puerto Rico.

Tom Bossert, Trump's homeland security adviser, told reporters during a White House briefing Monday that it was too early to say whether climate change worsened the hurricanes, but he acknowledged a need to bolster flood and coastal defenses threatened by rising seas and powerful storms.

"We continue to take seriously the climate change, not the cause of it, but the things that we observe," he said. "What President Trump remains committed to is making sure that federal dollars aren't used to build things that will be in harm's way later or that won't be hardened against the future predictable floods that we see."

Other administration officials have dodged climate change questions.

Pruitt told CNN that "to have any kind of focus on the cause and effect of the storm, versus helping people, or actually facing the effect of the storm, is misplaced." White House adviser Kellyanne Conway chastised CNN's Chris Cuomo for asking about the topic in the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey, saying, "We're trying to help the people whose lives are literally underwater, and you want to have a conversation about climate change." Energy Secretary Rick Perry similarly dismissed the issue, telling CBS that "everyone wants to run to the climate change debate, but that is very secondary at this particular time."

Lawmakers and the federal government will have to confront future risks as they send money for recovery, however. Congress is moving ahead with an initial $15 billion aid package for Texas and Louisiana, and scientists say addressing the role of a changing climate is crucial to using that money effectively.

"Climate change has to be a part of the conversation ... it's inaccurate to think you could have a conversation about the changing nature of risk without talking about greenhouse gases and burning fossil fuels," said Heidi Cullen, the chief scientist at the research group Climate Central, who studies how climate change affects extreme weather as part of the international science partnership called World Weather Attribution.

Scientists say man-made greenhouse gas emissions could make hurricanes more intense. Continued sea-level rise will also make storm surges higher and more dangerous. Both could complicate emergency response planning and investments to rebuild after the storms.

Despite Bossert's comments, Trump is actively erasing climate considerations from government processes, nixing flood standards for federal projects, withdrawing the U.S. from the Paris climate change agreement, pulling back a regulation to limit carbon dioxide from power plants, and halting funding to help poor nations adapt to new weather extremes.

In previous years, climate advocates and scientists could have relied on the Obama White House to amplify their message. Now, they've got cabinet members who doubt whether human activity is causing global temperatures to increase, seas to rise and coastal communities to face more risks from storm surge and flooding.

Congressional opponents of government efforts to address climate change aren't making any linkages between the two devastating storms, either.

"It's terrible to have Category 4 in the Gulf Coast of Texas and then a Category 5 in the Atlantic, but sometimes bad things happen," Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) said last week. "I guess we could pass a law saying you can't have hurricanes, but I'm not sure Mother Nature would listen to us."

Attributing extreme weather events to climate change is still an evolving area of research, although it has progressed quickly over the last few years. Scientists at the Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory, which works cooperatively with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, believe that by the end of the century, global warming will mean more intense hurricanes that bring more rain. But they say it's too early to detect whether man-made greenhouse gas emissions have changed hurricane activity so far. That's because the extreme weather events are rare and difficult to model.

Michael Wehner, a senior staff scientist in the Computational Research Division at the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory, has studied how 15 hurricanes might have behaved under lower temperatures, and so far has determined that a one-degree Celsius increase — 1.8 degrees Fahrenheit — raises rainfall about 6 percent.

That would mean that Harvey, which dumped more than 50 inches of water on Houston, brought between 10 and 15 percent more rain because of climate change.

"The public should know, and policymakers should know, that any planning that you might have made based on the historical record is inadequate," Wehner said. "It's a different world. It's a warmer world, and storms behave differently."

Center-right groups urge ITC against recommending tariffs in solar case Back

By Megan Cassella | 09/11/2017 03:53 PM EDT

The International Trade Commission should avoid recommending the use of tariffs to protect the U.S. solar industry in an ongoing trade remedy case, a coalition of right-leaning policy groups will say this week as a swirling debate over a pending ITC ruling has divided domestic industry.

The heads of six groups, including the R Street Institute, the American Legislative Exchange Council and the National Taxpayers Union, warned in a letter that will be sent to the ITC on Tuesday that an affirmative decision would double the cost of solar products in the country and leave the U.S. vulnerable to retaliation and challenges at the World Trade Organization.

If the ITC finds evidence that domestic industry has been hurt by imports, it should tailor its recommended relief to exempt imports from countries that the U.S. has free trade agreements with, the letter says.

The groups also leaned on recent history to bolster their argument, noting that the statute under which the case was filed, known as Section 201, is an "extreme remedy with a troubling recent history." Former President George W. Bush levied import restrictions similar to what Suniva and SolarWorld Americas are asking for in this case to protect the domestic steel industry in 2002, but those were ultimately withdrawn after the European Union challenged them at the WTO.

"Similar to steel in 2002, solar tariffs today would amount to nothing more than a crony capitalist giveaway to failing companies," the groups wrote in the letter, a copy of which was obtained by POLITICO. "They would be paid for by crippling an otherwise growing domestic solar industry (one whose preferential federal tax treatment has been correspondingly phasing down) and higher prices for energy consumers."

EVERYONE WANTS ZINKE'S EAR: It may be August recess for much of Washington, but Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has a bunch of deadlines coming up in the next couple of weeks and lots of people looking to grab his attention. Today's the last day for public comments on BOEM's push to write a new five-year offshore drilling plan (submit yours here ). Nearly 51,000 comments have already poured in as President Donald Trump's administration is expected to begin the two-to-three year process of writing a plan that would open parts of the Gulf of Mexico and Atlantic Ocean as well as Alaska's Chukchi Sea, Beaufort Sea and Cook Inlet areas to drilling opportunities.

A group of 69 House Democrats, led by Rep. Jared Huffman, urged Zinke in a letter Wednesday not to expand drilling opportunities in the Arctic and Atlantic saying "the risks are simply too high, and the consequences too severe." But more than 110 other House lawmakers, led by Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, said in their own letter it was "imperative" to open as much of the Outer Continental Shelf as possible "to ensure opportunities are not missed" to expand U.S. energy independence. Meanwhile, the administration of Trump ally Gov. Chris Christie voiced opposition to including any of the area off the coast of New Jersey in the new plan in its own comments. And a coalition of environmental organizations warned opening Atlantic waters to drilling posed "a direct threat to the fragile and unique ecosystems of the southeast coast and to the millions of people whose livelihoods depend on our clean coastal resources."

Separately, Zinke is nearing the end of his national monument review, and more than 400 executives from the outdoor apparel, footwear and equipment sectors are urging him not to make any changes to nearly two dozen designations under the Antiquities Act currently being examined. "As business leaders, we simply ask that your final report remain true to the Teddy Roosevelt values we share with you — to maintain the national treasures Presidents of both parties have protected, to defend the integrity of the monument-making process and to assure these majestic places remain accessible for all Americans, sustaining healthy communities and a healthy economy," they wrote. Among those signing the letter are Adidas Outdoors, Burton, L.L. Bean, Orvis, The North Face, REI and YETI.

Monument backers got some good news Wednesday when Zinke announced he would recommend no changes to California's existing Sand to Snow National Monument. "The land of Sand to Snow National Monument is some of the most diverse terrain in the West, and the monument is home to incredible geographic, biologic, and archaeological history of our nation," he said in a statement. Former President Barack Obama created it back in February 2016.

MORE TIME GIVEN ON WOTUS REPEAL: Interested parties now have until Sept. 27 to comment on the EPA's efforts to repeal the previous administration's Waters of the U.S. regulation after the agency extended the public comment period by a month, Pro's Annie Snider reports. Administrator Scott Pruitt wants to author his own version of the rule defining which marshes, bogs and creeks are subject to regulation under the Clean Water Act, though backers of the Obama rule have criticized the length of time the Trump administration gave for public comment.

Speaking of WOTUS, Pruitt appeared in a video released Wednesday for the National Cattlemen's Beef Association urging farmers and ranchers to make sure they formally submitted comments before the deadline. "This record being made is so important because it helps us make informed decisions," Pruitt said, being careful not to specify what the comment should sound like.

IT'S THURSDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Faegre Baker Daniels' Andrew Wheeler was first up to identify Wednesday as the 40th anniversary of Elvis' death. WELCOME TO THE GOP, GOV. JUSTICE! Wyoming's all-Republican congressional delegation is decidedly not a fan of West Virginia Gov. Jim Justice's proposed $15-per-ton subsidy for utilities to buy coal from Appalachian mines instead of those in Western states. "We strongly urge you not to take actions, such as adopting the subsidy policy proposed by Governor Justice, that would repeat the mistakes of the last eight years," Sens. John Barrasso and Mike Enzi, as well as Rep. Liz Cheney, wrote in a letter to Trump. "Now is the time to remove distortions in our energy markets. We should not be imposing new ones." Justice's proposal would have to go through Congress, where Barrasso chairs the Environment and Public Works Committee, and Enzi holds the Budget Committee gavel, and where the Freedom Caucus, which tends to oppose any overt energy subsidies, holds substantial sway in the House.

GREENS CONDEMN CHARLOTTESVILLE RALLY: A coalition of more than 110 environmental and public interest groups issued a statement Wednesday condemning the white nationalist rally and associated violence from last weekend in Charlottesville, Va. "President Trump and all political leaders, no matter their party affiliation, have an obligation to stand up against such hate groups immediately and unequivocally," they said. "Their voices and words — and lack thereof — matter." Among those signing the statement are Citizens Climate Lobby, Earthjustice, Natural Resources Defense Council, Sierra Club and Physicians for Social Responsibility.

HEITKAMP LANDS A CHALLENGER: Wealthy potato farmer and Republican state Sen. Tom Campbell threw his hat into the ring to face Democratic Sen. Heidi Heitkamp Wednesday, Campaign Pro's Kevin Robillard reports. He's given enough personal money to launch an advertising blitz, which heavily focuses on his potato farming business that employs hundreds of people in the state. His first ad includes this pretty witty line: "It's time for a leader who knows how to grow something besides government."

ADVISER NO MORE: A spokesman said Wednesday Daniel Yergin, vice chairman of consulting agency IHS Markit, "fully supports" the decision to disband Trump's Strategic and Policy Forum that he sat on, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Yergin, who advises many of the country's largest energy companies and helps organize the industry's largest annual conference, sat on the White House forum with the heads of GM, JPMorgan Chase and other major companies. Dow Chemical's Andrew Liveris also voiced support for the decision to disband the Manufacturing Council. "In discussions I had with the White House earlier today, I indicated that in the current environment it was no longer possible to conduct productive discussions under the auspices of the Initiative," he said in a statement. "And so, as proud as I am of the efforts we were taking on behalf of the American worker, disbanding the Manufacturing Jobs Initiative was the right decision." More from POLITICO's Dan Diamond on the corporate revolt here.

Meanwhile, the American Technology Council, a government committee with advisers from the tech industry, will keep going, Pro Tech's Steven Overly and Nancy Scola report, citing a White House official. The group was distinct from the other business groups that disbanded in that it was designed to convene government officials such as the secretary of Defense and head of OMB, rather than business executives. But it convened a summit in June that included heavy-hitters like Apple's Tim Cook, Amazon's Jeff Bezos and venture capitalist John Doerr, a major greentech backer.

MAIL CALL! PROTECT CLEAN ENERGY IN NAFTA TALKS: The Business Council for Sustainable Energy sent a letter to U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer urging the protection of clean energy technologies as the Trump administration begins to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement. "Giving attention to items such as a zero tariff for goods produced in North America, promoting U.S. codes and standards, and updating language to reflect the growing impact of information technology on all sectors, will ensure that NAFTA supports the continued growth of clean energy and the benefits it provides to the U.S. economy," Lisa Jacobson, the group's president, wrote. That comes as multiple environmental groups slammed the administration for kicking off negotiations in private.

BATHROOM BILLS OPPOSED BY ENERGY SECTOR KILLED: Texas lawmakers failed to pass several bills by the end of a special session that would have limited transgender individuals' access to bathrooms in public places and schools, BuzzFeed reports. The bills, which divided state Republicans and the business community, were opposed by leaders of major energy companies, including BP America, Chevron, Dow Chemical Co., Exxon Mobil and Halliburton.

TRADE REMEDY CORNER: BIODIESEL INDUSTRY SAYS AD EXTENSION NOT A BIG DEAL: The Commerce Department this week announced a delay in its preliminary antidumping duty determination on imports of biodiesel from Argentina and Indonesia. The U.S. industry which is seeking relief says it's no big deal. The National Biodiesel Board, which is petitioning for the duties, requested an extension to the anti-dumping probe last month. The Commerce investigation is expected to issue preliminary countervailing duties by Aug. 22, which is also an extended deadline.

"It is evident from market reaction that some in the industry are not familiar with this legal process and the fact that nearly every trade case, from steel to cased pencils, includes these routine extensions," said Doug Whitehead, chief operating officer of the National Biodiesel Board. "This in no way impacts the schedule or the fact that unfairly traded imports are hurting American companies and the employees who serve this industry. We remain confident that both the DOC and ITC will find in American biodiesel producers' favor."

SEND IN REINFORCEMENTS: NYU School of Law is launching the State Energy and Environmental Impact Center, backed by a $6 million grant from Bloomberg Philanthropies, to help state attorneys general fight Trump administration efforts to roll back environmental regulations or climate change policies, the Washington Post reports. David J. Hayes, deputy Interior secretary under President Obama, will be executive director for the nascent group.

PARK BOTTLE BAN AXED: Amid news it removed a Bikeshare station installed during the Obama administration from White House grounds, the Trump administration on Wednesday also killed off its predecessors effort to stop the sale of disposable water bottles on National Park Service grounds. "While we will continue to encourage the use of free water bottle filling stations as appropriate, ultimately it should be up to our visitors to decide how best to keep themselves and their families hydrated during a visit to a national park," Acting National Park Service Director Michael T. Reynolds said. The change in policy, which axes a 2011 Interior memorandum, takes effect immediately.

NEW ENERGY INFRASTRUCTURE COALITION LAUNCHED: The Energy Equipment and Infrastructure Alliance launched a new campaign Wednesday to tout "the importance and benefits of energy infrastructure and its ongoing development." Entitled Energy Builders, the effort comes in response to expanding pipeline protest movement and aims to highlight local economic benefits and jobs that come from infrastructure projects. "The extremists pushing to 'keep it in the ground' don't appreciate what these projects mean to wage earners and their families, not to mention the power they provide for America's homes and businesses now and in the future," Terry O'Sullivan, general president of the Laborers' International Union of North America, said in a statement.

REPORT: YES WE CAN (LIMIT TEMPERATURE INCREASES): The Rocky Mountain Institute released a report Wednesday arguing limiting temperature increases to 2 degrees Celsius is both practical and possible. "Today, many experts doubt that energy systems can decarbonize fast enough to prevent this scenario," the report says. "But this belief is both dangerous and wrong." Among the shifts needed are rapid and economic scaling of clean energy technologies; foundational changes to emissions within agriculture, forestry and other land-use behaviors and coordinated market and policy incentives globally.

HOW TO TAKE AN AX TO EPA: Former Trump EPA transition leader Myron Ebell issued a report Wednesday offering suggestions for how to radically reduce the size of the agency. Among his recommendations: Eliminate the enforcement office; abolish the 10 regional offices and push their emergency response functions to FEMA; stop the environmental justice programs; and overhaul how the agency approaches its scientific work. Ebell also calls for greater disclosure from the agency on its discretionary spending on functions not formally designated by Congress.

BIG SALE! Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Total and two dozen other companies bid on 76 million Gulf of Mexico acres, drawing more than $121 million in winning bids Wednesday from oil and gas companies, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The bidding comes up short of the $247 million generated from a Gulf of Mexico lease sale last March.

ENVIRONMENTAL JUSTICE TOOL UPDATED: EPA issued an annual update Wednesday to EJSCREEN, its geographic tool for exploring environmental justice issues. According to EPA, the update includes new data on public schools and housing; a new way to view surface water pollution; and the ability to view cities as distinct areas, like with states. EPA will host three training webinars in the coming weeks. Click here for a blog post on the update from Matthew Tejada, director of EPA's Office of Environmental Justice. The Trump administration's proposed 2018 budget sought to zero out EPA spending on environmental justice, though Hill appropriators have not taken that route.

EPA extends public comment period for WOTUS repeal Back

By Annie Snider | 08/16/2017 04:05 PM EDT

EPA is giving the public another month to comment on its move to repeal the Obama administration's Waters of the U.S. rule.

The agency announced today that it will extend the public comment period by 30 days, giving environmental groups, industry advocates and the public until Sept. 27 to weigh on its proposed rule to repeal the Obama-era regulation.

Supporters of the Obama rule, which increases the number of streams and wetlands that receive automatic federal protection, had criticized the length of time the Trump administration gave for public comment. The repeal rule was originally opened for 30 days of comment, although it was public for about a month before the comment period formally opened. The original Obama rule, also called the Clean Water Rule, was open for more than 200 days. Issues raised through the public comment process help lay the groundwork for future legal challenges.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has pushed to swiftly repeal the contentious regulation and draft his own rewrite defining which marshes, bogs and creeks are subject to regulation under the Clean Water Act.

WHAT'S NEXT: Comments on the Trump administration's rule to repeal the WOTUS regulation are due by Sept. 27.

GOP state senator Campbell jumps in against Heitkamp Back

By Kevin Robillard | 08/16/2017 11:49 AM EDT

Republican Tom Campbell, a North Dakota state senator and wealthy potato farmer, officially launched a campaign against Democratic Sen. Heidi Heitkamp on Wednesday and is launching a major advertising buy to kick off his effort.

Campbell is the first entrant into the race against Heitkamp, who won her seat by just 3,000 votes over Republican Rick Berg in 2012. Heitkamp is considered one of the most vulnerable Democrats in the country in 2018, after President Donald Trump won the state by nearly 36 points in 2016.

"I'm going to be throwing my hat in the ring and running for United States Senate," Campbell said on a local radio show. "The next generation is losing the American Dream. Politicians in Washington right now have lost touch with what made America great."

Heitkamp has raised money at a brisk pace this year, bringing in more than $3 million for her campaign committee. Meanwhile, Campbell has given his campaign enough personal money to launch an early TV ad blitz, beginning with a 60-second biographical spot. The ad tells the story of Campbell starting a custom combine business when he was just 16 and later launching a potato farming business, which employs hundreds of people in the state.

"Today, what Tom Campbell started with a combine and a prayer is a true North Dakota success story," the narrator says in the ad. "Hardworking. Conservative. Outsider. Exactly what North Dakota needs in Washington."

Republican Rep. Kevin Cramer is also weighing a run against Heitkamp.

Yergin supports ending Trump policy advisory forum Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 08/16/2017 03:41 PM EDT

Daniel Yergin, an energy expert who sat on President Donald Trump's Strategic and Policy Forum, "fully supports" the forum's decision to disband, his spokesman told POLITICO.

"As our members have expressed individually over the past several days, intolerance, racism and violence have absolutely no place in this country and are an affront to core American values," forum members said in a prepared statement. "We believe the debate over forum participation has become a distraction from our well-intentioned and sincere desire to aid vital policy discussions on how to improve the lives of everyday Americans. As such, the president and we are disbanding the forum."

Yergin, vice chairman of consulting agency IHS Markit, advises many of the country's largest energy companies and helps organize the industry's largest annual conference. He sat on the White House forum with the heads of General Motors, JPMorgan Chase and other major companies. An IHS spokesman said he supported the forum's decision to disband.

A steady stream of CEOs and other executives had left the forum and a separate White House manufacturing council in recent days to protest Trump's claim that both sides were responsible for violence at a white supremacist march in Charlottesville, Va., last weekend that left three people dead.

As the defections mounted today, Trump said he was disbanding both groups of business advisers.

Trump dumps CEOs before more could abandon him Back

By Dan Diamond | 08/16/2017 12:50 PM EDT

Some of America's top CEOs were preparing to issue a statement criticizing the president — so he effectively fired them from a White House council first.

President Donald Trump on Wednesday announced he was ending two business advisory councils amid a stampede of defections and after one of the groups had decided to disband over the president's much-criticized response to the weekend's violence in Charlottesville, Va.

A person close to Trump's Strategic and Policy Forum said the group had already told the White House it had resolved to disband and condemn the president's Tuesday claims that "both sides" were responsible for violence at a white supremacist and neo-Nazi gathering and that some "very fine people" were among the marchers defending a Confederate statue.

The group in a statement presented the decision as mutual with Trump, though EY CEO Mark Weinberger tweeted Wednesday that "we made the right call." Members of the separate Manufacturing Council — which had already lost eight members this week — were due to hold their own call Wednesday.

"Rather than putting pressure on the businesspeople of the Manufacturing Council & Strategy & Policy Forum, I am ending both. Thank you all!" Trump wrote on Twitter Wednesday afternoon, ending the debate.

The split likely won't change Trump's agenda — the long-time real estate developer still intends to slash corporate taxes and regulations. And the White House said a separate group of government officials called the American Technology Council, which met with top Silicon Valley executives and Trump in June, will keep working. Still, the break-up of the two high-profile CEO groups shows increasing pressure on business leaders to distance themselves from the White House and could hurt Trump's standing with the pro-business, establishment wing of voters and donors in the Republican Party.

"There is no room for equivocation here: the evil on display by these perpetrators of hate should be condemned and has no place in a country that draws strength from our diversity and humanity," JPMorgan CEO Jamie Dimon said in a statement Wednesday after Trump disbanded the Strategic and Policy Forum to which he belonged. Dimon had weighed in on the events in Charlottesville over the weekend but had not criticized the president directly.

"It is a leader's role, in business or government, to bring people together, not tear them apart," he said.

Executives historically have clamored to belong to White House business councils, which give them an opportunity to pitch the president behind closed doors.

Merck's Kenneth Frazier — the first CEO to announce he was leaving Trump's manufacturing council this week — repeatedly pressed Trump in private on reforming tax laws. Dow Chemical CEO Andrew Liveris was initially granted a private sit-down with EPA head Scott Pruitt as the agency weighed a key regulation, though the meeting was trimmed down to a brief greeting.

In return, the executives served as surrogates for a White House trying to sell its pro-business message. Council members regularly flanked the president at a series of announcements and executive order signings. Executives like Campbell's Soup CEO Denise Morrison told reporters they were optimistic about Trump's effect on the economy. Dow donated about $1 million for the president's inauguration.

The corporate backlash started Monday with Merck's Frazier — the only African-American CEO on Trump's manufacturing council — who said he was quitting "to take a stand against intolerance and extremism." Within a day, the CEOs of Under Armour and Intel said they were leaving too.

The president on Tuesday called them "grandstanders" on Twitter and lashed out at Merck specifically. He claimed the defections wouldn't hurt him.

"For every CEO that drops out of the Manufacturing Council, I have many to take their place," Trump tweeted on Tuesday morning. However, no other CEOs publicly stepped forward to join the council, and five more leaders said they were leaving.

On Tuesday — before Trump's news conference but after he took heat Saturday for blaming "many sides" for violence in Charlottesville — Morrison of Campbell's said she planned to remain on the manufacturing council. Social media campaigns in response called the company a "Soup Nazi" in reference to the television show Seinfeld; another circulated altered photos of fake Campbell's products called "Cream of Complicity" and "Swastika Soup."

On Wednesday, Morrison said she couldn't serve on the council any longer. "Racism and murder are unequivocally reprehensible and are not morally equivalent to anything else that happened in Charlottesville," Morrison said in a statement.

Others also flipped their stances. "The President's most recent statements equating those who are motivated by race-based hate with those who stand up against hatred is unacceptable and has changed our decision to participate in the White House Manufacturing Advisory Council," Johnson & Johnson CEO Alex Gorsky said on Wednesday — less than 24 hours after telling reporters he planned to stay on the council so J&J would have a voice in high-level discussions.

Activists said the overnight campaigns and threats of boycotts motivated executives. Progressive groups have also pushed payment processing companies to cut ties with hate groups, collecting thousands of signatures on petitions, though Discover, Visa and Mastercard told POLITICO they had limited ability to force banks to cut off merchants conducting legal businesses.

"The collapse of the CEO councils is not due to an outbreak of conscience," said Robert Weissman, president of Public Citizen. "Instead, it is public pressure — pressure for the CEOs to evidence a measure of decency — that is driving them off the councils. That's not exactly the most inspiring example of moral leadership. No profiles in courage here."

Silicon Valley executives such as Amazon's Jeff Bezos and Apple's Tim Cook also met with Trump in June through the administration's American Technology Council, which is technically made up of government employees. Still, activists like Weissman are calling on the affiliated executives to condemn Trump's comments too.

Until this week, Trump had spent months praising the same executives who are now rebuking him.

"I want to thank these great business leaders," Trump said in February, when Merck's Frazier, J&J's Gorsky, Campbell's Morrison and other CEO advisers joined him for a signing ceremony on an executive order on regulatory reform. "They're helping us sort out what's going on, because ... it's been disastrous for business. This is going to be a place for business to do well and to thrive."

Trump fallout with business leaders could chill relations with tech industry Back

By Steven Overly and Nancy Scola | 08/16/2017 06:45 PM EDT

The fallout between President Donald Trump and business executives this week is likely to chill his already icy relationship with tech industry leaders, even as the White House pushes ahead with plans to enlist their help in modernizing federal technology.

A White House official said Wednesday that the American Technology Council, a government committee with advisers from the tech industry, plans to carry on despite the dissolution of two separate councils composed of CEOs. And while some firms that advise the American Technology Council signaled they would continue to assist the administration, those that were already wary of this administration are likely to be more so after the week's tumult, which included the president tweeting his anger at one of the executives who quit.

"Tech CEOs will remain engaged with policymakers on the Hill and executive branch as they always have, working through industry groups such as the Business Roundtable and Technology CEO Council rather than specific presidential councils and commissions," said Bruce Mehlman, a Republican lobbyist and executive director of the Technology CEO Council, which includes Oracle, Xerox, Dell and Intel.

The CEOs, some of whom met with Trump at Trump Tower during the presidential transition or appeared with him at the White House to tout corporate announcements, could also avoid Trump's presidential photo ops that make their engagement so public, instead working with the federal government through agencies and lobbying the administration through associations and advocacy groups.

Oracle said Wednesday it will continue to advise the administration on technology issues.

Intel CEO Brian Krzanich was among those to depart the president's Manufacturing Jobs Initiative, saying that the political climate was not conducive to getting work done. "I hope this will change, and I remain willing to serve when it does," he wrote in a blog post. The company declined to say whether he would engage the administration in other capacities.

IBM CEO Ginni Rometty wrote in a memo to employees that CEOs on the president's Strategy and Policy Forum terminated the group because it "can no longer serve the purpose for which it was formed." She added, however, that IBM has a legacy of working with all administrations. "IBM will continue to work with all parts of the government for policies that support job growth, vocational education and global trade, as well as fair and informed policies on immigration and taxation," she wrote.

Other companies that have participated in American Technology Council activities — Alphabet, Microsoft, Apple, Qualcomm, Amazon and Adobe — either declined to comment or did not respond to questions.

Their silence isn't surprising. Most in the tech industry were already tempering talk about their engagement with the Trump administration. A parade of high-profile executives attended a White House summit in June, for example, but most declined to confirm their participation until the very last minute. Many have also insisted that their participation in such events is not an endorsement of Trump's policies — with some of those policies drawing the ire of Silicon Valley's liberal occupants.

It's reflective of the challenge that has persisted since their pick for president, Democrat Hillary Clinton, lost to Trump in November. The executives are pulled to assist the government and promote policies favorable to their businesses, but also want to keep distance from a president whose demeanor and political positions have galled many in the industry.

Trump's already precarious relationship with business leaders frayed quickly this week after he failed to place blame for a violent rally in Charlottesville, Va., squarely on white supremacists. Merck CEO Kenneth Frazier was the first to step down from Trump's manufacturing advisory council as a result, prompting a series of other business executives and labor leaders to follow suit.

Trump called them "grandstanders" and defiantly declared he could replace them easily. But on Wednesday, in a single tweet, Trump disbanded two CEO-level advisory committees that had been his most direct outreach to the nation's business leaders. "Rather than putting pressure on the businesspeople of the Manufacturing Council & Strategy & Policy Forum, I am ending both. Thank you all!" he wrote.

But the American Technology Council is different. Unlike those two groups, the ATC was created as a convening body of government officials — including the secretary of Defense, the director of OMB and the U.S. chief information officer — rather than of corporate leaders.

The council, though, has engaged with tech industry executives via a high-profile White House summit in June led by senior presidential adviser Jared Kushner that was attended by, among others, Apple's Tim Cook, Amazon's Jeff Bezos, Microsoft's Satya Nadella and Eric Schmidt of Alphabet (Google's parent company), as well as a follow-up call with corporate officials earlier this month.

"The American Technology Council is solely made up of government employees," a White House official said. "The council is full steam ahead on its work assisting the modernizing of government IT, which is primarily being done through internal government resources. The council will continue to occasionally consult with the private sector on specific issue areas like improving cloud rollout, cybersecurity and digital services for vets."

The official also pointed out that, aside from the June meeting, the group's consultation with corporate leaders is remote, via emails and calls, and that there are no plans for further in-person events or meetings.

BOEM Gulf of Mexico offshore lease sale yields $121M Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 08/16/2017 05:23 PM EDT

BOEM's latest auction of offshore acreage in the Gulf of Mexico drew more than $121 million in winning bids today from oil and gas companies.

Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Total and two dozen other companies bid on 76 million acres, which Interior said was the largest amount of Gulf acreage ever offered in a single lease auction. The bidding fell short of the $247 million generated from a Gulf of Mexico lease sale last March, however.

President Donald Trump and Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke have touted offshore drilling as a way for the U.S. to achieve "energy dominance." But with oil prices hovering below $50 a barrel, oil and gas companies have been wary of committing to new offshore projects, which can take several years and billions of dollars to carry out.

Interior slashed the royalty rate that companies have to pay on the oil and gas they produce to 12.5 percent for leases in less than 200 meters of water depth, down from the 18.5 percent originally advertised for the sale.

WHAT'S NEXT: Public comments are due Thursday on Interior's review for a new five-year offshore lease plan.

PERRY'S GRID STUDY LAYS BLAME ON NATURAL GAS: Months of breathless anticipation culminated late Wednesday with the release of the Energy Department's grid study that concluded the surge in supplies of cheap natural gas had weighed on power prices and was the key factor in the closure of many coal-fired power plants, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. The report, requested by Secretary Rick Perry, doesn't call for Congress to change any laws or agencies to alter any specific rules but does seek "reforms" — from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the EPA and FERC — to power markets that would help bolster the electricity network's resilience and provide support for some plants.

The agency linked four factors — cheap gas, low electricity demand growth over the past decade, government regulations and the influx of renewable energy into the grid — to the struggles of coal and nuclear power, but didn't try to assign a percentage of blame to each of them.

Still, Perry did cast some side-eye at renewables incentives, saying in a letter accompanying the report "[i]t is apparent that in today's competitive markets certain regulations and subsidies are having a large impact on the functioning of markets, and thereby challenging our power generation mix. It is important for policy makers to consider their intended and unintended effects."

But the report takes a softer tone than Perry's April memo that ordered up the study, which said Obama era regulations had "destroyed jobs and economic growth" and threatened the grid, and suggested that federal support for renewable power "create[s] acute and chronic problems." That document, energy guru Peter Fox-Penner told Darius, was "looking through a preconceived, political lens broadly at baseload and blaming renewables policy, which is looking at the wrong culprit. The right direction for a solution is market design."

Part of the reason for DOE's call for FERC, EPA and other bodies to help alter electricity market and aid power plants is because the agency has limited power to direct energy policy. "DOE has no authority," former FERC Chairman Jon Wellenoughoff, a Democrat, said ahead of the report's release. "It's FERC that has all the authority ..and DOE does not control FERC. I would say that when I was there, and I'd say it now."

Other voices weigh in: Graham Richard, CEO of Advanced Energy Economy, said grid operators weren't having the troubles adjusting to a wide array of resources as suggested: "This report seriously overstates the challenges associated with new energy resources," he said. Consumer Energy Alliance President David Holt called it an important step in discussing the future of the energy grid: "While utilities, electric cooperatives, and grid operators have been able to absorb the changes brought about by increases in renewable energy and the abundance of low-cost natural gas, it is clear that they will have significant challenges as the pace of change accelerates," he said in a statement. Others were not so positive. "Coal and nuclear can no longer compete on their own, and they are now pushing Trump to save them. This study is a shoddy attempt to do just that," the Sierra Club's Mary Anne Hitt said.

MONUMENTAL DECISION DAY: Today is Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's deadline to send President Donald Trump recommendations on the future of 22 national monuments -- 16 of which could be on the chopping block. Zinke earlier this year issued a preliminary recommendation for Trump to reduce the size of the Bears Ears national monument in Utah and one news organization, Utah Policy, reported on Wednesday that Zinke may call for Trump gut the monument's footprint by up to 88 percent.

The secretary made a round of phone calls about the monument report with lawmakers on Wednesday, including House Natural Resources Committee Chairman Rob Bishop who, through a committee spokeswoman, declined to comment on their conversation. Bishop is holding a press briefing on the monuments this morning, and the Sierra Club and public land advocates are holding a rally outside of Interior's Washington headquarters at noon today. Sen. Martin Heinrich will hold his own press conference outside an REI in Albuquerque, N.M. today at 12:15 p.m. MST to oppose any changes to the national monuments.

HARVEY OVER HOUSTON: Gulf of Mexico oil rigs and refineries are bracing for Tropical Storm Harvey, which looks likely to turn into a full-fledged hurricane. The storm could dump 16.5 inches of rain on the flood-prone coast that is the heart of U.S. energy production, according to forecasts. Oil producers are already starting to pull personnel off oil rigs, which could throw fuel prices higher until the extreme weather quiets down. Track Harvey's path here.

Perry, Texas' longest-serving governor, tweeted "Stay safe, Texas" ahead of landfall, linking to emergency preparedness resources.

IT'S DEJA VU ALL OVER AGAIN: Speaker Paul Ryan said Wednesday a short-term continuing resolution would likely be necessary to give Congress more time to iron out a longer-term spending package, POLITICO's Louis Nelson reports. "I think that will probably be necessary, yes, because I can't imagine the Senate will be able to process the appropriations bill as quickly as the House is," he said of a CR. And that comes even as the threat of government shutdown grew over President Donald Trump's insistence Congress give him money for his border wall, POLITICO's Josh Dawsey reports, potentially opening up significant rifts within the president's own party if he sticks to his hard line.

WALDEN WEIGHS IN ON MALHEUR SITUATION: Asked about the 2016 occupation of the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge in his district, Energy and Commerce Chairman Greg Walden urged peaceful protest and respect for the laws for anyone seeking to protest the federal government. "Those that violate the law should be prosecuted," he said alongside Ryan

Wednesday. "However these protests take place, they need not be armed, they need not be violent, they need not be vile."

THERE'S NO PLACE LIKE HOME: With his national monument review wrapping up, Zinke today heads to Missoula, Mont., for an "on-site briefing and [to] assess the situation involving ongoing wildfires in the Pacific Northwest and Northern Rockies." Along with Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Zinke will "inspect the on-the-ground operations."

GOING OUT GUNS BLAZING! Daniel Kammen resigned his post as State Department science envoy in a fiery letter addressed to Trump Wednesday in which eagle-eyed readers noted the first letter of each paragraph spelled out I-M-P-E-A-C-H. "Particularly troubling is the consistency of your response to Charlottesville with a broader pattern that enables sexism and racism, and disregards the welfare of young Americans, the global community and the planet," the University of California, Berkeley, professor wrote. "Your presence in the White House harms the United States domestically and abroad and threatens life on this planet."

PENCE: MORE VENEZUELAN SANCTIONS COMING: Expect the Trump administration to unveil yet another round of sanctions against Venezuelan government officials, Vice President Mike Pence told a gathering in the largest Venezuelan community in the U.S. "At President Trump's direction, the United States has already issued three rounds of targeted sanctions against Maduro and his inner circle — and there's more to come," Pence told the applauding crowd. "And we'll continue to act until the Maduro regime holds free and fair elections, releases all political prisoners, and ends the repression of the Venezuelan people." As POLITICO's Sergio Bustos reports, the vice president vowed to employ "full measure of U.S. economic and diplomatic power" to restore order in the oil-rich country.

WATCH THIS SPACE: Look for environmental advocates to pressure sympathetic attorneys general nationwide to launch all-out investigations into whether Exxon Mobil misled the public on climate science in light of Wednesday's peer-reviewed Harvard study with that conclusion. "Time for California AG @AGBecerra to join @MassAGO and @AGSchneiderman in a full scale investigation of what #ExxonKnew," Jamie Henn, a spokesman for 350.org, tweeted Wednesday. Back in July, Becerra told advocates that "though we don't announce publicly if we are doing an investigation, I'm very aware of that particular matter."

MAIL CALL! BISHOP SEEKS UNREDACTED BLM MISCONDUCT REPORT: House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop has asked Interior's acting inspector general for an unredacted copy of a report outlining serious misconduct from a BLM law enforcement manager. According to a committee aide, the official allegedly removed moqui marbles from an evidence room, gave several as gifts and asked an underling to pore through his emails and delete any that portrayed him badly.

MORE UTILITIES OPPOSE SUNIVA PETITION: Add the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council and Duke Energy to the list of entities opposing a bid by Suniva and SolarWorld Americas to have the International Trade Commission recommend duties on imported solar equipment in order to revive domestic manufacturing facilities. "The delivery of reliable, affordable, and increasingly clean energy relies upon international trade policies that increase supply chain stability, not policies that destabilize it," Diane Denton, managing director of federal policy for Duke, wrote.

SUPPORT URGED FOR INTERNATIONAL CLIMATE WORK: As Congress attempts to figure out what to do about the appropriations process, the Business Council for Sustainable Energy sent a letter to Senate leaders urging continued support for the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the International Panel on Climate Change, as well as the Green Climate Fund. "Preserving the U.S. financial contributions to these international programs and institutions not only protects the opportunity for U.S. governmental leadership but also protects and promotes the business interests of American companies," Lisa Jacobson, the group's president, wrote.

GETTING TO 100 RENEWABLE AROUND THE WORLD: A Stanford- and U.C. Berkeley-led peer-reviewed paper out Wednesday tackles individualized plans for 139 countries — which account for 99 percent of global emissions — to run on 100 percent renewable energy by 2050. It won't be easy though, as the study calls for "rapid technology transition" that will see electricity generated by wind, water and solar power replace fossil fuels. Additionally, hitting the targets will rely on public action around the world to pick "leaders who will implement strong policies, reduce barriers and confront entrenched interests." The journal Joule published the paper.

THAT'S A LOT OF PEOPLE! An estimated 17.6 million people live within a mile of an active oil or gas well, according to a peer-reviewed study published Wednesday in Environmental Health Perspectives. Researchers from PSE Healthy Energy; the University of California, Berkeley and Harvey Mudd College found 50 percent of West Virginians and 47 percent of Oklahomans live within a mile of active oil and gas development. The study also estimated the state with the most residents living near active wells as Texas, with some 4.5 million.

REPORT: ENERGY SECTOR SPENT BIG IN 2016: Clean Water Action released a report Wednesday finding the oil and gas industry spent $103 million during the 2016 election cycle, 88 percent of which went to Republican candidates. In addition, the report found the energy sector spent $119 million on lobbying in 2016, supporting 722 registered lobbyists to push their priorities.

RECORDS SOUGHT ON PARIS DECISION: The Center for Biological Diversity submitted open records requests to EPA, OMB and the State Department seeking all records related to the Trump administration's decision to pull out of the Paris climate accord. Those include any relevant emails, telephone logs and notes from meetings involving Trump, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt, Secretary of State Rex Tillerson and other officials.

REGULATORY TASK FORCE RECORDS SOUGHT: After EPA failed to respond to an open records request within statutory limits, the Southern Environmental Law Center filed a federal lawsuit seeking correspondence related to the agency's regulatory reform task force that seeks to identify possible regulations for elimination. "It's already absurd to have an arbitrary directive to strip away commonsense environmental protections, but to refuse to share any information about this process is alarming and simply un-American," Kym Hunter, a staff attorney with the group, said in a statement.

SLEEPING TOO WELL? Your ME host really, really, really hates rats, so this piece in the New Republic warning of the coming "ratpocalypse" due to shorter, warmer winters is quite disconcerting. And, there's a climate link! "I personally feel there is a connection with climate change, just because of logic and the biology of rats' reproductive cycle," Bobby Corrigan, one of the nation's leading rat experts (that's a thing), said.

DOE grid study: Gas drives power shift, but markets need reform Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/23/2017 10:08 PM EDT

The Trump administration's dive into the nation's power system delivered a conclusion Wednesday that the energy world reached long ago: Cheap natural gas is changing the face of the U.S. electric grid.

In an Energy Department report ordered by Secretary Rick Perry, the agency pointed to low power prices and the closure of many coal-fired power plants as mostly due to a surge in supplies of natural gas, which last year topped coal as the nation's biggest source of electricity. But the report also called for "reforms" to power markets that would help bolster the electricity network's resilience by easing the financial pressures on many power providers.

Perry drew a wave of criticism when he ordered the agency to produce the report, saying in his April memo that Obama-era regulations had "destroyed jobs and economic growth" and threaten the grid, and suggested that federal support for renewable power "create[s] acute and chronic problems." Critics warned that Perry appeared to be building a case for federal action to support the coal industry, a priority for President Donald Trump, who promised to revive the suffering industry.

But the new 187-page report paints a far more complex picture of the nation's power grid, and it laid out many of the issues that have been vexing states and federal regulators, particularly in the Northeast and Midwest.

"The biggest contributor to coal and nuclear plant retirements has been the advantaged economics of natural gas-fired generation," DOE's report says. "Low-cost, abundant natural gas and the development of highly-efficient [natural gas combined cycle] plants resulted in a new baseload competitor to the existing coal, nuclear, and hydroelectric plants."

The agency focused on four different factors that were eating away at the economics of coal and nuclear power: cheap gas, low electricity demand growth over the past decade, government regulations and the influx of renewable energy into the grid. But DOE officials said that assigning a percentage of blame to each of those factors was too great a lift — if it was possible at all. Nevertheless, one official said agency number-crunchers were able to identify natural gas as the biggest factor.

Despite highlighting natural gas as the prime factor that most analysts, utilities and regulators had already settled on, one DOE official said the new study was designed to approach the concern around the retirements of around-the-clock baseload power in a new way, and bring new attention to an important but underappreciated issue.

Perry, in a letter accompanying the report, said the power industry "has experienced massive change in recent years, and government has failed to keep pace."

"It is apparent that in today's competitive markets certain regulations and subsidies are having a large impact on the functioning of markets, and thereby challenging our power generation mix. It is important for policy makers to consider their intended and unintended effects," he added.

The report's recommendations don't call for Congress to change any laws or agencies to alter any specific rules. Rather, it appears designed to nudge regulators like FERC to "expedite" its work with grid operators to figure out policies to bridge — or block — new state energy policies and establish fuel-neutral power markets that fairly pay power producers.

The study also suggests that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the EPA and FERC revisit a number of their regulations on the power industry, and boost research and development for grid management and coal power plant efficiency.

The report is not likely to be nearly as popular in the coal industry as Trump's early executive order on climate change and energy, which focused mostly on promoting coal by rolling back regulations at EPA and the Interior Department. Still, the report nodded to the president's call for "energy dominance."

"While DOE is not the main agency tasked in the Order, it should continue to prioritize energy dominance and implementing the Executive Order broadly and quickly," it states.

Paul Bailey, head of the American Coalition for Clean Coal Electricity, commended DOE and Perry in a statement "for studying the challenges that face the electricity grid. One of the biggest challenges is how to sustain the nation's coal fleet so it can continue supporting a reliable and resilient electricity grid."

Solar Energy Industries Association head Abigail Ross Hopper said the group was still reviewing the report. But she noted "it's been proven time and again that a diversified electricity mix is good for the overall system and poses no threat to the reliability of our nation's grid. On the contrary, solar and other renewables provide significant cost savings, relieve pressure on our nation's infrastructure and improve the grid's overall performance."

DOE's call for FERC, EPA and other bodies to help alter the electricity market and aid power plants is at least partly because of the agency's limited power to direct energy policy.

"DOE has no authority," said former FERC Chairman Jon Wellinghoff, a Democrat, ahead of the report's release. "It's FERC that has all the authority ... and DOE does not control FERC. I would say that when I was there, and I'd say it now."

Still, Tony Clark, a Republican former FERC commissioner, said DOE is often used by administrations as a "thought leader in the energy space," given the resources the agency has in its national labs and vast amounts of data.

One DOE official said that most studies of the power system have focused on its reliability. And though a gas-heavy grid is dependable, the official cautioned that those plants are reliable so long as the fuel is there, and the threats to pipelines, physical attacks and resilience deserve a lot of attention.

The study, which Perry had originally sought in June, was also notable for what it doesn't say.

In letters that became public on Tuesday, coal producer Murray Energy and other companies wrote that during private conversations with CEO Robert Murray, Trump had promised to use DOE emergency power to put in place a two-year moratorium that would require Ohio-based FirstEnergy to keep operating its coal-fired plants even if its power-generating subsidiary goes bankrupt. According to the letters, administration attorneys were concerned about the legality of such an action. One letter said Murray was present when Trump repeatedly directed Perry to grant the request to order the plants to stay open.

But DOE denied the request, saying that "the evidence does not warrant the use of this emergency authority."

Environmentalists, renewable energy advocates and some analysts were incensed by Perry's initial April 14 memo as well as some of his public statements about intervening with state energy policies, such as suggesting he planned to have a hand in keeping power plants running.

Perry's memo, energy guru Peter Fox-Penner said, was "looking through a preconceived, political lens broadly at baseload and blaming renewables policy, which is looking at the wrong culprit. The right direction for a solution is market design."

Just days after issuing the memo to his chief of staff, Perry said that keeping nuclear power on the grid served a national security interest and can justify moves by the federal government that override state authority.

"I was a very strong proponent of the 10th Amendment — thank you very much, we know how to run Texas," the former governor said at an energy event in New York City, referring to the amendment that lays out federal authority limits. "Shoe is on the other foot — or the boot is on the other foot — now."

But on Wednesday, DOE officials said they focused on the specific questions they were tasked with in Perry's memo and not his public statements.

Clark said the controversy around Perry's statements had gotten out of hand.

"Everything right now in D.C. seems to get spun out of control a little bit in terms of reaction on both sides," he said. "When it was first announced that there would be a DOE study, you had some folks say every coal plant in Ohio and Pennsylvania was going to be saved. And you had other people setting their hair on fire thinking that this would be the end of the wind and solar. ... To me, that was the D.C. spin machine."

Ryan: 'I don't think anyone's interested in having a shutdown' Back

By Louis Nelson | 08/23/2017 03:09 PM EDT

House Speaker Paul Ryan said Wednesday he did not think Republican lawmakers are interested in shutting down the government over funding for President Donald Trump's long-promised border wall.

Trump told the crowd at a rally Tuesday night in Phoenix, "believe me, if we have to close down our government, we're building that wall," a promise that prompted the crowd to chant "build that wall."

But Ryan (R-Wis.), who spoke to reporters during a visit to Intel Corp. offices in Oregon, said the House has already passed border security legislation that includes money for a wall. He said lawmakers shouldn't have to choose between keeping the government open and making good on the president's border security pledge.

"I don't think a government shutdown is necessary, and I don't think most people want to see a government shutdown, ourselves included. And Congress, in the House, has already done its work on this issue. There are very legitimate problems and concerns on the border that need to be addressed," Ryan said. "I don't think anyone's interested in having a shutdown. I don't think it's in our interests to do so while we work on doing what we actually said we would do, what we've done already in the House and we need to do, which is to control our border. So I don't think you have to choose between the two."

Congress must pass funding legislation by the end of next month in order to avoid a government shutdown, and lawmakers are scheduled to have just 12 working days after their Sept. 5 return before the deadline hits. Ryan said he expects Congress will keep the government open via a short-term continuing resolution, as opposed to a full appropriations bill, because the schedule won't offer sufficient time for the Senate to process the latter.

"The fact is though, given the time of year it is and the rest of the appropriations we have to do, we're going to need more time to complete our appropriations process, particularly in the Senate. So that's something that I think we all recognize and understand, that we're going to have to have some more time to complete our appropriations process," the speaker said.

Asked if that meant a continuing resolution, he replied, "I think that will probably be necessary, yes, because I can't imagine the Senate will be able to process the appropriations bill as quickly as the House is."

Shutdown threat grows as Trump digs in on wall Back

By Josh Dawsey | 08/23/2017 01:30 AM EDT

President Donald Trump's vow Tuesday to close down the government if he doesn't get money for the border wall mirrors private comments he has made to advisers in recent days — and could cause significant rifts within his own party if he follows through.

The fight over the wall is likely to explode in September as the administration wrangles over a new budget, an increase in the debt ceiling, the beginning of a tax reform package and a possible resuscitation of health care legislation.

Trump has told his advisers he will not accept a deal on other issues without money for the wall "and it has to be real money," said one senior White House official.

Trump has told senior White House officials and advisers he would be willing to go to whatever lengths are necessary to get money for the wall, a contentious claim even among his advisers.

He hasn't identified specific amounts of money that he wants, but he seeks "enough to really start building it," said one person who spoke to him last weekend.

"He is animated about the wall," the person said. "He cares about that more than many other things. He knows his base cares and chants about it."

At a campaign rally in Phoenix on Tuesday, the president reiterated to his loyalists that he is committed to his vision for securing the border. "If we have to close down our government," Trump said, "we're building that wall."

Some said Trump's preoccupation is in keeping with what he has said since before the election last year. "It should surprise exactly no one," presidential counselor Kellyanne Conway said. "Why are people surprised when they try to change his mind on something significant and fail?"

Few staff members in the West Wing are as concerned about it, senior administration officials said.

Some in the White House have urged Trump not to focus as much on the wall, try to pass a clean debt-ceiling bill and move to tax reform. "You have barely anyone here saying, 'Wall, wall, we have to get the wall at all costs,'" one White House official said.

It would be impossible to get Democrats on board for such a plan, Capitol Hill aides say, and Republicans will probably need Democratic support to enact a budget or raise the debt ceiling.

Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), who leads the conservative Freedom Caucus, praised the idea Tuesday — and Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) has promised to try to get money for the wall. The House passed a bill in July that delivers some wall funding, but it has little chance of becoming law.

Trump, on the campaign trail, said that Mexico would pay for the wall — a promise that has been widely mocked for its improbability.

Two people who have spoken to Trump said he sees not building the wall as a personal embarrassment — and that he has shown more interest in building the wall than in other issues, like the upcoming budget negotiations.

"You don't want a government shutdown," the White House official said. "He is told that. He says, 'I want money for the wall.'"

PASSED WITH FLYING COLORS: Solar panels across a swath of the U.S. went dark Monday as the first domestic total solar eclipse since 1979 transfixed the country, but the electric grid appeared to weather the disruption easily. Applying lessons Europe learned during its own 2015 eclipse, utilities leaned more heavily on alternate supplies to fill in gaps in solar generation. As Pro's Esther Whieldon reports, Eric Schmitt, California ISO's vice president of operations, told reporters about 3,000 megawatts to 3,500 megawatts of solar generation stopped during the eclipse, but hydropower and natural gas power supplies filled in that gap. "We didn't have any major challenges on the system, even minor challenges," he said. "We're very pleased with how smooth it went. All the resources performed the way they were supposed to perform."

How'd others do? The PJM Interconnection, the grid operator for more than a dozen Mid-Atlantic and Midwestern states saw a decrease of about 520 megawatts utility scale solar during the eclipse, which is not even a drop in the bucket for the system that has 185,000 megawatts of power on call. Duke Energy estimates it saw a drop of 1,700 megawatts-worth of output from utility-scale solar generation in North Carolina. (The grid's success did not extend to traffic where numerous apocalypses were reported after the eclipse passed).

Cabinet secretaries took a break. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke tweeted it was a "pretty cool view" from his agency's rooftop, while EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said his staff enjoyed a "great view" from headquarters. Energy Secretary Rick Perry said the total eclipse "rocks" and linked to National Renewable Energy Laboratory staff enjoying the view.

Away from Washington, senior lawmakers did as well. Senate EPW Chairman John Barrasso "really enjoyed watching the eclipse" from Casper, Wyo. (where the totality lasted more than two-and-a-half minutes). Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski was underground in a "permafrost tunnel" near Fairbanks, Alaska, at peak eclipse, but later caught a glimpse from visiting Deputy Energy Secretary Dan Brouillette.

WELCOME TO TUESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and SEIA's Christopher Mansour was first to name Italy as the spot with two other independent countries within its borders (San Marino and Vatican City). THE MITCH MCCONNELL CONNECTION: Anthony Pugliese exited the Department of Transportation to join FERC as its chief of staff, Transportation Pro's Lauren Gardner scooped for Pros. He was DOT's senior White House adviser — a role that was intended to help 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. keep tabs on their goings-on. In this case he served next to Cabinet Secretary Elaine Chao, wife of Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, and the two didn't appear to have gotten along. POLITICO reported in May how Pugliese informed Chao that he expected her to check in with him on all policy moves, a declaration that got a chilly reception.

Now Pugliese has a job as the top staffer for newly anointed FERC chairman Neil Chatterjee — for years McConnell's top energy policy aide — despite limited energy experience. The FERC announcement says Pugliese learned energy matters from his time working for Pennsylvania Gov. Tom Corbett, where he spent a year working for the department of Community and Economic Development, and as a consultant for Pugliese Associates, a Pennsylvania lobbying shop founded by Pugliese's father, Rocco. The company's website shows that it's energy clients included Tesla Motors, a filling station chain, and an energy efficiency non-profit. ### BIODIESEL PRODUCERS CROSSING FINGERS FOR COMMERCE TRADE

RULING TODAY: The Commerce Department is expected to issue a preliminary ruling today on whether to impose a tax on Argentine and Indonesian imports of biodiesel to counter those two countries' subsidies. Biodiesel exporters have been arguing for months that biodiesel feedstocks in Argentina and Indonesia are underwritten by their governments so they can sell into the U.S. market.

RFS credits in discord: Today's decision could drive up the biofuel credits that oil refiners use to comply with the Renewable Fuel Standard, because it would potentially shrink supplies and increase the price of biodiesel. Those biodiesel credits can be used for compliance with the ethanol part of the program, too. But Tom Kloza, a founder of the oil tracking service OPIS, says RIN prices have been buffeted by "cross winds" since a court ruling last week that let some small refiners out of the program. "There's a little uneasiness about this small refinery exemption," he said. Today's "ruling isn't as big as the anti-dumping. It would probably provide an upward lift, but right now you have this downdraft related to small refinery exemption."

Just the first step in the trade dispute tango: A victory today for domestic producers would signal what may be a larger victory in October, when Commerce will rule on whether the two countries dumped biodiesel on the U.S. market in an effort to undermine U.S. production. Kloza said that one could potentially rattle biofuel markets. Neither decision will likely be finalized until next year.

A PRIZE PODCAST: This week's episode of Global POLITICO podcast features Dan Yergin, the Pulitzer-winning historian and expert on the geopolitics of energy, as well as Angela Stent, a former U.S. national intelligence officer for Russia, discussing the current "frigid, antagonistic, confrontational" relationship between U.S. and Russia. Yergin also discusses the dissolution of Trump's advisory council of business leaders last week, which he called very much "a comment about what's happening to our politics."

CALIFORNIA'S CLIMATE PUSH FUELS ECONOMIC GROWTH: Since the adoption of landmark climate legislation in 2006, California's gross domestic product growth has nearly doubled what's been seen at the U.S. more broadly, but the rate of the state's emissions reductions have slowed recently due to a spike in transportation-related emissions, according to a new report out from the nonpartisan group Next 10. "Transportation sector emissions vastly outweigh other carbon-producing areas of California's economy, and the recent spike should alert policy-makers that despite our best efforts, more must be done," Adam Fowler, an economist at Beacon Economics, which prepared the report, said in a statement. Among the other findings: Energy-related carbon dioxide emissions in California were down 12.5 percent in 2016 from their 2006 levels and renewable energy made up 21.9 percent of total electricity generation in the state.

CHECK OUT THAT HASHTAG: Zinke's wife Lola raised a few eyebrows around Washington with a tweet of her and the secretary on a run to the Capitol that included the hashtag #senaterun. ME readers likely remember the Montana congressman was considered a likely Senate candidate against Democrat Jon Tester — who's up for reelection next year — prior to being tapped by the Trump administration for the Interior slot.

MAIL CALL! SCHATZ CRIES FOUL OVER EPA GRANT POLICY: Hawaii Democratic Sen. Brian Schatz sent a letter Monday to EPA's Pruitt urging him to reverse course on a new directive in which a political appointee — John Konkus within the Office of Public Affairs — now will evaluate grant solicitations. "I fail to understand the beneficial role a political appointee, without any meaningful scientific background, could have in the grant review process," Schatz wrote. He added the new policy appeared to be in "direct conflict" with the agency's scientific integrity policy.

THERE'S A HEARING! It may be August recess, but the Senate EPW Subcommittee on Superfund, Waste Management and Regulatory Oversight, chaired by Mike Rounds, today holds a field oversight hearing at his former office — the South Dakota state capitol. It'll examine efforts from the Army Corps of Engineers to manage the Missouri River to "make certain the agency is working in an appropriate and responsible manner." More information here.

DEMOCRATS TOUT ECONOMIC BENEFITS OF MONUMENTS: Ahead of Interior's Zinke's Thursday deadline to issue recommendations on the fate of nearly two dozen national monuments, the Joint Economic Committee Democrats released a series of fact sheets highlighting what they say are the substantial economic benefits the sites provide to local communities. "Removing designation in whole or in part from national monuments, as the Trump administration has proposed, would eliminate this economic engine," Sen. Martin Heinrich, the committee's ranking Democrat, said in a statement.

PUT UP YOUR DUKES: The nomination of one of their own, former New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett, to run the Export-Import Bank has emerged as the latest battle in the Republican Party's civil war, POLITICO's Zachary Warmbrodt reports. Business groups are expected to ramp up efforts to block his appointment, while opponents of the bank are warning the Senate Banking Committee about the consequences of failing to advance Garrett's nomination. "The divides among congressional Republicans appear to be deepening, and I am left with the sense that for some issues, the GOP is closer to a coalition government than a unified party," Compass Point analyst Isaac Boltansky said.

TAKE A GLANCE! DISSECTING NEW YORK'S ENERGY GOALS: The Manhattan Institute is out with a report today arguing, among other findings, New York's goal of reducing greenhouse gas emissions 80 percent from 1990 levels by 2050 is "unrealistic, unobtainable, and unaffordable." In addition, meeting renewable energy and GHG goals will mean shifting to electric-powered equipment across most sectors of the state's economy "adding many billions of dollars in costs in both the private and public sectors," the report argues. Lower-income New Yorkers would bear more of the brunt of those policies to hit the interim reduction goals, it says.

NOT A FAN: German Chancellor Angela Merkel slammed her predecessor Gerhard Schroeder for taking a high-paying post at Russian oil company Rosneft, POLITICO Europe's Victor Brechenmacher reports. "I do not find what Mr. Schroeder is doing appropriate," Merkel told German daily BILD. Schroeder has drawn criticism in Germany for his involvement in the Russian energy sector and his friendship with Russian President Vladimir Putin. He already holds a leadership role at Nord Stream AG, a gas-pipeline consortium set up by Gazprom, to transport Russian gas across the Baltic Sea and into Germany.

LET THERE BE REGIONAL ADMINISTRATOR! A former Alabama environmental regulator will serve as EPA's Region 4 Administrator, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Trey Glenn was director of the Alabama Department of Environmental Management from 2005 through 2009 and has owned an engineering consulting firm in Birmingham for the last eight years. Alabama's ethics commission found "probable cause" back in 2007 that Glenn may have violated ethics laws but a grand jury in 2009 concluded there were no "provable violations." Regional administrators do not require Senate confirmation.

COURT REVIVES DUGONG SUIT: The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals has revived an environmentalist lawsuit dating back to 2003 alleging a plan to place a U.S. Marine Corps air base in Okinawa, Japan, threatens a local population of dugongs, which are similar to manatees. A lower court previously said the green groups did not have standing to bring the case, and the suit raised "political questions" the court could not answer. But the 9th Circuit reversed that Monday, saying the case must be heard. The green groups will now get to present their case that the new military base will threaten the Okinawa dugong, which is listed as endangered in the U.S. and Japan. However, they may still fail to change anything about the base; the 9th Circuit said the green groups "may face challenges in securing relief on the merits." The base construction has been controversial for reasons beyond dugongs, with the prefecture government taking Japan's central government to court this summer to halt work on seawalls and new land.

LOTS OF FREE TIME? Sebastian Gorka, Trump's deputy assistant, posted the personal phone number and other contact information of a blogger after he put up a post detailing how Gorka's son made an environmental documentary, Death and Taxes reports. The video at issue, made by 18-year-old Paul Gorka, looks at how plastic pollution contributes to water quality issues.

REPORT: NUCLEAR NEEDS CONGRESSIONAL HELP: Kirk Lippold, an energy policy expert who served as commanding officer of USS Cole, is out with a new report arguing Congress must extend a nuclear production tax credit for the U.S. to remain a worldwide leader in that energy sector. "It is incumbent for that leadership to continue through public support of this clean energy source in order for it to remain a reliable power backbone for decades into the future," he writes in the paper for the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council.

California grid emerges from solar eclipse unscathed Back

By Esther Whieldon | 08/21/2017 03:53 PM EDT

The California grid survived today's total solar eclipse without a hitch, California Independent System Operator officials said.

About 3,000 megawatts to 3,500 megawatts of solar generation stopped producing power during the eclipse, and the grid operator was able to cover that loss largely with hydropower and natural gas power supplies, Eric Schmitt, ISO vice president of operations, told reporters.

The grid operator had expected to lose up to 4,600 megawatts of utility scale solar during the eclipse and about 1,300 megawatts of residential rooftop solar.

Schmitt said months of planning had enabled the grid operator to accommodate the solar event.

"We didn't have any major challenges on the system, even minor challenges," he said. "We're very pleased with how smooth it went. All the resources performed the way they were supposed to perform."

Electricity prices were normal, peaking in the low $20s per megawatt-hour. But as the eclipse abated, they then went negative — meaning generators would need to pay to ship their power — as the solar power plants began to come online, Schmitt said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The ISO expects to release more details about how the grid performed during the solar eclipse, such as how much battery storage was used and how much rooftop solar went offline, at a later time.

DOT adviser jumps to FERC Back

By Lauren Gardner | 08/21/2017 12:33 PM EDT

Anthony Pugliese has left DOT to become the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's chief of staff, POLITICO has learned.

Brigham McCown, a former Republican DOT official who worked on the Trump administration's transition team with Pugliese, confirmed the move.

Pugliese was the department's senior White House adviser, a role that Cabinet secretaries across the administration have chafed against.

A FERC spokesman confirmed the move. DOT didn't respond to a request for comment.

Court says EPA overstepped in denying small refiners RFS exemption Back

By Alex Guillén | 08/15/2017 02:09 PM EDT

The Obama administration in 2016 wrongly forced two small refineries in Wyoming to comply with the Renewable Fuel Standard, a federal court ruled today.

The Sinclair Oil-owned facilities had requested exemptions from the RFS, citing language in the law that allows EPA to spare small refiners from the program's biofuel blending requirements if they would experience "disproportionate economic hardship." While DOE recommended granting them a 50 percent waiver, EPA in October 2016 said both facilities were profitable enough to bear the RFS's costs and thus would have to comply fully with the program.

However, a split panel from the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals today said EPA overstepped its authority by concluding that the exemption could only be granted if complying with the RFS presented a long-term, "existential threat" to the refineries' survival.

EPA "chose a definition of economic hardship plainly at odds with Congress's statutory command," concluded the two majority judges, Timothy Tymkovich, a George W. Bush appointee, and Nancy Moritz, an Obama appointee. They sent the matter back to EPA for further action.

In a dissent, Carlos Lucero, a Clinton appointee, said he believed EPA had relied on "a more nuanced analysis" than the majority said which may have been permissible.

The decision comes just weeks after the D.C. Circuit ruled in a separate case that the Obama EPA had misappropriated a broader waiver authority under the RFS to require using less corn ethanol in 2016 than Congress required.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA must review the refineries' petitions in light of the ruling. The agency could find further reasons for denying the petitions or it may grant Sinclair the sought-after exemptions.

2018 showdown looms: House Republicans vs. Democratic senators Back

By Elana Schor and Burgess Everett | 11/18/2016 05:22 AM EDT

As Democratic senators weigh when to fight and when to compromise with Donald Trump, Republicans on the other side of the Capitol are watching — with 2018 in mind.

Several of the 10 Democrats up for reelection in states that Trump won are likely to face off against members of the House Republican Conference. And on Thursday, one of those potential Senate hopefuls, Montana Rep. Ryan Zinke, fired a warning shot at his possible rival, Democratic Sen. Jon Tester.

"What I'm hoping, quite frankly, is that Sen. Tester moves rapidly to the middle," Zinke said of the two-term incumbent he is considering taking on. "His votes have not been consistent with Montana."

Zinke said he's preparing "to get a lot of pressure" to run against Tester, who chaired the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee during a disappointing 2016 election cycle for his party. The two-term congressman has met with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) about a possible bid.

Tester would be "a formidable opponent, should I run," Zinke added. "I'm in no hurry to make a decision."

Democrats had hoped to defeat Zinke this year to kill off the Senate prospects of the affable former Navy SEAL. But despite Tester's personal attention to the campaign of Democrat Denise Juneau, who challenged Zinke for Montana's at-large House seat, the Republican coasted to an 18-point victory.

Tester said Thursday he'd bet a steak dinner that Zinke will run against him. No matter what, the Democrat is girding for a fight.

"They're going to get someone tough," Tester said Thursday.

Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.), who was elected in 2014 in the increasingly red state, said it was "too soon" to say definitively how much trouble Tester might be in.

"Every election has a different dynamic," Daines said. "You saw what happened last cycle. It was assumed we were going to lose the majority."

Beyond Montana, Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.) could face a strong challenger in Rep. Kevin Cramer (R-N.D.). Like Zinke, Cramer was an early backer of Trump's presidential bid even as the Republican establishment chafed at the New York developer.

Cramer often appears on short lists to lead Trump's Department of Energy, though one source working on the president-elect's transition said the two-term Republican is expected to take on Heitkamp rather than join the administration.

Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.), the former House member chairing the National Republican Senatorial Committee for 2018, praised Cramer as a "tireless advocate."

"He puts the people of North Dakota before everything else, and that's what people want in their elected member of the Senate," Gardner said. "And obviously, in the 2018 election cycle, we just have to plan on winning every race. And of course, he'd be very good at it."

Heitkamp has long made clear that she expects a bruising reelection battle and plans to remind voters of her work with the GOP.

"My whole purpose in being here is trying to bridge some of these partisan divides and try and get things done," Heitkamp said. "I don't care what their label is. When I agree with them, we're going to do business. When I disagree with them, we're going to have a conversation."

Democrats are expecting a challenge to Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.) from either Rep. Evan Jenkins (R-W.Va.) or state Attorney General Patrick Morrisey. Manchin is hoping for a repeat performance of this year's election, when his state installed a Democratic governor at the same time it overwhelmingly voted for Trump.

"It's a very good sign. Basically people look at the individual," Manchin said. Voters "know who I am."

Still, Manchin acknowledged that his next campaign is "going to be more challenging." He joined an expanded Senate Democratic leadership slate on Wednesday, giving him a chance to make his case for making deals with Trump — but also potentially allowing Republicans to directly tie Manchin to any Democratic obstructionism.

Given how quickly his state has gone from blue to red, it's unclear how effective Manchin's earlier campaign strategies for governor and senator might be.

"I've been in office since 2001, the state has dramatically changed its politics," said Sen. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), who added: "Every election's a challenge and he knows that, I think. He's up for the challenge. He's a very intuitive politician."

In Missouri, which Trump carried by 19 points, several GOP House members are seen as potential challengers to Democratic Sen. Claire McCaskill: Reps. Vicky Hartzler, Ann Wagner, or Billy Long. Incumbent GOP Sen. Roy Blunt just survived a nimble challenge in the state by Democrat Jason Kander.

In Indiana, meanwhile, Republican Rep. Luke Messer could end up squaring off against Democratic Sen. Joe Donnelly. Trump won the Hoosier State by a staggering 28 points.

Historically the party in power has lost ground during the first midterm election under a new president. In 2010, Democrats lost the House and relinquished six Senate seats as voters recoiled at some of Barack Obama's early initiatives, especially his health care law.

The 2018 Senate map gives the GOP a buffer to weather that trend. But if the country doesn't like what the next two years out of Washington brings, Republicans won't be able to shirk the blame.

Sen. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) said he and other Republicans who were elected to the Senate in 2014 ran as outsiders vowing to shatter the status quo. Asked if Republicans will have to retool that message after they take the wheel in Washington, he said, "That depends on whether or not we actually deliver on what we said we were going to do. So the first 100 days with the new president are going to be critical."

GOP divided over Trump's Ex-Im Bank nomination Back

By Zachary Warmbrodt | 08/21/2017 02:30 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nomination of former Rep. Scott Garrett to lead the Export-Import Bank has opened up yet another front in the Republican Party's civil war.

Pro-business trade groups, free-market advocates and even social conservatives and gay-rights activists are targeting GOP senators with competing lobbying efforts as they clash over Garrett's past attempts to shut down the bank and his controversial views on LGBT issues.

The issue could come to a head this fall if Senate Republicans move forward with a hearing and confirmation votes for Garrett. Some of the leading groups opposed to the credit export agency are warning the Senate Banking Committee about the consequences of failing to advance the nomination. Meanwhile, business groups are expected to ratchet up efforts to block Garrett's appointment.

That has raised the political stakes around the New Jersey Republican's confirmation and underscored divisions that have contributed to the GOP's lack of success in pushing major legislation through Congress.

"The logjam over the Ex-Im Bank is just the most recent battle in the ongoing ideological war within the GOP between its pro-business wing and the free-market absolutists," Compass Point analyst Isaac Boltansky said. "The divides among congressional Republicans appear to be deepening, and I am left with the sense that for some issues, the GOP is closer to a coalition government than a unified party."

Outside groups are stepping up their efforts as the Trump administration gives Garrett a chance to sell his nomination, which has been under fire since the president announced his pick in April.

At least three Senate Republicans — the number it would take to block his confirmation if Democrats uniformly were to oppose him — have indicated they are on the fence.

Businesses that rely on the Export-Import Bank are stepping up their drive to rally opposition to Garrett because of his attempts to kill the agency when he served in Congress. In 2015, he said the bank "embodies the corruption of the free enterprise system" by promoting crony capitalism.

The bank, which offers loan guarantees to foreign buyers of U.S. exports, hasn't been able to back deals that exceed $10 million since 2015, when its authorization temporarily lapsed and it lost a needed quorum of board members. Though its charter was renewed by Congress in December of that year, the lack of a quorum continues today.

U.S. manufacturers including Boeing and GE view it as a critical financial backstop.

As Garrett met with senators on Capitol Hill earlier this month, he offered a friendlier public message than he had while in Congress. He said he backed the president's desire to have a "functional" agency and that his job would be to "fulfill the administration's agenda of creating more jobs and helping manufacturing in this country."

But his pitch left a bipartisan group of senators less than satisfied.

"He lost his reelection bid last year, and he's now saying lots of things to try to get a new job," said Hamilton Place Strategies partner and former Bush administration official Tony Fratto, who represented a business coalition that supported the Export-Import Bank.

In response to the industry lobbying, outside groups that have worked for years to close the bank are jumping in to help push Garrett's nomination.

On Aug. 7, the Club for Growth and Heritage Action for America were among the conservative organizations that sent a letter to Senate Banking Chairman Mike Crapo (R-Idaho) warning that they would oppose any appointments to the agency's board if Garrett's name did not move forward.

Even after rushing to Garrett's defense, the bank's opponents would still like the agency to be shuttered. And if he ends up saying he's now in favor of reauthorizing the bank as part of his attempt to win confirmation, "it's politics, pure and simple," said Andrew Roth, Club for Growth's vice president of government affairs.

"The fact remains, if the bank is going to have a president, the only person out there that's capable of reforming the bank or reducing its size is Scott Garrett," Roth said.

Another issue dogging Garrett among Republicans is his record on gay rights.

His views attracted controversy in July 2015, when POLITICO reported that he told a group of fellow Republicans that he had refused to pay National Republican Congressional Committee dues because it recruited gay candidates.

Garrett later denied that he was against gay candidates and said his concern was with support for same-sex marriage. But the political fallout contributed to his failed 2016 reelection bid and is becoming a more prominent issue in his Senate confirmation.

American Unity Fund, a pro-LGBT conservative group founded in 2013, plans to aggressively lobby to defeat his nomination if it proceeds, said Tyler Deaton, a senior adviser for the organization.

Deaton said nominating someone with Garrett's record of "vilifying gay Americans" is like "throwing a wrench into something that's already complicated."

"We've shared our concerns with the White House," he said. "They've not even tried to defend Mr. Garrett's anti-gay behavior."

The White House declined to comment on Garrett's LGBT record.

The Family Research Council, the conservative Christian nonprofit that describes homosexuality as "unhealthy and destructive," has come to Garrett's defense. The group has also been critical of the Export-Import Bank.

In a post last month, the group said Garrett's views on sexuality had "absolutely nothing" to do with his résumé.

"Scott Garrett's got a strong history of supporting not only free markets but fighting against government largess," said David Christensen, the Family Research Council's vice president for government affairs, in an interview. "He would be good at leading the Ex-Im bank. We also think it's unfair for some groups to try to raise his stance on social issues as a weapon against him."

Pruitt picks ex-Alabama regulator for regional chief Back

By Alex Guillén | 08/21/2017 04:57 PM EDT

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt has appointed a former Alabama environmental regulator as the agency's Region 4 Administrator, EPA announced today.

Trey Glenn was director of the Alabama Department of Environmental Management from 2005 through 2009. For the last eight years, Glenn has owned an engineering consulting firm in Birmingham.

Glenn "will help us carry out President Trump's vision of creating a more streamlined and efficient EPA that focuses on the Agency's core mission, while also providing more regulatory certainty to our nation's businesses," Pruitt said in a statement.

Alabama's ethics commission in 2007 found "probable cause" that Glenn, in his prior job as director of the state Office of Water Resources, may have violated ethics laws to land the ADEM position. But a grand jury in 2009 concluded there were no "provable violations," according to local news reports.

EPA's 10 regional administrators are political appointees but do not require Senate confirmation. EPA's Region 4 covers Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina.

WHERE ARE THE BRAKES ON THIS ROLL BACK? Even as they're publicly touting the efforts of President Donald Trump to roll back regulations, some oil and gas companies are increasingly worried the administration may go too far, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. A dozen executives, lobbyists, lawyers and analysts are worried about the fallout if the rules' loosening is followed by a major disaster, and they are concerned that unscrupulous competitors could benefit from the axing of rules that their companies have already spent money to comply with. They're also uneasy with efforts to renegotiate trade deals like NAFTA or reorganize the agencies responsible for overseeing offshore drilling. "Every industry wants regulations that make sense, but you don't need to roll things back so far that it opens an opportunity for outsiders to criticize, or something bad happens and then [rulemaking] goes the other way but even further," Brian Youngberg, energy analyst at investment firm Edward Jones, tells Ben.

One example of a rule drawing too much attention from the Trump team is the Obama-era Interior Department rule tightening methane emission standards for oil and gas wells and pipelines on public lands. Trade associations American Petroleum Institute and Western Energy Alliance publicly cheered Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's push to rewrite the rule, but behind the scenes, Exxon Mobil, BP and other large oil and gas companies considered the rule relatively minor, lobbying and industry sources said. Those companies already had the technology to comply and they planned to pay off the implementation costs through the sale of methane they captured. And others operating in Colorado already had to comply with a state rule that closely resembled the federal one.

Industry officials are scratching their heads at Interior's review of whether to combine the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, which leases the federal Outer Continental Shelf to energy companies, with the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement, which regulates the companies' activities. "When there's — God forbid — the inevitable accident in the Gulf of Mexico, why would you want to be known as the administration that made that move?" said one lawyer representing oil and gas companies. Officials said they didn't ask for the reorganization and first heard about it when Zinke floated the idea.

ICAHN'T BELIEVE THIS IS HAPPENING: Carl Icahn's failure to rewrite biofuel rules looks to have foreshadowed the billionaire investor's departure as an adviser to Trump, and questions about whether his effort violated ethics rules are still swirling, our Eric Wolff writes. Icahn stepped down as an unpaid Trump adviser on regulations on Friday, just ahead of EPA's rejection of the change in the Renewable Fuel Standard's "point of obligation," which could come any day.

Though the White House has insisted that Icahn only served in an informal role, Trump's move to tap him to alter regulations had raised eyebrows among ethics watchdogs since Icahn's vast holdings, from insurance to liquefied natural gas and rail cars, often put his businesses in the cross-hairs of Washington regulators.

"There was a perception of government that was not in line with ethics rules. Donald Trump came in and said the ethics rules don't apply to him. Icahn had convinced himself the same would apply to him," said Jeff Navin, a partner at Boundary Stone Partners and a former acting chief of staff at the Department of Energy under Obama.

ZINKE MONUMENT RECOMMENDATIONS DUE THIS WEEK: Zinke has until Aug. 24 to send Trump recommendations on whether to rescind or tweak more than a dozen national monuments created by former presidents, most of which are in Western states. Zinke has whittled down the list of monuments on the chopping block from 22 to 16, but he has only visited seven of those, plus one the Commerce Department is reviewing. It remains to be seen whether Zinke will recommend Trump test his authority under the Antiquities Act and rescind any of the monuments — a move that would certainly face legal challenges. Zinke in June made preliminary recommendations that Trump trim back the size of the Bears Ears National Monument in Utah.

Californians for monument visits: Ahead of Zinke's Thursday deadline for reviewing a host of national monuments designated under the Antiquities Act, a bunch of California politicians asked him to come visit the sites still under examination in their state. "We invite you once more to visit our state, meet face to face with the communities who love and protect our treasured landscapes before making a recommendation that might reduce or revoke monument status," the letter, led by Rep. Judy Chu, says.

Congressional leaders pushed, too: The chairs of the Congressional Asian Pacific American Caucus, the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus sent a letter Friday to House and Senate leadership urging them to resist any legislative efforts to limit the president's ability to designate monuments under the Antiquities Act. "Any attempt to curtail the President's authority to protect these places or to remove protections already put in place by other Presidents is an attack on our shared history," Reps. Cedric Richmond, Michelle Lujan Grisham and Chu wrote.

EPA SEEKS 16-MONTH DELAY OF TEXAS HAZE DEADLINE: EPA on Friday asked a federal court in D.C. to rewrite a consent decree reached with environmental groups under the Obama administration requiring the agency to take action on Texas pollution contributing to regional haze. The court had previously given EPA until Sept. 9 to either accept a state plan or write a federal plan, but on Friday EPA asked the court to give it until Dec. 31, 2018. The agency's filing says that since the Trump administration took office, "EPA and Texas have engaged in a productive level of dialogue that has not occurred in many years." EPA and Texas regulators have agreed on a plan to write a rule "that would be more consistent with the [Clean Air Act's] preference for cooperative federalism, and would produce a plan that more effectively addresses concerns raised by the State," the filing added.

Environmentalists have until Aug. 29 to object in court, but they made their feelings clear in a Friday evening statement blasting EPA's proposal as bad news for residents of Oklahoma who breathe in some of that Texas air. "Scott Pruitt just made it clear that he plans to abandon the residents of his home state to placate Texas polluters who don't give a second thought about Oklahoma families or its natural places," said Johnson Bridgwater, director of the Sierra Club's Oklahoma Chapter. The green groups noted that EPA was supposed to have done all this back in 2007, making the proposed delay that much more untenable.

RECORDS SOUGHT IN SAGE GROUSE REVIEW: The Western Values Project filed a FOIA request Sunday seeking copies of communications between various Interior officials participating in its sage grouse review and various energy groups, including the Western Energy Alliance, American Petroleum Institute and Petroleum Association of Wyoming. That comes as Western Values Project released a document that it said showed Zinke's early August order for his department to alter how it and states implement conservation plans for the bird was based heavily on recommendations from the Western Energy Alliance. "This is a dangerous trend that is becoming a pattern for Secretary Zinke - offer lip-service to the West while granting private industry unfettered control of our public lands," Jayson O'Neill, deputy director of the Western Values Project, said in a statement.

THERE'S A GROUP FOR EVERYTHING: Four governors on the Outer Continental Shelf Governors Coalition — Maine's Paul LePage, Mississippi's Phil Bryant, Alabama's Kay Ivey and Alaska's Bill Walker — released a letter Friday urging Zinke to include all possible areas as the agency develops its five-year offshore drilling plan. "Access to offshore energy resources will allow coastal states and communities to realize great economic opportunities," they wrote.

TRICKLE OF CHANGE ON CLIMATE? Some Republicans may be taking their first steps to distance themselves from their party's hard line on climate change, but there are doubts from some that participation in the House Climate Solutions Caucus represents anything more than political cover for endangered lawmakers, POLITICO California's David Siders reports. But Rep. Carlos Curbelo, one of the group's co-founders, said it was working on "blocking and tackling ... opposing anti-climate legislation" and already showed progress from a couple of years ago when hardly any GOP members spoke out on climate change. "I think the next phase, and hopefully we can get to that this Congress, is to turn the caucus into an ideas factory, get behind proactive legislation," the South Florida Republican said.

NEW AD AGAINST REGULATORY BILLS: Clean Air Moms Action is out with a new ad today urging Congress to oppose the Regulatory Accountability Act H.R. 5 \(115\) and the Regulations from the Executive in Need of Scrutiny Act H.R. 26 \(115\), two measures they say would threaten environmental and public health protections. The $250,000 digital campaign will run across Missouri, Indiana, Montana, Florida and Virginia — the states of Democratic senators that bill backers would need to get them to 60 votes in the Senate. Both bills have passed the House on largely party-line votes.

MAKE OR BREAK IN THE PEACH STATE? Three backers of the Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia — Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, Oglethorpe Power Co. and the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia — last week asked the Energy Department for a bigger lifeline, but one state regulator was skeptical that would determine whether the project proceeds, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "I'm not sure that the loan guarantee piece of the project equation is a make or break issue for us," Tim Echols, the vice chairman of the Georgia Public Service Commission, said by email. "The Toshiba payments are far more important." The long-delayed and over-budget project suffered the bankruptcy of its lead contractor and reactor designer Westinghouse this spring.

DOE CELEBRATES COAL EXPORT: Officials from the Energy and Commerce Departments will gather with Ukrainian Ambassador to the U.S. Valeriy Chaly today at 2 p.m. in Baltimore in recognition of the first shipment of Pennsylvania thermal coal bound for Ukraine. U.S. participants include Wells Griffith, acting assistant secretary for international affairs at DOE, and Israel Hernandez, acting under secretary of the International Trade Administration.

TRUCK LOBBY WORRIED ABOUT TRUMP EPA REOPENING PHASE 2 RULE: The American Trucking Associations is "concerned" about EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's announcement last week that he will revisit parts of the Obama administration's Phase 2 emissions standards for heavy duty trucks. The split highlights a regulation that had largely gotten the buy-in of the trucking industry in order to avoid state-level patchwork rules. The only major legal challenge to the rule was over EPA's first-time aerodynamic rules for trailers, which is the part of the rule Pruitt plans to re-open. In a statement on Friday, ATA President and CEO Chris Spear said the industry is concerned that cracking open the federal rule for this one issue "has opened the door to California taking the lead, and a more aggressive track, in setting trailer standards." A California Air Resources Board spokesman told Trucks.com that it is "premature" to discuss whether state rules in development will break from the federal regulation.

MORE ASIAN CARP TROUBLE FOUND: It's unclear how it made its way past several electric barriers meant to keep the invasive species out, but an adult Asian carp got quite close to Lake Michigan, according to a report from a coalition of federal agencies released Friday. "Time is of the essence to both implement a permanent solution and take immediate steps to stop Asian carp from reaching our Great Lakes," Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow said in response.

Carl Icahn steps down as White House regulatory adviser Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 08/18/2017 05:40 PM EDT

Wall Street billionaire Carl Icahn will no longer advise President Donald Trump on regulatory policy, Icahn announced on Twitter today.

Icahn owns refiner CVR Energy and had been pushing for a change to federal ethanol policy that the Trump administration is set to turn down. EPA is said to be preparing to reject a proposal that would let oil refiners off the hook for complying with the federal ethanol mandate. Critics said Icahn's role advising on that policy, combined with his role at the helm of refining company, presented a conflict of interest.

In a letter addressed to Trump and posted online, Icahn said he faced questions over whether his informal role conflicted with the duties of Neomi Rao, Trump's administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs.

Icahn said he decided to step down to prevent "partisan bickering" over his role. He said he never had access to information that was not public nor profited from his position as an informal adviser.

"Indeed, out of an abundance of caution, the only issues I ever discussed with you were broad matters of policy affecting the refining industry," Icahn wrote in the letter. "I never sought any special benefit for any company with which I have been involved, and have only expressed views that I believed would benefit the refining industry as a whole."

The announcement comes in the wake of other business leaders leaving Trump's side after he said both sides were to blame for violence at last weekend's white supremacist rally in Charlottesville, Va. Icahn did not mention Trump's response in his letter.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA is expected to make its ethanol mandate decision in coming weeks.

Zinke recommends shrinking Bears Ears monument Back

By Esther Whieldon | 06/12/2017 04:07 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke proposed shrinking the Bears Ears National Monument on Monday, trimming back the controversial Utah monument created by former President Barack Obama during his final days in office.

A preliminary review of the 1.4 million-acre monument that Zinke sent to the White House over the weekend shows his "belief that the monument needs to be right-sized," Zinke said in a statement.

Any move by President Donald Trump to alter the monument designed to protect thousands of sensitive archaeological sites will set off a legal fight with tribes and conservation groups that have complained the Native American ruins there were being damaged and would be threatened by oil and gas development in the area.

Zinke's preliminary recommendations to Trump show he did not plan to go as far as revoking Obama's monument designation — a move that has been sought by the state's congressional delegation.

"Rescinding the monument was an option, but looking at it, there are some antiquities within the monument that I think deserve to be protected," he said in a press call.

Trump has ordered Zinke to review 22 of the national monuments that were established in the past two decades to determine if they should be altered or revoked. The secretary has until Aug. 24 to send his final recommendations to the White House, and Zinke has extended the comment period on Bears Ears to July 10.

Zinke is also pressing Congress to look at the Bears Ears boundaries "to see whether the lands are more appropriately designated as national conservation areas or national recreation areas," he said. "There's certainly a high demand of recreation. There's certainly a demand for conservation in some parts, but we believe that those areas are better suited under congressionally mandated designations than they are a monument."

The secretary also asked Congress to grant tribes the ability to co-manage specific areas within Bears Ears, and for Congress to clarify how wilderness areas that overlap with monuments should be treated, an issue for Bears Ears and some other monuments under review.

A former congressman from Montana, Zinke cited his concern that the federal government restricts activities on the land it designates as protected, saying that designating a monument the size of Bears Ears where "multiple-use management is hindered or prohibited is not the best use of the land and is not in accordance with the intention of the Antiquities Act."

President Barack Obama created the monument in southeast Utah in December, angering Republicans who accused the administration of federal overreach by ignoring locals who opposed the move and using the Antiquities Act to cut off commercial activity such as mining and oil and gas drilling.

Prior legislative attempts by the Utah delegation to curb federal monuments in the state have failed. Utah Republicans Rob Bishop and Jason Chaffetz did manage last year to get their Utah Public Lands Initiative legislation through the Natural Resources Committee, which Bishop chairs, but it never received a floor vote.

If Trump ultimately decides to alter Bears Ears or the other monuments on the list, he is certain to face legal challenges from environmental groups. "An attack on one monument is an attack on all of them," said Jesse Prentice-Dunn, advocacy director at the Center for Western Priorities.

Past presidents have changed the size of monuments but none have revoked them entirely, and legal questions remain as to whether the law allows a president to fully undo their predecessor's actions.

Zinke last month traveled to the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante monuments and this week he will head to New England to visit the Katahdin Woods and Waters National Monument in Maine, which is also under review.

Zinke has repeatedly talked about the need to balance conservation with commercial and recreational demands on public lands, and has already this year ended the moratorium on new coal leases and launched reviews on ways to open up more areas for oil and gas development.

Vogtle owners seek new cash infusion from loan program Trump wants gone Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/18/2017 04:50 PM EDT

Backers of the Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia are hoping Energy Secretary Rick Perry can quickly wedge more federal financial support under the massive project — just as one state regulator was skeptical that it would be a "make-or-break" decision.

Three of Vogtle's backers revealed this week that they want a bigger lifeline from the Energy Department after their long-delayed and over-budget project suffered the bankruptcy of its lead contractor and reactor designer Westinghouse this spring.

Under the Obama administration, DOE approved loan guarantees of $3.4 billion to Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, $3.1 billion to Oglethorpe Power Co., and $1.8 billion to the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia to back the Vogtle project — the nation's first set of new reactor designs in more than a generation.

Now, all three say they've filed paperwork with DOE to increase those loan guarantee levels for the Vogtle project, while declining to say how much they're now seeking.

When Congress established the loan program as part of the 2005 energy law, DOE was authorized to guarantee up to $12.5 billion in financing for nuclear energy projects in the U.S., which would potentially allow Vogtle's owners to tap another $4.2 billion. Bloomberg first reported on the new applications from Southern and Oglethorpe.

Still, Tim Echols, the vice chairman of the Georgia Public Service Commission, warned against linking Vogtle's fate to the additional DOE financing.

In June, Vogtle's co-owners secured an agreement from Westinghouse parent company Toshiba that would direct $3.68 billion to the project. But, in an SEC filing last week, Oglethorpe aired concerns that they may not be able to "fully collect" the sum if Toshiba's financial status erodes further.

"I'm not sure that the loan guarantee piece of the project equation is a make or break issue for us," Echols said by email. "The Toshiba payments are far more important."

Vogtle's sister project in South Carolina, V.C. Summer, which is set to receive a smaller payout from Toshiba, didn't initially seek assistance from DOE. But earlier this month, a DOE official said SCANA sought as much as $3 billion in grants from the agency to support the flailing project — a cash sum that is essentially 10 percent of the agency budget and would almost certainly need congressional approval. DOE rejected the request but suggested SCANA apply for a loan guarantee, which the company declined to do.

Southern is expected to tell Georgia regulators by the end of August whether it plans to proceed with all or part of the two-reactor Vogtle project.

Echols, who has supported the project for years, wrote an op-ed for The Wall Street Journal late Thursday saying that "[w]ith vision, perseverance and God's help we will make the Vogtle reactors America's next nuclear-energy flagship."

The decision on whether to approve increases for the Vogtle loan guarantees could force Perry into an uncomfortable position: He has expressed his interest in protecting around-the-clock "baseload" sources of electricity like nuclear power, but conservatives have long lambasted the loan program for distorting the energy market.

The Trump administration has called for killing the loan office in its fiscal 2018 budget proposal — a document Perry has publicly distanced himself from on Capitol Hill.

Republican spending chiefs in the House and Senate have also advanced bills that would rescind the loan guarantee authorities established under the George W. Bush administration, a move that may have closed the door on the latest request from Vogtle's owners if the legislation is ultimately signed into law before DOE acts.

"This is reversal of fortune at a pivotal time for the loan guarantee program," said David Blee, the executive director of the U.S. Nuclear Infrastructure Council, a coalition of nuclear businesses. "This demonstrates, especially in comparison to V.C. Summer, the importance of loan guarantees in propelling first-of-a-kind nuclear energy projects."

He added: "We are confident that key appropriators and authorizers will take note."

But some conservatives aren't persuaded by Summer's demise or Vogtle's woes to abandon their opposition to the loan program.

"It's a pivotal moment on the direction of whether this administration will stay true to conservative principles in energy policy that protect the taxpayers and that shift U.S. energy policy in a more market-oriented direction," said Nick Loris, an energy and environment fellow for the conservative Heritage Foundation.

Trying to shore up Vogtle with additional financing, he said, would be a "slippery slope" toward preserving DOE's loan program. "The tide is turning in the right direction for closing down the loan guarantee program. It wasn't all that long ago that this program was hailed an economic stimulus from both Democrats and Republicans."

EPA will review parts of Phase 2 truck emissions rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 08/17/2017 04:47 PM EDT

EPA will revisit certain parts of the Obama administration's 2016 Phase 2 emissions rule for heavy-duty trucks, the agency announced today.

The rule set new standards for model years 2021-2027 of tractor-trailers, school buses, delivery vans and other large workhorse vehicles. The Truck Trailer Manufacturers Association sued to block EPA's novel aerodynamic requirements for trailers, arguing the agency cannot set vehicle standards for a product without an actual engine.

The Trump administration is considering revisions to the trailer standards, but it will leave in place separate requirements for tractor engines.

The final 2027 trailer standards by themselves would have secured as much as a 9 percent drop in carbon dioxide emissions and fuel consumption compared to a 2017 trailer, and the separate standards for tractor engines would achieve up to 25 percent emissions reductions by 2027, according to Obama administration estimates.

EPA said it will also reconsider part of the rule that classifies gliders — refurbished engines installed into a new tractor chassis — as a new motor vehicle. House appropriators last month voted to have EPA report to Congress on the glider issue, although that language may not survive the ultimate spending package that clears Congress.

"We intend to initiate a rulemaking process that incorporates the latest technical data and is wholly consistent with our authority under the Clean Air Act," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will begin a rulemaking process to revise or completely rescind those parts of the rule. The earliest compliance deadlines are in 2018. The trailer association unsuccessfully sought relief in court, but EPA may now offer administrative delays in light of its new rulemaking.

EPA PLANS FOR CLEAN POWER PLAN REPLACEMENT: EPA plans to take the first step toward replacing the Clean Power Plan by the first week of October as it publishes its plan to rescind the Obama administration's carbon limits for power plants, Pro's Emily Holden reports.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt had been averse to replacing the rule, and sources tell Emily that when OMB first began reviewing the Clean Power Plan withdrawal in June the agency did not have plans to replace it. The decision to signal the agency will write a replacement comes after months of lobbying from electric company executives and suggests Pruitt may not challenge the legal finding that EPA must regulate greenhouse gases. One likely approach to a new emissions regulation would focus on improving coal-plant efficiency, so generators make more power while burning less coal.

The repeal-and-replace proposals come as patience was wearing thin at the D.C. Circuit, which has avoided issuing an opinion on the Clean Power Plan itself while EPA reconsidered the rule. In an August warning shot to EPA, judges said failing to propose a replacement meant the agency was avoiding a "statutory duty" to regulate carbon emissions, though it agreed to keep the case on ice through Oct. 7. EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said she "would not comment on proposals going through interagency review."

TRUMP OFFICIAL TO HOST CLIMATE MEETING: National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn will host a breakfast meeting to discuss "international energy and climate issues" the day before the opening of the U.N. General Assembly next week, POLITICO's Andrew Restuccia reports. The invitation obtained by POLITICO says the huddle is an "opportunity for key ministers with responsibility for these issues to engage in an informal exchange of views and discuss how we can move forward most productively." But an administration official stressed the meeting will not focus solely on climate change.

HILLARY'S CAMPAIGN IDEA THAT ALMOST WAS BUT THEN WASN'T: Among other revelations contained in her new book, Hillary Clinton said she was intrigued by Peter Barnes' proposal to create a sort of Alaska Permanent Fund for the whole country. The idea, dubbed by her campaign "Alaska for America," would have taken royalties from oil and gas production — plus receipts from a carbon tax, financial transactions taxes, fees on airwaves used by cell phones and broadcasters, and other resources — and used them to give Americans a guaranteed minimum income. But, alas, as she and Bill worked the calculator, they found the math didn't work.

"We decided it was exciting but not realistic, and left it on the shelf. That was the responsible decision," she wrote in "What Happened." "I wonder whether we should have thrown caution to the wind and embraced 'Alaska for America' as a long-term goal and figured out the details later."

About that carbon tax: Clinton says her campaign also looked more specifically at the idea of a carbon tax dividend, but once again could not get math to work out without new costs for the middle class, which she had vowed against. "Still," she added, "it's tantalizing."

Canary was the coal mine: Clinton argues the Obama team's slow efforts to counter the emerging Republican narrative that his administration began a "war on coal" hurt Democrats in 2016, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. "The Obama administration was slow to take on this false narrative," she wrote. Clinton encouraged Obama to roll out the Clean Power Plan in 2015 in coal country, and pair it with a major initiative to bring new investments and jobs to the region as a way of softening the blow.

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke also makes a cameo: Clinton recounts an awkward encounter at the inauguration when she said she was surprised Zinke came over to greet her because in 2014 he had called her the "Antichrist." "Maybe he'd forgotten, because he didn't come equipped with any garlic or wooden stakes, or whatever one uses to ward off the Antichrist. But I hadn't forgotten," Clinton writes, adding that she absolutely reminded Zinke of his remark. "He was taken aback and mumbled something about not having meant it. One thing I've learned over the years is how easy it is for some people to say horrible things about me when I'm not around, but how hard it is for them to look me in the eye and say it to my face." (Zinke's wife, Lola, disputed the story.)

CARPER WON'T BACK WEHRUM: Top EPW Democrat Tom Carper told reporters Tuesday he won't back Trump's nominee to run the EPA's air office, Bill Wehrum. "This nominee is troubling," he said. "I don't say that about all of this administration's nominees, but this one is troubling." Chairman John Barrasso told reporters the committee would have "four or five" confirmation hearings next week, though he wouldn't specify which nominees that includes. He separately said EPW was "working on a time" for EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to come testify before it.

NELSON: GOP 'DENYING REALITY' ON CLIMATE CHANGE: Even as he said he didn't want to play partisan politics in the aftermath of Hurricane Irma, Florida Sen. Bill Nelson knocked Republicans — including his likely 2018 opponent Gov. Rick Scott — for opposing action to address manmade climate change, POLITICO's Michael Grunwald reports. "It's denying reality," Nelson said. "You can call it politics or whatever, but the Earth is getting hotter. This storm is another reminder of what we're going to have to deal with in the future." He added it would be a crucial issue during his reelection contest.

EPA-INTERIOR VOTES EXPECTED: You'd be forgiven for forgetting the House is still working through its mega-spending package H.R. 3354 \(115\), but five outstanding EPA and Interior-related amendments should get votes today. The amendments would bar EPA from enforcing its methane rule, block the social cost of carbon from future rule makings, prohibit the closure of EPA regional offices and slash the agency's budget by an additional $1.87 billion, among others. Full list of all pending amendments to the bill here.

CCS WEEK KICKS OFF IN EARNEST: Senate EPW today holds a hearing on how to accelerate deployment of carbon capture and sequestration technologies around the country. Look for lots of discussion of the FUTURE Act, S. 1535 \(115\), one of the few pieces of legislation ME can remember that boasts the support of both Barrasso and Sheldon Whitehouse. Witnesses include Matthew Fry, a policy adviser to Wyoming Gov. Matt Mead and former DOE senior official Julio Friedmann.

HELPING OUT THE LITTLE GUYS? The House Energy and Commerce Committee's environment panel will hold a hearing today on a quartet of bills aimed at postponing or loosening various emissions regulations. H.R. 1917 \(115\) would delay the brick MACT until legal challenges have played out (coincidentally, the D.C. Circuit revealed Tuesday that oral arguments over that rule will take place Nov. 9). H.R. 1119 \(115\) would expand Cross-State Air Pollution Rule compliance options for 19 plants, mostly in Pennsylvania, that burn coal waste for electricity. H.R. 453 \(115\) would extend some deadlines for a residential wood heater emissions rule. And H.R. 350 \(115\) aims to clarify that anti-tampering provisions in vehicle emissions rules do not apply to vehicles used only for racing, an issue that flared up last year under EPA's Phase 2 heavy-duty truck rule. Some of these bills passed the House in previous years, but failed to gain traction in the Senate. If you go: The hearing kicks off at 10 a.m. in Rayburn 2123.

ENDANGERED SPECIES MEASURES GETTING MARKED UP: A litany of controversial measures get marked up today at the House Natural Resources Committee, including H.R. 3668 \(115\) a sportsmen's package that Democrats have condemned as enabling the deregulation of gun silencers and five bills taking bites at the Endangered Species Act. They are: H.R. 424 \(115\), which would redo Interior rules delisting the gray wolf; H.R. 2603 \(115\), which would bar non-native species from being listed as endangered or threatened under the statute; H.R. 3131 \(115\), which would lower attorney fees that could be awarded in ESA litigation; H.R. 717 \(115\), which would allow federal agencies to factor cost into listing decisions and prioritize listing petitions rather than decide them in the order they're received; and H.R. 1274 \(115\), which would require the availability of all data used in listing decisions to impacted states. The fun kicks off at 10 a.m. in Longworth 1334.

BLAST FROM THE PAST: ME got to briefly chat with former EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy after she met with Senate climate caucus members to "catch up" on various environmental issues. She declined to weigh in on Pruitt's comment that it's "insensitive" to discuss climate change in the aftermath of hurricanes Harvey and Irma, but said, "I think we all know that storms like that get as intense as those storms were because of an impact on climate. If you want safe and healthy communities, you're going to have to address the issue of climate change. Period."

ICAHN'T BELIEVE EPA: Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse cast a jaundiced eye over Pruitt's letter denying email communication with billionaire Carl Icahn. "On its face, this letter suggests Mr. Icahn had far less control over RFS policymaking than he had suggested publicly," Whitehouse spokesman Rich Davidson told ME. "On the other hand, Pruitt has a long-established skill in obscuring his contacts with the industry that pulls his strings." Pruitt said the agency searched the inboxes of 39 agency officials and came up empty on Icahn emails.

RESHUFFLED ELECTRICITY BOARD REVS UP TODAY: DOE's newly configured

Electricity Advisory Committee assembles this afternoon to kick off a meeting with a half dozen fresh faces and a two-day agenda that will cover the agency's much-discussed electric grid study, include a two-hour panel on cybersecurity and a rundown of a National Academies report on grid resiliency. Perry let the membership of 14 EAC members lapse recently and installed six new members, effectively shrinking the board's overall size. But the person Perry tapped as the new EAC chairman, Michael Heyeck of American Electric Power, isn't apparently able to attend, according to the agenda, which describes ERCOT engineer John Adams as acting chairman this week. Most of the cybersecurity talk — including panel discussion and a presentation on a draft DOE multiyear energy sector cybersecurity plan — is slated for Thursday morning. The meeting starts at 1:30 p.m. at the offices of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association in Arlington, Va.

GAO TO PROBE PERRY'S HEALTHCARE TWEETS: GAO has agreed to a request from Rep. Frank Pallone, top Energy and Commerce Democrat, to issue a legal opinion on whether DOE's use of its Twitter account to promote an op-ed by Secretary Rick Perry on health care violated the Antideficiency Act, the Anti-Lobbying Act and the Consolidated Appropriations Act of 2017. Pallone first made the request in late July.

ZINKE TELL STAFF TO UP GAME ON FIRE PREVENTION: Zinke directed staff on Tuesday to be much more proactive on fire prevention, including by hiring contractors if necessary to clear dead trees, removing vegetation away from roads and buildings that could prove quick fire fodder and to include fire prevention in resource management planning. The move comes as wildfires rage in the West. "It makes little sense to be thinning to protect structures when we see flames on the ridge and smoke in the air—fuel management is more effective when undertaken before fires break out," Zinke said in the memorandum.

ITC VOTE ON SOLAR TRADE CASE COMING NEXT WEEK: The U.S. International Trade Commission will vote Sept. 22 on whether the U.S. solar industry has been injured by low-cost imports, according to an ITC website announcement. The case has the solar industry on tenterhooks, as domestic companies that install cheap foreign-made panels believe raising equipment costs will harm business. A Trump administration official has already signaled the administration would likely impose tariffs if the ITC determines there has been injury.

MAIL CALL! HOUSE SCIENCE PROBES OBAMA APPOINTEE: After DOE's inspector general found the government spent $138,000 on an employee's graduate degree unrelated to his job, House Science Chairman Lamar Smith sent a letter requesting documents on what the agency is doing to prevent something similar from happening again. "The Committee is concerned this could be an indication of a more widespread occurrence of inappropriate training authorizations and expenditures within DOE," Smith wrote.

McCOLLUM HITS PRUITT OVER ATTACK ON JOURNALIST: Rep. ### EPA to replace Clean Power Plan Back

By Emily Holden | 09/12/2017 09:04 PM EDT

EPA plans to publish its proposal to rescind the Clean Power Plan and take its first step to replace the rule by the first week of October, according to a source familiar with the process.

The decision to publish an advance notice of EPA's intent to issue a new regulation on carbon emissions from power plants comes after months of lobbying from electricity company executives who think it would be the smart legal move. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt had previously been resistant to replacing the Obama-era rule.

Without a rule on the books, environmental advocates could sue the agency — leaving businesses in limbo while the courts sort out the issue, industry officials had warned.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit has frozen consideration of lawsuits against the Clean Power Plan while asking for status updates from EPA. In August, judges told EPA that without a replacement rule in place it was avoiding a "statutory duty" to regulate carbon emissions under the Clean Air Act. The judges agreed to keep the case on hold through Oct. 7.

EPA's decision to pursue a replacement rule suggests Pruitt may not challenge a legal finding that EPA must regulate greenhouse gases.

The agency told the court it would publish a rule to withdraw the Clean Power Plan this fall. The OMB first reviewed the rule withdrawal in June. At that time, EPA did not have plans to replace the Clean Power Plan, sources said.

Pruitt, as attorney general of Oklahoma, joined other states' lawyers in arguing that the Obama administration went too far in trying to curb carbon levels by encouraging states to shift away from burning coal and toward renewable power and natural gas.

One likely approach to a replacement rule would focus on improving coal-plant efficiency, so generators make more power while burning less coal.

"We aren't going to comment on proposals going through interagency review," EPA spokeswoman Liz Bowman said via email.

Cohn to participate in energy, climate discussion at United Nations Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 09/12/2017 03:37 PM EDT

National Economic Council director Gary Cohn will host an energy and climate change discussion with international officials in New York next week, an administration official confirmed.

The Monday meeting comes the day before the opening of the United Nations General Assembly, where President Donald Trump and dozens of other world leaders will speak.

Cohn invited officials from more than a dozen countries to the breakfast meeting to discuss "international energy and climate issues," according to a copy of the invitation obtained by POLITICO.

The invitation, which Cohn sent on Sept. 7, says the huddle is an "opportunity for key ministers with responsibility for these issues to engage in an informal exchange of views and discuss how we can move forward most productively."

The administration official stressed that the meeting, first reported by the New York Times, will not focus solely on climate change.

Trump infuriated foreign diplomats when he announced in June that he would withdraw from the Paris climate change agreement, which has won the support of nearly 200 nations. Cohn was among White House officials pushing Trump not to exit the Paris agreement at the time.

But so far, the United States has not formally withdrawn, and Trump administration officials have sent mixed signals about whether it is willing to reach a deal to remain in the pact.

The State Department announced last month that the U.S. would continue participating in international climate change negotiations, including talks aimed at implementing the Paris pact, "to protect U.S. interests and ensure all future policy options remain open to the administration."

Trump, who has called climate change a "hoax" perpetrated by the Chinese, has said the United States is getting an unfair deal in the Paris agreement.

Clinton: Obama was too slow to counter 'war on coal' narrative Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/12/2017 03:30 PM EDT

Hillary Clinton says in her new book that former President Barack Obama took too long to challenge Republican criticism that his administration had started a "war on coal," which hurt

Democrats in last year's election.

"The Obama administration was slow to take on this false narrative," she wrote in "What Happened."

But Clinton did admit that her infamous comment at a March 2016 town hall event that "we're going to put a lot of coal miners and coal companies out of business," was a gaffe and an "unfortunate comment."

And she argued that the politics around coal are a microcosm of how Democrats have fallen out of touch with white working class voters.

Democrats' support for air and water pollution regulations made them an "easy scapegoat" for long-term misfortunes in coal country, Clinton wrote, "despite strong evidence that government regulation is not the primary cause for the industry's decline."

The former secretary of State wrote that she suggested Obama roll out the Clean Power Plan in 2015 in coal country, and pair it with a major initiative to bring new investments and jobs to the region. "That might have softened the blow a little," she wrote.

Obama ultimately announced the regulation from the White House alongside EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy, which Clinton argued was "seen by many folks in West Virginia as another signal that Democrats didn't care about them. Once that perception takes hold, it's hard to dislodge."

Embracing a narrative about how industrial areas can "reinvent" themselves for 21st century jobs was a vote-winner, according to Clinton. Clinton lost Pennsylvania, but won a landslide victory in Pittsburgh, the city President Donald Trump cited as a concern when he pulled out of the Paris climate agreement earlier this year.

"Trump may think of that city as an emblem of the industrial past ... but the reality is that Pittsburgh has reinvented itself as a hub of clean energy, education, and biomedical research," Clinton writes.

Pittsburgh's mayor has committed the city to meeting the Paris deal's reduction goals, even as the U.S. withdraws from the agreement.

But ultimately, the coal issue remains as one of her top disappointments, particularly since it contributed to her losses in Pennsylvania and Ohio.

"Did they turn against me because I served as Obama's Secretary of State and believed climate change was a real threat to our future? Or did their rage flow from a deeper tribal politics?" she wrote. "All I knew for certain was they were angry, they were loud, and they hated my guts."

Despite the campaign promises of Trump, "the hard truth is that coal isn't coming back," Clinton wrote, adding, "Politicians owe it to communities that have relied on the industry for generations to be honest about the future."

Clinton also criticized Don Blankenship, who headed Massey Energy when its Upper Big Branch disaster killed 29 workers in 2010. Shortly before he reported to prison last year, he showed up outside a Clinton campaign event in West Virginia.

"Blankenship endangered his workers, undermined their union, and polluted their rivers and streams, all while making big profits and contributing millions to Republican candidates," Clinton writes. "He should have been the least popular man in West Virginia even before he was convicted in the wake of the death of twenty-nine miners. Instead, he was welcomed by the pro-Trump protesters in Williamson. One of them told a reporter that he'd vote for Blankenship for President if he ran.

"Meanwhile, I pledged to strengthen the laws to protect workers and hold bosses like Blankenship accountable — the fact that he received a jail sentence of one year was appalling — yet I was the one being protested."

Trump picks Bush-era EPA official for air chief Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/07/2017 07:16 PM EDT

President Donald Trump has nominated Bill Wehrum, a George W. Bush-era EPA official who since has represented a variety of energy industry interests, to run EPA's powerful air office.

POLITICO reported in July that Wehrum was expected to receive the nod.

As head of EPA's Office of Air and Radiation, Wehrum will play a key role in undoing many of the Obama-era regulations most opposed by Republicans, including the Clean Power Plan, the 2015 ozone standard and forthcoming vehicle emissions rules. Wehrum has been critical of EPA's authority to regulate greenhouse gases, even after the Supreme Court's 2007 ruling saying EPA did have such authority.

He served as a counsel to Jeff Holmstead, Bush's first-term air chief, before replacing Holmstead in an acting capacity from 2005 to 2007. Bush nominated Wehrum to the job permanently, but Democrats blocked his nomination from proceeding in the Senate.

Wehrum spent the past decade as a partner at the Washington, D.C., law firm Hunton & Williams. His clients have included the American Petroleum Industry, American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers, the Utility Air Regulatory Group, the American Chemistry Council, the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Forest & Paper Association.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will review Wehrum's nomination in what is certain to be a contentious process.

Florida Sen. Bill Nelson: Republicans 'denying reality' on climate change Back

By Michael Grunwald | 09/12/2017 09:06 PM EDT

Democratic Senator Bill Nelson of Florida, after surveying the damage that Hurricane Irma inflicted across his state, blasted Republican politicians who reject the science and minimize the importance of climate change—including his likely opponent in 2018, Governor Rick Scott.

In an interview Tuesday evening with POLITICO, Nelson said it's clear that manmade global warming made Irma worse by increasing the temperature and the height of the seas that fueled the storm. He said he didn't want to play partisan politics in the aftermath of a hurricane, but then went on to criticize Republicans in general and Scott in particular—though not by name—for opposing climate action. He noted that both the Trump administration in Washington and the Scott administration in Tallahassee have reportedly discouraged government employees from even talking about climate change.

"It's denying reality," Nelson said. "You can call it politics or whatever, but the Earth is getting hotter. This storm is another reminder of what we're going to have to deal with in the future."

Nelson, a former astronaut, launched into a detailed explanation of the science of climate change and the greenhouse effect, and how it has helped make the waters around Florida higher and warmer in recent decades. He said it would be a crucial issue in his reelection campaign, even as he avoided the words "Rick Scott."

"It's certainly going to be an important issue, and if certain people such as the one you mentioned is my opponent, there's a significant contrast in what we believe," Nelson said.

Florida is a swing state in presidential elections, but its state government and statewide offices tilt heavily Republican; Nelson has been an exception to the red wave, but a well-known, well-funded opponent like Scott would be by far his most difficult challenge to date. He clearly sees climate as a potential wedge issue in a state with a heavily coastal population and increasing vulnerability to Irma-type disasters. Scott did not discuss the issue in his frequent Irma briefings; a spokesperson for the governor, when asked about Nelson's comments, said, "Now is not the time for politics. This storm is not a partisan issue. Now is the time to focus on helping Florida rebuild."

But in the past, he has questioned climate science—or declined to affirm the scientific consensus that it's being caused by humans, often noting, "I am not a scientist"—and fossil-fuel interests have supported his campaigns. In 2015, the Miami Herald reported that Scott's administration had even banned the use of the terms "climate change," "global warming" and "sustainability" in official documents.

Nelson is not known in Washington as a leader on climate issues, but he said he's focused on them since he was Florida's insurance commissioner in the 1990s. He's fought against President Trump's proposed cuts to climate science at agencies like NOAA, NASA and EPA, and said he helped persuade the Obama administration to launch a satellite, first dreamed up by Al Gore, that takes continuous pictures of the Earth from deep space.

But Nelson didn't really argue that he deserved kudos for accepting the conclusions of the scientific community; he argued that Republicans on the other side of the issue need to explain why they think "99.5 percent of climate scientists" are wrong. Several prominent Republicans in South Florida—including Miami-Dade County mayor Carlos Gimenez and Reps. Carlos Curbelo and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen—have made it clear they believe Washington needs to take climate seriously. Nelson pointed out that politicians don't question government scientists when they say a hurricane is coming—but when the same agencies use the same scientific instruments to measure long-term climate trends, opinions suddenly differ.

"It's ironic, isn't it?" Nelson said. "They accept the hurricane information, but deny the climate information ... Look, some people still think the Earth is flat."

Pruitt: EPA had no emails communications with Icahn Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/12/2017 02:28 PM EDT

EPA had no email communication with billionaire and former Trump adviser Carl Icahn, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt told Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) in a letter this week.

In the letter sent Monday and provided to POLITICO by an EPA official, Pruitt said EPA searched the inboxes of 39 high-ranking officials for messages to or from Icahn between Feb. 17 and Aug. 18, and they found no emails on any subject.

Pruitt's letter was a response to four different letters from Whitehouse and other Senate Democrats seeking information on Icahn's efforts to modify the Renewable Fuel Standard to benefit his refining company. Icahn was an unpaid adviser to Trump until last month, when he resigned his title after questions arose about his advocating for policies that would help his businesses.

Pruitt did acknowledge meeting with Icahn as part of his vetting process to join the Trump administration.

"Mr. Icahn was one of many of the president's advisors that I met with during my confirmation process," he wrote. "During that meeting, I made no assurances with regard to the point of obligation or any other substantive issue."

DOE shrinks electricity advisory board Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/06/2017 05:34 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry is installing new members to the Energy Department's Electricity

Advisory Committee even as he whittles down the size of the board.

The 2016-17 roster for the board, which reports to the assistant secretary for electricity deliverability and energy reliability, had numbered 32 people, but including the new members, it will now total 24, since 14 members didn't have their terms renewed.

DOE says that three members had asked the agency not to renew their terms because of other commitments or because they had left the country.

Perry installed six new members: Mike Heyeck, a former AEP executive and founder of Grid Group; Paul Hudson, ex-chairman of the Texas Public Utilities Commission; Mladen Kezunovic, an engineering professor at Texas A&M; Bryan Olnick, an executive with Florida Power & Light; David Wade, CEO of the Electric Power Board of Chattanooga; and Tom Weaver, an official with AEP.

EAC members serve two-year terms, but about half of the positions are staggered so that some measure of continuity is maintained.

The board, which typically meets three times a year, is purely advisory and works on a range of power-related issues. The panel's charter states that there be "approximately 30" members.

Those not returning are: Ake Almgren, Merwin Brown, Paula Carmody, Paul Centolella, Carlos Coe, Phyllis Currie, Mark Lauby, Janice Lin, Anne Pramaggiore, Paul Roberti, Sue Tierney, Rebecca Wagner, Audrey Zibelman, and Carl Zichella.

WHAT'S NEXT: The electricity advisory committee will meet next Wednesday and Thursday in Arlington, Va.

FERC SEEKS EXTRA TIME: Within hours of being sworn in as the new FERC chairman, Kevin McIntyre asked Energy Secretary Rick Perry for a 30-day extension to take action on DOE's proposal calling for new rules to protect coal-fired and nuclear power plants. "The proposed extension is critical to afford adequate time for the new Commissioners to consider the voluminous record and engage fully in deliberations," McIntyre writes in a letter issued Thursday night that cites the fact that two new commissioners have joined the agency in the past two weeks. "The DOE Act does not limit the means by which deadlines can be altered or amended but instead vests such determinations squarely in the discretion of the Secretary."

McIntyre also notes the high volume of comments —more than 1,500 — received on the proposal. Remember FERC is currently slated to take action on Dec. 11, the end of the 60-day deadline set by DOE, a much shorter timeline than the agency typically has for making big decisions. A DOE spokeswoman responds from Qatar: "We have received the Chairman's letter to the Secretary and it is being reviewed."

Perry's urgency seems to be driven by fears that coal-fired power plants operated by FirstEnergy Solutions could shut down if the company falls into bankruptcy — an occurrence that Murray Energy chief Bob Murray has warned would sink his coal mining company. (More on the Murray-Perry links below.)

REDOING THE MATH ON ANWR?: Democrats are asserting that the weak demand from oil companies in this week's lackluster lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska is a good reason not to buy Republican claims in their tax package H.R. 1 \(115\) that allowing drilling in a portion of ANWR would generate $1 billion over 10 years, Pro's Ben Lefebvre and your ME host report. House Natural Resources ranking member Raul Grijalva and two other committee members asked CBO Director Keith Hall in a letter to redo its math in light of the poor lease sale, which generated only $1.2 million. Energy and Natural Resources ranking member Maria Cantwell summed up her position: "The dismal response to this lease sale proves what we've been saying all along: even the small amount the GOP claims will be raised by drilling in the Arctic is a sham."

But Republicans were unmoved: Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski said it was misleading to compare Wednesday's sale with prospects for ANWR, noting the refuge is believed to hold as much as 10 times the billion barrels of oil estimated to lie buried in the petroleum reserve. "Different fields, different prospectivity," Murkowski told reporters. And Rep. John Shimkus, another conferee, noted the plan had always been to fill whatever revenue shortfall from the ANWR proceeds with cash raised from selling oil from the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. "Part of the reason why the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is now part of the tax bill is that in the 10-year window, ANWR doesn't score anyway," he told ME. (The latest report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated ANWR revenues would fall short by about $366 million).

Bottom line: With Murkowski and Alaska Rep. Don Young on the tax conference, ANWR won't lack for support even if the outlook for leases is weak.

ZINKE'S HELICOPTER HABIT: Travel logs show Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke spent more than $14,000 on government helicopters over the summer, Ben reports. In one case, Zinke took a $8,000 ride so he could make emergency management exercise in Shepherdstown, W.Va., on June 21 because he said official business would prevent him leaving Washington before 2 p.m. What was that business? The swearing-in ceremony for Zinke's congressional successor, Rep. Greg Gianforte.

In another instance, Zinke ordered a Park Police helicopter — at a cost of about $6,250 — to fly him and another Interior official to and from Yorktown, Va., on July 7 so he could make a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence. He was coming from a walking tour of the local Revolutionary War battlefield and attended a boating industry roundtable discussion. Heather Swift, an agency spokeswoman, told ME: "The swearing in of the Congressman is absolutely an official event, as is emergency management training. Shame on you for not respecting the office of a Member of Congress."

LET'S MAKE A DEAL! Oil-state Republican senators left a Thursday meeting with President Donald Trump with a directive to get to work on a biofuels compromise that will benefit both gasoline makers and corn growers, your ME host reports. "[Trump] wants us to come to him with something that's going to make both sides happy, and I believe we can do it, and believe he thinks we can do it after this meeting," Jim Inhofe said, adding he and John Cornyn had begun working with corn-state Republicans on possible solutions.

What's Sen. Chuck Grassley think? "I'm waiting for Senator Cruz to give me a plan. He said he had a win-win plan."

Team ethanol not so thrilled: Ethanol Industry groups Growth Energy and the Renewable Fuel Association were skeptical of Cruz's claims that RIN prices were hurting biofuels. RFA noted the numerous analyses that show refiners are making money on RINs this year, while Growth suggested that maybe they could take the pressure off by allowing year-round sale of E15. And a spokesman for POET, which makes more ethanol than anyone, minced no words. "It looks like Ted Cruz is doing the same old thing playing with the facts," said Kylie Gilley, POET Senior Vice President of External Affairs & Communications. "The fact is in the current market, some oil companies win and some don't playing the RIN market."

EPA floats administrative action: Senators who attended the meeting said EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt floated administrative actions to cut the costs refiners bear to comply with the Renewable Fuel Standard. "There's some indication that the EPA administrator could have some authority with regard to the RINs prices," Cornyn said. "So I think that was kind of interesting to hear from the EPA administrator that is something they might be able to do." An agency spokesman did not confirm Pruitt's remarks, but said EPA had the authority under RFS to take action to alter RIN pricing.

White House spokesman Hogan Gidley on the meeting: "President Trump had a productive meeting today with senators and administration officials. The president confirmed his commitment to RFS and his support for our farmers and energy workers. He understands there are differing views on this issue, and the administration looks forward to working with all the stakeholders toward a mutually agreeable path forward."

A THOUSAND WORDS: Photos published Thursday show coal magnate Bob Murray personally pitching Perry on his plan to save struggling coal companies just three weeks before Perry ordered a grid study later used to support a proposed rule to reward coal and nuclear power plants for providing "grid resiliency," Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Among those in attendance was Andrew Wheeler, a lobbyist for Murray Energy Corp. at the time, who has since been nominated as EPA's No. 2 official. One of the photos obtained by In These Times shows Perry and Murray in a big bear hug.

DOE's spokeswoman Shaylyn Hynes responds: "Industry stakeholders visit the Department of Energy on a daily basis. The DOE proposal to FERC was about the future and resiliency of the nation's power supply, an issue much bigger than one industry or company."

NO SHUTDOWN! Lawmakers cleared a two-week stopgap spending package Thursday to avoid a government shutdown but remain a ways away on a broader budget agreement, POLITICO's John Bresnahan, Sarah Ferris and Nancy Cook report.

MORE VIEWS ON TAX CONFERENCE: The Business Council for Sustainable Energy released a letter Thursday outlining its priorities and suggestions for the final compromise version of the tax bill. It finds flaws in both versions with some in the House's "extremely problematic" for how they treat a variety of energy technologies. "We urge Congress to address these issues during the conference on the tax reform legislation or in a year-end extenders bill," it suggests.

DECISION WITH BIG CONSEQUENCES: How the Securities and Exchange Commission rules on a shareholder proposal from Jantz Management LLC that asks Apple to set a specific date for when it could eliminate its carbon footprint will have major implications for investors, Pro Financial Services' Patrick Temple-West reports, citing an asset manager involved in a fight with the company. If the agency allows Apple to block the proposal, the decision "could have serious repercussions not just for Apple shareholders, but for investors in all other companies," said Jantz. "The SEC has long made it clear that proposals on a company's actions on climate change are not ordinary business, and that there is a dire need for leading companies to set a timeframe to reduce [greenhouse gas] emissions aggressively now," the company said.

O CANADA! Rather than trying to eliminate the NAFTA energy chapter, the U.S. should work with Canada and Mexico to improve it, Pro Trade's Doug Palmer reports, citing the head of the Canadian Electricity Association. "We believe ... the chapter has worked well and that it does not require major fixing or nixing," CEA President and CEO Sergio Marchi said Thursday. "It provides a consolidated energy space in NAFTA, and offers an effective framework for adding new elements as we modernize this agreement."

A SCIFMAS CAROL: Pruitt testified before lawmakers on Thursday that his new secure phone booth is for both classified matters and communicating with the White House. "There are secure conversations that need to take place at times," he told Rep. Diana DeGette. "I believe there are secure conversations that need to take place that I didn't have access to. ...

Cabinet-level officials need to have access to secure communications." Pruitt would not say how much time he spends working in the booth. DeGette wrote on Facebook later that she was concerned Pruitt "couldn't say how often it's used" given the $25,000 price tag and the administration's proposed budget cuts.

Spotted: Pruitt taking his staff to dinner at Le Diplomate.

MAKING HIS CASE: As lawsuits against Trump's Monday order to shrink two national monuments continue to pile up, Zinke defended the case for downsizing both the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante in a CNN op-ed. "The Antiquities Act is not a weapon for presidents to arbitrarily restrict the uses of hundreds of thousands of acres of land to prevent uses like timber harvesting and cattle grazing," he writes. "It is also not a tool for presidents to use to restrict access for outdoor recreation on land that belongs to all of us."

REMOVED: EPA has removed references to climate change and greenhouse gases on web pages about its own sustainability plans and dialed back language on its commitment to using renewable energy, according to changes that the Environmental Data & Governance Initiative reports happened in September. EDGI says EPA also took down some links to climate adaptation resources.

LAUTENBERG'S WIDOW SLAMS DOURSON: Bonnie Lautenberg, the wife of late-Sen. Frank Lautenberg and tireless advocate for the overhaul of TSCA, slammed Trump's pick to run the EPA's chemicals office and urged senators to oppose Michael Dourson's nomination. "Michael Dourson will only serve to undermine Frank's legacy and threaten the safety of families and children across our country," she wrote on CNN.

'Largest ever' Interior Alaska oil lease sale draws little interest Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/06/2017 08:26 PM EDT

The Interior Department received only seven bids from two companies today in what it had billed as the "largest ever" oil and gas lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve in Alaska.

The bids on the 10.3 million unleased acres in the NPR-A generated just $1.2 million in high bids, according to a Bureau of Land Management summary. The relatively low amount could undercut GOP arguments that opening up the nearby Arctic National Wildlife Refuge would generate $1 billion in revenue.

A BLM Alaska lease sale last year generated $18 million for 1.4 million acres offered.

Subsidiaries of ConocoPhillips and Anadarko were the only two companies that participated in the lease sale. The companies only bid for 80,000 acres, or less than 1 percent of the acreage offered. The highest bid amount was $14.99 per acre.

Low oil prices and the relatively cheap and plentiful land available for hydraulic fracturing in the lower 48 has hurt oil company interest in the out-of-the-way fields of Alaska and the Gulf of Mexico. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) have pushed to open more public land to drilling, however, saying that doing so is important to increase domestic energy production.

Zinke had previously said that today's "large and unprecedented sale in Alaska will help achieve our goal of American Energy Dominance."

An Interior spokesperson did not immediately respond to questions.

Democrats worry Arctic National Wildlife Refuge being lost amid tax debate Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/29/2017 05:17 AM EDT

Democrats' fight to keep oil and gas rigs out of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is losing ground as the Republican tax plan advances — and it's almost as if no one has noticed.

The prospect of drilling in the untouched Alaskan tundra is as close to reality as it's been in more than a decade, with none of the political drama that in past decades turned the refuge's fate into a top-tier rallying cry for liberals. Legislation to allow drilling in ANWR is quietly hitching a ride on the tax code overhaul that Senate Republicans hope to complete by the end of the week, overshadowed by larger debates on whether the bill is a giveaway to rich people and corporations at the expense of the poor and working class.

"It's really not gotten the attention that it should," Sen. Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.), a member of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, told POLITICO about the ANWR provision. "It's not just the budget discussion. It's about everything else that's going on, the flurry of all sorts of other news."

Angus King (I-Maine) said Republicans were trying to shield ANWR from opposition by adding it to the larger bill rather than bringing it to the floor separately under rules, which would require it to win support from 60 senators to overcome a filibuster.

"Well, clearly the strategy is to try to get it through as part of this tax reform effort and thereby avoid a direct up-or-down vote," King said in an interview earlier this month.

The nonstop news cycle and preponderance of other concerns with the tax bill are making it difficult to focus on an issue that normally fires up Democratic voters.

"I do think that putting ANWR in the budget reconciliation package hasn't drawn as much extremist opposition because it is completely overshadowed by tax reform, which is the center of the package," said Chris Guith, senior vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Global Energy Institute. "But there are some who aren't exactly supportive of tax reform that support ANWR, and it's possible to see ANWR bring a vote or two to help pass tax reform."

Senate Energy Chair Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) easily advanced legislation through her committee directing the Interior Department to hold two lease sales for drilling in ANWR over the next decade. It would raise $1 billion over that period, according to the Congressional Budget Office, making it eligible for inclusion in a budget reconciliation package that Democrats cannot filibuster.

The reconciliation package also will include Republicans' tax plan and a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate. While Murkowski helped scuttle the Obamacare repeal push earlier this year, she says she supports ending the mandate. Murkowski's office did not respond to a request for comment.

ANWR, a swath of tundra on the northern Alaska coast, is home to polar bears, porcupine caribou and a landscape that hasn't been touched in thousands of years. Congress designated the 19 million-acre area a wildlife refuge in 1980, but it set aside a 1.5-million-acre parcel known as "10-02" for possible drilling if future lawmakers approved such a plan. The U.S. Geological Survey estimated in 1998 that part of ANWR could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil, and President Donald Trump and Alaska Republicans have called it essential for their plans for American "energy dominance."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who is undecided on the tax bill for a several reasons, said she will support an amendment on the Senate floor to eliminate the ANWR language, but she said success there is not a prerequisite for her to vote for the underlying bill. "No it is not, but I would certainly try to get it out of the package," Collins told reporters Tuesday. Collins was the only Republican to cross the aisle on an unsuccessful amendment to keep pro-drilling language out of the underlying budget resolution, meaning it is unlikely that she would be able to strip the ANWR provision from a reconciliation bill.

But Democrats say that passing a deficit-increasing tax bill in order to open ANWR would actually harm energy-producing states. That's because the $1.5 trillion shortfall from the GOP tax cuts would trigger required "pay-as-you-go" cuts to mandatory spending programs, according to a CBO analysis sent to House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

One of the programs on the pay-go chopping block would be the energy royalty revenue sharing program carried out through the Mineral Leasing Act. Cutting those payments would lose Alaska an estimated \$15 million in energy royalty payments next year alone, an amount important to a state already facing budget shortfalls.

"Communities throughout the West would be impacted by the loss of revenue, which is used to support a variety of needs including infrastructure, school funding, conservation, and recreation," Hoyer said in a statement to POLITICO. "This is yet another example of the consequences associated with forcing through legislation to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit in order to give tax cuts to the wealthy."

Pay-go cuts also would hit popular programs like Medicare and student loans, but Congress can waive the law with 60 votes in the Senate. Democrats are not yet on board with that approach.

The current push to open ANWR, coming amid a swarm of competing headlines and buried in larger legislation, has come nearer to succeeding than the GOP's two previous attempts. President Bill Clinton vetoed a budget package in 1995 that included language opening ANWR, while a Democratic filibuster thwarted a second attempt in 2005.

Environmental groups have targeted public engagement at only a handful of congressional districts. The League of Conservation Voters spent $550,000 on television ads in three Republican congressional districts. The LCV also paid for a bipartisan polling firm to probe public opinion on opening ANWR, but even that focused only on registered voters in eight congressional districts.

"The reason they're trying to sneak it into the tax package is they know they don't have the votes otherwise," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, the league's senior vice president of government affairs. "They know they can't pass it under regular order, that's why they're doing a sneak attack."

Even ANWR supporters are staying out of the spotlight.

"I haven't seen any full-out, front-page ads, nothing like that," Alaska Oil and Gas Association President Kara Moriarty said. "We're a little battle-weary, to be honest. Alaskans support opening up ANWR. There's been a few statements reiterating that."

Poor Alaska lease sale sows confusion on ANWR drilling plan Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Anthony Adragna | 12/07/2017 05:47 PM EDT

The weak results from the lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska are giving Democrats ammunition in their fight to stop Republicans from opening the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge under the tax bill.

Democrats are making hay out of the fact only two companies bid in what Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke had hailed as an "unprecedented" offering of acreage in the NPR-A, and they say the lease sale, which generated only $1.2 million, undercuts Republican claims that allowing drilling in a portion of ANWR would generate $1 billion over 10 years. The latest report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated ANWR revenues would fall short by about $366 million.

House Natural Resources ranking member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and two other committee members sent a letter to CBO Director Keith Hall asking for a re-do on ANWR drilling revenue estimates in light of the poor NPR-A showing.

But Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), the driving force behind putting the refuge in the budget package, said the lease sale had little bearing on prospects for ANWR, however. The refuge is believed to hold as much as 10 times the billion barrels of oil estimated to lie buried in the petroleum reserve, Murkowski said.

"Different fields, different prospectivity," Murkowski told reporters.

Meanwhile, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) said negotiations over ANWR and how much money it might bring to federal coffers is ongoing.

"I'm going to see all sorts of numbers being thrown out at the last few minutes," Bishop told POLITICO. "We'll look at them. We'll still negotiate this process."

Zinke booked government helicopters to attend D.C. events Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/07/2017 06:31 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke spent more than $14,000 on government helicopters this summer to take himself and staff to and from official events near Washington, D.C., in order to accommodate his attendance at a swearing-in ceremony for his replacement in Congress and a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, according to previously undisclosed official travel documents.

The travel logs, released to POLITICO via a Freedom of Information Act request, show Zinke using taxpayer-funded vehicles from the U.S. Park Police to help accommodate his political events schedule.

In a case detailed in the new documents, Zinke ordered a U.S. Park Police helicopter to take him and his chief of staff, Scott Hommel, to an emergency management exercise in Shepherdstown, West Virginia, on June 21.

Zinke's staff justified the $8,000 flight by saying official business would prevent him leaving Washington before 2 p.m., too late to make the two-hour drive to the exercise, according to the documents.

The event that prevented Zinke from leaving before 2 p.m. was the swearing-in ceremony for Rep. Greg Gianforte (R-Mont.), according to Zinke's official Interior calendar. Gianforte, who won a special election for Zinke's old seat in May, and his wife contributed $15,800 to Zinke's two congressional campaigns.

"Secretary Zinke's last engagement in Washington D.C. is at 2 p.m.," an Interior staffer wrote as justification for using the helicopter. "Driving to [the West Virginia event] would not enable him to be on time and fully participate as scheduled."

Interior defended the trips.

"The swearing in of the Congressman is absolutely an official event, as is emergency management training," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift wrote in an email Thursday. "Shame on you for not respecting the office of a Member of Congress."

Zinke also ordered a Park Police helicopter to fly him and another Interior official to and from Yorktown, Virginia, on July 7 in order to be back in Washington in time for a 4 p.m. horseback ride with Pence. The trip cost about $6,250, according to the documents.

While in Yorktown, Zinke completed a walking tour of the local Revolutionary War battlefield and attended a boating industry roundtable discussion, according to the documents. The day before the trip, an Interior trip planner added to the schedule a 30-minute flyover of an area where Dominion Energy is building high-voltage electric transmission lines to run across the James River.

Interior officials originally estimated that driving to Yorktown would take about three hours, although one noted that "there is a major construction project on I-64, which will slow things down."

In an email to Interior travel scheduler Tim Nigborowicz, an Interior employee justified Zinke's using the helicopter rather than a less expensive method by saying "the Secretary will be able to familiarize himself with the in-flight capabilities of an aircraft he is in charge of" and that the Park Police staff on board would "provide an added measure of security to the Secretary during his travel."

The former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL is already being investigated by the Interior Department's inspector general and the independent Office of Special Counsel for his mixing of official travel and political events. Interior earlier this year released records documenting Zinke's use of charter and military aircraft, including a $12,000 flight from Las Vegas to Montana that allowed him to give a speech for a hockey team owned by a major campaign donor.

Perry seeks plan for new grid study by Wednesday Back

By Darius Dixon | 04/17/2017 03:17 PM EDT

Energy Secretary Rick Perry's memo starting a review of federal policies affecting the electric grid calls on his staff to submit an "implementation schedule" by Wednesday.

The text of Perry's Friday memo to his chief of staff, Brian McCormack, urges that the "full resources and relationships available to the [Energy] Department" should be used to determine which federal taxes and regulations have undermined baseload power plants.

"By Wednesday, April 19, 2017, present to me an implementation plan to complete this study 60-days [sic] from that date," Perry wrote.

The study would focus on the evolution of wholesale electricity markets, whether wholesale energy and capacity markets are adequately paying baseload power sources, and "extent to which continued regulatory burdens ... are responsible for forcing the premature retirement of baseload power plants."

Many of the issues targeted by Perry have been high on FERC's agenda for more than a year under its so-called price formation initiative, which focuses on how power plants are paid in an increasingly complex grid. FERC is also trying to navigate the complicated impacts of several state-level energy policies.

DOE, under former Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz, spent roughly a year analyzing the electric grid, including many of the issues raised in Perry's memo. The memo also raises concerns about the "diminishing diversity" of fuel types on the grid.

Bloomberg first reported on the memo Saturday.

WHAT'S NEXT: Perry's senior staff will submit a plan Wednesday for getting the full grid study to him by June 18, which is a Sunday and may push the deadline to the following day.

Bob Murray had early access to Rick Perry to share coal plan Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/07/2017 05:30 PM EDT

Coal magnate Bob Murray pitched Energy Secretary Rick Perry on his plan to throw an economic lifeline to coal companies less than a month before Perry set in motion plans to aid the industry, according to newly disclosed photographs that show the two meeting.

The liberal magazine In These Times obtained pictures of Murray and Perry from a March 29 meeting at Energy Department headquarters, less than a month after Perry was sworn in. Several other officials were in attendance, including Andrew Wheeler, who at the time was a lobbyist for Murray and has since been nominated as the Environmental Protection Agency's No. 2 official.

The meeting puts Murray and Perry together at a crucial moment in the timeline of the Trump administration's push to save the struggling coal industry, an effort that would benefit Murray Energy in particular while raising electricity prices for potentially millions of people. A month before the meeting, one of Murray's biggest customers, FirstEnergy, told investors it was seriously considering seeking bankruptcy protection for its merchant division, FirstEnergy Solutions, a move that would likely void its supply contracts with Murray's coal mines.

Three weeks after Murray's visit, Perry would order a grid study that later became part of the justification for a proposed rule to reward coal and nuclear power plants for providing "grid resiliency." FERC, which has jurisdiction over the proposal, must make a decision on it by Monday.

At the time of the meeting, Wheeler was already the leading candidate to become the deputy administrator for EPA. Wheeler, who represented Murray as a lobbyist for Faegre Baker Daniels, would not be officially nominated for months. Wheeler, who has acknowledged participating in meetings on Murray's coal plan at DOE and on Capitol Hill, cleared committee last week and is awaiting Senate confirmation.

Murray is an outspoken supporter of President Donald Trump and held a fundraiser for him during the 2016 campaign.

DOE did not dispute the validity of the photos.

"Industry stakeholders visit the Department of Energy on a daily basis," DOE spokeswoman Shaylyn Hynes said, when asked about the meeting. "The DOE proposal to FERC was about the future and resiliency of the nation's power supply, an issue much bigger than one industry or company."

The photographs show Perry sitting at the head of a table in the Department of Energy, with Bob Murray, CEO of Murray Energy, to his left, and Wheeler down the table from Murray.

"Enclosed is an Action Plan for achieving reliable and low cost electricity ... and to assist in the survival of our Country's coal industry, which ... power grid reliability and low cost electricity," Murray writes in a cover letter to Perry, parts of which are visible in one photo from the meeting.

Though the document has never been publicly released, DOE critics say Murray's plan appears to have inspired DOE's grid study and the proposed rule Perry sent FERC in September. Copies are visible at the seats of most of the participants, including Perry and Murray. Wheeler, who told members of the Senate Environment Committee he had only seen the memo briefly, is not holding a copy in the photos obtained by In These Times. Murray told Greenwire in November he "didn't have any involvement" in writing the rule.

Murray has acknowledged sharing the plan with Trump.

"I gave Mr. Trump what I called an action plan very early," Murray said in a recent PBS Frontline documentary on EPA. "It's about three-and-a-half pages and — of what he needed to do in his administration. He's wiped out page one."

The meeting appears to have been successful for all. One of the photos shows Perry and Murray in a big bear hug.

Congress clears spending bill, averting shutdown Back

By John Bresnahan, Sarah Ferris and Nancy Cook | 12/07/2017 09:10 AM EDT

Congress passed a two-week funding bill Thursday, staving off a government shutdown a day ahead of the deadline. But lawmakers face a turbulent next few weeks as they try to clinch a broader budget deal by the end of the year.

Senators approved the measure on a 81-14 vote, soon after the House passed it 235-193. Despite initial reluctance from conservative House Republicans, GOP leadership was ultimately able to pass it with votes to spare.

The more interesting action was arguably taking place across Pennsylvania Ave.

President Donald Trump met with the "Big Four" congressional leaders — Speaker Paul Ryan, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer — at the White House on Thursday afternoon in a bid to jump-start negotiations over a two-year budget deal.

Per one senior Democratic aide, the vast majority of the talks focused on spending levels, and the two parties did not come to a consensus. Democrats want parity for any defense and non-defense spending boost, while Republicans want to see the Pentagon get the bulk of any spending increase.

"We had a good meeting. We agreed to keep on talking," McConnell said after returning from the meeting. Asked if they were any closer to a deal on spending caps, he said, "I wouldn't say that, but it was a good meeting. Everybody wants to get to an outcome."

"We had a productive conversation on a wide variety of issues," Pelosi said in a statement following the meeting. "Nothing specific has been agreed to, but discussions continue."

The group also discussed the fate of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program. GOP leaders argued the issue would have to be dealt with separately from funding the government — something many Democrats will not support.

Earlier in the day, Pelosi told reporters, "We will not leave here without a DACA fix."

The shutdown dance comes as Republican leaders and the White House are pushing to finish work on a trillion-dollar-plus tax cut plan being hashed out by House and Senate tax writers. Ryan and McConnell are hoping to buy enough time in the budget talks to complete work on the tax bill, all while mollifying their defense hawks and conservative hard-liners in the House Freedom Caucus. And that's to say nothing of Democratic demands for a deal to help hundreds of thousands of Dreamers who face possible deportation next year, as well as a host of other controversial policy issues.

Ahead of the meeting, a senior administration official said Trump's main push would be to keep DACA out of the budget deal, increase defense spending without boosting non-defense funding, and get Democrats to agree to allow his hugely controversial border wall project.

That, Democrats say, is a White House pipedream. During a Thursday speech on the floor, Schumer said Trump and Republicans will have to be open to real negotiations in order to reach a budget deal, and added that the GOP would pay politically if there is a shutdown.

"Congressional negotiators are making good headway on a budget deal that would meet our commitments to our military and also urgent priorities here at home," Schumer said on the floor.

"Unfortunately, the progress here in Congress is in stark contrast to the rhetoric coming from the White House. President Trump again suggested yesterday that 'a shutdown could happen.' If a shutdown happens, as the president seemed to be rooting for in a tweet earlier this year, it will fall on his shoulders. His party controls the Senate, the House, and the presidency."

But first, Republicans had to put up the 217 votes to keep the government open Thursday — not an easy feat for a conference populated with conservatives who rarely vote for any spending bills.

That's why Ryan, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and other GOP leaders spent much of Wednesday huddling with conservative hard-liners unhappy with the leadership plan to avert a shutdown. McCarthy even brought in McConnell to talk to frustrated rank-and-file members grumbling about the strategy at one point.

By Thursday morning, however, House GOP leaders were predicting they'd have the votes to pass the continuing resolution. And they were right.

Apple's fight with shareholders tests SEC stance on activist proposals Back

By Patrick Temple-West | 12/08/2017 05:01 AM EDT

How the Securities and Exchange Commission rules on a bid by Apple Inc. to block a shareholder proposal could have "serious repercussions" for investors, an asset manager involved in a fight with the iPhone-maker said on Thursday.

Boston-based Jantz Management LLC argues that Apple is "out of line with longtime SEC rulings" in its request to block a shareholder proposal from Jantz that asks the company to set a specific date for when it could eliminate its carbon footprint.

Apple's defense is untested because it is using little-noticed SEC guidance published on Nov. 1 to ask the agency for permission to block Jantz's proposal.

The guidance said the SEC would weigh any recommendation by a company's board of directors on whether a shareholder proposal involves a significant policy issue and should be included, or if it is "ordinary business" and should be disallowed.

Apple said its board determined that the Jantz proposal should not be considered at the company's 2018 annual shareholder meeting.

The Cupertino, Calif.-based company says it is already working to eliminate the carbon footprint in its supply chain. The company did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The matter is pending before the SEC. If the agency allows Apple to block the proposal, the decision "could have serious repercussions not just for Apple shareholders, but for investors in all other companies," said Jantz, which has about $41 million of assets under management.

"The SEC has long made it clear that proposals on a company's actions on climate change are not ordinary business, and that there is a dire need for leading companies to set a timeframe to reduce [greenhouse gas] emissions aggressively now," said Jantz, which often tries to agitate for politically progressive changes at companies with shareholder proposals.

Apple is also asking the SEC for permission to block a shareholder proposal offered by Zevin Asset Management that's seeking a report about how CEO Tim Cook's compensation could be tied to sustainability metrics, including diversity among senior executives. In this dispute, Apple is also using the SEC's Nov. 1 guidance to bolster its case.

Zevin is a Boston-based socially responsible investment fund with $554.5 million under management.

Historically, "proposals related to environmental matters or executive compensation are generally considered weighty policy matters and not ordinary business," law firm Davis Polk said in a client note last month.

An SEC spokesman declined to comment.

Shareholder activism can have a big impact on corporate actions. In May, almost two-thirds of Exxon Mobil's shareholders defied corporate executives and voted for the company to incorporate the Paris climate agreement into its business models, regardless of what the U.S. government does.

Similar resolutions won majority shareholder support at Occidental Petroleum and PPL Corp.

In response, the Trump administration in October proposed making it harder for shareholders to file proposals, which can cost companies tens of millions of dollars to deal with.

The Treasury Department recommended that the SEC raise the thresholds for when an investor can resubmit a proposal that previously drew low voter support. From 2007 to 2016, almost a third of all shareholder proposals were resubmissions, Treasury said.

Treasury argued that big investors with overt social, religious or policy objectives — and just six individual investors — were responsible for two-thirds of all shareholder proposals filed in 2016.

Canadian industry leader urges U.S. not to dump NAFTA energy chapter Back

By Doug Palmer | 12/07/2017 03:59 PM EDT

The United States should abandon the idea of eliminating the NAFTA energy chapter and work with Canada and Mexico to improve its provisions, the head of the Canadian Electricity Association said today.

"We believe ... the chapter has worked well and that it does not require major fixing or nixing," CEA president and CEO Sergio Marchi said during a discussion on NAFTA energy issues hosted by the Washington International Trade Association. "It provides a consolidated energy space in NAFTA, and offers an effective framework for adding new elements as we modernize this agreement."

That is also Canada's position, a Canadian embassy spokesman said. Mexico has also expressed support for including an energy chapter in the revamped agreement now being negotiated. That's a major change from 25 years ago, when it insisted on being excluded from NAFTA energy commitments.

Marchi, a former Canadian trade minister, said his group has been told the U.S. wants to eliminate the chapter based on the rationale its provisions can be covered by other sections of the agreement.

"We also hear, for example, that without a chapter it makes it a lot easier for USTR to run the show, rather than relying on interdepartmental consultations," Marchi said.

The Office of the U.S. Trade Representative declined to comment on whether the U.S. was proposing to eliminate the chapter.

Marchi said scrapping the chapter wouldn't necessarily undo the energy reforms contained in the pact. But he argued it would make it appear the chapter hasn't worked, when that's not the case.

"We think [eliminating the chapter] would be a mistake," Marchi said, adding that Canada and Mexico could just as easily argue that the U.S. demand for a textiles chapter is unnecessary.

KICKSTARTING ANWR OF WORDS: Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski launches the latest push to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling today with a mega three-panel hearing on the topic. Tasked with raising $1 billion over the next decade through budgetary instructions, Murkowski's panel is expected to move forward quickly with legislation that would remove restrictions on drilling in ANWR or other currently off-limits areas.

Who's testifying? The first panel includes Alaskans Sen. Dan Sullivan, Gov. Bill Walker and Rep. Don Young. After that, lawmakers will hear from Lt. Gov. Byron Mallott; Greg Sheehan, acting director of the Fish & Wildlife Service and two other Alaskan officials. And the third panel includes various other interested groups, ranging from representatives of the Wilderness Society to the Arctic Slope Regional Corporation. "I want to make sure that the debate finally catches up with the technology and the high standards that exist in Alaska," Sullivan said, adding critics of ANWR drilling have been using the same "stale, old talking points" for 40 years.

What will opponents say? Led by ranking member Maria Cantwell, critics of ANWR drilling are likely to argue the low price of oil makes raising $1 billion from opening the area unlikely and that the industry has been lukewarm about Arctic exploration. "They're in a hurry for something that the industry hasn't been excited about," she told reporters. "In 50 years, she and I — even though we've worked together as good colleagues — are going to be dead and the only thing that's going to matter is whether we've preserved a place as unique as this." Sullivan, for his part, scoffs at the idea there isn't interest in drilling: "There's plenty of interest. I know that." Cantwell asked Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke in a letter Wednesday to clarify his position on ANWR drilling. She said a markup of legislation is expected next week.

What about the House? The House Natural Resources Committee, which faces the same $1 billion revenue instructions as its Senate counterpart, is also likely to look at ANWR, Chairman Rob Bishop told ME. "ANWR by itself could give us the revenue numbers that we need," he said. "Whether we do anything more than that, I don't know." As a side note, ME saw Bishop and Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady energetically chatting at length on the floor during votes Wednesday.

HE'S GOT THE... POWELSON: Rob Powelson, who joined FERC this summer, said the country's at an "inflection point" for the future of the electricity markets, and called for patience as his agency works through Energy Secretary Rick Perry's controversial grid proposal on top of other tough discussions about state energy policies. "There are a lot of moving parts to this conversation. I don't mind that there's a little bit of impatience," he tells Pro's Darius Dixon in an interview. "This is an issue that has been elevated in the conversation of energy policy. I've been very direct in my position in support for markets."

States' rights guy? Powelson said it's not his job to stand in the way of states seeking to address carbon through mechanisms like the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative and California's cap and trade model. "If states want to want to value carbon, they should be able to do it," he said. "States have said, 'Look, in lieu of a hard price on carbon on the national level, there are mechanisms for valuing it.' And it's not my job to tell those states you can't do that."

Blame for 'polar vortex': He chaired the Pennsylvania utility commission during Hurricane Sandy in 2012 and the 2014 "polar vortex," but Powelson isn't buying DOE's line questioning the reliability of natural gas during that cold snap. "There were enough sins in there that everybody had some responsibility," he said.

Oh, and hey Congress: Powelson called for people to be patient as he and Chairman Neil Chatterjee learn the ins and outs of their new roles, but he subtly jabbed Congress for its inaction on two other FERC nominations. "If I could stress one thing, I need everybody in this town to remain calm, understand that the FERC is working hard around these issues," he told Darius. "[But] it'd be nice to have two other colleagues to be part of this conversation."

TWO MORE GET EPW HEARING: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee plans to hold a hearing Nov. 8 on the nominations of Kathleen Hartnett White to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality and Andrew Wheeler's bid to be EPA deputy administrator, your ME host reports. That comes as Pro's Alex Guillén got his hands on White's financial disclosure form which shows she owns four oil leases but appears to give away most of the income from them.

TWO HURRICANE HEARINGS ON TAP TODAY: The House Transportation Committee gets top billing for hurricane-related hearings today as it convenes top officials from FEMA, the Coast Guard, the Army Corp of Engineers and EPA to discuss "initial lessons learned from the 2017 hurricanes, and identify key challenges and obstacles that may remain in the way of recovery." Lawmakers from affected communities in Florida, Texas, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico will also appear.

Meanwhile, the House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee meets at the same time with Army Corps, Energy, GAO, state and industry officials to discuss energy infrastructure response and recovery efforts. Look for questions about the $300 million Whitefish Energy contract, the slow Puerto Rico recovery and ongoing disaster relief funding requests to dominate the discussion. ME would also look for lawmakers from both parties to discuss the need for increased consideration of infrastructure resiliency when building (without mention of climate change among Republicans).

More questions for FEMA: Bipartisan House Energy and Commerce leaders sent a letter to FEMA Director Brock Long seeking information about what role his agency has played in repairing the Puerto Rican grid to date. "It would appear that the Agency, until now, was not involved in one of the most significant decisions in the effort to rebuild Puerto Rico's electrical grid," they write. "Efforts by the governor of Puerto Rico and PREPA to cancel the contract with Whitefish underscored the need for federal leadership and strategic coordination of the effort to restore Puerto Rico's electric system."

Today: Senior House Democrats, including Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, hold an event "in solidarity with the people of Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands" on the House East Front Steps at 10 a.m.

Key meetings: Gov. Ricardo Rosselló's rather eclectic set of meetings in Washington on Wednesday included Rep. Sean Patrick Maloney, Sens. Roger Wicker, Orrin Hatch and Tom Carper, Bishop and acting Homeland Security Chief Elaine Duke.

PICTURE THIS SCENE: While riding in a bus up a mountainside over the weekend in Puerto Rico, Bishop took a "very positive" call from Trump about national monuments. Though he said Trump provided few specific details, Bishop said the president vowed to announce his final decision on whether to shrink a host of national monuments "very soon" and spoke positively about Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's recommendations. And, Bishop said, Trump "basically agreed with us that [the Antiquities Act] has been abused and needs modification."

Oregonians fault report: Sens. Ron Wyden and Jeff Merkley sent White House Chief of Staff John Kelly a letter expressing concern about "numerous factual errors" in Zinke's report that they worry contributed to recommended diminished protections for the Cascade-Siskiyou National Monument.

Won't prejudge Whitefish cancellation: It's too soon to know whether Puerto Rico's decision to pull the plug on Whitefish Energy's $300 million contract to rebuild the island's grid was the right call or not, Bishop told ME. "There's still strange things about it, but there has to be some reasons they did it in the first place," he said. "Procedure is obviously pretty bad because there were so many questions and transparency was not there. But whether ultimately, I don't have enough information [yet]." Natural Resources intends to continue looking into the matter.

ME TOO! Sen. Jeff Flake has also placed a hold on Bill Northey's nomination for a USDA undersecretary post in an effort to land a White House meeting over the Renewable Fuel Standard, his office says.

FOREST MANAGEMENT EFFORT PASSES: House lawmakers cleared legislation on Wednesday that backers say will address fire-borrowing, streamline environmental review processes and minimize litigation related to the U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Land Management. The vote was 232 to 188. Critics say the measure, H.R. 2936 \(115\), would undermine endangered species protections and impede the ability of agencies to respond to wildfires.

Meanwhile, ten Senate Democrats asked Trump and Senate leaders to include funding for wildfire disaster response in the next disaster aid package.

CRAMER: TRUMP URGED SENATE RUN: North Dakota Rep. Kevin Cramer told a radio host Wednesday that Trump called him during dinner on Halloween and "strongly, strongly encouraged" him to run against Sen. Heidi Heitkamp next year. Cramer said he'd make a decision "after we get tax reform done." Clip, flagged by American Bridge, here.

MAIL CALL! HOUSE LAWMAKERS HIT BACK ON RFS: Sixty-four House lawmakers, led by Republican Bob Goodlatte and Democrat Peter Welch, slammed the RFS in a letter to Pruitt as "a well-intentioned but deeply flawed policy that has negatively impacted families and businesses" around the country. They urged EPA to factor in its "significant pitfalls and costs" in future regulatory actions.

UPTON: ENBRIDGE'S RESPONSE 'ABSOLUTELY UNACCEPTABLE': Rep. Fred Upton sent a letter to Enbridge Wednesday seeking documents and a meeting with a top official concerning when the company knew of damage to Line 5 pipeline under the Straits of Mackinac. "Although Enbridge has stated that the safety of the pipeline was not compromised by the loss in coating, it is absolutely unacceptable that the people of Michigan were kept in the dark about this issue for three years," he wrote.

WHATCHA GONNA DO? Nine Senate Democrats wrote Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross on Wednesday asking for information on what the administration plans to do with two major climate change reports — the Climate Science Special Report and the final National Climate Assessment — expected to be released in the coming days.

TAKE A GLANCE! LET'S GET RESILIENT: Joint Economic Committee Democrats released a report Wednesday arguing the federal government must adapt how it rebuilds following natural disasters to be more resilient and that every dollar spent on disaster preparedness provides almost $4 in future benefits. Take a glance here.

NOT RIGHT AROUND THE CORNER: Southern Co. CEO Tom Fanning said Wednesday increased federal loan guarantees for the Vogtle nuclear power project in Georgia won't be finalized before next spring, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "Final issuance of the additional loan guarantee is subject to the satisfaction of a number of conditions and is not expected to occur prior to the end of the first quarter of 2018," Fanning said on the company's quarterly earnings call.

FORMER EPA OFFICIAL: PRUITT POSES 'DIRE AND FUNDAMENTAL' THREAT: Former EPA Deputy Administrator Bob Sussman argues in the latest issue of Environmental Law Reporter that Pruitt poses an existential threat to the agency. "EPA's ability to maintain core protections and respond to new threats—the bread and butter of EPA's mission—is rapidly eroding and may suffer irretrievable damage if Pruitt's policies continue," he wrote.

FERC HIT BY CYBERSECURITY ATTACK: The inspector general of FERC said that a "recent security incident involving [FERC's] unclassified cybersecurity program" pointed to the need to better implement certain cyber defenses, without providing specifics about the incident. "We are concerned that certain controls may not have been in place that could have potentially prevented the incident," the IG's office said. Read the report here.

NOT PLEASED: Billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer's $10 million campaign to impeach Trump isn't sitting well with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi who reached out to tell him the effort is a distraction, POLITICO's Heather Caygle reports. Other Democrats agree with her view that the party should focus on showing it can govern. "I certainly don't think that that's a helpful effort," Rep. Ro Khanna said of Steyer's campaign.

TAKE A GLANCE: The U.S. Chamber's Global Energy Institute released a series of videos showcasing the energy industry's response to the recent string of hurricanes.

POLITICO Pro Q&A: FERC Commissioner Rob Powelson Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/02/2017 05:00 AM EDT

Rob Powelson, who joined FERC this summer, has found himself serving as something of an ambassador from the states during one of the agency's most turbulent periods.

A Republican with a more than eight-year tenure as a Pennsylvania energy regulator, Powelson made headlines recently for saying that he didn't join FERC "to go blow up the markets" after Energy Secretary Rick Perry unveiled a controversial grid proposal aimed at propping up coal-fired and nuclear generation.

His five years as chairman of the state commission included Hurricane Sandy in 2012, and the 2014 "polar vortex" — an event Perry often cites to justify his proposed rule. But where the Energy Department's plan chides the reliability of natural gas during that cold snap, Powelson said "there were enough sins in there that everybody had some responsibility" and that grid operators are adapting to the "new normals of weather."

We're at an "inflection point" for the future of the electricity markets, Powelson told POLITICO in a recent interview. He said he wouldn't stand in the way of states that want to do more to address climate change — "If states want to want to value carbon, they should be able to do it" — but he urged patience from everyone waiting for FERC action on pricing reform and state policies.

This interview has been edited for length and clarity.

Your home state is a big chunk of the PJM market. But last week Pennsylvania's state legislature approved a resolution supporting the DOE proposal while the utility regulator called the plan "unwieldy, untimely and impractical."

As I often said in my prior life: God forbid the legislature has to make a decision that the PUCs have to make — raise rates, fine companies, revoke licenses. That's why you have independent agencies like FERC and state public utilities commissions that have to do economic regulation and safety regulation.

I think there are forces at play that wanted to put that marker out. When you peel it back, I think now back in Pennsylvania, as of Friday, there's 500 trillion cubic feet of natural gas under the ground. If you're the Marcellus Shale Coalition, you're like "What happened to us in this discussion?"

The legislature put a marker down ... but at the end of the day, the resolution is not binding. It's not an act of law.

Pennsylvania is among the states that may consider out-of-market policies to help nuclear. So, what keeps you up at night more — addressing state subsidies or the pricing issues?

I'm a states' rights advocate, but there are two things that drive what we do here. There's the Federal Power Act, and there's the Natural Gas Act. FERC Order 888 created this wholesale construct in the market. In the mid-2000s, probably 26 or so states ... did [renewable portfolio standards]. Republican states, Democratic states — those RPSs have driven strong investments in renewables. ... Pennsylvania, and other states, are [asking], "Do we embed in the RPS a nuclear standard?" Some are doing that after the fact.

And then there are some who have said these RPSs have caused a distortion in the market as we get to grid parity and we get more scale of renewables and the impact that that's having. ... These state policies obviously drove an outcome. Today, an unintended consequence is that some people say these states have not valued nuclear.

There are a lot of moving parts. To FERC's credit, we look at the markets and how they're functioning and how we value things like resiliency, and how we keep markets functioning. That's what I'm looking at. This is an inflection point. No doubt about it.

For you, is anything other plant retirements driving market policy changes?

If there is a deep concern about grid resiliency, and we can use events like the polar vortex, the recent hurricanes, and we can use derechos — these new weather events, the new normals of weather. The RTOs are saying, "Look, the velocity of these storms and the impact they have on the generation fleet, we think, yeah, we should do a deeper dive and value resilient resources." On the flip side to that is you've had states that have looked at things like microgrids, and they're doing grid resiliency.

The polar vortex was alarming in the sense you had a 24 percent forced outage rate. There were enough sins in there that everybody had some responsibility. But then you go to the next year, February of 2015, on another very bad cold snap there wasn't a 24 percent forced outage rate and the system performed. Right after 2014, PJM put forth the construct of capacity performance. And, by the way, we're not 100 percent into the capacity performance [process]. We have another auction of capacity performance results and then we're fully into a fully integrated CP. I personally want to see where we stand there. That's a longer term view. I want to see how capacity performance is working and ... how it deals with reliability.

Why isn't there an agreed upon set of facts around the polar vortex?

Capacity performance was a direct outcry of the polar vortex. ... I was told, as chairman, that capacity performance would provide the needed uplift compensation metrics to deal with these types of events going forward — meaning that these baseload resources will be adequately compensated by this.

In your mind, has that turned out to be true?

I'm still waiting. When we get to 100 percent, I think we'll have a story to tell.

You've crossed paths with Perry a couple of times since the proposal came out. Have you made your views clear to him?

To his credit, he's looking at this issue in terms of — as the head of DOE — reliability, resiliency. He's looking at the sustainability of these markets.

There are a lot of moving parts to this conversation. I don't mind that there's a little bit of impatience. Chairman [Neil] Chatterjee and I are the new FERC guys. I get it. This is an issue that has been elevated in the conversation of energy policy. I've been very direct in my position in support for markets.

Commissioner Cheryl LaFleur has often talked about the "doors" to how that conflicts with states gets resolved: planned re-regulation, unplanned re-regulation, litigation and/or some kind of harmonization.

The state policy changes are ongoing with us. ... Personally, I'd like to see us get our hands around that conversation. If states want to want to value carbon, they should be able to do it. They've done it with things like the [Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative]. California has a cap and trade model. States have said, "Look, in lieu of a hard price on carbon on the national level, there are mechanisms for valuing it." And it's not my job to tell those states you can't do that.

Is it FERC's job to tell them they should do that?

I don't think so. What we're saying is that if you're going to design constructs, you better make sure they adhere to certain market principles. Trying to answer your question, yes, post-technical conference, there's a genuine commitment to handle the state piece. There are a couple of options, but I'll be straight up with you, I can't get into where they would go.

FERC's authority over the RTOs is fairly absolute. Can you see any scenario where FERC overrides the RTOs and the states to impose something akin to what Perry has proposed?

I think we'd be hard-pressed to not engage stakeholders like our states and our RTOs, independent market monitors.

Is there a chance FERC expands the footprint of the DOE proposal to include areas outside of PJM, New York and New England?

I've thought about it. I don't have any preconceived outcome. Most people would say that this is more of a PJM, New England, NYISO issue. But there's not a lot of coal left in New England.

I'm trying to be patient here and seeing where we go internally with staff recommendations.

How do you view your role with FERC after eight-plus years at the state-level?

My biggest takeaway is that I respect the independence of FERC. I worked for three governors.

What's very important to me is maintaining the independence of this agency because the people that work here look for that kind of guidance. In my view, not that there's been issues in my short tenure here, but it's important that you maintain that. The same could've said under the Obama administration. Our engagement with the states is now, more than ever, so critical.

Some have argued that it's been the imperialistic FERC, at times — that we've been very top-down.

The DOE NOPR hasn't necessarily helped improve the image of FERC's independence.

The NOPR, based on my cursory review of the state comments — and we're doing forecasting — have been 98 percent against. Obviously, this is a big issue. It's an inflection point for the FERC.

You've said this is an inflection point a few times.

We've come through the conversations post-Order 888 in the 1990s, to the future of the markets to ... today, the $64,000 question: What's working and what's not working in markets, and how to do we keep those markets sustainable, long-term.

If there's a deficiency, how do you fix it fast enough to make a difference?

To Secretary Perry's credit, he has certainly stimulated a conversation or — as some would say — a call to action. That's healthy. I'm an impatient regulator, by nature. But some of this stuff has to be thought through. We have to develop a record and we have internal capacity to look at what's working and not working in markets.

If I could stress one thing, I need everybody in this town to remain calm, understand that the FERC is working hard around these issues.

I'm actually kinda giddy to be here at this point in time. It's a good challenge for us to have. The big question is, where do we go?

Is the DOE proposal at all distracting?

No, it's nothing personal. I think they were trying to say is that we've had all these things and when you lose the quorum, the train stops. ... You can't take up a notational vote on an issue of this magnitude.

Neil and I have only been on the job less than [three] months. I'm asking people to be patient with us too. We're the new people here. And it'd be nice to have two other colleagues to be part of this conversation.

Senate EPW to take up White, Wheeler nominations next week Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/01/2017 05:48 PM EDT

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee plans to hold a confirmation hearing on Nov. 8 regarding Kathleen Hartnett White's nomination to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

In addition, the panel plans to consider Andrew Wheeler's selection to serve as EPA deputy administrator on the same day.

CEQ nominee owns four oil leases Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/01/2017 05:35 PM EDT

Kathleen Hartnett White, the Texas Public Policy Foundation fellow nominated to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality, owns four oil leases, though she appears to give away most of the income.

One of those properties, in Sugarland, Texas, is leased to CVR, the refiner owned by billionaire investor and President Donald Trump backer Carl Icahn, according to White's financial disclosure. It generated between $201 and $1,000 for White since the beginning of 2016, according to the form. The other leases provided income between $201 and $5,000 over that period, according to the form, which requires her to report only a range.

However, it is not clear how much of that money White kept. The form indicates that she gifted the interest generated by all four leases to a nephew, but that the leases "generated a small amount of income" over the reporting period.

White's husband reported significant ranch and cattle holdings in Texas via stakes in two different family trusts. In addition to her work at TPPF, White sat on the Texas Emissions Reduction Plan Advisory Board, which was disbanded on Sept. 1. She also reported part ownership of a Jack Russell Terrier breeding business in Texas.

Although White was announced White's nomination on Oct. 13, she appears to have been waiting in the wings for some time before that. White's signature on the financial disclosure is dated Aug. 2.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has not yet announced a hearing on White.

Southern CEO: DOE loan guarantees won't be final till next spring Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/01/2017 04:39 PM EDT

The Energy Department's decision to increase federal loan guarantees for the Vogtle nuclear power project in Georgia isn't expected to be finalized before next spring, Southern Co. CEO Tom Fanning said today.

DOE announced in late September that it had conditionally approved a $3.7 billion loan guarantee increase for the project on top of the $8.33 billion previously authorized by the Obama administration. But DOE's action to cement that decision is still at least four months away.

"Final issuance of the additional loan guarantee is subject to the satisfaction of a number of conditions and is not expected to occur prior to the end of the first quarter of 2018," Fanning said on the company's quarterly earnings call.

Obama's Energy Department originally approved Vogtle project loan guarantees totaling $3.4 billion to Southern Co.'s Georgia Power, $3.1 billion to Oglethorpe Power and $1.8 billion to the Municipal Electric Authority of Georgia. Energy Secretary Rick Perry is primed to offer an additional $1.67 billion to Georgia Power, $1.6 billion to Oglethorpe and $415 million to MEAG.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Georgia Public Service Commission is scheduled to begin hearings on Nov. 6 to discuss the Vogtle project.

Pelosi moves to muzzle Trump impeachment talk Back

By Heather Caygle | 11/01/2017 01:02 PM EDT

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi offered a forced smile recently when asked on MSNBC about a Tom Steyer-sponsored ad that calls for President Donald Trump's impeachment.

"That's a great ad," Pelosi said twice, before rushing to plug the Democrats' Better Deal economic agenda as the TV hit wrapped up.

Pelosi played it off, but privately she was peeved. She told lawmakers at a Democratic leadership meeting soon after that she had reached out to the Democratic megadonor to tell him that his $10 million ad campaign is a distraction. (A source close to Steyer said he hasn't spoken with Pelosi since the ad launched.)

Pelosi is eager to show her party can govern — in contrast to the chaos surrounding Trump — and she believes that a reputation as the "no drama" Democrats is key to taking back the House in 2018 and whisking her backing into the speaker's chair.

While not an official slogan, Pelosi has discussed the strategy broadly in recent leadership and caucus meetings, urging members to avoid talk of impeachment and resist taking Trump's bait on whatever topic is dominating his Twitter feed that day.

"There's nothing any of us can say in Congress that is going to change people's view of Donald Trump," said freshman Rep. Ro Khanna, a Silicon Valley progressive who agrees with Pelosi's strategy. "What they need is us to help them form their view of whether the Democratic Party is ready to lead."

Pelosi and House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland both issued cautious statements Monday after former Trump campaign aides were indicted in special counsel Robert Mueller's Russia probe. The House Democratic leaders reiterated their calls for an independent commission while carefully avoiding any speculation about Trump's potential collusion with Moscow in the 2016 campaign.

Privately, Pelosi has suggested that the Russia probe could lead to the unraveling of Trump's presidency, going so far as to say "the proof is in the Putin" at a Democratic leadership meeting earlier this year.

But in public, the California Democrat is encouraging her rank and file to take a measured approach to all things Trump, banking on the strategy that, by next November, the president and congressional Republicans will bomb with voters on their own.

Pelosi has warned lawmakers about wading too deeply into Trump-created distractions, most recently at a leadership meeting last week, where she cited the controversy surrounding NFL players kneeling during the national anthem and the president's attacks on Rep. Frederica Wilson (D-Fla.) over his phone call to a soldier's widow.

Instead, she has urged Democrats to stay focused on policy battles, telling members at their caucus meeting last week they "will be in the majority" if Republicans head into the midterms without a single major legislative accomplishment.

That doesn't mean House Democrats will ignore Trump or his tweets. But Democratic leaders think responding to every culture war salvo from the president will only muddy their message heading into the midterms.

Pelosi has encouraged lawmakers to talk up what a Democratic majority can deliver for voters, plugging their economic message on repeat in hopes that it eventually will break through with voters.

"In my opinion it cannot happen fast enough," said Rep. Cheri Bustos, a moderate Democrat whose northwestern Illinois district was carried by Trump last year. "If we get asked about Frederica Wilson or the NFL or Russia, we can answer that. But then let's get back to what's on people's minds."

The party's Trump-focused message fell flat last year, as Democrats picked up only six seats in the House after boasting about the potential for double-digit gains and lost big in working-class districts that dot the Rust Belt.

This time around, Democratic leaders purposefully avoided including divisive social issues in their agenda rollout this summer. Their "no drama" approach to Trump's controversies is an extension of that strategy.

Keeping Democrats united won't be easy for Pelosi. The caucus ranges from progressive rabble-rousers like Khanna — who ousted a Democratic incumbent last year and called for a primary challenge to Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California — to a dozen Democrats sitting in Trump-won districts like Bustos.

"It is difficult because [Trump's] actions are so outrageous," said Rep. Ruben Gallego (D-Ariz.). "And it's ongoing work, by all of us, not just leadership" to stay focused.

The approach risks angering progressive groups and liberal donors, some of whom have declared all-out war on Trump and have threatened to primary Democratic lawmakers who don't do enough to take on the president.

But some lawmakers say their hands are tied — that the best way to defeat Trump's agenda is by regaining the majority, and the best way to be back in the majority is to avoid focusing too much on Trump.

In terms of the Indivisible Movement to resist Trump's agenda, Rep. John Larson (D-Conn.) said, "There's a role and a place for that. But the vast majority of people are scared to death about their own futures,"

"When you haven't been in the majority since 2010, you want to make sure that given the opportunity we have in front of us to take back the House, that you remain focused," Larson added. "And that's the only way any progressive agenda is going to have the opportunity to see the light of day."

Indivisible, the grass-roots progressive group formed after Trump's election, declined to comment.

Meanwhile, even as the Russia probe heats up, Democratic leaders have been working behind the scenes to quell any chatter about impeachment. For them, the topic is a distraction from defeating Republicans' tax push in the short term and could turn off independent voters down the road.

Democratic leaders pressured Rep. Al Green to relent on forcing a vote on impeaching Trump after the Texas Democrat reignited the issue on the House floor recently. Hoyer was seen having a long, intense chat with Green just off the House floor during the debate.

And then there's Steyer's ad, and many House Democrats agree with Pelosi on that.

"I certainly don't think that that's a helpful effort," Khanna said of the ad.

Steyer said in a statement, "This isn't about me, or Rep. Pelosi. This is about giving a voice to the American people who are demanding the political establishment stand up to Trump."

There is at least one pol who is happy to comment on Steyer's impeachment push.

"Wacky & totally unhinged Tom Steyer, who has been fighting me and my Make America Great Again agenda from beginning, never wins elections!" Trump tweeted.

IS HE KEEPING HIS WORD? EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt came into office boasting of returning the agency to its mission of cleaning up the air, water and land, but Pro's Alex Guillén and Emily Holden look at what he's accomplished so far and how it stacks up to his ambitious rhetoric.

- Tackling air pollution: He's rolled back or delayed a host of air quality regulations from the Obama administration, but signed off on 378 actions related to state plans as of Sept. 25, compared with 213 during the same period under Obama. Some environmentalists worry those quick approvals suggest laxer plans that are inadequately protective.
- Cleaning up Superfund sites: Pruitt's taken action to develop a top 10 list of priority Superfund sites and issued task force recommendations designed to speed up cleanups, but critics say the actions are toothless and actually hurt other cleanup efforts.
- Upgrading drinking water infrastructure: He's identified the need to upgrade water infrastructure to avoid similar crises like Flint, Mich., but hasn't offered many details on how to pay for it.
- Undoing Obama's climate agenda: Pruitt's stuck to his vows to unravel Obama administration actions addressing climate change through steps like revoking the Clean Power Plan and promising to open up a debate on climate science.
- Expanding outreach to states and businesses: The former Oklahoma attorney general has conducted outreach to almost entirely to Republican-controlled states, while industry groups have given high marks to Pruitt's approach.

EPA's take: "We're only 10 months on the job and eight years from today, Americans will be impressed with how President Trump and Administrator Pruitt were able to protect the environment and American jobs," agency spokesman Jahan Wilcox said.

LOLA ZINKE ROLE SCRUTINIZED: New documents show Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's wife, Lola, used Interior staff time to coordinate some of her activities while traveling with her husband during jaunts that gave her access to high level politicians and GOP donors who could benefit her as a political operator in her own right, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. "These emails show that the leadership at the Department of Interior treats basic ethical standards like an inconvenience," Western Values Project Executive Director Chris Saeger said.

In one instance, records show the secretary's wife helped decide the guest list for a Young America's Foundation town hall forum with her husband on April 17 at its Reagan Ranch in Santa Barbara. She sent a "list of people I have invited to the event" to two Interior staffers, according to a series of April 7 emails. Interior says she pays her own way when she accompanies her husband and that travel is cleared by ethics officials in advance. "DOI incurred no expenses due to Mrs. Zinke's presence" with the secretary, Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Friday.

YOU GOTTA MAKE A DECISION: What once was a sleepy little panel in Nebraska today decides whether to allow the Keystone XL pipeline to follow the path that developer TransCanada has proposed in the latest battle over the pipeline that's become a national fight. The Nebraska Public Service Commission, consisting of four elected Republicans and one Democrat, will decide whether to grant a permit to 1,200-mile proposed pipeline that would carry up to 830,000 barrels of oil per day. It's the last regulatory hurdle for the project, which President Donald Trump has pushed to complete and which has galvanized mass protests from the environmental movement.

Commissioners have faced intense lobbying from the White House, environmental advocates, TransCanada lobbyists and their own state politicians ahead of the decision. One development they won't be taking into account, though, is the spill of 210,000 gallons of oil from the existing Keystone pipeline in Amherst, South Dakota last Thursday. Officials said Nebraska law bars the consideration of spills or pipeline safety in the decision-making process. TransCanada said in an update the spill is "under control and that there is no significant environmental impact observed or threat to public safety" but that it continued to send crews to the site. But green groups immediately seized upon the incident as an example of what they say are the safety and environmental risks of moving forward with Keystone XL.

Regardless of the decision, environmental and Native American groups say they will continue to fight the project's completion. They'll hold a press conference in Lower Brule, South Dakota and sign a treaty against Keystone XL after the commission meets in the morning. "Nothing has changed at all in our defense of land, air and water of the Oceti Sakowin Lands," said Faith Spotted Eagle, a member of the Yankton Sioux Nation. "If anything, it has become more focused, stronger and more adamant after Standing Rock," referring to the protests of the Dakota Access pipeline. TransCanada, for its part, hasn't committed to building the controversial project yet, though it said earlier this month it was "quite encouraged" by industry interest in reserving space on Keystone XL. Oh, and the Associated Press reports the commission's decision is subject to legal challenges, setting up another potentially lengthy court battle.

Watch the meeting, which kicks off at 11 a.m. EST, online here.

IT'S A WRAP FROM BONN: The White House left climate talks in Bonn, Germany feeling pretty good about its efforts and the international community seemed relieved by the constructive role career negotiators played in quieter diplomatic efforts to help write the rulebook for the Paris deal, Pro's Emily Holden reports from Germany. Most political leaders at the talks sought to highlight U.S. activity in the negotiating rooms rather than the provocative move to press the case for the fuels blamed for warming the Earth and boosting sea levels. "You couldn't have expected more," said German Environment Minister Barbara Hendricks. "It's diplomats who are working here, they act professionally."

White House energy adviser George David Banks said the U.S. had in fact been "indispensable in thwarting efforts by some countries to get a free pass" under the Paris agreement. The American negotiating team, he said, had "led across many issues, promoted U.S. national interests, and protected U.S. taxpayers and businesses."

Potential pitfalls ahead: The success of the Paris agreement, which built on cooperation between the U.S. and China in the run-up, was that it set up a system that gives flexibility to developing countries that lack the capacity to meet its goals, Todd Stern, the Obama administration's special envoy for climate change, told POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff and Sara Stefanini on Friday. That marked a change from the "firewall" between rich and poor built into many years of climate negotiations and agreements. "In a world where somewhere between 60-65 percent of global emissions are coming from developing countries at this point — you can't have that," Stern said. Read their Q&A with Stern here.

Meanwhile, an agreement to phase down emissions of hydrofluorocarbons, extremely potent greenhouse gases, will go into effect in 2019 after getting enough countries to ratify the deal on Friday, the New York Times reports. That mark was hit when Sweden became the 20th country to ratify the Kigali amendment, which is expected to hold down climate change by 0.5° C [0.9° F] by 2100. The State Department still hasn't sent the treaty to the Senate for ratification, despite the entreaties of industry to do so.

INTERIM UTILITY HEAD NAMED IN PUERTO RICO: After Ricardo Ramos resigned his post as the head of Puerto Rico's utility Friday, its governing board named Justo González the interim chief, El Nuevo Día reports. Ramos said his resignation "has nothing to do with any matter covered in the media," but described it as "very personal." And the island's government said it had begun searching for a permanent head of the utility "inside and outside Puerto Rico."

Quick check: More than two months after the hurricane, more than 50 percent of the island still lacks electricity. Stats here.

WHAT'S THE VETTING CRITERIA? The Climate Solutions Caucus has added Reps. Josh Gottheimer and Matt Gaetz to its ranks, but it's the latter's inclusion that caught ME's attention. Gaetz introduced legislation H.R. 861 \(115\) abolishing the EPA earlier this year and told a Florida newspaper in 2016: "In our fervor to protect the environment, we lose sight of economic and scientific reality."

WATER, WATER EVERYWHERE: The Supreme Court will visit Water World on Jan. 8, when in its first arguments of the new year the court will hear arguments in two high-profile water cases. First up is Texas v. New Mexico and Colorado; this case is about Texas's allegations that New Mexico is sucking too much water out of the Rio Grande. These arguments aren't to settle the dispute, merely to determine whether the federal government can play a role in the proceedings. Next on the docket will be Florida v. Georgia, a fight over the use of water from the Apalachicola River. The case's "special master" recommended the justices dismiss the suit, as POLITICO Pro Florida's Bruce Ritchie reported last month.

HIS MIND SEEMS MADE UP: Trump seemed like his mind was pretty made up not to reverse an Obama-era ban on importing elephant hunting trophies from Zimbabwe and Zambia (reversing course on his administration's original decision last week) in a Sunday evening tweet. "Big-game trophy decision will be announced next week but will be very hard pressed to change my mind that this horror show in any way helps conservation of Elephants or any other animal," he offered.

COAL ASH GETS ITS DAY IN COURT: The D.C. Circuit hears oral arguments today (at the unusual time of 2 p.m. so heads up) on EPA's 2015 coal ash regulation and Pro's Alex Guillén runs through in Energy Regulation Watch all of the twists and turns in recent months leading up to today's hearing. Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson, a George H.W. Bush appointee, and two Obama appointees, Judges Patricia Millett and Cornelia Pillard, will today consider hear arguments about whether to put the case on hold indefinitely at the Monday arguments, alongside the various legal and technical challenges. Remember EPA intends to reconsider various aspects of the regulation and Congress made a major change to the rule's enforcement mechanism last year.

Alex's take: "This sustained tug-of-war has made things a little hazy, and it's not clear where the court will land on all this. This suit has been pending for more than two years, and the court did not grant EPA the same indefinite delay it did on a cavalcade of other rules. But the judges could still decide to wipe their hands of it and avoid the headache of navigating their way to a ruling."

LEFT OUT: Not included in the White House's latest $44 billion disaster recovery request was a $12 billion Houston area coastal barrier project sought by Texas Gov. Greg Abbott, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. The so-called coastal spine project aims to protect communities and infrastructure from massive storm surges, but green groups want the federal government to finish an environmental review on the project before it moves forward.

ICYMI: Merchant power companies are afraid an exemption included in the Senate and House tax bills for regulated power utilities — but not them — would leave them at a disadvantage, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. Both bills would exempt the regulated entities from the new cap on interest deductions for businesses at 30 percent of their adjusted income. "Since we compete with [regulated utilities], the tax provisions likely raise competitive issues which we will need to raise on the Hill," said John Shelk, CEO of the Electric Power Supply Association.

MAIL CALL! AIDING ZINKE'S CAUSE: Echoing Zinke's own calls from a couple weeks ago, 16 Senate Republicans released a letter Friday asking Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to prioritize four Interior nominees for confirmation. The chamber confirmed one of the four — Brenda Burman — on Thursday, but the senators still want action on the nominations of Susan Combs to be Interior's assistant secretary of policy management and budget, Joseph Balash to be assistant secretary for Land and Minerals Management and Ryan Nelson to be agency solicitor. "As you proceed in scheduling the next nominations to bring to the floor, we urge you to make these well-qualified nominees a top priority," the letter, led by Steve Daines, says.

Please, pretty please? Seven Senate Democrats are once again urging Trump to nominate a science adviser and fill other positions within Office of Science and Technology Policy. "Without adequate OSTP staffing, the country lacks key insights from those with deep experience in science and technology," the letter, led by Maggie Hassan, says.

Another RFS plea: Seven House Democrats asked Pruitt to reverse course in EPA's final renewable volume obligations regulation so it does "not unreasonably reduce advanced biofuels and cellulosic biofuel blending targets." Link here.

Solar plea to Trump: Six solar finance firms are asking Trump to consider the broader ramifications of whether to slap steep tariffs on imported solar equipment would have on broader markets and industries. "Tariffs not only will substantially and negatively impact the U.S. solar sector and the 260,000-plus well paying manufacturer, supplier, developer and installer jobs it supports, but also seriously undermine the billion-dollar financial markets and companies, such as ours, that rely on the success of the domestic solar industry," they wrote.

TAKE A GLANCE! The Center for American Progress is out with a report identifying members of Congress hostile to national monuments and who sponsored bills targeting public lands access. There are 19 members, with a heavy presence of Alaskans and Utahns, called out specifically.

MOVER, SHAKER: Tom Simchak starts Nov. 28 at the National Governors Association's Environment, Energy, and Transportation Division. Simchak (an American) was previously an energy policy adviser at the British embassy.

TransCanada 'encouraged' by interest shown in KXL shipments Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/09/2017 12:39 PM EDT

TransCanada says it is "encouraged" by industry demand to reserve space on Keystone XL, but it hasn't yet committed to building the controversial project.

TransCanada received enough commitments to ship oil along the proposed 1,200-mile pipeline to make it profitable, but the company is still analyzing the conditions shippers requested, Paul Miller, TransCanada's president of liquids pipelines told a conference call. The company is targeting commitments to ship 500,000 barrels a day via 20-year contracts, he added.

"We're quite encouraged by the results," Miller said during the company's third-quarter earnings call. "I believe the conditions are manageable."

The company still needs the approval from Nebraska's Public Service Commission for the pipeline's proposed route through the state. That decision is expected later this month

"We still have a lot of work to do," Miller said. "We are still working through the bid conditions, and that will take some time. It will take us some time to review the decision from the PSC."

Overall commitments to ship oil are "substantially similar" to what the company received when Keystone XL was first proposed nearly a decade ago, TransCanada said in its quarterly earnings report.

TransCanada had asked the Alberta government to reserve space on Keystone XL to help push the project forward, according to a Bloomberg report.

How the Bonn climate talks survived Trump Back

By Emily Holden | 11/17/2017 07:52 PM EDT

BONN, Germany — The White House goaded activists at the international climate talks by pushing coal and other fossil fuels. But behind closed doors, U.S. negotiators stuck to their Obama-era principles on the 2015 Paris deal — despite President Donald Trump's disavowal of the pact.

State Department negotiators at the U.N. conference that ended Saturday hewed to the United States' long-established positions on the details of how to carry out the Paris agreement. And that's the U.S. role that most foreign political leaders sought to highlight, despite the low expectations inspired by Trump's "America First" agenda and his dismissal of human-caused climate change as a hoax.

"You couldn't have expected more," said German Environment Minister Barbara Hendricks, who described the U.S. delegation as constructive and neutral. "Its diplomats who are working here, they act professionally."

White House energy adviser George David Banks portrayed the outcome in even more glowing terms, saying the U.S. had been "indispensable in thwarting efforts by some countries to get a free pass" under the Paris agreement.

The American negotiating team, Banks said, had "led across many issues, promoted U.S. national interests, and protected U.S. taxpayers and businesses."

Among the contentious issues that arose were efforts by poorer nations to allow them to use less arduous systems than wealthier countries to ensure they are measuring their greenhouse gas emissions. China had led that push, which the European Union and U.S. have long opposed, though ultimately the issue was left largely unsettled.

Negotiations at the conference, which began Nov. 6, wrapped up Saturday morning after developing nations launched an 11th-hour campaign to require wealthier nations to outline in advance how much climate funding they will provide — a sticking point for countries like the U.S. that amend their budgets each year.

Although observers said the U.S. made no effort to disrupt the talks, former Obama administration climate diplomat Todd Stern said Washington was "not in the negotiations with the same credibility as before."

"It's not that the U.S. isn't there, but it's not the same," said Stern, who had led the U.S. negotiators in Paris nearly two years ago. "It's the EU, the U.K. ... New Zealand, Australia, Canada, Japan, etc. They don't weigh as much as the U.S. did, but they can be very important."

The State Department sent fewer than 20 staffers, a far smaller delegation than it has sent to other climate gatherings in recent years.

Some observers said a U.S.-sponsored panel discussion earlier this week that promoted coal, natural gas and nuclear power appeared designed to please Trump's political base and energy industry supporters in the U.S. At the event, which provoked a high-profile protest, Banks told the audience that the U.S. would support "universal access" to affordable and reliable energy, which for many places in the world meant coal.

Andrew Light, who was part of Obama's delegation and is now a fellow at the World Resources Institute, said bringing that pro-fossil fuel event to the climate talks showed that the U.S. can remain a party to the international talks without substantively changing its positions.

"This administration can continue telegraphing its core beliefs, whether or not anyone one believes that with them," Light said. "In the long run there's everything to be gained from an environment where the United States does cooperate with other parties on whatever they want to cooperate on."

Other U.S. representatives, from companies to a group Democratic governors and mayors led by California Gov. Jerry Brown, sought to reassure the world that many in the U.S. still want to take action to ratchet down carbon pollution, even without Trump. Microsoft Corp. announced own its goal to slash carbon emissions 75 percent by 2030 and pitched sustainable technology, including for agriculture and land-cover mapping, in meetings it held with foreign governments.

But the talks on carrying out the Paris agreement will face major hurdles before the next major gathering next year in Poland. Countries will also face a deadline to finish deciding how they achieve the deal's goal of keeping global warming to below 2 degrees Celsius, the mark that scientists warn would cause irreversible damage.

"Parties haven't allowed the threatened U.S. withdrawal to derail this process," said Elliot Diringer, a former Clinton administration adviser who is executive vice president for the Center for Climate and Energy Solutions. "They've made good progress and set themselves up for a more focused negotiation next year. At the same time, the talks here have underscored the significant political challenges ahead next year."

But Tosi Mpanu-Mpanu, the lead climate change specialist for the environment ministry in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, said many major issues were pushed until next year. "I have a feeling that people were a little bit complacent," he said, disappointed in what he called a "self-fulfilling prophecy" that countries wouldn't make much progress this year.

Environmental advocates insisted they still aren't seeing the emissions reductions or money necessary to achieve the goals of the Paris deal.

"The conference gets a grade of 'meets expectations,'" said Andrew Deutz, director of international governmental relations for The Nature Conservancy.

Deutz said that while the U.S. didn't blow up the process, "the absence of national U.S. leadership was evident within the negotiating process this week and for driving more ambitious climate action in the future."

Island nations that face the most immediate threats from climate change and sea-level rise pressed their case throughout the two weeks. Allen Chastanet, the prime minister of Saint Lucia, told reporters that island nations are "paralyzed," because they can't stop rising temperatures alone.

Hurricane Maria demolished Barbuda and brought heavy damage to Puerto Rico, after passing just 40 miles from Saint Lucia.

"I have to say to you deep down inside of me I'm angry, I'm anxious and I'm fearful," he told a news conference. "It can't be that a prime minister's only resource is to get on the side of your bed on your knees and pray, and that's what I feel every time I'm here and a hurricane is developing over the Atlantic, is 'Lord, please take care of our people.'"

Q&A with former U.S. climate envoy Todd Stern Back

By Kalina Oroschakoff and Sara Stefanini | 11/19/2017 02:12 PM EDT

BONN, Germany — The United States traditionally pushed hard during international climate talks to ensure that both developed and developing countries shoulder the burden of dealing with global warming.

But a weakened U.S. delegation played a much more marginal role at the COP23 summit that wrapped up Friday, thanks to the Trump administration's decision to pull out of the Paris agreement.

That helped lead to the resurgence in Bonn of the idea of "differentiation," under which poorer countries do less, arguing that the rich ones caused the problem of climate change thanks to more than a century of industrialization.

Without U.S. support, the rest of the developed world is having a tougher time arguing back.

Todd Stern, the U.S. special envoy for climate change from 2009 to April 2016, spoke to POLITICO on the sidelines of the summit about what a lower-profile America means for climate talks.

This summit was meant to make progress on rules that are due at the 2018 meeting in Poland. What will be at stake at the COP24?

It's the place where all these various guidelines get done. It might be boring for readers, but it's actually really important.

Setting up a transparent monitoring system for national emissions is critical to tracking progress toward the Paris agreement's goals. Why are the discussions on the topic so tough?

One of the important sentences that we actually negotiated with China talks about essentially setting up a system where there will be flexibility provided to those developing countries who need it on basis of capacity. If you instead take that flexibility and say, OK, it applies to all developing countries, then you are kind of de facto getting back to a bifurcated system. The U.S. was always the loudest, strongest voice in pushing that back.

And now?

There were many, many countries supporting us, but that was something we cared about a lot, both for substantial reasons and political reasons. The U.S. is not in the negotiations with the same credibility as before. The EU, the U.K., the Umbrella Group countries — New Zealand, Australia, Canada, Japan, etc. — they don't weigh as much as the U.S. did, but they can be very important. There's no reason this should get messed up, but there are a bunch of countries who would like it to get messed up.

The Paris agreement helped bury the idea of differentiating responsibilities for the developing and developed sides, but the idea made a comeback in Bonn. What's behind that?

The DNA of these negotiations was this separation, this firewall. It's built into the Kyoto Protocol, and it's been an article of faith for all these years for developing countries, which in the period of time from Copenhagen [in 2009] to Paris, bit by bit, got pushed back and turned into something that was absolutely still a form of differentiation but not that sharp division. It's not that countries are trying to just throw grenades. They want to go back to that more comfortable system where they're not expected to do much.

And that's a problem?

In a world where somewhere between 60 percent and 65 percent of global emissions are coming from developing countries at this point, you can't have that. We shouldn't be fighting this battle all over again. We're going to have to fight it a little bit because people are pushing. We just need to have these guidelines, implementing measures, to be faithful to what happened in Paris.

What role did coal play at this conference? A White House coal event, for instance, provoked public protest in the conference halls.

I think the U.S. did a kind of stunt with that. It was designed to provoke the kind of reaction it got, I suppose. Coal continues to be a difficult political issue in Germany. It's a difficult political [issue in the U.S.], but it was a difficult issue before the election. There are not very many coal miners in either country, but there's a lot of this political attachment to that world and the symbolism of it.

Several developing countries pushed hard for a greater focus on climate efforts up to 2020. Why?

Pre-2020 is a hobby horse that a number of countries have been riding for several years now. One thing we know for sure is that issue is going to fade away before too long because it will become 2020. Obviously, what countries are doing now matters, but most countries, and this is all about developed countries, are doing what they pledged to do after Copenhagen. They have legislation, regulation, all of that. At least an element of this, I think, is a tactical way of trying to put developed countries on the defensive again. Pre-2020 is still seen as a period where the capacity to say you're the ones who are supposed to be acting is greater than post-2020.

Again, I think there's a certain amount of political theater going on.

This interview was edited for clarity and length.

Reports: PREPA chief resigns Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/17/2017 01:53 PM EDT

The head of the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority has resigned from the utility following extended power outages on the island in the aftermath of Hurricane Maria, according to news reports.

PREPA Director Ricardo Ramos had come under fire for signing a $300 million contract with Whitefish Energy to restore the power grid that was destroyed by the storm. That contract with Whitefish Energy, which had only two employees when the storm hit Puerto Rico, has come under scrutiny in Congress.

The resignation will take effect today. Neither PREPA nor the governor's office were immediately available for comment.

The FBI and the House Natural Resources Committee are probing PREPA's $300 million contract with Whitefish Energy, which had two employees when it won the no-bid contract to rebuild Puerto Rico's electric grid after the territory suffered a direct hit from Hurricane Maria in September.

Supreme Court to settle federal role in Texas-New Mexico water dispute Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/10/2017 11:38 AM EDT

The Supreme Court today said it will hear oral arguments about federal involvement in a long-running water dispute between Texas, New Mexico and Colorado.

The case involves allegations from Texas that irrigators in New Mexico are sucking up water from the Rio Grande that should flow downstream under a 1938 compact. The federal government intervened as an interested party, arguing that New Mexico's actions affect its obligation to deliver Rio Grande water to Mexico, and it is seeking a court order prohibiting New Mexico from continuing the water use.

The case's special master, New Orleans attorney Gregory Grimsal — a lawyer picked by the justices to hear the case — recommended earlier this year that the Supreme Court reject parts of the U.S.' claims that apply under the compact.

The federal government objected, arguing that it can bring claims under the compact even though it is not a member because it is a "third-party beneficiary." Meanwhile, Colorado argued that the U.S. claims should be limited to those brought under the 1906 Boundary Waters Convention between the U.S. and Mexico.

Grimsal did recommend the justices hear certain claims brought by the U.S. under federal reclamation laws.

The justices agreed to weigh only the issues determining what the federal government can contest, focusing on the "threshold" issue of the federal government's role in the case, not the underlying water use dispute, which likely will take several more years to resolve.

WHAT'S NEXT: Arguments likely will occur this winter, with a decision coming in the spring.

POLITICO Pro Florida: U.S. Supreme Court sets arguments in Florida v. Georgia water lawsuit Back

By Bruce Ritchie | 10/10/2017 11:47 AM EDT

The U.S. Supreme Court today said it is setting oral arguments in Florida's lawsuit against Georgia over the use of water from the Apalachicola River.

That means the court isn't inclined to act quickly on a special master's recommendation to dismiss the case.

Florida Gov. Rick Scott, in 2013, sued Georgia in the Supreme Court seeking a cap on Georgia's use of water from the Chattahoochee and Flint rivers, following the collapse of the Apalachicola Bay oyster population.

After a six-week hearing in the fall of 2016, court special master Ralph Lancaster last February recommended dismissal because Florida had not included the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in the lawsuit, which operates federal hydropower dams on the Chattahoochee River.

Even if water use by Georgia cities and farms was capped, there was no guarantee the Corps of Engineers would provide more water to Florida, Lancaster wrote.

But the court allowed the states to file exceptions in the case and other interested parties to file briefs.

In disputing Lancaster's recommendation, Florida told the Supreme Court that it represents the state's last legal remedy for saving the Apalachicola River and the oysters and people who depend on it.

But Georgia argued that Lancaster got it right and that Florida failed to show how potentially "catastrophic" cuts in water use would benefit the downstream state.

A timetable for hearings was not set by the court today.

Trump reverses hunting trophy decision, says he will review Back

By Akela Lacy | 11/17/2017 08:42 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Friday reversed his own administration's decision to allow hunters to import elephant hunting trophies from two African countries, saying he will perform a review before making changes.

Earlier this week, the Fish and Wildlife Service announced it would allow imports of wildlife trophies, including elephants, from Zimbabwe and Zambia. The move sparked immediate outcry from conservation groups and even some of President Trump's most staunch supporters.

"Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts," Trump tweeted Friday night. "Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!"

After Trump's tweet, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke released a statement confirming the decision.

"President Trump and I have talked and both believe that conservation and healthy herds are critical. As a result, in a manner compliant with all applicable laws, rules, and regulations, the issuing of permits is being put on hold as the decision is being reversed," the statement from Zinke reads.

Early Saturday, Trump retweeted prominent media figures who'd expressed their support for the policy reversal.

The original announcement made late Wednesday at the African Wildlife Consultative Forum in Tanzania received immediate backlash from conservationists and wildlife supporters, including groups like the Natural Resources Defense Council and Conservation International.

Fox News host Laura Ingraham, a vocal supporter of the president, also tweeted her opposition to the measure. "I don't understand how this move by @realDonaldTrump Admin will not INCREASE the gruesome poaching of elephants. Stay tuned," Ingraham tweeted Thursday.

The National Rifle Association's Institute for Legislative Action had applauded the move.

The decision, pending further review, would have reversed an Obama-era 2014 decision to ban all imports of elephant trophies from Zimbabwe and Zambia.

Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts. Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!

— Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) November 18, 2017

Environmental groups applauded Trump's decision to review the policy change.

"It's great that public outrage has forced Trump to reconsider this despicable decision, but it takes more than a tweet to stop trophy hunters from slaughtering elephants and lions," said Tanya Sanerib, senior attorney with the Center for Biological Diversity, in response to Trump's apparent change of heart. "We need immediate federal action to reverse these policies and protect these amazing animals."

A spokesperson for the Center for Biological Diversity also noted that the Fish and Wildlife Service already began issuing permits to import trophies from lion hunting. That began over a month ago, according to ABC News.

During a press briefing Friday, White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said the decision to reverse the ban came after a review that showed the original criteria for establishing it — insufficient data from Zimbabwe and Zambia on whether or not they were effectively managing wildlife — indicated that "both Zambia and Zimbabwe had met new standards, strict international conservation standards that allowed Americans to resume hunting in those countries."

Sanders added that "a ban on importing elephant ivory from all countries remains in place," emphasizing that the process of the review of the ban's criteria started under the Obama administration, which Trump also noted in his tweet.

The White House did not immediately reply to a request for comment.

Texas coastal spine left out of Trump disaster recovery request Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/17/2017 05:39 PM EDT

The White House's latest request for congressional disaster recovery funding does not include a $12 billion Houston area coastal barrier project sought by Texas Gov. Greg Abbott, handing a win to green groups that want the federal government to finish an environmental review on the project before it moves forward.

The White House on Friday asked lawmakers to approve $44 billion in additional funding to aid storm-ravaged areas in Texas, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and Florida, including $12 billion for a flood mitigation program run by the Community Development Block Grant.

But the coastal barrier project that was part of Abbott's $61 billion storm recovery funding request in late October would not qualify for that program under the rules set by the White House because it would not address the damage caused by Hurricane Harvey in August. Instead the state's so-called coastal spine project aims to protect communities and infrastructure from the kind of storm surges last seen during Hurricane Ike in 2008 that caused about $30 billion in damages.

One of a few possible designs for the proposed coastal spine would extend a 10-mile seawall at Galveston Bay by another 50 miles and include massive floodgates that could be closed ahead of a storm to block the surges of water from pummeling the coastline.

Environmental advocates say they are not opposed to the project that's designed to protect coastal communities, critical marine and avian habitat, the Port of Houston, the Houston Ship Channel and oil refining and processing plants that are all vital to the state's economy and could create an environmental disaster if damaged.

But they say its not yet clear how a new barrier would affect the flow of water, and whether it could hurt marine and other ecosystems.

"We don't know what that would do to the ecology of the bay or to the shoreline there," said Amanda Fuller, National Wildlife Federation deputy director of Gulf of Mexico Restoration. "It's just a bunch of unknowns at this point."

The Army Corps of Engineers is performing a five-year study it expects to complete in 2021 on design options for the coastal spine that would avoid harming the marine and avian ecosystem of the Galveston Bay area that serves as a nursery for marine creatures before they mature and move into the Gulf of Mexico.

Bob Stokes, president of the Galveston Bay Foundation, which focuses on wetland preservation and restoration, said the project could be funded in the future through federal appropriations and he continues to "firmly believe that [the study] process is necessary before we fund the coastal spine."

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas — who has placed a hold on President Donald Trump's nomination of Russell Vought to be deputy director of OMB until the Texas funding comes though — has called the president's latest recovery request "wholly inadequate."

Abbott's office did not respond to requests for comment.

Independent power sector worried by tax carve-out for regulated utilities Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/17/2017 05:23 PM EDT

A tax carve-out for regulated power utilities included in both the House and Senate tax bills doesn't apply to merchant power companies, which fear the provision could put them at a competitive disadvantage.

Both the Senate bill that advanced out of committee and the bill passed by the House Thursday would cap interest deductions for businesses at 30 percent of their adjusted income. That would serve to offset "bonus depreciation" that the two bills include that allow businesses to deduct the full cost of capital investments from their taxes.

But regulated utilities convinced congressional tax writers to insert an exemption in the bills for them — but didn't provide the same exemption for the merchant power companies or subsidiaries of regulated companies that sell power into the competitive wholesale markets.

"Since we compete with [regulated utilities], the tax provisions likely raise competitive issues which we will need to raise on the Hill," John Schelk, CEO of the Electric Power Supply Association, a trade association which represents the owners of merchant plants. "Needless to say, our argument will be we should get equal treatment."

Winning the exception to the interest deduction has been a high priority for all power providers, since building power plants requires huge capital expenditures, and the debt required to finance them extends for decades. Regulated utilities' expenses are covered by payments from ratepayers, and they prefer using straight-line depreciation that stretches over years for their assets rather than the bonus depreciation. That bonus depreciation can threaten their rate base, since state regulators often view the quicker depreciation as a tax benefit that must be returned to ratepayers.

But independent power producers, which include market-only power plant owners as well as divisions of companies like Dynegy, NRG Energy and FirstEnergy that run competitive power plants don't get that benefit — and they want it. Companies that own merchant power plants tend to have a lot of debt from past investments, but they aren't building many new plants.

"For them, expensing the capital is not a big deal right now, so it doesn't help them," said Toby Shea, an analyst with Moody's. "But the interest expense, which they have a lot of, would help them a lot."

And while regulated utilities and unregulated utilities do not generally compete inside markets like PJM or Texas, there are exceptions. For example, Schelk points out that power plants run by regulated utilities in South Carolina and North Carolina that sometimes sell power into PJM's market would be able to offer lower prices thanks to their exemption.

"Good example is right here in Virginia," Schelk said. "Virginia is in the PJM regional market, but Dominion has rate-based generation while there are also merchant generation IPP plants in [the state]. They compete to be dispatched in PJM and also compete for procurement of new projects."

Other analysts were skeptical that the bill as written would create a big problem for independent power providers. Christi Tezak, managing director for ClearView Energy Partners, said that if competitive arms of holding companies are treated the same as independent power producers, then it's hard to see how either has an advantage in markets.

But, utilities could win a change to the bill in conference or on the Senate floor that would expand the carve out to their competitive divisions.

"If [utility holding companies] get it and IPPs don't then there would be a competitive issue vis-à-vis the two different owners.," she said.

Zinke demands 'immediate action' on 4 Interior nominees Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/08/2017 10:59 AM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke sent a letter to Senate leadership demanding "immediate action" on four agency nominees, some of whom have waited four times as long as their predecessors for a vote.

"Several of our nominees for leadership positions have been waiting an exorbitant amount of time to be confirmed in the Senate," he wrote in the letter obtained today. "These delays are hampering DOI's ability to do the work of the people we are all supposed to be serving."

He called for the chamber to immediately process the nominations of Brenda Burman to lead Interior's Bureau of Reclamation, Susan Combs to be Interior's assistant secretary of policy management and budget, Joseph Balash to be assistant secretary for Land and Minerals Management and Ryan Nelson to be agency solicitor.

Zinke bashed senators for working "behind the guise of the cloakroom, putting random and unknown holds on these nominations," a practice he called "senseless and unexplainable."

Senate confirms Burman to lead Bureau of Reclamation Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 06:11 PM EDT

The Senate cleared Brenda Burman's nomination to run the Bureau of Reclamation by voice vote on Thursday.

"FINALLY! Excited to finally have Brenda Burman confirmed to lead @usbr," Secretary Ryan Zinke tweeted in response.

Burman's nomination to lead the nation's wholesale water and hydroelectric power provider got caught up in the battle over Zinke's national monument designation review.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin placed a hold on her nomination until he landed a meeting with Zinke to discuss the review and lifted it after that meeting took place earlier this week.

WHAT'S NEXT: Burman will assume her position running the Bureau of Reclamation.

IRMA WALLOPS FLORIDA: It may take days to fully understand the scale of the damage, but the catastrophic Hurricane Irma hammered Florida throughout Sunday just days after Texas bore the brunt of Hurricane Harvey. Millions of people were without power (latest estimates had around 3.5 million customers without electricity) and Acting Homeland Security Secretary Elaine Duke told the Miami Herald many could be without power for weeks in the storm's aftermath. Florida Power & Light CEO Eric Silagy said in a statement late Sunday that an "extensive rebuild" of Florida's west coast electric grid would leave customers without power for extended periods.

EPA said ahead of landfall it had completed rapid assessments of 90 Superfund sites in Florida and would ensure any impacted site would be inspected as soon as it's safe to do so. Sen. Marco Rubio told the Associated Press on Sunday agency officials were "generally positive" about the security of Superfund sites during the hurricane, but "they can't guarantee it 100 percent," he added. EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt also allowed three Tampa Electric Company facilities and several Monroe County units to operate without meeting all air pollution controls in an attempt to ensure a steady stream of electricity.

TIME TO DISCUSS CLIMATE CHANGE? Bucking prominent Trump administration officials like Energy Secretary Rick Perry and Pruitt, Miami's Republican mayor said Saturday it's "the time" to discuss climate change and what can be done about the problem, The Miami Herald reports. "This is the time to talk about climate change," Mayor Tomás Regalado said. "If this isn't climate change, I don't know what is. This is a truly, truly poster child for what is to come."

McCain agrees: Speaking on CNN's "State of the Union" on Sunday, Sen. John McCain said it was time to sit down and discuss potential solutions. "There [are] things happening with the climate in the world that is unprecedented," he said. "We have to understand that the climate may be changing and we can take common sense measures which will not harm the American people."

Quotable: In response to Pruitt's comments that discussing climate change during hurricanes is "insensitive," climate hawk Sen. Brian Schatz tweeted: "Every Senate R except for one voted for Pruitt. The Republican Party is refusing moral and political responsibility for the planet itself."

IT'S MONDAY EVERYONE! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and 39 states (more than ME would've thought) have had a lawmaker serve as president pro tempore in the Senate. Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

CLIMATE ADAPTATION WORK TRUDGES ON: Staffers working on climate adaptation at EPA continue those efforts even though the four people working on that matter were moved to different offices a few months ago, Pro's Emily Holden reports. "Unequivocally, the Office of Policy continues to support work on climate adaptation," said Joel Scheraga, a veteran EPA employee and the agency's senior adviser for climate adaptation. "The bottom line is that climate adaptation work continues." Even though Pruitt has put many climate change initiatives on ice, Scheraga said EPA is still available to work with state and local leaders who want to prepare for the effects of climate change, including heavy rains, more intense hurricanes and sea-level rise.

An agency spokesman, Jahan Wilcox, said the reorganization "occurred in the spring and allowed these four employees to continue their work on climate change adaptation within the Office of Policy," which is run by Samantha Dravis, a top aide to Pruitt. The four work within the Office of Regulatory Planning and Management and the National Center of Environmental Economics.

MORE EPA AMENDMENTS COMING: Hurricane Irma prompted House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy to scrap votes scheduled for today, but lawmakers will vote on lingering EPA and Interior amendments to an eight-title spending package H.R. 3354 \(115\) this week. Before breaking last week, votes were ordered on amendments barring EPA from enforcing its methane rule, prohibiting the use of the social cost of carbon in regulations, blocking the closure of any EPA regional offices and slashing agency appropriation by $1.87 billion.

INVESTIGATIONS GALORE! Confirmation came late Friday that a bunch of Trump administration actions were under review by watchdogs. Among them:

1. Zinke's call to Alaskans: GAO said it would issue a legal opinion about Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's calls to Alaska Sens. Lisa Murkowski and Dan Sullivan over their Obamacare repeal votes, Pro's Alex Guillén reports, citing letters released Friday. Zinke allegedly told both lawmakers that Murkowski's vote against moving ahead on healthcare repeal efforts could negatively impact Alaskan energy goals in the Trump administration.

2. Interior's staff reshuffle: Interior's inspector general confirmed it would look into Zinke's June reassignment of a number of senior executive staff, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. Among of the dozens of staff moves under review is Zinke's decision to transfer Joel Clement from a managerial position involving climate change issues to a job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies.

3. Hiring practices for political appointees: GAO has also agreed to look into the hiring practices of various political appointees at EPA and the White House Council on Environmental Quality, as well as whether those officials are complying with ethics requirements, two senior Environment and Public Works Committee Democrats said Friday. "When an agency can just ignore those rules—and congressional oversight—the result often leads to corruption and scandal," Sens. Tom Carper and Sheldon Whitehouse, who requested the probe, said in a statement. "We're grateful that GAO will let us know what EPA hasn't."

AT LONG LAST, PHMSA CHIEF PICKED: Late Friday night, the White House announced its selection of Howard "Skip" Elliott to run the Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration, Pro Transportation's Tanya Snyder reports. He's a 40-year veteran of the U.S. freight rail industry and currently vice president of public safety, health, environment and security for CSX Transportation in Jacksonville, Fla. Elliott's portfolio includes hazardous materials transportation safety, crisis management, and environmental compliance. He received a lifetime achievement award from the Association of American Railroads for his work on hazardous materials transportation safety.

ICYMI: Fears are growing among the solar industry that a forthcoming trade commission ruling — and Trump's increasing frustration with advisers recommending a cautious approach to trade — could result in steep tariffs being set on shipments of solar equipment into the country that could stunt the industry's rapid growth, Pro's Esther Whieldon, Eric Wolff and Andrew Restuccia report. The U.S. International Trade Commission rules later this month on the complaint from solar manufacturers Suniva and SolarWorld USA and, if it finds damage, would send the matter over to the White House for a final decision.

Key takeaway: A senior administration official said Trump is very likely to support tariffs against the solar imports if the ITC sends the complaint over to 1600 Pennsylvania.

Meanwhile, the sector boasted its largest second quarter ever with 2,387 megawatts of solar photovoltaic systems installed, according to the Solar Energy Industries Association's latest report. That's more than quarter one of 2017 and represents a eight percent year-over-year increase.

MAIL CALL! REVERSE COURSE ON CLIMATE PREPAREDNESS: Carper, top EPW Democrat, sent a letter to Trump Friday urging him to reinstate several previously canceled Obama-era initiatives on climate preparedness. "While our country debates how to address climate change, rising sea levels and extreme weather events are no longer a matter of debate, becoming the new norm and placing extreme burdens on the American people and economy," Carper wrote. Among his requests: Reinstate the requirements that federally funded projects be required to take flood risks under consideration and hold a "red team-blue team" exercise on preparedness rather than climate science.

EYEING AN EXIT? Tucked away in a New York Times report on how Trump's rattling Republicans ahead of the midterms comes the tidbit that Rep. Fred Upton, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee, "may retire or run for the Senate." Upton has been one of the most visible faces on energy policy in the House. He later emailed Jonathan Martin, the Times reporter, to say he was eyeing the Senate seat now held by Sen. Debbie Stabenow. ME can't wait for the Upton v. Kid Rock primary.

WATCH THIS SPACE: Wednesday marks the deadline for EPA and environmental challengers to suggest expedited briefing schedules in the lawsuit over Pruitt's delay of the chemical safety rule, Pro's Alex Guillén reports in Energy Regulation Watch. That comes even as the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit declined to immediately reinstate the rule in the aftermath of Hurricane Harvey. And, ICYMI, Trump picked Gregory Katsas, currently a deputy counsel at the White House, for the open slot of the D.C. Circuit left open recent retirement of Judge Janice Rogers Brown.

THIS SEEMS TIMELY: The National League of Cities and the Environmental and Energy Study Institute are holding a briefing today at 3 p.m. in Cannon 122 to hear what various cities around the U.S. are doing to invest in resiliency. Speakers include Pittsburgh Mayor Bill Peduto.

IT'S TIME TO RECTIFY: Germany's automobile industry must "rectify the mistakes" exposed in its Dieselgate emissions scandal but there's still a robust future for the sector, Chancellor Angela Merkel said in a podcast Saturday, POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff reports. "We've experienced a major loss of trust in the car industry," Merkel said. "But at the same time, we also know that the car industry is an important pillar of our economic success, as well as of our reputation as an export nation, and the quality label 'Made in Germany.'" With just two weeks to go until the German elections, Merkel is trying to walk the fine line of chastising the industry for its failure in the emissions cheating scandal without alienating the hundreds of the thousands of workers in the sector.

THIS SEEMS LIKE A BIG DEAL: China has begun the preliminary research into eventually banning the sale of all fossil fuel powered vehicles, the BBC reports. "Those measures will certainly bring profound changes for our car industry's development," Xin Guobin, the country's vice minister of industry, said. China has not said when the ban might go into effect.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

EPA staffer: We're still working on climate adaptation Back

By Emily Holden | 09/11/2017 05:02 AM EDT

Staff from the EPA's disbanded climate adaptation office are still doing the same work despite moving to different offices a few months ago, the head of the team told POLITICO.

An EPA reorganization finalized last week revealed that the agency followed through with a plan set in in the spring to reassign four climate change adaptation employees to two different sections of the Office of Policy, which is run by Samantha Dravis, a longtime political strategist and top aide to Administrator Scott Pruitt.

"Unequivocally, the Office of Policy continues to support work on climate adaptation," said Joel Scheraga, a veteran EPA employee and the agency's senior adviser for climate adaptation. "Samantha Dravis has asked me to continue working on climate adaptation issues. The bottom line is that climate adaptation work continues."

Pruitt has eliminated EPA's initiatives aimed at reducing man-made carbon dioxide emissions in order to curb climate change. He has questioned CO2's role in rising temperatures, proposing the agency should host public debates on the science. He is working to rescind the Clean Power Plan, the Obama administration's key proposal to start decreasing U.S. greenhouse gas levels, and he was a core proponent of exiting the Paris climate agreement.

But Scheraga said EPA is still available to work with state and local leaders who want to prepare for the effects of climate change, including heavy rains, more intense hurricanes and sea-level rise. The news is one of the first signs that Pruitt would allow some climate change efforts to continue.

EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox said the changes "occurred in the spring and allowed these four employees to continue their work on climate change adaptation within the office of policy." The staffers will work within the Office of Regulatory Planning and Management and the National Center of Environmental Economics.

Scheraga said the agency wants to help make sure that as communities "invest literally billions of dollars in new [water] systems that they in fact are better prepared for these extreme weather events so that they don't overflow so that they don't spill raw sewage into our lakes and streams," for example.

"We work with the communities to provide them with the information and the tools that they have told us they need to address their needs," Scheraga said. "They have told us they need to deal with these more intense precipitation events, these storm surges, so that in fact they can continue to protect public health and the environment, again consistent with EPA's mission to ensure that they continue to protect water quality and can provide safe drinking water."

That kind of work will be important as Texas and Florida rebuild following two of the most damaging hurricanes in U.S. history.

Congress is moving ahead with an initial $15 billion aid package for Texas and Louisiana, and scientists say addressing the role of a changing climate is crucial to spending that money effectively.

Fred Wagner, a lawyer who counseled the city of New Orleans in rebuilding its downtown medical center after Hurricane Katrina, said communities that want to spend more to rebuild smarter, with bigger and more frequent flooding in mind, will need to be able to point to climate change, even if they just call it "resiliency."

"It makes justifying the investment in those features much more acceptable, much more palatable," he said.

GAO to probe Zinke call to Murkowski Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/08/2017 05:12 PM EDT

The Government Accountability Office will look into Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's calls to Alaska Sens. Lisa Murkowski and Dan Sullivan over Obamacare repeal, according to letters sent today.

Two key House Democrats, Reps. Frank Pallone and Raul Grijalva, asked GAO to provide a legal opinion on the July calls, during which Zinke reportedly told Murkowski that her vote against moving forward with repeal efforts could negatively impact Alaskan energy goals in the Trump administration.

Interior's inspector general already concluded its own inquiry into the matter without making any findings after both senators declined to discuss the calls with investigators.

WHAT'S NEXT: GAO's letter does not specify how long the inquiry might take.

Interior IG probing Zinke's senior staff reshuffle Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/08/2017 05:09 PM EDT

The Interior Department's internal watchdog has launched a probe into Secretary Ryan Zinke's June reassignment of a number of senior executive staff, an official told POLITICO today.

The inspector general's office is auditing Zinke's decision to reassign dozens of senior executive service employees, including Joel Clement, who was moved from a managerial position involving climate change issues to a job collecting royalties from oil and gas companies. The office has begun interviewing key agency staff and asked the secretary's office to hand over documents, IG spokeswoman Nancy DiPaolo said.

The audit follows a request in July from Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and seven of her colleagues for Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall to look into the matter.

Depending on what the audit uncovers, it could lead to a broader investigation to determine whether any laws were broken.

WHAT'S NEXT: DiPaolo said the IG hopes to wrap up its work within a few months.

White House to nominate heads for FHWA, PHMSA Back

By Tanya Snyder | 09/08/2017 08:20 PM EDT

President Donald Trump announced tonight that he will nominate Paul Trombino to head the Federal Highway Administration and Howard "Skip" Elliott to run the Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration.

Trombino was director of the Iowa Department of Transportation from 2011 to 2016. He unexpectedly resigned from his post in Iowa last November and in December became president of the McClure Engineering Company, a civil engineering firm.

Before his stint in Iowa, Trombino worked at the Wisconsin DOT for 17 years, most recently serving as director of the Bureau of Transit, Local Roads, Rails and Harbors.

Trombino served as president of the American Association of State Highway Transportation Officials for the 2015-2016 term and as the 2016 vice chair of the Transportation Research Board Executive Committee.

Trump also tapped Howard "Skip" Elliott, an award-winning 40-year veteran of the U.S. freight rail industry, for administrator of PHMSA. Elliott is vice president of public safety, health, environment and security for CSX Transportation in Jacksonville, Fla., with a portfolio that included hazardous materials transportation safety, crisis management, and environmental compliance.

According to the White House, Elliott "is a pioneer and leading advocate in developing and implementing computer-based tools to assist emergency management officials, first responders, and homeland security personnel in preparing for and responding to a railroad hazardous materials or security incident."

Elliott received a lifetime achievement award from the Association of American Railroads for his work on hazardous materials transportation safety.

Solar sector rattled by trade case, Trump rhetoric Back

By Esther Whieldon, Eric Wolff and Andrew Restuccia | 09/08/2017 05:03 PM EDT

A looming trade commission ruling on the surging imports of solar equipment to the U.S. and President Donald Trump's impatience on creating trade barriers are raising fears among many in the solar industry they could see a tariff that stunts the sector's sharp growth.

The U.S. International Trade Commission will decide later this month whether foreign companies are harming U.S. solar cell makers with their shipments of solar equipment into the country. And if it does find damage, it would recommend a remedy — and ultimately hand the final decision off to Trump to decide whether to impose tariffs.

The complaint filed by solar manufacturers Suniva and SolarWorld USA to the ITC only needs to show that surging imports harmed the domestic industry, which appears to be backed up by data showing a five-fold increase in imports from 2012 to 2016 and the closure of more than half the U.S. cell manufacturing sites over that period.

Trump has frequently complained that U.S. companies were suffering from unfair competition from foreign countries — particularly China, whose companies dominate solar manufacturing — and he is very likely to support tariffs against the solar imports if the ITC sends the complaint to the White House, according to a senior administration official.

The official said the president is increasingly frustrated with advisers recommending a cautious approach to trade.

But many in the U.S. solar business say that setting up tariffs or floor prices for imports, as Suniva has suggested, could pose some political risks for Trump because of solar technology's broad popularity, as well the growing clout of the workforce that sells and installs the systems.

The politics of this "might get wrapped up in Trump's desire to beat his chest," said Jigar Shah, founder of solar installer SunEdison now at specialty finance company Generate Capital, and who opposes tariffs. "These are all the people that basically thought that the U.S. economy had left them behind and voted for Trump. This is a policy that would directly negatively impact Trump's base."

Solar power costs have tumbled to less than a quarter of the price a decade ago, largely because of declines in the prices of cells and panels driven by low-cost production from Chinese companies. That has helped spur a surge in both large-utility scale installations as well as small rooftop systems for homeowners and businesses.

Opponents of trade barriers, including the industry lobby group Solar Energy Industry Association, contend that using the authority that was last applied by President George W. Bush would drive up the price of solar panels and eliminate 88,000 jobs, a third of the industry's U.S. workers.

Many of those jobs are in states Trump won narrowly in 2016: North Carolina, Arizona and Florida, which are all among the top 10 in the country in solar jobs, according to a report from the advocacy group The Solar Foundation.

But supporters of tariffs — including the Steel Manufacturers Association — are pressing Trump to put in place barriers to stem the flow of cheap solar cells and modules that have pushed many U.S. manufacturers — including Suniva — into bankruptcy. Suniva and SolarWorld contend that resurrecting the U.S. solar manufacturing sector would generate about 16,000 manufacturing jobs "in very short order" and increase overall related employment by about 45,500 jobs.

"The U.S. solar manufacturing industry must be provided meaningful relief to ensure that thousands of American manufacturing jobs are not permanently exported overseas," Suniva and SolarWorld said in an emailed statement.

They added that "Any criticism of a remedy is a vote for sending American manufacturing jobs to China and its proxies."

The ITC decision on whether the imports harmed U.S. manufacturers is due Sept. 22. If it finds harm, it would send its recommendations to the White House in November, and a final decision from Trump would be expected after the beginning of the new year.

Trump could face pushback from lawmakers if his big trade decisions hurt their constituents, said Tori Whiting of The Heritage Foundation, noting the political and international pressure that prompted Bush to pull back tariffs on steel imports less than two years after he imposed them in 2002.

And new tariffs could ultimately spur Congress to jump into the issue, she said.

"Congress has given up a lot of its authority when it comes to decisions made on trade and on the changing on barriers and tariffs," Whiting said. A strong move by the White House on solar or steel imports "could motivate Congress to ... reassert their constitutional powers."

Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) in January introduced a bill, S. 177 \(115\), that would subject all of a president's trade actions to congressional approval with exceptions regarding protecting national security.

So far, more than 70 lawmakers from both parties have weighed in on the case in letters to the trade commission, with the majority pushing for the ITC to not impose new solar tariffs.

But most lawmakers from states that are home to Suniva and SolarWorld factories in Oregon, Michigan and Georgia say they back the manufacturers' petition, including Reps. Kurt Schrader (D-Ore.) and Dan Kildee (D-Mich.).

"China is illegally dumping below-cost solar panels on the marketplace. They've been doing it for years," Schrader said, noting that SolarWorld won anti-dumping and countervailing duty sanctions against Chinese and Taiwanese-made solar products in 2012 and 2015. But those measures had little impact, since Chinese companies shifted much of their production to other Asian nations not covered by the duties.

Kildee told POLITICO he viewed the issue as "really a question as to whether we're going to abdicate manufacturing to other places around the world."

But Sen. David Perdue's (R-Ga.) August letter, co-signed by 15 other senators, argued that the proposed "tariffs would especially hurt residential rooftop solar projects that are rapidly growing." Solar installers comprised more than half of Georgia's 4,000-person solar workforce in 2016 about 2-1/2 times the number employed in solar manufacturing jobs there.

Both of Suniva's Georgia and Michigan factories are shuttered after the company sought bankruptcy protection.

The issue is further complicated over exactly who the tariffs would protect, since Suniva and SolarWorld USA have foreign owners. American financiers pushed Suniva to file the trade case, but Shunfeng International Clean Energy Ltd. owns a majority stake in the company. While SolarWorld USA is an arm of Germany's SolarWorld Industries.

"These are foreign multi-nationals but they have manufacturing in the U.S., That's the distinction. And you have domestic companies addicted to foreign imports," said Robert Scott, a senior economist with the Economic Policy Institute. "That seems awkward, and that's one of the reasons I suspect that Trump may be hesitant to act in this case. There are no clear domestic interests at stake and there are now increasingly clear domestic enterprises who could lose."

Still, Trump has re-opened the NAFTA free trade deal with Canada and Mexico in search of a revamp more to his liking, and has taken a protectionist posture in an attempt to reverse various other trade agreements, complaining they are "bad deals" that hurt American workers. The solar case could present him with an opportunity to show he's following through on his get-tough pledges. He regularly calls out other countries — even tiny Finland — for having a trade surplus with the United States, and he has put trade hawks like Peter Navarro and Robert Lighthizer in key administration posts.

At a meeting in the Oval Office earlier in August Trump told chief of staff John Kelly, "This is my view. I want tariffs. And I want someone to bring me some tariffs," Axios reported.

If the commission sends the case to Trump in November, he would not be limited by the agency's recommendations and could even try to negotiate a deal with other countries to avoid angering allies he needs to keep on his side for bigger fights.

"I think it's catnip to the base and irresistible to the president," said Paul Bledsoe, a strategic advisor at the Progressive Policy Institute, a left-leaning policy think tank. "I see very little downside to him acting on it. I think it's a classic kind of far right conservative argument: 'Isn't it ironic the lefties don't even protect their own solar manufacturers,' kind of thing."

ONE REALLY BIG FAN OF PERRY'S PUSH: Energy Secretary Rick Perry's push to require power markets to cover the costs to run coal and nuclear plants that are being squeezed economically has earned a powerful supporter in President Donald Trump's orbit in the form of coal magnate Bob Murray, Pro's Darius Dixon and Eric Wolff report. The proposal, which must be approved by FERC, would be mostly limited to plants in a stretch of the Midwest and Northeast where Murray's mining company, Murray Energy, is the predominant supplier. One stretch of the Rust Belt and Appalachia, overseen by an electricity market called the PJM Interconnection, accounts for roughly 44 percent of Murray's sales and Perry's rule was "certainly targeted at the PJM region," said Andy Ott, CEO of PJM.

An unlikely group of allies that includes environmental groups, the natural gas, wind and solar industries and the American Petroleum Institute has vocally opposed Perry's plan. "Customers get less than nothing while a few companies and their investors get a whole lot of something," Nora Mead Brownell, a Republican former electricity regulator, said of Perry's plan. "Money that gets spent there doesn't get invested in doing what you really need to do, which is upgrading the grid." Perry argues his proposal is an effort to ensure that the power network can withstand threats like terrorist attacks or severe weather.

Among the nation's roughly 280,000 megawatts of coal-fired power, Perry's rule is tightly written to affect only about 40,000 megawatts, according to POLITICO's analysis. Murray Energy acknowledged in written comments it has a "vital and critical interest" in whether the plan flies. "Given the current threats to those resources, Murray Energy, along with other coal producers and related industries ... is threatened with bankruptcy and significant economic harm if those resources are forced out of the market by unreasonable and unsupportable market pricing mechanisms," it wrote. Since Trump's swearing-in, Murray has made personal pleas for help in face-to-face meetings with Trump and DOE officials, including Perry and Brian McCormack, Perry's chief of staff.

FOR YOUR AFTERNOON RADAR: Three major scientific reports acknowledging manmade climate change are expected to be released today by the Trump administration, Pro's Emily Holden reports. They include: two volumes of the National Climate Assessment and a draft of the State of the Carbon Cycle Report. The documents will go against numerous public statements by Trump Cabinet officials refusing to accept mainstream climate science.

OIL'S TAX WIN: Along with keeping most of their existing incentives, multinational oil companies won a new tax break that would cost the government nearly $3.9 billion over the next decade in the latest GOP tax proposal. The House bill's elimination of a tax on "foreign base company oil related income" received relatively little attention in the initial flurry of tax-bill coverage Thursday, and it caught even some seasoned policy-watchers off guard. The tax typically applies to income from refineries, pipelines and other assets near multinational oil companies' overseas operations, according to a research note from ClearView Energy Partners. The industry has long complained that it is being treated unfairly compared to other types of industries, such as manufacturing. "FBCORI surprised us, but it appears to reinforce the pro-fossil bent of House Republican leadership," ClearView analysts wrote Thursday night.

Two thumbs up: The oil industry also loves the 20 percent corporate rate outlined in the proposal and is happy to see no changes to two provisions that favor its high-capital, low-operating-cost business model (the intangible drilling cost deduction and well depletion allowance, for those paying attention at home). Meanwhile, a pair of credits/deductions the House plan does jettison won't shave too much off the bottom line for most companies, industry folks tell ME. In a statement, API President Jack Gerard said "significant proposals, like lowering the corporate tax rate and strong cost-recovery provisions, will help ensure that our tax system is smart, fair and pro-growth to benefit American consumers, businesses, and the economy."

Horse-trading ahead: Release of the House bill is a starting point for tough negotiations in the weeks and months to come, in which energy provisions will, admittedly, play a relatively minor role. One House idea already encountering headwinds from the upper chamber is the proposal to slash the value of the production tax credit. "The wind energy production tax credit is already being phased out under a compromise brokered in 2015. It shouldn't be reopened," Sen. Chuck Grassley said in a statement. "I'm working within the Senate Finance Committee to see that the commitment made to a multi-year phase-out remains intact."

FULL HOUSE: For the first time in more than two years, when Phil Moeller left the agency, FERC is on the path to having all five leadership seats filled again. Kevin McIntyre, President Donald Trump's pick to lead the agency, and Democratic commissioner Rich Glick, were confirmed Thursday afternoon. The pair still need to be officially sworn in to seal the deal, but they're both locals so we expect them to take the oath pretty soon. McIntyre and Glick have terms running through 2023 and 2022, respectively.

The hot potato: FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee passes the baton. During Kentucky native's brief tenure in the agency's center seat, Perry lobbed — as former FERC Chairman Pat Wood has called it — "a scud missile of the NOPR" at regulators, directing them to act on a controversial plan to prop up coal and nuclear power plants. FERC is taking reply comments through Tuesday, and the agency is expected to stick to the Dec. 11 deadline to take some "final action." Given the particularly political lens FERC has been seen through over the past few months, FERC World will also be trying to read between the lines of McIntyre's staffing decisions and how he addresses the agency's independence.

Filling out DOE: The Senate sent Perry a few extra hands to run the Energy Department. Paul Dabbar and Mark Menezes were confirmed as undersecretaries of science and energy, respectively. Steven Winberg, Trump's pick to lead the agency's fossil energy office, also got a thumbs-up from lawmakers.

Attractions yet to come: William Wehrum's nomination to run EPA's air office may get a Senate floor vote as soon as next week after Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell filed cloture Thursday, Pro's Alex Guillén reports.

Oh, and: Trump announced late Thursday his nomination of Linda Capuano, a fellow at Rice University's Baker Institute for Public Policy's Center for Energy Studies, to run the Energy Information Administration. She's previously been a vice president at both Marathon Oil Co. and Advanced Energy Industries. Biography here.

SCIENCE CHAIRMAN CALLS IT QUILTS: Noting his House Science chairmanship runs out next year, Lamar Smith announced his retirement Thursday. Since ascending to the top of the science panel in 2013, the controversial Texan has tussled with academics, scientific organizations and government regulators, with Obama-era figures from the National Science Foundation, EPA and DOE among those who ended up in his crosshairs. The vocal climate science skeptic undermined the Obama administration's efforts to address climate change and elevated the minority of scientists who question that human activity drives the problem to equal footing as others. Pro's Darius Dixon has more here.

Smith's take: "The time is the right time. No regrets. Well, I should quote Frank Sinatra in 'My Way' where he said 'regrets I have a few but too few to mention,'" he told reporters.

Science organizations and green groups welcome his exit: Andrew Rosenberg with the Union of Concerned Scientists expressed hope his exit would allow the science community to rebuild its relationship with Congress. "I hope that the next representative to serve as chair will return this committee to its intended purpose—strengthening America's scientific enterprise, providing thoughtful and constructive oversight of federal policy and protecting the health and safety of the people Congress is supposed to serve," he said.

Who might the next chairman be? Current Vice Chairman Frank Lucas didn't rule out a bid to succeed Smith but noted Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling is also departing Congress. "Life's all about options, right?" he quipped to reporters.

IT'S LAW: Trump signed into law legislation S. 190 \(115\) that exempts certain equipment that needs to remain on at all times from energy use restrictions for an additional six years.

STOP ME IF YOU'VE HEARD THIS BEFORE: Two corn-state Republican EPW senators — Deb Fischer and Joni Ernst — are publicly undecided about Kathleen Hartnett White's nomination to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality after meeting with her over past critical comments toward the Renewable Fuel Standard. "I am withholding judgement right now," Fischer told reporters Thursday. A spokeswoman for Ernst said she plans to ask additional questions on White's views at her Nov. 8 confirmation hearing. Remember: Just one Republican defection sinks a nomination in the tightly divided EPW panel.

What has White said about the RFS? She has been far more vocally opposed than even Bill Wehrum, whose selection to run the air office was briefly delayed over the issue. Back in July 2013, she wrote: "It is time to repeal the renewable fuel standard — not to expand or entrench this market distortion." White also wrote its importance to the Iowa presidential caucuses explains the durability of the "counterproductive and ethically dubious" RFS in her book.

She's repeatedly argued biofuels are creating a "global food crisis" and urged Congress to end the program's "destructive food-as-fuel folly."

Fears of a repeat from some: Jim Inhofe told ME "there's reason to suspect" the bloc of biofuels backers might withhold support for White over her RFS stance and called their efforts to impede the Wehrum nomination "a little extreme." But Chairman John Barrasso, as always, projected confidence when asked if he worried they'd derail the confirmation process: "I'm committed to the president's nominees and we're going to go ahead with the hearing next week."

WITH SOME HELP FROM HIS FRIENDS: In the 24 hours before he sent his hotly anticipated national monument report to the White House, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke called just one non-GOP lawmaker — Maine Independent Sen. Angus King, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports, citing copies of Zinke's August and September calendars. Among those he called on Aug. 23 were Sens. Orrin Hatch, Dean Heller and Murkowski, Reps. Rob Bishop and Greg Walden, and the Republican governors of Utah, Maine and New Mexico.

Speaking of which, six green groups are suing Interior and the White House Council on Environmental Quality for copies of Zinke's national monuments report and related review records. The suit, filed Thursday by Earthjustice on behalf of the Sierra Club, Natural Resources Defense Council, The Wilderness Society and three other groups, say the agency has not responded to their public records requests.

MORE QUESTIONS ON WHITEFISH: Senate Homeland Security ranking member Claire McCaskill released a set of letters to FEMA, the Army Corps of Engineers and Whitefish Energy seeking additional information on the now-cancelled grid restoration contract. Among other things, she alleges the Puerto Rican utility may have already used FEMA funds to pay Whitefish, notes the Army Corps also considered using the tiny Montana-based company and questions a similar $200 million contract with Oklahoma-based Cobra Acquisitions.

9/11 invoked in EPA's Puerto Rican response: New York Rep. Jerry Nadler slammed EPA's assurances that drinking water around Superfund sites in Puerto Rico is safe to drink as "eerily similar" to the agency's response following the 9/11 terrorist attacks. "This is exactly what we got from EPA after 9/11... and thousands of people are sick and hundreds of people are dead because [air quality levels] weren't fine. And that's why I'm skeptical," he said. Video here.

MAIL CALL! GET SERIOUS ABOUT TRANSPORTATION-RELATED EMISSIONS: The New England Power Generators Association, along with several environmental and science groups, asked four governors — Massachusetts' Charlie Baker, Connecticut's Dan Malloy, Rhode Island's Gina Raimondo and Vermont's Phi Scott — to develop and implement a "regional, market-based policy" to address greenhouse gas emissions from the transportation sector. Letter link here.

Waiver please? Pennsylvania Gov. Tom Wolf asked Pruitt in a letter Thursday to waiver RFS volume requirements. "I request that you reduce the 2017 and 2018 volumes to a level that avoids the severe economic harm experienced by the Northeast region of the United States as a result of the high costs of purchasing RINs to comply with the RFS," he wrote.

Major climate science reports coming Friday Back

By Emily Holden | 11/02/2017 06:19 PM EDT

The Trump administration will release three major scientific reports on Friday acknowledging manmade climate change, according to a source familiar with the studies.

The U.S. Global Change Research Program will publish two volumes of the National Climate Assessment, which is required by law to be issued every four years and expected in late 2018. The first volume is a final version of the Climate Science Special Report. The second is a draft for public comment that focuses on impacts of climate change on humans and the environment.

USGCRP also will post a draft of the State of the Carbon Cycle Report, a supporting document.

An early version of the science report, published by the New York Times in August, found that human activity is the driving force behind increasing temperatures that are already intensifying extreme weather and causing sea-level rise.

The reports will contradict President Donald Trump and cabinet officials like EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Energy Secretary Rick Perry, who have expressed doubts about mainstream climate science. Some green advocates had worried the administration might suppress the research.

The source told POLITICO that the reports, which include the work of multiple agencies and are reviewed by outside scientists, are expected to stick to the science, avoiding discussions of politics or mitigation policies.

USGCRP was not available to comment.

House tax bill slashes value of wind energy tax credit Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/02/2017 02:20 PM EDT

The House tax bill released Thursday would substantially reduce the value of a key wind energy incentive, tighten requirements on what renewable energy companies have to do to qualify for tax credits, extend a nuclear energy tax break, and restore support for clean energy technologies that had been "orphaned" from an earlier tax extenders law.

The bill also eliminates an electric vehicle tax credit and jettisons some little-used oil industry tax breaks — as well as getting rid of the more significant domestic production tax deduction enjoyed by oil companies and other manufacturers.

The wind industry was quick to condemn the changes to its tax treatment.

"Despite comments to the contrary, this proposal reneges on the tax reform deal that was already agreed to, and would impose a retroactive tax hike on an entire industry," Tom Kiernan, CEO of the American Wind Energy Association, said in a statement. "The House proposal would pull the rug out from under 100,000 U.S. wind workers and 500 American factories, including some of the fastest growing jobs in the country. We expect members of the House and Senate to oppose any proposal that fails to honor that commitment, and we will fight hard to see that wind energy continues to work for America."

Here are some highlights from the text and a section-by-section summary provided by the Ways and Means committee.

— PTC cutbacks: The bill would reduce the value of the Production Tax Credit to 1.5 cents per kilowatt-hour, the level it was set at in 1992, rather than indexing it for inflation. That would reduce its value far beyond the terms of a tax credit phase-out that was implemented with bipartisan support in 2015. Wind farms and other eligible projects that begin construction this year can now claim a 1.9 cents/kWh credit, down from 2.3 cents/kWh for projects that started last year. The credit is scheduled to disappear for projects built after 2019 under current law, a schedule maintained in the House bill.

Developers also would face tougher requirements to claim the credit, the value of which is determined by when construction begins. The House bill requires a "continuous program of construction" until a facility comes online in order to qualify for the credit, eliminating provisions of existing law that allow developers to make "safe harbor" investments to qualify. The Joint Committee on Taxation says eliminating the inflation-adjustment and tightening the construction requirements will save $12.3 billion over 10 years, according to the bill summary.

— ITC repealed after 2027, orphan credits revived : The House bill extends the investment tax credit for a set of "orphaned" technologies left out of the 2015 legislation phasing out the ITC and PTC over five years. Fuel cells, small wind turbines, combined heat and power systems and microturbines can now claim the ITC until Jan. 1, 2022, with the credits phasing down at the same rate as the solar ITC. But what was to be a permanent 10 percent tax credit for solar investments will now terminate at the end of 2026. The House bill includes similar "continuous construction" requirements for the ITC as for the PTC. The changes would cost the government $1.2 billion in reduced revenues over 10 years, according to JCT estimates cited in the bill summary.

— Advanced nuclear tax credit extended: The bill extends a tax credit for advanced nuclear projects, allowing the secretary of Treasury to transfer unused credits after 2020, which was the in-service deadline under current law. The extension has long been a priority for South Carolina Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham and Tim Scott, among others. The credits would cost $400 million over 10 years.

— Utilities keep interest deduction: The bill would change how much loan interest some businesses can deduct from their taxes, while allowing them to take advantage of full expensing of capital investments. However, it excludes regulated utilities from the new rules, providing a win for the industry. Eric Grey, director of government relations for the Edison Electric Institute, a trade group, told POLITICO in September that losing the interest tax deduction was a major concern for utilities. Overall, JCT estimates the deduction-and-expensing changes would save the government $172 billion over 10 years.

— No more 199: The House bill would eliminate the domestic manufacturing credit known as section 199. Current law allows certain oil and gas companies to claim a 6 percent tax deduction, and other manufacturers can claim a 9 percent deduction, but the House bill would strip section 199 from the tax code starting next year. Doing so would save $95.2 billion over 10 years.

— Minor oil credits repealed: The bill repeals two small oil industry credits that have barely been used because they only kick in when commodity prices are low. Repealing the enhanced oil recovery credit would cost the government about $200 million over 10 years, while eliminating the marginal well production credit would have no effect on revenues.

— EVs lose credit: The bill repeals a $7,500 tax credit for electric vehicles. It is part of a slew of tax credits, along with a mortgage credit, and an adoption credit, that the bill proposes repealing. Repealing all of the credits would save $4 billion over 10 years, but the summary does not include a JCT estimate for the electric vehicle credit alone.

— Biodiesel, CCS missing: An expired biodiesel blenders credit was not restored, something likely to become an issue in the Senate where Sen. Chuck Grassley wants it revived as a producers credit; and a credit for carbon capture and sequestration did not get in the text, despite having bipartisan support.

Senate tees up Wehrum vote next week Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/02/2017 05:56 PM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell filed cloture today on William Wehrum's nomination to run EPA's air office, setting up a floor vote for as early as next week.

Wehrum's committee vote last week was held up briefly over a spat between corn-state Republicans and an EPA proposal to weaken biodiesel mandates. EPA subsequently promised not to roll back the mandates and Wehrum cleared committee on an 11-10 party-line vote.

It is not clear precisely when the Wehrum vote will occur.

McConnell also filed cloture on nominees to the Transportation Department, Justice Department and National Labor Relations Board. A vote on the DOJ nominee is slated for noon on Tuesday.

Lamar Smith won't seek reelection to House Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/02/2017 03:40 PM EDT

Rep. Lamar Smith, the controversial chairman of the House Science Committee, announced Thursday that he will leave Congress when his term ends in 2018.

The 16-term Texas Republican is one of the longest-serving members of the state's congressional delegation, and has often tussled with academics, scientific organizations and government regulators since become Science chairman in 2013. In a letter to constituents, Smith said there were several reasons he is choosing not to seek reelection next year, including that he will complete his term as chairman of the House Science Committee. Smith said he is looking forward to spending more time with his grandchildren, and "I hope to find other ways to stay involved in politics."

This year, Smith has been instrumental in resurfacing old allegations about Russian efforts to fund activists opposed to oil and gas drilling, an effort critics say is designed to distract from controversy over whether any members of President Donald Trump's campaign were involved with Russia's efforts to disrupt last year's election. On Tuesday, he wrote to executives at Facebook, Twitter and Alphabet requesting information about Russian purchases of anti-fracking ads on social media platforms.

Smith said he looks forward to staying busy.

"With over a year remaining in my term, there is still much to do," he wrote in the letter Thursday. "There is legislation to enact, dozens of hearings to hold, and hundreds of votes to cast."

During the Obama administration, officials at the National Science Foundation, the Environmental Protection Agency and the Energy Department all found themselves in Smith's cross-hairs. The 69-year-old lawmaker, who previously chaired the House Judiciary Committee, also made regular attempts to expand his committee's jurisdiction over cybersecurity to launch far-reaching probes targeting the New York Federal Reserve, Healthcare.gov and the companies that provided software to Hillary Clinton's email server.

He antagonized the broader science community when he touted a number of NSF grants as "frivolous" and sought to restructure how different areas of science were funded by the federal government.

Smith has also used his perch on the Science panel to undermine the Obama administration's efforts to address climate change, elevating several global warming skeptics to question the agreement among the vast majority of climate scientists that humans are the main driver of the phenomenon.

Smith's 21st District, which takes in parts of Austin and San Antonio as well as rural counties to the west, has been solidly Republican in the past. Mitt Romney won nearly 60 percent of the vote there in 2012.

But Trump got 52 percent to Hillary Clinton's 42 percent in the district in 2016, and several Democrats saw an opportunity to challenge Smith before he announced his retirement. One Democrat, veteran Joseph Kopser, outraised Smith in the third quarter and has over $219,000 in his campaign account.

"The people of Texas are losing a dedicated public servant and skilled legislator, but we are confident they will select another conservative Republican like Chairman Smith who shares their values," said National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Steve Stivers (R-Ohio).

Smith' relationship with Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, the top Democrat on the Science Committee and a fellow Texan, has been rocky for years. Both lawmakers are soft-spoken and have served together in Congress for more than two decades. But Johnson has accused Smith of bringing "disrepute to our institution" and turning his panel into "little more than an arm of the Republican National Committee," particularly when he started issuing subpoenas in 2013, the first in 21 years.

Smith has subpoenaed the EPA for health data used for clean air regulations, and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the suspicion that a scientific paper on climate change was mishandled.

Lamar Smith plows through criticism to create 'activist' Science Committee Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/12/2016 05:03 AM EDT

The escalating subpoena showdown between Rep. Lamar Smith and two state attorneys general is the culmination of a long-running effort by the Science chairman to assert unclaimed territory and turn a once-sleepy panel into an investigative powerhouse.

The Texas Republican, who took over as chairman of the House Science, Space and Technology Committee in 2013, has tried to shift federal science dollars toward basic research and away from ambitious efforts to reshape the energy system that he feels the private sector should be tackling instead. But Smith has earned more attention for a series of confrontations with scientists, activists and public officials that have raised the public profile of what has traditionally been a B-list committee.

Smith accuses the Obama administration and environmental activists of politicizing scientists' findings about climate change in an effort to expand the size of government and more aggressively regulate businesses. Democrats say Smith is doing the bidding of his donors in the fossil fuel industry to shield companies from having to pay to reduce their carbon emissions.

The National Science Foundation, NOAA, EPA and the Energy Department all have found themselves in Smith's crosshairs, and the 69-year-old lawmaker has seized on his jurisdiction over cybersecurity to launch far-reaching probes targeting the New York Federal Reserve, Healthcare.gov and the companies that provided software to Hillary Clinton's email server.

When Congress reconvenes next month, Smith will have to decide whether to escalate his showdown with the AGs of New York and Massachusetts, both of whom rejected subpoenas from Smith seeking records related to their own investigations into whether ExxonMobil misled the public about climate change. Smith also has subpoenaed several nonprofit groups who worked with the AGs. The chairman acknowledges his request is likely unprecedented but says his goal is to protect scientists from political interference.

"It's bigger than Exxon. It's the whole idea of trying to silent dissent and trying to silent what I consider to be legitimate scientific skepticism maybe," Smith told POLITICO last month in a wide-ranging interview in his personal office. "But they clearly are trying to intimidate individuals and trying to stop them from claiming that the science is not settled and that's about as basic as it comes when you talk about academic freedom, scientific right of speech or whatever."

Smith's critics argue that it's the chairman who is guilty of using intimidation tactics.

"He's using the chairmanship of the Science Committee, in my view, not only in a very partisan way but as a political tool, not really in consultation with or listening to the science community," said Andrew Rosenberg, a former regional administrator at NOAA and professor of natural resources at the University of New Hampshire.

"He's basically turned the entire discussion around the Exxon issue on its head," added Rosenberg, who now directs the Center for Science and Democracy with the Union of Concerned Scientists, which is refusing to comply with a subpoena from Smith. "That somehow we, the Union of Concerned Scientists and other organizations and state attorneys general, are trying to stifle scientific speech when in fact what we are saying is that Exxon did that — they suppressed the science that they had internally."

Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, a fellow Texan, has excoriated Smith's work from her post as the panel's top Democrat.

Both lawmakers are soft-spoken and have served together in Congress for more than two decades, which makes her criticism all the more biting. In a series of dismissive letters and statements challenging his various investigations, Johnson has accused Smith of bringing "disrepute to our institution" and turning his panel into "little more than an arm of the Republican National Committee."

Johnson first felt that Smith was veering off-course in 2013 when he issued the committee's first subpoena in 21 years, hoping to get the EPA to turn over health data it used for its clean air regulations even though the agency said the information belonged to Harvard and the American Cancer Society.

Last year, Smith subpoenaed records from NOAA under the suspicion that a scientific paper refuting a widely touted "hiatus" in global warming was mishandled because it did not incorporate satellite data. Smith accused the agency of relying on "clearly cherry-picked" data to produce "politically correct science." Smith says an anonymous whistleblower told the committee the paper was rushed and the episode has made him question the peer review process at Science, which has long enjoyed a reputation as one of the most respected journals.

NOAA says the paper's nine authors did not incorporate satellite measurements because they were studying a dataset of land stations, ships and buoys at sea, and 23 former NOAA scientists, who have collectively worked under every president since Richard Nixon, say Smith's charge is baseless. Moreover, after corrections were made to satellite data this spring, they too refuted the hiatus, although there's still debate over the degree of warming. There also haven't been any complaints filed with NOAA's anonymous scientific integrity system, the agency said.

Smith's critics say the episode exemplifies the chilling effect that such inquiries can have on the scientific community.

"Anybody can look at the paper, the methods and the data, and the results. And they can disagree with them or can come up with a different analysis — knock yourself out. That's the scientific process," Rosenberg said. "Now, we're going to investigate somebody's emails because you didn't like the answer? Tell them to take a month out of their time, compile everything you've ever written with the word 'climate' in it? That's not supporting the science work of the country."

Given the long odds of Democrats flipping control of the House next year, Smith is likely to return to his post, where he is eligible for one more term as chairman under party rules and could try to stretch his portfolio even further.

"Certainly, we are taking initiatives that haven't been taken on before, but I feel like I'm in Congress to do more than just vote," Smith said in the interview. "I want to maximize the potential of the committee, simple as that. And one way to maximize the potential is to explore the jurisdiction that we have."

Those following the Science Committee scratched their heads when Smith pinged the New York Fed about a Bangladeshi "cyberheist." subpoenaed Healthcare.gov, and sent letters to companies involved with the server Hillary Clinton used while secretary of State.

But the Science Committee has jurisdiction over federal cybersecurity programs as well as cyber standards developed by the National Institute of Standards and Technology.

People weren't thinking about cybersecurity 15 years ago, said David Stonner, who led NSF's congressional affairs for 16 years. "And the fact that it has become a huge issue opens the door for whoever on the Hill wants to be responsible for oversight of this issue, rather than oversight of just an agency."

Smith says he takes a special point of pride in all the buzz around the committee's work.

"I will say that one of my goals when I became chairman was to make the committee a committee that attracted members — that people wanted to be a part of what we were doing," Smith said. When he took over the panel, he said, it was the first time in 20 years that there were more Republican lawmakers who wanted to be on the committee than there were spots for.

Rep. Randy Weber, a two-term Texas Republican who chairs a Science subcommittee, was attracted to Smith's panel by an opportunity to represent his constituents who work at NASA's nearby Johnson Space Center and to scrutinize activities across the federal government.

"Chairman Smith does a great job attracting new members, because he gives every member an opportunity to take a leading role in committee action," Weber said in an emailed statement. Smith, he added, "consistently reinforces the principle of good governance and fiscal responsibility over the federal agencies the committee oversees."

Johnson, on the other hand, is convinced that Smith has driven the committee off the reservation.

"I don't expect that we're going to agree on everything. But it's really not a political committee," said Johnson, who has served on the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee in addition to the science panel over her nearly 24 years in Congress. "For the most part I'd bragged for all these years that I was on two committees that didn't get into the politics and would stick to the issues. ... I can no longer say that."

For all his activism, Smith is not one to display a bombastic personality. He doesn't raise his voice and says that he doesn't let the many critiques of his leadership sink in.

Oddly enough, Smith has an unlikely advocate on the Science Committee: Rep. Alan Grayson, a controversial left-wing Senate candidate uninhibited in his criticisms of Republicans.

"The chairman is a fair-minded, honest person," the Florida Democrat said of Smith. "In his heart he is a legislator, not an ideologue."

Smith appears to be a man who truly loves science — he draws inspiration from an "ultra-deep" field photograph of galaxies taken by the Hubble Space Telescope hanging near his desk, and talks fondly of taking physics and astronomy in college — but the Texan is considerably out of step with the larger science community on climate change.

He considers himself a "climate skeptic" who wants more detail in the science behind global warming — a position that distinguishes him from someone like GOP presidential nominee Donald Trump, who dismisses the issue as a hoax.

"I think human activity does have an impact on climate," Smith said. "I don't think we know exactly how much of an impact and I think that is a separate legitimate debate despite what some people might suggest."

To Smith, in clamoring for government programs to reduce carbon emissions, policymakers have lost faith in technology.

"Throughout our nation's history technology has always solved our problems and why suddenly now we don't think technology will solve our problems, I don't know," he said, adding that he supports more spending on R&D for "coming up with technological breakthroughs to address climate change."

Alongside his battle with NOAA, Smith ruffled feathers in the broader science community when he touted a number of NSF grants as "frivolous."

"The purpose of the science committees should be to help research progress, to get the barriers out of the way, not to generate barriers," said Rush Holt, a physicist and former Democratic congressman who is the CEO for the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Holt, who said he didn't have "personal bone to pick" with Smith, said, "it was not lost on the science community that the House Science Committee, several times in the couple of years, has substituted political opinion for peer review."

Basic R&D is the bread-and-butter issue of the Science Committee, and Smith's support of it isn't unusual for a Republican. But he still managed to ruffle the ranks of the science community last year in his efforts to renew the America COMPETES Act, a major piece of research legislation. The bill cut spending levels for renewables and earth science, parceled out funds depending on preferred fields and would require NSF grants to include an explanation of why they're in the "national interest."

Smith and his staff say that Congress has a responsibility to set priorities, and to some degree believe previous Science committee leaders have treated the science community with kid gloves even though most of them are accepting taxpayer cash.

"I think that there was initially pushback by academics and other researchers because they weren't used to anybody conducting any kind of oversight as to how the taxpayer dollars were being spent," Smith said. "And I consider that ... to be my obligation and responsibility."

A member of Smith's staff put it more bluntly: "Back in the good old days, very often, chairmen of the Science Committee were shoveling gold off the stagecoach. We're not in that era right now. We're in an era of very tight fiscal constraints and in general, if you can maintain the fraction of the federal spending dollars that basic research gets, it's a win every year."

Lamar Smith won't seek reelection to House Back

Calendar: Zinke primarily called GOP lawmakers, governors ahead of sending monuments report Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/02/2017 07:20 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke called mostly Republican lawmakers and governors the day before he sent his national monument report to the White House, according to copies of Zinke's August and September calendars the Interior Department released today.

Zinke's calls on Aug. 23 included Sens. Lisa Murkowski, Orrin Hatch and Dean Heller, Reps. Rob Bishop and Greg Walden, and the governors of Utah, Maine and New Mexico, among others. Sen. Angus King (I-Maine) was the only non-Republican to receive a call that day, less than 24 hours before Zinke submitted his draft monument recommendations. Zinke met earlier in the month with Democratic Sens. Ron Wyden and Jeff Merkley.

White House officials involved in the monument discussions included energy advisor Mike Catanzaro, Intergovernmental Affairs Director Justin Clark, Domestic Policy Council Director Andrew Bromberg, Cabinet Secretary Bill McGinley and White House deputy chief of staff Rick Dearborn, according to Zinke's calendar entries.

The calendar also showed that Zinke was off for two weeks earlier in August, just before the report was due. The secretary's wife, Lolita, posted photos to social media of the couple vacationing in the Mediterranean, drawing flak from critics who said he was not sufficiently focused on the monument review.

Only a few meetings were listed in August and September involving energy issues including one with oil and gas exploration company Hilcorp Energy CEO Jeffrey Hildebrand and some on more general topics such as sage grouse in early August and another on "solar emphasis areas" in early September.

NEW DAY IN DRILLING: The Interior Department is preparing to offer the largest lease sales in years, if not decades, that could open waters in the mid-Atlantic, off Florida's west coast and possibly even areas of the Pacific for offshore oil and gas drilling, two sources who conferred with the agency in recent weeks tell ME. Bloomberg reports the Trump administration's new five-year drilling plan would run from 2019 to 2024 and could open Atlantic waters to drilling. The plan, which would replace and extend beyond the Obama-era drilling plan that ran through 2022, is expected to be music to the energy sector's ears and starkly opposed by the environmental community.

Timing for the release remains in flux. ME hears from multiple sources that the roll out, slated for today, had been placed on hold without any reason being provided and without word on when it might be rescheduled. Interior declined to directly respond to whether the announcement had been shelved for now. One thing to watch whenever the plan emerges is whether it seeks to reopen drilling off the coast of Florida. Congress imposed a moratorium on that back in 2006, but that moratorium ends in 2022 and this plan would go beyond then.

PERRY'S RAISING EYEBROWS: The tone of Energy Secretary Rick Perry's letter giving FERC more time to consider his proposal to address the nation's grid resiliency by boosting coal and nuclear facilities is raising concerns from some observers who worry about the energy regulator's independence in overseeing the nation's wholesale power markets, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. "It's sort of odd for the commissioners to feel like DOE is holding the stopwatch on the commission's process," said a former Obama official.

Some thought FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre could simply have declared that the agency needed more time rather than explicitly asking Perry for it. Other energy attorneys thought Perry's power assertion — he wrote, "It is solely within my authority ... to grant an extension" — could have been part of an effort to save face. Heather Curlee, an attorney at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati who serves as federal regulatory counsel to the Solar Energy Industries Association, told Eric: "There's a power in a public concession, allowing another person to publicly to say, 'Clearly I'm the one in charge and this is all a grand plan.'" With the extension, FERC will now decide by Jan. 10 to adopt the rule, reject it, rewrite it or send it out for study, among other options.

MAKE OUR PLANET GREAT AGAIN? Leaders, moguls, celebrities, activists and more descend on the French capital today to mark the second anniversary of the Paris climate agreement. There will be plenty of photo ops and inspirational rhetoric, but French President Emmanuel Macron hopes the One Planet Summit will add financial meat to the bones of the landmark accord. Expect new and expanding coalitions and initiatives, particularly aimed at shoring up financial aid, peaking emissions, ditching coal and helping countries already coping with the effects of climate change.

In a Monday interview with CBS News, Macron said Trump's decision to withdraw from the Paris accord actually boosted momentum for climate action and slammed the U.S. withdrawal. "It's extremely aggressive to decide on its own just to leave, and no way to push the others to renegotiate because one decided to leave the floor," the French president said. "I'm sorry to say that. It doesn't fly."

Opening the funding spigots: Nearly 1,200 companies aim to align their emissions reduction plans with the Paris agreement by 2019, and 118 have committed to get all of their electricity from renewables (enough demand to power Ukraine), the We Mean Business Coalition announced today. In addition, 54 global companies from different industries put out a joint call on Monday for framework conditions that lay the foundation for a pathway toward limiting the temperature rise to well below 2 degrees Celsius. Domestically, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation said Monday that it will donate $600 million over a five-year period from 2018 to 2023 to nonprofits working on climate change solutions. And former New York mayor Michael Bloomberg will announce that 237 companies, with a combined market capitalization of over $6.3 trillion, have committed to voluntary recommendations on climate disclosures.

MORE DISCLOSURE FROM EXXON: In a Monday SEC filing, Exxon said it would begin releasing more information on the potential impact of climate change on its operations "in the near future." Those additional disclosures will include "energy demand sensitivities, implications of 2 degree Celsius scenarios and positioning for a lower-carbon future," according to the company.

FIRST MOVE ON CPP REPLACEMENT: An advance notice of proposed rulemaking seeking public comment on potential proposals to replace the Clean Power Plan will be released by EPA "in the upcoming weeks," Pro's Alex Guillén reports, citing a Monday court filing. The agency said the notice will "solicit information on systems of emission reduction that are in accord with the legal interpretation that has been proposed by EPA" and that the agency is still "considering the scope of any potential new rule."

NEW ENERGY NOMINEE NAMED: Trump announced his selection of Lisa Gordon-Hagerty of Virginia to be DOE's under secretary for nuclear security. Gordon-Hagerty has held a wide variety of jobs in Washington, including director of DOE's Office of Emergency Response and a five-year stint on the White House National Security Council staff. She now runs a national security consulting company.

ICYMI, judges on the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals appeared skeptical a case brought by children seeking dramatic government action against greenhouse gas emissions could prevail but seemed inclined to let it proceed to a trial phase, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. ON THE CALENDAR: Georgia's Public Service Commission will now vote Dec. 21 whether to allow construction to continue at the troubled nuclear project plant Vogtle, WABE reports. Westinghouse, the lead contractor on the project, went bankrupt earlier this year and the cost of construction has doubled. "Whether our decision leads to the cancellation of this project, or that we agree to the owner's recommendation to go forward and complete the project with conditions, it is important that we move forward this year, before the end of the year," Public Service Commission Chairman Stan Wise said. A decision from the commission had initially been scheduled for February.

PERMITTING PROCESSES UNDER THE MICROSCOPE: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee takes a look this morning at "opportunities to improve the efficiency, transparency, and accountability" of permitting from Interior and FERC for energy and resource infrastructure projects. Witnesses include: Jim Cason, associate deputy secretary at Interior, and Terry Turpin, director of the Office of Energy Projects at FERC. Watch here.

Before that, lawmakers will vote on the nominations of Linda Capuano to run the Energy Information Administration and Timothy R. Petty's selection to be assistant secretary for water and science at Interior.

SEEKING LONG-TERM HELP: New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo and Puerto Rico Gov. Ricardo Rosselló chided Washington for its languid response to the ongoing crisis on the devastated island, POLITICO New York's David Giambusso reports. "I believe there has been a disregard for the people of Puerto Rico because it's Puerto Rico and because they're Puerto Ricans," Cuomo said, flanked by Rosselló and members of New York's congressional delegation. Cuomo later released recommendations for how to rebuild Puerto Rico's electric grid that he said would make it "more resilient, efficient, advanced and less dependent on fossil fuel imports."

BUTTERFLIES AGAINST BORDER WALL: The non-profit North American Butterfly Association filed a lawsuit Monday against the Trump administration that argues it failed to meet constitutional requirements with preparations to build a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border. The lawsuit, filed in D.C. District Court, contends that federal authorities plan to build the wall through the association's 100-acre butterfly center in South Texas without adequate compensation. "Proposed border wall construction would cut off two-thirds of the Butterfly Center, effectively destroying it and leaving behind a 70-acre no-man's land between the proposed border wall and the Rio Grande," the lawsuit argues. The plaintiffs also claim the wall preparations have violated environmental laws, and that construction could jeopardize the lives of threatened and endangered species. Read the complaint here.

ALL TALK, NO ACTION? Consumers talk a good game about forswearing gasoline-powered vehicles in favor of ones powered by alternative fuels, but their actions don't back up those boasts, according to a new report from Fuels Institute. Among the reasons consumers ultimately don't pull the trigger on alternative fuel vehicles: low gas prices, lack of battery charging infrastructure, range anxiety and battery replacement costs. Axing the electric vehicle tax credit in the tax package (as the House-passed version did) would pose additional challenges to swift deployment of the new technologies, it notes. Link here.

Perry's FERC letter raises eyebrows Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/11/2017 06:55 PM EDT

The urgent tone taken by Energy Secretary Rick Perry in his letter to FERC granting more time to consider his power market plan is raising eyebrows among some observers who are concerned about the energy regulator's independence in overseeing the nation's wholesale power markets.

The letter from Perry to FERC agreeing to give the agency another 30 days to develop a final action on his proposed rule to support coal-fired and nuclear power plants emphasized Perry's authority to grant an extension to the independent agency, while also noting that the Energy Department is reviewing its options for helping those plants on its own.

"If the commission fails to adopt the proposal within the original deadline ... the security of our nation's electric grid will continue to be at risk," the letter reads.

But many opponents of the plan say Perry's proposal to ensure the power grid's resilience is misguided, since power outages due to fuel shortages are extremely rare, and his effort appears designed to help a small number of companies, including coal producer Murray Energy. And the tight timeline he is pushing would be far faster than FERC's typical process.

"It's sort of odd for the commissioners to feel like DOE is holding the stopwatch on the commission's process," said a former Obama official. "Perry is continuing to assert his prerogative to control the stop watch for a process that should be FERC's process."

Perry's letter invoked Section 403 of the Department of Energy Reorganization Act, which grants him the authority to propose a rule and demand a final action, but most observers agree that DOE can't force the commission to take any action. Even President Donald Trump's authority over the agency is limited to nominating commissioners naming its chairman.

The rule proposed by DOE in October would establish payments to power plants that maintain 90 days of fuel on site. Perry had pressed FERC to take action on it by Monday, but FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre requested a delay on Thursday, his first day in the new job. With the extension, FERC will now decide by Jan. 10 to adopt the rule, reject it, rewrite it, or send it out for study, among other options.

Some observers say that McIntyre didn't need to consult with Perry, and could simply have stated that the agency needed more time. Still, Perry's letter asserted he had the right to control the clock.

"It is solely within my authority under Section 403 to grant an extension of time for final action," Perry said in the letter.

The letter also says that DOE will make use of that same time to "continue to examine all options within my authority ... and any authorities to take remedial action as necessary to ensure the security of the nation's electric grid."

That reference could indicate DOE was considering using its emergency authority under the Federal Power Act to keep certain power plants running indefinitely, though administration sources have previously told POLITICO the Trump administration would not use that authority in such an unprecedented manner.

FERC Commissioner Neil Chatterjee, who has been a supporter of Perry's efforts to support coal-fired power plants, told reporters on Monday he wasn't concerned about the agency's independence.

"I've been pretty adamant that FERC has a history of independence and will continue to remain independent," he said. "If you look at the way we're handling it, we're doing it the way FERC always does it: Fact-based, data-based, and through the record. This has not been a political process, and pressure from DOE, pressure from the administration is not a factor in this."

Other energy lawyers said McIntyre's letter to Perry seeking additional time may have been part of a subtle political maneuver to help Perry save face.

"At the end of the day it's a power game," said Heather Curlee, an attorney at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati who serves as federal regulatory counsel to the Solar Energy Industries Association. "There's a power in a public concession, allowing another person to publicly to say, 'Clearly I'm the one in charge and this is all a grand plan.'"

A DOE spokeswoman said Perry respects FERC's authority as an independent agency. "He also recognizes that FERC is the body charged with addressing these policy and market issues and he looks forward to action in the coming weeks," Shaylyn Hynes said in an email.

Republican former FERC Commissioner Tony Clark didn't see anything alarming in the letter.

"I read the letter as the Secretary making a case for his proposal and expressing some impatience, but I wouldn't necessarily equate that to infringing on FERC's independence," he told POLITICO in an email. "The text of sec. 403 provides that the secretary can propose a rule and set reasonable timelines for action, but after that, FERC can basically do whatever it feels appropriate given applicable statutes and the record before it."

EPA to release advance notice for Clean Power Plan replacement in 'upcoming weeks'

Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/11/2017 06:29 PM EDT

EPA plans to release its advance notice of proposed rulemaking seeking public comment on potential proposals to replace the Clean Power Plan "in the upcoming weeks," the agency said in a court filing today.

The ANPR will "solicit information on systems of emission reduction that are in accord with the legal interpretation that has been proposed by EPA," the filing added.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt last week indicated at a congressional hearing that EPA will write a replacement rule of some sort, a shift from EPA's past position that it would also consider writing no replacement rule at all.

Today's filing, however, says that EPA is still "considering the scope of any potential new rule."

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will hold further public hearings on its proposed repeal of the Clean Power Plan in three states, although it has not yet set dates.

Judges appear skeptical of stopping kids' climate lawsuit early Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/11/2017 02:51 PM EDT

Two appellate judges today hinted they believe a lawsuit brought by children seeking dramatic government action against greenhouse gas emissions should be allowed to continue, even as they raised significant questions about whether the suit can succeed.

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments today after the Trump administration asked it to take the unusual step of blocking the matter from reaching a trial phase. The Trump administration says the children do not have standing to bring the lawsuit.

But two of the 9th Circuit judges expressed skepticism at the unprecedented step of getting involved at this stage.

Judge Marsha Berzon, a Clinton appointee, said the suit is troublingly broad, but acknowledged that lawsuits are often narrowed at trial. "I would hope if this case did go forward that it would be pared down and focused and directed at particular orders or agencies," said Berzon.

Chief Judge Sidney Thomas, another Clinton appointee, said stopping the case now would mean the court would be "flooded" with similar requests for all kinds of suits.

Meanwhile, Judge Alex Kozinski, a Reagan appointee, appeared skeptical of the case's future, opining about what would happen if the Trump administration defied a court order to act and questioning the children's standing to sue.

Thomas also raised concerns about whether the children can plausibly seek relief over such a complex issue. Their attorney argued that courts have ordered the government to take wide-ranging action before, as with school desegregation.

WHAT'S NEXT: If the 9th Circuit lets the suit move forward, discovery will resume and a new trial date will be set, likely for sometime next year.

EPA will review 2021 auto emissions rule alongside later years Back

By Alex Guillén | 08/10/2017 04:43 PM EDT

EPA will expand its review of 2022-2025 model year vehicle greenhouse gas emissions standards to include 2021 model year standards, the agency announced today.

The development mirrors a reconsideration of that year's fuel economy standards by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. NHTSA must set its Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards in blocks of up to five years, meaning it is only just starting to write rules for 2022-2025, and the agency said last month that it will also review its rule for 2021.

Because NHTSA is reviewing its own 2021 standard, EPA will do the same, according to a pre-publication notice signed today by EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao. It asks for input on the "availability and effectiveness of technology," costs and impacts on consumers, auto manufacturers and automobile safety, among other things.

EPA announced earlier this year that it will reopen the midterm review of the 2022-2025 standards after the Obama administration, in its final days in office, certified those standards as achievable. EPA has until April 1, 2018, to decide whether to weaken or keep those standards.

Any change to EPA's standards, either for 2021 or for the midterm review period of 2022-2025, would require a formal rulemaking process and would be open to legal challenges.

WHAT'S NEXT: The agencies will take public comments for 45 days once the notice is published in the Federal Register.

PEER-REVIEWED STUDY FINDS EXXON MISLED ON CLIMATE: Harvard researchers are out this morning with a peer-reviewed analysis concluding Exxon Mobil misled the public over the course of 40 years of climate change communications. After poring over its scientific research, internal company memos, and paid, editorial-style advertisements, the study concluded that 83 percent of Exxon scientists' peer-reviewed papers and 80 percent of the company's internal communications acknowledged climate science — but just 12 percent of its advertisements did so, and 81 percent actually doubted human activity's role in the problem.

"We conclude that ExxonMobil misled the public," the report concludes. "We stress that the question is not whether ExxonMobil 'suppressed climate change research,' but rather how they communicated about it." The study, supported by Harvard University Faculty Development Funds and by the Rockefeller Family Fund, acknowledges "textual analysis is inherently subjective" but says the overall trends are "clear." The findings will be published in the journal Environmental Research Letters.

Exxon, which did not have advance access to the study, did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Tuesday night. A spokesman for the fossil fuel giant previously said allegations from environmental groups it misled the public and investors on climate change were based on "distorted reports that they have commissioned and a distorted history of climate research that we've done openly with government bodies."

MONUMENT DECISIONS IMMINENT: Rumors are swirling around Washington that Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke may send over his verdict as soon as today on what to do with the nearly two dozen national monuments the White House put up for review. The House Natural Resources Democratic staff released a report complaining Zinke used a secretive review process, obscuring the true purpose was to open up lands for fossil fuel development. "If President Trump and Secretary Zinke don't listen, then the courts and the voters will teach them that our public lands are not industry playthings to dispose of as they see fit," Ranking member Raul Grijalva said in a statement.

Religious leaders weigh in: A group of Christian leaders sent Vice President Mike Pence a letter Tuesday urging the administration to "not rescind or rollback any designations" of the national monuments currently under consideration. They called the Antiquities Act an "important tool" for "protecting the special places of God's Creation where we play, pray and learn."

Irony alert: During an interview with Fox News' "Fox and Friends," Pence said he was in favor of building more monuments around the country rather than tearing down existing ones. "I'm someone who believes in more monuments, not less monuments," he said in response to questions about whether statues commemorating the Confederacy should be removed. We'll see if that desire to preserve monuments extends to ones designated by other presidents. Remember Zinke already preliminarily suggested shrinking Utah's Bears Ears National Monument back in April.

DO YOUR DUTIES: Biodiesel shipments from Argentina and Indonesia will face import duties after the National Biodiesel Board notched up an early victory in a trade case from the Commerce Department Tuesday, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. In light of the preliminary ruling, Argentine and Indonesian companies will have to pay a cash deposit on shipments to the U.S. to cover potential future penalties. The Commerce Department will now take comment on the preliminary ruling and then issue a final decision likely next year. Here are the decisions on Argentina and Indonesian biodiesel.

RIN-sanity: The price for credits in biodiesel jumped 8 cents on the news, to $1.17, the oil tracking service OPIS tells ME. Biodiesel credits are critical for refiners who need to buy them to comply with the Renewable Fuel Standard. EPA requires more ethanol blending than happens in reality, and some refiners buy the biodiesel credits to make up the difference. The ruling from Commerce has now raised their compliance costs.

MORE MURKOWSKI INTRIGUE: Zinke's July calendar, which the agency released Tuesday, was relatively light compared to prior months on meetings with energy industry interests. But it did provide further evidence that the secretary may have pressed Alaska Sen. Dan Sullivan on July 26 over Sen. Lisa Murkowski's vote on the healthcare bill, something the secretary has not denied doing. Hours before calling Sullivan that day, Zinke had a number of White House meetings and calls, including with Vice President Mike Pence, then-White House chief strategist Steve Bannon and Trump's top energy aide Mike Catanzaro. Zinke's calendar did not include a call with Murkowski, but the senator has said they did talk that day.

Zinke's July calendar also included a meeting with President Donald Trump's daughter-in-law Lara Trump on wild horses and animal welfare issues and a call with a number of lawmakers on both sides of the aisle, including Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee ranking Democrat Maria Cantwell.

Fascinating tidbit: From an excellent New York Times report on the simmering feud between Trump and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell: "Senator Lisa Murkowski of Alaska told colleagues that when Mr. Trump's interior secretary threatened to pull back federal funding for her state, she felt boxed in and unable to vote for the health care bill." Back in late July, Murkowski told the Alaska Dispatch News that Zinke's forceful call didn't sway her vote on the healthcare bill.

FIRSTENERGY'S TOUGH SELL: FirstEnergy Solutions, a unit of FirstEnergy Corp., wanted the federal government to use its emergency powers to save coal plants that teetered on the edge of insolvency — saving some of Trump supporter Robert Murray's coal mines that supply fuel for the plants — but it had a major problem: The power from the plants isn't deemed especially critical. The federal government has authority to keep plants open when crucial to local supplies, but PJM Interconnection, which manages the largest grid in the country, has plenty of power. In an April letter, the grid operator told Ohio Governor John Kasich that thanks to its capacity market, which pays power plants to remain on standby even if they don't run, it had 6 percent more power on reserve than it needed. The letter also said the operator maintained a robust process for managing retirements, and that typically new plants could come in to replace older ones.

That badly undermined FirstEnergy's position, as did the fact that the company asked for a three-year commitment to keep the plants operating. Normally the authority granted under section 202 of the Federal Power Act is used for short periods when there's an unexpected disruption, like when in April lightning struck a plant in Oklahoma, creating a need to change how nearby transmission operated for a few months. Keeping the plants open for so long would entail paying their owners to stay available — which presumably was FirstEnergy's point, but it adds costs for PJM and its ratepayers.

ICYMI: Pro's Alex Guillén and Eric Wolff look at how two wealthy backers of Trump — coal magnate Robert Murray and Wall Street billionaire Carl Icahn — failed to get their policy priorities turned into action despite the president's backing. Murray's failure to get DOE to use its emergency powers to force some Rust Belt coal-fired power plants to stay open, and Icahn's earlier inability to convince EPA to alter its ethanol rule, show the limits of trying to circumvent the federal bureaucracy even with a sympathetic ear in 1600 Pennsylvania.

INSIDE TRUMP WORLD'S NAFTA STRUGGLES: The Trump administration is grappling with its position on an investor-state dispute settlement mechanism in NAFTA, ratcheting up concerns among businesses eager to see the U.S. make a clear commitment to continue with the controversial provision as it has in past trade deals, according to sources with knowledge of the deliberations. The controversial international arbitration mechanism allows private companies to seek damages from government actions that violate their investment rights under a trade deal. Business groups, particularly in the oil and gas sector, have launched a full-court press on Hill offices to request that they put pressure on the administration to include the dispute provision. One lobbyist source said the energy sector's support of a modernized NAFTA deal hinges directly on the inclusion of ISDS.

Speaking of which, Trump on Tuesday night in Phoenix: "I think we'll probably end up terminating NAFTA at some point."

DEVIL'S IN THE DETAILS, GUYS: Trump's administration may seek to secure stakes in Afghanistan's vast mineral deposits — estimated at $1 trillion by one U.S. government report — as a way to offset ongoing military costs there, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. "We're looking at all those types of options," a senior White House adviser said. Analysts caution extracting and processing tons of minerals from a war zone and then transporting them out of a country with little modern infrastructure won't be happening anytime soon.

MARK YOUR CALENDAR: A coal industry source tell ME the Energy Department's big grid study will finally be released on Thursday.

DAKOTA ACCESS COMPANY SUES 'ECO-TERRORIST' GROUPS: Energy Transfer Partners, the owner of the Dakota Access pipeline, filed a lawsuit Tuesday against Greenpeace International and Earth First!, asserting they worked to spread misinformation about the project and damage the company, Diamond Naga Siu reports. The federal racketeering lawsuit alleges the groups launched "attacks [that] were calculated and thoroughly irresponsible, causing enormous harm to people and property along the pipeline's route."

In response, Greenpeace USA General Counsel Tom Wetterer bashed the filing as the second "meritless" lawsuit filed against them by the law firm led by Trump's former personal attorney Marc Kasowitz. And Earthjustice President Trip Van Noppen called the lawsuit "an unprovoked and malicious attack on those who would use the power of the law and free speech for good."

EPA IG TO REVIEW TSCA DATA REPORTING: EPA's inspector general has begun an inquiry into chemical data reporting under the reformed Toxic Substances Control Act, according to a newly posted memo. The reformed law requires chemical makers and importers to give EPA key data about those chemicals used to review potential risks, and to update that data every four years. Investigators will look specifically at "how the EPA is ensuring that companies are compliant" and whether EPA is using that data to prioritize which chemicals to review for health and environmental risks.

PELOSI, OTHERS TALK MARINE MONUMENTS: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Reps. Jared Huffman and Jackie Speier, and others are hosting a public forum today at the Bay Model Visitor Center in Sausalito, Calif. on protecting national marine sanctuaries and monuments. As a reminder, Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross has until Oct. 25 to send Trump a report on the potential for offshore fossil fuel production, among other things, in 11 marine national monuments and sanctuaries. Members of the public will have an opportunity to comment at the event, which kicks off at 10:30 a.m. PST and can be streamed here.

MAIL CALL! PUMP THE BRAKES ON LNG EXPORTS: The Industrial Energy Consumers of America sent a letter Tuesday to the Trump administration asking for a moratorium on additional approvals of natural gas exports. "If we export too much LNG, prices will eventually rise to global levels," Paul Cicio, the manufacturing group's president, wrote. "At that point, foreign nations demand for LNG will dictate what price Americans pay. This is certainly not in the interests of the American public."

ELECTRIC CONTRACTORS OPPOSE SUNIVA PETITION: The National Electrical Contractors Association sent a letter to the International Trade Commission Tuesday opposing an effort from Suniva and SolarWorld to have imported solar cells or panels slapped with steep tariffs. "We believe the proposed remedies will significantly harm American manufacturers of solar parts and panels and ultimately crush demand for solar installations nationwide," the group wrote.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

Exxon scrambles to contain climate crusade Back

By Andrew Restuccia | 05/09/2016 05:28 AM EDT

On Nov. 3, ExxonMobil dispatched its top lobbyists to Capitol Hill on an urgent mission — tamping down an escalating campaign aimed at making the country's largest oil company pay a legal and political price for its role in warming the planet.

The meeting marked a striking shift in Exxon's handling of the controversy. The notion of holding oil companies responsible for global warming, in the same way tobacco companies had to pay billions of dollars in damages over the health effects of cigarettes, had long been seen as a quixotic quest led by scruffy, oil-hating extremists. But POLITICO's interviews with dozens of activists, industry officials and lawmakers suggest that support for a legal crusade against Exxon is growing far beyond the political fringe — and now poses the biggest existential threat the company has faced in decades.

Just five days before the meeting on Capitol Hill, Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton had urged the Justice Department to investigate whether the petroleum giant spent decades deceiving the public about the threat of climate change. State attorneys general had Exxon in their sights as well, preparing to issue subpoenas that would eventually rope in virtually all of Washington's conservative policy apparatus. A four-year effort by green activists, scientists and lawyers to turn Big Oil's biggest player into the poster child for climate change — deliberately patterned after the successful campaign to take down tobacco — was shaking the descendant of John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil empire to its core.

So the four Exxon executives arrived at the office of California Democrat Rep. Ted Lieu with one job: convincing four of their most vocal congressional critics that the company wasn't the polluting villain its enemies were making it out to be.

Exxon supports "sound climate policy" and has tripled its greenhouse-gas cuts since 2008, the executives boasted to the lawmakers in a 10-page glossy presentation, later obtained by POLITICO. Exxon was even on record in favor of a tax on carbon emissions — a climate remedy more radical than anything President Barack Obama has proposed.

The company left empty-handed, though, after refusing to directly answer questions about whether it had suppressed internal research that underscored the threat of climate change while publicly sowing doubt about climate science, according to people in the room.

The presentation made at least one thing clear, however: After years of shrugging off pressure from eco-activists, Exxon was showing signs of worry.

And Exxon wasn't the only one with reasons to be nervous.

***

Interviews with advocates on both sides of the feud reveal how quickly the anti-Exxon movement has sprouted, to the point that it's now consuming op-ed pages, airwaves and courtrooms across the country. Once merely intent on shaming the oil giant into better behavior, environmentalists are pursuing a strategy to discredit the company, weaken it politically and perhaps make it pay the kinds of multibillion-dollar legal settlements that began hitting the tobacco industry in the 1990s.

The campaign — led by some of the same climate activists who defied Beltway wisdom by killing the Keystone XL oil pipeline — has mushroomed into far more than a greens-versus-Exxon feud.

Just last week, a leaked subpoena from the attorney general in the U.S. Virgin Islands revealed a vast probe that demanded Exxon's communications with more than 100 free-market think tanks, conservative consulting firms and climate-skeptic scientists — proof, the company's supporters say, that environmentalists are using the legal system to launch a broad attack on their political opponents. The subpoena targets Exxon's dealings with parties including the Competitive Enterprise Institute, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Foundation, the Hoover Institution, George Mason University and scientists at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the University of Alabama and the University of Delaware.

The first subpoena to Exxon came from New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman, who used his state's powerful consumer fraud law to hit the company with legal papers just a day after the lobbyists' meeting on the Hill. AGs in California and Massachusetts have also launched investigations into the company.

Members of Congress have weighed in too, with Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) and presidential contender Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) urging DOJ to consider bringing civil racketeering cases against oil companies.

"Obviously, we take it extremely seriously," Exxon spokesman Alan Jeffers told POLITICO, noting that the company is complying with the New York subpoena while it fights the racketeering summons from Virgin Islands Attorney General Claude Walker. The greens' campaign is built on "distorted reports that they have commissioned and a distorted history of climate research that we've done openly with government bodies," Jeffers added.

Both sides describe the political stakes of the campaign as huge.

"Exxon's been able to work its political will for a quarter of a century — they shouldn't be able to," said climate activist Bill McKibben, a leader of the fight against Keystone. "They should be a toxic political brand."

"Exxon is taking this real seriously, and that tells you something, doesn't it?" Matt Pawa, a Massachusetts lawyer who has repeatedly gone after Exxon in court, said in an interview. "Maybe they've got something to hide."

Even rival oil companies that disdain Exxon's support for a carbon tax are spooked about how far the greens' campaign has gotten, especially when the industry is already reeling from a huge slump in fuel prices.

"Industry doesn't look at this and say, 'Too bad for Exxon,'" one fossil-fuel lobbyist said. "We say it's very chilling, a horrible precedent, and no one wants to see themselves next."

Underscoring the industry's anxiety is the breadth and intensity of the counterattack it has mounted. Industry consultants are accusing the state AGs of colluding with environmentalists, and have questioned the role of foundations created by the Rockefeller family — petroleum heirs turned anti-oil activists — in helping bankroll some news organizations' Exxon investigations.

The industry is even exploring the idea of launching a counter-probe: A lobbyist for one of Exxon's industry rivals told POLITICO he has reached out to red-state attorneys general to gauge their interest in probing where environmental groups are getting their funding. No takers have emerged so far.

But industry backers' main argument is that the greens are assaulting the constitutional rights of anyone who dissents from mainstream climate science. Heritage Foundation fellow Hans von Spakovsky has denounced Schneiderman's probe as a "Soviet-Style investigation," while conservative columnist George Will called it an example of "gangster government."

"Instead of honoring legitimate academic and scientific inquiry, the far-left has gone to extremes to silence those who disagree," Oklahoma Republican Sen. Jim Inhofe, the chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, said Wednesday. He added, "This is nothing more than a misuse of power to score cheap political points."

Exxon itself has made similar arguments, fighting the Virgin Islands subpoenas in court as an infringement on the company's free-speech rights. But Walker, the territory's AG, dismissed that reasoning.

"The First Amendment is not a defense to fraud," Walker told POLITICO through a spokesman, and "the Constitution provides no right to mislead shareholders."

"The tobacco companies," he added, "raised exactly these arguments. ... That was soundly rejected by the courts."

***

The seeds of the Venus flytrap closing around Exxon were planted in June 2012 in the wealthy seaside town of La Jolla, Calif., where two dozen scientists, lawyers and academics huddled for a scholarly conference on an issue that had vexed the environmental movement for decades: How, on a planet filled with 7 billion people, do you hold oil companies liable for their role in worsening climate change?

"This wasn't a strategy session," said Peter Frumhoff, a conference organizer and the director of science and policy at the Union of Concerned Scientists. "This was a kind of first cut at, for lack of a better word, an exercise in applied scholarship."

But attendees emerged with two strategies that would set the tone for today's anti-Exxon fight.

First, they underscored the importance of building a catalogue of peer-reviewed research making the case that individual corporations could be held responsible for their contributions to climate change, a step that could serve as Exhibit A in future legal action. That tactic took a page from Exxon itself, which funded research after its 1989 Valdez spill arguing that Alaska's Prince William Sound was already recovering from the damage.

Richard Heede, a climate researcher who helped organize the La Jolla conference, said the attendees realized the "value" of having credible peer-reviewed research.

Working with other academics like Naomi Oreskes, whose book "Merchants of Doubt" drew parallels between the climate and tobacco fights, Heede published articles in peer-reviewed journals that placed the responsibility for climate change at the feet of major fossil fuel companies. In a November 2013 study, for example, Heede estimated that 63 percent of worldwide emissions of industrial carbon dioxide and methane came from a group of 90 "carbon major" entities. (ExxonMobil was prominent in the list.) Environmental groups like Greenpeace immediately trumpeted the research.

"For a long time, fossil fuel companies have benefited from the idea that everyone is responsible for climate change — and if everyone is responsible, then nobody is responsible," said Carroll Muffett, the president of the Center for International Environmental Law. "Now the science is moving into a much finer resolution."

Second, the La Jolla attendees agreed that obtaining and publicizing internal corporate documents was the key to turning public opinion against the oil companies and eventually securing a legal victory.

"A key breakthrough in the public and legal case for tobacco control came when internal documents came to light showing the tobacco industry had knowingly misled the public," the 2012 conference organizers wrote in a memo on the meeting. "Similar documents may well exist in the vaults of the fossil fuel industry and their trade associations and front groups, and there are many possible approaches to unearthing them."

Exxon's opponents are likely to get hold of more internal records as the attorneys general proceed with their investigations. Schneiderman's aides are culling through tens of thousands of pages of documents from the company, according to a person familiar with the probe.

"I'd be amazed if there aren't several paper trails that will be found through subpoenas," said veteran lawyer Richard Ayres, one of the Natural Resources Defense Council's co-founders and an attendee at the 2012 conference. "Once subpoenas are answered, the trails will begin to be more visible and people will find this idea of litigation a lot more appealing."

The source familiar with Schneiderman's probe said the wide leeway afforded by his state's financial fraud law, the Martin Act, aided his request for documents. Those include records of Exxon's internal research into climate change's causes, the role of climate information in business decisions, and marketing, advertising and company communications.

From the start, Exxon's critics drew heavily on the lengthy legal crusade against tobacco companies that culminated in a massive settlement in 1998 totaling hundreds of billions of dollars.

Tobacco critics made little headway in the 1950s, when few Americans knew of the dangers of smoking. But the anti-tobacco fight gained steam as studies directly linked cigarettes to cancer and other ailments, eventually allowing the states to collect huge windfalls from the tobacco companies as compensation for smoking's health costs.

For the people gathered in La Jolla, even getting to the lawsuit stage would be a victory. "No matter what the outcome, litigation can offer an opportunity to inform the public," anti-tobacco litigator Sharon Eubanks said at the meeting, according to the meeting notes.

At the heart of any legal strategy is proof of a conspiracy or fraud — in this case, an alleged effort by oil companies to conceal their internal knowledge of their product's contributions to climate change. The activists' big break came in September and October, when the nonprofit investigative website InsideClimate News and the Los Angeles Times published stories alleging that Exxon's scientists had known as far back as the 1970s that the company's fossil fuels would cook the planet, even as its executives hid that knowledge.

The stories, citing internal Exxon documents, didn't make an immediate splash in Washington. Lieu and Rep. Mark DeSaulnier (D-Calif.) didn't ask DOJ to launch an investigation until Oct. 15. Exxon addressed the controversy for the first time on Oct. 21, singling out InsideClimate as "an anti-oil and gas activist organization" — the first of many times that the industry would slam the news outlet for taking money from the anti-fossil-fuel Rockefeller Brothers Fund and Rockefeller Family Fund.

Then the activists scored a political coup on Oct. 29 by injecting the issue into the mainstream of the presidential race. Responding to a question at a New Hampshire town hall, Hillary Clinton told an activist from McKibben's climate group that the Justice Department should look into Exxon's activities, saying, "There's a lot of evidence they misled."

Days later, Exxon's lobbyists were taking the meeting in Lieu's office with Lieu, DeSaulnier and two other liberal House Democrats. They aimed to "show the source documents that we think are the complete opposite of what the media reports have showed," Exxon spokesman Jeffers said afterward.

Their message: Exxon "believes in climate change, they believe it's largely caused by the burning of fossil fuels and human activity, and they support a fee on carbon," Lieu recalled in an interview. "That is the company line."

But when Lieu asked if Exxon supported any current proposal to tax the carbon in its nearly 25 billion barrels in proved worldwide oil reserves, the lobbyists said no. Nor would the company admit to the greens' accusations of deceiving the public.

"The basic questions were not at all resolved or seriously addressed in the meeting," Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.) told POLITICO. DeSaulnier called Exxon's pitch an attempt at "damage control," rather than an effort to be "open and honest and corrective."

***

American oil companies are coping with the anti-Exxon campaign at a uniquely vulnerable time, with oil prices dropping to a 13-year low in February. Exxon lost its top-ranked credit rating last month thanks to a debt load that has more than tripled since 2012 and earnings that fell by 50 percent last year.

To be sure, Exxon's status as one of the world's most profitable companies remains unshaken. Its market value is nearly double that of Chevron, the nation's second-biggest oil and gas company.

But as the greens' campaign matures, Washington's conservative firmament is broadcasting its fury at what it sees as a fishing expedition aimed at ferreting out embarrassing information about the company.

Among those fighting back is CEI-affiliated conservative activist Chris Horner, who has used public records requests to uncover internal documents about coordination between activists and state attorneys general. Horner, who runs an anti-environmentalist research machine called E&E Legal, released emails last month that showed the attorneys general consulting with an anti-Exxon lawyer and an official at the Union of Concerned Scientists before holding a news conference in March with former Vice President Al Gore.

Two BakerHostetler litigators, David Rivkin and Andrew Grossman, have also founded a project called Free Speech in Science accusing the environmentalists of attacking climate skeptics' constitutional rights.

"You don't normally choose a target first, based on their speech, and say you're going to pursue all theories" available to attack that target, said Grossman, also an adjunct scholar at the conservative Cato Institute. "What's really going on here is intimidation."

Leaders of the Federalist Society, an alliance of conservative lawyers that counts Supreme Court Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito as members, have penned lengthy attacks on Schneiderman and other attorneys general investigating Exxon. National Review, Reason, Powerline and others followed suit in defending the oil giant, as have members of The Wall Street Journal's editorial board.

Exxon is "considering all of our options" for potential legal action against InsideClimate News, the Los Angeles Times or activist groups, spokesman Jeffers told POLITICO.

Aside from the company itself, the most vocal resistance to the greens has come from FTI Consulting, a firm filled with former Republican aides that has helped unify the GOP in defense of fossil fuels. Under the banner of Energy in Depth, a project it runs for the Independent Petroleum Association of America, FTI has peppered reporters with emails that suggest "collusion" between green activists and state AGs, and has raised questions over InsideClimate's Rockefeller grants.

The intensity of Energy in Depth's counter-assault reflects the degree of potential pain the entire industry faces from Exxon's troubles. IPAA senior vice president Jeff Eshelman said its efforts "haven't been to defend one company or interest, but rather to showcase [InsideClimate's] ongoing attacks on the American oil and gas industry that seem to be funded by multi-million-dollar activists."

InsideClimate News, which was named a Pulitzer Prize finalist last month for its Exxon stories, says it has received $25,000 from the Rockefeller Family Fund, or about 2 percent of the company's budget. The idea that the funding is influencing its news coverage is "an easy accusation, but it's completely baseless," founder and publisher David Sassoon told POLITICO. "Our funders have no access to our editorial and they never have."

As for Exxon, he said: "They have never asked us for a correction. They don't dispute the authenticity of the documents that our report is based on."

***

While nearly 200 nations hammered out a global climate agreement in Paris in December, many establishment environmentalists took a victory lap. But the anti-Exxon forces were girding for their next fight.

On the sidelines of the United Nations conference in Paris, Pawa — the Massachusetts lawyer — delivered a private talk to activists that McKibben described as his "opening argument in the case" against Exxon. Columbia Law School professor Michael Gerrard also spoke that day at Pawa's request about what he described as "some of the defenses that would be raised" by a corporation facing legal threats linked to its greenhouse gas emissions.

Pawa is a veteran Exxon antagonist, having won a $236 million judgment against Exxon in 2013 for polluting New Hampshire's groundwater. He helped an Alaskan Inuit village sue the company in 2008 over the rising seas that threatened the local economy.

And the previously unreported closed-door huddle in Paris wasn't the only place Pawa has touted his legal theory of Exxon's culpability.

He delivered a courtroom-style presentation titled "What Exxon Knew About Global Warming, and What it Did Anyway" in March at an environmental law conference in Oregon. Later that month, he led a closed-door briefing with Democratic attorneys general and their staff, according to emails obtained by Horner's conservative think tank.

Pawa's central role in the escalating bombardment of Exxon has made him a target, as the company's allies liken him to a puppet master orchestrating the campaign behind the scenes. But he told POLITICO that he is not formally involved in any state investigations, even as he suggested that more AGs could jump into the fray.

"There will be a successful outcome some day, whether it's my or another generation of lawyers," Pawa said. He added: "I do think we will be successful. I hope it's in the short term."

Activists plan to make a public stand at Exxon's annual shareholder meeting May 25, where several resolutions intended to force the company into acknowledging the climate threat will come to a vote.

The calls for a DOJ racketeering investigation from Clinton, Sanders, Lieu and Whitehouse, a former state attorney general, are also paying off. The Justice Department told Lieu in March that it had referred the requests to the FBI, a move that doesn't preclude DOJ later filing a civil complaint.

Walker, the Virgin Islands' AG, predicted that his Exxon probe will take longer than the four months it took for his office to secure an $800 million settlement in a separate case against Hess Oil. But otherwise, he said, a thorough inquiry "takes time, and my job is to get it done right, not fast."

Oil companies may face yet another headache if Democrats regain the Senate in November: Lawmakers such as Whitehouse told POLITICO they will push to hold hearings like those in the 1990s where tobacco executives had to testify under oath.

The prospect of intensifying political trouble for Exxon and other major oil companies while a legal case drags on is an integral design feature of activists' campaign against the company. Whether the endgame is the type of multibillion-dollar settlement that crippled cigarette makers, or whether it's a Beltway surrender that forces the company to do more on climate change, no longer matters.

What matters, the company's critics say, is sending a message to the industry that its days of climate obstructionism are over.

In the meantime, Whitehouse is betting that the flood of internal Exxon documents emerging as a result of the investigations will uncover damaging information.

"It wouldn't surprise me if some of these organizations were busily scrubbing their files to get rid of culpatory materials," he said.

Meanwhile, the industry's seemingly united pro-Exxon front belies a paradox: Other American oil companies are frustrated by the company's stated advocacy of a "revenue-neutral" carbon tax. No Democrat or environmentalist takes that stance seriously, but Exxon's willingness to even utter the phrase makes it an outlier among U.S. drillers and refiners, which fear that a levy on greenhouse gases could gain momentum if Clinton wins in November.

Many in the industry are also skeptical of Exxon's ties to the Democratic front-runner: The company's Washington office includes senior lobbyist Theresa Fariello, who bundles contributions for Clinton's campaign, and former Democratic aide Dan Easley, both of whom attended the Election Day meeting in Lieu's office.

"Exxon was one of the first companies out of the gate on a carbon tax, and they've made no secret they want to get along with the Clinton guys," said one fossil-fuel lobbyist unaffiliated with the company. "Their chickens are coming home to roost."

Zinke recommends shrinking Bears Ears monument Back

By Esther Whieldon | 06/12/2017 04:07 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke proposed shrinking the Bears Ears National Monument on Monday, trimming back the controversial Utah monument created by former President Barack Obama during his final days in office.

A preliminary review of the 1.4 million-acre monument that Zinke sent to the White House over the weekend shows his "belief that the monument needs to be right-sized," Zinke said in a statement.

Any move by President Donald Trump to alter the monument designed to protect thousands of sensitive archaeological sites will set off a legal fight with tribes and conservation groups that have complained the Native American ruins there were being damaged and would be threatened by oil and gas development in the area.

Zinke's preliminary recommendations to Trump show he did not plan to go as far as revoking Obama's monument designation — a move that has been sought by the state's congressional delegation.

"Rescinding the monument was an option, but looking at it, there are some antiquities within the monument that I think deserve to be protected," he said in a press call.

Trump has ordered Zinke to review 22 of the national monuments that were established in the past two decades to determine if they should be altered or revoked. The secretary has until Aug. 24 to send his final recommendations to the White House, and Zinke has extended the comment period on Bears Ears to July 10.

Zinke is also pressing Congress to look at the Bears Ears boundaries "to see whether the lands are more appropriately designated as national conservation areas or national recreation areas," he said. "There's certainly a high demand of recreation. There's certainly a demand for conservation in some parts, but we believe that those areas are better suited under congressionally mandated designations than they are a monument."

The secretary also asked Congress to grant tribes the ability to co-manage specific areas within Bears Ears, and for Congress to clarify how wilderness areas that overlap with monuments should be treated, an issue for Bears Ears and some other monuments under review.

A former congressman from Montana, Zinke cited his concern that the federal government restricts activities on the land it designates as protected, saying that designating a monument the size of Bears Ears where "multiple-use management is hindered or prohibited is not the best use of the land and is not in accordance with the intention of the Antiquities Act."

President Barack Obama created the monument in southeast Utah in December, angering Republicans who accused the administration of federal overreach by ignoring locals who opposed the move and using the Antiquities Act to cut off commercial activity such as mining and oil and gas drilling.

Prior legislative attempts by the Utah delegation to curb federal monuments in the state have failed. Utah Republicans Rob Bishop and Jason Chaffetz did manage last year to get their Utah Public Lands Initiative legislation through the Natural Resources Committee, which Bishop chairs, but it never received a floor vote.

If Trump ultimately decides to alter Bears Ears or the other monuments on the list, he is certain to face legal challenges from environmental groups. "An attack on one monument is an attack on all of them," said Jesse Prentice-Dunn, advocacy director at the Center for Western Priorities.

Past presidents have changed the size of monuments but none have revoked them entirely, and legal questions remain as to whether the law allows a president to fully undo their predecessor's actions.

Zinke last month traveled to the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante monuments and this week he will head to New England to visit the Katahdin Woods and Waters National Monument in Maine, which is also under review.

Zinke has repeatedly talked about the need to balance conservation with commercial and recreational demands on public lands, and has already this year ended the moratorium on new coal leases and launched reviews on ways to open up more areas for oil and gas development.

U.S. biodiesel industry gets early win in trade case Back

By Eric Wolff | 08/22/2017 05:05 PM EDT

The Commerce Department will impose import duties on biodiesel shipments from Argentina and Indonesia as a result of a trade case brought by domestic producers, Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross said Tuesday.

"The U.S. values its relationships with Argentina and Indonesia, but even friendly nations must play by the rules," Ross said in a statement announcing the rulings.

The department found the Argentine and Indonesian governments set up subsidies in violation of international trade laws, and penalties are needed to even out prices. "The subsidization of goods by foreign governments is something that the Trump administration takes very seriously, and we will continue to evaluate and verify the accuracy of this preliminary determination," Ross added.

Because the ruling is preliminary, companies in Argentina and Indonesia will have to pay a cash deposit on exports to the U.S. to cover potential future penalties. The cash deposit rates will range from 50.29 percent to 64.17 percent of the value of Argentine biodiesel, and from 41.06 percent to 68.28 percent for product from Indonesia.

Commerce also imposed a retroactive penalty so that the deposit rates will apply to biodiesel exports to the U.S. from those countries dating back to May, rather than starting Tuesday, as would normally be the case.

The National Biodiesel Board and 15 biodiesel producers brought the case in response to rapidly increasing imports of biodiesel from the two countries.

"The Commerce Department has recognized what this industry has known all along — that foreign biodiesel producers have benefited from massive subsidies that have severely injured U.S. biodiesel producers," Doug Whitehead, NBB's chief operating officer, said in a statement.

The National Association of Truck Stop Operators opposed the rulings, arguing they would raise fuel prices in the U.S. and ultimately lead to higher costs for consumer goods transported by truck in the U.S. "Any outcome that results in cutting off Americans' access to cleaner burning fuels, such as biodiesel, from foreign markets is a bad day for the United States," David Fialkov, NATSO's vice president of government relations, said in a statement.

Commerce will take comment on the preliminary rulings and then issue final decisions, which are likely to come next year.

Commerce is expected in October to issue a preliminary ruling in a separate case on whether Argentina and Indonesia deliberately dumped biodiesel in the U.S., undermining U.S. producers. NBB and the 15 biodiesel producers brought that action as well.

A memo Commerce released Tuesday on Argentine imports is here. The decision is here. A memo on Indonesian imports may be read here. The decision is here.

Trump rejects wealthy friends' pleas for help Back

By Alex Guillén and Eric Wolff | 08/22/2017 07:30 PM EDT

Coal magnate Robert Murray has just joined Wall Street billionaire Carl Icahn in an exclusive club — wealthy backers of President Donald Trump who tried and failed to get lucrative concessions from his administration.

Murray, CEO of Murray Energy, one of the nation's biggest and most politically active coal miners, complained in an Aug. 4 letter made public Tuesday that the Energy Department had dragged its feet on his request that it use its emergency powers to force some Rust Belt coal-fired power plants to stay open. Trump was so taken by the idea that he immediately turned to Energy Secretary Rick Perry and ordered him to do it, wrote Murray, who said he had witnessed the conversation.

But DOE said no.

Murray's failure to shift the policy, and Icahn's earlier inability to convince the Environmental Protection Agency to alter its ethanol rule, raises questions about the limits of bulldog business leaders to circumvent the government's bureaucracy, even in an administration run by a sympathetic billionaire.

"These are two people who really don't understand how government works talking to a president who came into office not understanding how government works," said Jeff Navin, a founder of Boundary Stone Partners and former acting chief of staff at the Department of Energy under President Barack Obama. "What they're asking for causes serious legal problems for the agencies they're asking to take these steps."

Some conservatives, meanwhile, praised Trump for sticking up for market principles by refusing to grant favors to individual supporters.

The Trump administration "is committed to making sound policy decisions based on market principles and the rule of law, not political favoritism," said Tom Pyle, president of the industry-funded American Energy Alliance and former head of the Trump transition team at the Energy Department. "This is welcome news for Main Street and a wake-up call for K Street."

Icahn was an early Trump supporter — the two men go back decades — and though Murray started 2016 backing Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, he eventually boarded the Trump train, hosting a major fundraiser in West Virginia and offering to educate Trump on coal issues. Trump's victory in November meant both had a chance to advance pet policies, especially since it seems both men have regular access to the president.

Yet both met with defeat.

The Energy Department rejected Murray's request that it use a special authority meant to protect the electric grid during emergencies to order FirstEnergy Solutions, part of Ohio-based utility FirstEnergy Corp., to keep open its coal-fired plants supplied by Murray's mines, even if the utility enters bankruptcy proceedings and would otherwise shut them down. Murray said that if those power plants shut down, it would force his company into bankruptcy.

Trump seemed fully supportive in private meetings, Murray revealed in letters to the White House, which were first published by The Associated Press.

At one meeting with the president, Trump turned to Perry in front of Murray "and said three (3) times 'I want this done,'" the coal company owner wrote. During a subsequent meeting with Murray and FirstEnergy Corp. CEO Charles Jones, Trump told an aide to "'tell [National Economic Council Director Gary] Cohn to do whatever these two want him to do.'"

But despite Trump's reported enthusiasm about granting Murray's unusual request, and despite Murray's assurances that other coal producers would benefit as well, the administration this week rejected it. DOE said in a short statement that "the evidence does not warrant the use of this emergency authority."

A White House spokeswoman did not address whether Trump had made the promises to Murray but said the president had acted on behalf of coal miners by killing Obama-era rules.

"Whether through repealing the Clean Power Plan and the 'Waters of the U.S. Rule,' removing the U.S. from the Paris Climate Agreement, or signing legislation to overturn rules and policies designed to stop coal mining, President Trump continues to fight for miners every day," White House spokeswoman Kelly Love said in a statement.

Similarly, Icahn's push to change a federal biofuel program to help his oil refining company CVR Energy suffered defeat earlier in the month. The Wall Street investor for years had railed against the EPA's Renewable Fuel Standard, which requires gasoline refiners to blend ethanol into their fuel, and Icahn's role as an unofficial Trump adviser on regulations presented him the opening he had sought.

In the early weeks of the Trump administration, Icahn presented the White House with language for an executive order to overturn the rule, which was costing his company hundreds of millions of dollars. But Icahn's effort hit a wall of opposition from oil companies and biofuel makers, and by spring, the proposal was largely left for dead. Sources told POLITICO earlier this month that the president would not be changing the biofuel program, though EPA has yet to make the decision official.

Icahn "comes in hot, his guy wins, Trump places a crown on Icahn's head, and Icahn says 'OK, it's corporate raider time,'" said Tyson Slocum, energy director for the nonprofit consumer advocacy group Public Citizen. "He knows hardball tactics. What Carl Icahn doesn't know is D.C."

Last week, Icahn resigned his title, and in another sign that he was wrapping up his affairs in D.C., he settled a court challenge to an enforcement action brought by the Federal Railroad Administration against American Railcar Industries, another Icahn-controlled company. That final settlement largely resembles the inspection regime the agency originally imposed, an FRA spokeswoman said.

One critic said the lack of experience in the new administration appeared to open the door for both Icahn and Murray, even if neither managed to step through it.

"I think we've seen, in this administration, at least, reports of an under-attentiveness to those procedural and institutional safeguards. That creates risk for unsound decisions to be made," said Ali Zaidi, a former Obama White House energy adviser now at the law firm Morrison & Foerster.

Icahn and Murray aren't the only ones seeking special treatment.

Coal billionaire-turned-West Virginia Gov. Jim Justice has proposed a federal subsidy for Appalachian coal in a plan that could net his own mines millions of dollars.

Justice privately pitched Trump on a subsidy that would pay utilities $15 per ton of Appalachian coal burned, and he said in a recent interview the president was "really interested" in the plan, which would cost an estimated $4.5 billion a year and likely require congressional approval.

But Justice's proposal has not been received well by key circles. It's gone over "like a fart in church" with Western coal miners, according to Travis Deti, executive director of the Wyoming Mining Association. And Wyoming's congressional delegation — including Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso, a Republican — panned the idea in a letter to Trump. Democrats, environmentalists and budget-hawk Republicans are also opposed to any coal subsidy.

Justice might look to the results that Icahn and Murray got.

Icahn and Murray "both became completely consumed with their own narrow self-interest, and they completely lost sight that there are a lot of stakeholders — including corporate stakeholders — that may not like their proposals," said Public Citizen's Slocum.

White House eyes Afghanistan resources to defray costs Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 08/22/2017 03:01 PM EDT

President Donald Trump may press for a U.S. role in tapping Afghanistan's vast mineral reserves to defray the cost of military operations there, a senior adviser to Trump confirmed to POLITICO Tuesday.

Trump, who repeatedly called for the U.S. to take Iraqi oil to pay for its mission in that country, plans to increase troop levels in Afghanistan. But while he vowed in his policy speech on Monday that the U.S. would not engage in "nation-building again," he also said the U.S. would "participate in economic development to help defray the cost of the war to us."

Asked whether Trump was considering grabbing a stake in Afghanistan's vast mineral deposits — estimated at $1 trillion by one U.S. government report — a senior White House adviser said it was on the table.

"We're looking at all those types of options," the adviser said.

A White House spokeswoman said there were no new announcements at the moment.

The war-torn country has an estimated 60 million metric tons of copper and 2.2 billion metric tons of iron ore, plus deposits of magnesium, gold, silver, rubies and other valuable resources spread across the country, according to a U.S. Geological Survey study. It also holds up to 1.6 billion barrels of recoverable oil and 16 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, according to government data — a relative pittance compared to some of its Middle East neighbors, but enough that Exxon Mobil and other oil companies sniffed around the area briefly.

But extracting and processing tons of minerals in a war zone and transporting it out of the mountainous country with few modern roads or bridges is not something that can be done anytime soon, analysts said. Armed guerrilla groups and warlords currently mine the deposits to fund their own operations, according to a study by Global Witness, a nonprofit that campaigns for transparency in mining, oil and gas sectors.

Afghanistan's inherent infrastructure difficulties, both physical and political, blocked the building of a natural gas pipeline through the country in the late 1990s.

In 1997, Unocal, which was later bought by Chevron, joined a group of companies seeking to build a $2.5 billion pipeline transporting natural gas from across the country, but it abandoned the effort. A company executive told the House Foreign Relations Committee in 1998 the lack of a strong government in the country posed a serious challenge to getting any energy infrastructure built there.

Trump can look at China for an example of how things can go wrong on the mining front, said Tony Cordesman, Burke chair in strategy at the Center for Strategic International Studies.

In 2007, two Chinese mining companies obtained Afghan government permission to extract copper from the country's Aynak region. A decade later, the project has stalled amid security concerns, contract disputes and controversy over the Chinese consortium's handling of Buddhist relics at the site.

"Above all it's a security problem. Is there mineral wealth there? Yes. Are we in position to secure a mine? If you don't have security, it is extremely difficult," Cordesman said.

Dakota Access owner sues green groups Back

By Diamond Naga Siu | 08/22/2017 04:44 PM EDT

Dakota Access Pipeline owner Energy Transfer Partners filed a federal racketeering lawsuit today against Greenpeace International and Earth First!, contending the environmental groups worked together to spread false information about the company to raise money and damage Energy Transfer's business.

"The alleged Enterprise is comprised of rogue environmental groups and militant individuals who employ a pattern of criminal activity and a campaign of misinformation for purposes of increasing donations and advancing their political or business agendas," ETP and its parent company said in a statement. "The Complaint asserts that the attacks were calculated and thoroughly irresponsible, causing enormous harm to people and property along the pipeline's route."

The 187-page complaint additionally alleges that "smaller, more violent eco-terrorist organizations and radicalized individuals" are mishandling their funds and instead of using it to help the environment, they used the money for personal gain.

"Under the 'Greenpeace Model,' raising money and the network's profile is the primary objective, not saving the environment," their complaint wrote. "Greenpeace's most senior leaders have admitted that their goal is not to present accurate facts, but to 'emotionalize' issues and thereby 'pressure' (i.e. manipulate) their donor audiences into parting with their money."

Greenpeace USA General Counsel Tom Wetterer said this is the second "meritless" lawsuit filed against them by the law firm led by President Donald Trump's former personal attorney Marc Kasowitz.

"They are apparently trying to market themselves as corporate mercenaries willing to abuse the legal system to silence legitimate advocacy work," Wetterer said in a statement.

KINDA A GAS... IN MONTREAL: Americans are looking forward to a little R&R with family for Thanksgiving, but diplomats from around the world are gathering in Montreal throughout the week to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Montreal Protocol and to discuss the next steps at curbing emissions of extremely potent greenhouse gases. They're likely to be in an ebullient mood since reaching the 21-country threshold to ratify the Kigali amendment, which calls for the rapid phase down in production and use of hydrofluorocarbons. It will now go into effect in 2019.

A key issue to watch during the talks is the money promised for the Multilateral Fund, through which rich nations help developing ones with their efforts to phase out HFCs. The U.S. has dropped its support for international efforts like the Green Climate Fund, so we'll see if this agreement — which has significant support among industry groups — avoids the same fate. "It will be a good week for America if our diplomats come to Montreal to celebrate the achievements of the last 30 years, contribute generously to the Fund, and announce plans to stay the course on Kigali," NRDC's David Doniger wrote in a blog post. An agenda for the meeting is available here.

One observer's thoughts: "We expect the Protocol this week to stay on the course first set by Reagan, Thatcher, and Mulroney 30 years ago, tackling all the key issues, including funding for phasing out chemicals that nations have agreed to eliminate," said Durwood Zaelke, president of the Institute for Governance and Sustainable Development. "No one wants to see this workhorse treaty fail — and it won't."

SWEARING-IN WATCH! ME is on high alert for FERC news today. A couple of clued-in sources tell us that President Donald Trump has (finally) signed off on Kevin McIntyre, the incoming chairman, and Rich Glick getting sworn in at FERC, setting the stage for them to take office as soon as today. The pair were confirmed by the Senate on Nov. 2 but floated in limbo for reasons unclear to ME, providing plenty of grist for the rumor mill. In order for McIntyre to officially take the gavel, the White House needs to issue a separate chairman designation. So keep an eye out for that.

GIMME WATER: The new U.S. and Mexico water-sharing agreement for the Colorado River has given a further nudge to Southwestern states to help shore up the declining water reserves, Pro's Esther Whieldon reports. The deal, called Minute 323 and signed in September, changed procedures governing how much water each country can take during times of drought, but Mexico also agreed cut its offtake even deeper during shortages if Nevada, Arizona and California agree to a voluntary drought contingency plan to bolster Lake Mead's water levels.

But internal squabbles among the states are hampering the odds of them inking an agreement they hope to sign by next summer. "Minute 323 was a big step forward and it put an additional weight on the scales for pushing forward for [the drought contingency plan]," said Ted Kowalski, director of the Colorado River initiative at the Walton Family Foundation. Arizona, southern Nevada and southern California have all been drawing more water than the river can replenish in recent years and climate change is expected to further strain water supplies, adding further pressures to reach an agreement.

PRUITT 'VERY DISAPPOINTED' BY KEYSTONE SPILL: During an appearance Wednesday on Fox News Radio, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt hailed Tuesday's approval by Nebraska regulators of a key permit for the Keystone XL pipeline but said he was "very disappointed" by the 210,000 gallon spill from a portion of the original Keystone pipeline last week. "There needs to be some accountability there, but very, very excited about the approval overall of the pipeline," he said. Meanwhile, South Dakota regulators raised the possibility of revoking the pipeline's permit in their state if a probe determines TransCanada violated its license, Reuters reports. TransCanada has yet to disclose the cause behind the spill.

Pruitt also defended efforts to cut down on agency spending. "We can afford to cut our budget," he said. "We are cutting the job done but at the same time doing it in a fiscally responsible way."

CHECK THIS OUT! Pro's DataPoint has created a stunning graphic looking at the geographical distribution of nearly 3,100 pipeline spills around the country during the last seven years. It also breaks them down by the substance released. Check it out here.

NEW NOMINEE NAMED: Before heading off to Florida for Thanksgiving, Trump announced his selection of Phyllis L. Bayer of Mississippi to be an assistant secretary of the Navy for installations, energy and the environment. She was most recently chief of staff in the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and has held a variety of Defense-related roles before that.

BROWNFIELDS READY TO ROLL: House lawmakers appear ready to tackle a modified version of legislation H.R. 3017 \(115\) that reauthorizes EPA's Brownfields program, with a Rules Committee hearing slated for next Tuesday at 5 p.m. The measure cleared the Energy and Commerce Committee back in June by voice vote and a summary of modifications since then is available here.

NO RFS WITH YOUR TURKEY THIS YEAR: The White House was still reviewing the 2018 Renewable Fuel Standard volumes as of Tuesday morning, so it seems we'll all be free to get the turkey basted and the cranberry sauce made in advance of our Thanksgiving feasts this year, or at least get on the road early. RFS watchers will recall the Obama administration made for a stressful pre-holiday when it released the 2017 volumes the Wednesday before Thanksgiving. Pruitt still has plenty of time to make the Nov. 30 deadline, which falls a full week after those giant balloons float down Fifth Avenue.

BLAST FROM THE PAST: ME didn't have space for this last week, but Sen. Jim Inhofe told an interesting story about why Sen. Roger Wicker was the lone senator back in 2015 to vote against an amendment that climate change is real and not a hoax. "He walked in after it was over, he didn't know what that was [about]," Inhofe says. "He'll admit that, although he enjoyed being the one out of a hundred." At the time, the Mississippi Republican said he refused to participate in "a political show vote" so voted against the amendment.

YOUR CALL: Environmental advocates and EPA have been sparring over which circuit court should consolidate the lawsuits over two TSCA rules, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit said Wednesday in an order that it would defer ruling until the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit weighed in on the matter. Background from Pro's Alex Guillén here.

MORE TIME GIVEN: The National Park Service has extended the public comment period through Dec. 22 on its proposal to sharply increase fees associated with use of national parks. The comment period was originally slated to end on Thanksgiving. In a statement, NPS said it had already received more than 65,000 comments and extended the deadline to "accommodate interest in this issue from members of Congress and the public." More information here.

MAIL CALL! QUESTIONS RAISED OVER TROPHY BAN: Twenty-two Democratic senators asked Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke nine specific questions about the status of the administration's ban on importing elephant and lion trophies from Zimbabwe and Zambia, and demanded he formally halt any reversal of it. "While we appreciate that additional reviews may be underway, the fact remains that tweets alone do not constitute substantive federal policy without commensurate agency action and do not negate the need to file appropriate public notice," they wrote. Days after the administration said it would lift the ban, Trump appeared to back away from the decision in a series of tweets this week.

Zinke slams phony photo: A fake image circulating online purporting to show Zinke in front of a killed elephant drew condemnation from the Interior secretary. "The only thing I've hunted in Africa is terrorists. #GotEm #NoBaggingLimit," he tweeted.

MAINERS PUSH COLLINS ON DOURSON: A group of Maine scientists asked Sen. Susan Collins to formally oppose Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemical office. "Professor Dourson has no business in any position at the EPA," they wrote. "The EPA cannot protect our land, air and water if it is led by officials who oppose those goals." Remember Collins said last week she's "leaning against" the nomination, which would sink it.

WALDEN, CHABOT PRESS EPA ON SMALL BUSINESS CONTRACTING: House Energy and Commerce Chairman Greg Walden and Small Business Chairman Steve Chabot asked Pruitt what his agency is doing to ensure it complies with requirements to spend a certain amount of its outside research and development obligations on small business funding. Link here.

MORE ENFORCEMENT DISCRETION IN PUERTO RICO: EPA said Wednesday it would continue to exercise some enforcement discretion from some Clean Air Act permit conditions and permitting requirements for Puerto Rico's utility through Jan. 31, 2018 as the island continues to recover from Hurricane Maria. "Extending the enforcement discretion for local power facilities is an important step to ensuring power is restored in communities across Puerto Rico," Pruitt said in a statement.

SIERRA CLUB PUSHES CORKER, FLAKE, McCAIN ON TAXES: The Sierra Club launched digital ad campaigns across Tennessee and Arizona in hopes of getting Republican Sens. Bob Corker, John McCain and Jeff Flake to oppose their chamber's tax package, which the group described as a "misanthrope's dream and a nightmare for our country."

NEWSPAPER ADS HIT PEARCE: The New Mexico Wildlife Federation has taken out full-page newspaper ads in the state attacking Rep. #### States struggle with Colorado River cuts after U.S.-Mexico deal Back

By Esther Whieldon | 11/22/2017 05:03 AM EDT

The new U.S. and Mexico water-sharing agreement for the Colorado River is giving the Southwestern states that rely on the waterway a new incentive to help shore up the declining water reserves — if Arizona and California can resolve their internal squabbles over how split the burden.

The U.S.-Mexico pact, called Minute 323 and signed in September, tweaked the procedures that govern how much water each country can take during times of drought, which is largely determined by water levels at Lake Mead, one of the two largest reservoirs on the Colorado River system. But Mexico also agreed cut its offtake even deeper during shortages if Nevada, Arizona and California agree to a voluntary drought contingency plan to bolster the lake's water levels — a deal the states hope to sign by next summer, officials said.

The river supplies drinking water to tens of million people in Mexico and U.S., including residents of Denver, Las Vegas and Los Angeles, as well as dozens of Indian tribes, and it irrigates millions of acres of valuable farm land.

"Minute 323 was a big step forward and it put an additional weight on the scales for pushing forward for [the drought contingency plan]," said Ted Kowalski, director of the Colorado River initiative at the Walton Family Foundation.

Lake Mead's water levels have been under pressure for years, and Arizona, Southern Nevada and Southern California have all been drawing more water than the river can replenish. Last year, the lake's levels reached only 30 percent of its capacity, and climate change and forecasts that a years-long drought will persist are raising fears the problem could get worse.

"If we don't have a plan in place to manage this river sustainably everybody that relies upon the river is going to be a loser," said John Entsminger, general manager for the Southern Nevada Water Authority.

The governors of Arizona, California and Nevada reached a draft agreement last year in which each state would voluntarily pull less water from the Colorado River than its users hold rights to — California's reductions would kick in last — in order to raise and sustain Lake Mead water levels.

But for those "lower basin" states to sign the deal, the water users inside each state must work out among themselves precisely how they will carry out those additional savings. Experts say that's where the real challenge arises.

"The low hanging fruit has been done as far as conservation ... you've got to really work harder to conserve even less quantities of water," said Christopher Harris, executive director of the Colorado River Board of California.

Nevada has avoided any nasty internal battles because the Southern Nevada Water Authority holds nearly all of the state's Colorado River water entitlements, Entsminger said in an interview.

But the situation is much more complicated in Arizona, where a wide range of water users including tribes, cities and farmers hold rights to the water. The challenges in California are equally complicated but appear to be closer to being resolved among the four water districts, including the Imperial Irrigation District and the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, that hold rights to Colorado River supplies.

For the Metropolitan Water District to lessen its reliance on the Colorado River that feeds it from the south, it will need to solve its supply problem in the north, where its water supplies from Sacramento-San Joaquin Bay-Delta are at risk. That water source is shrinking because the pumps that pull the water from the delta are catching and killing endangered Delta smelt.

California Gov. Jerry Brown has proposed the $17 billion "WaterFix" project to move the intakes further upstream to avoid threatening the fish. Jeffrey Kightlinger, Metropolitan's general manager, said enough water agencies have agreed to move forward with that plan, although it may be smaller than originally envisioned.

"We have critical mass to move forward with the state water project," he said.

For its part, the Imperial Irrigation District is balking at agreeing to use less Colorado River water until California authorities live up to their promise to add new wildlife habitat and curb toxic dust from the Salton Sea Lake in Southern California. The 350-square-mile lake is expected to shrink to one-third its original size as the Imperial Irrigation District and other users continue cutting back on water flows from the Colorado River.

The lake is an ecological haven for migratory birds, but its receding shoreline is polluted with chemicals from farming irrigation drainage, and the resulting dust from the dry lake bed has caused asthma problems in nearby communities.

The state approved a 10-year plan on Nov. 7 to implement the mitigation measures, which Tina Shields, the Imperial District's water department manager, said was needed to move forward.

"It's a first step, there's still more that will have to be done," Shields said. "We're going to need not just words on paper but projects on the ground. We're all about getting there."

In Arizona, a turf battle is raging over who decides how the state would implement its cuts.

Gov. Doug Ducey's office and the Arizona Department of Water Resources have sought to overhaul how the state manages its water, a move that's drawn pushback from the Central Arizona Project over what do with water supplies conserved under the drought contingency plan.

The Project, which operates hundreds of miles of canals and pipelines that ship Colorado River water to Tucson, Phoenix and Indian tribes, has controlled that excess water in the past and wants the option to sell it to help pay off $4 billion it owes the federal government for canal construction. It also contends that tribes that hold water rights do not have authority to reach their own conservation deals with the Bureau of Reclamation.

"We have a proposition on the table that would give that clear authority to DWR and ... Central Arizona Project folks don't like that outcome," said Thomas Buschatzke, director of the Arizona Department of Water Resources, who described the dispute as "a lively debate."

Chuck Cullom, manager of CAP's Colorado River programs said water users are "trying to shoehorn" other issues into the drought contingency plan discussion that are making it hard for CAP to agree to.

To win the state Legislature's approval next year of the water deals, the Department of Water Resources will need to garner the backing of most water users in the state, which is no small feat.

"They may be able to get there still, it's just sometimes hard to imagine it given the level of rhetoric that's been going on between the state and CAP," said the Colorado River Initiative's Kowalski.

Experts and water agency officials acknowledge that reaching a deal before August won't be easy, but they're optimistic it can be done in time.

"There's always atmospherics around deals like this," Entsminger said. "Things always seem to be wobbly until you actually push it across the finish line."

U.S., Mexico set aside Trump tensions for Colorado River deal Back

By Esther Whieldon | 09/29/2017 05:02 AM EDT

The water-sharing pact signed this week by the U.S. and Mexico emerged despite tensions caused by President Donald Trump's policies on immigration and trade, showing the negotiators' willingness to take on problems caused by shrinking supplies from the Colorado River, according to western water experts.

That deal signed Wednesday was supported by state water agencies and major users in both countries, and sets out procedures to reduce off-take during times of drought that are expected to persist for the foreseeable future.

"Water is the lifeblood of this region," Jennifer Pitt, Colorado River Project director for the National Audubon Society, said in an interview. "It is fundamentally important to the economies of southwestern U.S. and northwestern Mexico. ... It's just too important for the two countries not to have good relations over [it] and not have a plan in place about how to manage supplies reliably for that enormous population."

Representatives from the International Boundary and Water Commission of the United States and Mexico signed the pact, called Minute 323, that largely carries forward for another nine years a prior agreement that was due to expire this year. Water levels at the Colorado River's most important reservoir, Lake Mead, have been plummeting, and both the U.S. and Mexico could have faced the threat of mandatory supply cuts starting as early as next year.

The river supplies drinking water to tens of millions of people in both countries and irrigation for millions of acres of agriculture, both of which would suffer unless the countries reached a deal.

Federal officials failed to sign a deal before the end of the Obama administration, raising fears that Trump's calls to build a wall along the Mexican border and the reopening of NAFTA would undo years of progress in the negotiations. But the officials, supported by state water agencies and Mexico water license holders, knew they had to reach a deal or risk years of litigation in a crisis that would force them to choose between cutting off water supplies to farms and sensitive wildlife habitats or to major population centers.

"In a crisis, you would have winners and losers, and some of the biggest losers would be agriculture and the environment," said Ted Kowalski, director of the Colorado River initiative at the Walton Family Foundation. "I think it's highly unlikely the Bureau of Reclamation is going to turn off the city of Las Vegas or the city of Phoenix."

So the officials continued plodding away at negotiations, hoping the Trump administration would in the end agree to a deal.

The water agency officials were "largely insulated from the political conversation between Washington, D.C., and Mexico," said Chuck Cullom, Colorado River programs manager for the Central Arizona Project. The water managers "focused on providing the greatest benefits for the country and the communities ... rather than the political winds that might be blowing in a number of directions," he said in an interview.

The basin states made reaching a deal a top priority this year, according to Pitt.

"There's a long-standing balance of power between the states and the federal government on the Colorado River where the federal government tries to as much as possible defer to the states, who are really the owners of the water. So as the states made it clear to the incoming administration this was a priority, the administration said, 'We will support you on this,'" she said.

A key sticking point in the negotiations had been Mexico's insistence that the lower basin states of California, Arizona and Nevada first agree to a drought contingency plan under which they would voluntarily conserve additional water beyond mandatory cuts in order to increase reservoir levels.

Mexico officials were worried they would be left holding the bag if a water crisis occurred before the states reached a deal. But Mexico eventually agreed to make additional cuts once the states pass a contingency plan.

Mexico is very dependent on the upstream dams in the U.S. for its water delivery, since a 2010 earthquake damaged its dams. But Mexico also took the position that the original 1944 treaty between the countries only required it to cut supplies if the U.S. suffered extreme drought, a vague term that left too much open to interpretation.

"That was a big concession for Mexico to follow our lead," said Tom Buschatzke, director of the Arizona Department of Water Resources. But the U.S. also agreed to fund $31.5 million in water efficiency projects in Mexico through 2026 and to explore the possibility of investing in a desalinization plant that could help address future water supply challenges.

What made the deal possible is "the hard work that long preceded Trump," said Stephen Mumme, a political science professor at Colorado State University. "This is a classic example of ... a situation where not doing it could be really costly, and the sheer complexity of the number of players and the importance of the U.S. stake in this policy arena really overrode the Trump administration," he said.

"It's a good example in my mind of the limits of rhetorical breast beating and name calling and wall building."

TSCA rule lawsuits to head to different courts Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/01/2017 03:51 PM EDT

Lawsuits over two key EPA rules for implementing the revised Toxic Substances Control Act will play out in two separate courts.

Various challenges were filed last month over EPA's prioritization rule, which determines how the agency chooses which substances it will focus on immediately, and its evaluation rule, which describes how EPA will review substances. Public health and environmental groups argued that both rules skewed in favor of industry interests.

Lawsuits over the rules were filed in the 2nd, 4th and 9th Circuits. EPA had asked for all the lawsuits to land in the same court, but each rule's challenges will proceed in a different court. The lawsuits over the prioritization rule will move forward in the 9th Circuit, while the 4th Circuit will handle challenges to the evaluation rule.

The decisions were made randomly by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, a group of seven judges who consolidate similar lawsuits that are filed in disparate courts.

Collins 'leaning against' Dourson for EPA chemicals role Back

By Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 12:35 PM EDT

Sen. Susan Collins told reporters today she's "leaning against" backing Michael Dourson's nomination to run EPA's chemicals office, which would leave him without adequate support for confirmation in the closely divided chamber.

"I have a lot of concerns about Mr. Dourson, but I've not yet made a final decision," she said.

North Carolina Republican Sens. Richard Burr and Thom Tillis both came out in opposition on Wednesday to Dourson, who is currently working as an adviser at the agency. Both declined to say if he should leave that role today.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) also said today he had not decided whether to support the nomination.

Pence doles out first contributions ahead of 2018 elections Back

By Alex Isenstadt | 11/21/2017 06:00 AM EDT

Vice President Mike Pence is putting his imprint on the 2018 midterm elections, doling out contributions to three dozen Republican candidates — many of whom have been steadfast allies of the White House.

Pence is cutting his first batch of checks through his newly formed political action committee, Great America Committee. The vice president is giving financial support to a slate of high-profile candidates that includes Missouri Senate hopeful Josh Hawley, Nevada gubernatorial contender Adam Laxalt, and Florida Gov. Rick Scott, who is eyeing a potential Senate bid.

Not on the list: besieged Alabama Senate candidate Roy Moore, who is facing accusations that he engaged in sexual misconduct with teenagers when he was in his 30s.

Looking to reward those who have been loyal to the administration, Pence is wading into several prospective primaries. Among those getting checks are Tennessee Rep. Marsha Blackburn, a Senate hopeful who is facing a fight for the Republican nomination, and Wyoming Sen. John Barrasso. Several potential Barrasso primary opponents have emerged, including investor Foster Friess and Blackwater founder Erik Prince.

"The vice president is grateful to those who have gone above and beyond to promote the president's policies. He will always stand with those who stand with the president's agenda," said Alyssa Farah, a Pence spokeswoman.

Pence is also filling the coffers of a half-dozen members of the House Freedom Caucus, including the group's chairman, North Carolina Rep. Mark Meadows.

Several White House advisers, including political director Bill Stepien, legislative director Marc Short, counselor Kellyanne Conway and Pence chief of staff Nick Ayers, helped to craft the list of recipients.

Pence launched the political action committee earlier this year. That move led to speculation that the vice president was looking to expand his profile ahead of a potential future national bid, something his advisers deny.

With help from Emily Holden, Eric Wolff and Alex Guillén

WELCOME TO CONGRESS, MR. PRUITT: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt makes his long-awaited first appearance before a House Energy and Commerce subpanel this morning where he's expected to get grilled on a host of issues. The session will be broken into two segments — 10-11 a.m. and then 2 p.m. onwards — to allow Pruitt to attend a White House meeting on biofuels (more on that below). Look for E&C Environment Chairman John Shimkus to recognize the arrangement is "not ideal, but gives members maximum ability to personally question the administrator about the agency's mission" during his opening remarks.

What Republicans will say: Expect Chairman Greg Walden to press Pruitt on budget transparency and his plans to address staffing issues: "I expect that 'Back to Basics' is not an abdication of environmental protection, but rather a rededication to mastering the most fundamental aspects of EPA's mission," he'll say, according to prepared remarks glimpsed by ME. Shimkus said his questions could touch on a range of topics, including TSCA, brownfields, safe drinking water and the agency's staffing.

And Democrats? "We're all noticing the orientation toward the environment is completely different with respect to budgeting, with respect to climate change, potentially with respect to methane, particulates," Rep. Scott Peters, a subcommittee member, told ME. "So, I just think we want to get a sense of where he's going and how he'll measure success." The committee's top Democrat, Frank Pallone, wouldn't reveal what he intends to grill Pruitt about when ME caught up to him in the hall.

Pro's Alex Guillén's expectations for Pruitt's first Capitol Hill appearance in six months: "Lawmakers have probably built up some serious questions in that time, so we could see questioning on practically any issue before EPA: the Clean Power Plan repeal effort; the Waters of the U.S. rewrite; Superfund work; proposed budget cuts; Pruitt's decision earlier this year not to ban chlorpyrifos; and his increased security and travel. Pruitt's prepared testimony offers a standard overview of his EPA philosophy."

Rally time: Environmental and public health advocates, including the Union of Concerned Scientists, Sierra Club, Business Forward and the Alliance of Nurses for Healthy Environments, will rally outside Rayburn at 9:20 a.m. to draw attention to Pruitt's lagging enforcement efforts, spending habits and overhauls of science advisory panels. Ahead of the session, the Environmental Defense Fund updated their "Pruitt Playbook" and the Union of Concerned Scientists offers some suggested questions to ask.

If you go: The hearing kicks off at 10 a.m. in Rayburn 2123.

WHY PRUITT'S LEAVING: Sen. Ted Cruz has secured a meeting today at 11:30 a.m. with President Donald Trump and several Cabinet members, including Pruitt, for what he told ME is likely to be a "free-ranging discussion" about biofuels and the recent fights over the Renewable Fuel Standard. His message? "We need to find a solution that is a win-win. That is a win for corn farmers across the Midwest but at the same time is a win for blue-collar union members who work in refineries and right now are being bankrupted by a regulatory system that isn't working," the Texas Republican said. Other Senate Republicans are expected to attend as well (perhaps the ones who signed this letter). Remember Cruz still has a hold on Bill Northey's USDA's farm and conservation mission nomination, so watch to see if that's lifted as the most immediate outcome of the session.

Oilies only: Sen. Chuck Grassley wasn't invited to the meeting, his spokesman said, but not to worry: Grassley has said that a White House RFS meeting would be "a waste of time." And if there's one thing energy world knows now, it's that if you don't have Gang Grain, you got nothing.

WELCOME TO THURSDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and no one was able to name the Father Millet Cross national monument (which has since been transferred by Congress to a state park) as our nation's smallest at just 0.0074 acres when designated. For today: Which state currently has the most national monuments at 18? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

ARCTIC LEASE SALE FLOP: Despite touting the "largest ever" lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska, BLM received just bids on seven of the 900 tracts offered, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. Those bids, generating just $1.2 million in high bids, came jointly by ConocoPhillips and Anadarko for 80,000 acres, or less than 1 percent of the acreage offered. The highest bid amount was $14.99 per acre. The relatively low amount could undercut GOP arguments that opening up the nearby Arctic National Wildlife Refuge would generate $1 billion in revenue. Leasing of state land did quite a bit better, according to the Anchorage Daily News.

For perspective: At the price of $14.99/acre, "leasing the entirety of the Arctic Refuge Coastal Plain's 1.5 million acres would raise slightly more than $11 million in revenue for the federal government, a far cry from the billion dollar lie that Trump and Republicans are feeding the American public," the Alaska Wilderness League's Kristen Miller said in a statement. Remember the Republican budget calls for Senate ENR to kick in $1 billion in revenue (which CBO said would come through ANWR drilling), though the lease results seem to bolster skepticism from environmental advocates and Democrats about those estimates.

Situational awareness: Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski was named a tax conferee late Wednesday, along with Sens. Orrin Hatch, Mike Enzi, John Cornyn, John Thune, Rob Portman, Tim Scott and Pat Toomey. "With Congressman [Don Young] representing the House of Representatives on our energy provisions, Alaskans will have a very strong voice at the table to ensure this bill crosses the finish line," she said in a statement.

No (strategic petroleum) reservations: Count Shimkus, a tax conferee, among the backers of the Senate's approach of selling off 7 million barrels from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve as part of the final tax package H.R. 1 \(115\). "There was a reason to have the SPR," he told ME. "There is a credible reason to debate whether, for now and in the immediate future, there is a need." He also said he's a "big ANWR supporter" and that he doesn't see the Arctic drilling provision getting pulled from the final version.

INHOFE, PRUITT'S TOXIC LEGACY: POLITICO Magazine's Malcolm Burnley takes a

deep dive into the contaminated Oklahoma region of Tar Creek, an area so poisonous that only 10 holdouts live there, and he finds a buyout program for residents that left Sen. Jim Inhofe awash in scandal and litigation. Then-Attorney General Scott Pruitt ultimately concluded an audit into possible criminal wrongdoing didn't warrant charges and he shielded his review from public release, only to have some in the state believe his efforts were designed to spare Inhofe embarrassment. Many residents in the polluted zone of Tar Creek continue to express shock that no one was prosecuted over what happened in their federal buyout program

Pruitt and Inhofe flatly denied there was any political motivation in shielding the audit. "It was important to protect the individuals' reputation that were in that investigation," Pruitt said in an interview. "You would think that this wouldn't be a political issue, that people wouldn't put on the red and blue jerseys." One interesting fact though: Ryan Jackson, now Pruitt's chief of staff, was once Inhofe's point person on the Tar Creek issue. Photo gallery here.

Pruitt's new gig: Trump named the EPA administrator to chair the Gulf Coast Ecosystem Restoration Council, a group formed after the Deepwater Horizon oil spill restore the ecosystems and economies of the Gulf Coast, your ME host reports. Pruitt named Kenneth Wagner, a senior adviser, to be his designee on the council.

MAY FERC NOW BE WHOLE: New FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre will be sworn in today, bringing the five-member agency to full power, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. His swearing-in will put to rest rumors that either the Trump administration or McIntyre himself were delaying his start date to give current Chairman Neil Chatterjee enough service time to make staffing changes

MORE HEARINGS COMING ON CLEAN POWER PLAN: EPA announced Wednesday it would hold additional public hearings on its plan to repeal the Clean Power Plan in San Francisco; Gillette, Wyo.; and Kansas City, Mo., Pro's Emily Holden reports. Pruitt said the change was "due to the overwhelming response" and the agency will announce the dates and locations of the meetings in the coming weeks.

SPLIT OVER EXTENDERS? Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady told reporters Wednesday he doesn't like the idea of moving a package of extenders this year but hasn't made a final decision yet, Pro Tax's Brian Faler reports. "It's horrible policy and process," he said. But those comments come as Thune, the Senate's number three Republican, said lawmakers will revive biodiesel, geothermal and other energy-related breaks along with other "cats and dogs." Doing an extenders package as the chambers work to iron out differences between their broader tax bills is likely to test tax writers' bandwidth.

Shutdown watch: Congressional leaders head to the White House for a meeting with Trump on government funding today, but GOP lawmakers expect to pass a two-week spending package despite internal division within their party, POLITICO's Rachael Bade and Sarah Ferris report. House Freedom Caucus leaders have been asking for a commitment GOP leadership does not believe it can give them: a promise to "hold the line" and refuse Senate Democrats' demands for increased spending on non-defense programs.

House Democrats, including Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, hold a press conference at 10 a.m. in Cannon 234 to call on Republicans to take up additional federal assistance for Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands. Watch here.

ICYMI: Both sides framed their arguments at a hearing of the U.S. Trade Representative over whether to impose tariffs on solar equipment imports in language aimed at swaying Trump, Pro's Eric Wolff reports.

PATAGONIA SUES OVER BEARS EARS: A coalition of groups, including Patagonia, became the latest to file a lawsuit challenging the Trump administration's downsizing of Bears Ears National Monument on Monday. Link to the lawsuit filed in Washington federal court here.

ENDANGERMENT FINDING PUSHBACK STALLS: Conservative state lawmakers and businesses that are members of the American Legislative Exchange Council on Wednesday shot down an effort to urge Pruitt to challenge a science-based endangerment finding that requires EPA action on greenhouse gas emissions. "In subcommittee, a substantive conversation occurred where arguments were made for and against the draft model policy," said Bill Meierling, executive vice president of external relations for the group. "After debate, it was clear that neither the public nor the private sector supported the draft as written."

Meierling added that "ALEC members prefer to advance policy only after a consensus opinion has been reached." Reports suggested later the resolution had been pulled in the aftermath of strong opposition, including from Exxon Mobil. Pruitt was expected to speak at the ALEC meeting on Friday but canceled due to a "scheduling conflict," Meierling said.

NO COMMENT: Murkowski forcefully urged Sen. Al Franken to step down amid sexual harassment allegations on Wednesday, but a spokeswoman declined to state whether Roy Moore would be welcome on her committee if he wins the Alabama special election next week. "We aren't commenting until after the special election and decisions about committee seats are made by conference," she said. Outgoing Alabama Sen. Luther Strange currently has a slot on the energy panel.

THERE'S ALWAYS A TIE: Congressional Democrats said Tuesday they have evidence then-national security adviser Michael Flynn sent assurances to former business partners that a U.S.-Russia energy partnership in the Middle East, which reportedly would have included more than two dozen nuclear plants in the region, was "good to go," POLITICO's Kyle Cheney reports. The revelations from a whistleblower came in a letter released Tuesday.

MAIL CALL! LET'S BOOST EFFICIENCY CAPS! A collection of energy efficiency organizations, led by the Alliance to Save Energy, sent a letter to congressional appropriators on Wednesday urging them to boost "budget cap allocations for federal energy efficiency programs." Failure to do so could result in steep cuts to EPA and DOE programs across the board, the groups warn. Link here.

TAKE A GLANCE! LESSONS FROM THE RFS: The American Enterprise Institute is out with a report looking at policymaking lessons from the RFS. It argues the biofuels mandate would be better as a rate standard than a volume standard, EPA should issue multiyear rather than annual rules and that uncertainty should be explicitly incorporated into future rulemakings, among other things.

BAD SOLAR ACTORS: Campaign for Accountability released the results of a years-long investigation concluding two companies — Vivint and SolarCity — received more complaints about their sales tactics than others in the solar industry. "Unfortunately, the deceptive sales tactics of solar companies, like Vivint and SolarCity, are making rooftop solar a risky bet," Daniel Stevens, the group's executive director, said in a statement. Read it here.

DREAMS TURNED REALITY? The Center for Western Priorities is out with a report finding the Trump administration has already granted 13 of the energy industry's 24 top priorities. Read it here.

SUGGESTIONS GIVEN: American Council for Capital Formation released a paper this morning with ten ideas for improving the regulatory process. It's the product of a November 2016 roundtable with Sens. Mike Rounds, Angus King, James Lankford and others. Link here.

MOVER, SHAKER: Michael Boucher has joined Crowell & Moring LLP environment and natural resources practice as a partner in Washington. He joins from Dentons US LLP, where he led that firm's chemical, pesticide, and consumer product regulation team.

Biofuel backers claim victory in EPA battle Back

By Eric Wolff | 10/20/2017 05:37 PM EDT

Biofuels backers were breathing a sigh of relief on Friday after EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt backed away from changes to the Renewable Fuels Standard, a reversal that left oil refiners frustrated.

Pruitt acceded to demands from Sen. Joni Ernst that he publicly promise not to pursue plans to change the biofuel program rules — changes that had been sought by oil refiners who have long complained about the costs of implementing the program that many see as a giveaway to the corn states.

Pruitt's letter to Ernst, Sen. Chuck Grassley and five other Midwestern Republican senators delivered what they'd asked for: A promise not to expand the group of companies required to comply with the program, to keep the biodiesel volume requirements at levels proposed in July, to not alter the policy that strips RFS credits from exported ethanol, and to explore allowing year-round sale of gasoline with 15 percent ethanol nationwide.

The quick reversal by Pruitt — at the direction of President Donald Trump — showed the influence of the biofuel lobby, corn growers and farm-state lawmakers to scuttle changes in the decade-old policy sought by the energy industry.

"This was a basket of bad ideas for biofuels," said Brooke Coleman, head of the industry lobby group Advanced Biofuels Business Council. "And there's no way that we could have any other response than to take this approach. [Pruitt] didn't kick tires on changing the RFS, he tried to take a baseball bat to the program, and the response was matching and in response to, from a magnitude perspective, to the initial foul."

The push by the senators, as well as Midwestern governors, "made a huge difference in this matter," said Michael McAdams, head of the Advanced Biofuels Association. "In addition, the collective unity of the entire biofuels industry, including those who distribute and market these fuels, made a significant impression on the importance and support for the RFS program."

But oil refiners who have said the high cost of biofuel credits, called Renewable Identification Numbers, was costing them hundreds of millions of dollars, lamented the power of the biofuels lobby and the corn-belt lawmakers.

"The [Pruitt] letter is a result of political pressure applied by Midwestern politicians," said one refining source. "Some Midwesterners cannot accept any premise that the RFS could be improved. As a result, their overreaction included everything from holds on confirmations to even more personal threats launched at the White House and EPA."

The unified and vociferous campaign by the biofuels industry in attacking the proposal that would have lowered biodiesel volume mandates surprised some in the refining industry, as well as the political staff in the EPA, sources tell POLITICO.

The Trump administration's embrace of the oil industry had raised refiners' hopes that it could have the best opportunity in years for significant RFS changes, and refining giant Valero Energy, along with a group of Pennsylvania companies, believed they would get relief from what they considered an onerous program.

But Grassley took to the Senate floor to blast Pruitt's biofuel plans as a "betrayal" of Trump's promises to protect ethanol, and he arranged a call with Trump and Pruitt that led to the meeting in his office with Pruitt and Ernst as well as Deb Fischer (Neb.), John Thune (S.D.), Ben Sasse (Neb.), Pat Roberts (Kan.) and Mike Rounds (S.D.). Following that meeting, Ernst demanded the public statement from Pruitt, and said she would withhold her support for Bill Wehrum, who was nominated to run the agency's air office, forcing a delay in the Environment and Public Works Committee's vote until next week.

Ernst spokeswoman Brook Hougesson told POLITICO, "Now that Sen. Ernst has received the assurances that the EPA will support the spirit and the letter of the RFS, she will support Mr. Wehrum."

Valero was disappointed its efforts to change the program had been shot down by the fierce political opposition.

"These senators have intervened in a regulatory process, and the proposals and concepts in the letter address RFS implementation problems to which these senators have offered no constructive solutions," Valero said in a statement. "The only unifying principle of their bullying opposition seems to be a desire to maintain the status quo at all costs and to protect windfall profits associated with unregulated trading of renewable identification numbers, or RINs. Their position advances neither the goals nor the efficient implementation of the RFS, and places U.S. manufacturing jobs at risk."

But in a statement, the White House made clear that Trump remained fully behind the biofuels program.

"President Donald J. Trump promised rural America that he would protect the Renewable Fuel Standard, and has never wavered from that promise," spokeswoman Kelly Love said in a statement. "The president has had constructive conversations with several key officials about the RFS over the past week, and he understands their concerns. The Trump administration will protect the RFS and ensure that our Nation's hardworking farmers continue to fuel America."

One energy executive said the biofuel backers were victorious because they were unified in their support for the RFS, while Republicans, the oil industry, and even the refiners were not on the same page.

"The ethanol boys won this round, no doubt, but at a pretty high cost," said Stephen Brown, vice president for federal government affairs for Andeavor. "The refining industry is anything but united on the RFS beyond a sunset as individual companies have each made investments and honed mitigation strategies to comply with the statute. As those investment decisions become increasingly operationally embedded, the industry will continue to splinter on the suite of RFS issues."

But some producers are still wary of Pruitt's pledge in his Thursday letter, and they note that he promised to release a final rule in which none of the mandatory volumes will be less than he proposed in July. For some producers, those volumes were already too low.

"There's some work to do here," Coleman said. "We won't know until the rule is done. And we recognize it's an ongoing rulemaking, it's not like they're going or republish the rule, they've said what they can say. The final rule really matters."

'Largest ever' Interior Alaska oil lease sale draws little interest Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/06/2017 08:26 PM EDT

The Interior Department received only seven bids from two companies today in what it had billed as the "largest ever" oil and gas lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve in Alaska.

The bids on the 10.3 million unleased acres in the NPR-A generated just $1.2 million in high bids, according to a Bureau of Land Management summary. The relatively low amount could undercut GOP arguments that opening up the nearby Arctic National Wildlife Refuge would generate $1 billion in revenue.

A BLM Alaska lease sale last year generated $18 million for 1.4 million acres offered.

Subsidiaries of ConocoPhillips and Anadarko were the only two companies that participated in the lease sale. The companies only bid for 80,000 acres, or less than 1 percent of the acreage offered. The highest bid amount was $14.99 per acre.

Low oil prices and the relatively cheap and plentiful land available for hydraulic fracturing in the lower 48 has hurt oil company interest in the out-of-the-way fields of Alaska and the Gulf of Mexico. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) have pushed to open more public land to drilling, however, saying that doing so is important to increase domestic energy production.

Zinke had previously said that today's "large and unprecedented sale in Alaska will help achieve our goal of American Energy Dominance."

An Interior spokesperson did not immediately respond to questions.

WHAT'S NEXT: Republicans hope to keep ANWR drilling provisions in their budget proposal.

Democrats worry Arctic National Wildlife Refuge being lost amid tax debate Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/29/2017 05:17 AM EDT

Democrats' fight to keep oil and gas rigs out of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is losing ground as the Republican tax plan advances — and it's almost as if no one has noticed.

The prospect of drilling in the untouched Alaskan tundra is as close to reality as it's been in more than a decade, with none of the political drama that in past decades turned the refuge's fate into a top-tier rallying cry for liberals. Legislation to allow drilling in ANWR is quietly hitching a ride on the tax code overhaul that Senate Republicans hope to complete by the end of the week, overshadowed by larger debates on whether the bill is a giveaway to rich people and corporations at the expense of the poor and working class.

"It's really not gotten the attention that it should," Sen. Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.), a member of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, told POLITICO about the ANWR provision. "It's not just the budget discussion. It's about everything else that's going on, the flurry of all sorts of other news."

Angus King (I-Maine) said Republicans were trying to shield ANWR from opposition by adding it to the larger bill rather than bringing it to the floor separately under rules, which would require it to win support from 60 senators to overcome a filibuster.

"Well, clearly the strategy is to try to get it through as part of this tax reform effort and thereby avoid a direct up-or-down vote," King said in an interview earlier this month.

The nonstop news cycle and preponderance of other concerns with the tax bill are making it difficult to focus on an issue that normally fires up Democratic voters.

"I do think that putting ANWR in the budget reconciliation package hasn't drawn as much extremist opposition because it is completely overshadowed by tax reform, which is the center of the package," said Chris Guith, senior vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Global Energy Institute. "But there are some who aren't exactly supportive of tax reform that support ANWR, and it's possible to see ANWR bring a vote or two to help pass tax reform."

Senate Energy Chair Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) easily advanced legislation through her committee directing the Interior Department to hold two lease sales for drilling in ANWR over the next decade. It would raise $1 billion over that period, according to the Congressional Budget Office, making it eligible for inclusion in a budget reconciliation package that Democrats cannot filibuster.

The reconciliation package also will include Republicans' tax plan and a repeal of the Obamacare individual mandate. While Murkowski helped scuttle the Obamacare repeal push earlier this year, she says she supports ending the mandate. Murkowski's office did not respond to a request for comment.

ANWR, a swath of tundra on the northern Alaska coast, is home to polar bears, porcupine caribou and a landscape that hasn't been touched in thousands of years. Congress designated the 19 million-acre area a wildlife refuge in 1980, but it set aside a 1.5-million-acre parcel known as "10-02" for possible drilling if future lawmakers approved such a plan. The U.S.

Geological Survey estimated in 1998 that part of ANWR could hold up to 12 billion barrels of oil, and President Donald Trump and Alaska Republicans have called it essential for their plans for American "energy dominance."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who is undecided on the tax bill for a several reasons, said she will support an amendment on the Senate floor to eliminate the ANWR language, but she said success there is not a prerequisite for her to vote for the underlying bill. "No it is not, but I would certainly try to get it out of the package," Collins told reporters Tuesday. Collins was the only Republican to cross the aisle on an unsuccessful amendment to keep pro-drilling language out of the underlying budget resolution, meaning it is unlikely that she would be able to strip the ANWR provision from a reconciliation bill.

But Democrats say that passing a deficit-increasing tax bill in order to open ANWR would actually harm energy-producing states. That's because the $1.5 trillion shortfall from the GOP tax cuts would trigger required "pay-as-you-go" cuts to mandatory spending programs, according to a CBO analysis sent to House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

One of the programs on the pay-go chopping block would be the energy royalty revenue sharing program carried out through the Mineral Leasing Act. Cutting those payments would lose Alaska an estimated \$15 million in energy royalty payments next year alone, an amount important to a state already facing budget shortfalls.

"Communities throughout the West would be impacted by the loss of revenue, which is used to support a variety of needs including infrastructure, school funding, conservation, and recreation," Hoyer said in a statement to POLITICO. "This is yet another example of the consequences associated with forcing through legislation to add $1.5 trillion to the deficit in order to give tax cuts to the wealthy."

Pay-go cuts also would hit popular programs like Medicare and student loans, but Congress can waive the law with 60 votes in the Senate. Democrats are not yet on board with that approach.

The current push to open ANWR, coming amid a swarm of competing headlines and buried in larger legislation, has come nearer to succeeding than the GOP's two previous attempts. President Bill Clinton vetoed a budget package in 1995 that included language opening ANWR, while a Democratic filibuster thwarted a second attempt in 2005.

Environmental groups have targeted public engagement at only a handful of congressional districts. The League of Conservation Voters spent $550,000 on television ads in three Republican congressional districts. The LCV also paid for a bipartisan polling firm to probe public opinion on opening ANWR, but even that focused only on registered voters in eight congressional districts.

"The reason they're trying to sneak it into the tax package is they know they don't have the votes otherwise," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, the league's senior vice president of government affairs. "They know they can't pass it under regular order, that's why they're doing a sneak attack."

Even ANWR supporters are staying out of the spotlight.

"I haven't seen any full-out, front-page ads, nothing like that," Alaska Oil and Gas Association President Kara Moriarty said. "We're a little battle-weary, to be honest. Alaskans support opening up ANWR. There's been a few statements reiterating that."

The Environmental Scandal in Scott Pruitt's Backyard Back

By Malcolm Burnley | 12/06/2017 05:57 PM EDT

PICHER, Okla. — Tar Creek, Oklahoma, is breathtaking in a terrible way: At one time the world's deepest source of lead and zinc, the three-town region is now a cratered landscape so poisonous that no one, aside from 10 holdouts, can live there. Mountains of ashlike "chat," a toxic residue from lead-zinc milling, rise majestically among the remains of homes torn from their foundations. Abandoned pets forage around the ruins. A child's teddy bear lies sprawled in a ghostly living room. A gorilla statue fronts an empty high school, atop a sign proclaiming "1A Football State Champs, 1984."

Tar Creek is also part of the environmental legacy of one of the state's—and nation's—leading politicians, Senator Jim Inhofe, and his longtime ally, Scott Pruitt, the former Oklahoma attorney general who is now head of President Donald Trump's Environmental Protection Agency. After the EPA struggled to clean up the area, in 2006, Inhofe endorsed a plan in which a trust overseen by local citizens would use federal dollars to purchase homes and businesses in the toxic region so residents could move elsewhere. Then, when the plan proved so problematic that it spawned more than a half-dozen civil lawsuits and an audit into possible criminal wrongdoing, Pruitt, as the state's attorney general, invoked an exception to state freedom-of-information laws to keep the audit from being an open public record.

Now, that decision is coming into new light as many Oklahomans clamor for the audit to be released, suggesting that its revelations will prove embarrassing to Inhofe, who played a key role in designing the buyout plan, and cast doubt on Pruitt's decision not to move forward with charges. Last week, a Washington, D.C., nonprofit called the Campaign for Accountability raised the stakes even further, filing suit in Oklahoma courts to force the release of the audit.

"If you take a look at Scott Pruitt's record, you see a general disregard for transparency," said Daniel Stevens, the group's executive director. "I don't think it's outside our bounds to say that Pruitt is trying to hide evidence of criminal wrongdoing."

Pruitt, in an interview, dismissed the idea that he was covering anything up, saying his former office's grand jury unit reviewed the audit and determined that no charges were warranted. He said he declined to make it public because he didn't want innocent people to be besmirched, even though the auditor rejected that reasoning and maintained it should be a public document. "It was important to protect the individuals' reputation that were in that investigation," Pruitt said.

Nonetheless, the mess at Tar Creek continues to follow Pruitt in other ways. As EPA administrator, he has assumed full responsibility for the still-faltering cleanup. And eyebrows were raised in Oklahoma this past January when, as Pruitt was awaiting confirmation for his EPA post, a White House spokesperson told Bloomberg News that the handling of Tar Creek was emblematic of Pruitt's philosophy: "national standards, neighborhood solutions."

Pruitt, in an interview, said he knew nothing about the Bloomberg article, saying only that he endorses the EPA's current work at Tar Creek and the principle of combining federal resources and state and local leadership, rather than the buyout that occurred before his time as EPA administrator, while he was Oklahoma's attorney general.

"I think as far as a model going forward outside of the buyout, what we're trying to do is have a renewed focus on what I think are some of the most beneficial things we can do for citizens across the country, and that's to address some of these legacy sites that have substantial environmental challenges that allow them to once again enjoy the communities in their backyard," he said.

But many residents of the Tar Creek area, who gave up their homes in a buyout they considered both coercive and corrupt, continue to blame Pruitt for the fact that no one was prosecuted. They described a program so rife with good-old-boy corruption that certain individuals received outsize payoffs while some homeowners got so little they couldn't relocate anywhere nearby; meanwhile, they said, the people hired to demolish the homes received inflated contracts through a flawed process.

"We were lied to and deceived from Day One," said Gloria Workman, who said her son has learning disabilities from growing up in the polluted zone of Tar Creek, which had lead-poisoning levels in children that were three times higher than those registered in Flint, Michigan, during the peak of its recent water crisis. "Not only were we losing our homes, we were raped in the process."

"It was a nightmare," said Mary Thompson, who was still awaiting a resolution from the trust when an EF4 tornado ripped through Tar Creek in 2008, throwing bodies and trailers through the sky, killing six people and destroying more than 100 homes. Without homes, many people took lower-than-expected buyout offers—however insufficient they were perceived to be—because they had nothing left, she said.

"They preyed on us after the tornado," said Thompson, whose home was leveled.

Nonetheless, Inhofe, in a 2015 news release touting the completion of the buyout, cast it as a success because it did not lead to an expanded federal role.

"This is an example of a government program created for a specific purpose and then dissolves after the job is completed," Inhofe proclaimed.

Now, he continues to defend it but sounds less celebratory. "The first thing to know about the Superfund site at Tar Creek is that it's what's called a 'mega-site' and that it is an exceptional circumstance in every way. You can't compare it to any other Superfund site in the country," Inhofe said in a statement to POLITICO. "The voluntary relocation assistance to get people out of harm's way was right for the situation at Tar Creek, but may not be for every other Superfund—that is why state and local partnership is critical."

To many former residents, who still want the investigative report by the state auditor to see the light of day, even these modest and conditional endorsements feel like slaps in the face.

"People hate the government out here, and it's because of things like this," said Aletha Redden, a lifelong resident of the area who has a Donald Trump bumper sticker on her pickup truck. "I want Scott Pruitt to know: This is not the model."

***

A flat expanse of dusty roads and scrubby vegetation situated in the heart of Tornado Alley, the Tar Creek area was once the mainstay of the Quapaw Tribe, which was forcibly relocated there by the U.S. government in 1834. At the time, the territory had little economic value, but a half-century later, prospectors discovered enormously rich ore. By the turn of the 20th century, companies broke ground with drill rigs on Quapaw land.

Many of those firms made fortunes, luring white settlers into an uneasy state of coexistence with the Quapaw. Tar Creek proved to be the deepest reservoir of lead-zinc ore in the world, producing a whopping $1 billion in minerals between 1908 and 1950, according to the Oklahoma Historical Society. Picher, the largest of the mining towns, swelled to a population of 14,000.

Almost every aspect of life in Tar Creek traced back to the mines. The high school took on the mascot of a gorilla, a reference to workers in the mines who broke up boulders with hammers. Children played in sandboxes filled with chat, the chalky mining debris. Teenagers earned the nickname "chat rats" for climbing up the pillowy piles of toxic rubble throughout town and rolling tires down their slopes.

By the end of World War II, however, the boom was over. Most of the mining companies decamped for richer pastures. For the families left behind—including that of Yankees slugger Mickey Mantle, who grew up in the Tar Creek area in the 1940s—it was a slowly unfolding disaster. The extent of Tar Creek's collapse was reflected in the words of John F. Kennedy, who barnstormed into Joplin, Missouri—25 miles away from Tar Creek—in the closing days of the 1960 presidential campaign.

"My own judgment is I know no tougher occupation in the world that [sic] to be a miner, lead, zinc, coal. I am always glad to meet them because I think they live with peril," Kennedy declared. "They have as tough a life as there is. Every other one whose hand you shake has a finger off, a foot crushed, the chances of in 20 years their having a bad accident are more than any of the rest of us. And yet in this community and in West Virginia and Idaho and in other sections of the United States, there has been no group that has been harder hit, no group that has been more forgotten."

Indeed, after the last prospector looking for ore packed up and left in the mid-1970s, people looked to casinos and farming to make a living. But the residue from decades of mining was poisoning them. In 1979, acid mine water leached into the ground, threatening the area's aquifers, killing fish and turning creeks a rusty orange color. When the federal Superfund program—designed to clean up the nation's most polluted and contaminated land—kicked off in the early 1980s, Tar Creek was named to the inaugural National Priorities List. It's still on the list.

The EPA has spent more than $176 million over the past 25 years on cleanup work inside the 42-square-mile-area, on projects from plugging mine shafts to removing contaminated surface soil in people's yards. Though the amount of money sounds large, it hasn't been nearly enough to remove the toxic dangers, and many residents insist the cleanup was mishandled from the get-go. In some cases, the removal of soil resulted in sloping yards, which, during bouts of rain, caused flooding and mold inside houses. In 2000, the FBI raided the offices of the EPA's prime contractor at Tar Creek, Morrison-Knudsen. The company later settled a lawsuit brought by the federal government alleging false representation of billing and progress reports for a sum of $1 million. In the settlement, the company made no admission of wrongdoing.

Meanwhile, the environmental hazards began to multiply: Shortly after the start of that Superfund spending spree, in 1993, researchers at the University of Oklahoma found that 34 percent of Quapaw children were living with lead concentrations above the federal limit. Further studies found alarming rates of lead and arsenic in both the tribal and non-tribal populations. In 1997, a university-lead study estimated that 21 percent of children near Tar Creek had elevated blood-lead levels (defined as 10 micrograms per liter at the time), which is three times higher than the highest measurements found in Flint, Michigan, in 2015. The learning disabilities and memory loss that had plagued the schools and curtailed lifespans for decades suddenly had a culprit.

As the dangers became ever-more visible and the cleanup lagged, residents rallied around the idea that the government should quickly buy them out of their homes, rather than wait for the hazardous materials to be removed. They thought they might have an ally in the state's senior senator, Inhofe, a Republican who was chair of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. But Inhofe, who has a skepticism about environmental science that exceeds that of any of his colleagues, refused to consider the idea. "There will never be a buyout. I promise you that," Inhofe told the Tulsa World in late 2003.

Inhofe's refusal to take action of any sort was often criticized in local press, due in part to the relentless attacks of a young Democratic congressman named Brad Carson. "If you'd asked people in Oklahoma politics at the time, they'd say we were mortal enemies," said Carson, referring to himself and Inhofe. "I was elected [to Congress] in 2000, and my goal was to untie the Gordian knot. The area is desperately poor. If it was in suburban Tulsa or Oklahoma City, there would've been outrage."

In 2004, Governor Brad Henry signed a bill authorizing the use of state dollars for the relocation of roughly 100 families with children under the age of 6. Under pressure to take further action, the senior senator began to come around. At first, he secured $2 million in federal funding to pay for a study that discovered that 286 homes within Tar Creek were at risk of being swallowed up from cave-ins of underground mine shafts. This provided an opportunity for Inhofe to reverse himself on the buyout, supporting it on the grounds of protecting residents from cave-ins.

"The stability with the underground mine workings was worse than anyone had previously been thought," recalls Ed Keheley, a retired nuclear engineer and native of Picher who co-authored the study's final report. In the spring of 2006, Inhofe announced a joint federal and state buyout program that would begin with $20 million in funding, with the express purpose of relocating any and all people who'd voluntarily leave Tar Creek.

Having once opposed the buyout to his political detriment, Inhofe now used his clout to keep on funding it, but with the idea that decision-making would be concentrated among local leaders, not the federal government. With Inhofe's support, the Oklahoma legislature created a nine-member panel called the Lead Impacted Communities Relocation Assistance Trust to assume control over the project. The members were all volunteers, helping their community, but some had a vested interest in the buyout: They included, for example, a local banker whose institution would later give loans to people to help them relocate; local property owners whose own homes—and those of relatives—would be subject to the buyout; town officials; and a leader of the Quapaw Tribe.

Inhofe cast himself in the role of the community's protector, putting out a 2008 campaign ad that declared: "Tar Creek: poisoned earth, the threat of schools and churches sinking into abandoned mines. Everyone thought it would be too much to tackle, except for one stubborn man named Inhofe."

But over a five-year period, the buyout would become the subject of a host of civil lawsuits and the subject of a state investigation.

***

The local members of the trust—few, if any, of them schooled in environmental management—had two major tasks: figuring out how much each property owner should be paid for their home or business, and then choosing a company to demolish the properties. Both tasks would become the subject of complaints about cronyism, with residents saying the trust members rewarded their friends and politically connected individuals.

It didn't help that the trust often met behind closed doors, and that the vice chairman of the trust resigned within a year. The trust's sole employee, operations manager Sonya Harris, also quit, declaring in her resignation letter that she could no longer continue "with a clear conscience without recommending a change; I will not place myself in a position to be perceived as approving of the operations to this point."

The first case to raise eyebrows involved the mayor of Picher, Ernest "Sam" Freeman. In 2005, when the buyout was first being discussed as a probability, he acquired three large parcels of former mining land covered with chat from the Picher Development Authority, which he chaired. Freeman bought them at 3 cents per square foot, for a total price of $2,088.50, according to the findings of a state audit at the time. It was, the audit declared, a violation of state laws forbidding members of public boards from entering into contracts with those boards. Ottawa County District Attorney Eddie Wyant called on Freeman to return the properties to the development authority in lieu of charges.

"If Sam wanted to buy that land, he needed to get off the board and purchase it legally," Wyant told a local newspaper at the time. "I am not one to put anyone in jail over this, but he needs to clear it up." Wyant, when reached by phone, declined to comment further.

Freeman returned the land, but, in a move that enraged some neighbors, profited off it anyway. The trust had decided that, because so much former mining land had been taken over by state authorities and tribal members, those who owned mobile homes or other shelters on land they didn't own would be eligible for buyouts. Freeman made a claim based on the fact that he had been maintaining and renting out homes on the chat-infested property for years before he tried to buy it.

Trust documents show that Freeman received at least $274,000 from the buyout, more than half of which came from the same lots he had been ordered to return by law enforcement. (Freeman told POLITICO a payout of more than a quarter-million sounded accurate enough, though he declined to provide an exact figure.) Neighbors suspected cronyism. Freeman, who is no longer mayor, denied receiving any preferential treatment. "These people thought I bought the lots to make a killing in the buyout," he said. "I don't think I got more than anyone else would have."

The size of the mayor's profit diminished public confidence in the trust, just as it was engaged in the most delicate part of its task, figuring out how much to pay each individual property owner. Property owners were supposed to receive fair market prices as if pollution hadn't existed in Tar Creek, based on the sales of similar properties elsewhere in northeast Oklahoma. But those calculations appeared to lack uniformity.

The average payout for the 695 properties involved in the buyout was just over $65,000, but the disparity in prices between two properties could be dramatic. Residents complained about lowball offers on some decent properties and overly high payouts for others that were rundown or minuscule in size.

"I got $3,000 for my gun shop. It took me $16,000 to build it," said former Tar Creek resident John Frazier.

Wally Long said he and his wife got $35,000 for their Dairy Queen, while another Dairy Queen right up the road got substantially more.

"We were told [by the trust] that's all the money there is," Long said. "It bothered my wife a lot. She put 23 years of her life into this business."

Meanwhile, a trust member named Janell Trimble got $185,000 for her house, and her brother collected $115,000 for his fiberboard house.

"I may be a member of the [relocation trust's committee], but I honor my duties and I recuse myself when family members are involved," Trimble told the Tulsa World in 2008. "[B]ut as a buyout participant I also expect to be treated just like the next person."

Nonetheless, both Trimble and her brother received more than 35 percent above the average price per square foot. On the other end of the spectrum, an elderly woman named Betty Betts received an offer of $12,000 for her home; when she protested, the appraised value was raised to $20,000. Many people got so little for their homes that they had to turn around and take out loans in order to resettle elsewhere in Oklahoma. In the end, the trust finished up with millions in unspent funds.

Residents concentrated their anger on the company that the trust hired to conduct the appraisals, Cinnabar, which had previously made headlines for its management of a noise-insulation program at the Tulsa Airport, which involved multiple lawsuits. In response, the trust engaged an "appraisal reviewer" to go back over Cinnabar's work. But the reviewer, a company named Van Tuyl Associates, quickly came under criticism as well. "They [often] didn't get out of their car. They never entered these homes," said Keheley, who was a member of the trust at the time. (Van Tuyl Associates is now defunct; its former president could not be reached for comment.)

When the unrest over the buyout made the local newspapers, the trust's leadership pointed to a 95 percent acceptance rate for buyout offers. But some residents accused trustees of pressuring them with "take it or leave it" offers, according to a class-action lawsuit brought against the trustees, Cinnabar and Van Tuyl by more than 250 residents affected by the buyout. Plaintiffs also complained that they were denied the right to view the appraisal paperwork. There was even a fake camera—and posters notifying residents they were being videotaped—in the room where buyout offers were made, an apparent attempt to compel residents to take the offers, according to documents in the suit.

The suit, filed in Oklahoma district court, accused the defendants of cheating average property owners and rewarding friends and associates of the trustees. Depositions revealed an explanation for some of the inconsistencies in appraisals: For certain properties, Cinnabar expanded the boundaries of where it could find "comparables"—properties in adjacent counties whose sale prices were used to calculate the appraisals—with the approval of a state employee named J.D. Strong, who, according to the lawsuit, played a significant role in overseeing the trust.

One of the properties appraised in this fashion was that of Trimble, whose $185,000 payout, according to appraisal documents, had infuriated other residents.

When, in 2008, residents outlined their frustrations in a scathing six-page letter to Inhofe, Henry and other elected officials, Strong dictated the governor's reply, which was co-signed by Inhofe, lawyers for the plaintiffs asserted in his deposition. "I may have drafted this," Strong responded, when presented with a copy of the letter saved on Strong's computer.

In an interview, Strong defended the trust and its system of appraisals: "We knew going in that we weren't going to be the most popular. We went in with the idea that we were going to be fair. I can honestly say that, looking back, we were fair and unbiased and frugal."

During the six years the lawsuit was making its way through the state court system, both Cinnabar and Van Tuyl Associates declared bankruptcy. Eventually, the plaintiffs and the trust settled the case in 2015 for $1.3 million, which, after deducting attorney fees, meant that each resident ended up receiving an additional $2,600.

But that didn't satisfy many property owners.

"The people of Tar Creek were treated like second-class citizens, based on where they were born and lived," concluded Wally Kennedy, a columnist at the Joplin Globe who reported on northeast Oklahoma, including Tar Creek, for more than 30 years. "For someone to portray the buyout of the people of Tar Creek as a successful program is lying through their teeth."

***

Once the trust obtained the properties on the toxic land, the next problem was how to destroy the empty structures that were on them.

Inhofe made sure there was enough money for the job. Even as he joined fellow Republicans in condemning President Barack Obama's 2009 stimulus bill as an unwarranted giveaway, the senior senator helped secure an additional $15.7 million in the bill to help the trust finish its work.

The trust hired a local businessman named Jack Dalrymple to oversee bids for the demolition contract. He was best known for organizing an annual deer hunt for paralyzed veterans, an endeavor that earned him a lifetime achievement award from a local Chamber of Commerce. His payment was to be 10 percent of the value of the winning bid. He formulated a scoring system to evaluate bids and, in March 2010, the trust awarded the contract to Stone's Backhoe, the most expensive of all four bids. At $2.1 million, it was nearly four times the cost of the lowest bidder.

Just 14 days after Stone's was declared the winner, it asked that the contract be reassigned to two subcontractors, CWF Enterprises, a carpet-cleaning business, and Vision Construction and Management. Former residents contend that there were longstanding ties between Dalrymple and the subcontractors. Whether or not they were friends before, they soon became hunting buddies. In October 2012, local coverage of Dalrymple's annual event for paralyzed veterans pictured the heads of the two firms setting up the flag for the hunt.

One of the losing contractors filed suit against the trust and individual trustees in Oklahoma district court, accusing them of violating the state's open-meeting act and competitive bidding act. The district county judge sided with the plaintiff, reopening the bidding process.

But rather than blame Dalrymple, the trust gave him a new contract. It included a flat rate for his services, $305,472—about $100,000 more than he would have received had the contract remained with Stone's.

In January 2011, a $1.7 million demolition contract was awarded to none other than CWF Enterprises, the carpet-cleaning business, which was also the least expensive of the three bids received. A month later, however, the estimated cost of the contract ballooned to $3,050,786—almost exactly 10 times what Dalrymple received in his new contract.

While many residents cried foul, Andy Lester, the trust's attorney, attributed the increase to the fact that the EPA-controlled repository for dumping debris had just closed down. Trekking the remains of the houses and businesses to a dumping ground further away caused the massive change order, and a near doubling of the contract.

Lester also defends the choice of Dalrymple to handle the bids, contending that he was an engineer with some prior experience with public contracts and that the trust members couldn't handle the process on their own.

"It is important to remember that the trust board consisted of nine members—including, for example, a physician, a school teacher, and a mushroom farmer. They were volunteers, not professionals at this kind of work," Lester said. "Jack Dalrymple is a professional engineer with significant experience. And candidly, there are very few professional engineers in northeast Oklahoma."

Nonetheless, lawyers out of the Tulsa region filed a lawsuit in 2012 under the False Claims Act that accused the trust members, Dalrymple and the heads of the companies hired to do demolition work of being part of a "good old boy network" and defrauding federal taxpayers.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Zach and Brad Barron, say the lawsuit fizzled when the Department of Justice took the stance that "the government didn't sustain damages" from the charges laid out in the complaint. In a false claims lawsuit, where the plaintiffs are effectively trying to recoup money that's owed to the government, a lack of willingness from the government is effectively a death knell, the Barrons said. The lawsuit was eventually dismissed.

In an interview, Dalrymple insisted the allegations of cronyism were entirely unfounded.

"There were a lot of emotions and feelings during that period," he said. "When you ask someone to leave their home, it's a tough thing. But ... there was nothing there."

***

Still, the drumbeat of complaints continued, eventually reaching the ear of Jerry Morris, the state director for Oklahoma's then-junior senator, Republican Tom Coburn.

It was no secret that Coburn, a physician who cast himself as a political outsider, didn't look upon Inhofe with any sort of fond feelings of mentorship.

"I think they were often seen as having very different approaches to politics," said David Blatt of the Oklahoma Policy Institute. "Inhofe is seen as a classic, pork-barrel politician who'd bring federal dollars to Oklahoma, the more the merrier." Whereas Coburn, Blatt says, "hated that kind of politics and did as little of it as he possibly could. In fact, he spoke disdainfully and caustically about it the whole time he was in the Senate."

Coburn was not shy about stepping on his fellow Republican's toes. Morris forwarded a memo with a lengthy list of allegations related to the awarding of contracts in the Tar Creek buyout, especially regarding the demolition work, to then-Attorney General Pruitt. In April 2011, Pruitt asked the state auditor and inspector, Gary Jones, to look into the memoranda sent from Coburn's office.

"I have determined that these concerns are serious in nature such that an investigation of the matter is warranted," Pruitt wrote to Jones. A 17-point list of allegations for Jones to investigate followed, including whether there was collusion between Dalrymple and the contractors hired to do the demolition work.

After spending almost two years on the investigation, Jones turned over the results of the audit to the attorney general's office in January 2014, apparently believing it had uncovered important information.

For a year and a half, the attorney general sat on the findings. Then, in May 2015, Pruitt announced that he wouldn't press charges. In addition, he vowed to keep the audit secret by refusing to release it.

Jones fired back at the attorney general's office days later, penning a letter to Pruitt that described his rationale for withholding the audit as "baffling."

"To our knowledge, the individuals named in the report are members of a public trust or contractor whose services were retained as part of this substantive project," Jones wrote. Further, he contended, "our office has received no inquiries from you or your staff regarding the content of the audit report."

Pruitt justified the secrecy by comparing the investigation results to the findings of a grand jury. "Specifically, our office is concerned about publication of unsubstantiated criminal allegations against private citizens," Pruitt wrote in a 2015 statement.

In an interview with POLITICO, Pruitt appeared to go one step further, suggesting the audit had in fact been vetted by a grand jury.

"You're addressing issues that it's been some months since I've looked into," Pruitt said. "I know the decision I made at that time was based upon the investigative audit. The investigative audit didn't yield anything to the grand jury, and, as such, it was important to protect the individuals' reputation that were in that investigation."

But when asked to clarify, a Pruitt staff member indicated that he was using the term "grand jury" as shorthand for the Multi-County Grand Jury Unit, a division of the AG's office, headed at the time by a Pruitt appointee, which decides whether to take cases to a grand jury for indictment.

It's not the same as a grand jury finding. Nonetheless, the attorney general's office, now overseen by Mike Hunter, Pruitt's former top deputy, has denied all open records requests for the audit, declaring it to be "under the supervision of the Multi-County Grand Jury Unit." A spokeswoman for the Oklahoma attorney general's office said that if there was in fact a grand jury, the office couldn't confirm or deny that.

These rationales befuddle open records experts.

"I don't think there's anything in the law that would prohibit it [the investigation] from being released," said Joey Senat of Oklahoma State University, the president of FOIA Oklahoma. "The law doesn't require that the audit be kept secret. What would its release be harming? They've closed the investigation and decided not to prosecute."

Jones, who is now running for governor, reiterated his call for the attorney general's office to release the audit, saying in a statement that "regarding any investigation of this kind, we always err on the side of transparency and the people of Oklahoma have a right to know."

Concluded Senat: "When you have the state auditor [Gary Jones] saying these are not unsubstantiated claims and this is a serious problem, good government would call for letting the public know what happened and showing the public the audit. Transparency helps alleviate a lot of concerns about favoritism, corruption, and incompetency—if those are indeed unfounded."

***

Tar Creek today looks like an abandoned landfill. Illegal dumping has added a fresh layer of grime to the already ruined patch of earth. Giant craters from collapsed mine shafts, some as large as 200 feet in diameter, are filled with Bud Light cans, shotgun shells and the tangled remains of kids' playground equipment. "We call this urban renewal, Picher style," quipped former resident Gloria Workman.

Abandoned houses that were not part of the buyout are now coated with graffiti. The charred remains of the former mining museum in Picher, which burned down at the hands of arsonists, stands as a teetering monument to Tar Creek's former way of life. And the sense of danger and destruction extends beyond the former buyout area: On rainy days, local fields used for football practice bleed a toxic shade of orange.

The EPA is continuing its now 33-year-old cleanup effort, and it's thrust the Quapaws back into stewardship of the land. Although the tribe leased away or sold off significant chunks of Tar Creek to mining companies throughout the 20th century, the Quapaws have at least temporarily regained control of all of it. Since 2012, the tribe—a sovereign nation with roughly 5,500 members—has been the primary EPA contractor for environmental remediation at Tar Creek. It's the first time any tribe has been a prime contractor on a Superfund site, assigning all the contracts and overseeing all the work.

"It's a great story," said Craig Kreman, assistant environmental director of the Quapaw tribe. "We're employing tribal members a lot of the time and members of the community. So that income [from the EPA contract] stays here in this community and is being spent in this community. We're not hiring a contractor out of Georgia."

Every day, a steady stream of trucks haul away more than 2,000 tons of soil saturated with cadmium, lead and other metals at the site. Each patch of earth requires years of passive soil treatments before it tests clean enough to plant row crops like winter wheat. Half-acre by half-acre, the hope is that Tar Creek can be put into productive agricultural use decades from now.

In August, after touring the abandoned area and surrounding towns, Pruitt's senior adviser Albert "Kell" Kelly, praised the EPA's efforts surrounding Tar Creek in sweeping terms: "People from all across the country count on the Superfund program to address pollution and revitalize their communities. Tar Creek cleanup is an excellent example of how the program should work. State and local partners, tribal partners, and EPA—all working together year after year to address historical pollution at this mega-site. It's cooperative federalism working at its best."

But many local observers, including Ed Keheley, aren't nearly as positive.

"Usually, the EPA comes in, they do their dirty work, sprinkle some wheat seed, take a picture to show Congress, and next year it looks like this," he said, pointing to a barren pasture. "Clearly, the EPA hasn't had the best interests of the people at heart. So I get personally offended when people like Scott Pruitt suggest otherwise."

For his part, Pruitt announced a fresh grant of $5 million to the Quapaw-led project last May, and he is quick to distance this experiment in local control from the one that preceded it.

"We [the EPA] can't impact the buyout. We didn't authorize the buyout. I didn't manage the buyout and its unique situation," Pruitt said. "I think what's most tangible is what we can do together with the tribe to advance and continue remediation."

When asked to respond to the undying complaints of residents in rural Ottawa County, where Tar Creek is located—a county in which Trump received 71 percent of the vote in November 2016—Pruitt changed the subject. "I had no experience with Tar Creek, to be honest with you," he said.

That's true, except it was his office's decision, when he was attorney general, not to prosecute the people accused of mishandling the trust money, Keheley and other local residents point out.

But what galls them more than the failure to prosecute is the failure to release the results of a government investigation—an audit that they believe will raise questions about Pruitt's unwillingness to press charges and cast a negative light on a project near and dear to Inhofe's heart.

Pruitt's connections to Inhofe are extensive. One of Pruitt's first hires as EPA chief was Ryan Jackson, a longtime Inhofe staffer and the senator's point person on Tar Creek, who is now Pruitt's chief of staff. He also brought on four other former aides to Inhofe, the Senate's leading proponent of the idea that man-made pollution contributing to climate change is a conspiracy and a hoax. Three of them are Pruitt's senior advisers on air, climate and legal issues.

"It gives me a level of comfort to know that we have a bureaucracy that's actually going to be serving instead of ruling," Inhofe told the Washington Post, applauding Pruitt for hiring his staff.

Numerous veteran Oklahoma political watchers, some of whom spoke to POLITICO on condition of anonymity, suggest that there may be an ulterior motive in Pruitt's embrace of Inhofe: It's widely believed that Pruitt, who is 49, wants to run for Inhofe's seat when the senator retires. Many observers think Inhofe is unlikely to seek reelection in 2020, when he'll be 85. And some have noted that Pruitt's decision not to advance the case against the buyout trust spared Inhofe the embarrassment of seeing the program he personally tailored and promoted go down in scandal.

"Pruitt is a rising Republican political star previously in Oklahoma and now nationally," said one journalist who closely follows the Oklahoma political scene. "There have been rumblings that Pruitt might have his eye on higher office. ... Pruitt would do everything to keep Inhofe close, assuming he wants to run for that seat."

Wally Kennedy, the Joplin Globe columnist who has covered the Tar Creek trust more closely than any other journalist, said, "My sense of the way that unfolded was that Pruitt decided he was not going to do any kind of prosecution, and then Inhofe writes a letter saying what an outstanding job the trust did. My reaction was 'Huh?'"

"The fact that the audit was not publicly disclosed tells me that somebody is hiding something," he added. "This is Oklahoma taxpayers' money being committed to ratting out what appears to be some apparent corruption. But everybody looks the other way. That's why I'm talking to you. Because if you can shed a light on this, maybe somebody will say 'We need to take a second look at this.'"

Pruitt, however, insists his decisions were strictly based on the law, and an Inhofe staffer flatly dismissed the possibility of Inhofe influencing Pruitt's decision.

"Senator Inhofe would have had no involvement in the case or in any of then-Attorney General Pruitt's decisions," the staffer said.

Pruitt was similarly bemused by the idea that there would have been any sort of political calculation behind his decision to shield the audit. The only politics in this case, he suggested, was on the part of those who want to embarrass him and Inhofe.

"You would think that this wouldn't be a political issue, that people wouldn't put on the red and blue jerseys," Pruitt said in frustration.

Others argue that transparency in this case is not a political issue as much as a legal right.

"The open records act seems pretty clear this audit should be released," said Stevens, executive director of Campaign for Accountability. "You have to ask why he's not releasing it? Pruitt should have to be held accountable for this."

Pruitt named chair of Gulf Coast Ecosystem Restoration Council Back

By Anthony Adragna | 12/06/2017 07:28 PM EDT

President Donald Trump announced today that EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt would chair the Gulf Coast Ecosystem Restoration Council.

The group, formed in 2012 after the Deepwater Horizon oil spill, helps restore the ecosystems and economies of the Gulf Coast. Pruitt was unanimously selected by Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas, the five states on the council.

"I am honored to be selected by the states and look forward to working with the governors to continue the excellent work of this Council to further the critical mission of restoring the Gulf of Mexico ecosystem," he said in a statement.

Pruitt named Kenneth Wagner, a senior adviser, to be his designee on the council. He takes over the chairmanship from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Powelson says McIntyre to be sworn in Thursday Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/06/2017 03:33 PM EDT

New FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre will be sworn in on Thursday, FERC Commissioner Rob Powelson told an audience of electric power officials in Philadelphia today.

"At a general session this afternoon in Philadelphia, one of the key speakers was FERC Commissioner Rob Powelson, and during his speech this afternoon he confirmed that Kevin McIntyre will be sworn in tomorrow," PJM Interconnection spokeswoman Susan Buehler said.

President Donald Trump nominated McIntyre, a partner at the law firm of Jones Day, to be commissioner and designated him to be chair months ago. The Senate confirmed him in early November, and he received his signed commission just before Thanksgiving.

His swearing in will put to rest rumors that either the Trump administration or McIntyre himself were delaying his start date to give current Chairman Neil Chatterjee enough service time to make staffing changes. Chatterjee will miss that deadline by a day.

It also puts McIntyre in charge of the process initiated by Energy Secretary Rick Perry that is aimed at supporting coal-fired and nuclear power plants in an effort to protect the power grid's resilience. Action on that proposal is expected by Monday.

EPA to hold more hearings on Clean Power Plan withdrawal Back

By Emily Holden | 12/06/2017 03:28 PM EDT

EPA will hold three additional public hearings on a proposal to withdraw the Clean Power Plan, in San Francisco; Gillette, Wyo.; and Kansas City, Mo., the agency announced today.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt in a press release said the change was "due to the overwhelming response" to two days of hearings in West Virginia last week. Many environmental advocates criticized EPA for initially scheduling hearings only in coal country.

The agency will announce the dates and locations of the meetings in the coming weeks, and speakers must register.

The Obama administration, by comparison, held public hearings on the proposed climate standards in 2015 in Pittsburgh, Denver, Atlanta and Washington, D.C.

WHAT'S NEXT: Comments on the draft withdrawal are due Jan. 16.

Republicans divided over taking up tax extenders this year Back

By Brian Faler | 12/06/2017 05:40 PM EDT

Republican leaders are divided over whether to take up a second tax-cut bill this year.

Senate Republicans want to move legislation reviving a rump group of tax "extenders," separate from their more sweeping plan to rewrite the code.

But the House's top tax writer isn't so sure.

"I don't like the extenders," said House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady (R-Texas). "It's horrible policy and process."

"No decision yet," he added, saying lawmakers need to talk it over.

His comments came after Sen. John Thune, the chamber's No. 3 Republican, said today lawmakers will revive biodiesel, geothermal and other energy-related breaks along with other "cats and dogs," including a tax credit to maintain short-line railroads.

Thirty-four temporary tax provisions expired at the end of last year, including 16 energy ones, and lawmakers are now facing demands to revive them. Some want to attach the provisions to funding legislation needed to keep the government open H.J. Res. 123 \(115\).

Many Republicans had sworn off the "extender" ritual after a 2015 tax agreement made many of the breaks permanent while giving others what lawmakers said was one final extension — which, for some, ended last year.

Putting together an extender bill, even as lawmakers negotiate a final compromise on their tax-overhaul plans, is likely to test tax writers' bandwidth.

Solar pitches target Trump at USTR hearing Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/06/2017 03:46 PM EDT

Supporters of tough trade tariffs on solar energy equipment and their opponents squared off again at a hearing of the U.S. Trade Representative today, with both sides coloring their arguments in language aimed at swaying the White House.

The two companies seeking tariffs on foreign shipments of solar panels and cells, Suniva and SolarWorld Americas, pressed the case that barriers were vital for protecting U.S. manufacturing of the clean energy technology because of its importance for national security — issues at the heart of President Donald Trump's "America First" agenda.

"A strong remedy is required to persevere the U.S. industry, provide breathing space for this American-invented manufacturing technology," said Matt Card, vice president of operations for bankrupt Suniva. "Anything less would ... result in the loss of this industry. That would have a dramatic negative impact on national security."

Witnesses at the hearing opposed to instituting tariffs raised the same issues, but contended that trade barriers would threaten other businesses, and that the benefits of tariffs would help only a narrow segment of the solar industry.

"Factories in South Carolina and across the nation would suffer from solar tariffs," South Carolina Gov. Henry McMaster told the panel. "While there is only one operating factory in the U.S. petitioning for these tariffs, there are over 50 American-owned factories employing thousands of people that would be the ones harmed, including a steel mill in South Carolina that provides American-made steel for many of the U.S. factories that produce metal equipment for the utility scale solar farms."

The panel, which included representatives from the departments of Energy, Treasury, State, Labor and Commerce, and from the Council of Economic Advisers, appeared unmoved by the national security arguments, and instead peppered parties with detailed questions about the potential tariffs' impacts on U.S. solar power demand. Panel members also questioned whether a few years of trade protections would be enough time for Suniva and SolarWorld to hike their production enough to catch up to overseas competition.

They pressed witnesses from both side on how tariffs would effect the domestic solar market, whether a modest tariff would be effective, and their opinions on the recommendations the U.S. International Trade Commission sent the White House last month. ITC members recommended a range of options, from sliding scale of tariffs to a cap on total shipments.

The Trade Representative will send the White House a recommendation, and Trump has until Jan. 26 to make a decision.

PRUITT'S CARBON TIGHTROPE BALANCING ACT: Leaving the door open to rewrite the Obama administration's Clean Power Plan would help President Donald Trump's administration honor the wishes of power companies looking to avoid years of legal uncertainty but might not satisfy the demands of some conservative activists, Pro's Emily Holden reports. EPA wants to move to collect comments about whether to write a new regulation, and is likely to write a new rule given the agency would be on much shakier legal ground if it simply opted not to regulate carbon dioxide from power plants.

Any replacement rule would be unlikely to take a meaningful bite out of carbon levels and would be based on a much narrower interpretation of EPA's Clean Air Act authority. That may be enough in the interim for some conservatives who would prefer a straight withdrawal of Clean Power Plan but who wouldn't oppose a replacement rule. "Ultimately, the responsibility to fix this mess lies with the Congress, so until they act, the only thing the Administration can do is minimize the damage," said Tom Pyle, a conservative lobbyist with the American Energy Alliance who led Trump's Energy Department transition team. But the details could have political implications for Pruitt, who is widely seen as a potential candidate for the U.S. Senate in his native Oklahoma.

Most utilities assume future regulations or laws will ultimately require them to curb carbon emissions even if the Obama administration's Clean Power Plan goes down and support EPA issuing a replacement rule — albeit a much weaker one. "We think that future regulation of carbon emissions from power production is likely, and could provide additional planning certainty," Tammy Ridout, a spokeswoman with coal-heavy AEP, said. Regardless of the approach Pruitt ultimately selects, environmental groups are sure to vigorously contest his efforts in court.

DOMENECH CLEARS SENATE: Trump's pick for Interior assistant secretary nominee, Douglas Domenech, cleared the Senate by voice vote late Wednesday. The veteran of George W. Bush's Interior Department who was on the Trump transition team's landing team at the agency said during the confirmation process that he still believes that the human contribution to climate change is very small. Domenech also previously served as Virginia's secretary of natural resources.

But others will wait: Efforts to fill out the Trump energy team must wait a few more days again after the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee shelved votes slated for today on the nominations of five FERC, DOE and Interior nominees, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. Votes are now slated for next Tuesday.

Democrats threaten to delay Bodine: Two EPW Democrats — Sheldon Whitehouse and Jeff Merkley — threatened to hold up Susan Bodine's nomination to be EPA enforcement chief until she provides details about her advisory role to the administrator and whether she played a role in the agency's decision to enforce its methane rule on a "case by case" basis. They said Bodine's assumption of a role at EPA without being confirmed first may run afoul of federal law.

EPA nominees up next week: Four EPA nominees will get their day at Senate EPW for a hearing next Wednesday. They are: Michael Dourson to run the agency's chemical office; Matt Leopold to be general counsel; David Ross to run the water office; and William Wehrum's contentious bid to be EPA's top air official. The committee also will consider Jeffery Baran's renomination to another five-year NRC term.

WELCOME TO THURSDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Bracewell's Frank Maisano named Schuyler Colfax and John Nance Garner as the two House speakers that became vice president. For today, and in keeping with the theme: Who is the lone speaker that went on to become president? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy, and @POLITICOPro.

GET PUMPED! POLITICO Pro convenes its first-ever policy summit today (follow along here) with a little something for everyone. Of particular interest to energy fans: a 10:30 a.m. session hosted by Pro's Nick Juliano on the implications of the Trump administration on energy policy. Panelists include: Exelon CEO Chris Crane; Senate Energy staffer Spencer Gray; Business Council for Sustainable Energy President Lisa Jacobson and MWR Strategies' Mike McKenna. Other non-energy speakers throughout the day include: Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin, Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross and top House taxwriters Kevin Brady and Richard Neal.

TEMPORARY REGULATORY WAIVERS GALORE: With Florida and Texas still restoring power and taking stock of damage following Hurricanes Harvey and Irma, federal regulators are temporarily relaxing regulatory requirements to help those states get back online. As POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports, the EPA acknowledged in a letter Wednesday it recognized the need to use "flexibility" provided in federal stormwater discharge permits for facilities affected by the storm.

Jones Act waiver extended: Citing "severe disruptions of the oil supply system," DHS announced Wednesday it extended a Jones Act waiver through Sept. 22 to alleviate fuel shortages in the areas affected by the hurricanes. The decision will allow foreign-flagged vessels to deliver fuel from U.S. refineries to Florida and other impacted states, something barred under the 1920 Jones Act.

Texas' too: EPA said late Wednesday it would waive fuel requirements under the Clean Air Act for reformulated gasoline and low volatility gasoline in Texas through Oct. 1 to "help address the emergency circumstances" in the state from the hurricanes. In addition, the agency also continued to allow the use of Texas Low Emission Diesel in 110 Texas counties.

Three's a trend! OMB Chief Mick Mulvaney told CNN's Jake Tapper on Wednesday there's "plenty of time later" to discuss climate change but said the focus right now should be on helping hurricane victims in Texas and Florida. "I'd be more than happy to have a longer discussion another day about climate change, man-made climate change," he said. Energy Secretary Rick Perry previously said now's "not the time" to discuss climate change, while EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt called such talk "insensitive."

Curbelo fine with climate talk: Back on Capitol Hill after responding to Hurricane Irma's impacts on his district, Rep. Carlos Curbelo said climate change should be a part of post-storm discussion. "It shouldn't be the first thing people talk about — the first concern has to be all the people in the Florida Keys and throughout the state of Florida who are struggling," he told reporters. "[But] it's certainly not irresponsible to highlight how this storm was probably fueled — in part — by conditions that were caused by human-induced climate change."

Backs Nelson's climate comments: Curbelo said he "absolutely" agreed with his state's senior senator, Bill Nelson, that Republicans were "denying reality" if they refused to acknowledge climate change. "I am critical of both the deniers and the alarmists because they don't contribute much to solving this problem," he said. "The deniers deny it so you can't address a problem you don't recognize and the alarmists scare everyone and take credibility away from the issue, and people who are convincible then shy away. People need to talk about this in a sober way, in a rational way."

Be on the lookout: Curbelo said his bipartisan Climate Solutions Caucus should hit 60 members in the near future, which would triple its membership from last Congress. The caucus grew to 56 members on Tuesday with the additions of Republicans Chris Collins and Pat Tiberi and Democrats John Larson and Nydia Velazquez.

HOUSE PANEL TAKES FIRST LOOK AT RELIABILITY: They've split the original hearing into two, but the House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee takes a first look at various issues associated at the reliability of the U.S. electric grid. Making his first congressional appearance since confirmation is FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee. Also testifying is Gerry Cauley, president of the North American Electric Reliability Corporation, and Patricia Hoffman, an official within DOE's Office of Electricity. The background memo for the hearing, which kicks off at 10 a.m. in Rayburn 2123, is available here.

HERE'S SOMETHING YOU WON'T SEE EVERYDAY: Still looking to drum up momentum for their bipartisan bill boosting carbon capture and sequestration technologies, one of the Senate's most unusual possible quartets — Heidi Heitkamp, Shelley Moore Capito, Sheldon Whitehouse and John Barrasso — participate in an event hosted by the Center for Climate and Energy Solutions on the latest innovations in the technology and efforts to speed its deployment. It kicks off in Hart 902 at 8:30 a.m. Details here.

PARTS OF EPA DISCHARGE RULE DELAYED: EPA issued a final rule Wednesday formally delaying key compliance dates from a 2015 regulation limiting toxic discharges in power plants' wastewater streams, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Specifically, the agency will delay deadlines related to limits on discharges of flue gas desulfurization wastewater and bottom ash transport water, two waste streams associated with burning coal for electricity, while it reconsiders those standards. EPA said the delays will provide annualized utility cost savings between $27.5 million and $36.8 million.

Environmental groups vowed to sue: Mary Anne Hitt, director of Sierra Club's Beyond Coal campaign, said in a statement her group would take "immediate action" to fight a decision she called "so unconscionable from a public health — and common sense — perspective, that [Pruitt] couldn't even name a valid legal reason for the delay." Earthjustice Attorney Thomas Cmar called the rule "a bold-faced gift to the coal industry at the expense of the health of families everywhere."

PROBE OF EPA GRANT PROCESS SOUGHT: The Center for American Progress and

Union of Concerned Scientists are today asking EPA's inspector general in a letter to investigate the agency's grant review process, rumored cancellation of some grants and allegations of political interference. "We urge your office to begin an investigation of these matters immediately," they write.

REVAMPED FEDERAL LEASING PROGRAM SOUGHT: The Wilderness Society, along with several other petitioners, are asking Interior and BLM this morning to revamp the fiscal terms and management processes regarding oil and gas leasing on federal lands. The petitioners argue their reform proposals would not harm, slow, or stop energy production on public lands. "Analyses of these decades-old [current] policies has shown that they are harming the taxpayers that the BLM is obligated to ensure receive the benefits of leasing and the public lands that BLM is obligated to ensure are managed for multiple use and sustained yield," they write.

HIDDEN DANGER IN OKLAHOMA? Massive oil storage tanks in Cushing, Okla. could be growing more vulnerable by the day as man-made earthquakes stemming from fracking tests their limits, Kathryn Miles reports in POLITICO Magazine. Five of the largest energy companies each said have procedures and protocols for natural disasters, but that they would not comment on the specific designs of their tanks, nor how those tanks would fare in a major earthquake. Read the full thing here.

NRDC SEEKING REHEARING ON REFRIGERANTS CASE: The Natural Resources Defense Council plans to ask the D.C. Circuit for an en banc rehearing of last months' decision striking down an EPA rule limiting use of hydrofluorocarbons, a global warming exacerbating coolant. NRDC believes the majority in the 2-1 decision erred in its determination that the law was clear and did not require agency interpretation, known as Chevron Step 1. "[D.C. Circuit Judge Brett] Kavanaugh interprets the law in a way that eviscerates the program," said David Doniger, head of climate programs for NRDC. "Everybody understood to this point that the substitutes for ozone depleting chemicals were replacements ... and when new ones are developed safer than the old ones, the old ones are supposed to give way." HFCs fall out of the atmosphere faster than CO<sub>2</sub>, but have a far higher global warming potential.

Honeywell, too? "We believe the EPA's regulation is well-supported by the law and was in the best interests of the public, industry and the environment," a spokeswoman for Honeywell International Inc. said in an email to ME. Honeywell makes next generation coolants. "We are closely reviewing the decision and are likely to pursue an appeal, and are already taking steps to ensure that the accelerated transition to HFC alternatives continues."

FOR YOUR REFERENCE: Advanced Energy Economy today released seven specific issue briefs as policymakers consider ways to modernize the U.S. electric grid. They cover: advanced metering; access to data; optimizing capital expenditures; distributed energy resource ownership; using energy efficiency as a resources; performance-based regulation and designing rates in a distributed energy resource future.

BETTER LUCK NEXT YEAR? Two ambitious bills in California — laying the groundwork for a regional electricity grid and eventually phasing out use of fossil fuels — won't advance this year, a key committee chairman told the Los Angeles Times Wednesday. "There's not a lot of time for the engagement we need to make it work," Assemblyman Chris Holden said, adding they should be considered as part of a "comprehensive conversation" in 2018. The legislative session ends Friday and the deadline for amending legislation was Tuesday night.

REPORT: CLOSING COAL PLANTS MEANS BIG BUCKS: Phasing out inefficient coal plants would save U.S. customers up to $10 billion annually by 2021, a new report from Carbon Tracker finds. Constructing combined cycle gas turbines will be more cost-effective by the mid-2020s than continuing to operate 78 percent of the nation's current coal fleet, the study concludes. "The US power sector remains entirely unprepared for a coal phase-out consistent with a below [2 degree] C outcome," it finds, referring to the goal of the Paris climate agreement to limit global temperature increases.

NEW EDF AD USES HARVEY FOOTAGE: The Environmental Defense Fund is launching a new ad in the Washington area for three weeks using footage from the Arkema plant incident in Texas. The ad warns Congress that cutting the agency's budget could harm disaster response moving forward.

MOVER, SHAKER: Nick Conger starts a new gig as former Vice President Al Gore's communications director in Nashville on Oct. 2. The Obama administration EPA veteran leaves his current post as a press secretary at NRDC on Sept. 22. "I couldn't be more thrilled to join [Gore's] team and help shape his public activities," he writes of his role.

Repeal and replace approach to EPA climate rule may disappoint Trump base Back

By Emily Holden | 09/14/2017 05:01 AM EDT

The Trump administration is leaving the door open to replace former President Barack Obama's landmark climate regulation for power plants — a move that would fall short of conservatives' calls to erase it all together

A mend-it-don't-end-it approach from the Environmental Protection Agency on Obama's 2015 rule could appease power companies that say they need some kind of EPA regulations — albeit much weaker ones — to save them from years of legal uncertainty. But it might not satisfy the demands from some conservative activists, who have pressured EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to reject the entire idea that climate change is a problem requiring federal action.

The agency is aiming by early October to issue a proposal to undo the Clean Power Plan, along with a separate advance notice of its intent to consider a replacement, a source close to the process told POLITICO.

That approach still leaves a wide array of options on the table — including ultimately deciding against a new rule — and it could allow Pruitt to stretch out the process for several more years without ultimately resolving how the agency should address the greenhouse gas emissions from power plants, one of the largest contributors to human-caused climate change.

The Clean Power Plan encouraged the power sector to shift away from coal and toward natural gas and renewable power, an approach that Obama's critics said exceeded EPA's authority under the Clean Air Act. At a minimum, Trump's EPA would likely seek to limit any replacement to require only the negligible carbon emissions reductions that could be achieved at coal plants themselves, without prodding states and utilities to replace those facilities with cleaner generation.

The details about how to begin unraveling Obama's climate regulations could have political implications for Pruitt, who is widely seen as a potential candidate for the U.S. Senate in his native Oklahoma. Repealing the power plant rule was an explicit campaign promise for President Donald Trump, who has dismissed man-made climate change as a "hoax."

For now, conservatives appear willing to give Pruitt the benefit of the doubt because he is walking a legal tightrope and could still decide to take aim at EPA's underlying obligation to regulate carbon emissions. The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals has agreed to keep litigation over the Clean Power Plan on hold through Oct. 7, but judges warned Pruitt last month that EPA is dodging its legal obligation to regulate carbon by failing to outline its next steps on the rule.

Myron Ebell, the climate skeptic who led EPA's transition team, has pushed for Pruitt to fight the agency's "endangerment finding" that it must address climate change. But he said a replacement rule might be an "adequate stopgap."

He said if the courts ultimately find that a coal-plant focused rule isn't enough to fulfill EPA's legal obligation, then "in order to keep the president's promise that we're going to get rid of these economically destructive rules, the only alternative they will have is to reopen the endangerment finding."

Challenging that finding, which determined that heat-trapping gases like carbon dioxide were a public health threat, would mean fighting climate change science, and most lawyers say it is a losing battle. The Obama administration issued the endangerment finding in 2009, two years after the Supreme Court told EPA to determine its role in fighting climate change.

Tom Pyle, a conservative lobbyist with the American Energy Alliance who led Trump's Energy Department transition team, said he would prefer a straight withdrawal of the Clean Power Plan but wouldn't oppose a replacement rule.

"Ultimately, the responsibility to fix this mess lies with the Congress, so until they act, the only thing the Administration can do is minimize the damage," Pyle said via email.

But EPA would be on much shakier legal ground if it just refused to regulate carbon dioxide from power plants, the nation's largest source of greenhouse gas pollution.

EPA wants to move to collect comments about whether to write a new regulation, and is likely to write a new rule, multiple sources said.

Any replacement would be based on a narrow interpretation of EPA's authority and is unlikely to make a meaningful dent in carbon levels — unlike Obama's version, which pledged to cut the power industry's carbon pollution as much as 32 percent below 2005 levels by 2030.

Opponents of the Clean Power Plan have also argued that the rule is illegal because EPA had already regulated coal plants under a different section of law. EPA could still make that argument while proposing to withdraw the plan and invite comments on the idea in its notice of a potential replacement.

Environmental groups are expected to sue no matter which path Pruitt and Trump take.

"There would be very intense protests to rescinding the Clean Power Plan and replacing it with nothing indefinitely, which is what this would be," said Sean Donahue, a lawyer at Donahue & Goldberg who represents environmental groups defending the Clean Power Plan in court.

EPA is planning to issue an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking (ANPR), the first step toward issuing a replacement for the Clean Power Plan, according to the source familiar with the process. But that route leaves many options open.

Kevin Poloncarz, a lawyer with the firm Paul Hastings who represents energy companies supporting the Clean Power Plan, said the notice could be "fairly nondescript" and could suggest a replacement rule or ask for feedback on whether EPA can legally regulate power plants under the section of the Clean Air Act that the Obama administration used.

If EPA simply rescinded the Clean Power Plan without announcing plans to consider a replacement, Poloncarz said power companies could face nuisance lawsuits.

Issuing the notice could be a compromise position. While it's in place, "the industry should feel some degree of comfort that they're insulated from those lawsuits," Poloncarz said.

States like New York could still take court action against EPA if the agency is taking too long or questions its own authority on greenhouse gases, he added.

It's not unusual for an agency to take years to follow up on an ANPR. EPA took about six years to issue its draft Clean Power Plan in 2014.

"The entire point of ANPR is to help agencies decide which course they want to pursue where there are multiple options," said Tom Lorenzen, a partner at Crowell & Moring who represents electric cooperatives challenging the Clean Power Plan.

"I think one purpose of an ANPR would be to send a message to the court that EPA is thinking about what comes next," he added.

Lorenzen said an ANPR could suggest a replacement rule or argue that any regulation is illegal because the agency has already regulated power plants under Section 112 of the Clean Air Act.

Several attorneys noted that Bill Wehrum, the lawyer nominated to run EPA's air office, has represented power industry clients who likely would back a replacement rule because they consider regulation to be inevitable.

Most utilities assume a future regulation or law will require them to curb carbon emissions, even if Trump's EPA rescinds the Clean Power Plan.

Even coal-heavy power companies have said they support EPA issuing a replacement rule.

AEP, a Midwestern power company that gets slightly less than half of its electricity from coal, would back a new proposal "consistent with the EPA's authority under the Clean Air Act," spokeswoman Tammy Ridout said.

In 2005, 70 percent of AEP's power came from coal, but the company has been intentionally shifting toward renewable power and lower-carbon natural gas.

"We think that future regulation of carbon emissions from power production is likely, and could provide additional planning certainty," Ridout said.

Interior nominee Domenech says human role in climate change small Back

By Esther Whieldon | 07/20/2017 01:12 PM EDT

Interior assistant secretary nominee Douglas Domenech told his senators at his confirmation hearing today that he still believes that the human contribution to climate change is very small.

At the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee hearing, Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) asked Domenech, President Donald Trump's nominee for assistant secretary for insular areas, if he still stood by his December op-ed that said that humankind was impacting the climate in "very small ways."

Domenech, an Interior veteran who was on the Trump transition team's landing team at the agency this year, said "yes."

The senator asked whether Domenech, given his views on climate change, is the "right person" to help vulnerable island communities that are being impacted by sea level rise.

Domenech said that as Virginia's secretary of natural resources, he helped the fishing community in Tangier Island in Chesapeake Bay deal with erosion and sea level rise.

"We worked with them quite a bit in terms of reinforcing their shoreline and those kinds of activities with the Corps of Engineers, and so I take it very seriously, I don't at all minimize that the climate is changing," Domenech said.

WHAT'S NEXT: Senators will by the end of today send Domenech a list of questions they want answered for the record and the committee will likely wait to schedule a vote on his nomination until they receive his responses.

Senate energy committee delays vote on FERC, DOE and DOI nominees Back

By Darius Dixon | 09/13/2017 06:28 PM EDT

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee announced this evening it postponed a Thursday morning series of votes on President Donald Trump's nominees for FERC and the departments of Energy and Interior.

The panel was slated to consider Kevin McIntyre for chairman of FERC, Richard Glick for FERC commissioner, David Jonas for DOE general counsel, and Ryan Nelson and Joseph Balash for solicitor and assistant secretary for land and minerals management at DOI. The vote will now happen Sept. 19.

A committee spokesperson said the vote was delayed because of "member availability."

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate energy committee will vote on the nominees on Tuesday at 9:30 a.m.

POLITICO Pro Florida: EPA backs Florida on stormwater permit 'flexibility' following Irma Back

By Bruce Ritchie | 09/13/2017 07:10 PM EDT

EPA is telling state officials they recognize the need to use "flexibility" provided in federal stormwater discharge permits for facilities affected by Hurricane Irma.

Florida regulations allow for temporary bypass of stormwater systems or unintentional noncompliance in emergency situations, Florida Department of Environmental Protection spokeswoman Dee Ann Miller said.

The state had relayed concerns to the EPA about those provisions relating to Hurricane Irma, said Miller, who added that those bypass provisions will allow ports and other facilities get back into operation as quickly as possible.

In a letter released today, EPA regional administrator Trey Glenn said the agency recognized the need under federal law for "potential flexibility" because of circumstances caused by Hurricane Irma that are "beyond the reasonable control" of permit holders.

"The EPA also recognizes there may be other unforeseen issues that arise as a result of this disaster and we stand ready to work together with our state partners to address these potential issues as they arise," Glenn wrote.

Florida Sen. Bill Nelson: Republicans 'denying reality' on climate change Back

By Michael Grunwald | 09/12/2017 09:06 PM EDT

Democratic Senator Bill Nelson of Florida, after surveying the damage that Hurricane Irma inflicted across his state, blasted Republican politicians who reject the science and minimize the importance of climate change—including his likely opponent in 2018, Governor Rick Scott.

In an interview Tuesday evening with POLITICO, Nelson said it's clear that manmade global warming made Irma worse by increasing the temperature and the height of the seas that fueled the storm. He said he didn't want to play partisan politics in the aftermath of a hurricane, but then went on to criticize Republicans in general and Scott in particular—though not by name—for opposing climate action. He noted that both the Trump administration in Washington and the Scott administration in Tallahassee have reportedly discouraged government employees from even talking about climate change.

"It's denying reality," Nelson said. "You can call it politics or whatever, but the Earth is getting hotter. This storm is another reminder of what we're going to have to deal with in the future."

Nelson, a former astronaut, launched into a detailed explanation of the science of climate change and the greenhouse effect, and how it has helped make the waters around Florida higher and warmer in recent decades. He said it would be a crucial issue in his reelection campaign, even as he avoided the words "Rick Scott."

"It's certainly going to be an important issue, and if certain people such as the one you mentioned is my opponent, there's a significant contrast in what we believe," Nelson said.

Florida is a swing state in presidential elections, but its state government and statewide offices tilt heavily Republican; Nelson has been an exception to the red wave, but a well-known, well-funded opponent like Scott would be by far his most difficult challenge to date. He clearly sees climate as a potential wedge issue in a state with a heavily coastal population and increasing vulnerability to Irma-type disasters. Scott did not discuss the issue in his frequent Irma briefings; a spokesperson for the governor, when asked about Nelson's comments, said, "Now is not the time for politics. This storm is not a partisan issue. Now is the time to focus on helping Florida rebuild."

But in the past, he has questioned climate science—or declined to affirm the scientific consensus that it's being caused by humans, often noting, "I am not a scientist"—and fossil-fuel interests have supported his campaigns. In 2015, the Miami Herald reported that Scott's administration had even banned the use of the terms "climate change," "global warming" and "sustainability" in official documents.

Nelson is not known in Washington as a leader on climate issues, but he said he's focused on them since he was Florida's insurance commissioner in the 1990s. He's fought against President Trump's proposed cuts to climate science at agencies like NOAA, NASA and EPA, and said he helped persuade the Obama administration to launch a satellite, first dreamed up by Al Gore, that takes continuous pictures of the Earth from deep space.

But Nelson didn't really argue that he deserved kudos for accepting the conclusions of the scientific community; he argued that Republicans on the other side of the issue need to explain why they think "99.5 percent of climate scientists" are wrong. Several prominent Republicans in South Florida—including Miami-Dade County mayor Carlos Gimenez and Reps. Carlos Curbelo and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen—have made it clear they believe Washington needs to take climate seriously. Nelson pointed out that politicians don't question government scientists when they say a hurricane is coming—but when the same agencies use the same scientific instruments to measure long-term climate trends, opinions suddenly differ.

"It's ironic, isn't it?" Nelson said. "They accept the hurricane information, but deny the climate information ... Look, some people still think the Earth is flat."

EPA delays parts of power plant toxic discharge rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/13/2017 03:35 PM EDT

EPA has finalized a rule delaying by two years the key compliance dates for a 2015 regulation limiting toxic discharges in power plants' wastewater streams while it reconsiders those standards.

The delay provides "relief from the existing regulatory deadlines while the agency revisits some of the rule's requirements," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement.

Following industry requests, EPA specifically is delaying deadlines related to limits on discharges of flue gas desulfurization wastewater and bottom ash transport water, two waste streams associated with burning coal for electricity. EPA estimates the two-year delay of those requirements will provide annualized utility cost savings between $27.5 million and $36.8 million.

The agency said it will not revisit new standards for other types of waste streams — including fly ash transport water, flue gas mercury control wastewater and gasification wastewater — and will leave deadlines associated with those streams in place.

The delay will take effect two weeks after it is published in the Federal Register, and is open to court challenges.

The Obama administration said the overall rule, known as effluent limitations guidelines or ELGs, ultimately would curb 1.4 billion pounds of aluminum, lead, mercury, arsenic and other toxic metals from entering waterways via discharge streams each year.

How Man-made Earthquakes Could Cripple the U.S. Economy Back

By Kathryn Miles | 09/14/2017 05:03 AM EDT

When Hurricane Harvey made landfall in Texas, U.S. oil refining plummeted to record lows. Now, two weeks later, six key refineries remain shut down and an additional 11 are either struggling to come back on line or operating at a significantly reduced rate. That slowdown, coupled with predictions of decreased demand in the wake of Irma and the devastating earthquake that struck Mexico last week, has shifted oil pressures in other places, too. And none may be quite as vulnerable as the tank farms in Cushing, Oklahoma.

Dubbed the "Pipeline Crossroads of the World," Cushing is the nexus of 14 major pipelines, including Keystone, which alone has the potential to transport as much as 600,000 barrels of oil a day. The small Oklahoma town is also home to the world's largest store of oil which sits in hundreds of enormous tanks there. Prior to this recent spate of natural disasters, Cushing oil levels were already high. They've increased nearly a million barrels to nearly 60 million barrels in the two weeks since.

This concentration of oil, about 15 percent of U.S. demand, is one reason the Department of Homeland Security has designated Cushing "critical infrastructure," which it defines as assets that, "whether physical or virtual, are considered so vital to the United States that their incapacitation or destruction would have a debilitating effect on security, national economic security, national public health or safety, or any combination thereof."

The biggest potential cause of that incapacitation? According to Homeland Security, it's not terrorism or mechanical malfunction. It's natural disaster. And here's the problem: When most of the Cushing tanks there were constructed, the most logical cause of any such disaster seemed like a catastrophic tornado. No one anticipated swarms of earthquakes. But that's what began occurring about five years ago, when wastewater injection and other fracking-related activities changed the seismic face of Oklahoma in dramatic fashion. Two hours before that deadly quake in Mexico, for instance, a magnitude 4.3 temblor shook Central Oklahoma, knocking out power for thousands. The earthquake, which had an epicenter just 100 miles northwest of Cushing, was the 186th quake in Oklahoma to register a magnitude 3.0 or higher.

This man-made seismicity has changed the landscape of Oklahoma significantly, from a state with one of the lowest seismic rates in the country to the most seismically active in the lower 48, says Ken Erdmann is Senior Vice President at Matrix Engineering, the firm that designs, fabricates, and builds many of the tanks in places like Cushing. "It's not natural. It's not Mother-nature based."

That's a problem, he says because the statistical analysis used to establish safe environmental loads is based on historical intervals—both the average and maximums of events like snowfall or wind or seismic activity.

"When those levels become man-made induced numbers," says Erdmann, "statistics are no longer really relevant."

But while the number of earthquakes and their intensity has increased in recent years, the strength of the regulatory apparatus in place to ensure their safety hasn't kept pace. Oversight of the tanks has been left to a tiny agency buried inside the Department of Transportation that was never intended to serve this role. And the safety standards, which one earthquake expert calls the weakest permissible, were created by an industry trade group rather than the government agency. For those inclined to contemplate worst-case scenarios the prospect of an earthquake rupturing the Cushing tanks would be an environmental catastrophe far greater than the Exxon Valdez.

***

When most of these tanks were constructed, seismic activity in Oklahoma was negligible. In 2011, the state experienced a 5.6 quake. Last year, they had a 5.8—the same magnitude as the quake that rocked Washington and much of the eastern seaboard six years ago. That Oklahoma event toppled the exteriors of historic buildings and prompted the Pawnee nation to declare a state of emergency. Seismologists at the United States Geological Survey say the area around Cushing is capable of an even stronger quake—maybe even a 7.0. Earthquake magnitude is measured exponentially, which means that a 7.0 quake would be 15 times larger than the biggest one to hit Oklahoma so far. And it would release over 60 times as much energy.

What would it do to the Cushing tanks? I posed that question to each of the five largest oil companies there.

Michael Barnes, senior manager of U.S. Operations and Project Communications at Enbridge, which holds nearly half the oil at Cushing, says it's the company's policy not to comment on speculative questions such as mine "because by their very nature they are hypothetical." What he would say is that the company regularly participates in safety drills, workshops and other activities. That includes protocols preparing for seismic activity.

"In the event of an earthquake, procedures are in place to respond quickly and confirm Enbridge tanks and other facilities were not impacted and can continue to operate safely," says Barnes. "This includes dispatching technicians and other experts to perform visual inspections and check instrumentation on tanks, pipes, motors and pumps."

I received a similar response from the other energy companies with major Cushing holdings: that they have procedures and protocols for natural disasters, but that they would not comment on the specific designs of their tanks, nor how those tanks would fare in a major earthquake.

Getting an answer out of the government can be just as frustrating. A big part of the problem is the Byzantine system of governmental agencies regulating these tank farms. This oversight varies from state to state. In Oklahoma, most energy concerns are controlled by the Oklahoma Corporation Commission (OCC). But, says their spokesperson Matt Skinner, the OCC only regulates intrastate pipelines and tanks.

"If any part of that oil leaves the state or comes from elsewhere," says Skinner, "it becomes totally outside of our jurisdiction."

Determining that jurisdiction is no easy matter. The EPA regulates "non-transportation-related oil storage tanks," but that excludes farms like Cushing, which are tied to pipelines. The person I talked to there couldn't tell me who regulates Cushing, nor could the spokesperson for the Department of Energy, which oversees our country's petroleum reserve sites. The Department of Transportation regulates oil and gas pipelines, unless they cross federal lands, in which case they are the purview of the Bureau of Land Management, or if they are operated by the military. Gas and oil produced on the outer continental shelf falls under the Department of the Interior, which works in concert with the Department of Transportation to regulate its movement.

I called those offices as well, asking if they knew what agency regulated tanks like the ones at Cushing. No one I spoke to knew—including at the public affairs office of the Department of Transportation. As it turns out, a tiny office in the DOT known as the Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration (PHMSA) regulates the tanks. Established by President George W. Bush in 2004, PHMSA was intended to increase security around the transportation of hazardous fluids like gas and oil. As such, it was never really meant to govern stationary storage. I asked their spokesperson what seismic regulations were in place for tank farms like Cushing. He referred me to Appendix C of the Pipeline Safety Regulations. And it is true that there are seismic considerations there: provisions regarding safety reporting, any "unintended" or "abnormal" movement of a pipeline, or reduced capacity of a pipeline because of seismic activity. But none of these considerations mentions storage tanks per se. I asked that same spokesperson to direct me towards the language relating to tanks. He has yet to respond.

None of this surprises the OCC's Matt Skinner. "I've gone through the standards a bunch of times," he says. "I haven't found any relating to tanks and seismic activity."

***

If the government isn't explicitly regulating the ability of the tanks to withstand an earthquake, then who is? Turns out that what standards do exist are created by the American Petroleum Institute, a national trade organization representing the oil and gas industry. And the standards are not overly rigorous, say seismologists.

Tom Heaton, professor of Geophysics and Director of the Earthquake Engineering Research Laboratory at Caltech says most, if not all, of the tanks in Cushing are built to the weakest industry design standards. He thinks even a moderate quake could be enough to violently push the oil from one side of the tank to another. In geological terms, the phenomenon is known as a seiche: an internal wave or oscillation of a body of water. The more oil is in a tank, the more dangerous that seiche becomes.

That makes tank farms like Cushing particularly vulnerable in the face of other natural disasters like Harvey and Irma as oil and pipeline companies engage in a kind of shell game for oil storage—full tanks do better in high wind conditions like hurricanes and tornadoes; they fare far worse in earthquakes.

And certainly there is precedent for the kind of damage Heaton predicts. In the years after the 1994 Northridge earthquake in California, the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST), found evidence of seismically-induced oil tank damage going back as far as the 1930s and as recently as the 1994 quake, some of which was catastrophic.

But Ken Erdman is circumspect about just how much damage a major quake might wreak on the Cushing tank farms. In addition to his role at Matrix, Erdmann also heads up the API committee that creates standards for the tanks. He says it's true that ones in Cushing weren't built for moderate or severe quakes, and that the shaking caused by one would almost certainly be "beyond allowable limits" for the API standards utilized at the Oklahoma farms. Probably, he says, you'd see buckling and deformation of the tanks rather than full failure.

The real problem, he says, would be the pipelines themselves, says Ron Ripple, Mervin Bovaird Professor of Energy Business and Finance at the University of Tulsa. Ripple estimates that an earthquake or other disaster would have to knock out half those tanks to have a real impact on the market. Of bigger concern to him are the pipelines, which control a larger volume of oil. He points to the October 2016 explosion of the Colonial Pipeline in rural Alabama as a corollary. The resulting fire kept crews from repairing the pipeline proper for six days. During that time, oil commodity prices jumped 60 percent—the highest spike in nearly a decade. Exporters clamored to find work-arounds, including tankers capable of moving the oil by sea. As a consequence, freight cargo rates increased by nearly 40 percent. Meanwhile, motorists in southern states rushed the pumps, elevating prices there, too—forcing the governor of Georgia to issue an executive order warning about price gouging.

It wouldn't be unreasonable, says Ripple, to see a similar scenario were the Cushing pipelines to go down. The Colonial Pipeline moves about 100 million gallons of oil and gasoline a day—about the equivalent of the Seaway Pipeline, just one of the more than dozen that converge on this town. That pipeline was also shut down in late 2016, after authorities in Cushing noticed a spill. The effect of that shutdown had the opposite effect, pushing the price of US oil below $50 a barrel, as international traders worried they wouldn't get their deliveries.

"Prices move through the markets fairly quickly," says Ripple. "We tend to see opportunistic changes in prices right after an event. Some of those look like a pretty close cause-and-effect relationship between supply and demand. Other times, you'll see impacts that leave us all scratching our heads. In the end, you just don't know how the market and consumers will react."

Johnson Bridgwater, director of the Oklahoma Chapter of the Sierra Club, says he's mindful of the economic effects of such a spill, but it's the impact on the landscape and the people who occupy it that most concerns him. Imagine, says Bridgwater, if Ripple's scenario of losing half the tanks came to fruition.

"That's fifty million barrels," he says. "We'd be looking at our own on-land Exxon Valdez."

Worse, actually. The Valdez was carrying just over a million barrels of oil. A quarter of that spilled. And light crude, the kind of oil stored in Cushing, poses particular challenges to an environment, often killing animals or plants on contact and emitting dangerous fumes that can kill both human and animal residents.

"This would not be a simple cleanup," says Bridgwater. "You'd have an uninhabitable community for a long time."

That shouldn't be acceptable to anyone, says U.S. Representative Bobby Rush, the Chicago area Democrat who serves as the ranking member on the Committee on Commerce and Energy's Subcommittee on Energy.

"Over the past five years or so Oklahoma has become more active as an earthquake zone. PHMSA must account for these changing circumstances and implement appropriate regulations that apply to tank farms located in these more sensitive areas to make them more sturdy and secure. The fact of the matter is that we must ensure that these tanks, which hold vast amounts of oil, are designed to withstand seismic activity in order to protect both the public safety and the local, state, and national economies that rely heavily on this resource."

Court ruling leaves HFC future in hands of EPA, Congress Back

By Eric Wolff | 08/09/2017 05:09 PM EDT

The effort to get the U.S. to comply with a treaty eliminating a heat-trapping chemical now faces a grueling path after a major courtroom setback this week — and it may depend on EPA using its power to regulate chemicals.

The D.C. Circuit Court's ruling Tuesday forced EPA to abandon its plan to use the Clean Air Act to limit use of hydrofluorocarbons, a refrigerant that would be phased down under recent changes to the Montreal Protocol. Proponents of the effort, including environmentalists and the air conditioning industry, will now need the Senate to approve the treaty and Congress to pass a new law authorizing EPA to implement it, or they will have to persuade EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt to act — no small feat considering the EPA chief's disdain for both climate change initiatives and regulations.

The changes to the Montreal Protocol agreed to in Kigali, Rwanda, last year would curtail global use of HFCs, a move that scientists say could prevent up to 0.5 degrees Celsius — 0.9 degrees Fahrenheit — of warming by the end of the century. U.S. industry groups have supported the Kigali agreement and had backed EPA's plan to implement it under the Clean Air Act's Section 612. That section, put in place nearly 30 years ago as authorizing language to implement the initial Montreal Protocol, established a market mechanism that was designed to reduce ozone-damaging chemicals.

But the court's rejection of using Section 612 may require new legal authority to empower EPA to act if the U.S. eventually ratifies the Kigali amendment.

"You'll have a treaty and have Congress look at it and pass implementing legislation," said Stephen Yurek, CEO of the Air Conditioning, Heating, and Refrigeration Institute, whose members are the world's biggest makers of HFCs — and will produce most of the next generation chemicals.

In its ruling, the D.C. court suggested a slew of laws EPA could use to regulate HFCs: The Toxic Substances Control Act, the National Ambient Air Quality Standards, regulating as a hazardous air pollutant, and regulating HFCs in cars and trucks. But several lawyers said TSCA was the only credible alternative.

"There's a lot of authority under TSCA to regulate chemicals and chemical uses," said Jane Montgomery, a partner with Schiff Hardin who works with power companies. "It's not as straightforward as what they intended to under 612, but there's an environmental harm portion of TSCA. ... For managing the sale and manufacturing and use, TSCA is the most appropriate statute we have."

Yurek said AHRI was still reviewing TSCA as an option, but he feared that it would be a blunt instrument, requiring EPA to issue a rule that immediately limited or banned HFCs, in contrast to the phase-down approach created under Section 612 of the Clean Air Act.

"I'm concerned that it's much more of a command-and-control-type regime, you have different categories, and potentially banning," he said.

Under the TSCA update Congress passed last year, EPA must assess HFCs before regulating them, and then issue a rule, a process that could take about five years, legal experts said. The agency would ultimately have the authority to limit or even prohibit them, Montgomery said. And in its ruling, the D.C. Circuit upheld several of EPA's tools used to assess the global warming impact of HFCs, bolstering the case for a potential TSCA rule.

AHRI and environmental attorneys largely dismissed the court's other suggestions for EPA to comply with the Kigali goals. The NAAQS program focuses on just six pollutants, none of which are HFCs, they said. Congress similarly created a fixed list of pollutants under the hazardous air pollutants rules, limiting that program's broader application, attorneys said. And refrigerants used in car and truck air conditioners make up only a small part of the refrigerants market.

"These authorities are even less congruent with the authority the EPA invoked in this rulemaking to regulate ozone-depleting chemicals and their substitutes down the road," said Brendan Collins, a partner with law firm Ballard Spahr who represents power companies and oil and gas companies.

EPA says it is still reviewing the court decision, but it's not clear whether Pruitt would advance another rule to govern HFCs, even though it is backed by business interests. Proponents of the Kigali treaty could draw a skeptical reception from the Trump administration, which has been dismissive of both multi-party treaties and climate science — though the administration did defend the rule in court in February. The White House would need to submit the treaty amendment to the Senate for ratification.

Kigali advocates have long aimed to keep a low profile and quietly persuade staffers to support the effort as the administration got up to speed. AHRI is now trying to determine whether the court decision will require a change in its strategy, or if it can apply the same pro-U.S. business approach to the more conservative House.

"We have to decide [if] we do a more public push or keep the schedule," Yurek said. "Right now, the plan is that we continue to wait until the end of this year, and continue to educate both House and Senate."

Green groups who back the ban on HFCs may try a more direct route by appealing to the D.C. Circuit for en banc review. There are seven D.C. Circuit judges appointed by Democrats, versus four appointed by Republicans, potentially giving the appeal an edge — though that advantage flips at the Supreme Court, should the case go that far.

"We are exploring the options," said David Doniger, director of climate programs for the Natural Resources Defense Council. "Including rehearing based on the dissent."

NO CAPSTONE FOR KEYSTONE: Whatever chance the nearly decade-long fight over the Keystone XL pipeline had ending with Nebraska state regulators approving a key permit for the project seems to have evaporated. By approving an alternate route through the state that steers clear of more of the sensitive Sandhills region, the Nebraska Public Service Commission introduced more uncertainty as TransCanada may face the task of getting new permits approved, a new round of legal battles and further public resistance from a reenergized environmental community. "By pushing Keystone XL onto a new route, the commission all but guaranteed more delays and hurdles for TransCanada to work through," 350.org executive director May Boeve said in a statement. "We'll be there with our allies pushing back on them every step of the way."

Another hurdle facing TransCanada is securing additional easements from landowners along the pipeline's revised route. The company seemed to suggest frustration at the decision through its terse, one-sentence statement on the decision: "As a result of today's decision, we will conduct a careful review of the Public Service Commission's ruling while assessing how the decision would impact the cost and schedule of the project," TransCanada CEO Russ Girling said. But look for other backers, including President Donald Trump, to hail the decision as a big win for the U.S. energy industry. American Petroleum Institute CEO Jack Gerard welcomed the approval in a statement, saying "[t]he Nebraska Public Service Commission set an example for how to carefully evaluate critical energy infrastructure projects, even in the face of strongly held views and opinions."

Pro's Ben Lefebvre's blunt take: "Forcing TransCanada to use an alternative route will force the company see what additional permits BLM and the Army Corps of Engineers will require it to pull. If the regulatory lift is heavy enough - and if pipeline foes file enough appeals to the PSC decision and/or new court casts - years could be added to the KXL clock. Alternatively, TransCanada may decide to press pause, suspend the work and content itself to hold on to its State Department permit, perhaps resuming efforts when emotions settle and the market outlook for Canadian crude is brighter."

COLLATERAL ADVANTAGE: After breaking with the coal industry for much of the last decade over climate change policy, the U.S. nuclear industry has found its fate intertwined with the struggling industry thanks to a Trump administration push to shore up the old workhorses of the electric grid, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposal to alter electricity markets has drawn nuclear power into the new administration's pro-coal fold by basing its grid rule on a characteristic the two technologies share — keeping 90 days of fuel supply on site. "Maybe in previous administrations there was some support [for nuclear power] but I feel this administration has been much more vocal," Nuclear Energy Institute CEO Maria Korsnick said.

Help on the Hill: Expanding the constituency of the regulatory push to also include nuclear may bolster Perry's plan gain support on Capitol Hill and survive any court challenges. "If you are trying to find a legal argument to keep coal plants open with a FERC rule, the broader you can make the applicability, the harder it is to lose an argument that the rule is overly discriminatory," said Alison Silverstein, an analyst who worked on DOE grid study earlier this year. "If I were owning nuclear generation within Entergy, FirstEnergy or Exelon, I'd be keeping my head down and let the coal guys do the work, and seeing what I can get."

SENATE STAKES OUT ITS POSITION: The chairman's mark released Monday by Senate Appropriations funds Interior at $12.2 billion for Fiscal 2018, about $300 million higher than the House-passed version earlier this year. The $1.2 billion for the Bureau of Land Management, $171 million for the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management and $1.25 billion for the Fish and Wildlife Service all match spending levels in the House bill, while maintaining the U.S. Geological Survey's fiscal 2017 spending levels of $1.09 billion and providing $109 million to the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement. It's also chocked full of many of the same riders involving the Endangered Species Act that are also in the House version, but leaves out a rider barring offshore wind development off the Maryland coast.

EPA funding did better here: The draft would reduce the agency's funding to $7.9 billion, down a bit from last year's levels but up several hundred millions from a House-passed bill that would've slashed the agency's spending to $7.5 billion. And it's a far cry from the administration request, which would've slashed EPA's budget to $5.7 billion. There's funding for programs like the Chesapeake Bay restoration effort and a modest boost for Clean Water and Drinking Water State Revolving Funds, as well as the agency's Superfund program. But environmental and public health groups are worried about zeroing out funding for the Integrated Risk Information System program, which establishes a federal database of the risks of various chemicals, as well as provisions encouraging the rollbacks of the 2015 ozone standards, as well as portions of the glider kits and heavy duty vehicle emissions standards.

Spared: The Trump administration push to slash funding to the National Park Service (it got a $10 million boost) and the Land and Water Conservation Fund (it would maintain its $400 million funding) were rebuffed in the bill, Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief's Sarah Ferris reports. An explanatory statement on the bill is here.

Reminder: This bill won't be marked up and should be viewed as the Senate's guideposts as negotiations between the two chambers kick off in earnest. Oh, and Democrats are still not on board. "I can't look past the deep and damaging cuts to the EPA budget in this bill that put public health at risk," Sen. Tom Udall of New Mexico, top Democrat on the Interior spending panel, wrote in a statement.

DRILL AND CUT: States would lose more than a billion dollars in energy production royalty payments if Congress passes the tax bill H.R. 1 \(115\) that came out of the House last week, according to a Center for American Progress analysis. That's because the House bill creates a $1.5 trillion deficit that the CBO said would trigger pay-as-you-go laws, which require discretionary programs be cut to offset that amount. On that chopping block would be the revenue sharing program that delivers about half the federal government's royalties from energy production on federal lands to states. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, who helped shepherd a bill that would open up ANWR to drilling into the budget, would see her home state of Alaska lose $15 million next year under that scenario, according to Interior payment estimates. Murkowski didn't reply to an email seeking her thoughts on the matter.

LEGAL LIMBO NO MORE? D.C. Circuit judges seemed skeptical at oral arguments Monday that EPA would live up to its promise to enforce its coal ash regulation, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. That skepticism raises the chances the judges will rule on the issues raised by environmental groups. Two Obama appointees — Judges Patricia Millett and Cornelia Pillard — asked many technical questions about the regulation and a 2016 congressional change to its enforcement regiment. More from Eric here.

ACC SPOTS BACK HELLER, STABENOW: The American Chemistry Council released ads backing two vulnerable incumbents — Nevada Sen. Dean Heller and Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow — up for reelection in 2018, Campaign Pro's Kevin Robillard reports. Heller's ad touts his conservative credentials and thanks him for "fighting for Nevada values," while Stabenow's ad says she's "dedicated to Michigan workers and families, she's fighting to keep jobs here, opposing unfair trade practices and fighting to close loopholes that give tax breaks to companies that move jobs overseas."

ANOTHER SPOT TARGETS ATLANTIC COAST PIPELINE: NRDC is out with a second ad hitting Dominion over the controversial Atlantic Coast pipeline and urging Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe to cement his climate and clean energy legacy by rejecting the infrastructure project. It accuses Dominion of "using its power to muscle an unneeded pipeline across the commonwealth."

GREENS FILE SUIT OVER MONUMENT REVIEW: Friends of the Earth filed a lawsuit over unfilled FOIA requests seeking Interior documents related to its review of the Bears Ears, Gold Butte, Katahdin Woods and Waters, Mojave Trails, Northeast Canyons and Seamounts, and Giant Sequoia national monuments. The requests also seek information on Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's role in the review. Read the lawsuit here.

FIGHTING PARK FEE INCREASES: Representatives from groups including the Sierra Club, League of Conservation Voters and National Parks Conservation Association gather at 10 a.m. today at Interior to rally and deliver 150,000 comments against raising fees for national parks access.

SCOTT DEFENDS EVERGLADES EFFORTS: Florida Gov. (and likely Senate candidate) Rick Scott said Monday in Palm Beach County that Everglades restoration has been a major priority during his time in office, POLITICO Florida's Bruce Ritchie reports. He made the remarks at the completion of a reservoir to manage flows on the Loxahatchee River, which Scott said showed the state completed projects to restore the area. "When I ran, I talked to a lot of people about the Everglades," he said. "And what they said was, 'You know, the state never finishes projects. You know, they would start things, they never finish them.' What you can see today and a lot of other things — we finish projects."

STAFFING IT UP: Ballard Partners, the Florida lobbying firm led by Brian Ballard, a top fundraiser for Donald Trump's campaign last year, has signed three more clients: CSG Development Services II LLC, Sunrun Inc. and Vivint Solar Inc. The registrations bring the number of federal clients Ballard has signed since opening a Washington office early this year to 51. (A handful of those clients have parted ways with Ballard since then.) The decision by Sunrun and Vivint, both solar companies, to hire Ballard comes after the U.S. International Trade Commission opened the door in September to tariffs targeting Chinese solar manufacturers (h/t POLITICO Influence).

Keystone XL pipeline wins green light in Nebraska — but may face new hurdles Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 11/20/2017 11:25 AM EDT

Nebraska regulators approved the Keystone XL pipeline Monday, but only if it is built along a new path that may force the project developer to jump through a new set of regulatory hoops.

The 3-2 vote by the Nebraska Public Service Commission gave the green light to a different route than the one preferred by Keystone developer TransCanada, moving it east to run partially alongside the original Keystone pipeline and through a portion of the state's ecologically sensitive Sandhills area as well across the Ogallala Aquifer.

The Trump administration is evaluating whether it would have to re-approve the controversial pipeline to account for the new route. But activists who have spent the better part of a decade fighting to block Keystone said the decision throws the whole project into jeopardy, while TransCanada, the company seeking to build the project, said only that it is evaluating its next steps.

"This decision today throws the entire project into a huge legal question mark," said Jane Kleeb, the activist who led the opposition to the pipeline and who is now Nebraska Democratic Party chair. "TransCanada will have to go back to the State Department because that route has never been reviewed by the feds."

The State Department said it is reviewing the PSC decision for just such a possibility.

"We won't know about any impacts until we learn precisely the extent of any changes, something we are currently engaged in," State Department spokesman Vincent Campos said.

TransCanada President and CEO Russ Girling said the company "will conduct a careful review of the Public Service Commission's ruling while assessing how the decision would impact the cost and schedule of the project."

Former President Barack Obama had blocked the permits for the pipeline in 2015, citing the oil sands' impact on climate change, but President Donald Trump quickly reversed that decision after taking office. Keystone XL is designed to transport up to 830,000 barrels per day of crude from Canada's oil sands and North Dakota's shale fields to oil refineries on the Gulf Coast.

The Nebraska PSC vote comes as TransCanada adds new crews to its cleanup operations in South Dakota, where the original Keystone Pipeline ruptured last week and released 210,000 gallons of oil. But Nebraska law bars the regulators from considering spills or pipeline safety in its decision-making process.

Environmentalists and landowners who opposed Keystone XL's construction have promised to try to overturn the commission's decision.

"We will appeal," Kleeb said. "We will challenge a foreign corporation being given eminent domain in the county courts, with every intent to bring it to the Supreme Court if needed."

Even with the approval, the project, whose costs to build the nearly 1,200 mile artery have ballooned to $8 billion, is still not ready to be built since TransCanada is gauging the economics of the huge investment. Though prices for oil have rebounded moderately in recent months, and while TransCanada has said demand for space on the pipeline is strong, it's not yet clear that enough companies will commit to the 20-year contracts required to reserve space on it.

The opposition to Keystone XL had been a rallying cry for green activists who have long said mining Canada's oil sands would be a disaster for global climate change, releasing vast amounts of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

But supporters have said tapping the oil fields in Alberta is no worse than the oil production in Venezuela, where much of the heavy sour crude that is shipped to U.S. refineries comes from now.

Many in the oil industry, however, no longer see the Keystone XL pipeline as crucial to the U.S. refineries as they once did, especially since the railroad sector stepped in to offer a more flexible — though more expensive — way to ship the oil.

"There's not going to be a parade thrown, although everyone in the industry is going to be grateful," said Tyler Nelson, an energy lobbyist for Cornerstone Government Affairs. "It should have been done years ago. But now a lot of people want it to be over with and done and move on."

The pipeline may struggle to succeed in the oil business. Energy markets have made the Alberta oil sands less attractive, with ExxonMobil, ConocoPhillips and others pulling out of the region to concentrate on U.S. oil shale development in Texas. Meanwhile, rival pipeline company Enbridge has expanded its pipeline system delivering Canadian crude to the U.S.

Critics have pointed to the recent shale oil boom as a reason that supply from the Canadian and North Dakota fields is in less demand, and they argue that much of the oil from Keystone XL could end up on tankers bound for export. U.S. oil production is on target to average more than 9 million barrels a day this year, nearly double what it was when TransCanada first proposed the massive pipeline.

If TransCanada gives its final approval to go ahead, construction would not start until 2019 at the earliest, Paul Miller, TransCanada's president of liquids pipelines, said during a conference call earlier this month.

The pipeline already is the focus of a court challenge stemming from Trump's State Department approving the project. A coalition of groups is arguing the State Department did not do due diligence before approving the cross-border pipeline in March. The case is still in the beginning stages, with a decision pending from the U.S. District Court of Montana on a Trump administration motion to dismiss.

DOE rule offers nuclear industry much-wanted attention Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/21/2017 05:00 AM EDT

The nuclear industry may be a collateral winner in President Donald Trump's effort to end the "war on coal."

Nuclear power plant owners spent much of the past decade at odds with their coal-fired peers over climate change, but now they have found their fates intertwined thanks to the Trump administration's view that protecting the old workhorses of the electric grid is key to maintaining a reliable supply of power.

Energy Secretary Rick Perry's proposal to alter electricity markets would be a boon for coal companies like Murray Energy and the utilities supplied by its mines, but the proposal allows nuclear companies to come along for the ride — welcome relief for an industry that often felt left out of the Obama administration's climate push despite its carbon-free profile.

"It's not surprising to see nuclear energy and coal in there together because they were sort of the odd couple out in the Obama administration. With respect, their focus was on renewables," said David Blee, who heads the U.S. Nuclear Infrastructure Council, a coalition of companies working in the sector. "This administration is making up for lost time in those areas."

The Obama administration disappointed the nuclear industry by not providing much in the way of explicit incentives for existing reactors, despite relying on the carbon-free electricity they provide to hit the Clean Power Plan's emissions reduction target.

But now the Energy Department has drawn nuclear into the new administration's pro-coal fold by basing its grid rule on a characteristic the two technologies share. Perry's proposal calls for consumers to pay power plants operating in regional electricity markets for keeping 90 days of fuel supply onsite. Most coal-fired power plants in the PJM Interconnection could qualify, as would virtually all nuclear plants in those areas because reactors only refuel every 18 to 24 months.

"Maybe in previous administrations there was some support [for nuclear power] but I feel this administration has been much more vocal," Nuclear Energy Institute CEO Maria Korsnick said, noting that one of Perry's first trips as DOE chief was to the long-stalled Yucca Mountain nuclear waste site. "The challenge is how we lever that to make the most of it. This notice of proposed rulemaking is one example of their willingness to put something in play."

Trump and Perry's broadening strategy also may help the Energy Department's grid proposal gain support on Capitol Hill and survive inevitable court challenges.

"If your real focus here is to understand where we are with our baseload generation then you have to put those two together even though they are a pairing that, from an emissions perspective, are very different," said Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski. "I don't know that it makes it a better pairing but it probably does build a broader constituency."

Illinois Rep. John Shimkus, a senior GOP member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, echoed that sentiment. "For me to be able to say it's 'baseload' and say it's coal and nuclear, and have that baseload argument, that's helpful," he said.

FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee, a former top aide to Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) who is now in charge of responding to DOE's proposal, says he wants to put in place an "interim" rule that would keep coal and nuclear plants online until the commission decides on long-term market changes. And he says climate advocates should be cheering the fact that nuclear plants would get a lifeline.

"One of the things that has been perplexing to me about the opposition to the interim step that I'm hoping to take to throw a lifeline to some of these baseload units is if we're going to seriously consider taking steps to mitigate U.S. emissions, nuclear power has to be part of that conversation," he said at a CQ Roll Call event last week. "To me, it seems very short-sighted to simultaneously stress the need to mitigate carbon emissions and not care about maintaining our nuclear fleet moving forward."

The Trump administration has largely managed to avoid criticism from nuclear backers for its efforts to pull back other federal climate programs that could have benefited the industry. Under Trump they are also getting much-wanted attention to their priorities, such as Yucca Mountain, a comprehensive review of U.S. nuclear energy policy led by the White House, and a conditional commitment to provide additional financing for the over-budget Vogtle nuclear project in Georgia.

"From our perspective, [we see] a real re-commitment to, frankly, the most important clean energy resource in the country," said Rich Powell, the executive director of the ClearPath Foundation, a conservative group that backs low-emissions energy sources.

"They may not call that a climate strategy, or a climate play," Powell added. "But in actuality, that is a very important measure on carbon."

There's also a legal upside of expanding the target audience beyond coal, said Alison Silverstein, an analyst who worked on DOE grid study earlier this year.

"Nuclear is still in the game principally because the secretary glommed onto the term baseload and defined it as coal and nuclear. And there is now ... no way to separate them," she said. "If you are trying to find a legal argument to keep coal plants open with a FERC rule, the broader you can make the applicability, the harder it is to lose an argument that the rule is overly discriminatory."

But Silverstein, a former top aide to ex-FERC Chairman Pat Wood, added: "If I were owning nuclear generation within Entergy, FirstEnergy or Exelon, I'd be keeping my head down and let the coal guys do the work, and seeing what I can get."

Many coal plants, she said, are no longer baseload providers but that "nuclear is the true baseload resource."

For all the talk of aligning coal with nuclear despite their often disparate missions, Illinois Rep. Bobby Rush said don't expect him or his fellow Democrats to embrace coal anytime soon.

"That was the obvious attempt to protect coal by adding nuclear to it but I don't think that dog's going to hunt," he said. "I don't see any Democrats who want to change their position on coal by the fact of them adding nuclear. I think that, for the foreseeable future, coal is not going to be one of the options."

Senate panel bucks Trump to protect arts, conservation programs Back

By Sarah Ferris | 11/20/2017 05:08 PM EDT

The Senate Appropriations Committee today unveiled legislation that rejects billions of dollars of President Donald Trump's proposed cuts to iconic cultural and conservation programs.

GOP appropriators drafted a fiscal 2018 Interior and Environment bill that exceeds the White House's requests for key programs including the U.S. Forest Service, the Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

The bill would spend \$32.6 billion in fiscal 2018, roughly $5.3 billion above Trump's request for the same departments.

Republicans also rejected Trump's proposed cuts to beloved programs like the National Park Service — boosting its budget by $10 million to $2.942 billion. That figure is $389 million above Trump's request.

The GOP bill would maintain the Land and Water Conservation Fund at $400 million, far above Trump's proposed $64 million budget. The National Wildlife Refuge Fund would receive a budget of $13.2 million — a program that Trump wanted to slash entirely.

The Senate panel would boost funding for popular programs like the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Gallery of Art, which faced sharp cutbacks under Trump's budget.

The so-called chairman's mark of the bill was released this afternoon; unlike bills released earlier this appropriations cycle, it will not receive a formal committee markup.

Democrats cheered the GOP senators' decision to buck Trump in several areas, but vowed to fight against many other cutbacks and "poison pill" riders in the bill.

"I can't look past the deep and damaging cuts to the EPA budget in this bill that put public health at risk," Sen. Tom Udall of New Mexico, top Democrat on the Interior spending panel, wrote in a statement.

Judges skeptical of EPA's coal ash claims on enforcement Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/20/2017 06:41 PM EDT

Judges at the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals seemed skeptical at oral arguments Monday that EPA would live up to its claim that it would enforce coal ash rules, raising the likelihood the court may reject the agency's bid to put the case on hold and instead move forward to rule issues raised by green groups.

EPA has asked the court to remand on five key issues under the 2015 rule so it can address issues raised by industry groups, though the agency has said it would leave the rule in place while it reconsidered the issues. But environmental groups insist they want a ruling.

Environmental groups had already lodged legal challenges to parts of the rule before Congress amended it in 2016 by passing the Water Infrastructure Improvements for the Nation Act, S. 612 \(114\). The new law tightened many coal ash standards while also enabling EPA to create a state-based permitting program for coal ash disposal. That new program was intended to replace enforcement that came as the result of lawsuits from citizens and non-profits.

Judge Patricia Millett, an Obama appointee, appeared to doubt that EPA was up to the task of implementing the 2016 change.

"You've already said states aren't lining up to set up permitting, and Congress hasn't appropriated money for EPA to establish a program," she said to Perry Rosen, the Justice Department lawyer representing the agency. And she was skeptical that EPA had the staff available to enforce new coal ash rules while the program got up and running.

Millett and Judge Cornelia Pillard, also an Obama appointee, peppered lawyers from both side with questions on technical matters related to active and inactive coal ponds, lined and unlined storage, along with the enforcement issues. Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson, a George H.W. Bush appointee and the senior judge on the case, asked few questions.

Millett raised eyebrows from attorneys on all sides by repeatedly citing a portion of the WIIN Act that appeared to incorporate EPA's 2015 version of the rule. By doing so, she said, Congress "endorsed the regulation" exactly as it stood. That would resolve many of the legal questions, and none of the parties had raised the possibility in their legal briefs.

"Doesn't that foreclose on industry arguments and take care of your challenges?" she said to Thomas Cmar, an attorney for Earthjustice representing environmental groups. "What's good for the goose is good for the gander."

Cmar sought to deflect the argument in court, but afterward agreed the judges went pretty deep on the regulation.

"I don't get the sense that they are going to decline to rule" on the case, he told reporters after arguments.

American Chemistry Council ads back Heller, Stabenow Back

By Kevin Robillard | 11/20/2017 03:32 PM EDT

The American Chemistry Council is out with television ads praising two vulnerable senators facing reelection in 2018: Michigan Democrat Debbie Stabenow and Nevada Republican Dean Heller.

The ad backing Heller appears aimed at shoring up the Nevadan's support with Republican base voters. Heller, the only Senate Republican facing reelection in a state Democrat Hillary Clinton won in 2018, has faced criticism from Republicans for coming out against a version of Obamacare repeal. Danny Tarkanian, a businessman and frequent GOP candidate, is challenging him in the Republican primary.

"Fighting for conservative principles, Sen. Dean Heller is leading efforts to cut taxes for workers and reform the tax code so small businesses can invest and create high-paying jobs," a male narrator says. As an image of President Donald Trump and Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch appears on screen, the narrator continues: "Sen. Heller is dedicated to putting conservative judges on the federal bench." The ad then asks viewers to call Heller and thank him for "fighting for Nevada values."

Watch the ad here.

The ad backing Stabenow, which is paid for by both the Chemistry Council and North America's Building Trades Unions, is also a positive spot.

"Dedicated to Michigan workers and families, she's fighting to keep jobs here, opposing unfair trade practices and fighting to close loopholes that give tax breaks to companies that move jobs overseas," the male narrator says. "And Sen. Stabenow supports tax reforms that help middle-class families and small businesses."

Watch the ad here.

Both ads began airing today. According to Advertising Analytics, the Nevada buy will run until Dec. 2 and includes $436,000 of broadcast airtime in Las Vegas and Reno. The size of the Michigan buy is unclear.

Trade decision could devastate U.S. solar market Back

By Eric Wolff | 09/22/2017 11:28 AM EDT

A federal trade panel declared Friday that surging imports of solar panels have hurt U.S. manufacturers — a decision that will allow President Donald Trump to penalize Chinese companies but could also choke off the fast-growing green energy industry in the U.S.

The U.S. International Trade Commission voted to uphold a complaint brought by two domestic solar manufacturers that complained that the low-cost imports had damaged their businesses. The decision was opposed by the much larger U.S. solar installation industry, which has seen the influx of the cheap panels spark a boom in construction of giant solar farms and rooftop systems around the country.

The issue will give Trump the opportunity to erect trade barriers he has hailed as key to his strategy to revive domestic manufacturing, and at the same time hit the Chinese companies that have largely evaded previous U.S. import penalties to become the leading suppliers of solar cells and panels. Administration officials say the trade case hasn't been a central one for the president, but they are increasingly confident Trump will favor tariffs when the commission sends the White House its recommendations in the next couple of months.

In a statement, the White House said Trump would make a decision that "reflects the best interests of the United States," and it praised the solar-makers, saying the domestic "solar manufacturing sector contributes to our energy security and economic prosperity."

The case could also give Trump a platform to advance his "America First" agenda and tout his effort to revive the ailing coal sector. Coal companies have complained that the Obama administration waged a regulation-heavy "war on coal" while tilting federal tax incentives and loans to renewable energy sources in order to advance climate change policies.

"[Trump] could easily reward his buddies in the coal industry who would really like to see high-priced solar panels competing with coal for space on the grid," said Clark Packard, a policy analyst and trade lawyer with the conservative think tank R Street Institute, which opposes tariffs. He added: "He may just want to stick it to people — your coastal elites who never would have voted for him who are more likely to use solar panels. He's looking for any circumstance to impose tariffs, it doesn't seem he cares what they are."

Trump has not weighed in on the case so far, though his administration has reopened the landmark North American Free Trade Agreement with Mexico and China, and he has regularly blasted China and other countries for what he calls unfair trade with the U.S.

"He's a protectionist, there's no doubt about it, and he's not very sympathetic to the renewable energy," said Gary Hufbauer, senior fellow for the Peterson Institute of International Economics. "As much as you can predict any president, I think his conclusion is foregone."

The complaint brought by Georgia-based Suniva and Oregon-based SolarWorld USA has brought sharp opposition from most of the U.S. solar industry, which has seen its growth skyrocket as costs for the technology fell to a fraction of what they were a decade ago. Aided by federal tax incentives and state-level programs, large solar power installations have sprung up across the country, driving down costs for those plants to levels that are now competitive with coal and natural gas power power stations. That's lifted employment in the sector to 260,000 even as the number of U.S. companies that make solar cells and panels sinks.

The solar industry has warned that high tariffs would eliminate 88,000 U.S. jobs by boosting costs and making many projects uneconomic just as the industry, which generates $29 billion in revenue, was starting to stand on its own.

"If companies are going to be injured, we're going to be bringing in employees who will lose their jobs, mayors and governors and senators and representatives," said Abigail Ross Hopper, head of the Solar Energy Industries Association. "We're going to be making sure folks understand the impact, and putting a human face to it."

The four members of the ITC will now begin to formulate a remedy to address the injury suffered by the U.S. manufacturers, and they will take recommendations from solar companies. Any remedies taken by the U.S. will not apply to imports from Canada.

Suniva brought the case under Section 201 of the Trade Act, a rarely used but powerful tool that gives the president the ultimate authority to take or discard the recommendations of the commission. Most trade complaints — including two solar cases acted upon by the Obama administration — are limited to imports from specific countries, but Section 201 allows the president to impose tariffs on all imports of a product. The authority was last used by President George W. Bush in 2002 to implemented a tariff on imported steel, but it was withdrawn 15 months later.

The commission will hold hearings on potential remedies on Oct. 3 and send its recommendations to the White House by Nov. 13.

Unlike trade complaints that allege foreign companies had unfair advantages because of subsidies in their home countries or that companies were "dumping" products at below-market prices to squeeze out competitors, a case brought under Section 201 needs only to show that imports were harming the domestic industry. That lower standard appears to have been met by data showing imports from Asian countries surging as some 30 companies in the U.S. shuttered their manufacturing plants.

While solar manufacturers in China ship about 20 percent of the equipment that is imported in the U.S., many Chinese companies have moved production to countries like Malaysia or Vietnam to avoid trade penalties imposed during the Obama administration.

Suniva, which lodged the original complaint and filed for bankruptcy protection earlier this year, has said that putting tariffs or setting a floor price for imported solar equipment would generate new manufacturing jobs in the U.S.

"President Trump can remedy the industry's injury with relief that ensures U.S. energy dominance that includes a healthy U.S. solar ecosystem and prevents China and its proxies from owning the sun," Suniva, which is itself majority owned by a Chinese company,

Shunfeng International, said ahead of Friday's decision.

The company has recommended a remedy that would set a price floor of 78 cents per watt, as well as a tariff that starts at 40 cents per watt and declines over four years — proposals that would more than double the current panel costs. Analysts have said that could erase five years of cost declines made by the industry.

"We are confident there is a way to strengthen and save U.S. solar manufacturing without harming the strong growth that has made America such a powerful market for solar products," said Timothy Brightbill, an attorney at Wiley Rein who is representing SolarWorld. That company is a unit of Germany's SolarWorld Industries GMBH, which has also filed for bankruptcy in its home country.

Several lawmakers and governors had urged the commission to reject the trade complaint, including in a letter sent Thursday by Govs. Brian Sandoval of Nevada; John Hickenlooper of Colorado; Charles Baker of Massachusetts; and Roy Cooper of North Carolina.

"At a time when our citizens are demanding more clean energy, the tariff could cause America to lose out on 47 gigawatts of solar installations, representing billions of dollars of infrastructure investment in our states," they wrote to ITC Chairman Rhonda Schmidlein.

A bipartisan group of 16 senators sent a letter last month to the ITC asking it to "carefully consider the negative impact" of an injury finding. Those lawmakers included Sens. Johnny Isakson of Georgia and Jerry Moran of Kansas, both Republicans, along with coastal Democrats like Massachusetts Sen. Ed Markey.

Conservative groups that support free trade have also opposed erecting the trade barriers. Earlier this month, a group of six conservative organizations, including the R Street Institute, the American Legislative Exchange Council and the National Taxpayers Union, published an open letter arguing against tariffs. The conservative Heritage Foundation, which was not on the letter, also opposes a policy of tariffs and has been tracking the Suniva case closely.

"We believe that policies that pick winners and losers by imposing tariffs are bad, pretty much no matter what they are," said Tori Whiting, a research associate at the Center for International Trade and Economics at Heritage.

Suniva and SolarWorld are not without their own defenders: Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and two members of the Washington House delegation sent a letter of their own in favor of the tariffs, and House members from Georgia and Michigan have both backed the petition. The groups have also been backed by steel manufacturers.

ANWR ISSUES COMPLICATE TAX FIGHT: Complications from language in the Senate's tax package related to ANWR drilling that ran afoul of budget reconciliation rules appeared on the verge of being resolved by late Wednesday. "We are finishing up the last of that and expect to have a curative amendment if you will as part of the process going forward," Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski (and major ANWR backer) told Roll Call. The changes came after an anticipated ruling from chamber's parliamentarian that language easing environmental rules for ANWR drilling would need 60 votes to be kept in. Though final text of the legislation was not yet available, multiple aides said the concerns would be easily resolved.

Murkowski backed a procedural motion on the bill (along with the rest of the Republican caucus) on Wednesday evening and seemed upbeat about getting one of her top legislative priorities included in the mammoth package. She touted the ANWR section in a statement announcing her support, though she noted: "We still have work to do on this legislation and I look forward to the debate on the Senate floor and my colleagues' ideas to further improve it."

Democrats rally against: Six Senate Democrats, including Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and top Energy Committee Democrat Maria Cantwell, are holding a press conference today at 12:30 p.m. in the Senate Swamp to rally against opening ANWR drilling as part of the tax package. That comes as a groups of religious leaders and scholars sent a letter to members of Congress also opposing the drilling push.

Another issue to watch: Money for wind and solar power projects could dry up if Congress doesn't alter language in the tax bill aimed at preventing banks from moving their profits abroad, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. That's because renewable energy companies typically sell the federal tax incentives attached to their green energy projects to banks, but provisions in the Senate tax bill would make it difficult for banks with overseas subsidiaries to buy the credits. "To me it feels like a drive-by shooting," said Mike Garland, CEO of wind developer Pattern Energy. "Clearly the provision is aimed at corporations who are sending work overseas, but the result is that the investment in U.S. activities is penalized."

IT'S THE END OF THE MONTH AS WE KNOW IT! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and LCV's Gene Karpinski was the first to identify Sen. Richard Shelby as a member of the boll weevils. For today: Which former Interior secretary's niece is currently running for governor next year as a member of the opposite political party? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy, and @POLITICOPro.

STICKING TO THE SCRIPT: EPA plans today to set final 2018 biofuel volume requirements conforming closely to what Administrator Scott Pruitt promised Midwestern senators earlier this year, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. The final rule will require blending of 15 billion gallons of conventional biofuels — typically corn ethanol — as well as 288 million gallons of cellulosic ethanol. Advanced biofuel volumes will rise slightly from the July proposal to 4.29 billion gallons overall, and the regulation will require 2.1 billion gallons of biomass-based biodiesel for 2019. Bloomberg first reported the volumes. But look for lawsuits to follow regardless.

Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley called the decision "disappointing" in a statement. "I'm glad that EPA backed off a later proposal, which would have represented an abandonment of President Trump's stated commitment to biofuels and the integrity of the RFS," he said. "I plan to continue working to impress upon the Administration the capability to grow domestic energy production by unlocking the full potential of biofuels."

MARKING ON UP: House Natural Resources gavels in today at 10 a.m. to mark up seven bills on various topics, but two jump out to ME. One measure H.R. 1778 \(115\), offered by Liz Cheney, would require specific congressional authorization for Interior to impose any moratorium on federal coal leasing. (Remember, the Trump administration overturned an Obama-era ban earlier this year.) The other, H.R. 3117 \(115\) from Evan Jenkins, would bar EPA, DOE or Interior from using the social cost of carbon (or similar metrics) that are used to estimate monetary damage the country faces from climate change events linked to greenhouse gas emissions.

Interior motives: Deputy Interior Secretary David Bernhardt returns today to Capitol Hill for the second time in two days at 9:30 a.m. before a House Appropriations subpanel for oversight. What'll be on the mind of Betty McCollum, top Democrat on the subcommittee, according to a spokesman? "Congresswoman McCollum will ask whether the supplemental includes sufficient funds for recovery from the recent natural disasters, including whether the department anticipates another supplemental request to address additional needs. She'll also ask about the backlog from damage caused by previous storms that has not yet been repaired, and about what the department can do to rebuild stronger and mitigate the effects of future disasters." More here.

No rush from Bishop for more nominees: Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop said Wednesday he's not in any particular hurry for President Donald Trump to name additional people to permanently fill Interior slots. "I have to admit some of the acting directors right now are Utahns that I know, and I'm very comfortable with them," he said, highlighting acting BLM chief Brian Steed and acting Fish and Wildlife Director Greg Sheehan.

STAYING OPEN: The Navajo Generating Station will remain open through December 2019 after receiving the necessary federal approvals, Salt River Project announced Wednesday. "We are grateful for their effort as this agreement provides meaningful benefits for all involved and creates a path forward during this challenging transition," Mike Hummel, deputy general manager of Salt River Project, the plant's operator, said. A Navajo Nation task force and Salt River Project negotiated the new lease over a period of several months, as well as related agreements.

TRIPPIN': Energy Secretary Rick Perry leaves today for a trip to Saudi Arabia, Qatar and United Arab Emirates, Axios reports, citing a department official. He's expected to speak next Wednesday at the Carbon Sequestration Leadership Forum in Abu Dhabi.

MORE HEARINGS? West Virginia GOP Senate candidate Patrick Morrissey appeared to endorse additional public hearings on the EPA's proposed repeal of the Clean Power Plan in a tweet late Wednesday. "Just as WV was harmed by not holding a public EPA hearing in our state during the Obama Administration, it would be wrong to exclude other parts of the United States from this EPA hearing process now," the state's attorney general wrote. "Certainly wouldn't oppose other hearings. As someone who believes Obama Power Plan is wrong & illegal, I think it's important to hear from multiple places." The agency completed its lone scheduled public hearing on Wednesday.

Meanwhile, former coal executive Don Blankenship, who is reportedly planning a run for Senate, promised some news today: "We will be putting out a new ad tomorrow morning on TV, Facebook, and more. It will be a shocker. Government corruption is pandemic and obvious," he wrote on Twitter. Blankenship, who was convicted of conspiracy to violate mine safety standards after the 2010 Upper Big Branch disaster that killed 29 of his workers, would face Morrissey and Rep. Evan Jenkins in a GOP primary to challenge Sen. Joe Manchin.

TEXAS HOLD 'EM: The relationship between the U.S., Venezuela and CITGO may about to get tenser. Venezuela has detained six CITGO executives from Texas, Senators John Cornyn and Ted Cruz said in a press release. The news comes after Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro placed a loyalist general in charge of the state-controlled oil company Petroleos de Venezuela S.A., which controls the U.S.-based refining company. The Treasury Department has already been slapping sanctions right and left on Venezuela government officials, including PdVSA execs, for several months as the country's human rights violations pile up. There's no indication yet what response the Trump administration may have to the detention of the Texans — a White House spokeswoman referred questions to the State Department, which did not immediately offer comment.

TRUMP ENERGY INFLUENCERS GATHER: Bigwigs with sway in the Trump administration's energy policy realm gather for a Heritage Foundation and Texas Public Policy Foundation conference today beginning at 8 a.m. There's a "very special" guest speaking at 8:45 a.m. (ME would put money on Pruitt, Perry or Zinke). Other speakers include: former Senate EPW Chairman Jim Inhofe, outgoing House Science Chairman Lamar Smith and Sen. Mike Lee. ME also hears coal magnate Robert Murray will be in the building. Heritage is also hosting an event on Perry's grid resiliency proposal at 12 p.m. if you want to make it a longer day on Mass Ave.

BROWNFIELDS IN THE HOUSE! Lawmakers today consider legislation H.R. 3017 \(115\) that would extend EPA's popular Brownfields program through 2022 at current funding levels and allow the agency to award more funding grants (up to $500,000) to each site slated to be cleaned up. E&C Environment Chairman John Shimkus told ME he expected the measure would pass by a wide margin. It received bipartisan support during committee consideration.

DEJA VU ALL OVER AGAIN: Republican congressional leaders and the White House have hatched a plan that would dare Democrats to shut down the government by not including a fix for so-called DREAMers in a short-term funding measure that would keep the lights on into January, POLITICO's Rachael Bade, John Bresnahan and Sarah Ferris reports. Democratic leadership sources suggest they could be open to a one- or two-week CR, but would be unlikely to move the deadline beyond Jan. 1.

DOE REAUTHORIZATION BILL TEXT PUSHED TO 2018: Embattled Rep. Joe Barton said his efforts to pull together a DOE reauthorization bill had fallen further behind after a meeting between Energy and Commerce Republicans and Democrats failed to materialize this week. "It's been postponed, I think, 'til maybe next week," he told ME, of the effort first floated in January. "We're getting ready to really get to work." When asked about when he expected to have legislative text pulled together, Barton said he had aimed to have some draft text by the end of the year for lawmakers and their staffs. "I was hoping to use this meeting this week to get agreement on the general framework so that we could begin to have the staffs put that together on a bipartisan basis," he said, but the latest delay likely drags that milestone into early next year.

And ICYMI, Barton said he plans to remain vice chairman of the powerful House Energy and Commerce "for the time being" but acknowledged a "private conversation" with Chairman Greg Walden about the matter, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. That comes as another woman came forward to share a series of private messages, some with sexual overtones, traded with Barton in the Star-Telegram.

FOR YOUR LUNCH PLANS: FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee, fresh off gaining a new colleague, addresses the Natural Gas Roundtable today at 12:30 (in perhaps one of his final appearances as chairman). On Wednesday, he tweeted of his new colleague Rich Glick: "I had the pleasure of working with Rich in the Senate and look forward to working with him in this new capacity," he said.

LET ME SPEAK: House Natural Resources ranking member Raúl Grijalva has asked the attorney of a former staffer to release him from confidentiality rules so he can discuss details of the workplace misconduct claim that's ensnared him this week, POLITICO's Elana Schor reports. Until the former aide's counsel agrees to the release of the agreement, he added, "I can't unilaterally do it without exposing myself to getting sued on a personal level."

THROW IT OUT: Greenpeace asked a federal district court in North Dakota to dismiss a lawsuit filed on behalf of Energy Transfer Partners alleging the green group and others committed racketeering and other crimes. "It is incumbent upon every court that faces these baseless claims to ensure a robust arena for political speech and weed out efforts to suppress critical speech masquerading as [racketeering] claims," the group wrote in its motion. "It appears clear that Greenpeace is being targeted by repeated lawsuits for the precise purpose of chilling its speech."

TAKE A GLANCE! Resources for the Future released a new issue brief Wednesday looking at the impacts of the shale revolution on the oil and gas industry. It concludes: "The shale revolution has dramatically changed the position of the United States as an energy producer, allowing the oil and gas sectors to more easily ramp up production in response to price changes."

ANWR language complicates tax bill Back

By Seung Min Kim | 11/29/2017 04:20 PM EDT

A Republican effort to tie Arctic drilling to the tax bill hit a snag in the Senate today.

The Senate parliamentarian has told Democrats and Republicans that parts of the tax bill authorizing drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge would not be able to pass under budget reconciliation rules that prevents a filibuster, a Senate aide told POLITICO. Language easing environmental rules for ANWR drilling would need 60 votes to be kept in, which Republicans would not have.

The aide said provisions may have to be stripped from the bill before it could proceed, make drilling in the refuge virtually impossible, although multiple other sources said the issue was easily resolved.

The ANWR language had been a priority for Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who is seen as a key swing vote on the bill.

Senate GOP clears key hurdle on taxes Back

By Seung Min Kim, Colin Wilhelm and Bernie Becker | 11/29/2017 09:15 AM EDT

The Senate set the stage Wednesday for possible passage of its tax bill later this week, voting to begin formal debate after a day of wheeling and dealing for enough Republican votes.

On a party line 52-48 vote, the Senate moved to formal debate on the GOP legislation, which Republicans are hoping to pass before the end of the year so they can take a key legislative victory into the 2018 elections after a year of disappointments on other major bills. The House passed its own version of tax reform earlier this month.

Senate GOP holdouts began lining up behind their party's tax overhaul earlier in the day. But Republican leaders still have a litany of issues to resolve before the bill gets across the finish line, which they hope will be by week's end. Those issues include an expected ruling from the Senate parliamentarian that could rule out a companion measure to allow drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, one Senate aide said, although other sources downplayed how problematic that issue is.

Another factor, which would rile the White House, is a proposal to cut the corporate tax rate to 22 percent instead of 20 percent to free up money for a more generous child tax credit.

In a key concession, Senate Republicans agreed to increase the tax deduction offered to businesses that don't pay corporate taxes, called "pass-throughs," according to two GOP senators, a move meant to win over Sens. Steve Daines of Montana and Ron Johnson of Wisconsin.

Another GOP holdout, Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, voted to move the bill forward after assurances that other legislation would be passed to stabilize the health insurance market if Obamacare's individual insurance mandate is abolished in the tax bill as planned. And GOP senators said they had made progress on a "trigger" mechanism to raise taxes or cut spending that would kick in if the bill fell short of economic growth projections, a change sought by Sens. Bob Corker of Tennessee, Jeff Flake of Arizona and James Lankford of Oklahoma.

Collins also told reporters that both President Donald Trump and Senate Republican leaders support her request to include a deduction for up to $10,000 in property taxes — paralleling a House provision — although they've yet to agree on how to pay for it.

She would pay for it by setting the corporate tax rate at 21 percent and keeping the top rate for individual earners at 39.6 percent, though Collins added, "They're not crazy about my pay-fors, I will admit."

At the same time, more than a few House Republicans, especially conservatives, gave poor reviews to the trigger proposal, potentially making it more difficult for the two chambers to reach a final compromise on a tax bill.

A negative decision on ANWR could also complicate matters in the Senate. But while one Senate aide said the parliamentarian found that the bill's ANWR provisions ran afoul of strict budget rules, other aides said the issue could be worked around without much trouble.

And Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), a perennial swing vote who scored the language that expands drilling in the refuge, said in a statement Wednesday that she would support the overall package.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who has kept his views on the tax bill muted this week, also voted to push it forward.

Other balking GOP senators also fell into line, including Jerry Moran of Kansas, who also has expressed concerns about the amount of red ink caused by the bill.

GOP senators earlier Wednesday said they were still working through the trigger sought by the three Republican deficit hawks, which experts say could violate Senate budget rules. Options for a trigger now include automatic spending cuts if the tax bill didn't spur the economy as much as Republicans want, according to Sen. John Kennedy (R-La.).

Senate Republicans had also been discussing automatic tax increases as a trigger, while Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) is among those pushing the idea of guaranteed tax cuts if the economy exceeds expectations in the future.

An earlier proposal that was floated would boost the corporate tax rate — currently set at 20 percent in the bill — by 1 percent to make up revenue if GDP did not grow an average of 0.4 percent during a five-year period. Another trigger proposal could prompt tax increases worth as much as $350 billion in additional revenue over a decade, starting in 2022, according to a source familiar with the negotiations.

Several GOP senators who said they didn't like a trigger also voted for the motion to proceed to ensure the tax bill's passage.

"We're not talking about a large tax increase," Lankford said. "We're talking about small things around the edges to be able to guard against future increases in deficits."

On the pass-through sticking point, the Senate bill would be changed to give the businesses a tax deduction of up to 20 percent of their income, an increase from the 17.4 percent currently in the measure.

But increasing the deduction would also give even more benefits to higher earners, feeding into Democrats' criticism of a measure that most polls find unpopular. Daines said the proposal also would cost around $60 billion over a decade - which would take up most of the breathing room Senate Republicans have for their bill, which can cut taxes by no more than $1.5 trillion over a decade.

"There has been some good progress for Main Street businesses in the tax cut bill," Daines said.

Johnson, along with Daines, wants to eliminate the ability of corporations to deduct their state and local taxes, which would free up about $140 billion in revenue, Johnson said Wednesday. That could increase the deductibility for pass-throughs as high as 27 percent, according to the senator.

Collins previously had outlined a series of objections to the bill, including that it totally eliminated the deduction for state and local taxes. The Maine Republican said she decided to vote to proceed to the tax bill after securing assurances from GOP leaders that proposals to stabilize Obamacare insurance markets and protect pre-existing conditions would be included on must-pass legislation this year.

But Keith Hall, the director of the Congressional Budget Office, told lawmakers Wednesday that his office did not expect one of those proposals, cosponsored by Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Patty Murray, to prevent increases in health care premiums.

Meanwhile, a number of House Republicans unloaded on the trigger idea. The Republican Study Committee, a conservative group of more than 150 House Republicans, won't take an official position on the trigger until it holds a formal vote of all members.

But Rep. Mark Walker of North Carolina, the group's chairman, said: "We don't want it," adding that not a single member of the group said they'd be willing to vote for the Senate tax reform package without further changes. The House passed its own tax bill this month, and GOP leaders there have repeatedly said the two chambers will go to a conference committee to resolve the differences in their bills.

At the same time, a pair of prominent Senate Republicans are pushing to raise the corporate tax rate from its current proposed 20 percent, in exchange for a larger benefit to families with children.

Sens. Mike Lee of Utah and Marco Rubio of Florida announced Wednesday they would introduce an amendment to do just that. It would take the corporate rate to 22 percent while making the child credit partially refundable and tie the changes to inflation. Trump has called the 20 percent corporate rate a red line, and the White House said Wednesday it would oppose increasing it to pay for a more robust child credit.

"We have a chance to do better by working families in this tax bill," Lee and Rubio said in a statement, adding that "this amendment would level the playing field for families, while still kick-starting national investment and growth."

Some other senators were amenable to the idea. "I wouldn't be opposed to going up to do a number of things," said Flake.

Tax change would create havoc for renewable energy financing Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/29/2017 05:56 PM EDT

Renewable energy advocates are warning that money for wind and solar power projects could dry up if Congress doesn't alter language in the tax bill that's designed to prevent banks from moving their profits abroad.

Companies that develop wind and solar projects typically sell the federal tax incentives attached to their green energy projects to banks, who can use them to reduce their own tax burdens. Those "tax equity" deals provide the renewable energy developers with the cash they need to build their projects.

But provisions in the Senate tax bill would make it difficult for banks with overseas subsidiaries to buy the credits, which are also accrued by low-income housing and infrastructure projects.

"To me it feels like a drive-by shooting," said Mike Garland, CEO of wind developer Pattern Energy. "Clearly the provision is aimed at corporations who are sending work overseas, but the result is that the investment in U.S. activities is penalized."

Under measures in the tax proposal aimed at reducing "base erosion," Congress would create a kind of minimum tax on profits earned in the U.S. to prevent companies from shifting that income onto the books of their subsidiaries in countries with lower taxes. But the current language would require energy project developers and their bank partners to recalculate their tax credits every year — creating uncertainty that would push many of the financial institutions out of the tax equity business.

"It takes us out of the market," said a source at one bank that does this kind of financing. "The best case scenario is it significantly reduces our involvement in the market, but it would be so difficult to plan in the near term at least, it would take us out. And we're talking about hundreds of millions of dollars of investment every year."

Renewable energy developers don't have the large profits that banks tend to generate, so they don't pay enough taxes to benefit directly from the Investment Tax Credit for solar or the Production Tax Credit for wind that Congress created.

So they have relied on the tax equity financing to drive their rapid growth. In a blog post, Keith Martin, an attorney who is co-head of U.S. projects for Norton Rose Fulbright, said nearly half the financing for a typical solar project and more than half the money for a typical wind project comes from tax equity deals — and four financial institutions have already told him they would leave the market if the law is changed.

There are nearly three dozen financial institutions doing these kinds of deals presently, but about 40 percent of the total funding comes from just three of them: JPMorgan Chase, Bank of America and US Bank.

"Without tax equity financing, most of these projects don't go forward, solar or wind," said one renewables industry source who's lobbying on the issue.

The Senate bill has renewable energy industry groups up in arms. The Solar Energy Industries Association, the American Wind Energy Association, Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions and the American Council on Renewable Energy sent a joint letter today to every senator asking for a fix. The lobbying source said the groups are pushing hard for changes, and they have several legislative proposals they hope to get attached to the bill during the vote-a-rama amendment process expected later this week. The person declined to describe the proposals because "things are at a delicate stage."

Financial institutions might be amenable to a provision that allowed banks to carry over unused tax credits to future years, according to the banking source. That would lower the returns on their investments, but it would keep them in the market.

Peter Kelley, vice president for public affairs for AWEA, said Sens. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) are "working to fix the problem before the bill is considered by the full Senate."

"We continue to advocate for a tax reform package that does not threaten the $85 billion in economic activity and the projected 50,000 new American jobs from wind farm development through 2020," he said in a statement.

Grassley, who is already playing defense to keep cuts to the wind tax credit included in the House bill out of the final bill, and a spokeswoman said, "Sen. Grassley is aware of the concerns raised and is looking into the issue."

Advanced biofuels set for slight bump in final RFS rule Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/29/2017 09:16 PM EDT

EPA today will provide a slight bump for advanced biofuel volumes requirements in 2018 as part of a final Renewable Fuel Standard rule set to be released Thursday, oil and ethanol sources tell POLITICO.

The rule, which is largely in line with a proposal EPA released in July, also requires blending of 15 billion gallons of conventional biofuels — typically corn ethanol — the maximum allowed by law and the same as what the Obama administration required for 2017.

It sets the overall advanced biofuels target at 4.29 billion, 10 million gallons more than were required this year and a 50 million gallon increase compared to its July proposal. The rule requires 288 million gallons of cellulosic ethanol, a reduction from the 311 million gallons required this year, but up from the 238 million gallons proposed in July.

Biodiesel producers are likely to be upset by the rule's targets. It requires 2.1 billion gallons of biomass-based biodiesel for 2019, the same as what is required in 2018, despite the industry saying it could easily produce more. The agency did not change the already final 2.1 billion gallon biodiesel requirement for 2018, as it had suggested it might in a notice released last month.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt had promised Midwestern senators earlier this year that he would not set levels any lower than the July proposed rule.

Bloomberg first reported the volumes earlier today.

The rule's Thursday release would mark the second year in a row EPA has released the volumes by the Nov. 30 deadline required by law, and it will fulfill Pruitt's promises to industry to produce a rule on time.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA likely will face legal challenges to the numbers from oil interests, biofuel interests or others.

Zinke to end coal leasing moratorium, reinstate royalty advisory committee Back

By Esther Whieldon | 03/28/2017 08:15 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke on Wednesday will revive an internal advisory committee on energy leasing and royalties, and he will rescind the Obama administration's coal leasing moratorium, according to sources familiar with the plans.

Zinke's move will follow President Donald Trump's executive order today directing his administration to review or eliminate a suite of Obama-era climate and energy policies, including the leasing moratorium. Former Secretary Sally Jewell put Interior's coal leasing program on hold while the agency reviewed how much it should be charging for the leases.

Zinke will also reinstate Royalty Policy Committee that the Obama administration terminated in 2014, sources say. The committee advises the secretary on managing federal and tribal mineral leases and revenues and members have typically included federal representatives as well as state, tribes, industry and public interest groups.

As a congressman Zinke sponsored a bill that would have had Interior reinstate the committee. Sen. Steve Daines, who has said he will attend the signing, sponsored a similar bill.

WHAT'S NEXT: Zinke will sign orders reinstating the royalty committee and ending the coal leasing moratorium at 10 a.m. Wednesday at Interior Department headquarters.

GOP looks to jam Democrats in shutdown fight Back

By Rachael Bade, John Bresnahan and Sarah Ferris | 11/29/2017 01:06 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and congressional GOP leaders are daring Democrats to shut down the government over immigration rather than back a plan to extend funding into January.

After Democratic leaders Rep. Nancy Pelosi and Sen. Chuck Schumer boycotted a Tuesday afternoon White House negotiating session on government funding, Speaker Paul Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell began hashing out a plan to pass a short-term spending bill to fund the government into January. The measure would not include a fix for so-called Dreamers, something Democrats have demanded be part of any spending bill.

Trump was open to the idea of a short-term continuing resolution during a White House meeting with GOP leaders, according to multiple Hill and White House sources familiar with the meeting.

While the plan hasn't been finalized, the House would move first under this scenario, passing a bill with only Republican votes. The Senate would then try to follow suit, but it would need to pick off at least eight Senate Democrats to clear the chamber's higher 60-vote threshold. Republicans believe that Schumer would come under heavy pressure from his own colleagues to avoid being blamed for a shutdown, GOP aides said.

Delaying a broader debate on government funding into 2018 would cheer conservatives, who have been dreading a massive year-end spending package that includes a fix for the Obama-era Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program. Republicans also want to complete work on a massive $5 trillion tax bill before taking on another fight.

But it also raises the likelihood of an ugly shutdown battle just before the holiday season.

Many Democrats have vowed to withhold their votes from any spending agreement that does not include a fix for the young undocumented immigrants brought to the country as minors. Democratic leadership sources have suggested that Pelosi and Schumer could back a one- or two-week CR. But they're loath to move the deadline past Jan. 1.

Still, Democrats may come under pressure to avoid a government shutdown over DACA, which does not fully expire until March. One House Appropriations Committee Democratic source said there could be some wiggle room in the party's stance on DACA that could help avert a shutdown. The source speculated that while many Democrats are dead-set against a full-year spending package without an immigration deal, there may be fewer who would object to a CR into January.

"There are a lot of questions that would determine how Democrats vote," the source said. "DACA is one, but there's also the question of the supplemental. There's the question of a [spending] caps deal."

At the same time, Ryan and other GOP leaders have for weeks resisted the idea of a stopgap bill through January.

"This is something the speaker feels strong about," leadership ally Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.) told POLITICO on Monday night. "A CR and sequester for the military is not a way to begin the New Year."

But that stance is shifting as Dec. 8 — when the government runs out of money — approaches and the GOP remains laser-focused on its tax bill.

Democratic leaders' refusal to show up at the White House for spending talks Tuesday, after Trump insulted them on Twitter, has also solidified a GOP desire to consider a more hard-line strategy.

"I'm very disappointed that Democrats abandoned the field with a shutdown looming. I think that's irresponsible," said Rep. Hal Rogers (R-Ky.), a longtime spending panel member who often works with Democrats on funding matters. "If the Democrats won't even talk, they're the ones who are going to cause a shutdown."

Asked about the new strategy, Ryan's office downplayed the notion that it has settled on a new GOP-only approach, arguing that everything is still in flux.

"No plan has been decided on," said Ryan spokeswoman AshLee Strong. "Assuming Democrats are interested in talking with congressional leadership and the White House, talks will continue."

The left is far from alone in its resistance to a CR through January. GOP defense hawks such as House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry of Texas abhor the idea of funding the military on a temporary basis and often complain that the lack of budget certainty cripples the nation's readiness.

However, Defense Secretary James Mattis, who also attended the White House meeting Tuesday, plans to talk to defense hawks to try to make them more comfortable with the plan. GOP leadership is also going to try to win over defense hawks by promising more spending for the military if they wait until January, perhaps even higher than the nearly $603 billion currently being considered, according to one House GOP source.

GOP leaders could also encounter resistance from moderate Republicans representing Hispanic-heavy districts. Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla.) on Tuesday said he would vote against any government funding bill past December that doesn't include a solution for Dreamers.

"I'm announcing today that I will not support any appropriations bill that funds the government beyond Dec. 31 unless we get this DACA issue resolved," Curbelo said at a panel on immigration reform in Florida held by the pro-immigrant business group IMPAC Fund and the University of Miami.

At the same time, a longer stopgap spending bill would be applauded by conservatives. Members of the House Freedom Caucus and Republican Study Committee have been urging Ryan not to create a new deadline right before Christmas, fearful that it would cripple the GOP's leverage and lead to the right getting steamrolled on immigration.

"If we have to do a CR, we prefer January rather than Christmas," Freedom Caucus leader Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said Wednesday morning.

The lawmakers who actually have to write spending bills would also prefer a stopgap that stretches into January, as it would give them more time to work on a bigger appropriations package to fund the government.

Barton to remain E&C vice chair Back

By Darius Dixon | 11/29/2017 03:22 PM EDT

Rep. Joe Barton said today he had discussed his role as vice chairman of the powerful House Energy and Commerce Committee with Chairman Greg Walden, but he has no plans to relinquish his spot following the embarrassing episode last week when an explicit photograph of him circulated online.

"For the time being," he told POLITICO. "I guess I can answer that."

A spokesman for the longtime Texas Republican has already said Barton had no plans to leave Congress, but he acknowledged discussing his position on the committee with Walden.

"I've had a private discussion with Chairman Walden, but it is private," Barton said. Whatever happens with his position as vice chairman would "be a mutual decision," he added.

Barton apologized over the picture last week and said that the Capitol Police are investigating the incident.

Grijalva asks to end confidentiality of workplace misconduct settlement Back

By Elana Schor | 11/29/2017 03:29 PM EDT

Rep. Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said Wednesday that he has asked the attorney for a former aide he paid to resolve a workplace misconduct claim to release him from confidentiality rules so he can share the details of their settlement.

Grijalva became the second sitting House member embroiled in controversy over Congress' secretive system for settling workplace misconduct claims after the Washington Times reported Tuesday he paid more than $48,000 to a staffer over a hostile work environment claim stemming from his alcohol use. The Arizona Democrat slammed the newspaper's report but did not dispute that a settlement was reached on his behalf.

Recalling the negotiation of the settlement, Grijalva told POLITICO on Wednesday that at times he thought he "should have insisted on" handling the complaint through litigation or through Capitol Hill's Office of Compliance, which requires the leaders of the House Administration Committee to approve any settlement.

Those options "would have not handcuffed me" when it comes to discussing the terms of the settlement, Grijalva said. Until the former aide's counsel agrees to the release of the agreement, he added, "I can't unilaterally do it without exposing myself to getting sued on a personal level."

Grijalva said his office has yet to receive a reply to a verbal request that the former aide's attorney agree to release the terms of the 2015 settlement, which was paid through his committee operating budget rather than the Office of Compliance's fund for settling workplace disputes on Capitol Hill.

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) is facing a political firestorm over three sexual misconduct complaints from former aides, one of whom settled a claim against him that was paid using his personal office's budget rather than the Office of Compliance's fund.

Reps. Jackie Speier (D-Calif.) and Barbara Comstock (R-Va.) have introduced bipartisan legislation that would publicly identify the offices on the receiving end of misconduct complaints and allow alleged victims to discuss their claims without being bound by confidentiality. Grijalva noted that "a plus" to that legislation is the transparency it brings to the settlement process.

"Because, otherwise, what are you hiding?" he said. "And then you leave it up to supposition, which is never good."

ODDS LOOKING GOOD FOR ANWR: Senior House Republicans said Tuesday they were optimistic a provision opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling would make it into Congress' final tax package, even as a handful of their colleagues expressed unease. "I've been asking for ANWR for a long, long time," said Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, who is on the conference committee sorting out the differences between the House and Senate bills. "And so have most rational people. I expect it to be part of the final product." Alaska Republican Rep. Don Young, also a conferee, said he was "feeling pretty good" about the provision's chances of making it through conference.

Alaska Sen. Dan Sullivan summed up the state of play over ANWR: "You don't want to jinx it and we're going to continue to work hard, but we're confident and we're going to have good representation on the conference." Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski is expected to join Young as a conferee once the Senate votes to go for conference. Sullivan added his vote on the package would be in jeopardy if the ANWR provision doesn't make it into the finished product.

Grassley ready to rumble: Senate Judiciary Chairman Chuck Grassley suggested he'd throw his weight around to alter provisions in the House-passed bill that would change qualification terms for some renewable energy projects and trim the renewable production tax credit. "I would think they'd be embarrassed of even putting it in," he told reporters. "What is there about wind that would cause them to do something that they haven't done for anything else?" Grassley also said changing the tax credits went against a promise he'd received from Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin back in January. A coalition of right-of-center clean energy groups sent a letter outlining their own concerns about the House and Senate bills on Tuesday.

Extenders package coming together: Legislation extending expired tax provisions, including short-term tax benefits to promote renewable energy sources like biodiesel and solar power, is expected to come together in the next couple of weeks, Pro Tax's Aaron Lorenzo and Bernie Becker report, citing senior GOP senators. Multiple sources say a package could hitch a ride with an end-of-year government funding agreement. Sens. Johnny Isakson and Tim Scott are advocating to extend a 2020 deadline on tax credits for new nuclear energy projects, while Grassley has pushed a biodiesel credit.

Meanwhile, senior congressional Republicans are drawing a line in the sand by promising they won't grant Democrats concessions in a second short-term spending bill later this month to keep the government open, Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief's Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris report. "If we pass a bill on or about the 22nd and go home, then the Senate will need to make up its mind about what to do about that," Rep. Hal Rogers said. "The option is either: Pass or have a shutdown in place."

NEVER HEARD OF THIS BEFORE: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt will only stay for an hour during a Thursday appearance at an Energy and Commerce subcommittee before returning later in the afternoon. "Congressional Republicans need to grow a backbone and stand up to President Trump and the members of his cabinet, like Administrator Pruitt, who have repeatedly ignored any Congressional oversight," ranking member Frank Pallone told ME in a statement. "It's clear that we're simply not going to get any real oversight of the Trump Administration from Congressional Republicans anytime soon." A committee spokesman confirmed the arrangement and said it was to accommodate a meeting at the White House. EPA didn't respond to request for comment.

Context here: ME's never heard of a Cabinet official taking a lengthy break in the middle of a congressional hearing, regardless of the reason. And, remember, this is slated to be Pruitt's first appearance before the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Ahead of the appearance, more than 1,000 scientists asked congressional leaders to question Pruitt about efforts to overhaul the agency's science advisory panels. "Without the best available scientific advice, the EPA will be ill-equipped to tackle emerging environmental and public health challenges, and the American people will suffer," they write.

GOOD DAY, SUNSHINE: TRADE REP TO HEAR SOLAR CASE: The U.S. Trade Representative will hear arguments today at 9:30 a.m. for what kind of tariffs or quotas — if any — the president should impose on imported solar panels. The hearing will likely be a rehash of arguments that were made to the U.S. International Trade Commission before that body proposed its own set of remedies for the damage done to U.S. trade manufacturers by low cost imports.

Trump gets to make the call: The president will ultimately have full latitude to impose penalties on imported solar cells and panels, and the Solar Energy Industries Association is hoping to influence his decision by recasting their arguments against a tariff in Trump's preferred terms. The group rolled out its America First Plan for Solar Energy, saying rejecting tariffs would promote "U.S. energy dominance," help national security and save jobs. Trump must make a decision by Jan. 26.

Republicans urge no tariffs: 35 House and six Senate Republicans sent letters ahead of the hearing urging the Trump administration not to slap tariffs on imported solar equipment.

ZINKE FLOATS SHRINKING MORE MONUMENTS: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke urged Trump in his 20-page final recommendations to downsize Nevada's Gold Butte and Oregon's Cascade-Siskiyou national monuments, in addition to the drastic scalebacks of Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante national the president announced Monday. Management plans at half a dozen other monuments would be changed, though their boundaries would not be altered. And Zinke suggests creating three new national monuments: Camp Nelson in Kentucky; Medgar Evers's home in Mississippi; and the Badger II Medicine Area in Zinke's own homestate of Montana.

CITIES RALLY ON CLIMATE: Some 36 U.S. mayors signed an agreement Tuesday vowing to do their part to curb greenhouse gas emissions even as the Trump administration has signaled its intent to leave the Paris agreement. Former President Barack Obama later delivered brief remarks to the gathering in Chicago thanking cities for showing "the kind of leadership that is needed at the moment" and mayors for helping to keep "our word on the world stage." Obama said "cities and states and businesses and universities and nonprofits have emerged as the new face of American leadership on climate change."

MCINTYRE MIA? It's been 34 days since Jones Day attorney Kevin McIntyre was confirmed by the Senate to be a FERC commissioner, and two weeks since he got his signed commission. Commissioners basically get to decide for themselves when they want to get sworn in, so speculation has swirled about why the would-be chairman hasn't shown up for work. McIntyre still has a webpage at Jones Day, which usually is one of the first things to go when a big firm lawyer takes a government job. An out-of-office reply from his work email account said he he would be back on Dec. 14. The White House did not respond to a request for comment, and a FERC spokesman said, "We have nothing on that at this time."

AIN'T NO THING: Grassley is downplaying the significance of the meeting that Sen. Ted Cruz secured with Trump and several Cabinet members on Thursday to discuss biofuels and vehicle fuel-efficiency policy. "The president keeps doing what he told the voters of Iowa, as well as me and Senator [\[Joni\] Ernst](#), which is supporting ethanol," Grassley told reporters Tuesday, adding that it's not unusual for the president to accept a meeting request from senators. The Iowa Republican also said he thinks Cruz's leverage has diminished since the EPA last week released the rule setting 2018 blending requirements for biofuels — which kept flat the levels for corn ethanol.

SWEET TREAT: Bishop gave Trump a special little treat during his Monday visit to Utah to unveil his monument recommendations: a box of chocolates from a store in his district. "It was cheesy but I thought why not?" he said. "He says he likes chocolates." No word on what Trump thought of the candy, which Bishop said was the store's popular nut roll.

And another gift: At a tax event at the White House on Tuesday, North Dakota state Sen. Jessica Unruh gave Trump a Make Coal Great Again hat as she praised the tax overhaul. "The production tax credit has destroyed the energy market, especially in the Midwest. We don't have a lot of electricity produced from natural gas in North Dakota. So wind production has really eroded our state tax base and replaced coal production when it comes to electricity production," she said. "We're also very thankful for all the regulatory reform we've seen come from your office."

NO NOMINATION VACATION: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee takes up R.D. James' nomination to run the Army Corps of Engineers this morning at 10 a.m. in Dirksen 406. The nomination earlier this month cleared the Senate Armed Services Committee on a voice vote, though the crowded December to-do list suggests he may not get a floor vote until next year.

In the afternoon, an EPW subcommittee holds a hearing entitled "Challenges Facing Superfund and Waste Cleanup Efforts Following Natural Disasters." Witnesses are from Texas and California alone.

SEE YOU IN COURT (AGAIN): Joining environmental and public health groups, a coalition of 15 Democratic attorneys general sued EPA on Tuesday for missing a key deadline related to implementation of its 2015 ozone standard, Pro's Alex Guillén reports.

MAIL CALL! DON'T TURN THE CAR (STANDARDS) AROUND: At least 22 Democratic senators, led by Ed Markey, Sheldon Whitehouse and Kamala Harris, are sending Pruitt a letter this morning urging him not to weaken emissions standards for model years 2021 through 2025. "Regulated industries should not be able to undermine technically sound standards that have clear environmental and health benefits," they'll say in letter which ME has glimpsed. And their letter comes as the Union of Concerned Scientists releases a new report arguing automakers have for decades repeated a "familiar pattern" of attacking new policies as technologically infeasible.

TAKE A LOOK PLEASE! Seven Democratic senators asked GAO in a letter to examine how the Trump administration developed its lower social cost of carbon figure. In particular, they asked for an examination of how other states and countries created similar measures. Link here.

FIGHTING PARK SERVICE CUTS: The NRDC Action Fund is launching a five-figure, TV ad campaign in Montana today against the Trump administration's proposed cuts to the National Park Service and urging Sen. Jon Tester to continue fighting them. Watch it here.

FOR YOUR RADAR: The American Legislative Exchange Council is meeting today through Friday in Nashville and conservative legislators will weigh a model resolution calling on EPA to review the endangerment finding, which requires regulations to limit greenhouse gas emissions. ALEC members will vote on the proposal Thursday. Exxon Mobil, a private sector member of ALEC, is opposing the push, particularly because of its language questioning climate science, The Hill reports.

STUDY BUDDIES: E2, former DOE head Ernest Moniz's Energy Futures Initiative and the National Association of State Energy Officials are teaming up on a detailed analysis of energy jobs for every state, including jobs in solar, wind, energy efficiency and clean transportation. The groups expect the report out by Spring 2018.

HOW TO DIGITIZE AN ELECTRIC GRID: The Bipartisan Policy Center released a series of recommendations Tuesday for how to digitize the electric grid. Among their suggestions: Having DOE convene a task force on the issue and including funding for modernizing grid investment as part an infrastructure package. Read the whole report here.

Stories from POLITICO Pro

House tax bill slashes value of wind energy tax credit Back

By Eric Wolff | 11/02/2017 02:20 PM EDT

The House tax bill released Thursday would substantially reduce the value of a key wind energy incentive, tighten requirements on what renewable energy companies have to do to qualify for tax credits, extend a nuclear energy tax break, and restore support for clean energy technologies that had been "orphaned" from an earlier tax extenders law.

The bill also eliminates an electric vehicle tax credit and jettisons some little-used oil industry tax breaks — as well as getting rid of the more significant domestic production tax deduction enjoyed by oil companies and other manufacturers.

The wind industry was quick to condemn the changes to its tax treatment.

"Despite comments to the contrary, this proposal reneges on the tax reform deal that was already agreed to, and would impose a retroactive tax hike on an entire industry," Tom Kiernan, CEO of the American Wind Energy Association, said in a statement. "The House proposal would pull the rug out from under 100,000 U.S. wind workers and 500 American factories, including some of the fastest growing jobs in the country. We expect members of the House and Senate to oppose any proposal that fails to honor that commitment, and we will fight hard to see that wind energy continues to work for America."

Here are some highlights from the text and a section-by-section summary provided by the Ways and Means committee.

— PTC cutbacks: The bill would reduce the value of the Production Tax Credit to 1.5 cents per kilowatt-hour, the level it was set at in 1992, rather than indexing it for inflation. That would reduce its value far beyond the terms of a tax credit phase-out that was implemented with bipartisan support in 2015. Wind farms and other eligible projects that begin construction this year can now claim a 1.9 cents/kWh credit, down from 2.3 cents/kWh for projects that started last year. The credit is scheduled to disappear for projects built after 2019 under current law, a schedule maintained in the House bill.

Developers also would face tougher requirements to claim the credit, the value of which is determined by when construction begins. The House bill requires a "continuous program of construction" until a facility comes online in order to qualify for the credit, eliminating provisions of existing law that allow developers to make "safe harbor" investments to qualify. The Joint Committee on Taxation says eliminating the inflation-adjustment and tightening the construction requirements will save $12.3 billion over 10 years, according to the bill summary.

— ITC repealed after 2027, orphan credits revived : The House bill extends the investment tax credit for a set of "orphaned" technologies left out of the 2015 legislation phasing out the ITC and PTC over five years. Fuel cells, small wind turbines, combined heat and power systems and microturbines can now claim the ITC until Jan. 1, 2022, with the credits phasing down at the same rate as the solar ITC. But what was to be a permanent 10 percent tax credit for solar investments will now terminate at the end of 2026. The House bill includes similar "continuous construction" requirements for the ITC as for the PTC. The changes would cost the government $1.2 billion in reduced revenues over 10 years, according to JCT estimates cited in the bill summary.

— Advanced nuclear tax credit extended: The bill extends a tax credit for advanced nuclear projects, allowing the secretary of Treasury to transfer unused credits after 2020, which was the in-service deadline under current law. The extension has long been a priority for South Carolina Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham and Tim Scott, among others. The credits would cost $400 million over 10 years.

— Utilities keep interest deduction: The bill would change how much loan interest some businesses can deduct from their taxes, while allowing them to take advantage of full expensing of capital investments. However, it excludes regulated utilities from the new rules, providing a win for the industry. Eric Grey, director of government relations for the Edison Electric Institute, a trade group, told POLITICO in September that losing the interest tax deduction was a major concern for utilities. Overall, JCT estimates the deduction-and-expensing changes would save the government $172 billion over 10 years.

— No more 199: The House bill would eliminate the domestic manufacturing credit known as section 199. Current law allows certain oil and gas companies to claim a 6 percent tax deduction, and other manufacturers can claim a 9 percent deduction, but the House bill would strip section 199 from the tax code starting next year. Doing so would save $95.2 billion over 10 years.

— Minor oil credits repealed: The bill repeals two small oil industry credits that have barely been used because they only kick in when commodity prices are low. Repealing the enhanced oil recovery credit would cost the government about $200 million over 10 years, while eliminating the marginal well production credit would have no effect on revenues.

— EVs lose credit: The bill repeals a $7,500 tax credit for electric vehicles. It is part of a slew of tax credits, along with a mortgage credit, and an adoption credit, that the bill proposes repealing. Repealing all of the credits would save $4 billion over 10 years, but the summary does not include a JCT estimate for the electric vehicle credit alone.

— Biodiesel, CCS missing: An expired biodiesel blenders credit was not restored, something likely to become an issue in the Senate where Sen. Chuck Grassley wants it revived as a producers credit; and a credit for carbon capture and sequestration did not get in the text, despite having bipartisan support.

Senate tax writers teeing up tax extenders bill Back

By Aaron Lorenzo and Bernie Becker | 12/05/2017 07:23 PM EDT

Leading GOP senators expect legislation to extend expired tax provisions to come together in the next couple of weeks.

Energy and agriculture provisions are driving the plan.

"We always wind up doing it, so yeah, I suspect that's something we'll have to do," said Senate Finance Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). "There hasn't been much talk about it right now, but there's always loose ends that you just have to tie up."

The items, which would revive short-term tax benefits to promote renewable energy sources like biodiesel and solar power, as well as rail lines crucial to farming communities, weren't included in the major tax legislation already advancing in Congress, H.R. 1 \(115\). Nor were they part of the massive package of tax extenders Congress passed in 2015.

Instead, these extra extensions of longstanding policies are moving separately.

They could ride with an end-of-year government funding agreement, according to multiple sources on Capitol Hill, as well as lobbyists.

"I wanted it in the bigger tax bill but there are so many extenders that they just made it too complicated," said Sen. Mike Crapo (R-Idaho). "So the decision was made — not by me — to pull the extenders back for a different bill."

Crapo is pushing to continue a tax credit to maintain short-line railroads, which connect farm goods from hard-to-reach locations around the country to main rail arteries that can carry the food anywhere.

Sens. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) and Tim Scott (R-S.C.) are advocating to extend a 2020 deadline on tax credits for new nuclear energy projects. Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has worked on biodiesel.

In the House, a separate effort has been afoot to further delay start dates on several health care-related taxes, like the medical device excise tax and health insurance tax, connected to the Affordable Care Act.

WHAT'S NEXT: Government funding runs out Dec. 8, and talks on longer-term spending plans are ongoing.

House GOP leaders vow no deals with Democrats on stopgap spending Back

By Jennifer Scholtes and Sarah Ferris | 12/05/2017 11:06 AM EDT

House Republican leaders have promised conservatives that they won't grant concessions to Democrats to get enough votes for a stopgap spending bill — gaining GOP support but also raising the specter of a government shutdown later this month.

Majority party leaders in the House tentatively decided Tuesday morning to hold tight on their plan to fund the government through Dec. 22, bucking calls from conservatives to move the deadline to Dec. 30.

Still whipping to ensure sufficient GOP support, leaders pushed off a Rules Committee meeting and final floor action by a day, with House passage on the two-week patch, H.J. Res. 123 \(115\), now expected Thursday. Government funding runs out on Friday.

Those intraparty talks will drag into Wednesday, after a huddle with House Speaker Paul Ryan, conservative holdouts and defense hawks ended without a resolution Tuesday afternoon. A final decision isn't expected until Wednesday morning, after another last-minute meeting by the House Freedom Caucus.

The problem with the House strategy is that Senate Republicans still need the votes of at least eight Senate Democrats to advance spending legislation, likely resulting in deal-making later this month that won't fly with fiscal conservatives in the House.

Enough Senate Democratic votes appear possible for a "clean" stopgap spending bill, or continuing resolution, that would extend from Friday until Dec. 22. Both parties hope to have reached a bipartisan, two-year agreement on overall spending levels for defense and non-defense programs by later in the month.

"We don't know what the House is going to do, but if it's a short-term CR, it gives us a little more time to do the things we're talking about now," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer told reporters Tuesday afternoon, noting that top congressional leaders plan to meet with President Donald Trump on Thursday to work on topline budget caps.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell also indicated that Republicans in the upper chamber are gunning for a two-week stopgap rather than a deal until Dec. 30, which he said isn't "the best way to go forward."

But the trouble could come with the vote on a second stopgap just before the Christmas holiday, when Democrats would be expected to make more demands such as an agreement on how to treat DREAMers, young undocumented immigrants. If GOP leaders in the lower chamber stay true to their promises to the likes of the House Freedom Caucus, the game plan could result in shutdown-spurring deadlock right before lawmakers plan to leave town for the holidays.

The scheduling changes in the House came after members of the Freedom Caucus temporarily withheld support on a tax vote Monday night to get leaders to opt for a Dec. 30 deadline.

But for now, fiscal hardliners seem appeased by other commitments they've clinched after making that demand.

Rep. Dave Brat (R-Va.), a member of the Freedom Caucus, said leaders "made some great assurances" during a Tuesday morning Republican Conference meeting that "the team stays together" on issues that could emerge.

"And that means you don't go to the Democrats like usual at Christmastime or right after," Brat told reporters.

Longtime spending leader Rep. Hal Rogers (R-Ky.) suggested House lawmakers could try to force the Senate to accept their version of the second patch.

"If we pass a bill on or about the 22nd and go home, then the Senate will need to make up its mind about what to do about that," Rogers said. "The option is either: Pass or have a shutdown in place."

Ryan expressed confidence that the initial funding measure will pass this week but didn't address prospects for a deal beyond Dec. 22.

"I feel like we're going to have a majority, and we're going to have 218 for passing the CR we had this week," Ryan told reporters Tuesday morning. "We're having a good conversation with our members about timing and date and tactics and all the rest. The point is, we're having the kind of family discussion that we need to have on how to proceed forward with a majority, and I'm confident we'll have that."

In punting the drama to the week before Christmas, GOP lawmakers may try to jam

Democrats with big boosts to defense spending.

An unlikely mix of conservatives and defense hawks is still eyeing a plan to attach a full year of Pentagon funding to the Dec. 22 bill — a move that would cause a showdown in the Senate.

Democrats in that chamber have refused to back a bill that prioritizes the military over spending on domestic programs. And Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin dug in on that threat Tuesday.

Some conservatives in the House are betting pressure to fund the Pentagon would be just enough to convince a handful of red-state Democrats to vote in support of a second government funding bill later this month.

If the military funding isn't enough, House Republicans are tossing around another bargaining chip: a disaster aid package. That bill would include tens of billions of dollars for storm-ravaged Florida, Texas, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands, making it tougher for Democrats to oppose.

Another must-pass item, funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program, could also be added to the bill, lawmakers said.

"Is the Senate going to turn around, Christmas or New Year's, and say we're not going to take care of the defense of America, we're not going to take care of these people with these hurricanes?" Rep. Bradley Byrne (R-Ala.) said. "If they are, then it's on them."

Greens sue EPA over missed ozone designation deadline Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/04/2017 03:04 PM EDT

Ten environmental and public health groups today sued EPA for missing a key deadline to implement the 2015 ozone standard.

EPA faced a statutory deadline on Oct. 1 to say which parts of the U.S. were meeting the new ozone standard. Administrator Scott Pruitt said over the summer that he would delay that decision by one year, although he reversed course after several lawsuits were filed. EPA last month issued designations for 85 percent of all U.S. counties which it said met the standard or did not have enough information to decide.

But the agency has remained silent on the remaining 15 percent of the nation, which includes many of the urban and downwind regions that face the worst smog pollution. Any area deemed in "nonattainment" will have to write a plan to reduce ozone-related pollution, and EPA's delay also puts off any requirement for those areas to act.

A coalition of Democratic attorneys general is also expected to sue EPA soon.

EPA has faced similar lawsuits after delaying designations under previous standards — such as the 2010 sulfur dioxide rule, for which environmental groups negotiated a consent decree with the Obama administration that set a series of designation deadlines lasting through 2020.

It's unclear whether a similar deal can be reached here. Pruitt recently issued a directive barring EPA from agreeing to such consent decrees. If EPA resists negotiations, the court may set its own timeline for the agency to act.

WHAT'S NEXT: The environmentalists' suit was filed in the U.S. District Court for Northern California. EPA has not indicated when it may act on the remaining designations.

Democratic AGs sue EPA over missed ozone deadline Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/05/2017 05:06 PM EDT

Fifteen Democratic attorneys general today sued EPA for missing a key deadline to implement the 2015 ozone standard.

EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt faced an Oct. 1 deadline to declare which parts of the country failed to meet the 2015 standard. Pruitt has issued designations for 85 percent of the nation's counties that either meet the standard or lack the data to make a decision. But he has not said which areas are in nonattainment, a designation that would require those states to write and implement a plan to clean up the air.

A number of the states involved face ozone pollution problems, including car-heavy California and New York as well as states in New England, which are often referred to as the "nation's tailpipe" since pollution from other states blows in their direction.

The AGs who joined the lawsuit include those from California, Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, Washington and the District of Columbia.

WHAT'S NEXT: The AGs' lawsuit comes one day after environmental and public health groups sued over the same issue. Both are in the U.S. District Court for Northern California.

HARVEY MESSES WITH TEXAS: Hurricane Harvey is closing in on the Texas coast, with the bullseye painted right on Corpus Christi. The storm will be the first to hit the Texas coast since the Category 4 Hurricane Ike slammed into Houston in September 2008. Harvey looks likely to reach at least Category 3 by the time it makes landfall early Saturday, according to forecasts. It has already caused BP, Exxon Mobil, Anadarko and other oil companies to evacuate their deepwater rigs. BSEE estimated the shutdowns took 10 percent of the Gulf of Mexico's oil production offline as of mid-day on Thursday, and that number is only likely to be higher when the agency's next bulletin comes out later today. Harvey will also throw a wrench into U.S. oil exports, much of which leaves the country via Corpus.

Harvey could prove to be the first big test of FEMA's new head, Brock Long, who won Senate confirmation in June. FEMA set up an Incident Support Base at near Seguin, Texas, complete with supplies, a spokeswoman said, but so far there have been no requests for support.

Bolstering the case for the Ike Dike? The petrochemical and refining operations around Galveston and the Houston Ship Channel aren't expected to be at the epicenter of this storm, as of Thursday's forecast, but emergency planners there have been worrying ever since Hurricane Ike inflicted $29.5 billion in damages and killed 74 people in 2008. Texas politicians and business leaders have been pushing the idea of a massive seawall to protect Galveston and Houston, and in April asked President Donald Trump for $15 billion for the project. Hurricane Harvey could help them continue to make the case as they fight for federal funding. But environmental groups are wary of the effort, dubbed the "Ike Dike," arguing it could hugely alter the salinity patterns and block key fish species in Galveston Bay, where millions of dollars, including money related to the 2010 Deepwater Horizon oil spill, have been spent on environmental restoration.

What about New Orleans? A dozen years after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the city, the Big Easy may not be prepared to handle heavy rains this time around with three of five turbines that power drainage pumps for the low-lying city not working, the New Orleans Advocate reports. In addition, 15 of the city's 120 water pumps are offline as the city braces for between five and 10 inches of rain.

REPORT: THREE MONUMENTS IN BULLS EYE: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke didn't make public his report on what to do with 22 national monuments under review, but his recommendations call for shrinking three of the most controversial sites — Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante monuments in Utah and Cascade-Siskiyou in Oregon, the Washington Post reports, citing "multiple individuals briefed on the decision." Remember a final decision to reduce the size of any of the national monuments will be almost immediately challenged by environmental and conservation groups, as well as sympathetic attorneys general.

Groups slammed the decision by the Interior Department not to release the draft report, and the complaints grew louder throughout the day Thursday. "This summary is not transparent and this is not how our government should do business," Sen. Tom Udall (D-N.M.) said in a statement. "The American people have the right to see his entire report. A proposal to strip protections from public lands should be made public immediately," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) added in her own statement. The Center for Biological Diversity announced it had already filed a FOIA request for the document.

One monument spared: A source briefed on Zinke's decision told the Bangor Daily News the draft recommends keeping the Katahdin Woods and Waters National Monument intact while making "some changes on allowable uses." That goes against the wishes of bombastic Maine Gov. Paul LePage, who urged Congress and the Trump administration to undo the designation.

READY, STEADY, CAN DOE GO? It's unclear whether any of the recommendations from Energy Secretary's Rick Perry much-anticipated grid study have legs, but that answer may depend on how much weight the administration throws behind them, Pro's Darius Dixon reports. "If these recommendations, as a suite, are something that the administration really wants to do, someone in the White House is going to have to quarterback that," said Greg Gershuny, who served as chief of staff in DOE's Energy Policy and Systems Analysis office during the Obama administration. "How engaged Perry is and how many times a week he's going to the Hill and talking to other agency heads is going to tell us a lot about how serious they are about this."

Four issues Darius suggests watching: Efforts to have FERC "expedite" its work to reformulate how electricity markets pay power generators; research and development dollars toward grid reliability, which the Trump administration's first budget suggested cutting deeply; a push to speed and reduce the cost of "licensing, relicensing, and permitting of grid infrastructure" and calls for EPA to revisit its New Source Review permitting program that requires power plants to tighten emissions controls when they upgrade. A caution: Several of those issues have proven to be thorny matters for agencies to address over several administrations.

API SOUNDS WARNING ON NAFTA: In an op-ed published Thursday, the American Petroleum Institute's Jack Gerard urged the Trump administration not to tinker with key energy trade provisions as it worked to negotiate NAFTA. "By maintaining successful provisions on zero tariffs, market access, trade liberalization and strong investment protection, the Trump administration can modernize NAFTA without jeopardizing energy trade flows," he wrote. Among the most-watched provisions, Gerard voiced strong support for preserving the investor-state dispute settlement provision, which he said is "a neutral arbitration system for enforcing these protections, safeguarding American investments."

ACCESS DENIED: EPA leadership has adopted a new social media policy that will see employees barred from accessing many popular sites, according to an email from the agency's human resources office obtained by ME. "Due to recent events in the news we are going to start blocking many of the popular social media sites for employees who do not need them for justified, business purposes," it says. Employees must now complete a mandatory survey on their behavior before a default block takes effect.

MORE GROUPS OPPOSE CLOVIS: Dozens of environmental and food groups are out this morning with a letter urging senators to oppose Sam Clovis' nomination to be USDA's chief scientist. "Without competent, science-based leadership, the USDA will be unable to protect our environment and help thousands of farmers and their communities adapt to these worsening burdens," the letter, led by Friends of the Earth and the Health, Environment, Agriculture, Labor Food Alliance, says. The groups argue the nomination of Clovis, who lacks any formal scientific training, also violates the law.

REPORT: DEMOCRAT BACKS BLM MOVE WEST: Sen. Michael Bennet became the latest Colorado politician to back moving three federal agencies — the Bureau of Land Management, the Bureau of Reclamation and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service — to the Denver area, according to a report in Western Wire, a project of the Western Energy Alliance. "I think anything we can get out of Washington, D.C. and into Colorado, I'm for," the Democrat said. Republican Sen. Cory Gardner and Gov. John Hickenlooper are among the other proponents of the move west.

WHAT A MESS! Even as he takes pot shots at congressional leadership, President Donald Trump is trying to set up a meeting with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, House Speaker Paul Ryan, Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi in the near future to stave off a federal default and a government shutdown, POLITICO's Kyle Cheney and Seung Min Kim report. Ryan predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a debt ceiling increase and said there are "a lot of options" about how to structure the legislation. He also said a short-term government funding bill would likely be needed to keep the lights on through December, though there's no guarantee Trump would sign that if it doesn't include border wall funding.

ZINKE'S STILL ON THE MOVE: He may be facing heat over his private national monument report, but Zinke travels to the Great Smoky Mountains National Park and the Blue Ridge Parkway today to commemorate the 101st anniversary of the founding of the National Park Service.

ME's off next week, but Energy Secretary Rick Perry travels to Astana, Kazakhstan on Aug. 28 for a "Future Energy" expo along with Rep. Kevin Cramer and Overseas Private Investment Corporation CEO Ray Washburne, among others.

CALIFORNIA REPUBLICANS OUST LEADER OVER CLIMATE VOTE: California Assembly Republicans voted unanimously Thursday behind closed doors to oust Chad Mayes as their leader following his vote last month in favor of bipartisan climate change legislation, the Mercury News reports. "The Republican caucus just elected a new Republican leader," Mayes announced on the floor following the 25-member caucus' vote. The new leader of the bloc, farmer Brian Dahle, voted against the extension of the state's cap and trade program.

MAIL CALL! N.H. LAWMAKERS SEEK UPDATE ON WATER CONTAMINATION:

New Hampshire's two Democratic senators — Jeanne Shaheen and Maggie Hassan — and Rep. Carol Shea-Porter sent a letter to the Air Force requesting an update on efforts to decontaminate water supplies fouled with perfluorinated chemicals at the former Pease Air Force Base. They sought a public meeting as well as an opportunity for local elected officials to receive an update.

REPORT: HOW TO GET HYDROPOWER DEPLOYED FASTER: The R Street Institute released a report Thursday detailing a series of changes to the hydropower licensing process that it said would speed deployment of the renewable power source. "Congress and the administration should prioritize the reduction of uncertainties and delays in hydropower licensure, which largely stem from duplicative processes, poor dispute resolution and lack of schedule discipline," the report said. Among the top suggestions are making FERC the sole federal decision-maker and studying the possibility of privatizing federally owned dams.

NO MORE HOLDING ON RENEWABLES: Green America launched a new campaign Thursday urging AT&T and Verizon to publicly commit to fuel their operations with 100 percent renewable energy by 2025. "AT&T and Verizon both recognize the urgency of climate change and the need for action, now we need to see that concern translate into commitments to purchase of wind and solar power," Beth Porter, climate campaigns director at Green America, said in a statement. Both companies are currently using less than two percent renewable energy to power their massive servers, according to Green America.

RECORDS SOUGHT OVER AUTO REVIEW: The Center for Biological Diversity filed an open records request Thursday seeking copies of all communications between representatives of the auto industry and EPA and NHTSA over the federal reassessment of vehicle fuel economy standards. "The public deserves to know the truth about whether backroom deals are influencing the agency," Vera Pardee, a senior attorney with the group, said in a statement.

TROLL SO HARD: 314 Action, a new group hoping to get scientists elected to public office, tweeted a picture of several copies of "Environmental Science for Dummies" that they sent to EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt at the agency's headquarters.

Perry's grid study: 4 things that may have legs Back

By Darius Dixon | 08/24/2017 06:56 PM EDT

The Energy Department's study of the electric grid arrived late Wednesday, but it's not yet clear whether Secretary Rick Perry's efforts to help support nuclear and coal-fired power plants will have legs.

The 187-page report called for DOE to focus mostly on R&D and coordinating efforts to prepare for disasters, and left the heavy lifting for other agencies, such as FERC, EPA, the National Science Foundation and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Among the recommendations are for FERC to "expedite" its work to reformulate how electricity markets pay power generators, and for EPA to revisit its New Source Review permitting program that requires plants to tighten emissions controls when they upgrade their plants — both issues that have proven difficult for the two agencies.

"If these recommendations, as a suite, are something that the administration really wants to do, someone in the White House is going to have to quarterback that," said Greg Gershuny, who served as chief of staff in DOE's Energy Policy and Systems Analysis office during the Obama administration and worked on the Quadrennial Energy Review.

"In the next four or five weeks, as Congress gets back, we'll see if these things are going to move," he said. "How engaged Perry is and how many times a week he's going to the Hill and talking to other agency heads is going to tell us a lot about how serious they are about this."

DOE, which did not submit the report for OMB review before its release, is now taking public comments on the study. Here's a breakdown of the issues.

Wholesale electricity markets: The new report calls on FERC to speed its work with states, grid operators and market players to "improve" how power producers are paid in the wholesale markets under the agency's jurisdiction. FERC had been grappling with the issue under its "price formation" initiative over the past three years, rolling out proposals and new rules to try to adapt to the increasing complexity of the electric grid — and to make sure power generators are fairly compensated.

However, grid operator PJM has argued regulators were thinking too small, and it released a trio of working papers earlier this year highlighting FERC's initiative while quickly noting that "fundamental" price formation issues hadn't been addressed. DOE suggested that FERC consider "fuel-neutral" markets to pay for essential grid reliability services.

So far, FERC seems sympathetic.

Soon after President Donald Trump gave him the gavel this month, FERC Chairman Neil Chatterjee stressed that generators, including coal and nuclear plants, "need to be properly compensated to recognize the value they provide." FERC has broad authority to alter market pricing rules, but that can be a slow process, and can have vastly different impacts in different states and regions — and draw sharp political pushback.

ClearView Energy Partners analysts warned against dismissing opposition to market rules that raise electricity prices on consumers.

"FERC-led initiatives can often create strange bedfellows, strong alliances and more opposition than state-led proposals," a ClearView report issued Thursday said. "We are reluctant to assume this all goes as quickly as the change advocates hope."

DOE's study also argued that "negative offers should be mitigated to the broadest extent possible," a reference to the fact that renewables like wind power can still make money even if power prices go negative because they can rely on a federal production tax credit.

Grid reliability R&D: The new report says that DOE should "focus R&D efforts to enhance utility, grid operator, and consumer efforts to enhance system reliability and resilience." That view stands in contrast to the Trump administration's first budget proposal, which suggested cutting DOE's electricity office by 42 percent from current levels, to $120 million.

Nevertheless, Perry has said he wants his agency to focus on "early-stage" research, with the intention of transitioning that work to the private sector as quickly as possible.

DOE's study says more research should be done on technology that will make it easier for grid operators to integrate increasing amounts of renewable power, facilitate technical coordination with Canada and Mexico, and increase "targeted" R&D to boost the efficiency of coal-fired power plants.

Infrastructure development: The new push calls on the federal government to "accelerate and reduce costs for the licensing, relicensing, and permitting of grid infrastructure" — including power plants and transmission — which could easily involve a half-dozen federal agencies.

DOE, the study says, "should review regulatory burdens for siting and permitting for generation and gas and electricity transmission infrastructure and should take actions to accelerate the process and reduce costs."

The Obama administration sought to quicken the electric transmission permitting process in 2013 with a memo to the chiefs at the departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Energy and Interior, which resulted in a final rule last year. Several members of Congress have also pressed the issue in legislation, including in the 2015 highway bill that included directives to more than a dozen agencies to join a new permitting council tasked with speeding up the federal process for large infrastructure projects.

DOE also recommends that the NRC "ensure the safety of existing and new nuclear facilities without unnecessarily adding to the operating costs and economic uncertainty of nuclear energy" and, without much explanation, "[r]evisit nuclear safety rules under a risk-based approach."

The report doesn't target specific NRC regulations, but does discuss the agency's license renewal process and the expenses associated with equipment upgrades, which may make it a prime target for cost reductions.

Breaking down barriers for coal power: The study recommends that policymakers "encourage EPA to allow coal-fired power plants to improve efficiency and reliability without triggering new regulatory approvals and associated costs." That's a reference to the New Source Review permitting program, which was created under the 1977 Clean Air Act amendments to prevent coal plants and other major emitters from making equipment changes or upgrades that would increase their emissions.

Reforming the program has been an industry priority for decades, with companies arguing that power plants have held back on making upgrades that would increase their efficiency because of concerns that they would have to go through the NSR permitting process. A collection of unions earlier this summer, for example, called for NSR reform as part of any replacement rule for the Clean Power Plan.

But multiple Bush administration attempts to weaken permitting requirements show that NSR reform is much easier said than done. A 2002 rule was partly struck down by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said several new exemptions were not allowed under the Clean Air Act. Another 2003 rule introducing another major exemption was completely tossed out by the D.C. Circuit. A third NSR rulemaking, issued in the final days of Bush's presidency, dealt with how sources report emissions changes. Environmentalists sued, and the rule remains under reconsideration at EPA to this day.

Trump takes potshots at GOP leaders as fiscal crisis looms Back

By Kyle Cheney and Seung Min Kim | 08/24/2017 03:40 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Thursday reignited his feud with GOP leaders, taking fresh potshots at Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and House Speaker Paul Ryan. But underneath the bluster, there's a recognition that Congress and the White House still need to work together to avoid fiscal disaster in September.

Trump is working to convene a meeting with McConnell and Ryan as well as Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi soon after the August recess ends, according to congressional sources. Avoiding a federal default and a government shutdown will likely be chief among the topics of discussion.

It could be an awkward meeting.

Trump blamed McConnell and Ryan in a pair of tweets Thursday for creating a "mess" over the debt ceiling, contending they rejected his call to attach an increase in the nation's borrowing limit to a bipartisan veterans bill.

"I requested that Mitch M & Paul R tie the Debt Ceiling legislation into the popular V.A. Bill (which just passed) for easy approval," Trump wrote Thursday morning. "They didn't do it so now we have a big deal with Dems holding them up (as usual) on Debt Ceiling approval. Could have been so easy-now a mess!"

The tweets underscore the absence of a strategy heading into a delicate month of negotiations that could rock the U.S. economy as well as Trump's refusal to call a truce in the GOP's growing civil war.

The White House had said Wednesday that Trump and McConnell will meet following the August recess to discuss the fall agenda, though it did not mention Democratic leaders. A White House spokesperson didn't immediately respond to a question about a bipartisan meeting, but press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said Trump intends to work closely with congressional leaders on shared policy goals.

Trump's tweet aside, passing a debt limit increase was never going to be easy.

The White House favors a "clean" debt ceiling hike. But conservatives in the House and Senate are loath to back any measure that increases the nation's borrowing authority without corresponding spending cuts and reforms. Connecting a "clean" debt ceiling hike to a veterans bill would have put them in an untenable position of either voting against their fiscal priorities or against the bipartisan VA measure.

Though the notion of tying a debt ceiling increase to the veterans measure was always likely to be doomed, one GOP source said the Senate had been preparing to support it, only to be stymied when House leaders opted to adjourn for the August recess.

Ryan said on CNBC on Thursday that the House had looked at linking the debt ceiling to the VA bill but the deadline came up and "we weren't able to do that then." Recess was also fast approaching, and House GOP leaders didn't want to keep Republicans in town for a toxic vote and then send them home feeling demoralized and angry.

Two House Republican sources also note that leaders in their chamber were worried that some GOP lawmakers would fume at being squeezed into supporting veterans and a debt increase they hated — or voting against those who served the country and sticking to their fiscally conservative principals.

At one point in early August, according to the same sources, the White House suggested the House, which left a week before the Senate, return for a debt ceiling vote. House GOP leaders rejected the idea outright because they knew it would upset their members to return for despised legislation.

Still, Ryan predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a debt ceiling increase and said there are "a lot of options" about how to structure the legislation.

Ryan also said he expects the House to pass bills to keep the government open about a week after Congress returns. But he said the Senate's heavy workload in September — which, unlike the House agenda, includes confirmation of judges, subcabinet officials and ambassadors — will likely require a short-term funding measure to keep the government open until December.

Trump, though, has signaled that he's open to playing hardball for border wall funding, raising the prospect of a shutdown next month if he doesn't sign the short-term funding extension.

Trump is increasingly furious at Senate Republicans for failing to repeal Obamacare and not doing more to curb the Russia investigations. He vented to Sens. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) and Thom Tillis (R-N.C.) over the phone, is seeking a primary challenger to Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and has expressed frustration at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). He's also drawn criticism from senators for his handling of the violent white supremacist march in Charlottesville, Virginia.

Trump has particularly tangled with McConnell, shouting at him in a phone call earlier this month, while the Senate majority leader later questioned Trump's political acumen.

After hitting McConnell and Ryan over the debt ceiling, Trump added another broadside in his morning tweetstorm.

"The only problem I have with Mitch McConnell is that, after hearing Repeal & Replace for 7 years, he failed!" Trump tweeted. "That should NEVER have happened!"

Trump's attack on the Republican leaders came just a day after the White House and McConnell's office issued conciliatory statements intended to tamp down talk of a breach and after the two men had not spoken for two weeks. McConnell's statement also listed preventing a government default among his and Trump's shared goals.

And even as Trump showed no inclination to lighten up on his fellow Republicans, GOP lawmakers on Thursday appeared to try to lower the temperature around their squabble with the president.

Asked about Trump's debt-ceiling swipe, Ryan told CNBC, "I don't really take it as going after me." McConnell also praised Trump at a public appearance in Kentucky on Thursday.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a frequent Trump critic, said during an interview with conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt that Trump is right to criticize Congress and encouraged lawmakers to take tough votes.

Even Sen. Jeff Flake told Fox News he was "glad" Trump visited Arizona this week to tour the border, despite Trump's repeated attacks on him.

Still, Flake also poked at Trump in a separate interview, with CNN reporting Flake said Trump was "inviting" a 2020 challenger by how he is governing.

TRUMP'S MONUMENTAL DECISION: The news spotlight will shift to Salt Lake City today, where President Donald Trump is expected to unveil his decision to drastically trim Utah's Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante national monuments after deciding the designations under the Antiquities Act were overreach. The moment marks a huge victory for the state's congressional delegation, which fought hard to undo the designation. "Every elected official from the mayors to the commissioners, every single elected representative, got engaged in it. It was the real, Utah cumulative, everybody-pull-together kind of thing," Boyd Matheson, president of the Sutherland Institute, told the Salt Lake Tribune. Look for a whole bunch of VIPs, including Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, Sen. Orrin Hatch and House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, to be on hand for the Trump's announcement.

But expect the pushback to be instantaneous and lengthy legal battles to follow. Some 5,000 people protested the anticipated decision outside the Utah State Capitol over the weekend (picture via League of Conservation Voters here). Look for Native American, public lands and environmental groups to lodge lawsuits arguing the Antiquities Act doesn't provide the president authority to change a prior designation. Representatives from the Navajo, Ute, and Hopi Tribes will hold a telephone press conference tomorrow at 5 p.m. EST responding to announcement.

Trump is due to speak at 2:40 p.m. EST in Salt Lake City. One thing to watch for is whether his comments touch on the other national monument designations that Zinke recommended shrinking such as Cascade-Siskiyou, Organ Mountain-Desert Peaks, Rio Grande del Norte and Katahdin Woods and Waters.

Also, look for Trump to use the trappings of a presidential trip — and a roundtrip flight on Air Force One — to heap praise on Hatch as he tries to persuade the seven-term Utahn to seek reelection and block Mitt Romney's path to the Senate, POLITICO's Alex Isenstadt reports.

ANWR IN AS HOUSE-SENATE MOVE TO TAX CONFERENCE: House lawmakers vote today on whether to go to conference on their tax plans H.R. 1 \(115\) after senators voted 51 to 49 early Saturday morning to pass their massive tax overhaul. Sen. Maria Cantwell's push to block language opening ANWR to oil and gas drilling fell short on largely party lines 48 to 52 during the debate. Here's what the energy and environment world had to say following the vote:

—Clean energy groups: "We applaud the reduction in the corporate tax rate and preserving frameworks that support the clean energy sector. However, we are concerned about provisions that will have a negative impact on clean energy investments, including Base Erosion Anti-Abuse Tax (BEAT) provision and the impact of the corporate Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT) on investment tools that have been critical to the growth of the clean energy sector," a statement, signed by six groups including American Wind Energy Association and Citizens for Responsible Energy Solutions, reads.

—Oil, gas and utility industry groups liked what they saw and encouraged the chambers to iron out their differences ASAP. "We are encouraged that both the House and Senate agree that reducing the corporate tax rate is vital to modernizing the tax code, and urge Congress to quickly finalize legislation for the President to sign into law," American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers said in a statement.

—Environmental groups warned the bill would undermine public health and environment: "The bill would threaten the climate by leaving billions of dollars of fossil fuel subsidies intact while changing the tax code in ways that would jeopardize the financing of numerous clean energy projects under construction and discourage future clean energy investments in wind and solar," Ken Kimmell, president of the Union of Concerned Scientists, said in one such statement.

Someone's not happy: Coal magnate Bob Murray bashed the Senate's plan as a "mockery" of the tax reform process and warned it might put him out of business, according to the Wall Street Journal. "This is not job creation. This is not stimulating income. This is driving a whole sector of our community into nonexistence," he said.

Speaking of ANWR, two-thirds of voters (including 43 percent of Republicans) don't think Congress should make ANWR drilling a major priority, according to a new poll conducted by Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health and POLITICO, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports.

EPA SAYS NEVERMIND ON MINE BONDING RULE: EPA on Friday evening backtracked on the Obama administration's proposal to require hardrock miners to prove they have the money to clean up their mines, saying that it's actually "not appropriate" to regulate. The issue has been brewing for years following an environmentalist lawsuit that said EPA had never fulfilled part of the Superfund law requiring it to write financial assurance regulations for industries that could leave behind toxic messes. The Obama administration's proposed rule required hardrock miners to obtain some type of bonding or collateral would have cost $171 million annually and was projected to save taxpayers $527 million in Superfund clean-ups over 34 years. It was strongly opposed by industry and Republicans.

On Friday, at the court-ordered deadline to finalize a rule, EPA said no regulation was necessary. "EPA is confident that modern industry practices, along with existing state and federal requirements address risks from operating hardrock mining facilities," Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement. "Additional financial assurance requirements are unnecessary and would impose an undue burden on this important sector of the American economy and rural America, where most of these mining jobs are based." The final rule noted especially that the savings for taxpayers would have been "relatively small" and that miners would have faced costs "an order of magnitude greater" than the government's savings.

Industry, Republicans celebrate: Supportive statements flooded in Friday night from the National Mining Association, Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski, Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman John Barrasso, and Bishop. EPA's own release included praise from three Republican governors and Sen. Steve Daines, who chairs the Senate Western Caucus. Earthjustice, which represented a coalition of green groups in the lawsuit, vowed to sue over the decision in a statement over the weekend.

Two more points: 1) The Obama administration's plans to write similar rules for chemical makers, electric utilities and petroleum and coal products manufacturers are looking unlikely to happen following this decision. 2) Coal mines are regulated differently and are required to obtain financial assurance, a practice regulated by the states. Hardrock mining covers a variety of non-fuel resources, including gold, copper, silver, iron, gypsum and sulfur.

TAKE A PASS? Ahead of a Thursday meeting between Trump, Sen. Ted Cruz and other senior officials about biofuels policy, Texas Gov. Greg Abbott formally asked for a Renewable Fuel Standard waiver from Pruitt. "The time is ripe for EPA to grant substantive relief from the unique, adverse impacts the RFS program is having on the state of Texas," he wrote in a Friday letter. "The extreme, detrimental impacts on large portions of the refining sector have now placed unacceptable burdens on the Texas economy and the economy and security of the nation as a whole." Abbott, in particular, cited high RIN prices as causing hardship to refiners across the state.

SHUTDOWN? WHAT SHUTDOWN? Senior Republicans projected strong confidence Sunday they'd be able to avoid a government shutdown by passing a short-term funding package before the Friday deadline, POLITICO's Kevin Robillard reports. "There's not going to be a government shutdown," Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said on ABC's "This Week." "It's just not going to happen." House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen on Friday released a two-week CR that would keep the lights on through Dec. 22.

But disaster aid will wait: House Republicans are tentatively planning to package the next installment of disaster aid with the Dec. 22 stopgap funding bill, Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief reports. "There's working agreement to that model," Texas Rep. Pete Sessions said Friday. "I think some of these things all collide together." No word yet on how much bigger that package will be compared to the White House's $44 billion request.

WHITEFISH HIRES MORE LOBBYISTS: Whitefish Energy, the tiny Montana-based company that drew controversy for its now-canceled $300 million grid repair contract in Puerto Rico, hired the Tallahassee office of Foley & Lardner to lobby on its behalf, POLITICO's Matt Dixon reports. Lead lobbyists will be Robert Hosay, a former Gov. Jeb Bush administration official, and Jason Allison, who once led the Scott administration's Agency for State Technology. The hiring comes as the company filed a lawsuit Friday alleging a subcontractor interfered with tens of millions in payments, the Associated Press reports.

Speaking of which, Senate Homeland Security ranking member Claire McCaskill sent a letter Friday seeking additional information about a $200 million contract inked by Puerto Rico's utility with Cobra Acquisitions LLC, another newly-formed company, for grid restoration work. Link here.

OBAMA LAMENTS CLIMATE LEADERSHIP PAUSE: Speaking in France on Sunday, former President Barack Obama said U.S. states and cities were making up for what he called "a temporary absence of American leadership" on climate action, Reuters reports. Obama also met with French President Emmanuel Macron, his predecessor Francois Hollande and Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo.

CALLING ALL COMMENTERS! EPA convenes a public hearing this morning at 10 a.m. at agency headquarters on its plan to repeal the Obama-era Phase 2 emissions rule for heavy-duty trucks that classified "glider kits" as new vehicles or engines that are subject to more stringent requirements. More information here.

PERRY'S IN THE MIDDLE EAST: Energy Secretary Rick Perry continues his Middle East swing this week. Among this weekend highlights: Meeting with His Royal Highness Crown Prince Mohammed bin Salman in Saudi Arabia and touring Aramco's facilities in Dhahran. ME readers will of course remember that Trump asked the oil giant to make its hugely anticipated stock offering on the New York Stock Exchange.

GETTING IN THE FAST LANE: Zinke used a trip to Louisiana over the weekend to pledge to remove regulatory barriers slowing down coastal restoration projects, The Advocate reports. "Louisiana and the coastline are important, and we're losing too much of it. ... There's a lot of things that Interior can do," Zinke said. Photos from his visit here and here.

CLARIFYING: ME wrote last week that coal magnate Robert Murray said at a conservative energy conference that he had met with Pruitt seven times. A spokesman clarified that Murray was referring to all meetings with anyone from the Trump administration, not just Pruitt, including "before and after the election." It was previously reported Murray has met several times this year with President Trump himself to discuss strategies to boost the coal industry, including his ultimately unsuccessful proposal to use the Energy Department's emergency authority to keep coal plants operating.

Trump moves to block Romney from the Senate Back

By Alex Isenstadt | 12/03/2017 08:23 PM EDT

Donald Trump is going all out to persuade seven-term Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch to seek reelection — a push aimed in no small part at keeping the president's longtime nemesis, Mitt Romney, out of the Senate.

Romney has been preparing to run for Hatch's seat on the long-held assumption that the 83-year-old would retire. Yet Hatch, the longest-serving Republican senator in history, is now refusing to rule out another campaign — a circumstance Romney's infuriated inner circle blames squarely on the president. Their suspicions are warranted: Trump has sounded off to friends about how he doesn't like the idea of a Senator Romney.

The president's mostly behind-the-scenes campaign to sway Hatch will burst into public view on Monday, when he arrives in Salt Lake City to hold a well-choreographed event designed to showcase his affection for the powerful Senate Finance Committee chairman.

Trump's appearance is ostensibly official in purpose: He will announce his decision to reduce the size of Utah's Bears Ears and Grand-Staircase Escalante national monuments, a cause that Hatch has championed. But it's also undeniably political: To use the trappings of presidential power to get a veteran lawmaker to rethink his long anticipated plans to leave the Senate.

Trump is slated to ride with Hatch both ways on Air Force One — a total of roughly nine hours round-trip. After descending from the plane together, the two will meet with Mormon leaders and then head to the state capitol for the signing of the executive order, according to three White House officials. Hatch will introduce Trump, who in turn is expected to lavish praise on the senator. After the order is signed, Hatch is expected to receive the president's pen.

The public display of affection isn't just about blocking Romney, senior administration officials say. Trump has felt loyal to Hatch since the senator defended him in the wake of the "Access Hollywood" tape episode late in the 2016 campaign. Hatch stuck by Trump even as other members of Utah's Republican delegation withdrew their support.

More recently, Hatch has played a key role in moving Trump's prized tax reform bill through the Senate.

Trump aides say the president's bond with Hatch began long before Romney emerged as a potential successor. Hatch visited Trump in the Oval Office during the first week of his presidency for a lengthy discussion about the then-vacant Supreme Court seat and Utah's national monuments.

Yet people close to Romney are convinced that Trump's main motivation is to keep the 2012 GOP presidential nominee out of the Senate. Romney himself has expressed frustration with the ongoing uncertainty about Hatch's plans, said three Republicans who've spoken with him recently. The former Massachusetts governor has pointed out that it was Hatch who urged him to consider running in the first place, but now appears to be wavering on whether to step aside.

"Hatch is a known entity for Trump and has been really good for the president for the most part," said Kirk Jowers, a friend of Romney who formerly served as the chairman and general counsel of his political action committee. "He knows for a fact he's not going to get that with Romney. I don't know that he knows what he's going to get with Romney, but it's not going to be what he's got with Hatch."

Indeed, there's widespread concern within the White House that Romney in the Senate could make Trump's life difficult. During the 2016 campaign, the former Massachusetts governor emerged as the de-facto leader of the GOP establishment's "Never Trump" campaign, delivering a nationally-watched speech in which he blasted candidate Trump as a "phony, a fraud" and implored the party to stop him.

Hatch, by contrast, went all-in for Trump in Utah, where Trump received just 46 percent of the vote but still carried the state because of a third-party candidate. Before the election, the senator also campaigned for Trump in four states, hitting the trail with the candidate's son, Donald Trump Jr. While many Republicans air their issues with Trump publicly, Hatch has usually chosen to telegraph his concerns in private discussions with the president.

"I'll just put it this way. Sen. Hatch was one of the leading voices for the president during the entire campaign," said Don Peay, a Trump family friend who led his Utah campaign. "Hatch clearly was a strong supporter of Trump from the beginning," said Peay, who helped to organize Monday's event.

Trump's push to get Hatch to run for an eighth term has taken place in furtive phone calls and West Wing visits. In early October, the senator called the president to invite him to Utah to announce his monument plan, said one person briefed on the discussion.

Near the end of the call, the president conveyed a request. "Orrin," he said, "I really hope you will consider running again."

Hatch told Trump he hadn't made up his mind.

Their mutual endearment has at times been public. When Hatch was asked last week by reporters about Trump's decision to retweet several anti-Muslim videos, the senator said he wasn't "aware" of the firestorm — and then praised Trump.

"I'll say this for ya.' He's been one of the best presidents I've served under, and the reason is he's not afraid to make decisions. He's not afraid to take on the big boss around here," Hatch said.

Trump responded by tweeting out a video of the remark. "Thank you @SenOrrinHatch," he added. "Let's continue MAKING AMERICA GREAT AGAIN!"

Romney's post-election relationship with Trump has been far more ... complicated.

During the transition, Trump considered appointing Romney as secretary of state. Trump was expecting not to like Romney but was surprised by how well they gelled during the interview process, something he told aides repeatedly at the time. Trump ultimately decided against Romney.

As the year wore on, the former governor praised the new president for some of his personnel choices. But he also made his differences known.

During an appearance in Park City, Utah, in June, Romney told a group of prominent Republican donors that Trump's White House was too consumed by palace intrigue. He also offered an implicit critique of the president's "America First" approach to foreign policy, growing emotional as he outlined the country's humanitarian responsibilities overseas.

Then, in August, Romney struck again — this time to implore the president to apologize for equating white supremacists who sowed violence in Charlottesville, Va. with their counter-protesters.

"Mr. President," Romney wrote in a Facebook message, "act now for the good of the country."

Romney has been making the rounds in Utah amid speculation that Hatch is nearing retirement, huddling with an array of Republican figures including state House Speaker Greg Hughes. Romney has told people that while he wouldn't be reflexively anti-Trump as a senator, he would be more than willing to let his criticisms be known.

Some Trump allies contend that Utah would be better served by having a presidential loyalist in the seat.

"I think he could be a great ally of the president but, as you well know, they're very different people and have very different personalities," said Hughes, who recently met with Romney in his office in the state capitol. "Sen. Hatch," he added, "understands the president very well."

Asked who the president would rather have in the seat, Hughes, who was once mentioned as a candidate for a position in the Trump administration, said he had little doubt: "I think the president enjoys having a strong ally."

Romney, for his part, won't be at Monday event. He was invited but, several people close to him said, will be out of town.

Over the weekend, Romney wrote a tweet that underscored his respect for Hatch but also, perhaps, hinted at a belief that the senator had now accomplished what he needed to before moving on.

"A very big week for Utah's own Senator @OrrinHatch," he wrote, "with tax reform, Bears Ears reversion, and a presidential visit."

Trump to meet with Cruz over biofuel policy Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Andrew Restuccia | 12/01/2017 04:04 PM EDT

President Donald Trump will meet with Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and several Cabinet members next week to discuss U.S. biofuel policy and fuel efficiency standards, an administration official told POLITICO on Friday.

The Thursday meeting is an attempt by the White House to reach a compromise between Cruz, who has held up a Trump nominee to the Agriculture Department nominee over the administration's support for the Renewable Fuel Standard, and the farm-state lawmakers who pressured EPA to back down from potential changes to the regulations for biofuels.

The White House had until now ignored Cruz's requests for a meeting. Cruz and eight other senators sent a letter in October requesting changes to the program overseen by EPA, which sets the minimum volumes of ethanol and biodiesel to be used in the fuel market. Refiners must either purchase the biofuels to blend with their gasoline or diesel fuel, or buy credits to show their compliance — credits the refiners say are too expensive and threaten to push some refiners out of business.

Cruz retains a hold on Trump's nomination of Bill Northey to a senior USDA post, a move seen as payback after EPA backed down from considering changes in how the biofuels program is implemented amid an outcry from farm-state lawmakers.

"The key here is they need to get Cruz something to get rid of that hold," said one industry representative familiar with the meeting.

The meeting will include Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, Energy Secretary Rick Perry, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt and National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn, the administration official said, though the person added that the attendee list could change. No industry representatives are expected to attend.

While biofuels will most likely be the first topic discussed, attendees will also delve into the higher CAFE standards the Obama administration put into place, as well as octane requirements. The Trump administration has delayed implementing an increase in civil fines for automakers who violate the fuel economy standards, a move that triggered a lawsuit from environmentalists.

Cruz and Trump have had a rocky relationship in the past, including after Trump linked Cruz's father to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy during the 2016 campaign, though they have been on better terms in recent months.

Cruz's office did not reply to a request for comment, and the White House declined to comment.

McConnell: 'There's not going to be a government shutdown' Back

By Kevin Robillard | 12/03/2017 10:16 AM EDT

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said Sunday he was confident there wouldn't be a government shutdown when funding runs out at the end of the week.

"There's not going to be a government shutdown," he said on ABC's "This Week" when asked whether the Republican-controlled Congress could keep the government running. "It's just not going to happen."

Democrats have threatened to withhold their votes for government funding unless Congress acts to provide legal relief to tens of thousands of children of undocumented immigrants who are protected by an Obama-era program that is set to end in March.

McConnell argued there is no "crisis" that would justify tying saving the so-called Dreamers to government funding.

"That's a ridiculous position. There is no crisis," McConnell said. "There's no emergency. The president has given us until March to address it. I don't think the Democrats would be very smart to say they want to shut down the government over a non-emergency."

Government funding is expected to run out on Friday.

OMB Director Mick Mulvaney, appearing on CBS' "Face The Nation," was slightly less confident, but predicted Republicans would be able to avoid a shutdown despite a "broken" system of government spending.

"I think there's a group of right-wingers in the House who say they want to shut the government down," he said. "There's a group of Democrats who want to shut the government down over DACA. And there's a group of lawmakers from some of the hurricane states who want to shut the government down until they get what they want. This just sheds light on the fact that the appropriations, the spending system is broken when any little group can sort of hold the government hostage. We need to get beyond that. I think that we will, I don't think you'll see a government shutdown."

When host John Dickerson noted Mulvaney was once a fiscal hardliner in the House, the OMB director replied: "All the more reason the system should be fixed. We don't spend money properly in Washington, D.C."

EPA proposes repealing 'glider kit' part of truck rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 11/09/2017 12:48 PM EDT

EPA today proposed repealing part of the Obama-era Phase 2 emissions rule for heavy-duty trucks that classified "glider kits" as new vehicles or engines that are subject to more stringent requirements.

Glider kits are new truck chassis with rebuilt engines and can cost significantly less than a new truck with a new engine. The proposal argues that EPA does not have the authority to regulate glider kits under the Clean Air Act.

In a statement, EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said the Obama administration unlawfully tried to expand the Clean Air Act's reach. "Gliders not only provide a more affordable option for smaller owners and operators, but also serve as a key economic driver to numerous rural communities," he said.

Pruitt announced plans to revisit that part of the rule in August following a May meeting with and a July petition from Fitzgerald Truck Sales, the biggest U.S. manufacturer of glider kits.

WHAT'S NEXT: EPA will take public comment through Jan. 5 and hold a hearing on Dec. 4 at EPA headquarters in Washington.

UPPING THE ANTE ON ANWR: Environmental advocates and Democrats are upping the pressure on the House GOP's self-styled climate hawks to withhold their vote on the final tax package H.R. 1 \(115\) if it contains a Senate provision allowing oil and gas drilling in the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge. But those efforts don't appear to have borne any fruit yet, Pro's Ben Lefebvre and your ME host report. The rider — a key priority for Senate Energy Chairman Lisa Murkowski — is just one of many dicey items Senate and House negotiators must work through as they go to conference to iron out differences in their bills, even as drilling opponents push Republican members of the Climate Solutions Caucus to back up their words with action.

Six of the 12 House GOPers who signed a letter last week opposing ANWR drilling backed the initial tax bill, and activists staged protests at the offices of Reps. Pat Meehan and Carlos Curbelo on Monday. Three of those six tax bill supporters who oppose ANWR — Reps. Dave Reichert, Ryan Costello and Curbelo — suggested the fate of the ANWR rider wouldn't determine their final vote. "It would be very disappointing, but I doubt that I would deny all of my constituents the opportunity to experience tax relief because of any one provision," Curbelo told ME at Monday votes.

Earthjustice, the Center for Biological Diversity and other groups sent a letter to Climate Solutions Caucus Republicans asking them, among other things, to work against opening ANWR. And Democrats say the final tax bill vote offered a concrete opportunity for members of the group to demonstrate their pro-climate stance. "It would certainly be nice if the symbolic power of them acknowledging climate change through this caucus translated into action at some point," Rep. Jared Huffman told ME. "This would be a good point."

Two interesting polls suggest there's no widespread public support for opening ANWR despite the vocal backing of Alaska's delegation. One, from the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health and POLITICO, found 67 percent of respondents said opening ANWR "should not be a priority" for the federal government. The other poll, conducted for the Yale Program on Climate Change Communication, found that 70 percent of Americans oppose drilling in ANWR.

Late Monday, Speaker Paul Ryan named four lawmakers of particular note to ME fans to the House's conference committee: Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, Energy and Commerce Chairman Greg Walden, John Shimkus and Don Young. Also joining the Republican conference party: Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady, Devin Nunes, Peter Roskam, Diane Black and Kristi Noem.

WELCOME TO TUESDAY! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Squire Patton Boggs' Lem O. Smith was first to identify Sen. Lamar Alexander as the one-time Trent Lott roommate. For today: Who was the original House sponsor of the Energy Policy Act of 2005?

FIRST MONUMENT LAWSUITS FILED: A coalition of environmental groups filed the first lawsuit challenging President Donald Trump's long-expected move to shrink the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument just hours after he announced his decision to significantly pare two national monuments in Utah. The groups argue in their complaint filed in Washington federal court that the Antiquities Act "does not authorize Presidents to abolish [national monuments] either in whole or in part, as President Trump's action attempts to do." And the Native American Rights Fund, representing the Hopi Tribe, Navajo Nation, Pueblo of Zuni and Ute Mountain Ute Tribe, filed its own challenge the Bears Ears proclamation late Monday evening.

Report's coming today: While on hand for Trump's announcement in Utah, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke told the press pool to expect the release of the results today of his review of several dozen national monument designations. And Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop, as well as Utah Reps. Chris Stewart and John Curtis, host a pen and pad briefing this morning at 11 a.m. where they'll discuss Trump's visit and the introduction of related legislation on Utah monuments.

Pro's DataPoint has whipped up a nifty graphic showing Trump's drastic reductions to the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante national monuments in Utah. Check that out here.

The quote everyone's talking about: "Does he know the interior. He's knows it, he loves it. He loves seeing it and riding on it," Trump on Zinke.

NEW REQUESTS FOR KEYSTONE XL PROJECT: Environmental groups are asking the Trump administration to conduct a new supplemental environmental impact statement and Endangered Species Act consultation after the Nebraska Public Service Commission approved a modified path for the Keystone XL pipeline last month. "Now the administration has no choice but to update its assessment to reflect the pipeline's current proposed route," Doug Hayes, a senior attorney with the Sierra Club, said in a statement. That comes as the Nebraska regulators scheduled a Dec. 12 hearing for TransCanada and environmental groups to argue it should reconsider its decision on the controversial pipeline, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports.

Meanwhile, the Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration said a weight put in place to keep the Keystone pipeline from moving may have played a role in the 210,000 gallon oil spill in South Dakota last month, Reuters reports. It's a finding that could trigger costly inspections of tens of thousands of miles of underground pipelines.

KEEPING THE LIGHTS ON: House Republican leaders think they'll have enough votes from their caucus alone to pass a two-week, stopgap spending package to keep the lights on this week, Pro Budget & Appropriations Brief reports. But a warning signal went up Friday as the Florida and Texas delegations (that's 63 people for those counting at home) threatened to withhold support unless they get a more generous disaster aid package. That threat didn't appear to refer directly to the two-week bill currently under consideration, but shows how much power the two delegations could exert on the spending debates going forward.

Even amid the now-routine House hiccups over the short-term package, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell coolly predicted his chamber "will pass it before the end of this week."

Green groups launch new push: Ahead of the funding deadline, a collection of environmental and public health groups are unveiling a new website today highlighting local stories of the importance of environmental protections and what budget cuts could mean for health and safety. That comes as Mike Mikulka, president of the largest union for EPA Region 5 employees, warned a government shutdown would "create an unprecedented emergency for human health and our environment."

And a dozen environmental and union groups are sending a letter to congressional leaders calling for a disaster supplemental package that is "robust, funds recovery and rebuilding efforts in a way that results in stronger and more resilient communities." Link here.

Oh and ICYMI: House Republicans, including Ryan, weighed stripping House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen of his gavel after the long-time New Jersey Republican voted against their tax bill, POLITICO's Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan report.

AMERICA FIRST FOR SOLAR PLAN: The Solar Energy Industries Association this morning rolls out its plan for Trump that it argues would keep America First and, at its core, reiterates the group's push against any tariffs or quotas on imported solar equipment. SEIA argues imposing tariffs represents a "bailout" for two foreign-owned companies that are exploiting U.S. trade law and would be a "bad deal for America." One idea floated in the plan is an import license fee that the group says would "get hundreds of millions of dollars in direct investment help to U.S. companies and our economy." They'll roll the whole thing out at 9:15 a.m. at the National Press Club.

DOT PUTS THE BRAKES ON ECP MANDATE: DOT Monday rescinded the mandate for trains carrying crude oil and ethanol to be equipped with electronically controlled pneumatic brakes, with the understanding that such brakes would reduce the risk of derailment in cases of emergency. The 2014 FAST Act ordered a scientific evaluation of ECP brake performance in emergencies, with a requirement for a final decision on the rule's fate by Monday — the two-year anniversary of the law's passage. The scientific study was inconclusive, and a GAO study found that DOT didn't have enough data to make a call. But a DOT analysis in October found that the costs outweighed the benefits of an ECP mandate by a factor of three. Commerce Committee Chairman John Thune praised the repeal decision. "Repealing this rule puts sound science and careful study ... over flawed guesswork," he said in a statement.

MOVING MORE NOMINATIONS: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee takes up the nominations of Timothy R. Petty to be Interior assistant secretary for water and science and Linda Capuano to run the Energy Information Administration today at 10 a.m. Watch here.

LAWSUIT ROUNDUP! SUIT FILED OVER MISSED SMOG DEADLINES: Ten environmental and public health groups filed a lawsuit Monday over a missed Oct. 1 statutory deadline for EPA to say which parts of the U.S. were meeting the 2015 ozone standard, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. A coalition of Democratic attorneys general is also expected to sue EPA soon.

Interior appeals loss in methane rule stay suit: The Interior Department said Monday evening it will appeal a federal judge's October ruling that said its delay of the Obama administration's methane waste rule was illegal. The judge said the Bureau of Land Management should have gone through notice-and-comment rulemaking to delay the rule since it had already taken effect. Interior proposed an 18-month delay and took public comments into November. It is unclear when that delay will be finalized. Interior's appeal will go to the 9th Circuit.

Are you new here? A lawsuit challenging EPA's delay of a regulation limiting power plants' toxic wastewater discharge was transferred from an Obama appointee to newly confirmed Judge Dabney L. Friedrich on Monday, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. Environmental advocates originally filed the case in May, and in September EPA finalized the delay of certain implementation deadlines.

ANOTHER HIRE AT EPA: Clint Woods, the head of an association that represents conservative state air agencies, will become the deputy assistant administrator of EPA's air office, Pro's Emily Holden reports. Woods is executive director of the Association of Air Pollution Control Agencies. He previously worked for the energy and environment subpanel of the House Science Committee and for the American Legislative Exchange Council. He'll begin his new job at EPA in mid-December.

NEW EPA PUSH ON PFAS: EPA announced Monday it was launching a cross-agency effort to address PFAS contamination around the country that will include identifying a set of near-term actions it can take to help local communities. No details were given though. You'll remember that concerns over PFAS contamination in North Carolina waterways were one of the major concerns for that state's senators in deciding they couldn't support Michael Dourson's nomination to run the agency's chemical office.

MUSICAL CHAIRS AT E&C: Mississippi Rep. Gregg Harper takes over as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee, Chairman Greg Walden announced Monday. Also of interest to ME readers: South Carolina Rep. Jeff Duncan joins both the Energy and Environment subcommittees.

Agenda here. The visit comes after he inked a memorandum of understanding with Saudi Arabia during his trip there to increase research and collaboration on carbon capture technologies. "This MOU outlines a future alliance not only in supercritical carbon dioxide, but also in a range of clean fossil fuels and carbon management opportunities," Perry said in a statement.

Also, guys, he's having the best time! Check out these pictures of Perry with his feet in the sand, shopping and doing other fun looking things here.

TAKE A GLANCE! The American Council for Capital Formation is out with a report today blaming the struggles of the California Public Employees' Retirement System, the nation's largest public pension fund, in part on investments in "certain political causes and issues at the expense of doing what's necessary to improve fund performance." It argues prioritizing environmental, social and governance investments frequently comes "at the expense of other investments more likely to optimize returns."

Climate-minded Republicans face heat in Arctic drilling debate Back

By Ben Lefebvre and Anthony Adragna | 12/04/2017 07:15 PM EDT

Pressure is mounting on House Republicans to oppose new Arctic drilling in the tax bill.

Protesters staged sit-ins Monday in two GOP lawmakers' offices, and environmental groups are working to grow the number who have expressed reservations about opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil rigs. The fate of the ANWR rider — a top priority for Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) — is one of several tricky issues Republican leaders will have to work out as they try to reconcile the differences between the House and Senate tax bills with the goal of getting their $1.5 trillion overhaul of the tax code to President Donald Trump's desk by the end of this year.

Despite its strong backing from Alaska's congressional delegation, the prospect of drilling in ANWR draws little support among the public at large, according to a new poll conducted by the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health and POLITICO. It found 67 percent of those surveyed believe opening ANWR "should not be a priority" for the federal government, compared with 19 percent who said it was a "very" or "extremely important" priority. Among Republicans, 43 percent said ANWR should not be a priority, more than the 35 percent who said it was at least very important, according to the POLITICO-Harvard poll.

Another poll, conducted for the Yale Program on Climate Change Communication, found that 70 percent of Americans oppose drilling in ANWR.

A dozen House Republicans, six of whom supported the House tax bill, voiced their objections to the ANWR language in a letter to GOP leaders last week, although none has threatened to vote against the underlying bill if the provision remains. Environmentalists who are dead set against the Senate version's ANWR language have promised to make the issue a test for the 31 Republicans in the Climate Solutions Caucus.

"As Congress enters conference, we have two primary goals: Encourage the 12 House Republicans who signed the letter supporting the Arctic Refuge to stand strong and oppose the bill, and push other members to join them," said League of Conservation Voters spokeswoman Alyssa Roberts. "That includes members of the Climate Solutions Caucus. Any member who supports drilling in a pristine wildlife refuge that is feeling the impacts of climate change firsthand is doing the exact opposite of supporting 'climate solutions.'"

Protests started early Monday as advocacy group Sunrise Movement sent protesters to stage sit-ins Monday at the offices of caucus member Rep. Pat Meehan (R-Penn.) and co-chair Carlos Curbelo (R-Fla.).

Curbelo said he was sympathetic to the opposition to opening ANWR, but that it wouldn't swing his vote against the tax bill, H.R. 1.

"It would be very disappointing, but I doubt that I would deny all of my constituents the opportunity to experience tax relief because of any one provision," he said.

Murkowski wouldn't directly answer whether she's concerned about ANWR's prospects during the conference. "I am going to be obviously very engaged in trying to move ANWR throughout the whole process," she told POLITICO on Monday evening. "And, as I've been doing, I just said everything is one step at a time."

Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), the top Democrat on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said she "certainly appreciate[s]" the 12 House Republicans opposing ANWR drilling and said the final vote would be an "awesome" opportunity for the Climate Solutions Caucus to show its power.

"We know there are more members of Congress that are concerned about the inclusion of that rider than the ones who signed that letter," said Lydia Weiss, the Wilderness Society's government relations director for lands. "This is one more headache for [House Speaker] Paul Ryan."

The House and Senate hope to start conferencing on the bill this week. But the versions of the bill the two chambers passed differ on key provisions in the package, including language Murkowski added to the Senate bill to open the ANWR for drilling.

ClearView Partners, a research firm, gave the bill an 80 percent chance of success in a note to clients Monday. "That said, we caution that the other 20 percent reflects the complexity of the conference process ahead," the analysts wrote.

Earthjustice, the Center for Biological Diversity and other groups also sent a letter to the caucus Republicans asking them, among other things, to work against opening ANWR. The letter was "an accountability mechanism," said Bill Snape, senior counsel for the Center for Biological Diversity, one of the groups that signed the letter.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Ryan Costello (R-Pa.), who backed the House plan on the floor but signed the GOP letter opposing ANWR, said he'd like the drilling provision taken out of the bill, though that was not a precondition for his support.

A spokeswoman for Curbelo would only say "the congressman does not believe the tax bill is the appropriate venue for addressing ANWR," but did not say whether the congressman would vote against the bill.

Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), a Ways and Means member who also opposes ANWR drilling, stopped short of threatening to oppose the final bill if the drilling provision stays. "It is my hope that there will be a robust conference discussion and in working through the differences between the two plans, improvements will be made," he said in a statement. "This includes protecting the Arctic."

Trump strips monument protections from 2 million acres in Utah Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/04/2017 03:10 PM EDT

President Donald Trump announced Monday that he is removing more than 2 million acres of protected territory from two national monuments in Utah, handing a political win to the state's lawmakers but setting off more protests from environmentalists and outdoor sports groups.

"You know how best to conserve this land for many, many years to come," Trump told a phalanx of the state's Republican lawmakers in Salt Lake City, as he took yet another swipe at the conservation legacies of former Presidents Barack Obama and Bill Clinton — and at regulators in Washington. "They don't know your land and truly they don't care for your land like you do. From now on that won't matter."

Trump's efforts to change the monuments' status started in April, when he signed an executive order directing Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to review more than a hundred national monuments. Zinke said Monday that the finished report will be released Tuesday.

The long-expected announcement was a victory for Sen. Orrin Hatch, Rep. Rob Bishop and other Utah Republicans who had pressed the administration to shrink the territories of the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante monuments from their combined 3.2 million acres. But Trump's action enraged environmentalists and some Utah residents, who see the move as a first step toward allowing fossil fuel extraction near the monuments.

The planned cuts — essentially a rollback of the borders Obama and Clinton had set — was leaked to POLITICO and other news outlets last week. Obama set aside a total of more than 5.7 million acres of federal land into national monument parks, the most of any president under the Antiquities Act of 1906.

The new borders would shrink the 1.353-million-acre Bears Ears down to about 201,400 acres and break it into two new monuments called Indian Creek and Shash Jaa. That would free up oil, natural gas and uranium deposits for possible extraction.

Trump would also cleave the nearly 1.9 million-acre Grand Staircase-Escalante monument into three parts, totaling 997,490 acres: Grand Staircase, Kaiparowits and Escalante Canyons. The move would free up protections over areas high in mineral resources.

In the proclamations that reduced the monuments, Trump argued that many of the objects and physical features named in Clinton's and Obama's original designations "are not unique to the monument, and some of the particular examples of those objects within the monument are not of significant historic or scientific interest."

Environmental groups and Native American tribes have vowed to tie up Trump's move in courts. Southern Utah Wilderness Alliance plans to file a suit "within days, if not hours," legal director Steve Bloch said.

"The general gist of the argument regarding both national monuments is that the Antiquities Act is a limited grant of authority from Congress to the president to establish national monuments," Bloch said. "Nowhere in the act does Congress give the president the power to revoke or diminish national monuments, and by doing so the president is acting beyond his authority and unlawfully."

The Navajo Nation also promised to fight Trump's decision. The Navajos, who consider the Bears Ears monument of "critical importance" to the culture of many tribes in the region, said the White House ignored their requests to meet and discuss the issue.

"The decision to reduce the size of the Monument is being made with no tribal consultation,"

Navajo President Russell Begaye said in a press release. "The reduction in the size of the monument leaves us no choice but to litigate this decision."

A spokesman for the tribe did not immediately respond to questions.

Trump is also in danger of inflaming public opinion even while he appeases the Utah congressional delegation. Besides environmentalists, hunting and fishing groups have come out against the move, including some groups that had expressed early optimism about Trump and Zinke.

"Staircase Escalante in particular is troubling with a carve-out for the coal industry," said Land Tawney, president of Backcountry Hunters and Anglers. "That carve-out is smack dab in the middle of some of the most important habitat for desert bighorn sheep and will impact that species immensely, all for some coal that will most likely be sent to China."

Tawney had said a year ago that he hoped Trump and Zinke would oppose GOP efforts to "liquidate" federal lands. But more recently, as Zinke has carried out Trump's review of past presidents' monument designations, Tawney's organization has run ads out West asking, "What Happened to Ryan Zinke?"

Oil and gas companies, which have supported Trump and his push for American "energy dominance," welcomed the shearing back of the monuments' borders.

Nebraska regulators set hearings to review Keystone XL decision Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/04/2017 03:40 PM EDT

Nebraska Public Service Commission will hold a hearing on Dec. 12 for TransCanada and environmental groups to argue it should reconsider its decision on the Keystone XL pipeline.

The PSC last month approved a route for the controversial Keystone XL that did not follow the path the Calgary-based company originally proposed. That could force TransCanada to apply for additional permits.

The company, which asked for the additional hearing in late November, has said it is still reviewing the PSC's decision.

Besides TransCanada, the Sierra Club and Nebraska landowners also requested to approach the board during the hearing, the notice said. Each party will have 20 minutes to discuss the commission's decision. The commission will not make a decision based on the hearings until a later date, the PSC said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The parties will meet for the hearing in Lincoln, Neb., on Dec. 12.

Trump, Democrats restart talks to avert shutdown Back

By Sarah Ferris, Jennifer Scholtes and Seung Min Kim | 12/04/2017 01:27 PM EDT

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said Monday they will meet with President Donald Trump to resume high-stakes negotiations to avoid a government shutdown at week's end.

The Thursday sit-down at the White House with Trump and GOP leaders would amount to a do-over of the meeting Democrats ditched last week over a fiery Trump tweet that slammed the Democrats and cast doubt on the prospect of reaching a deal. The boycott caused a political spectacle and temporarily halted talks on a broader spending deal congressional leaders have been negotiating behind the scenes.

"We hope the President will go into this meeting with an open mind, rather than deciding that an agreement can't be reached beforehand," the Democratic leaders wrote in a joint statement.

Government funding runs out Friday at midnight, though Republican leaders believe they have the votes to push back that deadline until just before Christmas. Both parties hope to have reached a bipartisan, two-year agreement on overall spending levels for defense and nondefense programs by the time funding runs out again on Dec. 22.

That year-end deal is also likely to include other long-stalled legislative priorities, including addressing funding lapses for the Children's Health Insurance Program and the National Flood Insurance Program.

South Dakota Sen. John Thune, the third-ranking Senate Republican, said "probably not all [GOP senators] but most of them" will support the brief, two-week funding fix when it hits the Senate floor later this week.

"It's a matter of just making the government function," Thune said.

Democratic leaders reiterated on Monday that they are seeking a compromise to extend protections for the hundreds of thousands of undocumented immigrants who came to the country as children and are protected by an Obama-era program that Trump is ending in March.

Though top congressional Republicans would prefer to defer the immigration battle to early next year, several key GOP lawmakers are getting impatient and trying to work up their own legislative fix for Dreamers in order to pressure leadership.

Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) quietly began working with Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) several weeks ago in a new "gang" to craft Dreamer legislation that could pick up 60 votes, according to a Flake spokesman. Flake and Bennet worked together nearly five years ago to write the Gang of Eight comprehensive immigration reform measure. Aides declined to name all the senators who are involved, although Democratic officials said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois is also engaged in the talks.

"To have those kids go through another end of the year without knowing what their status is, is not good," Flake said Monday evening. "There are a couple of issues we still need consensus on, but we're getting close on a number of them."

House GOP leaders plan to pass a two-week stopgap on Wednesday to buy more time for striking a broader spending deal. House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy promised on Saturday at the Reagan National Defense Forum that "we'll get out of this mess."

But the major question remains the Senate, where Republicans will need Democrats to pass any stopgap legislation and the Democratic leadership has declined to say whether it will offer votes to avert a government shutdown, even if some of its members say they'll vote for a stopgap bill.

"It doesn't make a difference whether we do [vote for the continuing resolution] or not," said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the top Democrat on the Appropriations Committee. "The Republicans are in charge."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said she expects enough Democrats to support the bill: "The last thing we need is for the government to shut down."

Enacting the temporary patch would likely allow GOP leaders to postpone Democratic demands on prickly political issues like the deal for young immigrants and funding for the children's health care program.

The two-week stopgap does include language, however, that would make more funding available until month's end to states that are running out of money for administering the children's health program.

House GOP leaders believe they can secure enough votes from Republicans alone to clear this week's stopgap bill without making concessions to Democrats. But some conservatives have scoffed at the idea of punting until Dec. 22, which they fear will lead to a rash of spending before Christmas.

House Freedom Caucus members have asked Ryan for a stopgap through Dec.30 instead

"It's still up in the air," one House GOP staffer said about whether Republicans will back the two-week continuing resolution. "It's like a Kabuki dance in slow motion."

Defense hawks have also balked at the idea of a stopgap bill through the end of January, warning of budgetary uncertainty for the Pentagon.

With that in mind, some House Republicans are pushing a strategy that would include a full year's worth of funding for the Defense Department on one of the stopgap bills this month.

Rep. Mike Gallagher (R-Wis.) said that strategy would allow the House GOP to take a "bigger stand."

"I don't think there's an appetite among ... defense hawks in Congress for a long-term CR going into the next year," Gallagher, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said at the Reagan National Defense Forum on Saturday.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on Monday was confident Congress could pass a short-term funding bill. "We'll pass it before the end of the week," he said on the floor of the two-week measure.

And Republican leaders, despite some agitation from their rank and file, see no justification for Democratic demands for tying a so-called Dreamers deal to legislation intended to prevent a government shutdown.

"You hear our Democratic colleagues say, well, they're going to shut down the government unless we capitulate on the DACA fix, which is not going to happen," Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas said on Monday.

White House Budget Director Mick Mulvaney noted over the weekend that Democrats who are hell-bent on getting a Dreamers deal aren't the only ones threatening to withhold votes on government funding. Some House "right-wingers" have threatened opposition, he noted, as well as lawmakers from hurricane-hit states who want more disaster aid.

"This just sheds light on the fact that the spending system is broken when any little group can sort of hold the government hostage," Mulvaney said on CBS' "Face the Nation" on Sunday.

"We need to get beyond that. I think that we will. I don't think you'll see a government shutdown."

Ryan weighed stripping Frelinghuysen of chairmanship Back

By Rachael Bade and John Bresnahan | 12/04/2017 03:13 PM EDT

Speaker Paul Ryan and his leadership team recently discussed replacing House Appropriations Chairman Rodney Frelinghuysen after he bucked the party and voted against the GOP tax bill, multiple sources told POLITICO.

Ryan, House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) over the Thanksgiving recess considered calling up the GOP steering committee charged with selecting chairmen to force a roll call on whether Frelinghuysen should maintain his position. Scalise, three sources said, pushed hard for the move and was furious that the New Jersey Republican opposed the legislation that leaders believe is vital to maintaining their majority.

"Committee chairmen are expected to support the team," said one senior GOP leadership aide said. "How does he expect to win support for his own bills when he's unwilling to support the President and Speaker's number one priority?"

Spokespeople for Ryan's office and the Appropriations Committee declined to comment.

News about the talks comes after Ryan last week pulled out of a fundraiser for Rep. Lee Zeldin of New York, another centrist Republican who voted against the tax bill. Both Zeldin and Frelinghuysen share concerns about what repealing the state and local tax deduction would mean for their high-tax districts, where constituents use that benefit to lower their federal tax bill.

But Republican lawmakers are even more angry about Frelinghuysen, who's one of the most powerful chairmen in the conference. Chairmen are expected to support GOP leaders on tough votes or major pieces of legislation. And Frelinghuysen, who hails from a more moderate-minded swing district, was not given a green light to vote against the tax bill.

The chairman's "no" vote is particularly sensitive because Ryan, McCarthy and Scalise often have to strong-arm other Republicans to vote for government funding bills that come out of Frelinghuysen's committee. There's a fear that if the chairman is not punished, other lawmakers will balk when GOP leaders need them most on spending bills.

"If there's no perceived blowback against Frelinghuysen, Ryan's hand is weakened," said a second House Republican source familiar with the back-and-forth. "It's almost a political necessity. There has to be real or perceived blowback."

At the same time, many conservative Republicans grew angry when former Speaker John Boehner removed lawmakers from prized committees for voting against leadership on critical bills. Boehner punished former Rep. Tim Huelskamp by kicking him off the Agriculture Committee — which helped lead to his primary defeat just over a year later.

"I disagree with the chairman's vote, but he, like all of us, should vote according to the principles on which he was elected—as long as within bounds of the Constitution," said Rep. Justin Amash (R-Mich.) on Twitter. "Leaders would be wise to surround themselves with more people, not fewer, who hold alternative viewpoints."

It's not the first time Frelinghuysen has gone against leadership. Ryan and his top lieutenants had to work hard to flip him from "no" to "yes" on the Obamacare repeal bill earlier this year. The New Jersey Republican did not want to vote for the health bill and worried it would undercut his re-election effort, multiple sources told POLITICO at the time.

Frelinghuysen was also one of only two Republicans to vote in early October against a GOP bill to restrict abortions after 20 weeks except in instances of rape or where the mother's life is in danger.

Beyond floor votes, Frelinghuysen clashed with Ryan over a new, controversial Authorization for the Use of Military Force. Frelinghuysen, eager to embrace "regular order," allowed his panel in June to adopt a bipartisan amendment to a spending bill that would phase out the post-9/11 authority for military action overseas and call for new war guidelines.

Ryan called it a "mistake" at the time — and instructed the House Rules Committee to strip the language from the bill before it even hit the floor.

Then, again to the chagrin of GOP leaders, Frelinghuysen took the unusual step in July of allowing controversial immigration language to be adopted by voice vote during a committee markup. Using the same tactic as with the AUMF provision, GOP leaders again overrode the chairman's call by plucking the immigration language before it reached the floor.

The discussion about Frelinghuysen's fate comes as Congress barrels toward a potential shutdown at week's end. House Republicans are expected to pass a two-week spending stopgap without Democratic support on Wednesday, a painful vote for conservatives and appropriators who see "continuing resolutions" as bad policy.

Even if a shutdown is averted, conservatives are likely to be forced in the coming weeks to accept an increase in non-defense spending in order to win a Pentagon budget boost — then back a massive omnibus in January that could include additional spending for other programs that is not offset with cuts elsewhere.

National Academies study on rail ECP brake efficacy inconclusive Back

By Lauren Gardner | 10/05/2017 11:00 AM EDT

A National Academies committee tasked with reviewing DOT-conducted train brake testing could not conclude whether an advanced system that regulators have required for unit trains carrying hazardous materials like oil performs better in emergencies compared to others, according to a report released today.

That finding, based on results produced by DOT, may pave the way for the department to roll back a 2015 mandate for certain trains to install electronically controlled pneumatic brakes. Congress required studies of the requirement in the FAST Act and directed DOT to use the results to either justify its costs or repeal it by the end of 2017.

The latest report builds off an initial study released in February that determined DOT didn't adequately support why it planned to use certain parameters and factors to analyze ECP brakes and their performance relative to other systems. The panel made recommendations on that issue in advance of physical tests in the field and in a lab, which the members witnessed in the spring.

"DOT's efforts to validate its modeling and simulation approach in response to the committee's request do not instill sufficient confidence in DOT's comparison of the estimated emergency performance of ECP braking systems with that of" others, the report said.

A 2016 Government Accountability Office report on competing ECP braking studies from DOT and the railroad industry concluded that both sides' studies suffered from a lack of data to support their claims, in part because at that time the railroad industry had shared limited data.

GAO: Data lacking in DOT and freights' arguments on ECP brakes Back

By Jennifer Scholtes | 10/12/2016 04:39 PM EDT

Special brakes for trains hauling flammable liquids might not be as beneficial as the DOT claimed in its rule last year strengthening protections for crude-by-rail, the Government Accountability Office reported this afternoon.

DOT has argued that electronically controlled pneumatic brakes not only allow trains to stop faster but also save money by reducing fuel consumption, operational inefficiency and wear. But GAO says those conclusions were based on limited data — at least in part because the information railroads have shared on their use is itself limited.

"Industry stakeholders claim that DOT overestimated benefits," GAO stated in its report. "DOT's use of limited data adds uncertainty to the estimates that DOT did not always acknowledge in the rule and its supporting analysis."

The railroad industry has deployed its own studies finding essentially the opposite.

It may not be possible to determine which side's studies are most accurate, considering GAO found DOT's modeling "lacked transparency as the information published may not be sufficient to enable an independent third party to replicate it." GAO also dinged industry studies that suffered from the same lack of data: "only two out of five railroads provided GAO extensive quantifiable data to support these claims."

DOT contends GAO's argument is lacking and has disagreed with its recommendations that DOT "acknowledge uncertainty" in revising its economic analysis on ECP brakes, collect data from railroads on their use of the technology and publish more information on brake modeling.

Revised ECP brake rule analysis shows costs greater than benefits Back

By Lauren Gardner | 10/13/2017 02:43 PM EDT

DOT's updated regulatory impact analysis of a 2015 braking mandate for certain unit trains found that its costs exceed its estimated benefits, putting the rule one step closer to repeal later this year.

While costs and benefits associated with the electronically controlled pneumatic braking requirement both decreased, the estimated benefits plummeted even more compared to the original analysis. DOT attributed the change to the decline of tank cars transporting flammable energy goods since 2015 and to railroads failing to order ECP brakes on new trainsets, meaning required installations would have to be done via costlier retrofits.

The FAST Act directed DOT to update its analysis to take into account studies by GAO and the National Academies on ECP brakes, though the department indicated it will review the National Academies report during the comment period. Freight railroads and some lawmakers had protested the ECP requirement, arguing that not enough data exists to justify the cost of retrofitting them onto locomotives.

DOT has until early December to justify the ECP requirements or repeal them.

The Association of American Railroads applauded the updated report and said it shows the rule should be thrown out. But the group took issue with DOT's citations of testing FRA conducted within the analysis, pointing to the National Academies study that couldn't conclude whether those brakes were more effective than others.

"Nothing could be further from the truth," the group said, regarding the study's validity.

Comments on the updated analysis are due Nov. 1.

Greens sue EPA over missed ozone designation deadline Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/04/2017 03:04 PM EDT

Ten environmental and public health groups today sued EPA for missing a key deadline to implement the 2015 ozone standard.

EPA faced a statutory deadline on Oct. 1 to say which parts of the U.S. were meeting the new ozone standard. Administrator Scott Pruitt said over the summer that he would delay that decision by one year, although he reversed course after several lawsuits were filed. EPA last month issued designations for 85 percent of all U.S. counties which it said met the standard or did not have enough information to decide.

But the agency has remained silent on the remaining 15 percent of the nation, which includes many of the urban and downwind regions that face the worst smog pollution. Any area deemed in "nonattainment" will have to write a plan to reduce ozone-related pollution, and EPA's delay also puts off any requirement for those areas to act.

A coalition of Democratic attorneys general is also expected to sue EPA soon.

EPA has faced similar lawsuits after delaying designations under previous standards — such as the 2010 sulfur dioxide rule, for which environmental groups negotiated a consent decree with the Obama administration that set a series of designation deadlines lasting through 2020.

It's unclear whether a similar deal can be reached here. Pruitt recently issued a directive barring EPA from agreeing to such consent decrees. If EPA resists negotiations, the court may set its own timeline for the agency to act.

WHAT'S NEXT: The environmentalists' suit was filed in the U.S. District Court for Northern California. EPA has not indicated when it may act on the remaining designations.

Judge says Interior delay of methane waste rule was illegal Back

By Alex Guillén | 10/04/2017 07:32 PM EDT

A federal judge ruled today that the Bureau of Land Management's June postponement of key compliance dates for the methane waste rule was unlawful.

BLM relied on Section 705 of the Administrative Procedure Act to justify the delay. But Magistrate Judge Elizabeth Laporte of the U.S. District Court for Northern California said it was too late because the rule's effective date had already passed. That means BLM should have gone through a round of notice-and-comment rulemaking before suspending any part of the rule, she said.

Coincidentally, the ruling came on the same day that Interior proposed an 18-month delay of the methane waste rule as it works to rewrite it.

Laporte's ruling acknowledges the pending rulemaking but said it could be months before it is finalized and takes effect, and may not survive its own legal challenge, giving her no reason to pause now.

She vacated the delay and ordered the requirements reinstated. She rejected BLM's arguments that the delay should be kept in place, saying that doing so would create "a free pass for agencies to exceed their statutory authority and ignore their legal obligations under the APA, making a mockery of the statute." And Laporte said any company that misses upcoming January deadlines because of Interior's delay is in "a problem to some extent of their own making."

Laporte previously used similar legal reasoning to strike down Interior's delay of a resource valuation rule.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will take public comment for 30 days on its new proposal to delay the methane waste rule.

BLM proposes 18-month delay to methane rule Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 10/04/2017 09:59 AM EDT

The Interior Department proposed to suspend enforcement of an Obama-era rule on methane emissions for 18 months as it plans to rewrite it, according to a document to be filed tomorrow in the Federal Register.

"The BLM is currently reviewing the 2016 final rule and wants to avoid imposing temporary or permanent compliance costs on operators for requirements that may be rescinded or significantly revised in the near future," the agency said in the document.

The agency said it is concerned that the final rule analysis "may have underestimated costs and overestimated benefits, and [BLM] is therefore presently reviewing that analysis for potential inaccuracies."

The 2016 rule was intended to require oil and gas developers on federal lands to capture more of the methane that leaked during their operations. The rule went into effect in January 2017 and survived an effort by Congressional Republicans to repeal it.

WHAT'S NEXT: BLM will accept public comments on the proposal for 30 days.

Trump judge assigned challenge to EPA water rule delay Back

By Alex Guillén | 12/04/2017 04:01 PM EDT

Environmentalists' lawsuit seeking to end EPA's delay of a regulation limiting power plants' toxic wastewater discharge has been assigned to a judge newly placed on the bench by President Donald Trump.

The suit was reassigned today from Judge Ketanji Brown Jackson, an Obama appointee, to Judge Dabney L. Friedrich, who was confirmed by the Senate last week by a vote of 97-3.

Green groups filed the lawsuit in May after EPA stayed certain requirements under the rule, known as the steam electric effluent limitations guidelines. But in September, EPA finalized a delay of certain implementation deadlines as it works to reconsider those parts of the rule, and the agency argues that means this lawsuit should be dismissed as moot since the stay was ended.

EPA and environmentalists have been trading briefs on the matter in the months since.

Friedrich was a former White House attorney under George W. Bush and was formerly an aide to Sen. Orrin Hatch. From 2006 to 2016, she served on the U.S. Sentencing Commission, which creates sentencing guidelines for federal courts.

WHAT'S NEXT: Friedrich will have to determine whether to dismiss the suit, but will likely need time to get up to speed on the case.

EPA delays parts of power plant toxic discharge rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/13/2017 03:35 PM EDT

EPA has finalized a rule delaying by two years the key compliance dates for a 2015 regulation limiting toxic discharges in power plants' wastewater streams while it reconsiders those standards.

The delay provides "relief from the existing regulatory deadlines while the agency revisits some of the rule's requirements," EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt said in a statement.

Following industry requests, EPA specifically is delaying deadlines related to limits on discharges of flue gas desulfurization wastewater and bottom ash transport water, two waste streams associated with burning coal for electricity. EPA estimates the two-year delay of those requirements will provide annualized utility cost savings between $27.5 million and $36.8 million.

The agency said it will not revisit new standards for other types of waste streams — including fly ash transport water, flue gas mercury control wastewater and gasification wastewater — and will leave deadlines associated with those streams in place.

The delay will take effect two weeks after it is published in the Federal Register, and is open to court challenges.

The Obama administration said the overall rule, known as effluent limitations guidelines or ELGs, ultimately would curb 1.4 billion pounds of aluminum, lead, mercury, arsenic and other toxic metals from entering waterways via discharge streams each year.

Head of conservative states' air group to take top EPA post Back

By Emily Holden | 12/04/2017 05:07 PM EDT

EPA is hiring Clint Woods, the head of an association that represents conservative state air agencies that have challenged federal pollution and climate regulations, to become deputy assistant administrator of the agency's air office.

Woods is executive director of the Association of Air Pollution Control Agencies. He previously worked for the energy and environment subpanel of the House Science Committee and for the American Legislative Exchange Council, an organization of conservative state legislators and businesses. Before that, he was government affairs manager for the Recreation Vehicle Industry Association.

Woods will work under the agency's air chief, Bill Wehrum, a former Hunton & Williams lawyer who has represented fossil fuel and chemical companies and was acting head of the air office under the Bush administration. Woods says he will also work with Principal Deputy Assistant Administrator Mandy Gunasekara, who took up the role last month, and David Harlow, an EPA air adviser from the same law firm as Wehrum.

Woods did not say what his specific duties would be but noted that his time with state and local agencies through AAPCA will "draw a lot of parallels" with EPA's work in implementing the Clean Air Act through cooperative federalism.

He is currently based in Lexington, Ky., and will assume his new position in mid-December.

AAPCA President Stuart Spencer, the associate director of the Arkansas Department of Environmental Quality, said Woods helped grow membership, increased engagement with EPA and produced reports on the state role in environmental protection.

Dourson at risk of rejection as more Republicans lean no Back

By Nick Juliano and Anthony Adragna | 11/16/2017 05:55 PM EDT

President Donald Trump's nominee to a key chemical safety job at the EPA is at risk of rejection after Republican senators balked amid accusations that he is too eager to cover for companies peddling dangerous products.

North Carolina's two GOP senators have said they will vote against confirming Michael Dourson as an EPA assistant administrator, citing a record that included work on a chemical linked to cancer deaths near a Marine Corps base in their home state. And Maine Republican Susan Collins said Thursday that she is leaning no as well — a vote that would be enough to sink his nomination.

Democrats are optimistic about turning four additional Republicans who they believe should be in play based on contamination issues back home.

Republican leaders have not decided what to do about Dourson's nomination, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) said Thursday.

"We'll have to see whether it's a viable nomination, and with two against him obviously that doesn't leave us a lot of room," Cornyn told POLITICO. "We haven't made a decisions on that yet, but we'll be revisiting it."

Critics say Dourson, a former industry-funded toxicologist, regularly downplayed the risks of chemicals such as PFOA and trichloroethylene that are contaminating soil and water in communities across the country. Dourson has already begun working at EPA as a senior adviser to Administrator Scott Pruitt, an arrangement Democrats have condemned as improper.

"There are all these local contamination issues across the country that have been bubbling up recently or have been out there for years, and because Dourson is this hired gun ... he's almost by nature of his job been working on these really controversial chemicals," said Jack Pratt, chemicals campaign director for the Environmental Defense Fund, which opposes Dourson's nomination.

Republican North Carolina Sens. Thom Tillis and Richard Burr said Wednesday that they could not support Dourson because of his past work as a toxicologist who was frequently hired by industry to rebut public health concerns about chemicals. Collins said Thursday that she is "leaning against" confirming him.

A legislative aide said Democrats are eyeing Republican Sens. Jeff Flake of Arizona, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Bob Corker of Tennessee and Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, although Flake, Toomey and Corker told POLITICO they're still undecided.

"Sen. Toomey remains concerned about the PFOA issue in Bucks County and Montgomery County and remains dedicated to addressing it," a spokesman for the Pennsylvania Republican said, naming two Philadelphia-area counties where toxic firefighting chemicals leached into the ground from two closed naval bases. Toomey is reviewing the nomination "with these concerns in mind," but the spokesman did not say how he plans to vote.

However, even if the nomination is pulled or rejected, Dourson will still be able to influence

EPA's implementation of a major chemical safety law because he has already started working at the agency. Democrats have criticized that arrangement, though EPA says previous administrations allowed people to begin working there before being confirmed.

EPA's chemical safety office, which Dourson has been nominated to lead, has a heavy workload after Congress in 2016 passed a bipartisan law updating the Toxic Substances Control Act for the first time in nearly 40 years. The office has been charged with evaluating the safety of chemicals already in use and determining how to test new chemicals before they are allowed into the marketplace.

The near-universal support TSCA reform won in Congress last year may help explain the wariness among lawmakers about giving chemical industry allies too much of a foothold in EPA.

"They wanted to give the public some assurance that the products on their shelf are safe, and when you put the chemical industry in charge that's not going to happen," said Madeleine Foote, a legislative representative with the League of Conservation Voters.

Tillis and Burr stopped short of calling for Dourson to step down from his existing position at the agency. "I'll leave that up to the EPA to decide," Tillis told POLITICO.

Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), who has supported several Trump nominees, said he would vote against Dourson but not object to him continuing to work at EPA.

Before joining EPA last month, Dourson was a professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine's Risk Science Center, and he founded the nonprofit Toxicology Excellence for Risk Assessment, which was often conducted industry-funded research. He also previously worked at EPA from 1980 to 1995. Past clients of Dourson and his research group have included Dow Chemical, Koch Industries and Chevron, according to the Associated Press.

Critics say Dourson's research routinely concluded that chemicals were safer in far higher concentrations than those recommended by agencies like EPA, putting communities at greater risk of finding toxic substances like perchlorate, TCE or PFOA in their air or drinking water.

Pratt said Dourson's work followed a pattern.

"Over and over again these chemical companies would hire him, he'd look at the research, and say the standard that EPA or whatever regulatory body has is too strict — it should be looser," Pratt said.

EPA defended the nominee.

"Dr. Michael Dourson is a highly qualified scientist to lead EPA's Office of Chemical Safety and Pollution," EPA spokesman Jahan Wilcox said in a statement. "He worked at EPA for 15 years, founded a program that characterized the health hazards of chemicals, performed pro-bono work that saved a family near Cincinnati and his expertise on TCE contamination resulted in settlements that helped 130 families outside of San Francisco."

Dourson told the Environment and Public Works Committee at his confirmation hearing last month that he did not have a thumb on the scale.

"I can give you as many or more examples of situations where the science that we brought forward as a team actually lowered the safe dose or risk position for various sponsors," Dourson told Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) at the hearing. "If confirmed, I will rely on the guidance of EPA ethics officials."

Tillis and Burr said they could not support Dourson based on his record and North Carolina's history of chemical pollution problems, such drinking water at Camp Lejeune that was contaminated for decades by chemicals including trichloroethylene. TCE is one of the first 10 chemicals EPA must evaluate under the new safety law, but Dourson has previously endorsed health standards that are 1.5 to 15 times less protective than those backed by other researchers, according to EDF.

Retired Marine Corps Master Sgt. Jerry Ensminger, whose daughter died of leukemia linked to the contaminated water at Camp Lejeune, met with Tills and aides to Burr to urge their opposition, according to the Wilmington Star News.

Among his other industry-funded work, Dourson appeared before an EPA scientific advisory panel session concerning the pesticide chlorpyrifos on behalf of CropLife America. He led a 2008 paper on acrylamide, which can form during high-temperature cooking of some starchy foods, that received funding from major food companies like Burger King, Frito-Lay and McDonald's. And he studied 1-bromopropane, a solvent linked to some neurological and reproductive disorders, in 2004 with funding from Albemarle Corp. and Ameribrom Inc.

In all cases, he recommended standards many factors less protective than public health and EPA research suggested.

He also has done work for industry-friendly state governments. In the early 2000s, Dourson helped West Virginia set drinking water guidance limits for PFOA, also known as perfluorooctanoic acid or C8, at 150 parts per billion. That was 150 times less protective than manufacturer DuPont's own internal standard of 1 part per billion and more than 2,000 times less protective than EPA's recommendation of 70 parts per trillion.

During his confirmation hearing, Dourson argued that the research had evolved significantly since his recommendation to West Virginia, saying that "the science has progressed, significantly advanced since the time of 2004 and the new science indicates a lower level." And he defended the integrity of his work overall.

"Throughout my career — with EPA, TERA and now with the University of Cincinnati — I have been objective in my work and applied sound science to come to my conclusions," Dourson said.

U.S. BACKS HFC REDUCTION DEAL: While you were munching on turkey and mashed potatoes, the Trump administration pledged its support for an international accord aimed curbing emissions of hydrofluorocarbons, highly potent greenhouse gases. "The United States believes the Kigali Amendment represents a pragmatic and balanced approach to phasing down the production and consumption of HFCs, and therefore we support the goals and approach of the amendment," Judith Garber, the State Department official who led the delegation to Montreal Protocol conference, said in remarks on Thanksgiving Day. It's a big deal because the agreement, which enters into force in 2019, is expected to avoid a temperature increase of 0.5° C [0.9° F] by 2100.

And the U.S. ponied up, too: The U.S. agreed to pour $36.67 million annually from 2018 through 2020 into the Multilateral Fund, through which rich nations help developing ones to phase out HFCs. That's part of a broader $540 million countries agreed to contribute over the three-year period. Look for Congress to be a lot more willing to contribute for this than it has been for other international climate efforts given both industry and environmentalists strongly back the broader agreement.

Limping toward Senate consideration: Garber told diplomats the U.S. had "initiated the process" for putting the Kigali agreement to the Senate for its advice and consent, though she cautioned there was "no timeline currently determined" for formally sending it over to Congress. "There are a number of steps in our domestic process that we would need to complete before reaching a final decision," she noted.

HEADS TURN TO WEST VIRGINIA: Washington's attention will be trained on what will be a critical week in Congress for the GOP's tax package, but the eyes of the energy and environmental world turn to Charleston, W.Va. for the lone public hearing on EPA's proposed repeal of the Obama-era Clean Power Plan. Preliminary lists of witnesses on Tuesday and Wednesday include numerous heavy-hitters: coal magnate Robert Murray, West Virginia Attorney General (and Senate candidate) Patrick Morrisey, Rep. Evan Jenkins, as well as dozens of environmental, health and public interest advocates vocally opposing the regulation's repeal. Remember EPA continues to accept comment on its proposed repeal through Jan. 16.

Oversight hearings from Appropriators: As they work to stave off a government shutdown, House Appropriators will check in with the U.S. Forest Service and Army Corps of Engineers on Wednesday before hearing from Deputy Interior Secretary David Bernhardt on Thursday. Bernhardt, who will be joined by officials from EPA and Energy, is also due to provide an update to the House Oversight Committee on their regulatory reform initiatives on Wednesday.

Taking stock: POLITICO's Seung Min Kim looks at the daunting remainder of the year for Congress.

EPW to move more nominees: The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee is scheduled to vote on the nominations of Kathleen Hartnett White to run the White House Council on Environmental Quality and Andrew Wheeler to be EPA deputy administrator on Wednesday at 10 a.m.

Brownfields bill hits the floor: The House is slated to vote Thursday on legislation H.R. 3017 \(115\) that reauthorizes and revamps EPA's Brownfields program, which helps promote the redevelopment of contaminated sites.

MAKING PROGRESS: TransCanada said it's removed 44,400 gallons of oil from the site of a spill from the Keystone pipeline in South Dakota in its most recent update on the situation. The company said it has 170 people "on-site, working around-the-clock" to clean up the spill and that "there have been no significant" environmental impacts from the incident. Preliminary inspections were supposed to be completed Sunday, and the company has not given any estimate of when the pipeline will begin operations again.

UPTON STAYING ON ENBRIDGE'S CASE: House Energy and Commerce Energy Subcommittee Chairman Fred Upton told Michigan radio on Sunday that he, along with Gov. Rick Snyder's office, met "at length" with representatives from Enbridge about its troubled Line 5 pipeline, and he vowed to continue seeking greater transparency from the company about the status inspections and repairs. "There is no room for an accident here," Upton said. "We're going to stay on their case."

More on why he passed on a Senate run. "I've never lost an election - didn't think that I would - but it's a tough sledding that's for sure, so at the end we just said, 'No, not gonna do it.'"

QUITE AN INTERESTING RECOMMENDATION: Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has recommended the creation of a new national monument in Montana that would protect more than 200 square miles of federal land from any fossil fuel development, a move some see as politically shrewd given the former Montana congressman's whispered future ambitions, NPR reports. "I think the secretary has talked about wanting to come back to Montana after he's done being secretary and potentially run for governor," said Land Tawney, president of the Montana-based sportsmen's group Backcountry Hunters and Anglers. During an April executive order signing, Trump described national monument designations made under prior administrations as "massive federal land grab[s]" and Zinke has suggested shrinking a handful of them.

DEFENDING GAETZ IN CLIMATE CAUCUS: Rep. Matt Gaetz 's joining the Climate Solutions Caucus raised more than a few eyebrows in Washington given his legislation earlier this year to abolish the EPA, but the Citizens Climate Lobby actually sees it as a major sign of progress. "We think his joining (which happened at the invitation of a fellow freshman Congressman from across the aisle) signals a big shift in the way climate change is being approached in Congress," Flannery Winchester, a spokeswoman for the group, wrote in an email. "Gaetz's membership on the caucus shows that the issue is becoming less politicized, and his exposure to the other Republicans in the group will likely bring him closer to bipartisan climate legislation that's actually viable."

BACK ON THE JOB: In a Thanksgiving statement, Whitefish Energy said it resumed efforts to repair Puerto Rico's electric grid after receiving enough of a payment to indicate a "good faith intent" from the island's beleaguered utility to pay the Montana-based company. The amount of the payment was not specified. Government figures Sunday showed more than 42 percent of the island remains without electricity.

DON'T DO IT! Eleven state attorneys general sent a letter last week to the National Park Service voicing strong opposition to proposed fee increases at high-profile parks around the country. "The Service has not offered a reasoned explanation for its proposed fee increases and its actions are inconsistent with the laws that govern our national park system," the letter, led by California's Xavier Becerra, says.

NOW LOBBYING: Former Sen. Byron Dorgan has been hired by the Wilderness Society to lobby on "conservation issues relating to the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge," according to records posted last week.

OBSTACLES AHEAD: Keeping energy consumption in check is crucial if the European Union intends to meet 2020 targets for renewables and energy efficiency, POLITICO Europe's Kalina Oroschakoff reports, citing an European Environment Agency warning. The agency also urged countries to speed up cutting fossil fuel use in their energy systems to meet the 2030 renewable and energy efficiency targets.

Trump and congressional leaders to hold talks to avoid shutdown Back

By Seung Min Kim, Heather Caygle and Andrew Restuccia | 11/22/2017 01:42 PM EDT

President Donald Trump and top congressional leaders will meet next week to try to hammer out a year-end agreement to avert a government shutdown, according to multiple sources, as Capitol Hill careens toward a legislative pile-up next month.

The so-called Big Four — Speaker Paul Ryan, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer — haven't even agreed on total government spending levels that would allow appropriators to write a massive funding bill for the rest of the fiscal year.

That means a short-term funding extension to keep the government operating beyond a Dec. 8 deadline is all but inevitable. Congressional leaders would likely need to reach an agreement on the top-line figures by early next week for there to be any chance of finishing an omnibus spending bill in December.

The meeting is scheduled for Tuesday at 3 p.m., according to congressional sources and a White House official. White House Deputy Press Secretary Lindsay Walters later said in a statement, "The President will be meeting with congressional leaders next week to discuss end-of-year legislative issues."

In addition to having to move a must-pass bill to fund the government, Republicans hope to pass a sweeping rewrite of the tax code by Christmas.

Further complicating matters is the ongoing dispute over the fate of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, the Obama-era initiative that has shielded hundreds of thousands of young undocumented immigrants from deportation.

Trump has announced that DACA permits will expire beginning in March, although immigration advocates have said scores of current DACA recipients have already lost protections because they weren't able to get their status renewed before an October deadline.

One source familiar with the negotiations said Democrats, particularly Pelosi, have pushed aggressively to include a DACA fix to a short-term continuing resolution that would keep the government open beyond Dec. 8. A Democratic leadership aide said Pelosi has not asked specifically for a DACA fix to be attached to a short-term extension, although she and Schumer have been publicly adamant that a legislative solution for DACA needs to pass Congress next month.

Democratic leaders have also insisted on ensuring that any agreement to raise defense spending above sequester levels also boosts funding for domestic programs.

Congress stares down shutdown amid December deluge Back

By Seung Min Kim | 11/26/2017 03:23 PM EDT

December is shaping up to be the cruelest month for Republicans who control Capitol Hill.

Under enormous pressure for a legislative achievement, GOP senators will attempt to follow their House counterparts this week by passing a massive tax overhaul they can send to President Donald Trump by the end of the year.

At the same time, they're dealing with Democrats to avert a Christmastime government shutdown. And that battle is complicated even further by an emotional fight over the fate of hundreds of thousands of young undocumented immigrants.

"I'm not prepared to go home for the holidays until we get our work done," Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Sunday on CNN's "State of the Union."

The to-do list, which Trump will discuss with top congressional leaders at a White House meeting on Tuesday, doesn't end there. Lawmakers are butting heads over a third tranche of emergency aid for hurricane-ravaged areas. Key surveillance powers used by the National Security Agency need to be renewed. Funding for a health insurance program benefiting 9 million lower-income children is already long expired, with several states close to running out of cash.

And it all comes against a continuous backdrop of sexual harassment bombshells that are ensnaring a growing number of lawmakers — not to mention a dramatic Senate special election in Alabama that could immediately prompt ethics proceedings, a rarity in the chamber.

First up is the tax overhaul. The House passed its plan just before the Thanksgiving break with surprising ease — putting pressure on the Senate to cobble together 50 Republican votes, the same task that stymied GOP senators in the Obamacare battle this summer.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is reckoning with multiple dueling factions, all with competing concerns about the tax bill. A bloc of deficit hawks, including Sens. Bob Corker of Tennessee and Jeff Flake of Arizona, is worried the measure would balloon the deficit. Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) is opposed, at least for now, because of the way the bill treats small businesses.

Other Republicans, including moderate Sen. Susan Collins of Maine and conservative Sen. Jerry Moran of Kansas, aren't pleased that a health care fight is being injected into the tax mix. The Senate legislation would repeal Obamacare's requirement that everyone carry insurance, yielding hundreds of billions in savings but potentially destabilizing health care markets.

If Senate Republicans can pull it off, they'll immediately begin trying to reconcile their bill with the very different House plan.

Then there's the matter of keeping the government open. As Republicans try to jam through their partisan tax bill, they'll be in talks with Democrats on a sweeping year-end spending package to fund the government through September. That task always needs bipartisan buy-in, but the immigration dimension makes the challenge vastly more complicated than in past years.

A short-term funding patch delaying the current Dec. 8 deadline at least a couple of weeks is inevitable, since top Hill leaders haven't even agreed on spending numbers for federal agencies. The appropriations committees would need at least three to four weeks to write funding legislation.

Because it involves a must-pass bill, the spending fight gives House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) maximum leverage to demand a top priority for Democrats by year's end: codifying Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals into law.

While not explicitly threatening to withhold votes without a DACA measure, both Pelosi and Schumer have vowed to save the Obama-era immigration program legislatively before lawmakers leave Washington for the year. Moderate Republicans have also urged their leadership to find a fix.

But doing so could prompt a rebellion among conservatives who don't want to be steamrolled by Democrats on such a contentious issue. The White House is also insisting on funding for President Donald Trump's border wall with Mexico.

In addition to a huge omnibus spending package, Congress has another pricey funding measure to deal with — aid for hurricane-wrecked states and territories — that many on Capitol Hill say doesn't go far enough.

The White House has suggested a $44 billion emergency measure distributed to Texas, Florida, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands for ongoing hurricane relief, as well as money for combating wildfires in the West. Democrats and some powerful Republicans — including Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn of Texas, the No. 2 GOP leader — have said the package is far too small, though they will have to contend with fiscal conservatives who are getting weary of continued spending on aid, particularly if it's not paid for with other cuts.

Other prime government programs could be temporarily shuttered if Congress fails to act.

One is Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which empowers the NSA to monitor communications without a warrant. That authority expires at the end of the year, and there is bipartisan opposition to a "clean" renewal of the spying powers. There are varying proposals that would extend the programs, but with key reforms.

The National Flood Insurance Program, which has become financially strapped after the spate of powerful hurricanes this year, also needs to be reauthorized by Dec. 8. The House and Senate have dueling proposals to renew the program.

On the health care front, the expiration of funding for the Children's Health Insurance Program is already causing problems as more states have turned to temporary cash infusions from the federal government to keep the programs running.

House Republicans passed a largely partisan CHIP funding measure earlier this month. Still, CHIP could be a relatively simple fix: One option would be to let funding ride along with a short-term continuing resolution that will need to clear Congress by Dec. 8.

Lawmakers will also face pressure to act on legislation that would stabilize the Obamacare markets after Trump's decision last month to stop paying so-called cost-sharing reduction subsidies to insurers.

All of this activity could be overshadowed by ballooning sexual harassment scandals on Capitol Hill.

Multiple women have come forward with allegations against Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), who have faced calls for ethics investigations or to step aside from powerful leadership posts. On Sunday, Conyers announced that "in light of the attention drawn by recent allegations made against me," he is stepping down from his post as the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. At least one House Democrat said Conyers should resign from Congress.

On the GOP side, Senate Republicans have scoured through essentially every option to try and knock Alabama Senate candidate Roy Moore out of the race, after at least nine women accused him of varying degrees of sexual misbehavior, including when one woman was 14 years old.

Democrat Doug Jones has a shot at an upset in the Dec. 12 election, which would be a political stunner in the conservative state. But if Moore wins, he will immediately face calls for expulsion from some of his own colleagues, and McConnell has promised that ethics proceedings for Moore would begin promptly. That could lead to his eventual expulsion, though doing so would be unprecedented.

To top it off, Rep. Al Green (D-Texas) has promised to force a vote to impeach Trump by Christmas. Green backed away from his first attempt to push the issue to the House floor earlier this fall after private pressure from Democratic leaders.

"Whatever others will do is their choice," Green said in a speech laying out his impeachment vow. "My conscience dictates that I will vote to impeach. Let others do what they may. History will judge us all."

GOP STILL ANXIOUS OVER AGENCY VACANCIES: President Donald Trump's administration has been more active in recent weeks in formally nominating people to host of vacant energy and environmental posts throughout the federal government, but members of his party still aren't satisfied with the pace. In conversations with 10 GOP senators, most said there were still numerous vacancies hampering the president's ability to implement his agenda. Here's what a couple of them had to say:

— John Barrasso, EPW chairman: "The pace has picked up, and I'm encouraged by that. I still am looking forward to getting the nominations for the Bureau of Land Management, Fish & Wildlife [and] of course the National Park Service. So there are still some critical ones out there that need to come forward."

— Shelly Moore Capito, another EPW member: "I still think we have too many vacancies."

— Jerry Moran, also on EPW, said there are too many instances where senators can't find the right person at an agency because they haven't been nominated. "I'm pleased to see any movement, which we're seeing from the White House, in the nominations and I hope we can — without objections from Democrats — take up those nominations as they arrive."

— Lisa Murkowski, Energy chairwoman, cautioned that while the pace of names had increased recently, "we've got to get them through the whole process."

Carper raises concerns: EPW ranking member Tom Carper said in a statement EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt "must follow through with the answers he assured us he would provide during his own confirmation hearing before we move forward with additional nominees" after meeting with four nominees slated to have confirmation hearings next week. But Barrasso told ME "we're going to continue" to process nominations regardless of those concerns.

HAPPY MIDWAY POINT OF SEPTEMBER! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Meguire Whitney's Elizabeth K. Whitney was first to identify James K. Polk as our only speaker to ever become president. For today: What's the only current state where both senators share the same first name? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy, and @POLITICOPro.

TRUMP SHRUGS OFF CLIMATE LINK TO HURRICANES: After visiting Florida on Thursday, Trump told reporters aboard Air Force One he saw no link between climate change and Hurricanes Harvey and Irma, which devastated much of the southern U.S., Pro's Emily Holden reports. "We did have two horrific storms, epic storms," he said. "But if you go back into the '30s and '40s, and you go back into the Teens, you'll see storms that were very similar and even bigger, OK?"

Scott too: Even after twice touring the storm-ravaged Florida Keys this week, Florida Gov. Rick Scott still won't say if he believes man-made climate change is real, POLITICO Florida's Marc Caputo reports. "Clearly our environment changes all the time, and whether that's cycles we're going through or whether that's man-made, I wouldn't be able to tell you which one it is," the governor (and Trump's preferred Florida Senate candidate) said.

Two Superfund sites need work: EPA officials have now examined 30 of the 90 affected Superfund sites in Florida and concluded two of them in Jacksonville — Fairfax Wood Treating and U.S. Naval Air Station Cecil Field — require follow up work due to flooding in the area.

ANOTHER EPA RULE RECONSIDERED: Pruitt has granted separate petitions of AES Puerto Rico and the Utility Solid Waste Activities Group to reconsider aspects of the agency's 2015 coal ash regulation, Pro's Alex Guillén reports. USWAG asked that pending deadlines be pushed back and called for the rule to be changed in the wake of a December 2016 law changing the enforcement scheme, while AES' petition centered on how utilities could store the residue from coal-fired power generation on site. "In light of EPA's new statutory authority, it is important that we give the existing rule a hard look and consider improvements that may help states tailor their permit programs to the needs of their states, in a way that provides greater regulatory certainty, while also ensuring that human health and the environment remain protected," Pruitt said in a statement, referring to provisions in last year's water infrastructure law.

Environmentalists bashed the decision to reopen the rule, which took almost six years to develop, as endangering human health and the environment. "This decision is a galling giveaway to industrial polluters, even by this Administration's standards of pandering to industry at the expense of the public," Earthjustice attorney Lisa Evans said in a statement. They vowed to fight moves to undermine the regulation, though Pruitt's EPA is likely to ask a federal appeals court case with oral arguments currently scheduled for Oct. 17 be put on hold while it reconsiders the rule.

MINING INDUSTRY HEADED TO TRUMP HOTEL: The National Mining Association confirmed to ME a report in The Intercept that it will host its private conference next month at the Trump International Hotel in Washington. "We evaluated information from five different venues and this was the only venue able to accommodate a group of our size and our meeting requirements on our desired dates," a spokeswoman said. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke is slated to address the group at the hotel.

SCIENCE PANEL WANTS FACE-TO-FACE WITH PRUITT: EPA's Science Advisory Board, the influential group of scientists who weigh in on key science issues, have invited Administrator Scott Pruitt to a meeting "to share your vision of the SAB's ongoing role in providing scientific advice and to hear about your priorities for the Environmental Protection Agency," according to a letter sent this week. The meeting will "allow for a dialog on how best the SAB can work to ensure the highest quality science supports Agency's policies and decisions," wrote SAB Chair Peter Thorne. It's not unusual for administrators to appear before the SAB on occasion; Gina McCarthy, for example, spoke to SAB in April 2016.

Elephant in the room: EPA is currently taking public comment on 132 nominees for SAB. It has 48 slots, with 15 opening up at the end of the month. The current SAB is dominated by academics, but also has members from state agencies, private companies and environmental groups. Comments are due Sept. 28.

GOTTA START SOMEWHERE: The White House Council on Environmental Quality took the first step Thursday toward implementing Trump's August executive order aimed at speeding the environmental reviews of infrastructure projects with the release of a work plan, Pro's Emily Holden reports. Among the steps to come: Work with other groups to create a framework for the "One Federal Decision" process, coordination to identify high-priority projects and the issuance of guidance to speed the NEPA process.

LET'S GET TOGETHER? Murkowski told reporters Trump had invited her over for lunch last Friday, but she had to bow out due to a commitment in Alaska. She viewed the invite, though, as a sign that their relationship could be productive in the aftermath of her vote against health care legislation. (She wasn't sure if it was a solo invite.) "I don't think there's a sourness," she said. "If there were, I don't think he would continue to be engaging."

PERDUE STICKING WITH CLOVIS: Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue voiced his enthusiastic support for Sam Clovis' nomination to be USDA's top scientist hours after Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts suggested he would leave the fate of the controversial pick to the administration, Pro Agriculture's Helena Bottemiller Evich reports. "President Trump made a good choice in nominating Dr. Sam Clovis and he has my full support," Perdue said. Clovis has raised eyebrows for his climate skepticism and lack of scientific background, among other issues.

NEW YORK OPPOSES SOLAR TRADE PETITION: With just a week to go until the International Trade Commission votes on whether to slap imported solar products with steep tariffs, New York state added its voice to those opposing the petitions of Suniva and SolarWorld Americas Inc. "If the relief requested by the Petitioners were to be ultimately granted, New York State's residential, small commercial, and industrial-scale PV projects would all substantially contract or disappear," Richard Kauffman, the state's energy czar, wrote. "Rather than grow to 12,000 jobs by 2021, the industry would be able to support just half the number of jobs it supports today."

UTAH GOVERNOR: ZINKE INDICATED MONUMENT DOWNSIZING: Utah Gov. Gary Herbert told local reporters Thursday that Zinke had indicated to him that Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument was an "abuse of the Antiquities Act" and said he thought it should be carved up "into smaller monuments — two or three." In addition, Herbert said the "indication" on Bears Ears National Monument is it will be shrunk down. The Trump administration has not said when it plans to release Zinke's recommendations publicly, though rumblings are it could come as soon as today.

ICYMI: Democrats and taxpayer advocates are concerned industry has an outsized role on the 20-member advisory committee named by Zinke to review royalty rates that oil, natural gas and coal companies pay for access to federal land and water, Pro's Ben Lefebvre reports. The group includes five energy company representatives and six others members who hail from energy-friendly, GOP-led local governments, but critics say it lacks adequate public interest group or Democratic representation.

EPA TOP LAWYER NOMINEE REPRESENTED BASF, FORD, UTILITY: Matt Leopold, President Donald Trump's nominee for EPA general counsel, has represented several regulated companies in recent years, including a leading chemical manufacturer, automaker and utility, according to a financial disclosure posted by the National Law Journal. Leopold has been an attorney at the Tallahassee-based Carlton Fields since 2015, and his client roster, according to the disclosure, included chemical giant BASF, automaker Ford Motor Company and utility Florida Power & Light. Leopold also listed analysis firm Resource Environmental Solutions; Comanco Environmental Corporation, which builds containment systems; and sand miner Edgar Minerals. He was previously general counsel for the Florida Department of Environmental Protection. Leopold and other EPA nominees will get a hearing Wednesday.

WOTUS-LINKED JUDGE ADVANCES: North Dakota District Judge Ralph Erickson, who gained national attention (at least among energy watchers) when he placed the Obama administration's waters of the U.S. regulation on ice back in 2015, saw his nomination to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals advance through the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday. The vote was 20-0. Democrat Heidi Heitkamp praised the action as "great news" following the hearing.

REPORT: RAPID ACTION NEEDED TO ADDRESS CLIMATE CHANGE: Limiting global temperature increases to less than 2 degrees Celsius cannot be done by reducing carbon dioxide emissions alone and additional action must be taken by 2020, according to a report and peer-reviewed paper out late Thursday from 33 climate policy experts. Policymakers must also drastically reduce short-lived super climate pollutants, such as HFCs and methane, by 2020 and undertake atmospheric carbon extraction. "Scientists have many ideas about how to reduce emissions, but they all agree on the urgency of strong and decisive action to remove carbon from the economy," California Gov. Jerry Brown said in a statement about the study.

MAIL CALL! WHAT'S THE DEAL WITH THOSE EPA CUTS? Six EPW Democrats, led by Carper, asked EPA in a Thursday letter to provide additional information on its intended workforce reductions. They expressed concern that implementing the Trump's administration already proposed cuts and "further White House direction to plan for additional longer term down-sizing would damage EPA's ability to carry out its Congressionally-mandated mission to protect public health and the environment."

DEMOCRATS FIGHT WOTUS REPEAL: Twenty-one members of the Senate Democratic caucus, led by Ben Cardin and Carper, urged Pruitt and the Army Corps of Engineers in a letter released Thursday to reconsider plans to scrap the Obama administration's Waters of the U.S. regulation. "For an administration to change the definition of what constitutes a water of the United States almost immediately upon entering office creates more, not less, regulatory uncertainty," they wrote. "We need stability and certainty for our constituents to be safe and our economy to grow."

LAWSUIT CHALLENGES EFFICIENCY ROLLBACK: Democracy Forward, representing the Natural Resources Defense Council, filed a lawsuit Thursday challenging the Trump administration's decision to stay two provisions of a January air conditioning efficiency rule. The lawsuit argues the rule had already gone into effect when DOE issued the stay and that the agency failed to adequately explain its decision.

GROUP SLAMS TRUMP'S CHEMICALS NOMINEE: The Environmental Working Group released a report today arguing Michael Dourson, Trump's nominee to run EPA's chemicals division, has "consistently fought to weaken proposals to protect our families from dangerous chemicals, including chemicals linked to cancer, brain damage and reproductive harm." Read it here.

MORE SUPPORT FOR NORTHAM IN VIRGINIA: A broad array of liberal groups, including the Tom Steyer-backed Next Gen America and the Virginia League of Conservation Voters PAC, are joining forces in a $2 million campaign to boost Democratic Lt. Gov. Ralph Northam for governor, Pro Campaign's Kevin Robillard reports. The digital ads, which begin running this week through the election, aim to reach and turn out more than 1.2 million voters.

GREENS, SPORTSMEN TEAM UP: The Congressional Sportsmen's Foundation and the National Wildlife Federation have signed a memorandum of understanding in hopes of advancing wildlife conservation and access to public lands.

MOVER, SHAKER: Tracy Stone-Manning is the new associate vice president for public lands at the National Wildlife Federation. She was previously Montana Gov. Steve Bullock's chief-of-staff and before that his director of the Department of Environmental Quality.

Doug Little, an Arizona Corporation Commissioner, has accepted the position of deputy assistant secretary for intergovernmental and external affairs at DOE. "I have enjoyed serving Arizona and look forward to this tremendous opportunity to influence energy policy at the national level," he said in a statement. First elected in 2014 (more on that here), Little served as chairman of the commission last year and also joined the board of directors for the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners. He starts Oct. 2.

Trump on climate change: 'We've had bigger storms' Back

By Emily Holden | 09/14/2017 04:36 PM EDT

President Donald Trump on Thursday discounted any link between climate change and the intense hurricanes that ravaged Florida and the Gulf Coast while talking to reporters aboard Air Force One on his return from storm-stricken Fort Myers and Naples

"We've had bigger storms than this," Trump said when asked if the highly destructive Hurricane Harvey and record-breaking Hurricane Irma were changing his views of climate change.

Trump said storms from the 1910s, 1930s and 1940s were worse.

Members of Trump's cabinet have repeatedly said that now is not the time to talk about climate change, which is predicted to make hurricanes more intense, increase rainfall totals and put coastal communities at higher risk to storm surges as sea levels rise.

Trump pushes Rick Scott to run for Senate during Irma recovery visit Back

By Nolan D. McCaskill | 09/14/2017 11:39 AM EDT

President Donald Trump traveled to southwest Florida with a message for the people of Fort Myers, who are recovering from Hurricane Irma: Rick Scott for Senate.

Trump, first lady Melania Trump and Vice President Mike Pence flew to Florida on Thursday morning to visit Fort Myers and Naples, two Gulf Coast cities that Irma tore through earlier this week.

Trump acknowledged the devastation in brief remarks he delivered in Fort Myers ahead of a briefing from state and local officials.

"We're gonna see some more of it now, unfortunately," he lamented.

"I have to say that your governor — where is our governor here? Rick Scott," Trump said, pausing for applause of the Republican governor. "The job he's done is incredible, and I guess I've been very lucky because, you know, you have a great governor in Texas; you have a great governor in Florida. The job that Rick has done is being talked about all over."

Trump offered more praise of Scott, who he has continued to nudge to challenge incumbent Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson in 2018, taking advantage of Thursday's backdrop of a recovering city.

"I just, again, I have to say that — what do I know? But I hope this man right here, Rick Scott, runs for the Senate," Trump said.

Scott has publicly said he is weighing a Senate run, but he has insisted that he feels little pressure to make an early decision. And Trump is unsure whether the governor ultimately will run.

"I don't know what he's gonna do, but I know that at a certain point it ends for you, and we can't let it end," Trump said. "So I hope he runs for Senate. Who knows what he's gonna do?"

Thursday marks the second time the president has publicly asked Scott to run. In June, during an announcement about Cuba regulations in Miami, Trump urged the governor to challenge Nelson.

The president helicoptered to Naples later Thursday, flying low enough to see some of the flood damage throughout the region. Irma dropped more than a foot of rain in parts of South Florida over the weekend, and Naples was hit with the storm's strongest winds — which registered at up to 142 miles per hour, according to the National Weather Service.

He spoke to homeowners and handed out handshakes and hoagies to community members.

"They're too small," the president remarked as he yanked off his thin plastic gloves and resumed shaking hands.

He asked a buff man if he was "a workout guy" and encouraged him to "keep it up." And he questioned whether one woman who was holding a small dog was a biker, noting that "the bikers love us."

The president also shook the hand of a man who asked where former President Barack Obama was the last time the area was hit with a hurricane. "On the golf course!" the man answered.

Trump asked if the man had voted for him. "Best vote of your life?" he wondered. He then turned to the press. "Don't report that," he said, smiling. "That's good news."

The president ended his trip the same way it began: with a tweet.

"Just left Florida for D.C.," Trump announced. "The people and spirit in THAT GREAT STATE is unbelievable. Damage horrific but will be better than ever!"

Pruitt to reconsider parts of 2015 coal ash rule Back

By Alex Guillén | 09/14/2017 04:15 PM EDT

EPA will reconsider key portions of the 2015 coal ash rule, according to a letter from Administrator Scott Pruitt to industry officials released by Earthjustice.

Two petitions were filed in May by AES Puerto Rico and the Utility Solid Waste Activities Group, an umbrella group whose members include the Edison Electric Institute, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, American Public Power Association and more than a hundred utilities and related companies.

Pruitt's letter does not specify which parts of the rule he plans to reconsider, but both USWAG and AES identified specific issues with the regulation.

USWAG's petition asked that pending deadlines be pushed back and called for the rule to be changed in the wake of a December 2016 law changing the enforcement scheme in order to accommodate new management options based on site-specific risk analyses rather than the original "burdensome, inflexible, and often impracticable requirements." USWAG also argued that various executive orders from President Donald Trump dealing with regulations justify cracking the rule open.

AES' petition focused on requirements for how power plants store their coal ash piles before they are moved off site to be disposed of or to make products such as concrete and wallboard.

Oral arguments at the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals over the rule are currently scheduled for Oct. 17, but EPA is likely to ask the case be put on hold while it reconsiders the rule.

WHAT'S NEXT: Pruitt will initiate a formal reconsideration process. Any actual changes to the rule will have to go through public comment and will be open to legal challenge.

White House outlines plan for expediting environmental reviews Back

By Emily Holden | 09/14/2017 06:12 PM EDT

The White House took its first step toward speeding environmental reviews for infrastructure projects today, with the Council on Environmental Quality releasing a work plan in response to President Donald Trump's August executive order.

CEQ in a fact sheet called the current review and permitting process "fragmented, inefficient and predictable," saying "projects often involve numerous federal agencies, overlapping statutory requirements, and duplicative or redundant processes."

The Trump administration has attacked reviews under the National Environmental Policy Act for holding up projects. In a June speech at the Department of Transportation, Trump threw binders full of highway environmental reviews on the floor, calling them "nonsense."

CEQ said the median timeline for issuing environmental impact statements is four years, but some take more than 10 years. Trump's order directs agencies to try to complete reviews within two years, issue a single decision that represents all agencies and provide permits within 90 days.

CEQ said it will:

— work with the Office of Management and Budget and Federal Permitting Improvement Steering Council to create a framework for the "One Federal Decision" process laid out in Trump's order.

— coordinate with the Council, DOT and the Army Corps of Engineers to identify high-priority projects.

— review its own regulations on implementing NEPA.

— issue guidance to speed the NEPA process.

— form an interagency working group to review regulations that may bog down reviews and permitting.

Roberts looks to Perdue, Trump to make call on Clovis' nomination Back

By Catherine Boudreau | 09/14/2017 01:27 PM EDT

Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts said today he is leaving the fate of controversial USDA nominee Sam Clovis up to Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue and President Donald Trump.

Roberts told reporters today the committee will move forward "expeditiously" with Clovis' nomination to be USDA's chief scientist if "that is the desire of the secretary and the president."

Roberts said the committee hasn't received all of Clovis' paperwork, which is why a confirmation hearing has not been scheduled.

The committee has a "few outstanding asks" for publications and other materials, spokeswoman Meghan Cline told POLITICO in an email.

Clovis, the nominee for USDA undersecretary for research, education and economics, has come under fire from Democrats and environmental groups over what his opponents say is a lack of scientific experience that is required for the job, as well as his skepticism on climate change and a series of controversial past statements — which include racially charged comments about progressives and former President Barack Obama, and about federal protections for the LGBT community.

Perdue: Clovis has 'my full support' Back

By Helena Bottemiller Evich | 09/14/2017 05:39 PM EDT

Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue said today that his support for USDA nominee Sam Clovis hasn't wavered.

"President Trump made a good choice in nominating Dr. Sam Clovis and he has my full support," Perdue said through a spokesperson. "I look forward to his hearing, so the committee has the opportunity to get to know him personally."

The comment comes hours after Senate Agriculture Chairman Pat Roberts suggested he is leaving the fate of the controversial nominee for USDA undersecretary for research, education and economics up to Perdue and President Donald Trump. Roberts told reporters today that the committee will move forward "expeditiously" with Clovis' nomination to be USDA's chief scientist if "that is the desire of the secretary and the president."

Taxpayer advocate, Democrats see industry tilt on Zinke's royalties panel Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 09/14/2017 03:33 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke has pledged to increase energy revenue from federal lands, but congressional Democrats and public watchdogs are worried the agency is putting key policy decisions about royalties in the hands of the industry.

Interior officials have said increasing drilling on federal lands would help fulfill President Donald Trump's promise to "usher in a golden age of energy dominance" — and help restore the agency's coffers back to levels seen a decade ago, when they were bolstered by oil prices that flirted with $150 a barrel.

Now, with oil prices under $50 a barrel, the portion of Interior's budget from those revenues has dropped to $6.2 billion, one-quarter of where it was in during the heady market of 2008.

"I will be looking at revenue," Zinke told senators during a June budget hearing, pointing to the federal income from natural gas, oil and wind. "If you're going to operate on public land, then the public should have a say, because we are all stewards of our public lands. We want to make sure we have a fair return. That return should be transparent."

But public interest groups and Democrats say the 20-member advisory committee Zinke named to review royalty rates that oil, natural gas and coal companies pay for access to federal land and water is stocked with industry-linked members.

The committee includes five energy company representatives and six others members who hail from energy-friendly, GOP-led local governments. Critics say it lacks representatives from public interest groups or Democrats who might question whether the public is getting a fair deal from new drilling.

"We should be exploring better royalty structures," Sen. Tom Udall (D-N.M), whose state is the fifth largest oil producer in the country, said in an email. "But I'm skeptical that the royalty policy committee established by Secretary Zinke is structured to ask the most probing and balanced questions to benefit citizens." Udall plans to reintroduce his legislation, S. 2254 \(108\), next week that would institute royalties on gold, silver and other precious minerals currently excluded from generating royalties.

Ryan Alexander, president of public watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense, lauded Zinke's move to restart that commission as an opportunity to make sure taxpayers get a fair return for energy developed on public lands, but its make-up didn't give her confidence that would happen.

"There's a lot of people who know a lot of stuff on that committee," said Alexander, whose nomination to the committee was rejected by Interior. "But there isn't anyone who focuses on taxpayer interest. It is a definitely a concern that this is weighted toward the industry. We're going to be watching carefully."

Republicans have backed Zinke's exclusion of environmental and public interest groups.

"Many of these public interest groups have been driving this debate in court and so forth at the demise of our natural resource industry, and our economies and jobs in places like Montana," Sen. Steve Daines (R-Mont.) told POLITICO. "So it's time to change it up."

Interior's royalty rates dictate the percentage of the proceeds from oil, gas or other energy produced from federal lands or waters that companies must share with the government. The new committee will "provide advice to the Secretary ... on the fair market value of and on the collection of revenues derived from, the development of energy and mineral resources on Federal and Indian lands," according to the charter Zinke approved in March.

Oil production on federal lands reached an all-time high of 580 million barrels in 2016 from the surge in offshore production, according to data from the Office of Natural Resources Revenue, an overall increase of 33 percent from 2008.

Even as oil production surged, oil revenues flowing to Interior dropped to $2.8 billion, however, the lowest point since 2005, largely because of weak market prices. U.S. oil averaged $43.29 per barrel last year, less than half the price in 2014.

Natural gas volumes have fallen by a third since 2008, with most of the drop because of offshore drillers' shift to more profitable oil production. And coal production on federal land fell by a third between 2008 and 2016, following electric utilities' switching to cheaper natural gas.

Interior's decisions on royalties have a major impact on state budgets. In 2016, Wyoming received $684 million from federal leases, nearly one-quarter of the state's $3 billion budget that year, while New Mexico got $386 million, about 6 percent of the state's total budget.

Interior lowered the minimum royalty payments for oil and gas produced from shallow-water areas of the Gulf of Mexico that it offered in a lease in August. But that cut failed to attract companies to the area, which is largely tapped out of oil and gas from years of development, and only 10 percent of the tracts up for auction were leased.

Interior has also rolled back an Obama-era rule on assessing the value of coal from federal lands that required mining companies to use the price they sold the coal at on the open market — not to affiliate companies they may have sold it to at a steep discount. Zinke's move did away with a rule that the department estimated would increase Interior's coal royalty revenues by up to $85 million a year, but that coal companies complained was too burdensome.

Zinke's appointments to the committee include employees of ConocoPhillips, Anadarko Petroleum and the National Ocean industries Association, a trade group representing offshore drilling companies.

He also included Matthew Adams, vice president of taxation at Cloud Peak Energy, a Wyoming-based coal company that donated $10,000 to Zinke's PAC in 2016. Cloud Peak paid the department $80 million in royalties last year, according to government data.

Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift called the commission members "eminently qualified individuals," and added that Cloud Point Energy's donation to Zinke's PAC was "absolutely not" a factor in appointing a company representative to the commission.

Another member of the committee is John Sweeney, an investor relations executive at VWR Corp., a Pennsylvania-based company that provides laboratory services to the pharmaceutical, biotech, industrial and healthcare industries.

Sweeney nominated himself to the commission and was appointed because of "his education and experience in business connecting investors with developers," Swift said. Sweeney did not reply to messages seeking comment.

Swift also pointed to the native American tribes on the commission as operating some renewable energy projects. Those tribes on the board are also heavily invested in oil, gas and coal projects. The Navajo Nation, whose president Russell Begaye is on the royalty commission, runs the largest coal-fired power plant in the western United States, and Begaye wrote an op-ed in March asking for government assistance to keep plant from shutting.

Zinke promised to appoint up to four members representing "academia and public interest" groups when he announced plans for the commission, and he has stressed the importance of public oversight on royalties.

But the sole slot that was allotted in the end for a representative for the public interest went to Daniel Rusz, a coal expert from energy industry consulting group Wood MacKenzie.

Interior's Swift initially said the choice came about because "no groups identifying themselves as public interest were nominated or self-nominated." She didn't address the rejection of the Taxpayers for Common Sense nomination, but said the group was "still permitted to attend the public meetings and the public comments are taken into consideration in decision making processes."

The commission also doesn't include any local government representatives identified as Democrats or nominated by Democratic governors. No one from Colorado or California was appointed, despite those two states producing more energy resources from federal lands than Alaska or Texas.

Gov. Steve Bullock, the Democratic head of Zinke's home state of Montana, nominated a Montana Department of Natural Resources employee who helps manage 6.2 million acres in the state that received $23 million in royalties from Interior in 2016, though that nominee was rejected. Interior did name a Montana representative as an alternate board member in case a sitting member drops out.

Instead, Interior appointed a Clinton Carter, Alabama's Republican state finance director. Alabama received $1.9 million in royalties from the department in 2016.

The lack of public accountability advocates on the board threatens to undermine its purpose of helping Interior increase public revenue, House Natural Resources committee ranking member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) said in a letter to Zinke.

Appointing a committee dominated by the fossil fuel industry with no public interest voices does not build "greater trust and transparency," Grijalva said in his letter, adding that the committee "should not be allowed to act as a fig leaf for actions designed solely to favor the interests of drilling and mining companies."

Liberal groups pour $2M into Virginia governor digital ads Back

By Kevin Robillard | 09/14/2017 10:00 AM EDT

A slew of liberal groups are teaming up for a $2 million digital ad buy aiming to drive Virginia voters to the polls in November and back Democratic Lt. Gov. Ralph Northam for governor.

Planned Parenthood Votes and Planned Parenthood Virginia PAC, the Tom Steyer-backed Next Gen America, Priorities USA Action and the Virginia League of Conservation Voters PAC are all contributing hundreds of thousands of dollars to the effort, which will begin this week and run until Election Day. The ads will aim to reach and turn out more than 1.2 million voters.

"When it comes to women's health in Virginia, everything is on the line, which is why we are doubling down to elect progressive champion Ralph Northam," said Deirdre Schifeling, the executive director of Planned Parenthood Votes. "We are pushing boundaries with the most coordinated and innovative digital program we've seen on this scale. This cutting edge digital program in Virginia will set a new precedent for coordinated investment and execution of a digital media program to reach, persuade and mobilize voters in a statewide race."

Planned Parenthood's ads, the first to be released, tout Northam as a "true champion for women's health" who will fight to expand Medicaid and attack Republican gubernatorial candidate Ed Gillespie for saying he would like "to see abortion be banned."

The groups are touting the buy as an unprecedented effort from liberal groups to coordinate their digital spending. The groups are sharing data and working together to develop messaging, voter contact timelines and dividing targeted audiences.

Democrats have often worked together to coordinate their television and mail efforts, but digital efforts have sometimes been more scattershot.

Priorities, which was the main super PAC backing Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton in 2016, hopes to replicate the effort in other states with competitive races in 2018.

"For years, Democrats have worked together on TV advertising and field, but fallen behind on digital advertising. Progressives can and must work together if we are going to make electoral gains in 2017, 2018 and beyond, and this first-of-its-kind coordinated digital effort is going to provide us a blueprint moving forward," said Patrick McHugh, executive director of Priorities USA Action. "Working closely together will allow us to efficiently deliver complimentary messages using the same data and targeting to ensure we're all working toward the same shared goal without duplicating or competing efforts."

LASHING OUT: Taking a cue from his boss, Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke continues to bash Patagonia and "the DC media" amid the latest wave of headlines. Reports that Zinke spent more than $14,000 for government helicopters so he could attend events in D.C., including to go horseback riding with Vice President Mike Pence, were "total fabrications and a wild departure from reality," the Interior secretary wrote in a statement on Twitter Saturday, without providing any new facts to contradict POLITICO's initial report, which was based on Interior Department travel logs. "All of these instances were thoroughly vetted and scrutinized before being approved by the department's career ethics officers and solicitors," he said in a posted Saturday. "We will continue to use government resources efficiently." More from Pro's Ben Lefebvre here.

That came after Sen. Maria Cantwell, top Democrat on the Energy and Natural Resources called for the agency's inspector general to add the trips to its ongoing probe of Zinke's travel habits: "If the Secretary misused public funds, he should write the treasury a check for the full amount and apologize," she said in a statement.

Questions, meanwhile, have arisen after Zinke and the Trump administration repeatedly attacked Patagonia, which filed a lawsuit challenging the decision to downsize Bears Ears National Monument in Utah. Zinke, in a Friday appearance on "Fox News," bashed the company by name as "made in China" and said Patagonia "should focus on how to bring manufacturing back into this country rather than lying to the public about losing federal land." (The House Natural Resources Committee made their own jab).

That prompted Walter Shaub, former director of the U.S. Office of Government Ethics, to urge the company to explore its legal options. "I don't know if there's any legal recourse, but I hope Patagonia has a law firm research the issue," he tweeted. "The federal govt officially and publicly calling a company a liar for political reasons is a bizarre and dangerous departure from civic norms. It's also decidedly anti-free market." And he added later Saturday: "Zinke is the poster child for this lawless administration's misuse of governmental authority & resources. His thuggish interference with a business is outside the scope of his duties, raising a question as to whether a sovereign immunity defense might fail if @patagonia sues."

Speaking of monuments, the uranium company Energy Fuels Resources lobbied the Trump administration to trim Bears Ears, the Washington Post reports. Zinke and Utah Republicans repeatedly insisted that mining and drilling considerations played no role in the decision.

One more thing: The FEC fined Zinke's congressional campaign committee $3,929 for failing to properly disclose contributions it received just before the 2016 election, Ben also reports, citing commission documents.

WELCOME TO MONDAY! Hope everyone in the Washington area enjoyed the first flakes of winter on Saturday! I'm your host Anthony Adragna, and Safer Chemicals Healthy Families' Liz Hitchcock was first to guess that 31 states (plus D.C.) have at least one national monument. For today: Just three presidents never used their authority under the Antiquities Act to designate a national monument since the program begun. Who are they? Send your tips, energy gossip and comments to aadragna@politico.com, or follow us on Twitter @AnthonyAdragna, @Morning\_Energy and @POLITICOPro.

SEE YOU IN JANUARY: FERC now has until Jan. 10 to take final action on DOE's grid resiliency proposal that would prop up coal and nuclear plants after Energy Secretary Rick Perry granted the commission an extra 30 days late Friday, Pro's Eric Wolff reports. In a letter, Perry said that he preferred a faster outcome but would allow the extra time requested by new FERC chairman Kevin McIntyre hours after being sworn in.

DOE spokeswoman Shaylyn Hynes: "Secretary Perry understands and respects the reasons for the Chairman's request and looks forward to swift action from the Commission to promptly address grid security."

Eric reads the tea leaves and reports the extension could indicate there's no consensus among the five commissioners on what to do. The commission is unlikely to either fully reject or adopt outright the proposal from Perry that calls for power plants that keep 90 days of inventory on site to receive full cost recovery, but could try to split the difference. Observers think FERC could call for a technical conference, or opt for a plan reportedly being considered by Commissioners Cheryl LaFleur and Rob Powelson to close the current DOE docket and open a new one that seeks input from grid managers.

Though his company told Eric they'd "defer" to Perry's judgement, coal magnate Robert Murray told The Washington Examiner he was deeply disappointed by the delay in considering Perry's plan. "We must have it. The 30-day delay is disappointing. I am concerned. It needs immediate action," he said. Remember Murray, a big Trump backer, had early access to Perry and other administration officials to push his ideas to save the struggling coal sector.

And long-time former FERC staffer (and now consultant) Alison Silverstein summed it up to The Washington Post: "The secretary's proposal seems to me to be unsupported by facts of any kind."

TROUBLING SIGNS ON ENFORCEMENT: EPA Administrator Scott Pruitt's agency has been far more lenient on enforcement actions during its first nine months than either the Obama or George W. Bush administrations, according to analysis conducted by the New York Times. The 1,900 civil cases started during the first nine months of Trump era are one-third fewer than under Lisa Jackson and one-quarter fewer than George W. Bush's first months, according to the Times. Pruitt's agency has sought $50.4 million in civil penalties to date, just 39 percent of what the Obama administration sought and about 70 percent of what the Bush administration sought. And the agency hasn't forced companies to retrofit their facilities to prevent pollution as much: the $1.2 billion in injunctive relief sought under Pruitt is just 12 percent of what was sought under Obama and 48 percent under Bush.

In addition, enforcement staff must now seek permission from Washington before ordering certain air and water pollution tests, according to documents obtained by The Times. "Certain people who are polluting are doing it with impunity right now and I think it is horrible," Nicole Cantello, an EPA lawyer in Chicago, said.

EPA responds: The agency told the Times it focuses "more on bringing people back into compliance than bean counting." In a statement Sunday, EPA said "Pruitt has not directed EPA staff to decrease their enforcement efforts," and questioned the Times methodology. "EPA and states work together to find violators and bring them back into compliance, and to punish intentional polluters. As part of this effort, we are collaborating more with states and we are focusing more on outcomes. Unless the activity is criminal, we focus more on bringing people back into compliance," the agency said.

QUITE THE PREDICTION! Speaking at his rally in Florida Friday, Trump promised the U.S. would be "totally self-sufficient" on the energy front by the end of the year and suggested using profits from energy exports to "start paying off our $20 trillion in debt." The International Energy Agency has said that "by the mid-2020s, the United States [could] become the world's largest liquefied natural gas (LNG) exporter and a few years later a net exporter of oil" though still a major importer of some types.

CALIFORNIA'S 'NEW NORMAL': Devastating wildfires still ablaze in Southern California have been exacerbated by impacts from climate change, California Gov. Jerry Brown said at a press conference, according to the Los Angeles Times. "This could be something that happens every year or every few years," Brown said. "We're about to have a firefighting Christmas." During a Sunday interview on "60 Minutes," Brown bemoaned that Trump doesn't have a "fear of the wrath of God" and offered him some advice with regards to the Paris agreement: "Take a deeper look now is not the time to undo what every country in the world is committed to," POLITICO's Brent D. Griffiths reports.

SEE YOUTH IN COURT! The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments today over whether a lower court should be allowed to hear a novel lawsuit brought by children and young adults using a public trust doctrine argument to try to force the federal government to take drastic action to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. This litigation is simply over whether the lower court can even hear this case, not the ultimate outcome of any such litigation. A federal judge in Oregon previously ruled the case could at least go to the trial phase, although many legal observers believed the suit was still a long shot. But the Trump administration asked the 9th Circuit to step in early and block the proceedings on the grounds that the judicial branch is not supposed to answer such sweeping questions about environmental policy, a job it says should be left to Congress and the executive branch. Watch a video livestream of the hearing here starting at 1 p.m. EST (10 a.m. PST).

The case could get even more attention because of one of the three judges assigned to the panel: Alex Kozinski, a Reagan appointee. The Washington Post on Friday reported that six former clerks or staffers said Kozinski "subjected them to a range of inappropriate sexual conduct or comments," including allegedly viewing pornography in his chambers. Kozinski later told the Los Angeles Times, "If this is all they are able to dredge up after 35 years, I am not too worried." Also on the panel are Chief Judge Sidney Thomas and Judge Marsha Berzon, both Clinton appointees.

21 (SUPERFUND) SHOTS: EPA on Friday released a list of 21 Superfund sites, ranging from Rhode Island to California to Oklahoma, that it's targeted for "immediate and intense action," Pro's Emily Holden reports. Those top-tier polluted properties include: the San Jacinto Superfund site in the Houston area, which was damaged by flooding during Hurricane Harvey; the West Lake Landfill in Missouri that contains radioactive waste from the Manhattan Project and is next to another site with a long-burning underground fire and the East Chicago, Ind. site Pruitt visited earlier this year. "The Administrator will receive regular updates on each of these sites," the agency said.

BARRASSO LANDS A CHALLENGER: Democratic businessman Gary Trauner, who narrowly lost a bid for Wyoming's lone House seat in 2006, announced he'd challenge incumbent Sen. John Barrasso on Friday, Wyoming Public Radio reports. "The system is rigged, D.C. is broken, and that's why people aren't getting ahead anymore," he said in his introductory video. He'll, of course, face long odds against the popular incumbent in the deep red state.

FLOOR WATCH: A trio of energy-related bills are due to hit the House floor Tuesday under suspension. One of them H.R. 2872 \(115\) would ask FERC to create procedures for expediting hydropower permitting at existing non-federal dams without hydroelectric facilities. Another H.R. 2880 \(115\) would aim to speed the approval FERC of closed loop pumped storage projects. And there's a bill H.R. 1733 \(115\) requiring the government to issue a report on the environmental and energy-related benefits of re-refining used lubricating oil.

MOVING OUT (WEST)? Two Colorado Democrats — Ed Perlmutter and Jared Polis — are backing calls from their fellow Republicans to move the headquarters of BLM out West, according to a report in Western Wire, a project of the Western Energy Alliance. "I know the perfect home for the agency: Colorado," Polis, who's running for governor, said. "We would welcome the BLM with open arms. With the agency closer to the vast public lands we all cherish and share, they would have better insight into what the lands mean to the western way of life. It makes perfect sense to have the agency nearby."

HEADED TO PUERTO RICO: The electric industry sent seven different teams to Puerto Rico over the weekend where each of them will head to a separate part of the devastated island to support power restoration efforts. Members of the American Public Power Association, the Edison Electric Institute and the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association will help the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers get the lights back on. Months after a hurricane slammed into the island, the government says less than 60 percent of electric capacity has been restored.

That comes as the New York Times reports the death toll on the island may actually be well over 1,000 rather than official count of 64.

TAKE A GLANCE! The Center for American Progress is out with a new analysis this morning warning of significant damage to wildlife like polar bears, migratory birds and caribou if ANWR is opened up as part of the Republican tax package.

What about Paris? A collection of environmental groups, including BankTrack and Rainforest Action Network, find in a new report that some $600 million has been processed by commercial banks since the Paris accord was signed that has gone to the top 120 companies planning to build new coal plants. Chinese and Japanese banks have been most involved in the deals. Link here.

SPOTTED: Senior EPA and Interior officials speaking at the Congressional Western Caucus' Winter Roundtable. EPA officials attending included senior policy advisor Mandy Gunasekara and senior advisor Albert Kelly, while the Interior officials were special assistant to the secretary Marshall Critchfield and adviser Amanda Kaster-Averill. ## Stories from POLITICO Pro

Zinke booked government helicopters to attend D.C. events Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/07/2017 06:31 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke spent more than $14,000 on government helicopters this summer to take himself and staff to and from official events near Washington, D.C., in order to accommodate his attendance at a swearing-in ceremony for his replacement in Congress and a horseback ride with Vice President Mike Pence, according to previously undisclosed official travel documents.

The travel logs, released to POLITICO via a Freedom of Information Act request, show Zinke using taxpayer-funded vehicles from the U.S. Park Police to help accommodate his political events schedule.

In a case detailed in the new documents, Zinke ordered a U.S. Park Police helicopter to take him and his chief of staff, Scott Hommel, to an emergency management exercise in Shepherdstown, W.Va., on June 21.

Zinke's staff justified the $8,000 flight by saying official business would prevent him leaving Washington before 2 p.m., too late to make the two-hour drive to the exercise, according to the documents.

The event that prevented Zinke from leaving before 2 p.m. was the swearing-in ceremony for Rep. Greg Gianforte (R-Mont.), according to Zinke's official Interior calendar. Gianforte, who won a special election for Zinke's old seat in May after assaulting a reporter, contributed along with his wife $15,800 to Zinke's two congressional campaigns.

"Secretary Zinke's last engagement in Washington D.C. is at 2 p.m.," an Interior staffer wrote as justification for using the helicopter. "Driving to [the West Virginia event] would not enable him to be on time and fully participate as scheduled."

Interior defended the trips.

"The swearing in of the Congressman is absolutely an official event, as is emergency management training," Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift said in an email Thursday. "Shame on you for not respecting the office of a Member of Congress."

Zinke also ordered a Park Police helicopter to fly him and another Interior official to and from Yorktown, Va., on July 7 in order to be back in Washington in time for a 4 p.m. horseback ride with Pence. The trip cost about $6,250, according to the documents.

The horseback ride through Rock Creek Park also included Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and CMS Administrator Seema Verma, according to a post on Pence's Facebook page.

While in Yorktown, Zinke completed a walking tour of the local Revolutionary War battlefield and attended a boating industry roundtable discussion, according to the documents. The day before the trip, an Interior trip planner added to the schedule a 30-minute flyover of an area where Dominion Energy is building high-voltage electric transmission lines to run across the James River.

Interior officials originally estimated that driving to Yorktown would take about three hours, although one noted that "there is a major construction project on I-64, which will slow things down."

In an email to Interior travel scheduler Tim Nigborowicz, an Interior employee justified Zinke's using the helicopter instead of less expensive method by saying "the Secretary will be able to familiarize himself with the in-flight capabilities of an aircraft he is in charge of" and that the Park Police staff on board would "provide an added measure of security to the Secretary during his travel."

Interior officials certified ahead of the flight that Zinke's use of the helicopter would not compromise law enforcement obligations.

The Park Police helicopter, Eagle One, is deployed for medevac and emergency response situations around Washington, a part of its mission Zinke praised later that month.

"U.S. Park Service helicopter pilot and crew provided a life-saving medevac flight during the attack on members of Congress during baseball practice," Zinke said in the July 25 video celebrating American Heroes Week.

The former Montana congressman and Navy SEAL is already being investigated by the Interior Department's Inspector General and the independent Office of Special Counsel for his mixing of official travel and political events. Interior earlier this year released records documenting Zinke's use of charter and military aircraft, including a $12,000 flight from Las Vegas to Montana that allowed him to give a speech for a hockey team owned by a major campaign donor.

Zinke attacks reporting on helicopter rides Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/09/2017 10:18 PM EDT

Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke on Saturday attacked POLITICO's coverage of his use of $14,000 in taxpayer-funded helicopter rides in the D.C. area — but offered no facts that contradicted the story that ran Thursday.

"Here are the #facts the DC media refuses to print," Zinke said in a statement on his official Twitter account. "Recent articles about official Interior Department helicopter usage are total fabrications and a wild departure from reality."

His statement went on to note — as POLITICO's story had said — that the trips in question had included a visit to an emergency management exercise in West Virginia and a flyover of a power line project in Virginia.

Zinke also defended a separate helicopter flight last summer over two national monuments in Nevada. POLITICO had reported in September on that flight, which Interior Department documents said cost at least $40,000.

POLITICO's reporting was based on records that the Interior Department had released under the Freedom of Information Act. Zinke's travels got more attention Friday in a follow-up story by The Associated Press that mentioned all the helicopter trips.

In his statement Saturday, Zinke wrote: "On these instances, I conducted an aerial survey of a million acres of federal monument lands, an aerial survey of power line project which was under scrutiny for possible compensatory migration corruption from the previous administration, and a national comment authority directed emergency response exercise." He added that all his trips "were thoroughly vetted and scrutinized."

Zinke's tweet came as prominent Democrats criticized his use of U.S. Park Police helicopters to fly between Washington, D.C., and the events in West Virginia and Virginia. The use of the speedy aircraft also allowed him to fit in two events in D.C. — a horseback ride through Rock Creek Park with Vice President Mike Pence, and the swearing-in ceremony of Rep. Greg Gianforte (R-Mont.), Zinke's successor in the congressional seal and a donor to Zinke's past campaigns.

Senate Environment and Resources Committee ranking member Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) said in a tweet Friday that she had asked Interior's inspector general to add the helicopter flights to its investigation of the secretary. The IG's office is already looking into Zinke's past mixing of official business with political events, including his use of a charter flight after speaking to the Las Vegas professional hockey team owned by a major donor.

In one of the flights POLITICO wrote about this week, Interior's staff at first approved Zinke's use of a Park Police helicopter to travel to a July 7 meeting of boating industry representatives in Yorktown, Virginia. Days later, it added an overview of a proposed high-voltage transmission line site to the same trip.

In justifying the use the helicopter, Interior's staff said on June 29 that it was needed to ensure he could make it back to D.C. in time for his "official event" with Pence. The Park Service approved the request on July 1, and Interior staff added the transmission line site review to the itinerary on July 6, according to official emails. The helicopter trip cost about $6,250.

"Following his visit to Yorktown, Secretary Zinke must return to Washington D.C. to attend an official event with Vice President Mike Pence at Rock Creek Park," an Interior staffer said in a July 4 email.

Earlier, Zinke and his chief of staff, Scott Hommel, used a helicopter to fly from the capital to attend an emergency management exercise in Shepherdstown, West Virginia, on June 21. Interior staff justified the flight by saying Zinke needed to attend Gianforte's swearing-in in Washington earlier in the day. That flight cost $8,000.

"Scott confirmed that we would like to use the helicopter to go round trip," Zinke's special assistant Caroline Boulton wrote in a June 16 email to department schedulers.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift had defended the flights in an email POLITICO published Thursday: "The swearing in of the Congressman is absolutely an official event, as is emergency management training," she wrote. "Shame on you for not respecting the office of a Member of Congress."

According to official Interior documents, Zinke also used a Bureau of Land Management helicopter on July 30 to survey the Gold Butte and Basin and Range national monuments outside Las Vegas as part of the national monument review President Donald Trump had tasked him with. Zinke proposed reducing the size of both monuments.

FEC fines Zinke campaign committee Back

By Ben Lefebvre | 12/08/2017 05:50 PM EDT

The Federal Election Commission fined Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke's congressional campaign committee $3,929 for failing to properly disclose contributions it received just before the 2016 election, according to commission documents released this week.

The 18 donations to Zinke for Congress came less than two weeks before Election Day and totaled $37,900, according to the FEC case file. FEC regulations calls for all donations of more than $1,000 made in the final weeks of an election cycle to be reported within 48 hours, a deadline the FEC said Zinke's campaign committee missed. The Montana Republican was reelected to the state's lone House seat last year before stepping down to join President Donald Trump's Cabinet.

Zinke for Congress Treasurer Lorna Kuney in a written response to the FEC in September attributed the mistake to a data entry error that she said was "truly just an unfortunate mistake" and asked the fine be dropped. The FEC declined her request, and Kuney paid the fine in October, according to the case file, which was made public Thursday. The document was first reported by the Center for Public Integrity's Dave Levinthal on Twitter.

The FEC last month in a separate case asked a leadership PAC established by Zinke, SEAL PAC, to explain discrepancies in its disclosure filings, including reporting $200,000 more cash on hand on Jan. 1, 2017, than it reported having a day earlier.

What's Next: SEAL PAC has until Dec. 26 to respond to the FEC's questions about discrepancies in its reports.

FERC's McIntyre presses for time Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/08/2017 04:26 PM EDT

New FERC Chairman Kevin McIntyre is hoping to give himself and his new colleagues a month to weigh their options before making a decision that could rewire large parts of the nation's electric grid.

McIntyre asked the Department of Energy late Thursday for another 30 days for him and the four other FERC commissioners to address Energy Secretary Rick Perry's request to alter power market rules to support struggling coal and nuclear power plants in the name of bolstering grid resiliency.

FERC is unlikely to either fully reject or adopt outright the proposal from Perry that calls for power plants that keep 90 days of inventory on site to receive full cost recovery — a requirement that only coal and nuclear power plants could meet. Instead, FERC observers said the agency could buy time by calling for a technical conference, or considering a plan such as the one The Energy Daily reported was being crafted by Commissioners Cheryl LaFleur and Rob Powelson to seek input through a "Notice of Inquiry" to regional power grid operators to report back on the resilience of their power networks and what could be improved.

Former Chairman Neil Chatterjee has hoped to help generators by putting an interim measure in place to support power plants facing closure while the commission sought a permanent solution, but that plan appeared to lack the support among the other commissioners.

DOE had asked FERC to take action by Monday, but McIntyre's request for more time could indicate there's no consensus among the five commissioners on what to do.

"We said (earlier this week) that if there weren't three votes for something, the issue could sit until there were," said Christi Tezak, managing director at analytics firm ClearView Energy Partners. "It appears to us that McIntyre would like to explore something between Chatterjee's preference for an interim solution and the LaFleur-Powelson NOI angle. This is something we thought was a reasonable outcome."

DOE has not yet replied to McIntyre's letter.

Perry's proposal has drawn broad criticism as a carve out that would cost power customers billions of dollars and was designed to support the coal industry in the PJM Interconnection, and the mining company run by coal magnate Bob Murray in particular.

Powelson, a Republican appointed by President Trump, has been vocally opposed to the proposed DOE rule. The plan that he and LaFleur have crafted would reportedly close the current DOE docket and open a new one that seeks input from grid managers — an idea that could create a long delay before any action was taken.

McIntyre's request for more time could create problems for Murray Energy, which has emphasized the need for a speedy outcome: One of Murray's top customers, FirstEnergy Solutions, is considering bankruptcy, which could be the first step to closing some big coal plants. But Murray Energy said it was not concerned with a possible 30-day delay.

"We believe that the sooner this rule is implemented, the better it will be for the American people," a spokesman said. "With that said, this extension request is a matter between FERC and Secretary Perry, and we defer to their judgment."

Bob Murray had early access to Rick Perry to share coal plan Back

By Eric Wolff | 12/07/2017 05:30 PM EDT

Coal magnate Bob Murray pitched Energy Secretary Rick Perry on his plan to throw an economic lifeline to coal companies less than a month before Perry set in motion plans to aid the industry, according to newly disclosed photographs that show the two meeting.

The liberal magazine In These Times obtained pictures of Murray and Perry from a March 29 meeting at Energy Department headquarters, less than a month after Perry was sworn in.

Several other officials were in attendance, including Andrew Wheeler, who at the time was a lobbyist for Murray and has since been nominated as the Environmental Protection Agency's No. 2 official.

The meeting puts Murray and Perry together at a crucial moment in the timeline of the Trump administration's push to save the struggling coal industry, an effort that would benefit Murray Energy in particular while raising electricity prices for potentially millions of people. A month before the meeting, one of Murray's biggest customers, FirstEnergy, told investors it was seriously considering seeking bankruptcy protection for its merchant division, FirstEnergy Solutions, a move that would likely void its supply contracts with Murray's coal mines.

Three weeks after Murray's visit, Perry would order a grid study that later became part of the justification for a proposed rule to reward coal and nuclear power plants for providing "grid resiliency." FERC, which has jurisdiction over the proposal, must make a decision on it by Monday.

At the time of the meeting, Wheeler was already the leading candidate to become the deputy administrator for EPA. Wheeler, who represented Murray as a lobbyist for Faegre Baker Daniels, would not be officially nominated for months. Wheeler, who has acknowledged participating in meetings on Murray's coal plan at DOE and on Capitol Hill, cleared committee last week and is awaiting Senate confirmation.

Murray is an outspoken supporter of President Donald Trump and held a fundraiser for him during the 2016 campaign.

DOE did not dispute the validity of the photos.

"Industry stakeholders visit the Department of Energy on a daily basis," DOE spokeswoman Shaylyn Hynes said, when asked about the meeting. "The DOE proposal to FERC was about the future and resiliency of the nation's power supply, an issue much bigger than one industry or company."

The photographs show Perry sitting at the head of a table in the Department of Energy, with Bob Murray, CEO of Murray Energy, to his left, and Wheeler down the table from Murray.

"Enclosed is an Action Plan for achieving reliable and low cost electricity ... and to assist in the survival of our Country's coal industry, which ... power grid reliability and low cost electricity," Murray writes in a cover letter to Perry, parts of which are visible in one photo from the meeting.

Though the document has never been publicly released, DOE critics say Murray's plan appears to have inspired DOE's grid study and the proposed rule Perry sent FERC in September. Copies are visible at the seats of most of the participants, including Perry and Murray. Wheeler, who told members of the Senate Environment Committee he had only seen the memo briefly, is not holding a copy in the photos obtained by In These Times. Murray told Greenwire in November he "didn't have any involvement" in writing the rule.

Murray has acknowledged sharing the plan with Trump.

"I gave Mr. Trump what I called an action plan very early," Murray said in a recent PBS Frontline documentary on EPA. "It's about three-and-a-half pages and — of what he needed to do in his administration. He's wiped out page one."

A spokesman for Bob Murray said that during the March 29 meeting, Murray did not discuss the DOE's proposed rule, and he added that he was not involved in drafting Perry's proposal.

The meeting appears to have been successful for all. One of the photos shows Perry and Murray in a big bear hug.

Brown: Trump doesn't fear 'wrath of God' Back

By Brent D. Griffiths | 12/10/2017 07:00 PM EDT

California Gov. Jerry Brown slammed President Donald Trump as a man who is not afraid of "the wrath of God."

"I don't think — President Trump has a fear of the Lord, the fear of the wrath of God, which leads one to more humility," Brown said in an interview airing Sunday on "60 Minutes" on CBS. "And this is such a reckless disregard for the truth and for the existential consequences that can be unleashed."

In the past, Trump has called climate change a hoax pushed by the Chinese.

Brown, a four-term governor of the state, said California is "not waiting for the deniers" as it confronts its most destructive wildfire season on record and prepares for what may become the new normal.

An outspoken advocate on the subject, Brown was among a handful of blue-state politicians who promised to stay the course of combating climate change even after Trump withdrew the United States from the Paris climate accord, saying it was not good for the country. Brown called that notion "preposterous."

"I'd say to Mr. Trump: Take a deeper look now is not the time to undo what every country in the world is committed to," Brown said.

On this and other issues, Brown argued that his state's reputation as being a Democratic bastion that is far out of touch with the rest of America is simply incorrect. Instead, he said, California is America's future; it just arrived sooner than everyone else — with Brown specifically pointing to states like Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan and Pennsylvania where Trump won just enough votes to win the White House.

"There's more confidence here; there's less fear. People are looking to the future," Brown said. They're not scared, they're not going inward, they're not scapegoating, they're not blaming — Mexican immigrants. They're not blaming the stranger. Just the opposite. It's a place that's alive."

As for his future, Brown told "60 Minutes" that he is looking forward to retiring in 2019 and spending time on his ranch north of Sacramento.

EPA announces 21 Superfund sites to prioritize Back

By Emily Holden | 12/08/2017 04:13 PM EDT

EPA has named 21 Superfund sites on its priority list for cleanup.

The list follows recommendations from a task force convened this summer. Administrator Scott Pruitt had previously said he would make a top-10 list of sites that needed the most attention.

"The list is designed to spur action at sites where opportunities exist to act quickly and comprehensively," EPA said in a press release. "The Administrator will receive regular updates on each of these sites."

There are more than 1,300 of the toxic waste sites around the country, and environmental advocates have warned that prioritizing just a few may take resources away from others and allow Pruitt to provide resources in states run by his political allies.

The new list includes sites in red states but also in New England and on the West Coast. It includes the San Jacinto Superfund site in the Houston area, which was damaged by flooding during Hurricane Harvey. EPA has already ordered two companies to pay $115 million for cleanup efforts there.

Murkowski draws energy policy wins despite health care stance

By Esther Whieldon

10/24/2017 05:00 PM EDT

It's been three months since the Trump administration first threatened reprisals against Alaska if Sen. Lisa Murkowski didn't get in line on repealing Obamacare.

Instead, it's giving her seemingly everything she could want.

The Interior Department is considering issuing new permits to drill off the Alaskan coast, taking the first steps toward opening the long off-limits Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil exploration, and edging toward building a road through the federally protected Izembek wilderness, a project long championed by Murkowski.

That's all despite the late July phone call from Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke to the chairwoman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to warn her that her opposition to the measure killing Obamacare could endanger federal projects in the state — a threat that quickly leaked to the media. And though she never backed the repeal, the administration has remained solidly behind her priorities.

"The Trump team appears to be learning that the tasty carrot is a better way of moving a senator than a poorly wielded stick," said Paul Bledsoe, who worked as a Clinton White House energy aide and is now a lecturer at American University.

Zinke's Interior Department is moving ahead with efforts to help reverse the long decline in Alaska's energy production, a priority for Murkowski, since the oil industry still provides about one-third of the state's jobs.

And President Donald Trump and Zinke have continued to put Alaskans into prominent administration posts, including nominating Tara Sweeney as assistant secretary of Indian Affairs. Sweeney, who was an executive for a corporation of indigenous groups that own millions of acres of oil-rich land, is the wife of Murkowski's former state director, Kevin Sweeney.

Zinke's late July calls to Murkowski and Sen. Dan Sullivan (R-Alaska) allegedly threatening to pull support from their energy and land priorities prompted lawmakers to seek a GAO probe, although a separate inquiry by Interior's inspector general ended in August after the two Alaska senators declined to discuss the incident with investigators.

For her part, Murkowski responded to Zinke by delaying her panel's consideration of several Interior and DOE nominees — though she advanced those nominations a few days later after sitting down with Zinke for a beer.

Interior spokeswoman Heather Swift in an emailed statement did not deny that the administration is trying to win Murkowski's support, and she noted Zinke "works with a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle to advance shared priorities" on such things as restoration of the Everglades in Florida and expanding access to the Sabinoso Wilderness in New Mexico.

The support for many of Murkowski's priorities after the dustup doesn't appear to be a coincidence, according to Kate Kelly, a former senior adviser to former Interior secretary Sally Jewell.

"These decisions don't happen in a vacuum," said Kelly, who is now at the Center for American Progress. In addition to heading the committee that oversees much of the Interior's activities, Murkowski also chairs the subcommittee that controls its appropriations.

"She holds the purse strings and occupies key positions on committees for the Interior department, so it's a smart move to keep her happy," Kelly said.

Murkowski maintained that the administration is not trying to sway her.

"Absolutely not," she told POLITICO in a brief interview. "I think in fairness the administration is working on issues that are important and they care about. And these are matters that we've been talking about with them since they came into office, so this is about priorities that they have laid down, and we agree."

Bledsoe agreed that Murkowski and the Trump administrations share many of the same priorities in boosting energy development on public lands and removing Obama administration restrictions. But he said he saw Interior's actions as an acknowledgment that "they need her every bit as much as she needs them. As the near-misses on their big legislative items have accumulated, the White House is recognizing that they're not immune from old-fashioned politics."

After years of stonewalling by the Obama administration, Murkowski appears to be close to winning Interior's permission for a 12-mile road through the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge to link the isolated city of King Cove to an all-weather airport. Documents obtained through a public records request by Defenders of Wildlife show the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is pursuing a land exchange for the road. The records, first reported by The Washington Post, include emails among staff that say the push for the exchange is coming from Zinke's office.

On the oil front, the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management is expecting to release a draft five-year offshore oil and gas leasing plan by the end of the year to allow drilling in parts of Alaska's Chukchi and Beaufort seas, which former President Barack Obama had closed off last year.

And Zinke is quietly working on an environmental review that would allow oil companies to perform seismic testing in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, according to an Aug. 11 memorandum from the FWS Alaska region acting Director James Kurth. The House is slated to vote Thursday to formally back the Senate's budget resolution passed last week that included language that would give Murkowski a path forward for opening ANWR up to drilling.

In August, BLM issued a call for nominations for new oil and gas leases in Alaska's National Petroleum Reserve, an area near ANWR that has long been home to oil production. BLM also published an order in the Federal Register on Tuesday lifting a ban on mining on 700 acres near Fairbanks that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration had set aside as a buffer around an array of weather satellite receivers. The land sits next to an open-pit gold mine owned by Kinross, which has conducted exploratory drilling in the area.

The Interior actions may not be designed to win Murkowski support for any specific Trump policies, said Pat Pourchot, who served as Interior's special assistant for Alaskan affairs under former secretary Jewell, but fostering a good relationship may pay dividends down the road.

"It doesn't matter if it's an exact quid pro quo or not, but it can't hurt to try to have good relationship with people in other branches of government or other branches of congress that might help you on your priorities," Pourchot said.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski is aiming to have President Donald Trump's two pending FERC nominees confirmed before the Senate flies off for its recess at the end of the week.

"I was talking with our leadership today about it. I want to try to get it shook loose before we take a break," the Alaska Republican, who chairs the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said of the nominees. The Senate is not scheduled to be in session next week.

Kevin McIntyre, Trump's pick to chair the agency, and Rich Glick, who serves as general counsel to energy committee Democrats, were approved by Murkowski's committee on a voice vote last month to become FERC members.

Sen. Maria Cantwell, the top Democrat on the energy committee, has said she was "favorably impressed" by McIntyre who, when confirmed by the full Senate with Glick, will bring FERC's leadership board back to full strength for the first time since late 2015.

WHAT'S NEXT: The Senate is scheduled to be on recess for the week of Columbus Day and is rarely in session on Friday, suggesting that the FERC nominees could be confirmed in the next day or so.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairwoman Lisa Murkowski aims to hold a vote on four FERC and Interior Department nominees late next week.

"My hope is that we might be able to get them out ... maybe a week from now, which would be great," Murkowski told reporters today after a confirmation hearing.

The nominees are Joseph Balash, to be Interior assistant secretary for land and minerals management; Ryan Nelson, to be Interior solicitor; and Richard Glick and Kevin McIntyre, to be FERC commissioners.

Murkowski at the hearing said she will urge her colleagues to submit their questions for the record quickly and asked the nominees to be "rapid with your responses ... so that you can get to work. We can't get you there fast enough," she said.

WHAT'S NEXT: The committee will vote on the nominees as soon as next week.

The top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee are calling on the Senate leadership to press for weather-resilient distributed energy to rebuild the power grids in hurricane-ravaged Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

Committee chairman Lisa Murkowski and ranking member Maria Cantwell, today signed on to a letter spearheaded by Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.). Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Rob Portman (R-Ohio) joined them.

The senators said Hurricanes Irma and Maria exposed the vulnerability of the power grids on the islands, and some communities face months without electricity. Congress has already approved about $52 billion in aid for recent hurricanes and is expected to sign off on more spending.

"Decentralized energy resources operating in microgrids are more likely to remain functioning during and after storms," the letter said, noting that the declining costs of solar, wind, energy efficiency and battery storage in many instances makes them more affordable than existing power sources. The islands rely mostly on power plants fueled by oil, natural gas and coal.

In a speech over the weekend at the Alaska Federation of Natives convention, Murkowski broke with the party line to emphasize that "climate change is real" and she backed adding more alternative energy across the state, where rural communities often rely on diesel generators.

"Our world is changing," she said, according to Alaska Public Media. "And we all know that climate change is at the heart of this change."

National Parks to reopen in U.S. Virgin Islands following hurricanes

USVI National Parks are top tourist destinations, Visitors spent in $70M for USVI in 2016

WASHINGTON – Today, U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke and U.S. Virgin Islands Governor Kenneth Mapp announced the reopening of Christiansted National Historic Site and Buck Island Reef National Monument on the island of St. Croix and Trunk Bay Beach at Virgin Islands National Park on the island of St. John. The National Park Service is an important economic engine in the USVI, attracting more than a half a million visitors in 2016 and supporting 900 jobs in the community. Visitors spent $70 million and helped support $34 million in labor and more than $90 million in economic output.

“I couldn’t be more proud of the hard work of National Park Service staff, volunteers, and their partners in the Virgin Islands. Their commitment to the park and to the community is inspiring. I’ve heard many stories of staff tending to the needs of the park and their neighbors before even taking care of themselves,” said Secretary Zinke. “We have a long way to go, but every day we make progress toward getting these parks fully functional to visitors and back to providing important economic support to these communities as they return to normal.”

"The reopening of Buck Island Reef National Monument, Trunk Bay Beach, and Christiansted National Historic Site represents another significant milestone in the recovery of the U.S. Virgin Islands," Governor Kenneth E. Mapp said. "These are, of course, premiere destinations for visitors, but are also significant recreation areas for Virgin Islanders - many of whom traditionally celebrate Thanksgiving at our beaches. Thanks to the Department of Interior, the National Park and all the Virgin Islanders that continue to work on facilitating our efforts to rebuild."

“National parks such as Christiansted National Historic Site, Buck Island Reef National Monument on St. Croix and Trunk Bay Beach at Virgin Islands National Park on St. John protect some of the best of our natural heritage. Together with other protected areas, they attract millions of visitors annually and help to protect the U.S. Virgin Islands' unique wildlife by acting as a refuge for threatened species," said Delegate Stacey Plaskett. "Although their primary purpose is the protection of biodiversity, National Parks also deliver other invaluable economic, social, cultural, and health benefits to our territory's residents. Future generations deserved the right to see these natural values intact and protected as we do today."

The National Park Service protects and preserves significant historic sites, important ecosystems, and popular beaches that are vital to the tourism economy in the Virgin Islands. For example, visitors to Virgin Islands National Park spent $70 million in 2016.

Christiansted National Historic Site demonstrates the architectural, economic, and political influence of 18th century Europe like no other place in the Caribbean. The 19,015-acre Buck Island Reef National Monument includes the 176-acre island consisting of tropical dry forest and 18,839 acres of submerged lands and coral reefs.

With the opening of Trunk Bay Beach, Virgin Islands National Park now has three popular tourist destinations ready to receive visitors. Honeymoon and Hawksnest beaches reopened on November 13. Water sports equipment rental is currently available at Honeymoon Beach and equipment rental will resume at Trunk Bay Beach today. Taxi service, essential to getting visitors to park beaches, has also resumed.

To reopen Trunk Bay Beach, the National Park Service stabilized numerous structures and removed fallen trees and more than 480 cubic yards of debris. Dive teams removed underwater debris from swimming areas, however visitors are encouraged to use caution when swimming in all areas of Virgin Islands National Park.

While these sites are open to visitors, many services and features at NPS sites across the islands remain closed or inaccessible while cleanup continues.

For continued updates on the status of national park areas in the Caribbean and elsewhere that have been affected by hurricanes and severe weather please visit: <http://go.nps.gov/hurricanes>.

New Interior Department Survey Shows HUGE Increase in Recoverable Energy Resources in Federal, State and Native Lands and Waters in Alaska

17.6 Billion Barrels of Oil, 50 Trillion Cubic Feet of Gas

Secretary Zinke praises scientists at BOEM and USGS who partnered to produce the updated survey of the Western Beaufort Sea Planning Area and NPR-A

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Today, U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke released an updated resource assessment for the National Petroleum Reserve in Alaska (NPR-A), the Western Beaufort Sea, adjacent State and Native lands, and State waters, which estimates the mean undiscovered, technically recoverable resources both on and offshore to include 17.6 billion barrels of oil and more than 50 trillion cubic feet of gas.

"Earlier this year I visited the North Slope to talk with Alaska Natives and elected officials about what responsible energy development means for the communities and the state. The response was overwhelmingly positive and the message was clear: the path to American Energy Dominance starts in Alaska," said Secretary Zinke. "Today's updated assessment is a big step toward that goal. Thanks to the incredible work of scientists at the USGS and BOEM, we know what's available and what our potential is. That's important because with the scientific knowledge, industry partners are more willing to explore the area. New discoveries have changed our geologic knowledge of the area - and these assessments show that the North Slope will remain an important energy hub for decades to come in order to meet the energy needs of our nation."

The assessment was conducted by the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management (BOEM), the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), and the U.S. Geological Survey (USGS), which are all bureaus under the management of the Department. USGS led onshore efforts, and BOEM led offshore efforts with data contributed by BLM. Additional information was provided by state and industry partners.

Onshore, USGS estimates a mean of 8.7 billion barrels of oil and 25 trillion cubic feet of gas. This is a significant increase from the 2010 resource assessment, which estimated a mean of 1.5 billion barrels of oil.

Offshore, BOEM's revised estimates of mean undiscovered technically recoverable resources in the Beaufort Sea Outer Continental Shelf Planning Area are 8.9 billion barrels of oil and 27.7 trillion cubic feet of gas. BOEM's updated assessment resulted in a net increase of nearly 700 million barrels of oil equivalent over BOEM's 2016 Beaufort Sea Planning Area assessment.

"I am always mindful of the need to protect the environment and our subsistence way of life and I appreciate the Department of Interior's commitment to responsible development. This resource assessment tells us something our North Slope Inupiat people already know--Alaska has incredible potential," said Alaska Native officials North Slope Borough Mayor and whaling captain, Harry K. Brower Jr. "The Borough and the majority of our residents have long supported the careful and responsible development of oil and gas resources within our region that protects the balance between economic development and our subsistence way of life."

"Just as we have always known, this assessment shows that the NPR-A has significant potential and will remain a big part of our energy future," Chairman Lisa Murkowski said. "I thank Secretary Zinke for traveling to this area with me earlier this year, for directing USGS to update its resource assessment, and for working with Alaskans on a better plan for responsible development."

"The good news for Alaska and America's energy dominance continues," said Senator Dan Sullivan. "Alaska's vast resources offer a superior opportunity for us to provide jobs, energy, and security to our nation and our allies. This updated assessment by the USGS and BOEM shows that the resources are there and the time is now to invest in our vast Arctic energy potential."

"I am pleased with the Secretary's announcement," said Alaska Congressman Don Young. "I have consistently fought to defend and grow both the Alaskan and American economy. Finding more recoverable oil in the NPR-A will be a benefit to everyone in our nation. I stand with the majority of Alaskans in asking Secretary Zinke and the President to continue efforts to expand our energy independence through exploration and responsible development of the NPR-A and Coastal Plain."

"A frontier to many, Alaska's North Slope is our home; it is rich with potential," said Richard Glenn, ASRC Executive Vice President of Lands and Natural Resources. "Any good land use and resource exploration decisions require the best available subsurface data and interpretation. I commend our colleagues on the USGS team for taking up this effort." ASRC is an Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (ANCSA) regional corporation. ASRC owns more than five million acres of lands on the North Slope. Shareholder owners of ASRC are the predominant majority of the residents of the eight villages of the North Slope.

"BOEM is pleased to participate in this partnership with USGS to use shared science and new technology to produce these increased estimates of oil and gas potential in northern Alaska," said Walter Cruickshank, acting director of BOEM.

"This assessment is a testament to the expertise of our geologists and energy resource scientists," said Bill Werkheiser, acting director of the USGS. "These results also show the value of our partnerships, particularly with our sister agencies, the State of Alaska, and industry."

The USGS, BLM and BOEM conducted these assessments in compliance with Secretarial Order 3352 and as part of a program directed at estimating the undiscovered, technically recoverable oil and gas resources of priority petroleum basins in the United States. The next USGS assessments to be announced in Alaska are of the Alaska 1002 Area and the area west of the NPR-A.

This assessment is for undiscovered, technically recoverable oil and gas resources. Undiscovered resources are those that are estimated to exist based on geologic knowledge and theory, while technically recoverable resources are those that can be produced using currently available technology and industry practices.

The estimated undiscovered oil resources are significantly higher than previous estimates, mainly because two geologic formations in the NPR-A host recent oil discoveries that are larger than anticipated. The current USGS estimate is more than six times the previous USGS assessments of the Central North Slope (2005) and NPR-A (2010).

Moreover, the USGS assessment team made use of three-dimensional seismic reflection data in northeastern NPR-A and adjacent State lands and waters, provided by partners like the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, to estimate the number and size of seismic amplitude anomalies, which are considered viable proxies for undrilled prospects.

To find out more about USGS energy assessments and other energy research, please visit the USGS Energy Resources Program website, sign up for our Newsletter, and follow us on Twitter.

More information about BOEM resource evaluation on the Outer Continental Shelf (OCS) is available on the BOEM website.

Industry Background

Industry discoveries announced during 2015–2017 indicate that the potential for larger oil accumulations in both formations is greater than previously thought. The Pikka and Horseshoe oil discoveries near the Colville River delta just outside NPR-A were announced in 2015 and 2017. Industry announcements suggest that the two discoveries 21 miles apart likely are in the same oil pool, which may hold more than 1 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

Industry announced the discovery of the Willow oil pool in the Nanushuk Formation in NPR-A in 2017 with estimated resources of more than 300 million barrels of oil. Multiple wells have been announced to be drilled during the 2017-2018 winter drilling season at both Pikka-Horseshoe and Willow to further delineate these discoveries.

Industry announced an oil discovery in the deeper Torok Formation at Smith Bay, less than one mile offshore from NPR-A, in 2016 to hold more than 1 billion barrels of oil. Another oil discovery in the Torok Formation was announced in 2015 at the Cassin prospect in NPR-A, not far from the Willow discovery. No plans for drilling have yet been announced at either Smith Bay or Cassin.

E&E News: Senate advances Bernhardt for deputy

July 20, 2017

The Senate this afternoon advanced the nomination of David Bernhardt for Interior Department deputy secretary, teeing up the final confirmation vote expected Monday.

Senators voted 56-39 to invoke cloture on the nomination. All Republicans present, six Democrats and one independent voted in favor.

Democrats Martin Heinrich of New Mexico, Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota, Joe Manchin of West Virginia, Joe Donnelly of Indiana, Brian Schatz of Hawaii and Michael Bennet of Colorado voted with Republicans, as did independent Angus King of Maine.

Senators not voting were: Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), Ben Sasse (R-Neb.) and Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.). Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), recovering from surgery and recently diagnosed with brain cancer, was absent.

Bernhardt's nomination has attracted strong support because of his extensive public policy experience in the executive and legislative branches, but also robust opposition from Democrats and green groups alarmed by his ties to oil and gas lobbyists.

The Campaign for Accountability today filed a complaint with the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia to investigate whether Bernhardt violated the Lobbying Disclosure Act by continuing to lobby despite formally withdrawing his registration in 2016.

Emails obtained through the California Public Records Act show Bernhardt continued to advise the Westlands Water District, a California agricultural organization, after terminating his lobbying registration (Greenwire, July 18).

Bernhardt was registered as a Westlands lobbyist between June 2011 and Nov. 18, 2016, when he was a member of the Trump administration's Interior Department transition team and potential nominee. The president formally picked him in April.

Bernhardt, who had served as chairman of the natural resources department at the law firm Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck LLP, previously promised lawmakers that if confirmed, he would "not participate personally or substantially in any particular matter involving" his former clients or "specific parties in which I know the firm is a party or represents a party" for two years, unless he receives authorization to do so.

Administration aides have said they thoroughly vetted Bernhardt on ethics. They and other defenders, including Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.), call him an experienced nominee.

In addition to his lobbying career, the Coloradan has worked as a Capitol Hill aide and served as an Interior official during the George W. Bush administration.

Bernhardt has taken heat over allegations of mismanagement at Interior during his tenure there, including a drug and sex scandal at the former Minerals Management Service and political interference in endangered species decisions.

'Disqualifying'

Energy and Natural Resources Committee ranking member Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) has led the opposition to Bernhardt and spoke on the floor before today's vote.

Cantwell said that while it's true Bernhardt has "considerable" experience to do the job, the revolving-door nature of his career continues to concern her and raises a serious appearance of conflict-of-interest issues.

By putting forward Bernhardt as Interior's No. 2, President Trump is not helping to drain the swamp, "he's helping to fill it," Cantwell said.

The League of Conservation Voters also reiterated its opposition to Bernhardt today after sending a letter last month to the full Senate urging it to reject the nomination.

"Bernhardt's long list of conflicts of interest alone should be disqualifying — but given the Trump administration's incredible disregard for integrity, science and facts, it's no surprise that a top nominee would have a record of altering government science for political gain and overseeing an office plagued by scandal," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, LCV's senior vice president for government affairs.

Sittenfeld added: "We strongly urge senators to oppose Bernhardt's nomination and will continue to hold Congress and the administration accountable for putting polluter profits ahead of our clean air, clean water, public lands and families' health."

Zinke 'miserable' by lack of help

Gardner on the floor today praised Bernhardt's experience and commitment to public service, noting that other nominees considered by the Energy and Natural Resources panel have toggled between government and the private sector.

"What we see is another nominee, dedicated public servant, who gained experience in the private sector and is willing to come back to public service to give back to our great country," said Gardner, who noted that Bernhardt worked with his wife, Jaime, at Interior during the Bush administration. "Mr. Bernhardt's integrity and ability are two of his strongest qualities for his nomination."

Several stakeholders have voiced their support for Bernhardt as well, including the Colorado River District, Colorado Water Congress, Southern Ute Indian Tribe, Outdoor Recreation Industry Roundtable and Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership.

Yesterday, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) talked with reporters about the lack of confirmed appointees in place at Interior — and how it's making Secretary Ryan Zinke's life "miserable."

"There are a whole lot of problems that could be solved if Bernhardt was there now," the chairman said. "The Senate waiting as long as it has is wrong, it's simply wrong."

Former Texas comptroller Susan Combs, who has been nominated for a top position at the Department of Interior, assured senators Thursday she would work closely with states on conservation policies that can impact oil and gas drilling and other development on federal lands.

During a hearing before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Combs promised a "collaborative" approach during questioning from western states including Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, and Sen. Mike Lee, R-Utah.

"Secretary [Ryan] Zinke did discuss trust a number of times," she said. "He wants to be sure sure field offices are out there working in an open collaborative way."
State officials in western states were frequently at odds with the Obama administration over tougher regulations on developing federal lands, which in some states constitute more than 60 percent of the total lands mass.

Combs, who served in Texas state government for two decades and was the state's first female agriculture commissioner, has been nominated by President Donald Trump to Assistant Secretary of the Interior overseeing policy, management and budget.

On Thursday she took tough questions from Sen. Diane Cantwell, ranking member on the committee, for a report in the Washington Post last month that Zinke had reassigned up to 50 senior officials with the Interior Department's Senior Executive Service, including the department's top climate policy official, Joel Clement.

"I'm asking the inspector general to look into what the department is doing," Cantwell said. Combs responded that while she didn't "have any particular information on the reassignments" she understood such moves were part of a career building protocol.

"[Senior Executive Service officials] are supposed to be mobile to add to their resumes," she said.

Ohio River jam highlights absence of Trump's infrastructure plan

By Eric Wolff and Tanya Snyder

10/12/2017 06:59 PM EDT

Shipments of coal and grain are paralyzed at a critical chokepoint on the Ohio River due to dilapidated infrastructure, highlighting the need for the kind of major capital investment that President Donald Trump promised, in a speech along the banks of the same river, three months ago.

Lock 52 on the Ohio River in southern Illinois closed Oct. 9 because its infrastructure is too decrepit to function effectively in high water, and it could be several more days before the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers reopens it. The closure has created a 57-mile backup of 51 towboats and 564 barges waiting to pass, according to the Waterways Council, an advocacy group for water infrastructure.

Trump visited this key inland waterway in June, emphasizing the importance of waterways and promising investment. But Trump's fiscal 2018 budget proposal called for cuts to civil works spending. And his campaign promise of $1 trillion for infrastructure is so far unrealized, even as the New Deal-era locks and dams on the Ohio River degrade and unscheduled delays balloon.

That's left commodities producers, who depend on waterways for bulk transportation, in the lurch. In 2015, companies shipped 575 million tons of commodities worth $302 billion via waterways. Of that total, coal makes up the largest single industry at 23 percent, with grains following at 15 percent.

Waterways infrastructure, much of which was built in the 1930s as part of President Franklin Roosevelt's public works programs, is long past its expected lifespan. The Waterways Council says unscheduled delays have grown by 700 percent over the last decade. The closure of a single lock on the Mississippi River during harvest season could cost $933 million, according to a University of Tennessee study.

Carol Labashosky, a spokeswoman for the Louisville district of the Army Corps of Engineers, said having to close Lock 52 isn't unique historically, but there have been frequent intermittent closures at this lock as well as another one downriver throughout September and October. "This fall we've had quite a few closures," Labashosky said. "Some of them have only been a couple of days or one day, but this is a lengthy delay."

Labashosky said they'll reopen the lock "as soon as the river cooperates," which she estimated would happen Friday or Saturday. Others are betting on Oct. 15 or 16.

Industries reliant on waterways are looking to Trump's promises of infrastructure investment to help modernize and update the locks and dams. The Waterways Council agrees. Deb Calhoun, a spokeswoman for the group, said they want to "hold the administration's feet to the fire.

"The president said we need to fix it," she said.

In June, Trump spoke on the banks of the Ohio River, in front of a barge filled with West Virginia coal, to proclaim that "America must have the best, fastest and most reliable infrastructure anywhere in the world." Noting the "dilapidated system of locks and dams that are more than half a century old" and the "$8.7 billion maintenance backlog that is only getting bigger and getting worse," Trump declared: "We cannot accept these conditions any longer."

But in May the administration released a fiscal 2018 budget that proposed to cut the Corps' civil works budget by about 17 percent. The amount proposed would fund only a small number of the 25 congressionally authorized priority projects, which have a combined portfolio value of $8.8 billion.

Calhoun said they are "trying to move forward and not stop and go backwards," and observed that the budget came out when Trump was "pretty new on the job."

Trump's budget did address the urgent bottleneck at Locks and Dams 52 and 53. Though it proposed to shut down work on four ongoing Corps waterways projects, it requested $26 million out of the Inland Waterways Trust Fund for the Olmsted Locks and Dam project, which was supposed to solve the problems at Locks and Dams 52 and 53 years ago, but has been mired in delays due to a misguided attempt at a new dam-building method.

The Olmsted project, authorized in 1988, was supposed to be finished in 10 years for $775 million. The Corps claims it will be done next summer, nearly 30 years later — with a final cost close to $3 billion.

For the remainder of the 25 projects Congress wants to see built, industries are waiting on the infrastructure package Trump promised during the campaign.

Trump himself hasn't spoken much about his infrastructure package since proposing that $1 trillion in spending could be leveraged by $200 billion from the federal government. In fact, he has since indicated he may be souring on public-private partnerships, which administration officials and Republican lawmakers had long said would fund 80 percent of the plan. The battle over health care has pushed back the promised tax overhaul, which is not expected to be quick business either. The fall timeline for Congress to craft a legislative infrastructure package has slipped away, and no one knows to when.

Ohio-based coal producer Murray Energy depends on inland waterways to move its product, and is calling for more spending.

"We certainly support President Trump's commitment to rebuild America's infrastructure, particularly the locks and dams along the Ohio, Monongahela and Mississippi Rivers," spokesman Gary Broadbent told POLITICO.

Even if the Olmsted Locks and Dam opens on time next summer, the project won't be finished until 2022, when the existing Lock 52 and 53 are finally pulled out of the river.

The weak results from the lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska are giving Democrats ammunition in their fight to stop Republicans from opening the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge under the tax bill.

Democrats are making hay out of the fact only two companies bid in what Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke had hailed as an "unprecedented" offering of acreage in the NPR-A, and they say the lease sale, which generated only $1.2 million, undercuts Republican claims that allowing drilling in a portion of ANWR would generate $1 billion over 10 years. The latest report from the CBO, shared internally with budget staffers, estimated ANWR revenues would fall short by about $366 million.

House Natural Resources ranking member Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and two other committee members sent a letter to CBO Director Keith Hall asking for a re-do on ANWR drilling revenue estimates in light of the poor NPR-A showing.

But Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), the driving force behind putting the refuge in the budget package, said the lease sale had little bearing on prospects for ANWR, however. The refuge is believed to hold as much as 10 times the billion barrels of oil estimated to lie buried in the petroleum reserve, Murkowski said.

"Different fields, different prospectivity," Murkowski told reporters.

Meanwhile, House Natural Resources Chairman Rob Bishop (R-Utah) said negotiations over ANWR and how much money it might bring to federal coffers is ongoing.

"I'm going to see all sorts of numbers being thrown out at the last few minutes," Bishop told POLITICO. "We'll look at them. We'll still negotiate this process."

WHAT'S NEXT: Republicans will meet in conference to reconcile the House and Senate versions of the tax bill.

President Trump and Secretary Zinke Announce Modification to Utah Monuments, Resulting in 5 Unique National Monument Units Totaling More Than 1.2 Million Acres

Modifications protect paleontological resources, Native American artifacts and other objects of historic or scientific interest while restoring traditional use and access to public land

SALT LAKE CITY – Acting upon the recommendation of U.S. Secretary of the Interior Ryan Zinke, and with the support of Utah's governor, Congressional delegation, local officials, and residents, President Donald J. Trump today signed proclamations to adjust the boundaries and management of Utah's Bears Ears National Monument \(BENM\) and Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument \(GSENM\). The proclamations modify the boundaries of those monuments and result in five unique monument units within the two monuments which protect important objects of historical and scientific interest.

"No one values the splendor of Utah more than the people of Utah – and no one knows better how to use it. Families will hike and hunt on land they have known for generations, and they will preserve it for generations to come." said President Donald J. Trump. "The Antiquities Act does not give the Federal Government unlimited power to lock up millions of acres of land and water, and it's time we ended this abusive practice. Public lands will once again be for public use."

"I thank President Trump for his leadership on the Monument Review and for keeping his promise to make sure the rural voice is heard once again," said Secretary Zinke. "As I visited the Monuments in Utah, I met with Americans on all sides of the issue -- from ranchers to conservationists to tribal leaders -- and found that we agree on wanting to protect our heritage while still allowing public access to public land. The people of Utah overwhelmingly voiced to us that public land should be protected not for the special interests, but for the citizens of our great country who use them, and this is what President Trump is doing today. Bears Ears and Grand Staircase will remain under federal protection, will adhere to the spirit and letter of the Antiquities Act, and -- even after our modification -- combined will still be nearly twice the size of Rhode Island."

"By acting on Secretary Zinke's thoughtful recommendations, President Trump has restored balance to our public lands discussion," said Governor Gary Herbert of Utah. "We are pleased that Utahns once again have a voice in the process of determining appropriate uses of these public lands that we love. By reducing these super-sized monuments to a size consistent with the intent of the law, new doors of dialogue have opened up that will allow thoughtful, long-term protection of these federal lands. Federal, state, local and tribal officials can now convene to craft legislation for appropriate special protections and responsible recreational uses."

"Thank you Secretary Zinke, for coming to San Juan, Kane, and Garfield counties and listening to the local grassroots people. Your boots on the ground approach was unexpected, but well received and appreciated," said San Juan County Commissioner Rebecca Benally. "Thank you Senator Hatch. You and your staff have been champions for us. Thank you for never giving up. For believing we could rectify a wrong and for being a fighter for San Juan County and our people. Thank you President Trump. Thank you for not being a typical politician and passing us over. Thank you for caring about San Juan County. We may be only 15,000 strong, but we matter. We appreciate you willing to take the backlash from the special interest groups as you stand for the people and the economy of San Juan County."

"I'm thrilled and grateful to President Trump and Secretary Zinke for giving Utahns a voice in the protection of federal lands in Utah," said Senator Orrin Hatch. "The President's proclamation represents a balanced solution and a win for everyone on all sides of this issue. It also represents a new beginning in the way national monuments are designated, paving the way for more local input, and taking into account the actual letter and intent of the Antiquities Act, which calls for the 'smallest area compatible with proper care and management of the objects to be protected.'"

Bears Ears National Monument: The BENM will now encompass two monument units, Shash Jáa and Indian Creek, which will continue to be jointly managed by the Bureau of Land Management and U.S. Forest Service. Shash Jáa is approximately 129,980 acres and Indian Creek is approximately 71,896 acres. Collectively, at approximately 201,876 acres in size, Bears Ears remains larger than Utah's Bryce Canyon National Park and Zion National Park combined. The new proclamation allows for increased public access to the land and restores traditional use allowance for activities like cattle grazing and motorized recreation, and tribal collection of wood and herbs. Objects that remain within monument boundaries include: the "Bears Ears" buttes, Lime Ridge Clovis Site, Moon House Ruin, Doll House Ruin, Indian Creek Rock Art, and Newspaper Rock. The federal lands excluded from the monument will continue to be managed by the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) and the U.S. Forest Service.

In addition, the President's proclamation provides that the Bears Ears Commission will provide guidance and recommendations for the Shash Jáa unit of the monument and will be expanded to include a Native American San Juan County Commissioner elected by the majority-Native American voting district in that County. The President and Secretary will also request that Congress formally allocate Tribal co-management of the monument.

Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument: The GSENM will now consist of three distinct monument units, the “Grand Staircase” (209,993 acres), “Kaiparowits” (551,034 acres), and “Escalante Canyons” (242,836 acres), and all three will be managed by the BLM. The three new monument areas collectively total 1,003,863 acres, which is larger than the entire state of Rhode Island. The federal lands not included in the new monuments will continue to be managed by the BLM.

In the 20 years since designation of the GSENM, the objects identified by the proclamation have been more thoroughly examined and mapped, which offered the opportunity to examine the significance of the objects previously identified and determine the proper size of the reservation necessary to protect those objects. The modified monument includes important objects identified in the original designation, including those areas with the highest concentration of fossil resources, important landscape features such as the Grand Staircase, Upper Paria Canyon System, Kaiparowits Plateau, Escalante Natural Bridge, Upper Escalante Canyons, East Kaibab Monocline, Grosvenor Arch, Old Paria Townsite, Dance Hall Rock, and relict plant communities such as No Mans Mesa.

FACT VS FICTION: Antiquities Act and Monument Review

Myth: No president has shrunk a monument.

False: Monuments have been reduced at least eighteen times under presidents on both sides of the aisle. Some examples include President John F. Kennedy excluding Bandelier National Monument, Presidents Taft, Wilson, and Coolidge reducing Mount Olympus National Monument, and President Eisenhower reducing the Great Sand Dunes National Monument in Colorado.

Myth: The monument review will sell/transfer public lands to states.

False: This is not true. The Secretary adamantly opposes the wholesale sale or transfer of public lands. The Antiquities Act only allows Federal land to be reserved as a national monument. Therefore, if any monument is reduced, the land would remain federally owned and would be managed by the appropriate Federal land management agency, such as the BLM, U.S. Forest Service, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, or the National Park Service (NPS).

Myth: Removing the monument designation from land will leave Native American artifacts and paleontological objects subject to looting or desecration.

False: This is not true. Whether these resources are found on land designated as a monument, national forest, BLM- managed public land, or other federal land, it is generally illegal to remove or disrupt these resources without a permit issued by the federal government.

Myth: The monument review will close/sell/transfer national parks.

False: No national parks are under review.

Myth: The review was done without meeting advocates for national monuments.

False: The Secretary visited eight monuments in six states and personally hosted more than 60 meetings attended by hundreds of local stakeholders. Attendees included individuals and organizations representing all sides of the debate ranging from environmental organizations like the Wilderness Society and the Nature Conservancy to county commissioners and, residents, and ranchers who prefer multiple use of the land.

Myth: Tribal Nations were not consulted.

False: This is patently false. Before traveling to Utah, the Secretary met with Tribal representatives in his office. On his first day in Utah in May, the Secretary met with the Bears Ears Inter-Tribal Coalition in Salt Lake City, for just under two hours. Throughout the four-day survey of the Utah monuments, the Secretary also met with local Tribal representatives who represent different sides of the debate. The Secretary also met with Tribal representatives for their input on several other monuments from Maine to New Mexico to Oregon and everywhere in between. Additionally, the Department hosted several Tribal listening sessions at the Department and across the country, including a four hour session with the Acting Deputy Secretary on May 30th.
